Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this hospital for a single reserve or for a large section of country ?

Mr. DALY. It will accommodate the Bloods, Piegans and Blackfeet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it proposed to erect hospitals on other reserves ?

Mr. DALY. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What special reason exists for erecting this hospital ?

Mr. DALY. These Indians are not much inclined as some other tribes to pursue habits of industry. Owing to their proximity to the American boundary much disease prevails among them, and it is absolutely necessary that this hospital should be provided.

To complete Red Deer Industrial School..... $6,000

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like to inquire with respect to the inspection of schools in the North-west. I notice very large fees and travelling expenses are paid to inspectors. One inspector named Hughill received no less than $2,300; he inspected eighty-three schools at $20 each; and his travelling expenses amounted to $675. No doubt these schools are scattered over the North-west Territories and a considerable amount is required for travelling expenses, but the expenditure under this head seems to be excessive. Rev. D. Gillies inspected seven schools at $20 each, and his travelling expenses were considerable.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will understand that the item under consideration is in connection with an Indian industrial school. The inspectors the hon. gentleman refers to are not, of course, inspectors of Indian schools and the expenditures for inspection of public schools are under the North-west Legislature. The item appears in the Auditor-General's Report because all the accounts of the North-west are audited by the Auditor-General. When the main Estimates are considered, the hon. gentleman will receive explanation under that head.

Mr. McMULLEN. I thought I would draw the hon. gentleman's attention to this matter, in order that he might be prepared with an explanation.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to inquire whether the work being performed by the industrial school is satisfactory; also to what extent the Indians are becoming civilized, and to what extent the Government's encouragement of industrial schools is producing results? Is the working of the schools satisfactory, and has the outlay of the Government produced results commensurate with the cost to the Government of the attempt made to civilize and Christianize Indians?

Mr. DALY. The results so far have been very satisfactory. It is simply surprising how the children adapt themselves to the modes of civilization. I may say that not only in regard to Christianization, but as regards their morality and adaptability to the ordinary walks of life, it is marvellous the advance the children are making. I will give further explanations on the main Estimates. I have some material prepared which will lead the hon. gentleman to believe that the work pursued in regard to industrial schools has been very satisfactory indeed.

Mr. MULLOCK. I observe in the report of the Minister of the Interior, allusion is made to the change in the mode of controlling the sale of liquor in the North-west. A good deal of stress is laid by one or two of the officers of the North-west Mounted Police as to the evil effects of the present license system, as compared with the effects of the old permit system. I observe Commissioner Herchmer states that, for example, in the Battleford district, within an area containing only 400 souls, there are four licenses granted, two wholesale and two retail, and under the license system liquor can be sold to half-breeds, who are made an underhand means of communication with the Indians, and thus under the present license system a large quantity of liquor is finding its way into the hands of the Indians. One of these reports states that no less than six car loads of liquor were received at one of those points within six months. Is the Minister going to take any steps to call the attention of the North-west Government to this matter?

Mr. DALY. The attention of the North-west Government has already been called to the matter. We considered it sufficiently serious to draw their attention to it, in the hope that this state of affairs existing there would be changed.

Mr. MULLOCK. Did you say when attention was drawn to it?

Mr. DALY. A month or six weeks ago. It was in Colonel Herchmer's report of the Mounted Police, and it was that that drew my attention to it.

Chilliwack Methodist Church
Indian Industrial School..... $2,500

Mr. McMULLEN. What number of children attend this school, and of what extent is it?

Mr. DALY. The Government have already given $2,500 towards the construction of the school, and it is thought if we give $5,000 in all, that is all the department will be required to do, as the Methodist Church Missionary Society will pay the balance of the cost. I will give the hon. gentleman further information when the main Estimates are up.

Mr. CHARLTON. I quite understand that the hon. Minister of the Interior may not be in possession of detailed information at this moment; but I would like to ask him what the general policy of the Government is with regard to schools of this character. I see that this is a Methodist school, and I presume the Government are making appropriations for schools of other religious denominations. I wish to know if that is correct, and also whether the Government aids denominational schools of various kinds, and whether it establishes schools in the nature of public schools that are not at all denominational. What is the character of the religious teaching in these industrial schools?

Mr. DALY. The Indian industrial schools generally in British Columbia and the Northwest Territories are all connected with the different churches. We have certain schools under the Roman Catholic Church, certain under the Presbyterian, certain under the Church of England, and certain under the Methodist Church. We have in the North-west Territories what is called the Red Deer school under the Methodist Church, the school at Qu'Appelle under the auspices of the Roman Catholic Church, the Blood Reserve school under the auspices of the Church of England, another school at Elkhorn and at St. Paul's under the Church of England, and the industrial school at St. Boniface under the Roman Catholic Church. Another school is about to be erected in Brandon which will be conducted by the Methodist Church. I believe Brandon was selected on account of its central position towards the Indians. It is not the policy of the department nor the intention of the Government to extend to any greater length operations in reference to these industrial schools. We think that the field is now supplied.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose the Minister is not in a position at present to furnish details of the expenditure on behalf of each of these denominations.

Mr. DALY. I have the information, but I have not got it in my possession now.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hope the Minister will be kind enough when this matter comes under discussion again, to give a detailed statement of the expenses of Indian denominational schools with regard to each denomination, the gross amount paid, and the relative expenditure on behalf of each denomination. That information would be interesting to the country.

Mr. DALY. I will have that information.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I can very easily see how we drifted into this policy of appropriating public moneys for the support of these denominational schools for Indians. It was a very natural thing, at one stage of our attempts to civilize the Indians, that the Government should more or less have assisted the pioneers, but it is a policy fraught with very great difficulty, and very great danger, and I think it is well to know whether we shall agree to formally adopt the policy and approve of it, and let the public know that it is to be our policy in future, or whether we do not intend to go along quietly voting these moneys year after year without full knowledge of what we are doing and whither it is tending. I do not see where this thing is going to end. I thought that the different churches engaged in the evangelization of the Indians were doing so on voluntary subscriptions furnished them by the members of each church. If we continue doing this at the public expense, hon. gentlemen will see that, in the very near future, we will reach a point when there may be an uproar; each church will complain that it is not getting its fair share. Is this support to be a per-capita grant, or is it to depend upon the number of proselytes it may make? What principle will you adopt? You cannot divide this thing into Catholic and Protestant. It will be Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist denominations, and every Christian body which goes there to carry out this work will expect, and will have the right to expect, if you continue this system, to receive aid from the state. I think we are just beginning to adopt a policy which possibly, in the near future, will result in very serious difficulties in this House. I would urge the hon. gentleman to bring down a full and complete statement on this matter, and, at the same time, that he will be able to indicate to the House whether the policy of the department is to continue still further giving this money, or whether it is their intention to retract the course which they have already taken? The hon. gentleman knows that we have had experience in this House of the difficulty of continuing these educational grants, without getting into political difficulties which may convulse the country from one end to the other. We ought to be exceedingly cautious of the policy we lay down. I trust the information which the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) seeks will not only be full and complete, but that it will be supplemented by a full statement from the hon. gentleman in charge of the department as to what the policy is to be.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is a matter of very considerable importance. Two years ago a very full statement was brought down giving the information asked for by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), so that the Minister will only have the last two years of the expenditure to look over in order to furnish the information to the House. These appropriations for denominational schools for Indians began in this way. Some four denominations applied to the Government for aid to their schools, and the policy adopted at the time application was made was to give so much for each pupil, according to the average attendance at the school, up to the sum of $300. But no support was given to any Indian school lying outside of the Territories that were actually surrendered to the Crown. At that time many of those schools, in fact, the great majority of them, lay far beyond any actual settlement, and far beyond the region that had been surveyed and set out for settlement; and so it was thought that the missionary would serve a good public purpose in the education of the Indians by preserving order and quiet among them, and preventing them being misled by mischievous persons who might go amongst them; but they were informed at the same time that the Government did not commit itself permanently to such a policy—that it was merely a temporary arrangement with regard to which there would be no breach of faith if the Government took charge of any of those schools at any time it might think proper. I think the Indian inspector was instructed to act as superintendent of the schools, and during his visit, when payment was being made to the Indian population, to see what sort of work was being done. Well, since that time, the Government have gone a long way further, and they have gone further without bringing the matter before the House for its decision. The only way the subject has ever come before Parliament has been by the appropriations which have been asked for. Now, there have been industrial schools established amongst the Indians by various religious bodies, and these may be doing very excellent work. As to that I cannot say whether they are doing the work better than it would be done under a public official, and with the necessary public supervision. But even though the present system should be continued—and it may be found practically the most convenient at present and perhaps indefinitely—I think it ought at all events to be the subject of public supervision by an officer who is not connected with any one of the bodies in question, and who would from time to time report to the House as to what the public were getting for the money which the public were contributing. So far as I know, we have had no indication as yet that there has been any supervision, and no report has been made as to the work done in those schools. They may be very efficient or they may be very inefficient; the Indian children may be very regular in their attendance, or there may be very few in attendance at all. My recollection is that there was a great deal of difficulty in securing the attendance of the Indian children. When a school was first established, they attended for a short time until the novelty wore off, and then they ceased to attend; and I know that in some cases there was an indisposition to keep a register because that register would indicate the paucity of the attendance. It was hoped by those who were teaching in those schools that the condition of things would be improved whenever the Indians ceased to be a nomadic population, and settled down on their various reservations. I do not know how far that expectation has been realized. I do not know how far the schools have been improved by the Indians continuing residence upon their reservations; but I think it is very important that there should be a supervision by some responsible official, and that there should be laid before Parliament every year a report with regard to the attendance at all these schools, so that that information will be in the hands of members, when the money is asked for, and so that the public will have an opportunity of knowing whether the money that is being expended is being well expended or not, which you can only tell by the results accomplished in those schools. If it can be shown that the Indians are being converted into husbandmen and good mechanics by these industrial schools, then it will be evident that the money is being properly expended in the public interest. The question of the instrumentalities by which this work is being accomplished is subordinate to the actual accomplishment of the work, for the time being at any rate. But I think that up to the present time the House is without the necessary information, and the schools are without the necessary supervision that should be exercised over them, so that it is impossible to tell whether the teachers in those schools are doing their work efficiently, so far as industrial and secular study is concerned.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am glad that my hon. friend who has just spoken has not the strong objections to these schools in the abstract that he had on a previous occasion when he and I had some controversy on the subject. But I think he is perfectly right in demanding that there should be a proper supervision of these schools by a public official who would be removed from all sectarian influences. I think that is a condition that should attach to every public grant for educational purposes. What has given rise to so much objection to these grants is that there is no guarantee that the money given by the state, irrespective of what is given by the religious denominations, is properly expended, and I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman in that view of the case. At the same time I approve, as I always have approved, of the Government grants to these denominational schools; for, if these Indians are to be civilized, I think they must also be Christianized; it is necessary to carry on the two branches together; and I think there is no machinery which the Government could adopt which would be either so efficient or so economic as that which the Government has carried on in the past. I agree with the hon. member for Bothwell, as a general principle, that where the Government grants assistance, whether to denominational schools or otherwise, it should be accompanied by public supervision, and of course that principle applies with all the greater force where the money is placed in the hands of persons who are not under Government control. Therefore I think the Government would be doing right in establishing a careful and efficient method of supervision, so that the state may see that the money it gives is properly expended, irrespective altogether of what may be contributed by the machinery through which the agency is carried on.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is mistaken in saying that I have expressed to-day views different from those I have expressed on any former occasion. I have said, what I said before, that at the time the arrangement was made, the various religious bodies were expressly informed that the Government did not tie its hands, and that if the Government thought, in the public interest, they should take control of these schools, they reserved to themselves that liberty ; but I pointed out that since then the Government have gone further, and that various industrial schools have been established, under denominational control, and that it would not be so easy to resume control, if the public interest should require us to do so. The hon. gentleman said I objected to religious bodies taking control of the schools. That was not my statement. He has forgotten the circumstances under which that discussion arose. The hon. gentleman proposed to the House a resolution in which he declared that our Constitution was founded on the principle of the absolute separation of church and state, and that any contribution to any religious body from the funds of the country, was a contribution in contravention of that principle. That was the view he put forward in his resolution ; and I pointed out what I thought was an inconsistency, and which I still think is such, that the hon. gentleman was nevertheless supporting contributions from the public funds for the aid of these denominational schools, and, in so far, he was not consistent with the particular doctrine he laid down with so much vehemence and vigour, when supporting the resolution he addressed to the House in the discussion of the Jesuits' Estates Bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is no abstract proposition of that kind to which there are not necessarily some exceptions, and this treatment of the Indians is an exceptional case, which takes it out of the general principle. The time may come when it may be no longer necessary to continue that agency, but it is an exception, intended to suit special circumstances.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not disposed to call in question the policy which dictated the giving of certain grants, in the first instance, because I am not thoroughly acquainted with the facts ; but I was led to understand from the discussion which took place in this House a year or two ago, that these grants were given entirely to churches engaged in the evangelization or civilization of the Indians in far-off places, where they could not be reached otherwise. I dissent from the proposition, that it ought to be the policy of the state to Christianize these Indians at all. The nation which has been engaged more in the work of Christianizing and evangelizing the heathen or any other is the British nation, and I have not heard that that nation has permitted itself to spend money from the public exchequer for that purpose. I think the work has been carried on as a voluntary charity, by those whose heart is in it. It appears to me we are going to get into trouble if we are going to spend money in this way. While work was going on in the outlying stations well and good ; but now we are asked to give money for the establishment of the denominational school of some Protestant denomination in the city of Brandon. If you give a grant to be used in the city of Brandon, why stop there ? You will have to give grants all over the different parts of the Dominion, and unless I have very strong arguments to the contrary, I will, so far as my own voice goes, dissent from the policy of giving, in places like Brandon, civilized cities and regular provinces, public moneys for the benefit of any one denomination. If we aid this Protestant denomination, how can we refuse similar aid to other Protestant denominations ? You cannot stop there. Each denomination has as much right to a grant of public money as any other. Are you going to give grants according to the per capita number of the different denominations, or on what principle ? The hon. gentleman may justify, possibly, the small grant to the missionaries engaged in civilizing the Indians out on the plains, where they are outside the reach of civilization, but there is no ground I have heard advanced for granting sums of money for the establishment of a denominational school in the city of Brandon or any other city. It is opposed to sound policy in this country, where there is no state church, to recognize the legal existence of the different Christian bodies, and if you do so, you are launching yourselves upon an unknown sea of doubt and difficulty, and I do not think the end will be very far off before you will have a violent shaking from one end of the Dominion to the other. Why give this grant to Brandon more than to some of the cities of Ontario ? Brandon is a large city in a recognized province, and why establish a denominational school there ?

Mr. DALY. I am afraid the hon. gentleman has not studied the question at all or he would not have made the remarks he has. So far as the establishment of an industrial school at Brandon is concerned, any other point in Manitoba might have been chosen. The school is not situated in the city of Brandon. One of the main objects in the location of these industrial schools is to take them away as far as possible from the different reserves, and the Methodist Church, which is to conduct the school at Brandon, chose that city as the most central location from the different reserves from which they will draw the Indian children.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Where is the school ?

Mr. DALY. Across the river from the city of Brandon, about a mile from the limits. It was their own location, and they chose it because it was within a reasonable distance of the different reserves from which they have to bring their children. Experience teaches that you must locate these schools a long distance away from the reserves, or otherwise the children will be inclined to go back to their original life, and their parents will make continual visits, asking to be fed and clothed, and otherwise interfere with the education of the children. In reply to the hon. members for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), I would say that if those hon. gentlemen will read the report which I laid on the Table the other night—the Annual Report of the Department of Indian Affairs—they will find that we have inspectors of the industrial schools, and that every one of those schools is subjected to the most rigid inspection from the time of its erection to the present. The report of this inspector you will find at pages 186 and 188 of the report. It has been the policy of the department since the establishment of those schools, and a policy which is likely to be maintained, that every one of them shall be subjected to a most rigid inspection. There is a uniform set of books open to the inspection of the inspector—and any other officer of the department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the inspector appointed by the Department of Interior apart from the denominational schools?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. You have written reports from them?

Mr. DALY. Yes; you will find the fullest possible information in the report. I did not expect this item to come up now, but am prepared to discuss it, although, after the lengthened sitting of last night, we all feel pretty tired. I may say, however, that during the last year, we placed these schools on a per capita basis. I will give to the House, when the main Estimates come down, exactly what we pay the different schools per capita. And that per capita grant is based upon the experience of the department up to this time as to the cost of these different denominations of conducting these schools, and I think that when I lay the information before hon. gentlemen they will come to the conclusion that the officers of the department have gone into this matter in as thorough a manner as they possibly could, with the one intention in view of making the work of the schools as effective as possible at as little cost as possible to the Government. I may say that we have nineteen boarding-schools, attended by 360 children. Of these schools, six are conducted under the auspices of the Church of England, six under the Roman Catholics, six under the Presbyterians and one under the Methodists. Of day-schools there are 110. These day-schools, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) knows, we are required to maintain under the treaty with the Indians. These schools are attended by 11,454 children. Of the schools fifty-eight are under the Church of England, thirty-one under the Roman Catholics.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is this for Manitoba only, or for the whole North-west?

Mr. DALY. For the whole North-west. Two of the day-schools are under the Presbyterians, fourteen under the Methodists, and five are undenominational. Of industrial schools there are ten, attended by 1,030 pupils. Of these four are under the Church of England, three under the Roman Catholics, one under the Presbyterians and two under the Methodists. I give that information that the hon. gentleman may know the number of schools the Government are contributing to maintain or are maintaining at the present time, but if hon. gentlemen will read the report they will get the fullest information on the subject.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman in a position to say what amount the denominations contribute to these schools?

Mr. DALY. I cannot give the figures just now, but I will later on, so far as we can get the information.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Minister says we had 113 schools in the North-west, which we are supporting. But I see we give grants to 213 Protestant schools in the North-west. I suppose these are not—

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman must not confuse the Indian schools with the other schools of the North-west, as they are entirely distinct.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the hon. Minister if he would also furnish us with information as to the nature of the instruction imparted in these various schools. I presume, from the title, that the industrial schools are designed to teach some useful art. I suppose the nature of the instruction given in these schools will be shown also.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will find it all in the report.

Mr. MULOCK. The allowance is made on a per capita basis. Is that per capita of attendance?

Mr. DALY. We pay so much per pupil. Take Qu'Appelle school, for instance. We give them $115 per pupil for 200 children, and for that they are expected to furnish everything, pay the teachers and everything else. The High River school gets $130 for 120 pupils, and for this they have to maintain the school, provide the grub and everything of that kind.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is there any standard of qualification by which these inspectors must act?

Mr. DALY. Yes. The inspectors have been chosen with reference to their special qualifications for the work they are to perform. I would ask the hon. gentleman to read the report.

Mr. MULOCK. Is any regard paid to the denominations?

Mr. DALY. Yes; there is an inspector of Roman Catholic schools and an inspector of Protestant schools.

Mr. MULOCK. Two for all the schools?

Mr. DALY. For all the Indian schools, yes.

Mr. MULOCK. And the inspector of the Roman Catholic schools is a Roman Catholic, I suppose, and the inspector of the Protestant schools, a Protestant?

Mr. DALY. I presume so. Mr. Macrae is the inspector of the Protestant schools, and Mr. Betourmay of the Roman Catholic schools. In addition, the schools are inspected by the regular inspector of the department and his assistant, and they are not left one month without thorough inspection.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not think the hon. gentleman quite disposed of the point raised by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies). It may be a matter of necessity, as the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) says, at one stage of the development of the Indians, to carry on these denominational schools with a view to evangelize and civilize these people. But when it comes to an old settled province, such as Manitoba is now, and the establishment of a school within a mile of the limits of one of the principal cities of Manitoba, I think the necessity which alone justifies such a school has disappeared. For example, there must be in the city of Brandon clergymen of various denominations, and thus the pupils brought to these industrial schools are quite within the reach of clergymen of various denominations. It seems to me we ought to look forward to the time when these schools will cease to be, at all events, denominational.

Mr. DALY. The school is an industrial school, and the object is solely the advancement of the Indians. There is no question that great sacrifices have been made by missionaries of all denominations for the evangelization and civilization of the Indians, but it has been found that in the ordinary day-schools we cannot give them the instruction that will bring them out of their original state. The object is to give them a knowledge of the arts. Carpentry, tailoring, shoemaking, and, in one school, tinsmithing, are taught, so as to fit the pupils to earn their living. So far as the Brandon location is concerned, the school was located there without my influence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not intend any reference to Brandon, as such. My objection would have been equally tenable, had it been Winnipeg or Toronto or London; I did not refer to Brandon because the hon. gentleman happens to come from there.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will see that we have one school at Regina, one at St. Boniface, one on St. Paul Reserve—a Church of England school—near Winnipeg, and another not far from Calgary. The location of these schools is with a view to making them convenient for the people who conduct them, and at a distance, as far as possible, removed from the reserves from which they draw the children: because it is found in practice, that unless these children are taken from the reserve a sufficient distance to remove them from the influence of their parents, the work of the schools will go for nothing.

Mr. MULOCK. While this course might be justifiable at one stage of the instruction of the Indians, it seems to me that difficulties will arise, if this policy is pursued in the civilized parts of the Dominion—the policy of giving grants sufficient to pay for the maintenance of denominational schools. If the several denominations know that they can get sufficient grants to establish a school, they will have them established, and you will have a school for every denomination of Christians in the Dominion, and you cannot give the grant to one, while refusing it to others. While denominations that send missionaries away out among the wild, unreclaimed Indians, might be entitled to a small support, under peculiar circumstances, that argument won't apply to the civilized parts of the Dominion. Now, I was led myself to make some of these remarks by a statement I saw in one of the newspapers, that one of the largest body of Christians in this country had repudiated the idea of receiving Government support at all. I do not know whether that statement is true. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman has heard anything about it?

Mr. DALY. I do not know what the hon. gentleman refers to. I think, a year and a half, or two years ago, the Baptist denomination made some reference to it. Is that what the hon. gentleman means?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is one. I understand the Presbyterians did, also.

Mr. DALY. The Presbyterians may have done so, but it has not come to my knowledge. But I understand the point the hon. gentleman to make is, that he does not see the necessity for the establishment of an industrial school at Brandon, or any other place in the province of Manitoba, because these Indians there are civilized sufficiently not to require it. Now, the Indians of Manitoba require an industrial school just as much as they do in any other part of the North-west. It is even more necessary to have an industrial school for those young men than it is further west, for the simple reason that they go into villages and towns, and, extraordinary to state, but it is true, they adopt the worst habits of the whites. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary that we should have these industrial schools located centrally, but removed sufficiently from the reserves from which the Indians come, that they may be taken away from the influence of their own parents. Now, have I sufficiently answered the hon. gentleman? I say that the school is as great a necessity in the province of Manitoba to-day as it is in the North-west Territories. We have schools that are receiving assistance from the Government, even in this civilized province of Ontario, where the Indians have been educated for years. It seems to be just as necessary here to educate them as it is in the towns of the North-west.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman should understand that there is a broad distinction between supporting industrial schools as such, and supporting denominational schools in which industrial matters are a secondary consideration. I understand, that with those missionaries who go out to evangelize the Indians, their chief object is to christianize them and to bring them within the particular denominations to which these missionaries belong, and that the question of teaching them industries and matters of that kind, is a secondary consideration. My idea is, that the industrial schools are desirable enough from a state stand-point, but the importation of denominational teachings into them and the payment of them by the state, involves a principle which, I think, is calculated, in the near future, to give rise to a good deal of heart-burning and bickering.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is a great distinction between this and any other class of education. Now, apart from all the controversy we have to-day, I myself believe that religious and secular education ought to go together. But the distinction made is this, that in a civilized community and among civilized people, the ground always taken is that the home is the place for religion to be taught. That does not apply to the teaching of Indians.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman want the state to teach religion?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Well, I would almost go as far as to say that with regard to Indians.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Which religion?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would do just exactly as the Government are doing, that where a religious body does not make a profit out of it—these people do not make money out of it.

Mr. DALY. On the contrary, they say they lose money.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If any religious body undertakes such a work as that of civilizing or christianizing any body of Indians, and give guarantees that they are able to do it effectually, I will go as far as to say that the state is perfectly justified in giving them assistance under the peculiar circumstances of the case, because there is no other way by which you can do it. These people have no home teaching. The hon. gentleman said: Why should not the different clergymen come to Brandon to this school? I think, probably, that would be useless to produce good results. I think the circumstances of the case justify the department in making here a considerable departure from the general rule. These people have no home teaching, and that is the only ground upon which you can justify, even, a system of secular education.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understand that in addition to maintaining these religious schools in the North-west, the Government contribute largely to the public schools as well.

Mr. DALY. What public schools do you refer to?

Mr. LANDERKIN. In the North-west you have a system of public schools. Does not this Government contribute largely to the maintenance of these schools?

Mr. DALY. Yes, in this way: that out of the lump sum granted, we give to the North-west Territories so much towards schools. But we are discussing Indian schools, that are entirely separate. We contribute to public schools in this way: that we give the North-west Government $196,000 this year, and out of that they have to provide for their different schools.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No doubt there is a difficulty with reference to these denominational schools, but the question is whether you have some better plan to propose and to proceed upon. I understand that the main object of these industrial schools, undertaken under the auspices of any denomination, is to give an education in industrial pursuits and habits.

Mr. DALY. Exactly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose as long as they are managed by the different denominations, religious instruction may be given; but I do not view these schools as being established for the purpose of teaching peculiar religious doctrines, or anything of that kind.

Mr. DALY. Not at all.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The main object, as I understand it, is to impart a common education, and to instruct them in some handicraft. I notice in the report of the Minister that they have pupils who have been there a certain length of time, and then left. Some of them are blacksmiths, some carpenters, some one trade and some another. I see, in a great many cases, however, that they go back to the reserves. That is one of the great difficulties, I suppose, that is encountered in the matter of Indian teaching, that they drop back on to the reserves.

Mr. DALY. That is the problem we have got to solve.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is a problem of which I know something from my own experience of an industrial institute in our own province. The House and Parliament will have to have some patience with this work, because you cannot transform the traits of the Indian character into the traits of the white character, all at once. The progress cannot be very rapid, but if it is in the right direction and under economical management, I would be disposed to think we should not object too strongly to the present system until we can find one that is better. I presume the present system is as economical as any that we could devise in any other direction, for the time being; and the question is largely whether the country is willing to sanction the expense. But the motive, I believe, is good, the object sought to be attained, is good, and there will be necessarily more or less expense attendant upon the system while it is developing its good effects. I can see the difficulty, of course, that the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has mentioned, but as he himself admits, he is not just prepared to state what other course could be taken in reference to the matter. I presume with reference to that school at Brandon, the difficulty seems to be with my hon. friend that as it was located in what might be termed a centre of civilization, there would be other means sufficient to give them instruction. But I presume the pupils at the Brandon school are brought from the reserves some distance away.

Mr. DALY. Hundreds of miles away.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is simply located in Brandon for convenience, and it is thought to be an additional benefit that the Indian child, being removed so far from the reserves, will not be exposed to the influence of his parents, who might not care for him, or desire any instruction to be given to him. The aim is that he may gradually be led to adopt civilized modes of life, and adopt some handicraft by which he can earn a living. I know from my own observation, that this is a difficult question to understand and a difficult question to handle. The time may come when it will be necessary to revise our manner of procedure in the direction indicated by the hon. member for Prince Edward Island. One denomination has, I believe, taken the ground that it was wrong in principle to do what we are doing.

Mr. COATSWORTH. That church has no mission.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Difficulties may arise when this principle is being carried out. I have been led to make these remarks because I am not prepared, for my own part, to say that this system should be abandoned until some other system, which we know will be better, can be introduced.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Brant in so far as they relate to the expenditure for Indian schools. If the hon. gentleman was a close student of public expenditure with respect to schools in the North-west, he certainly would come to the conclusion that they were not carefully and economically handled. If the hon. gentleman read the items and turned up the reports he would see for himself, for I am sure he has capacity for seeing, that there were gross expenditures in connection with schools. We have called the attention of the Government, year after year, to this fact. I am not prepared to say that the present Minister of the Interior is to be held responsible, as he has only recently entered on the duties of his position, but it is well to call his attention to the extravagances that have occurred in the administration of the schools and in the general management of Indians in the North-west. The whole expenditure in connection with schools and reserves bears on its face the mark of extravagance. I admit it is desirable to endeavour to induce the Indians to adopt industrious habits, rather than allowing them to become criminals and cause trouble to the settlers. Accordingly, we should have industrial schools, but they should be administered under a rigid economical system. I cannot allow the remarks of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), in regard to this matter, to go uncontradicted.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I happen to know something about the schools, because I had occasion to have some correspondence with the department in regard to them. I can only speak on behalf of one denomination, the Methodist denomination, and they have with great hesitation, taken charge of those schools. They have felt a great deal of diffidence in doing so, because the amount allowed by the Government for their support is considered to be inadequate. So far from there being reckless extravagance, there is an actual loss to the churches. I have no doubt that, were it not for the fact that the churches wish to advance their own interests, they would not take up these schools. They are, in fact, doing Government work. If this work was not being done by the churches, the Government would have to appoint inspectors and instructors, and the expenditure would be very much increased, and probably the desirable results now attained would not be secured. In regard to the general expenditure for Indians if the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) would consult the records of expenditure for Indians in the United States, as compared with Canada, he would come to the conclusion that there was no reason to complain in regard to our expenditure.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). My remarks were connected with the management of the industrial school, but my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) drifted off to the general management of Indian affairs, which is a pretty large question. The item under the consideration of the committee at the present time is for an industrial school, and my remarks were confined to that item.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is the religious instruction of the school under the supervision of the Minister?

Mr. DALY. I have not yet attained that perfection in evangelization that the hon. gentleman has.

Expenses of International Mining Convention.....$1,000

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the hon. gentleman explain this vote?

Mr. FOSTER. It is in connection with the meeting of the Mining Convention in Montreal the other day, at which a large number of delegates were present.

Cost of Litigation$10,000

Mr. CHARLTON. What expenses will this item cover?

Mr. DALY. It is for litigation that may arise, and that has arisen, and in connection with suits that have not yet been settled. The Government estimate that $10,000 will cover the amount.

Mr. CHARLTON. What are the suits that have arisen?

Mr. DALY. There is one suit, the Queen and Magee, in regard to ordnance land.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This is a supplementary vote, the amount for litigation for 1892-93 having been voted in the main Estimates.

Mr. FOSTER. The litigation has been heavy this year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I suppose this additional amount is required, but perhaps the hon. gentleman can state for what special cases it is needed.

Mr. FOSTER. A large amount, I believe, is required for litigation in connection with the fisheries—Behring Sea.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is there not a special vote taken for that matter?

Mr. FOSTER. That is for the arbitration. I will, however, bring down the information from the Justice Department. The item can be allowed to stand.

Determining Boundary line in Passamaquoddy Bay..... $2,000

Mr. CHARLTON. Has this boundary never been defined?

Mr. DALY. There never has been any actual delimitation of the boundary line at this point. This work will be carried out under the convention of last year between the United States and Canada.

Expenses of determining Boundary line between Canada and the United States..... $32,000

Mr. CHARLTON. Is this amount to be expended for the purpose of determining Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

the Alaska boundary? Has anything been done towards the delimitation of that line yet?

Mr. DALY. No; this money is required for that purpose. The money is needed in order that we may start our parties on the 1st of April. Our survey parties will then meet the parties of the American Government and then proceed with the work. It is expected that it will continue for three years.

Mr. A. N. Montpetit—Translation Civil Service Inquiry....$1,102 75

Mr. McMULLEN. This seems a large sum. How long did it take to perform this work, and how was this man paid?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Montpetit was engaged by my predecessor to make this translation on account of his ability. The work has been satisfactorily done, and I recommended that the payment should be made.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite clear that this gentleman was probably a friend of the late Secretary of State, and he gave him this nice little job which cost over $1,100. I would like to know on what basis he was paid?

Mr. FOSTER. The Clerk of the House informs me that he was paid at the usual rate of $1 per page.

Gratuity to Mr. Mowat, seriously injured by explosion of barrel of varnish at Campbellton Station.$1,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How are we responsible for the explosion of a barrel of varnish?

Mr. HAGGART. There was a fire amongst the varnish in the store-room at Campbellton, and this man in trying to save the Government property was terribly injured. The barrel of varnish exploded as he was taking it out.

Mr. CHARLTON. Are you not a little short of varnish for the Government now?

Mr. DALY. We got a new supply.

Fire at St. John's, Nfld $10,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman in a position to state the general contributions towards the St. John's fire, and how they were disposed of? There were a great many handsome contributions made from the citizens of the different parts of the Dominion, who sympathized with our Newfoundland friends in their great trouble, and it might be interesting to know if there was any official report made as to the total amount received, and how expended?

Mr. FOSTER. The Newfoundland Legislature is now in session, and no doubt an official report will be made. Of course, we placed no condition on our grant, and they are under no obligation to send us a return, but if they publish a report, I have no doubt that the large donors will have a copy sent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) To whom did we send this $10,000 ?

Mr. FOSTER. We did not send the $10,000. We loaded our vessel at Halifax and sent the goods that they telegraphed they were most in need of at the time. The supplies went to the relief committee, and the hon. gentleman will remember that it was one of the first donations utilized.

Prohibition Commission..... $15,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Should not the phrasing here be altered ? Should not this appropriation be for : "Further amount required for salving the Finance Minister's conscience and delivering the Government from the necessity of coming to a decision which might involve some difficulties ?"

Mr. FOSTER. That would be a private interpretation.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it would be proper to change the title of this vote, and to make the $15,000 "for the purpose of deferring action on the temperance question until some day in the dim and mystic future." The object of the Government in appointing that commission was clearly apparent. It was a deliberate action taken for the purpose of deferring the necessity of meeting this question, and while that was the suspicion at the time the commission was appointed, that suspicion has now crystallized into a firm belief. Might I ask the Finance Minister : How many years we are likely to wait for the report of that commission to be made, and whether it is likely to reach the House and the country before the next general election ?

Mr. FOSTER. I know my hon. friend is burning with a desire to get the results of this commission, and I am sorry he should be disappointed even for a few months. I may say with reference to the work of that commission, that since it was appointed it has prosecuted its work with all due diligence. The work is not a slight one, and upon the lines upon which they are prosecuting it, it will necessarily take a large amount of time. At least, it is certain from the time that they commenced that it will take a longer period than will enable them to have the report ready for this present session of the House. They have now finished the prosecution of their inquiries in all the provinces with the exception of Ontario, and they have extended their inquiries to certain of the United States. So far as I can learn, they have now simply the province of Ontario to finish, and some few further inquiries in other parts. They have been getting documentary evidence from all quarters from the very first, so that I think that, without any doubt, the labours of the commission, so far as getting the evidence is concerned, will probably finish in the course of a couple of months. Just at this moment, they are not pursuing their investigations and taking evidence, because of the season of the year, but they intend to meet again in a short time for that purpose. Just as soon as it comes in it is the intention of the Government to have the evidence and the report published, and if that be done before next session, of which I have little doubt, it will be distributed to the members, so that they will be able to make themselves acquainted with the labours and conclusions of the commission before we next meet. I must say that I do not think there has been undue delay on the part of the commissioners. There has certainly been no design of that kind on the part of the Government. Every communication that has passed between the commissioners and myself has been with the idea of hastening their operations rather than retarding them. However, the commissioners are the judges largely of their own work. The scope of their work was laid down by Parliament, and that has not been either extended or diminished by any instructions they have received from the Government. They have conducted the investigation in the way that seemed best to themselves under the resolution of Parliament, and I believe they have prosecuted the work, which is no light one, diligently and conscientiously.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am sure that the country will be delighted to learn that the Government have had no desire to delay the prosecution of the investigation, or to defer action on the temperance question by the appointment of this commission. The statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance that the commission are not prosecuting their inquiries at this season of the year, leads me to suppose that their investigations are of a kind that cannot be carried on in inclement weather. I presume that they are not prosecuting them in the open air to any great extent, and I do not know why they should suspend their inquiries during the winter. I suppose that when we get the report of this commission we shall really know whether or not intemperance is an evil. It seems as if the Government were in doubt on that point, and that it was necessary to appoint a commission to ascertain for them whether or not intemperance was an evil, and whether it was such an evil as to require legislative action on their part. But I suppose, when they get the report of this commission, they will be informed as to those questions, and as to whether they should intervene in the direction of prohibitory legislation. Now, speaking seriously, this whole thing is a perfect farce, and I believe that the great mass of information collected by this commission is a mass of rubbish. The country did not stand in need of the information on this question which this commission is professedly collecting. We had already in our possession all the necessary information with regard to the ravages of intemperance, with regard to the amount of money expended in drink, with regard to the evil results that flow from the selling of whiskey; and for the Government of Canada, in the face of the demand for legislation to check this great evil, to pretend that they did not know whether it was an evil or not, and whether it was such an evil as to justify them in introducing legislation to prevent it, and to appoint a commission to instruct them on these questions, is all simple bosh. The fact is, the commission was appointed for the purpose of staving off action on the part of the Government in regard to an awkward question on which the Finance Minister had taken very positive ground in the past when he was not sitting on the Treasury benches. Then he had no doubt that intemperance was an evil and that the Government should intervene to prohibit or restrict this traffic; but after he became a Minister of the Crown he was unable to make up his mind on the matter. He did not think the Government had sufficient information, and so a commission was appointed to inform them on facts that have been known to the world for ages. The whole thing is a screaming farce, for which I denounce the action of the Government. It was not an honest or courageous action. If they do not want to give the country a prohibitory law, let them refuse it; but to stave off the question in the way they are doing is something that will not meet with the approval of the great mass of the temperance people.

Mr. CHRISTIE. I quite concur in the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. It appears to me that this Royal Commission can be of no service whatever. Its appointment is a perfect waste of money. It appears to me that it was only intended to stave off a difficult question for an indefinite number of years, and that it would be wise to bring this expenditure to a close. It is an enigma to me which I cannot solve, how this Royal Commission, by wandering about the country from Dan to Beersheba, and getting the opinions of people for and against prohibition, will ever advance the temperance cause. I think that nothing has occurred during the past decade so injurious to the cause of temperance as the appointment of this Royal Commission. It has completely side-tracked the prohibition movement, paralyzed all efforts and acted like a placebo to keep the temperance men quiescent. I think the whole thing is a huge farce; but that is not all, it is a useless and wicked waste of money and we should not sanction it.

Mr. SCRIVER. I desire to ask the Minister of Finance whether he could inform the committee about what amount the commission has cost, and, if he cares to do it, I would like him to express an opinion as to what the additional cost would be?

Mr. FOSTER. The vote taken in the main Estimates of 1892-93 was $5,000. The expenditure to the 6th February has been $13,325. This vote will bring the total appropriation up to $20,000, of which there will be $6,674 available. As to the cost still to be incurred, I can hardly speak; it will depend somewhat upon the length of the investigation. But the major part of the cost, certainly, as far as the investigations and the evidence taken are concerned, must have been incurred. Then, there will be the cost of printing the evidence and the report, which, although considerable, will not be very large. I should imagine that altogether not less than $25,000 or $30,000 will suffice to pay the cost of the whole inquiry.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many commissioners are there?

Mr. FOSTER. Five.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the scale of remuneration allowed?

Mr. FOSTER. The commissioners are paid at the rate of $10 per day when engaged on the work of the commission, actual travelling expenses, and a living allowance of $4 per day—about $17 per day. I do not think I ought to allow the remarks of my hon. friend to pass unnoticed. He has, in his burning zeal for the cause, made an attack on these gentlemen, because there has been a few months' delay. I think he was unfair in several points. He concluded that the whole matter was a farce and bosh, and that this calling for information was a screaming farce. I knew the hon. gentleman would denounce the commission. It is his business to denounce everything which has the patronage and sanction of the Government, and my hon. friend would be entirely wanting in what he conceives to be his duty if he did not always rise to the occasion, and denounce each and every one of these things. But I am not aware that this commission was intended to find out whether intemperance was a great evil. If the hon. gentleman had read the scope of the instructions, he would not have thought it necessary to make that remark, because intemperance is certainly an evil; and to find out whether it is or not is not one of the reasons why this commission was appointed. It is strange that civilized countries and Governments, besides our own, have sought information on subjects of this kind, which are quite well known in a certain sense amongst the people generally. If my hon. friend will inquire, he will find that in Great Britain they have had one or two Royal Commissions on intemperance, which went around taking investigations upon almost the same lines as this one, and that the results of their investigations and their own opinions have been embodied in public documents and have been considered of the very greatest value, and that out of them very useful legislation has been enacted and placed on the Statute-book in Great Britain. If my hon. friend, in his zeal for temperance, which I do not doubt, has followed the temperance movement in different countries, as no doubt he has, he will understand that the temperance people of the United States have united in one great endeavour within the last fifteen years, and that is to get the Congress of the United States to appoint a commission to investigate the evils of the liquor traffic. During every Congress efforts are made by the temperance bodies of the United States to have such a commission appointed, and they have sometimes come very close to getting it, and they considered it one of the strong things for which to urge, and the effort to obtain which they do not propose to give up until their object is accomplished. It is wonderful how these strong, level-headed temperance and Christian men in the United States are carried away by this bosh, and are anxious to engage in this same screaming farce. If my hon. friend will consult his memory, he will find that he need not go out of this country to seek a parallel for this. He need not go out of this country, nor very far back in its history, for I think it was no longer ago than 1873 or 1874, when a Government in this country, leading a strong party in this House, appointed a commission to obtain information, which commission travelled from place to place, took evidence and made investigation, and gave the results to this House, and these results were beneficial, for out of them came legislation which temperance people believe has, to a certain extent at least, been beneficial to the country. There is a wide distinction between a few men knowing that a thing is evil, and between having sufficient and collected information with reference to the whole matter at hand. I do not think this commission has been a solemn farce or mere bosh, and I am certainly bound to maintain that it was not from any dilatory motives or with a view of shelving the question that it was appointed, or that it is not now at its labours. I pointed out once before, that if the Government wished to shunt the question, there were other ways of shunting a motion than by appointing a Royal Commission on a motion of a member of the Government, and that there were better means of not meeting the strength and crux of opinion on this matter than by appointing a Royal Commission to investigate and report. My opinion is, and I have always held that opinion, that the Government did far otherwise than shelve and shunt the matter, and actually brought the question to the front by appointing a Royal Commission, and brought the period nearer to a point when decisive action is to be taken one way or the other. Whether prohibition, as a result, is to be enacted or not, I am not going to express an opinion at this moment. I have my own private opinions, and will express them publicly when the time comes. When we have that information before the House and the country, that will be the time to digest it, without making the question a party one, which it ought never to be, and without using it for political advantage. I hope the House will come to the discussion and decision of that great question as to what is most useful and beneficial and practicable on its own merits; and when that conclusion is come to, I have no doubt the right thing will be done. But I think my hon. friend ought not to have made these wild and wide assertions against the commission. I do not think the commission, either in its inception or action, deserves such strong adjectives.

Mr. CHARLTON. I may have possibly been unduly severe in my criticism, with reference to this commission, but it has struck me, as a temperance man, and I believe my impression is correct, that it was unnecessary. We had a commission, as my hon. friend tells us, in 1873 or 1874, which procured for us all the information necessary to come to a practical result. It is not necessary to appoint another to investigate the question of the evils of the liquor traffic, as we were already in possession of all the information necessary to guide us intelligently in forming an opinion and basing our action on this question. My hon. friend tells us this should not be made a party question. I do not know how we are going to avoid that. It is a question upon which men take different sides, and must necessarily be a party question. It is a question which had presented itself to this House, from time to time, and the opinion of the House has been had on it. This is a question which has long been before the people. It is a question upon which the temperance men of this country have decided convictions. They did not need the Government commission to furnish them with information upon it; they had all the information they desired to get, in order to enable them to form an opinion upon the question. They did not ask for that investigation, and whatever may be the result of it, whatever its report may be, that report will have very little effect, one way or the other, upon the temperance sentiment of the country. If they bring in a report which declares that a prohibitory liquor law is not advisable or desirable in the interests of the people of this Dominion, does my hon. friend suppose that it will convince a single temperance man in this country? If that is the report, will one man who desires to see the evils of intemperance lessened, be convinced that the Government should not take action? If, on the other hand, the commission brings in a report recommending a prohibitory liquor law, does he suppose that it will do away with one single iota of the resistance to the passing of such a law? The report will be utterly inoperative, so far as its effect on public sentiment is concerned. The temperance sentiment of the country rests upon ample evidence, while those who oppose it, oppose it for reasons that will not be affected by the finding of the commission. But it is well known that the question was an embarrassing one for the Government. There was no necessity for the commission, and the action of the Government, in creating it, was dictated by party exigencies, by the necessity the Government felt of staving off the question and gaining time. And they did so, and I am bound to say that they did it very astutely and very effectually. It could not have been done more effectually. Now, with reference to the example my hon. friend has cited in other countries. I do not know that I am as well informed as the hon. gentleman is, but I am not aware that there ever was a committee appointed in England to investigate the desirability of a prohibitory law.

Mr. FOSTER. Not a commission on the prohibitory law, but there was one on the temperance question.

Mr. CHARLTON. There was a commission to gather information as to a proper license law, to investigate the various license systems of other countries. But a commission to investigate into the propriety of passing a prohibitory liquor legislation, has not been asked for and, I believe, has never been granted in England. With regard to the demand of the temperance people in the United States, that Congress should instruct a commission to inquire into the temperance question, it must not be forgotten that the temperance question has been dealt with by the separate states to a large extent, and that every state has jurisdiction in the matter to prohibit the manufacture or sale within its borders of intoxicating liquors, and the desire of the temperance people in the United States to secure action by the general Government upon this matter, has been simply with a desire to promote uniform action throughout the United States. And the question has arisen, whether Congress had jurisdiction in this matter, and Congress felt reluctant to act, because it has been held by some constitutional lawyers, that the question is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the states. But even if Congress were to adopt the principle of appointing the commission, and that commission were to be appointed and commence its inquiries, after the commission had completed its inquiries, the United States would only be in the position Canada stood in, in 1874, when the commission had completed its inquiry. Though a commission may be desirable in the United States, it does not follow that the same is true of Canada, because we have had a commission, and in this respect we are in advance of them. Whether it is necessary to have a commission there or not, it is not necessary here. We have had the report of the commission and all the information that is desirable and necessary to enable the people to make up their minds intelligently as to whether prohibitory legislation is proper and desirable in the Dominion of Canada. We had this information before the present commission was appointed. We were in a position then to grapple with this great evil. It was our duty then to grapple with it. If it can become the duty of the Government of this country to grapple by means of legislation, with the evils of intemperance, that duty existed then, and that duty will not be discharged until this legislation is placed upon the Statute-book.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman in what he said about the temperance commission and the necessity for it. I am rather surprised to hear it advocated that we should base our legislation at this date on the evidence of a commission issued twenty years ago. It seems to me the condition of affairs is changed since then, and it would not be fair to ask the people to base a decision upon this important question on evidence received twenty years ago. As I view the matter, the people of this country are divided into three classes with reference to this question. One class is composed of those who favour prohibition and would vote for it under almost any circumstances; the second class includes those who do not favour prohibition, and who would vote against it under almost any circumstances. But there is a third class of the people, a very large class, indeed, who are not decided about this question and who want information with regard to it, and, as it often happens in other public matters, this is the class of people who would probably decide this question of prohibition ultimately. I think it would be the duty of the Government, as soon as we ascertain definitely that a large majority of the people are in favour of prohibition, to propose a prohibitory law. But, at the same time, people cannot make up their minds, members of Parliament cannot make up their minds unless we have the necessary information before the country. Now, there are conflicting opinions. I am a prohibitionist myself, as I suppose is well known.

Mr. GIBSON. Compensation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Prohibition, but not now.

Mr. GIBSON. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. COATSWORTH. Certainly; go on.

Mr. GIBSON. Is it the intention of the hon. gentleman to go before the commission if he is called upon?

Mr. COATSWORTH. Well, I suppose I have nothing to do with the commission, and I doubt very much the advisability of a member of Parliament going before the commission. It is very like a judge giving evidence in his own court.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Our functions are both judicial and legislative, and it is a very grave question whether a member of Parliament ought to appear to give evidence before that commission.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is seeking to get information, not to impart it.

Mr. COATSWORTH. That is true also. But what I want to say is, there are a great many different opinions expressed as to the effect of a prohibitory law, and there are two or three questions to be decided before we can ask the House to pass such a law. The first question that is often asked and often lectured upon is: Does prohibition prohibit? I have not been in the state of Maine. Perhaps my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has been in that state. I hear many conflicting reports as to the effect of prohibition in that state. I would like, if possible, to satisfy myself before I am asked to vote as to the effect of a prohibitory law where it is passed in other places, and it is not a fair thing to ask hon. members to vote unless they are satisfied, and it is not fair to ask an expression of public opinion unless we lay before the people, as reasonable men and voters, the information necessary to a fair consideration of the question. We cannot decide that question, we cannot decide the question of revenue or any modified scheme of prohibition until we get the evidence before us and judge for ourselves what has been the history of the question and what will be the probable results of any such law. So I highly approve of the prohibition commission the Government has issued. And I regret to hear any hon. member say that the Government issued it to gain time, when there is such a good reason for issuing a commission of that kind, when the evidence that commission is taking is so essential to enable us to form a proper judgment upon the question, I think it ill-becomes any member of this House to accuse the Government of issuing that commission merely for the purpose of gaining time and temporizing with the matter. For my part, I heartily support the action of the Government in issuing that commission, for, prohibitionist as I am, I am not prepared to support a prohibitory law until we can see that it is best for the country.

Mr. CHRISTIE. We all know that there is a very strong public sentiment in this Dominion in favour of prohibition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. CHRISTIE. A tremendous public sentiment. We have seen evidence of that since this Parliament was elected. Two years ago this House was flooded with petitions in favour of immediate prohibition. The people asked that a prohibitory measure should be enacted, and instead of that, they got a Royal Commission. They asked for fish and they got a serpent. It is a measure which has completely paralyzed all effort. Since the commission was issued not a single movement in advance has been made. Now, while we are waiting, the terrible evil is going on. Time will not wait for that Liquor Commission, the evils of intemperance will not wait. I will not take up the time of the House by dilating upon these evils, but every man in this House knows that terrible evils do result from intemperance, and we know that the only remedy is prohibition. The licensing system has been tried for ages and has signally failed, and the only remedy is prohibition. For one, I think the time has come for prohibition. I believe that the result will be grand and glorious, that it will virtually do away with poverty, misery, wretchedness and crime, and inaugurate an era of prosperity such as we have never seen or even dreamed of. Now, others may do as they please, but I, for one, am in favour of immediate prohibition. I am not disposed to wait for this Royal Commission to report. I believe the time has come when we should make a strong and determined movement in favour of prohibition, and I hope that we will not waste any more time and public money upon this Royal Commission.

Mr. SCRIVER. I do not agree with my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) in the opinion that any such change has taken place in the country, or in public sentiment, since this commission began to take evidence, as to warrant the action of the Government in appointing the Royal Commission. I was opposed to that action, and so expressed myself at the time, because I thought that we were in possession of all the information we needed to guide us in legislating upon this question. I do not wholly agree, however, with my hon. friend in front of me (Mr. Charlton), nor with my hon. friend at my left, in saying that all the information obtained by this commission is of no value. I think a great deal of it is questionable value, and I cannot say that I approve altogether of the course taken by this Royal Commission. I think they have sought information that will be, when reported, of very little value as a guide to this Parliament in legislating upon this question. More than that, it seems to me that the course which has been taken by this Royal Commission has been, in some instances, at all events, of a character to lead us to doubt their impartiality. For this reason especially I am not disposed to change the opinion which I entertained when the Royal Commission was appointed, and I still think, as I did then, that their labours will not result in any real value to the country, or in advancing the object which we all have at heart.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who expressed the opinion that this commission was a farce, may have been right or may have been wrong; but there is no question that he has, to a very large extent, voiced the opinion of a large portion of the temperance public in this Dominion. Now, as regards the general subject of prohibition which has been discussed here, I suppose the Government will take care that the report will not be presented to Parliament in time to require the Government to formulate a fixed policy before the general election. I assume that we will have that election anterior to the time when a policy could be formulated upon that report. That will go, I take it, as a matter of course. But I have held the opinion for many years, and have expressed that opinion both by voice and by vote in this House, that there are two leading questions to be discussed and decided upon before you determine to apply the system of prohibition to Canada, and the investigation and report of this commission cannot tend towards the solution of either of these questions. The only and main question which we have to determine is whether public opinion is really ready to back up such a stringent measure. Now, if public opinion is not ripe on the question, I care not a snap of my finger for any report that any five or six gentlemen may make. There are those of us who live in Scott Act counties, and have seen the effects of prohibition where it has been partially applied. The results have not been as satisfactory as many temperance gentlemen could wish. But it is said by them that is not giving the question fair-play, because the prohibition only extends to the city or county, and as liquor is obtainable from adjoining counties, fair-play is not given to the principle. Speaking as far as the province I come from is concerned, where the Scott Act was in force in all the counties of the Island for many years, I think I can fairly say that prohibition works to the great advantage and benefit of the rural population, and to the great disadvantage and evil in the cities. I do not think that in the cities the Scott Act worked well or did good; I think it was productive of a good deal of harm. I think it did immense good in the rural districts. But I voted some years ago in favour of having this question of prohibition submitted to a plebiscite, divorced from all other questions. Why, Sir, if you go to the country to-morrow upon the trade question, what would be the result? It will be almost impossible to get a fair, unbiassed verdict from the people, because in almost every district there will be a small body of men known as prohibitionists who look upon the question of prohibition as more important than the trade question, or any other. They do not care to obtain a verdict on the trade question, but they will stand shoulder to shoulder in favour of a man who will declare himself for prohibition. That is not as it ought to be. I think myself that we ought to have adopted the resolution that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) moved here some years ago, and which I had the honour to support in this House, that the country should be tested upon the question of prohibition, yea or nay. If at such an election the question had been discussed in its various phases, its social aspects, its economic aspects and its political aspects—using the word political in its largest sense—and this question had been discussed: You are going to lose so many millions of revenue by prohibition, and are you prepared to levy this deficiency of eight or ten millions by direct taxation or otherwise? the people would then be able to vote upon that question divorced from the thousand and one issues which are tendered to them, and mixed up at a general election. Well, when that question is solved, if public opinion largely preponderates in favour of it, then, I say, must the Government consider the ulterior and further question, whether they see their way clear to raise sufficient money by other methods of taxation to make up the deficiency which the loss of revenue from this liquor traffic would cause. That is the political question, and it is one which the Government of the day have got to solve. But how is this commission going to solve it? They came down to my province, and selected half a dozen extreme men on each side, and examined them. Examined them upon what? Examined them simply upon their own opinion as to whether prohibition would work or not. That is not the point. The question is, whether there is a sufficiently strong opinion in favour of a prohibitory law to enable such a law to be carried into effect.

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) How will you find that out?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) By a plebiscite. I would not determine the question simply on the vote polled, but as to whether a majority of the registered electors declared themselves in favour of that system. If voters stayed away from the polls, that fact would show that their hearts were not in favour of the system. If, however, a majority of the registered electors declared in favour of prohibition, that phase of the question would be settled, and we then would be brought face to face with the question as to whether our economic and financial position would justify the Government in carrying out prohibition. That is the question which the Government would have to solve. What light were gentlemen travelling around the country going to throw on this problem? None whatever. At the conclusion of their labours we shall be no wiser than we were before. I could understand the policy of sending two or three independent men to the state of Maine to examine into the effect of prohibitory legislation there. That might have done some good, but these travelling gentlemen visiting the different cities and asking stereotyped questions of some temperance men, of some moderate drinkers, and some engaged in the traffic themselves, cannot afford any solution of the question, and cannot place us one inch further towards obtaining a solution of the liquor question, when their report is made, than we are to-day. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite if this proposition does not present itself as the correct one, and I contend that, after this report has been made, the Government will not be justified in taking a single step until they have found out by plebiscite, or some similar method, what is really the opinion of the people as to the desirability of introducing and enforcing prohibition. If the public sentiment is not behind such a measure, it could not be carried out, and turmoil and injury would accrue to the community, which would produce far more evil effects than any benefits that would be derived; but, if the mass of the people are in favour of such a law, it behooves this Parliament to carry out their behest. I do not think you can find this out at a general election, but by a plebiscite, and by that mode only.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman has not fairly indicated the province of the commission by any means, when he states that the commission simply examined a few extreme men as to whether they are for or against prohibition. If I correctly understand the duty of the commission, it is to gather information which would be valuable: first, as to how far the revenue would be affected by the destruction of the trade or otherwise; second, what amount of property was invested in the trade, and other data that would be very valuable either to the Government or to private individuals to satisfy their own minds as to what course should be pursued. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) said there will be three classes of people who will be influenced. First, out-and-out temperance people; second, those directly engaged in the liquor traffic, and, third, the intermediate class who were open to conviction, and if convinced, would decide one way or the other. But there is another class outside of these, the class of men who would be willing to support a measure of total prohibition on the basis of compensation to those engaged in the trade, whose business and property would be destroyed if such a law came into existence. This class is the only correct and honourable one. It is the duty of this commission to collect such data, by which we would be enabled to understand the amount of capital invested in the trade, the various ramifications which would be affected, and also how far the revenue would be destroyed, and what method could be adopted of replacing the revenue in the event of the Government or the country determining that we should have prohibition. On these various lines, valuable information is being collected, which could not be collected otherwise than by a commission. Under these circumstances, the commission is a most important one, the information collected will be valuable, and it will enable the people to determine individually which way they are inclined to go, after the report is laid before this House and before the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I must say, in regard to the claim that a Royal Commission is not necessary to find out the amount of revenue collected from the traffic, that our Inland Revenue returns will show that amount. Again, with regard to the value of property no doubt hon. members are aware that this can be obtained by referring to the municipal assessments of the several towns and cities in which the distilleries and breweries are located. So, the commission was not necessary on those two grounds. My impression is that the main object of the commission was to ascertain, if possible, how far public sentiment was ready to accept and put in force and successfully enforce temperance legislation. That appears to be the point on which there was considerable difference of opinion. Undoubtedly, this report, if printed in full, will prove to be a very voluminous one, and the Minister of Finance will remember that there was a question asked across the House the other day as to whether it was the intention of the Government to put a sum in the Estimates this year to defray the cost of printing the report. The Minister of Finance answered that this was the intention of the Government. It is highly desirable that the report should be in the hands of every member of the House one month or six weeks before next session. It will be a very extensive report, and it will be the duty of every hon. member to give the question his very serious and careful consideration when it comes up, and in order to do so, it becomes necessary to have the report at the earliest possible moment during the recess in order that members may become thoroughly posted and be able to form an intelligent and independent opinion on the subject from the evidence adduced as to whether Parliament will be justified in introducing and carrying into effect a prohibitory measure. I hope the Minister of Finance will see that the report is placed in the hands of every hon. member at the earliest possible moment, so that we may be able to deal with the subject next session, as I earnestly hope will prove to be the case.

Mr. CRAIG. I attended a meeting of members of this House in favour of prohibition in one of the rooms upstairs, and I heard some gentlemen talking, as hon. members have been talking to-day, to the effect that the report will be of very little value. But Mr. Spence, secretary of the Dominion Alliance, who has the cause of prohibition at heart as much as any one in this country, said that he had attended all the meetings of the commission, and from his own personal knowledge he had no sympathy whatever with those members who undervalued the report of the commission, that he knew it would be a most valuable report, that the information to appear within its pages could not have been gathered by any other means, and that it would prove a strong educating influence in favour of temperance and of prohibition. I thought it right to repeat this testimony which Mr. Spence gave in favour of the commission's report.

For Portrait of Lord Lansdowne. . . $1,022

Mr. CHARLTON. Is not this a pretty large sum to expend on a single portrait?

Mr. FOSTER. No. Before Lord Lansdowne left this country, Sir John Macdonald asked him to sit for his portrait in London, and said the Canadian Government would pay for it. Lord Lansdowne sat, and the portrait has been finished, and I believe it has just been received here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This is not encouraging home industry. There are many excellent portrait painters in this country, and it would have been desirable to have induced the Governor-General to have sat to one of them.

Mr. CHARLTON. Some of our home artists would have been very glad to have done the work for $300 or $400.

Increase of salary of M. Kelly, Assistant Inspector of Weights and Measures. $50

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is this for?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). On inquiry I find that this official does the hardest and largest part of the work connected with the Quebec division, of which he is assistant inspector. The total collection amounts to $2,063.96, and of this Mr. Kelly collects $1,068.57. His salary has been $600, and it is proposed to increase it to $700. His division extends clear down to the coast, he is engaged the greater part of the year, and his expenses are very heavy. I am satisfied that he is a very deserving official and is entitled to the increase.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are his expenses paid by the department?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). His expenses are paid, but I think in his case there are some expenses it would be hard to recompense him for, when we consider the hardship he has to undergo, because he has to travel in all sorts of conveyances. I think he is a very deserving official.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If you put the increase on that ground, I would point out Mr. CRAIG.

that there are a number of very deserving officials in the town from which I come who are deserving of an increase of salary. There are gentlemen there who think their salaries should be increased, and who have made repeated attempts to get them increased. Some of the gentlemen to whom I refer hardly receive as much as would enable them to pay their way, although they have been 20 years in the service. I would point out to the hon. gentleman that the principle might be extended to the deserving officials to whom I have referred.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I wish the hon. gentleman would draw the distinction a little finer. Mr. Kelly is one of four or five officers in the division and he does more work than any one of the others.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That may be a good reason for reducing the number.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There is something in that suggestion. I will not say that the Weights and Measures branch of this department could not stand a decrease in officials; in fact I will go so far as to say that the staff could be cut down in that branch. I trust that the increases in this department may be few and far between. So far as this particular officer is concerned I am satisfied he deserves this slight increase.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. While the Weights and Measures branch of the Inland Revenue Department is under consideration, I would draw the attention of the Government to the fact that a promise was made last year, that they would inspect the milk cans at Toronto. A delegation waited on the Minister of Inland Revenue then, and he promised that he would have the cans inspected and marked. Now, that has not been done. Afterwards, I drew attention to the matter in the House and the promise was renewed, and since then we had another promise from the hon. the Controller of Inland Revenue. The Government have never carried out that promise, and the people are in the same position today that they were in a year ago. I find that the inspector at Toronto has neglected his duty, and that he has been attending to other work for which there is no necessity whatever. For instance, he went to Brampton and he found a box for carrying grain from a threshing machine that he claimed should be stamped, and he threatened the law on the people and said he would get them fined. However, they settled the matter by paying him $5, and he returned to Toronto rejoicing, with the $5 in his pocket. I suppose if he thinks he will make $5 another year, he will return there and threaten the people again. I would now ask the Government to insist on the inspector enforcing the regulation with regard to milk cans, because it is a great grievance to the farmers that they have to deliver milk in cans holding nine gallons, when they only get paid for eight. I hope the Government will at once carry out their promises in this matter.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought this matter to my attention. Since my connection with the department, I may say that positive orders have been given to the inspector at Toronto to carry out the hon. gentleman's request, and the request of the deputation which visited Ottawa a year ago.

Grand Falls Bridge, N.B. $500

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Chairman, I do not know how necessary this may be, and how far it is a work that is under the jurisdiction of this House, but, Sir, I do know that I brought to the attention of the Public Works this year, and the year before, a matter of a somewhat similar kind, wholly under the jurisdiction of this Parliament. I refer to the navigation of the River Sydenham. The Trade and Navigation Returns show that there is an immense and important traffic on that river. The Government is allowing the navigation on that river to be destroyed, and, up to the present time, I have received no assurance whatever that any appropriation will be made to remove the obstructions to navigation there. I called the attention of the Minister last year to the fact that steam-boats were plying daily from Louisburg and from Dresden to Sarnia and Detroit, and other ports of importance, and that the proprietors of these boats complained that the wheels were broken by sunken trees in the river, and that it was the duty of the Government to protect the navigation, but, up to this moment, nothing has been done. I have simply had a communication this year, as I had last year, acknowledging the receipt of my application; but I have received no intimation from any member of the Administration that these obstructions would be removed, and it seems to me rather an unusual course, to make appropriations for public works that are not under the jurisdiction of this Parliament at all, and to neglect works which are of the first consequence to the trade of the country. The Government are trustees for the public, holding in trust the public funds, and the funds ought to be applied to the protection of those harbours and rivers where there is a large amount of trade and commerce carried on. Every year when the waters are high in the River Sydenham, whole trees are sometimes undermined, fall into the river, float forty or fifty miles, become filled with water, sink to the bottom, and thus become obstructions to navigation. In a little while bars are formed against these trees. A few hundred dollars would be sufficient at present to remove the obstructions, which a short time it will take as many thousands to remove if the matter is neglected. I have spoken to Ministers personally, and not seeing anything yet done in the way of an appropriation, I bring the matter to the attention of Parliament, to satisfy those interested in the trade and commerce of that section of the country, that as far, at all events, as I am concerned, I have done my duty, and I ask the Government to do theirs.

Militia Expenses—Rebellion, N.

W. T., 1885 $3,000

Mr. FOSTER. This is to pay claims which have been made and which have been adjudicated upon by the authority appointed for that purpose. They come through the Department of Justice. There has been a similar sum required each year for three or four years.

Unprovided items, 1891-92. . $158,247 50

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What do these chiefly consist of?

Mr. FOSTER. You will see them all fully detailed in the Auditor-General's Report. During the last four years I have reduced these unprovided items from about $800,000 down to $158,000, and I propose, by strict supervision, to reduce them still lower, if possible. They are little odds and ends of expenses in the different departments.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 10th March, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 91) to amend an Act respecting the Nova Scotia Permanent Benefit Building Society and Savings Bank—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Weldon.)

REPRESENTATION OF VAUDREUIL.

Mr. LAURIER. I again call the attention of the Government to the vacancy in the representation of Vaudreuil. I should like to know if, at last, the returning officer has been appointed?

Mr. FOSTER. I should like my hon. friend to put his question on Monday.

Mr. LAURIER. I will put my question on Monday; but if the returning officer is not appointed on that day, there are means which can be used when an hon. member thinks that the justice to which he is entitled is not granted.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the printing of the revised copy of "Hansard" is far behind, the issue for March 1st not having yet been placed in the hands of members. This printing is, therefore, ten days behind, and it appears to me absurd that these revised copies have not yet been issued, so that they can be distributed to members and the press of the country. What is the explanation of the delay?

Mr. COSTIGAN. With respect to the delay, which the hon. gentleman has charged to the printing department, in the issue of the revised edition of the "Hansard," I may say that, so far as the Printing Bureau is concerned, a very complete system has been adopted of furnishing information to the House and to the Government as to the progress of the work connected with the publication of "Hansard." Whenever there is a delay of one hour or five hours in regard to the transmission of manuscript from the translators to the Bureau, or from the Bureau back for revision or correction, or in the final distribution of "Hansard" to the House, a statement is placed in the hands of the House, and a copy of that statement is furnished to the chairman of the "Hansard" Committee. I am sure if that hon. gentleman were in his place he would join me in stating that so far as regards the Printing Bureau, every exertion is being made to keep up the work and avoid delay. In some cases within my own knowledge delay has occurred respecting some speeches delivered in French. That, of course, delays the publication of that portion of the "Hansard" which is in English. Again, sometimes the copy for revision has been retained in the hands of members a little longer than it should for purposes of revision. I can assure the hon. gentleman that in performing the work of the Printing Bureau no time has been lost.

Mr. McMULLEN. The system should be changed, for at the present time the country press is deprived of the corrected copy of "Hansard" for nearly two weeks.

Mr. EDGAR. I think the Printing Bureau must be blamed. A long time ago an Order of the House was made for the printing of papers brought down in connection with the Caron Commission. I have made inquiries very recently from the officers of the House who are correcting the proofs, and they informed me that for some time the evidence proper is in type and has been corrected and struck off, and that they are now engaged in correcting the exhibits, which may take a week or two longer to get all finished. I would suggest that one copy of the evidence should be printed and distributed among the members of the House at once, even if the exhibits have to come afterwards.

Mr. COSTIGAN. My attention was drawn to the matter at the time the printing was ordered. An inquiry was made of the Prime Minister, as to when the evidence and the report would be ready for the House, and he sent the inquiry to me. I was informed by the Queen's Printer that by giving it his best attention, with a view to expedite the work and employing extra hands, he thought it would be ready in some three or four weeks. That time has nearly expired, and I am quite sure the report must be nearly ready. I dare say I would be quite safe in saying it would be ready on Monday.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman will be able to tell us definitely on Monday when we shall have it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. EDGAR. Of course the length of the session will depend on when we receive it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There will not be an hour's delay.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to draw the attention of the Finance Minister to the necessity for calling a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee. We are now about six weeks here, and there has only been one meeting of the committee for the purpose of organization. If the Public Accounts Committee are going to do any work this session they should start to do it at once. I believe that a great deal of discussion which takes place in the House on items in Supply could better be done in the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. FOSTER. Would my hon. friend say what day next week would be suitable?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Wednesday.

Mr. FOSTER. I will see the chairman and ask him to call a meeting for Wednesday.

P.E.I.—COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Prime Minister intimated some days ago that he would be able to inform me whether an appointment had been made or not to the Prince County Court Judgeship.

Mr. FOSTER. The appointment has been made.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has it been accepted?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; it has been accepted.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 3) to amend the Wrecks and Salvage Acts.—(Mr. Costigan.)

RECEIPT OF PARLIAMENTARY FEES.

Mr. FOSTER moved second reading of Bill (No. 61) respecting the disposal of moneys paid in connection with proceedings before Parliament.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. EDGAR. Did the Minister tell us exactly the system that has been pursued up to this time?

Mr. FOSTER. The moneys have been collected by the clerk of the Private Bills Committee. These moneys have been deposited by him to the credit of the accountant in a peculiar form, so that they could be drawn by the accountant, countersigned, I think, by the clerk of the Private Bills Committee. Whatever charges are against these amounts have been paid directly by cheque upon these accounts, and after the charges had all been paid the balance was deposited to the credit of the Receiver-General. The system that this proposes is the same that is followed in Britain. They place all deposits immediately to the credit of the Receiver-General, and whatever fees, advertising expenses or refunds are necessary are paid by cheque upon the Consolidated Fund.

Mr. EDGAR. Then the accountant will receive no money; but only pay out. There is no other source from which he receives money?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. MULOCK. He is expected to deposit de die in diem?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Cape Tormentine Harbour..... $6,500

Mr. OUMET. The other day in the Supplementary Estimates I asked for $13,000 to complete the payments to the contractors on this work. The present vote is required to complete the wharf and to make certain repairs, namely, to replace the timber that has been destroyed by the teredo or sea-worm, and to protect the wharf by placing stone on each side. Since last year we have adopted a rule to use creosoted timber on all important works; but ordinary timber was used for this work, and some that has been there for only fifteen months has already been practically destroyed by the sea-worms. The wharf is to be placed in a condition to accommodate the traffic which will take place there in connection with the railway.

It will be the place of shipment on the mainland, as Cape Traverse will be on the Prince Edward Island side.

Mr. WELSH. Last year, when the subject of this Cape Tormentine pier was before the House, the question was asked when this expenditure was going to cease, and we were told that the amount then voted was the last to be asked for this work. Now, it appears, before this breakwater is completed, that it is beginning to rot and to be worm-eaten. I also asked what was the meaning of this breakwater. The hon. Minister of Public Works says that it is one end of the communication with Cape Traverse. Now, this wharf is in a very exposed position, subject to the sweep of the north-west winds down the gulf, and it is constantly getting filled up with sand; and then a further piece is built, and soon that is filled up. When the Government undertook to build this breakwater, if they intended it for the purpose of communication with Prince Edward Island, they should have taken a vote to build a breakwater at Cape Traverse, otherwise they cannot be sure of having communication there. In fact, I do not see that there is any call for this breakwater at all, because every year the Government will have to provide for the repair of damages received from the gales of wind. I would rather see some of this money voted for some of our necessary breakwaters and harbours on Prince Edward Island, which nature intended for harbours. A very few miles from this harbour there are good natural harbours. There is Pugwash, only about ten miles distant, a splendid harbour, then there is Shediac, also a good harbour, and on the opposite side we have Summerside and Charlottetown, both excellent natural harbours. Yet here is a large amount of public money being spent to build up an unnatural harbour. I do hope there will be some items in the Estimates of the Minister of Public Works, for I know that hon. gentleman is well inclined. He has lent a willing ear to the representations I have made of the wants of Prince Edward Island, and I have every confidence that he will use his endeavours to see that fair-play is done.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My hon. colleague was not in the House the other evening, or he would have learned that the object of this expenditure is not at all for the purposes of the ferry between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, although that was the excuse which induced the House, in the first instance, to vote the money. When I spoke the other night about the expenditure of this $30,000, which is appropriated for 1892-93, and the $6,500 which is to be voted for 1893-94, I called the attention of the House to the fact that there was no corresponding wharf on the other side and that, therefore, the expenditure was useless. But the Minister of Public Works told me that the object was solely to provide a shipping place for the railway which is owned by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood). His railway runs down there, and, although there are the natural harbours of Pugwash and Shediac, there is no wharf to enable his railway to run into those harbours, and it was therefore necessary to build one at the expense of $178,000 to enable that hon. gentleman to ship his lumber which is carried by his railway. Originally the House was induced to vote this estimate on the ground that the wharf was to be one of the termini of the ferry between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, but that excuse has been thrown to the winds, and we are told that it is intended simply for the benefit of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood). Had the House been told this in the first instance, strong as party lines are, I do not think the House would ever have consented to the vote. The Government have made their expenditure on the mainland, but they have not expended anything on Prince Edward Island, nor do they intend to. We were told that some surveys would be made this season to see if the project was feasible, but no trouble was felt about the feasibility on the mainland. Besides this, $6,000 or $7,000 of public money is to be appropriated for running the hon. gentleman's railway down to the wharf.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend's statements are somewhat wild. He says that $6,000 or $7,000 has actually been expended for running Mr. Wood's railway to the wharf.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is what the Minister of Public Works told us the other night.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I know it.

Mr. FOSTER. Not one dollar of that money is to be expended in running Mr. Wood's railway, or any other private railway, down to the wharf. So much for that statement. The gist of the other statement is that this appropriation, from first to last, was made for the purpose of having a wharf or shipping place for a private railway concern. That is not the fact either. The hon. gentleman knows well the circumstances that led up to the construction of the Cape Traverse wharf, then of the railway extension in Prince Edward Island, and then of the terminal wharf. All these were started and in progress and largely completed before Mr. Wood's railway ran over rails at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I stated that.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a fact that Mr. Wood and others built a railway which ran from Sackville, a connection on the Intercolonial Railway down to Cape Tormentine, but the connection between the two has been overstated by my hon. friend. The Cape Tormentine wharf being commenced, this railway did start and has been completed, and it utilizes that wharf. That is perfectly right and proper, but the cardinal idea that underlay the construction of these three separate works was to make connection between the mainland and Prince Edward Island at this point. That arose long ago, and was very thoroughly developed in a parliamentary investigation and report, and the idea was to make that a third connection between the mainland and Prince Edward Island. That idea has not been lost sight of. This vote finishes, I believe, the expenditure on Cape Tormentine wharf; that is, it finishes that wharf as it is to-day. I quite acknowledge that there would be no justification for making those heavy expenditures for the sake of simply arranging a place where some lumber may be shipped from a private railway. That was not the underlying motive which induced these three expenditures; and if the idea is not driven to its logical conclusion, of making a short communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, then the objects with which Parliament started out in the beginning will not be carried out. But it is the intention to make improvements upon the other side, as may be necessary, so that the connection may be complete.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Before the hon. gentleman continues his argument I wish it to be well understood, in answer to what he said about the statements I made when I was Minister of Public Works, that what I said then is quite in accord with what the leader of the House has just stated. I stated, on behalf of the Government, that this work at Cape Tormentine was for the purpose of making communication with the other side. That was the intention, and I have never heard that that intention has been abandoned. It was not abandoned when I was in the Government, and now I hear from the leader of the House that it is not intended to be abandoned, and therefore I wish it to be well understood that, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), said just now, what I stated was the exact meaning and understanding that the Government had at the time. Their intention was to have communication between the two.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat and the Finance Minister have stated exactly what I said when this matter came up the other night. I was very anxious to impress the fact upon the House. I think I repeated it to-day that this work was intended to make part of a ferry system between Prince Edward Island and the mainland to carry out the terms of the Union. The House was induced to vote money on that representation, that was almost the sole argument for the expenditure of this enormous amount of money. What I was calling the attention of the House to was the statement of the Minister of Public Works that at present they did not intend to construct the wharf on the other side, one of the termini, and, in the meantime, it was to be used to export lumber on the Shediac Bay.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Did they state that?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes; the Minister of Public Works stated that the other night. This is the second time the subject has come up. And that is what I stated to-day. The ex-Minister of Public Works (Sir Hector Langevin) has said that I made an inaccurate statement. The Minister said that $7,000 of this money was to be used to carry down to the end of the wharf the present Shediac Railway, which he chose to call Mr. Wood's railway—the Sackville Railway. The Minister said that, and I repeated it. He said it would enable the lumber carried on that road to be exported. He told me that he had not been satisfied from the engineer's report in his department that a proper wharf could be built satisfactorily on the Prince Edward Island side. He has not yet satisfied himself that this can be done. I do not know whether it can be done or not. I am only pointing out to the House that this work was intended for a specific purpose. We are now spending an enormous amount of money, and if the wharf is being destroyed by worms at the rate he says it will cost a fortune to keep it up, and if it is only to export what is carried on the road it is not worth keeping up.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I regret that I was not present to hear the hon. gentleman's first observations with regard to this vote. I happened to be absent, also, the other evening, when he spoke, but I have had the opportunity of reading his observations in "Hansard." I regret the hon. gentleman made observations the other evening, and I am informed he repeated them to-day, that are not fair towards the railway which I happen, fortunately or unfortunately, I am not sure which, to be connected with. Now, Sir, so far as the construction of the railway is concerned. I do not see that it has any connection whatever with the construction of this wharf. We all know, and there is no one in the House who knows better than the hon. gentleman, that there was a continual agitation for the construction of the railway from Sackville to Cape Tormentine, for many years before the work was commenced. I think the Act incorporating the company was passed some ten or twelve years before the work began. A great many efforts were made to induce some person, or number of persons, to put money into the work and commence its construction, but these efforts were unavailing. I think it was in 1882 or 1883 that I and others associated with me in Sackville, decided to undertake the work, and we did undertake it, under a promise of a subsidy from the Local Legislature, but without a promise of any subsidy from this Legislature. I had some notes upon this matter, but I do not happen to have them here; but I think it was in 1886 that, finally, this Government voted a subsidy in aid of this work. We have succeeded in building the railway, and I should judge, from the hon. gentleman's remarks, that he thinks, and that he would have the House infer, that the object of the Government, in voting the large amounts of money which have been voted for the construction of the work in question, was to benefit the Sackville and Cape Tormentine Railway. That, every one knows, who knows anything of the history of the work, is not correct. The wharf, I am quite free to admit, as the Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) has stated, would not be justified, if it was simply as a terminus of this railway. It was remarked, I believe, by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet), the other night, that some lumber would be shipped over this railway next year. I am glad to say that I think there will be, and I hope there will be some other local business. But the hon. gentleman is certainly very unfair, when he says that this work is purely for the benefit of the owners of the railway. If I look at it aright, it is not so much for the benefit of the owners of the railway as for the benefit of the owners of the lumber. The lumber goes over the railway now, shipped to a place called Port Elgin. It is carried there by rail and made up into rafts and shipped thence by vessel. The only difference to the railway of shipping it at Cape Tormentine will be that it will have to be carried to that point instead of to Port Elgin. It is certainly conveying a very unfair impression to the House if the hon. gentleman would have members believe that it is for the special benefit of this railway in connection with the shipment of lumber that this wharf is being constructed. Now, we all know the facts in connection with the construction of these branch railway lines. We know the difficulty there is in inducing people to embark in the enterprise, and we know—I know from experience, and I think the hon. gentleman will not dispute the statement—that many of those who do embark in these enterprises do not go into them with the prospect of very large profits. I am not in any way ashamed, nor have I anything to apologize for, so far as my connection with this railway is concerned. I think it has been said in this House, I know it has been said on other occasions, that this work was built expressly for my benefit and to facilitate the shipment of lumber from mills that I was alleged to have along the line of railway, and for the benefit of other property which I owned. I have stated before, and I am glad to be able to state it again, that I do not own a mill or any other property of any sort or kind along this railway, that I derive no personal benefit from it in any shape or way other than that I received in common with other residents of that section of the country. I may further say that I have been obliged to give a large portion of time to the affairs of this corporation, both during its construction and since it was completed, in assisting in the management and operation, and I have never received, have never asked and never expect to receive, one dollar of remuneration directly or indirectly for the time and labour I have spent in connection with this work. That may seem to the hon. gentleman or to some other hon. gentlemen in the House an extravagant statement. They may have the opinion that public men are influenced in everything they do by some selfish or mercenary motives. I am quite aware there is a great deal of selfishness in the world; but I believe it is possible for some public persons to be moved by public consideration and to devote a certain portion, at all events, of their time, and perhaps, sometimes, of their capital too, to the advancement of projects which, while they do not offer to the investor a very large return, are of great public advantage to the country in which they live. I have certainly been fortunate enough to meet with some persons of that character in my lifetime, and I think it is unfair for any hon. gentleman in this House to characterize every person who connects himself with a public work, as doing so merely from mercenary motives and with the object or hope of reaping large profits in the end. I wish to say, that so far as this wharf is concerned, there will probably be some local business done over it. Whatever local business is done over it, will be of benefit and advantage of the general public who do that business. It will not be of any special advantage to me or to the other owners of the Cape Tormentine Railway. I quite agree with the Minister of Finance, that the object in constructing this railway is to afford a means of communication at that point with Prince Edward Island. I believe that is the proper place to establish communication both in winter and summer. I would also remind the hon. gentleman, when he speaks of the Sackville and Cape Tormentine Railway as having been constructed altogether for my advantage, that there are no individuals who reap more advantage from the construction of that road, even as it is to-day, than the travelling public of Prince Edward Island who have to cross in the winter time. The hon. gentleman remembers that before that road was constructed, they were obliged to drive some thirty-five or forty miles from Au Lac or Amherst by stage, and the complaints were numerous and loud against that means of travelling, and no class of persons demanded the construction of the railway between these points more than the people in Prince Edward Island. If you will turn back to the "Hausards," you will find that not a session of Parliament had passed for ten years before this road was commenced, in which the representatives of the Island in the House did not press upon the Government to take some means to secure the construction of this line of railway. They have the benefit of travelling over it now, when they cross in the winter time. Now, I quite agree with the remarks which were made by one of the representatives, the other evening, in regard to the necessity of completing this connection with Prince Edward Island. I believe that steps should be taken at once to have the wharf at Cape Tormentine put in shape, so that it will be possible for a steamer to run across there. The principal object in the construction of this railway was to afford better means of communication with Prince Edward Island, and I will endorse any effort that may be made by the representatives of Prince Edward Island, or by anybody else, to attain that object. I cannot see that any serious blame is to be attached to the Government because this work at Cape Tormentine has not been completed as early as was desirable. The contract was let in 1886 or 1887. The first contractor failed, after some few years, and there was a considerable delay before the contract was let again. The contractor who has had it in charge, and who has at last completed it, has done his work well, I believe, and as rapidly as could reasonably be expected. The work was not completed until last fall, but it was impossible, before it was completed, to have any communication with Prince Edward Island at this point. Now that it is completed, it does appear to me that there should be no loss of time in putting the wharf at Cape Traverse in such a position that communication may be at once established. That was the policy of the Government, as settled in 1883, after the committee reported, and that policy has been followed ever since in the expenditure of these public moneys. I do not expect it is the intention of the Government to abandon that policy now; they will certainly be very censurable, if they do so. I will be glad to join with any members of the House in pressing upon the Government the importance of having these works completed, and regular communication established there as soon as possible.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am utterly at a loss to understand the meaning of the first three-fourths of the hon. gentleman's speech. He led this committee to understand that I had, at some time, or in some place—and he intimated that it was this session—cast some reflection upon him for constructing the Sackville Railway. I never cast any reflections upon him for constructing the Sackville Railway. I never opposed the construction of the Sackville Railway. The point we were upon was the expenditure of certain moneys to enable the owners of the Sackville Railway to export lumber. I never questioned the hon. gentleman's enterprise; I never referred to the way the railway was built, whether he built it from Government subsidies or private subsidies, or whether he ought to be commended, or approved, or condemned, in any sense whatever. The hon. gentleman has evolved that from his own inner consciousness, for some purpose I cannot conceive of. I will refer to the record. In answer to my question, what the Minister of Public Works wanted $30,000 for, he replied as follows:—

The contract has been completed. The estimated cost was $185,000. The final estimate amounts to only $179,200. The amount already paid is $166,000, and the balance of $13,000 now asked for is to complete the payment to the contractor. Some additional work will have to be done, and in the main Estimates we ask for $6,500 to complete the work and put it in order so as to bring the cars on the dock. This will be done at the beginning of the summer, and we hope that the whole wharf will be ready for navigation this season. From what we hear we expect that it will be fully utilized.

That was the first comment I interposed in the debate at all. I was anxious to see that this railway should be constructed, as it had been originally intended as one of the termini of the ferry between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Then I asked the hon. gentleman, on the next page, whether it was simply for the purpose of enabling the owners of the Sackville Railway to export their lumber, or whether it was to be constructed as one of the termini of this ferry; and the hon. gentleman went on, as I will read to the House now, to give me to understand that it was not to be constructed as one of the termini of the ferry, that it was to be constructed simply to enable the owners of the Sackville Railway to export lumber. What did he say:

My information is that when the wharf is completed, and when the cars can come to the end of the wharf, it is intended to have large shipments of lumber from that point.

Is that not explicit? Now, let us find out what the real dispute is about. The hon. gentleman told me that $6,500 was to be asked to put the cars to the end of the wharf to enable them to export lumber from there. Why, it is as plain as a pike-staff, as you will see from page 1341:

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then we are building that wharf for the purpose of enabling the owners of the Sackville Railway to ship lumber from there. Is that it?

Mr. OUMET. No, the railway will carry lumber, and the people of New Brunswick will sell it, and both will be benefited by the road. The fact that Mr. Wood is president of that railway, is no reason why the people of New Brunswick should not have that accommodation for shipping their lumber. The ferry question is another thing. The Sackville Railway, I understand, was built with the expectation that it would give the people of Prince Edward Island the shortest and best communication with the mainland. I presume that the branch of the Island railway to Cape Traverse was built with that expectation, and the present wharf was built for the same purpose; but on account of the delay in constructing the work, there has been every year an accumulation of sand, so much so that there is hardly sufficient water for a ferry to approach the wharf. Since the work has been carried to completion, communication has been opened with the Department of Railways, and a controversy has arisen as to the success of that ferry scheme. In that view, the Department of Public Works, having been informed by the engineers that $30,000 would be required to construct a deep water wharf there, similar to that constructed at Cape Tormentine, with fifteen feet at low water, has decided that it would be better to make an experiment before entering upon that large expenditure; and it is the intention of my department, acting with the Department of Railways, to carry out some dredging near the wharf at Cape Traverse, in order to ascertain whether we will be justified in undertaking that further expenditure of $30,000. I think I am perfectly justified in taking the position that before I recommend such a large expenditure, I must be assured by the Department of Railways that the expenditure will not be useless.

The hon. gentleman will see the point to which my criticism was directed. I said that the Government came to this House and asked for $200,000 to build a railway branch in Prince Edward Island to connect with a ferry, that they expended $178,000 or $180,000 in building a wharf, which was to be one of the termini of the ferry; and after that expenditure had been made, the Government came to the conclusion that they were ignorant as to whether it was feasible to build a wharf on the Island side, and they decided to institute inquiries as to whether it was feasible to carry out such work. Then I ask, why should the Government spend $6,500 to bring down cars to the end of the wharf on the New Brunswick side? My criticism was directed to that point. I did not refer, directly or indirectly, to the construction of the Sackville Railway, whether it was a laudable enterprise or not, whether it was constructed with private means, whether it received a subsidy from the Government or not, nor did I refer to the hon. member for Westmoreland, or call in question his zeal, or enterprise, or motives. The hon. gentleman has himself conjured up the whole matter. I devoted my criticism entirely to what I consider was reckless mismanagement on the part of the Public Works Department. I declared that before the Government expended $500,000 on the construction of terminal facilities in connection with the ferry at that point, they should have ascertained whether a wharf could be constructed on the Island side, and not have come to Parliament at the tenth hour, after they had expended $400,000, and stated that they did not know whether a wharf could be built there, although it was absolutely necessary to make the ferry scheme a success. The Minister said that $30,000 would be required to carry out the ferry scheme, and it was necessary that he should investigate the matter and ascertain if the project was feasible. I repeat that I was calling the attention of the House to the reckless mismanagement of the department in consequence of which nearly half a million dollars had been expended on the enterprise, when the very feasibility of the work that was necessary to make it a success to the people of Prince Edward Island was left in doubt, and that Parliament should be told that after this large amount of money had been expended in New Brunswick, the department does not yet know whether the wharf on the Island is feasible, and the people on the Island must wait till the Ides of March come before anything can be obtained for the Island. I pointed out that was the measure of justice meted out to the Island, but that $6,500 were asked by the Minister of Railways to carry a tram down to the end of the wharf so that the railway company may be able to ship its lumber there. I therefore pointed out that Parliament never would have voted $178,000 to build a wharf there if it had known it was only for the purpose of shipping lumber. The statement to which the hon. member for Westmoreland has referred was not my statement, although both the hon. gentleman and the Finance Minister have attempted to make it my statement. I never referred to that matter until the Minister of Public Works officially stated, or rather gave it as an excuse for expending $6,000 or $7,000, and if those hon. gentlemen's constituents were treated as the people of Prince Edward Island are treated year after year, they would criticise these expenditures pretty closely too. How does this matter stand now? We stand charged in the Public Accounts with an expenditure of $200,000 in connection with the Island, and no doubt people will say, as they are accustomed to say, that the Island is always giving trouble, and, therefore, $200,000 has been expended there. This is not true. The Government have squandered that money, and the Minister of Public Works doubts whether it is feasible to build the wharf which is necessary to carry out the ferry scheme. It is time I criticised and called public attention to this matter, and to affirm that the expenditure of $178,000 cannot be justified on any ground whatever, except on the ground originally put forward, but now thrown aside, that it was to constitute one of the termini of the ferry to the Island.

Mr. PERRY. When any small grant is required for Prince Edward Island, the excuse is invariably made that the Government have no money. That excuse can be put forward now, as the duty on binding twine has been reduced and the cost of inspection of coal oil has been struck off, and thus there may be a deficit in the revenue. I suppose these reductions will be put forward as a reason why Prince Edward Island cannot receive any consideration in regard to grants of money for public works. I do not find fault with the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) for looking after the interests of his constituents, for he is right in doing so; but when it turns to a matter of self, of putting money into his own pocket, and the hon. gentleman asks that public money be voted to help himself, I will always enter my protest against such action. What is the Minister of Public Works doing? He is having money voted to enable the owner of the Sackville Railway, who is the hon. member for Westmoreland, to ship his lumber. That is a private road; it belongs to the hon. gentleman opposite, or to some company of which, I suppose, he is president. The Government own a railway in Prince Edward Island, to our sorrow. They have built a branch at a cost of $200,000, and when we ask that an expenditure of $20,000 be made to extend the Cape Traverse wharf on the Island, in order that the products of the Island may be carried to the railway terminus and shipped to New Brunswick, we are told that the Government will do nothing to aid the work, or rather we are told that they may possibly do a little dredging some time or other, not even mentioning the time. We know there is only one dredge on the Island, and it will no doubt be carried away to some point where some friends of the Government wish work done. I would not, however, recommend that any dredging be done along the wharf at Cape Traverse, because the work is built on the sand, and if a channel is dredged four or five feet deep, the whole structure will cant over and be destroyed, proving another monument to the incapacity of the present Government in carrying out public works. The Minister of Railways took a short trip to the Island not long ago, and he cancelled the appointments of half of the railway officials. To-day we are short of railway accommodation. A trip from Summerside to Charlottetown, a distance of fifty miles, and return, occupies three days. Is that the sort of accommodation in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, or the upper provinces? Certainly not, and in this respect a great wrong is done to the people of the Island. When we ask a vote of $5,000 to rebuild the wharf at Westpoint, in the beautiful county of Prince, which I have the honour to represent, to enable small vessels to carry the Island products to Richibucto and Shediac, we are told there is no money in the Treasury. Of course the duty has been reduced on binding twine, and, therefore, there is no money in the Treasury. We are told there is going to be a falling off in the Treasury, and that, therefore, the Government has no money. That is the answer we always get in Prince Edward Island. I would like to ask the acting Minister of Marine how many hundred dollars were paid last year by the owner of that Sackville railway as wharfage at Cape Tormentine for landing lumber. He is using the wharf, his road and his own private self have the benefit of it, and I presume he is paying nothing. He has free trade down there at that wharf. He is a protectionist in this House, but when he goes home and the money comes into him, he is a free trader. As I said, it is no wonder that the Prince Edward Island Railway is not paying expenses, when ten miles of it during a large portion of the year carries no trade beyond a few small articles from Cape Traverse to the junction of the main line. At least one-third of the trade of Queen's county and one-third the trade of

Prince county would be done there in summer, if accommodation was provided at Cape Traverse. We find, from the report, that at the terminus of the Island Railway there is only three feet of water at low tide. We know that is not sufficient to enable a steamer to load a heavy cargo and go to Cape Tormentine. What does the Minister of Public Works propose to do to remedy this evil? He says: First, we will try an experiment, we will send a dredge there and have some digging done. But where is he going to get the dredge? He has only one small dredge for the whole province of Prince Edward Island, and it has more to do outside of Cape Traverse altogether than it can do for the next fifteen or twenty years. I suppose that he will next propose to build another dredge, but the policy of procrastination will be introduced into that matter too, and it will be postponed year after year. We are told that the people of Prince Edward Island have no reason to complain. My friend the senior member for Cape Breton had the impudence to tell us the other day that we had so much accommodation for trade in Prince Edward Island that every table in Ottawa had Prince Edward Island potatoes on it. I defy the hon. gentleman to show me one Prince Edward Island potato. I heard a gentleman offer in Ottawa, the other day, a one dollar bill if he could find one Island potato in all Ottawa. Now, why is that? It is not because we have not the potatoes down there, nor because the people of Ottawa are not able to pay for them, but it is because we have no facilities for bringing them here. We are shut out from the Dominion of Canada. I say that the Government is unpatriotic in their treatment of Prince Edward Island, and that it is trying, in every way, to starve out the people of that province. As I said before, I do not blame the member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) for looking after the interests of his constituents, but I want the House to remember that if you take the whole shore along there down to Pictou, you will find it lined with gold pieces—money expended extravagantly by the Government. The county of Westmoreland is held for the Government by extravagant expenditure of money, and the counties of Cumberland, Colchester and Pictou are held by the Government by lavish expenditure of money, or money guaranteed by the Government. What is the Chignecto Ship Railway got up for, if it is not for the purpose of holding the counties of Pictou, Colchester and Cumberland for the Tories. We know the members of these counties are here to support the Government at all hazards. No wonder the member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) supports the Government, because he gets very good feed at the public crib. He recommends the Government to persist in a policy of extravagance. As far as the Sackville Railway is concerned, it is all very well, because he is principally and selfishly engaged in that enterprise. I understand that he got a large amount of money as subsidy from the Dominion Government, and he may have had a subsidy from the Local Government as well. I presume the railway has cost him very little; perhaps the whole of the stock he put in may amount to about 15 per cent of the capital, but I do not know. But he has the full benefit of the railway, and I would not begrudge it to him if he did not get it at the expense of the people of Prince Edward Island. The Government have refused to encourage navigation there, and my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) was right in stating that the wharf was for the benefit of the owners of the railway to run their cars on it, and not for the benefit of the people generally. Of course, if the Government persists in carrying out that policy they can do it; they have majority enough to do anything, except, perhaps, to alter the seasons of the year. I suppose they feel that Prince county sends two members to oppose the Government in this House, and they say: We will make the people of that county have a little more sense and return Tories here. Well, Sir, if they wait for Prince county to send Tories here, they will wait until they have hair on their teeth, and that will be a long time. The people of Prince county have too much sense to send Tories here. I am sorry to say that the people in the eastern end of the province did support the Government, and I regret that they have fallen amongst thieves. I had an idea, at one time, that the Government were going to be patriotic enough to extend that work at Cape Traverse. They are well aware that a meeting called by Conservatives and attended by both Conservatives and Liberals, at which I had the pleasure to attend, sent a respectable petition, numerously signed, to the department, asking that this work should be done. What was the answer given to that? The people of Prince Edward Island asked for bread and they were given a stone. The Minister said that the Government would dredge alongside the wharf, but he did not say what year he would do so, whether he would do it this year, or the next year, or when. If the bottom had been dug, five or six feet from the surface, then it might be all right to dredge four or five feet, but where is the engineer in the world that would recommend dredging alongside of a wooden wharf, built on the surface of the sand? Is it reasonable, is it practicable? Is it common sense? I am sure it is not. I am sure that the Minister of Public Works will not get one of his engineers to recommend that. The only object of it is to throw dust into the eyes of the people of Prince Edward Island. Where there is a strong tide and floating ice and drifting sand, is no place to build a breakwater. We know very well that structures built on sand are always on the surface unsafe; and that being the case, all the hon. gentleman's engineering, in order to provide facilities there for shipping, will be of no service. He feels bound to attend to the wharf at Cape Tormentine in the interest of the railway owned by my hon. friend from Westmoreland; but he says to the people of Prince Edward Island: You may starve; we are doing very well here, making a good traffic in lumber which is our staple export, but you can keep your horses, your sheep, your potatoes and your other products at home. That is the policy of the hon. member for Westmoreland. I am sorry to find that he is so unneighbourly. When the work was going on at Cape Tormentine, I had hoped that that was meant to be one terminus and Cape Traverse the other; I had hoped to see steamers running across; but I have not yet seen them. Sir, we are humbugged on the Island every year. We have sometimes been as long as four days without receiving a mail. But it seems that that does not signify a button. The Government are quite satisfied that we should be punished. They attempt to lead the world to believe that the people of Prince Edward Island do not pay their share of the duties. They got the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), in one of his moments of weakness, to tell this House that Prince Edward Island paid in duties only $272,000 in the year, when the fact is that we actually paid nearly $1,000,000. And what do we get in return? A trifle over $600,000 a year. Sir, I contend that the Government of Canada owe us the balance. I will explain why we are not represented as paying our full share of the revenue of this country. We know that Montreal is credited with paying 100 per cent more duty than the great city of Toronto, and why? Because the importations are made at Montreal. In the same way our importations are made elsewhere, but the duties are paid by the hard-working consumers of Prince Edward Island. Now, I do not know whether I can expect much in the shape of public grants from the Government. The hon. Minister of Public Works has not decided whether or not he will rebuild the wharf at the West Point. He is under the impression that the people there can travel fifteen or twenty miles and haul their produce, and he has not yet made up his mind whether or not he will grant us $6,000 or $7,000 to build the wharf. The old wharf was built by the Local Government a quarter of a century ago, and the people of Canada took it from the Island under the solemn pledge that they would keep it in repair, as they did all the other piers and breakwaters on the Island; but they have allowed that wharf to break up. They have not spent a single dollar upon it. The same is the case with the Cape Traverse wharf. The people of Prince Edward Island built a wharf at that point because it was a necessity. The Government of Canada came in and took that wharf, and entered into a solemn compact to keep it in repair; but I suppose they would be ashamed to state how much they have spent upon that wharf since they got it. There is the same story everywhere. There is the Cascumpec harbour, on which they spent about $18,000 to blast rocks, but the rocks have been allowed to remain on the bottom, so that there is less water there than there was before. They sent a dredge which worked two days very well, but most of the rocks are still there, and I suppose will be left until there is a change in the Government of this country, and the sooner that change comes the better for the people of Prince Edward Island, and specially for my constituents, because then they may expect to get justice. Now, I do not know what the policy of the Minister of Public Works is with reference to that harbour. It is one of the finest harbours on the Island, but the water is now so low that there is only nine feet at low tide; and although petitions and requests have been sent to the Government for the improvement of that harbour, still nothing is done. The harbour of Malpeque, if not the best harbour on the north side, is the second best, but it is almost destroyed by a bar at the mouth. One vessel, loaded with oats for the home market, because we have no other market for a great many of our products, got aground on that bar, and what would have been the result if a storm came on and that vessel had been lost? It might have cost the owner thousands of dollars. The members of the Government have their salaries assured; but the poor man who has to depend on his vessel has to risk his property because of the neglect of the Government to do their duty. When they are told that a bar is there, which might be removed in a week or a fortnight if they would send a dredge to do the work, still they do nothing. It is a great pity that Prince Edward Island ever came into Confederation; it would have been better off if it had remained as it was.

Mr. WELSH. I compliment the hon. member for Westmoreland on his enterprise in building that railway. It has been of great use and benefit to the travelling community in the winter and to the people of New Brunswick living along that line. I am not aware that the hon. gentleman asked anything from the Government to help in that enterprise any more than any other railway company. The Government built a wharf at Cape Tormentine and a breakwater, and my recollection is that when that breakwater was built, it was to be the terminus of the ferry. The Government also entertained that idea, because only two years ago they brought down in the Estimates a sum of $40,000 to build public works at Cape Traverse, and they withdrew that and I compliment the Minister of Public Works for stating that he is going to make inquiry before asking for a sum of money to carry on that work. It is a matter which certainly requires looking after, because the wharf at Cape Traverse is built on sand and has been extended and extended, but, as fast as it is extended, the harbour fills up again. It is useless to go on spending money dredging in sand, for, as fast as you dredge, the harbour fills up again. I think the Minister of Public Works is right. I think this should have been done at the time the breakwater at Cape Tormentine was commenced. The Minister of Public Works of that day should have attended to it then and done as the present Minister intends to do. With regard to summer navigation across there, to which the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) referred, no doubt, in fine weather it will be a very nice little ferry and very convenient for the travelling community; but I know, from personal experience, that there is not a more dangerous piece of navigation in the Straits of Northumberland than at Cape Tormentine, where this pier is built. It is surrounded by a reef of rocks, except at one place which is very narrow. I have led plenty of ships through there and know all about it, and I know it is very difficult to navigate. And as for winter navigation, Cape Tormentine pier is altogether out of the question. I have listened with much attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), and think he put the matter very fairly. I also think that he removed the misunderstanding in this connection. All I ask is that the Government should pay a little more attention to the wants of Prince Edward Island. I feel sick almost of getting up and bringing forward, time and time again, our needs. I have been urging our claims ever since I have had a seat on the floor of this House. I have had promises, by word of mouth, from the late Minister of Public Works, but his promises were like pie-crust, and I think he is now eating the reward of false promises.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I wish to say a few words in reply to the hon. members for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and Prince (Mr. Perry). The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) said he could not understand my object in referring to my connection with this Cape Tormentine Railway, which occupied some three-quarters of the time I used in addressing the House. I have since turned up "Hansard." What I complained of was the unfair way in which the hon. gentleman, the other day, and to-day as well, placed this matter before the House. Now, he says he did not impute any wrong motives to me. But I find in "Hansard," on page 1344, that he said:

The Government built a wharf at a cost of $179,000, which cannot be justified in this House or the country, on any ground except that the Government were obliged to build it in order to carry out the terms of Union.

That is quite correct; but he goes on to say:

Now it appears that the whole structure was built as a feeder to the Sackville Railway.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is the Minister's statement.

Mr. OUMET. I never said that.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I read the debate all through and cannot see anything whatever to justify that statement. The hon. gentleman ought to know himself, that the Sackville Railway cannot derive any special advantage from the construction of this wharf, except through any traffic that may come over from Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman, a little further down, said:

The department has thrown away $400,000—$200,000 of which will benefit specially the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), who is largely the owner of the Sackville road, and it appears to me, from what the Minister says to-night, that he recognizes that fact.

The hon. gentleman thus representing that the construction of this work was for the benefit of myself or the railway with which I am connected. I endeavoured to show, a little while ago, that there is no way in which I am specially interested personally, in which even the Sackville road is specially benefited by the construction of this work. The work is only justifiable, as the Minister of Finance has said, as a means of communication with Prince Edward Island. Yet, notwithstanding that, the hon. gentleman afterwards said that this $6,500, which is the item we are considering, is for the special benefit of a railway, and to enable the owners of that railway to export their lumber. I explained, a little while ago, that neither I personally nor the owners of the railway have any lumber to export. There will probably be some lumber exported over that wharf. I know there will, but it is owned principally by persons not connected with the railway, and it is those persons who will get the benefit, if any there is, from shipping at that wharf. The railway does not get any special benefit.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They get their freight.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). They get their freight now on all the lumber. It is shipped over the railway, either to Sackville wharf or to Port Elgin, and the railway gets the freight.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Could the lumber be carried to the terminus there, Cape Tormentine wharf, if the wharf were not there?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Certainly not, but it would be carried over the railway to other points. If not carried to Cape Tormentine, it would be taken to Sackville wharf or Port Elgin, and the railway would get freight in any case. The railway gets freight on all this lumber in any case, whether this wharf is built or not. And the only benefit in shipping by Cape Tormentine goes to the owners of the lumber, and I will point out how that advantage comes. The principal part of this lumber is shipped now to Port Elgin. It is taken there on the railway and it is then put into rafts to be taken off to be loaded on board the vessels which can only be done out in the open bay. This, we know, to a certain extent, destroys the value of the lumber. If it is shipped to Cape Tormentine it can be shipped dry, and if the hon. gentleman's colleague was here, he would bear me out in saying that lumber will be worth from five to ten shillings a standard more shipped dry than when it is shipped in rafts in the open bay. The advantage, therefore, will be to the manufacturers, owners and shippers of the lumber and not to the railway. This statement of the Minister is the only statement on which the hon. gentleman has based his tirade of abuse against the member for Westmoreland.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There was no tirade of abuse.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). And, notwithstanding the explanation made, the hon. gentleman, in his second speech, repeated that this $6,500, the vote we are considering, is for the special benefit of the railway, and to enable the railway to export their lumber. And the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Perry), who followed him, used these words—I took them down: “The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) asks public money, $6,500, to help him to ship his lumber,” and a number of other expressions to the same purpose. I am sorry the hon. gentleman cannot discuss this matter without taking advantage of it either to make political capital for himself or to injure those who happen to be opposed to him. I think, when he gets upon his feet, addressing the House, he allows his zeal for the interest of his party to lead him into these very extravagant and unreasonable statements. I quite agree with everything the last speaker said in reference to the necessity for these public works being completed, so that regular communication can be maintained. The hon. gentleman reminded me, further, of the construction of the wharf at the Sackville end, which was mentioned in a remark which came out incidentally. The railway company have a wharf at Sackville, on the Sackville River, and never received or asked for or expected to receive a dollar of public money to assist in the construction of this wharf.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not quote that.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I have never asked a dollar for the construction of this wharf so far as the interest of the railway was concerned. As the hon. gentleman knows, this policy was adopted as a result of the report of the committee appointed in 1883 to look into this whole subject. That committee reported strongly in favour of this means of communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and recommended the Government to undertake these different public works and carry them out, in order that this communication might be established. That is the policy which the Government has pursued ever since: that is the policy which, so far as I know, they still favour, and which they intend, as soon as practicable, to complete. What I protest against is the unfair way in which the hon. gentleman proceeds, in presenting this matter to the House, to lead the House and the country to suppose that the Government are making these expenditures, in some way or other, for the benefit of the member for Westmoreland and the Cape Tormentine Railway.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is both ungenerous and unjust. He has deliberately attempted to lead the House to believe that I made statements in this House, when he knew I was merely repeating the statements of the Minister of Public Works. I knew nothing, when I spoke in this House, about the arrangements made to extend the railway to the end of the wharf. I did not refer to it directly or indirectly.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Let me correct the hon. gentleman. This vote is not to extend the railway.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Let me repeat what the hon. the Minister of Public Works said. Here is his explanation as to what this $13,000 was required for:

The amount already paid is $166,000 and the balance of $13,000 now asked for is to complete the payment to the contractor. Some additional work will have to be done, and in the main Estimates, we ask for $6,500 to complete the work and put it in order so as to bring the cars on the dock.

The hon. gentleman understands that. Then he went on:

My information is that when the wharf is completed, and when the cars can come to the end of the wharf, it is intended to have large shipments of lumber from that point.

The statement may be true or may be false, but the Minister of Public Works, in answer to my statement, said this money was being asked to enable the Government to bring the cars down to the end of the wharf, and, when asked what the cars were going to do, he said it was expected that large shipments would be made of lumber carried over the hon. gentleman's railway. And he further told me that the departmental reports showed that a large portion of the wharf had been constructed after the department knew that the complementary wharf on the other side could not be built, and, at the present time, he was not able to say whether that wharf on the Prince Edward Island side to enable the ferry to run would ever be built, that he would consult with the other departments and they would have another survey made; but that this wharf had only one present purpose and object, and that was the shipping of lumber and other material coming down the hon. gentleman's road. I think I was justified in coming to the only conclusion that any one could come to, that this money we are asked to vote was merely to run the hon. gentleman's road to the end of the wharf, in order to facilitate the export of lumber and other material. What else is it for? He speaks of my having vented a tirade of abuse against himself. It is very generous for him to attempt to draw the fire of the Opposition from the Government, but this "abuse"—criticism would be the fair word—was directed against the department which improvidently and recklessly has spent $400,000 to accomplish an object which could not be accomplished unless the wharf could be built on the other side, and they never took the means of ascertaining the facts in that respect, but as at present advised, they think it cannot. The hon. gentleman thinks I ought to sit quietly by, with a knowledge of these facts, and not criticise the Government, and this notwithstanding that I have been trying, year after year, to have expenditures made for Wood Island breakwater, the Rustico breakwater and others, and could not get it done. But the hon. gentleman gets anything he wants in Westmoreland, and he says to me: You should be satisfied; I am very comfortable; my wharfs and breakwaters are all built; I can get anything I want; you ought to be satisfied. The hon. gentleman knows that is an undignified position for him to take, coming, as he does, from the Maritime provinces. If he could get outside his party, he would like to assist me at times in pressing the necessity for the expenditure of some money in the county I represent, even though it is an Opposition county. He knows that we do not clamour to have works carried on merely to have public money spent in our counties, but that the works are necessary. I never asked the department for the expenditure of a dollar that the public interest did not even absolutely require. I did not go round the halls of the different public buildings in Ottawa seeking privately to influence the public men in the expenditure of public money. I made my demands, such as they were, here in this House. I have made them for the last ten or twelve years, and I have got what my hon. friend told you to-day, promises which were false, and which were not carried out. The record of the department, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, has been a disgraceful record. I stated that before, and I repeat it again. I told the hon. gentleman, the present incumbent, that I made no complaint against him, because he was new in the department, and I would not judge him until he had had fair-play. I told him I expected to get fair-play, and I reserved my judgment upon him and his department, while he presided over it, until I saw whether he was going to act fairly. But the hon. gentleman comes down now and talks about my criticism as a tirade of abuse. I think my criticism is amply justified, such as it was.

and I say that a department which spent $400,000 in carrying out a public work and having neglected to do that which was absolutely necessary to make the public work of any benefit, neglected to ascertain whether a link could be built until that $400,000 was spent—I say that the department is blamable, and hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House know that I am right in my criticism. The hon. gentleman sees it, and ought to have the justice to say so, that I based my criticism concerning this wharf upon the statement of the Minister himself, and it was fully and amply justified by the quotation I have just read.

Mr. CASEY. This item would seem at first glance to be one concerning only the neighbouring provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island; but, during the course of the debate, it has assumed a different character. It appears very clear that there has been a large and utterly unjustifiable expenditure of public money in this case; it appears that between $450,000 and $500,000 have been expended under false pretences by the Government in connection with this supposed ferry from Cape Tormentine to Cape Traverse. We were told at the time this vote was first proposed, and we have been told to-day by the late Minister of Public Works, that this vote was asked, primarily, for the purpose of completing communication with the Island, and having a ferry across from one harbour to the other. The House voted the money on that ground. We are told now that the ferry idea, if not abandoned altogether, is indefinitely postponed; I say, therefore, that the Government which asked us to vote this money, and which has spent this money under the pretense of building a ferry from Cape Tormentine to the Island, has simply defrauded the country of that much money. As to whether the ferry is still in view, we are left in doubt. The hon. Minister of Public Works gave, on Friday week, rather a confused account of his intentions in that respect. He said:

I was not Minister of Public Works when this particular work was undertaken, and I cannot question the correctness of the assertion of the hon. gentleman. But I may tell him from what I know—

I will call the special attention of the Minister of Public Works to the report in the "Hansard," and ask him to say if he has been correctly reported, because he appears to contradict himself directly in his remarks:

—But I may tell him from what I know and what I saw, that this wharf has been built exclusively in order to serve as a ferry accommodation with Cape Traverse. It is not an efficient harbour, true enough, but it is large enough for the ships that go there; I do not know how many there are. If it has been built only to serve for a ferry, I do not think it was necessary to build it in its present shape.

Now, that is a wonderful delivery for a Minister of Public Works. He sets out with the assertion that, so far as he knows, this work was built exclusively for the purpose of a ferry; he winds up with the statement that if it was built for a ferry he does not see any reason why it was built in the way it has been built. He does not know, therefore, whether it is meant for a ferry or not. He says he does not know how much traffic there is.

From what I saw, this wharf has been built exclusively in order to serve as a ferry accommodation.

In two sentences afterwards, he says :

If it has been built only to serve for a ferry; I do not think it was necessary to build it in its present shape.

Two of his sentences directly contradict each other. I think the hon. gentleman is quite right in saying, as he did, that he did not know much about this work.

Mr. OUMET. What you don't know, also, will make a big amount.

Mr. CASEY. I think if what I don't know was added to what the Minister does know, he would be a fairly intelligent Minister of Public Works. But it is quite certain that in regard to this ferry he is not informed, and it is quite certain that the work which has been carried on upon this wharf has been a waste of public money. In the first place, the Minister told us to-day that the sea-worm had eaten up all the timber in fifteen months.

Mr. OUMET. They did not eat it all up.

Mr. CASEY. There was a waste of public money, of course, in the first place, in building one end of the ferry before you knew whether you could have the other. That has been sufficiently pointed out already. Then there was a waste in building the wharf of wood which was not creosoted, so that as any person connected with such works must have known, the sea-worm would utterly destroy it in a very short time, and now it has been rebuilt. Then we come down to the connection of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) and his railway with this question. The Minister distinctly stated that $6,500 was required to get the Sackville and Cape Tormentine Railway down to the wharf; but, says the hon. member for Westmoreland, that does not concern us at all; the railway won't make anything more out of this. If they did not ship the lumber here, they would ship it from Sackville or Port Elgin, and they would have to raft it out into the bay, haul it out of the water and put it on the ship, and it is a great deal better to be able to ship it dry. But still, says the member for Westmoreland, the railway does not make any money from having improved terminal facilities. Mr. Chairman, I think even the hon. member himself must see how absurd such a statement is.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I did not make any such statement at all.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. CASEY. I took down the hon. gentleman's words, and if he will refer to the notes of the "Hansard" reporters he will find that he said that if they did not take lumber at this point they would take it at Sackville or somewhere else. At this other point it could not be loaded dry, while if they had this Cape Tormentine wharf the lumber could be loaded dry, and that was a great advantage.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I said a great advantage to the shipper; not to the railway.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman seems to think the interest of the shipper and the interest of the railway can be separated in this matter.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I stated distinctly that they were entirely separate.

Mr. CASEY. Of course people who send lumber over the railway do not pay for the freight, as the railway has no interest in the quantity shipped.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). The lumber has to be shipped over the railway.

Mr. CASEY. To some extent, of course.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). All the lumber in that section has to be shipped over the railway.

Mr. CASEY. All the lumber that has been cut hitherto has been so shipped. It is childish, however, to suppose that no more lumber will be shipped, that the traffic on the railway will not be increased with improved terminal facilities. Of course, this expenditure is intended to increase it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why is an expenditure of $13,000 proposed, if it is not to afford additional facilities for shipping lumber?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). It will enable the shipper to get a better price. Is not that a motive for constructing the works?

Mr. CASEY. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman intends to lower the rates of freight in consequence of the additional terminal facilities furnished at the country's expense or not. If such is his intention, there may be some force in his remarks. Otherwise the shipper will get no better price. But, of course, there will be more lumber to carry and the railway company will make additional profit. The hon. member for Westmoreland is an exceedingly disinterested man, according to his own statement. He says he expects to get no benefit from the work any more than anybody else along the line, that he expects no payment and has received no payment from the railway. I wish we could import a few such capitalists into Ontario, men who will invest tens of thousands of dollars and give their time for weeks and months and exercise the influence they possess with the Government, without expecting any profit. I am sure the electors of Westmoreland must feel deeply grateful to the hon. gentleman who spends his time and uses his influence without expecting any profit. The statement is too thin. Nobody believes that such men exist. No doubt the hon. gentleman is a good business man, and is able to make a fair profit out of every business transaction, and no doubt he will do so in the present case. He is perfectly right to do so as long as he accomplishes it by fair means; but when he makes a profit out of public expenditure, I do not think those are fair means. During the last ten years four or five times as much public money has been expended in the county of Westmoreland as in the whole of Prince Edward Island. Is that fact due to the influence of the hon. gentleman, or to the political complexion of the electors, and is the inadequate provision made for Prince Edward Island due to the fact that the Islanders, like the people of a tight little Island across the sea, are inclined to be free traders and send members of that stripe to Parliament? I can see no other reason for Prince Edward Island being neglected. The whole story reminds me of an anecdote which a friend of mine heard when travelling on the Intercolonial Railway. Passing a certain station, which was on one side of a deep inlet of the sea, he noticed a branch line which appeared to go round an inlet, and my friend asked an ex-member of this House, beside whom he was sitting, how large a place is that to which the road runs. The answer was: "It has 400 or 500 people." The question was put: "Is there any special trade there?" and the answer came: "They do a little fishing; but there is no particular trade." Then again the question was put: "But what is the railway going to carry?" The answer was: "It is going to carry the county." I think that is the case in regard to the wharf at Cape Tormentine and the extension of the railway to that point—it is intended to carry the county, more than to carry lumber or anything else.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have taken considerable interest in this discussion, and it is quite clear there has been a very large amount of money uselessly and extravagantly expended on this wharf. When the proposition for the construction of the wharf was first made the estimated cost was placed considerably below the amount already expended. The Minister of Public Works intimated, uncautiously perhaps, that this year it was intended to lay the tracks down to the wharf to facilitate the shipment of lumber. No doubt he stated what was true; but finding it was an imprudent observation on his part he is now rather disposed to withdraw it. At the inception of the scheme, no doubt it was intended to facilitate the transport of lumber over the railway. We will not, however, charge the Minister in question with this expenditure; he has, however, been guilty of sins of omission as well as of commission. It is obvious that from the commencement a mistake was made, because if it was intended to utilize the wharf for a ferry to the Island, proper steps would have been taken to see that there was a convenient place at which to erect a pier on the other side. This action is similar to that of a man who, desiring to build a house, selects a foundation on one side and commences to build without finding a foundation on the other side. The Dominion have erected a wharf at a cost of $200,000, and yet the Minister confesses that in order to utilize this wharf it is necessary to have another wharf erected on the other side; but no successful effort has been made to carry out the work. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Welsh) has expressed the opinion that the proposed location for this pier is a dangerous one for vessels at certain seasons, and that vessels could only approach it in calm weather. This appears to have been a useless and improvident expenditure from the beginning to the end. Any impartial person listening to this discussion can come to no other conclusion than this as well as a great many other public works have been constructed, not in the interests of the country, not for the purposes of developing trade, not to promote the general good, but for the purpose simply of carrying a particular county. We have the post office at St. Henri, and fifty or sixty other post offices erected, not necessary to accommodate the interests of the public service, but for political purposes. I have not the slightest doubt that this wharf is on a par with those. I hope that the present Minister of Public Works, when he gets clear of these ridiculously extravagant expenditures of the past will turn over a new leaf. I hope he will not follow in the footsteps of his predecessors and bring enormous unnecessary expenditures on the country for public works which are monuments of disgrace to those who projected them.

Mr. YEO. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this vote. We know that a large amount of money has been expended on this work, and if this comparatively small sum is required to repair the damage done at Cape Tormentine, of course it is very necessary. I had always understood, until the discussion which took place the other evening, that the principal object of constructing a wharf at Cape Tormentine was to facilitate the traffic between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. But I was astonished to hear the Minister of Public Works say the other evening that one of the principal objects was for the shipping of lumber. I am glad to hear from the present Minister of Public Works, as well as from his predecessor, that he has changed his opinion, and that he now says the object was to facilitate communication between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. We know that a branch line is constructed from the Prince Edward Island Railway main line to Cape Traverse, and we also know that there is a wharf at Cape Traverse which is useless, because it is sanded up so that a vessel of very light draft of water cannot get near it. We see that on the New Brunswick side the wharf is completed. That certainly is a much more extensive work than would be required to be built on the Island side, and it is somewhat strange that the Department of Public Works should make such a large expenditure on the New Brunswick side without providing for corresponding wharf accommodation on the Prince Edward Island side. The Minister of Public Works has not told us yet if it is his intention to immediately construct the harbour at Cape Traverse. He said that the idea was to dredge the wharf at Cape Traverse, but I understood from him that the dredge was to be employed during the principal part of the season in King's county, on the eastern end of Prince Edward Island. I think the Minister should tell the committee if he intends doing something during the present season for Cape Traverse. I take it that no one knows better than the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) that the wharf at Cape Tormentine will be comparatively useless unless either a wharf is constructed at Cape Traverse, if such a thing is possible, or a breakwater erected at the entrance of the harbour to prevent sand accumulating. I am somewhat surprised that a large expenditure should take place on the New Brunswick side before the Government had ascertained whether it is possible to make a harbour on the other side. I find that yearly large amounts of money are paid out to construct artificial harbours in different parts of the Dominion, while where there are natural harbours they are being neglected. As my hon. colleague has pointed out, at Cascumpec, on the north side of the Island where there is a natural harbour, a good deal of money has been expended in blasting and dredging it, but the rock which has been blasted is allowed to remain at the bottom, and no doubt, sand has accumulated during the last two years while nothing has been done on the work. Then again, at Malpeque, the best harbour on the north side of Prince Edward Island, a sand bank has formed in mid-channel, at the entrance of the harbour, which will destroy it if not removed. The sand bank was not discovered until last season, but if it is allowed to remain there undisturbed, it will accumulate until the whole entrance of the harbour will be filled up. This is a matter which ought to be attended to by the Government at once, and I hope that during the coming season some action will be taken by either of the Departments of Marine or Public Works. The Minister of Public Works stated that this wharf at Cape Traverse was sanded up, and I am sorry to say such is the case with nearly all the wharfs we have at present in the province. A large amount of money has been expended on the breakwater at Malpeque, but it is sanded around and almost useless now. There is another very good Government wharf at Victoria West, Prince county, but until some dredging is done it is entirely worthless. My hon. colleague has referred to the wharf at West Point, which is as necessary to the people of the western end of Prince county as any work could be, but that is also useless, because from year to year it has been neglected. I cannot find much fault with the present Minister of Public Works, because he has not been long in office, but I would remind him that the people in the neighbourhood of these wharfs are placed at a great disadvantage, so much so, that many of them have come to me and stated if the Government did not give them facilities for shipping they could not remain there. We know that Prince Edward Island is an agricultural country largely, and the shipping of produce is done in the fall of the year when the roads are generally very bad, and it is quite an object with them to have a shipping place within a mile or two of their farms, rather than to have to cart their produce fifteen miles or so. If they have to haul their produce long distances, they can derive no remuneration from it, and the consequence is that many of them have told me they will have to leave their farms if facilities for shipping are not provided. So far as the expenditure of public money is concerned, Prince Edward Island has been shamefully used. It has been stated by other gentlemen that this perhaps arises from the fact of the province sending members opposed to the Government. In my recollection Prince Edward Island has sent representatives who nearly all supported the Government, but I do not think we fared much better then. It may be the case in other provinces that members who support the Government can get more money for their counties than members opposed to it, but in the case of Prince Edward Island it does not seem to make any difference. We have to pay our share towards all the public expenditures on the mainland and we receive nothing in return. I trust that this state of things will not be allowed to continue, but that the hon. Minister of Public Works will pay some little attention to the interests of Prince Edward Island, and give us what we are entitled to. I know that very largely signed petitions have been sent to him asking for immediate attention to the requirements of Cape Traverse harbour, and I trust that he will give the matter his immediate attention. The wharf at Cape Tormentine, on which so large an amount of money has been expended, will be almost useless unless a harbour is made on the Prince Edward Island side.

Mr. OUMET. In justice to my predecessor and to the department, I beg to say a few words in explanation, and to give a summary of the history of this undertaking. In 1883, in response to numerous petitions which had been sent by the residents of Prince Edward Island, a committee was appointed by this House to inquire into the possibility of establishing steam communication between the Island and the mainland. The committee came to the conclusion that the best points for the ferry were Cape Tormentine on the one side and Cape Traverse on the other. In accordance with the report of the committee, the Minister of Public Works ordered surveys to be made, and they were made with very great care. Three or four different places were surveyed by the engineers of the department, their reports were sent in, and finally the chief engineer of the department made a report recommending Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse as the two termini of the crossing. In 1886, the first vote was asked and was obtained from this House, and at the time, I see by "Hansard," a good deal of discussion took place. Cape Tormentine, I understand, was not especially objected to, but my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Welsh) was opposed to the selection of Cape Traverse, as he is to-day. Perhaps he was right, but the reports of the engineers were there, and the Minister of Public Works was bound to act upon the recommendation of the people and of the engineers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think my colleague pointed out at the time the danger to navigation of building the wharf near the rocks on the Cape Tormentine side.

Mr. QUIMET. Yes; I see he protested against it. Well, I may tell the committee that this expenditure was not undertaken either to benefit the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) or any county on the mainland. It was undertaken solely for the purpose of satisfying the people of Prince Edward Island in providing what they considered had been promised them in the way of steam communication between the Island and the mainland. The place of crossing having been decided upon, a branch railway was built to Cape Traverse wharf. Unfortunately, the contract for Cape Tormentine wharf was given in 1886 to contractors who failed two years afterwards, I think—Messrs. Strachan & Bethune. There was, consequently, a long delay before a settlement could be arrived at with these gentlemen, and new tenders were called for, and a new contract made. I think the present contractors were greatly delayed during one season by storms. These are the reasons why this steam communication has not been established at an earlier day. Now, this wharf is going to be completed. Perhaps I made a mistake the other day, or I did not express myself so fully as to satisfy my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies). Although he has read what I said, my limited comprehension does not lead me to believe yet that he has been fair in his construction of what I said, and in the criticism that he has made. However, I am able to stand it. I said at the time that the contract for the wharf was completed, and I was asking $13,000 to pay the balance of the contract. Then I said that in order to put the wharf into proper condition, we should have to make some repairs. Some of the timber had been eaten by the teredo; these repairs are to be made with creosoted timber, so as to last as long as possible. I said that it was necessary to put the wharf in such a condition that the cars could be brought on to it, so as to facilitate the transfer of passengers as well as baggage and freight from the wharf to the ferry. That is what I said. I never said that we were building that wharf in order to enable the people of the New Brunswick Railway to ship their timber from there. I said that in order to make Cape Traverse wharf perfectly suitable for the traffic we should have to build an addition on to the wharf, and that addition I said would cost $30,000; and the department hesitated, because when we called upon the Department of Railways to take up that work, which properly belongs to that department, we were given the answer that the communication would not perhaps be successful, or as successful as we expected from the amount that had been expended there. Then I came to the conclusion that it would be useless for the Department of Public Works to go to the expense of another $30,000 before we could ascertain whether or not the ferry would be a commercial success, whether the people of the Island would be satisfied with it, and whether we should get a return for the expenditure. This is the position I took, and I think it is a very reasonable one. I said that we were going to dredge an approach to Cape Traverse wharf, sufficient to allow a ferry to be placed there, and if it is a success we shall have proper accommodation built there next year in addition to the wharf at Cape Traverse. The hon. gentleman from Prince (Mr. Perry) then got up very excitedly and said: That is the way the Department of Public Works is spending the money! They have spent $180,000, and he even went as far as $400,000, and now the Minister comes down, and says that perhaps that work will not be very useful. It was then I said that after all this would be used as a harbour of refuge, and as a place where lumber could be shipped. I meant Cape Tormentine. That is true, and I will again remind the committee that it is unfair to put the blame on the department or the Minister at the head of it, since every precaution was taken at the time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who is the engineer that made the report on the Cape Traverse wharf? I would like to see that report.

Mr. QUIMET. I see here an answer by the Minister of Public Works, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that he would have a report of the engineer the next day. I suppose that report was placed on the Table, and I do not see that it was ever alleged that the construction of the wharf and the location had not been recommended by the engineer of the department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The engineer who was responsible for the location and construction ought to be very severely reprimanded.

Mr. OUMET. For the edification of the hon. gentleman, I would say that some day I shall have a careful study made of the works done in the time of the greatest Minister of Public Works we ever had, in the estimation, of course, of the hon. gentleman, and we shall see that a great many of these public works, on which large amounts of money have been spent in different parts of the country, have been found to be unnecessary, and most of the money wasted. Was that the fault of the Minister at the time? It may have been the fault of the engineer or of those who make representations, as, no doubt, were made at the time, that these places were the best, and no doubt it was represented that these were the best places to have communication with the Island, namely, Capes Traverse and Tormentine. If a careful study were made, the hon. gentleman would be more careful not to attack my predecessor, and might find it a pretty difficult task to justify a good deal of the expenditure made by other people who were not Conservatives.

Mr. MULLOCK. The hon. gentleman has just advanced a new doctrine. We have seen another effort made by the Government a short time ago to escape responsibility, on the ground that they were judges. Now we have the Minister of Public Works saying that this vast expenditure of $400,000 was made on advice of officers of the department, and that it is those officers who are responsible. The hon. gentleman referred to a great Minister of Public Works, and I presume he meant Mr. Mackenzie, but Mr. Mackenzie never dreamt of sheltering himself behind his officers.

Mr. OUMET. Does the hon. gentleman think that Mr. Mackenzie would have held himself responsible for errors made in soundings and surveys? We are responsible for the policy, but not for the mechanical work.

Mr. MULLOCK. I understand the hon. gentlemen to say that this whole expenditure was based upon the erroneous advice of departmental officers, and that if the Government had known as much then as they do now, that expenditure would never have been incurred.

Mr. OUMET. I never said so. I said we are going to make the experiment.

Mr. MULLOCK. You admitted there was a great mistake.

Mr. OUMET.

Mr. OUMET. No; I never admitted that.

Mr. MULLOCK. Well, that the officers made a great mistake.

Mr. OUMET. I never admitted that either.

Mr. MULLOCK. The hon. gentleman does not say that he himself would have advised the work to be done there. On the contrary, he told the committee that work was entered upon on the advice of his officer.

Mr. OUMET. I never said that.

Mr. MULLOCK. That is the drift of your whole argument.

Mr. OUMET. No.

Mr. MULLOCK. You are not entitled to spend money in that case unless the expenditure is shown to be useful. The first step is to show that it will be useful, but hon. gentlemen have a new doctrine, and they are not going to spend money unless it is found out to be useless.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the hon. gentleman going to put in the place of those wooden piles which are found not to last?

Mr. OUMET. We will put in creosoted timber.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are the two inspectors employed at the same time?

Mr. OUMET. There were two, one for stone, half of the work being built of stone, and the other inspector was for the timber work.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is the hon. gentleman going to have an inspector for the creosoted piles?

Mr. OUMET. Somebody must be there to see that proper material is employed.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is singular that on all these public works there are always two or three inspectors. The Minister says there is one for stone and the other for timber.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Yes, both at the same time. One had charge of the stone work and the other of the timber. They were both asked for by the engineer in charge, and I believe both were necessary and were employed all the time.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there any masonry work, or is the stone just dumped in?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). There was no masonry work. The surface stone is large stone of certain sizes, which has to be laid in such a way as to make a smooth surface. I know they had to be laid with great care, and that the engineer in charge insisted upon the inspector examining every one of these stones, and seeing that it was properly put in place, so that it would not be moved by the action of the sea.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was the man in charge, the inspector, a practical mason, a man of experience?

Mr. OUMET. He was a man by the name of Goodwin. I will give the reason why two inspectors were employed. The contract was carried on schedule prices, that is, so much for every cubic yard of stone, and so much for every foot of timber, and a man had to be there to measure every piece of stone, and every piece of timber that was put into the work. This measurement has certainly saved a great deal of money to the department. The contract was estimated, as I have stated, at $185,000, and it has only cost $179,000. This offers fair ground for the presumption that these inspectors have earned their money.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think we have threshed out this matter of the policy of the Government in spending this money before ascertaining whether the wharf at Cape Traverse can be built or not. I think I gleaned from the hon. gentleman that he is giving the House an assurance that he will have a survey made, and if the work is practicable, he will recommend a sufficient expenditure to build it.

Mr. OUMET. That is my intention.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I may remark to the hon. gentleman that whoever recommended the location or construction of the Cape Traverse pier ought to take very little credit to himself. So far as the location is concerned, any one can see that a blunder has been made; it does not require any engineering skill to know that, one has only to go and look at the place. So far as the construction is concerned, while it was supposed to be filled with stone, frozen earth has been dumped in. The fact is, the whole construction of Cape Traverse wharf was a mistake from beginning to end. I was going to say it was a disgrace, and I do not think I should be far astray in using that word. The construction, location, and all connected with the work, was a mistake and a disgrace. Heretofore, I may say plainly, I have been suspicious of any promise coming from the department; I have had no confidence in it. But I am willing to judge the hon. gentleman by his work, and not by the past history of the department. I understand that we have a positive assurance that at the next session he will lay before us full reports of the engineers if they have been prepared. I may say that I do not propose to be fooled much longer, and if progress is not made I shall take any and every means to bring the wants of the different sections of the country I represent before the House, and to expose the shameful manner in which we have been treated. And when I look back at the resolution passed two years ago, which committed the Government and the House to a fair expenditure of public money in the several districts, irrespective of the representation of the counties, whether Liberals or Conservatives, I think I have a right to complain of the manner in which this resolution has been worked, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned. Therefore, I shall not hesitate to bring to the notice of the hon. gentleman of the House the needs of my district. He knows that certain cases have been put before him by my hon. colleague (Mr. Welsh) respecting Wood Island breakwater, and others by myself, and I am waiting patiently to see how far the hon. gentleman will carry out, in the Supplementary Estimates, his promises of giving fair-play to the Island. If he does, well and good; if not, I shall resort to such means as the Constitution affords me of making our just claims known.

Mr. OUMET. The hon. gentleman cannot treat myself or the department more harshly than he has already done.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have never said anything against the hon. gentleman in his management of the department, so far.

Mr. OUMET. I am surprised to hear the hon. gentleman say so.

Ship Channel between Québec and Montreal $10,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How are you going to expend this money?

Mr. OUMET. This is a revote of the balance required to dredge the ship channel at Cap a la Roche.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see there is a mechanical staff in connection with this work in the shop. How many are employed, and what are they paid? In the Auditor-General's Report the statement is made of $11,719 expenditure.

Mr. OUMET. The shop is at Sorel, where the barges, dredges, tow-boats, stone-lifters, etc., are repaired during the winter. During the summer, we had no men at all; I discharged them all. During the winter, we have sometimes ten, and sometimes as many as a hundred. The number varies.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that a large amount of money was spent there. There is a man named Howden employed as superintendent. Is he an engineer?

Mr. OUMET. Mr. James Howden may not be properly called an engineer, but he was employed from the beginning of the deepening of the channel by the Harbour Commission of Montreal, as superintendent of dredging, and was retained in that capacity by the department, when the work was assumed by the Government. He has since occupied the same position, with this addition, that I placed him in charge of the dredging in Ontario also. I believe that no better man, no more competent man, could be found for the work. Those who have known of his work, know how faithfully he discharges his duty.

Mr. McMULLEN. He is evidently a good man; that is, he gets a good salary, $2,500.

Mr. OUMET. He gets $2,500.

Mr. McMULLEN. He gets his travelling expenses also. There is another man I want to know about, Mr. L. T. Derais, who is described as "agent."

Mr. OUMET. Mr. Dorais is a clerk at Sorel. He is in charge of all supplies for the dredges, and he is the lieutenant of Mr. Howden.

Mr. LAURIER. May I ask, is the whole amount, $10,000, to be expended at Cap a la Roche?

Mr. OUMET. No; I think the Supplementary Estimates will have an entry as to that. I expect, at that time, to explain the whole policy of the Government as regards that deep channel.

Mr. LAURIER. A needed explanation.

Mr. OUMET. I think that a full and satisfactory explanation will be given. I expect at that time to explain to the committee the future policy of the Government as regards that ship channel.

Mr. McMULLEN. How is it that we pay rent for a ship-yard at Sorel, $1,600 a year?

Mr. OUMET. This is not only for the ship-yard; it is also for the shops and, in fact, all the ground that is necessary to keep our dredges and material for repairing the dredges, etc.

It being six o'clock, the committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

Ship Channel between Quebec and Montreal.....	$10,000

Mr. McMULLEN. Before leaving the item which, we understood, was not passed at six o'clock, I desire to ask the hon. Minister, what is now the average depth of the ship channel from Quebec to Montreal?

Mr. OUMET. The ship channel is supposed to be 27½ feet, but it has not that depth now throughout, on account of "sliding," and in other places that depth is attained only at high tide. Below Cap a la Roche, we have been working during the summer and dredging a channel through shale rock, so as to give an additional depth of 8 feet: and, when the work is completed, about 1st July next, there will be a depth of 27½ feet there at low water. Below that point, there are one or two places where the depth is only 20½ feet, and I intend to submit to the House the expediency of also dredging there to a depth of 27½ feet, when the Supplementary Estimates come down.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has the hon. gentleman formed any estimate as to the cost of this work?

Mr. OUMET. The sum now proposed to be expended is the balance of $200,000, which was the estimated cost of the work four years ago. As to further expenditure which may be proposed, when it is brought before the House in the Supplementary Estimates full plans and details will be submitted to enable the House to judge of the advisability of carrying out these additional works in order to make the navigation of the channel safe, because I must say that the work is imperfect as it is now, and a great many accidents have happened. At certain places the channel is too narrow and tortuous, and these defects must be remedied, in order to secure an average depth of 27½ feet, and also to improve the channel at points where there are cross-currents. I have had careful surveys and soundings made during the summer and winter, and all necessary information will be laid before the House.

River Kaminstiquia—Turning Basin.. $5,000

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the hon. gentleman expect to complete the work this year?

Mr. OUMET. This revote will complete the work under contract. I am sorry to say that, although we expected the work to be completed by 1st July, it will not be ready by that time. The river will be dredged to a depth of 16½ feet at low water at the Canadian Pacific Railway elevator and also up to the turning basin.

Mr. LISTER. To whom was the contract for the work let?

Mr. OUMET. The last contract was let to Marks & Macdonald. When the whole work connected with the river entrance and turning basin has been completed the expenditure will reach $180,000.

Mr. LISTER. Was the turning basin a contract by itself?

Mr. OUMET. I understand the work was let, but that afterwards it was re-advertised, and, at last, the contract for the completion was given to Marks & Macdonald, at 12¼ cents per yard.

Dartmouth Post Office..... $5,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the estimated cost of the post office building?

Mr. OUIMET. The estimated cost was $16,000, but I expect to be able to carry out the work for a less sum.

Mr. McMULLEN. What are the receipts of the post office, and do the receipts warrant the expenditure?

Mr. OUIMET. The receipts, in 1892, were: Postal revenue, $2,023; money orders issued, $19,739; savings bank deposits, $6,727. I may say that no new buildings are included in these Estimates, and no new policy has been inaugurated.

Mr. MULLOCK. It would be much better if there was a new policy, as the old one was a very bad one.

Mr. OUIMET. These Estimates are for the completion of buildings initiated before my entrance into the Department of Public Works. We have not commenced any new buildings since that time. As to whether we will ask the House to consider the policy again, I could not say; but I only make this explanation in order to avoid a repetition of the discussion that took place last year. I suppose hon. gentlemen might take the remarks of last year as said; and if any money is asked for new buildings, the question can then be raised.

Mr. LAURIER. I would not have either, but for a few words which fell from the lips of my hon. friend. He said that probably at the next sitting the policy might be reconsidered again. That means that although the hon. gentleman is asking nothing now he contemplates reverting to the old policy.

Mr. OUIMET. If I said anything that could lead the hon. gentleman to understand that, I withdraw it.

Mr. LAURIER. Very well, then.

Mr. LISTER. Do I understand that the policy of the Government in erecting post offices in small places is to be abandoned?

Mr. OUIMET. I mean to say that the present policy of the Government is, not to go into any new building except in two or three large places about which there can be no discussion.

Mr. LAURIER. I suppose the hon. gentleman means Woodstock, Ont.?

Mr. OUIMET. Well, that town has certainly very fair claims to the consideration of the Government, and if anything is done the claim of Woodstock will be seriously considered.

Mr. LISTER. What about Sarnia, then.

Mr. OUIMET. Well, we will see. We will consider the small places afterwards.

Mr. LISTER. It is not such a small place. I think it is a good many hundred times larger than Laprairie, where you have erected a post office.

Mr. OUIMET. Perhaps so.

An hon. MEMBER. Where is Sarnia, anyway?

Mr. LISTER. It is not in the backwoods, where you evidently come from. The Minister has stated that he intends in the Supplementary Estimates to bring down an amount for the construction of post offices and custom-houses. Is that correct?

Mr. OUIMET. I have stated twice what is intended, and I did not suppose that the hon. gentleman would cross-examine me the whole evening.

Mr. LISTER. I have a right to ask you a question; we are paying you $8,000 a year for that.

Mr. OUIMET. What I said was that in the present Estimates there is nothing for new buildings, and therefore there is no reason for entering into the long and uninteresting discussion of last year.

Mr. LISTER. Do you expect to be relieved from all your sins of commission and omission in the past? Will you intimate what places you will put new buildings in?

Mr. OUIMET. I do not think it is pertinent to the question before the committee.

Mr. LISTER. Will you tell us whether you intend to erect them in large or small places?

Mr. LAURIER. He says they will be in large places.

Mr. LISTER. Then the policy of the Government has been changed?

Mr. OUIMET. I never said that.

Mr. LISTER. Am I to understand then that no public buildings are to be erected in future in places where the receipts do not justify the expenditure?

Mr. OUIMET. Is that the policy of the new Government that is going to take our place?

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman must not get off in that jocular style. We are in earnest in this matter. Is or is it not the policy of the Government to continue the erection of buildings in small places where the revenue does not justify the expenditure?

Mr. OUIMET. Our policy will be, not to erect any new buildings where the expenditure cannot be justified.

Mr. LAURIER. That is a new policy.

Mr. MULLOCK. Will the Minister say why he has abandoned the old policy?

Mr. OUIMET. I never said we could not justify the expenditure.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman has stated that he will erect buildings in Woodstock and other places with a large population. That is a change of policy and therefore a condemnation of the old policy. Is it the case of a new broom, or is it the result of deliberate conviction? Is it the Minister's own opinion or the decision of the Cabinet? It will be a relief to the country to know that the old policy has been abandoned.

Mr. LISTER. He says it is only abandoned for this year, but he does not say it is permanently abandoned.

Mr. FOSTER. You ought to be thankful for one year.

Mr. LAURIER. The Minister of Finance is right; we ought to be thankful that the policy is to be abandoned even for one year. I take it as an indication that the policy is to be abandoned for ever, because the Minister has laid down the principle that no new buildings are to be erected where the revenue will not be justified.

Mr. OUMET. The expenditure.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Minister of Finance, according to his Budget speech, has suspended the entire policy of the Government for one year.

Mr. BORDEN. I understand the policy of the Minister of Public Works to be, as stated last year, in a similar discussion, that he will carry on to completion works for which a vote was taken prior to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in 1890, and which was accepted by the leader of the Government and adopted by the House. He has reaffirmed that policy this year. Now, I desire to call the attention of the Minister to the fact that in 1886 this House voted a sum of money for the construction of a post office in the town of Kentville, N.S.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that in your county?

Mr. BORDEN. Yes; it is in King's county.

Mr. CAMERON. What is the population?

Mr. BORDEN. Two thousand.

Mr. CAMERON. Oh, that is altogether too small for a post office.

Mr. BORDEN. At all events the post office revenue is $3,000, much larger than that of Dartmouth, and the customs receipts are much larger also. I think we must hold the Minister to the policy he has stated, and I desire to ask him when it is his intention to carry out the policy which he affirmed last year and reaffirmed this year with reference to this particular work. The vote for Lunenburg post office was taken in 1886, but it was not immediately constructed, and I see there is a vote now asked to complete the work. There can be no possible reason for constructing a post office at Lunenburg, which should not appeal to the Government to erect a post office at Kentville. Kentville is almost as large as Lunenburg, and has as good a right to have a post office, and on the line of policy laid down by the Minister it is in precisely the same position, because this House deliberately sanctioned in 1886 the construction of a public work in Kentville. I called the attention of the Minister to this subject during recess and expressed the hope that he would carry out his statement that he would complete all public works for which votes had been taken in this House. I am both surprised and disappointed to find that no provision is made for that work in these Estimates, and I hope that, when the Supplementary Estimates come down, they will contain a revote of the money which was voted in 1886 for this purpose. It is a work which can be defended on every ground; I would not ask for it, were it not. The Minister is bound to construct it, in carrying out the policy which he has announced as the policy of the Administration, namely, to complete every building for which a vote was taken prior to 1890; and, in addition to that, there is a very good reason for the construction of this building, on the ground of the postal and customs revenue collected there. I can assure the Minister, that there are a score of places in the Dominion of much less consequence than the town of Kentville, which have public buildings. In 1887, when I came here, I went to the then Minister of Public Works in regard to this matter, calling his attention to the fact that the vote would lapse after the 1st July, and he assured me that he would not allow it to lapse—that arrangements were then being made for the purchase of a site, and that he would see that those arrangements were completed before the 1st July. That promise, like a great many of that hon. gentleman's promises, was only made to be broken, for when I came back, in the following year, I found that the vote had been allowed to lapse. I may say, however, that there was some difficulty in reference to the choice of a site, there being a difference of opinion among the citizens of Kentville as to the proper location for the building. That far there is, perhaps, some justification for the department hesitating for the moment to purchase a site. But a commissioner was sent from Ottawa to investigate the matter, and I have now a notice on the Paper; which will, perhaps, be reached in a few days, asking for the papers in connection with that investigation. I do not know what the report was. But I again ask the Minister to look into this matter, in the hope that he will put a vote for the work in the Supplementary Estimates, shortly to be brought down.

Mr. LISTER. There is no doubt that the Government have been guilty of a shameful and a shameless course in the matter of these public buildings. They have simply expended the public money for the purpose of fortifying themselves in office. Wherever there was a constituency at all doubtful, the Government were found persuading the electors to return a supporter by placing money in the Estimates for the erection of a public building. Their conduct in this respect became so disgraceful that the present Minister of Public Works is obliged to proclaim to the House and the country that the course which his predecessors have pursued he is about to abandon. Sir, this matter cannot be brought to the attention of the Government too often. The Minister even now says that he proposes to erect buildings in certain towns throughout the country, but he refuses to name the places. Now, for the purpose of showing how the hon. gentleman now in office, as well as his predecessor, have administered the affairs of the department in this respect, I desire, for a few minutes, to call attention to the places where public buildings have been erected. I find that in the town of Laprairie, a place of two or three hundred inhabitants, where the revenue amounted to the magnificent sum of $461, it was thought necessary to erect a public building at a cost of from $25,000 to $30,000. In the town of Walkerton, with a total revenue of $4,817, it was considered necessary to erect a post office, and we know for what reason. We know that the public interest did not demand it, but we know that it is in a doubtful county, and $40,000 was voted for the purpose of carrying that county. In the town of Napanee, where the gross postal revenue is only $6,064, in order to make things solid there for the Government, it was considered that a public building should be erected at a cost of between $30,000 and $50,000. In the town of Cayuga, with about 700 inhabitants, in a constituency that formerly returned a Liberal to this House, this wise Government considered that a public building should be erected. The total postal revenue being the large sum of $1,327. It was not erected because it was required in the public interest, but because the constituency was doubtful, and a member was required from there for the purpose of sustaining the present corrupt Government in power. We find that a post office is thought necessary in the town of Port Arthur, which yields a total postal revenue of $4,801, while places like the town of Woodstock, with a revenue of from $14,000 to $16,000, are passed over. In Strathroy, in the county from which the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Roome) comes, it is found necessary, at a critical time in its political history, to strengthen the hands of the Conservative candidate, and the Minister of Public Works comes down and proposes to expend from $25,000 to $40,000 for the erection of a public building there, although the total revenue amounts to only $5,004. We find that in the town of Amherstburg, a place of a couple of thousand inhabitants, and yielding a revenue of $2,273 only, it was necessary, in order to make South Essex solid, to put up a public building at a cost of between $25,000 and $40,000. And so it goes on. The town of Picton, as we know, has always been somewhat uncertain politically. At one time the constituency returned a Liberal and at another time a Conservative. The election of the Conservative member was protested and set aside, and in order to make the constituency sure before another election came on, the Administration came down and asked Parliament to vote from $25,000 to $40,000 for the erection of a post office there, though the revenue amounted only to $5,691. It had the desired effect; the county returned a member to support the Government. The town of Petrolia, with a postal revenue of $6,534, and a population of about 3,500, gets a post office for the same reason. Hon. gentlemen will have no difficulty in seeing that the real object in spending these vast sums of public money is not to serve the public interest except in so far as the public interest requires the present Government to continue to conduct the affairs of the country. Instead of putting their own hands into their own pockets and buying up constituencies they know a trick worth two of that. They understood how to buy constituencies and pay for them out of money from the public purse. Sir, the hon. gentleman has talked about the town that I come from. I desire to say to him that it has probably a greater population than his whole county. It has a population of 7,500 people, a post office revenue of $9,211, and a money order business to the extent of $31,496. Yet that town has not got a post office such as is given to other towns, where the same necessity for public buildings does not exist. It is a distributing centre for the mail for the States and for the west and the south. Large customs revenues are collected there, and a larger general postal business done there, with the exception of the cities, than is done anywhere else in the whole province of Ontario. Yet, because the people think proper to return a Liberal to this House, they are denied what has been granted to all the smaller towns throughout the Maritime provinces and the province of Quebec. Sir, the Minister of Public Works seems to be carrying his political feeling to an extravagant extent. I think that, while he is acting as a member of the Government, he should look to the wants of the country at large, and it should be a matter of no consequence to him whether a Liberal or Conservative be returned, when bringing down estimates for public buildings, so long as the wants of the majority require that the money be expended. It is a disgrace to the Government that this system should be continued so long, of bribing people with their own money. I am glad to hear the Minister say, to-night, that this pernicious system of robbery which has characterized the action of the Government, with regard to the constituencies throughout this country is to be discontinued, because I understand the Minister to say that in future public buildings will be erected only in places where they are called for by the amount of public revenue received and the business transacted there. If that is to be the rule, I can appeal confidently to him to do that justice to the towns of Sarnia and of Woodstock, which the Government have hitherto refused to do.

Mr. KAULBACH. I rise to correct the impression which seems to exist in the mind of the hon. member for King's, N.S. (Mr. Borden) with respect to Lunenburg in comparison with his own town. I happen to be familiar with the position he occupies as representative for the county of King's, and while I feel satisfied that his claim is a fair one, still, it is not so strong as the claim which Lunenburg has for a public building. When I make a contrast with respect to population, I find that the town of Kentville has only about one-half the population of Lunenburg. The exports of the town of Lunenburg are immense and increasing every year, and there is no town outside of Halifax more deserving of a post office, not excepting Kentville. I feel satisfied that the Government were fully justified in making the appropriation for a public building in the town of Lunenburg. They only did it after years of appeal to them in the most earnest manner during previous Parliaments. If the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden) desires to have a post office in Kentville he should not endeavour to obtain it by representing his town as more entitled to it than the town of Lunenburg.

Mr. BORDEN. I am very much obliged to my hon. friend for the lecture he has been good enough to administer to me. I have been a member of this House almost as long as he has, and am, perhaps, as well acquainted as he with my duties. I am, however, much obliged to him for the partial endorsement he gave of the necessity for a public buildings in Kentville. He entirely misunderstood my allusions to the town of Lunenburg. I never said it was not entitled to a public building. On the contrary, I think I said it was, but I said that Kentville was more than equally entitled to the same treatment. First of all, because in 1886, the very year in which the vote was introduced to provide a public building for the town of Lunenburg, a similar vote was introduced and carried through this House to construct a public building in the town of Kentville, and no doubt the Government of that day had carefully considered the question and considered the town of Kentville as much entitled to a public building as the town of Lunenburg. The hon. gentleman has seen fit to refer to the relative population of the two towns. I do not believe he is correct in saying that the population of Lunenburg is double that of Kentville, but, be that as it may, let us look at the revenue of the respective towns. I find, and I call the Minister's attention particularly to this, that, while in the town of Lunenburg, the postal revenue was $2,247.04, the revenue of the town of Kentville during the same year was $3,052.78. I find also that while in the town of Lunenburg the number of money orders issued last year was 1,725, in the town of Kentville it was 2,071, and last year the total amount of money orders issued in the town of Lunenburg was $22,002.17, while in Kentville it was $26,163. I find also that in the town of Lunenburg last year the total amount of money orders paid was $11,263.36, while at Kentville, this abused town, the total was $19,848.96, almost double. Now, let us turn for one moment to the receipts of customs, and it should be borne in mind that these public buildings are constructed for the post office and custom-house especially. I have shown that the postal revenue of Kentville is at least 33 per cent greater than that of Lunenburg. I will now show the amounts collected in customs. In Lunenburg the amount was $10,398.06; and in the town of Kentville, $27,078.10, almost three times as much. Yet my hon. friend talks about Lunenburg's increased population. I point the hon. gentleman, the hon. Minister, and this House to the relative revenues collected in these two towns. I do not object to the town of Lunenburg getting this post office, and, under the policy put forward by the hon. Minister last year, and this, he had no alternative but to construct that post office, because this country was committed to the expenditure by the vote of 1886. I ask equal fair-play for the town of Kentville, for which a vote was taken in 1886, and on the hon. gentleman's own statement of policy, I demand, I do not ask, I demand, in the name of justice and fair-play, for the town of Kentville that it shall receive the public building which this House solemnly declared, in 1886, it was entitled to, and to which it is still more entitled now, by reason of its growth since that time. The hon. member has announced that he intends to bring down further votes in Supplementary Estimates. In view of the circumstances, and in view of what the hon. member stated, I think I have a right to ask the Minister to state now whether he intends to ask for an amount to place a public building in Kentville. I think the hon. Minister should take some notice of the statements made over and over again about this public building. I do not know but I am entitled to as much consideration as any hon. member in this House. I have had the honour of sitting here as a member most of the time for nineteen years. I am almost as old a member of this House as the hon. Minister himself. But, at any rate, the constituency I have the honour to represent has the right to know what the hon. Minister intends to do about this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not usual to announce what you are going to put in the Supplementary Estimates until those Estimates are brought down. If the hon. gentleman has a right to know what is to be put in the Estimates for his county, every other hon. gentleman has an equal right, and if this were recognized, all object of secrecy would be gone; we might as well put the Estimates on the Order Paper.

Mr. BORDEN. But this is a special case.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BORDEN. If the hon. gentlemen had listened they would not be so ready to laugh. This building was provided for by a vote in 1886, and the Minister has announced it as his policy to carry on and build every work to which this country has been committed by vote in Parliament.

Mr. FORBES. While it has been said that the claims of the town of Kentville are superior to those of Lunenburg, and while this has been proved from the blue-book, by the quotation made by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden), in every respect except population, I might add that the town of Kentville leads the town of Lunenburg in population, also, I believe, as I have documents showing that the population credited to Lunenburg town in the census returns is not a correct representation, because of the fact that the enumerators went outside the statutable limits of the town in their enumeration, in order to swell the population. Thus, in every respect, in public demands, in growth of business and population, the town of Kentville is in advance of Lunenburg. So we see there are other towns in Nova Scotia which are as much, if not more, entitled to consideration than Lunenburg, the claims of which latter town I do not at all depreciate. The town of Kentville, I admit, has superior claims to consideration in this respect. Its rights have been conceded by the Government in the vote which was put in the Estimates and approved by this House, but, for reasons which I shall not dwell upon, it was withdrawn, and, in justice to the claims of the hon. gentleman from that county, and in justice to Nova Scotia, it should be restored. The town of Liverpool has equal claims upon the resources of the treasury with those of Lunenburg, and far superior to those of the other towns mentioned by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister). The towns of Lunenburg and Dartmouth have had public buildings erected within their limits at large expense to this country, expense which might have been much smaller with equally good service. The town of Liverpool, which is the shire town of the county I have the honour to represent, had a postal revenue of $1,926.49, in 1892, as against $2,247.04 for the town of Lunenburg. The number of money orders issued in Liverpool was 2,132, while in Lunenburg the number was 1,725. Liverpool issued money orders for the total amount of $28,266.92, while Lunenburg issued money orders for $22,002.17. The total commission received by the Treasury of Canada by the money orders issued in Liverpool, was $213, while the revenue in this respect in Lunenburg was only $173.58. In the town of Liverpool the total amount of money orders paid by the office was $14,446.73, while the town of Lunenburg, which had such a great sum of public money expended within its limits, paid only $11,263.36. Surely these proofs should commend themselves to any fair-minded Government, and command an equitable distribution of the public funds in the best interests of the public and not with an ulterior motive.

Mr. GILLIES. You have no bank.

Mr. FORBES. Certainly we have; there was a time when we had two. We have a vast trade going on there all the time, and in future I trust the public revenue and comparative business done will be given more weight. I form the criterion in determining the location of these public buildings. Drawing conclusions from the past, I claim that the town of Kentville and the town of Liverpool have claims far in advance of those of Lunenburg and Dartmouth, both of which have their public buildings. I do not find fault with the construction of public buildings in those towns, which probably only are getting their desert, though I believe equally good buildings could have been had for much less expenditure. I would ask the hon. Minister to consider the growth of these other towns in deciding upon further expenditure.

Mr. KAULBACH. It is rather amusing to hear my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Forbes) ventilating the claims of the town of Liverpool. I do not wish to underestimate the importance of that town—

Mr. FORBES. Better not.

Mr. KAULBACH. It is a near neighbour, and it would be most discourteous of me to do so. It bears no comparison whatever to the town that is getting this vote for a post office. Lunenburg, within the past year, has had an export of something like $1,000,000. I would like the hon. member for Queen's, N.S., to contrast this with the town of Liverpool, or to ask my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden) to contrast it with his town. The hon. member for King's, and the hon. member for Queen's refer to the smallness of the revenue from money orders. I would like to remind these hon. gentlemen that we have three banks in the town, and that the people use the banks in many cases for the transmission of money.

Mr. FORBES. But they cannot sell stamps at the banks.

Mr. KAULBACH. Another reason why the revenue seems small is that the town is surrounded by quite a number of post offices, which are taps to draw business from the main office. Consequently the revenue from the town does not show the large figures that perhaps other towns do

Mr. BORDEN. I gave the revenue for the whole county.

Mr. KAULBACH. If the hon. member for King's would visit Lunenburg more often than he does he would have a more favourable impression of it. Those who have noticed its growth and expansion are satisfied that there is no town in Nova Scotia outside of Halifax to excel it.

Mr. BORDEN. I am favourably impressed with the town of Lunenburg. No one seeing the representative which it sends here can fail to have a favourable impression of the town. The hon. gentleman has stated that there are reasons why the revenue collected in the town of Lunenburg seems to be very small as compared with other towns. But the figures that I gave and which I thought were for the towns of Lunenburg and Kentville I find were for the counties of Lunenburg and King's. Now, Sir, I find that Kentville proper collects $21,939, while the town of Lunenburg proper collects $6,200, that for Kentville, instead of three times, being almost four times greater than that for Lunenburg which makes the discrepancy still greater. I cannot for the life of me see what the export business of Lunenburg has to do with it. The export trade of that town consists of fish caught in the deep sea, hundreds of miles away, and I cannot see that is any basis for a claim for a public building. The point is, what amount of revenue does it bring into the Treasury to justify the erection of a new post office? I venture to say that so far as exports from the place itself are concerned, the exports from Kentville are very much larger than those from the town of Lunenburg.

Mr. BOWERS. As hon. gentlemen are calling the attention of the Minister to the claims of their respective shire towns, I might call his attention to the claims of the town of Digby, which far exceeds in importance either Lunenburg, Liverpool or Kentville. The amount of money orders issued in Lunenburg is $33,265.53; in Dartmouth, $19,739.38, while in Digby the amount is $37,433.10. The House will remember that last year I showed that Digby was the centre of a large postal business, and that it received the mails from St. John for distribution to many points on the Bay of Fundy and St. Mary Bay. There is also a large Custom business there, and Digby is as much entitled as any town in the Maritime provinces for the consideration of the Government. I do not know that it has as large an export trade in fish as Lunenburg; but the general export trade in lumber, fish and other things is at all events equal to Lunenburg. I trust that when the Minister brings down the Supplementary Estimates Digby will not be forgotten.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am exceedingly pleased to hear the Minister of Public Works announce that the Government have decided to erect public buildings throughout the country, only where the revenue would justify the expenditure. A resolution based on that principle was introduced to this House in 1890 by the Hon. Mr. Mills, and that resolution was accepted by the First Minister and unanimously adopted by the House. I am glad for the first time to have an intimation from the Minister of Public Works that the Government will adhere to that good, sound principle. I have no objection to my hon. friend (Mr. Bowers) pressing the claim of his place to the consideration of the Government; but at the same time I am glad that the persistent criticisms of the Opposition for many years on the extravagances of this Public Works Department have resulted in a change of policy for the future.

Halifax Drill Hall $65,000

Mr. McMULLEN. How much has been spent here?

Mr. OUIMET. Nothing yet. Our department is waiting for instructions from the Militia Department on the matter.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is this the place where the old drill hall was burned down for the purpose of getting a new one erected?

Mr. OUIMET. I am not aware of that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The minister has not answered the question of my hon friend beside me.

Mr. OUIMET. It is only fair not to ask me to say more than I have already said. I stated last year that I had come to the department late, that I found a certain number of post offices and public buildings on the slate, and that I undertook to construct those buildings, and declared I would not go beyond them until I had obtained for myself all information necessary to enable me to make a recommendation to the Government in regard to that policy. That is all I said last year, that is all I say this year, and I do not want to be understood to have said more. I find myself in a curious predicament. The policy, from the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, is all wrong when applied to our friends, but is all right when applied to themselves, and if buildings were constructed in their counties the expenditure would be defended by every one of them, unless they suspected there was some treachery designed by the Minister of Public Works.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Try the experiment.

Mr. OUIMET. I would be charged at once with being a briber.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You have not tried the experiment.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend merely referred to the fact that if the Minister was going to continue the erection of post offices, the places mentioned by them were more entitled to public buildings than St. Henri and many other places. The Government decided in 1886 that they would erect a building there, and the Minister was supposed to implement the promise, but he appears now to be going back on this pledge. I am glad to learn that they have adopted the unanimously expressed mandate of the House that public buildings should only be erected in places where the revenue justified them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Minister told the House last year that in certain places the Government had decided to erect public buildings, and the faith of Parliament and the honour of the Crown was pledged to erect them. It is a serious matter, and should be so regarded, when the honour of the Crown and the faith of Parliament have been pledged to the construction of certain buildings, such, for example, as at Kentville, that such policy should be abandoned. We have always held that the word of the Crown is sacred and should be carried out by Parliament. Is it the policy of the Government to trail the honour of the Crown in the dust to suit party exigencies?

Mr. BORDEN. I want to know why a distinction is made between Lunenburg and Kentville, for the hon. gentleman seems now inclined to go back on his statement of last year. He will not say now that it is his intention to construct a building at Kentville, although the faith of the country is pledged to it by a vote of Parliament. In 1886, votes were taken for public buildings at Lunenburg and Kentville. For several years a building was not constructed at Lunenburg; then it was commenced, and it will be completed this year. The vote for Kentville was allowed to lapse. I have shown conclusively that the revenues derived from the post office and custom-house at Kentville are nearly double what are received at Lunenburg. I want to know on what principle the hon. gentleman discriminates between those towns, and I have a right to receive an answer for the information of the House and the country.

Mr. OUIMET. I have no answer than the one I have already given, that I found certain buildings on the slate and the estimates prepared, and I undertook to carry out what had been designed by my predecessor, and nothing more.

Mr. FORBES. Will the hon. gentleman bring down the slate, as we may be able to read the hieroglyphics?

Mr. BORDEN. The Minister cannot explain his action on any other ground except that of party favouritism and party feeling, and the furtherance of the views of political supporters. I had hoped from his statement that he would not allow himself to be pushed into a position of that kind.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not think the Minister's action in this matter can be justified, if the building just referred to was on the slate. If there was jugglery practised in former times with the mandate of Parliament, the Minister should see that this should cease, and if he desires to keep the slate clean, he should at once take steps to remedy the gross mistakes the Government has made in violating that mandate. I fail to see any justification for thus discrediting the solemn vote of Parliament, and for the hon. gentleman's failure to carry it out. Whether that vote was right or wrong I will not say, but the faith of Parliament and the honour of the Crown having been pledged to the construction of that building, that pledge should be carried out in good faith.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden) has certainly made a case against the hon. Minister. I will not, however, hold the hon. gentleman responsible, because the policy was inaugurated before he came into office, and I give him credit this evening, I will not say for repudiating that policy, but for manifesting an inclination to repentance. I advise my hon. friend to wait until the Supplementary Estimates come down, and if he fails to find an item for Kentville, then he will be entitled to bring the hon. Minister to account.

Halifax Drill Hall..... $65,000

Mr. McMULLEN. Have plans and specifications been prepared for this drill hall; what will be its dimensions, what material will be used in constructing it, and what will be the cost?

Mr. OUIMET. A demand has been made by the Department of Militia for a building for military purposes. We have not yet received full information to enable complete plans to be prepared, and, therefore, I cannot give the dimensions of the building. It is to be erected, however, on the old site. Strong pressure is being brought to secure a change of site. If such demand is acceded to, the details will be given to the House, and its approval will be asked.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is a very unfortunate announcement. The Minister says it may be erected on the old site, but that very strong pressure is being brought to bear to change the site, that plans and specifications have not yet been prepared, and yet, on face of these facts, a vote is asked of $65,000. I think that it is a very absurd request under these circumstances. The Minister is not prepared to tell this House whether it is going to be built on the old or the new site.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely my hon. friend will see that when he seeks for $65,000 he ought to be prepared to tell us where he is going to build this drill shed and also generally what the cost will be.

Mr. OUIMET. The cost has been estimated at $75,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Without the land ?

Mr. OUIMET. The land is there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought you said you were not going to build on that site.

Mr. OUIMET. We will not spend the money until we have decided on the site.

Mr. MULOCK. Is it not premature to ask for a vote until you decide on the site ? Probably, next session, you will ask a vote for $65,000 for a piece of land, so that we may drift into an expenditure far in excess of what the House might sanction, if they knew, at first, what the cost would be. Before we vote this money we should have a reasonable estimate of the total cost. It is the custom of the department, when they are launching into a new scheme, to do so without giving the House an intelligent estimate of the total cost ; you commence by piecemeal, and then lead us into very heavy expenditure. I wish to show, by illustration, what this leads to. In 1884, the House voted a sum of money for the Langevin Block, and we were assured that the total cost would not exceed $400,000. But there was no detailed estimate, and the result of this slipshod way of doing business resulted in our having to pay $782,000 actual cash, besides several outstanding claims. Whether these claims are recognized or not is another matter, but in view of what has taken place in the past, I would not be surprised if we would have to pay more money for that building. Does the Minister suppose that any individual would contemplate embarking in an enterprise like this without having a reasonable idea of the total cost ? The Minister is not manifesting a business capacity in doing a thing like this. If we expend $25,000 on a building, we are told that we must follow it up and complete it. There may be a shuffle of the cards in the Ministry, and some hon. gentleman will preside over his department who will say : I am not responsible for this, I found an unfinished work on my hands and I must carry it out. I think that is a very ill-omened beginning for the hon. Minister. Up to this moment he has been sheltering himself behind the past, but now he is himself originating an enterprise in the same old slipshod way which has characterized the department for years. I agree with my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that Parliament should not vote this sum until it knows what the total cost is likely to be.

Pictou Post Office, Custom-house
&c., to complete..... $14,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is this a new post office ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. OUIMET. The erection of this building was undertaken about three years ago, but when we came to pass the title of the land we found there was a difficulty. There were some heirs who had some rights that we could not purge, and we had to go to expropriation, hence the delay. The cost is estimated at $23,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is a very handsome custom-house in Pictou, and it has been there for years back.

Mr. OUIMET. This is for the post office.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where is that post office situated ? I have been at Pictou very often, I know something about the trade and population of the town, and it is a most surprising thing to me if any money is required for a public building there. The town has been going down for the last fifteen years ; the population, instead of increasing, has largely decreased. The custom-house there at present is large enough to supply the wants of the place three times over.

Mr. OUIMET. The postal revenue is $5,257, and the money orders issued and paid amount to $77,648.

Mr. LISTER. The postal revenue of the town of Sarnia is $9,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It does appear to me that a grant for the town of Pictou is, under the circumstances, a very extraordinary proceeding. In the first place, my recollection is that there were public buildings there a considerable number of years ago. Twenty years ago the population of the town of Pictou was 3,262, in 1881 it had grown down to 3,403, in 1891, being under the special protection of the National Policy, and being aided by the new railway constructed to the place at very great expense to this country, its population had grown down still further to 2,998, according to the census returns. Now, the waste of $30,000 or $40,000 of public money on a town of that size is, under the circumstances, very decidedly in opposition to any proper policy.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think this vote is in violation of the principle which was recently laid down. The Minister of Public Works intimated at the commencement of the passing of these items that a departure had been made from the old policy, and that he only proposed to carry out the completion of the buildings which had already been commenced and on which considerable work had been done. Now, this is a building on which there has been virtually nothing done, while there are over a score of places in Ontario of larger population than Pictou which have never received any public buildings. For instance, the town of Woodstock is a standing monument of reproach to hon. gentlemen opposite, who have kept it without a post office for the last ten or fifteen years. I suppose this vote is to be attributed to the fact that the town of Pictou is represented here by a Minister of the Crown, and one who is all-powerful, and also by one who is not a Minister—and Minister inside the Cabinet and one outside; and no doubt these two men, in order to keep the town solid, are demanding the expenditure of more public money there. I do think, unless the Minister has a better explanation of this vote than anything he has yet given, that the committee should insist on this item being wiped out.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I notice by a return that was brought down to the House a few years ago that an appropriation of $27,743 was made in 1872-73 for a custom-house and post office at Pictou. I should hope it has not taken twenty years to complete the title. Has the Minister made a mistake in this grant? Is this the place that it is intended for?

Mr. OUMET. The grant for this post office has been in the Estimates, I understand, for three years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister does not evidently understand the statement made by my hon. friend, that $27,743 of public money was spent in building a custom-house at Pictou. Now we are asked to build another at a cost of probably $20,000. Surely the Minister should explain this matter. The return which my hon. friend mentions referred to buildings that had been erected.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou). The public building erected in Pictou in 1872 was only for a custom-house, and this vote is only for a post office.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is the present building used for the post office?

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou). No; the present post office is a private building.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why is the post office wanted more than it was twenty years ago? The population has fallen off?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Every hon. gentleman who has passed through Pictou, knows that there is a very handsome brick custom-house there, standing at the very head of the wharf, an edifice large enough for a town ten times the size of Pictou. It is as substantial to-day as when it was built, and I cannot see the necessity for a new building.

Mr. OUMET. The words "custom-house" ought to be struck out. I move that they be struck off. There is only sufficient accommodation for the Customs business in the custom-house, and they want a post office.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman should move that the item stand until he can give more definite information.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The question arises, is the High Commissioner on the rampage again?

Mr. OUMET. We will let the item stand.

Chatham, N.B., Post Office and Custom-house $15,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Were there not buildings erected for this purpose at Chatham some years ago? My recollection is, that there were. First of all, we put up buildings, and then, years after, further appropriations asked. What is the population of the town of Chatham?

Mr. OUMET. 5,644. The postal revenue is $4,197.93; the customs duties, $14,490; Excise, $8,944, and money orders, $42,243.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is to be done with the old building?

Mr. OUMET. It will be sold, after the new post office is built.

Mr. LAURIER. Have you secured the site?

Mr. OUMET. Yes; at a cost of $4,750.

Mr. MULOCK. From whom did you purchase it?

Mr. OUMET. From the Fraser estate. The site is 61 feet frontage on Water street, by 330 feet depth.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the estimated cost of the whole work, including the site and furnishings and everything else?

Mr. OUMET. $25,000.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the estimated cost of maintaining it?

Mr. OUMET. There will be heating and the payment of a guardian, who will probably be the postmaster or one of the officers living in the house. We have adopted the rule of having one of the officers who live in the building, as caretaker, in order to save expense. I suppose that will entail a payment of $150 or $200 to that officer, and of course there is the ordinary expenditure for maintenance.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is the site of the new building close to the old one?

Mr. FOSTER. The old site was down close by the water. This is further up in the town. The old site was unsuitable, and the old house has been going into decay for a number of years. It was thought better in every respect to have a new site and new building, and dispense with the old one.

Mr. McMULLEN. When was the old one built?

Mr. FOSTER. It was bought in 1872.

St. John Custom-house..... $75,900

Mr. OUMET. The total cost is estimated at $145,580.

Mr. BOWERS. With regard to this custom house, last year I called the attention of the Government to the fact, that there was no watchman in the building. The Minister of Public Works and the senior member for St. John both stated there was, but when in that town, I made inquiry and found that there was not, but only a caretaker, who was the janitor. Had there been a watchman, the fire would have been noticed at the outset and probably extinguished before any material damage was done. I should think that, in the case of a building costing $500,000, a watchman should be employed and a time-clock should be placed at each end of the building, so that, every hour, he would have to put his hands on that clock.

Public Buildings—Maritime Provinces generally $20,000

Mr. FLINT. I would like to make a remark to the Minister in connection with this item. I think he would do well to see that these repairs are made promptly. I know one or two instances in which delay in making a moderate amount of repairs, has cost the Government a great deal of money. Where the cause of this delay lies, I am not able to say. In the case of the post office in my town, where repairs were needed, it was understood that they would be made some time during the latter part of the summer, but, owing to delay, and the lack of proper persons to look after the repairs, the whole season passed by. Of course, we know that during winter and early spring a good deal of damage is done to a building when it is in need of repairs. I mention this for the information of the Minister, in order that he may exercise more promptitude in these matters.

Quebec—St. Henri Post Office . . $13,000

Mr. LAURIER. Will that complete the building?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes; it is under contract, and the amount that is now asked will complete the building. We expect it will be ready some time during the fall. The first contractor failed, and we had to ask for new tenders. We entered into a new contract some time during last fall, and they are now doing the work.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears from the Auditor-General's Report, that only $9 was spent last year.

Mr. OUIMET. The site was bought during the fiscal year of 1890-91. Last year, for the reason I have given, the contract fell through, and, of course, we did not have to pay the contractor anything; on the contrary, we had to confiscate his deposit. New tenders were asked for, and that caused a loss of time. That is the reason we have not spent more money during the last year.

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary $32,000

Mr. LAURIER. What is that for?

Mr. OUIMET.

Mr. OUIMET. As the hon. gentleman knows, the penitentiary is not completely finished. The principal part of the work that is now going on is the construction of a boundary wall of solid masonry, which is 27½ feet high, six feet wide at the base, and about three feet wide at the top. It will be not only a splendid structure, but a great security for the penitentiary. When this boundary wall is completed, the yard will be more than three times as large as it is now, and will consequently give a much larger space for the prisoners to work in. There are some other works to be done inside. I may explain that this work is all done by convict labour. We only have to pay for the materials used in the wall, and also the material used in the different work shops. This is all included in the $32,000.

Mr. LAURIER. I suppose part is expended on capital account, and part on ordinary income account.

Mr. OUIMET. It might be well to charge it to capital account, but we charge it only to revenue. I think it prevents an increase of the debt.

Mr. LAURIER. That is a large sum to pay for raw material.

Mr. OUIMET. I have a full statement of details, of which I may give the following summary:—stone and cement, $15,158; materials for working, $626; materials for stone cutters, $1,732; for repairs to building, $2,000; tools for carpenter shop, $150; blacksmith shop, $1,166; salaries to Public Works officials, one year, $1,775; maintenance of steam works for the buildings, $1,481; maintenance of machinery, $4,000; office keepers, hall and vestry fittings, etc., $559; Protestant chapel, $395; schools and surgery fittings, etc., $395; school and library fittings, $707.50; repairs of various kinds make up the total.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the estimated value of the work when completed?

Mr. OUIMET. The amount already spent on the penitentiary is $508,000. After this boundary wall is completed, I can give a correct estimate of what will be required; I suppose about $50,000 will finish the building.

Mr. McMULLEN. We understood from the Minister of Justice that these convicts would perform valuable work and save a great deal of money. Now, it appears to me this is going to cost an enormous amount of money. If we had an estimate of what it would cost had it been let by ordinary contract, we would have some idea of the saving we have made by utilizing convict labour. I would like to know what it would cost, suppose we had let it out by contract.

Mr. OUIMET. I have no figures before me which would enable me to answer that question. What is saved is just the price of labour that we would have to pay if the work was done by contract. But there is another advantage we gain by utilizing the labour of the convicts. If they were not employed at this work, they would have nothing to do, except breaking stones and carting it away, and it is a very bad thing for the inmates of the penitentiary to have no other work than that to do. I have been there two or three times during the summer and I have been told that the convicts greatly like that kind of work. It is outside work, and it is a singular fact, that although these people have been working outside during the whole summer, there has not been a single escape, which shows the good influence outside work has upon them.

Mr. McMULLEN. I agree with the Minister that it is well to employ the convicts on outside labour where possible. The hon. gentleman mentioned an item of something like $4,000 for repairs to machinery, and also a large item for blacksmith's tools. Can he say that this machinery and tools will be of any value after this work is performed? Will it be possible to continue the employment of these convicts at this particular kind of work in any way? How long will it take to complete the work?

Mr. OUIMET. It will take certainly not less than three or four years. After the boundary wall is completed they will have to level the ground, and they will have as much as eight feet of rock to blast and take away in some portions of the yard. I think it would be worth the hon. gentleman's while to visit that institution. It is certainly the best built penitentiary in the Dominion, much better than that at Kingston, because it is more modern. When the building was built at first, it was nothing but a reformatory school, and very deficient at that; but it has all been rebuilt, and when those works are completed, it will be the best building of its kind, I think, that can be found in America. Some of these convicts are very skilful in various trades, and they have worked in a very satisfactory manner. For instance, all the heating machinery for three or four boilers has been put up by one man.

Mr. MULOCK. I believe you have an inspector for all the penitentiaries?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman said that the mode of employing convicts in this penitentiary had resulted in no attempts at jail-breaking. That is most satisfactory. I suppose that similar results have not followed in all the penitentiaries, for I believe in some of the penitentiaries of late, perhaps where there is not the same occupation, the inmates have attempted to break away: For example, in Kingston, where the inspector made inquiry into the discipline and other matters some time ago. He made a report, and that report has not given, I believe, entire satisfaction. It is extremely important, I think, that there should be every confidence in the inspector, and if he is not deserving of that confidence, it should be discovered at the earliest moment. I have received certain communications which rather shake my confidence in the inspector. If the statements made to me are correct, he has not made a thorough and impartial investigation into the matters complained of at Kingston. I am sorry the Minister of Justice is not here, he would be prepared, of course, to deal with the matter to which I am about to refer; but perhaps some other member of the Government will take cognizance of what I am about to say, and may, perhaps, act upon the suggestion. Now, the investigation that took place at Kingston, I am told, was not at all a thorough one. Certain grave charges were made against the administration, and if the Minister likes, in order that I may not be vague, I will just give them.

Mr. OUIMET. Is this the proper time? I think it would be better if the hon. gentleman could wait for a better occasion. I have something to do with the Department of Justice myself, in the absence of the Minister of that department, and if the hon. gentleman will communicate to me privately what he has to say I will make inquiries and, perhaps, be in a position to answer him when he brings the question before the House. I would ask the hon. gentleman to postpone his remarks.

Mr. MULOCK. What time would suit the hon. gentleman?

Mr. FOSTER. This discussion might come up on items connected with the Justice department.

Mr. MULOCK. I am willing to bring it up whenever an opportunity is afforded me.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will be able to bring it up when further estimates are submitted in connection with Department of Justice.

Richmond Post Office..... $4,000

Mr. McMULLEN. It does not appear that any money has been spent on this proposed building?

Mr. OUIMET. This vote has been carried on from year to year for three or four years.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is an item which the Minister could well afford to drop. What are the receipts of the office?

Mr. OUIMET. The receipts were only $2,512; money orders issued $16,000, savings bank deposits $24,000. The population increased from 715 in 1871 to 2,056 in 1891.

Mr. McMULLEN. No less than six places in my riding have larger revenues, and there are twenty or thirty places in Ontario where the receipts are three or four times as much. The savings bank deposits are $16,000, but there is one place in my riding where they reach $37,000. The item should be struck out.

Mr. OUIMET. If the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Landerkin) were present, I would ask him to defend this vote on the ground that the faith of the Crown has been pledged to it, and that it would be bad policy for the Government to break its promise.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. member himself made that statement, and I am glad he intends to adhere to it. He seems to hesitate when a constituency is represented by an opponent, but has no doubt in regard to the expenditure when the constituency is represented by his own friend.

Mr. OUIMET. It would be a bad precedent to wipe out this item from the appropriation list, and the department has already been blamed for having done what it is now asked to do.

Mr. BORDEN. I am not responsible for what my hon. friend behind me said, and I support the hon. Minister in his policy, if he carries it out impartially and deals with all constituencies alike.

Mr. CHARLTON. I very much doubt whether the Minister will give any favour or even justice to my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden). It would be much better to drop this vote for Richmond. It is an instance of the vicious policy of expending money, not in the public interest, in places not entitled to it, but purely for partizan purposes, and if this reform is to be commenced it is a good time now. This is confessedly one of the class of votes which cannot be justified. The hon. Minister does not justify the principle pursued, so let him drop this vote from the Estimates, and give evidence of faith by works, and show that he is honest in his declaration of policy with respect to his future action, and do what is to be done in the matter now.

Mr. MULOCK. I am surprised that we are called on to discuss the item, in view of all that has taken place in this committee. This item involves an entire departure from the position taken by the Minister at an earlier period of the evening. There is the fact that the hon. gentleman is now endorsing the old vicious principle that the country has condemned, a system which he himself admits to be vicious. The hon. gentleman is proposing to embark on an expenditure for the little village of Richmond, Quebec, with a population of 2,056, the gross receipts of the post office being $2,153 annually. The hon. gentleman told the committee a few moments ago, that in the future such expenditure would be based on the receipts, those receipts being deemed the test as to the requirements. On what principle does the hon. gentleman select a small place and omit altogether places with very much larger population and contributing very much larger receipts to the revenue? For example, take the old standard illustration, the town of Woodstock, with a population of 8,612. Here you are going to spend public money in a small village with a population of less than one-quarter of that. I ask the Minister of Public Works if he can justify the proposition he is now submitting to this committee? If it is not time yet to erect a public building of this kind in the town of Woodstock, how is it that the time has arrived to erect one in the village of Richmond?

Mr. OUIMET. I have just mentioned that this post office has been promised, the money was voted two years ago, and it was voted again last year, and, although, through some local difficulty, the site has not been selected, I do not see how we can withdraw from the promise that has been made. If this building is not gone on with this year, it will be the last time the vote will be asked for. But really I do not feel justified now in withdrawing this item. I think the hon. gentleman ought to congratulate me for not having gone on with the expenditure. It shows that the department was not anxious to spend the money. We are trying to fulfil the pledges of the Government, but we are not very zealous in spending money except when it is necessary. I can only tell the hon. gentleman that if the building is not gone on with from this date next year, the vote will not stand on the appropriation list for next year.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad the Minister has spoken so candidly; I accept his promise, and I know it will be carried out, if he takes the vote. But I would much prefer that he would bow to public opinion now and not ask the vote at all. I can assure him that his pertinacity last year in pressing a similar vote, that for Laprairie, perhaps more indefensible than this, did him no credit, and did the Government no credit and it met with universal condemnation at the hands of the public. The only defence offered then was that which is brought now, that there was an understanding. Now, I will give the Minister a precedent whereby he can, I think, withdraw from this understanding. There is a harbour in the town of Cobourg which was constantly being dredged at the public expense. A vote was taken in 1890 for a certain sum of money to dredge the harbour of Cobourg. The item was put in the public Estimates of 1891, which were prepared before the Parliament of 1891 was elected. At that election the constituency in which the town of Cobourg is situated sent a representative who was not a supporter of the Administration. What did the Government do? They struck out that item from the Estimates. After the constituency had gone against the Government, they thought they were no longer obliged to maintain this item for dredging the Cobourg harbour, and on the motion of the Minister of Finance the item was struck out. That was within the last two years. You did not seem bound to live up to any implied understanding at that time, and yet you seem bound to live up to an understanding that involves an expenditure where the constituency has gone all right. Now, you see that you do not follow a principle. You apply what you call a principle to defend this vote, but you ignored that principle in regard to the harbour of Cobourg, although you maintain it with regard to the public building at Kentville. I think the Minister of Public Works is now taking upon himself the responsibility for an indefensible expenditure of public money if he seriously presses this vote upon the committee. I think he will do wisely to let it stand over in order to give this matter thorough consideration, for it is not likely to pass the committee to-night except after thorough discussion.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is one of the items that the Minister can well afford to strike out of the Estimates. He admits that nothing has been spent in the construction of the post office. Under these circumstances, and in justice to other places where the receipts are double those of Richmond, I think he can well afford to strike this item out. If he will go over the Post Office Report he will find a number of places that give $3,000 or $4,000 or $5,000 a year revenue, but which have no public building. I have marked here several places in the province of Ontario where the revenue is double. Take Uxbridge, $3,456; Wallaceburg, $3,000; West Toronto Junction, $3,600; Ridgetown, $3,621; Parkhill, $6,998; North Bay, Nipissing, $3,605; Listowel, in the county of Perth, $4,146, with a total amount of money orders of $19,000. Mount Forest, where I live, returns $4,049 of receipts, double the amount in Richmond; 2,747 money orders issued, amounting to $32,000. I cannot understand on what principle the Minister expects that we should consent to pass this item. I want to draw his attention to one or two other towns. In Harriston, in the county of Wellington, the total revenue is $3,298, and the total money orders issued are over $16,000, and yet it has no post office building. These are all places better deserving of post offices than Richmond. Now, this vote is in direct violation of the resolution unanimously adopted by this House in 1890 that the construction of public buildings should be determined by the amount of revenue collected in each place. The hon. gentleman cannot claim that he is committed to this expenditure, because no money has been spent. Under these circumstances I think the committee should wipe out this vote, until public buildings are given to places like Woodstock which are more entitled to them.

Mr. CHARLTON. I fear that the hon. Minister scarcely realizes the actual character of this proposed expenditure. We have got so much in the habit in this country of expending public money, not honestly and in the proper discharge of the functions of Government, but for strictly party purposes, that the hon. gentleman scarcely realizes the turpitude of the crimes that the Government have been perpetrating almost without number. We have granted bonuses to railways to the extent of over $15,000,000, and I venture to say that in hardly a single instance have these grants been made with a view to the public service, but they have been made almost universally for the express purpose of strengthening the Government. They have been in fact direct bribes, not to individuals, but to aggregations of individuals in ridings. The grants of post offices to small towns are exactly of the same character. We had a discussion on the appropriation for the La Prairie post office last year, and now we are discussing an appropriation for a post office in an insignificant town of about 2,000 inhabitants, with a postal revenue of about $2,000 a year. What is this appropriation made for? Is it made on any principle of justice or fair-play, or because this town needs a post office? Not at all. It is made for party reasons, to reward this section of the country for party services. In my riding there are two towns, the town of Simcoe, with a revenue of over $5,000, and the town of Tilsonburg, with a revenue of nearly $5,000, two and a half times as much as the revenues of Richmond, and yet neither of them has a post office. I would not ask for post offices for them, because they are not of sufficient importance, and it would not be in the public interest to make appropriations for that purpose; but they have two and half times as good reason for post offices as the place now under discussion. If the Minister proposes, as he said a short time ago, to adopt a fairer basis, and one which will do less violence to the principles of justice and decency, this is a good time to commence. The conduct of the Government in the case of Cobourg and the case of Kentville, shows that they pay no regard to previous promises whatever. It has no restraining effect upon them if they have any political object to gain. This case is so glaring that this vote should be dropped. No reason can be assigned for the expenditure of the money.

Mr. LISTER. The Minister of Public Works has not explained yet to this committee the distinction between Richmond and Kentville in regard to a post office building. The hon. member for King's, N.S. (Mr. Borden), informed this committee during the early part of the evening that in 1886 an item was placed in the Estimates for the erection of a public building in the town of Kentville; that item appeared in the Estimates for two or three years; that it was passed by the committee and by the House, and the propriety of the proposed expenditure thus acknowledged. Having been passed, the faith of the Government was pledged that that building should be erected. Yet the hon. Minister sits in his seat indifferent, apparently, to what is said, and regardless altogether of his duty to the country and the pledge made by the Government that that work should be carried out, and he comes down here and asks the House to vote $4,000 towards the erection of a public building in the town of Richmond. It appears from the Estimates that this item has been voted upon no less than three times. Now, if he is going to follow the policy of erecting these public buildings in the small towns and villages of the country, in places having an insignificant revenue, the rule should be applied to one place, where the faith of the Government has been pledged, as well as to another; and if the Minister feels that it is necessary, in the interest of the country at large, that the town of Richmond should have a post office, I ask him upon what principle he decides that the town of Kentville, which I understand is a more important place, yielding a revenue of $3,000, should not have one? Not one dollar has been expended on this work. If the building had been commenced, even if the land had been purchased, there might have been some reason for the hon. gentleman going on with the work. We have the right to ask why he decides to build at New Richmond when he refuses to build at Kentville. No doubt the hon. gentleman is rewarding the county for returning a supporter. No doubt at the last election the hon. gentleman for that county was authorized by the Government to say that if he were returned the Government would come down handsomely and put up a public building in this place. No doubt that was an element in the last election, and no doubt the Government were privy to that corrupt arrangement. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to get up here and be virtuous when hon. gentlemen point out to him the necessity of a public work, or if not the necessity, at all events the right, to have them in comparison with other places to which they have been given. If the hon. gentleman acts upon any principle at all, one place of 2,000 inhabitants is equally entitled to a public building as another place of 2,000 inhabitants, where the revenue is the same, or where the revenue is greater in the one which has not the building than it is in the other. It is evident that the hon. gentleman wishes to reward his supporters, and is wasting public money for the purpose of keeping himself in office. The Government finding that they do not receive sufficient from the Red Parlour and other sources to carry on elections, bribe the electors by battalions. They buy up whole constituencies by saying to each: elect such a man and we will spend $40,000 in your town. Why, the wanton manner in which the Government have spent the money of this country is simply astounding. In the little town of Cayuga, a little scattered village called a county town, we find that the total receipts from the post office are only $1,327, and yet in that little town the Government consider that a public building should be erected at a cost of from $20,000 to $30,000. They pay a keeper to look after that building more money than they pay for the whole rent of the former post office. Although hon. gentlemen opposite have swelled their income enormously by the tremendous taxation they place on the country to something like $36,000,000 or $37,000,000 a year, an increase of about $14,000,000, they have found ways and means to spend every dollar they have improperly extracted from the pockets of the people, and in addition they have added over $100,000,000 to our public debt, and raised the interest on our public debt from $7,000,000 a year to something like $12,000,000 a year, or nearly one-third of the total revenue of the country. As a matter of fact, in putting up this post office at a cost of $30,000, when they had the old office, which suited all purposes just as well, at a rental of $100 or $150 a year, they subject the country to a net loss of the sum required to meet the interest on that expenditure over and above the rental formerly paid; and we have to go to England to borrow the money to pay for this new building, for which it is safe to say we pay 4 per cent. That is the interest we are paying in the post office savings banks, so that we are spending on interest alone $1,200 a year on the cost of the erection of a post office in a little town which only furnishes a postal revenue of $1,327 per year. And, in addition to the interest, we have to pay for light and heat and caretaking, and so on, which would be about $400 or $500 more. We are, therefore, spending, in order to collect $1,300, something like $1,700 per year. Go where you will, throughout the different provinces of the Dominion, from British Columbia to Nova Scotia, and you will find that all the little towns which have returned gentlemen to support the Government, have succeeded, after these members were returned or pending another election, in getting Government assistance in the shape of a public building. The position taken by the Liberal party has ever been, that the Government is not justified in spending public money in the erection of public buildings, unless the receipts justify the expenditure. The Government are merely trustees for the public, and you might as well justify the stealing of the money of his ward by a trustee as justify the profligate waste of public money which has been going on under the system followed by this Government. The hon. gentleman must not expect to escape this year, as he did last. We had pity for him last year, as he was green in the business and knew very little about his department. I hope he knows more now.

He made promises last year which I hope he will find a way of performing, but I am sorry to say, he is not carrying out those promises, because, of all the Ministers of Public Works we have ever had, the hon. gentleman seems to know less about his department than any of them.

Mr. OUIMET. Thank you.

Mr. LISTER. I do not ask your thanks, sir.

Mr. OUIMET. I am not looking for them.

Mr. LISTER. Then, there is no necessity for saying "Thank you." I tell the hon. gentleman, that the Minister who preceded him in that office, although he has been disgraced, knew, when he came before the House with his Estimates, all the particulars concerning the expenditures he proposed; but the hon. gentleman comes here to-night incapable of giving information. He is unable to say what the price of a certain building is; he has no estimates to submit, but takes the vote by a lump, and asks Parliament to trust him to see that the money is properly expended. Before asking for public money, the hon. gentleman ought to be prepared to give an estimate of the cost and to say that it will not exceed a certain sum, and to prove to us that the building is absolutely necessary in the public interest. He ought to be able to give every information which he should be expected to give, when asking Parliament to vote public money. He has not been able to do this, but has to ask his deputy for an answer to almost every question. I do not believe he ever studied his brief. We know that these particulars are prepared by the deputy, and the least we have to expect of the chief of the department is, that he should study his brief and be able to answer questions put to him. Sir, I think this is an unjustifiable item and that the House has no right to permit it to pass, and I beg to move:

That the item of $4,000 for Richmond Post Office be struck out.

Mr. IVES. I do not intend to attempt to follow the hon. gentleman who last spoke through the political speech which he has just made; but he has made one or two assertions that I would like to correct. He has intimated, that the object for which this vote was originally placed in the Estimates, some years ago, was to bribe the counties of Richmond and Wolfe. If the hon. gentleman knew how absurd that statement was, if he were better acquainted with the enormous extent of those counties and of how small a portion of the community would be likely to be benefited by a post office in the town of Richmond, he would not have made that statement. I can assure the hon. gentleman, if it will help him to sleep to-night, that there is not the slightest foundation for the insinuations he has made, that the vote was originally placed in the Estimates, either to reward past fealty to the Conservative party or to secure future support for that party. The vote was first taken, I think, in 1889, not when an election was pending and not immediately afterwards. It was put in the Estimates because of the importance of the place and the necessity for a public building. My hon. friend should understand, when he is dealing with the town of Richmond, that he is dealing with a town of considerable importance, of much greater importance than the population indicates. Richmond is a divisional point on the Grand Trunk Railway; it is a point where a very large amount of business is transacted. It is a point which not only serves for post office purposes the people of the town itself—in which town there are two post offices, the revenue of only one of which the hon. gentleman has quoted, if I mistake not—but also a very large and very flourishing and very important farming community, that is behind it. The town is the headquarters of the Grand Trunk Railway in the Eastern Townships, the point where all trains are made up and where all the transfers are made from the Quebec branch and from Portland and Montreal. It is the centre of a large population, and I think, if my hon. friend who made these insinuations against the town of Richmond, were to consult his leader, who knows something about the town, he having been a candidate in the last general election and having a general knowledge of the place, because he has passed through it nearly every week in the year for the last twenty years, I think he would ascertain that he has shot very wide of the mark. If the vote was not originally intended to affect the voters of the town of Richmond and the counties of Richmond and Wolfe, I can quite readily understand that the hon. gentleman's speech, when read in the town of Richmond, would very materially weaken the regard of the Liberals and the people down there generally for the Opposition in this House.

Mr. LISTER. That is the right line of argument; that is exactly what I thought you would say.

Mr. IVES. The hon. gentleman lives at the further end of this country, in the coal oil district.

Mr. LISTER. I do not live in the coal oil district.

Mr. IVES. The hon. gentleman must be pardoned if he has no accurate knowledge of what he is talking about when he asks to have this vote for the town of Richmond struck out. As a friend beside me suggests the fact of his living in the coal oil district may account for his ideas being so crude.

Mr. LISTER. You are a clever fellow.

Mr. IVES. I used to have something to do with the county of Richmond and I would not ask any better campaign sheet than the hon. gentleman's speech. With that speech I could succeed in the town of Richmond, in meeting nearly every statement made by the hon. gentleman opposite this session. I would say to the people: You see what Mr. Lister has said in regard to your business and with regard to the importance of your town, and you can judge from this how much dependence is to be placed on the statements of the Opposition generally. I am much obliged, as having something to do with the politics of the constituency, for the aid and assistance the hon. gentleman has given us in the counties of Richmond and Wolfe. Now, the hon. gentleman has asked one question which I think ought to be answered—why has this vote been continued year after year? The reason is because of the carefulness of the Government in this matter. The Government have been offered sites more or less suitable for a post office in this town, but the price which has been asked for these sites has been, in the opinion of the Government, more than should be asked and more than the Government ought to pay. The original vote of $4,000 was put in the Estimates to secure the site, but the Government have not been able yet to secure a suitable site at what they considered a fair price. But there is every reason to think that in the course of the current year an arrangement may be made by which a most suitable site will be secured, partly at the expense of the corporation, and at a price which a careful Government can afford to pay. I must ask my hon. friend not to persist in this motion, because the adoption of it would be a great injustice to the people of Richmond and also to the people of the rich farming district surrounding the town, as it would deprive them of the new post office which would do away with the absurdity which now exists of two post offices in different parts of the town.

Mr. FLINT. I think the whole tendency of the remarks of the President of the Council (Mr. Ives) go very far to defend, if they do not justify, the speech of the gentleman who preceded him. The tenor of the speech of the hon. gentleman shows the immoral effect of the Government's system of making these appropriations and of the bad political principles by which that system must necessarily have been inspired. The address we have listened to supported this assumption, because the hon. gentleman stated that the speech of the gentleman who preceded him could be used, and would be used, to damage in the locality the candidate supporting the party of which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) is a member. It is part and parcel of the system which we on this side are endeavouring to suppress, the making use of these appropriations for political effect. The object is not only to gain for the Government candidate support because the Government has made this appropriation but to condemn those who criticise the appropriation as enemies of the town, and I am not one of those who believe that with sensible and impartial and reasonable electors these arguments have any great weight. But, unfortunately, there is in every community a large class of thoughtless voters, not very deep in their political principles, who are moved by such superficial arguments as this. Their passions and prejudices are appealed to by the Government, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), and the result has been the sinking of millions of money for these very improper purposes. I ask on what principle is this vote defended? I plead with the Government against the utter abnegation of all principle in the manner in which these appropriations are made. Let the Government establish some principle, based upon the population of the community, based upon the revenue derived from these places, and establish a schedule by which appropriations shall be awarded, and then all these complaints will cease. Now, is it fair that the supporters of the Liberal party in Richmond should be put in the false position that their opponents may say to them that the Opposition at Ottawa was opposed to an appropriation for a public building in that village, and say that we are belittling the importance of this place, when our only objection is that the Government are spending the money for political purposes, and ignoring other places which have much greater claims. We have one locality with a large population and a large postal and Customs revenue; yet for political reasons—because no other can be assigned—that town is refused a public building, and another town with much less claim, is granted the favour. We find that large towns in Ontario and Quebec and the Maritime provinces, having greater claims than Richmond, are refused appropriations, and in every instance we find that the refusal of these claims coincides with the fact that the representatives of these constituencies are opposing the Government. Can we be expected to support a principle so utterly abhorrent to all reason, so utterly immoral, the effect of which is felt throughout the country in degrading political life? We find that Ministers of the Crown, representatives of the people, learned and talented men waste five-tenths of their energies in election times, in persuading the people to vote for the ministerial candidate on the pitiful grounds that certain public favours will be given them if they do so, or that the erection of public buildings will give a certain amount of labour to a certain number of electors. The whole system is fraught with danger, and we ought to insist that the Government shall establish a broad principle upon which appropriations of this kind can be made, that it shall no longer be left to the back-door influence of members supporting the Government to determine these appropriations.

Mr. BORDEN. I am very sorry to have to vote in opposition to some of my friends on this side of the House. I was much touched by the appeal which the Minister made a short time ago in reference to this vote. He said, What can I do? The faith of the country has been pledged. We have voted this over and over again, and I cannot strike it out. Now, as I said before, the Minister laid down the policy which I approved of, because I thought it was a fair and just one, namely, that he intended to carry out every pledge to construct a public building, made prior to the adoption of the resolution of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in 1890; and that being the case, the hon. gentleman adheres to the vote we are now discussing. He might, however, have treated this vote as the vote was treated which was passed in 1886 for the town of Kentville. I do not know why he makes the distinction; but I have still a hope, the hon. gentleman having laid down his policy so distinctly, and being an honourable man, that he will yet restore to the Estimates the vote which was so improperly stricken out in 1886. Until he fails to do that, I propose to support him in the policy which he has deliberately laid down, of carrying out the works to which this country was pledged before the adoption of that resolution in 1890, and which was accepted by the whole House. That being the case I will vote with the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. McMULLEN. In discussing last year the question of Richmond post office, I find the following report in the "Debates" of 19th May:

Mr. FLINT. If the hon. Minister is not too tightly bound by pledges, I should hope he might see his way to cancel this vote and give a larger amount to some of those large towns in the west, which have stronger claims from a business stand-point.

Mr. MULLOCK. Can the Minister state that the land has yet been bought?

Mr. OUMET. Not yet; it is being purchased; not a cent has been spent yet.

Mr. MULLOCK. So there will be no loss by abandoning the scheme at this stage. Perhaps the Minister would consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). It is quite clear that this enterprise is an infringement of the resolution of 1890. I would like to know how the Minister justifies asking the House for this money in view of that resolution.

Mr. OUMET. The first appropriation was made in 1890, and it was renewed last year. I think it is time we should keep faith with that locality.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the population of Richmond?

Mr. OUMET. A little over 2,000. The revenue is $1,909. The cost of the buildings will be between $16,000 and $18,000.

Then the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) drew attention to the impropriety of expending such sums in face of the receipts given by the Minister, both with respect to the post office, Inland Revenue and Customs. Then the Minister spoke as follows:—

Mr. OUMET. I differ with the hon. member for South Oxford. The Government have undertaken certain obligations for this locality, and they feel bound to fulfil those obligations. It is intended to have the post office, custom-house and inland revenue in the building.

It is therefore quite clear that the intention last year was that the work should be proceeded with, for the Minister of Public Works said the Government desired to implement their promises. This vote was passed in 1891, revoted in 1892, and it is now proposed to be revoted, although no money has been spent. The Minister of Public Works has already intimated to this committee, as "Hansard" will show to-morrow, that it is only his intention to carry to completion buildings on which work had already been commenced. It is unfair to ask the committee to pass this item under the circumstances, especially in view of the agitation prevailing in the country for a general reduction of duties. The Minister of Finance has promised to go round the country and investigate that matter, and next year if the reductions anticipated by the people are carried out there may be a deficit. Yet the hon. Minister is proposing to spend money to erect a post office at a village where the receipts are only $2,000. Possibly those people may have the promise of the former Minister of Public Works; but this committee is not pledged to carry out any promise made by a Minister of the Crown in face of the decision of Parliament that public buildings should only be erected at places where the receipts justify them. On what principle does the Minister ask this committee to commit itself to an expenditure for a post office at this village of 2,000 people, when there are over forty or fifty places in Ontario with receipts nearly double that which do not now possess any post offices? It is difficult to understand on what principle the Minister asks this committee to consent to re-enact the abominably corrupt scheme of previous years in connection with erection of public buildings. On what principle does the hon. gentleman leave out Listowell, Mount Forest and Harrison, with receipts running from $3,000 to $4,000, and ask a vote for a place with only $3,000 revenue?

Mr. LISTER. It is not to be wondered at that the President of the Council should defend this iniquitous proposition of the Minister of Public Works, when we bear in mind that the hon. gentleman for years has been backing up just such transactions, and worse, too. He voted last year for the erection of a post office at Laprairie. I suppose he would vote for a post office in every small village in the province. It makes no difference to the Minister. He supported all those propositions submitted by the present Minister of Public Works, and the hon. gentleman who preceded him. He voted for post offices at Port Arthur, Picton and twenty or thirty other smaller places. The hon. gentleman said that he desired no better speech with which to go before the people of Richmond and Wolfe than the one I made with reference to this expenditure. I hope the people of Richmond and Wolfe have a higher sense of political morality than the President of the Council. If the people are to vote against an opponent for denouncing an iniquitous system of expenditure of public money, and have no more political morality than to allow themselves to be diverted from what is right because some one advocated what is wrong, there is very little hope for the constituency of Richmond and Wolfe; but I have no doubt that in the constituency there are many men who will not be influenced by any such clap-trap as the President of the Council has used before this committee, that they will not be turned from doing what is right because some one spoke against an appropriation that to every reasonable man would appear to be wrong. The hon. gentleman says I come from Lambton. I am proud to come from Lambton. He says that I come from the oil regions. I can tell the hon. gentleman that I do not do anything of the kind, although I would feel proud to represent the oil men of this country. He wonders I should not know there is such a place as Richmond, that magnificent town of 2,000 inhabitants, that yields to the Government of this country about $2,000 a year. I can tell my hon. friend who does not come from the oil regions that he is very crude not to know that West Lambton is not the oil territory of this country. He tells us that the Government have been making earnest inquiries as to the advisability of erecting public buildings in this great town of Richmond, and that that is the reason why this vote has been placed in the Estimates for the last three years. I doubt that story. The hon. gentleman has got to be the President of the Council. After knocking for years at the door and kicking up a dust outside the Council room, he has got into it, and he occupies the high position of President of the Council and Judge of the Judicial Committee. He has brought all his influence to bear, and he has got the Government to do what they were loath to do for years before in reference to this post office. If I remember aright, the President of the Council once represented Richmond and Wolfe, and he afterwards took Sherbrooke, and got a friend in Richmond and Wolfe, to strengthen his position and power, as it is necessary he should have one or two followers. In order to retain this follower, no doubt, he has induced the Government to build this post office at a cost of $20,000 or $30,000 for the purpose of collecting $2,153 a year. In order to collect this the country is pledged for all time to come to an expenditure of $1,700 a year. It is quite possible, as he says, that the mails may have to be changed at Richmond; but there are many other such places in this country, and I venture to say that if a motion were made here to erect public buildings in the town of Woodstock, with an income of $16,000 or $17,000 a year, and a population of 14,000 people, the President of the Council, righteous man that he is, would be found voting against it, although he attempts to justify this expenditure for the little town of Richmond. The President of the Council and his friends for the time being have control of the purse strings; but at some future time they will have to answer for the extravagance they are now guilty of. We had an evidence in the case of Laprairie last year, as well as in the present case, of the reckless manner in which the public money is squandered. It is strange that hon. gentlemen opposite will not bring that influence which they can bring to bear, so as to put an end to this extravagant, wasteful and corrupt Government.

Mr. IVES. My hon. friend quite misunderstood me if he gathered from what I said that the people of Richmond would consider his speech a reason for continuing their fidelity to the Conservative Government, because he threatened to deprive them of his vote. What I did say was, and what, if he had been listening carefully, he might have gathered: That they would judge of the correctness of the statements of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, by the incorrectness of his statement with regard to the necessity of a public building at Richmond, and the propriety of erecting one there.

Mr. LANDERKIN. There is a little history in connection with this that has not been touched upon to-night, and, in order to enable hon. gentlemen to vote intelligently on the question, I shall have to tell it. You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that a few years ago Mr. Colby became a member of the Cabinet. I do not know whether he was ever a judge in the Cabinet or not, but hon. gentlemen will remember that there were some who were not called to the Council at that time, who had what they call a sore head. I do not know whether it affected the President of the Council very much or not, but I do know that since Mr. Colby went away, the President of the Council comes to this House more frequently than before. I do not suppose that he is moved by little considerations of this kind, but when his head got sore and the wound got deeper, the Government, in order to heal the wound, placed this little sum in the Estimates to build a post office. He represented that constituency for a number of years, and I am not surprised at it, because he is an able, active and enthusiastic party man. Well, after the constituency of Richmond and Wolfe got to know him well, he had to go to Sherbrooke; they had found him out in Richmond. I presume some of the rest of us have to change sometimes. I remember at the time that Mr. Abbott was in the Government, and that the President of the Council was out of it, there was a paper published in the town of Richmond, which was a firm and ardent supporter of the President of the Council, and it was talking about the enormity of the offences of the Government of Mr. Abbott. I presume the President of the Council has seen that paper kick. I tried to read an extract from that paper in the House, but so incensed became the Minister of Finance that he moved that the House should adjourn rather than let me go through with the article. I think it was immediately after this article was published that this sum was put in the Estimates. The Government knew the way to apply a balm to the President of the Council, but that was not the balm he was looking after. He desired to get into the Cabinet, and nothing but that would satisfy the hon. gentleman. He looked in the Estimates at the grant for building a post office at Richmond, but he spurned it from him, and he got his "Guardian" to condemn the Government for their rascality generally. It said that there should be a change in the Government, that it was full of corruption, and that it was an abomination to the honest people of the Dominion from one end of it to the other. Well, I have not heard any vapourings from that paper since the President of the Council came in. But then, it is a most curious thing that after the hon. gentleman had won this great favour for the honest people about Richmond, he had to go to Sherbrooke. Well, he went to Sherbrooke, and attended to some little matters there. There was a gentleman in Sherbrooke who was not so glad to see him back in Sherbrooke as he was glad to be there himself. I do not think that that old politician met him with a brass band. However, the hon. gentleman went there and formed some combinations and overcame some difficulties. He held on to Sherbrooke very tenaciously. I believe he imitated Mr. Chapleau, in becoming a very vigorous kicker, and finally he got into the Cabinet, and became chief justice there, or President of the Council. Well, soon after he got into the Council he created a vacancy in the post office at Sherbrooke, and I believe one gentleman who opposed the President of the Council was appointed postmaster, and the other who opposed him was appointed inspector. Thus the President of the Council has great combining graces. It is wonderful how he could use all those agencies at his disposal to make one gentleman who opposed him postmaster and the other inspector of the mail bags. I think that this gentleman, with all these inspiring graces, should inspire the country with confidence in his ability as Chief Justice of the Cabinet, to settle the difficult questions of a judicial character that come before them. I do not know whether he will use coal oil to do it or not. He must require some lubricant at times to render his decisions acceptable to all classes. Now, you understand, Mr. Chairman, a little of the history of this transaction. You see how from beginning to end this was done for a political purpose by the late Government. It was done for the purpose of conciliating the members who became hostile in their preference for Mr. Colby ; and you see the means used by the President of the Council to heal the difficulties and restore harmony in the local party ranks by the use of public money. That is the position exactly—the public money is used for the purpose of restoring harmony between the different factions of the party. It is not the public interests, but the party interests that are regarded in the expenditure of the people's money ; and if the people of Richmond are the honest and straightforward people that we believe they are, they will hurl this back with scorn upon those who are seeking to bribe them by this means. But it was not the people that the Government were bribing or seeking to conciliate at that time. It was the President of the Council. They first sought to do so by making a grant to the city of Sherbrooke for an exhibition ; but nothing would satisfy the hon. gentleman by the Presidency of the Council. I hope his usefulness will not be curtailed after having received that which he has sought for so many years.

West Farnham Post Office,
Customs and Inland Revenue offices—to complete $5,000

Mr. McMULLEN. How much has been spent on this building ?

Mr. OUIMET. The building is at present under contract. The total sum to complete it will be $10,089.

Montreal Post Office—alterations and improvements . . . $12,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What is this for ?

Mr. OUIMET. The Montreal post office building has become quite insufficient for the business transacted there. Hitherto the third floor has not been occupied, and we are now dividing it and generally fitting it for offices ; so that not only the basement, but the first, second and third floors will be used. The money order and savings bank offices will be removed to the second floor, and to accommodate the public who go there in thousands, elevators will be put in. I think that this year we shall not put on a new roof, but repair the present roof.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it the intention to light the third flat with electricity, like the rest of the building ?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the contract price of the electric light ?

Mr. OUIMET. Up to the present time the price has been $16 per lamp. I propose, in future, to measure the electric light, and to pay for it at the ordinary rate. The building is such that the lamps have to be lit all day and all night, in the basement, and on the first floor. In future, instead of paying so much per lamp we will pay so much per meter, as that will be cheaper. It is also our intention to improve the skylights in order to have more light.

Mr. McMULLEN. Have you any other buildings for postal service besides this one ?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes ; we have several branch post offices on different streets.

Orillia Public Building $1,600

Mr. OUIMET. This will be completed in less than two months. The entire cost will be $16,661.

Toronto Drill Hall $90,000

Mr. OUIMET. The total cost will be $180,000. The city furnish the site, which they estimate at $150,000.

Winnipeg Military Buildings. $20,000

Mr. OUIMET. A vote was taken last year to build new barracks for the school of infantry, and the balance to be voted is $20,000. The cost will be $45,000.

Regina Court House and office and Registry office $20,000

Mr. OUIMET. The estimated cost is $60,000.

Calgary Post Office, Custom House, &c. $25,000

Mr. OUIMET. The entire cost is $50,000.

North West Mounted Police Buildings $20,000

Mr. OUIMET. This is to provide for additional officers' quarters, fire protection, general renewals and repairs in the whole of the North-west Territories. There will be expended at Regina, $2,000 ; Maple Creek, $20,500 ; Medicine Hat, $250 ; Calgary, $3,000 ; Fort McLeod, $1,050 ; Lethbridge, $1,500 ; Saskatchewan, $2,500 ; South Edmonton, $2,000 ; Battleford, $2,000 ; McLeod outpost, $1,500 ; Lethbridge outpost, $500 ; Maple Creek outpost, $200, etc.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That sum will hardly provide for the erection of new buildings.

Mr. OUIMET. No ; I do not think there are any new buildings except at the outposts. I may say these buildings, as a rule, cost less than the ordinary buildings, because the members of the force are employed in building most of them. They receive extra pay, but not at all what we should have to pay other labour.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have previously called attention to the necessity which seems to me to exist for us to begin to reduce the number of mounted police, and I think that, instead of providing new buildings, as if to perpetuate the force we should begin to look forward to its reduction. Last year the Minister of the Interior intimated that it was the intention of the Government to reduce the number of mounted police. I think there were a number who had served and whose time expired last year and I think the Minister intimated that it was not the intention to fill the places of a number of those whose time expired. I would like to know what reduction there has been.

Mr. IVES. Two hundred less than last year. But there are new duties for the force in connection with the cattle quarantine, which calls for the service of a large number of men, and, while that continues, I do not think it is safe to give a promise of very great reduction. I think possibly, after the necessity for this work disappears, a material reduction in the force will be made. But the hon. gentleman must understand that the police are being called upon to do a very large variety of public duties in connection with the Customs, quarantine and watching the Indians in every part of the North-west Territories. I must say the amount which the Government have placed in the Estimates is very much less than the Comptroller would like and that it is an exceedingly moderate sum when you consider that the force is scattered all over the country, and that you have to furnish shelter for them at all their different stations. This sum is not sufficient to furnish permanent quarters and it is absolutely the least sum the service can get on with.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am glad to learn that the force has been reduced by two hundred within the last year. There is one point to which I drew the committee's attention last year and to which I would ask attention this year. I have no doubt that the Mounted Police perform a great variety of services in connection with the revenue, I think that instead of the whole expenditure being charged to police a fair share should be charged to customs or inland revenue to represent the service performed for these departments. Of course the country has to pay the money, but it is hardly doing justice to the different accounts. I can understand that, should a reduction be made in the force making it impossible for the force to do duty as customs preventive officers and inland revenue officers, it might be necessary to have a staff in connection with these two departments. But, in that case, the expenditure would be charged to the proper departments and each would bear its proportionate share of the expense.

Experimental Farms--improvements, renewals, repairs, &c., in connection with buildings, fences, &c.. . . . $6,000

Mr. FOSTER. That should be a revote, Mr. Chairman. I marked it so in the Estimates, but it was left out in the printing.

Repairs Ottawa Buildings--Furniture, &c. $110,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What is this for ; this is a very large item ?

Mr. OUIMET. I will give the hon. gentleman the items : Eastern block, $7,900 ; Western block, $10,000 ; Langevin block, $6,000 ; Parliament buildings, Senate, $6,000 ; House of Commons, $8,000 ; Library, $4,500 ; Supreme Court, $2,000 ; Departmental buildings and Parliament Buildings, $5,500 ; general repairs and maintenance in connection with gas, water supply, bells, electric light, ventilation, boilers, machinery, &c., $40,000 ; post office, inland revenue, office, custom-house and Ottawa river works office, $6,000 ; Geological survey, $2,000 ; Victoria Hall, $2,000 ; Government Printing Bureau, $3,000 ; miscellaneous, $5,000 ; total, $110,000.

Rideau Hall. $15,000

Mr. MULLOCK. Perhaps the hon. Minister will let that item stand ; I have a return based on that and I want to discuss it.

Mr. FOSTER. All right.

Grounds, Public Buildings,
Ottawa. $6,000

Mr. McMULLEN. Does this include Major's Hill Park ?

Mr. OUIMET. No ; it is the amount paid under contract for the maintenance of Parliament grounds and their ornamentation.

Heating Public Buildings, Ottawa, including salaries of engineers, firemen and elevator attendant. $66,000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Last session, when we discussed this item, it was pointed out to the hon. Minister that we were using large quantities of wood and, by the comparison made, it was very clearly shown that wood as fuel, instead of coal, was anything but an economy in the public service. If I am aright, the Minister said we were under contract for a time. I would like to ask if the contract has expired, and whether he has made any change with reference to it ?

Mr. OUIMET. The contract has another year to run. I intend to ask for a sufficient amount in the Supplementary Estimates to have these boilers changed or replaced in order to burn nothing but coal and give up wood.

Major's Hill Park, Ottawa. $4,000

Mr. McMULLEN. How is it intended to spend this money ?

Mr. OUIMET. This is the amount paid for the maintenance and ornamentation of the park. It is spent under contract, after public tenders were asked for.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is a very nice spot, I admit ; but it appears to me we have spent an enormous amount of money on Major's Hill Park. I am glad to see that the item is coming down. Who has the contract just now for the care of the park ?

Mr. OUIMET. A man by the name of Garello.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I believe the man who has charge of it, is a pretty decent old man.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would remark that the way in which the turf around these buildings was attended to last season was simply disgraceful. I constantly saw huge floods of cold water poured upon it. I trust the Minister will see that a little more pains are taken in the management of these grounds in the future. I do not want to spend another summer here, if I can help it, but I am bound to say that the care that was shown, or rather the want of care that was bestowed upon these grounds, was extremely disgraceful, bearing in mind that they have cost us nearly a couple of hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Major's Hill Park was watered with revolving sprinklers, and the grass was kept in terrible condition, but here they just turned on the nozzle.

Mr. BOWERS. I should suppose, when we have scientific men on the experimental farm to instruct these people, they would know enough not to turn on the grass a stream of cold water in a hot summer's day.

Water for Dominion Public Buildings $15,500

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is this water supplied by contract ? It seems to be an enormous sum to pay for water for the public buildings at Ottawa.

Mr. OUIMET. It is according to an agreement that has been entered into with the corporation, three or four years ago.

Mr. MULLOCK. Where do you get your electric light ?

Mr. OUIMET. We have a special engine for ourselves and dynamo. It is well that it should be so, because at the present moment we are very poorly served in town.

Mr. DENISON. Is this sum for water alone ? It seems to me to be a very great amount. Capitalized at 4 per cent, it represents nearly $400,000 a year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If that agreement is capable of being opened, I think the Minister had better look into it. How long has it yet to run ? Surely, we are not bound for all time ? I suppose you have to make certain allowances to Ottawa for municipal advantages, as is the rule, I think, in most cities where the Government buildings occupy so much space. In Washington, for example, there is a fixed portion of the municipal expenses paid in bulk sum. I think they tax the people one-third. How is it here ? Are you taxed the same as ordinary ratepayers ?

Mr. OUIMET. We pay no taxes at all ; but we have consented to pay a certain amount, as a compromise, for what is called local improvements, and which benefit the public buildings.

Mr. MULLOCK. The water tax, therefore, I regard as a contribution. Could you say how much the Government pay to the city for municipal services of all kinds?

Mr. OUMET. This sum of $15,500 is for water consumed at the buildings, and also for our contribution towards the maintenance of a proper system of protection against fire.

Mr. MULLOCK. Is it paid for by meter?

Mr. OUMET. A certain amount has been agreed upon, after conference. What we pay in addition to the corporation is in the shape of maintenance of certain works and bridges, for which we intend to ask this year $6,000. We also maintain Major's Hill Park, at a cost of $4,000, but that, of course, is the property of the Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the Government has also built bridges on the road to Rideau Hall.

Mr. OUMET. The Government contributed $1,000 towards one of the bridges.

Mr. McMULLEN. Do the Government maintain it?

Mr. OUMET. No.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to call the attention of the leader of the House to the French Treaty, which has been laid on the Table. I have received a large number of inquiries from the Maritime provinces as to the meaning of this treaty. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman will be able to answer my question to-night, but it is very important to know exactly how far the treaty goes. In article 3 it gives a list of articles of Canadian origin that can be imported into France direct, and on which we will receive the advantage of the minimum tariff, among which is fish preserved in its natural form. I would have no doubt in regard to the matter myself, but I am asked whether that description includes ordinary dry codfish, or pickled herring, or pickled mackerel, which are preserved in their natural form. It is very desirable before the treaty comes before the House—and I do not know whether the hon. gentleman intends to ask the consent of Parliament to it this session or not—that we should know exactly what these words include. I shall be much obliged, if the hon. gentleman feels that he is not in a position to answer this question authoritatively to-night, if he will ascertain exactly what these words include, whether they include ordinary dry and pickled cod and ordinary pickled herring and mackerel.

Mr. OUMET.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it would be more satisfactory to the hon. gentleman if on Monday, before the House goes into its work, I make a general statement with regard to the treaty, giving all information in my possession, and it will answer most of the hon. gentleman's inquiries.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman intend to ask Parliament this session to assent to the treaty?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not prepared to answer that question just now.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 13th March, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

VAUDREUIL ELECTION.

Mr. LAURIER. I beg again to ask if there has been a returning officer appointed for the electoral division of Vaudreuil?

Mr. FOSTER. A returning officer has been appointed. He is Mr. Francois De Sales Bastien, the same returning officer as before. Nomination, 5th April; polling, 12th April.

INQUIRY RE SIR A. P. CARON.

Mr. EDGAR. On Friday the Secretary of State promised me that he would be able to give me full information as to the distribution of the evidence taken before the Caron Commission. I hope he will have something satisfactory to lay before the House or otherwise it may delay the session.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I find that the Queen's Printer has completed a portion of the work, so as to enable me to lay a partial report on the Table. The evidence is now complete and is ready for distribution among the members.

Mr. EDGAR. They are going on with printing the exhibits?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

RELIEF OF JAMES BALFOUR.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved second reading of Bill (No. 93) for the relief of James Balfour—(from the Senate).

Mr. AMYOT. I beg to draw the attention of this House to the fact that there is no evidence whatever to support the Bill. There is only the simple admission, not under oath, of the wife, but not a particle of evidence of the circumstances to show any guilt whatever on her part. There is only the wife's mere admission to her husband and the minister of her church and nothing else. There are certain letters which she wrote to her husband, but you will not find any evidence taken under oath of any person to show that the woman was guilty of what she admits. If a simple confession not under oath is to be sufficient to annul a marriage and obtain divorce, well and good; but we have to take the responsibility of the precedent. I do not believe there is a court of justice which would base a judgment of this nature on such evidence.

Mr. CHARLTON. It strikes me that the whole course of procedure in this Dominion in divorce matters is one that places members in a very awkward position. The granting of divorce should certainly be a judicial act. My own feeling in this matter is simply this: Here are cases presented to me for my decision in which I have not examined the evidence and have not had opportunities to hear the witnesses. I am called on to perform a judicial act without knowing the evidence. If a divorce is to be granted at all, and I believe there is one reason, and only one which justifies granting it, the granting of it should be a judicial act after due trial in a court of justice. I presume two-thirds of the members in this House, in giving their votes on divorce Bills, are simply governed by the assumption that the Senate passed the Bills with sufficient reason. That is not a reason which satisfies me, and I believe the time will come when the good sense of the country will see, if we are to grant divorces at all, that the present cumbrous system should be replaced by a trial before a court, where evidence will be heard, and a judicial decision given. I enter my protest, as a member of this House, against the system which calls on me to vote in matters concerning which I am not informed to the extent to which I should be in order to give an intelligent vote.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, on a division.

RELIEF OF E. H. HEWARD.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved second reading of Bill (No. 95) for the relief of Edmund Holyoake Heward—(from the Senate).

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Is the correspondent in this case still a member of Her Majesty's service in this country?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). No.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, on a division.

DUGGAN—CULLER.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether a person named Duggan, of Quebec, was appointed some time during the last two years as culler at Montreal, or to measure and report as culler or otherwise at Montreal? If so, what salary was he paid? Does not the last amendment to the Cullers' Act provide that there shall be eight cullers only? Is there not an assistant culler at Montreal? What is his name, and what fees or salary was paid him last year? How long was Duggan at Montreal, and what is his salary?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I beg to say that there was a person of that name who was employed and was paid the sum of $500. The last amendment does not provide for eight cullers, and there is not an assistant culler at Montreal. Therefore, no fees or salary were paid. Duggan was employed from the 1st of June to the 5th of December, 1892, for which he received $500.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

Mr. WILSON asked, Has the attention of the Government been directed to the petition presented to this House, asking for a change in the "Weights and Measures Act," so far as it relates to the weight of vegetables by the bushel? If so, is it the intention of the Government to amend the law as prayed for in said petition?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The attention of the Government has been directed to the petition for a change in the Weights and Measures Act, so far as it relates to the weights of vegetables by the bushel. It is not the intention of the Government to amend the law as applied for during the present session.

SUPERINTENDENT OF I. C. R.

Mr. GODBOUT (for Mr. Cloquette) asked, Whether the Government are aware that the position of superintendent of the section of the Intercolonial Railway between Ste. Flavie and Moncton has been vacant for over three months? If so, do they intend to fill the said vacancy at an early day, and to appoint a French Canadian thereto, in compliance with the petitions in that behalf forwarded to the Government, and in particular to the hon. Postmaster-General, Sir A. P. Caron?

Mr. HAGGART. There has been a vacancy in the superintendency of the Intercolonial Railway between Ste. Flavie and Moncton for some time. It is the intention of the Government to fill the vacancy.

MR. THOMAS BREEN.

Mr. VAILLANCOURT (for Mr. Delisle) (translation) asked, Is Thomas Breen still employed by the Public Works Department? If so, what is his present occupation and the amount paid to him for salary, board and travelling expenses, in 1892; also, in January and February last?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I beg to state that Mr. Breen has the supervision, as residing engineer, of all the works that are carried out in the county of Gaspé, including the Magdalen Islands, and the counties of Bonaventure and Témiscouata. Mr. Breen received, in 1892, and in January and February, 1893, the following amounts:—Salary, $2,337.50; board, $476; and travelling expenses, $670.40.

MR. JOSEPH ROSA.

Mr. VAILLANCOURT (for Mr. Delisle) (translation) asked, Is Joseph Rosa in the employ of the Public Works Department? If so, what is the nature of his work? How much did he draw for salary, board and travelling expenses from 1st January to 31st December, 1892? What amount of money was expended for public works under his superintendence in 1892?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) Yes; Mr. Rosa has the superintendence, as resident engineer, of the slides and booms of the Saguenay River, and also of the works carried on in the counties of Montmorency and Charlevoix. Mr. Rosa received the following amounts:—Salary, $2,013; board, $535.50; travelling expenses, $549.60. $7,090.10 were expended on the works under his supervision.

MR. C. E. MICHAUD.

Mr. VAILLANCOURT (for Mr. Delisle) (translation) asked, What amount of money was paid by the Public Works Department to C. E. Michaud, surveyor, for salary, travelling expenses and board during the year 1892? What works were intrusted to his supervision, and what is the amount expended on each of such works? Is the said C. E. Michaud still under pay, and what is his work?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) Mr. C. E. Michaud was paid as salary the sum of $2,013 ; for travelling expenses, $196.31 ; and for board, $150.50. The works intrusted to his supervision during the year were those carried out at Rimouski, Trois Pistoles, Ile Verte, Berthier (en bas), and St. Michel de Bellechasse. The amounts expended are subdivided as follows :—At Rimouski, $4,592.75 ; Trois Pistoles, $1,499.28 ; Ile Verte, $3,999.70 ; Berthier (en bas), $485.93, and St. Michel de Bellechasse, $996.70. Mr. Michaud is still employed by the Government ; his last work was the compiling of a report on all the works he has under his supervision, so as to enable the chief engineer to prepare his estimates.

MR. ARSENE CLOUTIER.

Mr. VAILLANCOURT (for Mr. Tarte) (translation) asked, Was Mr. Arsène Cloutier of L'Islet, appointed superintendent of the works done last summer on the pier at L'Islet ? If so, what was his salary, and what amount did he receive ?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) Mr. Arsène Cloutier was not appointed superintendent of the works carried out last summer on the pier at L'Islet.

INDUSTRIES IN UXBRIDGE.

Mr. EDGAR asked, 1. What was the nature or description of each of the thirty manufacturing industries existing in the town of Uxbridge according to the census of 1891 ? What were the names of each of the proprietors of such several manufacturing industries ? How many hands or employees were employed in each of such manufactories ? 2. What was the number and nature or description of each of the manufacturing industries in the town of Uxbridge according to the census of 1881 ? What were the names of each of the proprietors of such several manufactories ? How many hands were employed in each of said factories ?

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask my hon. friend to allow this question to stand.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask if the Government is ready to give any assurance that that class of questions will receive an answer some day soon ?

Mr. FOSTER. Before answering the hon. gentleman I had better ascertain how the work in the department is getting on with reference to these questions. I will ascertain and be ready to answer his question to-morrow.

TRACKMASTER—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILROAD.

Mr. PERRY asked, What were the reasons for dismissing John McPherson, late trackmaster on the Prince Edward Island Railroad ? Is he superannuated ? If not, why not ?

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the hon. gentleman I may state that John McPherson's services were dispensed with because one roadmaster is considered sufficient. He is not superannuated ; he is not entitled to superannuation.

INDUSTRIES IN THE CITY OF LONDON.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) moved for :

Return giving the names of the 804 manufacturers of the city of London referred to in the census of 1891.

He said : I would like to add,

"The industries in which they are engaged, and the amount of capital invested in each industry."

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the hon. gentleman had better ask for the capital of each individual manufacturer. That goes rather further than the spirit of the instructions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose there will be no objection to giving the number of hands employed by each ?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then I will amend it in that way ; although I think it is very important to obtain the amount of capital invested, otherwise we cannot tell how far the value of the dwelling-house has been included.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

COLUMBIAN EXHIBITION—CLOSING ON SUNDAY.

Mr. CHARLTON moved :

That in the opinion of this House, the Canadian Department of the Columbian Exhibition should be closed on Sunday, in accordance with the British example at previous exhibitions, in deference to the Christian sentiment of the country, and as a recognition of the duty resting upon an avowedly Christian people, to refuse by an official act to do violence to Christian principles and to decline to lend aid or countenance to any course that will deprive official caretaker, or labourer, of Christian liberties, or privileges, or will invite or compel any class of the population to violate Divine requirements relating to the observance of the Lord's Day as a day of rest.

He said : The motion of which I have given notice and which we reach to-day is substantially the one submitted to the House last session, and my reason for raising the question again is, that the action of the House on the matter last session was hardly satisfactory, and subsequent developments in the United States have, in my opinion, rendered it highly desirable that the Canadian Government and the Canadian people should take a stand on this question, so far as our influence may be exerted, that will not be of an uncertain character. Last year Congress in making an appropriation coupled it with a provision that the fair should not be open on Sunday, the payment of the appropriation being made contingent on that provision. A very decided attempt was made to obtain a reversal of that condition during last session of Congress. I believe that attempt did not succeed. There has, however, been a movement in favour of the opening of the Chicago Exhibition on Sunday which is very formidable indeed, and promises to be a successful one. The reason for this movement, so far as the majority of the citizens of Chicago are concerned, is, no doubt, purely a mercenary one. The people of the city believe the fair is more likely to be a financial success if it is open seven days instead of six days in the week. The effort put forth by the promoters of the fair and by those who are pecuniarily interested in it has been seconded by the Sunday newspapers of the United States, very naturally, by the continental element of the population, by the anarchist and socialist elements, and in fact by all the elements of society in Chicago and the United States antagonistic to social order. The movement for the opening of the fair on Sunday has been opposed in the United States by the Christian sentiment of that country. The religious element is almost a unit in favour of closing the fair on the Lord's Day. I believe one or two small religious bodies, such as the Seven Day Baptists and the Adventists, support the opening of the fair on Sunday, because they do not believe in the Christian Sabbath. It is also opposed by the labour organizations, the Federation of Labour, the Knights of Labour, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and various other organizations; and it may be asserted unhesitatingly that the best elements of the country are arrayed on the side of opposition to the opening. It is said that petitions, representing at least 35,000,000 of the population, were presented to Congress last session in opposition to the movement to open the fair on Sunday. The issue may be said to be, Sir, between the friends of religion, morality and labour, on the one hand, and on the other hand, the enemies of religion and those who pay no attention to the religious and the civil rights of the labourer. The arguments pro and con, of course, are the old familiar arguments with reference to Sabbath desecration, and the use of the Sabbath as a day for pleasure, for pic-nics, and parties and excursions, etc. It is said that those in favour of the opening are actuated by a sincere desire to give the labourer a rest and a chance to visit the fair. The arguments in this direction would be just as applicable to the case of a circus here in Ottawa on the Sabbath. We could use the same arguments with the same force to advocate that a circus should be allowed to go on with its performance on Sunday on account of the poor labourer in the city here who was unable to see that circus on any week day. It is a significant fact that the great mass of the labourers on whose behalf this argument is put forth are themselves opposed to the opening of the fair. If it were opened it would have the effect of depriving 30,000 employees in the exposition itself of their Sunday rest. It would have the further effect of depriving of their Sunday rest some 35,000 or 40,000 employees of the various street railway lines and elevated railway lines, and of the 100 railway lines centring in Chicago. The effect of the opening of the fair on Sunday would be to pour excursion trains into the city from about 100 railway lines. It is unnecessary to say that the people who would patronize these Sunday excursions would be of a class to make the fair not a very desirable place to be frequented by the decent and better ordered of society. I have an extract here with regard to the character of Sunday excursions at Pittsburg, which is a photograph of the character of almost all such excursions. The Pittsburg "Commercial Gazette," speaking of a Sunday excursion, such as the Sunday opening of the World's Fair would multiply beyond all precedent, says:

Think of several hundred men, women and boys, for the most part belonging to the classes who have least regard for the rights of others or the restraints of the law, gathered together in a promiscuous assembly, and seemingly let loose to follow their evil bent: Many of the men and boys had supplied themselves with flasks of liquor, and when their destination had been reached and the time came for indulging in "the dance," it is not surprising that the climax of disorder and indecency should be reached. In addition to other demoralising scenes there was cheating and gambling.

That is a fair picture of the character of a Sunday excursion. Sometimes they are rather worse, sometimes rather better; but if 100 excursions of this kind were let loose in Chicago every Sabbath day from 100 different railways, the character of the Columbia Exhibition would be such as would not make it attractive to Christian people in this country, or in any other. I stand here upon the floor of Parliament in my capacity as a representative of the people, to urge upon the Government that the example set by the Dominion of Canada in this respect should be a good one, and that we should wash our hands from all the evils which would be the result of the Sunday opening of the Columbia Exhibition. It may be said that we have nothing to do with religion here. That is very true, Mr. Speaker. We are not called upon to enact that a man shall be religious; we are not called upon to enact that he should attend church; we are not called upon to enact what his religious faith should be. That is entirely beyond our province; but we may legitimately be called upon to say: that if a man is a religious man, or if he has conscientious or religious scruples he shall be allowed to exercise his religious rights upon the Lord's Day, and that he shall not be deprived by any action of ours of his opportunity or privilege to attend church. It is for the purpose of securing civil rights, not for the purpose of dictating what a man's religious belief shall be, or in what manner he shall spend the Lord's Day ; but it is for the purpose of protecting the civil and religious rights of the 30,000 employees of the exhibition, and of the labourers and employees of the various railway lines who desire to have the Sunday rest, that action of this kind may be justified. It is a fact, Sir, that although we cannot provide what a man's religion shall be, and that we are unable and not called upon to legislate as to what religious observances there should be, yet, by the fact that we profess to be a Christian nation we are restrained from any action that would be contrary to the provisions and requirements of the higher law. We cannot go to work and deliberately set at naught the provisions of the first commandment, or of the second commandment, or of the third commandment, or of the fourth commandment, or of any one of the ten commandments. It does not rest upon us as a Christian state to do it. We have not, properly speaking, the power to do it, and we should withhold our sanction from any attempt to set at naught or override any one of these commandments—the fourth included among the number. Now, Mr. Speaker, the tendency of the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday will be, not to benefit the labourer, but to enthrall him. The first effect would be, upon the multitude of labourers who are connected with the exhibition itself, upon the additional multitude who are called upon to act as brakemen and conductors and engineers and firemen, and in various other capacities as railway employees on transportation lines. To deprive all these men of their Sunday rest is to insert the thin end of the wedge, and it sets an example of depriving others. I have an extract here from Horace Greeley, descriptive of the effect of Sunday labour in Geneva, which would bear very pertinently upon this point of the question. Mr. Greeley, it may be borne in mind, was not a Puritan ; he was not a religious bigot ; he belonged to that society known as Universalists ; he was a man of very broad and liberal views, and his views in regard to Sunday observance were dictated solely by civil considerations, and considerations as to the effect it produced upon society. He spoke as to its effect upon the civil rights of man and upon the material development and well-being of nations. This letter was written many years ago ; it is descriptive of the condition of things in Geneva, Switzerland, and Mr. Greeley says :

I wish you might stand an hour with me on Sunday morning in the labour market in Geneva, and see the troops of dull, tired, saddened-looking labourers in ragged blouses, unwashed from the grime and sweat of one week's work of seven days, trudging off sluggishly and wearily, like dumb, driven cattle, to the work of the next week of seven days. "Are these slaves?" you ask. Slaves? Bless you, no. These are free men. These are voters and citizens in a land of universal suffrage, under the freest Government on earth, with an advanced and liberal constitution of the latest French invention, and with all the modern improvements. No blue laws here. They once had blue laws in Geneva, but they have laughed them down long ago. This, which you see, is liberty, complete, untrammelled, personal liberty. Every one of these free citizens has a right, a proud, irrevocable right to work on Sunday if he chooses, and that is what it ends in for him, and that is what it will end in for you if you choose to make the costly experiment. The workingman who may work on Sunday has got to work on Sunday when work is wanted. The right to rest for each depends upon the law of rest for all. Think of it, think of it twice, think of it again, then say if you will barter away your birth-right, the American Sabbath, the universal privilege of rich and poor, for this miserable French delusion, this continental holiday through which one-half of the people have to toil that the other half may frolic.

This puts the case pertinently and forcibly, and it is for the reasons set forth in Mr. Greeley's letter, an extract of which I have read, that the labourer instinctively realizes that, if he consents to the demand to deprive any fellow-labourer of his Sunday rest, he is inserting the entering wedge and that the recoil may be upon himself next, and he may be called upon to submit to the same treatment which he has meted out to others. For that reason the feeling against the Sunday opening of the Chicago Exposition is almost a universal one among labourers. Some gentleman was kind enough to send me a few days ago a copy of the Chicago "Herald" containing a report of a speech by the Rev. L. C. Randolph, a Seventh Day Baptist, who takes the ground that the Fair should be opened on the Lord's Day. He says he advocates this in order to protect the weak against oppression and wrong. It is to protect the weak against oppression and wrong that the demand is made that the fair shall not be opened on the Lord's Day. It is to protect the 30,000 people engaged on the fair grounds ; it is to protect the labourers engaged in transporting people to and from Chicago ; it is to protect in their religious rights every man, woman and child whose labours shall be demanded if the fair is opened on the Lord's Day. This gentleman further says that we have no right to adopt a principle that will work injustice to any class of people. Sir, that is true, and it is another reason why the closing of the fair is demanded—because the opening of that fair and the deprivation of thousands of people of their Sunday rest is a wrong done to these people. It is purely on civil and material grounds, entirely distinct from religious ideas and observances, that I base my motion asking that we as a country shall place ourselves in antagonism to the demand that is made, and made with such promise of success, that the Chicago exposition shall be opened on the Lord's Day. I do not need to say that there is no question as to the state of Christian sentiment in Canada upon this matter. There is no question either as to the state of Christian sentiment in the United States. So deep is the feeling, so keen is the sense of importance of the question, that it is evident—nay, it is certain—that tens of thousands, possibly hundreds of thousands of Christian people will refuse to patronize the fair or countenance it or visit it if it is opened on the Lord's Day; and we as a people certainly do not want to place ourselves in a position to invite and sanction a violation of the fourth commandment. We have as a people a long record, extending away back for a thousand years and more, as a Sabbath-observing people. The British people before the days of Cromwell imbibed the opinion that they were the chosen people of God. It may have been a very ridiculous impression, but it led to a strict, a Puritanical observance of the Sabbath. Whether they were the chosen people of God or not, they have experienced the truth of that promise that in keeping His commandments, there is great reward; and if the heritage of Jacob, promised to the Jews was ever received by a race, it has been received by the Anglo-Saxon race. Through all the course of English history, and all the course of English colonial history, we find that that race has paid respect to the Sabbath. Great Britain, in its ordinances, has asserted that it is a Christian nation, and upon the very coins of the realm the sovereign is named, "Sovereign by the grace of God." There has never been an exposition opened in England on the Lord's Day; there has never been an exposition opened in England's colonies on the Lord's Day; there has never been, up to this time, an exposition opened in the United States on the Lord's Day. When the French exposition was held, the exhibits of England, the exhibits of America, the exhibits of Canada, the exhibits of all the British colonies were closed.

Mr. AMYOT. I beg pardon. I think you are mistaken. I think that in Paris we saw the products of all the countries of the world on Sunday, as well as on any other day of the week.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not withdraw my statement. I know that the American exhibits were closed. I have read the correspondence between Mr. Atterbury, the president of the Sunday Observance League, of New York, and the late Secretary Blaine on that subject. I know that the British exhibits and the Canadian exhibits were closed; as to the other colonies I will not answer, but I presume that they were closed also. There was an object lesson to all nations of the world. If an inquiry should be made on the part of a German or a Russian, why the exhibits of these great nations were closed on that day, the answer would be, because Great Britain and America believed in paying national respect and national recognition to the claims of the Christian Sabbath. There was an object lesson of the most powerful character. We, as a people, have never yet transgressed or falsified that declaration, and it will be done for the first time if it is done during the coming summer in the case of the Chicago exposition. I do not say that it will be done; but there is a danger of its being done, and I wish to see the Dominion of Canada wash its hands of all complicity in that transaction. I wish to see the Canadian portion of the exposition closed on the Lord's Day, whether the United States portion is opened or not, for the sake of the influence which such an act would have upon our own people, and because it would be in accordance with our conscientious convictions as a people. Now, the hon. Minister of Justice was kind enough last session to express himself as favourable to this proposition. He acknowledged that it was quite in consonance with precedents, both in Canada and in Great Britain, and that it would be the natural course for us to take. But he added—I was not quite satisfied with his position then, and I am still less satisfied now:

I shall ask the House, however, not to adopt the motion as pledging the Government to any particular course, for this reason; that while that was the disposition of the Government, there may be considerations which would prevent its being carried out, and those considerations we are not yet aware of. Our exhibits will be, to a great extent, under the control of the managing authorities of the exhibition, and our exhibits are, I believe, to be in the main building, and we must conform ourselves to such regulations as we find imperative in that country to which our exhibits are sent, and in which the exhibition is being conducted.

Now, I can conceive of no circumstances under which we should be obliged to conform ourselves to the regulations that they might provide, and violate our conscientious scruples, reverse our national record, and disgrace our country by opening our exhibit on the Lord's Day. There is no reason why it should be done. The country does not want to place itself in a position where it can be done. I do not want to leave in the hands of the Government the power or authority of deciding this matter at all. I desire to have an expression from the Parliament of Canada as to what, in the opinion of the representatives of the people, this Government should do. I do not want this House to utter any uncertain sound. I do not want this country to take a position antagonistic to British or Canadian records or to the requirements of divine law. For that reason I have brought this question up on this occasion. We are bound to consider the question for ourselves, independently of the action of the United States; and we are not, as the Minister of Justice said last year, to be governed by their action in the matter. I presume that a good many people take very little interest in this question. I presume that I might secure more interest in it before some other audience than I am able to secure before this House; but there is not an hon. gentleman present who does not represent a constituency having a majority of Christian people. I presume there is hardly any hon. gentleman present who would care to place himself upon record as being in favour of Sunday desecration, or of lowering the record of Canada in this matter. I believe it would be inconsistent with our past if we were to make an exception of this Chicago exhibition in the matter of Sunday observance; and, instead of lowering our record, or changing our principles, I think we ought to reaffirm them. I shall be proud of Canada if, during the coming summer, our part of the exhibition were closed, even although the American authorities should decide to throw the fair open on the Lord's Day. If we close our exhibit, as I believe Great Britain will hers, we will be making a practical protest against what we believe to be a desecration of the Lord's Day, and will be taking a firm stand in vindicating the reverence of our people for their Christian teachings.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to add a few words to what has been said by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). That hon. gentleman has taken largely the points and notes I had made on this important question, so that I shall not detain the House by referring to them at any length. I simply wish to endorse, to the fullest extent, the views he has expressed. I think it would be a national disgrace if we were to countenance the desecration of the Lord's Day in the United States by keeping our exhibition open. Canada has a very respectable record in this matter which we should not allow to be broken. If there is any one thing to-day which is a standing reproach to the United States, it is their desecration of the Lord's Day, and if there is any one thing that we should appreciate more than another it is the sacredness of that day. The Christian communities belonging to the different denominations throughout this country are watching, with close and attentive eyes, the action of this House. All the ministers of the different denominations are strongly in favour of this House declaring that our portion of the exhibition shall not be open on the Lord's Day. I shall not detain the House. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has anticipated almost every argument that could be made in favour of his motion. There is not a nation in the world where the sacredness of the Lord's Day is openly violated, in which the labouring classes do not suffer. It is a positive fact, well established by extended investigation, that wherever labour is compelled to work seven days in the week, the violation of the Lord's Day tends to pauperize rather than enrich. We know of instances where men, when compelled to work on the Lord's Day, have had their wages reduced, so that they did not earn more in seven days than they did formerly in the six days. Any number of instances can be adduced to prove that nations which have openly disregarded the divine obligation of resting on the seventh day have become demoralized, and the classes which suffer the most are the labouring classes. At this stage of our existence, we, as a nation, ought not to permit our creditable record to be broken in this matter, and if we do not, our action cannot fail to have a beneficial effect. People passing through the fair may have their attention drawn to the fact that the Canadian exhibit is closed on the Lord's Day, and when they ask the reason, the answer, no doubt, will be that the people of Canada so respect that day as to refuse to allow their exhibit to be open upon it. That will prove to the Christian world that in Canada, at least, there is one feature of our people which deserves respect, and that is our observance of the Lord's Day. I hope that this House will give expression to its views on this question, and show to the world at large that we, as one of the dependencies of the British Empire, are bound to follow the noble example set us by the mother country in this respect.

Mr. AMYOT. I do not intend to give a final or decisive opinion upon the best way of observing the Lord's Day. I do not think that is within my province. I have not been sent here for that. I have been sent here to study the fiscal condition of the country and to pass criminal laws, but not to define the Divine laws. I will observe, first, that my hon. friend who has just spoken, speaks of the seventh day of the week. I think he is mistaken. Sunday is the first day of the week. Well, we must settle that point first.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, by saying "the seventh day," I meant that we should labour six days and that we should set aside or keep sacred the seventh.

Mr. AMYOT. I am glad that my hon. friend admits with me that Sunday is the first day of the week. But I thought God rested on the seventh day of the week, and I ask myself by what right this Parliament shall substitute another than the day fixed by God. I would ask the hon. gentleman to give me his authority. The Jews, who are very numerous on this continent, have always kept the seventh day. By what right should we impose our views upon these people? I do not pretend that we are wrong in taking that day; I do not discuss the question, but I ask of such religious men as the two hon. members who have spoken before me, where is their authority to substitute another day for the day chosen by God himself? These hon. gentlemen want to bring into discussion here a religious question; they want to be, not only schoolmasters, but pastors of souls. They want to legislate us into heaven. Well and good, but they must convince us first, because between God and man there is only conviction. I want the hon. gentleman to tell us by what authority they substitute the first day for the seventh day designed by God as the Sabbath? So long as they do not satisfy us upon this point they cannot expect us to insult God and take another day than the one he has selected himself. Mr. Speaker, it has been said by the hon. member that it is a standing reproach to the United States to open the exhibition on Sunday. I regret these words; they should not be spoken in Parliament or in any assembly representing the people of this country. The representatives of the United States have not been called upon to answer that charge. We make an accusation against that country when its representatives are not here, and in a body such as this, to answer to the charge that that should not be done. It may be done in the press or on the stump, perhaps, but hon. gentlemen should not use the responsibility of membership of this House to give weight to such accusations against a friendly country. Now, we want to use the exhibition to benefit the Canadian people. We have the advantage of having a large space there and our agricultural and manufacturing products, minerals and so on will be exhibited there. We received the hospitality of the United States, and yet these hon. gentlemen, on receiving that hospitality, would dictate to the United States laws of hospitality. They receive the benefit of the kindness of their hosts only to insult those hosts. I think that is not fair between one nation and another. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are thousands, I may say millions, of people who feel that they may go on Sunday to view the wonders that will be on exhibition in Chicago, without offending God. Why should the majority impose their views upon that minority, if minority they be? And I am opposed to that. I say, without expressing my own opinion upon the other point, that millions of people who are to be at the exhibition will think that they may in conscience go either in the morning or the afternoon or the evening to look at these pictures, these machines (which will not be working on Sunday), these wonders of modern science, without offending God, just as we look on Sundays at the brilliant sun or the shining moon, which tell us that there is above us a power greater than themselves, the attainment of whose presence and favour should be the constant effort of men. Should not the hon. mover and seconder of the resolution have more pity for the thousands upon thousands of working men for whom Sunday will be the only opportunity of seeing the wonders of the exposition? Is it not too oppressive for the hon. gentlemen to try to prevent these workingmen from enjoying the exhibition? The hon. gentleman thinks it wrong to go to the exhibition on Sunday. Then let him stay at home. But the millions who think it is not wrong, let them go. They do not trouble the hon. gentleman's rest or his worship; they do not trouble him in any way. Let them go if they like. I am in favour of liberty for every one if that liberty does not encroach upon the liberty of others. Now, my hon. friends say that there are some employees in that exhibition who would like to rest on Sunday. He may be sure of one thing, that the chief officers there, whether they are from the United States or Canada or elsewhere, will have heart and conscience enough to see to it that the employees will be so treated that every one will be able to earn his living without injuring his health or doing violence to his conscience. I do not express my own opinion; I do not feel called upon to give a personal opinion; but I say this Parliament should not try to dictate to the United States the laws of hospitality and should not try to prevent the poor working classes from enjoying the exhibition. We should mind our own business, and leave every one else free to do the same. There was an American once who got rich by minding his own business, and if this Parliament will mind its own business more closely it will have enough to do, and its interests might be better served.

Mr. BECHARD. It is most edifying to see gentlemen in this House so pious as to be able to preach to their fellow-countrymen upon the observance of the Lord's Day. Since these hon. gentlemen feel so keenly upon the observance of the Lord's Day, even on an occasion when they might be excused did they feel an absence of responsibility, surely their charity and sense of justice will lead them to respect the rights of the minority in different provinces of this country, and to have great regard for the maintenance of those rights.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). I do not think this question calls for any decision on the part of the House at the present time. While I may be charged, owing to the remarks I may make, with being a Sabbath desecrator, yet what I urge I urge for the welfare of the country generally. It is an old saying, and a true one, that when you are in Rome you should do as the Romans do, and if we have an exhibit there it will be no harm for us to do what the other nations do there. I have been in foreign cities, and I have been in museums, art galleries and places of that character, on Sunday, and I could not see that any harm came to the people who attended them. I have also been in Chicago on Sunday, and one of the pleasantest afternoons I ever passed was spent in visiting the new art gallery there, which was attended by as respectable a class of people as I ever met in any city. The hon. gentleman says that he has moved this motion in the interest of the workingmen. Now, I have the interest of the workingmen as much at heart as he has, and there is only one way, in my opinion, by which we can protect the interest of the workingmen in regard to Sunday labour. We must admit that the complexities of civilization are such that there must be more and more Sunday labour as time goes on; we cannot get rid of that; and that being the case, we ought to try and make necessary provision for it, and the only provision which will protect the workman is one which will procure to every man one day of rest out of seven. It will require a law to do that, and if the hon. gentleman will introduce a Bill into this House providing that every man shall have a right to at least one day's rest out of seven, I will support it. But, as a matter of fact, these men do not work seven days in a week. All these street car men, and railway men, and men engaged in similar work, are treated by their employer on the same principle as their street car horses are treated—that is, they work only so many hours a week because the employer cannot afford to overwork them; and when Sunday necessity requires he increases his staff by one-sixth, and in that way one-seventh of the men are off every day, and none of them are obliged to work seven days a week. No doubt it does happen in many European cities that men have to work seven days in a week, but we can prevent that in our country by adopting a law that no man shall be compelled to work more than six days in seven. Now, we had this Sunday question up in Toronto, the city from which I hail, and over a year ago a petition was presented to the City Council, asking that Sunday street cars be given to the people. Ten thousand voters of that city voted for Sunday street cars, against fourteen thousand, and I venture to say that when the question comes before the people again, we will have Sunday cars in Toronto. We will have them both in the interest of the general public, and in the interest of Sabbath observance, because if there are street cars on Sunday, people will go to church in larger numbers. The proof that Sunday street cars will promote Sabbath observance is seen in the fact that the Anglican Bishop of Toronto, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Toronto, and several members of the clergy, voted in favour of the Sunday street cars. The hon. gentleman who moved this motion told the House that Chicago, with a hundred excursions pouring into it on Sunday, would be a scene of Pandemonium, almost a Sodom and Gomorrah. But what do the Chicago people themselves say? They say that unless you allow the exhibition to be opened on Sunday, the immense number of visitors who will be there, will go to the saloons and beer gardens, which will exert a far more demoralizing influence upon them than going to the exhibition. Now, I shall not go any further into this discussion, especially as I know that by taking this course I shall run the risk of being considered up west as a Sunday desecrator. I think we had better not pronounce on this question at present, but leave it in abeyance; and if the Government find eventually that the mother country and the other British colonies insist on their exhibits being closed on Sunday, we may follow suit. But on the general principle, as I have said, that when we are in Rome we ought to do as the Romans do, I think we ought not to form an exception to the general practice that will be followed in Chicago.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I do not think the question is one of Sunday observance with reference to street cars, but it is one with reference to exhibitions: and as we are to take part in a World's Fair at Chicago, taking there Canadian goods and Canadian manufactures, I think we should at the same time take something of our Canadian character. We can at least show to the people of the United States that one of the salient characteristics of Canadians is a proper observance of the Sabbath Day. I would be more in accord with this resolution if it read in this way:

That in the opinion of this House the Canadian department of the Columbian Exhibition should be closed on Sunday, in accordance with our own custom, and in accordance with British example, etc.

It is not our custom in Canada, at all events, so far as I am aware, to keep exhibitions open on Sunday; but it is rather our custom to keep them closed on Sunday. If we are going to make a fair exhibition of Canadian goods and Canadian character in the United States, we should not go there to do as the Romans do; if we did entirely as the Romans do, we should follow their manufactures also, and as we will not follow them in that direction, we should not follow them in adopting their characteristics, but we should endeavour to show prominently the Canadian character at the World's Fair. Now, the hon. gentleman who last spoke said that if the Canadian department was closed on Sunday, the people would rush into beer gardens. Are there not churches in Chicago, and cannot people go to church as well as to beer gardens? I am not very often in the same boat with the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), but on this resolution I sympathize with them, although I can imagine certain circumstances in which it might be judicious and, perhaps, expedient, to keep the exhibition open on Sunday. I think this matter should be left largely in the hands of the Government to do as they may deem best. In the main, however, I am in accord with this resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House votes upon the question I would like to say a word or two upon the resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Whilst not disagreeing with him in general on the principle of keeping one day in the week as a day of rest, and a day for becoming religious exercises and worship, I think at the same time there are certain practical considerations arising out of this motion which the House would do well to weigh before pronouncing decidedly upon the question. The hon. gentleman has dealt with it as a protest against what he considers unnecessary labour upon the Sabbath Day, and as a presentment of the Anglo-Saxon and Canadian character at the exhibition, as being in the line of precedents in the history of our own Canadian civilization and of Anglo-Saxon civilization. That is one point from which he has viewed it. He has also looked at it from a practical standpoint, and he urges that this resolution should be passed in the interest of the many thousands of labourers who will be employed at the exhibition, the many thousands of labourers who will be employed upon railways, the many thousands of labourers who will be employed in various ways in connection with travel, and who will have to work upon the Sabbath day while the exhibition is in progress. Well, Sir, we must, in the first place, recollect that we are not the managers of this exhibition. First and foremost, this exhibition is held under the auspices of the United States of America, through a commission which has been appointed by their Congress, and the nations are invited by the United States to exhibit their wares, and their goods, and to show their progress in various ways. So, as to whether the exhibition shall be closed or shall not be closed on Sunday, depends entirely on the United States of America. It may very well be, that certain exhibitors, individual countries, will come to a conclusion diverse from that which may be come to by the United States. That will not affect, however, the conduct of the United States in regard to the exhibition remaining open on the Sabbath Day. So, if the United States commissioners come to the conclusion that the exhibition is to be kept open on the Sabbath Day, almost all the labourers will be kept at work, the trains will be run, the hands that man those trains will be employed, and labour will go on, whether we protest or not, just the same as if we protested, and, in the language of the hon. gentleman's motion, closed the Canadian department, though as to that I shall have a word to say a little later. So that, as regards the practical side of the hon. gentleman's motion, it is really of no value. If the United States commissioners come to the conclusion that the exhibition shall be closed, this question with respect to the saving of labour and rest to the labouring man on that day, will be solved in the way the hon. gentleman wishes. If they come to the conclusion, however, to keep the exhibition open on Sunday, the amount of labour employed and the work done will be within a fraction of the same, whether we make a protest and close our department or not. I am arguing this simply on one side, and a very important side, of the hon. gentleman's motion, because he based a very strong argument, from his point of view, on the right of the working-man to have the Sabbath Day, this seventh day's rest. Well, outside of that, I think there is something to be said in favour of the view of having the exhibition open on

MR. FOSTER.

Sunday, something to be said by Christian people, something to be said by philanthropists as straightforward in motive and honest in heart as either of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken to this motion, and I am not impugning their honesty of heart or goodness of motive. The very same spirit which in London and other cities of Protestant Great Britain opens the galleries of art and painting on the Sabbath Day and swings back the doors of the Museums, in order to give the man who works from early morn to night, six days in the week, a chance to go in on the Sabbath Day with his family and view the grand works, the creations of art and science, and behold in concentrated form the representation of the world's life, the world's history and the world's progress—that same spirit is abroad in this country, as well. And I would not for one moment care to place my opinion against those, in a philanthropic and Christian sense, for after all, it is the man who makes his own temple in which to worship God; it is the man's heart which will be judged, as between him and his Creator, and not the letter of the law and the enactments on a Statute-book; and a man can go and look upon the beauties of nature outside of the city, he can go and look upon the beauties of art in the museum, and his soul can be lifted up to God in an expression of trust and recognition of His divine power, just as well as it can be under the roof of the finest cathedral or the lowliest meeting-house in the world. So this must be taken into account, and we must allow a certain amount of freedom to men, a certain amount of tolerance to the opinion of men, with respect to this matter. I am here yielding not one iota in my reverence for the Sabbath Day and for the worship of God and for the keeping of our religious ordinances, to the hon. gentlemen opposite, and yet not daring to take the stand, that I have any right to forbid a man to go out into the broad fields of nature on the Sabbath Day and worship his God there, if he wishes to do so, and if his mind calls him to worship in that direction. So, there is something in the argument, an argument that is to-day being advanced by some of the noblest divines in the United States and some of the devoutest hearts, that if this exhibition is open, with its wealth of accomplished results of progress, its triumphs of art, and all that tends towards the greatness of the race and the continued progress made by that race in the arts and sciences, if that be open on the Sabbath Day in the heart of Chicago, how many hundreds of thousands of people may be drawn to that exhibition and elevated and benefited, who otherwise, without the exhibition being open, might be frequenting places which tended to demoralization, instead of elevation. I am not disposed to say there is not a strong argument in that, and I wish to give expression to that idea, in noticing what the hon. gentleman said in regard to his motion. Let us go a little further towards the practical side of this matter. The hon. gentleman wishes that the Canadian department should be closed on the Sabbath. What is the Canadian department? The only Canadian department I can think of is the building which the Dominion of Canada will own and which the provinces together with her will own and utilize. I am entirely in favour of closing that building on the Sabbath Day. I am entirely in favour of having a complete day of rest, so far as that building and our employees are concerned, but that does not touch our exhibits, for the different exhibits of Canada are spread everywhere throughout the exhibition building, in that general group of buildings in Chicago. Our manufactures are along with the manufactures of other countries, they are in the same building; one of our sections is alongside another section of manufactures, and so on, throughout the whole range. Our agricultural products and every one of our other products are not complete by themselves, are not gathered in the Canadian department and in a Canadian group, but they are there in separate divisions, scattered all through the exhibition. What shall we do? We cannot close the exhibition—that is impossible—and the only thing we could possibly do, would be to draw a flag over or drape every small section of the Canadian exhibit which finds its place here and there throughout the exhibition. We could do that; we could thus make a protest. In this way we could make a protest, that we believed in not having our exhibit looked at on the Sabbath Day, in having no labour employed on the Sabbath; but the whole labour of carrying on the exhibition, provided the United States commissioners conclude that it shall be open on the Sabbath, would go on just the same, whether our sections here or there were draped and had no activity or motion about them, or whether they were not. So much with regard to that matter, viewed from the various points that present themselves. If we had all the Canadian exhibits in one building, under one roof, where we could have complete control of them, what the hon. gentleman desires might be brought about. As it is now, it is impossible of ourselves to bring that about. I have said already, that I believe the Canadian department and building should be closed on the Sabbath Day. If the United States commissioners who have charge of the exposition, come to the conclusion that it is best to close the whole exhibition on the Sabbath. I would not have one word to say against it, but, on the whole, I would feel that they had done a wise act, taking the balance of the argument and looking at both sides of the question. What Great Britain may do in regard to this matter, I do not know; and I think the position we ought to take is, not to bind our hands hard and fast by a resolution passed in this House, but we should leave this matter in the hands of the Government, who are as solicitous for the observance, the proper observance, for all possible observance of the Sabbath Day at Chicago, as are any other persons in Canada, and who will give due weight to the opinion of the people of Canada with reference to this matter. I may say further than this, that Canada would be very glad indeed to follow the example that Great Britain may set in this respect in regard to that exhibition, and she can do that with more facility and with greater practical result, because the English and Colonial exhibit, as I understand it, will be more nearly massed together than the exhibits of the other countries. So that whilst agreeing that, as a Canadian people and as an Anglo-Saxon civilization, we ought to be just as careful of our religious life, just as careful of all proper Sabbath observance, just as careful of the good name and the sanctity of the Canadian Sabbath, which counts much for our people, and which counts as well in the nurture and bringing up of our people, I yet think that in this respect, taking all the circumstances into account, it is just as well for us to watch the trend of events, and leave this matter in the hands of the Government with this assurance: That so far as they can possibly abridge work on the Sabbath Day, and so far as they can possibly, in accordance with Great Britain in the carrying out of the exposition, make the Sabbath a proper Sabbath Day, going even so far as to say that if Great Britain, as she has done on former occasions, closed her exhibits, that we would gladly follow in her wake. I think with these statements, that it would be well for the hon. gentleman not to press his resolution to a vote, but to leave it in that way. I believe from what I heard the hon. gentleman state that that is much the policy that was adopted by the leader of the Government when he was here last year. I have not read the whole of the debate through, and I do not know how far it went, but from the extract which he read I should judge that was the policy which the House thought was best last year, and I should think that that would be the better policy for us to pursue for the coming summer.

Mr. SCRIVER. Mr. Speaker, before this motion is submitted to the House I desire to say a word or two. I listened with a little surprise, I must say, to the very eloquent words of the hon. Minister of Finance upon this question, for while they were eloquent and while they presented a very forcible view of the Sabbath question, I was surprised to hear him ignore certain principles which I think all evangelical denominations hold in this regard. I was surprised to hear him take a position which would seem to substitute the cultivation of our esthetic and artistic for our religious nature, and I was surprised to hear him take a position which seemed to me to ignore the duty which is incumbent upon all members of Christian denominations to meet for public worship. Carried out to its legitimate extent, I think the hon. gentleman's views would obviate the necessity of common Christian worship in buildings devoted entirely, consecrated I may say, to the worship of God. If a man can fully cultivate his religious nature in viewing works of art or in viewing the beauties of nature, what necessity would there be for men assembling themselves together to worship God in buildings devoted to that purpose, and under circumstances and with surroundings peculiarly calculated to call upon their religious nature and to enlarge it and to strengthen it. I have heard that the hon. Minister of Finance, at one time in his career, filled with great acceptance and power some of the pulpits of the land. I wonder if he ever preached a doctrine of that kind to his people. I can hardly believe that he did. I do not propose to say anything more on this point. I desire to say a word with reference to what fell from my hon. friend on my left (Mr. Amyot) as to the divergence of opinion that might exist as to what particular day the Christian Sabbath should be observed as. I am surprised that he, a man brought up, I have no doubt, under Christian teaching, should seem to be ignorant of the reasons which have led to the adoption, by most Christian people, of the first day instead of the seventh day as the Sabbath. I do not think it is necessary in an assembly of this kind, to refer to these reasons, and I do not think it necessary that we should enter into any theological discussion with regard to this matter; but I am sure the hon. gentleman is not ignorant of what his own church teaches in this respect, and I am quite as confident that he is ready to bow to the decision and to the mandate of that church. With regard to the question before the House it seems to me not so much a question of expediency as a question of principle. It seems to me that it is a duty incumbent upon us as Canadians, professing to believe in a common God and a common christianity, not to let our position in regard to this matter be mistaken. There may be some practical difficulties—I see that there are by what has been suggested by the hon. Minister of Finance—as to the carrying out in its entirety of such a resolution as has been submitted to the House. I am glad to hear him say that he is in favour of, and I take it from that that he will do all in his powers to insure, the closing up of the Canadian building proper on the Sabbath. Whether it would be practicable, in the event of our coming to a determination in the spirit of this resolution to close all the Canadian exhibits on the Sabbath Day or not, I do not know. I suppose, from what the hon. Minister says, that in the distribution of these various exhibits, there might be some practical difficulty; but I think the passage of such a resolution as that submitted by my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) would have a good effect, specially if it were coupled with similar action on the part of the mother country, it would, I dare say, have its effect upon the decision which might be come to, as to the opening of the exhibition on the Sabbath Day at all. At all events I think our own position should not be misunderstood in regard to this question, and for myself I am prepared heartily to vote for the resolution.

Mr. CHRISTIE. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say but just a single word on this question. I simply wish to state that I am in perfect sympathy with the resolution. I do think it would be most unfortunate if we were to show to the nations of the world that we, as a country, disregard the sanctity of the Sabbath Day and trample it under foot. Let others do as they may, I do trust that we Canadians shall show that we are a Sabbath-keeping people.

Mr. DALY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at the action taken by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior to attempt to prevent the House from expressing an opinion upon this question. The action of the hon. gentleman is equivalent to saying that he is not in favour of what is demanded by the Christian sentiment of this country, and he has not the courage to meet that sentiment openly, but adopts a parliamentary expedient to shunt the issue. Now, Sir, I shall hold, and every Christian man in this country who investigates the matter will hold, that a vote in favour of the hon. gentleman's motion to adjourn this debate will be a vote in favour of opening the Columbia Exposition on the Lord's Day, and a vote against the motion that I have proposed; and we may as well meet the issue on that motion as on the main motion, because there is intelligence enough in the country to understand what the issue is, and what the course of the Government, represented by the hon. Minister of the Interior, is. I like to see a manly, honest, courageous course on any question; but I despise a sneaking course. This course, I characterize as cowardly—a cowardly expedient—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CHARLTON. If I am out of order—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman must realize, from his long parliamentary experience, that his language is not parliamentary.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think, perhaps, it was slightly unparliamentary, Mr. Speaker. I will define what I mean by a saying that it is not a proper way of meeting an issue—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman ought to withdraw the expression.

Mr. CHARLTON. Oh, certainly. In the heat of debate we often make use of words that are not parliamentary, and I withdraw it, and I will substitute something else, if you will permit me. I wish to say a few words in regard to the position taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, because I hold that the question which we have upon the amendment is the direct question, and those who vote for the amendment, vote for the opening of the exposition on the Lord's Day. The hon. Minister of Finance tells us that we are not the managers of the exhibition. We are not. We are not our brothers' keepers in any sense, but we are the keepers of our own honour; we are responsible for our own action; so far as we can govern our own action; and if the managers of the exposition decide that it shall be opened on the Lord's Day, it is a question for us to consider whether that decision is correct or not—whether it is in accordance with our principle, our record or our history, or a decision that the people of Canada will sanction; and if we decide that, in our estimation, the managers of the exposition are wrong, then we are not bound by their action. Sir, did the managers of the British exhibit, or the managers of the American exhibit at Paris hold themselves bound by the action of the managers of the Paris Exposition? Not at all. If the managers of the Paris Exposition decided that it should be opened on the Lord's Day, the managers of the British, and the managers of the American exhibit decided that they would not concur in that action—

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Will the hon. gentleman tell us—

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish the hon. gentleman to keep his seat. If the managers of the Columbia Exposition decide that it shall be opened on the Lord's Day, we are not any more bound by their decision than the British or American authorities were bound by the decision of the managers of the Paris Exposition. On the contrary, we have British and American precedent to govern us in standing up for Christian freedom and Christian right, and for refusing complicity in an act which we condemn, and which the Christian people of this country will condemn. The hon. gentleman says that if the exhibit is kept open on the Lord's Day, our course will make no appreciable difference in the amount of labour that will be performed. That may be. It may be very little difference to the managers of that exposition or to those whose rights are trampled upon. But we shall be able to say that we are not guilty of complicity in the action of the Chicago authorities in opening the exposition, that we have entered our protest, and that as far as we could set the matter right we have done so. Whether our country is little or great, we shall have done what is right, we shall have stood by our principles, and we shall have had the approval of our own consciences, and the approval of the Christian conscience of this country. The hon. gentleman goes on to say that a good deal may be said in favour of opening. I know that a good deal may be said in favour of opening, a good deal is said in favour of opening, by those who do not believe in being restrained by Christian principles or Christian usages. A good deal is said in favour of opening the fair by the Anarchists, by the socialists, by the infidels, by all the representatives of the worst social elements in the United States. There is not a demon that fell from heaven that is not in favour of opening that fair on the Lord's Day. Yes, a good deal may be said in favour of opening the fair more honestly and more plainly than has been said by the Finance Minister. But what he has said sufficiently indicates that he is not as sound on this question as he once was, and that he is not in sympathy with the pronounced Christian sentiment of this country. Talk about opening fairs, picture galleries and museums; but such talk does not command British sympathy. The attempt has been made on three separate occasions to bring about the opening of the British Museum on the Lord's Day, but on every occasion the attempt has been defeated by an overwhelming vote. Not on one occasion has that movement received the aid or the sympathy of the British workingmen, because they realize that if one class of labourers are deprived of their Sunday rest, the next step will be to deprive another, and finally every bulwark which secures to them their Christian rights, and their right to rest on the Lord's Day, will be swept away. The labourer is more interested than any other class in resisting the specious pretense that museums or exhibitions or circuses, or any other kind of entertainment that may minister to public taste legitimately and properly enough on a week day, should be permitted on the Lord's Day, and thereby deprive one class of labourers of their rest in order that another class may enjoy the day, and perhaps have a day's carouse. The hon. gentleman tells us that a man makes his own temple. Yes, a man may make his own temple. He may adopt his own form of worship, and it may be in accordance with the requirements of his God, or it may not. If he sets up his own temple and his own idol, and worships contrary to God's approval and to God's command, it is not what God approves.

Mr. FOSTER. Are you the interpreter of that?

Mr. CHARLTON. No; I am not. I take the law of God. I take the fourth commandment:

Remember the Sabbath Day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labour and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man servant nor thy maid servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath Day and hallowed it.

No, Sir, I will not be the interpreter of this law; I do not pretend to be; I would shrink from being its interpreter. I do not ask the hon. gentleman himself to interpret the law; but there is the law, and its requirements are plain and palpable. These statutes are not repealable. The Christian is bound to obey the law of God, and you are to say that a man is to make his own temple and worship as he likes. There are precepts that he who runs may read; there are laws that he cannot disregard, and that he has no excuse for being ignorant of. To say that a man may make his own temple, that he may worship as he likes, and that he may interpret as he pleases the requirements of the Almighty, is not good theology and it not good logic. The hon. gentleman says: If the exposition is opened on the Lord's Day, many thousands of people will assemble there and be benefited and elevated? If that exposition is opened on the Lord's Day, the railway trains will bear excursions into Chicago over a hundred roads. Christians will tell us that the worst classes of society will go to this fair, we will have pandemonium let loose, and there will be nothing to elevate the better sentiments of the people. The opening of that exhibition on the Lord's Day cannot fail to have a demoralizing and depressing effect on the people of the country at large, and particularly on those who visit Chicago, and there is good reason for the great fear entertained by the Christian people in this matter. I am sorry, therefore, to see the Government occupy a position of quasi hostility to this motion and declare themselves practically in favour of the opening on the Lord's Day by supporting the motion to adjourn. This will be the last day on which this motion can be reached, and the people will understand that the amendment of the Minister of Interior is one intended by the Government to evade facing this question honestly and fairly. We are told that we cannot close the exhibition, that our exhibits will be scattered over the premises in different apartments. I admit that, but we have also had exhibits in the Paris exhibition scattered through the various departments, and yet we have prevented these exhibits from being visited on the Lord's Day. We are not proposing to close the whole exhibition, but only that part over which we have control. That is all we ask. We are asking that a principle be vindicated, as a protest against action in the opposite direction on the part of the United States if it is taken. The Minister of Interior asks us not to tie the hands of the Government, but to leave to its discretion to do as they may think best. Sir, the Canadian people should have a fixed principle in the matter, and they should demand the expression of this House in support of that principle, and that they do not intend to sacrifice it by saying it is a matter of no consequence, let the Government deal with it as they will, having due deference to the sentiments of the people of the other side. Let them close it if they can do so conveniently, but not otherwise. Sir, if we leave this matter to the discretion of the Government, as my hon. friend asks, we will be acknowledging that we do not consider it a vital principle, but are prepared to allow the Government to do the one thing or the other, just as they please, and we will be satisfied with their decision. That will not satisfy me. I bring my motion before this House, because I believe Canada should be true to its traditions, true to the traditions of British polity, true to the principles of Christianity; and whether the United States may adopt our view or any other, that ought not to make any difference in our action. So far as we are concerned, we ought to vindicate our principles by closing our exhibit on the Lord's Day in deference to the Christian sentiment of the country and what we believe to be divine command. This is not a question for politicians to shuffle over or do what they deem most convenient, but it is a vital principle to be upheld or set aside by the Government, and I am sorry, therefore, that this motion to adjourn should have been made. I am sorry to see this desire to shelve this question, and I ask the hon. gentleman who moved this motion to withdraw it and allow the question to be settled fairly on its merits. If the Government are not willing to accept the resolution, let them say so. That would be an honest and proper course for them to adopt.

Now, I feel somewhat warmly on this question, because I believe it is one of vital importance. It pains me to see a great and Christian nation like the United States almost on the verge of abandoning at this day one of its time-honoured principles and of adopting the advice of socialists and anarchists and nihilists, and of following the example of continental peoples. It will pain me still more to see the Dominion of Canada an accessory to that act, and for that reason I will close by saying that the motion of the Minister of Interior is tantamount to a request that this motion be defeated. If the hon. gentleman persists in his motion to adjourn, let the Christian people of Canada understand how it was made, and why it was made, and what will be its effect.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). The hon. gentleman has told us what has been done in England. He has said that it has been a British custom to keep their exhibitions closed, but he has not shown a case where it was thought necessary by the British House of Commons to pass a resolution to that effect and similar to the one now offered.

Why not follow the same principle here and give to our Government the discretion which the British House of Commons has always left with its Government? The hon. gentleman talks of cowardice. Well, we all know something of the cowardice of an hon. gentleman who talks now so glibly about observing the Lord's Day, but who had nothing to say when he was charged in this House with the whistling of his own tug boats on a Sunday. He said, furthermore, that all the respectable and good-living people are in favour of closing the fair, and that it is only the riff-raff who are opposed to that proposition. Well, Sir, Bishop Potter has come out in favour of keeping it open, and so has the cardinal archbishop of Baltimore. Neither has he answered the charge that the day he professes to observe, and which he says the divine law commands us to observe, is not the day he asks us to keep holy, but the Saturday; so that every day of his life he has been violating the Mosaic law and has laid himself deservedly open to the severest punishment for such violation. He has also said that if the exhibition be opened on Sunday, all pandemonium will be let loose. Evidently, therefore, the workmen, of whom he professes to be the great friend, are those who will be let loose, and raise pandemonium. According to him, they are the riff-raff of the country. Now, the hon. gentleman, on most occasions, waxes enthusiastic as an anti-restrictionist; yet, on some questions, he is the greatest restrictionist in the country. He ought to take a little of his own medicine in morals which he applies to trade and show himself less a restrictionist in morals and more of a restrictionist with regard to trade matters.

Mr. GILLMOR. I did not understand the Finance Minister as my hon. friend did. I did not understand him to say that he would substitute a walk in the fields for worship upon Sunday. I do not understand him to say that he would substitute a visit to the British Museum for attendance in a place of worship on Sunday. While I sympathize with the mover of the resolution upon the whole, at the same time I thought he might very consistently have consented to the suggestion made by the Finance Minister. I thought so then, and I think so still. I think there was a good deal in the views suggested by the Finance Minister. He repeatedly said: I prefer that the exhibition should be closed and that the Canadian exhibition should be closed on the Sabbath; that is my opinion and my desire. And he suggested also that that was the desire of the Government. I think the mover of the resolution might fairly have felt that he had discharged his duty to the Christian sentiment of Canada, and consented to the proposal. That is the way it struck me. I have always been taught to observe the Sabbath. I do not think that the question whether it is the seventh or the first day is for us to consider.

We know what the Christian Sabbath is, and we need not discuss the theology of it. I was only speaking of the Finance Minister's speech, and, from beginning to end, I did not hear that he substituted any amusement or employment for the worship in the sanctuary on the Sabbath Day. I know him, and I know that he goes to worship on Sabbath as often as most of us. I say this because I do not think his speech deserves the criticism received in that particular.

Mr. DALY. As the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr Charlton) has seen fit to apply some very unfriendly language—

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he can only speak by the indulgence of the House.

Mr. DALY. With the indulgence of the House, I would like to say a few words. The hon. gentleman has referred to me in very uncharitable language, and has said that I presented the resolution I did from cowardly and sneaking motives.

Mr. MULOCK. That language was withdrawn.

Mr. DALY. It was not; he made a speech of fifteen minutes, but did not withdraw the language. Professing, as the hon. gentleman does, to be a great Christian and moralist, he might extend that Christian charity which I understand should be the leading feature of the Christian's nature, towards me. After the explanation the Minister of Finance has given of the position taken by the Government in this matter, after he has stated, as is the fact, that our wish was that, in accordance with Canadian ideas as to the observance of the Lord's Day, the exhibition should be closed on Sunday, the hon. gentleman might have withdrawn his motion, the more so considering that he had placed upon record in this House and, through the "Hansard," before the country, his position and opinion on this matter. I thought it my duty to the Government and this House to move the adjournment of the debate, and trust sincerely that upon a future occasion when the hon. gentleman chooses to parade his Christian character, as he has done here to-day, he will conduct himself more according to what I think a true Christian should be.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As I understand it, the American Congress came to a decision that it was desirable that the World's Fair should be closed on Sunday. I believe they made their money grant contingent upon that. If they might do so, I fail to see how it could be improper for this House to declare its opinion in this matter. We have voted a large sum of money to enable our producers to make an exhibition at Chicago. I would call the attention of the Finance Minister to this, which is a point, I think he did not fully consider. While that is an exhibition that will be pleasing to the eye as an educational purpose, the main feature of it for Canada and other countries is the opportunity it gives us to gain material advantage in the promotion of trade. The different exhibitors there will have attendants on the various exhibits who will endeavour to make sales to the inhabitants of the various countries that may go there as spectators or to display their wares. As the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) said, this is not a restriction that is not sanctioned by the community, the observance of the Sabbath, the resting from labour, the closing of places of business, but it is a Canadian custom that is universally recognized in this country, and it seems to me to be an official recognition of that fact by this House. To withdraw these exhibits from the public gaze on that day, would be simply declaring to the nations assembled there that while the people of Canada are anxious to do business, they find it is in the interest of the community that on one day in seven they should cease from their ordinary every day labours, carrying on their business on the other six days. That, I think, ought to be taken into consideration in reference to this matter. So far as I have seen, it has not been definitely decided by the World's Fair Commissioners whether the fair shall be open on Sunday or not. And if there was an expression by this House that it was the sentiment of the people of Canada, as I think it is their sentiment, that the exhibition should be closed on the Sabbath, I believe the commissioners would be glad to have such an expression of opinion and it would strengthen the hands of those upon the commission or through the country who are seeking to have the fair closed on the Sabbath. I do not see that it is necessary to adjourn this debate. I think we might be able to pronounce on the question now. Without condemning or attempting in any way to interfere with the views of those who may differ from me, I find no difficulty in voting for the hon. gentleman's resolution and declaring that it is right and proper that the question is one which may fairly be discussed and decided by the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. AMYOT. I want to give one more reason why the motion to adjourn should be agreed to. The question is now represented as one of money and expenditure. But we are not the only people in the Dominion who are paying for it. All the provinces are interested in it; they are paying large sums of money to assist in this exposition. Are we going to impose upon them our views without seeking an expression of their opinion? Because there are some people who see only their own little part of the country and cannot understand that there are people in the Dominion who think differently, are we going to take advantage of our majority and impose our views upon the provinces? Who tells my hon. friend that his views will be accepted in the province of Quebec? There should be further discussion of the question and we should consult the provinces.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence and reports of Government officials relating to the construction of a public building at Kentville, N.S., and the purchase of a site for the same, in accordance with a vote of this House passed in 1886.—(Mr. Borden.)

Statement showing, on the occasion of taking of the last census of Canada, the following particulars in regard to each of the following municipalities, viz.: The towns of Aurora and Newmarket, the villages of Holland Landing, Stouffville and Sutton West, and the townships of King, Whitechurch, East Gwillimbury, North Gwillimbury and Georgina, in the county of York, and the village of Bradford and township of West Gwillimbury, in the county of Simcoe:—(a) The number of inhabited houses. (b) The number of empty houses. (c) The number of houses under construction. (d) The total number of industrial and manufacturing establishments. (e) The total value of machinery and tools. (f) The total number of employees (classified as men, women and children respectively). (g) The total number of steam engines. (h) The names and numbers of the various industries in each of the said municipalities. (j) The aggregate of yearly wages paid in 1891, in each of the said municipalities. (k) The value of the manufactured products of 1891, in each of the said municipalities. (l) The total capital invested in industrial establishments in 1891, in each of the said municipalities.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Copies of all correspondence relating to the claim of Mr. Lauchlin McDougall, of Victoria county, N.S., for superannuation allowance, together with the amounts paid him as Lighthouse Keeper in St. Paul's and Ing-nish, giving the separate amounts for each year.—(Mr. Flint, for Mr. Fraser.)

Return showing separately the various kinds of manufacturing establishments that make up the total number of 67 with which Liverpool, N.S., is credited by Bulletin No. 12.—(Mr. Borden, for Mr. Forbes.)

Statement showing: (a) Amount of money received as visitors' entrance fees at the Kingston Penitentiary during each year from 31st January, 1885, to 1st February, 1893. (b) Payments out of said moneys to the Receiver-General, and disposition of such funds. (c) Particulars of goods manufactured and work done at said institution for any of its officers, showing who supplied the material for such goods, what sums were charged to said officers for said goods, and what sums have been actually paid during each of said years for said goods. (d) Quantities of coal oil and gas supplied such officers, amount paid therefor and when. (e) Amount of laundry work done at said institution during said dates, for whom done, amount charged and paid therefor, with dates of such payments and names of persons making such payments.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Return showing the entire cost, including grounds and out-buildings, of the Lieutenant-Governor's residence at Regina, including every expenditure in connection therewith.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Return giving the names of the owners of the several industrial establishments in the town of Mount Forest, and the number of hands employed.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Return showing a copy of certificate of qualification held by each of the commanders of the Fishery Protection Service last season, as follows:—Commander O. G. V. Spain, "Acadia;" Commander W. H. Kent, "Agnes Macdonald;" Commander E. Dunn, "Bayfield;" Commander Geo. M. May, "Constance;" Commander J. H. Pratt, "Dream;" Commander Wm. Wakeham, "La Canadienne;" Commander A. Finlayson, "Stanley;" Commander C. T. Knowlton, "Vigilant."

Copies of all correspondence, reports and other documents relative to the reduction in rank of C. A. Atkinson from conductor to brakeman, on or about October, 1887.—(Mr. Wood, Westmoreland.)

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

DOMINION STEAMER "QUADRA."

Mr. PRIOR moved for:

Copies of all tenders, letters, telegrams and correspondence between the Government and their agents and any other persons, in regard to the contract let for the repairing of the Dominion steamer "Quadra." He said: I will briefly explain the reason for asking for this correspondence. Last summer the Dominion Government steamer "Quadra" was wrecked on the northern coast of the Pacific Ocean. She was raised and brought down to the dry dock at Esquimalt, and the Government called for tenders for her repair. I am given to understand that four or five tenders were sent in to the Dominion Government agent in Victoria, and that only two or three out of these four or five were forwarded to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in Ottawa. Now, I am perfectly certain that it is not the intention of the Government to do anything unfair to the small builders who were in a position to repair the steamer. It is thought, however, by some of these tenderers that their tenders were purposely kept back by the agent. I cannot say that I believe that myself; it may be that they did not comply with the conditions set forth in the notices calling for tenders. Be that as it may, the fact remains that their tenders were not forwarded to headquarters. I myself wrote to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, giving him the facts of the case, and asking that an inquiry be instituted. He replied that such would be done, and I expected that the promise would have been carried out before now, but up to the present moment nothing, so far as I know, has been done in the case. I do not say that the department is at fault in any way, because neither my colleague nor myself have pressed the matter further than writing one or two letters, and I have not heard much more from the tenderers who complained at first. I felt it my duty, however, to sift this matter to the bottom, especially in view of the fact that some of these tenderers are men of small means, and the contract was given to a concern having large capital and a large plant. The small builders naturally felt that they had not had a fair chance with the larger concern, and knowing, as I do, that the Government are only too glad to give their work to the lowest tenderers who are able to perform it, I thought it my duty to make inquiry into this matter, and to get all the correspondence connected with it. I think it is especially the duty of the Government to be careful in all such cases where there is a chance of the poor man being oppressed by the rich. I do not say that this is the case now ; but it is a case in which I think the Government might at least see their way to have a commission appointed, and to make full inquiry into the matter.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is no objection at all to the passing of this motion, and the papers will be brought down. I am very glad the hon. gentleman does not blame the Government, and I am glad that he is taking an interest in this case. I beg to assure the hon. gentleman that the investigation promised by the Minister will be held. I will make an inquiry, and see whether tenders have been kept back.

Motion agreed to.

REVENUES OF PROVINCES.

Mr. PRIOR moved for :

Return showing total revenue paid into the Dominion Treasury by each of the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and British Columbia, during each fiscal year, commencing on the 1st July, 1880, and ending on 30th June, 1892.

Mr. DAVIN. I move in amendment that the words "and the North-west Territories" be inserted after the words "Nova Scotia."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman's amendment, but I desire to say to the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) that, as a matter of fact, these returns are apt to be misleading. The returns for Quebec and Ontario do not really represent accurately the amount paid by each province, and I think the same remark is partially true in regard to the Maritime provinces, because a very considerable amount of the imports really brought in for the use of Ontario, pass through Montreal, and the taxes are paid there.

Mr. PRIOR. I concur in the amendment.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

DOMINION EXPENDITURE BY PROVINCES.

Mr. PRIOR moved :

Return showing total sums expended by the Dominion Government in each of the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Manitoba and British Columbia from 30th June, 1880, to 30th June, 1892, under the following heads, viz. :—

Construction and equipment of Railroads,	} Not including the Canadian Pacific and Intercolonial Railways.
Subsidies granted to Railroads,
Maintenance of Railroads,
Harbours, Rivers, Piers and Docks,
Dredging,
Public Buildings of all kinds.

Mr. DAVIN. I desire that the words "and North-west Territories" be inserted after the words "Nova Scotia."

Mr. PRIOR.

Mr. PRIOR. I desire to say a few words in support of this motion, because there is a general opinion prevailing in the province from which I come that the people there are not receiving a fair share of the expenditure of the Dominion Government, in comparison with the revenue they pay into the Dominion treasury. My constituents know very well what they are paying into the treasury, but they wish to know more fully and clearly what they are receiving in return. They live some three thousand miles away from the seat of government, and it is not within their power to send delegations of thirty or forty business men to interview the Dominion Government, as constituencies in Quebec and Ontario can do. We have been told by some members of the Government that the expenditure of the province will be based on the population. That, we think, is not a fair way of dealing with this subject. We are a small population, numbering, according to the census, only 97,000 odd, including Indians and Chinamen, and yet we pay the enormous sum of $1,656,156 in revenue to the Dominion per annum, which is equal to $16.97 per head of the population. The Customs and Inland Revenue Returns for the year 1892 show that under these heads the city of Victoria alone paid $1,098,718, and has a postal revenue of $45,150. I think the constituents whom I have the honour to represent are perfectly correct in holding the opinion that they do not obtain a proper share of the expenditure according to the amount they pay into the treasury. From a statement published in the Victoria "Daily Colonist," of 14th February, and which I believe to be correct, I find that the people of British Columbia paid $16.97 per head, the people of Ontario, $5.70 ; Quebec, $7.06 ; Nova Scotia, $3.75 ; New Brunswick, $4.16 ; Prince Edward Island, $1.94 ; Manitoba, $7.50 ; North-west Territories, $0.17 per head. According to these figures, British Columbia pays three times as much per capita as Ontario, twice and a half times as much as Quebec, four times as much as Nova Scotia, four times as much as New Brunswick, twice and a quarter times as much as Manitoba, eight and a half times as much as Prince Edward Island, and nearly 100 times as much as the North-west Territories. I do not think it is fair that the expenditure should be based on population, and I think such will be the opinion of the House after hearing these figures. If we happen to be living in a country that possesses vast natural resources, if thereby, to whatever cause it may be attributed, we have been so fortunate as to attain a condition of financial prosperity, if the average man in that province is better off than the average man in any other province, it is only fair that the Government should make its expenditure on that basis. All we ask is that the expenditure shall be made according to the revenue we pay. I shall wait until the return is brought down before offering further remarks, for it may appear that we are mistaken in our views, but until the Finance Minister has allowed these returns to be laid on the Table of the House, my constituents will still adhere to their opinion, which I share myself, that British Columbia has not received a fair share of public expenditure.

Mr. DAVIN. I merely rise to say one word. The hon. gentleman says that the North-west Territories has contributed to the public treasury revenue to the amount of only 17 cents per head. That is the statement which appears in the defective return that has been referred to by the hon. member for South Oxford. But the people of British Columbia, of course, pay duties on a number of articles coming in by their seaports. We have no seaports in the North-west, and we pay our duties at Montreal, just as Ontario pays them. I have been in British Columbia, and I have observed the habits of the people there. I have also observed the habits of the people of the North-west Territories, and I must say that I fear, in the consumption of these things which redound most fruitfully to the revenue, the people of the North-west Territories cannot hold a candle to my friends in British Columbia. We are in that position that we have a very modest sum set down for what we pay in the returns, whereas, as a matter of fact, we pay as much as any other part of the Dominion. I am very glad my hon. friend has consented to have the North-west Territories placed in his motion, because when these returns come down it will be seen, that what with our population, and what with the amount of expenditure, the North-west Territories, instead of getting a great deal more than it deserves, as is the opinion of many hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, gets a great deal less than it is entitled to.

Mr. PRIOR. I must take exception to the remarks made by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and also to the remarks made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), if he intended then to apply to British Columbia. If I had the statistics here I could prove in very short time that there is hardly anything imported into the province of British Columbia on which duty is paid that is not consumed there. There is very, very little exportation of those goods from the province. We import a great many goods from the eastern provinces, and we consume them there duty paid. I think you will find from this time on that the customs duties paid by us into the revenue may get a little smaller, because our people are beginning to be larger users of goods manufactured in the eastern provinces than formerly. It is not the fault of the people of British Columbia that they did not use them before, but the reason was because manufacturers in the eastern provinces did not make goods up to the proper standard. The amount of duty-paid goods exported from British Columbia is very trifling indeed, and I think I could show that it does not amount to $500 a year taken off the revenue for which I gave the figures.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall see that the returns are brought down as soon as possible, and I shall make all the more haste in doing so because of the imputation cast on the luxurious habits of the British Columbia people by the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). My hon. friend (Mr. Prior) says that the people of British Columbia consume more than they import. But these customs duties are largely made up of the amount collected per head from the Chinese, and it is hardly to be supposed that they consume them.

Mr. PRIOR. Oh, that is not included.

Mr. FOSTER. All these points need to be cleared up, and I shall have the returns brought down as soon as possible, so as to get at the facts.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

WHARF ON RICHELIEU RIVER.

Mr. BECHARD moved for:

Copy of the Order in Council, or any other document, which authorized the "Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly Railway Company," or their successors, the "Vermont Central Railway Company," to build a wharf alongside their bridge across the Richelieu River, at St. John's, P.Q.

He said: I have on previous occasions drawn the attention of the Government to this matter. The railway bridge referred to is built on piers, and the company have also erected a wharf alongside the bridge which extends two-thirds of the width of the river. Barges come alongside that wharf in summer time to get loaded, and the riparian owners complain that in the spring season, when the water is at a high level, these barges prevent the easy flow of water, and as the shores are very flat, the consequence is that every spring a large portion of their farms are flooded for a considerable time. A year ago the company removed the greater portion of the old piers which had become useless, but the farmers still complain that the loading of barges along that wharf is very injurious to them. A few years ago, Mr. Parent, superintendent engineer of canals for the province of Quebec, was sent to visit the structure, and his report contains the following:—

During the past twelve months, I have caused a careful study of the action of this bridge, and of its wharf upon the level of the river. This action was found to be insignificant, when no loaded barges lay alongside the wharf. One loaded barge would hardly influence the current through the bridge, or the level above, but if more barges were added, their action would gradually tell, increasing rapidly with the number of barges, but never to such an extent as to cause a rise in the river level of more than from four to five inches. Of course, even less than such a rise would be very objectionable to farmers whose lands were low and damp; and measures should be taken to prevent more than one barge at a time to be alongside the wharf. I think the harbour master at St. John's is the proper party to look after that. In connection with the present case, the question may arise: Did not the Central Vermont Railway Company exceed their rights in erecting alongside their bridge a bridge crossing two-thirds the river? But I do not think this point to be within the reach of this office.

Another engineer was sent three years ago by the Department of Public Works and his report was the same in effect as that of Mr. Parent. He concludes by giving advice that not more than one barge at a time should be allowed to take a load there. I can state here that during last summer I have myself seen six or seven barges at a time alongside that wharf taking cargo. This is very objectionable to the farmers, who state that it keeps the water on their farms a good deal longer than it would otherwise remain there, and the consequence is that they cannot sow their seed grain in time. I again draw the attention of the Government to the matter. My object in making the motion is to know whether the railway company has been authorized by the Government of Canada to build that wharf, and if not, that the Government should take such measures as would be proper to make a change in that state of things.

Mr. HAGGART. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I have to state that there are no Orders in Council in the department that I know of permitting the building of a bridge or wharfs. The wharfs were built, I suppose, under the authority of an Act of 1832, which permitted the Montreal and Champlain Railway Company to build the bridge and the wharfs. By an Act of 1836 that right was transferred to the Stanstead and Shefford Railway Company, with a lease of the railroad. It is alleged that the lease was destroyed in a fire in 1875. By an Act of the Legislature of Quebec, passed in 1873, the right as granted to the Grand Trunk Railway Company to build wharfs, piers, etc., on the River Richelieu. There is no Order of this Government giving such permission.

Mr. BECHARD. I am very thankful to the hon. Minister of Railways for the information he gives me. I understand him to say that the right was given by an Act of the Legislature of Quebec in the year 1873.

Mr. HAGGART. I am mistaken in saying an Act. It was by letters patent, dated the 20th of February, 1873, given by the Local Government to the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. BECHARD. But this bridge does not belong to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and they do not use it at all. It is the property of the Central Vermont Railway Company. The Grand Trunk does not cross the River Richelieu at St. John's.

Mr. HAGGART. As I stated to the hon. gentleman, under an Act passed in 1832, the

Mr. BÉCHARD.

Montreal and Champlain Railway Company were permitted to build a bridge there, and in 1836 they transferred that right to the Stanstead and Shefford Railway Company, under the lease of the Montreal and Champlain Railway.

Motion agreed to.

BRANDING OF CHEESE.

Mr. REID moved:

That in the opinion of this House, "cheese" the product and manufacture of any foreign country should not be admitted for entry or "in transit" unless the name of the country is plainly marked, stamped, branded or labelled in legible letters, both on each cheese and box containing the same so as to indicate the country of its origin.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this resolution, I wish to explain my reasons for doing so. It is well known that the manufacture of cheese is one of the most important industries in Canada to-day. It is, therefore, right and just, if, by any possible means, this House can afford protection to that industry, and thereby put more money into the pockets of the farmers, that we should do so. Years ago the manufacture of cheese in Canada was unknown. At that time a different style of farming was carried on. But as the country became cleared our farmers had to adopt different methods of farming in order to make their business remunerative. They embarked in the dairying industry, which has since grown to enormous proportions. Let me just state the amount of capital invested in that industry in Ontario alone. I have made a careful estimate in regard to my own province, leaving the other provinces to be dealt with by the gentlemen who represent them in this House. It is estimated that in the province of Ontario there are 800,000 cows used in the dairying industry. These, at a value of $30 a head, represent a value of $24,000,000. The land used in pasture and under crop for dairying purposes is estimated at 3,000,000 acres, or three and a half acres for each cow; and the value of this land is estimated at $90,000,000. The value of the factories, dairies and store-rooms is estimated at $3,000,000, the farm buildings required for dairying purposes at $50,000,000, and the machinery, implements, etc., used in the industry at $8,000,000, or a total of $175,000,000 invested in the dairying industry. That, Sir, I claim is a larger amount of capital than is invested in any other industry in Canada. It is well known, also, that the Local Governments in every province are promoting the further development of this industry, which is found to be the most remunerative branch of farming to-day. Now, let me just refer, for a moment, to the growth of this industry since Confederation. In 1868 the manufacture of cheese in this country was hardly known. The first year in which any large quantity of cheese was exported was 1874. From that time to the present, the growth of the industry is shown by the following figures:—

	Quantity exported.	Value.
1874.....	24,050,982 lbs.	$3,523,201
1884.....	69,755,423	7,251,989
1887.....	73,604,448	7,108,978
1889.....	88,524,837	8,915,684
1890.....	94,260,187	9,372,212
1891.....	106,202,140	9,508,800
1892.....	118,270,052	11,652,412

showing a steady increase; and I believe that this year's returns will show a still greater increase. Now, Sir, in addition to these exports of our own product, I may say that we exported, last year, 10,140,678 pounds of cheese that came in bond from the United States. The Canadian cheese exported last year brought an average of 9 $\frac{3}{4}$ cents a pound, while the cheese brought from the United States, and exported through Canadian channels, brought an average price of 9 cents a pound. Now, Sir, it is on account of this large quantity of American cheese exported through Canada, that I have made this motion. I claim that the exportation from this country of this 10,000,000 pounds of American cheese is injuring the good name of our farmers. This cheese is brought to Montreal, not by our Canadian railways, as he has alleged, but from the frontier counties on the St. Lawrence, to Montreal, via the Victoria Bridge; and in the bonding warehouse at Montreal it undergoes the change from American to Canadian cheese. The fact of this inferior cheese being mixed with our Canadian cheese and exported as a Canadian product, injures the reputation and good name of our cheese. Now, it is a well-known fact, that the English market rules the price of cheese in Canada; and our farmers, seeing the prices at which this cheese is quoted on the English markets, are led to believe that these are the prices at which Canadian cheese is sold, whereas it is well known that there is no cheese manufactured in the world which is better than, if equal to, that manufactured in Canada, and the admixture of this inferior American cheese with it injures its good name. In the district in which my constituency is situated, the farmers depend altogether upon dairying, and St. Lawrence county, in the United States, which borders on my constituency, has 33,000 cows used in the dairying industry there, and the cheese products of these cows go to Montreal and are there mixed with Canadian cheese; so that the district from which I come is particularly liable to injury from the cause that I have mentioned. The cheese-buyers from Montreal come to that district to buy cheese, and they pay at least three-quarters of a cent more for the cheese made there than they do for the cheese produced right across the line. That fact proves the inferiority of the American cheese, and, therefore, I hold that it should not be allowed to be mixed in any shape or form with our cheese and sold as Canadian cheese. It is not on our Canadian cheese that the buyers make their chief profit. It is on this inferior cheese, for which they pay at least 1 cent a pound less than they do for ours; so that I claim it has injured our cheese to the extent of 1 cent a pound on the whole quantity exported last year, which is equivalent to a loss to our farmers in that year of \$1,182,700. Now, Sir, I see in the "Empire" of to-day the following:—

Hon. Mr. Sanford has received a letter from Mr. Manchester, of St. John, N. B., who is at present in England, in which he makes some important suggestions with regard to Canadian trade with Britain. He says it is absolutely necessary now for all exporters of Canadian products to have everything marked in the most conspicuous manner "the product of Canada," so that if the best qualities of beef, bacon, cheese, butter, etc., are shipped, a demand will be created equal to the Danes for butter, the Swiss for cheese and the Irish and Scotch for beef. Mr. Manchester says, moreover, that the visit of Professor Robertson to Great Britain has done much good, as he threw out some splendid ideas, which will doubtless be availed of during the coming season.

Professor Robertson has done and is doing great work among the farmers, and this industry is now growing to such an extent that I ask that the aegis of the National Policy be thrown around it and all the protection possible be given to our farmers. I have heard some hon. gentlemen opposite bewail the lot of the Canadian farming community, particularly the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), neither of whom has ever uttered a word in favour of protecting our agriculturists. I hope, however, that now they will give us a little assistance in this matter. Everything that can be done we should do to protect this really important industry, and I bring this motion before the House in the hope that it will meet your unanimous support.

Mr. ROSS (Dundas). In addition to a few words to the remarks of my hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Reid) I would entirely deprecate the placing of any more restrictions than possible to interfere with the friendly relations and free intercourse between ourselves and the United States, but at the same time, I feel that our own interests call for prompt action. On looking into the matter, I find that the greatest transgressors are our own men. Canadian exporters find that their market in England has increased to such an extent that the demand is greater than the supply, and so they endeavour to supply the deficiency and secure greater profits by bringing in American cheese of equal, or nearly equal value, not being too particular in many cases, and exporting it as Canadian cheese, thus increasing their sales. The result is, as my hon. friend has pointed out, that Canadian cheese must, to a greater or less extent, suffer in the general average. I believe the system adopted is to bring in American cheese as nearly as possible of the grade wanted in England, the brand, if there is any brand upon it—and I believe there is no brand upon the cheese itself, but upon the box—is removed and the article is branded as Canadian manufacture, so that the whole export passes as Canadian. The effect of this upon the Canadian cheese market must be detrimental, and the whole matter calls for the early attention of this House. There is no doubt my hon. friend has taken the right step in this matter, and I sincerely hope the House will endorse his action.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. I have much pleasure in supporting the resolution of my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid). We have a fair name in the old country in the matter of cheese, which I hope we will endeavour to maintain. We know that our Canadian cheese commands a higher price in the English market, and I think that the shipping of American cheese as Canadian cannot fail to be detrimental to that good name. Our cheese industry has made great strides in the last two years. In 1891, the value of the exports amounted to $9,508,800, and in 1892, to $11,652,411, and the quantity increased from 106,202,140 pounds in 1891 to 118,270,052 in 1892. That increased export shows how important this interest is and how productive it is of the best results to the Canadian farmer. This industry is one which yields the greatest results to the farmer and is one of the best industries relating to the farm. I hope this resolution will not meet any opposition in this House.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I am very much pleased, Sir, to be able to agree with this resolution in favour of the branding of American cheese exported from Canada so that it may be known as of American production. I am glad to think that the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Reid) will cast one vote in favour of the farmer, and I hope it is not the only one he will cast. I hope he will think upon the statement he made in his reference to the member for South Huron. I have been fighting for the farmers' interests for years in this House and out of it; in season and out of season. How many votes has the hon. gentleman given in favour of the farmer when the farmers' interests were at stake? I think it would be in the interests of the Canadian farmer to have all the American products shipped through Canada branded as American products and not allowed to be put upon the market as Canadian products. I hope the hon. gentleman will not stand up again and vote against giving the farmers free binder twine, free corn, and the relief on agricultural implements that the necessities of the farmer demand. I hope his new-born zeal will continue and that it will not die out with the single effort he has made to-day.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to say a few words upon this subject, as it is one in Mr. Ross (Dundas).

which I took interest some years ago, and which, I regret to say, did not meet with the hearty response of some of these gentlemen who would have us believe that they were always interested in the farmer's welfare. If I remember correctly, some hon. gentlemen sitting close to the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) were, at that time, rather inclined to pooh-pooh the motion as of little account; they see and think different to-day. Some years ago, when this question was brought before the House by me it was stated that we were suffering on account of United States cheese which were shipped through Canada, and from Canadian ports to British markets, and there represented as Canadian cheese, and an endeavour was made in this House to have such legislation passed as would put a stop to this practice. The object of the resolution was to have the Canadian products branded as coming from the United States. At that time I read a reference that was made in the British House of Commons to this matter, which, in my opinion, justified the statements I then made. I have it here to-night, and I think it will do no harm to read it again. It was intended to correct the very evil which this motion purposes to correct:

LONDON, March 20. — It was announced in the House of Commons to-night that the Colonial Office is about to inquire of Canada whether the alleged adulteration of imported American cheese also relates to the Canadian product, especially as regards the practice of using animal fat in making cheese.

That inquiry was made on account of the fact that cheese labelled, "Best Canadian," as I was told, were sold at the retail shops in London, which cheese were found to be largely adulterated with animal fat and cotton-seed oil. The cheese was evidently American cheese; there was no question about that. But because the Canadian article had attained a reputation in the market, unscrupulous persons engaged in the trade very unfairly and dishonestly labelled their product, "Canadian cheese," and to prove that it was Canadian, they showed the brand that it had been shipped from the port of Montreal, in Canada. Therefore, we thought it well to have the Canadian cheese exported from this country branded as Canadian cheese, and the American branded as United States cheese. On inquiry at the Inland Revenue Department, some time ago, I was told that this was already done; but I am informed now, as a matter of fact, it has never been done, and we are still labouring under the disadvantage that formerly existed, and Canadian cheese interests suffer through the way the trade is being carried on. I think it most unfair that this should continue and if we have the power, as I think we have, to compel the branding of these American cheese, we should exercise it, and not allow the inferior American article to be palmed off on the British consumer thereby bringing down the reputation of the Canadian cheese. There is no doubt that the development of the Canadian cheese industry has been very great, and that the industry is one from which the farmers receive a very large return. We should be jealous of that interest, as it is one of the few from which we receive a steady return. Our product has won a high reputation in the British market; it seems to suit their taste and appetite, and they are buying millions of pounds every year. Last year, if I recollect aright, we received not less than twelve and a half million dollars for the cheese we exported. That is a very important thing for the Canadian people, and the larger share of this goes from the province of Ontario. While on that point I trust I may be permitted to refer for a short time to an incident which took place last fall, which, to my mind, was not very creditable to the parties who were interested in it or commenced the agitation. I can cordially agree with the remarks of my hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Reid) with regard to the valuable work done by Professor Robertson, and those associated with him in the Experimental Farm. He is a man, who, above all others, may be considered an expert in this line in Canada. He is head and shoulders over every other in looking after the dairy interests of the Dominion. For a number of weeks last fall he was in England, and there he rendered most valuable service to the dairying interests of Canada. I do not think that any other man could possibly have done so much to bring the Canadian product into prominence in the British market as Professor Robertson did. He succeeded in bringing Canadian cheese prominently before the attention of the English dealers and consumers directly, and also in attracting the attention to the same subject of very many of the leading English journals, and Professor Robertson has told me that he is indebted to the kindness of our Governor-General for information given him before his departure, for which he had every reason to be grateful, assistance which gave him an introduction to the class of people he most wanted to reach, and thus enabled him to do his work more rapidly than he could otherwise have done it. I am sorry to find that western men who should be men of liberal views and broad minds, instead of approving Professor Robertson's work and giving him credit for it, have passed strictures upon him that were not at all called for by the facts of the case, and were consequently discreditable to the parties who gave vent to them. I refer to the meeting of the Dairymen's Association in Listowell last fall. Some hon. gentlemen will remember that when the dairy commissioner was on his way home from Europe he stopped off at Bedford, in the province of Quebec, where there was a large exhibition being held. Somehow or other, the reputation of Quebec some years ago had fallen in respect of cheese production among the British consumers. Professor Robertson, while in England, felt it his duty to correct, as far as possible, the impression that existed and, in coming home, took the opportunity to drop off at Bedford to see the exhibits. In his opinion, the cheese which were on exhibition there were of very superior quality. They were of high grade considering them as an average, and individually there were many of very superior quality. He advised some of the exhibitors there to make up a collection and send them up to the Industrial Exhibition in the province of Ontario, so that, in a friendly way, they might be put side by side with the cheese made in the province of Ontario, to see how the two would compare. Knowing, as he did at the time, that it was too late to make entries for that Industrial Exposition, he advised these parties to allow him to make a selection of an average number and send them up there, not for the purpose of competing, as they could not compete, for various reasons, one of which was that they were too late to be entered. But his suggestion was carried out, and the cheese were brought up there. The exhibition went on, and some of the men who judged the Ontario product, were asked, along with Professor Robertson, to examine the product from Quebec, of which there were twenty-nine samples; and to see what were the relative merits of the cheese from the two provinces. The result was that, after a careful examination, they attached this letter to the Quebec product:

TORONTO, ONT., 14th September, 1892.

To the President and Directors of the Industrial Exhibition:

GENTLEMEN,—On carefully examining a lot of twenty-nine cheese from eighteen different cheese factories in the district of Bedford, Que., we find them to be well made cheese, of uniform and excellent quality—on the whole, superior to the cheese on exhibition here, from any other part of the Dominion, and we strongly recommend that a gold medal be awarded to the President of the Dairymen's Association of the district of Bedford, Que., for an exhibit of such superior quality. We desire to record our high appreciation of the improvement and fine quality of the cheese which have come to the exhibition from a district where the cheese making industry is comparatively new.

All of which is respectively submitted.

E. CASWELL,
JOHN PODMORE,
A. F. MACLAREN,
JAMES W. ROBERTSON.

I may say, by way of explanation, that two of these gentlemen were the very men who judged the Ontario cheese, and this was done by Prof. Robertson to give the people of Quebec a better reputation for the product that they turned out, which, in his opinion, was quite equal to the best quality that was turned out any where else in Canada, and for the purpose of raising their reputation in the foreign market where they were handicapped on account of the unfortunate incident which I have already related, when some inferior cheese went to the old country. At the association meeting at Listowell. Mr. Ballantyne, Speaker of the Provincial Legislature of Ontario, who is a prominent man, one of the pioneers of the country, and who has been for a long time engaged in the manufacture of cheese, and in the promotion of that industry in Ontario, spoke as follows:—

He then called attention to what he considered an unjust clashing of interests as between Ontario and Quebec in giving first prize to an exhibit at the Industrial Fair at Toronto to cheese made in Ontario, and afterwards issuing a certificate highly recommending the cheese made in Bedford, Quebec, as equal to any in the Dominion. Waxing warm on the question, he characterized the action of the judges and the Dominion Dairy Commissioner in this matter, as a mean, dirty, contemptible trick, and concluded by administering what he thought to be a severe rebuke.

Now, I regret very much that a man's jealousy should carry him so far beyond discretion as to induce him to use such language against a worthy gentleman who is one of the ablest men in Canada on that question, and has been most successful in promoting that industry in Canada. He could not fairly say they were giving a gold medal to cheese produced in the province of Quebec as against Ontario cheese, because the former were not there in open competition, but for the purpose of showing their superior quality. This certificate was given by the very men who had judged the Ontario product. Now, I do not see why the Ontario people should have any jealousy against our friends in the province of Quebec, who have improved their knowledge of cheese making, and are now able to turn out a much better article than they did a few years ago. When Quebec cheese is brought into competition with ours and shows such a favourable quality there is no reason that the Quebec makers should be exposed to such severe strictures. A very lengthy controversy was carried on in the papers, to which I will not make reference to-day, but I believe the opinions of Mr. Ballantyne are not shared by many of the Ontario people. I believe that on the whole our people are glad to see our friends in Quebec improving that industry as they have done, and glad to see that they were able to turn out the creditable product which they did, in the Industrial Exhibition in Toronto, which is not confined to the province of Ontario, because exhibitors can go there from any part of the country, and this, in my opinion, is the only right principle upon which expositions should be held. I may say that the remarks of Mr. Ballantyne rather met with condemnation from the most eminent men in our part of the province, although they were not called upon to say a word with regard to that question, and I think that they regret sincerely that Mr. Ballantyne allowed his jealousy to carry him so far as to pass these strictures upon a very worthy gentleman who is his compeer, if not his superior, in ability and knowledge of the cheese industry in this country. That is all I have to say on this question. I believe I voice the sentiments of the people of Ontario when I say that they are always pleased to see the people of the province of Quebec or of any other province in the Dominion endeavouring to produce an article that is equally good with theirs, and that is equally valuable when sent to the foreign market. There is no feeling of jealousy towards their fellow-citizens in Quebec, if they do produce an equally good article, or even a better article, because it stimulates us to do better, showing that there are others who know a little more about that line of industry than we do. I hope this resolution will carry, and that the result will be that American cheese, which is shipped from a port in Canada, thereby creating the impression in Great Britain that they are a Canadian product, will hereafter be labelled as United States cheese in contradistinction to Canadian cheese, so that American cheese will not interfere with the reputation which our cheese makers enjoy in the British market.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am pleased to see the Controller of Customs in his place. This matter has been before the House several times, and the Government have undertaken to deal with the question of American cheese passing through Canada in bond. In 1888 a resolution, similar to the resolution now before the House, was moved by my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule), and seconded by myself, and I will read to the House one of the resolutions that were passed by the Dairymen's Association in my county, asking the Government to deal with this matter. I will read one now that I read then:

GANANOQUE, 14th April, 1888.

George Taylor, M.P.

DEAR SIR,—I have been requested by the President of the Gananoque Cheese Board of Trade, to forward you a resolution passed at a meeting of the Board and to ask if you would be so kind as to bring the matter before the notice of the Minister of Agriculture and ask that some action be taken that cheese manufactured in Canada will be known from cheese manufactured and shipped in bond from New York State, when shipped from Montreal to Europe.

I have the honour to remain,
Your obedient servant,

JOSHUA LEGGIE.

The question was then fully discussed: the Government took action, and for a year or two the cheese was branded as being American produce. The question was then raised in England, that, as all cheese coming either from Canada or the United States, was known as American, a distinction should be made and the word United States should be placed on the American product; and the Government issued an order that such should be done. But, as I mentioned in the House, in speaking a few days ago, a large cheese producer in my county, who had been in Montreal last year, stated, that he saw large quantities of American cheese arrive and shipped by steamer to England, without having the brand of the Government officials placed on it before it was exported. I would suggest to the Government, that they should remove this work from the Customs department. We have in Canada a dairy commissioner, in the person of Professor Robertson, who has done, and is doing, more for the cheese and butter industries of this country than any half-dozen men in Canada, or out of it, and I would suggest that the question of cheese exportation be placed under the direct supervision of Professor Robertson at the port of Montreal, because the statement is made, whether the officials are aware of the fact or not, that American cheese was exported from Canada last year, without being properly branded under the direction of the Department of Customs. If this is not practicable, I would suggest, in the interest of this large industry, that a special officer be appointed to supervise this work at Montreal, because, as the hon. member for Grenville, who moved this resolution, stated, large quantities of cheese was carried down the American side by railway and then across to Montreal, and was shipped from that port, not passing down over the Grand Trunk Railway. I know, however, that large quantities did pass over the Grand Trunk Railway, and, previous to last season, almost all the cheese was shipped across the river. Last year a steamer was fitted up specially for the purpose of carrying cheese, it being collected on the way down the river to Montreal. This cheese went there in bond and was re-exported from Montreal to England. I know the American people must have some object in sending cheese by this route. If they are able to run the blockade and ship it in Montreal, English buyers, finding it is shipped by a Canadian steamer, will arrive at the conclusion that it is a Canadian product. It may be difficult at first sight to tell the difference; in fact, you can only distinguish it when you put a knife in it. Be that as it may, cheese which leaves Montreal, should be branded both on the cheese and on the box, and when it is placed on the market, it will carry its origin on its face, and if it is American, it will not come into competition with the Canadian product. I represent the largest cheese district, for I believe the county of Leeds stands at the head of the cheese-producing district of Ontario, according to the last census. It is the banner county, and last year produced more than any other county in the province or the Dominion. Therefore, the members representing Leeds should feel as large, if not a larger interest in this subject than any other hon. members in this House. Our cheese has won a reputation, and the Government should take every precaution to see that that reputation is not in any way interfered with by allowing American cheese to be imported and mixed with shipments of Canadian cheese from Montreal.

As the hon. member from Grenville stated, a large quantity of cheese brought into Montreal, is brought in by Canadians; but it must be remembered that Canadians are as anxious to make a dollar as any other class, and if they can go over to the United States and buy American cheese for from three-quarters of a cent to 1½ cents less than in Canada, they desire to make their money on that product, as well as on the Canadian product, while, at the same time, the Canadian product should not suffer by allowing those people to mix a lower grade of cheese with the Canadian article. I hope, therefore, the Controller of Customs will see that the department gives effect to their regulations and that they will be thoroughly and particularly carried out, and, if this cannot be done, that the matter will be handed over to Professor Robertson, who, I am sure, if he is given a pointer, will find out and detain every cheese in transit, long enough to brand, not only the cheese, but the box, and will see that, while passing through the warehouses in Montreal and while being boxed, American cheese will be properly stamped, and that brands will not be scraped off the boxes, as, I believe, according to reports I have received from Montreal, has been done. Now, as we are at the opening of the cheese season for this year, the Government, I have no doubt, will take every precaution to see that our Canadian cheese will not suffer by coming in contact with American adulterated cheese or cheese of less value than ours.

Mr. RIDER. I can fully concur in the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Grenville, as well as the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member from Leeds. This is a very important question, inasmuch as the cheese industry has assumed large proportions in Canada. The Eastern Townships are now largely engaged in the manufacture of cheese, and they are placing on the English market cheese of a very superior quality. It is right and proper that this inspection should be looked after and that protection should be given to the manufacturers of good cheese to which they are entitled. I, therefore, hope the Government will take special action in regard to this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. For my own part, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the mover and seconder and others who have spoken with respect to this resolution. There is no doubt at all, that the cheese industry is a very important one, and is particularly so in certain of the provinces, and it assuredly deserves all the encouragement and all the care that can possibly and reasonably be taken in order to ensure a high character and to maintain that high character in its principal market, Great Britain. The resolution, however, calls for the marking of all cheese admitted to entry or in transit from a foreign country, and it strikes me, as I look into it—and it came into my mind as the debate progressed—that possibly, a pretty delicate question may be involved in the interference with goods in transit. We have a large transit trade through the United States, going to their sea-ports, and there is a large trade, on the other hand, from the United States, passing through our territory and going to Montreal and other Canadian ports. It seems to me to be a rather delicate question, and that very great care is required in legislating respecting this transit trade, a trade which is simply passing through our country, not of goods to be marketed here, but simply passing through to another country, and, as to legislating to make interference necessary with those articles and goods thus passing through our country. I think it is worth very careful consideration before a resolution like this is passed, binding the House to do thus and so. The matter was brought up three years ago with the idea of having something done to preserve the character of Canadian cheese, and to keep the inferior cheese of other countries from being palmed off as of Canadian make. Since that time the Minister of Customs has issued very stringent instructions to prevent any marking of cheese or any interference with it while it is in transit from the time it enters the country until it leaves it at the export port. The impression did get abroad that this cheese was tampered with while it lay in the bonded warehouse awaiting export, and that it was there marked as Canadian cheese; but I believe that that is not so, and certainly, if, in any case, that has been done, it is against the express orders of the Customs Department which are very stringent on the point. If, then, it is marked as Canadian cheese, it either must be done before it enters this country or when it gets on the other side. If done on the other side of the water, we have no right to interfere with it, and if it is branded as Canadian cheese before it enters this country, that raises again a delicate point as to how far we can legislate so as to interfere with the transit trade. The Government will not lose sight of the question. I have listened, and I know other hon. gentlemen have listened, to the great information that has been given. The Government will utilize that information, and will take the matter into their serious consideration. I do not mean that as a phrase, but I mean that everything that can be done will be done to protect our trade in this respect. Under these circumstances, I suggest to my hon. friend, whether or not it would be better for him to press this motion to a vote, or whether, after having brought it to the attention of the Government and the House, he might not leave it in the hands of the Government to make such regulations as they can to prevent the abuses he complains of.

Mr. REID. As the Minister of Finance states that the words "in transit" might interfere with the traffic, I will not press the motion, but I might say that I think the entering of it in bond could be remedied. It is in bond that the changes are made, and if prohibitory orders have been issued by the Minister of Customs, I do not think that they have been properly carried out. I hope that in future the order will be carried out to the letter. I cannot see why any country ought to be ashamed of its name, and, therefore, I do not understand why the Americans should brand the word "Canadian" on their cheese before it is shipped into this country. Surely if cheese comes to this country, branded with the name "Canadian," when it is not produced here, we have the right to prevent an injustice of that kind. I think the evil might be remedied in another way. We might pass a resolution that all cheese exported from this country should be branded with the name of the country of production. At all events, we are not ashamed of our own name, and we are proud of having our cheese branded "Canadian." In the meantime having brought the matter before the attention of the House, and as the Government have promised to look after it, I shall withdraw the motion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to inquire from the hon. the Minister of Finance exactly what he means by the words "in transit." I can understand there would be very great difficulty indeed in intermeddling with cheese passing from one portion of the United States to another through our territory, and I can quite agree with him that that could hardly be interfered with without prejudicially disturbing the bonding privilege. But in the case of cheese coming from an American place of manufacture to be exported from a Canadian port it seems to me to stand on quite another footing, and, with respect to that, I do not think that the objection could hold. I notice that a very large amount of cheese, not the produce of Canada, is being exported from this country. Last year, as much as 10,000,000 pounds of cheese, not produced in Canada, is stated to have been exported to England, I suppose from our Atlantic ports. It is quite evident that there is considerable danger of the high character our cheese has obtained in the English market being taken advantage of to the detriment of our producers, and I think a very good case has been made out by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) for taking steps to insure that a distinction be made between Canadian cheese and American cheese. It is known to all who have paid any attention to the matter that our cheese has a decided call, as one may say, in the markets of Great Britain, and we are perfectly entitled—no one can complain of our conduct in so doing—to see that no cheese from any other country is sold as being Canadian cheese. I can say to the hon. gentleman from Grenville (Mr. Reid) that he will have undoubtedly my support and the support of most hon. gentlemen here in any step of this kind for the protection of Canadian products.

Mr. POPE. With reference to what the Minister of Finance has stated, as to our not having the power to prohibit cheese from being branded in Canada, as it comes from the other side of the line. I would suggest that the Government should furnish a Government stamp for all cheese manufactured in Canada, so that the Government stamp will be a guarantee in the English market that the cheese is manufactured in Canada and could not be manufactured anywhere else.

Mr. FOSTER. That could be done. We have a perfect right to legislate that every cheese that is manufactured in Canada shall be stamped as Canadian cheese, but I can quite see where a person who manufactures cheese on the other side of the line could get one of these little stamps and mark his cheese Canadian cheese, and send it to the British market. We can make it certain that no cheese goes out of Canada without being branded Canadian cheese. We can make it certain that no cheese which enters from the United States, passing in transit or bond through this country, to Great Britain, shall be interfered with en route, and that, so long as it is in Canadian territory it shall not be marked "Canadian cheese"; but after it gets out of Canadian territory, after it enters the warehouse at Liverpool, we have lost command over it and the person who owns it may stamp it as he likes. We have, I suppose, an undoubted right to say that no cheese shall come to this country from the United States, or that no cheese shall come to this country from the United States for transit to Great Britain unless it is marked American cheese. But, what I meant to say was this: That legislation of that kind is rather delicate legislation to undertake, and may interfere with the bonding and transit privileges which are mutual and beneficial between the two countries. That requires very great care, and very great caution, as to what legislation can be had in order to bring about the object which members on both sides of the House desire. The question is simply as to the best way to bring this object about. I made the request to my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) not to press his motion, so as not to bind the House to this resolution entirely, but to leave it free for the Government to see what can be done to bring about the object which my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. REID. Under these circumstances, I shall ask for leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

NORTH-WEST SCHOOLS.

Mr. SEMPLE moved for :

Return showing the number of school-teachers engaged in teaching in the North-west Territories, and the length of time each was engaged during the past year, with the salary received; also the number of pupils attending each school, and all sources of revenue for the maintenance of schools.

Mr. DALY. I may say to the hon. gentleman, as I said to him the other day, that the report of the Department of the Interior will, I think, contain all the information which he asks for in this motion; but any that it may not, I will undertake to have furnished to him if he will be satisfied to take what the report contains as the other portion.

Mr. SEMPLE. The answer of the hon. Minister is satisfactory. I am aware that all the information here asked for is not contained in the Auditor-General's Report, but as the hon. Minister has signified his intention of bringing down all that is asked for, I am satisfied to wait until the report comes down.

Motion agreed to.

GRINDING IN BOND.

Mr. DAVIN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Customs Act, 49 Victoria, chapter 32, so as to prevent the importation of wheat, maize, or other grain, in bond as now provided by the 93rd section of the said Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object I have in view is really to make the National Policy more complete. My desire is to give the farmers of this country all the protection we can. When the legislation that I now seek to repeal was passed, the "Mail" was the organ of the Conservative party, and the "Globe" assailed the policy of the Government, day after day, in article after article, denouncing grinding in bond, to which the "Mail," in reply, said that in a very short time, the North-west Territories would be able to supply the millers of Ontario with all the hard wheat they would require, so that this was a temporary measure. Well, as the hon. Minister of the Interior knows, we can now supply, not only Ontario, but the world, with all the hard wheat that it may require, and therefore, the necessity for the legislation, allowing the millers of Ontario to grind, in bond, hard wheat coming from the western states, has passed away. I may say that it is not at the present moment a matter of very great importance, and I will tell you why. The millers, for some years, abused the privilege of grinding wheat in bond. They brought in wheat from the western states, and, instead of sending away the flour of that wheat, they sent away the flour of other wheat, and sold the flour of the imported wheat in the markets of Ontario. That has been prevented, the Customs officers now insisting that the flour of any wheat brought in shall be exported. Well, very little wheat is, in consequence, brought in at present; but little or great it is an anomaly to have it brought in now at all free of duty, because the only reason for bringing it in was that we had not the hard wheat which the millers require in order to make flour of the grade and quality necessary for the English market. I hope, therefore, that the Minister of Finance will see no objection to our going into committee, and if we go into committee, I shall move :

That the 93rd section of chapter 32 of the Revised Statutes shall be repealed and the following substituted therefor :—

The importer of any cattle or swine may slaughter and cure and pack the same, or if such cattle or swine are imported in the carcass, may cure or pack the same in bond, provided the slaughtering curing and packing is done and conducted under such regulations and restrictions as the Governor in Council may, from time to time make for that purpose, but the said regulation shall not extend to the substitution of other beef or pork for the produce of such cattle or swine.

The difference between that and the clause I wish to repeal, is this : I would omit from the clause in the fourth line, "and the importer of any wheat, maize or other grain, may grind and pack the same in bond." That is omitted. The clause I wish to substitute is precisely the same as the 93rd clause, with the exception of those words which I would omit, so that the result will be that I shall have secured for the farmers of the North-west that market which we proposed to give them, as far as we could, when we introduced the National Policy. The only reason why we departed from the policy was that, at that time, we could not produce the amount of hard wheat that was necessary for the millers in order to sell flour to the English market of the required character. I would move, also, that the present section substituted by section 2 of chapter 44 of the statutes of 1891, for the paragraph letter "A" of section 245 of the said Act, be hereby repealed, and the following substituted :—

For the warehousing and bonding of such cattle or swine as may be slaughtered and cured in bond.

The words that are omitted from the 93rd clause of chapter 32 of the revised statutes will be omitted from the subsection amending the Act of 1891, and for the same purpose. The necessity for taking this course is so palpable that it is not necessary that I should seek to enforce my proposition on the mind of the Finance Minister, and I trust he will have no objection to our going into committee and taking away this anomaly in our legislation.

Mr. DALY. In reply to the hon. gentleman I may say that as he has stated to the House, at the time these regulations were made and this Act passed, the millers of Ontario were not able to get sufficient wheat from Manitoba and the North-west Territories to keep their mills in operation, and of necessity, in order to make hard wheat flour they had to import wheat from the United States. In order to meet their requirements they were therefore allowed to import wheat in bond. They had to export at first the equivalent of that wheat, but it was found by the late Minister of Customs that they were evading the law. Consequently a number of them were fined, and the regulation was made whereby it was required, as it is at present, that millers importing wheat in bond must not export the equivalent, as formerly, but the product of their wheat that they imported, so that, owing to the very strict regulations surrounding this matter of importing in bond, the fears of our farmers were set at rest ; and I think the hon. gentleman, having brought this matter to the attention of the Government, and the Government promising to inquire into it, will be satisfied, and withdraw his motion.

Mr. SPROULE. I may say that from a conversation I had with the President of the Millers Association some time ago, who was down here, I do not think there is any very strong grounds for passing the resolution which the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has moved, because, as he very correctly says, the product of any wheat imported has to be sent out of the country, and is not allowed to be mixed with Canadian wheat. I fully agree with the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that the productions of the North-west are now so great that the farmers there are quite able to supply the demand of the Ontario millers ; but a number of those millers are located along the western part of the province of Ontario where it is not very convenient to get Manitoba wheat at all seasons, and they can get American wheat at certain seasons when the supply runs short, and thus keep those mills running at a time when they would otherwise have to close them up were it not for this privilege. As long as they can do that, they can carry on their operations more successfully and profitably, and while they do not allow that wheat to go into competition in any way with the Canadian product, I do not see any very strong grounds for this motion. In our part of the country we import wheat from Manitoba every week in the year, and the wheat used by the millers outside of what is raised in their immediate localities is brought from Manitoba, and they find it valuable to mix with our soft wheat, because it makes a much better grade of flour—a flour which is more saleable in the Maritime provinces than the product of our own Ontario wheat. But while that is being done there, they are more on the direct line of railways and steamers between here and Manitoba, and they can get it much more readily than the millers can in the western part of Ontario. I think so long as they export the American product there can be no strong objection to that importation, which there might be if they were allowed to mix it with our own.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This whole discussion must be very instructive to the House. The hon. gentleman who has taken his seat has now no objection nor has he had from the beginning to allowing millers to import this wheat in bond without paying any customs duties upon it. At the same time, he holds that if there was a customs duty imposed upon it, it would really not come out of the millers, but out of the farmers who raise the wheat in the United States. Holding that view, I have never been able to understand how it is that he asks that this wheat should be imported free of duty. The hon. gentleman will tell the House that if it were a duty upon tea, the Chinaman pays it, because there is no tea produced in Canada; but that rule does not apply to wheat, because there is wheat produced in Canada, that either the duty increases the price or that it does not. The hon. gentleman holds that the duty upon wheat and barley and oats and all cereals increases the prices of those articles in the Canadian market. Yet he is still in favour of having this American wheat imported into Canada free of duty, so long as the product of that wheat is sold out of the country. The hon. gentleman also expresses the abominable notion that the American wheat is a good deal better than what can be produced in Ontario.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He has told us that this wheat is imported because it is good, hard wheat.

Mr. SPROULE. I made no reference to the quality of the wheat whatever, but said that the wheat raised in Manitoba and the North-west was suitable for mixing with ours, because it is a hard wheat. But as to the kind of wheat raised in the United States I said nothing. What I said was that the importation of American wheat was necessary to enable our millers to run their mills at a time when they could not get a supply from Manitoba and the North-west.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman spoke of this wheat as being of the same character as that produced in the North-west Territories and Manitoba.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not admit, as a resident of western Ontario—and I know something of the production of wheat—that the wheat from the western States or from our western territories is a better article than what can be produced in the western portion of Ontario. I tell the hon. gentleman that he is maligning his province when he undertakes to put before the House any such notion. I tell him that he is seeking to induce the population to leave the province of Ontario; that he is depreciating the value of our wheat in Ontario, and is preaching blue-ruin, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned. It seems to me that the sensible course to take would be to throw down those barriers which hon. gentlemen have raised, and which, in a sneaking kind of way that is not altogether courageous, they are admitting now, have been of no service to the farming population of this country. That is what in effect the hon. member from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has told the House by his motion, and that is in effect what the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has said in the speech.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say yes. I draw my own inference from the speech of the hon. gentleman, and that inference is that he is of opinion that these duties are after all, if they are imposed, paid by the party who purchases the article. The hon. gentleman has come to that conclusion. He and his friends on the Treasury benches must have been of that opinion all along, or else they would never have allowed this article to come in free when shipped in bond. They admit that they have not been able to help the farmers by the duties which they have imposed in that way and that, if those duties have served any purpose at all, it is in keeping a market for the Canadian farmer. I would like to know at what period in the history of this country has the farmer been unable to find a market at the market price for the wheat he could produce. Sir, the price is high or low in this country as it is high or low in the United Kingdom, and the hon. gentlemen who lately led their party told the people long ago that he was not a fly upon the wheel, that he was one of the big bugs who could regulate all the affairs of this country, including the market prices of everything that could be produced. And now the hon. gentleman admits his absolute helplessness in this way and that he is as thorough a fly on the wheel as ever alighted on that piece of machinery. In the speech the hon. gentleman made to this House I do not know whether he was looking forward to the Treasury benches or not. I have been looking over the Treasury benches to see which place he might expect to obtain, because I notice the hon. gentleman always comes to the rescue of the Government and is prepared to say for them what they are not always disposed to say for themselves. The hon. gentleman tells my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that he had better be satisfied with the explanation which the Minister has given and withdraw his motion and be a loyal subject and supporter of the Administration, and especially so while the leader of the Administration is absent from the House—don't let the hon. gentleman undertake to make mischief and that at the very moment when the leader has withdrawn from the House. Let the hon. gentleman look at the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) who never fails the Administration when it is important that the Administration should have his support.

Mr. HAGGART. A few words in reply to the hon. gentleman. He seems to be an authority on nearly every subject that comes up, but if there is one subject upon which he appears to think himself an authority it is the subject of wheat. I think he knows very little about it. When he comes to understand that the very Customs Act with the terms of which he finds fault is an emanation of the Government of which he was a member, the Mackenzie Government, that he consolidated the statutes and that this grinding in bond was included in that consolidation—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). To put a duty on wheat?

Mr. HAGGART. No, grinding in bond. That was in the consolidation made by the Mackenzie Government. Every one knows who has lived in this country that the flour-milling powers in this country are largely in excess of the requirements of the people. In order to enable these mills to be employed the Government allowed American wheat to come into Canada and be ground in bond and the product of it exported. As the hon. gentleman stated, and it was a good reason of complaint, the millers were in the habit of selling the flour which they ground from imported wheat in competition with flour from wheat imported from Manitoba. That was against the National Policy and it was put an end to, and a resolution of the House was passed that when wheat was imported to be ground in bond not only the quantity was to be exported, but the actual product of the wheat. The hon. gentleman says that the wheat grown in western Canada is equal to the Manitoba wheat or some grown in the northern part of Minnesota. Any miller who knows the facts about the wheat grown in this country will know that you are able to make from 200 lbs. of flour of wheat grown in Manitoba from fifteen or twenty pounds more of bread than from wheat grown in the particular section of the country the hon. gentleman resides in. That is the reason it is imported into the country for the purpose of mixing and that is why it commands a higher price in the old country. In some portions of the western states, in Northern Minnesota and Dakota they grow a wheat very similar to that of Manitoba. If the hon. gentleman had stated that he would have been correct, and if he had stated that this facility was offered in the interest of the milling industry, it is the duty of the Government to see that something of the kind is done for the benefit of the millers of the country.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think no person who has any considerable knowledge of the experience of the millers of this Dominion must confess that they had a very serious time of it for the last ten years. Now, with regard to the grinding in bond, if the law is as stated by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), and I have no doubt he is correct, and that the millers have to export the product of the wheat they import, I cannot see that the Canadian farmer suffers by the operation, and I do not think we should force the Canadian miller to allow his mill to stand idle for two or three months simply because he cannot get the supply of wheat to keep the mill running. I would like to ask my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who has brought in this question, if he is prepared to state to this House that the same quality of wheat as that grown in Manitoba has been brought into this country and ground in bond within the last six or ten years. I do not think he will risk his reputation by saying that it is. If he knows anything about what is brought in, he knows that it is winter wheat and not what is grown in Manitoba. If the hon. gentleman has introduced this resolution in the interests of the farmer of Manitoba it is wholly unnecessary, because the wheat produced in Manitoba is not brought in here to be ground in bond. If the importation of wheat from the American side and the grinding in bond militated against farming interests of the province of Manitoba or Ontario or any other, it would still be unfair to prevent the importation of wheat to keep the mills going. The milling facilities of the Dominion at the present time are far in excess of the supply of wheat that can be furnished in some seasons. Take for instance a season when the wheat crop fails in Manitoba. We have had seasons of that kind; we have had such seasons in Ontario. Would it be right to say to the millers: You must keep your mills idle and not grind at all? I think it would be cruel in the extreme. When the crops are a failure, I think it is nothing but right that they should be allowed to import and grind in bond. I think it would be a hardship to shut out completely what they require as long as they carry on an honest trade and export that which they bring in for the purpose of grinding in bond.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have heard, Sir, some rather remarkable statements in this House, but I think the Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) may claim the credit of having made a more remarkable statement on trade questions than any other man I have ever listened to. When I heard him declare that it was part of the policy of the Mackenzie Government to allow the grinding of wheat in bond, and when I recollected that the Mackenzie Government had imposed no duty whatever on wheat, I find it impossible to understand how any regulation affecting the grinding in bond of wheat could have occurred under the Mackenzie Government. Wheat was imported perfectly free.

Mr. HAGGART. The regulation with reference to bonding was under your Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It may be but not for grinding wheat in bond.

Mr. DAVIN. After the interesting debate we have had, and knowing, as I do, that not very much wheat comes in, and having the promise of consideration by the Government, I do not think I shall put the House to the trouble of dividing on this motion, and with the permission of the House I will withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons further papers respecting the several questions at issue between the Dominion of Canada and the colony of Newfoundland.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, March, 1893.

ADJOURNMENT—TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the House do now adjourn, and I do so for two reasons. The first is that to-morrow we are to have the beginning of the second edition of a debate upon tariff matters, and if my hon. friend will agree with me, I should like to have this debate go on de die in diem until we finish it. It will be a motion of an amendment to go into Supply, and we may have to have a late sitting. Another reason is that I promised my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I., whom I do not see in his place, that I would make a statement in reference to the French treaty; and I desire to do it as briefly as possible consistent with clearness. It will be within the memory of those who have followed the course of French legislation, that for ten years, at least, previous to 1892, the French tariff consisted of two lines, a general tariff and a conventional tariff, the general tariff being against all countries with which France had not any special treaties, either most-favoured-nation clause treaties in whole, or treaties which took in a partial list of their articles, and upon which partial list they had the lower tariff. About a year ago or so previous to 1892, the French Government and Chambers came to the conclusion to revise their tariff, and they did it by way of making two columns in their tariff, a maximum and a minimum column. They also came to the conclusion to terminate all treaties of whatever kind that existed between France and other nations, involving most-favoured-nation treatment. These treaties were due to expire at about that time, and after the year's notice was given, I think nearly all, if not quite all, the treaties were dropped. That year's notice was given for the 1st January, 1892, the purpose of the French Government being then, in having this maximum tariff and minimum tariff, to give to whatever country they could make terms with favourable to their own trade, either the whole or a partial list of articles on the minimum tariff rate. It is also a fact which ought to be borne in mind in considering this treaty, that upon a very large proportion of the articles the minimum scale of the new tariff is actually as high, and in many cases higher, than was the general scale in the tariff before 1892. I mention that because it is necessary to bear in mind what tariff articles exported from this country under the treaty will have to meet, even though these articles are let in at the minimum rate. The articles are set forth in the treaty which has been brought down to the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not been printed, I think.

Mr. FOSTER. It is in the printers' hands, I suppose. The articles on the part of Canada are those, mainly, which have for a number of years constituted about the only articles by rebate in which we could hope to influence France to give us more favourable terms in her market, that is, the article of wines. Three several attempts have been made within twelve or thirteen years to negotiate a treaty with France, and in each one of these the 30 per cent ad valorem upon wines has been used as a lever to induce France to give Canada better treatment with reference to certain articles which we might be able to export. These also have been made use of in the formation of this draft treaty. Non-sparkling wines, containing 15 degrees of alcohol, by the method of measurement in France, and equivalent, by the Canadian system of testing, to 26 degrees or less of alcohol, and all sparkling wines, are exempted from the surtaxe of 30 per cent ad valorem, leaving the specific duties still remaining on those lines. Then out of the number of articles which we were urged by the French negotiators to be admitted at a less duty, a few have been allowed, such as soaps, nuts, almonds, prunes and plums. With reference to soaps the clause reads:

The present duty charged on common soaps, savons de Marseilles, castile soaps, shall be reduced by one-half.

As that clause reads, one would think that it meant that common soaps from France, as well as savons de Marseilles, or castile soaps, were to be let in at this reduced rate, but a perusal of the negotiations as they progressed from day to day, shows that it is castile soap that was meant; and if the treaty is confirmed in accordance with the project which was submitted by the French negotiations, the words savons de Marseilles, or castile soaps, are simply used as explanatory of the soap which is to be allowed into this country at the reduced rate. As I have said, the duties on castile soaps, nuts, almonds, prunes and plums are to be reduced by one-third. On the other hand, among the various articles which were negotiated for by the British and Canadian negotiators, a certain number have been admitted to the minimum tariff. Among these are canned meats: condensed milk, pure; fresh-water fish, also fish preserved in natural form. "au naturel," lobsters and crayfish, preserved in natural form; apples and pears, fresh, also dried and fresh; preserved fruits, others—that is, "others" refer to the articles in the French treaty, where preserved fruits are under three headings, I think, namely, those that are preserved in sugar, honey or spirits, and fruits, preserved, "others," include, it would appear from the reading of the latter article, the latter class of fruits. "preserved fruits, others," meaning those not preserved in sugar, honey or spirits; building timber, in the rough or sawn, the sawn timber running up from a minimum thickness to a little over three inches; wooden pavement, staves—which was the translation of the French word merrains, which, I think, means stave-wood, not the completed staves, but wood for staves—wood pulp, extracts of chestnut and other tanning extracts; common paper, machine made; prepared skins, whole; boots and shoes; furniture of common wood; furniture, other than chairs of solid wood; wooden sea-going ships. These are the articles which are admitted to the minimum tariff. Now, it is only fair to take these articles and show how the minimum tariff upon them compares with the old tariff in force up to 1892 with the maximum tariff under the tariff law, which came into force in January, last year. The comparison is as follows:—

Articles.	Old Tariff, General.	Present Tariff, Maximum.	Present Tariff, Minimum.
Common paper, machine made.	11	13	10
Prepared skins, others whole.	50	50	25
Boots and shoes.	75 to 2 francs.	1 to 2½ francs.	75 to 2 francs.
Furniture of common wood.	5	6	5
Furniture other than chairs of solid wood, common.	7	11	9
Other chairs.	15	30	20
Wooden sea-going ships.	2	5	2

I thought it was necessary and only fair to read those figures, to show to the House the proportion which the present minimum tariff bears as regards those articles to the old general tariff; and the fact is simply this: that, in revising their tariff, the French Chambers largely advanced it on the old tariff, making the minimum either pretty nearly equal, or in many cases higher than the old general tariff, and then applying to other countries and saying to them: "Now, if you will treat with us and give us certain modifications, we will give you our new minimum tariff." Below the minimum tariff they do not go. I next desire to come to a consideration of the gain or loss, so far as it can be got at roughly, and it can only be got at roughly, involved in these interchanges. Take, for instance, the articles on which we are obtaining the minimum tariff, such as are laid down in the treaty, and the reduction of duty, on the basis of the trade of 1891-92 from our own books, below what would be the maximum rate we would have to pay on any exportations from this country that would find their way to France, is on the whole 157,443 francs, equivalent to $30,416. That may be taken roughly as the reduction that France gives us on those articles. Taking the 30 per cent ad valorem on wines, sparkling and non-sparkling, and almonds, nuts, prunes and plums, soaps, common and castile, as I see them on this list, the fact is, I think, that we get nothing but castile soap from France, so that that does not disturb the calculation—we give off in that respect $82,929. That is, on the article so far as I have read, France reduces $30,416 and we reduce $82,929. But Sir Charles Tupper found, as of course we might expect he would find, in going into the trade returns of the French imports, that the quantities were much larger than were shown by our exports, so that this comparison that I have read is not quite fair in this, that we used our own table of imports, which is chiefly and mainly correct, while we used our table of exports to France, which is not so correct by any means, and if we were to take the French table of imports in these articles in which—especially in the matter of lumber—they give a much larger quantity than our exports show. So that while the $82,929 would be the maximum of our loss, the $30,416 is not by any means the maximum of the loss to the French customs. However, there was another point in which France made concessions to Canada. That was in the trade of the colonies. Before 1892 the colonies had a tariff of their own, but, under the legislation of 1892, the tariffs for the colonies and the tariffs for the metropolitan country of France itself, were made the same, so that the maximum and minimum tariff applies to the French colonies, and would apply amongst others to the French colony of St. Pierre and Miquelon. After February, 1893, if the tariff had remained without change, St. Pierre and Miquelon would have been under the maximum and minimum tariff of France, and our products would have been largely shut out from that country, so far as a high tariff supervening upon a very small tariff of 3 per cent before, would have the effect of doing that. France also gave, not a minimum tariff but an arrangement away below the minimum tariff for the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, allowing a long list of articles, either free or at a very low tariff. For instance, coal, which under the general tariff would have been 12 francs, is made free; salt, which would have been 2 francs and 40 centimes, is made free; salted herrings, which would have been 15 francs, is made free; staves, which would have been 75 centimes, is made free; horned cattle, 30 francs per head, free; pigs, 8 francs per head, free; and sheep, poultry, eggs and meats also made free.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. LAURIER. These articles are not included in the treaty.

Mr. FOSTER. I am coming to that explanation. I am stating this showing that France made that arrangement as regards St. Pierre and Miquelon. Pork, 12 francs under the general tariff, is made free; oats, 3 francs before, is now half a franc; flour, 10 francs a barrel before, is now 35 centimes; hay, 30 centimes against 50 formerly; potatoes, free, against 40 centimes; sea-going ships free, against 2 francs; tobacco, 150 francs, against 1,500 francs; tea, 9 francs, against 20. The whole abatement under this arrangement of duty for our trade of 1891, from Canada to St. Pierre and Miquelon, would amount to 178,929 francs, or $34,533. So that that has also to be taken into consideration in calculating the amount of duties mutually given off by the two parties to this agreement. Now, it is only fair to state this as well: That the proclamation by which this reduction in tariff rates is made for St. Pierre and Miquelon is a proclamation which leaves that trade in these articles open on these terms to the whole world, as well as to Canada. From the correspondence as it went on, Council was of the opinion that that was to be as compensation to Canada as far as these articles are concerned, but the decree which was promulgated, and which reached us, I think in the latter part of January, shows that the proclamation was made general, and that these articles, as far as St. Pierre and Miquelon is concerned, came in at the lower rate. They, however, come from any country as well as from Canada. The facts are, I suppose, that the trade must mainly belong to Canada because of its proximity to these islands; its being near, producing these articles, and therefore getting the larger part of the trade. Now, I wish to state also, that this treaty contains two clauses with reference to what you might call "Third Power" treatment. With reference to the Canadian articles, France binds herself to give to Canada the same terms in regard to the articles mentioned in the treaty that she gives to any "more favoured" nation. On the other hand, as the treaty is signed, Canada agrees to give France "most-favoured-nation" treatment, not only on the articles that are mentioned, but on any articles of her tariff in which she gives better terms to any other country. That was not the intention of the Government, as will be seen by a telegram which was sent to our Commissioner in January, in which it was expressly stated that we agreed to the "most-favoured-nation" treatment, so far only as articles named in the treaty are concerned. Our Commissioner, either through error or for reasons which he explains in his correspondence, signed the treaty with the clause in it as I have read, giving "most-favoured-nation" treatment to France in all articles of our tariff. The papers which I will lay on the Table of the House will explain how that came about. There is this also to be stated: That since the treaty was made, an important change has taken place in the legislation in France with reference to ships. In olden time it was considered by Canada to be of very great moment, that she should get her wooden ships into France at a favourable rate, and the old negotiations proceeded upon that plane. Since that time the duty upon foreign ships has been largely reduced in France, so that now the maximum is 5 francs and the minimum 2 francs, reduced you may say to a nominal duty. Circumstances have also somewhat changed since 1878, so that that does not become so important to us. But ships was one of the articles which were mentioned in the treaty and which we were to have admitted at the minimum rate. But since this draft treaty was agreed upon, French legislation has intervened which makes that compensation to us of less value even than it would have been had this legislation not taken place. France has for a number of years paid a bounty upon the construction of wooden vessels, and a bounty upon the sailing of both wooden and iron vessels; and the legislation which has taken place within the last few weeks has been of such a kind as largely to increase the construction bounty upon wooden ships in France, as well as largely to increase the sailing bounty, and it has made it imperative that the sailing bounty shall not be given to vessels constructed outside of France which may be bought by the citizens of France. So that, in so far as we had hoped for compensation on the article of wooden ships, that legislation has been in the direction of nullifying any benefit that we had expected to gain in that respect. My attention was drawn to that in reading some of the English papers, and I immediately had Mr. Fabre communicated with; and he sent me a copy of the French law, which I will bring down with the papers I intend to lay on the Table of the House. Now, there is another point to be mentioned, that is, as to what is the meaning of certain clauses in this treaty. From the representations that came to us from time to time through Sir Charles Tupper, our negotiator, we formed certain ideas as to what was to be admitted. The wording of the treaty raises a doubt as to whether certain articles in their entirety are to be admitted under the treaty. For instance there is mentioned fish preserved in their natural form, and lobsters preserved in their natural form. Take lobsters as an illustration or example of what I am about to say. If the treaty means that we are not to have the minimum tariff in France except upon lobsters in their natural form, then that is of very little benefit to Canada. But as the negotiations progressed, the representations that came to us were that canned lobsters were to enjoy the benefit of the minimum tariff, which certainly would have been a large concession, so far as we were concerned; and the question to be set at rest now is, as to whether the wording of the treaty as it is signed extends to canned lobsters the benefit of the minimum tariff, or whether that is confined, as it would appear to be from the simple words of the treaty, to lobsters in their natural form. The same was the case with reference to fish preserved in their natural form, which would refer mainly to pickled fish, probably to sardines, but would not include, for instance, canned salmon, which we had thought would certainly be included. There are two or three similar matters which remain in doubt; but I cite these instances as a basis for the remark which is to follow and that is, that immediately upon our receipt of a copy of this treaty we opened up communication with our negotiators so as to get an authoritative understanding as to these matters of which I have spoken, and we called attention to the change that had been made in French legislation with reference to ships, and also to the fact that the advantages of a low tariff as to St. Pierre and Miquelon were not confined to

Mr. FOSTER.

Canada, but were thrown open to the world. Under these circumstances I am not prepared at present to ask Parliament to ratify this treaty. The treaty is signed subject to the ratification of the Canadian Parliament, and I make this full and frank exposition of the treaty in order that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House may look into it and consider it, for it requires a little consideration, in order to see just what the effect of the treaty is in these different particulars. And certainly, until we receive more satisfactory assurances than we have as regards these items of which I have spoken, I shall not ask the House to ratify the treaty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You will have it printed, I suppose?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. I submit to the House that if anything ought to convince Parliament that Canada has now reached a stage when she should be entrusted with the power of negotiating her own commercial treaties, the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman to-night ought to confirm that impression. It is now ten years or more since we have had on the tapis a treaty with France, and after this long period we are presented with a treaty which is most deceptive—so deceptive, indeed, that the hon. gentleman will not present it for ratification to the House. I do not blame him for this, because I share a good deal of what he has himself said. I am one of those who hailed with joy the announcement made a few days ago that at last the British commissioners had succeeded in getting a treaty for us with France; but when I came to look at the treaty, though I must say I did so in a very cursory manner, I was struck with the fact that the treaty contained almost absolutely nothing for Canada. In the first place, last year France adopted a National Policy in the shape of a protective tariff, and a protective tariff with a vengeance. The minimum rate of the present tariff in France is in almost every part higher than was the previous tariff. So that if under the previous tariff we were unable to have any considerable commerce with France, if under it our exports to France reached, in fact, only a little more than $350,000, we cannot hope that our exports will be increased at all under the present arrangement, even if we have the benefit of the minimum tariff. Therefore, we should have almost no benefit at all. On the other hand, there is this clause in the treaty which is most obnoxious, that if we ratified this treaty we should ipso facto extend to France the privilege of any treaty that we should negotiate with any other country. Well, we expect to negotiate a treaty with the United States at some time or other, I hope before long, and every one will agree with me that the commerce of the United States would be a hundred fold more advantageous to us than the treaty with France; yet, if we had a treaty with the United States, the benefit of it would be largely destroyed from the fact that France could come in and share the advantages we gave to the United States. We could, of course, put an end to the treaty by giving twelve months' notice to the French Government; but there seems to me to be one great deficiency in the treaty. We would have expected in a treaty negotiated with France to have had the benefit of the French market, especially for agricultural products, which are the staples of this country, and yet agricultural products are altogether omitted from the treaty. The only article in the way of agricultural products mentioned in it is apples. I do not know whether there is a minimum tariff in France on apples.

Mr. FOSTER. The minimum is 2, and the maximum 3 for fresh, and the minimum 10 and the maximum 15 for dry apples.

Mr. LAURIER. The article of the greatest consequence to us, next to agricultural products, is lumber. The advantage we receive from the minimum tariff is purely nominal. The maximum tariff in lumber is 1 franc, 50 centimes and 2 francs, 50 centimes per 100 kilos, according to certain qualities and dimensions, whereas the minimum tariff is 1 franc, 50 centimes and 1 franc, giving us an advantage of only 50 centimes, or 10 cents in the one case, and in the other the minimum tariff is 2 francs 50 centimes, and 1 franc 75 centimes, giving us an advantage of 15 cents per kilos. Under these circumstances the average is not appreciable. The difference is so small, when we consider that lumber is such a bulky article, that it is impossible to suppose we have any appreciable benefit. The hon. gentleman himself has shown to the House that, in the matter of ships, there is no advantage whatever. The bounty which is given to French-built ships makes the treaty in that respect perfectly nugatory. Then, with regard to fish, it is to be remembered that the advantage is confined simply to fresh water fish, and not to salt water fish. Well, I am sure we do not export to France or any other country fresh water fish. The treaty would have been of some benefit had it been extended to salt water as well as fresh water fish. Cheese and butter are also not included. On the other hand we reduce the duties upon the following French articles: wines, nuts, almonds, plums and soaps. It is impossible to have a direct trade with France if the treaty is limited to those articles. It would be almost impossible to have return cargoes, if the articles upon which we reduce our tariff are limited to wines, nuts, almonds, plums and soaps. Under those circumstances, while I do not pretend to pass a final opinion on the treaty, I am not surprised to find that the hon. gentleman is not prepared to ask the House to confirm it. I hope the hon. gentleman will lay on the Table for discussion, at all events, the negotiations which have taken place, which, I understand, he has in his hand.

Mr. FOSTER. All those that are material.

Mr. LAURIER. Those that are material are all those that took place.

Mr. FOSTER. Everything necessary to understand it.

Mr. LAURIER. It is better, judging from past experience, to have all the negotiations, because otherwise we may have contradictions from one country to the other as to what really took place. If the hon. gentleman wants to do himself justice he should put all the negotiations before the House. I suppose he will lay on the Table a copy of the French tariff, which he has in his hands.

Mr. FOSTER. There is one point that I missed, and which it is necessary to know in order to have a fair understanding on the matter. France is, if she holds to anything, holds to what she calls the "surtaxe d'entrepot," and that consequently of these articles not one can be exported from Canada into France if it touches at a European third port. They can be sent direct from here to France, or direct from an American port to a French port, but if they touch any other European port and are transhipped from that place, a surtaxe d'entrepot of 3 francs 50 centimes for every 100 kilogrammes is levied. It was with respect to that we wish to have a fast line of steamers between this country and the French ports. There are one or two other things to which I may draw attention. Preserved fish are allowed to go in under the treaty. My hon. friend speaks of cheese. There is a supplementary letter, which is attached, I think, to the treaty, or is in the correspondence laid on the Table, in which the French Government propose to give us a minimum on cheese, provided we give them a reduction on certain painting and designs. It is one of the articles of the treaty on which they wish a deduction, article 380. Then, with reference to lumber, although my hon. friend spoke of the difference between the minimum tariff and the maximum tariff as being small, yet the lumbermen with whom I have conversed tell me it will just afford them a chance to do trade against the chance not to trade and they are waiting with interest the ratification of the treaty to enable them to make sales in France. A very small margin upon 100 kilogrammes in lumber makes all the difference between being able to purchase or not for the French market. Then, as regards agricultural products, you might as well try to extract blood from a stone almost as to extract any concession from France upon agricultural products. If my hon. friend will go through the whole list of agricultural products, he will find that, with very few exceptions, there is no minimum tariff, but simply the one tariff. Agricultural protection is the one thing France has pushed to the forefront in the tariff she has made, so that it was impossible to get any minimum tariff on the large range of agricultural products, simply because no such minimum tariff exists on those products in the French treaty. With regard to sea fish, my hon. friend will see why France is unwilling to give any facilities to the importation of foreign sea fish, when she goes to such trouble, by her own fish marine and by paying out bounties, to encourage her own fishermen. The hon. gentleman started out with a criticism on the ground of our not being able to negotiate our own treaty. This treaty was negotiated wholly and solely by our own commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper. He was commissioner with the Earl of Dufferin in the matter, but the whole brunt of the negotiations fell upon him. Then what I omitted to mention and what my hon. friend supplied was that the treaty might be terminated on one year's notice. So that with reference to most of the countries with which we could form a treaty, that is with which Great Britain would have most favoured-nation treaties, for instance, notice could be given to terminate the French treaty before the desired treaty could become operative, and at least at any time it could be terminated on one year's notice. There is just one thing that my hon. friend says: True, under the treaty you would have the advantage of the French minimum tariff but that minimum tariff is higher than the old general tariff. That may be, but that is the lowest tariff for which anything could be got into France, and if, out of fifty countries forty-five of them have not the minimum tariff while five have, the trade rendered necessary by the consumption of France is thrown into the competition of the five and very great benefit comes of that at the present time. For instance, Norway and Sweden have the minimum tariff, and consequently they do a large lumber trade with France. We cannot compete for that trade, because the new tariff shuts us out, while they are allowed in. This minimum tariff would place us on a footing that would allow us to compete for a large lumber trade with France. I only mention that as a matter worthy of notice.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). The most serious objection to this treaty has not been mentioned, and that is its effect upon an important Canadian industry. I refer to the native wine industry. When I was last in Toronto, I met a large deputation of gentlemen interested in this business and they say they would suffer material damage by this treaty were it to come into force, and they contend that it should not be allowed to come into force without giving them an opportunity of being heard. When the Government, especially now that they have a Department of Trade and Commerce propose a change of this kind, they should take the greatest care to ascertain how the representatives of the Canadian industries that will be affected by it regard it. The wine growers of Ontario represent a very large industry. The whole

Mr. FOSTER.

Niagara peninsula, the Essex peninsula and Pelee Island will send representatives down to Ottawa this week to lay before the Government their facts as to the effect of this treaty upon their industry.

Mr. EDGAR. This is another instance of the old story of the labouring mountain and the ridiculous mouse. As even the Finance Minister expresses doubts as to the advantage to Canada from the proposed treaty I shall not say anything about that part of the question but I would like to draw his attention for a moment to the advantages we propose to give to France under that treaty and to understand a little more about them than I do now. The treaty proposes that wines, &c., of French origin entering Canada shall enter at certain reductions of duty. Now, I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, whether that means, as it says on the face, that we shall discriminate in favour of France to that extent against other nations, including England and the nations with which she has most-favoured-nation treaties. I think that is an exceedingly important matter, because I can hardly conceive it possible that France would for one moment entertain the idea of giving Canada any advantages if she was told frankly by our negotiator that the advantages which we purpose to give her in favour of her wines and nuts and fruits would also be shared by other nations. Now, is it proposed to discriminate in favour of France or not? If it is proposed to discriminate in favour of France in this respect, then there is an end absolutely and forever to any objection on the part of this Government to discriminating in favour of the United States under a reciprocity treaty. That is perfectly clear. But if there was no intention to discriminate in the way the language of the treaty would imply, I wonder if France knew about it. I wonder if France understood that when we come to carry out this treaty by amendments to the custom law we would take off the 30 per cent ad volorem duty on wines imported from Germany for instance. Because if we are bound by the treaties that England has made with other countries on the favoured nations basis and including Canada in their terms, then we are bound to give Germany and a dozen other countries the same advantages, the same tariff as we give France. I wonder what value France would attach to it if we were to do that. There can be no doubt upon this subject, because, a session or two ago, discussing the treaties, which, at the suggestion of the Ministry, we asked the English Government to denounce, so far as Canada was concerned—treaties with Belgium and Germany—the First Minister explained the terms of the treaty in this House. He said:

So that if in any other country Canada, with the consent of Great Britain, makes a reciprocity treaty or a preferential arrangement for trade we shall be obliged by these clauses to give to the German States of the Zollverein the same changes, differentiations or advantages we give to this third power.

Now, I think it can hardly be believed that France would consent to allow Germany to enjoy the same privileges—Germany of all countries of the world. It is not an immaterial thing to allow Germany to share in these advantages, because I find from the Trade and Navigation Returns that a considerable proportion of the wine of the class mentioned in the treaty is imported into Canada from Germany. And surely Canada would not discriminate in favour of France as against Great Britain, and, as matters now stand, a large quantity of wine is imported from Britain to Canada yearly. I see by the Trade and Navigation Returns that nearly nine-tenths of the nuts, almonds, dried prunes and plums that it is proposed to admit under this treaty with France, are now imported from the United States; so that it would be giving the present Government of the United States, to put it in the mildest form that the hon. gentleman chooses, a tremendous slap in the face at the very first favourable opportunity, in those very importations from that country. So I think that it would throw a good deal of light upon that subject if the Minister would tell us what the Government's intention is towards France.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend had asked for the information, without making deductions of his own, and founding a speech upon them, it might have been better. I can answer him in two simple sentences. We propose to discriminate neither against Great Britain, the United States, Germany, Belgium, nor, under our present intention, any other country in the world. My hon. friend wondered if France knew it. She knew it, and agreed to the treaty under that very well-known proposition.

Mr. EDGAR. These articles go on the free list.

Mr. FOSTER. No; they go on the list of the reduced tariff.

Mr. HAGGART. When I was making some remarks a few moments ago, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) replied to me as if I had made a misquotation, when I stated that the Mackenzie Government, in 1877, placed upon the Statute-book a law under which bonding privileges were used in Canada. He said it was one of the most extraordinary statements he ever heard among the extraordinary ones that he had heard me make in this House. Let me read from the statutes 40 Vic., chap. 10, section 59, passed in 1877:

The importer of any cattle or swine may slaughter and cure and pack the same (or if such cattle or swine are imported in the carcass, may cure and pack the same) in bond; and the importer of any wheat, maize or other grain may grind and pack the same in bond; provided such slaughtering, curing, grinding and packing be done and conducted under such regulations and restrictions as the Governor in Council may, from time to time, make for this purpose; and the said regulations may extend to the substitution of beef and pork, flour and meal in quantities equivalent to the produce of such cattle and swine, wheat, maize or other grain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What matter does it make if there was no duty on wheat, I should like to know?

Mr. HAGGART. I did not say anything about the matter; I said that the grinding in bond was done under a statute passed by you when you were in the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say it does not matter a straw, inasmuch as the whole point at issue was, whether there was any provision for the grinding of wheat in bond which could affect, in the slightest degree, the right of importation. It could not affect the right of importation in the slightest way.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Will the Government inform us if Sir Charles Tupper is going to continue his treaty-making with Spain?

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to inquire whether the Government propose to go on with the motion regarding the tariff "de die in diem."

Mr. FOSTER. I said I would like to do so if my hon. friend will agree.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman will bear in mind that we have not had a day for a private members' business now for three weeks. Through the indulgence of the House these days were granted to the Government in order to facilitate the departure of the Premier, and if the day is taken on Wednesday next, I suppose we shall have no further opportunity at all for private business. I think the Government are hardly treating fairly the private members of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. We can arrange that tomorrow.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend and leader laid down the proposition that this treaty showed the necessity of our obtaining independent treaty-making powers. While I am fully in accord with the general principle I can hardly say that the present attempt at treaty making, which the hon. Minister of Finance said was done entirely by Sir Charles Tupper, is very encouraging as to the nature of the treaties we would obtain under these circumstances. The hon. gentleman has been ten years nibbling away at this dry bone, and he has got very little out of it. He has been negotiating with France, negotiating with Spain, and negotiating with the United States, and although he has succeeded in obtaining this sort of treaty with France the attempt to obtain a treaty with the United States was abandoned on the first sign of difficulty. If Sir Charles Tupper and the Finance Minister, in their negotiations with the United States, whatever these may have been—we do not seem to be able to ascertain exactly what they were—had signed a treaty containing any such ludicrous and absurd proposals as he has presented to this House, I think they would have put themselves in a very awkward position. I say that it is quite time to stop this farce of pretending to make treaties abroad while we neglect the grand market that is open at our very door. There is no doubt that a treaty on advantageous terms to Canada could be obtained with the United States, without any more discrimination against England or any other country, than this treaty already signed by Sir Charles Tupper would involve. There is one thing that has been forgotten by those who have spoken, that is the difficulty of proving the French origin of goods which are to come in at reduced rates. I do not see how that could be established when they come from other countries here. Again, it must not be forgotten that any reduction of duty on particular articles, as long as we do not reduce our expenses accordingly, necessarily involves an increased taxation on something else. Now, if the duty on wines imported from France has amounted to anything worth while, we would have to make that up by taxation on some other things; and it would just amount to this: that the class of people who do not use wines would have to pay for the loss of revenue heretofore collected on light wines imported. Although it seems likely that we shall not be asked to ratify this treaty, I think such a proposal in itself calls for extended discussion and condemnation by the House, and I regret that we have no other chance to discuss it than on a motion to adjourn at this late hour.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. LaRIVIERE presented the third report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates, as follows:—

The Committee have had under consideration the question of remuneration to be paid Mr. A. C. Campbell, whose appointment as temporary substitute on the Official Reporting Staff was approved of by the House, on the 8th ultimo; and recommend that he be paid the sum of $1,200 for his services during the present session.

The Committee, owing to the increased amount of work which had to be done in connection with the translation into English of the speeches delivered in the French language, and also with the view of avoiding delays in the printing of the English revised edition, found it necessary to employ temporary assistance and recommend that Mr. Frank Hughes, who was engaged for that purpose, be paid at the rate of $2 per page of 2 columns.

The Committee submit, for the information of the House, the following comparative statement of the cost of publishing the Official Report of the Debates of the sessions of 1891 and 1892, viz.:—

	Session 1891.	Session 1892.
Reporters.....	$17,000 00	$16,985 82
Amanuenses.....	3,720 00	3,203 00
Translators.....	13,825 12	10,200 00
Printing, binding and paper.	24,064 49	16,622 24
Miscellaneous.....	115 70	299 99
	$58,725 31	$47,311 05

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be well if the hon. gentleman would consent to let that lie over.

POSTING OF PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis) moved:

That in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders and the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, the time for posting private Bills under the 60th Rule, be reduced from one week to two days, such reduction to apply to all Bills posted on or after Friday, the 10th inst.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This seems to be really offering a premium to parties to delay coming here for legislation to the last possible moment, and I would call the attention of the Government to the practice which seems to be a very bad one.

Mr. SCRIVER. I may say, as a member of the Committee on Standing Orders, that the circumstances which led to this recommendation was stated to the committee, and it appeared to the committee that the delay was a result of unavoidable accident, and that the House ought to entertain the application for the suspension of the rule. I quite agree that the departures from the salutary rules which exist for the government of the Committee on Standing Orders have been departed from in too many instances in the present session, and, so far as I am concerned, if I should live for another session, and be again a member of the committee, I shall, so far as it is in my power, insist on a more rigid observance of these rules than has prevailed during the present session.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 96) to consolidate and amend certain Acts relating to the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Mills, Annapolis.)

Bill (No. 97) to amend the Act respecting the Harbour and River Police of the province of Quebec.—(Mr. Costigan.)

RELIEF OF R. Y. HEBDEN.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis) moved :

That Bill (No. 94) for the relief of R. Y. Hebden, be placed on the Order Paper for second reading on Wednesday, the 15th of March.

Motion agreed to.

CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. CASEY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct attention to a matter which I had intended to bring up yesterday, but was unable to do so through a misunderstanding as to the point at which the Orders of the Day began. I refer to certain statements alleged to have been made by the Controller of Customs at the meeting in Kingston of Saturday evening last, in which he referred to the action of the Ulster men—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is, I am afraid, bringing up a subject which will provoke discussion, and I have ruled upon former occasions that, upon the calling of the Orders of the Day, no matters can be brought up which will provoke discussion.

Mr. CASEY. I was just going to explain my object in bringing the matter up. I had intended to call attention to the matter, but, as the Controller of Customs is not here to-day, there will be no use in bringing it up, but I give notice that I will do so on the first opportunity when the hon. gentleman is in the House.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. LAURIER. The Minister of Finance has forgotten to put on the Table the papers he referred to yesterday in the discussion of the French treaty.

Mr. FOSTER. When I looked over the papers last night, I found they were not as complete as I wished to make them, and am having the others copied to-day. I have no objection, however, to bringing down those I quoted last night, and will do so this evening.

Mr. LAURIER. I am glad the hon. gentleman has other papers. I was under the impression, from what he said last night, that they were already too complete.

COUNTY COURT JUDGE, WELLAND.

Mr. LAURIER. I am informed that the judge of the county court of the county of Welland died a month ago, and that the vacancy has not been filled, and that great public inconvenience is felt in consequence.

Mr. FOSTER. The vacancy has been filled.

Mr. LAURIER. When ?

Mr. OUIMET. Saturday.

Mr. MULOCK. Who is the appointee ?

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. Fitzgerald.

DISMISSAL OF THE POSTMASTER OF ST. LEON.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to point out to the hon. Postmaster-General that nearly a month ago, I asked for a return including all the documents respecting the dismissal of the postmaster of St. Léon. I should like to inquire from the hon. Minister whether these papers will soon be laid on the Table of the House. I should not like to charge the Government with negligence, but it seems to me that it is taking a good deal of time.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) I may say to the hon. member that the order to prepare these papers has been given. The hon. member will find, no doubt, that they contain very little information. The only papers that cannot be laid on the Table of the House, according to a rule invariably followed so far, are the confidential reports of the inspectors ; these reports are never communicated outside the department. I think those of these papers that can be communicated to the House will be brought down tomorrow.

SUPPLY—TARIFF REFORM.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. McCARTHY. I beg to move, in amendment, the resolution of which I had the honour to give notice to the House, and which has been for some days on our Votes and Proceedings. I make no apology, Sir, for bringing up this question, although the subject of the tariff has largely engaged the attention of the House for many days, and been spoken to, and perhaps very fully discussed, by members on both sides. I say I make no apology, Sir, because I regard it from a different point from that which the matter has been treated up to this time. The question has been debated on both sides of the House with reference to the antagonistic position which the members supporting the Government and the members who are opposed to the Administration have always taken with regard to the question of the tariff. On one side it seems rather to be dealt with as if the policy of protection had now become one of the prominent planks of the Conservative platform, while, on the other side, it has been dealt with as if free trade had always been and still was a cardinal principle to which hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House adhered. But, Sir, I am one of those who, in a humble way, it is true, but still as a member of this House, have been responsible from the very first, from the very initiation of the principle which ultimately came to be known as the National Policy. I say I am one of those who supported that principle in its early days, during the very earliest time in which I had the honour of a seat in this House, and who, from time to time, though perhaps not very prominently, has continued to give his adherence and support to the principles which have been known throughout this Dominion as the National Policy. And, Sir, it is because I think the time has come when we ought to reconsider, or, at all events, to consider, the position which the country holds with respect to the trade policy that I venture to ask the attention of the House to the statement which I propose to make, and to the principle which I propose to adduce in support of the conclusion which, from the notice I have given, it is sufficiently apparent my mind has already reached. Now, Sir, the National Policy, as it came to be known, was not thought of at all, was not advocated in this Parliament, at least, I think, until the year 1876. But from 1876 onward, during the session of that year and the two succeeding sessions of 1877 and 1878, and, finally, upon the resolution of the last named year, the principles which are known and spoken of as the National Policy were set forth by the then leader of the Opposition, the late Rt. Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. These principles were accepted by his followers in the House, and were ultimately adopted by the country, and crystallized into law in the session of 1879. And now I desire, Sir, to recall what it was that those who supported that policy expected as the result of the change which they advocated, what they expected would eventuate from it, and I want to see whether or not, and to what extent, the anticipations which were then formed have been justified by the result. Now, Sir, I think I am perfectly right in saying that, at all events, up to the last session of the Parliament in which the National Policy, as I say, was adopted through the resolution which was moved, it was never very strongly contended, or if was very strongly contended it was by a comparatively small minority of the members of this House, that the system of protection was, in itself, a very desirable system. The system of protection, Sir, was advocated and supported as one called for by the exigencies of the occasion, and not called for, and not justified as good in itself, and not one which, in the abstract, met with the support or approval of the majority of the members who, at that time, advocated the National Policy. I do not think, Sir, that it can be questioned that the great leader of the party to which I have had the honour to belong was not an advocate of protection as opposed to free trade. On the contrary, as his speeches at that time indicate, and as those who were intimate with him and knew his personal views are aware, his views were those of a free trader, his views were those of a statesman who thought that while free trade, in the abstract, was the correct and proper theory, he ultimately came, and, perhaps, not very hastily, but by slow degrees, to the conclusion that, under the circumstances which then prevailed, the system of protection might well be justified and urged as the proper system for this country to adopt. I would recall the attention of the House, even at the expense of reading the resolution of that early day, to the three resolutions which were moved by the then leader of the Opposition, Sir John Macdonald, one in 1876, one in 1877, and the final resolution in 1878. And they very fairly, I think, indicate the change that was going on in the mind of that statesman, as well as the change that was going on in the feeling of the country, or, at least, in what was then believed—and it proved rightly believed—to be the feeling of the country in regard to this question of protection, as opposed to free trade. In 1876, the resolution was as follows:—

That this House regrets that His Excellency the Governor-General has not been advised to recommend to Parliament a measure for the readjustment of the tariff, which would not only aid to alleviate the stagnation of business deplored in the gracious Speech from the Throne, but also afford fitting encouragement and protection to the struggling manufactures and industries as well as the agricultural products of the country.

It will be observed that the resolution of 1877 was somewhat bolder in tone, and the climax was reached when the resolution of 1878 was proposed as embodying the belief of the then Opposition. In 1877, the resolution was as follows:—

That this House regrets that the financial policy submitted by the Government increases the burthen of taxation on the people without any compensating advantage to Canadian industries; and, further, that this House is of opinion that the deficiency in the revenue should be met by a diminution of expenditure, aided by such readjustment of the tariff as will benefit and foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of the Dominion.

The resolution of 1876 was in favour of protecting the struggling manufacturers and industries as well as the agricultural products of the country, but in 1877 the mining interests were also included among those to be protected under the policy it was proposed to ask the House and country to adopt. And finally, in the following year, we had the resolution upon which the election was fought, and upon which the battle in the country was won:

That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that this House is of opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity treaty.

That was the resolution, Sir, which was the embodiment of the wisdom of the Opposition of that day, and which found acceptance with the people of this country. In the speech of the right hon. gentleman who moved that resolution, we find that he made this observation concerning free trade, as compared with protection :

Now, free trade may be all very well in its way. In the abstract, free trade is the liberty of buying in the cheapest market, and selling in the dearest. In the abstract, it is a proposition not to be disputed ; but, when brought down to the concrete, when the needs of nations are considered, and the peculiar needs of Canada are considered, it is found impossible to carry it out.

So, I think I am right in saying that, even up to the last moment, the right hon. gentleman who moved the resolution was in favour, generally speaking, or in the abstract, to use his own language, of the policy of free trade as opposed to protection. Now, Sir, what did we expect from this policy of protection ? I am not going to repeat the language of the resolution, but I am going to deal with some public utterances of great moment upon which, very largely, I think, the Opposition went to the country, and upon which the Opposition succeeded in the end in securing a victory at the polls, which placed them in power. Some of the things which we expected were mentioned in the speech of Mr. Colby, and those who remember the debate on the subject will agree with me, I think, that Mr. Colby's speech was the ablest utterance which was given in support of the policy enunciated by the Opposition. Now, Mr. Colby was undoubtedly a protectionist, in that he differed from his leader, in that he differed from a great number of gentlemen who supported that resolution ; he was a protectionist in principle, and he supported the theory which was advanced on behalf of the Opposition on grounds which commended themselves to him as a protectionist. I do not think I will be dealing unfairly—and I desire not to deal unfairly in this matter, either with gentlemen on this side or on the other side of the Chamber—if I refer to Mr. Colby's speech, for the arguments which he used, and for the principles that he laid down, as justifying the policy that was then proposed ; and I shall afterwards endeavour to see to what extent the result justified Mr. Colby's anticipations. No clearer utterance was ever made on the floor of Parliament than that made by Mr. Colby in support of these views, and I perfectly well remember that so highly did we think of Mr. Colby's effort, that it was printed and circulated as a campaign sheet throughout the whole of the province from which I come, at all events, and I believe throughout the whole Dominion. Now, Mr. Colby laid down five or six principles in support of the view which he then advocated ; and before I come to these, I want it to be distinctly understood that I am not going to find fault, if in the end I do find fault at all, that the anticipations of other gentlemen have not been realized. There were speeches made on the stump—I do not think they were made in the House—but speeches were certainly made on the stump in which a much more bright view was pictured for the policy than Mr. Colby anticipated himself, or than sober-minded men who occupied seats in this Parliament at that time ever dreamed or imagined. Those gentlemen thought there would be tall chimneys in almost every village and town, and numerous tall chimneys in every city. They thought and advocated that the result of this policy would be to give to the farmer a home market for all he could produce ; that no matter what the prices might be in the markets of the world, no matter how low they might become, under the beneficent effects of the protective policy which was then to be inaugurated the farmer would always find a home market absolutely his own, without competition ; and consequently, whether his crop was large or small, whether the crop of the world was large or small, the farmer would always get a ready market at very considerable, or very high, prices. I am not going to condemn the policy because it has not answered these rather far-fetched anticipations ; but I do think I have a right to look at the utterances of a gentleman who occupied the very distinguished position that Mr. Colby did, whose speech was so satisfactory to those who agreed with him that his views became their platform, and his speech became their campaign document, throughout the contest which then supervened. Now, this was the first proposition that Mr. Colby laid down—and, I dare say, the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) will remember that he adopted the views which that gentleman held on the subject, a year or two earlier, as the views which had been best expounded to this House, and which most fully carried out the doctrines which he, as a protectionist, entertained. He laid down as a principle, in the first place, that it was specially necessary in a new country, such as ours, to enable it to compete with countries whose manufactures were already established. That was the foundation proposition which the hon. gentleman propounded in his very able address. The next proposition was, that judicious protection benefits the nation at large, and especially a few interests ; that it created for the farmer a home market ; that the purchasing power of labour was increased. The third proposition to which he gave in his adhesion was, that protection benefited the agricultural interests ; and he also believed that the purchasing power of the farmer and of the labourer would be vastly enhanced by the creation of home markets and proximity thereto. He further contended that the tendency of protection was not to increase, but to cheapen, prices to the consumer, and he put it very strongly, for he said :

This is an incontrovertible proposition. Protection is mainly a defence of the markets of the nation to the people of that nation. It simply gave a fair field to competitors seeking industry and capital, where the highest prices are for those who produce the best and sell the cheapest products.

And, finally, he used these words :

We who entertain protectionist principles hold that the ordinary effect of protection would not ultimately enhance the price of goods to the consumer. And why? Because, when an industry is protected, those engaged in that industry had an opportunity of making money, and the result was that others, finding an industry to be a profitable one, would embark their capital therein: thus competition would regulate prices. In this way rings could not be formed.

Now, these were the six propositions that Mr. Colby urged in a speech of very great power, and which found favour with the Opposition, and ultimately, I think, found favour with the country. It will be my business, before I close, to see to what extent the anticipations of Mr. Colby have been realized. I think I may add, as really embodied in what Mr. Colby then argued for, although not stated in terms, but plainly from the language he used, that it was not intended that the system of protection was to be permanent, that it was only for the purpose of establishing industries that it could be justified, and that, as soon as those industries had been established, recourse should then be had to the ordinary principle which all admit to be, in the abstract, correct, namely, the principle of free or freer trade. Now, I take this as my first proposition, that the time has now come, that there has now been a sufficient period—and in that I do not suppose I will meet with very much approval from either side of the House—I contend that the time has now come when we can say to these protected industries that were established in 1879, that, if they can live in Canada, they ought to be able to live, at all events, without any further protection than may be the result of a revenue tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite will, no doubt, say that that time had arrived long since. Their argument will be that it was not necessary to experiment with a National Policy, that it was not necessary for the establishment of those industries that there should be any protection whatever. For my part, I am not prepared to recede from the position I took in that early date of my political career; but I think the time has now come, if it ever will come, when such industries as can satisfactorily live in Canada ought to be able to stand, I do not say altogether alone—I do not say if the doctrine of free trade were properly, thoroughly and literally carried out, which I understand would involve the imposition of an excise duty on a manufactured article to the extent of the customs duty on the importation. I do not mean to that extent, but I do mean to say that after fifteen years' experience, after an opportunity has been given for the establishment of industries in the home market, for obtaining that market, for obtaining the necessary skilled labour, for securing the best appliances that are admitted here or are to be found, if half a generation is not sufficient for that purpose, then I do not know what time is sufficient. I am very much more convinced of the truth of the proposition by a statement to be found in one of the much abused and much condemned census bulletins. I find Mr. Johnson, in bulletin No. 10, states distinctly one proposition, which I suppose we are all glad to know to be the case, that one of the results—I am reading from bulletin 10, page 10—is, to use his own language :

In fact the great feature of the decade's industrial progress is the vastly improved state of manufacturing machinery on account of which Canada is much better fitted to meet outside rivalry than she was ten years ago; that the average workman in 1891 is a more skilled hand than he was in 1881.

I do not propose—because in this matter every hon. gentleman has probably his own view and nothing I could say would probably take from that conviction—to labour on that point. I merely state it. I thought it was necessary that a certain amount of protection should be given to manufacturing industries, more especially under the peculiar circumstances of that Bill. If that be granted, then I do not think it can be fairly and reasonably denied that during the period that has elapsed since that protective policy was adopted and the time we have now reached ample opportunity has been afforded to the protected industries to take foothold, if indeed they are ever to succeed, and I do not see any reason why some of them should not succeed in this Dominion. But I come to another branch, and to the second branch of my recollection of those hon. gentlemen who were members of this House at that period, now some fourteen or fifteen years ago, of those hon. members who took part in that contest, which I think I am right in saying was the first great contest which has divided the people of this Dominion since Confederation, that the argument used was always this: That monopolies would be established, that rings would be formed, that there would not be competition in the home market; and the answer made, by every hon. gentleman who took part in that discussion from first to last was, that prices would be regulated by competition in the home market, that all we were doing was keeping out foreigners, having Canada for the Canadians, and that if in the end there should not be that competition in the home market which we all anticipated, means would be taken, prompt and conclusive, to put an end to any monopoly. We had from Mr. Colby himself, in the speech to which I have referred, a very strong statement in that regard. At the time I speak of, one of the protected industries was coal oil. It had been protected from the earliest time, and it continued to be protected during the early period of the Mackenzie Administration. In fact it was very difficult for the Mackenzie Government to be the author of the destruction of that particular industry, bearing in mind the fact that the Premier at that time represented one of the ridings—I am not sure whether he represented one of the ridings or the whole county of Lambton—very much interested as it was in the coal oil industry. But Mr. Colby in 1877 moved against the Government for the reduction of the duty on coal oil. The duty then was 15 cents per gallon, which, of course, was an enormous duty; and I think at the same time there was an excise duty on it, which, of course, had something to do with the amount of duty imposed. Mr. Colby's motion was that the duty on coal oil should be reduced, and that was opposed by the Mackenzie Administration in the year in which it was brought forward. In the subsequent year, 1878, the Mackenzie Administration came down with a measure reducing the duty on coal oil.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it was in 1877.

Mr. McCARTHY. My recollection is that it was in 1878.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The movement was made in 1876.

Mr. McCARTHY. That may be so. About that time, at all events, the duty was reduced, and a statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who was then Finance Minister, was that the reduction of that duty would save the people, directly or indirectly, $2,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think my statement was not so much as that. I think if the hon. gentleman will look at my speech, he will find I did not go so far.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am taking the hon. gentleman's statement from Mr. Colby's speech, and that was what Mr. Colby stated. I did not look at the hon. gentleman's speech, and I will not, therefore, say that the hon. gentleman's recollection is not better than mine. Mr. Colby made that assertion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He did?

Mr. McCARTHY. That the hon. gentleman's statement was that this reduction would effect a saving to the people somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2,000,000. Mr. Colby was taunted, as a protectionist, in moving for the reduction of the protective duty upon this particular industry. He was told that he was inconsistent. He was arguing the imposition of higher duties, and yet, in regard to the article of coal oil, upon which there was admittedly a duty for purposes of protection, he urged this reduction, and I will read to the House his answer, because it embodies the argument to which I desire to call the attention of the House, and which I beg to adopt as my own. Mr. Colby, in 1878, said:

In 1876, I felt it my duty to propose a reduction of the duty on coal oil from 15c. per gallon to 7½c., leaving the excise tax exactly as before. The proposition as made and explained by me was intended to give protection of from 20 to 25 per cent upon oil according to the current prices at that time.

It will be observed that those engaged in that industry are not content now with 20 or 25 per cent, but want something nearer 150 or 200 per cent, something in that neighbourhood now.

But I told them that this high duty had had the effect of creating a ring that controlled all oil wells, refineries, and stepped between the producer and consumer, who declared what the prices should be and compelled the consumer in Canada to pay just what American oil would cost, with the duty added.

It was said by a gentleman on the other side of the House the other night, that those who advocated the protective policy were inconsistent, but the want of consistency, I fear, belongs to the other side.

Further on, speaking on the same subject:

But if there was an excepted industry, to which the protective system did not safely apply, and which was monopolized by a ring, then protectionists would demand that protection be reduced on that industry to a point where competition would fairly regulate prices. To tolerate rings and monopolies is a blot and a stain on the national character, and protectionists are the first to decry it. Of all the industries in Canada, the protection on the refining of oil is, perhaps, the only one in which a monopoly is fostered.

I do not think the hon. gentleman would say that in the year 1893.

And that is simply because the area of production is limited, and may, by events, be brought under one control. There is, therefore, no inconsistency in their urging the Government to make this reduction.

It will be observed that the school in which I was taught to admire the National Policy was based upon two propositions: First, that the price would not ultimately be increased and enhanced—in point of fact Mr. Colby put it rather strongly; he did not think prices would be enhanced at all, but certainly the fair meaning of his speech is that they would not ultimately be increased—and, secondly, that rings could not be formed except in very exceptional cases, and that if rings were formed, protectionists would be the first to decry them, the first to take away the protection which enabled them to exist, and to bring about the result by opening the markets and allowing the foreigners to come in. Now, Sir, protection is, after all, a self-denying ordinance. When we pass a law which prohibits us buying, we do so against, as it were, the natural inclination of a man to buy. The foreigner cannot force his goods upon us. There must be two to make a bargain, the vendor and the purchaser, and when we deliberately pass a law to say we will not do what otherwise we would feel inclined to do, namely, to buy in the cheapest market, we do it as a self-denying ordinance, if I may call it so, and we do it because on the whole we are prepared to sacrifice our rights, so to speak, and to a certain extent to sacrifice our money in order that the country as a whole may be benefited thereby. And protection can only be justified, I venture to say, to the extent in which the benefit to the public at large is equivalent to the general burden imposed. You cannot carry it higher than that. Protection may possibly be justified to the extent that if a great public benefit is gained by the establishment of industries by which raw material is used which otherwise would go to waste; by which labourers are employed who otherwise would not find employment within the Dominion; to that extent, and to that extent only, can protection be justified, and even then, just as a business proposition, commensurate with the value of the benefit which flows from these industries, from this consumption of material, and from this employment of labour. But, Sir, if it be a fact that under the system of protection the manufacturers who are warmed into life under its sheltering folds and have in that way derived advantages and, in a sense, subsidies from the rest of the tax-paying public; if these manufacturers having become firmly established have not kept prices down, if there be no competition in the home market to regulate prices; if, on the contrary, combinations have been formed amongst them, and trusts have been created by means of which the manufacturer is permitted to say: This mill shall manufacture such a quantity of such a kind of material, and the price that we will fix for that and charge for it is so much a yard or so much by whatever measure it may be disposed of; if, I say, that stage has been reached in the fiscal history of this country, then, according to the principles which Mr. Colby enunciated, and which I fully adopt, a time has been reached when the protective policy should be changed and the market should be thrown open to foreign competition, so that prices may be regulated. Has that period been reached in our history?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. I hear my hon. friends behind me say, "No." Of course, we all must be entitled to our opinion on this subject. I venture to say, Sir, that there is hardly an industry, certainly not one of the great industries, so to speak, which have been fostered by the protective policy, that is not now in one way or another in combination, and in which, in other words, there is not a practical monopoly. Now, I will endeavour to prove my words, and I think I can prove them. I do not mean to say that I am going to weary the House, and I am perfectly well satisfied the House would not be wearied by me at that length, for me to go through all these varied industries and to show that in this one, and in each one, and in all of them, there is some arrangement or some trust existing between them, and that, so far as that is concerned, they were not longer entitled to the protection they enjoy under this tariff. But, with the indulgence of the House, I will, before I close, give some instances of that kind, instances of a very glaring character indeed, and I have no doubt that it is in the knowledge of the members of this Parliament that what I say is substantially correct. Before I come to that, let me for one moment deal with the advantages that have flown from this system of protection. Now, it is the habit of those, and very naturally so, in the state of political warfare in which we live, to cite the industries that exist as all owing their existence to the National Policy. Even my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, if I dare allude to an important utterance by him on a recent occasion—and I do so, Mr. Speaker, subject to your correction—spoke of the output from all these industries as being due and owing to the National Policy. Well, Sir, before the National Policy was ever thought of, twenty odd years ago, there were industries in this country. Ten years ago there were industries in this country, within a few months after the establishment of the National Policy, and, although I do not pretend to say that these industries have not been increased, or that the number of hands employed has not also been relatively increased by the National Policy, I want, if I can—getting out of the controversial view which is taken on both sides of the House, one side saying that none are due to the National Policy, and the other side claiming that all are due to it—I want fairly to see to what extent any of these industries are indebted to the National Policy; and, having ascertained that, we shall probably be able to see what these industries are worth. The increase in the number of employees during the ten years was 112,561. I see the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) shaking his head, indicating, of course, that he does not accept either the number of establishments or the number of employees returned by the census. Well, Sir, I am frank to say that neither do I. Not that I blame the Government—I want that to be understood; for I do not think the Government are responsible for that. Neither do I blame the census commissioners, because I realize, what is perfectly true, that the instructions under which these compilations were made were the same in 1891 as they were in 1881. But there was one great difference, which, I think, has brought about a result so extraordinary that it has shocked the common sense of those who know anything at all about the facts, and has practically rendered the census utterly worthless as a statistical record. The great difference was this, that, while the census officers were instructed to ascertain the number of industries exactly on the same principle in 1891 that was followed in 1881, in 1881 they were not paid for finding them out, and possibly omitted some that ought to have been included, whereas in 1891 they were paid, and, possibly, included some that ought never to have been there. The result is that in the town where I formerly resided, and in various towns in my constituency, I know—there is no question at all about it—that the industries have not at all increased, rather have they diminished. And, remember, I do not make an accusation against the census commissioner, because I can well understand that the officers who gathered the figures should be paid for the additional labour cast upon them.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that Barrie?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, the town of Barrie. I am speaking, not merely of the town of Barrie, but the town of Collingwood and the town of Orillia, and all the towns within my own personal knowledge. It is not too much to say that my part of the country, if I may so call it, so far as the protective policy has created manufacturing industries, has not derived the slightest benefit from it. Whatever benefit from the National Policy has fallen to the Georgian Bay counties—and I say it here in the presence of my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who, I think, will not dispute it—has come from the protection of the farmers, who, if they needed protection anywhere, needed it there, because they were so much exposed to the competition of the western farmers, who had the means of sending to the lumber country supplies which otherwise would have been contributed by the farmers of the Georgian Bay counties. But so far as manufacturing industries are concerned, there is less manufacturing in the whole region of the Georgian Bay to-day than there was ten years ago. Now, it is plain that we cannot regard the total number of employees, men and women, put down in the census at 367,496, as being due to the National Policy. I do not suppose that my hon. friend the Finance Minister would claim quite that. You have to take—we have not yet the means of doing it with regard to the last census, but we have with regard to the census of 1881—you have to take the part which relates to the so-called industries; and, analysing the different employments, you have to endeavour to see which of them are to be attributed to the National Policy with regard to the census of 1881, and which of them you are perfectly well satisfied can exist without the National Policy. It is not pretended in the least that in Manitoba there is any manufacturing; it is not pretended that in British Columbia, with the exception of one sugar refinery, there is any manufacturing—I mean in the sense in which we are now speaking of prominent manufacturing industries due to the National Policy. Yet we find that there has been an increase in the number of employees in Manitoba to the tune of 127 per cent, in the North-west Territories to the tune of 1,200 per cent, and in British Columbia to the tune of over 300 per cent. That, of course, enables us at once to see that we are not to attribute to the National Policy all the industries which are set down in the bulletins and treated under one head—and as to that I do not know that there is any good ground of complaint; nor are we to treat them as though they existed there in 1881. For instance, we have bakers—and I am afraid we shall have bakers whether we have a National Policy or not—blacksmithing, brickmaking, carpenters and joiners, lime kilns, saw-mills—if the National Policy has any effect, and perhaps it has a very great effect, on saw-milling, it is not certainly of an encouraging kind—tailors, clothiers, sash and door factories, breweries, printing offices, stone and marble cutting—perhaps there might be a difference of opinion in regard to this industry, but more or less there will be stone and marble cutting with or without a National Policy. I do not know whether any hon. gentleman will agree with my result or not, but I have endeavoured to analyse first the returns of 1881 to ascertain and separate into two columns the industries which do more or less owe. I will not say their existence, for the word is too strong, but their development in the stage at which they have now arrived, to this protective system, and those industries which do not and cannot by any fair-minded man be said to owe their existence to any such system; and I will give the House the result. I will not trouble the House by reading the whole table. I have given some examples of industries which I do not think owe their development to the National Policy, and I shall be glad to show the table that I have prepared to any hon. gentleman who likes to see it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is a long story, and I would much sooner that it be taken as read. The result of my analysis is this—speaking now of 1881—that of the total number of employees then engaged in industries more or less dependent on the National Policy—and I want it to be understood that I put it as more or less, because these industries all existed in 1871, I think, and, therefore, would only, in a limited degree, be dependent on the National Policy—there were not more than 112,000, or 44 per cent of the total number put down as engaged in industrial pursuits, leaving 56 per cent of the total number engaged in industries which were not dependent, in any sense, or shape, or way, for their existence on the National Policy. That, of course, does not take us very far. I have not got the census of 1891, to make a table of, and am, therefore, left to estimate, to the best of my ability, and have been, to some extent, aided in the calculation at which I have arrived by the number of employees that appears in one of the bulletins. In one of the bulletins, it will be remembered, although not exhaustively given, the number of employees in the different provinces engaged in these different industries is to be found. I have included those, and have arrived at this result, which I do not think will be considered as unfair, that, whereas, in 1881, 44 per cent of those engaged in manufacturing industries were to be attributed, in the sense in which I have used that term, to the National Policy, in the year 1891 perhaps 50 per cent may be attributed to the same policy. Hon. gentlemen will see that that, of course, is giving the benefit of 6 per cent increase to the industries fostered by the National Policy, so that we would have, in the year 1891, out of the total number employed in all industries, 168,333 as employed in those dependent upon the National Policy. Now, it is from that source that we are to get our home market. The benefit was not to consist in seeing tall chimneys, or, to quote the language used by a gentleman who spoke the other day, in seeing the St. Lawrence blackened by the smoke from these tall chimneys, but the object was to create a home market for the farmers, and, although I am saying a very trite thing, I am yet making a statement which is pertinent, as it seems to me, and I, therefore, may be excused when I ask: Who, after all, are the great producers of the country, and on whose prosperity we all depend? Now, if the farmer, who is the great consumer of these manufactured products, is to be benefited, there must be something in the shape of a home market for his products in return, or else he gets no advantage whatever. Now, I have the number employed in manufacturing, and to whom we owe the home market, furnished by the National Policy. I put that number at its very widest limit. I am approaching this matter, if I may use the expression without incurring the danger of being treated as a judge, in a judicial sense. I am approaching this subject, not with any desire to injure the hon. gentlemen with whom, up to a very recent period, I acted in cordial unison, and not with any desire to advance the cause of the regular Opposition. My desire is merely to see whether, under these circumstances, it is right or proper that we should continue in that policy; whether it is advisable to retain these high duties and still keep up the burden under which the consuming masses are suffering; or whether it is not our bounden duty now to put an end to that system and to return as quick as we reasonably can to the more appropriate system of a revenue tariff. Now, the floating population of the country, by the last census, is 4,829,411, in round numbers 5,000,000. If we assume that the 168,000 employees, men, women and children, were all to be credited as constituting the home market furnished by the National Policy for the balance of these 5,000,000, it is reasonable and right that we should count the cost. What is that cost? That, of course, depends on whether we are paying more to the home manufacturers than we pay in the open market. Is that open to doubt? Is there an hon. gentleman in this House who honestly believes and would seriously state that the goods manufactured in Canada could, irrespective of the tariff, be sold at their present prices? Or, put it the other way: Will it be said seriously that the consumers would not be able to obtain these goods at a much less price, if it were not for the tariff? Why, the very fact that we maintain it, the very fact that the First Minister insists that there shall be no panic in the country, and that any changes he may make shall not interfere with the protective system—that very fact is, to say the least of it, prima facie evidence that our Canadian manufacturers are absolutely and actually dependent for their existence, or, at all events, for the high price they now charge, on the protective policy. Well, what is the output now from these factories? I am not going to charge or credit—whichever way you like to look at it—the whole output from the industrial institutions, according to the bulletin, to this moiety of the industrial classes; but from the same table that I made of 1881 I reach the conclusion that the output in that year, of those industries which I set down as owing their existence to the National Policy, was $165,000,000, the total output being $309,000,000. Of that $309,000,000, according to the way I analyse it, I attribute $165,000,000 to those industries that are protected by the system which now prevails. Then we have to estimate—and it is only a matter of estimate—how much of the increased production, as appears by the census of 1891, is to be put down to the same source. I have roughly put that down at $100,000,000. If these figures be at all accurate, and I have endeavoured to make—

Mr. FOSTER. That is $100,000,000 of an increase.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You mean $100,000,000 attributable to the National Policy.

Mr. McCARTHY. If these figures be reasonable and fair—of course, $100,000,000 is a larger proportion; but I thought in all cases it was better to give a larger proportion, because undoubtedly the industries as well as the employees do show a larger increase, referable to the industries created, than would have existed but for this policy. Now, this $265,000,000 of goods manufactured in our midst was of course in addition to the large volume of goods we imported, and the practical question for the people is this: how much of that $265,000,000 are the people of Canada paying to-day more for than they would pay if it were not for the protective policy? If it be true that $265,000,000 of goods is manufactured in Canada, in addition to the large importation we make, if it be true that these prices are dearer than they would be but for the protective policy, it is for us here to see, and it is for the people of this country to determine, how much more we are paying than we would pay but for the system to which I have referred. I will not attempt to put that into figures, but perhaps one would not be far out if it was said that, taking quality and price into consideration—because I do not think the comparison would be true, unless you took into consideration quality, as well as price—about 30 per cent of that $265,000,000 is paid by the people of this country, in addition to what they would have to pay but for this protective system. Now, these are figures higher than any hon. gentleman has stated here, but, while it is impossible, with the means at our disposal, for any hon. gentleman—or, at all events, for me—to arrive at an exact result, I will endeavour to fortify my conclusion by the statements that I am about to make. I am sitting near my hon. friend here (Mr. Bergin), who is very much interested in the cotton industries, and I am glad to know that the statements I make and the conclusions I draw with regard to these industries, as one of the circumstances which enter into the consideration of this question, will be subject to his criticism and to any correction which they may require. And I am not caring very much what profits these manufacturers are making. I do not wish ill, Sir, to the manufactures we have established; I desire to see these manufactures prosper, within reasonable limits. I desire to see these manufactures able to stand alone, and, as I have said in another place, I shall be exceedingly disappointed if these manufactures are not able to maintain their position, are not able to live and not able to prosper under the conditions which, before very long, I think, may exist in this country. But, at the same time, I want to know whether we are paying more for our cottons because of the protective system. These two things, of the price and the manufacturers' profits, are wholly different. We may be paying very much more, and they may not be making anything commensurate with the enhanced price. The question is, what we are paying for them. We arrive at the conclusion, perhaps, that we are paying too much, if we find that they water their stock and pay high dividends. If we see that kind of thing going on, we, perhaps, come to the conclusion that the cotton companies are having rather a good thing of it. I shall call attention to some information I have, before leaving this cotton question, but what I want to draw attention to at this moment is that, while it is said, and, no doubt, said correctly enough, that cotton goods have fallen in this country since 1872 up to the present time, to the tune of 24 per cent—I am taking that from a table, and I dare not mention where I heard or saw it, for fear of incurring your displeasure, Mr. Speaker—but I am told that the statement was made, that prices of cotton goods, since the year 1872, have fallen by 24 per cent. Let us, for one moment, see what that means; let us work it out and see exactly what it comes to. Cotton that in 1872 would have cost $100, could now be bought for $76; that is, $100 worth of cotton, with the deduction of 24 per cent. In 1872 cotton goods paid a duty of 15 per cent, and this, with the freight and carriage to be paid on them, made the difference between $100, the price in Canada, and $80, which was the price in the market where the goods were first sold; and goods which, in 1872, cost $80 in England, can now be bought in Canada for $76. But, Sir, what has been going on during that period of time? I find, from the English Statistical Abstract, by Mr. Giffin, that, since 1872 up to the present time, cotton goods have fallen to the tune of 38 per cent. In other words, the cotton goods that cost, in 1872, $8.43, cost in 1889, $5.21, or a decrease, as I make it, of 38 per cent. That is the last date to which this statistical abstract goes. But, Sir, since that day the price of cotton has fallen enormously, and cotton was lower last year, and is lower to-day.—just as wheat is—than was ever known in its history, and that is proved and established, if proof were required, by the Trade and Navigation Returns. I find that, according to these Trade and Navigation Returns, the cotton which cost, in 1870, 9⁸ cents, cost, in the last year, 7³ cents, a difference of 2⁵ cents per pound. So that, besides the 38 per cent decrease up to 1889, you have to allow a further decrease by reason of the reduction in the raw cottons, and that reduction, regard being had to the relative cost of the raw material and the manufactured article, that result would be, as I make it, about 15 or 16 per cent more. Seeing what proportion the wages and the raw material bear to the duty, I think that this percentage ought to be added to the 38 per cent. Now, what is the conclusion? In the first place, your hundred dollars' worth of cotton in 1872 was worth, in England, $80. You have $80 worth of cotton goods, purchasable in 1889 for $49.60, and if you add the carriage in 1872—there is no duty, and thus we gain in that respect—it will bring up the cost to $52. I have to add to that 15 per cent for the fall in the raw materials since 1889. And to what conclusion do you come? The cotton that costs us $76 here can be procured in England for $52, less 15 per cent of the value of the raw material.

Mr. CASEY. What does it cost here?

Mr. McCARTHY. It costs here $76. I accept, of course, the statement that there has been a fall of 24 per cent. Now, are these figures fair?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Do you base your argument on that?

Mr. McCARTHY. I have no information other than that I have derived from my hon. friend who does not sit very far from me (Mr. Bergin). Now, just see the enormous difference in cost on this one industry of cotton. Why, Sir, last year alone, on the 46,000,000 pounds which were imported into this country, the difference in cost of the raw material was over $1,000,000, as to which we have had no benefit or no advantage whatever. While the farmer has been bound to take for his wheat just what he could get in the open market, the cotton manufacturer has not given, and it is not pretended that he has given, to the people of this country any reduction in prices during the last year or two, although his raw material cost him over $1,000,000 less than it did at the time the census was taken. Well, are these theories, or facts, or conclusions, whatever you choose to call them, borne out by what we know? In the first place, that there is a very great protection upon cotton no person can doubt. They have the system of specific and ad valorem duties. We know that the specific duty does intensely increase the price of the commoner and poorer article, and we are told that it is impossible that there can be a protective system unless there is a specific duty, though not necessarily an ad valorem duty. Now, what do we find with respect to the cotton companies? It is to be remembered that their operations are not given to the public; they are close corporations with respect to which we cannot go to a newspaper or to a trade return and find their annual reports; but I am speaking from information which I certainly credit, otherwise I would not venture to give it to the House. Take the Dominion Cotton Company. In 1892 its stock opened at 132; it rose in that one year to 226, nearly 100 per cent of increase in the value of stock. In the same year a share for share allotment took place with a payment of $10; in other words, the stock was watered to the extent of 90, or 90 per cent, and that stock so watered stands to-day at 143. Sir, is that a legitimate profit? While others have got to take 7 or 8 per cent, running risks in the business, here we find an industry which is virtually—notwithstanding the information which reaches the Government—I unhesitatingly say is virtually under one control, and an industry in which the output of each establishment is regulated, and the price at which that output is to be placed on the market, is also fixed, so that it is as perfect a monopoly as you can make. That industry has been able in this one year to double its capital and to pay handsome dividends besides. And that is not the only one. The Coloured Company's stock, which opened at 80 in the year 1892, is now selling at 110. The cotton companies outside the combination—because there are some who have not actually come in, as I understand it, but are virtually controlled by the same owner—opened at 94 and 92, and are now selling at 156. The Merchants' Manufacturing Company's stock opened at 103 in 1892, and could not now be got for 160. These companies have been paying dividends of between 6 and 10 per cent since the combination has been in force. Now, to conclude what I have to say with regard to this point, the Montreal Cotton Company are now watering their stock to secrete or to hide their earnings. One of the small companies in Montreal, whose name

Mr. McCARTHY.

I have not got by me just now, but who held their meeting on the 14th February last, reported a net profit of 26 per cent, and put by $20,000 after paying handsome dividends. Now, Sir, I think that, so far as the cotton industries are concerned, the conclusion that I have reached, that these goods are sold at 20 per cent more than they could be bought for in the open market, is amply justified. But we have other industries to take into consideration. Take the iron industry. Nothing is more important to the general consumer than these manufactures, and let us see, under the tariff of 1887, what the gentlemen who are interested in iron duties are actually charging for their goods. We all know, and we all lament, that notwithstanding the enormous duties that were imposed in 1887, with a view of promoting the industry of mining, practically no success has attended those efforts. That we all know. We also know, and also lament, that while no benefit has been derived by the public, no advantage has been gained; those who are interested have also practically formed a combination. I do not mean to say that there is a formal trust deed; I do not know; but they have meetings at which they regulate the price, and so late as the 7th January last the rolling mill proprietors, meeting under the head of the Bar Iron Association, which includes in its membership, as I am informed, all the rolling mills except those in the Maritime provinces, adopted a new schedule in which the base price of bar iron is quoted at $2.05, free on board, at Montreal, Hamilton and Toronto. Now, I will take bar iron, and I have statements which justify me in showing to the House what the position is regarding bar iron. It was subject to a duty of 17½ per cent in 1887. The duty upon bar iron now varies, except the specific duty of $13 per ton, and it increases with the lower grades and decreases with the higher grades of iron. I am taking now the ordinary cost of iron, and I have statements furnished to me, verified by papers which warrant me in adopting them as my own, that the cost in Liverpool of bar iron this year was $27.57 for the long ton—Staffordshire crown bars, £5 17s. If you add carriage and freight, you have $2.96, making the sum of $45.05. Comparing that with the price of the home article manufactured for the most part out of scrap, not at all equal to it, and we have for the long ton, $46, or an increase on the English price of 70 per cent. Now, these figures, at all events, are undeniable. We find, therefore, that the home manufacturers practically regulate their price by an association; fixing as they did here the other day, $2.05, free on board at the cities I mentioned, they have fixed the price just as high as the tariff allows, or 70 per cent more than the cost in England. Now, that is an article the price of which affects every household throughout the whole Dominion. There is not a man throughout the whole Dominion that is not affected by the cost of bar iron; and we have the enormous duty of $13 a ton—I forget at the moment what percentage it is—and the selling price of $46 per ton. For what result, may I ask? Why, Sir, for this result: We have 831 employees connected with these rolling mills. Their output was $1,750,000—I am speaking now by the book, because these are the figures the Minister of Finance gave me the other day in answer to my question—wages $335,000, raw material $575,000, 6 per cent on capital $60,000, 5 per cent on value of plant, $13,250, or 1·3 per cent on capital, 5 per cent on output, or 8·6 per cent on capital.

Mr. BERGIN. What do you allow for bad debts?

Mr. McCARTHY. They should not make bad debts. We have here a profit of over 60 per cent in addition to 6 or 7 per cent which these rolling mill people are earning if these figures are correct.

Mr. MULOCK. Then the buyer does not get an article of as good a quality.

Mr. McCARTHY. The buyer is buying scrap, and that is a great evil of the system to which I draw particular attention, for, although this resolution may not bear practical fruit immediately, I trust when the proper time comes for a reconsideration of the question, the facts to which attention is now drawn will not go unnoticed. What has been the result of the imposition of the duty on iron? I have taken two years before the duty was increased, for it was enormously increased, as we all know. In 1885-86 the importation was of the value of $7,646,000; next year it reached $8,000,000. It is even more to-day. Notwithstanding that fact, the consumption has increased, so that, in 1891, it had nearly reached the value of $10,000,000, and it was an equal amount in 1892. But the duty has enormously increased, and more especially in the direction to which I call attention. Take iron bars. The importation in 1886 was of the value of $728,208. What has taken its place? Its place has been taken by scrap iron, because, in 1886 the importation of scrap iron was only of the value of $200,300, whereas, in 1892, it had reached more than three times that amount. So we have encouraged the importation of scrap iron, and our rolling mills have been manufacturing scrap, and charging us the full price of Staffordshire crown bars, with 50 per cent added, and that is the result of the tariff arrangement of 1887, which gave no substantial increase to our industries. There is another proof which I propose to give in order to justify my conclusion, because that is all I am seeking, that is, that it is not too much to put down 30 per cent of the $285,000,000 of output of these industries to the protective policy, which should be charged against any possible corresponding benefit. Before I leave the subject of iron, however, I may draw attention to the views that were held by the trade publications. Reading from the "Trade Bulletin," a non-political paper, I understand, I find it writes editorially as follows:—

The complete fallacy of the iron duties as imposed by Sir Charles Tupper in 1886 is demonstrated by the absolute failure of the one concern (for which these duties were imposed on this country) to fulfil their promise to supply all the pig iron and all the puddled bars which the country would require. It is not only the importers, for whom the present Government have shown no consideration, that object to the duties as outrageous and uncalled for, but the manufacturers, who were led to believe that they could obtain their raw material in the shape of pig iron and puddled bars from the Lower Province Company; all admit that they have been grossly deceived, inasmuch as the company since 1886 has not increased its facilities so as to enable it to supply the increased demand from the manufacturers, but on the contrary it is producing less pig iron and fewer puddled bars to-day than in 1886. The manufacturers of bar iron are therefore prevented by the high rate of duty from importing puddled bars which would enable them to manufacture a regular and merchantable quality of bar iron, and are obliged to use scrap, which anyone knows produces iron of irregular quality. The present tariff has not benefited these manufacturers, which is evident from the fact that they only exist to-day through the influence of combines governed by large moneyed deposits necessary to insure good faith in sustaining unnatural prices. This rotten condition of affairs cannot be maintained. The people of this country insist upon tariff reform, and where the raw material is heavily taxed, and the experience of eight years has demonstrated that the production of such material has not under such protection been at all stimulated so as to cope with the requirements of the country, Sir John Thompson ought to apply the lopping axe, to which he referred in his Toronto speech, and thus save the other industries which are at present being ruined and only exist by resorting to the unnatural means to which we have referred. We do not go the length to which free traders urge us, as we do not believe in that policy for Canada, situated as she is beside such a powerful neighbour as the United States, which would absorb our manufacturing interests completely had she free access to our markets; but we do insist that a material modification of the outrageously high duties on iron is imperative in the interests of manufacturers as well as consumers.

I could read other statements from different trade journals, from the "Canadian Journal of Commerce," for example, to the same effect, but I will not weary the House with more than is absolutely necessary to establish my point. An industry against which complaint I understand has been made is the wall-paper industry, a very small affair; and I have a copy of a letter which was sent to the Controller of Customs dealing with this subject, in which it is represented by the largest importer in the country that the average rate of duty he pays on wall-paper is 85 per cent.

Mr. LISTER. That is correct.

Mr. McCARTHY. And the duty runs up all the way to nearly 200 per cent on the same article. The Minister of Finance did not require to put off, for a year's time, the reform which I think such a state of things as that demands. There was the statement, made by a respectable merchant, easily capable of proof; and I have it from no less than two merchants who are engaged in that business, first, that they cannot obtain the paper they require from the home producer, that it is not sufficiently good in quality, and is not varied enough in pattern to please the taste of the public; and second, that they are compelled to buy imported goods at this enormous duty, which ultimately comes, of course, out of the pockets of the consumer. I give that, therefore, as another instance of a very high duty which is imposed, and of which advantage, more or less, is taken by the manufacturers. Leaving that subject for the moment, I come to this conclusion, which I ask the House to adopt with me, that, for both reasons, both because a sufficient time has elapsed to enable industries to take root, and more especially because I think it is capable of the most complete demonstration—and if time permitted, I think I could satisfy the most doubtful member of this House on that point—that advantage has been taken by the manufacturers to enhance the prices up, or nearly up, to the tariff wall. In many cases it will be found that the prices of the Canadian articles are not as dear as the imported articles, but I venture to say—and I shall have a word to say on this point, especially in dealing with agricultural implements, to which I shall call attention—that where the price is not as high, the article is not as good, and people are compelled, and people do, and that is the best evidence on the point, pay a higher price for the imported article than for the domestic article, demonstrating, at all events, what is their opinion as to the relative value of the two commodities. Is it true that this tariff has been burdensome to the great mass of the consuming public? Why, if the public ever spoke with decided voice, they are speaking to-day. Their voice may not be heard in this Chamber, their voice may not have effect given to it here, although we are their representatives. For one cause or another, we may be willing to postpone the justice which they demand, but if ever the people of Canada spoke, all classes included, with a certain voice, and with a positive determination that if their will is to prevail, this tariff has to be reduced. Unrest is admitted to exist throughout the land. The farmers, slow to move, the best party men, as we know, in the Dominion, men who dislike to vote against or to leave their political allies or to take ground against a policy which they have been hitherto adopting; the farmers almost unanimously are demanding—and I think I speak with authority when I say so—that in their interests there should be a change. I have not been able, Sir, to present to this House a bundle of documents, which were sent to me, in the nature of petitions from Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and I take this opportunity of laying on the

Mr. McCARTHY.

Table these 113 papers, which are not properly in the form of petitions, but which very clearly embody the views of the farmers of the North-west Territories and Manitoba. They came officially to me from the Patrons of Industry of Manitoba and the North-west. They are petitions, so-called, from 113 of their associations, and they are signed by 1,712 bona fide farmers, who also, I am informed, are qualified voters and are entitled to return members to this Parliament. And what do these petitions say:

We, the undersigned farmers, members of Clover Bar (that is one of the associations and there are 113 altogether) representing Patrons of Industry, of the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, feeling that the duty now existing upon farming machinery and binding twine, coupled with the heavy freight rates we have to pay, bear so heavily upon us in our farming operations, that we cannot advise our friends to come to this country to become agriculturists under existing burdens, and we deem it unwise on the part of the Government to pursue their proposed immigration policy unless these burdens are reduced.

That comes, as I say, the most authoritative set of documents that have ever been laid on the Table of this House, from the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west, and if the hon. gentlemen who represent those parts of the country do not speak for them, why, Sir, then I cannot understand how it is that these people have taken all the trouble to circulate and adopt the petitions and papers which I have now the opportunity of presenting in this form to the House. I think, that so far as that is concerned the self-evident proposition which I have asserted in this resolution needs no demonstration at my hands to support it. I will come later on to the very important question as to whether now is the appointed time or not, or whether this question should be postponed to a more convenient season. In the meantime I deal with the question, that the people of this country demand—as the people of the United States demanded, and as the people in the United States accomplished their demand—the people of this country, I say, demand tariff reform, and tariff reform I am perfectly certain the people of this country are going to have. It may be delayed for a time, but in the end they are going to have it. But, Sir, I mean to say that there was strong ground for the Government coming down at the present session and meeting the discontent which prevails. I mean to contend, Sir, that this discontent has spread through this land, and I mean to say that this discontent has been, to a very large extent, the result of the burdens of this tariff, and the monopolies, and the trusts, and the evils that have grown under this tariff. I think, Sir, that in accordance with the system which has always prevailed in the history of England, which prevailed in the days of the Tudors and Plantagenets, that the governing body in this country ought to have met these discontents by their removal and not simply by their postponement. I accept in perfect good faith—although, perhaps, others may not be inclined to do so—the statements of the two gentlemen whom the "Globe" newspaper sent out to make an examination of the conditions of the affairs of this country. I know one of these gentlemen, not personally perhaps, but I know him by reputation, and I know him to be a Conservative of the Conservatives, an Imperial Federationist, a man who bears a high reputation, and one who would not swerve from the path of duty, and I have no reason to suppose that Mr. Atkinson, the other gentleman, was less worthy of trust. Their statements went uncontradicted, although sufficient time was given to indicate the persons with whom they had interviews, and these statements would have called for a contradiction if untrue. And what are the statements made by these two gentlemen? They tell us that in several counties they visited an annexation feeling prevails, and that that annexation feeling is due to the burdens which this tariff has imposed on the people of this country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How do you explain that that would cause an annexation feeling?

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) asks me how I can explain it. I am only stating a fact. I am not called upon here to explain it; I state the fact. There is no man who has ever read a page of history but must know that grievances and oppression do produce disloyalty. I do not speak of this country, but I speak of England. Oppression does produce disloyalty. I am not saying it is right that it should; I am not commending it; I am not dealing with anything more than facts; but I do say, Sir, that it does appear that the people of this country feel the oppression and burdens of this tariff so greatly that they look for annexation as the only means of escape.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Why do you not give Ireland Home Rule, then?

Mr. McCARTHY. When we come to the Irish question, if any gentleman chooses to bring it up, I will not be afraid to state why I do not give Ireland Home Rule. Well, Sir, what do we find? We find that in the county of Bruce, these gentlemen report in substance in the "Globe," as follows: "The farmers are restless and discontented. There is some annexation feeling. A desire for freer trade, especially with Great Britain."

Mr. DENISON. Which of the gentlemen states that?

Mr. McCARTHY. I cannot tell for the moment. It is either Mr. Cockin or Mr. Atkinson; but I think they state substantially the same thing. In East Huron there is dissatisfaction with the National Policy; some annexation feeling. In Ontario (south) the farmers are discontented, although there is no statement that there is annexation feeling. In East York—my hon. friend who made the last interruption can perhaps tell us—there is said to be some annexation feeling. I remember seeing a correspondence from a gentleman there by the name of Bruce, who, in his old age, saw no hope to escape except through annexation, although he had not been able in that to carry his son with him, who thought there was a brighter day coming, as I think there is, and that no person would be driven out of this country on account of the tariff, if he only remained here a couple of years longer.

Mr. FOSTER. You have great faith in us.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have great faith in you. Then, Sir, in Victoria, which is represented here by two very loyal gentlemen, there is also said to be a feeling that tariff reform is wanted. Annexation is not desired except as a measure of relief. And then, Sir, finally in Lincoln there is a strong annexation feeling on account of trade matters. But, have I to prove this annexation feeling? Why, there is actually established in our midst an association for political union, an association which is propagating these doctrines from one end of the country to the other, and an association which gained support only because of the discontent with the tariff and the trade policy. I do not say it gained support on these grounds from those who are promoting it. But I do mean to say that the men who attend these meetings, that the men who go and vote in favour of it or countenance it in any way, are led to do so solely by the discontent which prevails and which they feel with respect to this tariff.

An hon. MEMBER. They are all Grits.

Mr. McCARTHY. They may be. I do not know whether they are Grits or Tories, and I do not think it makes any difference. I do not think we ought to legislate so as to drive the Liberals into annexation. I do not think that our legislation should be such that men of any political stripe would not enjoy the benefit of equal and just laws, and I regret to think that any gentleman should take comfort in the fact that these annexationists belong to any particular political stripe. Now, Mr. Cockin, in his last letter, winding up his tour, says:

I desire to write at greater length on the question of annexation and the attitude of a certain minority in our midst regarding it. Mr. Atkinson and myself have each been pitched into by annexationists and Conservatives alike. The former charge us with the 'suppressio veri;' the latter with the 'suggestio falsi.' Nothing could be more unfair than such charges. Wherever I have found genuine annexation feeling, such has been mentioned. But it so happens that converts to annexation are claimed where an honest investigation has proved conclusively that a disposition to accept annexation has been the mere outcome of an irritating condition of affairs, which latter is capable of a satisfactory readjustment. Such readjustment secured, we should hear nothing more of annexation from these men. This being the case, no honest man can term these annexationists. I admit that such are the stuff out of which annexationists might be fashioned. As I remarked in my Paisley letter, "there are hundreds of men on the fence, and their backs are towards Canada," but one good harvest and satisfactory market would turn these men to the right-about in double-quick time. These men say: "We prefer to live under the old flag, but if we cannot get free trade without annexation, well, we shall have to accept annexation." There are many such in Bruce and other counties, but no reasonable man will call them annexationists. They are simply men who are dissatisfied, or, if you will, men disheartened to such an extent by the present policy of the Government that they are ready to sacrifice their patriotism to the nearer claims of the hearth and the home. We city men may sneer at such a lack of the higher patriotism, but we may well reserve our sneers until we have been similarly tried.

Now, Sir, I have not pretended to justify that course, or to say that it is the only course. On the contrary, I think it is not. I have no sympathy with men who cry out for annexation as a means of relief, nor have I any sympathy with the men who are always threatening to break up Confederation if they do not get their way. I think that within the lines of our constitution there are the means of redress, and, although they may be postponed for a time, if our people will only have confidence in themselves and in their country, redress in the long run will be theirs. I think, however, that I have justified that paragraph of my resolution in which I state that there is discontent verging on disloyalty. Now, Sir, if these things are true, or approximately true, ought this matter to be postponed or delayed, and if so, why? Surely, Sir, this is the place where all the representations that the Finance Minister requires from the people can be obtained through their representatives. The hon. gentleman who so worthily fills that office is no novice. He has been at the head of the Finance Department for some years, and he has associated with him the hon. gentleman who was formerly at the head of the Customs Department, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and they have recently obtained a practical gentleman to assist them, one who understands, if any man in this House does, the necessity for prompt and immediate action. I allude, Sir, to the hon. Controller of Customs. I have examined what happened here in 1888, and I find that that hon. gentleman, who moved for a committee and presided over that committee while it examined into the whole subject of combines, commenced his report by saying that the time at the disposal of the committee was not sufficient to enable them to examine into the nature and extent of other alleged combinations than those specified; but sixty-three witnesses were examined, and the committee held twenty-six meetings. I cull from this report some very valuable statements, which in a doubting body like this seemed to require proof, although I should have thought that they might have been accepted without any evidence. The report, dealing with the alleged combinations in groceries and sugars, said:

Thus facts prove this Grocers' Guild, with its several combinations, to be obnoxious to the public interest, in limiting competition, in enhancing prices, and by the familiar use of its growing and facile powers tending to produce and propagate all the evils of monopoly. Certain dealers are refused admission into its ranks, others are admitted and afterwards expelled, others again are placed under its ban, who from conscientious scruples or in a spirit of independence, refuse to join them. Merchants who have been buyers on equal terms and with equal facilities as other merchants, suddenly find themselves under the power of this combination.

Further on:

It was seen that an association formed at first to arrange uniform terms of credit and discounts, and to prevent the dating ahead of invoices, &c., soon and rapidly extended its operations to more ambitious schemes. The power used, cautiously at first, soon grasped with a firmer hand, and at length 'the simple plan that they may take who have the power,' governed the operations of these associations.

Dealing with coal combinations, the report says:

Citizen consumers in a like manner pay, not competitive prices, but such fixed prices as the combination choose to extort.

As to barbed wire:

An attempt was made during the past winter by barbed wire manufacturers to secure uniform prices for their product. The agreement the retailer was asked to sign bound him to sell at 6½ cents per pound, the inducement being that he could purchase at 5½ cents, which was a reduction of a quarter of a cent from last year's prices.

As to the Oatmeal Association:

A certain percentage of the oatmeal production is allotted to each mill, and upon every barrel sold by any miller in excess of this allotment, he pays a premium of 30 cents per barrel into the association, and vice versa, when any miller falls short of his allotment he receives an equal premium per barrel upon the quantity short.

As to the Confectionery Association:

The confectionery association is of recent formation and the usual result followed at once, viz., a rise in the prices.

Finally, the report says:

The committee find that the evils produced by combinations such as have been inquired into have not by any means been fully developed as yet in this country.

No truer word was ever uttered. In 1888 they had not been fully developed; I think they have nearly reached perfection now.

But sufficient evidence of their injurious tendencies and effects is given to justify legislative action for suppressing the evils arising from these and similar combinations and monopolies.

And a Bill was reported to this House. That Bill, as we all know, was virtually shorn of its provisions by an amendment made to it in the Senate, and it has remained from that day to this practically a dead letter. But will any one say that the combinations have decreased since? On the contrary, they have gone on increasing and fortifying their position until I doubt if there is any large industry to-day which is not virtually a combination.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the combination in coal due to the tariff?

Mr. McCARTHY. I freely say that it is not. It does not at all follow that there cannot be combinations without the tariff; but I do not say that the experience in the States proves that no legislation can put down combinations. The last remedy which has been suggested, whether it be fair or not, is the passage of a Bill permitting the Executive at Washington to reduce the duty upon any article which the Attorney-General will certify is governed by a trust or by a combination. Sir, no combination can be put down by law. The combines have only to change their mode of proceeding; they have only to create a trust. Look at them in the States. Look at the sugar trust, even the whiskey trust, the coal combine, of which we heard in this House the other night, the lead combine—why, there is hardly a commodity which has not to-day its trust, enormously enhancing the cost to the consumer, and which the law has been found powerless to check, and which there is no other means suggested of checking except the one of lowering the tariff. I propose to deal for a moment or two, with the indulgence of the House, with the question of the farmer, because I have ventured to insert in my resolution the statement, that of all industries the farming industry suffers the most from this present tariff. There are some injustices, some evils, flowing from the tariff which are common to all classes; but the farmer has been told that because of the countervailing advantages which he was to get under the tariff, and which, I am free to admit, to some extent he has got—and I will investigate their value—that because of these countervailing advantages he has agreed to submit—because he has agreed up to this time—to the disadvantages of the tariff, so far as he is concerned. Now, what are they? Why, some hon. gentlemen think that the agricultural industry is the most highly protected of all. Some hon. gentlemen think that the farmer has no duty to pay; that, wearing home-spun as he may, shingling his house from his own timber, using the logs cut from his own bush, sticking in pegs instead of nails, virtually the farmer may go free from all taxation. And, of course, not taking anything stronger than tea, because I believe he can have tea and coffee without being subjected to a tax; and, of course, if the farmer wore a fig leaf no doubt that would be still better, because there could be no question about a tax upon that, but in our climate, unfortunately, it would be impossible for him to go about in that way—living in this way he need pay no duty. Let me see if that statement of the farmers' condition is right.

Mr. FOSTER. That statement is not right. That is stated by the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not at liberty to prove what was said by another hon. member of the House, as I am not allowed to refer to a previous debate, or I would have very little difficulty in doing so, but it stands on record, and there is no difficulty in any hon. gentleman seeing whether what I have said is virtually or not a repetition of what has been said on the subject during a previous debate. I desire, as coming from an agricultural constituency, to repudiate the idea that the farmer is to be relegated to any such position. I deny in the most emphatic way that the farmer is to be treated as a hewer of wood and a drawer of water, as a man who must, in order to escape taxation, live in the manner pictured to us the other night. I deny that altogether. But, I say, if he did live in that way, nevertheless he could not escape from a very heavy burden of taxation. What are the taxes a farmer bears? Tell me what he does not bear. Although he is not a great manufacturer, is there any indulgence made to him in the matter of raw material? Agricultural implements, large and small, binder twine, everything he uses, as a farmer, is subjected to an enormous taxation.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). State the duty on agricultural implements.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am asked to state the duty, and it is as well I am able to answer that question, or else I would have to go down foot. It is 35 per cent. My hon. friend may not think that a very high duty. I differ from him. I say it is an enormous duty. It is not a duty for revenue. We know what the revenue tariff of this country has been. The highest tariff we ever reached for revenue purposes was 17½ per cent, and when you double that by one stroke and make a man pay $135 for a $100 article, do you mean to say he is not paying an enormous duty? But he is paying it on every possible article: binders, threshers, ploughs, seeders, hand instruments, binding twine, sowers, harrows, furniture,—perhaps he is not permitted to have household furniture, except such as he can tinker up in his own workshop—cutlery, lamps, clothing, blankets, harness, what is it the farmer does not pay duty on?

Mr. MULOCK. He pays more than 35 per cent on some implements.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am speaking of the large implements. Take, for instance, the province of Manitoba, and let us just see what duty the farmer has to pay in that province. I find, taking the last importations into that province, that he imported agricultural implements to the value of $278,036, on which he paid in duty $97,863. In that small province, that is the direct and positive duty the farmer has paid into the revenues of this country, and yet we are to be told that he goes free of duty. Now, my information varies, and hon. gentlemen coming from that province will be able to set me right, if I am wrong, but my information is that about one-third of the implements used in that country are imported.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, there is a great number of them. The hon. gentleman who says "no" will see that there must be. Take harvesters, 659 were imported in one year; mowers, 523; ploughs and sulkys, 1,844; threshers and separators, 193. The hon. gentleman who says "no" has, no doubt, better means of information than I have, but my information is that there is not more than two-thirds of the agricultural implements used in that country purchased from the domestic manufacturers. That one-third which is imported is taxed to what extent? Why, how many farmers are there in that country? What is a fair calculation as to the number of farmers in the province of Manitoba? Any hon. gentleman, working that out for himself and making the division, will at once see what proportion of taxation the farmer of Manitoba has to pay directly to the revenue. But we are told that the same farmer who buys these articles and pays this duty, could get the same articles for less price made at home. Why, then, does he not buy them? Why does a man give $185 for a harvester or a binder, if he can get the same article, manufactured by Massey, Harris and others, for $150? There is only one answer to that. These men are not paying $35 more simply for the pleasure of it and for the purpose of sitting on an American machine. The answer, of course, is that the American machine suits their purpose better and has better value. The farmer is content to pay $180 for an article, notwithstanding he can get it at $150, because the dearer articles last longer and suit him better.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Protection made it a better article in the States.

Mr. McCARTHY. That may have been so. I do not know. I do not know how that is. I do not know whom they were protected from. Certainly not from Canadians. Whom were they in the States protected from? Certainly not from Canadians. They could hardly be protected against any others, because we have never understood there was active competition between the English manufacturers of harvest implements and the American. Now, Sir, I think it would be perfectly true to say that these farmers who are buying the home implements are paying on the average just three times the sum which I have mentioned; that is, for years past, instead of paying $100,000 into the public revenues, they are paying $300,000, of which $200,000 go into the pockets of the manufacturers. But, Sir, that is not the only article. Barbed wire is a most important article for the farmers. We have been flooded with petitions in favour of the removal of the duty on barbed wire. What is the history of barbed wire? In that country they have no wood or other material for fencing, and they have to use barbed wire. That being so, one would have thought the Government would have jumped at the opportunity to place barbed wire on the free list. It is a raw material of the farmer. The farmers all over the Dominion are petitioning against the duty upon this article. The production and sale of this article is regulated by a combine which fixes the price and determines the quantity, and which I declare, upon the responsibility of a member of this House, is regulated by a solemn bond and instrument, which limits the output and tells the different manufacturers at what prices they are to sell. In the United States the same article can be got wholesale for $2.25 per hundred; galvanized, $2.75 per hundred. In Canada the wholesale price is $4.50, and the retail $4.75 per hundred. I would like to know what benefit the consumers, the farmers, are gaining from it; I would like any hon. gentleman to say that he believes he is right in postponing relief for one day or for one hour after the facts have been brought to the notice of the Government. The information that I state here has been obtained from a gentleman upon whom I have a right to rely, and I believe it represents the case correctly. He says:

There are three barbed-wire factories in the East and one in Winnipeg. All four have joined by agreement and made a money deposit by way of penalty whereby each is bound to obey the commands of a certain board. This board fixes the quantity of wire which each company may send into this province, and binds the company here to a limited output. The territory of Canada is also divided up in a certain manner, and one is not to take trade in the preserve of another. The price at which all these sell is fixed and the paternal Government by duties compels the granger here to buy from these companies. Any one of these companies could produce all the wire used in Canada, and, as a result, our company here is shut down more than half the time, but the price permits it and makes profitable the enforced idleness.

That is the history of barbed wire. But, Sir, that is not the only thing that the farmer has to complain of.

Mr. SPROULE. How much duty did they pay on barbed wire?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think they paid any; I do not think there was any importation. That is not what I am complaining of. If there was a duty and it would go into the revenue, it would benefit us all. The increased cost by reason of the tariff which excludes the foreign manufacturers—I have not figured at the percentage—goes to the benefit of the manufacturers, and does not go to the revenue of this country. If ever there was a complete case made out with reference to any article under the tariff, that case has been made out in relation to barbed wire. Now, the same difference will be found in regard to axes. We know how it is with regard to binding twine, and we know the measure of relief that has been meted out. That measure of relief, as I understand the statement made by experienced members of this House, gives to each farmer $1 a year. The reduction from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent means, to the average farmer, $1 a year, but leaves him to continue paying what he has been paying on his agricultural implements and other goods which are to him raw material of production, in addition to the enormous duties which we all have to pay on articles of clothing, and so on. He has this sop thrown to him in order to keep him quiet for a time—$1 a year. But, Sir, the farmer's case has not been all stated, and I desire to state it on both sides, and to give every advantage that can be given to the position that benefits the farmer. Sir, the farmer is protected. The hon. gentleman who generally sits behind me, but whom I do not now see in his place, has always been very strong in his representations that the farmer was the best protected man in the country. Well, Sir, undoubtedly, he is protected. Undoubtedly, in my riding my advocacy of the National Policy was not so much with a view to establishing great industries—tall chimneys and that kind of thing—it was because the farmers of that part of the Dominion had to meet the active competition of the United States, of the western farmer, because the home market and the lumber camps were flooded with the produce of western farmers—corn, beef, pork, &c.—and I desired to retain that market for the farmer, as, undoubtedly, the farmer was entitled to retain it, if he was to be subjected to the increased duties imposed. But it is well to estimate the value of that home market. Let us see here, face to face with the hon. gentlemen who hold different views, what this protective policy, so far as the farmer is concerned, is worth. I do not think my hon. friends will quarrel with me, when I say that I have taken the years 1877 and 1878, the last years in which the importation of farm produce reached high-water mark. In the first year the importation was $14,149,181, and in the latter about $13,736,525. The average for the two is $13,942,853. Now, Sir, that has been curtailed, no doubt, by the high duties we have imposed. In 1891 the importation of products of the farm was reduced to $2,740,253, and in 1892 to $1,824,200, the average being $2,282,231. So that the farmer is getting the home market to the extent of $11,660,622, so far as products of the farm are concerned. I take the figures which the Finance Minister gave as to the extent to which the farmer is getting the benefit of the National Policy in respect of meats, and I find that to be $1,011,144. Altogether, therefore, the benefit to the farmer of the market secured to him by these duties, is $12,671,766. Now, I want to know, supposing the farmer gets the benefit of the market to the extent of $12,750,000 for his products, how much better off is he? That is the question. The duties do not increase the farmer's output. He does not grow a bushel more of corn or oats; he does not produce one solitary stem additional by reason of this policy. The difference is that, whereas before his products would have been forced out of the country in order to find a market, under the present system a greater proportion of the products are retained in the country and consumed here.

Mr. SPROULE. How about the development of the hog industry?

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman asks, "What about the development of the hog industry?" The Minister of Finance gave us the figures as $1,144,000. I have taken that, in addition to breadstuffs. If these goods did not come in, all I can say is, that to the extent they did not come in, the farmer is benefited. But I will take the Finance Minister's statement, according to which the result was some over $1,000,000, so we have now $12,000,000. Now, the best way, perhaps, is to take the farmers' output. I find that the farmers' output for the province of Ontario is $260,000,000 per annum. Now, if you take that sum and say that for that $260,000,000 he is able to sell $12,000,000 worth more at home than he would but for the National Policy, you have the measure of the benefit which the farmer derives. What is that? Is it 5 per cent, or 7 per cent, or 10 per cent? As we know the price of most of these articles the farmer has to sell is regulated by the export demand, to what extent will it be said that the farmer of this country is benefited by this $12,000,000 of home markets? If you put it at 10 per cent—I do not think any person would put it higher—what do you get? You get a better price for the farmer of about $1,250,000 more for his produce. Divide that among the number of farmers in Canada, and what have you got? Why, Sir, about $1 a head; so that, dividing the number of farmers by the net result, in the manner I have stated, the farmer gets, to that extent alone, advantages of somewhere about $1 a head on the average.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What number of farmers do you take?

Mr. McCARTHY. I estimate the number of farmers from the census of 1881, with 12 per cent added, assuming that the farmers have increased in number at the same pace with the rest of the population, and I divide that number into $1,000,000, which is the outside sum, I think, which any fair-minded man will attribute as any possible benefit to be derived from the home market.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many farmers do you make ?

Mr. McCARTHY. 742,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You must have made a mistake in your division.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps I have ; I won't be sure about the figures. But, at all events, any hon. gentleman can correct them. I find, on making my calculation, that it is $1.70, not $1.07. But, when you take $1.70 as the average value of the home markets to the farmers, it is bringing the matter down to an absolute absurdity. Sir, I have stated to this House that this tariff wants immediate amendment. Now, I distinctly say here, in enunciating my policy, that I have no sympathy with any trade policy which discriminates against Great Britain. I am absolutely and unequivocally opposed to any kind of so-called free trade, no matter whether it gives a continental market or not, which discriminates against the mother country : on the contrary, I think we would be moving altogether in the wrong direction. I regret that we have not heard yet from the ostensible leaders, and from the actual leaders, of the opposite side of the House any positive statement against a policy which, only a year or two ago, they so warmly and so thoroughly endorsed. For all I know, that policy is their policy to-day. No word has fallen from hon. gentlemen on that side to show that they do not still adhere to and advocate that view. For my part, I do not believe in it, as a fiscal matter. I do not believe that this country would be better off, as a fiscal policy, in discriminating against Great Britain. But these are not the only considerations which ought to weigh in a matter of that kind. Why, Sir, it is a contemptible policy, if I may venture to use the term, to say of the country that gives us free trade—because that is what it amounts to—that we will take their markets and all the advantages they give us, and we will actually discriminate against them in our market and sell out to another country, in order to gain an advantage of that kind. I do not wonder that that policy has been repudiated ; I do not wonder that it has been rejected as ignoble, as dishonourable, and as dishonouring to the people of this country. I only wonder, if I wonder at all, that hon. gentlemen opposite have not yet seen their way to abjure a policy which they must know, by this time, can never be accepted by the people of this Dominion. But, on the other hand, are we to wait, as suggested by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), for a preferential trade ? That seems to be a policy which is almost as unwise as the policy to which I have just referred. Are we to wait for days to come for preferential advantages in the British market, which we feign hoped for, and which I, for one, still hope for, and which we may possibly yet get ? Are we to remain as we are ? If it is true, that this tariff is crushing the people of this country, if this tariff is causing discontent among the people of this country, are we to wait for some possible time in the future when, from economic or other causes, a different policy may prevail in Great Britain, which will induce this country to grant us preferential trade ? Sir, I advocated that policy in 1855. I do not know whether I convinced any gentleman in this House, but I convinced myself, that economic causes were fast hurrying on Great Britain to a condition in which she would be compelled, in self-defence, to adopt a protective policy. I arrived at the conclusion, whether rightly or wrongly, that the closing to Great Britain of the United States markets, of the markets of Germany, France and Russia, and a diminishing trade, relatively, not absolutely, would inevitably cause Great Britain, in self-defence, to adopt some policy of fair trade, which would mean a policy under which Great Britain could make a barter and exchange for the trade of other countries. We have seen how that policy succeeded in the United States. We have seen Mr. Blaine from time to time make an agreement with the South American Republics by which, for better terms in the United States market, he got better terms in their markets. I am free to say that at one time I hoped, and I am not sure that I do not still hope, that a day may come when these conditions may force Great Britain to adopt a like policy. But one disturbing cause has since occurred, a cause so enormous as to upset every prognostication, no matter how well founded those prognostications may have been in 1855, and that is, that practically the people on the other side of the line have adopted free trade.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). No, Sir.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman says, no. Then all I can say is that Mr. Cleveland cannot be true to the policy on which he was elected.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). He may not be able to carry it out.

Mr. McCARTHY. No man can read the platform on which Mr. Cleveland was nominated, no man can read the journals that support him, no man can read the declarations which have been made with respect to his policy without feeling confident that he will carry it out.

Mr. MULOCK. There is also his message.

Mr. SCRIVER. And his inaugural address.

Mr. COCHRANE. There is not a word about free trade in it. Say what you mean.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman is getting angry. If he will keep his patience and temper, no doubt he will be afforded ample opportunity of stating his views to the House. I have not said anything that I have not a perfect right to say, and no interruption will prevent me stating what I intend to convey to this House. Read the platform on which Mr. Cleveland was nominated, read the journals which support the President, read the speeches which were delivered not long ago by the leading men of the Cleveland party at the banquet at New York, read Mr. Cleveland's inaugural, and no man can come to any other conclusion than that he will fail to fulfil the promises and pledges he has given, unless he gives such free trade to the United States as is consistent with a revenue tariff. The hon. gentleman appears to have supposed that I thought Mr. Cleveland was going to carry out free trade pure and simple. Of course, he was mistaken in that view. What I meant, and every hon. gentleman who knows anything about the policy of the Democrats is aware of it, was that according to the views of the Democrats it was unconstitutional to levy taxes except for revenue, that for any indirect purpose or any such purpose as that of promoting industries the tariff could not be changed, and that circumstance completely altered the position which any person took in the year 1888. But, Sir, there is more than that. I voted against a resolution proposed by the hon. member for Queen's P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and in favour of a motion proposed by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). I voted then in favour of offering the English people preferential trade. I voted against the resolution of the hon. member for Queen's, which set out that the tariff should be lowered on those goods which were imported from England. I did not at the time, as my hon. friend who knows more about my views perhaps than any person else, suppose that any great good would come from the resolution submitted by the hon. member for North Bruce. But I thought it was reasonable on the eve of a general election for us to let it be understood by the fair traders of England, so that they might advocate that policy on the stump and endeavour to have candidates returned holding those views, that Canada was prepared for preferential trade with them. That I thought to be a reasonable proposition, and I, therefore, voted for that resolution. But how do we find the state of affairs to-day? Suppose we were perfectly certain that it would come, suppose our faith was clear and sure that we were to have preferential trade, was that any reason why we should not, in the meantime, lower our tariff? Is it necessary to retain a tariff of 35 per cent, which is injurious to our domestic interests, because by and by we may squeeze out of Great Britain a tariff for preferential trade? When our tariff is lowered to a revenue basis, there will be quite enough left, if ever we gain preferential trade on our breadstuffs in the English market, for the Government to come down and propose that it should be made lower still. If one dollar a bushel were guaranteed for our wheat, I would be prepared to give free trade to England. Let them guarantee $1 per bushel for our wheat, or a sliding scale which would give 40 shillings a quarter, or $1 a bushel at home, and I would be willing to admit, duty free, every product of England,—and I do not think any member of this House would vote against such a proposition. But the reduction of the tariff to a revenue basis would not prevent preferential trade, if we still want to hold a grip on the mother country. If we want to occupy this position and say: "We will do nothing for you until you have done something for us," there will still remain a sufficient amount of duty to throw off whenever the mother country shall give preferential trade. What are the prospects at home? There is such a struggle over home rule that the people are thinking of nothing else. That question will not be settled this Parliament, and we know perfectly well that the struggle is destined to go on for some years yet to come. And then, what?

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Controller of Customs is going to settle it soon.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then, what? We are still to hope and believe that a protective party may be formed in England. There is no question as to the fact that protection in England is gaining ground. The farmers are for protection. But their protection is as much against Canada as it is against the United States. Why, it was only the other day that, in the British Parliament, a motion was made to exclude our cattle. That motion obtained a very large vote, and it was to the effect that, under no circumstances, should Canadian cattle be admitted to the English market as they had been prior to the recent order scheduling Canada. Why should they not so vote? What do we do for England? Why should we expect England to keep her tariff down?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Was that the reason, in your opinion?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think it was the reason. I think the reason was that the English people do not want competition in their markets. It was the protectionist feeling gaining ground among the farmers, who are worse off to-day than the farmers in any other part of the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McCARTHY. At last I have drawn a sympathetic cheer. I have been fishing for it in pretty shallow water. I am afraid, but I have got it at last. Will any one venture to say that there is any similarity between England and Canada with respect to that matter? Free trade to the English farmer means that we Canadians, the people of the United States, the people of India, the people of Australia, and the peoples of Hungary and Russia and all over the world send their wheat to that country. Protection on the sliding scale that Mr. Lowther proposes would at once enhance the price to the British farmers. Surely the hon. gentleman can see that it is not the word "protection" that makes the difference; it is whether there is a matter to be protected or not.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They do not understand the question.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose I was discussing the possibilities of obtaining preferential trade, and while I do not at all doubt the ultimate possibility that a protective party might grow in Great Britain, and might be willing to give to the colonies preferential free trade, it yet appears to me so distant a possibility, or even so distant a probability, that it can hardly be said at present to be worthy of practical consideration. Moreover, I venture to think that the difficulties which lie in the way are not such as ought to induce us, at this moment, to postpone action to remedy what appears to me to be admittedly very great evils. The view which I took when I had the honour to address the House on this subject some years ago was, as I briefly said this afternoon, that economic conditions would force upon the British Government the necessity of establishing some system of protection, not with a view of carrying out protective measures, but with a view more of being able to enter into negotiations with other countries for free or fair trade. If, indeed, that event should happen, there is nothing at all in the proposition I now make which would render it impossible for Canada to give such terms to the mother country as would induce the mother country to admit Canada to all advantages which would be thus obtained. But, as I have said, if the United States adopt it, as I think they have practically adopted free trade—when I say free trade, I mean free trade, subject, of course to the necessity of a revenue tariff—that would completely change and alter the complexion of the case, and would, no doubt, prevent and delay the possibility of the British people departing from the course which they have adhered to for so many years, a course which they believe to be to the great advantage of the country, namely, the policy of free trade. In an analysis of the import trade of the United Kingdom, compiled by Sir Rawson W. Rawson, who is a member of the Imperial Federation Council, I find statements given which certainly are worthy of the very gravest consideration by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and by those members of this House, including the hon. Finance Minister, who may think that there is a possibility or a probability of getting from the British Government preferential free trade in favour of Canada. This statement which I have here, explains the proportion of the imports to Great Britain from the colonies and from foreign countries of the food supply which that country finds it necessary to import, and, judging from the figures given, the House will at once see what an enormous sacrifice Great Britain will have to make if the policy which is suggested is carried out. For instance, we have in this statement, on page 21.—I have no doubt my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) is quite familiar with it—an analysis of the imports into England, distinguished under the headings, value, percentage, articles, raw materials and materials, and we have also the proportion received from foreign countries and from British possessions, respectively, in the year 1889. Taking food supplies, we find that the following were imported into Great Britain from foreign countries and from British possessions:—Animals (alive), from foreign countries, 81.5 per cent; from British possessions, 15.5 per cent. Meat (fresh) 74.6 from foreign countries; from British possessions, 25.4 per cent. Meat (salted or preserved) 88 per cent from foreign countries; 12 per cent from British possessions. Bacon and hams, 94 per cent from foreign countries; and 6 per cent from British possessions. Other products, 91.5 per cent from foreign countries; and 8.5 per cent from British possessions. The result is that, of the whole 100 per cent of food which is imported into Great Britain, 90 per cent comes from foreign countries, and only 10 per cent, or a little over, from British possessions. Then, passing to other articles, we have the following statement:—Vegetables, corn, grain and flour, 87.6 per cent from foreign countries, and 12.4 per cent from the colonies and British possessions. The vegetables we are not very much concerned with; but in regard to them the same relative proportion is observed: 80 per cent from foreign countries, and only 19 per cent from British possessions. This same little work, at page 49, gives the result of the adoption of a policy of preferential trade. At least three rates, it says, have been proposed by different advocates of a preferential duty on foreign imports, namely, 2, 5, and 10 per cent, and it shows the amount of duty that would be imposed on foreign imports at these different rates in the United Kingdom, and throughout the British possessions. Anything less than 10 per cent would hardly be of any advantage to us in British markets, and, at that rate, there would be a duty levied on foreign food importations of no less than £14,600,000; and the equivalent to that, on the basis of 10 per cent imposed by the colonies on the manufactures of foreign goods, and in favour of the British manufacturer, would entail, not merely upon us alone, but upon all the colonies, a duty of only £4,825,000. These figures, of course, demonstrate the great difficulty there would be in such a trade policy as the one I have mentioned. At the same time, it is not at all impossible that between the manufacturers, who are at present suffering very greatly from the exclusion of their goods from foreign markets, united with the agriculturists who are suffering from the reverse, that is, the importation of food supplies, animals, etc., into Great Britain, a protective policy might, in the end, be brought about. But when we find such a statement made as was made recently by Lord Salisbury, at Liverpool, a statement which has, I think, been more than once read in this House, it does appear to me that it would hardly be practicable for us to postpone dealing with our own matters here in the hope that such a policy would be reached in England. Lord Salisbury spoke in the most positive terms :

I was also grateful that, in spite of some words in the address, he (the chairman) did not lead me into the thorny paths of fiscal restrictions. I am very nervous to allude to it, because I have found when I have uttered most innocent and tentative observations that I am always accused of reimposing a duty upon corn. You will therefore forgive me if I say that I look upon a duty on corn as outside the dream of any practical politician, and I am perfectly convinced that if a duty on corn should be reimposed, it would have so precarious a hold that no sane man would invest a farthing on the security of its continuance.

Now, if there is to be a protectionist party in England, undoubtedly it will be the Conservative party, and yet we find the recognized leader of the Conservatives speaking in these unequivocal terms in reference to the policy of imposing a duty on food, and it is only in regard to food that we, as Canadians, would be interested in any protective policy that the British Government might in the future adopt. So that for these reasons—first, because we cannot afford to wait, and, secondly, because if such a policy is adopted in England, there will be quite enough left in our tariff on a revenue basis to give in exchange for reciprocity that we might have in that direction—I am convinced that it would be unwise for us to postpone action in this matter, trusting to the possibilities, whether they be near or far, of benefits from a protective policy or a preferential trade in Great Britain. That is one of the policies which have been proposed. Another policy which is proposed is the policy of delay ; and I must state now why I am not satisfied with the proposition made by the Government that this matter should be dealt with in the next session of this Parliament. I am not satisfied with it for more than one reason. I am not satisfied, in the first place, that I have heard any valid excuse for the delay. I am not satisfied, in the second place, giving every credence to the sincerity of the Government, with their promise of tariff amendment ; on the contrary, I am very much the reverse. We must read, Sir, and I propose to read, the views which the Government have put forward on this subject from the time that the new Administration came into office ; and bearing that in mind, and having some regard to the consistencies, which I have no doubt the Government desires to maintain, it does appear to me that there is not the promise of a tariff amendment or change, in the sense in which I understand these terms, and in the sense in which I believe the country at this moment desires and seeks for change. The first Minister of the Crown who spoke on the subject of the tariff was the hon. Minister of Public Works. Speaking at Coteau Landing, at the nomination for the representation of Soulanges, that hon. Minister used this very clear and emphatic language :

Referring to the trade question, Mr. Ouimet declared that protection had proved a great benefit to the country. The prosperity which reigned everywhere was the best proof of this. Luxuries were taxed, while necessities were freed. The present Government, he announced, did not intend to make any change in this respect. It would, on the contrary, perfect it by certain modifications according to circumstances.

Now, there is no doubt at all about that statement, and I apprehend that a Minister occupying so important a position as the Minister of Public Works does know perfectly well of what he was speaking ; and his announcement was clear and definite that the Government intended to adhere to the protective policy, and would make certain modifications in the direction in which I apprehend the policy has since been changed. Then, the First Minister went to Toronto, and was present at the dinner given by the Board of Trade of that city. At that dinner, unfortunately as it appeared to me for the First Minister, under his hand he found the sentiment that the mouldering branches ought to be lopped off. Adopting this, as was not unnatural under the circumstances, he announced that the policy of the Government would be to lop off the mouldering branches. Very naturally he did not go into any details ; very naturally he spoke in general terms. It was not the place nor the time, and it was not to be expected that he would do more than intimate what the policy of the Government was to be, but that policy he announced to be the lopping off of the mouldering branches. What was to constitute a mouldering branch and when the lopping off was to occur was, at that time, left to inference. Some words, however, did fall from the First Minister, which indicated that it was not the intention of the Government to deal with the tariff until President Cleveland's Administration was installed, and until the Government here saw what the new Administration at Washington was going to do. But in a short while afterwards the First Minister was at great pains to explain that that was not what he meant, that he was altogether misunderstood, that it was not the intention of the Government to postpone action with regard to the tariff until the Washington Administration had arranged theirs under the new regime ; and at the Auditorium, shortly afterwards, dealing with this question, he is reported to have thus spoken :

I was misconstrued as having said that we would not make any changes in our fiscal system until they make changes in theirs. Admitting as I did that the National Policy was not perfection, the Liberals of this city were told that what I had said was that while I admitted it was not perfect, I did not propose to improve it until the United States improved their tariff. I need hardly tell you such a statement would have been absurd, that it was never uttered or thought of by me. I was speaking of fundamental changes which the mercantile community had been led to believe were necessary in our tariff organization in anticipation of fundamental changes in the tariff organization of the United States, but while I admitted that the National Policy is not perfection, that it never was, and requires to be moulded from time to time, to suit the changing circumstances of this country, I did not postpone the time for a tariff reform until tariff reform shall have been completed in the United States; we propose to put our hand to the work in the very session that is coming, in so far as may be necessary, to change and mould, from time to time, the tariff system under which we exist, and the most terse and energetic way of expressing the necessity of that was made by the leader of the Opposition last night when he said such changes are necessary because what is allowed one day may be abused the next. A tariff wisely framed and carefully framed as the tariff may require, in consequence of the changing conditions of trade in surrounding countries, may need to be altered, but our principle is well expressed, as contrasted with the principle of the Opposition, as expressed by Mr. Laurier, who declares that he will lay the axe to the root of the tree. We propose, in the words which were extended to me as a motto and toast at the Board of Trade banquet, simply to trim the tree and lop the mouldering branches. You will understand perfectly, ladies and gentlemen, without my telling you, that while to-morrow the papers will say I am very vague and sphinx-like in speaking on a subject like this, it is impossible for a Minister standing on a public platform in advance of the session of Parliament to put his finger upon one item of the tariff or another item of the tariff and say "That shall be repealed or that shall be reduced." All that we can state to you under our duty to those to whom we owe the highest duty as members of the Government, is the principle upon which we intend to proceed, the principle of sustaining the National Policy, but of reforming the tariff to suit the wants of the Canadian people, as they may change and alter from time to time.

Well, at the same meeting spoke a gentleman of almost equal authority in the Government, perhaps of still greater authority on the subject of trade, and that was the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said that this idea in substance of tariff reform was to be found in the acts of the past, and that we had only to look back upon the Statute-books to see what the Government of which he was a member had done from the first time that Government was formed, in 1878, until that date, to see how the tariff had been changed and reformed. His language was as follows:—

There are one or two things which I desire to say, and I shall try to keep within my ten minutes, in reference to what has been termed, and to which Sir John Thompson referred, as tariff reform. It is difficult, very difficult, to understand what is meant by this expression. It is one great advantage, in a free country like this, that those who are engaged in administering the affairs of that country that they can be told by their friends what reforms should be made, particularly in all that affects the taxation of the people. And if a system prevails which we believe is true and correct and will lead to the prosperity and greatness of the country, it does not follow that the details of a system of that kind cannot and should not be changed save as circumstances may require. We adopted a policy in 1879, and I am proud of the part I took at that time in assisting and promoting that policy. I do not hesitate to say, sir, that from my boyhood up I have always been a protectionist, and though it may be treason I might say that my teacher was Horace Greeley.

So the hon. gentleman goes on to explain how it was he learned the doctrine of protection. Then he proceeds to say :

Reading Horace Greeley's tracts, showing that the only system that would build up a new country as it has built up that country to a prosperity unparalleled in history, was the same one that must give prosperity and greatness to Canada was a policy of protection, and I have not changed my mind yet.

Then the hon. gentleman pointed out what had been done in the way of the remission of taxes, and he wound up in this way :

This is a great practical specimen of what I consider to be tariff reform, and in carrying out the suggestion of Sir John Thompson to-night that if, in the investigation which must take place by the Finance Minister, by the Controller of Customs, and by myself as Minister of Trade and Commerce we find there are any rotten limbs in connection with this policy of ours we will lop them off just as readily and freely as we did those other taxes we considered onerous upon the people of this country. But, at the same time, in doing that, I state for myself individually, and I think I may also state for the Government of which I am a member, that we do not intend to abandon the great principle of the National Policy as far as it is a protection extended legitimately to all interests, the manufacturing, agricultural and commercial interests of this country. I think after what I have said that you will come to the conclusion that the system of tariff reform has been actually practised by us ever since we have been in power.

Now, Sir, referring to that, it will be found that from 1879 until 1887, or 1886, at all events, no single session of Parliament has been allowed to pass without what is called tariff reform in that sense. In 1880 we had a Bill, and in 1881, and 1882, and 1883, and 1884, and 1885, and 1886. Every year there has been an alteration, or change, or modification of the tariff. Some goods have been put on the free list, the duties on others have been increased. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was, therefore, perfectly justified in saying that he could refer to the past, and that from the past we could judge what were his ideas of tariff reform. Then we had a final statement made to this House. Now, let me pause here just for a moment, if the House will bear with me. We have arrived at the opening of Parliament; we have the statement, first, of the Minister of Public Works; we have the statement made by the First Minister at the Toronto Board of Trade dinner; and we have the statement made at the Auditorium, that there would be changes in the tariff in the view which the Minister proclaimed of lopping the mouldering branches off. And what has been the result? Two modifications in the tariff. On coal oil the duty is said to be reduced to the extent of about 2½ cents per gallon. On binder twine there has been a reduction in favour of the average farmer of about $1 per annum. And the result is that the Government have lopped off the mouldering branches; they are not postponing matters, not delaying matters for the change that is to be made at Washington; they have arrived at the conclusion that this is all that the tariff needs at the present session, and these are the substantial changes which were promised by the First Minister at the meeting in the Auditorium, in Toronto. Curiously enough, Sir,—because it is by going from home that we learn news—I find in the London "Times" the report of a meeting which was not published here, but which appears to have got as far as the other side of the water. It is reported that the First Minister announced to his followers at that meeting that he did not propose to change the tariff until the tariff changes had been made at Washington, and he must ask the forbearance of those who were urging for tariff reform until the necessary time had elapsed. Now that will be found in the London "Times" shortly after the meeting was supposed to have been held here, but no public announcement was made in this country. This has never been put forward here as a ground for delay. The Minister of Finance has spoken of the financial policy of the country here and has not attempted to urge this House to delay or stay its hand by reason of the possible changes that might be made at Washington. And for obvious reasons. After the speech made by the First Minister at Toronto, where he repudiated that interpretation put upon his earlier statement, and for other reasons which for obvious reasons I need not dwell upon, it would be a policy to commend itself to the people of this country that they should wait for the changes at Washington before they changed our tariff here. Now, Sir, we have no sympathy for such a policy. Why did we wait for the change in the matter of sugar before altering our own tariff? If it was good policy to make that change when we did, why would it not have been good policy a year or two before? The only ground for making the change was that we could not afford to have it said that the people of the United States were getting their sugar for something like twenty pounds for $1, while our people were paying $1 for twelve, thirteen or fourteen pounds. But, if it was a wise policy it might as well have preceded as followed the change at Washington. We surely can regulate our own domestic concerns without waiting to see what is going to be done by the people to the south of us. We know already that what is going to be done will be in the way of reduction. We know, generally speaking, how changes must be made there, and it would perhaps tend to improve our relations with the United States, if we were to decide upon our tariff changes without waiting for the action they may take in that regard. But, for another reason I do not see my way to agreeing to this postponement. Is it possible, I ask hon. members of this House, taking the statement made in the most solemn manner by the Finance Minister, to imagine that there is to be any substantial change in the tariff in the way the people of this country desire? There may be modifications, there may be goods put on the free list, there may be increases here and reductions there, but what I understand as the change desired and what I advocate myself is a material reduction of the tariff in the direction of the revenue system, and I do not see that there is any possibility of that. In point of fact such a change is excluded by the language the Finance Minister used, because he said: There must be no panic; there is no intention on the part of the Government to do anything in the way of the reduction of the tariff so as to affect the industries of this country; no intention on the part of the Government to abandon the policy of protection that has brought about such prosperity and happiness to the people. Therefore it is clear that there is a radical distinction, a clear and unmistakable cleavage between those who favour delay and as little change as possible and those who go the length of free trade—which I do not, because I think there ought to be continuity in our politics and in our trade policy just as there would be if we had a foreign policy. I do not think it is right to encourage people to invest in manufacturing industries by our laws, to encourage artisans to come here in the hope of being able to obtain a living, and suddenly to change to their injury as if they were our enemies. I think we ought to lead the people to regard the laws of the Parliament of this country as laws not lightly to be changed or lightly to be revoked. At the same time we ought to proceed, as it appears to me, without unnecessary disturbance of the business relations, in the direction of freer trade and lighter tariff, no matter what the consequences may be. Now, Sir, I am told, and I will no doubt be told here, that I am not taking any account of the loss of duty. I am told: You propose to cut down the tariff substantially in reference to England—because that is what I do propose, I propose that as the only means at present available, the only practical measure of relief, to reduce our tariff in favour of that country in whose markets we have absolute free trade. I do not propose to go all the length of reducing our tariff in favour of the United States at this moment. I do not propose to restore matters to the condition they were in in 1877 and 1878. But I think the time may come—I believe the time will come, I have confidence in the justice of the new President of the United States, and I think that before long happier relations existing between this country and Washington than those which existed during the administration of the late President—the time will come when freer trade, and reciprocal trade if you like, or at all events trade upon better terms to both countries, can be established. But in the meantime I believe, Sir, the people of this country, of both sides of politics, would not approve of the Government lowering its duties in favour of the Americans while the Americans maintain their duties as against the Canadians. In the statement that was made by Mr. Atkinson in winding up his tour on behalf of the "Globe" newspaper, he puts that very strongly. He says:

This and other evidence all goes to show the advantages of free trade with the States. The conviction is held by almost every farmer I have talked with. And it is, in a majority of cases—

I ask the attention of the House to these words:

I think, accompanied by a sturdy objection to Canada doing anything humiliating or unbecoming to put it into effect. There is, too, an objection felt by members of both parties to allowing Canadian manufacturers to be put at the disadvantage of American competition while shut out from participation in the American market.

Now, that is stated by a Liberal making a tour on behalf of the great Liberal newspaper of Toronto to be the feeling of men of both parties. There is no desire to put the manufacturers at a disadvantage until the markets of the United States are open to them. Then, Sir, what about the loss of duty? Now, the duty on British goods, on those classes of goods which pay duty is, in round numbers, 30 per cent. The duty on goods coming from Belgium is, I think, somewhere about the same rate, and on the goods from Germany also the same. Why do I include the goods from Belgium and Germany? Because, Sir, whatever advantage Britain may have in any market, even in the markets of one of her colonies, under the stipulations of treaties which have been made by Britain with these countries and referred to in this House (the treaty, so far as Belgium is concerned, of 1862, and, on the part of Germany, 1865), both these countries are entitled to the same advantages in our market that Britain would have. So that, whether willing or not, the reduction of our tariff in favour of Great Britain and admitting her goods at any particular rate, would mean that both Belgium and Germany, at all events, would be entitled to the like privileges in our markets, and possibly too—as to that I express no positive opinion—many other countries who have the favoured-nation clause in their treaty with Great Britain, would be entitled to similar advantages; but the importation from other countries are so infinitesimal that, for the purposes of revenue, they need not be taken seriously into consideration. What, then, would be the result of taking off a duty of 10 per cent? Remember, I do not mean that it should be 10 per cent, or even 10 per cent all around, because nobody but the Finance Minister can regulate details of that kind. On many of these articles it ought to be much more. On iron, I think most members will agree with me that we ought to return to the duty that prevailed prior to 1887. That would be, of course, a reduction of much more than 10 per cent. But, just for the purpose of illustration, suppose that the amount of the duty taken off goods imported from Great Britain were one-third of the revenue, which is now collected, and suppose the same amount of reduction was made on goods coming from Germany and Belgium, we would practically suffer a loss of revenue to the extent of $3,000,000—$2,722,000—being 30 per cent of the revenue collected on British goods, the balance being made up by the duty collected on importations from Belgium and Germany. Well, where are you going to get the $3,000,000? How do you propose to make good that loss to the revenue? If this tariff means anything, it means the prohibition of importations. It is not a tariff for revenue purposes; it is a tariff for prohibitive purposes; and, without pretending to say that that can be demonstrated—it is a matter, of course, for the calculation of experts—I do not doubt that this loss would be made up upon the greater importation of goods from Great Britain under the reduced tariff. However that may be, it is certainly not a matter that should stand in the way of the reform which I advocate, if the reform in other respects commends itself to the intelligence of this House. Then, once more, let me recur to the position of the farmer in this country. I have spoken of his position, because, in speaking of him, I embrace all other consumers. I venture to think that everything I say with regard to the farmer that is not specially applicable to him, applies, with equal force, to the other consumers in this country. But, after all, the farmer is the man who is now knocking at our doors. In the "Globe" of to-day is a most important statement made at Moosomin, on 3rd March, and I commend this statement to the attention of the hon. member who represents that district, to whom these resolutions have been sent, and which speak, in no uncertain terms of the wants of the farmer in that part of this great Dominion. These are the resolutions:

Whereas, agriculture is the leading industry in Canada, on which three-fourths of her people depend and through which all true national prosperity must come; and

Whereas, the "protective tariff" cannot appreciably affect the value of farm products in Canada; and

Whereas, the present "protective tariff" of 35 per cent increases the cost of imported manufactured goods to the farmer from 58 to 60 per cent and has had the effect of causing the formation of trusts and combines with the result of extorting from the farmer a like high price for all protected home manufactures ; and

Whereas, this has made farming unprofitable in Canada—has reduced the value of farm lands in Eastern Canada from 35 to 50 per cent and has brought this “greater Canada” to a state of extreme depression ; and

Whereas, because foreign governments may prevent their citizens by high tariffs from satisfying their wants from us ; we must suffer the consequences with them if we cannot find an equally good marked elsewhere. That is our advantage and we are not blind to the efforts of government in this direction ; but it does not follow that our government should prevent us from supplying our wants from all foreign countries by imposing a like high tariff ; and

Whereas, a tariff is considered on all hands a necessary evil until some better means of collecting a revenue is devised ; therefore

Be it resolved, That this meeting does humbly petition Government to reduce the tariff to such an extent that it shall not exceed 12½ per cent on all farm products and all prime necessities for the household and the farm ;

Be it further resolved, That we request the active support of the public press and public bodies interested in agriculture and the rapid settlement and development of this great country, knowing, as we well do, our weakness if unsupported ; and that a copy of this petition be forwarded to the Minister of Inland Revenue and a copy to our representative, W. W. McDonald, M.P., and a copy to the Hon. Senator Perley.

Now, Sir, that is a resolution coming from a non-political body, speaking of their grievances. But it does not stand alone. From the Central Farmers' Institute, meeting in Toronto, not very long ago, resolutions of like import were adopted. From the Board of Trade at Lethbridge, I find resolutions also in favour of tariff reform :

Whereas it is the opinion of this Board of Trade that the time has arrived when it would be to the interest of the residents of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories to have the duties at present imposed on farm implements, binder twine and barb wire removed ;

Therefore this Board of Trade extends its thanks to Mr. Dalton McCarthy, Q.C., M.P., and the other members of the House of Commons who are pressing for the removal of the said duties, for their efforts in that behalf, and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Mr. McCarthy and that a telegram be sent him containing the substance of the same.

That resolution was also adopted. Then we have a mass meeting of the farmers at Brantford. Against these, we have the meeting of the Manufacturers' Association, who are perfectly satisfied with things as they are, and the only hope of relief they hold out to the farmers is the preferential trade for which the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) contends, and which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance thinks, in the not very near future may possibly be accomplished. Sir, I am done with just one observation. In my opinion it ought to make very little difference what my course in the past may have been, if my arguments are well founded, if my facts are fairly stated, and if my conclusions are reasonably just. The question now is, whether, at this time of day, and under all these circumstances, there ought to be a reconsideration of the policy that was adopted in 1879, whether there ought to be a change, regard being had to the various matters which I have had the honour to submit to the House. But I know perfectly well, my experience as a politician has been long enough to teach me, that much may be made against the views I now advocate, by my heresies of the past, if they be heresies. For that reason only I venture to trespass upon the House with the views which I have entertained and expressed on this subject on former occasions. I would not take up the time of the House by referring to them now, were it not that, whether I be right or wrong, whether my course now is one that ought to meet with the approval of this House and the country, I am not very far away from the views which I have held on this subject of trade from the earliest time at which I have ever taken part in this discussion. I had the honour to speak in this House as long ago as 2nd March, 1877. I then addressed the House upon the subject of the tariff, and the only passage that I have been able to find in the speech which I then had the honour to deliver, which is reported in the “Hansard,” is contained in the following words :

His right hon. friend's amendment contained a reference to another branch and that was with reference to readjustment of the tariff. He was aware that, not being a commercial man, his opinions had not the weight of those of hon. members who were directly interested in commerce, therefore, he felt a little diffident about saying anything on this matter. * * * He was not going to dispute the grand doctrine of free trade nor the philosophy of the hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who especially championed it. But he did say that there were exceptional cases to every doctrine, and the position of this country at the present time was exceptional, and ought to be dealt with in that spirit. We formed a sparsely settled country, stretching from ocean to ocean, with a great people south of us, who put a duty of about 45 per cent on what we sent to them. Whether free trade or protection was right or wrong those people were able not only to compete more than successfully with us with a duty of 17½ per cent, but they were able to compete with British manufactures in England itself.

Well, Sir, in the following year, 1878, I used this language :

He had never pretended that, looked at in a purely abstract light, a system of protection was to be preferred to one of free trade, and that it was wise, or would be good statesmanship for the country to build up against the laws of nature, manufactures which could not exist in the Dominion without such aid.

But what was the difference between the northern part of the United States and Canada? In regard to manufacture, our climate and natural products were, to a great extent, similar to theirs, and were we not in as good a position to manufacture north of the line as our American cousins on the south of the line? We could not, however, hope to compete against such an inferior system as we were now competing against. It was absurd to pretend that our manufactures could exist when the American markets were shut against us, while ours was open to them. What we wanted was not to inaugurate a system of protection, but to initiate such a system as would remedy the mistakes made against the doctrines of free trade, by our friends south of the line. If they were doing violence to what hon. gentlemen claimed to be a proper system of trade, we had to enact such laws as would meet the difficulty and to protect our own manufacturing industries, and the other branches of industry in this country, against that system. It was scarcely open to argument, whether reciprocity would not be better than protection. He had never heard any hon. gentleman say that it would not be.

Those were my views in 1877-78. I did not pretend then. I have never pretended to be a protectionist. I adopted the National Policy, or the policy of protection, as the policy which under the circumstances was best in the interest of this country. I supposed then, as we all supposed, that it would be merely a temporary one in regard to those articles which could be properly manufactured here. It has since gone much further than any one in 1877-78 ever dreamed of. An attempt has been made to protect every industry. A man had only to come to Ottawa and say that he proposed to start a manufactory in some line and ask that he be protected by a duty of 30 per cent, and that duty was imposed. Next year he would again visit Ottawa and obtain an additional duty of 5 per cent. If he then failed, the duty was left as it was. Coming down to a later period—because I have not taken much part in the discussion of the trade question, so far as I am aware—in 1891, after the last election, speaking before the young Conservatives of Collingwood, I used these words :

It was never contemplated in 1878 that our industries would always require to be spoon-fed, or would always require unlimited protection. The day must come, and the day is coming, when these industries must endeavour to stand alone, or with a reasonable amount of protection, and they should be prepared in the future to dispense with the high taxation necessary to their infancy.

These were the views, so far as I know, I have from time to time expressed on this subject, and I do not feel that I have departed in the slightest degree from those views I have held hitherto. I suppose, rightly or wrongly, that this protective policy was to exist for a limited time, and for a limited time only. I supposed, further, that if it was found in practice that the prices of the commodities produced were decidedly enhanced, that alone would be sufficient to bring about a revision of the tariff; and I do not feel that in adopting the policy which I advocate I am departing in any degree from my earlier views, even if that action would be a cause for shame. But it may be said: why, the country is so prosperous; the bank accounts are so large; the deposits are so large; the number of life insurance policies have so largely increased; all this wealth shows such manifest and patent evidence of prosperity, it would be madness to change the tariff. I am familiar with these arguments; I have heard them time and again.

Mr. McCARTHY.

After all, what do they prove? I, for one, do not venture to say that during the last ten years the country has stood still. I do not pretend to say that we have not more or less added to our wealth; I do not pretend to say that the industrial classes of this country of all descriptions have not by toiling and spinning materially improved our position; but what I do mean to say is, that the distribution of wealth is not, perhaps, as it was ten years ago; that while wealth has accrued in some hands, the distribution of it is not, perhaps, as general as it was ten years ago. When I hear the argument that the enormous balances in the bank, the enormous amounts in the building societies and savings banks show prosperity, I am reminded of what I saw in a New York magazine that I looked at not long ago. It was stated that there are six or seven men in New York city whose wealth is three or four times more than the whole national debt of Canada. No doubt that money appears in securities, bonds or deposits; yet in New York, the same magazine tells us, during the last year there were 100,000 evictions, and a large proportion of these who die were buried in the Potter's Field. So, while we have these great millionaires on the one hand, showing apparently that the country as a whole is very rich, we have most extreme poverty surrounding those millionaires in that very city of New York, to which these references are made. Then our farmer is better off, we are told, than is the farmer in the American states. I believe he is. I believe that the farmer here is, on the whole, better off than the average farmer in the United States, and I trust he is, because here is an account I find of the American farmer, and I am now reading from an article published during the last election in the Chicago "Herald," and this account of the American farmer does not indicate a desirability to continue our present system of taxation for another 20 years:

Thirty years of protective tariff taxation have reduced American agriculture to a position so ignoble that in some places it does not even retain its self-respect. A generation ago the American farmer was the proudest and most independent workingman on earth. To-day he cannot persuade his own son to remain on the farm. Thirty years of unjust laws and class privilege have made the farmer the sport of the cities, the butt of all cheap evils and the hoped for victim of every thief and swindler in the land.

Thirty years of oppression by favoured interests—oppression in many cases submitted to with cheerfulness and acquiesced in with patience,—have established in the minds of the thoughtless millions the idea that the farmer is necessarily a gullible fool; that he is legitimate prey, for shrewder men and that gold bricks and green goods exist for him and him alone. Thirty years of extortion and fraud on the part of his own government have spread the belief that the farmer lives to be duped and plundered, and our cities large and small, are full of cheap fellows who have so much contempt for his intelligence that they are sometimes disposed to boast of their own forbearance in not despoiling him further. In the thirty years of protection the typical American farmer with whom we are familiar has been changed from a well-dressed, well-read, independent and spirited man to a scarecrow, with vacant eyes and gaping mouth, with the inevitable confidence man near at hand. We do not deceive and oppress a man and retain our respect for him. The contempt with which the privileged classes in America regard the farmer whom they plunder has been communicated to the whole body of the people.

Now, Sir, if that is a fair description given by themselves of the American farmer I am free to confess that our farmer is much better off, but I trust, Sir, that we will see in time that we do not continue the system which has reduced the American farmer to the state of despondency that we find he occupies there. I am ashamed, Sir, for occupying the time of the House at such enormous length, and nothing but the great importance of the question would be any justification for it. I have endeavoured to make the argument which I started out to make as clear as I possibly could. I feel that I could not make the matter complete in any less time, but at all events, I am perfectly conscious that in making my statement I trespassed on the House in a way which deserves at my hands the very greatest thanks, and I am perfectly sure the House, under the circumstances, will be indulgent to me. I conclude by moving, seconded by Mr. Hodgins :

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved—

That since the introduction of the protective system sufficient time has elapsed for the establishment and development of such manufacturing industries as under existing conditions can be successfully carried on in Canada. Moreover, many manufacturers, sheltered behind the rampart thus erected, have formed combinations and trusts which prohibit competition and create and maintain monopolies.

That the existing tariff, defensible only as a protective measure, has proved in many instances oppressive and burdensome to the great mass of the consuming classes, and especially to those engaged in agricultural pursuits; is unfair and unequal in its incidence; and has been productive of discontent verging on disloyalty among those who suffer from its injustice.

That no sufficient reason has been adduced or exists requiring investigation respecting the foregoing facts, which are notorious, nor justifying delay in the passage of remedial legislation which is imperative.

That in the opinion of this House the tariff ought to be at once amended in respect of the matters herein indicated, and also by the substantial reduction of customs duties in favour of the United Kingdom, in whose markets all Canadian products are admitted duty free, and of those nations which under treaty obligations with Great Britain would be entitled to the same advantages; graduated, however, so as not unnecessarily to prejudice the business of the country nor to do wrong to those who have imported and paid duties in accordance with its provisions.

And this House declares its readiness to make a like reduction in favour of such other portions of the empire or with such other foreign countries, especially the United States of America, as are willing to reciprocate in matters of trade with Canada on fair and equitable terms.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I am not unaware that it must always be somewhat of a difficult task to answer an hon. gentleman of the parliamentary experience and admitted ability of the gentleman who has just taken his seat. But, I count myself somewhat fortunate to-night in the fact, that during the afternoon and during this evening my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) has been sailing in somewhat strange and troubled waters, over a course that was shoaly and tortuous; and having abandoned those strange lights upon the shore, to which he formerly trusted, he had scarcely become accustomed to the new ones, which for the present, at least, he has adopted in their stead. I am aware, Sir, that the jars of a family, or the jars among those who have been formerly members of a family, are never exceedingly pleasant to those who may have the misfortune to be participants. I assure my hon. friend that I am filled with regret—a regret that is intensified by my appreciation of his ability and of my personal friendship for himself—that we were not able upon this side of the House to join in that liberal measure of applause, which, under other circumstances we have extended to him in days gone by. I am quite aware, Sir, that in this country there are those who are ever ready to crown with laurels and eulogy, those who for the moment and from whatever cause may consider it their duty or their interest to break the ties, sometimes called pernicious party ties, which have bound them to those with whom they have been engaged in political work in the past. But, Sir, it is satisfactory to know that glory thus won is apt to be exceedingly ephemeral, and it is satisfactory also to feel that the history of Canada in the past—and its future history will probably be but a repetition of its past history in that regard—teaches us that those who in days gone by, whether in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite or on this side of the House, have admittedly done the best for Canada, have found ample scope for the patriotic employment of their genius within the ranks of one or other of the great political parties of the country. I am far from contending, Sir, that the party system in this country, or in any other country, is without its faults; but I fancy I speak the opinions of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, when I say that its advantages are many and its faults are fewer than those of any other system which we could adopt in Canada for the purposes of Government to-day. And while I say that, Sir, I desire to add another statement which is equally true: that in a country like this, where any political party of any pretensions must contain individuals who represent sections and interests as wide apart as the seas which bound us, it is impossible within party confines to secure any absolute uniformity of opinion upon great public lines or for the promotion of any great system of public works or benefit. Just as provinces in a Confederation such as this have to yield their individual preferences for the greater general good, so we members of a party have for the time being to yield opinions which we may honestly and firmly hold, in order that a great consensus of opinion may form a policy that will be acceptable to the party in general, and in order that the system of government may go on; and this House—this country—has no right to regard men as less honest, less conscientious, because they make such a compromise in the public interest; as any less honest or any less conscientious simply because they adopt the more delicate and perhaps the not less effective method of pressing their views privately upon those who for the time being may be in the position of having to mould either into statutes or resolutions the general opinion of the party as a whole. Now, there is a tendency, also, in this country, the moment a member of a political party happens to step out of its ranks, to accept his statements without any criticism, and to adopt his theories, however vague and however ill-considered they may be; and my hon. friend who has just taken his seat is not an exception to the general rule. Although my hon. friend has departed from the party caucus, I fancy that he will not say that upon his mind the dawn of millennial wisdom has come, or that he has freed himself from those failings and faults which are common to our fallen humanity; and I am sure that our hon. friend is far too brave a man to object to his statements being criticised, either from this side or the other side of the House, in connection with the theories which he has advanced in the present debate. I congratulate my hon. friend upon the applause that greeted him from the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite; but I tell him we appreciate quite well that they do not applaud him because they love him the more, but simply because they love us the less. I have congratulated my hon. friend thus far. I am sorry, Sir, that I cannot congratulate him upon the resolution which he has presented to this House. In the earlier days of the medical profession, when the science of physical diagnosis was not exceedingly well understood, and when a physician found a case as to the diagnosis of which he was not very well assured, he employed what in those days was called—and it was a very expressive term—a “shot-gun prescription.” In other words, he sought a judicious combination of diuretics, anti-philogistics, expectorants and chologogues, in the hope that if one remedy did not hit, another would. Now, Sir, what is the resolution that my hon. friend has placed upon the Journals of this House on the present occasion? It is a resolution which, if I read it aright, says that we must be loyal, that we must extend particular advantages to Great Britain, our mother country; and, having done that, we must also do it to those favoured nations that have treaties with Great Britain. That would not be an act of generosity, because my hon. friend knows that we are compelled to do it if we extend preferential advantages to England; but, having done that, then we are to go to the United States, and I suppose offer some special advantages to them; then we are to go to the colonies and offer some special advantages to them; then we are to go to the other countries of the world and offer some special advantages to them; and then we are to come back to Great Britain in the hope that we shall receive discrimination in her markets in return for the great loyalty and fidelity that we have shown to the British Crown in matters of trade. I confess that it seems to me that the British Government that would refuse to accept such a magnanimous offer as my hon. friend sees fit to make must be a very hard-hearted Government indeed. Now, Sir, I can congratulate my hon. friend on one feature of this matter. In days gone by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has been the champion resolution-framer of this Parliament, and I am bound to say—and I give him full credit for his ability in that regard—that he has placed upon the Journals of this House many a specimen that is rare and curious. But, Sir, the laurels have fallen from his brow, and have passed by an easy succession to the brow of my hon. friend from North Simcoe; and I am quite sure that the resolutions of the hon. member for South Oxford will go down to posterity as plain writing, while the resolution which my hon. friend has seen fit to place on the Journals of this House will go down as the hieroglyphics of the present, to puzzle the intelligence and the science of future generations. Now, Sir, the first thing which my hon. friend offers to this House is to lower the tariff towards Great Britain. The hon. gentleman has in his speech made this intention very clear, but he has not made so clear the reason which would impel him to do that, except, as I gathered it, that he wished to take off the burdens from the back of the Canadian farmer. But if the hon. gentleman made that contention in the House this afternoon, he made somewhat another contention recently in the city of Toronto. He made a contention there, that, if we did that, we should have England responding to us in the matter of discriminatory tariffs, and we should thus, in a very short time, enjoy a special advantage in the British market. Now, my hon. friend is a member of the Imperial Federation league. I have the honour of being a very humble member of that league myself, not because I believe that its theories are practicable for the moment, but because underneath its organization and underneath the idea which dictates its policy, is the strong feeling that the ties between this country and the motherland should be widened and strengthened and made more lasting if possible,

Well, the hon. gentleman was the leader of that movement in Canada, and when he was asked to give a practical basis upon which Imperial Federation could be carried out, he refused, up to the end of 1888. In that year I had the honour of attending a great public meeting held in the city of Toronto, of which my hon. friend was the father. And at that meeting my hon. friend propounded anew Howard Vincent's scheme of mutually preferential Imperial trade, and he told the people there that he would have the privilege of bringing such a scheme before this House during the session which was then on. Well, my hon. friend again referred to that scheme the other day in Toronto, and here is what he said at that meeting, held by Mr. Parkin, in the Auditorium :

Will we have the impudence—at least the want of modesty—to call upon Great Britain to change her free trade until we had done something at home? When Canada remembered that her trade was only 3 or 4 per cent of the trade of Great Britain, was it reasonable to expect that England would change her policy in a matter of that kind?

Now, it is interesting to go back for a very short time, in following my hon. friend's course in connection with this Imperial trade movement. In 1888 he placed this motion on the Journals of this House;—it was not reached, but the hon. gentleman strongly supported another motion in the same line exactly, moved by the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Marshall) :

That it would be in the interests of the Dominion, that such advantages should be sought for in the trade relations in the United Kingdom and Canada as would give to Canada advantages in the markets of the mother country not allowed to foreign states, Canada being levied for such privileges to discriminate in her markets in favour of Great Britain and Ireland, due regard being had for the purpose of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion, and to the financial interests of the Dominion as well.

There was no impudence, no want of modesty there, in the opinion of my hon. friend from North Simcoe. That was the resolution of my hon. friend himself. But my hon. friend has veered round, and to-night he says that this mutual preferential trade is a wild and hazy scheme. He says that it is in the impene- trable future, and that, consequently, we cannot depend much upon it. I want to show this House what the hon. gentleman thought of it in the session of 1888 :

I think I shall be able to satisfy the House that there is good ground to believe and strong ground to hope that there is a party in England which favours the giving of advantages in the English market to the colonies and that this opinion will ere long prevail.

There is a strong probability—

You see, Sir, he is very strong in his opinion—

—there is more than a strong probability that England will be compelled to put a duty on bread stuffs. Either England must fall from her great estate or she must adopt some such policy as I have outlined.

In the hon. gentleman's opinion, there was no cheek, no want of modesty, in advocating the scheme then. It was a perfectly practicable and feasible scheme, calculated to strengthen and make still more lasting the ties between Great Britain and Canada. That was his opinion then. But the hon. gentleman went still further. He went still nearer the Throne, and spoke in favour of this movement in England. Cheek, did he say? Want of modesty, did I hear him say in Toronto? Why, the hon. gentleman himself, under the shadow of the British Throne itself, propounded this policy. He propounded it to the people of Great Britain and Ireland, in his speech at Worcester, England, on 23rd July. He there said :

There must be a policy of give and take.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman says, "hear, hear," but he wants to give up everything now, and take nothing.

While we on our side must reduce our tariffs to admit your goods, so that you will be able to compete in our markets with all the world, with great advantage; yet, on the other hand, you must admit to your markets the produce of our farmers and our purchasers, on somewhat more favourable terms than you give to our foreign competitors.

Will my hon. friend say that he did not lend a word of encouragement to my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), whose eloquent words are still ringing within the shores of the British Isles, and who went over to promote this policy, which my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) introduced into this House and proposed to the British people, as well? Now, what is his idea in opening up this whole question and in declaring that it is perfectly mythical and impossible of fulfilment? The other day a motion was moved in Montreal by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), which sounds very like the motion which is upon the Journals of this House, that we should reduce the duties as against Great Britain, yet the hon. gentleman from Simcoe will not say that he has the backing of the Imperial Federation League in Canada in moving the motion which he has placed on the Journals, and which he asks this House to support. The Montreal motion, Sir, was defeated, and he therefore has not the authority of the Imperial Federation League at his back. Now, I recognize at once, that, with regard to the conduct of the hon. gentleman as a member of the Imperial Federation League, this House has no right to have anything to say. But this House has a right, for the sake of its own consistency, when a motion moved last session by my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and endorsed by my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and promoted by the Imperial Federation League of this country, was, through the instrumentality of these gentlemen, accepted and placed upon the Journals of this House, to contrast the past record of my hon. friend on this Imperial Federation question with the motion he asks us to adopt to-day. I think my hon. friend is asking this House to follow him in a ridiculous course, when he asks us to nullify and to express the very antithesis of what he expressed last session, and this simply to gratify his own personal whim or vindictiveness. I want to show for a moment that the hon. gentleman is inconsistent in another regard. In 1891 the hon. gentleman from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) moved a resolution almost identical with that which my hon. friend has now placed upon the Journals. My hon. friend has admitted to-day that they were almost essentially the same, and at his great meeting in Stayner, only a short time ago, my hon. friend doubted whether he would take some such line as was moved by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), or propose the motion which he has given to this House this afternoon. What did the hon. gentleman then do? Did he stand up and vote for the resolution of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)? He stood up in this House, as I very well remember, and voted directly against that resolution. Sir, I have searched the Journals of this House, and I may say to you that, though I have seen some particularly short turns in the careers of would-be statesmen in this Chamber, I have failed to find a shorter turn around the corner than my hon. friend has made in twelve months in proposing the same resolution, in effect, which he voted against one short year ago. It is not very long since my hon. friend declared in Toronto that he had voted for Home Rule; but he explained that it was in the face of an election. But there was no election in 1891, and my hon. friend need not have voted against his convictions: if his motion to-day was his conviction, he need not have voted simply for the purpose of conciliating public opinion in this country. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, in regard to these resolutions as to Imperial preferential trade, is in this position: either he was conscientious then or he was not conscientious. He declared in 1888, as to a scheme of Imperial preferential trade, that there was more than a strong probability—which, if I know anything about English, means an almost absolute certainty—that the scheme could be carried out. Now, if the hon. gentleman was not conscientious then—and I believe he was conscientious—how can he ask us to believe that he is conscientious now? If, on the other hand, he was conscientious then, he must admit that his judgment was exceedingly bad, and he cannot ask us in this House to follow in the trade policy of the country the judgment of one who was so exceedingly short-sighted only a year or so ago upon so simple a matter. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, why do we have this resolution of my hon.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

friend upon the Journals of this House? Is it simply for the purpose of showing our loyalty to Great Britain? If it is, I am bound to say I do not think it was necessary. This House, a short time ago, passed unanimously a resolution expressing the opinion that we were bound to stand by Great Britain as the head of the greatest Empire in the world. But, in days gone by, when it was not in so comfortable a position as it is at this time, Canada stood by the heart of the Empire, and I am proud to say to-night that in some of the toughest spots on which British valour and British heroism have been displayed, native Canadians have taken their places and have shown themselves the bravest and most heroic on the field. But, Sir, I ask my hon. friend, does Britain ask that we should make any such concessions as these? Great Britain knows the fight that Canada has upon the continent of America. Great Britain knows that we have a strong neighbour by whose legislation we must to a certain extent be influenced. Great Britain knows that she has a large amount of capital invested in her colonies which she must protect. She knows that in order to keep our credit good, in order to construct public works necessary for the country, we must have a revenue. She knows that we have been carrying on upon this continent the greatest work of nation-building that has been seen within the four corners of her Empire. She knows that we have constructed a grand public work which lends permanency and stability to her Empire more than any work that has been done by any other colony, or even by Great Britain herself for many long years, and she knows that we have done these things without asking her for the contribution of a single cent; and she knows still more, that it is upon the success of Canadian effort that the permanence of British institutions upon the continent of America depends. And, knowing this as she does, she is not the mother country to hamper us or load us down with obligations which in our young and imperfect condition we are unable to carry. But if it is for another purpose, which he outlined in his speech in Toronto, namely, that we shall win the favour of Great Britain by making the reductions which he proposes in this resolution in her favour, I tell my hon. friend that he is labouring in a most futile cause. Does he think for a moment that the miserable three or four per cent—I use his own choice expression here—which he referred to in the city of Toronto as the share of Britain's trade which comes from Canada, does he think for a moment that this will influence the great political party which has the control of British politics? Does he believe that sentiment controls the trade of Great Britain? Does he believe, I say, that the effort which he has made will have the effect which he hopes upon the people of Great Britain? If so, I tell him that he is reckoning altogether without his host. Great Britain knows. Sir, what it is to reduce her duties and open her markets to the world. We know that when Great Britain proposed free trade it was the belief of many of those who favoured the change that the effect upon the nations would be so great that in a few years all would open their ports to Great Britain. The years are passing by, Sir, but instead of the markets of the world being opened to Great Britain, the bars are being raised against Great Britain and her trade the wide world over, and that movement is gone so far that my hon. friend himself admits to-night that it is not impossible that in the future Great Britain may adopt protective measures herself. Now, Sir, I want for a moment to refer to the wording of this resolution in regard to this preferential trade. I do not think it is written for the purpose of misleading this House; that would be impossible. I do not think it is written for the purpose of misleading the country, but I tell my hon. friend that it might have that effect. The statement is made, "in whose markets all Canadian products are admitted free." The hon. gentleman might justly have written it, "in whose markets the products of every other country are free as well." The hon. gentleman has stated very fairly that we have no advantage in the markets of Britain. If we sell our cheese there, as we do, it is because we make a cheese that will compare favourably with any cheese which is manufactured on the continent of Europe. If we sell our apples there, it is because our soil and climate produce those apples which are most toothsome to the British people, and which keep best during the winter months. If we sell our butter there, it is because we are making a better article of butter, and I am glad to know that the trade has doubled within the past year. If we sell our wheat and flour there, it is because our great North-west, as well as the older provinces, produce the best breadstuffs to be found in the world at the present time. The hon. gentleman knows that on one occasion we had preferential treatment in the markets of Great Britain. He knows that for a time we had advantages there for our breadstuffs and our timber. And he knows perfectly well that instead of being controlled by any sentiment in favour of the British colonies, when the time came for Britain to take down the bars and allow the products of the world to come free into her markets, she disregarded the view of the British colonies, expressed in special protest and prayer in our behalf, and she let down the bars, and there are men here to-night who are old enough, I fancy, to remember the prostration of Canadian business that followed. I am only saying that England is not controlled by sentiment, and my hon. friend knows very well that the position I take is the proper position in that regard. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved a resolution here in 1891. The resolution was this: That we should take down the bars as against the United States, reduce our duties against the people of the United States, and then, having done that, we could go to the people of the United States and ask them to make a favourable trade arrangement with us. The hon. gentleman's resolution is the same, except that England is substituted for the United States. He says, now, let us go to Great Britain and say to them: We have taken off 10 per cent from our duties, we are giving you an advantage in our market; and the hon. gentleman ought to know that we are thereby giving away that with which some time we may be able to make a splendid arrangement with Great Britain in connection with the mutual preferential trade between England and Canada. Now, then, the hon. gentleman says: But we do not do that. Why, we can go to England and say that we will take off the rest. Of course, to theoretical politicians, revenues do not amount to anything. Revenue is nothing to them. The hon. gentleman says: I am going to have a revenue tariff; but in the very next moment he says: If that don't satisfy England, we will take off the balance of the tariff, and the revenue may go. Now, Sir, I was not exactly satisfied with the statement of the hon. gentleman as regards the manner in which he was about to raise the revenue—because he admitted that about $3,000,000 of revenue would be destroyed. How will he raise it? By direct taxation, or by duties upon tea and coffee, as would hon. gentlemen with whom he is consorting? But he says that is rather an unimportant matter, because, though he did not lay it down as a principle, he suggested that very possibly the imports would be greater, and that consequently the revenue would be greater in that regard. The hon. gentleman must remember that that was not the experience of the past. He must remember that when we had low duties against Great Britain, our imports from Great Britain lessened, year by year, until they fell from $68,500,000 in 1873, to $39,000,000 in 1878; all of which goes to show that if our trade with Great Britain is to be profitable to her, and if we are to buy a large amount of goods from the mother country, it must be by making our own industries prosperous and having a large amount of money in circulation among our people. Now, Sir, what is the hon. gentleman's other contention? He says we are going to make up the revenue by an increase of imports. Does he know the natural sequence of that, that we must depreciate Canadian industries by bringing in the products of cheap British labour, and shutting out our own people from our workshops and from our factories in our own country? In other words, if the imports are lessened, the revenue will be gone, and if the revenue is sustained, our workshops and our industries will be gone on account of the increased importations from abroad. Now, then, Mr.

Speaker. I want, for a moment, to show that if all the disadvantages to which I have referred are brushed aside, there is another disadvantage—to which my hon. friend did not refer at any length to-night—and that is the disadvantage that we shall raise recriminatory feelings in the breasts of other people with whom we may seek to secure trade upon better terms. The hon. gentleman says himself, in his resolution, that we had better go to the United States—and I shall deal with that a little later on—and secure a market there. Well, Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that we are friendly to the people of the United States on trade matters. We have always held from this side of the House that they have some things to sell which we could, with advantage, buy from them, and that we have some things to sell which we could sell them with advantage, and that they could buy with advantage as well. But the hon. gentleman sees, he must see at a glance, that the resolution which he asks this House to adopt is a resolution that would at once stir up the feelings of the people of the United States, and shut out the probability of our securing a settlement of the difficulties which we have with them, and, perchance, a better trade arrangement with the new Administration. Now, what does my hon. friend propose to do all this for? Practically, that we may lessen the burdens upon the farming population of the country. I congratulate my hon. friend upon having taken the farmers of this country to his bosom: but I do not congratulate him upon the fact that it has been the stock in trade of hon. gentlemen opposite for many a day, and he is only putting himself into those worn out garments in which the Opposition has presented an exceedingly shabby appearance from 1878 to 1893. Now, what does the hon. gentleman say? He says: We will relieve the burdens of the farmers by dealing with Great Britain, and by lessening our tariff against her. Now, I admit that on one or two articles there would be a lessening of burdens, but I tell my hon. friend again that he is dealing with a matter of which he does not seem to have any very great practical knowledge; because the articles that we import from Great Britain are largely luxuries, and do not bear upon the farmer at all. I admit that in the question of iron, perhaps, and in the question of some fabrics there may be a burden upon the farmer, to a certain extent; but I tell him—and, if he likes, I will read him a list of the articles which are imported from Great Britain—that he will not be considered as great a friend of the farmer, supposing he could secure this reduction. I think they would look upon him as Goldsmith looked upon his friends, when he said that they always sent him a ruffle when he badly needed a shirt. Now, Sir, what is the fact? I fancy I see my hon. friend from North Simcoe canvassing a farmer upon his platform of tariff reform. He goes into the house of this hard-working farmer and he says: My dear friend, I see that your floors are bare. I am going to lessen the duties against Great Britain in order that you may put Brussels carpet upon these floors. I see that your hands and your face are brown, and I intend to reduce the duty in order that you may have silk parasols and English kid gloves. The Minister of Finance is a temperance crank, and you have to drink tea, or coffee or cold water. I propose to reduce the duty on ale, on Dublin stout, on brandy, on gin, on wine and whiskey. In order that your farmers' wives and daughters may be comfortably clad, I propose to reduce the duty on silk ribbons, on laces, on velvets, on fringes, on bracelets and on artificial flowers. But the farmer says: You have not taken any duty off our agricultural implements. Then my hon. friend from Simcoe says: I am coming to that after awhile, and I am going to make bicycles free, in order to reduce the burdens upon the shoulders of the farmers. More than that: It was stated by an individual in the country, a son-in-law of the member for North Simcoe I understand, that there are to be Thompson-Conservatives, and—if you will pardon me, Sir—that there are to be McCarthy-Conservatives; and while the Thompson-Conservatives may go around in their old slouch hats of Canadian make, the hon. gentleman from Simcoe proposes to reduce the duty so that every McCarthy-Conservative shall step up in line with a shiny tile silk hat. Now, what does his resolution propose to do? He lessens the duties against a country from which the imports are largely luxuries. I hope that is not the policy of this Government. I hope the policy of this Government is to increase the duties upon luxuries, so that gentlemen like my hon. friend from North Simcoe—and I am glad he is able to do it—may be compelled to pay more to the revenue of this farmer than the farmer, who does not use a silk hat, who does not use bicycles, and whose tastes or necessities do not impel him to the use of artificial flowers, bracelets, silk ribbons, velvet, whiskey, wine and gin, and all those costly luxuries which are imported from Great Britain. I hope that when my hon. friend the Minister of Finance comes to revise his tariff, he will take the very opposite tack to that which is recommended by the hon. gentleman from North Simcoe. Now, Sir, I want to say to my hon. friend one word more in regard to his Stayner speech. My hon. friend does not seem to be exceedingly sure about his judgment on the trade question even yet. In his Stayner speech, delivered on the day before this House opened, he will not deny that he declared that he would extend the same privileges to the colonies as he did to Great Britain; he would take the duties off goods coming from the colonies, to a certain extent, as well as off those coming from Great Britain. He is not very sure as a party leader, he is not altogether certain of his opinions, because he has dropped that in the resolution which he has placed before the House today. Why is that? Has he changed his well-founded, well-grounded opinions again? The hon. gentleman cries out against combines, and I shall have a few words to say with respect to that point further on; but, in passing, I want to say that my hon. friend's political methods have warmed into existence a variety of combine that has been exceedingly peculiar. One combine is this: The hon. member for North Simcoe says he will not vote for any resolution which discriminates against Great Britain, yet he places upon the Journals of this Parliament a resolution, which is cheered by hon gentlemen opposite, and for which, strange to say, with charming consistency, they will vote—in other words, a combination between political antithesis for the purpose of puzzling and annoying and defeating the Conservative Government of Canada at the present moment. I want to deal now with another phase of this question. The hon. gentleman says these industries have been long enough established, that the National Policy has been long enough in vogue to do the work which it was intended it should do. In beginning this branch of the subject, I wish to say this, that the hon. member for North Simcoe is not at all in the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. They declared that they would uproot the National Policy industries from the beginning; they declared that the National Policy was wrong in its inception, wrong in its theory, and wrong in its practice and wrong in its influence from beginning to end. The hon. gentleman says that is not so. The hon. gentleman says that he was in favour of the principle of the encouragement of home industries. There was no necessity of his saying so, because his declarations in calmer, cooler and more satisfied moments have made that exceedingly plain. But he has taken on himself to outline a policy for the Government and for the Parliament of Canada. And having taken upon himself to outline that policy, I suppose he has thoroughly studied the whole question from beginning to end, also the history of industries, not only in Canada, but in every country under the sun; and I suppose he is prepared, as he ought to be, to give this House, the result of wide study, of wide research and of the very best information he can secure on this question. When the hon. gentleman is consulted on a point of law, he not only goes to the statutes of the present, but he goes to the case law as well. He sees what the decisions have been in similar cases. Now, at the present moment I ask him not to look alone at the condition of the to-day, but to go to the case law to get the experience of the past, to go to those countries where industries have been established, in order to arrive at a judgment as to the truth or falsity of his conclusions. Sir, the hon. gentleman has admitted that the National Policy was necessary for the establishment of Canadian industries. I take it for granted that he will not deny that fact now. He has not done so in his speech, and if it were necessary I could quote line after line delivered at Stayner recently, in which he said the life was being ground out of Canadian industries under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the National Policy was necessary for the industries of this country. That being agreed, let us go for a moment to other countries. Let us look at the countries of Europe, and there the hon. gentleman will find a long list of protective measures extended to industries in order to establish them, whether he takes Belgium, or Germany, or France, or others if he choose. If he go to the United States of America he will find, not a tariff history of thirteen or fourteen years, but a tariff history extending from 1789 up to the present moment to promote, advance and protect American industries. There was one break in 1846, and that was the only break the American people have had, and they repaired it a short time afterwards, because they saw they had made a mistake. I do not intend to engage in a wordy discussion with the hon. gentleman as to whether the American people have lately adopted free trade or not. The hon. gentleman will see in a very short time whether his statements are true; but I will tell him this, that if he expects the American people have passed on that question in favour of free trade, or in favour of the destruction of protection to American industries, he will find he is exceedingly mistaken when the policy of the new American Government comes into force. For if the new President did personally hold such an opinion, he would find that the American people would rise in their might at the very first opportunity and reverse any verdict it was supposed they had given in that regard.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh!

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman may jeer, but I will tell him that I will be in this House when it will be shown that I was right and that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was wrong. So far as England is concerned, every one who has studied its economic history for a moment knows that it reached its splendid position through a long and continued history of protection; not a protection of thirteen or fifteen years, but a protection of her industries for five centuries. Go back, if you like, to 1307, when she placed prohibitive duties on the exportation of her wool, when she placed prohibitive duties on importations of wool from abroad and made those penalties almost the penalties, and in some cases really the penalties of death for the infringement of her Customs laws. Even until 1842 she prevented the exportation of machinery, in order that she might not have competition from abroad. Take her history of the silk industry. First, placing on high duties, then trebling those duties, and then passing prohibitory Acts in order to prevent her silk goods coming in from the outside. So with regard to iron, and so with regard to her great merchant marine, of which Britons everywhere are proud, which was thoroughly established, as every one knows, by her prohibitory navigation laws passed during the time of the Protectorate. Yet, my hon. friend says, in the face of all this history of industries elsewhere: we have done sufficient during thirteen or fourteen years of the National Policy; we have established our industries so that we can expose them to the winds from every quarter of the world, and know they will stand; and, if they do not stand, they should not stand, is his verdict. The policy of this Government has been somewhat ridiculed by the hon. gentleman to-night. The hon. gentleman asked, in his Stayner speech, whether there is to be no remission of duties and if the National Policy is never to be changed. He has answered that question himself. He has declared that it has been changed in days gone by. He was correct. I am proud to say. It has been changed sometimes for purposes of revenue, it has been changed sometimes by the change from ad valorem to specific duties for the purpose of preventing frauds on the revenue; it has been changed sometimes for the purpose of establishing and maintaining new industries which it was thought might take root in Canada, and it has been changed, as my hon. friend did not, with the fairness we should have expected from him, tell his constituents in North Simcoe, by relieving the people from millions of dollars of taxation under the policy of the present Administration. The position of the Government to-day is a most tenable one when they state they will inquire into the whole matter and that they will change the duty as the necessities of the country require. And when my hon. friends on this side of the House and myself are voting against the resolution of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), we are not by any means voting that monopoly shall be maintained; we are not by any means voting that we have any feeling against Great Britain; but we are voting that we have confidence in this Administration—as he had till he was not consulted—owing to its history in the past, to do justice by the people in every regard in the future. Now then, Sir, I have briefly sketched the declaration of the Government. My hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) objects to it because, he says, there is no reason for delay. Why, the hon. gentleman's movements upon the question of Imperial or mutual preferential trade ought to warn himself and this House that we make haste slowly upon these matters. I see that clubs named after my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) are being established in various parts of Canada. I see that they have laid down no definite idea upon the tariff as their policy. It is wise that they have not done so, for if the hon. gentleman's future is to be judged—and I say it pleasantly—by his past, they might wake up some morning to find the whole platform upon which they had built floated out from under them, and they might find themselves without a policy and without anything to maintain and sustain them. What is the reason for his great haste? My hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) says: Oh, the suffering masses of Canada! Oh, the burdens that are bearing upon the farmers of this country! We must change the tariff on their account. But my hon. friend answered the first part of his speech in the last part of it. He told about the horrible burdens that bore upon the Canadian farmer, and he wound up by showing us that the only farmers that we could for a moment think of comparing the farmers of Canada with were a thousand times worse off than the farmers of this Dominion. I ask my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) who is now in his seat, and who complained so loudly about the burdens upon the Canadian farmers—I ask him to rise now, and I want him to answer, and it is his duty to do so, and to name, that this House and this country may know them, any class of farmers under the broad heavens that are better off than the Canadian farmer. I pause for an answer, Sir. I ask him again. I hope my hon. friend will name them.

Mr. CAMERON. He cannot find them in America.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He will not name them in America; he will not name them in Europe. He is silent; yet, here is my hon. friend in the position of weeping and wailing in the Canadian Parliament over Canadian farmers, who, he admits, are the best-off farmers under the sun. The hon. gentleman may perhaps say that silence does not always give consent. Well, let us see. The hon. gentleman told us to-night that he favoured the National Policy at its inception; but he does not think it has done just as it ought to have done. The hon. gentleman guarded himself, I am bound to say, somewhat cleverly by quoting from his speeches in order that those who followed might not quote them. I want to show the hon. gentleman that he did not quote all his speeches, and for fear that he may have forgotten them—and they are good speeches, and I am bound to say that he pounded home his facts with a magnificent logic that he has not applied in the promotion to his new ideas—I want to read these speeches of the hon. gentleman for his information and for the information of the House. He will see that he said in 1888:

The policy has been beneficial on the whole.

He said that after the National Policy had been in force nine years, mind you.

The condition of our people will compare favourably with that of any other people who are known to us, or of any other people that we are brought in contact with, and I am sure it will be found that the policy we adopted here, and which the country has twice ratified by a very large vote, has on the whole been exceedingly beneficial.

And now I wish my hon. friend to watch this, and to place it alongside of his statement that the National Policy is actually causing disloyalty :

And whatever may be now said of the difficulties we are labouring under, they are not at all attributable to the policy of protection known as the National Policy, but to causes over which we in this Parliament have no more control than have the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland.

I shall quote again from this magnificent speech of his—a really magnificent speech, which I was thinking of when he was painfully working to show the beauties of his new policy—a magnificent speech which he delivered in Bowmanville in 1887. He says :

I need not say—

And I fancy I can see the satisfaction that beamed upon his handsome countenance when he said it—

I need not say that the National Policy is necessary for this country and that it has brought comfort to many a home.

After nine years of experience of the National Policy the hon. gentleman stated that.

Mr. McCARTHY. Where was that reported ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. In the " Standard," the last copy of the " Standard." The speech was made in February, 1887, and my hon. friend will find it on the last page of the " Standard " newspaper that is bound in the Library. On 30th April, 1887, he said again :

I may say at once at the outset that I do not admit that what we know as the National Policy has been a failure.

Why, Sir, his conversion has been as sudden as the conversion of Saul of Tarsus, on the road to Damascus ; but instead of going as Saul did, to preach the Gospel of peace and contentment, my hon. friend is going abroad to preach the gospel of gloom and despair. Further on, the hon. gentleman said :

I do not desire to join the band which is sufficiently large in my view, altogether too large, who are always proclaiming that the people of this country are worse off than the people of any other country.

What does my hon. friend say to-day ? Changed conditions ! Where are they ? Changed conditions, does he say ? Let him point them out to us. We have more industries ; that he has admitted. We have more people employed ; that he will admit. We have more capital, our trade is extending, our credit is better in the markets of the world, and there is more money in the savings banks, a fact which, in that same speech at Bowmanville, he declared was a test of the people's prosperity. There is more money in the banks. There are more bank notes in circulation. The prices are very much lower than they were in 1887 ; and yet my hon friend says : Oh, the burdens that are falling on the people. He says it is Customs burdens now. He said then :

I need not say that the National Policy is necessary for this country, that it has brought prosperity to many a home, and that the burdens that fell on the people were not of the National Policy.

And yet, look at the facts : The Customs per head in that year was $4.83 ; last year it was $4.25 ; and yet my hon. friend says : Oh, the burdens that are falling upon the people. Now, I want for a moment or so to refer to that Bowmanville speech again. He was replying there to the Hon. Edward Blake, who had just a little while before adopted the National Policy and gone back upon the hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) said (I do not read it all, through it is a magnificent speech—I only give the pithy sentences.) :

I would like to know how Mr. Blake is, after his acrobatic feat.

I am bound to say the word is a splendid one :

He had opposed the National Policy, but now supports it. He would like to know how the Hon. Edward Blake could face the people, as he had gone back on all the principles he had ever advocated. He had done all this simply to oust the Government from office.

History repeats itself, Sir !

Mr. Blake was now supporting the National Policy—why ? He says the conditions are changed. What conditions ? Simply that he could now see what he could not see for eight years before.

Then my hon. friend gets rather sympathetic in his tone, and remembering that there was one hard-hearted sinner—and I use the word, of course, in a Parliamentary sense, Sir—who could not see and could not agree with Mr. Blake, he says :

And Sir Richard could not even see yet. Poor Sir Richard ! There never was a more melancholy sight than poor Sir Richard.

You see, Mr. Speaker, it was all a question of eyesight. Now, the scales had fallen from the eyes of the Hon. Edward Blake ; with age his eyesight had improved. I am sorry to say that the eyesight of my hon. friend from North Simcoe has not improved with age. Then he grew sympathetic once more, and he said :

Now, what about the poor followers ? I do pity some of those poor honest Reformers. There are honest Reformers, you know, who have been telling of the beauties of free trade and all the wrongs of our protectionist policy. Have these men jumped Jim Crow with the same agility as their leaders ?

But, recovering himself, he says :

They are to go, but whom will they follow ? They will become sheep without a shepherd.

My hon. friend is in the reverse position : he is a shepherd without sheep, unless he estimates the hon. member for Muskoka as a flock.

Mr. COCHRANE. He has one goat.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, Sir, it is exceedingly interesting to look at the hon. gentleman's record on the National Policy. In 1879 he declared that he supported it; he supported it in 1880; he supported it in 1881; he supported it in 1882; he supported it in 1883; he supported it in 1884; he supported it in 1885; he supported it in 1886; he supported it in 1887; he supported it in 1888. Now, by his statement made at Stayner, he said that he had always been consulted by the chieftain of the Conservative party, and I believe that is quite true, because he was a firm friend of his leader and was in his confidence to a very large extent. But if he was consulted by the right hon. gentleman, he was as responsible as anybody else, perhaps more so, for the policy which that chieftain placed before this country. Well, Sir, in 1891 my hon. friend accepted a Conservative nomination, and in his speech at Stayner he declared that he agreed in the main with the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party, and those points on which he disagreed with the party were so small that he did not see fit at his nomination to address to his convention a single word with regard to them. And then, Sir, there came that trying time in the history of the Conservative party, and in the history of this country, when the old chieftain, who, through many a year, in storm and in sunshine (thank God, mostly in sunshine) had been the chiefest hand in guiding the destinies of Canada, lay at "Earncliffe," on the banks of the Ottawa, fighting a hopeless contest with a relentless foe, from the result of which there was no appeal. And I remember, Sir, when the end came, the Conservative members of this House and the other House, with sad and gloomy hearts, met in the room to the left, to express our sorrow for the demise of the greatest Canadian that has ever occupied a place in our public affairs; and I remember that my hon. friend from North Simcoe, as the mouth-piece of the Conservatives of the two Houses on that occasion, penned an address to the widow of the deceased statesman, the words of which were these:

We should have been unworthy followers of our departed chief if we gave away to despondency; rather shall we, remembering his patriotic counsels and noble example, earnestly endeavour to carry on the great work so dear to his heart and for which he laboured so long and so successfully, the consolidation of a united, free and prosperous Canadian nationality on this northern continent, in connection with the great Empire of which it forms no insignificant part.

Sir, these were our sentiments then. They were our sentiments when we left the silent Catarqui cemetery and came back here to perpetuate our great leader's memory by carrying on the work which he had inaugurated and which he had so nearly carried to a successful completion. They were our sentiments through the longest and stormiest session of the Parliament of Canada, during which my hon. friend, I remember perfectly, was not fighting shoulder to shoulder with us, but was enjoying himself abroad. They were our sentiments in the by-elections, in which we fought the policy of commercial union from Marquette on the west to the sea on the east, without the hon. member for North Simcoe, and came back here with the grandest majority the Conservative party has had since Confederation. They are, Sir, our sentiments yet. We are going along the line of the address which my hon. friend wrote to the widow of the deceased chieftain; and I call his attention to the fact that instead of going along that line, instead of joining with us hand in hand and heart with heart in the promotion of these principles, he is joining with the lifetime enemies of the chieftain who is gone, for the purpose of defeating the followers and successors whom he has left behind, for the purpose of destroying the effects of his patriotic and progressive policy. Now, Sir, this is an exceedingly delicate matter, and I would not for a moment have referred to it had it not been that the hon. gentleman has made the matter public himself. At the meeting at Stayner he made a speech to his constituents in which he declared his reason for sitting on the cross benches of the House of Commons. He there declared:

It is not so much a matter of policy, gentlemen, which has driven me out of the ranks; it is, gentlemen, as a man of honour with regard to all these circumstances, I cannot do otherwise than back out, as I am not worthy of being consulted. That is one of the taunts against me: "we have formed an administration without consulting Dalton McCarthy." That is perfectly true, and that for the first time since I have been in public life a government has been formed by the leaders of my party without my being consulted. I am unworthy of being consulted. If I am not worthy of being let into their confidence and into their councils, I can only speak out to you in open meeting what I believe to be right. Had the circumstances been different it would have been my duty and privilege and pride to induce them to adopt the policy which in the interests of the country I believe to be the best.

That is the statement as reported in the Toronto "Empire." The "Telegram" had a report in these words:

It is not so much a question of policy that has driven me out of the ranks; it is the first time since I have been in public life, that I have been ignored in the formation of a new Government. If I cannot be taken into the confidence of the councils of my party, it is time I asserted my independence.

The "Mail's" report said:

It is not as much a question of policy that has driven me out of the ranks. It is the first time since I have been in public life, that I have been ignored in the formation of a new Government. If I cannot be taken into the confidence of the councils of my party, it is time for me to assert my independence.

I am aware that the hon. gentleman has explained this report and declared that he did not mean that. I can only say that these words, as reported by the different newspapers, are almost the same in each, and he must have said something very close to it. But, writing a letter to Mr. Long, the president of his association, he declared :

I think I made it plain, at least I tried to do so, that my reason for severing my connection with the Ministerial party was due to the fact that I had been attacked by the Government organ, which attack I thought must have been inspired by the Administration, or if not so inspired had not been denied or repudiated, and therefore, I had no other alternative but that of holding the Government responsible for it.

The Government had nothing to do with it, as I happen to know, but I do not intend to enter into the merits of that discussion. I may say that in this statement there is not a word about the trade policy. The reason which he gives for the calling of the meeting is the reason that the "Empire" had attacked him. He does not say that he had any objection to the trade policy of the Government. There is not a word about the trade policy of the Government. It is a marvellous reason for his right-about-face that the people will understand. But, notwithstanding that, in the resolution now before the House he asks us to believe that it is notorious that the trade policy of the Government is a curse almost to the people of Canada. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how he has arrived at his conclusion? When did he discover it? I would like to ask him how he has changed his opinion so rapidly. I would like to ask him whom he has consulted as to the trade of this country. How much time has he spent in seeing business men and visiting business industries? And I would like to know how much practical study he has given to the question, because he did not display that practical study in his speech this afternoon. I would ask him how he has come to change his mind, or whether the reason for his attack upon this side of the House is to be found—and I am not suggesting that it is, though these Sir, are ominous words—in this statement :

Now, I will see what will be done. The Empire may in a moment of insanity, or some person may have got hold of the editorial columns and may have written this article which has certainly not given any strength to the Conservative party throughout the Dominion, because even a member may be of some consequence. Even insignificant as I am, I may be of some consequence. Some men labouring under a delusion may have got hold of it. I will abide my time.

I want the hon. gentleman to say whether that was the reason, or whether he has become converted owing to the changed conditions of the industries which he has found from a careful study of that question. I only repeat, Sir, those words were ominous words. Now, it is a strange sight indeed if the gentleman, who in his speech declares he is a National Policy man, because he says :

I am a National Policy man.

We are all National Policy men. And to the people of North Simcoe he says this :

And if we could settle this Manitoba question, we could still afford to spread out upon trade matters while adhering to the National Policy in all its integrity.

I am dwelling on this question, not for the purpose of sneering at the hon. gentleman, not for the purpose of charging him with anything, but for the purpose of showing that his utterances in his Stayner speech, in which he announced his departure from the Conservative party, seemed to contain other reasons than those he has given to this House to-night. I was amused at hearing the hon. gentleman say that he was not a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. He denied that emphatically. He had no part with them, he said. I can only say that I am afraid my hon. friend is in a dangerous position. When I saw the smiles that crossed between him and my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who seems not to be that most melancholy sight of days gone by, I remembered another speech of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Speaking in this House, in 1878, he said : It was well known that the hon. gentleman who now sits for South Oxford had desired to be Finance Minister some years ago, and that he quarrelled with his leaders and deserted his party. But the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that was false. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said he did not know what the hon. gentleman termed false, but he knew the hon. gentleman did desert his party ; that the hon. gentleman claimed to be independent, and that the hon. gentleman had balanced himself upon the pole of independence until he fell into the very ready arms of hon. gentlemen opposite. I can only say that I am afraid my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is upon the other end of the pole, and that the easy descent which the hon. member for South Oxford found may be found alike by my hon. friend. Still another problem strikes me in regard to this matter. The hon. gentleman says it is absolutely necessary to reform the tariff at once. How will the hon. gentleman do it? It is absolutely necessary, he says, to reduce these duties at once. How will the hon. gentleman do it? The Government have said : we will arrange the tariff next session, when the full information is before us. They have said : we will take the very best means to ascertain the situation of each industry, its requirements and necessities, and we will rearrange the tariff next session. How will my hon. friend do it before? Suppose he defeats the Government by this resolution. A new Government will have to be formed—and formed out of hon. gentlemen opposite, mark you, Sir.—new elections will have to be held, the House will have to be reassembled, there will have to be a new session, a new tariff will have to be brought down, and so my hon. friend will find the months slipping by and the year around, just as the year will come around, even if this Government continues to occupy its place, as it will, Sir, and to carry out its promises, as it will. The hon. gentleman is asking for undue haste. He does not consider for the moment the interests that are involved. Speaking in 1878, he declared that it was criminal on the part of the Mackenzie Administration not to protect the industries of the country, because there were $77,000,000 invested in them, because these industries paid wages amounting to $40,000,000, and he desired to know whether those people who had invested that capital had not a right to the protection of the Government. What do we find now? We find $353,000,000 invested; we find 367,000 employees; we find $100,000,000 paid in wages; and we find $475,000,000 of annual products. And yet my hon. friend says: let us with a stroke of the pen, without inquiring into these matters, take away the protection from these industries, and perhaps destroy them entirely. Why, he admitted here to-day that there were 168,333 people employed directly on account of the National Policy, people who would not be employed if the National Policy were not in force. What does that mean? It means that there are 600,000 souls in this Dominion, counting 3½ people to each man, who labour in these factories—600,000 souls depending on the National Policy—and yet my hon. friend will take away the National Policy with a stroke of his pen and drive these men and these women into the same condition in which he described the people as being in the streets of London and the streets of New York, in abject misery and want. Sir, if there were reason to protect the industries in 1878, when he spoke in his manful voice in favour of it, there is still stronger reason for us to continue the system which keeps so many men and women employed. Then, Sir, I want to deal for a few moments with another phase of the question. I wish to deal with some statements that were made by my hon. friend this afternoon. I must confess that his charges against the National Policy were somewhat disappointing. They were the old charges which we have been in the habit of listening to in this Chamber ever since the enactment of the statute which brought this policy into force, and which my hon. friend has answered many a time with a force which he has not brought to the support of his new contentions to-day. Now, Sir, I read this motion, and I find in it some statements which seem to me extraordinary. I expected that when the hon. gentleman came to the House to make his speech he would give us proof. What were his proofs? He made statements that would put the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to the blush; he made statements the most extraordinary that have ever been given in the Parliament of Canada; but he did not bring any proof of them, except to read the "Globe" newspaper in support of them; and when my hon. friend is driven to have recourse to the "Globe" to prove his assertions against the Government of this country, it must be admitted that he is hard up for arguments. I have no fault to find with the "Globe" newspaper, nor with its correspondents, one of whom, the gentleman he named, I know very well and respect very highly. But it is the business of the "Globe" to destroy this Government, and when the hon. gentleman takes the "Globe" as the only line of proof he has for his assertions, I repeat that he is exceedingly hard up for political capital. One of the first statements in this resolution is that the National Policy is making the people disloyal, and he proves that from the "Globe," and the only alternative, he said, was annexation—

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not say that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend will wait a moment. What he said was that the "Globe" newspaper's correspondent said that he found a feeling in some parts that the only remedy was annexation. What does that statement lead to? He says that the National Policy causes disloyalty, and my hon. friend seems to think highly of the assertion. Disloyalty is either general against the mother country or it is based upon some specific desire to desert the British Empire and join another country. Can it be general disloyalty? No; because Great Britain has had nothing to do with the National Policy. Is it a specific desire on the part of the people of Canada to join with the United States due to the National Policy? If so, it is an extraordinary thing that people are becoming disloyal under a tariff of 30 per cent and exceedingly anxious to join a people who are living under a tariff of 60 per cent. Observe the sequence of the hon. gentleman's statements. He wept over the combines which he said had been formed in Canada; he told us that disloyalty was caused by these combines, and then he said there was this desire to join the people of the United States, and followed it up with a description of those gigantic combines that were ruining the people of the United States as well. Sir, that is an extraordinary sequence of statements and it is an argument I have never heard addressed to this Chamber before. Then he followed with another statement that on the articles manufactured in this country the people were robbed of about $90,000,000 a year. Shades of Arithmetic! That is the statement that I meant would put the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to the blush. The hon. member for South Oxford, who is rather free in his use of phrases and figures, declared to this House that the manufacturers were stealing $30,000,000 a year. But my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to use the language of my hon. sabbatarian friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) saw him and went him better and made it $90,000,000. Sir, I do not think it worth while to answer that, because, when the people see my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), with all his vitriolic opposition to Her Majesty's Government, says they are only stealing $30,000,000, and then they see that my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says the robbery amounts to $90,000,000, they will say that the hon. member for North Simcoe does not know what he is talking about; so I feel there is no necessity for answering that statement to-night. Now, Sir, another statement that he made was that the foundries of this country—the statement being based upon a most extraordinary system of calculation which I have not time to go into in detail—were making 66 per cent profit each year. Why, if the hon. member were to compute his law business and charge up mucilage and stationery as raw material, and take that from his income, I venture to say it would not be much more than 66 per cent profit. The statement is absurd, as the hon. gentleman must surely know. No foundry in Canada to-day, I am credibly informed, is paying more than an average return upon the investment, and a great many of them are not doing that at the present time, so keen is the competition. When the statement made by my hon. friend goes out to the business men of this country it will show the fitness of the hon. member to deal with trade and fiscal matters for the Dominion of Canada, setting his information, as he does, against the statements of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and against those of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). The hon. gentleman said further that these factories prevented competition. He said that we were promised competition and that we did not get it. But he said he did not believe that the fiscal policy proposed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, commercial union with the people of the United States, would do us any good in this respect. Now, how does the hon. gentleman harmonize these two statements? He says we have combines and no competition, and yet he says that by opening up our markets to the people of the United States we will get no advantage, notwithstanding the great industries they have in that country. And then he talks of coal oil and says that coal oil is a great combination. He forgot to say that the price of Canadian coal oil to-day was about 7 cents, 7¼ cents to 7½ cents in bulk at Petrolea, and that it is selling to-day in the city of Toronto for about 12½ cents per gallon. And how does he hope to rid us from the combines? I want to read to him what an American journal, "The Paint, Oil and Drug Review," says as to the remedy he proposes to take—that of allowing the Standard Company into Canada:

We appreciate the fact that it would be policy upon the part of this country to have free entry into Canada for its crude and refined petroleum or any and all other products of our soil and workshops. It would be considered patriotic, therefore, for the "Review" to advocate the abolition by Canada of the duty which the Standard is working to have removed. But in the present instance there is a very large nigger in the wood pile which the public do not see. If the independent petroleum interests here were as powerful as the Standard, and would receive their share of the benefit, it would be quite another thing, and would inure to the advantage of this country; but, as the petroleum industry exists in these United States, the advantages of free entry into Canada would only fill the coffers of a corporation whose very existence is a menace to the prosperity of our country, an organization which violates its laws with impunity, tramples on the rights of its citizens, bankrupts all honest competitors that it can, and is un-American in all its instincts.

It is stated that refined petroleum from these states is preferred to the Canadian refined, and is purchased by the Canadian even though it costs ten cents a gallon at retail more than the product of their home wells. If this is so—if it sells anyway—why need Canada reduce its revenue in favour of a foreign corporation which would use its newly acquired power to crush out all Canadian competition, with the eventuality of charging the public there even higher prices than they now pay?

That is the opinion of an American newspaper, with especial knowledge of its subject, with regard to the remedy which my hon. friend proposes. Now, the hon. gentleman said here this afternoon that there was no great industry in Canada that was not under a combine. That is another evidence that the hon. gentleman knows exceedingly little about it. Can he name a combine in woollen manufacturing? Referring to tweeds, I want to call his attention to a speech he made at Stayner, in which he said:

Take, for instance, a piece of tweed which you would buy in Scotland for £2. It costs $10 here. The duty is 35 per cent upon it, and it is therefore $13.50, $10 being the original cost and $3.50 the duty. Add per cent for carriage and freight and you bring it up to $14. That $3.50 goes into the revenue.

Now, my hon. friend touched a subject he never should have touched. If there is an industry in this country that is not under a combine it is the tweed industry, it is the woollen industry. My hon. friend knows, if he has studied the subject, that there is no combine in tweeds, and he knows that the prices of tweeds in Canada to-day are cheaper, quality being considered, than in any other country under the sun. Why, when one of these advocates of tariff reform was speaking in the country, he said to the old chairman who presided over his meeting, an intelligent farmer: "Why, Mr. Chairman, for the very coat that is on your back you pay 50 cents a yard more on account of the National Policy." The old chairman was surprised, and he responded:

"Well, that is a most peculiar thing, because it only cost me 35 cents, all told." The fact is to-day that tweeds are being sold at from 28 cents upward, that the highest dividend which has been paid by any company manufacturing tweeds in Canada during the past few years, is only 4 per cent per half year, and the vast majority of them have not paid any dividend at all. Yet my hon. friend, in his speech at Stayner, cites the price of tweed as an argument against the National Policy. What careful farmer cares whether there is a duty on Scotch tweed? I wear Canadian tweed; 99 per cent of hon. members in this House wear Canadian tweed; and if my hon. friend is the hundredth man and wears Scotch tweed, let him wear it and let him pay the tax to the revenue in consequence. Now, my hon. friend spoke this afternoon about agricultural implements. He dealt in generalities again. I ask him to remember that he did not cite a single instance where the Canadian people pay more for agricultural implements than the American people do. There is no use in making a comparison with Britain, because the British people do not manufacture the kind of implements we want. Now, what are the facts? To-day a binder in the United States costs, on the average, $125; in Canada it costs $115. Mowers cost $55 in the United States; in Canada, $45 on the average. Wheel-rakes cost $25 in the United States and $22 here. Fanning mills, $15 to $20 in the United States, and $10 to $15 here. Ploughs cost $12 and $15 in the United States and $10 to $13 here. Does my hon. friend want the proof? If so, I am afraid I shall have to fall back on the columns of the Toronto "Globe," because the Toronto "Globe" declared a little while ago that agricultural implements were cheaper in Canada to-day than they were in the neighbouring state of New York. Now, my hon. friend did not give comparisons. Let us see the price of agricultural implements in 1878. Self-binders were worth $325; they are now worth $110 to $115. Self-rakers were worth $115 to $150 then; they are now worth $75. Mowers were worth from $70 to $90; now they are from $40 to $50. Sulky ploughs were worth from $55 to $60 in 1878; they now sell from $25 to $30. Hand ploughs were worth from $17 to $20; now they can be bought for $11 to $14. Does this please the hon. gentleman? These are specific facts. But my hon. friend went to distant parts, and he declared that in the North-west the people were being ground down by the duty on agricultural implements. The people from the North-west are here, and the people from the North-west will say whether I am right or wrong, and the hon. gentleman can easily find out, if he desires to go to the trouble of doing so. I say that in the North-west, to-day, binders of Canadian make are worth $140; of American make, they are worth $175 to $185.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

The one is as good as the other. I tell him that the price between the American North-west and the Canadian North-west is only a matter of 4 or 5 per cent either way. Now, my hon. friend read some resolutions bearing out his declaration, and among them was a resolution from the Lethbridge Board of Trade, which complimented him, and defended him in the course he was pursuing in this House. I hand him the paper now, and I tell him that that resolution was defeated. Sir, one by one his contentions are shown to be as groundless as possible. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to find that the hon. gentleman prepares his facts so carelessly, because these are important matters to be placed upon the records of this House. Now, I come to deal with another matter, that of the cotton trade, in regard to which the hon. gentleman travelled over a great deal of ground. I think I shall be able to show that his calculations were extraordinary calculations. I want first to speak of the cotton industry in 1879. Previous to 1879 there were mills in Canada employing 3,000 hands. Now, there are twenty-four mills, with a capital invested amounting to $13,700,000 and the yearly product is $8,700,000. These mills employ 9,000 hands, and the yearly wages paid are $2,350,000; in other words, under the National Policy, there has been an increase in that industry, one of the most magnificent industries of the country, of 7,000 hands. I am under the necessity of calling my hon. friend's attention to another serious mistake that he has made. I am afraid that he depends too much upon the accuracy of the printers. He founded a whole line of calculations upon the fact that a speech delivered by an hon. gentleman on the other side and printed in "Hansard," showed certain reductions in the prices of cotton since 1872. Then the hon. gentleman went on to say that, from 1872 to 1892, twenty years, the price in Canada had not decreased nearly so much as the price of cottons in England. For the moment I was struck with his calculation, but I was not so much struck when I discovered that the printer had made a mistake, that the date was 1878 instead of 1872, and the hon. gentleman was comparing twenty years of England against only fourteen years of Canada, and complaining because the reduction was not sufficiently great; in other words, the hon. gentleman based all that long and laboured calculation upon a mistake in "Hansard," so accurate was he, and so long did he labour to find out the facts in this regard. If the hon. gentleman will take pains to make a proper comparison, he will find that not only have Canadian cottons, under the National Policy, been reduced 22 per cent, but they have been reduced a great deal more, and quite as much as they have been reduced in the free trade country of England. What is the fact? The hon. gentleman talks of combines; but, before he can prove to this House they are an injury. he must show they have increased prices. I admit there is a trust formed of the cotton mills—

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." There are trusts formed in every line of business for the purpose of cheapening production, and they are formed in free trade countries as well as in protection countries. There was a trust formed but before the hon. gentleman can show there is any injury done, he must show they have raised prices. What have they done? They have raised prices on three lines of goods, in which lines there was admittedly a cutting of rates, and there has not been any objection from the trade in any portion of Canada because those three lines of prices were raised. Where is the foundation for the hon. gentleman's complaint? Has this trust been grinding the life out of the Canadian people? Can he produce the members of the wholesale and retail trade that will say the combine has been charging too high prices? The fact is that our manufacturers have been supplying lines just as good as are to be found in England or the United States at just a shadow of an increase over the price in those countries at the present time, and I look upon the growth of the cotton industry in this country as one of the greatest monuments raised to the National Policy, so long as it retains its present position and gives the fair prices which it gives at the present time to Canadian consumers. When it does not, without the help of the hon. member for North Simcoe, this Government will cut its wings and restrict its operations, as it will the operations of any combine that works against the public good. So much for the cotton industry of this country, with which, however, I will deal a moment longer. What is the proof of the cotton combine? The hon. gentleman did not go into details. I desire to give what I believe to be an authentic statement of the income and output and profit of the cotton industries. They pay wages to the amount of $2,380,000; they buy coal to the value of $271,000; stores, etc., $870,000; freight, $400,000; duties on machinery and supplies, $65,000; outlay on repairs, and the placing of new plant, $501,000. It is estimated that they pay taxes, and this is a low estimate, to the amount of $100,000; and insurance is estimated at $50,000. The cost of selling their goods, according to the opinion of a leading merchant in this House, must not be less than $200,000. The amount expended for raw cotton is $3,298,000; or a gross total of $8,135,000. Deduct that from the output, $8,825,000, and there is a profit of $690,000, or from 6 to 7 per cent of profit obtained by the cotton manufacturers of this country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Oh, oh.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I shall be exceedingly glad if the hon. gentleman will go into the figures as fully as I have done, and if he comes to any other conclusion, I shall be glad to listen to him when I have done.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That accounts for the premium on the stock.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman says that accounts for the premium on the stock. I am not dealing with that point just now. My hon. friend will no doubt deal with it when he comes to speak on the question.

Mr. CAMERON. And he will be answered.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) says the hon. gentleman will be answered. I now come to deal with another question. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has submitted a resolution to the House, and it is an exceedingly peculiar resolution, coming from the hon. gentleman. It declares that this House wishes to open up special negotiations and to specially deal with the people of the United States.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is not in the resolution.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is true, I do not remember all of the resolution, word for word, because there is so much of it. I find it reads:

And this House declares its readiness to make a like reduction in favour of such other portions of the Empire or with such other foreign countries, especially the United States of America, as are willing to reciprocate in matters of trade with Canada on fair and equitable terms.

My hon. friend need not have placed that resolution on the Journals of the House, and I think he himself was of that opinion, because he scarcely referred to it when he made his speech. But, Sir, I should like my hon. friend, before he asks this House to vote for that resolution, to point to a single instance in all the long years of our history where we have refused to deal on fair and honourable terms with the people of that or any other country. I hope the hon. gentleman does not blame us for not having accepted commercial union, which we could have obtained from the people of the United States. He does not do that, because he told us so to-night, although he appears to try and join hands with the party which believes in unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. But why has he placed this little addendum to his resolution? Sir, the voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hand is the hand of Esau. It looks to me as though my hon. friend had placed it there in order that hon. gentlemen opposite might be prepared to vote for his resolution, and yet so little inclined was he to favour it that he scarcely referred to it in his speech. It is strangely discordant with his past. Why should we pass this resolution in favour of special arrangements with the United States? Here is the hon. gentleman's speech in 1888:

Why, the people of the United States are our competitors in the great markets of the world. They are producers of corn; we are producers of corn. They are producers of cattle; so are we. If we look at the Trade and Navigation Returns, which are open to all, we will find that the great market for both countries is in Great Britain, and to talk of sending our goods to the United States is like sending coals to Newcastle.

And yet the hon. gentleman gives, as one of the modes of relief for the distressed farmer, that we must open up special arrangements with the people of the United States. This House is willing to do so on any occasion, so long as it is attended with some advantage to the people of Canada, and it is not willing to do it under any other conditions, or to make any other arrangements than those to which I have referred in that regard. I am sorry I have occupied the attention of the House so long in reference to these matters, but I am still more sorry that it becomes the painful duty of any hon. member on this side of the House to argue trade matters with the hon. member for North Simcoe, who, however much he may in the past have deplored the mournful condition of hon. gentlemen opposite, seems to be going with them in their cry of ruin, seems to be going with them in their constant proposal to keep nostrums before the people of Canada. These are the old symptoms we have had described so often, and to a very great extent they are the old treatments which the physicians to your left, Mr. Speaker, have offered us on so many previous occasions in days gone by. However ill Canada may have been, she retained her consciousness to a certain extent, and, retaining her consciousness, she refused to accept the dosing of hon. gentlemen opposite, and she will refuse to accept the remedies which have been proposed by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I ask my hon. friend, is he joining with the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his cry of blue ruin? He says: No; I did not vote for him the other night. Why did he not vote for him the other night? Was it because he did not agree with the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)? Why, one resolution, that of my hon. friend from North Simcoe, is an amplification of the other, and in principles and in essentials they are as like as any two toads that ever went together in a puddle. Why did he not vote for the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)? Was it because he had a tender regard for the feelings of the Government party? I fear not. Was it because he did not desire to join the mournful member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)? Perhaps that might have been the case. Or was it because he wished, to use his own language, from behind the ramparts to attack the men who are defending the fort, in order to secure for himself a larger following and a greater strength in this country. Whatever may be the cause, and how—ever and whoever he may join with in this regard, I may tell him that Canada is not so easily discouraged. The people of this country listen to the wail, but they hold for the National Canadian party. They have voted for it in the past and they will vote for it in the future. They look to the past quarter of a century of their history and are proud. They look to the obligations of the ante-Confederation period that have been carried out. They look to the bond having been kept with the provinces of the east in the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. They look to the keeping of the bond with the provinces of the west and the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They look to the development under this Government of the North-west Territories, upon whose broad plains must depend the hope of future Canadian greatness. They look to our extending trade. They look to our credit, which stands higher than it ever did in the markets of the world. They look to our recognized ever growing importance as a country, and they are proud of Canada's past, they are satisfied with Canada's present, and they are ever hopeful for Canada's future. And, Sir, that hope is soundly based. Notwithstanding the abuse of hon. gentlemen opposite, our stock in trade is such as to encourage Canadians everywhere. What is it? We have a splendid territory, we have splendid resources, we have the freest institutions under which men live, we have that climate which in every age has given the best samples of mind and muscle, and which, in all ages, has been the ever hospitable home of freedom and of liberty; and we have 5,000,000 of people who are prepared to work out their destiny on the old lines. There was a time when my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) might have found a sympathizing audience in Canada. There was a time when the people of this country might have been discouraged, but that time is not the present, and I tell him that, instead of the nostrums that are being proposed to remedy the ills to which the Canadian body may be heir, it would serve our purpose better if we would encourage a strong, healthful, vigorous, harmonizing, unifying Canadian spirit throughout our whole Dominion; a spirit that recognizes our opportunity, a spirit that strengthens us for our task, a spirit that bids us to be on friendly terms with our neighbours, but bids us at the same time to look chiefly to Canada's sons for Canada's future; a spirit that looks, and longs, and labours for the union of our provinces, for the union of our people, for the ceasing of the cry of sectarianism, with a devotion that will never falter, until jealousies have ceased, until the strife of sections has been stilled, until the war of creeds is no more, until, over all the broad space from sea to sea, it is written: "The varying tints have united and formed, in Heaven's bright light, an arch of peace."

Mr. EDGAR. I have not had the advantage of hearing the whole of the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague), and I will not undertake to follow him in his long address. However, I did hear a portion of his remarks upon a subject which I take a little interest in, and on which I have already addressed this House during the session. I would like very much to follow him in that matter, and to set him right as far as I can in regard to it. I heard the hon. gentleman using very eloquent language indeed in eulogizing the great cotton industry of this country. I am sure that nobody desires to injure the great cotton industries of Canada, but I think we ought to ascertain whether these cotton industries are not making a good deal more than legitimate profits out of the people of Canada. When a resolution such as has been moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is under consideration, it is especially our duty to see that this cotton combine is not taking infinitely more than honest and fair profit out of the people of Canada, and is doing so absolutely under the protection of the tariff which this resolution attacks. I attempted to show, and it has not been contradicted, that the duties collected by the Government on the cotton which we imported in 1892 were 28 per cent ad valorem. I showed by undisputed figures, what the duties were which we paid to the manufactures. I did not show it in the same way as the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) showed it by comparing English and Canadian prices, but by taking particular articles and showing the specific duties and the ad valorem duties combined upon goods which were made in the country by the Canadian cotton mills. I showed, and it cannot be disputed, that the duties levied upon the Canadian people by the manufacturers of cotton, range from 35 to 65 per cent. I have also showed that these same cotton manufacturers are able without one cent of protection, to ship their products to China, to the value of about a quarter of a million dollars and compete there with the manufacturers of England and the United States. Surely, Sir, if they can compete with the other manufacturers of the world for the Chinese trade, it is not unreasonable for us to suggest that they are also able to compete with the other manufacturers of the world for the Canadian trade. I do not think the hon. member for Haldimand met any of these points. He did not attempt to answer them. It has also been pointed out to-day by the hon. member for North Simcoe, as it was pointed out once before this session, that the fall in the cost of the raw material between 1890 and 1892 saved over $1,000,000 in hard, clear cash to the manufacturers of cotton goods; and yet there was no consequent increase in wages or decrease in prices, but, on the contrary, an increase in price to the Canadian consumer of from 10 to 25 per cent. It has also been shown, and not denied, that one of the first effects of the National Policy on the cotton trade was to hold forth the promise of such exorbitant profits to those engaged in the business, that there was a rush into it, people almost losing their heads in their anxiety to invest their capital in the business. The honest, solid money of the investors of Canada was put into the cotton trade to twice the extent required for legitimate business, so that our limited market induced competition which for a time inured to the benefit of the consumer, but ultimately inured to the ruin of the investor. In various parts of this Dominion there are people who lost 25, 50, 70, even 100 per cent of their investments for some years in the cotton business, under the system which the hon. member for Haldimand is defending here to-night. That was one of the first evils which the high protective tariff inflicted upon this industry. And, Sir, what happened then? Naturally, what always happens in similar cases. The stronger financial corporations held on, and they froze out or wrecked the smaller and weaker concerns, and a short time ago, those remaining formed a combine, and that combine stands to-day in full force and operation, under the protecting aegis of that high tariff on cotton goods which the hon. member for Haldimand has so brilliantly pictured as a blessing and a benison upon this country. Why, Sir, how can men in their senses possibly believe that legitimate profits alone could have enabled the Dominion Cotton Company to increase its stock, last September, from $1,500,000 to $3,000,000 at one swoop? Of that increase of $1,500,000, all except $150,000 was pure, unmitigated, limpid water—and sugar, I suppose—and the remaining $1,350,000 the original stockholders have put into their pockets out of the enormous profits that they have already made and out of their anticipated profits under this tariff. I wonder if the hon. member for Haldimand can answer that? He cannot answer it. Nobody can answer it. It is a patent fact, which is there as clear and undisputed as the fact that the sun shines at noonday; and if there were nothing else at all to be said on the subject, that is a conclusive reason why we should call upon the Government to redeem the pledge which the First Minister made in this House last session, when he promised that if it were shown that there was a combine in the cotton business, the tariff would very soon be lowered. Instead of that, we have it defended here to-day by the champion who is put forward by the Treasury benches to crush out the independence of the hon. member for North Simcoe. That is their redemption of the promise that was made by the First Minister last year. What did the hon. member for Haldimand say in defence of this cotton combine, apart from the eloquent and inflated sentiments with which he surrounded the question? I do not intend to attempt to bring any eloquence into the discussion, even if I were able to do so; but I have a few figures, which, I think, will be a little more to the point. The hon. member for Haldimand said that cotton was sold by the Canadian manufacturers to-day at just a shade over the English and American prices. We know, Sir, that to the "heathen Chinee" it is sold at a price equal to or under the American and English prices; but to the Canadian consumer it is sold over the English and American prices. I will give you two or three examples in detail. American gray cotton that can be bought without a duty at 5 cents per yard, exactly the same quality and class, is sold at 6½ cents by the Canadian manufacturer, which is 30 per cent more than the American price. This, according to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) is only a shade over. Well, bleached cotton, which is sold here at 8 cents, which is 23 per cent of an increase. Now, those are the American goods. English check shirtings which are imported can be laid down here, freight and charges paid, at 4½ pence, and this quality is sold by the Canadian manufacturer at 10½ cents, which is an increase of 29 per cent. So, in answer to the general assertion that there is not more than a shade of difference, I show that, on these particular articles, there is a difference, ranging from 23 to 30 per cent. Another important point which I caught from the remarks of the hon. member for Haldimand, is this: He showed us, and I suppose he did not minimize the figures at all, the total cost of manufacturing the output of cotton by the Canadian mills. After putting in every thing he could think of, or that those who supplied him with the figures could think of, he brought a result of $8,135,000 as the entire cost of production. Well, Sir, I am very much obliged to him for furnishing those figures, because it helps us a good deal. I have been able, from other sources, to get the cost of the raw material and the cost of the wages, but all these other things that he gave us, freights, and so on, I had not got, so we will take his estimate of $8,135,000. Well, let us try and get at a fair estimate of what they sell their output for. The hon. member for North Simcoe made a calculation of it from one point of view. On a former occasion I estimated it from two points of view. I took this way of doing it. I took from the Trade and Navigation Returns the gross imports of raw cotton in 1882. I compared it with the gross imports of raw cotton in 1892, and I found that there was a difference of 26,000,000 pounds in the imports. That is to say, that in 1892 our imports had increased 26,000,000 pounds. I found, also, that the importation of the manufactured material, from 1882 to 1892, had decreased 7,000,000 pounds, and, therefore, the 26,000,000 pounds of raw material would represent 7,000,000 of manufactured material. That being so, the 46,000,000 pounds of imported raw material in 1892 would represent nearly $13,000,000 of manufactured material in 1892, unless our population has decreased, and unless the people of Canada were using less cotton goods than they did ten years ago. We cannot admit that our population has decreased, as the census returns show that it has increased between 11 and 12 per cent, and I know from inquiries I made personally in the trade, that the demand for cotton goods has considerably increased during that time so that there is no doubt, from those figures there is an output of some $13,000,000 worth. Take another way of looking at it. The Montreal cotton mills company, a month ago, gave to the world the figures of their output for the past year. They gave their figures at $1,468,000. Now, they have got 54,000 spindles in that mill. The whole of the mills of Canada have 520,000 spindles, and the simple rule of three will show that if 54,000 spindles can make, as they did last year $1,468,000 worth, therefore, the whole of the mills, working as the census returns say they are, full time—and I think the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) not very long ago said they were working full time—would turn out $14,000,000 worth. Now, I cannot be mistaken in those figures of the Montreal Company, because that was the output reported on the same day in the Montreal "Star," and on the next day in the Montreal "Herald," and the following day in the Montreal correspondence of the Toronto "Mail," and they have not been denied. We have a good many other ways of making that calculation. In answer to some questions put upon the Paper by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the Finance Minister said that, according to the census of 1891, the output was $8,451,724. Now, that was no doubt made from the raw material imported in 1890, because the census was taken in 1891. Well, the raw material imported in 1890 was 36,000,000 pounds. Therefore if 36,000,000 pounds produced, as the Finance Minister said they did, $8,451,000 worth, then the imports for 1892, which his own Trade and Navigation Returns show to have been 46,000,000 pounds of raw material, must have produced over $10,000,000 worth, and, as the prices have risen, the prices of Canadian goods in that time have been raised from 12 to 20 per cent, this would make the output of 1892, with even the 15 per cent of increase, $11,500,000 worth of manufactured cotton.

Mr. KENNY. Will my hon. friend permit me for one moment. Does he contend that in Canada during the past year 46,000,000 pounds of cotton were manufactured into cotton goods? We only imported 42,000,000 pounds of cotton—there were 4,000,000 pounds of waste.

Mr. EDGAR. There is a proportion of waste every year. I include the waste in my comparison of the year before. I treated all as raw material. The waste is used in the manufactures of cotton; I am entirely misinformed if it is not so used. I know that waste is exported from the cotton mills. I know also that waste is used in the manufacture of cotton goods as well as raw cotton. We know what it is used for; it is used to deteriorate the article. But it is raw material and imported for the purpose of being so used. So that I am right in my contention: I have included waste in both cases. That is one way of calculating. Now another way to get at it is this: I take the exports from England to Canada of cottons in 1891, taking the figures in the English public documents. Sometimes they were given in pounds and sometimes in yards. I find that 25,000,000 yards were valued at £420,000 sterling, in round figures, or \$2,000,000. Counting the raw material at $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards to the pound—and I have no doubt that is a fair estimate, I do not know whether my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny), who has asked me a question, will dispute the estimate that one pound of raw material will produce $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards of cotton—that would bring this English export to Canada in 1891 down to 7,000,000 pounds. Now, the imports of raw material into Canada are 46,000,000 pounds, therefore, at the English price of export, without freight or charges, this quality of cotton would produce \$13,000,000 worth. Now, I will tell the House on what authority I assume that one pound of raw material will make $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards of manufactured cotton. If any hon. member will turn to the "Hansard" of 1882, he will see a debate upon this subject of the excessive specific and ad valorem duties which were imposed upon cotton. The debate arose on a motion by Mr. Anglin, which was supported by a speech from him and by a very much more elaborate speech by Mr. Blake, and he will find that Mr. A. F. Gault, who is the president of all these combines to-day, gave as his estimate that the average yield of a pound of cotton would be $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards of the manufactured article. It is a great deal more in many cases, but Mr. Gault gave that as the estimate of the average. There is another way of reaching a conclusion. The import of raw material, as I have said already, is 46,000,000 pounds this year, and at $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards to the pound, that will give 161,000,000 yards. Now, I have taken a great deal of pains to inquire from a large number of large houses in Canada what would be a fair average figure at which to place the price of the cotton sold by these manufacturers to the trade. There is a gray cotton, the cheapest, then there are the white, the bleached cottons, and the great variety of expensive coloured cottons of a number of different classes, which my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) knows a great deal more about than I do. But I am sure it is a fair thing to put the average of all these goods at 9 cents. They run all the way from over 20 cents down to 5 cents. The larger quantity is the lower, I admit, and that brings the average down. But the dealers tell me that about 9 cents is a very fair average. The 161,000,000 yards made out of this 46,000,000 pounds of raw material would produce, at 9 cents per yard, \$14,490,000 worth of output. So, Sir, I have a number of calculations on a number of different bases making this output \$11,500,000, \$13,000,000, \$14,000,000, \$14,439,000. Two of them yield a result of \$13,000,000. Sir, we have the official statement from the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) that the cost of making all this is only \$8,000,000, and I would like him or his friends or the supporters of these combines to figure out what the profits are. They are anywhere from \$4,000,000 to \$6,000,000. Is it any wonder, under these circumstances, that the combines can water their stock? Is it any wonder that the Dominion Cotton Company stockholders, by their last operation, have made a bonus on their stock equal to 154 per cent—for that is what it means having reference to the current price paid for that watered stock and what they paid in cash for it. And are we to be told that the country is to submit to this condition of things, that the Government sitting there is unable to ascertain these facts when any private member can ascertain them if he will take the trouble, as the hon. member for Simcoe and myself have done? Are the Government going to listen to the stories poured into their ears by some promoters of these factories that they are only making such and such a quantity of goods? These men are not bound to give any return. These men are not under obligation to give any statement under oath. And they are interested to the amount of millions of dollars in concealing the amount of their output. I do not want to ask them about their output. We know what it is, what it must be, and I am only too glad that they have had a spokesman in the House to tell us what their expenses are. I give them the benefit of all these expenses they have piled up, and yet I insist, and the people of the country know and believe, that the cotton mills are making, by reason of this outrageous tariff, a profit of anywhere from \$4,000,000 to \$6,000,000 a year even on their watered stock.

Mr. TAYLOR. Representing as I do a large manufacturing town, I feel it my duty on behalf of these industries to repudiate the statements made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) when he says that every large manufacturing industry in this country is under a combine. We have in the town of Gananoque some dozen manufacturing establishments, and I do not know one of them that is interested in a combine. I am closely associated with the Gananoque Carriage Company, which at present has one factory in Gananoque and another in the town of Brockville, employing 225 hands. I know this factory is not in any combine, and the keenest competition exists between the different carriage manufacturers in this country. I am satisfied that all of them, to say nothing about the smaller shops, employ at least 1,500 hands manufacturing carriages in this country. The price of carriages, as every person knows, has been reduced since 1878 fully 50 per cent. Yet the hon. gentleman from Simcoe says that these large industries are all joined in a combine. I repudiate that statement most emphatically; there is no truth in it. While he may single out the cotton industry, or the sugar industry, and say that they are run by large corporations, he cannot point to the varied industries of our country and say the same thing. We have at Gananoque a shovel factory, employing some 80 men; there is no combine in that factory. We have next to that the Nail and Hinge Works, run by Cowan & Britton, and there is no combine there. We have our agricultural implements works, run by Mr. Cowan, and there is no combine there. I might mention a dozen other factories employing some of them from 80 to 120 hands, and not one of them is in a combine, but all are in keen competition with other manufacturers in different parts of the country. The goods turned out by these different manufacturing establishments are from 25 to 50 per cent cheaper than they were previous to the adoption of the National Policy. My hon. friend from Simcoe has taken up the cudgel for the farmers. Farmers, as a rule, do not think much of lawyers, and I do not see why the lawyers should feel called upon to champion the cause of the farmers. But he has joined with our friends on the opposite side of the House to spread the feeling among the farmers of this country that they are burdened by taxation. The farmers are as intelligent a class as the legal profession, although they may not know quite so much law, and the farmers themselves know that they are not overburdened by taxation. Now, let us apply practical common sense to the situation. Let us bring out from England or Scotland a practical farmer to this country. Let that farmer go into any of the older provinces and purchase a farm of 100 acres of choice land, with good buildings upon it, at a cost, we will say, of $5,000. We will suppose that he carries on a system of mixed farming, as is generally done in this country, and he stocks that farm. He purchases twenty cows at $30 a head, that is $600; a span of horses at $200; thirty sheep for $100; five pigs for $25; and $20 worth of fowl. That constitutes the average stock of a farmer on a hundred acres of land. For all these he pays the sum of $5,945 in cash. That is his capital invested in the farm. But then he must equip that farm with implements, and he purchases a set of double harness for $20, a set of single harness for $15; a wagon, $60; a buggy, $75; a cutter, $25; a plough, $15; a harrow, $10; a seeder, $50; a mowing machine, $50; a reaper, $110; a fanning mill, $30; a straw cutter, $20; a spade, $1; a shovel, $1 three forks and a barley fork, or straw fork, $3. Now, that constitutes the full outfit for a farmer. These goods at these prices—and many of them will not cost that much—that farmer purchases on going on to this farm, for the sum of $470.

Mr. TAYLOR.

These are the prices they can be bought for to-day. Now, my hon. friend says the farmer has to pay 35 per cent duty. I claim that the most, if not all, of these articles, are made in the country, and therefore the farmer pays no duty upon them; but for the sake of argument we will say he pays 35 per cent duty on this $470 worth of goods. That amounts to $164 on that outfit. At the very least they will last that farmer for ten years, and some of these articles will last fifteen or twenty years. Now, what is that burden upon this farmer? It amounts to $16.40 a year. That is the taxation that the average farmer of this country pays on his implements, even supposing that he has to pay a duty of 35 per cent on the original cost. He pays no taxes upon his food. He grows all the coarse food for his family. He gets his tea, coffee and everything of that kind, free of taxation. A lot of cotton goods come in free. There is no duty on raw cotton, and it is manufactured in the country. He grows his own wool, and he makes Canadian tweed, such as I am wearing, from his own sheep. Where does he pay any taxes? My hon. friend refers to wall paper, and these costly goods that he and other rich men of this country pay taxes upon. The farmer indulges very little in these expensive luxuries. Now, we will take the farmer of 1878. He, also, purchased an outfit amounting to the sum of $470 under the revenue tariff advocated by the hon. member for Simcoe. He bought this same machinery under a duty of 17½ per cent, or $82.25. We will say that outfit lasted for ten years, so that it cost the farmer $8.20 a year. There is a difference of $8.20 per head that the farmer pays more now than he did in 1878 on these implements; but let us suppose that in addition the farmer purchased 25 pounds of tea, on which he paid a duty of $1.50; $12 worth of sugar, with a duty of $2.40; five pounds of coffee, on which he paid 25 cents, and the duties on these three articles and his agricultural implements amounted to $12.30, or a difference of $4.10. There is the sum and substance of the argument of the member for Simcoe boiled down; that is the enormous burden on the farmers of this country—$4.10 according to his argument, even supposing they pay the whole duty of 35 per cent; but I repudiate that statement; there is not a word of truth in it. The Canadian farmer buys agricultural implements, buggies, wagons and other supplies that I need not enumerate, better and cheaper than the American farmer can buy right across the line opposite where I live. I am acquainted with the prices, and save and except barbed wire, hand-tools, pitch forks and shovels—there is a slight advantage in the American market on those articles—but save and except those articles, every other article that I have enumerated the Canadian farmer buys as cheap or cheaper, and of as good quality or better, than the American farmer does six miles across the river from where I reside. Then where is the Canadian farmer paying 35 per cent when he gets his goods as cheap here as the American farmer does? Besides, he has the benefit of the home market at his door. All the money that is paid for labour is expended in the country, in place of being sent away to a foreign country. The hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) might just as well take up and argue the case of the workingman of this country, and say that they, owing to the National Policy, had to pay a large duty on everything they consume; that they had to pay 50 cents a barrel on flour, 3 cents per pound on beef, 2 cents per pound on pork and so on; that the workingmen have to pay a duty on everything which the farmers grow, as to tell the farmers that they pay the duty on their agricultural implements. The workingman, if he purchased his flour in the United States, would have to pay the duty. I might give an illustration, which I have given before. We will take a workingman living in Gananoque. He has a family of five or six children, and he wants four barrels of flour to provide for his family during the winter. The same workingman keeps a cow, and instead of buying flour and bran and shorts to feed his family and his cow he comes to the conclusion that he will buy a number of bushels of wheat, take it to a mill and have it ground, and feed the offal to his cow. He goes to a Canadian farmer, and says to him: "At what price will you sell me 10 bushels of wheat?" The Canadian farmer replies: "At 75 cents per bushel." This workingman does not believe in patronizing home industries, so he thinks he will go across the line and buy American wheat and have it ground in an American mill. He goes to an American farmer and asks the price of 10 bushels of wheat, and receives a reply that the price is 75 cents per bushel, the same price as in Canada. He buys American wheat, and takes it to an American mill and asks to have it ground, and he finds the price charged for grinding is the same price as he would have to pay at a Canadian mill. He has it ground into flour, and he takes home 4 barrels of flour and the bran and shorts. As his family are in Canada he has to bring the flour and shorts over the border. At the boundary line the customs officer demands $2 duty on the four barrels of flour. Then the workingman pays the duty; but he was obliged to pay it because he purchased his wheat and had it ground in the United States, while he could have bought it as cheaply in Canada and have given employment to a Canadian mill. That workingman should pay the duty, and the hon. member for Simcoe might as well try to convince that workingman that, the circumstances being such as they are to-day, when he could buy his wheat as cheaply in Canada as across the line, he had to pay the duty, no matter where he bought it, as to tell the Canadian farmers that they are being oppressively burdened because they buy goods manufactured here as cheaply as they could purchase them in the United States. Notwithstanding that fact, the hon. member for Simcoe says that the farmers pay 35 per cent duty. I have explained quite satisfactorily. I think, to this House that, to place the amount at the outside, the farmer, even if he pays 35 per cent, pays only $4.10 more than when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. The great majority of the farmers would not only pay $4 a year, but would be willing to pay $40 a year and have the good times they enjoy now, as compared with the bad times from which they suffered during the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, with a revenue tariff of 17½ per cent. But my hon. friend admits that we must have a certain revenue for this country. How are we going to obtain it? A revenue tariff must produce taxation. We collect from Customs about $20,000,000 annually, or $4 per head of the population. If we remove that taxation, that amount of money will have to be raised from some other source, for the farmers do not want to repudiate their share of the taxation. We will take an average farmer's family of seven members. Under a system of taxation per head that family would pay $28 per annum, instead of which they pay on an average, from $5 to $10 per family. If we abolish Customs, the Government must obtain the revenue according to some other method than that adopted at the present time. We must obtain $20,000,000 of revenue from Customs or by direct taxation, and if a per capita system were adopted it would amount to $4 per head, which, with an average farmer's family of seven souls, would give $28. That would be direct taxation. If the taxation were imposed on a per capita plan, it would amount to $5 for every $1 that farmers pay now. I think the farmers understand the situation just as well as the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) understands subjects connected with the legal profession. They know how their dollars are earned and how they are spent, and they are fully aware that they pay very little towards the taxation of this country. The hon. member spent a considerable portion of time, not in trying to convince hon. members of this House, but in endeavouring to convince the farmers outside of this House that they are being oppressed by the National Policy. The farmers, however, know that the produce of their farms is as highly protected as are the manufactures of the country, and they know, further, that farming and the manufacturing industries and the labouring class must go hand in hand. The farmers, so far as I know them, and I represent a large agricultural constituency, if this question were put to the vote, would be prepared to stand by, and will stand by the National Policy in the future as they have in the past, and although the Government have proposed, and I have no doubt they will carry out their promises, to go in for a revision of the tariff on the protective lines, when they make that revision. I am sure it will be found to be acceptable to the House and to the country, and the farmers will stand by them when they again appeal to the country.

Mr. IVES moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.10 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 15th March, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. LARIVIERE moved that the third report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of the House during the present session be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 98) to amend the Act incorporating the Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company (Limited).—(Mr. Stairs.)

MR. FERDINAND BELLAVANCE.

Mr. CARROLL asked, Whether the Railway Department have repaid to Mr. Ferdinand Bellavance, of Sayabec, in the county of Rimouski, a deposit of $300 made by him in 1890, with a tender for "sleepers," which said tender having been accepted, the said Bellavance declined to execute the contract?

Mr. HAGGART. In reply to the hon. gentleman I have to state that Mr. Ferdinand Bellavance made no deposit of $300 in 1890 with a tender for "sleepers," and no contract was awarded him in that year. Consequently he could not have declined to execute the contract.

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES IN ST. MARY'S.

Mr. GRIEVE asked, What is the description of each of the seventy-three industrial establishments in the town of St. Mary's? 2. What are the names of the several manufacturers? 3. What is the number of hands employed in each establishment?

Mr. TAYLOR.

CHARGES AGAINST LAWRENCE HERCHMER.

Mr. DAVIN asked. How many of the charges made against Lawrence Herchmer, Commissioner of the North-west Mounted Police, have been found by the Commissioner the Honourable Mr. Justice Wetmore to have been proved? Has the learned judge found him liable to violent fits of temper? What course, in the interest of the North-west Mounted Police Force, does the Government intend to take?

Mr. IVES. As to the first question, 137 charges were preferred against Commissioner Herchmer. Of these Mr. Justice Wetmore found fourteen proved, and twenty-three proved in part. As to the second question, Mr. Justice Wetmore reported that none of the charges brought home to the Commissioner affected his honesty, his business capacity or the efficiency of the force. The learned judge found him liable to lose his temper. As to the last question, the matter is under the consideration of the Government.

BRANDON INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

Mr. McMULLEN asked. Whether $284.91 spent in advertising, stationery, &c., as set out on page D-33, Auditor General's Report, is all the money spent on Brandon Industrial School last year? If so, how many pupils were in training? Has not the school been closed for the last three years, and why is it considered necessary to reopen it?

Mr. DALY. The amount of $284.91 was the total expenditure during the year 1891-92. It was for printing and advertising for tenders. No pupils were in training; the school building is not yet erected; but the work of construction is to be pushed on without delay, now that the amended plans have been approved of.

CHEVALIER BARLEY.

Mr. MULLOCK asked, With regard to the Chevalier barley imported by the Government and supplied the farmers for seed, 1. Was the same pure when imported? 2. Was it tested by the Government? If so, when and with what results? 3. Was it supplied the farmers at cost? 4. Does the Government intend to import any seed grain for Canadian farmers?

Mr. FOSTER. 1. The barley imported was considered pure from the English seedsmen's stand-point. There was no admixture of any other sort of barley. A few seeds of other plants, but not pernicious weed seeds, were found among the barley received. The whole, therefore, was thoroughly clean, and including light barley seeds, a proportion of about 1 per cent was extracted by this process. A part of this loss was paid by the firm furnishing the barley. 2. The barley was tested in relation to its fertility and germinating power, at the Experimental Farm, with the result that it was found to be very satisfactory. Some of it was grown on each of the Experimental Farms where it was found to be pure and distinct. 3. The barley was sold to Canadian farmers at a slight fraction under cost. This was found to be a little over $4 per bag laid down, but it was sold at $4, and freight charges were paid on the purchase made, so as to insure its being furnished at an equal price to farmers in all parts of the Dominion. 4. There is no intention to import any other seed grain in view of existing information of facts.

LOCKS ON THE DU LIEVRE RIVER.

Mr. RIDER (for Mr. Devlin) asked. What is the total amount paid out in connection with the construction of the Little Rapid lock or locks on the Du Lièvre River? What were the extras? Are these extras still claimed, and if so, what is the amount?

Mr. OUMET. 1. The total amount paid out in connection with the construction of the locks on the River Du Lièvre, is $255,384.91, including surveys, land purchases, work done by days labour or contract, and superintendent. 2. A claim for extras to the amount of $60,971.74 has been filed by the contractors, but it has not been allowed.

Mr. RIDER (for Mr. Devlin) asked. 1. What was the amount of money received by the contractor or contractors for the construction of the Little Rapid Lock or Locks on the Du Lièvre River, county of Ottawa? 2. The dates of all payments made in connection with such work, and the names of the parties to whom paid? 3. The name or names of the Government inspector or inspectors and engineer or engineers who superintended the work?

Mr. OUMET. 1. The amount of the final estimate is $183,301.05. Payments were made on the following dates:—1887, 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891 and 1892. 2. The payments were all made to Thompson, Poupore & Company and to Poupore & Company, through the Bank of Ottawa. 3. The inspector was James S. Wilson. The engineer in charge was Mr. F. M. Hamel. The chief engineer was Mr. H. F. Perley. The original survey was made by Mr. W. B. Snow. The original plans were prepared by Mr. J. E. Boyd.

Mr. RIDER (for Mr. Devlin) asked, Who was the contractor, or who the contractors for the construction of the lock or locks at Little Rapid on the Du Lièvre River, Ottawa county? What was the original amount of tender for such contract?

Mr. OUMET. 1. The contractors were Thompson, Poupore & Company. 2. The original amount of tender was calculated, from scheduled prices, at $41,592.50, but the plans and specifications on which tenders were asked, were wholly deficient, not including entrance pier at the upper end of the lock, retaining wall, upper and lower wharves, excavation at upper and lower end, submarine work and lockmaster's house.

ELECTRICAL MACHINES FOR COMPILATION OF CENSUS.

Mr. RIDER asked, In bulletin No. 9 it is stated:

For the compilation of the population statistics of Canada, as collected in the census of 1891, electrical machines have been used.

Is the machine system, as used for the compilation of the last census returns of Canada, reliable, and by whom was this system introduced? From whom, upon what terms or conditions, and how many of the said machines were procured and so used?

Mr. FOSTER. The electrical machine was adopted by the United States Government, on reports made by the Franklin Institute, and by a special commission appointed by the United States Superintendent of Census. It is declared by them in their report to be decidedly more accurate than other methods. Under the former system there was no review of the work. Under the card system, worked by electrical machine, there is permanent record of population statistics. The system of counting is called the Hollerith system. It was introduced into the Canadian system by Hon. Mr. Carling, on a report by Mr. George Johnson, after a visit to Washington. The machines were rented from the inventor, Mr. H. Hollerith. At first, five machines were ordered; subsequently five more, and still later, one additional. The amount to be paid was $625 per month for the ten. The machines were to be set up, kept in order, and the necessary power to run them being supplied by the inventor.

AGRICULTURAL PURSUITS—CAPITAL.

Mr. RIDER asked, What is the total value of capital invested in agricultural pursuits in the Dominion of Canada, according to the census of 1891? (a) Total value of real estate? (b) Total value of stock, including animals of all kinds? (c) Total value of agricultural machinery, carriages, &c.?

Mr. FOSTER. The census schedules asked for quantities of the various crops, number of stock, &c., but in no case were values asked for.

TUNNEL—P.E.I. AND MAINLAND.

Mr. PERRY moved for:

Statement showing in detail the expenditure incurred since last session of Parliament, in carrying on the borings in the Straits of Northumberland to date as to the probable cost of a tunnel, also for all contracts, correspondence, telegrams or papers in anywise relating to such borings or such expenditure.

He said: The question of the construction of a tunnel across the Straits of Northumberland between Prince Edward Island and the mainland has been frequently discussed in this House, has been considered by the Government and has formed the subject of public discussion by the people of the Island during a number of years. I find from the correspondence brought down to the House that in 1890 Senator Howlan wrote to Sir Douglas Fox, an eminent engineer in Great Britain, asking him, first, for what sum of money he would give a professional opinion as to the feasibility and practicability of building a tunnel; 2. For what annual subsidy, payable half-yearly in London, and satisfactorily guaranteed, contractors could be furnished to complete the work; 3. If, in his judgment, the total cost would fall within $5,000,000? In answer to this, Sir Douglas Fox wrote:

If I heard from you by cable upon receipt of this letter I could probably arrange for Mr. Alfred Palmer to examine the condition of the tunnel and the connecting railways on his way home from Labrador, where he is at present engaged. For the opinion which you mention I would suggest the following: that you pay Mr. Alfred Palmer time at the rate of $25 per month, together with his extra travelling expenses occasioned by this detour, with a fee for myself of £202 10. Upon the receipt of Mr. Palmer's report to me I shall be better able to deal with the second and third questions in your letter.

Now, Senator Howlan telegraphed to Sir Douglas Fox on the 28th January, 1891, requesting him to send immediately an estimate of the cost of the tunnel, and Sir Douglas answered that he would rather wait until he heard from Mr. Pearson, a civil engineer engaged in tunnelling work. As it was a very urgent time, Senator Howlan again telegraphed Sir Douglas Fox that he wanted the estimate immediately. I wish to show that the Government of the day were very anxious to see this work commenced and carried on. Even the late Sir John Macdonald himself gave Senator Howlan a letter in February, 1891, in which he pledged himself and his Government, if it were sustained at the election, that immediate steps would be taken to carry out that work. Sir Charles Tupper, on the 28th February, 1891, telegraphed from Amherst to Mr. Ferguson, who was then a candidate in the interests of the Government, that he was sorry he could not visit Prince Edward Island, as the "Stanley" was not then crossing, and he dared not trust himself by the Capes. I do not know that he is so very precious that he could not cross there as well as anybody else. I have crossed there myself; but at all events it did not answer his purpose. Sir Charles Tupper said then:

I am satisfied that the tunnel can be built for $6,000,000 and you can rely on all my influence that the work that is so desired by the people of the Island and the people of the mainland will be carried out immediately.

I want the Government to understand that Engineer Palmer is the first engineer that I know of who recommended the building of the tunnel from the Island to the mainland. His report dates as far back as September, 1890. Now, all the information that was got in 1891, previous to the election, appeared to me to be a fizzle, and the Government did not act upon it. It turned out that Sir Douglas Fox had not sufficient information to make a close estimate of the cost of the tunnel, or even the feasibility of building it. Senator Howlan was sent to London in the spring of 1891 for the purpose of giving Sir Douglas Fox further information. He came back and we find that during that summer some further experiments were made, a report of which was laid on the Table of the House last session. The Government were not yet satisfied. They got the House to vote last session of Parliament a sum of $12,000, in order to have further borings made across the straits, and they came to an agreement with Alfred Palmer, C.E., to bore twenty-nine or thirty holes for the sum of $12,000. To my great surprise, I find that the Government required no security from Mr. Palmer. Mr. Palmer says himself, whether it is true or not I do not know, but I have no reason to doubt his words, he says that Senator Howlan became security, not by written agreement, but by word of mouth, and that Senator Howlan also volunteered to become banker and financier in this business. He was quite willing to spend the money as long as the Government would give it to him, and I dare say he is not the only one who would feel that way. We find that sometime in August only four holes were bored, and that something like $5,000 had been expended. What I want the House to bear in mind is this: Palmer was obliged by the contract for $12,000 to bore so many holes, but Palmer had not the fingering of the money. He had not even the hiring of the men, he was not even allowed to purchase a piece of rope, a piece of steel, a piece of iron, a bolt, a ton of coal, or anything else. I find that Senator Howlan bought these articles at his own prices, and he sold some of the coal at his own price. I find in one of his letters, dated 20th July, that he sold the Hon. David Rogers, of Summerside, coal for $3 a ton. This was coal that he had bought somewhere over in Nova Scotia, and had chartered a vessel at a very large amount to bring the coal across, and when he found that he had more coal than he wanted, he sold the balance to Mr. Rogers for $3 a ton, so he says. In another of his letters, dated 1st October, 1892, he says he sold the coal to Mr. Rogers for $2.25 a ton. Now, there is a conflict at once. He says in one letter that he sold the coal for $3 a ton, and in the other that he sold it for $2.25. Bear in mind that this coal was bought by a portion of the $12,000 which Mr. Palmer was supposed to earn. Why should the money be allowed to go into Senator Howlan's hands? Why should he be the banker or the financier of Mr. Palmer? Why should not the Government occupy that position themselves? That sent down their engineer, Mr. Henry, who I understand, is a very efficient man, and from his certificate I am sure that he was satisfied that the contractor, Mr. Palmer, had earned the money, and that the Government would have been justified in paying it to him. Now, I find that very little work has been done. Mr. Palmer states that seven holes were bored up to some time in August, and for that work the Government paid Senator Howlan, as banker and financier for Mr. Palmer, something like $5,000. How did the Government expect that the remainder of the holes, twenty-two in number, would be bored for the balance of the money voted? The holes that have been bored are near the shore, but no holes have been bored in the deepest parts of the strait, where they will cost a good deal more, on account of the depth of water, than the holes near the shore. I understand also that on the Island side there was some conflict between the men in charge of the diamond drill and Mr. Palmer. I believe that it came to a pitched battle, for Mr. Palmer bears the marks of having been assaulted. He states that he was cut on the nose by a knife. I do not know whether that is the case or not, but the mark has the appearance of having been made by a sharp instrument. I understand that after all this happened the Minister of Finance made another agreement with Mr. Palmer, under which Mr. Palmer was to go on with the work, and to receive the balance of the $12,000. I believe that Mr. Palmer was willing to do that; but it appears that some time in September Mr. Palmer was stopped in his work by the Government, and was told by them that they had no more money to squander in this way. This I would almost call imbecility; at any rate it was a very careless way of expending money. It is strange that the Government should make such a loose bargain. The simple fact that they did not exact security from Mr. Palmer, but simply took the Senator's word for the due performance of the contract, is enough to show that they acted very carelessly and in a very unbusi-ness-like way in this transaction. Mr. Palmer also complains of the usage he got. He says that he would have had this work completed according to the contract if the means had been forthcoming. The Government state that they gave the money to him, but he says he never got it. If they gave it to a person who went around and paid perhaps 100 per cent more than he should, and hired unnecessary labourers, and thereby robbed Mr. Palmer of what was due him, was that just or fair or honest? Now, Mr. Palmer, in a very long correspondence, which I have no doubt the Minister of Finance has seen, makes very serious charges against Senator Howlan. He makes no charges in this correspondence against the Minister of Finance or against the Government as a body. He says in one place that there was an understanding, and that he was forced to come to that understanding by Senator Howlan, that the profits should be divided equally between himself and Senator Howlan. Now, am I to believe that statement? Mr. Palmer is a man well known in this country. He has been highly recommended by Sir Douglas Fox and by Senator Howlan himself. He has also been, I understand, the bosom friend of the Government, and I am sure that when they thought so much of him as to give him a $12,000 contract without security, I have no right to stand up here and doubt his word. Now, I want to read what he says :

Senator Howlan undertook to finance the contract as banker, giving me an assurance that my fee of $1,250 would be paid, even though the contract should prove a losing one.

It appears that Senator Howlan gave Mr. Palmer to understand, as far as his word of honour went, that he would get his $1,250, whether the contract was a failure or not. He goes on further to say :

The Senator then unfolded his little plan as banker, which was as follows. He verbally guaranteed me $1,250 whichever way the contract went, he to receive all the profit over and above that amount.

First, Mr. Palmer says, Senator Howlan wanted all the profits, whatever they might be. Now, I do not state things as facts. I read merely as the statement of Mr. Palmer, and I have no reason to doubt it until Senator Howlan proves himself guiltless of the charges, which to my knowledge he has not yet done. Mr. Palmer goes on further :

I objected to this proposal and told him I wanted half the profit as well as my fee of $1,250.

There is an acknowledgment on the part of Mr. Palmer that the stipulation between Senator Howlan and himself was that the profits were to be equally divided between them. He goes on :

He thereupon agreed to allow me one-half the profit, but stated that he wanted $500 to recompense him for his loss of time from the Senate. I reluctantly agreed to this rather than lose the chance I saw of making a reputation for myself as a civil engineer.

Senator Howlan asked the sum of $500 in addition to half the profit, to indemnify him for the loss of his indemnity as a Senator. Now, what right had he to expect that this money should come out of the $12,000 which was voted for the purpose of experimenting by boring holes across the Straits of Northumberland? It is unjustifiable, to say the least of it. I am afraid, if there had been any profits, there was no division of them, and that it all went the one way. He was asked further :

Did Senator Howlan at any time consult with you with respect to the money transaction.

And he replied :

Not exactly, but about the end of June he presented an account in a book which he included the $500 he had advanced to me as banker upon my IOU, as well as money for his own travelling expenses and other items amounting to nearly $1,200, which I signed at his request, and which sum it was understood would be deducted from the amount of the contract.

If Senator Howlan was acting as banker and financier for Mr. Palmer, and if this money was not to be paid until the works were performed, why should this $500, upon Mr. Palmer's IOU, be obtained in the month of June, when the contract money would not be paid until October? Mr. Palmer was not able to live on the wind, he did not belong to Prince Edward Island, and could not go to a hotel there, and live for months without money, and I suppose he had no free pass and had to pay his travelling expenses. However, this was the stipulation, and I suppose Mr. Palmer tells the truth when he says he was driven to sign this document. Then he goes on further :

I called upon him, and finding that the Senator wished me to certify to a statement of some $4,000 of accounts, in which was included $500 for his loss of time from the Senate, previously referred to, as well as the $500 given to me at the commencement of the contract, also before mentioned, besides heavy travelling expenses, I refused, as the sums had nothing to do with the Government advance.

No wonder he refused. There were $500, which ought not to have been paid until the contract was completed. There were $500, to which he said he was asked to certify as being correct. He was called upon by Senator Howlan to indemnify him for his loss of time as senator. I do not know whether the Government were cognisant of the facts ; but if they were they should have put a stop to this. Then he goes on further and says that the result was, the Minister summed up both sides of the case. This was at the interview had between him and the Minister of Finance :

The result was that the Minister summed up both sides of the case, and subsequently he and Mr. Schreiber agreed to a rearrangement of the contract—with the Government instead of Senator Howlan as banker.

This was the second contract. The contract was taken from Senator Howlan's hands, or rather he was dismissed as banker and financier, according to this, and the Government entered into a contract with Mr. Palmer, and agreed to become paymasters themselves. I believe that if they had done that from the first, if they had acted in a business-like way from the first, if they had taken proper securities from Mr. Palmer, and paid this money on the recommendation of the Government engineer, it would have been all right. I am sure Mr. Palmer could have gone, if he only thought well of it, to the banks and borrowed any money he required; but instead of that, Senator Howlan stepped in and introduced himself, so Mr. Palmer says, as a very rich man, which no doubt he is, and as able to finance this matter all through, so that there would be no humbug. Now, Senator Howlan thought necessary, as financier and banker, to charter a small schooner—I do not know exactly how many tons—to go from Summerside to Pictou for a load of coal, and paid the sum of $191 out of Mr. Palmer's money, out of the money which should have gone to perform this contract. I suppose Mr. Palmer knew nothing of this charter, and that Senator Howlan was allowed to make whatever bargain he thought proper, and I see the Senator charged $5.75 for superintending the unloading of that coal on the wharf at Summerside. He sold a part of the cargo at $2.25, as he says in one letter, and at $3, as he says in another. Which of these two letters are we to believe? He also has a sum total of account of $1,197.98 against Mr. Palmer. These items Mr. Palmer is entitled to be shown, so as to ascertain their correctness. In my opinion, he has a right to know what are the items which make up the $1,197.98, because I contend this is Mr. Palmer's money. If he were able to make $1,000 on this contract, would that not be his lawfully? Would it be right that a third party should interfere between him and the Government and squander the money in that manner, taking $1,000 out of the profits of Mr. Palmer and letting it go adrift? I find also a lot of charges here which Senator Howlan makes for going to Halifax—I do not know for what. I find other charges he makes for going to St. John, $21.10, and another bill, without being itemized, for $15.15. Why should Mr. Palmer be called upon to pay this account? How did he become responsible? What authority would I or anybody else have to go and buy stuff for Mr. Palmer and make him pay that out of his $12,000? What right would I or anybody else have to travel to St. John or Montreal or anywhere else and make Mr. Palmer pay my expenses? If we had the items of that $1,197.89 made public, we would be able to judge how far they are honest, genuine and bona fide. I should not think that Senator Howlan or anybody else would hesitate for one moment to lay these papers before the eyes of the public, and let the people judge themselves who is wrong and who is right. But to my knowledge Senator

Mr. PERRY.

Howlan has not undertaken to deny these charges, and even if he did, it would be only a denial against an assertion. I am not prepared to stand up here and say that Senator Howlan would make a false statement or appropriate money falsely to himself, but I say that the charges are made by an honourable man, by an engineer, whose reputation is well known, not only in Canada but in the United States, Australia and different parts of the world, and until these charges are proved false I am not going to stand up here and say that Mr. Palmer made false statements. Here is a letter from Senator Howlan, in which he makes an attempt at denial. It is written the 17th of December last:

In regard to Mr. Alfred Palmer's interview concerning me which appeared in the Halifax "Chronicle," the material parts of which are published in this morning's "Guardian," permit me through your columns to assure the public that the statements made by Mr. Palmer so far as they charge me with conduct inconsistent with my position as a Senator are utterly untrue.

Now that is the only denial.

Mr. Palmer has for the last three or four months—

He says four months from the 17th of December, which would go back to July, but if we are to believe the correspondence they were friends in July.

Mr. Palmer has for the last three months spent all his time in slandering me from house to house, and publishing paragraphs insinuating—but not making—charges against me.

It will be my duty to show with what object and for what purpose he thus went to work. I have ample materials in my hands to show that his statements are untrue and that he is not entitled to credence—all I ask the public now is to suspend judgment until I have time and you can afford me a space to show what manner of man he is. I did not know of his publication until near noon to-day, and it is utterly impossible for me before the issue of to-day's papers, to expose the fallacy of this man's charges, the more especially as they contain references to persons at a distance, to whom I may have to apply to contradict him.

Permit me here to say, however, that his statement that I wanted or stipulated for the profits, or any part of the profits of his contracts, and that I personally guaranteed him a professional fee of $1,250 is an absolute falsehood. Knowing all the circumstances thoroughly, I can only account for his production as the effusion of a disordered mind.

GEORGE W. HOWLAN.

CH'TOWN, Dec. 17, 1892.

Now, Mr. Palmer is in Ottawa; he has been in Ottawa, I believe, more than one month, perhaps for two months, for I think he was here before the House met, and I am sure he must have been met by many hon. member of this House. Will any man who has met Mr. Palmer tell me that he has the behaviour of a man with a disordered mind? Does he look like a man who does not know what he is doing? Look at the plans he has on exhibition in the smoking room, look at the immense quantity of work he has performed. Will any one tell me, except, perhaps, he be such an engineer as Senator Howlan—for he appears to be far in advance in the business—that these are not great works and worthy the attention of the members of the House? I am proud to say there is hardly a member of this House but has taken the trouble to go and examine these plans, and all have spoken of them very highly. Mr. Palmer is no common man; he belongs to a professional class in this country that must be respected. In fact, your great public works cannot go on unless you have an engineer to back you, and is that the way an engineer, an eminent engineer, a young man who stands high in his profession, who has taken part in engineering works of the greatest importance in the world, should be treated? Is this a man to be cast aside by the Government or Senator Howlan? If they treat Mr. Palmer in this way, is that not enough to throw a damper on this work? Where can we get an engineer, if we use Mr. Palmer in this way? Here is a man who has been used, since the fall of 1890, on works the most important in Canada, and they have the benefit of his engineering skill, of his plans, of his estimates; they have all they could get from him, and now, when they suppose that they are done with him, they throw him aside; they leave him starving in Ottawa, for I know he came up here without a cent; I know he has no money here. The Government have made one mistake in not letting this contract as they should have done; let them not make a second. Let them settle amicably with Mr. Palmer; let them do justice to him. If he is entitled to $1,000, let the Government be magnanimous enough and just enough to pay him. If he is entitled to $2,000, pay him, for it is enough, as I say to throw a damper over one of the greatest undertakings in the whole Dominion, to have it said that an engineer, one of the most eminent in his profession, has been treated with injustice. I am glad to say that Mr. Palmer has not a word to say against the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). Mr. Palmer tells me that he received from that gentleman every consideration, and he speaks in very high terms of him. I am glad of that. But that does not say that Mr. Palmer has had justice done him. Now, coming back to this tunnel business, I would like to know how much longer the Government intend to keep the Island people in suspense? They told us, as I said before in the early part of April, 1891, that all the information that could be desired or could be obtained, or all that was necessary to enable Sir Douglas Fox to give a close estimate, was at hand. Now, that is two years since, and still the information is not got. And one of the biggest farces that has been played in connection with the work was played last summer. I would like very well to find out how much money has been expended? The amount voted was $12,000. But I am told that something like $5,000 has been spent. But I am told, further, that, if all the debts were paid, the amount expended would be in the vicinity of $8,000, and I believe that is nearer the mark. So there is $4,000 left, and I am told the Government intend to get the work finished for $4,000. But I do not think they can. I forgot to mention that Mr. Palmer had invented a plan by which the borings could be done very safely in the deep water where there is a heavy tide, a plan which was not previously known. I believe the first offer was made to some eminent men in the United States, but the answer the Government got was that there was no instrument invented, so far as they knew, that would carry out the work. Thus, the whole devolved upon Mr. Palmer. He perfected the invention and he has got the patent. He has got the machine that can bore successfully across the straits. And is he now to be cast off; is he to be no longer regarded as a useful man in his profession, or even as a citizen having rights to be protected? If so, where do the Government expect to get engineers for any works that they may have in hand? They are going on with some works of great importance—I don't know that they are of very much utility—but they are important, at least, so far as the cost is concerned. For instance, there is the Soulanges Canal. How do they expect to get engineers for such work, with Mr. Palmer publishing, over his own signature, statements of the way he has been used. I tell this House and the Government that unless Senator Howlan can prove himself clear of the charges made by Mr. Palmer, the great majority of the people of Prince Edward Island, so far as I know, will be inclined to believe the statement Mr. Palmer makes. And if Mr. Palmer is right in the statements he makes, I must come to the conclusion that he has been badly used. I need not refer further to the utility of the tunnel. I only remind the House that the Government, led by the late Sir John Macdonald, was, to a very large extent, pledged to complete the tunnel. Now, I would put the House in mind of what he did say. On the 6th of February, 1891, he wrote to Senator Howlan as follows:—

If, as I believe, the country will continue to give us its confidence, the Ministry will, under my guidance, take the matter up without delay.

This is more than two years ago.

I understand Sir Douglas Fox is of opinion the scheme is a feasible one. I fully appreciate the nature and extent of the obligation incurred by the Dominion to maintain continuous communication between the Island and the mainland. We have tried to carry this out by the "Stanley," but of course she cannot fight against the elements.

There is the admission of Sir John A. Macdonald himself that the Government had failed to carry out the terms of Confederation, and he said: "If I am returned to power, the Government, under my guidance, will at once take up the matter, and do justice to the province of Prince Edward Island. Has that been done? Is the Finance Minister prepared to stand up here and say: "Well, we are going to experiment further next summer, and, when this is done, in the fall of 1893, we will be able to go on with the tunnel, advertise for tenders to build it, or condemn the whole machinery." But I have no reason to believe they are going to condemn it. Perhaps this is kept up so that it may be used again on the eve of another election. I do not know, but really it looks very much as if we might be nearer to an election than a great many of us suppose. The Government, no doubt, know, but we, who are in Opposition, do not know. However, I warn my friends on this side of the House to be prepared, and not to be caught napping. This critical time may come much sooner than a great many of us anticipate. My opinion is based on the fact that this work is delayed. Now, I will read Sir Charles Tupper's telegram from Amherst, dated 28th February:

I regret that it is impossible for me to go to the Island, as the "Stanley" cannot cross, and I dare not attempt the capes. I have satisfied myself that the tunnel can be made for $6,000,000, and you may rely upon all the aid I can give to that important and necessary work.

Is that not enough to induce the people of Prince Edward Island to believe that the tunnel is going to be built? Is that not sufficient to induce the people to believe that the Government were honest? They had the promise of the Premier, Sir John A. Macdonald; they had the promise of no less a personage than Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner in England, who came over here, in his dignity as High Commissioner, to tell the people how they should vote. He told the people of Prince Edward Island, that, if the Government got in again, this was going to be built at once. The Government were sustained—perhaps, not by the electors of Prince county, nor of Queen's county; but, at all events, we are here, and we are a portion of the House. The Government has been sustained by the greatest majority they ever had since 1878. They have made promises which, I contend, ought to be fulfilled; and, as I have stated, I think, on a former occasion, if I found that the Government were bona fide intending to carry out this work, I do not know but that they would have my support. I would be very strongly tempted to support them. It would be a great consideration. A few millions and daily communication between the mainland and Prince Edward Island might tempt me to do a great deal. In respect to continuous communication, how have the terms of Confederation been fulfilled? In what way have they been fulfilled? This beautiful steamer "Stanley" cost this country $250,000. She is one of the finest vessels afloat on the waters of the St. Lawrence, but we find to-day that she is disabled and, perhaps, will be disabled, to my sorrow and to the loss of the people of Prince Edward Island, for days and weeks. That is a serious thing. Our trade is stopped. We find that potatoes are now bringing a good price in Montreal, a good price in Boston, in Philadelphia, in New York, and even a good price here in Ottawa. To-day we have 1,000,000 bushels of potatoes to export from the Island, while the prices are good, but we are shut up and cannot take advantage of these prices; and by the time navigation is open, prices will be down, perhaps, and the people will have lost the opportunity which they ought to have, of selling their products. Notwithstanding all that, the people of Prince Edward Island are expected to pay taxes, just as well as the people who have the privilege of the home market, who live near Montreal, Toronto, Halifax, St. John and other large cities. We are expected to pay our taxes, just as well as these people. I repeat, that I do hope the Government will take this matter into their serious consideration, and that they will do what is right by Mr. Palmer. I am sure the House will readily endorse a vote of $1,000 or $2,000 for the assistance of Mr. Palmer. Mr. Palmer has been ill-used. I do not charge the Government with wilful injustice in this matter; I think it may be an oversight. People are apt sometimes to do things they should not do. However, it is never too late to repent. There is no sin, even a political sin, even a sin by the Finance Minister himself, but that may be forgiven, if he shows true contrition, if he shows that he is prepared now to do what is right and stand by Mr. Palmer, do justice to him, and send him home a pleased man. I think it will be a great feather in the cap of the Government, when they have to knuckle down to an engineer and intrust $1,000,000 in his hands. I expect that the Minister of Finance will take immediate action, and that he will see that the people of Prince Edward Island are fairly and justly dealt with, and that if the project of the tunnel is feasible and if the cost comes within a reasonable sum, the Government will commence it in a short time. I hope they will not any longer follow the policy of "to-morrow." Let the Finance Minister at once take action and satisfy the people of the Island, and satisfy the people of his own province of New Brunswick, who also feel very much interested in this matter. Why, Sir, we find that in Prince Edward Island there are a hundred travelling agents from Toronto, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, trying to introduce their wares, their boots and shoes, although we are told by the census returns that the 109,000 in Prince Edward Island have 173 boot and shoe factories; still the boots and shoes we use are manufactured in New Brunswick and other places. Sir, it is ridiculous. I do not know myself what we can believe in respect to these returns. In conclusion, I trust the Government will take this matter up at once. They have a duty to perform. They are legislating here, not for the Conservative voters of Canada, but for all Canada; and I contend that Prince Edward Island being part and parcel of Canada, we have a right to consideration. The Liberals are a respectable portion of the people of Canada, and we have a very strong belief that the first time the Government dare to open the doors for an election, we will be in power. Sir, they have a right to legislate for these people as well as for themselves. Let them show an example of doing unto others as they wish others to do to them. Follow that grand principle, and you will be all right. Do not do us an injustice because we are a small people; do not do us an injustice because we may think differently from you on political matters; but be assured that we are just as honest as you are, just as loyal as you are, that we pay our taxes just as well as you do, and the least we can expect at the hands of the Government is fair and even-handed justice.

Mr. YEO. My hon. colleague (Mr. Perry) has dealt with this matter so fully that he has left very little for me to say. However, it is a matter of regret to members of this House from Prince Edward Island, and to the whole population of that province, that delays have occurred in completing the boring and survey of the Straits of Northumberland. According to the promises which were made to the people of Prince Edward Island a short time previous to March, 1891, it was expected that during the following season steps would be taken to ascertain whether this project was feasible. We find now that two seasons have passed, and very little has yet been done. My hon. friend alluded to the letter which Sir John A. Macdonald wrote to Senator Howlan, and which was used pretty freely in Prince Edward Island during the winter and spring of 1891; and he also read the telegram from Sir Charles Tupper, which greatly raised the hopes of the people. They expected that justice was going to be done. We find that, up to the present, very little progress has been made. It appears, according to my humble judgment, it was an unfortunate step to let the contract for this undertaking in the way it appears to have been let. The work should have been performed by the Government, and no private individual, and no member of the Legislature should have been mixed up with the undertaking. There is no doubt the engineer who was employed to do the work, was competent, as he was highly recommended. Surely there was some one in the public service in some of the departments who could have superintended the work, so that it need not have been placed in the hands of a member of this Legislature, it matters not who he is. So far as regards the gentleman named, I know very little about the affair except what I have seen in the public prints, but I say that, in an important matter of this kind, which would necessarily involve a large expenditure of public money, the Government should have taken steps to have seen that the work was properly done. It would be of very little consequence if it cost a few thousand dollars more to have it efficiently and properly done, and it would be far preferable to an expenditure being incurred which accomplished very little and left the matter still in an unsettled state. The terms of Union have been referred to. We see by the letter written by Sir John Macdonald that he admitted the terms of Union between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion had not been carried out, and the tunnel seemed to be the only feasible scheme by which those terms could be carried out; and knowing the fact that the faith of Canada was pledged and that the Prime Minister had given this promise, which was backed up by a promise given by the present High Commissioner, it should have been the duty of the Government to take the most speedy steps to have these borings and surveys completed, instead of which, very little has been done. It was estimated that, in all probability, this undertaking would cost $6,000,000. Of course, this is a large sum; but still, it is a small sum when we place it against the faith of the Dominion, and the solemn compact entered into between Canada and Prince Edward Island, but if, after the survey was completed, it was found the expenditure would involve a larger sum than the Dominion Government felt they would be justified in expending, then it would be a matter for consideration between the two Governments. But I do not think it is fair that this matter should be delayed from year to year. Two seasons have already passed since the promise was made, and very little has yet been done. I know it is the wish of every one in Prince Edward Island, that this matter should not be delayed until the elections come around again. This question caused great excitement during the last election in Prince Edward Island; it was handled for all it was worth by gentlemen running as candidates for the Government. We do not wish this to occur again. So far as the people of the Island are concerned they should be fairly and justly dealt with. I do not come here asking for favours, I ask only for justice, and that the terms of Union with Prince Edward Island should be carried out. Our people are suffering every year from the delay. During the present winter very great inconvenience has been felt from not having anything like continuous communication with the mainland. During part of the winter the steamer "Stanley" has been unable to make her regular trips, and at the present time she is laid up for repairs. The people, therefore, have had to resort to the old style of carrying the mails and passengers by ice-boats, the same way in which this was done with very little improvement on the method in vogue previous to Confederation. The condition of things is not what we expected when we entered Confederation. The people of the Island have faithfully fulfilled their part of the contract, and they look to the Dominion Government to fulfil their part. I would strongly urge on the Minister of Finance the necessity of at once taking other steps, not by letting a contract in the way in which this contract has been let, but by taking prompt measures to have the borings and survey completed, and completed in a satisfactory manner. The people of the Island complain loudly in regard to the absence of expenditure of public money in that province; but this question of the tunnel is our greatest grievance. One of the inducements held out to the people of the Island to enter Confederation was that continuous steam communication between the Island and the mainland would be provided. We know this from the letter of the late Prime Minister; but notwithstanding all the efforts made, the Government have not succeeded in carrying out their part of the contract. I hope the Minister of Finance will, during the coming season, have the borings and survey completed in a satisfactory manner.

Mr. MULLOCK. I am not myself aware of the correctness or otherwise of the statements made by the hon. members for Prince Edward Island. The subject is an entirely new one to me; but I have listened with much interest to their remarks. The hon. member who moved the resolution, read from certain documents some very grave statements. I am not acquainted with the engineer referred to, and I have never heard of him until this moment; but having listened to what the hon. member has said, that engineer Palmer is a man of professional standing, of world-wide reputation, in fact, one can hardly allow the grave charges he has made against a member of Parliament to pass by in silence. If I correctly caught the gravamen of the charge, this engineer alleges that one of our colleagues—and we are all interested in the reputation of our colleagues, both in this House and in the Senate—has been trafficking in a public grant, has by some process become possessed of public money voted by Parliament for a certain undertaking. If so, two very serious things have occurred: one, a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, and the other a misapplication of public money. These are exceedingly grave charges to be made in any place, especially if made in a place such as this, the House of Commons of Canada, for they are thus made to the whole people. I appreciate extremely the delicacy that my hon. friend manifested in saying that he could not for a moment father these charges as against our colleague, the Senator in question. That being the case, I feel in justice to him that it would be unfair that we should depart from this question and allow it to pass away from the attention of the House at this moment in silence. It is due, I think, to our colleague, the hon. Senator, that some authoritative denial, if possible, should be made by the Government in regard to this transaction, some explanation, and if that explanation is not forthcoming to-day, let it be said that such explanation will be given at a later period. If we drop the matter now, it practically leaves these charges unchallenged, and in that way it is almost declared by the action of the House that they are well established and well founded. I should grieve to believe that there is foundation for that, and therefore if no one else rises to offer a word in his behalf I myself will express the hope that there is some satisfactory explanation which will remove a cloud from the reputation of the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As this affects the expenditure of public money, and money too with which, if I correctly followed the hon. member who introduced the matter, the Minister of Finance was specially concerned, I think the Minister ought to give us some explanation as to what he knows on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a motion for information, and if you pass the motion the information will be brought down in five minutes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Statements have been made of a serious character, bearing in mind the relations existing between the Hon. Senator Howlan and the Government, who practically employed him as an electioneering agent, and who thought so much of his services that they first of all induced him to resign his seat in the Senate, and then when he was rejected by the people of Prince Edward Island, put him back in the Senate to represent the interests of the people who would have nothing to do with him as a member of this House. I think the Finance Minister owes it to a man of that character, and also his own character, to give us an explanation, if there be any explanation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not propose to enter into any of the disputes which exist between Senator Howlan and Mr. Palmer, the engineer, but I think there has been sufficient stated to call upon the Government for an explanation upon one or two points. The House will recollect that some years ago, Senator Howlan expressed himself as taking a great interest in this scheme of uniting Prince Edward Island and the mainland by means of what was then called a subway. That scheme was condemned by Mr. Palmer, the present engineer, as impracticable, and he, or Sir Douglas Fox, or some of the engineers suggested that instead of a subway a tunnel should be constructed. We then had the letter of Sir John Macdonald, the Premier of this country, and the telegram sent by Sir Charles Tupper, as to the political action the Government contemplated taking with reference to this great work. Whether it was for political or other purposes, the solemn assurance was given that from the investigation they were able to make into the matter they deemed the scheme feasible and promised it would have the support of the Government. When the election took place, we had the unseemly spectacle of a Senator resigning his seat in the Senate and contesting Prince county, not upon the politics of the country, but simply upon the construction of that tunnel. It was then charged against this gentleman that he came there simply as the mouthpiece of Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper, and that if he did not secure his election he would be reappointed to the Senate, and that the whole thing was an insult to the people. That charge was stoutly denied. It was called an infamous slander, and the people were appealed to and asked whether they thought it was possible that a man occupying the high position of a Senator of this Dominion would condescend to be made a catspaw of the Government in this way. The charge that he would be reappointed to the Senate was repudiated on every hustings, and those who made the statement were charged with slander. In course of time, Mr. Howlan was defeated, and his defeat was no sooner recorded than he produced a new document appointing him to the Senate again. To show the connection the Government have with this gentleman, and how far they are responsible for his action, I may say that no sooner is he reappointed to the Senate again than he received a commission from the Government to travel across the Atlantic and give the benefit of his personal knowledge to Sir Douglas Fox, the engineer to whom the feasibility of this work was referred. The newly-appointed Senator—I think almost before he was sworn in—travelled across the Atlantic at the public expense, and gave Sir Douglas Fox the benefit of his experience, whatever that might have been. The Government certainly had my approval in their action before attempting to adopt Sir Douglas Fox's estimate, or put this country to the expenditure of from $11,000,000 to $20,000,000, as the different kinds of tunnels were variously estimated at; in determining that some practical facts should be ascertained before Senator Howlan's or Senator anybody else's opinion should be taken on the matter. They proposed that borings should be made across the Straits of Northumberland, so as to ascertain the nature of the soil where the tunnel was about to be built. That was all right, and now we have got to that stage of the history of the case where complaints are being made by my hon. friend (Mr. Perry), who moved for the papers. What are these complaints? With a large part of the complaints of Mr. Palmer, the engineer,

I take it that this House has nothing whatever to do, and I do not propose to take up the time in dealing with matters which are more strictly affairs between one business man and another. But there is just a point where I think the House has to do, and where my hon. friend the Minister of Finance also has to do. Mr. Palmer, the engineer, complains that he has been treated very badly. If the Government were altogether unaware that Senator Howlan was the real man in this matter, drawing the Government money, spending the Government money, as and when he pleased, purchasing all the supplies, hiring all the men, paying all the wages, doing all the work, announcing himself as the real contractor, and acting as the real contractor, and treating Mr. Palmer, the engineer, as a mere subordinate of his own; if the Government were altogether unaware of these facts, it is, to my mind, a rather extraordinary condition of affairs, because they had their own engineer upon the ground and knew what was going on, for I assume they must have been informed. Now, Sir, to the one or two matters that I think the public have an interest in, I propose to call the attention of the House, and to see wherein the Government, if at all, are to blame. The charges made by Mr. Palmer were these: That Senator Howlan made a bargain with him, induced him to enter into a contract for boring twenty-nine holes across the Straits of Northumberland, promised him that he (Howlan) would finance the matter, whatever that may mean—the Government were to pay the money, and I should imagine they did not want any financing about it at all—promised he would pay Palmer $1,200 a fee, and that he (Howlan) would have all the profits. Subsequently that agreement, Mr. Palmer says, was modified, so that Palmer was to have one-half the profits and Howlan the other half. It is only fair to say that Senator Howlan denies that absolutely. I do not know whether we have anything to do with that fact standing alone. Senator Howlan has as good a right to have his word accepted, in the absence of any document, as Mr. Palmer has. But what further? He was to receive, as I said before, according to Palmer's statement, all the profits, which was modified afterwards to one-half the profits. And then they went on, Howlan advancing some money and drawing money from the Government on a draft, as I understand it, made by Palmer on the Government. So far so good. Now, as the work went on Palmer says:

As the Senator would not see the matter in this light, being evidently bound to carry out his own ideas, he therefore would not allow me the money to spend (that refers to $4,000), but purchased everything himself, and engaged the workmen, not particularly for their merit alone. His hostility was based on my determination to carry out the work upon the usual practice of scientific routine. The Senator, on the other hand, desired to do it in a way that, from an engineering point of view, was extremely ridiculous and impracticable.

Now, here is the statement made, that a member of the Senate, who had been specially taken into the confidence of the Government from time to time in connection with this business, who had gone across the Atlantic as their representative, and had seen Sir Douglas Fox, who had been paid for that trip out of the public money, who had returned and had induced one of Sir Douglas Fox's engineers to tender for the work, was acting as financier, paying the workmen and disbursing all the money that was paid by the Government under the contract. What I say is that as soon as the Government found that Senator Howlan was doing that they should have interfered. If he were not Senator Howlan I would say that it was not the Government's business; the contractor had a right to employ any one he chose to do his business; but he had no right to make an agreement with a member of this House to share in the profits of that contract. No more had he a right to engage the services of a Senator.

Mr. FOSTER. Could he not engage you as a lawyer?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He might engage me as a lawyer. What have we to do with that? What I complain of is that Senator Howlan was, in the name of Mr. Palmer, carrying on a contract with the Government. This House has nothing to do with his paying a retaining fee for a lawyer or a doctor or anybody else. But Senator Howlan held himself out to the people of the Island as the man who was doing this work, and Mr. Palmer as being simply a subordinate of his. The gravamen of my charge is that this matter, instead of being a purely business matter, was reduced to a purely political matter, and that Senator Howlan was permitted, with the knowledge of the Government, to act in a way which, to say the least of it, ran very close to a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, and, if Mr. Palmer's statement be anything like true, was a direct violation of that Act. Upon that point I express no opinion, because it is only fair to say that Senator Howlan directly contradicts the statement that Mr. Palmer makes, and I suppose it cannot be determined which is right and which is wrong until a committee is appointed to take evidence and report. I am not going to adopt the statement of the one or the other, or to say that I believe Palmer as against Howlan, or Howlan as against Palmer; but we want to know what the charges were and how far the Government knew the facts, because therein lies the whole point. Mr. Palmer goes on to charge:

The work was delayed in every possible way, owing to the fact that Banker Howlan was not forthcoming with the money. The cash he had already used had been expended in carrying out his own erroneous experiments, and he would not allow me one cent to spend upon the work. I received $100 from the Senator on my own private account, but outside of this he entirely controlled the expenditure.

Now, I do not understand Mr. Howlan to call in question or deny any of Mr. Palmer's statements on this material point, the only one in which the public are interested, that Senator Howlan controlled all the expenditure, paid all the money, hired the men, bought and paid for the materials, and did what he liked in connection with the contract. The question was asked Mr. Palmer:

Did Senator Howlan at any time consult with you in respect to money transactions?

He answers:

Not exactly, but about the end of June he presented an account in a book which included the $500 he had advanced to me as banker upon my I O U, as well as money for his own travelling expenses and other items amounting to nearly $1,200, which I signed at his request, and which sum it was understood would be deducted from the amount of the contract. I may say, that it is for a detailed statement of this expenditure that I have asked Senator Howlan privately and through the press.

Now, the complaint in which the public are interested is this, that $4,000 or $5,000 of public money, which was paid on account of this contract, went through Senator Howlan's hands, and that Senator Howlan has refused to give him the items of that money. Palmer charges that in that amount the Senator charged $500 for his own personal time. If these charges are true, they constitute a direct violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. I do not know whether the Government were aware of these charges or not. The papers containing them were sent to the Finance Department, and the attention of the department must have been called to them because they were in all the press of the Maritime provinces. Now, it is also fair to say that Mr. Howlan in his report, so far as I remember it, in reply to this charge, said that he had expended all the money for the public works alone, and denied having appropriated any part of the money for his own expenses. I understand also that he was willing to leave the matter of his dispute with Mr. Palmer to arbitration. With all these disputes between Palmer and Howlan, or as to whether Howlan properly or economically expended the money, I take it the public have nothing to do, but we have to do with the question whether a Senator was allowed to act as a contractor, or as a financier, to control the expenditure of public money under a contract, to hire the men, to buy the material and pay for it; and when the nominal contractor charges that he got $4,000 of public money, for $1,200 of which he refuses to account, the Government have a right to insist on his giving an itemized account of the expenditure. With all the other disputes we have nothing to do; I brush them all to one side. If the Senator satisfies the public that he never made a charge for his time or his services, he will have discounted Palmer's charges against him so far. As to that we have not the material on which to form a judgment. All that the public know is that although Palmer was the nominal contractor with the Government, Howlan was the only and the real contractor, that he handled the public funds under the contract and spent the money as he pleased. Then we have the charge made by the nominal contractor that Senator Howlan refused to account for $1,200 of the money that had been expended, and the further charge that a part of that money was appropriated by Mr. Howlan for his own services. Mr. Howlan simply denies the statement, saying that it is absolutely false. But the public want to know what the items of the $1,200 account consist of, and they have a right to know. This is public money. Senator Howlan is a public man, he is charged with doing that which, if true, would forfeit his seat, and he cannot expect to get off with a mere denial. I do not think that the Government are justified in remaining quiet either. They have a right to say to Mr. Howlan: Since you are charged with spending this money for your own services, you must give an itemized account which will justify the expenditure. I understand that some seven borings have been made, and that some $4,000 to $5,000 have been spent in making these seven holes, and that the balance of the $12,000 has not been paid. I presume the hon. gentleman has not paid it, because the work has not been done, and I suppose he has paid what his engineer has represented to be a fair estimate of what was done. Of that I make no complaint, but I do think the hon. gentleman has been negligent, after this charge was made in the public press against a gentleman who was allowed, for political purposes, to appear down there, on behalf of the Government, in order to impress people with the idea that they were to look to him for employment and everything in connection with that business. This having been done in order to carry that county, the Government are to blame for not having cleared their skirts in the matter more than by a bald denial. These are the only matters in which I think the public are interested and for which the Government are, to some extent, censurable.

Mr. FOSTER. I have nothing to complain of with respect to the manner in which my hon. friend who has just taken his seat has treated the question. I think he has treated it eminently fairly. The hon. gentleman who spoke first has, from his point of view, done what he thought was right as well; but I think the main part of his matter is, as my hon. friend who has just spoken has said, something with which this House has nothing to do. It appears that there is a misunderstanding between two gentlemen outside of this House entirely. One alleges one thing and another alleges another; and we in this House, I do not think, so far as that is concerned, are called upon to listen to the complaints of either or to arbitrate between them. These gentlemen have had private business, and if one of them feels aggrieved, he has the remedy the law gives. If they do not choose to take those remedies, they must take the result of what opinions people will form with reference to the matter. It will probably be most satisfactory to my hon. friend and the House if I state briefly what took place. I may correct my hon. friend in two things. This is the first time I have heard that Senator Howlan was sent, as an ambassador or envoy of the Government, to London to see the celebrated engineer, Sir Douglas Fox, with reference to the Prince Edward Island tunnel or subway. I do know that he was sent there for quite another purpose, and I do happen to know that when there he took the opportunity of seeing Sir Douglas Fox; but he was not sent by the Government for that purpose in any way, nor was he paid a single dollar of public money for that purpose. This is the first time I have heard the idea advanced, and my hon. friend is entirely wrong. Then, again, my hon. friend, in order to show that Senator Howlan, in this matter, must have been acting with the approval and in the confidence of the Government, made the assertion that the Senator was a trusted and confidential friend or agent of the Government in the matter of this tunnel. Now, there was nothing of that. It did happen that Senator Howlan, who was then a Senator, resigned his seat, and went down to Prince Edward Island, and took a very active part in an election there. Why did he do that? With a quiet seat in the Upper House, with an arduous contest ahead of him—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And an appointment in reversion.

Mr. FOSTER,—would it not have been very much easier for Mr. Howlan to remain here in Ottawa and attend to his senatorial duties when the time came, and receive his pay, and have an easy time, rather than go down to the rough climate of Prince Edward Island, in an inclement season of the year, and conduct a very vigorous and hard campaign? Why did he do it? He certainly made nothing out of it. He certainly must have been out of pocket by the transaction. I have my own opinion as to why he did it. He did it, I think, because of his very great interest in the tunnel. He has always had an interest in that, as my hon. friend knows, and a real interest, and I think he showed it in sacrificing his position and going down to fight a battle in its behalf. My hon. friend concluded, and, I think, almost stated, that Senator Howlan had the reversion of a senatorship in his pocket. That is not at all true. He had no promise of reappointment. He took his senatorial life in his hands, he went down into the battle, and was, I am sorry to say, unsuccessful. After that battle was over, and the smoke had cleared away, in looking around for a gentleman to fill the vacant place, it did happen that Senator Howlan's name was thought of, and he was reappointed. It was a new appointment, but to say that there was a reversion of it, and that he held that reversion, is to go quite beyond the record. Outside of that, I think I have plainly shown that there was no confidential relations between the Government and Senator Howlan with reference to the subway. Now, after Sir Douglas Fox's estimate as to the cost, it became apparent that no fair estimate of the cost could be given until the stratification of the bed of the straits was shown, and the Government promised to have borings made in order to find out the stratification, so that that being ascertained, it would be possible for the engineer to make a comparatively near estimate of the cost. Well, when that came to be decided, a sum of about $12,000 was put in the Estimates in order to carry out these borings. Then came the question as to how these shall be done. Now, one complaint my hon. friend might have, was that tenders were not called for publicly, and a contract let. So far as that is concerned, I consulted our Government engineer, Mr. Schreiber, and, after going over the matter, we found that that would be almost impossible.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I made no complaint about that.

Mr. FOSTER. No; but I said that might be made a subject of complaint, and for fear it should, I state how we came to do as we did. At the same time, there was here, Mr. Palmer, who had a reputation as an engineer, who had been engaged by Sir Douglas Fox himself in various works, in one capacity or another. He had something to do with the straits, and knew the country, and was interested in the tunnel, and he offered to do this work for $12,000. I did not take his offer at first. I referred it entirely to Mr. Schreiber, and asked him to report as to whether he thought that was a reasonable sum, and whether we had better accept Mr. Palmer's undertaking to do the work. The Government engineer reported upon the matter, and gave it as his opinion that it was a very reasonable sum, if it could be done at that. An element of uncertainty in the whole thing was how the boring could be carried out, as to whether an apparatus could be arranged by which the boring could be successfully done, taking into account the season of the year, the stormy weather and all that. And so it happened that, on the advice of the chief engineer, I gave the contract to Mr. Palmer. He was to bore twenty-nine holes of certain dimensions and certain depths, and certain other things were to be done. On the other hand, there was to be an officer of the Government there, as a sort of supervisor, to keep track of the work and to keep the Government informed and Mr. Bain, a local geologist, was to go there and watch the cores, as they came up, and form his opinions and write a report afterwards as to the geological formation. This happened in May, I think. The vote was put into the Estimates and voted, but the money was not available until 1st July of that year. Now, the season there, as my hon. friend knows, is a very short one and a very uncertain one, and, in order to do the work within the season—because his contract bound him to finish it by 1st October—it was necessary that Mr. Palmer should get at the work before 1st July. He came to see me, and asked me if I could advance money. I said: I cannot advance money until 1st July; you will have to do as you please as to that; on 1st July you will be paid according to progress estimates, and thereafter on the same plan. If you cannot start until then, that is your own look out; you know your contract. You will be paid, but you cannot be paid until that time. What arrangement Mr. Palmer made, or was going to make, I know no more of than my hon. friend. All I know was, that he went to work, and that the borings progressed, to a certain extent. I went away shortly after that on my own holidays, and the whole charge of the matter was placed in the hands of Mr. Schreiber, as was right. I had nothing to do with it, after the contract was signed, but gave the whole into the hands of the chief Government engineer. About 1st July, I think, an order was brought to me, signed by Mr. Palmer, to pay Senator Howlan $5,000. I said to myself: I cannot pay that money until I know what work has been done. I telegraphed the engineer, and he made a report to the chief engineer. That report, as revised by the chief engineer, said, that up to that time work had been done which justified the payment of $4,000. I telegraphed the department to honour the order to the extent of $4,000. A little later, I was in the city of St. John, probably a little after the middle of July; I am not sure of the date. Then, for the first time, I learned that there was any difficulty between Mr. Palmer and Senator Howlan. As soon as I found what the difficulty was and saw the dissatisfaction which seemed to be breeding between them, when Senator Howlan made that fact known to me, I said to him: I shall pay no more on that order. I took the precaution to see that Mr. Palmer's receipts and certificates were for the whole of the $4,000 that was paid. I then said: That ends the matter, as far as you and I are concerned; now the money is released, it is after 1st July; now Mr. Palmer can carry on his own work. Then came the tug of war. Mr. Palmer still had no money. The work could not go on, unless the men were paid and the drills were paid and supplies were paid for, and it came then to be a point as to whether the Government should go a little further than the contract bound them to go, in order that Mr. Palmer might still have a chance to do his work. He came to me. I sent him to the chief engineer. He saw the chief engineer. I was in Ottawa at the time. Because of the Government's desire that the time should be utilized in the best of the season, I said: I will advance $2,000. I will place it in the bank in Charlottetown, and it will be paid out for material and labour, on the certificate of yourself and the Government engineer, that it has gone into the work.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This was subsequent to the payment of the $4,000?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. I put the $2,000 there in the bank, and Mr. Palmer worked on it until that was spent. That brought him up to about 1st October, and about that date the Government engineer reported that the weather was rough and unsuitable and that work could not be done to advantage. The time had elapsed within which the contract should have been finished, and I did not think it wise to continue the work longer. The chief engineer advised me strongly in that direction, and the work ceased. Now, that is all there is to it. Whatever difficulties, in the first place, Mr. Palmer may have had in financing his scheme, I know nothing of; I have nothing to do with. It might have been better, if I had said to Mr. Palmer: Before I let the contract, I want security that you will carry it out; but I did not think this necessary, because I proposed to pay him on progress estimates, and, therefore, the work could go on. Whatever difficulties took place in financing, it was not for me to know. Whatever difficulties took place between Mr. Palmer and any person financing for him, I knew nothing about and had nothing to do with. I acted in the payment as I told the House; I considered it my duty to do that. As to these little affairs that have come up, I think my hon. friend from Prince (Mr. Perry) did not take the right ground. He said: These are the charges against Senator Howlan, and I want him to prove himself guiltless. That is not British justice. The proper way, I think, would be to say: These are charges made by a gentleman of whom I know very little, though I know nothing against him; they are made against a Senator of whom I have known something and for whom I have respect as my colleague; I cannot believe these statements until they are proved. It is assertion against assertion, and I think it is something that we here have nothing to do with. I quite acknowledge the position taken by my hon. friend opposite me (Mr. Davies), that if the Government had authorized this and was cognizant of it, they might have something more to do with it in the way the hon. gentleman has stated. But we have not, and I think these little things should be settled between Mr. Palmer and Senator Howlan outside. If any hon. gentleman in this House or the other thinks that Senator Howlan has violated the law or the independence of Parliament, or made himself liable to the penalty, there is a way of bringing that up and having it tested. But I do not suppose any hon. gentleman thinks that. As to the stories that have been told, I do not want to say one word against Mr. Palmer. I have tried not to listen to anything he had to say against Senator Howlan; I have tried not to listen to anything the other side had to say against Mr. Palmer. I have tried to keep myself clear from that and I have tried to keep the department and the Government entirely clear of it. It is true that ten holes were bored where Sir Douglas Fox said he would like to have twenty-nine bored, and a large amount of the money, I do not know exactly how much, but I think about $6,000, has been spent. But the chief engineer, Mr. Schreiber, and the engineer on the work on behalf of the Government, have united in a report to me that they think that the boring of six or seven more holes in proper positions would give all the data that are necessary, and they say this can be done for the amount of money that is left. It is my intention to have the borings finished as the Government promised, with the money that has already been voted. I think that will be sufficient. I may say here that there are some few bills yet out of men who say they have put their labour into it, or supplied something that actually went into it. The Government are not liable, they did that for Mr. Palmer; but at the same time we must act fairly. When these bills are collected and given to the engineer to supervise, the payment, or a proportional payment, will be made for what actually went into the work, so far as the sum will allow.

Motion agreed to.

BREAKWATER AT RUSTICO.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved for:

Copies of all reports, correspondence or other documents, not already brought down, relating to the state of repair of the breakwater at Rustico, P.E.I.

He said: I make this motion in order that I may bring to the attention of the Minister of Public Works the condition in which that public work stands to-day. The Rustico breakwater is built at the mouth of Rustico Harbour, in Prince Edward Island. Rustico Harbour is situated in the bend of the Island, and is a large fishing place. It is one of the first and oldest settled places in Prince Edward Island, perhaps is the most thickly-settled place, as it is almost a village for many miles, and is peopled by French Acadians. It is the largest fishing harbour in Prince Edward Island, and is the only harbour of refuge on the north side of that Island. I want to point out to the hon. gentleman that this is not like an ordinary breakwater, at an ordinary place, for local purposes. In the autumn of the year, when large fishing fleets gather about Prince Edward Island, it is off the vicinity of Rustico that they very often congregate; and in case of a storm from the north-west or the north-east, they have to run to a harbour, and Rustico is the only harbour of refuge near that place for many miles. Unless, therefore, the fishing fleet can, in case of a storm, gain access to a harbour, the chances of loss of life are very great; and if they are caught in the bend of the Island, on the lee shore, it is sometimes impossible for them to beat off: they must run for a place of refuge or be destroyed. I am old enough to remember when a very large number of ships, some fifty or sixty, went ashore on that coast for want of a harbour of refuge, and many hundreds of lives were lost. A few years ago the Government built a breakwater there. The harbour at the bar was silted up, and the quantity of water over the bar was so small that vessels were unable to frequent the harbour that formerly used to frequent it. The Government, therefore, built this breakwater, and the consequence was to deepen the water on the bar some three or four feet, and make it quite a nice little harbour for small schooners. The breakwater, of course, is very much exposed to storms. It began to be destroyed at the end, a little more each year, and was continually repaired by the Government. Almost every year some little repairs had to be done upon it, and I think that three years ago they ceased to repair it. The end of the breakwater was washed away, and the consequence was that the bar of the harbour, which in the first instance had a depth of some three or four feet given to it from the construction of the breakwater, again silted up, and I believe there is now a depth of three or four feet less than there was a few years ago. Vessels that frequented it after the breakwater was built are now unable to do so with safety. Before I came up from Charlottetown I wrote to one or two of the leading people in that place, asking them about the condition of the work as it is to-day, and in order that I may lay it before the hon. gentleman I will read a letter I received in reply to my own. I want to urge upon him that it is not simply a local work, and it ought to be treated in a different manner from works which are purely local, because it is not for the fishing boats and the fishing vessels of Rustico alone; but it is for the fishing fleet of the whole Maritime provinces that congregate off that harbour as a harbour of refuge. The letter which I received from Mr. James Laird, a large miller, ship-owner and ship-builder, residing in the vicinity, in reply to mine, was as follows:—

Yours of the 22nd ult. came to hand in due time, but I did not reply sooner because I wanted to gather all the information I could on the matter. In the first place, there have been repairs put in on the end of the breakwater, less or more every year for the last ten years with the exception of last year. The end of the breakwater would undermine with the heavy current around the end, it being built on the sand, and the piles not being driven to the solid, would undermine and hang by the bolts fastening at the top. It has been wearing away at the rate of from ten to twenty feet a year for the last ten years, until nearly 150 feet of it has gone, leaving in that space a mass of rubbish nearly dry at low water, and very dangerous for boats after dark. Now, in my opinion, if all the money that has been expended on it for the last ten years, had been laid out at first in good, long iron pointed piles driven through the sand to the solid earth or rock below, and at least the outer end kept filled with hard imported stone (as our Island stone won't stand the action of frost in the winter and salt water and storms in the summer) it might have stood pretty well until the present time. The breakwater improved the harbour from four to five feet, and now there is about one and a half feet less than there was at the time water was at the best. As regards the amount that it would take to put it in good repair, I do not feel myself competent to decide. * * * That is a matter, of course, that the engineer will report upon.

I spoke to the local member for the county, a very good Conservative, I may say, Mr. McDonald McKay, and he wrote me the following:—

OYSTER BED BRIDGE, P.E.I., Feb. 7, 1893.

L. H. DAVIES, Esq., M.P.

DEAR SIR.—I would bring to your notice, now that you are going through the Estimates for the current year, the state of the Rustico breakwater. This is a very important work which cost the Dominion Government over $18,000 for construction. I think it was in the year '80 or '81 that this work was constructed. Previous to that time the harbour was very poor, it being very difficult for vessels having a draft of over 8 ft. water to do any trade with the place, there being only 8 ft. water on bar at high water. Since the completion of that work there has been an average of 12 ft. water on bar, allowing vessels of 11 or 12 ft. draft to trade freely, until two years ago a heavy storm carried away some 50 or 70 ft. of work; since which time the harbour has been growing continuously worse until last season, when there was only 7 to 8 ft. water on bar. In August of last year a schooner drawing only 8 ft. 3 in. water, loaded with coal, got stranded on bar in trying to enter harbour, and has been a wreck since. The work at present is in a wretchedly bad condition; the outer end that now remains of the work is all open to the sea, and lifts and works with every heavy storm, and the sea wall of the work is stripped of the plank covering for a distance of 150 ft., and the sea makes a breach through the work for this distance, removing ballast and tearing up the work. There has not been one dollar voted for last two sessions to keep it in repair. If there is not some sufficient amount placed in the Estimates this year and authorized to be expended early next season, I am afraid the whole work will be carried away next autumn and fall storms. The months of June, July and August are the proper months to proceed with the works, in fact the only months that any expenditure can be placed on this work to advantage. I need not remind you of the great importance of maintaining and adding to this work, so that the people of Rustico may have a good shipping harbour. As you are aware, Rustico is some ten miles from our Island railroad, and therefore can derive little or no advantage from it in the transfer of produce to markets or of the importation of coal or lumber, which are now very extensively brought in and sold to farmers of Rustico, nine-tenths of them now being obliged to have coal brought here for fuel, and all the lumber for building and fencing purposes having to be brought here from New Brunswick and neighbouring provinces. Besides, Rustico has the second, if not the largest, fishing industries situate on the Island, employing some 50 or 60 large boats, and giving employment to some 300 men for five months of every year. There are eight schooners of different sizes owned and trading out of Rustico, with as many more which trade with Rustico each season.

Yours very truly,

DONALD McKAY.

Hon. gentlemen will see from the letters I have read the very great importance of the work, not only from a local stand-point, but from a provincial one, and even from an interprovincial one, because the fishing fleet of Nova Scotia is almost as much interested in this harbour as is the fishing fleet of the Island. There are a large number of boats, employing from 300 to 400 men, and it is absolutely essential to the existence of hundreds of families residing in the vicinity of this harbour that this breakwater should be placed in an efficient condition at an early date. I hope the hon. Minister will observe that the work can only be done during the months of June, July and August, in the opinion of Mr. McKay, who has lived there for many years, and who distinctly states that unless these repairs are executed at an early date the present work, which cost $18,000 or $19,000, will be carried out to sea. I hope the Government will not allow the coming season to pass without placing this work in good condition, so that the fishermen and seamen who have frequented the harbour in the past will be able to enter with vessels drawing from ten to twelve feet, as they have been accustomed to do for many years. This harbour will also afford an excellent harbour of refuge for the fishing fleet, and hundreds and thousands of sailors and fishermen will bless the Government that has provided that harbour on that which, at certain seasons of the year, is a dangerous coast.

Mr. OUMET. I find there is in the department correspondence from Messrs. Welsh, D. McKay, Blake, McLeod and Hon. D. Ferguson, who exchanged letters with the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and that correspondence has been referred to my department. This work has not escaped the attention of the department. I have had the work surveyed by the local engineer, and a report from the chief engineer is now in the department, stating that it is desirable to construct an "L" 60 by 30 feet, at the outer end of the breakwater, which would cost $1,500. The repairs to the rest of the breakwater would cost $1,000. This expenditure would place the breakwater in good order, and make it useful to the fishermen as well as to shippers who frequent that port. The department will certainly make the repairs if the amount placed at its disposal is sufficient for the purpose. The correspondence will be brought down at once.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I trust the hon. gentleman may be able to look at the letters I have read, when published, and, if possible, submit to his engineer the propriety of adopting the suggestion made by one of those gentlemen, namely, that the piles should be iron-pointed and driven down into the rock. Otherwise the same result will follow as has occurred in the past, and the sand will be washed away and the structure will float.

Motion agreed to.

NICKEL COINAGE.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York) moved :

That it is expedient, with the end in view of encouraging native products, to adopt a nickel coinage in place of the present copper coinage.

He said : Mr. Speaker, during the few moments which I have to address the House, I shall bring before the attention of the Government and of hon. gentlemen a very important question. Within the last few years we have discovered in this country a very important and valuable metal known as nickel. In Canada we have the largest known supply in the world of that metal, and the only other country which produces it is the French colony of New Caledonia. I am glad to say that the uses to which nickel is being adapted are steadily increasing, and as we have an immense supply of it in this country, I think it is our duty to further its use in every way which we possibly can. My motion now suggests that, for a subsidiary coinage, we should use nickel instead of copper. It has great advantages over the latter metal, it has about the same specific gravity, has a better colour, is odourless, and is non-corrosive. In the Report of the Geological Survey, a year ago, there is a full description of our nickel supplies given by Mr. Barlow, an officer of the Geological Department, and I would commend that report to the perusal of any one interested in the question. I may mention that among the many other uses of nickel, it is valuable as an agent for hardening iron, to be used in making steel plates for armoured vessels, and is now largely employed in the manufacture of cooking utensils. I am informed that, this year, there will be from five to ten million dollars worth of nickel taken out of this country and sent to all parts of the world. It is obvious that nickel will make a much better metal for coinage than copper, for the reason that it has a better colour, that it has no disagreeable odour, and that it has already been successfully adopted by many countries in different parts of the world. I have in my possession specimens of nickel coins now, used in a great many European countries, and the experience is that they are much better than copper coins. Nickel is already used in the United States, as a subsidiary coinage, the average issue there exceeding $1,000,000 a year. Among the other countries in which nickel is used for coins. I may mention Salvador, San Domingo, Switzerland, Egypt, Servia, Bulgaria and Jamaica, which spent £500 sterling in 1889 for nickel coinage. Germany issued a small nickel coinage in 1889, and there is a proposition now before the Chambers of France to adopt a pure nickel coinage. The alloy at present used for nickel coinage is made up of 75 per cent of copper and 25 per cent of nickel, but I think we ought to show that we believe in our own products and our own metals and that we should issue a coinage in Canada made out of pure nickel. This metal can be bought as cheaply as 25 cents a pound, and in that way, the issue will far more than pay for itself. I believe that if Canada shows the example of issuing a nickel coinage, it will have a good effect on other countries in the world toward introducing this metal, and, in this way, we would find an enormously increased demand for our nickel supply. Although the quantity used in Canada would not be great, still the other countries of the world use an enormous quantity, and perhaps our example might strengthen us in inducing the mother country to also adopt nickel coinage. It is for this reason that I ask the Minister of Finance to consider the question, and to see if he cannot, by next session of Parliament, bring down some measure in this direction which will give us the use of one of our own metals for our subsidiary coinage.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of attention to my hon. friend's advocacy of a new coinage. I do not know if the amount of the raw material we would use in this country would cause a great demand for our nickel supplies. But I think with him that the coinage itself would be a cleaner and better coinage than copper. It would not be quite so profitable to the country; but if it helped the nickel deposits and gave us better money, we might forego the profits. It would probably then be found that no one in the country would be reduced so low as not to have a nickel in his pocket.

Motion agreed to.

BRIDGE AT ST. MICHEL D'YAMASKA.

Mr. BRUNEAU (Translation) moved for :

Copies of all documents, memorials and correspondence between the Government and the Sorel Board of Trade and others, in relation to the granting of a subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, for the rebuilding of a bridge at St. Michel d'Yamaska.

He said : In placing this motion in your hands, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the subject. The bridge on the river Yamaska having been carried away by the ice, the town of Sorel and the neighbouring region thereby found themselves last fall without any means of communication. In 1870, debentures were issued at Sorel in favour of the Richelieu, Drummond and Arthabaska Counties Railway Company to the amount of $40,000, on the understanding that the trains were to be kept running over the line between Sorel and Yamaska. Later on, the obligations of the Richelieu, Drummond and Arthabaska Counties Railway Company were handed over to the South Eastern Railway Company, upon the express condition that full satisfaction should be given to the town of Sorel and to the neighbouring parishes; it being agreed upon that the trains should be kept running over the line as usual. The South Eastern Railway Company have become insolvent; trustees have been appointed and arrangements made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company so as to secure the regular running of the trains. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company state that they are creditors to the amount of nearly two millions of dollars, and further that they are unable, under the present circumstances, to build the bridge on the river Yamaska. On the 1st October last, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company having stopped running the trains over the line, we were left at Sorel without any communication southward and eastward. I have repeatedly called the attention of the Government to the matter, as will be shown by the papers submitted. A delegation from Sorel is coming up to-morrow, accompanied by the bishops of St. Hyacinthe and Nicolet. Our petition is before the Governor-General in Council, and I do not see on what ground, in a pressing emergency like this, the Government could deny our request. It is said that no railway subsidies will be granted this year. Ours is quite a special case and I call the attention of the Government to the urgency of our demand; judging from the past, I entertain no doubt as to our securing from the Government before the next session, some aid towards the rebuilding of this bridge.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Documents, memorials, plans and reports of surveyors, and correspondence in relation to the dredging of Baie La Vallière.—(Mr. Bruneau.)

Correspondence, tenders, engineers' reports and estimates, as well as all other documents in the possession of the Government, relating to the construction of the lock or locks at Little Rapid on the Du Lièvre River, County of Ottawa; also all correspondence in the possession of the Government referring to the payment of the extras to the contractors, including all reports with regard to the right of the contractor or contractors to bring a suit against the Government in the Exchequer Court for the recovery of extras claimed.—(Mr. Devlin.)

Correspondence, documents and petitions relating to the following subjects:—Improved mail service to and from Perkins' Mills, Stagburn, Venosta, Lascelles; the establishment of post offices in the township of Eardley and Hull; better mail service between Montreal and Ottawa and intermediate points.—(Mr. Devlin.)

Return showing the number of employees dismissed from the Prince Edward Island Railroad since the 1st day of March, 1892, the name of each employee dismissed, the date of each dismissal, the reasons for such dismissals; also the names of employees reinstated, if any.—(Mr. Perry.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Minister of Justice and the Hon. J. G. Bossé, Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, in relation to the trial and condemnation of R. H. McGreevy and O. E. Murphy, charged with a conspiracy to defraud; of all recommendations and of all reports made by the said Murphy and McGreevy and to a commutation of the sentence of R. H. McGreevy; of the order for the commutation of the sentence of R. H. McGreevy, and of any petitions, letters, &c., in relation thereto.—(Mr. Tarte.)

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 2) to disfranchise electors who have taken bribes.—(Mr. Weldon.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. JEANNOTTE. When this Bill was last before the House, I spoke in French, and the English press stated that I had declared here that I owed my election to corrupt practices. I never said anything of the kind. I certainly would not have been such a fool as to buy votes when I was elected by acclamation. There was an English newspaper from Toronto which went further, and described me as a representative Frenchman of Canada and of France, and then went on to say that the French people in France are the most corrupt people in the whole of Europe. If the editor of that Toronto paper had visited London, he would have seen sufficient there to make him do penance for the rest of his life for the sins of his countrymen. If those editors who take this view had read the English newspapers, they would have seen that some months ago that a certain number of ladies had published a letter in the press declaring that women of the first society in London were not at all what they ought to be. And some years ago, some titled people had a club in London, of which no one would dare to give the name, and some of the members of that club were obliged to leave London and remain abroad for one year at least. I do not wish to accuse anybody, but he who accuses first his neighbour must be very clean if something is not found that cannot be said against himself. I said that the only way to prevent corruption in elections was to stop canvassing from door to door, either by the candidate or his agent. That is now done in every election, and I have done it myself, and it is that canvassing from door to door which I said that I did, but I never said that I bought votes. Why should I buy votes when I was returned by acclamation?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I approve of the principle of this Bill: the object aimed at by the promoters of the Bill, the prevention of bribery at elections, is undoubtedly one which commends itself to the approval of this House; but, although there seems to be a consensus of intelligent opinion as to the principle involved in this Bill, still we differ considerably as to the means of reaching the end in view. I am strongly in favour of any measure tending to the promotion of electoral purity. Speaking, however, from experience, I am not prepared to say that bribery prevails as extensively in the province of Quebec as it does in Ontario. This is easily accounted for, Mr. Chairman, from the fact that, with our lack of capital in Quebec, candidates who take the field cannot afford to expend large sums of money. We all know the instance of that Ontario candidate, within a short distance of Ottawa, who found it convenient to lock up a few years ago, fifty thousand dollars. A candidate who is wealthy enough to throw away such a large sum of money in buying votes, will find it an easy task to break your law and corrupt the electors in canvassing for votes. In the province of Quebec, we are too poor to lock up such large sums with us. Candidates or citizens aspiring to become so, are seldom found willing to expend, not fifty thousand, but say, ten thousand dollars; why, Sir, the expenditure of five hundred dollars would sometimes cause serious financial annoyance. However well grounded may be the cause of alarm about the prevalency of bribery at elections through the Maritime and English provinces generally, thanks be to God, the evil has not yet deeply taken root in our French province. Although no one can dispute but that the principle of this Bill is a thorough good one, still I question very much whether it will have any practical effect, were it to become law. An election once over, as there always happens to be a successful candidate, and an unsuccessful one, proceedings will be forthwith taken by the friends of the former against the latter. A petition will be presented with a view to have the election voided; and after the petition is served in due form, and the preliminary examination of parties gone through, there will be a delay of six months running from the end of the session—which delay parties may avail themselves of—to have a petition signed by twenty-five or more electors, asking that an investigation be made as to whether bribery has prevailed at such election. It is no difficult task to conjecture the result. But, I may first ask, Mr. Chairman, who is going to pay the cost of this inquiry. Who is going to pay the travelling expenses and the remuneration of commissioners? Is it the Government, or the accused parties, or the candidate whose election is under trial? The Bill is silent on the matter. Let us for one moment suppose that the commissioners, after indulging, through the different parishes of the constituency in parades involving considerable costs to be paid, I presume, by certain parties, may succeed in unearthing two or three corrupt practices committed at the election, what hence? The Bill only provides that the commissioners may declare that the electors guilty of such corrupt practices shall be disfranchised for seven years. And please remark, Mr. Chairman, the Bill contains no provision as to hearing the accused parties in defence of the acts which incriminate them, or to show their falsity. No, Sir, not the least mention is made of it. I say this is a false principle according to English law. As we are all aware of, the Court of Appeal and subsequently the Supreme Court of Canada have given judgment to the effect that no elector is to be disfranchised except for acts of personal bribery and unless he has been put on his trial by direct action. Contrary to this decision, the commissioners may under this Bill, on the evidence given by "ex parte" witnesses, declare that the accused are disqualified. With reference to the judgments above alluded to, I may relate what took place in connection with the trial of a controverted election held in the county of Laprairie. The president of the court had deemed it his right to disqualify an elector on the single evidence that he had received one dollar from another elector, apparently as a bribe. An appeal was taken from this decision to the Court of Appeal; the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, no doubt, recollects the fact, as he was one of the counsels. By the unanimous finding of the five judges composing the Court of Appeal, the judgment of the inferior court was reversed and the decision of the Court of Appeal confirmed by the Supreme Court, was to the effect that no elector can be disfranchised unless a direct action be brought against him. Under this Bill, no direct action need be brought against the indicted parties; the commissioners may take the course they please; and whenever they choose, may hear or not witnesses, according to their caprice. Assuming for a moment I am accused before the commissioners; I have no right to attend the proceedings. The power of the commissioners is altogether discretionary. It is quite immaterial whether the commissioners be judges or not. The purity of elections at which the Bill aims, the checking of bribery at elections, is a principle I approve of; it is the means proposed I disapprove as self-destructive and worthless. Unless a direct action be brought against the culprit, the sentences of the commissioners cannot be put in execution, nor can the former be disfranchised. The impression will, no doubt, go abroad again, through the English press, that I advocate bribery at elections. No, Mr. Chairman, I am strongly opposed to corrupt practices and bribery at elections. I venture to hope there is no man, either in this House or outside of it, who does not sincerely wish to see bribery at elections stamped out. True, bribery does not extensively prevail in the province of Quebec; and whether evidence of any corrupt practices has been found before the courts, is more than I could say. Out of so many trials of controverted elections following up each general election, very little has been elicited. The same fate awaits, quite likely, the trials recently entered in court. No more will be heard of them. Mr. Speaker, in the province of Quebec, we have witnessed the case where, though some over-zealous friend spending a dollar bill in corrupt practices, an election has been voided and the candidate unseated, which does not go to prove that bribery prevails to any great extent in our midst. This Bill provides that, on a petition being signed by twenty-five electors, an inquiry shall be held in a county, in view of discovering whether bribery has prevailed to any extent. I entertain no doubt as to whether twenty-five electors may be found to sign such a petition, but as to whether there may be found twenty-five responsible electors; the Bill does not enlighten us on the matter, nor does it offer any security to that effect, as it provides only that such petition shall be signed by twenty-five or more electors, and nothing else.

Mr. AMYOT. The Bill provides also that the twenty-five electors shall deposit the sum of one hundred dollars.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I am aware of it; but it is also required to make a deposit of $1,000 to enter a controverted election petition, and, the suggestion is offered to raise the costs to $1,500, with the view to do away with vexatious trials. Now, this Bill tends to aggravate the existing state of affairs, as it creates a new machinery and only provides for a deposit of one hundred dollars. But to what end is this deposit made? It is not contended, forsooth, that it will serve to defray the costs of the trial, as the commissioners have full power to summon such and as many witnesses as they please, thereby involving heavy costs.

These witnesses will have to be paid and therefore taxed. Again, on whom are the costs to be saddled? On the Government, I presume, the Bill being quite silent on the matter. The Bill is also reticent as to whether the accused parties may be summoned to appear before the commissioners to prove that they are not guilty of the charges brought against them. As every one knows, such acts as seem to infringe on the law may be quite the reverse. From the fact that a man gives money to another, it does not follow that he intends to bribe him. Where acts of benevolence are intended, one should not without reasons, impute corrupt motives. Charity is of season, even during an electoral campaign. This Bill, to my mind, such as drafted, will be tyrannical in its operation over honest electors, as twenty-five voters will suffice to cause inquests to be held throughout the different parishes of a constituency; quite an easy task, with the number of grumblers to be found in each county, when an election is over. The Montreal "Star" in its issue of the 6th March, dealing with the law-amending mania so prevalent nowadays, says:

They are doing altogether too much law-making at Ottawa these days. There seems to be an impression among the leading men in Parliament that, if they can only get laws enough passed, this community will run itself without exercising will or conscience or common sense.

This year they are gone into the "thumb-screw and rack" line of business and are rapidly pushing through a revolutionary Bill that will compel a prisoner to incriminate himself, and, worse still, will compel a wife to incriminate her husband or a husband to incriminate his wife.

Hitherto British law has refused to stoop to this infamous torture of the most sacred affections among mankind, even for the purpose of dragging forth the truth; and how often will even this turning of the rack fail to exact the truth when a perjury will shield a loved life.

Should this Bill become law, the accused parties, on appearing before the commissioners, would be bound to say: "I have bribed to the extent of one dollar—disfranchise me or send me to jail. The remarks of the "Star" relate to criminal law. The same journal goes still further:

This was the amendment to the old law lately passed, being simply an extension of the British principle of giving the prisoner the benefit of every doubt. But to make the person a "compellable witness" is a total reversal of British practice and precedent. Nay, it is an attempt to repeal a law of nature.

Nor is there any defence of the iniquitous bill to be found in the plea that it may sometimes aid in reaching the truth. They get at the truth out West occasionally by partially hanging a man. To learn the truth was the excuse for long centuries of examination by torture. It is not sufficient to show that a method of inquiry may elicit the facts. It is also necessary that the method itself does not infringe the liberties and national rights of man.

This Bill is a kind of lynch-law, whereby an elector who allows himself to be bribed at an election is disfranchised, on his own evidence. I believe this Bill also violates a principle of English law, inasmuch as a man may be compelled to answer questions tending to criminate him and involving certain consequences, as fines and disfranchisement for seven years. Does any one believe that this Bill is going to put a stop to bribery, as practised in the province of Ontario, for instance? Not in the least, Mr. Speaker. Bribery will prevail in spite of this Bill. In England, if I am correctly informed, the Controverted Election Act has been amended, with the result that out of six hundred and some elections, which have been held since the last appeal to the people, hardly thirteen have been contested. And who will dare say, Mr. Speaker, that bribery is unknown in England? Who does not know that those great advocates of electoral purity, the English lords, spend to the tune of 30,000 pounds sterling at one single election? Were the law to be altered so as to enact that canvassing from door to door, either by the candidate himself or through his agents, shall be in the future strictly prohibited and deemed an offence sufficient to void an election, I would favour such an amendment, for, as previously said, when this Bill came up before the House, I see no other way of insuring electoral purity and putting down bribery, the growing evil of this day. But, no doubt, such a drastic amendment to the franchise law could hardly suit these gentlemen from the English provinces who would find it impossible, under such stringent provisions, to resort to bribery and corrupt practices, and therefore they feel reluctant to accede to this suggestion. It is not in public meetings that bribery is practised, the time being so well taken up with the speeches; but in committees corrupt practices are sometimes, though seldom, resorted to. In conclusion, although I approve of the principle of this Bill—I emphatically assert it again, to prevent any misapprehension—still, I object to the wording of it as defective; and as to its practical operation, it will prove powerless in checking bribery. I contend that the decision of the commissioners will not be put in execution, for so soon as they will apply the law, their finding will be set aside by the courts of justice.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose, Sir, that the principle of this Bill has already been adopted by its second reading, and we have now simply to consider its provisions, and to see how far the Bill carries out the object the hon. gentleman aims at. The Bill says, speaking of the petition, "signed by twenty-five or more electors of such district," then further down, in lines 8 and 9, "signed by the petitioners, stating that they are such electors." This might mean that they are "such electors" as have committed the bribery, or "such electors" as have signed the petition. If the hon. gentleman will take out the word "such," and add after "electors." "of the said electoral district," no room will be left for doubt as to the intention. Then, in lines 10 and 11, "the Governor-General shall appoint one or more persons," and so on. It would be well to state the persons who are to be appointed. They are described here: "such persons being judges of the Superior Court of the province." I suppose that the principal court of the hon. gentleman's province is called the Superior Court. It is not so with us, and perhaps would be better if we were to designate the court as the election court. Then the court that would have the right to try election petitions in every province would be the court from whom these persons should be chosen. I think if these changes were made, there would be less ambiguity in the section, and that it would, perhaps, better fulfil the object that the promoter of the Bill has in view.

Mr. WELDON. I think these are very good suggestions, especially the last, to substitute "judges trying election petitions" for the reason given. I think it is a more accurate expression. The others are verbal changes which it would be well to make.

Mr. TISDALE. In Ontario, I think, there are no judges designated who are to try the elections. They are appointed and selected, if my memory serves me aright, by some of the judges themselves. I think the idea is a good one, but let us not be indefinite in expressing it. It seems to me, any Superior Court judge of Ontario may be one of the election judges, but this does not designate which it shall be.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will look at the Controverted Elections Act he will see that a court is established for the trial of election petitions. That was held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It consists of judges taken from the Supreme Court of the province, which consists, as the hon. gentleman knows, of two divisions, the High Court of Justice and the Court of Appeals. The reason I suggested a change was that I do not know that this expression "Superior Court" would cover any class of courts in the province of Ontario. But if you designate a court by some Dominion name, and you have a Dominion election court provided, it would include those judges of the higher court that have the right to try election petitions under the Controverted Elections Act.

Mr. WELDON. I had in mind the language of the British North America Act, where the terms used are "Supreme District and County Courts." I meant a judge higher than a district or county court judge, but I think the hon. gentleman's suggestion is a good one.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Does not the election law cover all such cases? Sec. 1, chap. 8, 53 Vic., intituled: An Act to further amend the Revised Statutes, chap. 5, respecting the Electoral Franchise, says:
Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

2. No person found guilty of any corrupt practice under the provisions of 'The Dominion Elections Act' shall, during the seven years next after the time at which he is so found guilty, be entitled to be registered on any list of voters, subject, however, to the removal of such disqualification under the provisions of section ninety-one of the said Act.

Now what is meant by corrupt practices? Chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, respecting elections of members of the House of Commons says in terms:

The following persons are guilty of bribery, and shall be punishable accordingly:—

(a.) Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, gives, lends or agrees to give or lend, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, or promises to procure, or to endeavour to procure, any money or valuable consideration to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any person in order to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting, or corruptly does any such act on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election.

(b.) Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, gives or procures, or agrees to give or procure, or offers or promises any office, place or employment, or promises to procure or to endeavour to procure any office, place or employment, to or for any voter, or to or for any other person in order to induce such voter to vote, or refrain from voting, or corruptly does any such act as aforesaid on account of any voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election;

And every person so offending is guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall also forfeit the sum of two hundred dollars to any person who sues for the same, with costs.

I contend, therefore, that the electoral law, such as it stands, covers all the questions raised by the present Bill. In my opinion, it would be preferable to adopt the Bill (No. 90) of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey), which is now on the Orders of the Day. I think this Bill would meet with the approval of all the members of this House, and I think it will have the same effect as this. Besides, it is in accordance with the laws, and the Bill we are discussing now is against the law. I do not think there is any man who knows law who will say that a man can be disfranchised for seven years except by direct action. The Supreme Court, and the Appeal Court in Montreal, have both given judgment to this effect. The effect of the Bill I speak of will be the same as this, and it will probably be quicker in its action than the one now before the House.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman makes a suggestion that I withdraw the Bill. I would make a suggestion in return that he give the Bill his support, and then the English papers that have misunderstood him will no doubt do justice to his position.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. But your Bill is impracticable; there is no law to put it in force. I move that the committee rise.

Motion negatived.

Mr. AMYOT. I am certainly in favour of the principle of the Bill. Anything which tends to purify elections and prevent candidates from succeeding by means of money will receive my support. But in this instance I ask myself if the Bill is not rather incomplete. Would we not be acting a little hastily by passing it this session? First of all, there is no clause in the Bill by which the accused party shall be notified so that he may be present and make his defence.

Mr. WELDON. I have an amendment to propose, which I think will meet that.

Mr. AMYOT. Here are twenty-five electors who will deposit the sum of $100, $4 each. They will have no responsibility. They will make oath that to the best of their belief corruption has prevailed on a large scale. But we know that after an election, when the minds of the people are excited, it is very easy to find twenty-five men in a riding who will swear that to the best of their belief corruption has prevailed. But these men will have no responsibility whatever. Very often this $100 may be the balance not spent of a reptile fund. After they put up that money, the Government has to appoint a commission of one, two or three commissioners; then that commission goes to work and becomes nothing else but an inquisitorial commission. They go on a searching expedition; they visit each family; they may call every citizen of a parish, nay, even of a county. They may involve the Dominion in an expenditure ranging from $1,000 to $20,000, in making an inquisitorial investigation, based upon the quasi affidavits of twenty-five men without responsibility. Now, Mr. Chairman, the accused party will have to employ lawyers, and when this costly enquete is over, and those who have been accused have paid their lawyers, and lost there time in going here and there wherever the judges may hold their enquete, who will refund them for their expenses? Not only will that be an inquisitorial investigation, but it will be a tyrannical one, one which you will make without any guarantee to the accused party that the expenses incurred by him in self-defence will be reimbursed to him if he clears himself. The idea of the Bill may be good, but the plan should be more matured. Now, there is another consideration. You go to a poor man who is in need of money. Perhaps his family is suffering, and you give him a loaf of bread, or $1. The man who does this is a rich man, with his pocket-book full of money, and he goes and bribes the poor man with $1. This rich man goes free, but the poor man who has been bribed and seduced by money, owing to his poverty, is deprived of his rights for eight years. I think that is not correct. The briber should be punished as well as the party who is bribed. That is another feature of the Bill to which I object. Now, Mr. Chairman, should not these twenty-five petitioners be responsible for the costs? Should twenty-five men have the power, by a quasi affidavit—I call it that, because when we say that to the best of our belief corruption has prevailed, without giving details, it is only a quasi affidavit—should not these twenty-five men be responsible for their affidavits and for their petitions? Should they not guarantee to the Government that they are in good faith by becoming responsible for the costs or part of the costs? Now, there is no county in this Dominion, there is no place in the world where counties are organized, I may say, where you will not be able to find twenty-five men who will join together from motives or revenge, or some other unworthy motive, swear that there has been corruption, and you give power to these twenty-five men to involve the Dominion in heavy expense without holding them responsible. When you attack a candidate you attack only one man, but $1,000 are exacted from you as a guarantee for costs. You do not have to look after his estate, or after his property, to see if he is able to pay, but he has to make a deposit in the court of $1,000 as a guarantee for costs. But in this case you take any one who is on the list, rightly or wrongly, and you give him power to involve the Dominion in great expense, and you institute an inquisitorial investigation, you trouble families and saddle the accused party with heavy costs, and you do that without making the petitioners responsible in any way. Under these circumstances I can not approve of the Bill as it stands now. It needs to be so largely remodelled that I think the mover had better wait till next session, and then when he has prepared a new Bill, as he is very well able to do, we will give it our hearty support. Now, I must protest against some words which have fallen from the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte). That gentleman says that he is against corruption; but whenever a Bill to prevent corruption comes before this House he always votes against it. He has made the extraordinary statement that in the province of Quebec we are too poor to practice corruption. Such a piece of nonsense I never before heard in this House. In the province of Quebec we are not so poor as that. If you want to practice corruption in Quebec you can do it. There is corruption in our province in many places; it is no use to deny it; it is no use to say that Ontario is corrupt and that Quebec is not. There is corruption everywhere in Canada, and it is the duty of this Parliament to try and stop it. But when any measure is brought before this House with the purpose of preventing corruption, the hon. gentleman immediately jumps up from his seat and protests, and says that is not the way to stop corruption. Then let him suggest some way of his own of preventing corruption, when our attention is turned towards devising repressive laws. If we do not pass stringent laws against corruption we shall go on, as we have been doing, having many counties corrupted—

Mr. GEOFFRION. And misrepresented.

Mr. AMYOT—and the representation of Parliament will not be what it ought to be. I will close my remarks by asking the mover of this Bill to withdraw it and calmly consider it until next session, and then when he brings it back, in an acceptable form, we will give it our support.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Of course I cannot speak for the district of Quebec, with which I am not acquainted, but I am able to say that in the district of Montreal there is no corruption. We are not rich enough to throw our money away for nothing; we keep our money in our pockets and live pretty well with it. The hon. member for Bellechasse has said that it is always desirable to prevent corruption. I likewise favour any Act that will prevent corruption, but this Bill will not suppress, but rather encourage corruption, and I will prove it. Twenty-five electors will sign a petition setting forth that they have reason to believe that there were corrupt practices at an election, and then a commissioner will be appointed. What will follow? The candidate who has been elected will have to buy up those twenty-five electors to shut their mouths. There is no doubt that course will be pursued. Of course those twenty-five electors will not have deposited $100, but there will be some one behind them who will have made the deposit. He will go and see the candidate elected, and say to him, "You are in trouble, but I think I can settle the matter, very quickly and very easily. You have been elected, but you will have to defend your seat. This may cost you $2,000 or $3,000, and unfortunately you are not a rich man and cannot spare it; if you have any money, you had better keep it for your family." Then the man will close by saying, "Give me $1,000 or $1,500 and I will settle the whole matter." Then the newly elected member will settle it and will pay $1,000, and no more will be heard of the enquête. Money will thus be saved, for the enquête would not be a proper one, but would simply be a fishing expedition for evidence. Instead of $3,000 or $4,000 being spent on an enquête, the party himself will be called upon to spend $1,000 to protect himself and his friends, especially if he has been guilty of some corrupt practices, and the member-elect will be willing to do it. My hon. friend opposite desires voting to be made obligatory. I take a different view, and I want to vote when I like. I do not want to be told that I have to vote, but I want to be free. This country is the most free country in the world and we want to maintain that freedom, and do not want to be told by any law whether we shall vote or not. I am not against a law preventing corruption, but I should like it to apply to those who commit corrupt practices and who sometimes feel themselves obliged to buy votes. They want not only a strict law but a tyrannical law, while I am in favour of a very strict law being enacted. The present law, however, affords every protection to both candidates and electors. If a candidate is guilty of corrupt acts he can be fined and sent to gaol for three months, and he may also be disqualified for seven years, and any of his agents or any person guilty of corrupt practices can be fined $200 and disqualified for seven years, and every elector who receives money or promise of money for voting or abstaining from voting, can be fined $200, and his name may be erased from the list. The hon. member for Albert cannot want any more rigid legislation than this, unless indeed they want to pass a law by which not only the truth will be ascertained but by which the newly elected member will be prosecuted because he has not secured a large majority. I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw the Bill until next session.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I have been impressed a good deal by the remarks made by the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte). It seems to me that I see some further difficulty in the way of passing this Bill. I equally with the hon. gentleman opposite am in favour of the principle of the Bill, and in favour of any provisions that will have a tendency to lessen corruption in the country.

An hon. MEMBER. How about the cities?

Mr. COATSWORTH. In the cities, too. We have to be careful, however, to protect the interest of all parties. I will put a case. Let us follow up the proceedings a little. Twenty-five persons, who may be worthless, because, I am sorry to say, a great many of the electors are so from a financial point of view, and I do not use the term "worthless" in any sense derogatory to themselves personally, but, from the financial point of view, they are no good—file a petition, with their affidavit or declaration, against an elector, say, in East York, to bring the case to Toronto. The man lives twenty-five or thirty miles out of the city. An act of corruption is charged against him. He is summoned to appear on a certain day before a commissioner at Toronto, because the trial is not necessarily in the parish or township where the elector lives. So this elector, who may be a substantial man, is brought into Toronto and has to bring his witnesses and wait there for trial. Suppose he succeeds, then he is so much out of pocket, $100, $200, $300 or $400. There is no provision here that he is to be paid his costs. One of the primary principles of litigation is, that the successful party must be paid his costs by the other party. There is no such provision in this Bill. Any hon. gentleman who happened to have votes in another district—and I myself have votes in East York and other districts—might be brought up himself, and have to incur a long bill of costs in defending himself against a petition of twenty-five electors, who may be worth nothing financially, and in the long run he may be compelled to pay a large bill of costs, in order to have his name confirmed on the voters' list. That is the end of the matter. No doubt, proper provision should be made for preventing corruption, but it seems to me that this machinery is cumbersome. It is a multiplication of lawsuits. The tendency of our legislation, I think, should be to reduce the number of lawsuits, not to increase it. I do not see why the same machinery we use in our election trials may not safely and fairly be used for the purpose of preventing corruption; but I think this Bill should be remodelled. It may be, that the hon. gentleman has remodelled it so as to meet the objection I have taken, but it strikes me as an almost fatal objection, that a voter's vote may be challenged and a person be obliged to travel twenty-five or fifty miles to stand his trial in court, and be kept day after day attending court; and the result may be, that the case may be dismissed and he cannot get his costs. In some cases he will be out of pocket $1,000. One of the privileges we now enjoy, except in one of our courts, in Ontario, is the privilege of appeal. I believe that a voter, if he has been disfranchised, ought to have the right of appealing to the court 'en banc.' It appears to me, that the Bill, in that respect is defective. There is a summary trial under the Bill; there are no pleadings; there is no way in which a man may know beforehand exactly what evidence is going to be brought against him. He may be taken by surprise by the evidence, and if a judgment goes against him, he ought to have the right to have that judgment reviewed. While entirely in favour of this Bill or of any Bill which would tend to reduce electoral corruption, at the same time I do not think I can support it as the Bill is framed.

Mr. WELDON. In moving the second reading of this Bill, I took occasion to say that I hoped that the members of the House who favour its principle, would give us the great advantage of a constructive and helpful criticism of it. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) pointed out, in the first section, a criticism that seemed to me helpful, and as indicating that he was disposed to carry out the mandate of the House in passing the Bill through that stage, and my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) made, what I consider, apt and proper and fair criticisms. I may say to the hon. gentleman that when we come to the proper clauses, I propose to move amendments which, I think, will answer all but one of the objections he has offered. On clause 11, dealing with the matter of notice, I intend to move that the following shall be added:

That the Commissioners shall not report that any voter has taken a bribe, unless and until they are satisfied that he has had actual notice of the charge against him, and has had an opportunity of meeting the same, or that it was impossible to give him notice by reason of his intentionally avoiding service.

I also agree with the hon. gentleman that the deposit mentioned in the Bill is too small and, in my judgment, a deposit of $400 or $500 would very well meet the objections on that ground. If we put the deposit at too high a figure the Bill will be entirely useless and unworkable. The objections taken by my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) I must say, without any spirit of gibing or harshness, do not seem to me to be based upon, at least, a sympathetic view of the Bill. Of course, I take the hon. member at his word when he says he is in favour of the principle of the Bill, and I ask him, then, to use his legal ability to help to reduce his views to some form in which they can get expression. I do not agree with his views in the main. I think the danger he speaks of is whimsical and imaginary. I cannot see what in the world could induce people in a county to take unreasonable and unjust action without any party behind them, without any party fund behind them, without any organization behind them, but simply a desire to say that their votes should not be swamped by the ballots of those who sell their franchise. If there is no feeling in a county, and if the men who will not sell their votes do take hold of this thing, and put up their money to cleanse their county, then I grant you in such county the Bill will be of little service. I propose, when we come to the proper section, also to ask the committee to adopt the following:—

That the Commissioners may make rules, regulating their procedure as to the duties of any officer appointed in connection with the inquiry.

These are not unimportant, but very simple amendments, which, I think, will meet the real objections so far offered.

Mr. LISTER. I think that hon. gentlemen that desire to put down the growing evil of this day, should be found supporting this Bill, and, instead of finding fault with the Bill and picking out objections, that they should use their best exertions to make it as perfect as possible. No hon. gentleman can dispute but what the principle of the Bill is a thoroughly good one, and ought to be supported by every person. Desperate diseases require severe remedies. It is not at all likely that this Bill may be brought into use in a great many counties, but it is notorious that in some counties throughout the country bribery has become a desperate disease, and in these counties, it will be the interest of the law-abiding portion of the community to invoke the law which my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) is now endeavouring to put upon the Statute-book. It may not be a law that will be often called into force, but it will be a law 'in terrorem' for the purpose of frightening the wrong-doers. There is no question about it, notwithstanding what some hon. members may say, that, throughout the length and breadth of this country, bribery does prevail to a great extent. Notwithstanding the very stringent laws we have on the Statute-books for punishing bribery, we know, as a matter of practice, that on a trial of an election petition, it is the custom of the judge, when one case of bribery is established, to say: "I void the election." There may be one hundred charges of bribery in the particulars, but, from that moment, the election is voided and you cannot go into the other charges. Unless you charge personal bribery, these charges are not investigated, and persons who have been guilty of bribery escape the penalties of the law. This thing is repeated election after election, with the result that persons who are disposed to break the law become more careless as to the means they resort to, and bribery, like a cancer, is spreading.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Might I ask the hon. gentleman what position of affairs would come from the following state of facts: The election is not protested; a petition is filed under this Act against, say a couple of dozen persons, because under this Bill the same twenty-five men can impeach any number of voters. The case is tried by the commissioners, and all these men are, we shall suppose, found guilty of taking bribes. In the meantime let us suppose that the time for protesting the election has passed. There is the finding that the election has been corrupt, and yet the real remedy that Parliament has always been aiming at, namely, to avoid the election, cannot be had.

Mr. LISTER. I do not think that is the object of this Bill. We have an election court to regulate that. This Bill is for the purpose of purifying the county and to punish men who have accepted bribes regardless altogether as to who may be elected in the constituency. It is no punishment to a man who takes a bribe to have an election set aside, but it is a severe punishment to the candidate who has been put to heavy costs. The longer a law of this kind is left out of the Statute-book, the more dangerous the position of the candidate becomes. It is so to-day that a man must be either enormously wealthy or miserably poor to go into politics. If he is in moderate circumstances it is almost as much as the support of his family is worth for him to enter into politics. An election petition or two may be filed against him, and though he may be entirely innocent himself, yet through the action of some indiscreet agent his election is set aside and he has to pay all the costs. Now, unless we adopt some radical means to purify our constituencies of men who are guilty of that kind of thing, it will go on increasing from election to election. The object of this Bill is not to try election petitions at all, but to punish men who have been guilty of taking bribes at elections; and when it is known that a law of this kind is on the Statute-book, disfranchising men and imposing severe penalties on them for acts of this kind, it will have a deterrent effect upon them. I think this is a law which every hon. member of this House should support, whether he comes from the province of Quebec or not. It is his duty to the country, as a loyal and patriotic man, to support it. If he takes a more selfish view of the question, it is his duty to himself to support it. Whether he looks at it from the higher or the lower ground, every man in this House should support a measure that is going to purify the electorate of this country, and the tendency of this measure will be in that direction. When twenty-five men put up, say $500, that surely ought to be a guarantee that they are taking proceedings which they think at all events are just. That sum will be used, I suppose, as security for the necessary expenses of the proceedings.

Mr. AMYOT. The Bill does not say that.

Mr. LISTER. Well, the Bill can be amended. There is a principle here, and every man who approves of that principle should bend his energies to making the Bill as perfect as possible. It is not necessary to put this Bill off to another session. That is a mere makeshift. The Bill is before the House, and the House is just as capable of dealing with it to-day as it will be one year hence, and the hon. gentleman who refuses to support it may have to answer to his constituents for refusing to do what little lies in his power to remedy this great and crying evil.

Mr. DICKEY. There is one more consideration that I think ought to influence this House to favour the principle of this Bill—I mean the principle of stopping bribery in the constituencies. I think it is the experience of a good many hon. gentlemen in this House that, though money has been spent in securing their election, it has been spent largely against their will. They have found it impossible to control enthusiastic supporters who wanted to spend money whether forbidden or not, and men of that stamp always have this security, that if a protest is filed, they can stop the inquiry at any time by throwing up the sponge, and thereby escaping the danger of being put on the stand. This Bill will serve a very useful purpose in giving men who handle bribery money to know that if they bribe extensively they run the risk of a commission going into their county and sitting down and waiting for them, and bringing up the men who receive the money and finding out who, in the county have been bribed. I think that any hon. gentleman who wants to assist in putting down corruption, cannot get any better way of doing it than by striking terror into the minds of the men who handle the money.

Mr. COATSWORTH. But the Bill does not touch the briber.

Mr. DICKEY. I know that it does not. It is not for that purpose. It is to purge the electoral lists of men who do not sufficiently value their franchise as to use it honestly. With regard to the question of costs, I cannot see that there is practically very much in that objection. In that respect, the Bill may be subject to amendment. But as the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) says, here is a great and crying public evil, and I do not think we should be stopped from doing anything we can to correct it, by some mere technical objection about some individual in some constituency who may have to pay out something. If the Bill is imperfect, we can amend it, but I should be very sorry if the principle of the Bill should not be given a fair trial.

Mr. FREMONT. With respect to the principle of the Bill, I think all the members of this House are of the same opinion: We all aim at what is good, and are all desirous of making the elections more moral, and we desire to prevent bribery and corruption. The question is, whether this Bill is practical, and whether it would do away with bribery and corruption in elections. In looking over the revised statutes of Canada, I see that chapter 10, "An Act respecting inquiries as to corrupt practices at elections of members of the House of Commons," contains about the same features as the Bill now before the committee. It settles, in a fair and honest way, some of the questions to which this Bill relates. This law, by section 1, provides for two cases in which commissioners may be appointed by the Governor-General in Council, to make inquiries respecting corrupt practices in a riding. The first case is when a judge, in his report on the trial of an election petition under the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, states that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election. This case is not provided for in the Bill before the committee. The second case is exactly the case provided for in this Bill. Within sixty days after the publication in the "Canada Gazette" of an election, a petition may be presented, signed by any twenty-five or more electors of the constituency, stating that no petition charging corrupt practices has been presented and that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election; and there is annexed to the petition a solemn declaration. Now, I heard the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte), while speaking a few days ago on this Bill, stating, if I understood him aright, that there was a great deal of corruption in every election that took place in this Dominion. This evening, to my great surprise, I heard the same hon. gentleman stating just the contrary—that in the province of Quebec, or in his district, at least, there was no corruption. I think there is a great deal of exaggeration in both of these statements of the hon. gentleman. It is undoubtedly true that in many cases corrupt practices take place at elections, but it is equally true that, as soon as an election is over, those who supported the defeated candidate cry out every where that the result was due to corruption and bribery. In those circumstances, it would be very easy, immediately after an election, to find, not only twenty-five electors, but a large number, who would be quite willing to sign any petition, especially when it does not require to be backed by a heavy deposit. This Bill provides for a deposit of $100, but I understood from the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) that he intended by an amendment to raise the amount to $500. I think the law actually in force is a better one. Section 15 of chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes provides that any person presenting a petition shall deposit with the Accountant of the House the sum of $1,000. That is a more reasonable amount in proportion to the expense, which would be very heavy indeed if commissioners were appointed under the Bill before the House.

Mr. GILLIES. That is on filing the petition.

Mr. FREMONT. I mean the petition to have commissioners appointed to make inquiry respecting bribery, under chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes. Another feature in the Bill I cannot approve of is section 11, which, even with the amendment mentioned by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), cannot, to my mind, be acceptable. It is contrary to all principles of the administration of justice that, on a simple notice given to a party that evidence has been adduced against him, a report might be sent and his privileges as a citizen and elector be cancelled for a number of years. The law, which I quoted just now, meets this case in a perfectly just way. Section 14 of chapter 10 of the the Revised Statutes says:

Whenever it appears by the report of the Commissioners under this Act that any person named by them has been guilty of a corrupt practice and has not been furnished by them with a certificate of indemnity, such report, with the evidence taken by the Commissioners, shall be laid before the Attorney-General of Canada, who shall, if in his opinion there is sufficient evidence available for a prosecution, certify such opinion to the Secretary of State, who shall thereupon communicate the report with the evidence to the Lieutenant-Governor of the province in which the election was held and the Attorney-General of Canada shall instruct counsel to assist in any prosecution which is thereon instituted by the local authorities charged with the administration of justice.

So that the Act which is now in force provides for the trial of all these parties against whom corruption and bribery has been proved before the commissioners. It is not simply the report of the commissioners which disqualifies him, but the action must be taken in the name of the Crown upon that report, and a trial had before he can be punished. I would suggest that the Bill be withdrawn, and that the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) should present, at the next session of Parliament, a Bill amending this chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes in such a way as to meet his views, which are, I doubt not, those of the majority of this House.

Mr. MASSON. With regard to the first section, we have to consider whether the judges of the Superior Court and such judges as try election petitions are the proper parties to appoint as commissioners to make inquiry, and be, at it were, Grand Juries to visit each riding in the Dominion—in fact to take upon themselves the duties of a grand inquest. We also have to consider whether, having made the inquiries, they shall proceed one step further and draw an indictment against the parties accused before them, and who, on their report, must necessarily be punished. As to the matter of principle, I would object to the inquisitorial nature of this Bill, but as has already been explained, the object aimed at cannot well be met except by something in the nature of an inquisition. Now, what have these commissioners to do? They have to go, upon the petition of twenty-five electors, to any riding in their province. They are to give their notice when they shall hold sittings. They will necessarily receive evidence, and the party accused, it is suggested, shall have ample notice. The Bill already before us does not provide that, but the mover tells us he will propose an amendment whereby ample notice will be required. When that section is before the committee, I shall propose some amendments, by which to fix what shall be considered "ample notice," and to see that no precarious or slipshod manner of giving notice is allowed them. These judges are then formed into a grand inquest, to hear the complaints. They make such inquiry as may be suggested. Being from a distance, they can know nothing of the cases themselves; they are entirely at the mercy of those who brought them there, those who appeared before them with a view of prosecuting the parties. Therefore, they issue a large number of subpoenas. The expense of the witness' subpoena is provided for, but not in the definite manner I think it should be, but that is very easily rectified. A case is made out against a certain party. Now, I think it is one of the principles of our law, that, when a person is accused of a crime, or an offence against the law, be that offence small or great, he should have notice of it, he should have particulars of it and should have time to prepare his defence. Therefore, instead of going on with one continuous sitting, hearing a complaint that is brought before them, they should give this man notice that the sitting is to be held on that day, otherwise he comes there entirely unaware of the particulars of the charge against him, that he received a bribe, or in what manner the bribe was received, whether in money or in "kind," whether directly or indirectly. They come there, and, in nine cases out of ten, they will claim to have been taken by surprise, whether actual or pretended. Dissatisfaction will follow; their friends will be dissatisfied, and not wholly without reason. It, therefore, should, in my opinion, be provided, that when a prima facie case is made out before the commissioners, they should then adjourn their hearing for a definite time, say, ten days. It seems to me, ten days or twenty days is short enough notice, but, I suppose most judges would consider it ample. It would depend altogether upon the constituency. In one constituency it would be ample, but in another it would be a very short time. Notice of this adjournment should be given, with such particulars as the commissioners have at that time, so that the man put upon his trial for receiving a bribe, would be in the same position as the man brought before our courts on information having been made before a magistrate, and a prima facie case having been made, he would have reasonable notice, with the details of the charge made against him. If that is the work we expect these men to do, I question the propriety of incurring the great expense to the country and of placing such a tremendous burden upon the shoulders of our Superior Court judges. I doubt whether they are the proper persons to appoint for the preliminary inquiries, at least. Would it not be better to provide for some local official, such as the revising officer or some officer in the county, already there, to make the preliminary inquiry, and when before that officer, who takes the place of the grand jury, it should be remembered, in making the inquiry, if he finds a prima facie case, then the application should be made to try this prima facie case before him. It seems to me, that even the penalty of disfranchisement is one that should not be inflicted without the protection which goes with other trials involving questions of penalty. There is no member of this committee, I suppose, no member of this House, I trust, no elector in the country who will not admit frankly that bribery does exist, that bribery should be stopped, and that, if legislation can stop it, then legislation should be resorted to for that purpose. But at the same time, while we admit all that, we must at the same time admit that no person should be hastily tried, no person should be hastily punished and no person should be hastily deprived of his vote.

Mr. McLEOD. There seems to be a consensus of intelligent opinion that bribery is a growing evil and one that should be stamped out. This Bill proposes to do it. I have heard a good many objections made to it, but it seems to me that after all they can be answered. Let us see what the difficulties are. The object of this is to do away with bribery.

in other words it is to say to a man: Your franchise is not an article of merchandise; it is not for you to trade in, and if you turn it into an article of merchandise you shall no longer have a right to use it. I think the judges are the proper persons to inquire into these charges. Under the Act that has been referred to by the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, they were the persons to try them; but that Act was simply ineffective. This Bill is to do what I presume was intended by the other; in other words it is to make the other effective. A good deal has been said about the cost of the party getting witnesses there to defend himself. These objections do not strike me very forcibly. The charge is that he sold his vote. He knows whether he did or not. He cannot possibly have many witnesses; I do not see how he could call any witnesses. He could call twenty witnesses to say: I did not know that you sold your vote; but that is a question for himself. There is one section I would like to see amended when we come to it—section 4. It provides that the courts shall be held in the district or within ten miles of it. I think it should be held in the district itself. I admit there are some sections, as is admitted by the promoter himself, which could be advantageously amended; but, having agreed upon the principle, it seems to me the true course is to take the Bill up section by section, and amend those sections which require amendment in order to carry out the purpose of the Bill.

Mr. MASSON. My hon. friend who has just spoken seems to think the case a very simple one for a man who is put on his trial that he is restricted to one piece of evidence. I was going to speak of that on another section. He might require evidence to meet a circumstantial case; he might require evidence to discredit the witness who says he is bribed. There are many ways in which he might be put to expense and many reasons for which he might require time to prepare his defence, which points are not provided for in this Bill. I threw out these suggestions while speaking on the first section, not with a view to harassing the promoter of the Bill in its passage through the committee, but with a view to finding the remedy for the difficulties which suggested themselves to me. In my suggestion as to an inquiry made by a local officer, the prima facie case to be made out and the giving of reasonable notice, there would be ample time, because the next court would have to be fixed, and there is no necessity to rush it through at one sitting. While speaking before, the promoter of the Bill referred me to section 4, and said that that provided for the case I mentioned. I thought he had made some amendment; but as I read the Bill it does not provide for the difficulty. It provides for holding the court "from time to time." They may move about; they do not need to meet in the same place.

An hon. MEMBER. They have certainly the right of adjustment.

Mr. AMYOT. I entirely agree with the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman who has spoken (Mr. Masson). I studied political law in the English authorities and I admired that law. I found there the first principle of justice and equity, that when you want to try a man you give him notice and bring him into court and tell him of what he is accused. Section 13 of this Bill provides that the commissioners shall make their report to Parliament, and those whom they report as having been bribed are ipso facto condemned and punished for eight years. Is that an English principle of law? Here is a man who is accused of corruption, without receiving notice. The commissioners are sitting in the county, perhaps 20 or 40 miles from his residence. They hear one or two or three witnesses, and are satisfied that that man has been bribed; they report him to Parliament without even giving him a chance of making his defence, and he is condemned ipso facto; no chance of appeal; no possibility of bringing witnesses in his defence to explain the surrounding circumstances. I say this is against the principle of English law, and the liberty of the citizen. It is not only an inquisitorial court which you establish, a court to fish for evidence, but it is a court which decides without appeal, and without hearing the accused party. The idea of the hon. member who has just spoken is perfectly correct. Have a provisional court, if you like; get some parties to go there; but let them have a list of particulars which will first establish a prima facie case, then give notice to the party, and establish a regular tribunal and try him. Now, the hon. member for the county of Quebec (Mr. Frémont) has quoted a law which seems to apply, but I may tell him at once that it is not applicable in practice. We know that the judges in Ontario have adopted the practice of trying election petitions, each case separately, and as soon as they are satisfied that there is one case of corruption they void the election. In Quebec the judges do not proceed in that way, and I believe they are right. They examine all the witnesses, and then give their judgment and report to Parliament whether there has been general corruption. Now, under that practice of trying petitions in the province of Quebec it is impossible to apply chapter 10 of the Consolidated Statutes.

Mr. FREMONT. That law provides for a petition signed by twenty-five electors.

Mr. AMYOT. It has never been applied because the security of a thousand dollars, which has to be given, is so high that it has been found impracticable. Another reason why that law has not been applied, and the general law of contested elections which contains something to this effect, has been applied, is because in Ontario the judges proceed as I have mentioned, trying each particular by itself, and so soon as one case of corruption is established, they void the election. I do not think that is within the spirit of the law. That section 13, which is the main object of his Bill, is most unjust and tyrannical.

Mr. WELDON. You do not mean section 13.

Mr. FREMONT. It is section 14.

Mr. AMYOT. In French it is section 13; in English it is section 14:

All electors whom the commissioners report to have taken bribes shall be incapable of voting at any election.

My hon. friend sees that the commissioners make their report, and upon their report the punishment is inflicted. That report is made without trial, and that is not fair. So many changes are required in the Bill that I suggest that it be referred to a special committee. It is impossible to pass it as it stands now.

Mr. FREMONT. There is another irregularity; the Bill is not printed in French the same as it is in English. In the English version there are two sections that do not exist in the French version.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I am aware that in opposing this Bill we shall be blamed by some unscrupulous newspapers, but I do not care much for that. I am in favour of the Bill so far as it tends to purify elections, but I think this legislation is quite unnecessary. We already have all the laws that are needed to punish candidates and electors who are guilty of corruption. I was going to cite chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, but as my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Frémont) has gone over it very clearly and eloquently, I will only refer my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) to chapters 8 and 9 of the Revised Statutes. I suppose that the object of his Bill is to punish the candidate who buys votes and at the same time to punish the electors who sell their votes. Well, if he refers to the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 8, sections 82, 85, 88, 90 and 92, he will find there all necessary provisions to prevent corruption. In section 90, of chapter 8, he will find that "every person other than the candidate found guilty of any corrupt practice in any proceeding in which, after notice of the charge"—and here is just what this Bill does not contain—"will be punished."

Mr. LISTER. It is proposed to amend it.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Suppose we do, I see no necessity of making another law when we already have all the machinery we need for the purpose. In section 98 you have all that is necessary to purify elections, to punish and disqualify a man who sells his vote. You have in this Act a clause which says that the candidate himself shall be disqualified for seven years if he is proven guilty of corruption, and the Act contains a clause to punish the elector who sells his vote. What do we want more than that? Is it necessary for us to spend the time of this House in making new laws when we already have upon the Statute-books of this country, provisions of precisely the same character? I repeat, I am in favour of the principle of the Bill so far as it tends to purify elections, but I see no necessity for taking up the time of this House in passing another law similar to those we already have. As the member for Quebec county has said, in chapter 10 we have almost the identical clauses providing that the petition must be signed by twenty-five electors, but in addition, and what is far better, there is a deposit sufficient to cover the expenses of a speedy trial. According to the Bill proposed by the hon. gentleman, the accused has no notice of the charge laid against him, which may be brought by a man of no means whatever, and yet whose oath may remove him. He is not protected in any way. That man, without any means, may appear before a commissioner, who may be an unfriendly party, who may take his oath and make a report to Parliament, and the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery may report, the name may be struck from the list and the party disqualified for seven years, without knowing what the accusation is. The Bill is not only unnecessary, but it is very bad. I may go further, and again refer the hon. gentleman to chapters 8, 9 and 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. I do not want to say anything against the principle of the Bill, but, in my opinion, we have already all the laws that are necessary to prevent corruption at elections. If the hon. gentleman will take chapter 9 of the revised statutes, section 43, he will see that the sitting judges in an election court are bound by law to make a report to the House, and if they find it necessary to make further investigation in any county as to corrupt practices, they have a right to do so. What necessity is there to name commissioners and have another trial, except to annoy the member-elect and his friends, and incur expenses? If the hon. gentleman will look at section 44 of chapter 9, and section 48, he will find a similar provision, and not only according to chapter 8 has the judge the right to disqualify an elector who has sold his vote, but by section 69 of chapter 8, it is provided that if, during the trial, the judge finds there are parties before him who have sold their votes, or bought votes, he has the right to call the party before him and proceed with his trial at once. Under these circumstances, I am opposed to the Bill, because it is quite unnecessary, and will only hamper members-elect, and their friends.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. member, if he will look at the provisions of the Bill, and the provisions of the law as it now stands, will see that this Bill aims at something not accomplished by the existing law. The existing law is for the purpose of securing to the party whom the people have returned to this House, the seat to which he is entitled. That is the object of the law. But the object of this Bill is to inquire into the general conduct of the electors, on certain electors, to the number of twenty-five, taking the responsibility of charging that general corruption prevails in that particular constituency. This is not the first time a measure of this sort has been submitted to Parliament. The former member who occupied the seat I now have in this House, the Hon. Mr. Blake, in 1876, when Minister of Justice, introduced a Bill on this subject, and the hon. gentleman has, in the present Bill, followed largely the Bill that was then introduced and placed on the Statute-book as chapter 10 of the statutes of 1876, but which, after there was a change of Administration was repealed and removed from the Statute-book. The object of the present Bill is quite different from the object in view in the Controverted Elections Act. Let me suppose, for a moment, that it is not the successful party that has been guilty of extensive bribery, but the defeated party. If the defeated party has been guilty of extensive bribery in a constituency, surely that is not to be tried by filing an election petition. How can you get at it: what provision is there for inquiry into the general practices in such a case? The law relating to the trial of controverted elections does not meet that case, but chapter 10, of the statutes of 1876, which was subsequently repealed, did meet that case. There is the difference between that statute and the Bill which the hon. gentleman has submitted in some particulars, and if the time of the session permitted, I would myself have been very glad to have seen the Bill referred to a Select Committee, to compare it with the former statute and consider in what point it might be amended, and report it to the House, with a view to pushing it through, not perfecting it another session, but placing it on the Statute-book this session. That Act, which was formerly on the Statute-book, provided that:

When the House of Commons by address represents to the Governor-General that a judge, in his report on the trial of an election petition under the said Act, states that corrupt practices have, or that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the election, or is of the opinion that an inquiry into the circumstances of the election has been rendered incomplete by the action of the parties to the petition, a further inquiry as to whether corrupt practices have extensively prevailed is desirable.

That is one case. There is another case, which is provided for in the statute, as it is by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) in the first portion of the section, except that petition is presented to the House of Commons and it is the House of Commons that reports to the Governor-General on the petition and not the petitioners directly. There is that difference between the former statute in this particular and the one which the hon. gentleman has submitted to the House. On comparing them, I find they are in a large degree alike, that there are many of the sections which the hon. gentleman has copied from the statute to which I have referred. But under the statute of 1876 the primary object is to ascertain whether corrupt practices have extensively prevailed or not. It is an inquisitorial proceeding, in its very nature it must be an inquisitorial proceeding, and the hon. gentleman has provided by section 14 of his Bill further that those who are found upon this inquiry to have been guilty of corrupt practices shall be disqualified. I think that is not an unreasonable proposition. It may be desirable to get certain parties who may not be known to any one, but the commissioners will, no doubt, make necessary provision to protect the party against any injustice arising out of the commission. Let me suppose an inquiry is made on a petition. Those parties make a declaration that corrupt practices have prevailed. Commissioners are appointed, and an inquiry is held. Upon investigation and examination of a party, some one who was not before suspected, is accused of being guilty of corrupt practices. That party perhaps was not accused by the petitioners. It may be that the petitioners knew nothing about the bribery prior to his misconduct being declared. The party may not be present in court, he may not have the remotest idea that his acts of guilt were known to any party or likely to be disclosed. Where such a fact comes out, the commissioners, no doubt, will require the party to be notified, and an opportunity will be given to him to explain the charge made against him, if he can. But in the nature of things, you cannot give such a notice as one hon. gentleman suggested. It is only as the proceedings are had that you can discover who is and who is not accused, and when the accusation is made, then the commissioners in the rules of procedure which they will, no doubt, lay down for their guidance, will make the necessary provision that notice shall be given to the parties. I favour this measure on another ground, viz., that when you come to have an inquiry of this sort, you cannot bring an accusation against a man who is not in the country, who is a thousand miles away, and what you must do is to get rid of every non-resident voter from the voters' lists, so that the parties against whom the charges may be brought, will be parties who are resident in the locality where the voting takes place. That being so, I think it is an additional reason for favouring the measure which the hon. gentleman has submitted to the House. But if the hon. gentleman feels that he can get this measure through this session, and I think he can, I believe it would perhaps facilitate the Bill if the committee were to rise and the hon. gentleman were to ask for some friends to act practically as a Select Committee to report, so that next Wednesday the measure would be ready to be pushed through this session. I think the proposed method of putting the inquiry on foot objectionable.

Mr. WELDON. I do not know how long the session is likely to run. I would be very glad to accept that suggestion if I thought the result could be reached, but I am apprehensive that that would mean a miscarriage of the measure. I compared this Bill most carefully with Mr. Blake's Act of 1876, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) will see I copied the machinery part from that Act. I think Mr. Blake's Act ended by handing these names to the Attorney-General of the province for prosecution. I am sure the hon. gentlemen who criticised the Bill have magnified the changes that are required. There are only one or two clauses necessary to meet the consensus of opinion of the House and they are very simple and clear. I would like, at all events, to take the decision of the House on the first section and to see whether we can carry it or not.

Mr. MASSON. I have no doubt the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) referred to me as one who had demanded notices. I agree with every word he says as to the impossibility of giving notice in the first instance. I stated that, at first, it had to be inquisitorial, and that when a "prima facie" case was made, that another time, not necessarily another place should be named for the trial. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the difference between the adjournment of an investigation, and a new time appointed for the trial. A trial is quite different from the continuation of an inquiry. On a trial, whether before the same judge or the same tribunal that had found the "prima facie" case, the evidence should be given "de novo" in the presence of the accused, and he would have the opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses. If it is an adjournment of the inquiry, the accused is brought before it, and he is told certain things have been alleged against him and he is asked for a defence. He has only recently obtained the particulars and if he wants to cross-examine the witnesses who have already appeared, he has to bring them there at his own expense. There is no provision made for the court bringing them back again. There is no reason why we can expect that judges will double their work by making rules that would require them to have two investigations, where only one is provided under the Act. I do think that the suggestion I made, to have a local officer make the inquiry in the first instance is a good one. I understand that my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) gave notice of a motion some time ago that this officer should be the revising officer. I would accept that official as, perhaps, a very proper officer to make the 'prima facie' inquiry and then let the trial come before the judge.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, although this Bill has already been objected to on several grounds, still, I think there are other reasons which militate against its adoption, which have not yet been adduced, in so far at least as the province of Quebec is concerned with the execution of this law. I may say, first, in reply to an objection from the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that the object the Bill has in view is similar to that contained in the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapters 9 and 10. The election law provides that certain classes of persons shall not be entitled to be registered upon the list of voters, such as, for instance, those who are disqualified by the courts. One of the first grounds on which I object to this Bill, not in its basic principle, but in its application, is that in my humble opinion, judges are thereby taken away from their ordinary functions. One bar of the province of Quebec justly complains of the drawbacks in the administration of justice; and under such circumstances I question very much whether the judges are the proper parties to appoint, when they have plenty of business already cut out for them. It must also be borne in mind that there are only eighteen or twenty judicial districts for the province of Quebec. Under the first section of the Bill, the commissioners appointed to make inquiry shall be judges of the Superior Court. Each judicial district, on an average, includes three counties. The judicial district of Richelieu, for instance, has but one judge, and comprises the counties of Richelieu, Yamaska and Berthier. Let us suppose the case of twenty-five electors in each of the three counties of the judicial district of Richelieu petitioning for such an inquest at the same time; then, in addition to requesting the services of the judge of the Richelieu district, another judge from the districts of Montreal, Three Rivers or Quebec will, of all necessity, have to be adjoined to the former. But should an inquest be equally asked for in the last mentioned districts—in the county of Nicolet, for instance, which is included in the judicial district of Three Rivers—then, the judge at Three Rivers will have to summon to his help a judge from another district, either from Montreal or Quebec, to make the inquiry. What a disturbing element this would introduce into the administration of justice is easily gathered from the above. But it strikes me as an almost fatal objection that this provision has a tendency to substantiate the charge brought against the judges, about their meddling with politics. We have revising officers in the province of Quebec, in my county at least, whose impartiality is above suspicion; in certain instances complaints have been made against them and they have been accused of partiality. I need hardly say that, at this very moment, when in the province of Quebec, judges are being accused of meddling with politics, I look upon as quite untimely a legislation which could hardly fail to be considered as calculated to substantiate the charges levelled against them. Another reason which seems to militate against the Bill is, that the deposit required to cover the costs of the inquests, is quite insufficient. I may say also that this Bill infringes one of the basic principles of common law; for it is a matter of right that the accused party should have information as to the particular charges he has to meet; and, further, according to French law, the rules of indictment are so drastic that the incorrect description of defendant's name is sufficient to nullify the action. Although the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) has stated that he would amend his Bill in this direction, it still remains open to objection on all the other grounds mentioned; especially section 5, which, in my opinion, gives quite arbitrary powers to the commissioners appointed to make the inquest. It reads:

5. The commissioners shall by all such lawful means as to them appear best, with a view to the discovery of the truth, endeavour to ascertain the names of any electors who have taken bribes at the last election.

We are all strongly in favour of the principle involved in this Bill tending to stamp out bribery and to secure pure elections. They who take bribes at elections commit a bad action and should be punished; and it is provided for in the statute. I may also offer suggestions as to the clause of the Bill which puts the exercise of the law in the hands of judges. I think the names of revising officers should be substituted to those of the judges of the Superior Court of the province. Why not also give them the right of striking off from the list of voters the names of the electors who have taken bribes? There might also be an appeal before the courts on questions of law and fact. An honourable member stated on the floor of the House that bribery did not prevail in the province of Quebec to so great an extent as in the province of Ontario. I may say that bribery prevails throughout the Dominion. It has existed at all times and in all countries. Bribery at elections is, to my mind, the stumbling block of self-government. As long as we shall live under parliamentary institutions, it is idle to think that we may have pure and perfectly honest elections. However, I am happy to avail myself of this opportunity to state from my seat in the House, that I have been returned for a large constituency without spending a single cent. I still object to the Bill on another and very serious ground. I mean the evils likely to arise from the abuse of this legislation, at the hands of the twenty-five electors mentioned in this Bill. Any one who calls to mind how divided our people is, and where political animus may lead to, as also what blunders we often fall into through party spirit, cannot refrain from dreading the consequences likely to result from the application of this law. On these several grounds, I think this House, while strongly supporting the principle of this Bill, should unanimously reject the means suggested by this Bill to stamp out bribery.

Mr. PELLETIER. (Translation.) The hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau), in the course of his remarks, has questioned the propriety of appointing judges of the Superior Court as commissioners to make inquiry, as open to criticism. The revising officers, he suggests, are the proper parties to be appointed to such a position. The hon. member should not forget that revising officers, in several ridings, are the very judges of the Superior Court. Therefore, his first objection falls to the ground.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member should also recollect that I have suggested to inscribe the right of appeal to a superior jurisdiction on questions of fact and law. This right is not provided for by this Bill.

Mr. PELLETIER. (Translation.) This Bill, to my mind, is quite a new departure, and were it adopted, it would be the first time that a procedure would be seen in which twenty-five witnesses would be required to initiate proceedings. The most objectionable feature of our election laws, relating to bribery, is the complicated nature of the legal machinery, which creates considerable difficulty in the way of the execution of the law. As a preventive law, the Bill now before the House appears retrograde, at least, so far as procedure is concerned. To my mind, it outbids the law now in force, concerning the prevention and repression of corrupt practices, as regards technical difficulties and exaggerated formalism. First, Mr. Chairman, all corrupt practices are rigidly repressed by the law, and were a new legislation to be enacted, I think the first step should be taken in the direction of simplifying the procedure. Corrupt practices at elections being assimilated to a misdemeanour, I fail to see why they should not be treated as such. Why not, for instance, make parties indicted for misdemeanours in election matters, amenable to the police court? Any party could bring an action as in ordinary misdemeanours, before the police magistrate. The latter should be authorized to issue forthwith a summons against the accused.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) In the city of Montreal, the municipal law contains similar provisions. Cases of bribery and corrupt practices are heard before the police magistrate.

Mr. PELLETIER. (Translation.) The hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte), calls my attention to the fact that my suggestion is embodied in the municipal law of Montreal, and that cases of bribery at elections in municipal matters, under the clauses of the municipal law, are disposed with as suggested. The municipal law of Montreal provides that whosoever wants to ledge a complaint against another party, accusing him of being guilty of having taken bribes at an election, shall bring his charge before the recorder, who shall order a summons to be issued and served upon him. The recorder summarily hears and tries the case, and when the person offending is convicted, he forfeits for three years his right to vote at any municipal election. The Bill now before us provides that, as security for the costs, a deposit of $100 shall be made by the petitioners. Should the procedure be simplified, as suggested, any elector could go before the police court and, having deposited the sum of $100 lodge his complaint to the effect—not that bribery has prevailed at an election, to the best of his knowledge,—but declare, after alleging facts and making charges, that he intends to prove specified charges against certain persons accused by him. This procedure would put a stop to many malicious, futile or vexatious actions, too often brought by certain parties with a view of putting the defendant to expense. I suggest that the Bill be postponed until next session. I am also of opinion that all laws framed with a view to prevent and stamp out corrupt practices at elections, should aim at simplifying the procedure and facilitating the application of the law, instead of making it cumbersome and unworkable, as it happens in the present instance.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Can the hon. mover of this Bill cite me the case of another country where a law of this kind has prevented corruption?

Mr. WELDON. I do not know how other countries are, but I do know that, if the hon. members of this House will allow us to put this Bill on the Statute-book, there are some counties in which there was scandalous corruption in the last election, and that if we will cleanse of bribers and bribe-takers, if some of their friends in those counties are sufficiently in earnest as to put up the necessary money to have the law put into force. We ask this House to give us that opportunity—that is all.

Mr. DELISLE. (Translation.) After listening to the remarks of the hon. members who have occupied the floor before me, I think it is quite evident that this Bill, in its present shape, offers many objectionable features which make it a cumbersome and unworkable measure. It strikes me as an almost fatal objection, Sir, that a flagrant injustice is sanctioned by this Bill, in so far as it takes away from the accused party the privilege of defending himself. Charges will be brought against him by unknown parties and he is left without any means of proving his innocence. Now, it is a well known fact that charges in connection with corrupt practices at elections generally originate in feelings which are far from being actuated by justice. Charges, as a rule, will be brought by rabid opponents, before the commissioners, who, on an "ex parte" examination, are empowered to disfranchise the accused person for seven years. Now, I say, this procedure is unfair, and should not be countenanced by this House. I hold, further, that the election law which deals with bribery at elections, is already too stringent; it should be amended so as to shorten the period of time during which the culprits, even the most guilty ones, are disqualified; as, under such a law, our most useful citizens are liable to be punished with too great a severity. They will fall victims to the hatred of their opponents, and the country will be deprived of the benefits it might derive from their services. Mr. Chairman, I must confess I am quite at a loss to understand the purport of this measure. It might be construed as an attempt to empower political partisans to ruin, politically and financially, their opponents. I suggest that if the friends of the hon. promoter of this Bill had been more cautious in their constituencies, and had handled less bribery-money, the House would have been spared the trouble of discussing such a measure. I think all the members of this House should oppose the Bill, not out of a desire to prevent bribery, this great and crying public evil, being put down, but out of a desire to extend an equal measure of justice to every one. We hold, Sir, that this House should not support a law whereby an elector may fall a victim to the persecution of twenty-five opponents, apparently on the ground of stamping down corrupt practices and bribery—when the same men are far worse and more corrupt than he is. We are all in favour of measures framed with a view to purify the electorate of this country, and to put down bribery, but we should beware of any measures by which injustice may be sanctioned on the ground of promoting political morality and the purity of elections. Under these circumstances, I declare I shall oppose the Bill, as lacking, in its wording and its applicability, all the constituent qualities and features required from a legal and judicial standpoint.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I beg the hon. the Minister of Justice to tell us whether, in the province of Quebec, there is a sufficient number of judges to hold the inquests likely to be asked for under this Bill. As there are sixty-five counties in the province of Quebec, it is quite likely that sixty counties will ask for similar investigations. Who is going to hold these inquests, should there not be judges enough? How is the hon. the Minister of Justice going to make up the rest?

Mr. AMYOT. This is a most important question, and we must have an answer from the acting Minister of Justice. The clause says that the commissioners to make these inquiries shall be judges of the Superior Court. I do not know what is the case in the other provinces, but I would like to know whether in the province of Quebec there are a sufficient number of judges to hold an inquiry in every one of the sixty-five counties? That is the question, and I think it deserves an answer.

Mr. DELISLE. I really think the hon. Minister should answer that question. It is very important for us to know whether there are a sufficient number of judges to be appointed commissioners in the sixty-five counties in the province of Quebec. I really think that our judges have had enough to do in the last two years on Royal Commissions, without putting aside civil cases for political matters. Besides, I think this measure would afford a chance to a certain number of judges to make inquiries against their political adversaries. I really think the hon. Minister cannot refuse to answer that question.

Mr. OUIMET. In the province of Quebec the number of judges of the Superior Court is reduced to eighteen by the Bill passed during the last session, so that there will not be a sufficient number of judges to do the kind of work proposed by this Bill, if it is going to be enforced.

Mr. FREMONT. I think that the question that has been asked is not a serious question, because it is based upon the supposition that a petition would be presented in every constituency in the province of Quebec, which, of course, is altogether absurd. I think we must be a little more serious than that, and examine the Bill on its merits. I have already expressed myself in favour of the principle of the Bill, but I think it needs to be amended, and I wish to make a suggestion to its promoter. As I have already stated, after an election has taken place in a constituency, the defeated party always cries out that the result of the election is due to corruption, and there is no doubt that it is very easy to get twenty-five electors who will sign a petition or a solemn declaration of any kind. Therefore, I would suggest that the words "solemn declaration" be struck out, and that they be replaced by the word "affidavit, sworn to." If the law requires only a solemn declaration, especially where there are illiterate electors, they will sign the declaration without knowing exactly the meaning or importance of it, and they will certainly not feel themselves bound in their consciences, before God, as they would if they were obliged to swear to the facts. Therefore, I move that the clause be amended in the way I suggest.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. What would they swear to—that they have good cause to believe or that they suppose? That means nothing at all. If they have to make an affidavit, let them say what they know.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is quite evident that there is a great deal of difference of opinion in the House as to this Bill, and I think the hon. mover would have been wise to adopt the suggestion made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and refer it to a Select Committee in order that its merits and demerits may be reported upon. For my own part, I do not think that the Bill is one that should be passed in its present shape. There are a good many objectionable features in it which, I think, make it a cumbrous and unworkable measure. And I think the difficulties have been pointed out so clearly, that the House cannot, in justice to itself, pass the Bill in its present shape. One of the great objections is, that it will create a new court of procedure, with all the paraphernalia of a court. Our courts are already sufficient in number and complexity, without making more confusion by establishing new ones. I can fancy what a picnic it will be to the lawyers, after a general election, if this Bill becomes law. Take the two hundred and fifteen counties in the Dominion. After each election there is always a dissatisfied party, and there will be no difficulty in getting twenty-five men who will put up $4 apiece and file a petition, that, to the best of their belief, certain irregularities have taken place. On the strength of that, an investigation is held, and the party accused has got to defend himself, and the judge may appoint any place in the county for his sittings, or within ten miles of the county. The judge may adjourn the court, from time to time, and carry on the proceedings as he sees fit, and the defendant will be put to heavy expense in defending himself against a charge of this kind. We will have two courts then in connection with elections. In one a petition is presented, stating that the candidate elected has not been elected fairly, and he has to go through all the turmoil and expense of defending his suit before the election court. Then, as soon as he is through, the parties have another fling at him, by twenty-five of them signing a petition, stating that they are led to believe that certain irregularities have taken place, so that he is brought before the courts a second time. It will be easy to amend the law so as to meet the views of the mover of this Bill. For my part, I think it is a very cumbersome and expensive measure, and I do not believe it will meet the object the hon. gentleman has in view. I think that this House ought to guard against committing themselves to the punishment of the man who was bribed. I would punish severely the man who offers the bribe, because I think he is the one who ought to be punished. We all know how bribery is carried on. It is not done in the open day or in the market place, and the only way you can get at it is by the party who received the bribe, giving it away. If you put a penalty upon him, you will close his mouth, and it will be almost impossible to prove that bribery has been committed. I believe that, if this Bill were to pass, bribery and corruption will prevail to a much larger extent than it does to-day. It would be very unwise for the House to pass the Bill in anything like its present shape. It would be better to amend the law at present on our statutes and avoid all this paraphernalia of a new election court.

Mr. LISTER. It is somewhat remarkable and amusing to see what a unanimity of opinion exists in the House against bribery and corruption, and then see how earnestly and zealously hon. gentlemen try to escape the responsibilities of appearing to support bribery and corruption, by finding all sorts of faults with the Bill before the House. Many hon. gentlemen who spoke, evidently have not even read the Bill, or they are confounding it with the Election Act. This is not at all in connection with the Election Act. It is for an entirely different purpose. The Election Act is for the purpose of voiding an election in which bribery has been committed by a candidate or his agent. This is for the purpose of purifying the country from the class of people against whom it is directed. One hon. gentleman says that we should not have a statutory declaration, but an affidavit, that you should have people swear that they know of their own knowledge that such and such a person has been guilty of a corrupt act. The object of this Bill is to have an investigation in any constituency where bribery has prevailed to such an extent as to call for an investigation. If we insisted upon having an affidavit that the person, of his own knowledge, knows that bribery has been committed, the Bill could not be enforced. Where bribery has been committed, it is pretty generally known, it is in the air, and people may safely say that they have reason to believe bribery has been committed, and such an affidavit ought to be sufficient. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), while professing his zeal that does him credit, in the way of putting down bribery and corruption, fears that the candidate may suffer. Let me remove that doubt at once and for ever. Let me say there is no danger of the candidate being involved in these proceedings. They are not directed against the candidate, but against a class of men who should not be permitted to exercise the ballot. They are directed against the men who sell the highest privilege the law gives them. Surely, such men are not entitled to sympathy and should not longer be permitted to exercise that inestimable privilege, the right to say who shall represent them. But the hon. gentleman tells us, that it is a secret transaction, and that, if we are going to punish both parties to the offence, we will deprive ourselves of the evidence necessary to conviction. How are you going to convict them in the Bill? There are only two men in the world who know anything about it. Are you going to charge both with the offence? I say the man who is bribed usually looks for that bribe. He follows people up seeking to be bribed, and in the excitement people forget their duty, and, desiring to elect their candidate, yield to the importunity of the man who seeks to be bribed. He is punished under the Election Act if you can get at him, but by the course taken here an investigation is made and the men who have taken bribes are liable to be punished. There is no danger such as my hon. friend fancies about the procedure. It is of the simplest kind. The people who are supposed to have taken bribes are notified to appear on a certain day. The case is investigated, and if they are guilty they are punished; if they are innocent, I take it that their fees are to be paid. My hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Masson) talks about a formal trial after notifying the accused; but there is nothing of the kind contemplated here. It is a simple investigation, such as might take place in the House of Commons or any place else. The person is called upon to appear; he is accused of violating this law, the evidence heard in support of the charge and he is given an opportunity to answer. Why should we hunt up difficulties in the way of a measure that is, at all events, in the right direction? The hon. gentleman must not forget that this House some years ago passed almost a similar measure except that the twenty-five people had to petition Parliament, and Parliament ordered the investigation. With that one exception the Act is identical, so far as initiating the proceeding is concerned.

Mr. DUPONT. Amend it, then.

Mr. LISTER. Was there ever a trial under it, was it ever given a chance? Why was it repealed? The House deliberately passed it; but at all events that was a more cumbersome system than that my hon. friend proposes; by that Act the petition had to come before Parliament, and Parliament had to order the investigation. The proceeding here is simplicity itself. Twenty-five men, who, we must assume, are respectable citizens, say by petition that bribery has been committed, and they invoke the law; and if men are proven before a competent tribunal—not a partisan tribunal—to have taken bribes, punishment ensues. The whole matter will be left to the judges to say what is fair and right. If a man has been guilty of taking a bribe why not punish him by deprivation of a right that he has abused?

Mr. DELISLE. (Translation.) The third section, Mr. Chairman, ought to be set aside; it will be a source of a large expenditure, and, moreover, it will create a new political machinery.

Mr. FREMONT. (Translation.) It is the reproduction of section 3 of chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. Under that law it is the Minister of Justice who controls the appointment of the officers therein mentioned; therefore, there is no danger.

Amendment agreed to. Yeas, 55; nays, 27.

On section 4,

Mr MASSON. Before that clause is adopted I would like to move several amendments. I would move that the words "or within ten miles thereof" in the fourth and sixth lines be struck out, and that the words "or the neighbourhood thereof" be struck out, and in lieu thereof, there be inserted "if there be no such papers published in the said district then in the two papers published nearest thereto." I would also move that the word "ten," in the twelfth line be struck out, and in lieu thereof the word "fourteen." Ten days publication would mean one insertion in a weekly newspaper, unless it would be construed that it would require two insertions. Fourteen or fifteen days would insure at least two publications, and there would be seven days after the second before the court could take place.

Mr. RIDER. What is meant by "district" —electoral district or prohibition district?

Mr. WELDON. I would ask to put in the word "electoral" district.

Mr. AMYOT. Is there any provision about the expenses of the commissioners; who will take the money?

Mr. WELDON. That is provided later.

Mr. DELISLE. If I understand it aright that provision is contained in the seventeenth clause, which provides that persons presenting a petition to the Governor-General under this Act will be obliged to deposit $100. I would be very much surprised if the hon. member (Mr. Weldon) would be ready to say that $100 would cover the expenses to be incurred.

Mr. WELDON. When we reach that clause I will ask to amend it.

Mr. LISTER. Suppose no newspapers are published in the electoral district?

Mr. CURRAN. That would be an amendment made for the province of Quebec, publication to be made in both languages the same as in other cases.

Mr. AMYOT. I do not see the use of amending that; the Bill says "two newspapers of general circulation in the district or the neighbourhood thereof." A paper of general circulation in the French district is a French paper.

Mr. CURRAN. Not in every place. Take the city of Montreal, there are papers published in each language and there are many who read exclusively papers in one language.

Mr. DELISLE. This raises the question what is "general circulation"? We have in Quebec English papers, the "Morning Chronicle," the "Mercury" and the "Daily Telegraph," and if you do not mention in what language this notice is to be given some people will be left without the necessary notice of the holding of the court.

Mr. WELDON. That is the present law.

Mr. DELISLE. But it has been stated that this is a new Bill, that the Bill is quite a stranger to the old law.

Mr. FREMONT. The words "general circulation" are not the words usually used for notice by statute. I should think it would be better to provide for publication in two papers in the district.

Mr. WELDON. That is the very language of the Act.

Mr. FREMONT. I am speaking of the law generally and not of this Act alone. It is provided that notice shall be given in papers published in the electoral district, and if there are no newspapers published in the district then in the neighbouring district. I think it would be preferable to provide for publication in newspapers published in the district; otherwise, for instance in Quebec, they might pretend that the Montreal papers have a general circulation there.

Mr. MASSON. What I propose is the addition of these words: "And in the event of there being no, or only one, newspaper published in said district, then in two newspapers published nearest to the said electoral district."

Mr. AMYOT. I do not think the hon. gentleman has read the clause as it stands; it covers that. It provides for publication in two newspapers "of general circulation in the district." It does not say the papers are to be published in the district.

Mr. RIDER. I would like to make another suggestion as to notice to be given to the electors who are petitioned. I move that the words "by registered letter" be put in after the word "mailing."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think that suggestion should be accepted.

Mr. WELDON. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. The difficulty with regard to publication is that if there is no newspaper published in the electoral district, then, unless you provide for publication in the nearest newspapers, you may not have the notice in the newspaper reach the people interested. I have a section here which I will send to the hon. gentleman, and which I think would meet the case.

Mr. WELDON. My hon. friend has put in my hand the statute of Lower Canada which seems to me to meet the case perfectly. It provides that notice is to be given to the defendant by publication twice in the French language and twice in the English language in papers published in the locality if there be any, and, if not, in the newspapers published in the nearest locality.

Mr. DELISLE. The observation of my hon. friend is quite right, but the section he quotes has no reference to such cases as are covered by this clause.

Mr. AMYOT. The clause the hon. gentleman has read refers to notice served upon parties who are absent. The clause my hon. friend has read refers to actions served upon the parties who are present. But what is the object of this notice at all? Is it for the general public to know that the court will be held, or is it for the petitioners?

Mr. WELDON. The primary object is to let the parties who are interested in this proceeding, have notice. The secondary object is to let the general public who have anything to contribute to the inquiry, come in and be heard.

Mr. AMYOT. In our province the notice had better be given at the church doors. The municipal notices are always given at the door of the church.

Mr. WELDON. Let the hon. member move an amendment to that effect.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. The Bill says that as soon as the commissioner is ready to go on in the county or riding, he shall publish a notice in the press. The clause says he may adjourn from time to time. Suppose he adjourns for a month, then he would have to give notice again. Perhaps there will be no witness present at the court, and he may adjourn again for fourteen or fifteen days. Suppose he calls twenty witnesses and not one of them is present; then he will adjourn, but who will know it unless he gives another notice?

Mr. LANGELIER. It is just that way in election petitions. Notice is given, the court may adjourn from time to time, and the interested parties always know it.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. That is a case of one party petitioning against another. If the plaintiff is not ready he applies to have a day fixed, and both parties know it. But here there may be 100 parties.

Mr. LANGELIER. The public notice is intended for the general public in the electoral district. I do not see the necessity of publishing further notices as the amendment suggests. In the province of Quebec there is a proceeding much more important than this, which involves the cancellation of Crown lands. When I was Commissioner of Crown Lands, I introduced an amendment which is exactly in accordance with what is now suggested. Formerly the cancellation of lands might take place by simply publishing the notice in the "Official Gazette," which no one ever reads. The law now provides that notice must be sent by post card to the interested party, so the Commissioner of Crown Lands will be sure that notice reaches the party before cancellation takes place. One can understand that the cancellation of location tickets is much more important to the parties interested, than this proceeding can be. I think that notification has been found sufficient, and has worked in a satisfactory manner.

Mr. DELISLE.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. In this Bill a petition signed by twenty-five electors is sent to the Governor-General asking for an investigation. The judge fixes a time and place, and when he arrives not one of those twenty-five petitioners may be present. Perhaps they have all been bought out by the opposite party. Then the judge will be alone with two or three clerks, and he spends the whole day there without hearing any witness.

Mr. DELISLE. I would like to ask the framer of this Bill what he means by the words "within a reasonable time?" Is it a time for a debtor to pay his debts, or for a man to be hung? It is important that we should know what the hon. member means by these words. Of course he provides by a further clause that if the judges or commissioners fail to act through death or otherwise, they can be replaced. But it is very important for us to know what these words mean.

Mr. WELDON. I had the great advantage in drafting this Bill of having an admirable procedure ready made to my hand, which was drafted by Mr. Blake and put on the Statutes in 1876. It was reaffirmed by this House seven years ago, and is in the present Acts of Parliament. "The commissioners shall, upon their appointment, or within a reasonable time afterwards," is a phrase of which we have the equivalent in our statutes.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. The notice must be given in English and French. The section says: "They shall give notice of their appointment and of the time and place of holding their first meeting, by publishing the same in two newspapers in general circulation in said electoral district or the neighbourhood thereof." Suppose there is no paper published in that district. I move to add: "In the province of Quebec such notice shall be published in the English and French languages."

Mr. LANGELIER. In the province of Quebec it is sufficient to say that one of the said papers shall be published in the French language, because it would be of no use to publish a French notice in an English paper. The amendment suggested would mean that you might publish a French notice in an English paper.

Mr. CURRAN. In the greater part of the province of Quebec there are only French papers in many districts.

Mr. LANGELIER. In Quebec we have several papers which circulate among both French and English, in which you might publish a notice in both languages.

Mr. OUMET. I move in amendment that in the province of Quebec, the province of Manitoba and the Territories of the Northwest, such notice shall be published in at least one paper printed in the French language.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the sense of applying that to the North-west? There is no French paper published there.

Mr. FREMONT. If there is no French paper in the locality, will the notices be published in English and French in an English newspaper?

Mr. MASSON. Under the amendment it would be necessary to publish notices in French in the North-west Territories, and I believe there is no French paper published there.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I do not think we need the amendment, because there might be a French newspaper there.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. The Government will pay the expense, at all events.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I must warn this House that the French language is still official in Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

Mr. AMYOT. What is the consequence of the hon. gentleman's warning?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I object to the amendment, and I wish Manitoba and the North-west to be included so far as publications in French are concerned.

Mr. AMYOT. But if there is no French paper, how can the notices be published in French?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. If not, the notices will not require to be printed.

Mr. DELISLE. The publication can be left to the procedure of each province.

Mr. FREMONT. Much trouble would have been saved if this Bill had been referred to a special committee, where these matters would have been rapidly dealt with. There is a clause in all statutes in the province of Quebec dealing with this question. The rule in the province of Quebec is, that in a district where the newspapers are published only in one language, whether English or French, notices are published in both languages in the same newspaper. A similar provision might be embodied in this Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think we are introducing very vicious legislation. We understand very well that in the province of Quebec important notices are published in both languages. It is, however, perfect nonsense to apply that rule to Manitoba. There is a very small French population there. In many districts, there is no French paper issued, and if we make it a necessary condition that notices should be published in French newspapers, when we know there are scarcely any there, we are simply defeating the Bill. I object, on principle, to the proposition that we should apply to Manitoba the rule that all notices should be published in the French language. It is almost absurd to talk about it. It may be very well to say that French is an official language in the Local Legislature. Of course, the Legislature can decide that certain official notices shall be published in the French and English language, separately or jointly; but to declare that this Bill shall not go into operation until notices have been published in both languages, when it is known that in most of the districts no French newspapers are published, seems to be an attempt to defeat the Bill, and, at the same time to introduce a very vicious system.

Mr. LANGELIER. A similar remark would apply to English newspapers published in the province of Quebec, because there are several districts where no English newspapers are published.

Mr. AMYOT. At half past eleven o'clock the cat has got out of the bag, and we see the bottom of the hon. gentleman's heart. He knows there are many townships in Manitoba where the English language is not spoken. He knows that we are determined to keep our rights, and now he comes here at half past eleven, with his white necktie and says it is perfect nonsense to give the notices in the French language in the province of Manitoba. We have inherited our language, and I tell him at any hour of the day or night we are prepared to defend it. I am surprised that a man who intends becoming the leader of a great party should make a statement like that. He may be sure that the statement he has made to-night will be repeated, and that the electors of the province of Quebec will know who their real friends are. These parishes and townships in Manitoba where French is spoken have a perfect right to have notices given in the French language. What harm does it do the hon. gentleman that French people receive notices written in French? I hope he will not increase fanaticism and passion by trying to take that right away from them.

Mr. LISTER. I rise to a point of order. What is all this talk about. The clause the hon. gentleman refers to has been carried.

Mr. AMYOT. If the hon. gentleman wants to withdraw what he has said I will resume my seat.

On section 5-A.

Mr. WELDON. I move to add to this clause the following:—

The Commissioners may make rules regulating their procedure as to the duty of any officer appointed in connection with the inquiry.

Mr. FREMONT. I think there is a very great objection to this clause.

Mr. WELDON. They all seem to be very objectionable clauses.

Mr. FREMONT. After the hon. gentleman from Albert (Mr. Weldon) has heard what I have to say, I think he will himself suggest another clause instead of this. The powers of a commissioner appointed in connection with this Act commence when he is appointed and finish when he has ceased his inquiry, so that the rules of practice which he will adopt can only apply to the case which he will investigate and will not apply to inquiries which take place elsewhere. These rules of practice should be uniform and should extend to all inquiries, and they should be made by the Governor-General in Council upon the report of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I suppose it is in order to discuss whether these rules shall be printed in both languages? My hon. friend (Mr. Amyot) misunderstood what I said. The Bill, as amended, provides that, whether you have a French paper or not, in Manitoba, you shall publish the notice in a French paper, and, if there is no French paper, the law will become inoperative. It would be perfectly proper for the commissioners to publish the notice in such language as they thought right. Of course no one but a fanatic would prevent the notice being published in the language of the people to whom it ought to be addressed, but what I drew the attention of the committee to was, that, whether there was a French paper in the district or not, the amendment provides that it shall be published in a French paper.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I call the attention of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to the fact that the election law provides that the proclamation shall be published in both languages in Manitoba, and, therefore, we are only following the words of the Act in this matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If there is no French newspaper, how can you publish it?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. In the next district.

Mr. McLEOD. I think there is a good deal of force in the objection taken by the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Frémont). I move as follows:—

The judges authorized to try election petitions in each province shall make rules regulating the duties of any officer appointed in connection with the inquiry.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I want to know if those opposed to corruption are serious or not; and, in that view, I move that words be inserted here to punish those who give bribes as well as those who take them. A poor man with a family to support may be offered a bribe, and if he accepts it, he is disqualified for seven years, but the man who gives it to him is let go. I do not think that is just. The Controverted Elections Act provides for punishing men who buy their votes. I want it provided that the more guilty man, he who gives the bribe, shall be punished as well as the less guilty man who accepts the bribe. I would move to add the words, "and also those who have offered or given bribes."

Mr. DELISLE. I think the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman is quite reasonable.

Mr. FREMONT.

The more intelligent a man is the more guilty he is when he commits a bad act, and if we punish the poor fellow who accepts a dollar, not knowing the wrong that he does, why should we not punish much more severely the man who offers the bribe, and who, generally being more intelligent, knows the evil he is doing? I think the law should be amended in the way the hon. member proposes.

Amendment negatived.

Committee rose and reported progress.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to lay on the Table of the House certain papers relating to the French treaty, and to that end I move:

That a humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General for a return of certain papers relating to the treaty with France.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are there any other papers?

Mr. FOSTER. I think these are all that will be necessary.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 16th March, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 99) respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman tell us briefly what the scope of the Bill is?

Mr. FOSTER. The Harbour Commissioners were given certain borrowing powers and they have borrowed under the power. Some of their debentures are about maturing, and this is to enable them to borrow the amount necessary to redeem the maturing bonds.

Mr. MULLOCK. Will the hon. gentleman explain how it comes to be a Government measure?

Mr. FOSTER. The Harbour Commission was formed by a Government Act, and this matter was brought to my notice a short time ago by the Commissioners, and the present was considered the best and speediest means—

Mr. MULOCK. Of getting over the regulations in regard to Private Bills.

Mr. FOSTER. It is only a little one.

Mr. MULOCK. But it is a Private Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a quasi-Private Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 100) further to amend the Insurance Act. He said: This Bill is at the request of a number of the insurance societies and in line of the provision which is found in many of these societies, the object being to limit the number of shares on which any one director or stockholder may vote.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENTS IN DIGBY, N.S.

Mr. BOWERS asked, What is the number of industrial establishments in the town of Digby, N.S.? The number in the township of Westport, including Long and Brier Islands, Digby county? The number in the township of Hillsburgh, Digby county?

Mr. FOSTER. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that in the town of Digby the industries, with the hands employed, are as follows:—

CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS—SPEECH AT KINGSTON.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether the Controller of Customs is correctly reported as having said, in the course of a speech at a banquet at Kingston, on Friday :

Our friends [meaning? Orangemen in Ireland] over there will never submit: Britain may cast them out, but if she does she has no right to look for their further allegiance. They are preparing for action. Their unalterable determination is never to submit to Home Rule, and they will have the sympathy of the Orangemen of Canada. Aye, more than sympathy! they will have our active aid if that active aid be necessary. We shall be unworthy of our ancestors if we fail in our duty at such a crisis.

Mr. FOSTER. In answer, I will say that the Government has no information with regard to this matter.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS— PRECEDENCE.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That for the remainder of the session Government Orders shall have precedence on Wednesday after Questions put by Members.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is it proposed to take Mondays, also ?

Mr. FOSTER. Not at present.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would suggest to the Minister that it would be better to take Monday and leave Wednesday, as on Wednesday we can take up Notices of Motions and Public Bills and Orders for a portion of the day.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. I think an arrangement was made by which we could take Monday. After next Monday, I will have no objection to take Wednesday's Orders.

Mr. WELDON. Does the arrangement apply to Monday, next week ?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. WELDON. I wish the leader of the House could see his way to give us a little more time. I had a Bill before the committee last night which was placed on the Order Paper on the first day of the session, and not a single opportunity has been missed of getting it before the House. We have had practically only two opportunities of reaching it during the session.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the Government insist on taking one of the two days, I think it would be better to leave Wednesdays. It would divide up business in the hands of private members more equally.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think any case has been made out for interfering with either Monday or Wednesday. We are only a month and a half in session, so far, and there is no doubt a good deal of useful legislation on the Public Bills and Orders that ought to receive fair treatment. There is a lot of work on the Notice Paper which will absorb all of two Mondays, and I do not think it is fair that these Bills should be crowded out, for that is what it means if the Government persist. I would suggest that this motion be deferred until we see how we get along at the expiration of the week. I do not think the Government is doing fairly by the private members this session. They began to take private members' days at a very early date; and, in order to facilitate the departure of the Premier, this side of the House voluntarily assented to the motion taking Thursday, much sooner than it would otherwise have done. I think the Government ought to reciprocate and not press this motion.

Mr. McCARTHY. I desire, also, to enter my protest against the course which is now proposed. As the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) has said, he introduced his Bill on the first day of the session, and, if this motion carries, there is no possibility of reaching it again, so that he may move its third reading. If the Government are determined to call us together merely for the purpose of voting a Supply Bill, they might as well announce it, and then we need not go to the trouble of preparing public Bills and putting them on the Paper. I think the hon. gentleman who is leading the House had better postpone this motion, or else put important public Bills on the Government Orders. I am interested in a Bill which I placed on the Paper at the beginning of the session, but, if this motion carries, there will be no possibility of reaching it.

Mr. LAVERGNE. I have on the Order Paper a Bill which, although comprising only a section, is of some importance respecting the province of Quebec. If the Government take Wednesdays, I do not see how I shall be able to reach it, although the leader of the Government has informed me that I should have a chance to bring it forward. If a Bill introduced so early in the session cannot be reached it is perfectly useless to attempt to bring any measure before this House.

Mr. CHARLTON. There are twenty-two Orders under the heading of Public Bills and Orders, and thirty Notices of Motion. I do not think the Minister of Finance needs to be reminded that private members have not had a day until yesterday for public Bills since the day on which the Budget was delivered. The Budget debate consumed several of the private days, and then concessions were made for the purpose of facilitating the departure of Sir John Thompson. Private members will not be treated with any degree of fairness if the two days are taken next week. The Government should permit the public business to be done as well as their own. If we have twenty-two or twenty-three Orders for Bills on the Paper they should not be sacrificed.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no disposition, I am sure, on either side of the House to curtail the working time of the House beyond what is at all prudent. The proposition I am making will give hon. gentlemen who have private Bills at least two occasions for proceeding with them, provided the general wish on both sides of the House that we should try and get through the business by Easter succeeds in being realized. I think that is very strongly the opinion entertained on both sides of the House. I have not made this motion without doing the courtesy to the leader of the Opposition of consulting him about it, and he perfectly agreed with me, and concurred in the arrangement, and I then put the motion on the Paper. I think it fairly indicates what is the wish of both the Government and Opposition sides of the House. Of course, it must be taken with a fair measure of liberty to all members of the House who are entitled to it. There are no doubt twenty-five or thirty motions on the Paper, but if the House is never to decide on an approximate day on which to get through its business until the Order Paper is clear the House will sit from January to December, and it will be within the memory of the House that we have taken unopposed motions six or seven times so that every motion that required information and was not placed on the Paper for the purpose of some hon. member ventilating a question, there has been an opportunity of passing it and obtaining the information. What I propose to do, and I think it is a fair proposition, is to take succeeding Wednesdays for the Government, and to make the Order for Monday to be Wednesday's Order. That will give hon. members the evenings for public Bills. It must be remembered, even by those who have complained, the hon. member for North Simcoe, and the hon. member for North Norfolk, that we have passed their Bills, if not two or three times, or at least once.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is one feature of this session's legislation to which I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Finance. It has been the custom for members to get Orders of the House for returns, and no doubt a great many members have motions on the Paper with the intention of addressing the House so soon as the returns are brought down. The hon. member for North Norfolk has drawn attention to the fact that there are twenty-four notices on the Paper. I am quite satisfied that a great many of these are motions for the purpose of securing information on which the members will afterwards address the House. I notice that although there have been a large number of returns granted this year, only one-third of the returns have been laid on the Table as yet. It is impossible for hon. gentlemen to discharge the duties of the Opposition efficiently if the information necessary to enable them to proceed with their resolutions is withheld until the closing days of the session. The hon. gentleman now proposes to take the last day left to private members, and thus shut private members out from getting on with motions. If we are to close the business at an early day, more energetic efforts should be made to place in the hands of members returns granted early in the session, so as to enable them to take up the different matters and discuss them.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) has stated that there was an understanding across the floor, I suppose between himself and the Government, that he should have an opportunity of proceeding with his Bill to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act. It appears to me that the only way in which this can be done is for the Government to place it on their Orders.

Mr. FOSTER. I will explain. By the motion I make there will be two days, even though we are able to get away by Easter, in which the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of proceeding with his Bill—two Mondays.

Mr. EDGAR. The Public Bills and Orders are never reached on Mondays.

Mr. FOSTER. But I have asked to substitute Wednesday's Order Paper for Monday.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That for the remainder of the Session Government Orders shall have precedence on Wednesday, and that the Orders for Wednesday under Rule 19 be substituted for Monday's Orders during the remainder of the session.

Motion agreed to, on division.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. LISTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to draw the attention of the Government to an astonishing statement which appears in the Montreal "Star," of a very recent date, respecting the treaty recently negotiated between this country and France. I will read what the paper says :

LONDON, March 15.—Surprise, amounting almost to indignation, exists here over the statement made by Hon. G. E. Foster in the House of Commons on Monday night, that he would not ask the House to ratify the French treaty this session of Parliament, as there were some points in the draft treaty which would require still further consideration. Apparently this decision was reached at a late stage in the day, or, in other words, after the plenipotentiaries had appended their signatures to the agreement, for the High Commissioner for Canada, Sir Charles Tupper, who acted on behalf of the Dominion in negotiating the treaty, says he cannot understand the action of the Ottawa Ministry. He declared to-day to the "Star's" correspondent that every detail of the French treaty was before the Canadian Government when the authorized British plenipotentiaries signed it. Moreover, he states that the treaty, as signed, was made in exact conformity with the Canadian Government's wishes, except the most-favoured-nation clause, stipulating that Canada should receive the same treatment in France with regard to the articles mentioned in the treaty as any other favoured nation, while Canada was to extend like treatment to France in all articles. But, Sir Charles stated, he had every reason to believe that the explanation he had given on this point was perfectly satisfactory. If it was not, the Canadian Government had been given plenty of time to express their disapproval, for the treaty was sent to Ottawa on February 6, the same day on which it was signed in Paris by the plenipotentiaries. But not a single intimation of disapproval was received until Mr. Foster's exceptions in the House on Monday evening were cabled here.

I understand the Colonial and Foreign Offices are utterly at a loss to appreciate the Canadian position. They do not understand how it is possible after the treaty having been drawn up in accordance with the Dominion Government's wishes and signed by Sir Charles Tupper on their behalf, that the Minister of Finance should, without expressing any disapproval to the authorities here after having received the draft treaty, rise in the House and declare that he objected to the favoured nation clause and some of the stipulations about canned fish.

Speaking in this connection, a prominent official said to the "Star's" correspondent to-day: "This statement of the Canadian Finance Minister is an insult to the British Government: it is an insult to France, as well as to the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava and Sir Charles Tupper. Canada has aspirations for free treaty-making power, and I see Mr. Laurier drew attention to this in his criticism of the French treaty. Well, if the Canadian Ministry keep up this practice of throwing everything overboard after the treaty has been signed, their desire for treaty-making power will receive but little encouragement from the Imperial authorities."

In conjunction with the matter a leading "city" man remarked: "Why, the attempted repudiation by Premier Mercier in 1891, of the Quebec loan, is nothing to an action like this. Canada may as well shut up shop if it cannot improve on these methods so foreign to the usages existing in connection with international affairs.

It will be interesting to the country to know whether the statement contained in this article is correct: That the Canadian Government was apprised from time to time, and knew what the conditions of that treaty were at the time it was signed.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the opinions that the city man and the other prominent man have with reference to the transaction, I have nothing to say. Every man has a right to his opinion. The whole telegram was based on a fundamental error, namely, that I said I did not intend to ask Parliament to ratify the treaty this session. What I stated may be found in the "Hansard," and it will not bear out that interpretation. As to the insult to the British Government, or to France, or to Sir Charles Tupper, I do not conceive it is any insult—when a fundamental article of the treaty provides that it shall be subject to the ratification of Parliament—to lay it before Parliament with a full and frank explanation, in order that Parliament may have a full chance to consider it.

Mr. EDGAR. I find in the papers which were laid on the Table last night by the Finance Minister, a couple of cablegrams between the Government here and Sir Charles Tupper which throw a good deal of light upon this feature of the matter. One dated 6th February is as follows:—

PARIS, 6th February, 1893.

To Sir John Thompson,
Ottawa.

Treaty was duly signed at Foreign Office to-day at five; only alteration in draft already sent you is the addition of wood pavement in the piece. The letters were also exchanged. Am mailing full text in English and French both of treaty and letters Wednesday.

(Sgd.) TUPPER.

On the same day, 6th February, a cable was sent from Ottawa, addressed to "Tupper" at London, and signed "Thompson," as follows:—

OTTAWA, 6th February, 1893.

"Tupper,"
London (and forward).

No draft received; no steps shall be taken towards ratification until we cable approval. At present cannot understand what terms proposed either side.

(Sgd.) THOMPSON.

That is the way it stood when the treaty was ratified. Then on the 8th February, Sir Charles Tupper telegraphed from London to "Bowell," Ottawa, as follows:—

LONDON, 8th February, 1893.

"Bowell," Ottawa.

Had left Paris for London before your message arrived. Treaty was signed at five on Monday in accordance with instructions from your Government. No change in original draft except to give minimum tariff on wood for pavement in addition to all the other articles enumerated. The proposals in letters exchanged by plenipotentiaries are not binding but optional.

(Sgd.) TUPPER.

Sir Charles Tupper contends in his cablegram that the treaty was signed in accordance with instructions from the Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, before you pass from this subject, which is one of the very gravest importance—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is hardly in order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The matter is so important that I shall have to ask some hon. gentleman to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. TARTE. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would not have done this were it not that the matter is of such importance. The hon. Finance Minister left the impression on those who heard him the other day, that it was not the intention of the Government to ask the House to ratify the treaty this session. He may not have intended to do that, but at all events it is the impression he conveyed. The hon. gentleman asked us to refer to his exact words in "Hansard," and I think it is of importance that we should do so. I call his attention to the fact that after he had brought to the attention of the House the treaty, as he understood it, and taken certain exceptions to the clauses of that treaty as he understood them, he said:

"Under these circumstances I am not prepared at present to ask Parliament to ratify this treaty. The treaty is signed subject to the ratification of the Canadian Parliament, and I make this full and frank exposition of the treaty in order that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House may look into it and consider it, for it requires a little consideration, in order to see just what the effect of the treaty is in these different particulars. And certainly, until we receive more satisfactory assurances than we have as regards these items of which I have spoken, I shall not ask the House to ratify the treaty.

I may say that so far as the hon. gentleman's statement went, it was not only understood pretty clearly by us, but it gave some of us a great deal of satisfaction to know that he did not intend to ask sanction for the treaty this session. But, if the hon. gentleman, or if the Government of which he is a leading member, propose to ask the ratification of Parliament to that treaty this session, I think in view of the language the hon. gentleman used the other day, that we should now have an intimation from him to that effect. This matter will require a great deal of consideration and a good deal of prolonged discussion, and if the House is to be asked at this late period in the session to assent to the treaty, we ought to have some intimation to that effect from the Government, because we have been misled by the language the hon. gentleman used.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This matter is one of very great importance, and I cannot understand myself, any justification for the language that Sir Charles Tupper is reported to have used in regard to the position of the Government on this treaty. The Government may have acted imprudently or improperly in concurring in the treaty before they fully realized the character of its provisions; but, Sir, when that treaty provides that it shall not come into operation without the sanction of this House, the sanction of this House is not to be regarded as a mere formal matter but as a matter of substance; and being a matter of substance there is no ground for any such accusation, unless Parliament had given that sanction, and then had undertaken to repudiate it. Now, Sir, that is not our position. I would just refer to a very important case that I believe is precisely on all-fours with this: Many years ago, when the French Government was asked by the Government of Great Britain to join with them in treaty stipulations with a view of putting an end to the slave trade, an arrangement was made by the executive Governments of the two countries. If I remember rightly that treaty on behalf of France was signed, but had not yet been exchanged. The French Chamber had expressed a very strong opinion adverse to the ratification of that treaty and to its exchange and Guizot, who was Prime Minister at the time, said: That every step taken in the negotiations of the treaty towards its completion must be regarded, not as a mere matter of form, but as a matter of substance, and that if the Government had known the feeling of the French Assembly at the time the agreement was arrived at, then the Government of France would not have given its sanction to the treaty; it would not have negotiated a treaty adverse to the public opinion of France. And the Government of Great Britain with whom the negotiation was had, admitted that that was a good and sufficient reason for not going on with the treaty to its final completion. So, I say in this matter: If the Government has given its sanction to the provisions of that treaty, then the Government of this country has made a very serious mistake, and there has been a very great deal of carelessness, or, at all events, a very great error of judgment. But it is infinitely better that the Government should retrace its steps than that it should ask the House to ratify a treaty of the character of this one, a treaty that the hon. Minister of Finance himself clearly intimated to the House was, in his opinion, not in the interests of the country, if it were carried into effect. Sir, I agree with that, although I am inclined to think that a very great blunder has been committed in the negotiation of this treaty, a blunder so great that I cannot understand how a gentleman of the intelligence and ability of Sir Charles Tupper could have for one moment entertained such one-sided propositions as those embraced in this treaty—a treaty to some extent in the interests of France, so far as it goes, but to no extent whatever in the interests of this country. When it is expressly provided in that treaty that it shall not come into operation without the sanction of this House, I say there is no treaty at this moment, and there is nothing to complain of on the part of either the Government of Great Britain or the Foreign Office of France. We are here, in my opinion, masters of the situation, so far as we are concerned, and I trust that the Government will not commit the folly of proposing to this House the ratification of a treaty of the character of that which the hon. gentleman laid before the House two or three evenings ago.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Speaker, the point I desire to make in reading this article is this: When this matter came before the House the other night, the language of the Minister of Finance was such as to leave the impression on the minds of the members here that so far as he was concerned the terms of the treaty were not satisfactory to the Government, that it was doubtful whether the Government would ask the House to approve of the treaty, and that as at present advised they would not. Now, I say that the Government are censurable, because, as a matter of fact, if we are to take the statement of Sir Charles Tupper, that treaty was made in conformity with instructions given by the Ministry more than a month ago, while the negotiations were going on. So that when the Minister of Finance made the statement he did, he knew that the treaty was in conformity with the instructions given by the Government, that the Government had been fully informed of the terms and conditions of the treaty, and that the Government approved of the action of Sir Charles Tupper in concluding the treaty with the French authorities; yet he gives the House to understand, not by express terms, it is true, but by implication, that the Government are dissatisfied with the terms of the treaty, and that it is doubtful whether they will submit it to the House for approval or not.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, it is scarcely fair to let the matter go as my hon. friend has left it. My words are before the House, they were meant to convey everything they do convey, and they were not intended to convey one thing more than they do convey. What I said I had weighed carefully before I said it, and I intend, and the Government intend, to stand by what I said. What the hon. gentleman has stated as the purport and substance of my remarks may be his impression of them; but I do not think he can gather it from the remarks themselves. A matter of this kind I think we should treat calmly and fairly, without any attempt to make party capital out of it. It is a matter between this country and France. I quite agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that it is within the power of this Parliament to ratify the treaty, or not; and I do not think it can be spoken of as an insult, if this Parliament finds that it cannot ratify the treaty. Not more than three months ago, after the French Government itself had made a treaty with Switzerland, embracing a large number of articles, and subject to ratification by the Chambers, the French Chambers took that treaty and refused to ratify it; yet the French Government was not charged with discourtesy or with insulting the Swiss Government. The very fact of that clause being put into the treaty shows that it was meant to be a fundamental clause. The fact that it is stated that the treaty should be put before the Canadian Parliament shows that it was meant that it should be left to the wisdom of the Canadian Parliament, in the interests of Canada, to ratify it or not. I am loth to believe that the report in the "Star" clearly represents the views of Sir Charles Tupper in this matter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly I think the deduction might be fairly drawn from the words of the Finance Minister the other night, that the Government at that moment, and as advised, had no intention of submitting the treaty for our ratification. I think that deduction was very clear from the very damaging criticism which the Minister of Finance, properly in my judgment, subjected the treaty to—about as damaging a criticism as I have often heard indulged in. But the point to which I wish to call his attention is this. Undoubtedly the impression left on the minds of the members of this House was that we were not to be called on to discuss this treaty. We are as desirous as he is, of facilitating in all proper ways the business of the session, and I would ask, inasmuch as this is a matter of importance, if he does not do it to-day, that he will to-morrow or Monday, inform us what the decision of the Government is with respect to this same treaty—are they going to proceed with it, or are they not? Surely that is time enough for them, considering that this matter appears to have been within their cognizance for six or seven weeks, if we may judge by the dates of the telegrams which passed between Sir Charles Tupper and Sir John Thompson.

Mr. McMULLEN. I find on page 2355 of "Hansard," that the Finance Minister used these words:

The treaty is signed subject to the ratification of the Canadian Parliament, and I make this full and frank exposition of the treaty in order that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House may look into it and consider it, for it requires a little consideration, in order to see just what the effect of the treaty is in these different particulars. And certainly, until we receive more satisfactory assurances than we have as regards these items of which I have spoken, I shall not ask the House to ratify the treaty.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to call the attention of the Finance Minister to this, that he has not, as I understand it, answered what is the real gravamen of the question, that is, whether this treaty is based on the instructions given to Sir Charles Tupper or not? If it is, of course, the position is one thing; if it is not, the position is clearly another thing. We want to know exactly what the fact is in regard to that, because, as I understand from the statement we have before us, this treaty must have been in the hands of the Government at least a month ago; and if it is true, that the first intimation which the authorities at home and Sir Charles Tupper got of any objection on the part of the Government to this treaty, was the statement made in the House by the Minister of Finance the other evening, we cannot be surprised that Sir Charles Tupper felt a good deal of annoyance. That is a point which the Finance Minister has not touched upon.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not think it necessary to touch upon it. I thought the papers asked for conveyed the information upon that point, and they were laid upon the Table last night. With reference to the question my hon. friend asks me, it is a fair question, and I intend to give it a fair answer. My words conveyed the exact meaning they were intended to convey, and, unless the conditions change, I do not intend to vary those words.

Mr. EDGAR. We know that the cable despatches from the other side, and perhaps from this side also, are not always thoroughly to be relied on, and I dare say that the Minister of Finance is not to be held responsible for the cables about his movements and exploits which were received on this side of the Atlantic, when he was over there lately. But I wish to inform him, that among the brilliant achievements which were cabled out of the hon. gentleman over there, was a visit to Paris in connection with settling the terms of this treaty. It was, in fact, stated, that he had just about closed the matter so that I suppose the hon. Minister himself was not entirely ignorant of what was going on. I have no doubt, that if the plenipotentiary over there has exceeded his authority, or, at any rate, has done what is for the disadvantage of Canada, the Minister will find the Opposition supporting the Government against our very able plenipotentiary. I took the opportunity of looking hurriedly through these papers, with reference to another point. The other evening, I raised the question, whether Canada had informed France that she would not discriminate in favour of France at all in respect of the articles upon which we were to reduce the duty, because I understood the Minister of Finance to say that the Government did not intend to discriminate in favour of France against any country, and that France was perfectly aware of that all through. Perhaps there are papers that will show that, but I do not find any among those which have been brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. I informed the House—perhaps the hon. gentleman was not present—that I would put these papers on the Table, and that they would be followed by others.

Mr. EDGAR. I am calling his attention to an omission in these papers in that respect.

Mr. TARTE. There is a most important point on which we have not been informed. Sir Charles Tupper says most positively, that he was authorized to sign that treaty. We ought to know if he was really authorized or not. If he was, I do not see how we can refuse to ratify this treaty. If he was not authorized, we are entitled to know it now. When such a man as Sir Charles Tupper has signed a treaty and says he was authorized to do so, it is a very serious matter to find the Government which gave him that authorization, refusing to ask our ratification. There are not many precedents for such a course.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will look at the papers, he will find just the authority that was sent and more. He will find the explanation, as well, in the papers already brought down.

Mr. TARTE. There may have been no written authority, but there may have been verbal authority, which would be just as good.

Mr. FOSTER. There are no authorizations except what are contained in writing.

Mr. BORDEN. The words of the telegram read by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), and which were sent to the "Star," were as follows:—

Sir Charles Tupper declared to the "Star" correspondent that every detail of the French treaty was before the Canadian Government when the authorized British plenipotentiaries signed it. Moreover, he states that the treaty, as signed, was made in exact conformity with the Canadian Government's wishes, except the most-favoured-nation clause, stipulating that Canada should receive the same treatment in France with regard to the articles mentioned in the treaty as any other favoured nation, while Canada was to extend like treatment to France in all articles.

But Sir Charles stated he had every reason to believe that the explanation he had given on this point was perfectly satisfactory.

Now, the Minister states that the papers will show whether this is true or not. Very few of us have had an opportunity of reading the papers, and it seems to me only fair that the questions put by the hon. members for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) and Lambton (Mr. Lister) and L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) should be answered. I cannot see why the hon. Minister should hesitate. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has stated that he approves of the position taken by the Government, inasmuch as this treaty is subject to the ratification of Parliament, but if the statement made in that telegram be correct, that the treaty was signed with the express understanding that the Government approved of it, it is the duty of the Government to submit that treaty to Parliament. The Government is committed to it, and it will be time enough for Parliament to decide, after the treaty has been submitted to them, whether they will ratify it or not.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

KEMPTVILLE POST OFFICE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to call the attention of the leader of the House to the fact that a return moved for and granted by the House, with reference to certain irregularities and reports of the post office at Kemptville, has not been brought down, although considerable time has elapsed.

SUPPLY—TARIFF REFORM.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. IVES. After the remarkably able and comprehensive reply of my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) to the speech of the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, my task is an easy one. All that I propose to do is to notice a little more at length a few of his points, which, for want of time, my hon. friend from Haldimand did not give quite so much prominence to as I think might be desirable. I may say here that I think the Conservative party are to be congratulated upon the fact that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has come out from under cover and informed the House and the country what sort of tariff reform he is in favour of. We have heard a good deal said about unrest among the people with regard to the fiscal system of the country, but I beg to say that, in so far as that unrest affected National Policy Conservatives, it was in favour of a rectification and amendment of the tariff on the lines and within the principles of the National Policy. I don't know what Liberal uneasy people might have wished, or what they might have thought, but, in so far as the attitude of the hon. member for Simcoe affected National Policy Conservatives, it affected them because they supposed that the hon. gentleman still was a Conservative, still was a supporter of the National Policy, and that what he proposed was immediate change and improvement of the National Policy itself. And I think that nothing that could have happened in this House could more quickly have settled that unrest, so far as National Policy Conservatives are concerned, than the speech and the resolution of the hon. member for Simcoe. The hon. gentleman has been so completely answered with regard to his own record, that I do not propose to refer to that branch of the subject at all. I am more concerned with his resolution, with what he proposes to the country, than I am with his record. He bases his resolution upon two principal premises. His major premise is that the existing tariff has, in many instances, proven oppressive and burdensome to the great consuming classes, and more particularly to the agricultural classes, and that it is unfair and unjust in its incidence; and, as his second premise, and as his reason for immediate action, he says that the discontent created by its unfairness and its burdensomeness has amounted and does amount to disloyalty. Now, the proof of his first premise is the most important thing about his speech; it is the part of his speech that business men will examine most closely. If he has made out to the satisfaction of the country that the present tariff is, in many instances, burdensome and oppressive, and that it cannot be made less burdensome and oppressive within the lines and under the principles of the National Policy, then he has made out something of a case for what follows as the declaration of his resolution. Now, what has he said to justify the House or the country in coming to the conclusion that the existing tariff has proved burdensome and oppressive to the consuming classes and especially to the great agricultural classes? I must say I have heard a much better argument made by men on the back benches on both sides of this House than was made by the hon. gentleman. I was amazed when I read his speech, the important part of his speech and the part which business men will examine most closely, to see how little there is in it that is new, or that a business man would like to be responsible for. He starts off with the general statement that the National Policy may be credited with $265,000,000 of the total industrial production of the country. I believe the total industrial production is given at $350,000,000, and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), by some process of reasoning that he does not explain, reaches the conclusion that, of the total amount, $265,000,000 is due to the protective system. Well, he may be right or he may be wrong. He has not told us why he did not say $100,000,000 or $300,000,000; he has not given us any means of judging of the correctness of his figures at all. Then he makes another statement that, taking quality into consideration as well as price, this $265,000,000 worth of manufactured goods cost the people of this country, when they come into consumption, 30 per cent, or $80,000,000 more than they would have cost had we had a revenue tariff, and the people had been permitted to import them from other countries.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman allow me a word? I did not say that they cost so much more than they would have cost under a revenue tariff. I said they cost that much more than they would have cost under a system of free trade.

Mr. IVES. Very well; then take the hon. gentleman's statement of the case, and it raises one more question, and one more impracticability regarding his proposals, and that is: How are you going to get a revenue for this country? Take the hon. gentleman's statement as he now makes it, that these goods cost $80,000,000 more than they could have been brought here for from foreign countries under free trade; I want to know how he arrives at these figures. Has anybody who heard his speech the slightest idea of how he gets at these figures? Has he taken a yard of cotton and given us the price of it in the English or American market, estimated the cost of bringing it here, quoted the price of a yard of similar goods here and then compared the difference in proportion to the total consumption and ascertained that it represents so much? Did he do this with other items of the tariff? If he had made such a statement as this, if he had given us the opportunity to scrutinize his figures, there might be some basis for discussing them. But, because he, the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) assumes that the difference is $80,000,000, he asks us to believe it, without any proof or argument, and, for that reason, to change the whole fiscal policy of this country. Now, that was the hon. gentleman's general statement. He made some specific statements in this part of his speech. He went into what he will pardon me for calling a very awkward and involved calculation as to cotton. Instead of taking the price of cotton goods in England or the United States and comparing it with the price of cotton goods in Canada, which would seem to be the reasonable course, he undertook to show that there had been a much greater reduction in the price of cotton goods in England than there had been in the price of cotton goods in Canada. My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) pointed out to the House how much dependence could be placed on this calculation, when he showed that the hon. gentleman had been making his statement on the strength of a typographical error of some four or five years in "Hansard." But, Sir, what did he prove? He shows that there has been a greater decrease of price in cotton goods in England than there has been in Canada. I want to tell the hon. gentleman there has been a much greater deterioration in the quality of cotton goods manufactured for export in England in the last few years than in the cotton goods manufactured in Canada. I want to tell him that in Canada cotton goods have been constantly improving in quality, until now they rank fairly well with the best goods made in the United States, while in England cotton goods have been constantly deteriorating in quality, and the whole effort in Manchester and all Lancashire seems to be, by lowering the quality of their goods, stuffing with China clay, to make an article with weight, which they can export cheaply all over the world. That is the line they have been running upon. When the hon. gentleman comes here and undertakes to make out a case against the National Policy by claiming that there has been a greater reduction in England than there has been here, I point out to him the fact that the reduction has been in quality much more than in price. The hon. gentleman went on to refer to the fact that cotton manufacturers have been making enormous profits in this country; they have watered their stock and are paying enormous dividends. Sir, I do not propose to take up the time of the House at any length upon this subject, but I would like to correct one or two important statements of the hon. member from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. gentleman from Ontario (Mr. Edgar) in regard to this matter. The hon. gentleman from Ontario (Mr. Edgar), the other night, stated that a large amount of cotton waste had been imported into this country, and he jumped at the conclusion, and asked us to do the same, that the cotton waste was all used in deteriorating the quality of Canadian cottons. Why, Sir, let me tell the hon. gentleman that there is five times as much cotton waste used by woollen manufacturers in making union goods, as is used by cotton manufacturers. Let me tell him that cotton waste is a material that is used for cleaning on all the railways, and in all the shops and factories in this country; and we could easily account for the use of the cotton waste brought into this country, without supposing that a pound of it was used in deteriorating the quality of cotton goods. Then, as to the watered stock. I want to tell my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar) that not one dollar of stock was added to the capital stock of the Dominion Cotton Company, except that which represented the sacrifice made by the original shareholders of the companies that the Dominion Company bought out. They did what is usually done, they bought the property as cheap as they could. They bought a number of mills when they organized their company, and they issued stock to represent the amount for which they had bought these properties less than what they were worth, and less than what they cost. The hon. gentleman from Ontario (Mr. Edgar) stated that the cotton output of this country, if I mistake not, amounted to $14,000,000; it only amounted to $8,750,000, and when he stated that this enormous dividend had been paid, I can assure the hon. gentleman—and it will be made out by some hon. members in this House in the course of the session—that the total earnings of the cotton companies in the year 1892 amounted to less than 6 per cent upon the money which has been invested in these enterprises. Then my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) went on to tell us that the rolling mills of this country had earned 67 per cent profit in the last year. Well, I can only say that a statement so absurd, so ridiculous, only needs to be mentioned to refute itself in the House and in the country. The hon. gentleman then went on to speak about agricultural implements, and he gave us the old Liberal argument in which the duty is added to the cost of the implement when bought in the United States and brought into this country. He decried the quality and the character of Canadian implements, but he lost sight entirely of the argument which has been used so effectually a hundred times in this House, that agricultural implements are now made in Canada and as good as they are made in any other part of the world, and they are sold at prices as low in Canada as American manufacturers sell their implements to people in the United States. It is true that there are a few farmers who come from the United States, and, having used the Buckeye reaper, want to use the implements they have been accustomed to, and they go over there to get them. It is true that American companies, for the sake of selling goods in Canada, will occasionally sell a reaper, or a binder, or a mower, for less money to get it into Canada, than they would sell it to their own people. That is true; but the fact remains, and it has been established over and over again in this House, that our implements are sold as cheap to the Canadian farmer as the American implement makers sell to the farmers on the other side. Now, excepting a reference to wall paper, that is the whole of the hon. gentleman's argument in support of his major premise that the tariff is oppressive and burdensome, and that it is unfair to the people of this country. I leave the House to judge, and I ask the country to judge, whether he has given us facts, or figures, or arguments, or data, which would justify us in throwing over the National Policy, and in adopting a revenue tariff. Now, what is the proof of his second premise? His second premise is that discontent in this country is so intense that it is verging on disloyalty. Any one unacquainted with this country would almost fancy that nightly drills and meetings of men were going on, and that we were likely to have an invasion of the city of Ottawa by angry people from all sections of the country to drive out this Government and Parliament. Well, what is his proof? His proof is the report of the commissioners that the "Globe" newspaper sent out to investigate the feeling in the country, and the result of a public meeting which was held at Lethbridge. Those are the main items of proof which he gave us for the existence of that degree of discontent which, he says, makes it the imperative duty of the Government to act at once. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman what is the constitutional way for the people to show discontent? Is it not at the polls? Now, the National Policy was adopted in 1879. We had a general election in 1882 in which the people supported the National Policy by a large majority. But, it may be said, that they had only had a few years' trial of it. True, but in all the by-elections which followed that general election, the Government was strengthened, and we had this remarkable fact, that, when we came to the dissolution of the Parliament which was elected in 1882, the Government were stronger than they were immediately after the general election. Then we had another general election in 1887. Surely there has been sufficient time for the people to form some idea of the oppressive and burdensome nature of this tariff; but what was the result again? The result, in 1887, was the triumphant return of the Government to power. It was the National Policy that aided the Government in 1887, and nothing else; because the influence of the Riel agitation and other questions was against the Conservative party. Sir, you may notice further that all the by-elections which followed the general election of 1887 went in favour of the Government, and at the time of dissolution the Government were stronger than they had been previously. Now, we come to 1891, when the country was more or less excited by the hope of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and when one province, in particular, was, in some sort, mesmerized over this question. What was the result in 1891, after many years' experience of the National Policy? The result was that the Government was again sustained, although by a smaller majority. I remember well that when we had only a majority of ten or fifteen, we spent six months in this House because of the hope entertained by the Opposition that they would be able to defeat the Government. Finally we got to the country, and thanks to the enormous expenditure of money the Liberal party had made and the large number of their friends that had been unseated, we had an opportunity of strengthening ourselves, and by virtue of the National Policy we came back the next session with a majority, not of ten or fifteen, but a majority of sixty-five or seventy. If that is not a constitutional way of approving of the National Policy, I do not know what is. But we have had more recent elections than those of the by-elections of 1892. The Government was reconstructed only a few weeks ago, and the result of that reconstruction was that four elections were held in widely different parts of this country and among widely different classes of the community. We had at the same time two other by-elections, one in Hochelaga and one in Terrebonne. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that in Hochelaga, the most populous constituency in Canada, we have an entirely urban population, not an agricultural, but a consuming population. We have in Terrebonne an agricultural French population. In West York where the Controller of Customs was re-elected, we have an agricultural English population. What was the result? How did this discontent, verging on disloyalty, manifest itself? It did not show itself in any one of the six by-elections, every single one of which was carried by acclamation, and that was only a few weeks ago. Where is this discontent verging on disloyalty? I have not the slightest doubt but the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) feels discontent. But I wish to tell him that because he is discontented, it does not follow that farmers of this country are unhappy or discontented. I wish to call your attention, Sir, for a few moments to one or two points that go to show that the existing tariff is not, on the whole, burdensome. Take, for example, this fact, that of our total importations, nearly one-half under the existing tariff are free of duty altogether; and, not only one-half are free altogether, but in that one-half are to be found sugar, tea and coffee, which the great mass of the consuming population use, and have to use, and use to the same amount per capita as rich people use. Besides the fact that $48,000,000 of our total importations are free goods, besides the fact that we have over 113 items of free goods on the free list more than were on the list in 1878. I may tell this House that on the dutiable list are a large number of goods which are recognized luxuries and which are taxed at a high rate of duty, and the duty on which does not affect the consuming population. The bulk of our importations from England, silks, satins, silk hats, gin, beer, porter and all such articles, which bear a high rate of duty, do not affect the consuming population. When we come to the items which necessarily affect the consuming population, such as cottons, woollens and agricultural implements, if we are right in our claim that the prices have decreased, as I maintain they have decreased, 25 per cent all round since 1878, and those goods are of good quality, and that they are, take them all in all, as cheap here as in any other country in the world. I ask in what particular can the hon. gentleman show that the tariff on the whole is burdensome and oppressive? I undertake to say this, that no member of this House can, by figures, satisfy the House or the country that a farmer with a family of seven persons can possibly expend $20 more per annum under the existing tariff than he would expend under a revenue tariff. When you talk about cottons, what an enormous item it is. I should estimate 125 yards of cotton to be a pretty liberal allowance for a farmer's family. The average price of all the different kinds of cotton could be fairly stated at 8 cents per yard; that is $10 worth of cotton on an average for a family's use. If the hon. gentleman's statement was entirely correct, if 30 per cent must be added to that price, it would make a difference between the cost of the goods under the present tariff and the cost under free trade $3 on the quantity of cotton required for an ordinary family. The hon. gentleman has already fixed the tax in the case of binding twine. He said that the taxation on binding twine has amounted to $2 per head for each farmer, and we had removed one-half, and it now amounted to $1. So there are $4, if you give $3 to cottons and $1 to binding twine. You may go through the whole list, and I defy any hon. member to show that it costs a family of seven persons $20 more to live than it would cost under a revenue tariff. The hon. gentleman, however, would abandon the National Policy and would adopt a revenue tariff. He says that the existing tariff is not defensible, excepting as a protective measure. He also says we have all the industries now in Canada we are likely to obtain, and that those which are here have had protection long enough to be able to stand alone; and if they cannot stand alone, let them go to the wall. The hon. gentleman also would give 10 per cent reduction to Great Britain, for the reason that Great Britain admits our products into her markets free of duty. Well, as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) well observed, Great Britain admits our products, in common with the products of all other countries, into her ports free of duty because that is her policy. It is no special favour to us any more than to the rest of the world. She thinks it better to do it, and she does it, and she does not fancy, I think, that we are under any obligation to her to lead us to make this concession. But what would be the state of facts if this concession of 10 per cent were made to Great Britain? It would have to be made also in favour of all other countries with which Great Britain has treaties with favoured nation clauses. To what countries would this 10 per cent reduction have to be granted? Besides Great Britain this reduction would have to be given to the Argentine Republic, Austro-Hungary, Belgium, Bolivia, Borneo, Chili, Colombia, Corea, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Germany, Liberia, Morocco, Muskat, Persia, Peru, Portugal, Russia, Sandwich Islands, Sweden and Norway, Tonga, Tunis, Uruguay, Venezuela. I ask therefore, would this 10 per cent reduction inure to the advantage of Great Britain so much as it would to the advantage of Germany, Norway and Sweden and some other countries on the list I have read? It is well known that the German glass manufacturers have driven the English manufacturers out of their own market, and it is well known that German manufacturers of toys have also taken possession of the English market. Under the scheme of the hon. gentleman, which would open our markets to Austro-Hungary, Germany and Denmark, I believe that the result would be, that we would have reduced our tariff for the benefit of Great Britain, while these other countries which will not give us the slightest concessions in their markets, because of the reduction of 10 per cent in their favour, would benefit, to a great extent, and would compete injuriously with our own trade.

Mr. EDGAR. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the list of countries he read were countries with which we had most-favoured-nation treaties which bound Canada in this respect?

Mr. IVES. I yesterday asked the Deputy-Minister of Trade and Commerce for a list of such countries as have favoured nation treatment treaties with Great Britain, and which would participate in this 10 per cent reduction that it is proposed to make in favour of Great Britain, and the list which I read is the list which Mr. Parmelee furnished me.

Mr. EDGAR. How many are there?

Mr. IVES. Twenty-six with Great Britain.

Mr. EDGAR. If the hon. member will pardon me, I think he will find on investigating that he has included about ten more countries than he ought to; because, while there are that number of countries with which England has most-favoured-nation treaties, binding the colonies in some respects, there are only fifteen with which she has most-favoured-nation treaties binding the colonies as to customs duties. I think the department which furnished that statement will have to revise it. The discrimination would have to be in favour of these countries only with which England has most-favoured-nation treaties binding the colonies in respect to imports, and not in respect to commerce and other things.

Mr. IVES. I will have the list revised before I hand it in to "Hansard," if that is thought proper. I made the statement in good faith. I asked the Deputy-Minister of Trade and Commerce to give me the list of countries that would be entitled to participate in the 10 per cent reduction, provided it was given to Great Britain, and that is the list which I got. If it is not correct, I will have it revised. Now, Mr. Speaker, the question is: after having done all this for Great Britain and for Germany, and for the other countries, what would be the effect of this policy at home? And here, so far as manufacturing enterprises are concerned, I propose to read from an authority which the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) himself cited. He quoted from the "Trade Bulletin" with reference to the iron duties, and the closing part of that article which I wish also to read, says:

We do not go the length to which free traders urge us as we do not believe in that policy for Canada, situated as she is beside such a powerful neighbour as the United States, which would absorb our manufacturing interests completely had she free access to our markets; but we do insist that a material modification of the outrageous duties on iron is imperative in the interests of manufacturers as well as of consumers.

Now, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) cited this authority with great approval upon the subject of the iron duties, and read this portion of the article, I would like to have repeated in "Hansard" the opinion of what he hon. gentleman considers a good authority, as to effect which his policy would have upon the manufacturing industries of this country. I would like to ask, Sir: Before this combination in the cotton trade, which is so much complained of, was made, what position were the cotton industries of this country in to enable them to live under the policy which the hon. gentleman proposes? There was hardly one of them, except the present parent company, the Hochelaga Mills, which had earned a dividend for four or five years, and some of them were in an insolvent condition. It is true that owing to that very combination, which has reduced management expenses and expenses generally, they are in a condition to-day which would enable them to fight a battle with the cotton manufacturers of the States. But let us look at the woollen industries, industries in which almost without exception the stockholders have been without a dividend for the last three or four years. Our Canadian woollen mills are making goods to-day as cheap as they are made anywhere else in the world. What position would that industry be in if Canada were made a slaughter market for bankrupt woollen stocks from the United States, or cheap shoddy bankrupt stocks from Great Britain? They have all they can do now, with the competition among themselves, to sustain themselves and earn running expenses and keep their hands employed. Under this resolution you are not providing for the opening of the American market to them, but you are practically excluding all possibility of ever making an arrangement with the Americans for the opening of their market. While excluding our woollen products from the American market, you at the same time propose to make them an easy prey for bankrupt stocks from other countries, and the result of the policy of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) would be, in my opinion, to close up the woollen mills in this country. Then, Sir, let us look at the condition of the paper mills. The policy proposed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) would put a revenue tariff upon the soda-ash and rags which now come in free, and the result would be that the raw material which the paper mills use would have to pay as high a duty as they would be protected by so far as their manufactured products are concerned. The result of that would be that these paper mills, which to-day are selling their paper at extraordinarily low prices, prices not more than 40 per cent of what they were three years ago, which are having a life and death struggle with our somewhat restricted market, would get no enlarged market, but would have to compete against the overstocks of the great mills of the United States, which, in my opinion, would completely ruin the Canadian paper-making industry. Let us look to the position of the boot and shoe manufacturers of this country, who produce as good boots and shoes, and produce them as cheaply as they are produced anywhere in the world. Boots and shoes could not possibly be made and sold at a lower price than they are in this country to-day. The manufacturers of these goods are not rich, they have no spare capital, they are having all they can do to get along, and if you were to open a slaughter market here for the bankrupt stocks of boots and shoes of the United States the result would be that you would close up our boot and shoe factories.

Mr. MULLOCK. How is it then, that a large quantity of American boots and shoes find their way to Canada?

Mr. IVES. There are some tony people like my hon. friend who are not satisfied with the home product, and who want to have something made in Boston, and they pay three times as much for boots and shoes as they are worth, and three times as much as they could get the equally good Canadian article for.

Mr. MULLOCK. That is not the answer.

Mr. IVES. That is not the answer the hon. gentleman wanted, but that is the truth. Now, how would this policy affect the farmer, the class for whom my hon. friend is so solicitous? I noticed with pleasure, in reading his speech, that he gives credit to the agricultural protection feature of the tariff for the annual saving of the importation of $13,000,000 worth of agricultural productions from the United States into Canada. I am much obliged to him for that admission. I know how he gets at that. He takes the decrease in the importations of agricultural products in 1880 from what they were in 1879, amounting to $13,000,000, and he says that is the amount of the additional home market that the National Policy has given to the farmers; but he loses sight altogether of the fact that we have now a much larger population in our cities and towns, and that the importations to-day, particularly in view of the remarkably low prices of meat products in the United States, would make that protection, instead of $13,000,000 or $14,000,000, very likely double that amount. But, taking the increased home market at his own figure, $13,000,000 a year, is not that worth keeping? Does the hon. gentleman want to open the tariff door, so that meat products from Armour's and Swift's, instead of passing through our country by rail to New England towns and cities, would be unloaded at every town and city in Canada, so that our own people, who are making beef and mutton and pork for consumption by our own people, would be obliged to leave their work and hand it over to the Americans? That is what the hon. gentleman proposes to do to benefit the farmers of the country. The hon. gentleman could find nothing else that the National Policy does for the farmer. He has estimated that $265,000,000 of manufactured products are due to the protective policy. I note that the manufacturing industries of this country are paying $100,000,000 a year in wages. Therefore, my hon. friend cannot find fault with me if I take, as a result of wage-earning, such a proportion of that $100,000,000 as the $265,000,000 bears to the whole production of manufactured goods, $75,000,000 annually as received in wages which would not be received but for the National Policy. Now, I have estimated that at least $50,000,000 of that amount is expended for food products, while $25,000,000 is expended by the operatives in clothing and other things. Therefore, $50,000,000 may be added for what the farmers get for the food products they raise and sell to the operatives in the factories of the country. The $13,000,000 would be equal to an average of $18 a head to the farmers of this country, and the $50,000,000 would be equal to $70 a head, or $88 a head to the 720,000 farmers in this country. Then you must remember that when you have manufacturing industries in a town or a city or a village, you have many people there besides the operatives working in the factory; you have shoemakers, tailors and other people gathered around a manufacturing centre and more or less supported by it. These people buy the farmer's products also, and I think it would be infinitely easier for me to show an increased market for agricultural productions due to the National Policy, of $100 a year to every farmer in this country, than it would be for my hon. friend to show that it costs any average farmer $20 more to live under the existing tariff than it would under the tariff which he proposes. Now, Sir, what does the hon. gentleman propose to do? We imported last year $117,000,000 worth of goods, of which $48,000,000 worth were free and $69,000,000 worth were dutiable, and we collected on them $20,500,000 of duty. Now, if you apply the amount of money we collected to the amount of dutiable goods imported, you will find that my hon. friend, under a revenue tariff, would have to fix a rate of 29.7 per cent as an average rate upon the present dutiable list, in order to produce the same amount of money that we had last year. Is that what my hon. friend proposes? If he proposes to apply a revenue tariff and levy an equal rate upon all the imports, both dutiable and free, then he would require a rate of about 17½ per cent. Is that what he proposes? Or does he propose to tax luxuries higher, and to levy say $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 on sugar, tea and coffee, and then fix as low a rate as he thinks will raise the money necessary, and apply it equally to the whole list of imports? If that is what he proposes, then the condition of the poor farmer will be this: He will to some extent lose the home market which the manufacturing industries give him, and he will have to pay a higher price for many of the manufactured goods he has to buy, and perhaps double the price for his tea, coffee and sugar that he is paying to-day, in order to raise the $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 that would have to be levied upon those articles. But we have to make a still further calculation, because the hon. gentleman is going to impose 10 per cent less duty against England and some other countries than against the United States. What rate shall it be against the United States, and what rate against England? Has the hon. gentleman all these matters figured out? Is he as clear as to what rate of duty he would have to levy on English goods and German goods, and what rate of duty he would have to levy on United States goods, as he was in many other portions of his speech? I doubt very much, if the hon. gentleman had imposed upon him the duty of framing a tariff according to his own ideas, whether he would not think that a request for delay was a very reasonable request. The hon. gentleman does not consider, I presume, what result his policy would have so far as the United States are concerned, or what the United States would say to a proposal for a differential duty of 10 per cent against them and in favour of England, Germany, Denmark and the South American Republics. What do hon. gentlemen opposite think about a differential duty of 10 per cent against the United States? What is to become of continental free trade if we start off by imposing a differential duty of 10 per cent against the United States? Are the United States likely to go on with the scheme of a revenue tariff which the hon. gentleman is so sure they are just on the eve of adopting, if we take this course with regard to them months in advance of their considering the tariff question at all? I think we would have a right to expect, if we were to adopt such a hostile policy towards the United States as that proposed by the hon. gentleman, in his resolution, that the United States, if they should adopt a revenue tariff, would insert in it a provision similar to that which they put in their lumber tariff with respect to countries that impose export duties on logs. We would have reason to expect that, in the case of any discrimination in our tariff against the United States, the amount of that discrimination would be added to their duties against us. That would be the least hostile thing we should expect them to do. They might go further, and declare a customs war, and refuse to have anything to do with us; and I shall be very much surprised, if, when a division is taken, hon. gentlemen opposite, who have favoured in turn unrestricted reciprocity, and commercial union, and continental free trade, should rise and vote for a resolution to discriminate to the extent of 10 per cent in favour of Great Britain, as against the United States. In one part of his speech the hon. gentleman stated, that the British Government would sooner or later have to adopt some scheme of protecting her agricultural population, but that, probably, in view of the fact that the United States were likely to adopt the principle of free trade, England would be justified in waiting to see what the United States really did. But, while he thinks that would be a good reason for England to wait, it is no reason at all for Canada to wait, and, according to him, we ought to proceed at once and enact 10 per cent discrimination against the United States. He calls upon us to declare our hostility to that country. He asks us to destroy the better feeling which has begun to prevail between the two countries, and renew and intensify the old soreness, and he wants us to do that at once, without waiting to see what the United States are disposed to do with reference to Canada, when making their tariff—and all this because the hon. gentleman was not consulted in the formation of the Government. I am quite satisfied, that the country, after reading the hon. gentleman's speech and seeing what it is he really proposes, will be satisfied to wait until the Government have submitted, during next session, the changes they think should be made, in order to improve the existing tariff. And I think we shall hear less about unrest and less about tariff reform than we have heard in the last few weeks. I know that the Government sincerely and honestly intend to undertake this task and to do the best they can. The House and the country may rely upon that, and I believe that the House and the country will be satisfied with what the Government proposes and will refuse to withdraw confidence until the Government fails to redeem its pledge.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not intend to trouble the House with any lengthy remarks, as I have already spoken on the trade question, but many of my constituents expect that I shall vote in a certain way with regard to the motion before the House. I, therefore, wish to state my views very briefly. But, before doing so, I will, with the permission of the House, refer to some historical allusions that were made by my hon. friend, who went back to the inception of the National Policy, and presented the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald to us as a free trader. There can be no doubt that the late right hon. gentleman was a free trader. In 1875 I happened to be visiting the "Mail" office, on whose staff at that time was a man to whom the National Policy owes, next to Isaac Buchanan, more than to any man who has lived in Canada, and that was John Maclean, a friend of mine, and father of a son who sits in this House, and who, I hope, will be worthy of his sire. On that day I happened to be reading a leading article in the "Mail," but which was marked "communicated." Whether it was written by the gentleman to whom I have referred, or by a Mr. Phipps, who used at the time to contribute to the

"Mail," or by another person who sometimes also contributed protectionist articles at that time, I forget; but I know that Sir John Macdonald happened to come in, and entered into conversation with Mr. Belford, who was then editing the "Mail." He said: "Belford, what is the meaning of those protectionist articles in the 'Mail'? I am not a protectionist; I am a free trader." But, Mr. Speaker, it is quite consistent with the character of a great statesman to be a free trader in the abstract, and yet, with regard to a country placed as Canada was at that time and as she is now, with regard to a young country, to be a protectionist. In fact, there are three stages in the history of a country, in regard to which enlightened free traders and enlightened protectionists might agree. There is a stage when absolute free trade—that is the barbaric stage—is best for the country. Then comes a stage when the country is young and struggling into civilized life, and then, if you are to make it anything else but a cattle-growing and wheat-producing country, you must have protection. Then comes a time in its history—for instance, the United States may have reached that time—when an enlightened protectionist might come to the conclusion that the best thing for the country would be free trade. So that there was no inconsistency on the part of my late right hon. friend and leader, when he decided that the time had come for announcing the National Policy in Canada, as he did announce it. I may tell the House, and the House will excuse me, because it is interesting, a bit of gossip in connection with that. When the late right hon. gentleman was Receiver-General of Canada, Mr. Isaac Buchanan went to him and proposed that he should go in for protection. Sir John said to him: "Buchanan, the most contemptible of all things is an unsuccessful politician; and a politician who takes up a question that is ahead of the opinion of the country, is sure to be unsuccessful. Now," he said, "Buchanan, I mean to be a successful politician." Mr. Buchanan was at that time a very rich Hamilton merchant, and he went to London and called on Lord George Bentinck, who with Mr. Disraeli, was leading the Conservative opposition to Sir Robert Peel. Mr. Buchanan explained his views. He impressed Lord George Bentinck and convinced him, that if his views were taken up, England might be carried against Sir Robert Peel, and he said: "Buchanan, I wish you would see Disraeli." Just at that moment a gentleman in a black frock coat was seen to pass through the hall and go up the staircase. Lord George Bentinck said to Mr. Buchanan: "Do you know who that is? That is Disraeli. Just wait, and I will see if he will see you." When he came back, Mr. Buchanan said, eagerly: "Will Mr. Disraeli see me? What did he say?" "He said," replied Lord Bentinck, "If Buchanan will tell me how we can carry twenty-seven constituencies, I can beat Peel; but if he cannot, I really have no time to see him." I think the House will excuse me occupying its time with that little historical reference, because it throws light. I think, on the similarity of character between the late leader of the Conservative party in Canada and the late leader of the Conservative party in England. Now, Sir, I say in regard to the motion of my hon. friend what I said to a friend of mine in this House when he asked me what I thought of it when it was first put on the Paper. The great weakness of that motion is the part that relates to the discrimination in favour of Great Britain, and I am not surprised that my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague), when he came to reply, pounced on that portion of the resolution, and, so far as he laboured the argument, laboured against that. Because, whatever way you approach it, it will not commend itself to you. That has been so far discussed that it would weary the House were I to take up its time in regard to the point. I will only say this, Sir, that I entirely dissent from discrimination of any kind, and especially at this time, for a reason that has been stated by the hon. member who has last spoken (Mr. Ives). The superstructure reared by my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is not as large as his scaffolding. The speech made by my hon. friend, the petitions he referred to and the discontent, would in my opinion, have justified a motion calling for reduction or even abolition of duties on certain articles. But I do not think that there is any such discontent in the country, or any such claims put forward in any of the petitions—and I have presented a large number—as would lead any one to suppose that the time had come for sweeping away the National Policy altogether and going in for a revenue tariff policy. There are petitions on the Table, some of them presented by my hon. friend, some presented by myself, from all parts of the North-west. There are some presented from the city of Brandon, signed by every important man in the city, leading Conservatives, leading supporters of my hon. friend, the Minister of Interior (Mr. Daly). There is a petition presented to this House by myself from Souris signed by hundreds of farmers. And all these petitions called for is for the reduction of the duty on certain articles. Oddly enough, though I had nothing to do with preparing or even suggesting these petitions, they are for the reduction or abolition of the very duties referred to in the motion which I had the honour to place on the Table in the early part of the session. Take the first proposition of the hon. member for Simcoe:

That no sufficient reason has been adduced or exists requiring investigation respecting the foregoing facts which are notorious, nor justifying delay in the passage of remedial legislation which is imperative.

There can be no doubt about that; it is acknowledged; and not only is it acknowledged, but the existence of such monopolies is condemned by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). My hon. friend the Minister of Finance said that a quartette,—if I may speak in that undignified way of the Cabinet Ministers and Ministers of the Crown—at all events, four hon. gentlemen, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the two Controllers, are to investigate, and, if they find that there are combines and trusts, the Government will see that these combines and trusts shall not longer exist to oppress the people. Something like that is what fell from the lips of my hon. friend the Finance Minister. And my hon. friend the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) said he did not stand up to defend monopoly. So we may take it for granted that there is no division of opinion in this House as to whether monopolies should exist, nor yet as to whether they do exist. Then we have :

That the existing tariff, defensible only as a protective measure has proved in many instances, oppressive and burdensome to the great mass of the consuming classes and especially to those engaged in agricultural pursuits : is unfair and unequal in its incidence ; and has been productive of discontent verging on disloyalty among those who suffer from its injustice.

Now, Sir, that is a strong statement in regard to certain phenomena and it is undeniable. For instance, there cannot be the least doubt that there is discontent to the limit of which I have spoken with the tariff in the North-west and in Manitoba. There can be no doubt, also, because we have evidence of it, that to the limit I have spoken of, there is discontent in Ontario. The "Globe" commissioners were quoted by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). One of them, Mr. Atkinson, states that the farmers are discontented, that certain farmers have annexationist feeling, but he also states, and I believe it is very important to notice it, that those men do not wish to have the tariff changed so as to oppress manufacturers of this country in favour of the manufacturers of the United States. Now, I believe that is a very general sentiment, and we had a meeting in Regina at which the tariff was discussed ; though the feeling was universal that the tariff should be reformed and the duty on certain articles lowered, nevertheless one of the gentlemen who were strongest in expressing their feelings declared that he did not want to have the duties so reduced as to be greatly injurious to the manufacturers of implements. He mentioned implements specially. He said he wanted the duties reduced, but did not want them swept away entirely, because he did not want to do sudden harm to those persons who had been induced to go into that speculation by reason of the National Policy. Now, Sir, comes the third proposition :

That since the introduction of the protective system sufficient time has elapsed for the establishment and development of such manufacturing industries as under existing conditions can be successfully carried out in Canada. Moreover, many manufacturers sheltered behind the rampart thus erected have formed combinations and trusts which prohibit competition and create and maintain monopolies.

Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) had confined himself to the reduction or the abolition of the duties on certain articles, I consider that he could stand by that proposition. But when we read that in connection with my hon. friend's speech, and with the other parts of his resolution, clearly what it means it this : That there is no sufficient reason given why a general overhauling of the tariff should not take place this year, and why we should not go for a revenue tariff, qualified by this, however,—in justice to my hon. friend from Simcoe—that he said he wanted to do this gradually, he wanted a graduated tariff, looking towards a revenue tariff. Now, Sir, I think that the Government is reasonable in saying : If we are to revise the whole tariff, we certainly want more time than we have had to consider. I agree with that, but I do not agree that when we have certain things pointed out, such, for instance, as the duty on barbed wire, where you have a combination, where no revenue comes from it to the Government, so high is the protection, and where it is clearly oppressive as it is to the farmers of the North-west Territories and Manitoba—I say there is no sufficient reason yet given why the Government should not deal with that matter at once. No sufficient reason, in my opinion, has been given why the Government should not deal with agricultural implements, not sweeping away the duty, but lowering the duty at once, so as to relieve the farmers in the North-west. And so on in regard to one or two other matters. But I quite agree that if we are going to have a regular overhauling of the tariff, one year is quite short time enough to do what is in fact a very big job. But I may say here to my hon. friend from Simcoe, that I should be opposed to any graduated tariff. A graduated tariff was introduced into the United States in 1833. It went on till 1842, and the result was that business men were never certain, during the nine years, how the tariff would affect them, and it had a very serious effect on business. While I am dealing now with that tariff, may I say a word or two to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) ? He took up a position in regard to tariff changes in which I cannot agree with him. He spoke of the tariff of the United States, and pointed out that only in 1846 was there a lapse from the sacred policy of protection ; with that year excepted, the United States had gone on consistently in a protectionist policy. My hon. friend, I confess, metaphorically, of course, seemed to shed a tear of regret over the backsliding of the American statesmen of that year. Now, what are the facts about that ?—for they should have some bearing on our discussion with regard to the tariff in this House. On this side, and on the other, when you come to deal with the tariff and to bring forward your figures, it does not apparently ever occur to any hon. gentleman that all the conditions of the problem are not before us. They seem to think that they have all the conditions of the problem, whereas, not one only, but many conditions, are absent. Now, in the United States, from 1846 to 1860, during those fourteen years, there was an amount of prosperity such as was never surpassed before, and has never been surpassed since; yet you had, during that time, as near an approach to free trade as you can have in a country where you have not direct taxation. But, Mr. Speaker, I say that no free trader, no revenue tariff man, can take that circumstance and say that it demonstrates that a protective policy is bad, or that a free trade policy is good. You cannot do it, because there are a number of conditions that have to be taken into account. There is the application of anthracite coal to the making of iron; there is the enormous expansion in the building of railways. A lot of things like that have to be taken into account, in order to get at the sum of the forces that led to the prosperity in that period. But I say that the fact that the United States, during that period, from 1846 to 1860, was so prosperous under the tariff they then had, is full of lessons for us in Canada at this time, because it shows this—and it is a view that in a protectionist country we cannot keep too strongly before us—that you have a thousand manufactures, you have a thousand industries, going forward on a moderate tariff, and a moderate tariff may do, in fact, more for you than a very high tariff will do. Under a moderate tariff, you avoid one of the dangers of a protectionist policy, you avoid combines, you avoid rings, and avoid those oppressive monopolies of which we complain, at least those of us who take the stand I do, and think that we ought to have redress. I would even now urge on my hon. friend the Finance Minister that I do not see why, when he goes again into Committee of Ways and Means, having seen what are the opinions advocated in the petitions we have placed before him, having seen what is the sentiment in the House,—I do not see why he should not do what would be done in England, and say: Yes; I intend, in regard to certain things that have been brought before me, to make certain changes: we will reduce the duty, or we will abolish the duty on barbed wire; and we will see that, in the Northwest, where men have no timber to make fences, and in Manitoba, where men have no timber to make fences, they shall not be charged 7 cents a pound for barbed wire, which, I need not tell you, is almost a prohibitive price. He might also take up implements. I point out to him that a representative of the implement manufacturers was down here, and he stated that he would be very glad indeed if he was let off with 25 per cent. Now, I would urge on my hon. friend, when he goes into committee the next time, that, in two articles like that, he might make such change as will show that we have that elasticity in our tariff policy, that we ought to have. What is the use of hon. members coming here and getting up, one after another, and telling the Government what their constituents think, what they complain of, where the shoe pinches, and where a grievance is felt? What is the use of doing that, if it all falls upon deaf ears, and nothing is to be done for twelve months? Therefore, I appeal strongly to my hon. friend. He gave us a little aid on binder twine; he did a little for us on coal oil; let him do something for us on agricultural implements; let him do something in regard to barbed wire, and I promise him that his popularity, and the popularity of his Government will be immeasurably enhanced throughout the length and breadth of the farming community. Now, Sir, I have referred to the practical reforms that I think ought to take place this session. Will the House permit me briefly to refer to the contention made by my hon. friend from Simcoe? One statement he made has not been fully answered yet. I do not know how he demonstrates it, but he made the statement, he gave us the calculation, that, on $265,000,000, 30 per cent was paid by the people of the country, which would amount to some $79,000,000, double the amount we require to carry on the affairs of this country—paid, mark you, not into the coffers of the country, but paid into the hands of manufacturers. Now, take the argument made by the hon. member for South Ontario about the cotton combines. The hon. the President of the Council did not attempt to answer that argument, although he is in a position to know; he understands that question very well, and he ought to have been able to give an answer, if any one could answer the hon. member for West Ontario. The hon. gentleman's statement, in which he showed that something like $6,000,000 profit must have been made by those manufacturers, has not been answered yet.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the hon. gentleman gone into the calculation himself, at all?

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman asks me, if I have gone into the calculation, I have. Is there any other catechism my hon. friend would like to address to me? Mr. Speaker, I have gone into the calculation, and I may say here, that I not only followed the speech delivered, but I went to the office upstairs and obtained the papers that were in the hands of the hon. member for West Ontario, and I went over the calculations, and, so far as I could see, although I am not an expert in regard to this matter, they were quite correct. A remark fell from the hon. the President of the Council to which I desire to call the attention of the House. The hon. gentleman said: Can it be shown, that the farmers of this country, in consequence of the National Policy, pay $7 per head more than they would pay if there was a revenue tariff in operation? If they pay each $7 or $6 or $5 more, it is an enormous sum. Seven dollars would be 75 cents more than the per capita taxation of this country, and 742,000 farmers, multiplied by seven, would give an enormous amount. I may say that, speaking generally, in regard to all these calculations in which it is sought to show that the amount of taxation is small per capita, the hon. gentleman who is our popular whip, speaking on Tuesday night, made a calculation as to what the farmer paid, and he made out, that, if the farmer paid anything in excess, it was probably about $4, and that on a number of necessary articles. But he admitted that, besides those articles, barbed wire and some other articles could be obtained cheaper across the line. When an hon. member declares that the increased price is only $4 or $5 or $7, to use the language of Mr. Jevons, the great logician, "You are resorting to the fallacies of the spendthrift." With $3,000 or $20,000 income, he thinks one bottle of wine does not matter much, or one box of cigars, or one horse, or one anything else. Taken individually, these expenditures do not amount to much, but, in the aggregate, they destroy the man's position. And so in regard to any class or in regard to communities, if it could be shown that the National Policy was taking taxation out of the pockets of the people to the amount of $4 or $1 per head, in regard to any given industry. Take, for instance, binding twine. It is said that, in consequence of the reduction made, every farmer would pay $1 less for binding twine. Of course, that would be the average. But extensive farmers in Manitoba and the North-west, instead of saving $1, would save $5 or $6. Suppose you take a large number of the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west and put $1 into each one's pocket, as a saving in a single article, until they each receive $5, $6, $7 or $10, look at the amount of money that would be kept in the North-west. Instead of passing into the pockets of the plutocratic manufacturers that money, spent in the North-west, would make all the difference between the prosperity of the country and its depression, between its solvency and insolvency, between ease, on the part of the farmer, in paying his bills to the storekeeper, and ease, on the part of the storekeeper, in meeting his notes early each month. The position taken by the hon. member for North Simcoe, will have to be met, for it has not yet been demolished. No doubt the hon. Minister of Finance will deal with it, but it will have to be demolished or it will have its effect in the country. The farmer has been represented by the hon.

Mr. DAVIN.

the Finance Minister as though he obtained nearly every article he used free of duty, that he obtained his clothes free, his food free, and so on. Why, Mr. Speaker, there could not be a more unjust description of the articles that a farmer uses. He has to have as many tools as a tradesman; he has to have iron in nearly everything he uses; he requires a gig or trap, like a gentleman who indulges in riding about the country; he, moreover, requires a wagon, also leather, nails, and an innumerable number of articles, all of which pay duty; and, in my opinion, there is not a man in the community who is touched at so many points by the National Policy as is the farmer to-day. And, therefore, when we come here, those of us who represent farming constituents, and press our views, as we have done, on the Government, and when it is demonstrated that combines exist in certain industries which affect the farmer, I confess that, strong supporter as I am of the Conservative party, I think the Conservative Government ought not to put us off for twelve months, in order to remedy palpable grievances and to meet a case that is right before them, ready for solution and ready for the solatium that a reduction or abolition of duties would give. These are the points I wished to bring out, and I have done. I have shown why I differ from the hon. member for Simcoe, in regard to his motion, and I have also shown how far I sympathize with him. I have no desire to enter into the controversy raised the other night, in regard to the hon. gentleman's consistency. The hon. gentleman came before us as a member of this House, and presented a reasoned statement of the course he proposed to take. I remember the Hon. Joseph Howe, when his speeches of former years were thrown up to him, said: "Do not quote me against myself; there is no authority for whom I have such a supreme contempt." I take that greatest of statesmen of modern times, Mr. Gladstone. Suppose you were to quote Mr. Gladstone against himself. If that course were adopted, the time of the English House of Commons would be taken up, and at every sitting the morning would dawn before members would get through a debate. In my humble opinion, in any parliamentary assembly, especially in the Parliament of a great young nation, such as this, the proper way to judge a man is by the propositions he lays down and the reasons he advances to support them, because I do not at all agree with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) in what he stated in the early part of his speech. The hon. gentleman deprecated the hon. member for Simcoe coming forward to air his opinions, and intimated, that the proper course to take was to go quietly to certain gentlemen to discuss the subject with them. Mr. Speaker, I dissent entirely from that view, and for several reasons. First, and greatest of all, my reason is this, that Mr. Bagehot and all writers of constitutional government, lay down, that parliamentary government is the best means of educating the people that can be used. And if hon. members were not to bring forward questions for discussion in Parliament, where is the education of the people to come from? How can the people at large form their opinions on a given question? And, above all, are we not surrendering our rights as members of this House, because it must be remembered that the Parliament of Canada is the real Government of Canada, for, although for convenience sake we commit the Government to a committee of the House, the real Government is, after all, the Parliament of Canada, His Excellency, the Senate and the House of Commons. Here is the place to discuss whatever views we have, to establish them or have them refuted. My hon. friend, the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) when he quoted from my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) against himself, established this: that that hon. gentleman differs from himself in years gone by, and I should not be surprised if a member of Parliament so busy as the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) no longer holds the opinions he held at other times. I can easily understand a man coming conscientiously to a change of view in regard to a thing so delicate as tariff legislation, and I must say, too, that it was complimentary to the hon. member for Simcoe that some of the cleverest and most amusing things in the admirable speech of my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) were the quotations made from the speeches of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) himself; so that the hon. member was like that eagle of which Kirke White sings: He was transfixed with a dart, impelled by a pinion which he himself had nursed; the hon. gentleman was impaled by arrows picked up from battlefields where he had fought and won. For my part I consider the speech of the hon. member for Simcoe was an able speech, a speech well worthy of this House, and a speech that would do honour to any Parliament. I differ from it. But the position he took up has not yet been really impaired, and I look forward to seeing it dealt with by some member of the Government, no doubt by the Finance Minister when he comes to close the debate. One of his positions taken there, namely, that there is no reason for putting off reducing the duty on these articles where the need is palpable, I entirely agree with, and if there had not been certain things introduced into the resolution, which are larger than the petitions justified, and larger than the argument of my hon. friend, in my opinion justified, I might have found myself able to vote for his resolution. As it is, I certainly cannot support it; I cannot above all support it, with Great Britain in it; but at the same time I am glad that it was brought forward in a speech so able; I am glad that a subject so vital to the interests of this country was so thoroughly discussed and so thoroughly probed, and I look forward to great advantages arising from the discussion introduced by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy).

Mr. COATSWORTH. I do not intend to trouble the House with any lengthened speech on this subject; but I would like to state the reason why I support the Government in their tariff policy at this present time. The constituency that I represent includes almost all classes of people: the manufacturer, the merchant, the mechanic, the farmer, and if there are any other classes I think they will be found in East Toronto to a greater or less extent. I have been cognizant of the unrest which has been referred to by so many speakers, and the unrest exists not only in my constituency but in other parts of the country to some extent. So far as I have been able to analyse and account for that unrest and discontent, by whatever word we may call it, I do not think that it arises from tariff conditions, or, at any rate, I am perfectly safe in saying that it does not arise entirely from tariff conditions, but that it arises very largely from business conditions. We have periodical times of depression, and unfortunately not only in Canada but almost all parts of the world are passing through just such a period as that at the present time. I have had a number of communications with regard to the tariff from different persons in my constituency, and I find that there are diverse interests. I find, for instance, that one firm wrote to me to say that the duty must be reduced on bar and pig iron, and I have a letter from another firm in my constituency to say that if the duty is removed from bar iron and pig iron it will be injurious to their industry.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What industry?

Mr. COATSWORTH. The rolling mills.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. COATSWORTH. My hon. friend need not laugh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was not laughing. I was cheering the statement. From my stand-point, it is all right.

Mr. COATSWORTH. The point I want to bring out is that there are diverse interests. One interest asked to have the duty taken off a certain article, and the opposing interest writes that it will be ruined if the duty is taken off. In what position am I about that?

Mr. LISTER. Resign.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I do not know that my hon. friend resigned on the oil question. I do not think he did.

Mr. LISTER. I am all right on the oil question.

Mr. COATSWORTH. You did not support the reduction in duty, anyway, which you ought to have done from your point of view. What I want to say is this: That the very fact that there are so many diverse interests to be considered, places every hon. member in the position that without a full and fair investigation into all the interests concerned he is not qualified to vote properly on this question of the tariff. My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), among the arguments that he brought forward for an immediate dealing with the question of tariff, said: that there had been representations from various parts of the country, and that the thought, in response to those representations the Government should take up the question and deal with it at once. Now, on the same principle there is other legislation that ought to be carried in this House, if we are to act upon representations, not representing the majority of the country necessarily, but representing a large section of it. If we ought to pass laws on these representations, then why should we not a law prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquor?

Mr. LISTER. You voted against it.

Mr. COATSWORTH. No, I did not. I voted for it consistently, as I propose to vote on this occasion, and that is that we should not be called upon to vote until we have a full and fair investigation of the whole question, and then we will be able to decide as intelligent men, not as partisans, what vote we ought to give on these important questions. I have no hesitation in saying that I think the Government are doing perfectly right, and just exactly what it is their duty to do, in investigating these questions of tariff, before they call upon us to vote as to what reduction shall be made.

Mr. LISTER. Do you think they ought to be made?

Mr. COATSWORTH. Do you wish me to answer in advance of the investigation? I listened to the speech of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) with a great deal of interest, as I always listen to the speeches of my hon. and learned friend who stands so high in Ontario, but I must confess that it produced, in my mind, a measure of disappointment, and I notice it produced a measure of disappointment, also, in the minds of my hon. friends on the other side of the House. The speech divided itself into three parts, to a certain extent described by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). First, there was the speech itself, which was a general arraignment of the National Policy. Then, there was the resolution; that was another thing, and I do not think the resolution justified the speech, for the speech went far beyond the resolution. And there was the conclusion, that is, the statement by my hon. friend of his own policy, and of what he would have the Government do at the present time. That was another thing, entirely distinct from the resolution and the speech. Now, I say that, because, at the conclusion, or towards the conclusion of his address, he laid down this proposition: He would not, he said, at the present time, do anything towards the United States. He said the same thing in the Stayner speech—that the time had not come for dealing with the United States on this question. Therefore, his position at the present time, is, that we should leave the duties on goods coming from the United States. But, he says—and this is the sum of his whole speech—I would take one-third only off the duties imposed on British goods. Then he went on to say that that one-third would be of great benefit to the farmers. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is that conclusion which I propose to deal with this afternoon. I suppose the hon. gentleman cannot ask more than that we should discuss the conclusion that he arrives at himself. I think his own conclusion is not justified by the facts which we have before us in our Trade and Navigation Returns. Then, the hon. gentleman can no longer ask us to support his resolution. But first, Mr. Speaker, let me say that, to my mind, the speech, as coming from one of our great lawyers, was a very sectional one. It was not a national speech in any respect. It was a speech delivered entirely from the stand-point of the farmers. Now, I do not quarrel with the farmers, because, as I have said, I have farmers in my constituency, and I do not lose sight of the fact that they constitute a very large proportion of the population of this country. But when we are dealing with a national question, we should not deal with it from a sectional point of view, but we should endeavour, as far as possible, to embrace all classes of the population, and determine the effect of a certain policy, not upon one section, but upon all sections of the community. Now, in following out that policy, there is no doubt that there will have to be forbearance exercised on all sides. Our hon. friends on the opposite side of the House who would ask us to adopt the policy of free trade, well know that it would involve many sacrifices in this country. Where there are conflicting interests, we cannot adopt any policy which will be beneficial to all the people of the country, that will not involve sacrifices on the part of some. I do not mean to say that certain sections of the people must endure all the suffering, but, for the sake of each class, there must be forbearance on the part of other classes, and there must be mutual forbearance all around, for the sake of the general prosperity of the country. Now, I think we have to consider, not only the farmer, but the mechanic. The farmer, according to the census, numbers nearly one-half of our population, about 720,000, while the mechanics number nearly 400,000. Now, my hon. friend, in his speech, gives no thought whatever to the effect the reduction of the tariff he proposes would have on the mechanics, and I say that no policy which overlooks the interests of the mechanics of this country, the men who have to work from day to day, is a truly national policy. Now, the National Policy has been favourable to the mechanics.

Mr. LISTER. Oh, no; it has degraded labour.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I know more about the mechanics than you do.

Mr. LISTER. No, Sir.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I say I do. I have been a mechanic myself.

Mr. LISTER. You were glad to get out of the business.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Not at all. I learned my trade, and I could go back and work at it if necessary. I have had a great deal of experience among the mechanics of this country. I know what the rate of wages was fifteen years ago, when I was working among them myself, and how they had to live and were housed and clothed, and any one who compares their condition at that time with their condition at the present time, will have to admit that the National Policy has been a great boon to the mechanics of this country. I know that the average wages of the mechanics fifteen years ago were about $1.50 a day, whereas to-day they are from $2 to $2.50 a day. These are facts which hon. gentlemen opposite cannot dispute. Moreover, when we consider the necessary supplies that the mechanic has to purchase, we know that there has been a reduction of at least 30 per cent in their cost, as compared with fifteen years ago. So that, if the mechanic is obtaining higher wages, and if his wages have a greater purchasing power than they had fifteen years ago, he is unmistakably in a better condition than he was then.

Mr. McMULLEN. What happened to sugar when the duty was taken off?

Mr. COATSWORTH. It went down in price very much, so that the mechanic is enabled to buy 25 pounds of sugar to-day for the same money for which he could get only twenty pounds before.

Mr. CASEY. What brought it down?

Mr. COATSWORTH. You did not bring it down.

Mr. LISTER. Yes; we brought it down. We forced you to bring it down.

Mr. COATSWORTH. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to say that. They have tried to force us to do many things, but they have not succeeded very well, and I tell them that the Government and their supporters are not the men to be forced unless they see that what is desired is the right thing to be done, and then they will do it, no matter how much hon. gentlemen oppose it.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. COATSWORTH. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was coming to the part of my remarks where I wished to speak about the conclusions arrived at by my hon. friend from North Simcoe. As I have said already, I was rather surprised at the smallness of the conclusion in comparison with the length of his speech and the magnitude of the resolution. I expected that the hon. gentleman, following out his speech, would have asked a general reduction of the tariff. But in summing up the whole matter, what is the conclusion he arrived at? He simply asked the Government to take one-third off the duties now imposed on goods imported from Great Britain. That is all he asks. He has stated that he does not desire the Government to interfere with the tariff at present, so far as the United States are concerned, but simply wishes them to take one-third off the duties charged on goods coming from Great Britain, and this he asks in the interests of the farmer. Now, strange to say, he does not expect that the farmer will in any way be enabled to obtain more for his produce by this policy, but he expects simply to reduce the burden of taxation weighing on the farmer and thus enable him to effect a saving of $3,000,000 per year. Now, it will be interesting to ascertain what the result really would be to the farmer, if the Government acceded to that proposition. I am bold enough to say that I feel satisfied that any hon. gentleman who will follow up the calculation, as it affects the farmer, cannot support this resolution, because, so far as I have been able to work out the figures—and I have endeavoured to do so accurately and fairly—this proposition of the hon. member for Simcoe would be actually detrimental to the farmer. I have endeavoured to make an analysis from the Trade and Navigation Returns, in order to determine what proportion of $9,000,000 duty which is paid on British imports is chargeable against those purchased by the farmer, and I was surprised to find there was such a small result. I expected that the hon. gentleman would follow out his argument to a logical conclusion, and was surprised to find what a very small proportion of the goods which are imported from Great Britain are of such a class as are used by the farmer. I intend trespassing on the time of the House for a few minutes in order to read some of the principal articles, so as to convince the House that the statement I make is correct. After a careful calculation of those duties, I find that the proportion in which the farmers are interested is about $1,000,000 only, and that in which they are not interested $8,000,000. When I speak of the proportion in which they are interested, I refer, of course, to the things that are not necessary, although I am glad to say that many of our farmers are in such a position as not to be confined to the necessaries of life, but are able to purchase many of the luxuries, so that many of the articles I refer to are not necessary at all, in any sense of the word, and yet, at the same time, may, to a considerable extent, be used by the farmer. The first list I prepared is what may be termed the large items of duties in which the farmers are not interested as necessaries essential to their occupation or mode of living. Those articles are ale, $42,000; books, $61,000; brass-ware, $20,000; carriages, $55,000—by carriages I mean the higher grades; carpets, $31,000; cement, $58,000; chocolate, $10,000; copper, $5,000; cottons, $500,000. Now the duties on cottons amounted altogether to about $850,000. I have made as careful an analysis as possible, and I find that the proportion of cotton goods in which the farmers are in any way interested is very much less than I have allowed, that is $350,000; and when I say there is $500,000 of duty collected on a class of goods in which they are not necessarily interested, I am keeping well within the mark. Curtains, $57,000; decorated earthenware, $69,000; white granite, $83,000; china and porcelain, $21,000; tiles, $5,000; electric light apparatus, $28,000; embroideries, $26,000; fancy goods, $343,000; feathers, $5,000; fish of special kinds, $6,000; flax, $200,000. Now, with regard to flax, some of the largest items are a high-class of linen. The total duties on flax amounted to $325,000. And I have fixed the figure at $200,000 as the proportion in which the farmers are not interested. Fruit, $55,000; furs, $57,000; glassware, $80,000; gloves, $129,000 (this is the higher class of gloves); fancy gold ornaments, $19,000; gunpowder, $14,000; rubber, chiefly rubber clothing, $96,000; hats, beaver, silk and felt of the higher class, $190,000; ironware of different kinds, including car iron, iron pipes, railway iron, boiler tubes, special classes of iron not agricultural, and firearms, $457,000. Now, the total amount of the iron duties is $1,339,000; so, in taking those estimates, which, I think, no one will dispute, in which the farmer is not interested in, I estimate $457,000, a good deal less than one-half of the duties paid on iron. Jellies and jams, $18,000; jewellery, $9,000; lead products, $4,000; leather belting, $6,000; mats, rugs, &c., $14,000; metal (gas meters, &c.), $27,000; mineral waters, $5,000; oils, flax seeds, &c., $101,000; oilcloth, $68,000; packages, $25,000; paintings, $5,000; paints, $31,000; paper, such as note paper and that class of goods, $117,000; pickles, $22,000; post office parcels, $28,000; ribbons, $4,000; sauces and catsups, $12,000; silks, $610,000; soaps of a higher class, $10,000; spirits, including whiskey, brandy and liquors of that description, $619,000; sugar candy, $23,000; tobaccos, cigars and pipes, $28,000; umbrellas and parasols, $91,000; watches, $11,000; elastic webbing, $13,000; wool cassimeres, $22,000; wool cloth of the higher class, $1,437,000. I may say that the duties on all wool products amount to $2,920,000. I have carefully analysed that and have fixed the amount in which the farmer is not interested at $1,437,000. Carpets, chiefly Brussels, $267,000, and coal of a special class which comes from England, $29,000. Now, Sir, the items I have mentioned are all large items, and they amount in all, in round figures, to $6,500,000. But that is not all there is. There is a very long list of items of duty, most of them smaller than the items I have read, but many of them of considerable size, in which the farmers are not interested at all, but which I have not taken down in detail. There is also a large class of articles which they may be interested in to a certain extent, but in many of them to a very slight extent. And when I analyse the whole statement I find in addition to this $6,500,000 in which they have no interest whatever, except so far as they are able to purchase luxuries, there is at least $2,000,000 worth more in which they have not a direct interest. So that, according to my calculation, and I must say I have gone over it very carefully, and I do not think any gentleman will dispute the figures or the items I have read, the best conclusion I have been able to arrive at is that the farmers are possibly paying $100,000 of that duty. They are certainly not paying more and possibly they are paying less as a considerable portion of it is paid for the goods not at all necessarily used by the farmers. That brings us to the conclusion that the farmer will gain from the proposition of my hon. friend to reduce the duties by one-third, $330,000. Now, when we come to analyze that $330,000 to find out what it means to the farmer, we find that my hon. friend has not much reason to laugh at the gentleman who said that the farmer would make a dollar a year by the change in the duty on binder twine, for the farmer would only make about 45 cents a year out of the reduction my hon. friend proposes to make. Now, I challenge any gentleman who will take the trouble to go over the figures to prove that they are in any degree incorrect. I feel satisfied that on careful analysis it will be found that the farmer would get only 45 cents a year taken off his taxes by the proposition of my hon. friend. Now, there is another side to that. While he may have 45 cents a year taken off his taxes, we must bear in mind that this $3,000,000 of loss to the revenue must be made up. Now, I ask whether it is possible to put the duties on a class of goods more favourable to the farmer than in the list I have read? I challenge any gentleman to do so. The result would be that while the farmer might gain 45 cents, he would have to lose a dollar at least to make up the $3,000,000 loss to the revenue. I feel that every farmer who will make an analysis of the proposal of my hon. friend, and will set the result to himself, would vote against the proposal and declare it to be in the interest of the rich instead of in the interest of the poor. Now, Sir, just a few words in conclusion as to the claim of my hon. friend that we should move in this matter at once. I was rather surprised at that. While he spoke as a farmer the other day we cannot lose sight of the fact that he is a lawyer and consequently is not accustomed to see cases decided on ex parte statements. The proper, the legal way to proceed—and when I say the legal I do not use it with the meaning a lawyer gives it—but the proper and legal way for Parliament to proceed, is to hear the whole case and not to decide upon any change of policy until we are satisfied, having all the considerations before us, that it is best in the interests of the country. Therefore, I say that the hon. gentleman proposes to us to decide first and then investigate. In my opinion the proper course for the Government to pursue is the very one they have adopted, first to investigate and then decide. It may be that there are combinations in the country. I am not going to argue that question, but it seems to me that the hon. gentleman himself, when he referred to American legislation on that subject, suggested the proper remedy. The proper remedy to deal with combinations, if they exist to any extent here—I am not going to say whether they do or not—but even if they exist to the extent my hon. friend claims, the proper course to take is the one suggested, as the course they follow in the United States, and that is, to give the Government power, on the certificate of the Minister of Justice, to lower the duty on any article in regard to which a combine was formed. But I say that combinations are no ground for a general revision of the tariff. Combinations, if they exist in this country at all, exist in no greater number of articles than I could count on the fingers of one hand; they do not exist in regard to half a dozen articles. I say the proper method of dealing with a combination, is not by tariff legislation, but by putting it in the power of the Government to lower the duty on articles in regard to which the combine is formed. I am in favour of breaking those combines, because I think, as my hon. friend does, and as every hon. gentleman thinks, that a combination which has the effect of keeping up prices, and of shutting out opposition, is detrimental to the interest of any country. I think, therefore, we are perfectly safe in following the course the Government have decided upon, and for my part, I shall most heartily support them in it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I shall not take up the time of the House very long in speaking on this subject. I have not yet spoken upon it this session, and I presume hon. members on both sides will bear with me for a short time while I give my views on the matter. In the first place, I will say, and I make no bones about it, that I am a supporter of the National Policy. I place my feet fairly upon that rock, and I don't wobble. I will give you my reasons for it. I have been in business in one town fifty years, and I ought to be pretty well posted. I have seen good times and bad times. I have seen them in Peterborough, and I have seen them elsewhere in Canada. The worst times I ever saw that I recollect, was during the reign of my hon. friends opposite. I recollect well those days when you had to pay 12 per cent for money, and could not get it for less. I recollect well that labouring men got 60 cents a day, and were paid that by our corporation at that time. Now, I have a distinct recollection of those things. I have employed a great deal of labour myself for the last twenty years, but I never employed a labouring man for less than $1.25 a day, I never offered a man less than $1.25 a day. We have heard the National Policy abused here a great deal; we have heard it opposed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and I must say that, judging from their statements, they must have very poor counties, the people in the counties they come from must be very poor, everything must be going to the dogs. I must say, also, that I have heard my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) give a very doleful description of the state of the farmers. Now, I will give you another picture. The farmers in my section of the country are not so bad off. I have been a great deal amongst the farmers. I have been at picnics during last winter, and I never met a farmer yet that was not satisfied; I never heard a farmer complain of the National Policy on either side of politics. I have been at many meetings, and I never heard a question asked about it—they were all perfectly satisfied. They talk about unrest. Mr. Speaker, I say that is a question that ought never to be heard on this side of the House. Unrest, indeed! Well, I will tell you about the unrest: it is in the brains of the politicians who wish to exchange sides in this House. It is not among the farmers. I ought to know as much about the farmers as most men in this House, as I have been a great deal amongst them, but I never heard of any unrest among them. I will say further, that I never heard about this unrest and disquiet until I came to this House. I am sorry to say, from the course of some gentlemen here, that it proves the truth of the saying which was uttered nearly 2,000 years ago, that the worst foes you have are the foes in your own household. If I was ill and wanted medicine, I would not go to a lawyer. If I wanted to fix the tariff, I would not go to a lawyer, for, although he may know something about law, he does not know anything about tariffs. Now, I will say this, that I come from a town that the National Policy has built up; I come from a town which, ten years ago, only had a population of 6,000; it has now, including Ashburnham, an adjoining village, 13,000. We have gained over 1,000 in population during the last twelve months. Yet, we are told that the country is being depopulated. I wonder if those gentlemen ever took into account the number of Americans we have coming over here to settle. Our friends opposite only tell us about those who go away. I regret that our people are going away, but this will always be the case. The road is open, and they will go if they like, and where they like, if they think they can do better. I know that we have in our town over sixty American families who have come there during the last seven years and settled there, bought property there, and have taken the oath of allegiance, and they are as strong Conservatives as I am. There is no trouble about them, either. I said, Mr. Speaker, that I came from a town that is rapidly growing under the aegis of the National Policy, and I can prove it to you very easily. Now, just take one instance. I heard the Finance Minister to-day reading over the number of factories in some towns. I am not ashamed to tell you that we have factories in our town, many of them. I am not ashamed to tell you the number of hands that are employed there, and you will be glad to hear it, and I think some hon. gentlemen opposite will be glad to hear it, for I believe there are some hon. gentlemen opposite who do not go in for blue ruin; I am satisfied that some of them feel as I do about it. Now, Sir, we have woollen mills in Peterborough, we have factories in Peterborough, and I do not know of one combine in that town, I never knew of a combine there. The only combine I know of in Peterborough is a lawyers' combine. I know the lawyers have a card on their doors, giving their fees, and they will not deviate from it one iota; and yet we have lawyers coming here to tell us what we ought to do. I have stood by the National Policy, and I do not propose to stand by any man that tries to cut my throat and kill my business. As a good Reformer stated to me during the last election in Peterborough: "I have been looking around, but I cannot vote for the Liberal candidate, although he is a friend of mine, because I believe that man is coming behind my door to steal my coat." I may mention to the House that I shall not state anything but absolute facts, without exaggeration, and I must be excused if I talk somewhat earnestly, because I am interested in some of these industries. The Auburn mills in 1874 were managed and owned by proprietors in Montreal. The factory could not be made to pay in 1875, and it was sold, my friend Mr. G. A. Cox buying the stock at 5 cents on the dollar. What is the result to-day? That factory has been run so as to be a success; and I may say here that management is everything in conducting industrial establishments.

Mr. LAURIER. Then prosperity is due to management, and not to the National Policy?

Mr. STEVENSON.

Mr. STEVENSON. That stock to-day is worth 120 cents on the dollar. Why? The National Policy has no doubt helped it, but the establishment has been well managed. I can instance another factory equally as large that does not pay one cent on its stock to-day, and that is due to want of management. The National Policy at all events has helped the woollen factory, which now employs not less than 200 hands. Then there is the Wm. Hamilton Manufacturing Company, which makes boilers and everything connected with them. It also manufactures the machinery used in almost all the saw mills at Ottawa, or at all events the bulk of it. This company has also a factory in British Columbia, and is supplying that market. The number of mechanics employed is 130, and the pay-list is large. There is scarcely a week that machinery is not made for different parts of the country and car loads are not shipped. The next establishment is that of the Peter Hamilton Manufacturing Company which manufacture agricultural implements. It has been asserted in this House that Canadian manufacturers do not sell implements as cheap as the Americans, and that the manufacturers ought to reduce the price. I can prove before this House that our implements are sold as cheaply to-day as they are sold at Detroit. This is known to every manufacturer who sells in Canada. This concern employs 125 hands the year round. The next factory we come to is that of the Canada General Electric Company. It has been established two years, and employs on an average 500 hands. I wish hon. gentlemen opposite would visit Peterborough. I should be glad to show them around the town free of expense, and their eyes would be opened to what is going on at all events in one part of Canada. The company manufacture all articles connected with electric lighting. Many of these are now being brought to Ottawa and other places for sale, as that is the only establishment in which they are manufactured in Canada. The Hilliard Woollen Company employ about 60 hands; the John White factory employ about 30 hands; the Steel Bridge works employ about 80 hands. In 1876 there was not a steel or iron bridge company in Canada. In Peterborough we contracted for a bridge to be brought from Ohio. The manager who came to our town we engaged and he started business in Peterborough. He is now engaged in building bridges, also tunnels, he being employed at the present time in constructing a tunnel for the water power at Niagara Falls. So we do work not only for home but also for abroad. I am familiar with their work, because I happen to be connected with the company. We have no "combines" at Peterborough. If the people of other cities would act as we do I have no doubt they would be equally successful. We do not stand by and refuse to help these industries; but we take stock in them, because we are certain that we will get our investment back indirectly. We get stock taken in the town without any trouble, and, in fact, all the stock of these companies is owned in Peterborough. For example, the stock of the Auburn mills is entirely owned in the town, and the only stock not owned is that of the Edison company, which is controlled in New York. I come next to the Lock works, with which I am familiar. In 1878 no locks were manufactured in Canada, except a few at Kingston penitentiary. We went to Cleveland, bought out a factory, hired the men, bought the patterns, and brought the men and patterns to Canada. We established the works in Peterborough. For seven years we have run the factory with about 175 hands. Our output is of the value of $125,000 or $150,000 a year. We send our locks to every part of the country. Let me explain briefly this business, with which I am familiar. After we started, the Americans still retained control of this market, although that statement will perhaps not be accepted by the hon. member for North Simcoe, who says our people should buy English locks. Such a class of locks is not made in England. Let the hon. gentleman go to any hardware store and ask for English locks, and then he will see their patterns. Not only does the company make locks but they manufacture brass-work and do plating and bronzing for Pullman cars. When we commenced this business our American friends did not like the competition, and the fact that we bought out the Cleveland concern and brought over the men and patterns. What did they do? They sent out circulars to every wholesale dealer reducing the prices to them 20 per cent. We fought them, until the McKinley Bill passed, and that placed the price of the raw material so high that the American firms could not send their goods into Canada. Two other factories have started since, and the competition resulting has brought down the prices until they are now 40 per cent less than they were seven years ago. The foreman of the factory told me the other day that he would be glad to supply all the locks and screws needed in every farmer's house in the country for $5 for each house. We manufacture a first-class lock for $1.25 per dozen, complete. That surely cannot be considered an excessive price and one that our farmers cannot afford to pay. The concern employs from 100 to 150 hands at present. If you go down to the market and see farmers selling their produce you will find all the mechanics buying from them, and they have no trouble in disposing of their goods. We have also two factories making windows and doors for export, which engage about 40 hands. We have also a factory making porcelain knobs for doors and cut-off switches for electric lights, and they employ 100 hands there. A few years ago we started carbon works. There were no carbons made in Canada then, and as we had plenty of oil and coke here we commenced their manufacture, and we now supply nearly all that is used in Canada.

When our friends on the American side of the line found that we had brought some experts from Chicago to start the manufacturing of carbons they sent over the president of their company to Peterborough, and he said to us: Now, gentlemen, we have this trade in Canada entirely in our hands, and if you like we will take a big share of your stock, if you will combine with us and not lower the prices. That was the proposition we received from the American manufacturer of carbon. The price of No. 1 carbon was then $10 a thousand. We held a consultation upon the matter, and we decided that we would not go into the combine, and what was the result? They sent their carbons over to Canada and sold them for $5 a thousand here. They said: We will shut that factory up in a short time; but they did not succeed. They have been underselling us, but we were not a bit scared, and we are working away still. We have not made money to pay one cent of a dividend, nay, more, we were called upon to double our stock, and I am proud to say that every stock-holder responded, and that in one day we raised our stock from $50,000 to $100,000, and we are going on still and employing 100 hands. If I am to take the statements of some hon. gentlemen opposite there is a great deal of poverty in some parts of the country; but it is not so in Peterborough. The sheriff of the county of Peterborough has not sold out a farmer in the county for twelve months, and he told me the other day he was afraid he was going to starve. Peterborough is famous for its canoes, and we have two large canoe factories there, and also two furniture factories, employing 75 hands. It is known to most hon. gentlemen that we have very fine water-power in Peterborough, and we have three large flour mills there that turn out 1,000 barrels of flour per day. We do not supply wheat enough in our part of the country to keep these mills going, and we are constantly buying wheat in the west, and I leave it to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) who knows it well, to say if we are not paying 5 or 6 cents a bushel more for wheat than in any other part of Canada. Under these circumstances, we would be a very poor lot indeed in Peterborough if we did not support the National Policy. I have, within the last few days, received the complete returns of the money paid into the public treasury by the town of Peterborough in Customs, Inland Revenue and Excise. These returns are up to the present date, as the information in the blue-books is a year behind. Last year the port of Peterborough paid $100,000 into the Dominion Treasury for Customs, $76,000 for Inland Revenue and $16,000 into the post office. That is a fairly large contribution for Peterborough, and it shows that the Government should give us some return in the shape of some public works we want up there, in consideration of this large revenue. I may state that I have been engaged largely in the coal trade and that I exerted myself to get the duty taken off hard coal, and the duty was reduced by 50 cents a ton. Before the duty was reduced, I was getting a small percentage off from the coal company because we paid duty, but I will take my oath that in less than one week after the duty was reduced, the railway raised the freight 25 cents per ton, and the people of Buffalo said: "Oh, you have no duties to pay, and up goes your rates for coal the same as any one else." So we were just as badly off as when we started. I hear some hon. gentlemen talk about reducing the duty on binder twine, but you can take my word for it, that if the duty is taken off, the farmer will not get it any cheaper. I know that some of the manufacturers up our way do not intend to reduce the price, notwithstanding Mr. Mowat's factory. In view of all these things, and in view of the benefit the National Policy has conferred upon Peterborough, at all events, I am prepared to stand up for it, as long as I know it will benefit the country. I have been fifty years in business, and I know, from my experience, that the National Policy is for the benefit of a young country like ours. Some of the hon. gentlemen opposite think that if they get on the treasury-benches they will turn the world upside down. There may be one or two of them who have got the name of throwing fat on the fire, but I think the majority of hon. gentlemen opposite would not like to introduce any policy that would shut down all the factories in Canada. We are selling locks at our factory at 10 per cent less than the same kind of locks are selling at in the factories in Massachusetts. The only lock that they send in that can compete with ours is a very inferior iron lock, which is put down at a very low price to injure us. It is selling at $1 a dozen, while we are selling a much better lock at $1.25 a dozen. Now, I know what I am talking about, because I am familiar with the business, being connected with the factory, having a little stock in it, though not very much, and I take a deep interest in it. Now, as to profits, we have heard a great deal about bloated manufacturers. I never saw any of them. I wish some of the men who talk about bloated manufacturers would take some stock in our factories and see how much bloating there is in it. They would get a dividend of 5 or 6 per cent—no more. In fact, we are not getting one cent of dividend in one case, but still we are not going to throw the business overboard, because these factories employ large numbers of men, who bring their families there and build up the place, and if we do not get our profit in one way, we get it in another. Six per cent is the largest dividend I have got this year. Surely there is not much bloating about that. Now, I am not telling you anything but what I am prepared to prove, and I am not exaggerating in the least. I am familiar with the facts that I am speaking of, ten times more so than my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) who knows so much about them. I am not so familiar with law, but I tell you that the farmers have ten times less dread of the factories than they have of the lawyers and the lawyers' bills.

Mr. EDGAR. What are their dividends?

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, I want to tell you about the wages paid in Peterborough. The wages paid, last year, by the factories there amounted to a little over $600,000. In the face of that fact, will you tell me whether or not the National Policy has not built up Peterborough? Why, Sir, at the time the National Policy was announced, I venture to say that not over $100,000 a year was paid out in wages in factories in that town, where now there is $600,000. Probably some hon. gentlemen may think that this is a singular thing, but I will ask any one of them to come to Peterborough—I will pay his expenses—and I will satisfy him that I am stating the truth. As a representative of Peterborough, I support the National Policy, and I think hon. gentlemen will not deny that it has benefited us there, and that we ought to support it. We ought to keep our feet as firm upon the plank as we can, and we intend to do it. So long as I am in this House, I will not vary from that one iota. I support the man who supports the National Policy, whether he is on that side or on this side; I am here to do that, and I intend to do it. There is not a manufacturing establishment in Peterborough which, to my knowledge, is paying more than 6 per cent dividend. Yes; I think that, last year, there was one, and only one, that paid 8 per cent. I am not connected with that one, and I am not certain of that; I only heard so. Now, it ought to be a matter of rejoicing to hon. gentlemen on the opposite side as well as to us on this side that we have factories in Canada, and that the National Policy is building up even one town, and I only regret that we have not the names of some hon. gentlemen opposite among the stockholders of some of these factories. I know that we have some very strong Conservatives by getting them in as stockholders; and if it were not for this miserable, shaky business that prevents us from knowing one day what may take place another day, we would have far more. Now, I wish to draw your attention to something else, for it is not very likely that I shall be here to draw your attention to anything very much longer, because I intend to get out of politics. I have so much else to attend to that I cannot attend to this. But, let me say that I learned one thing many years ago, that is, that the farmer and the mechanic should go hand in hand, and I think that is the true way to build up a country. From my experience, and I am nearly as old as a good many gentlemen who sit on the opposite side, and I have certainly had as much experience in business as most of them, any country or town that lets its manufacturing go down will not amount to much. I will say more than that: I do not like a town that has a lot of rich men who will not do anything. I like to see them use their money instead of lending it out at 7 or 8 or 10 per cent on mortgages; I like to see them invest it in factories, and, if they did that, we would have better times. Just so surely as you drive out the factories by changing the policy and refusing to give them reasonable protection, just so surely will the country go down in its receipts, its money, and everything else. Now, I have told you already that in the county of Peterborough there are few sales under execution. I do not recollect seeing a sale on the market within the last two years, and I repeat we have a first-class county, both east and west. The farmers in that district know, from practical experience, the benefits they derive from the National Policy. We draw them from within five miles of our neighbouring town, we bring them from Lake Ontario to Peterborough, and buy their produce; and they can sell everything there at much higher prices than they can anywhere else. And all that is due to the National Policy. It is quite true we have good water power, but, with the exception of the mills, our factories are chiefly run by steam, and when I made these estimates of what we pay out, I did not include any of the mills. I have said nothing about them, although they turn out a thousand barrels a day, and employ a considerable number of hands, so that when I give $600,000 as an estimate, I am very much within the mark. Stores pay rents from $500 up to $1,300 per year, and do a rushing trade, and yet we are told that the country is going to the bad. If I only had as much money as some hon. gentlemen opposite, I would make things jump. I wish I had the money that Sir Richard Cartwright has, and I would soon make that little town of Napanee work up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will you come?

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to first rate. If you will take stock in something down there which will build the place up, I will guarantee to bring you over to this side of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We expect to go over there.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not wish to take up any more time of the House, and am very much obliged for the kind attention with which my remarks have been listened to.

Mr. KENNY. It must have been gratifying to my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to have heard the practical speech to which we have just listened, showing the beneficial results of the policy of protection which he was instrumental in inaugurating in this country in 1878, which he supported in 1882, which he supported in 1887, and which he supported in 1891, and which is still the policy of the Conservative party, of which he has been so prominent a member. There has been no change in the policy of the Conservative party. And when this hon. gentleman asks us to desert the ranks of that party and abandon the policy which was inaugurated by himself and others in 1878, and which we have been sent here to support, and when he accompanies this demand by a resolution in which he says that as a consequence of that policy, discontent verging on disloyalty exists in Canada, I say he must make a strong case indeed before he can expect his appeal to be successful. In 1878, when the policy of protecting Canadian labour and Canadian capital was inaugurated, the conditions of the trade and commerce of Canada were worse than they have been at any period of our history. The few industries that we had were in a state of paralysis. Some of them had been actually closed, and when the hon. member for North Simcoe pointed out the other evening, that in 1878 we had a certain number of factories in this country, he ought to have told us as he mentioned in his public speeches in 1878, that unless some changes were made in the fiscal policy of this country, those few industries would be closed. As a matter of fact, does not the hon. gentleman know that the only sugar refineries we then had had been closed by the action of hon. gentlemen opposite? Does he not remember that when the people of Canada in 1876, 1877 and 1878 appealed to the Government of that day to so arrange the tariff that a fair measure of protection should be granted to Canadian labour. Hon. gentlemen opposite refused to listen to that appeal, and that, as a consequence, they lost their majority in Parliament, and their control over the public affairs of this country. Therefore it is that I say that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) must make a strong case, indeed, before he can expect us to follow him and to change our party allegiance or deviate from the policy which has resulted in general advantage to the people of Canada. I am free to admit that the National Policy is not an unmixed blessing. I recognize that in certain branches of commerce it has not been beneficial, and without any desire to be personal, I must express my regret that to wholesale, the business in which I have been engaged all my life, it has been detrimental. To the importer of dry goods the National Policy has been a disadvantage. I say further, that in the community in which I live, Confederation has been an injury to that business, but would that warrant opposition to Confederation? Because the business of the wholesale dry goods importers in Canada has been prejudiced by the National Policy, that is not a sufficient reason for our opposing a policy which has benefited the masses of the people. That policy may be inconvenient to me and to a comparatively small number of merchants in Halifax, who are engaged in the importing business, but I can point to factories existing there which never would have an existence unless the Canadian labour employed therein was protected, and which had no existence before 1878. So that, while the few have suffered, the many have benefited. The hon. member for North Simcoe, in trying to establish his case, assails certain industries of Canada, and notably the cotton industry. I know that I run the risk of incurring your displeasure, Mr. Speaker, when I refer to anything that took place in a previous debate, but we are all aware that the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) made a speech which has been referred to during this debate, and which attracted very considerable attention, and these two learned gentlemen in the law have undertaken to instruct us in the matter of the cotton trade of Canada. I quite recognize their ability to deal with any question, but when these two gentlemen do not speak from original knowledge, we cannot be surprised that they should have drifted into errors to which all men are liable when they are not personally acquainted with the theme they are discussing. I refer to this industry more particularly because it is one of the most important in the country, and because it was the first to which the hon. member for North Simcoe paid any special attention. He laid down this proposition, that if he could show that the cotton mills paid too high dividends, or watered their stock, or charged excessive prices, he had established that it was necessary that this Parliament should interfere by tariff regulation. I think these are the points the hon. gentleman laid down.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think so, but however—

Mr. KENNY. If my hon. friend will permit me, I will read from his speech in the "Hansard":

We arrive at the conclusion, perhaps, that we are paying too much if we find that they water their stock and pay high dividends.

Then again, the hon. gentleman, in the course of his argument, proves to his own satisfaction that the prices of cotton goods have fallen a certain percentage in England and that they have not fallen by so large a percentage in Canada. If I am in error, I would call upon my hon. friend to correct me now. As regards the price of cotton goods, he has made a statement, and it is a very important one, that from 1878 down to 1891 the prices of manufactured cotton goods in Canada have decreased 24 per cent.

Mr. KENNY.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is correct, with this understanding, that I made the statement upon the information of my hon. friend who sits near me here (Mr. Bergin). I said so at the time. It was by a mistake in the "Hansard" that I spoke of 1872, when it ought to have been 1878.

Mr. FOSTER. So the basis of the argument was wrong?

Mr. McCARTHY. So far as the quotation of 1872 instead of 1878 was concerned, that would make a difference, I think, of 13 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. And vitiate the whole argument.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, it does not. The argument was that between 1872 and 1891 cotton goods fell in England to the tune of 38 per cent. Between 1878 and 1889 they fell to the tune of 25 or 26 per cent. So that the calculation is wrong to the extent of the difference between 25 and 38.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman, in trying to make a case against the National Policy, gave to this House certain figures. He brought down here a resolution in which he tells the people of Canada that the existing tariff is engendering discontent, verging on disloyalty, throughout the country, and it was unworthy of the hon. gentleman not to be accurate in a matter of such importance.

Mr. McCARTHY. It was not my fault; it was the fault of "Hansard."

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman made a mistake—

Mr. McCARTHY. No; I spoke from the "Hansard" report. I stated that it was the unrevised "Hansard," and it was there I found the figure 1872.

Mr. KENNY. Well, I accept that. Now, let us see where we are. The hon. gentleman stated, on what he believed to be a reliable authority—he would not have quoted it, if he had not thought it reliable, but he accompanied it with no explanation—that the reduction in the price of cotton goods manufactured in Canada from 1878 to 1891 was 24 per cent. Now, let that stand in the memory of the members of the House. I now propose to deal with the other figures, the accuracy of which, I suppose, he has tested before he came here. I will quote for the hon. gentleman the part of his speech to which I refer:

I find from the Statistical Abstract by Mr. Giffen that since 1872 up to the present time cotton goods have fallen to the tune of 38 per cent.

That is in England, of course. Now, I might be permitted to ask my hon. friend, what class of cotton goods he referred to?

Mr. McCARTHY. All the cotton goods referred to in that abstract. That abstract purports to give the prices from 1872 to 1888 of all classes of cotton goods, and what I said refers to those.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman took the average price ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I took the average price given there.

Mr. KENNY. I went to the Library and was furnished by the officers there with the last Statistical Abstract, which appears under date of 1892, "Giffen's Statistical Abstract." I find that it does not contain the average price per yard or per hundred-weight of cotton goods for 1872. I will ask my hon. friend if that is the work to which he makes reference ?

Mr. McCARTHY. This book I have not seen.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Take the witness box.

Mr. McCARTHY. The book to which I referred, was a much larger book than this.

Mr. KENNY. As I could not get the average prices in the larger work to which he refers, and as he was dealing with the years 1878 down to 1891 in Canada, and these were the years of the National Policy of the fiscal system which is now on its trial before this House, I propose to deal, through "Giffen's Statistical Abstract," with the average prices of cotton goods in England from 1878 down to the latest information this book affords. I find on page 144 of "Giffen's Abstract," that in 1878 cotton yarn was 12·47d. a pound, and in 1891 cotton yarn was 10·94d., a difference of 1·53d., or about 12½ per cent. That is the difference in price by the very authority which the hon. gentleman has quoted in this House. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has said that he included in his calculation such articles of cotton as appear in this abstract. I find that in cotton manufactured goods, that is, plain goods, in 1878 the price was 2·76d. per yard. In 1891 the price was 2·31d., a difference of :45, or say 16½ per cent. Why, Sir, to get 38 out of that comparison you have to add the difference in cotton yarn to the difference in piece goods.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not take from 1887, I took from 1872.

Mr. KENNY. Well, I cannot get the average prices in "Giffen's Statistical Abstract" of 1872. I am dealing with the years of the National Policy, and he gave us the Canadian statistics for 1878 to 1891. I took the same years for the English statistics. Let me go further. Take cotton printed goods. If the hon. gentleman will give me the statistics of average prices of 1872, I will be very glad to have them. I cannot get them in the Library.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will get them for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KENNY. In 1878 the average price per yard cotton goods, printed, cost 4.18; in 1891 they cost 3.15, a difference of 1.03, or 24¾ per cent. We all know that the cotton goods which were imported into Canada from England before we had the National Policy would principally come under the designation of plain goods, and that the difference in those goods in England from 1878 down to 1891, was only 16½ per cent; and that the difference from 1878 down to 1891 on printed goods, was only 24¾ per cent. Now, from the very authority upon which the hon. gentleman has based his statement, in the very book to which he has referred me, I find that in Canada, taking his own figures, there has been a greater reduction in the price of manufactured cotton goods, than in England. Therefore, the charge the hon. gentleman has made against the cotton manufacturers of Canada in relation to the price of cotton goods, falls completely to the ground. "Ex uno disce omnes." If the hon. gentleman says that we in Canada are paying more for our goods, I say that from his own showing he has no case which deserves the support of this House. So much for the price of goods. Next, the hon. gentleman has intimated that the cotton industries in Canada pay an excessively high dividend. Sir, unfortunately for myself, I was connected with a cotton factory which was established in Halifax, I think it was in 1879; I happened to be on the first board of directors. My association with it was not a very fortunate one. After struggling along in a very unfortunate financial career for some years, my connection with it ceased. I sold my stock at a loss of 75 cents on the dollar. In starting that industry we were not dazzled by the prospect of big profits; we did so in hope and expectation that we would get a fair return for our investment, and we desired to find employment for our people, to keep them at home and prevent them from straying off into the cotton mills of Lowell—the same spirit, the same idea, I have no doubt, which animated the hon. member for North Simcoe when he so eloquently urged the adoption of the National Policy, and which influenced him in supporting and continued to support until very recently. The hon. gentleman has stated, or has insinuated, at all events, that the cotton companies of Canada have earned very large dividends on their outlay. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is a shareholder, or has been a shareholder, in a cotton company, but surely there are hon. gentlemen in this House who have been associated as shareholders in cotton companies, and they must know, that the cotton companies of Canada have not paid 2½ per cent per annum on their investment since their establishment. We laboured under very great difficulties in starting this industry in Canada. We had no trained labour, we had to send to England for managers, and for operatives to instruct our Canadian labour. It takes a long time to develop a manufacturing enterprise in any country. How did England attain to her manufacturing supremacy? By adopting in its early stages a protective policy, by cheap labour, cheap capital and long experience. We had to contend with many obstacles. The industry was new to us. It takes, in my opinion, a long time to establish a new industry successfully, and to produce at the lowest possible rate, any class of goods. Recurring to cotton goods. I am sure that the hon. member for Simcoe has taken pains to inform himself on this question; the hon. member must know, and my hon. friend from West Ontario will admit, that the class of cotton goods we produce in this country, is infinitely better value than the class of goods that are sold at the same prices in England.

Mr. EDGAR. No.

Mr. KENNY. If the hon. gentleman had any practical knowledge, he would not deny it.

Mr. EDGAR. Not at the same prices. The hon. gentleman surely does not mean that.

Mr. KENNY. I do not know how these hon. gentlemen can expect to be very familiar, personally, with these goods. They do not import them. Surely those of us who are selling them every day, importing them from England, must know something more about them. I admit as to price that there are certain goods manufactured in Lancashire, largely filled with China clay, which are lower in price than any goods made in Canada. But we do not make those goods in Canada: in fact they are such an objectionable class of goods that we so adjusted our tariff as to exclude these goods, to a large extent.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman say, then, what we want protection for?

Mr. KENNY. What we want protection for! Mr. Speaker, I will ask my hon. friend a question. An Irishman, you know, always has the privilege of answering a question by asking another. My hon. friend asks me why we adopted a protective policy?

Mr. McCARTHY. No, I ask you what you want it for now?

Mr. KENNY. My hon. friend, if he had been importing cotton goods from 1872 down to the time when we commenced to protect the manufacturer of cotton goods in Canada, would have made this discovery, that the Americans were in the habit of coming into Canada, as my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Stevenson) pointed out in the matter of other classes of goods—so with cotton goods—the Americans came into Canada and slaughtered their goods here. The fact came palpably under my own notice when I was in the city of New York before 1878. Not knowing where to go for certain classes of domestic cotton goods. I consulted a gentleman in the trade, and he told me if I went to the agents of those companies which manufactured the goods I required, and said that I wanted them for Canada, I would buy them cheaper than they sold them to Claffin, or Mellen, or A. T. Stewart. That is my own experience. I asked an explanation, and he said: "Because these goods are going into Canada, the manufactures will not break their prices in the United States of America, but they will in Canada." The hon. member for North Simcoe must know that before the Mackenzie Government were driven from power the merchants of Montreal and other Canadian cities—so I am told, at least, and I think "Hansard" will show it—came to this Parliament, or to the Government at Ottawa at least, and begged of them to impose some tariff protection in order to prevent Canada becoming a slaughter-market for American productions. That is the kind of protection I want. I do not desire protection that is going to make the Canadian capitalist rich at the expense of my fellow-countrymen, but what I do want is protection for Canadians employed in our different manufacturing industries. When I refer to a slaughter market, every gentleman engaged in business having any knowledge of the important business before 1879 must be thoroughly familiar with the phrase. I venture the statement that the hon. member for North Simcoe, no doubt, referred to it in some past speeches. The "Hansard" for 1878 has just been placed in my hands, in which I find the hon. member made a reference to it. In a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman on 26th February, 1878, I find the following:—

Mr. McCarthy said he was glad to hear the hon. gentleman say "hear, hear," but he wanted to know to what these figures pointed? If we were then able in 1873 to export to the United States goods to the value of $42,000,000; and if we were then able to send manufactured articles there to the value of very nearly $2,000,000; and if we were not able now to send these goods to the value of more than $1,250,000, was not this because the United States was flooding our markets with their goods: and he wanted to know whether under these circumstances, remedial legislation was not required, and whether some protection should not be afforded, or whether we were to remain as flies on the wheel—that was to say; not take any steps to do what was unnecessary to be done in 1873. The accusation which the Opposition made was that these circumstances pointed conclusively to the fact that either this country had been made a slaughter market of, or that the protection system in the United States was a success, and he did not think it made any difference upon which horn of the dilemma the hon. gentleman chooses to be impaled.

Sir, there is the hon. member for North Simcoe's reference to the slaughter-market, and when that hon. gentleman asks me why I favour protection to Canadian labour, I refer him to his own speech of 1878, made on his responsibility as a member of Parliament. When I look at the hon. gentleman's course from the date when he uttered those words in this House, through the fourteen years that have elapsed since, and at his continuous support of the protective tariff, I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should ask me now abruptly to turn round and follow him because he chooses to change his mind. I have established, I think, that as regards prices, taking quality into consideration, the reduction in prices of Canadian manufactured cotton goods has been greater than that of goods manufactured in England. But my hon. friend will say—I am sorry that the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) is not in the House, because I should like to finish with this cotton question now—that some terrible company has been watering its stock, and he points to the Dominion Cotton Company. It is within the knowledge, as I said before, of most hon. gentlemen who have taken any trouble to inform themselves as to the history of our cotton factories in Canada since we started them, that they have had a precarious existence, that there has been great difficulties with respect to their management, and like pioneer enterprises in all countries, they proved very unremunerative and unfortunate investments to their shareholders. I think, with the exception of one or two, there were no cotton mills in Canada which paid dividends, and so difficult was it to carry them on that they were in danger of being closed. As hon. gentlemen engaged in manufacturing businesses are aware, the last step a manufacturer will take is to close his factory, and in order to prevent this calamity some gentlemen in Montreal, who had acted as agents for some of the mills, and possibly to whom these mills were under financial advances, helped the mills in their difficulty. What did they do? These gentlemen in Montreal, who acted as distributing agents for these cotton mills, entered into an arrangement with the shareholders of these mills to take over their properties partly, and pay them the price agreed upon, partly in bonds and in cash. In this way six or seven cotton mills were acquired by those gentlemen. The gentlemen who were connected with this enterprise—I am subject to correction if any hon. gentleman has better information than I have, for I am stating the case simply to the best of my knowledge—were connected with the Hochelaga company, that being at the time the largest cotton company in Canada. It was subsequently suggested that those properties which had been so acquired should be incorporated with the Hochelaga company. Before that was done, it became necessary for the gentlemen who were organizing the new company to secure a Dominion charter, for the reason that the mills which they were acquiring were scattered in different provinces, and to organize the company and give it a legal status they applied for letters patent and placed their organizing capital at $100,000. To comply with the law it became necessary for those gentlemen to deposit with the Secretary of State, what is now a public document and available to all of us, the sworn appraisement of the value of their property, and if I am correctly informed, the property of the Hochelaga Mills alone was valued by the sworn appraisers at $2,600,000. They also acquired the Magog print works, I think the only print works to-day in Canada, and other cotton mills, representing a sum of $2,000,000. If hon. members will add the value of those mills and the Magog works to the sworn appraisement of the Hochelaga mills, they will see that the property represents an estimated value of $4,600,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. gentleman say at what figure those people placed the cotton mill at Dundas in that estimate?

Mr. KENNY. I really cannot tell the hon. gentleman what mills were thus acquired. I make the statement simply that the number of mills so acquired was five or six. I have not the names of the mills.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the hon. gentleman understand that the cotton mills at Dundas are shut up?

Mr. McKAY. Although the Dundas Mills are shut up, the good machinery in those mills has been moved to other places, to Hamilton and Cornwall, and the spindles are now running and are employed in manufacturing cottons.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). That is just what the Dundas people complain of, that notwithstanding the National Policy the mill has been closed.

Mr. KENNY. Before proceeding with my argument, I may make a statement with regard to some of those mills in the eastern portion of the Dominion of which I have some personal knowledge, that if some arrangement had not been made, they would be closed to-day to the great delight of hon. gentlemen opposite, because their animus and intention is, if they ever get into power, to destroy every manufacturing industry we have in this country. Why, Sir, the other night, when the hon. member for North Simcoe Mr. McCarthy was making his speech, the only time they cheered was when he pointed to some misfortune in Canada or said something against our industries. When the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) told them he had no sympathy with their disloyal policy of unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union, they hung their heads in silence. When the hon. gentleman told them that the condition of the Canadian farmer was infinitely better than the condition of the United States farmer, and that all the statements which they had been making in this House for the last five or six years, were, therefore, in his opinion, incorrect and misleading, hon. gentlemen opposite had not a word to say. But, when the member for Simcoe referred to something unfortunate for Canada, then the hon. gentlemen opposite applauded. Now, Sir, to continue my reference to the establishment of the Dominion Cotton Company, which has been so fiercely assailed in this House. I pointed to the fact that the Hochelaga Cotton Company, according to a sworn statement which is now in the office of the Secretary of State, possesses an estimated value of $2,600,000. In addition to that, there were six or seven mills and the Magoz Mill, representing an outlay of $2,000,000. At that time the stock of the Hochelaga Cotton Company was $1,250,000, and the directors of that company said to their shareholders: At present we will issue no further stock; we will wait a year until the business is thoroughly organized, and then we will give you your stock, if you want it. Hence the increase of the Dominion Cotton Company to $3,000,000 capital, and, when hon. gentlemen consider that the real estate, the mills and the plant which they have acquired, represents an outlay of $4,600,000, and that in order to get the funds to pay for these, they had to issue bonds to the extent of $1,500,000, they will see that there is nothing very wrong in estimating that property to be worth $3,000,000. Sir, reference was made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to the mill at Valleyfield, and, in the course of his remarks, he said that that company was watering their stock. He made that statement very boldly and very emphatically. I have some slight knowledge of what is going on amongst the cotton mills in Canada—there is no secret about it; those in the trade hear of it—and I was under the impression at the time the statement was made, that it was the intention of the Valleyfield Mill to add to its capital, in order to increase its machinery and capacity. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) should, I think, have looked carefully before he made such a sweeping charge against a very respectable manufacturing company in this country. Now, Sir, I find in the "Empire" of the 16th instant, which has just been placed in my hands, the following letter, which, I think, appeared in the Montreal "Herald" of the 15th. It states:

Sir,—In your report of Mr. Dalton McCarthy's speech on the tariff you say:—

"The Montreal Cotton Company was now watering its stock in order to secrete its earnings."

Please note that this is a gross misrepresentation, and could only have been made by Mr. McCarthy out of a fervent desire to gain a point, no matter in what way.

If the other statements in his speech are as far removed from accuracy as this, those who put their trust in him will be very far misled.

The facts are: The Montreal Cotton Company are increasing their capital stock and are enlarging their mills and their business. The new capital which was authorized is to be used for this purpose solely, and will be issued to the shareholders at the rate of one hundred cents to the dollar. It will represent capital invested, and in no sense can it be called watering the stock. These facts were made public at the annual meeting held last month, and could have been learned by anyone.

STEVENSON, BLACKADER & CO.,
Agents for the Montreal Cotton Co., (Limited.)

And yet the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) will tell this House, on the responsibility of his position and as one of the leading and oldest members here, that that company was watering its stock. The hon. gentleman must deal with the statement I have read, in such a manner as to him seems best. Now, so much for the prices, so much for dividends, and so much for watering the stock. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) also spoke about these terrible cotton mills the other night; and I sometimes wonder, when I look back at the career of the cotton mills for the last ten years, if the law lords of Canada have not had a much better time of it than the cotton lords. When my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) asked across the floor of the House to-night, what were the lawyers' dividends, I could not help thinking, from my knowledge of cotton stocks, that the lawyers' dividends had been very much better than the dividends received by these terribly abused cotton manufacturers. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) comes to the conclusion that the profits made in the cotton mills of Canada must be from $4,000,000 to $6,000,000 a year. He points out that the importation of raw cotton has enormously increased of late years, until it has reached to 46,000,000 pounds. That in itself ought to be gratifying to every Canadian here, when he remembers that in 1878 we only imported 7,000,000 pounds of raw cotton, and now we import 46,000,000 pounds, while we get our goods as cheap, and better quality than ever we had them before, and our own people get the benefit derived from manufacturing them. My hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) says: Oh, these terrible people; they imported 46,000,000 pounds of raw material and they manufactured them into cotton goods, and these goods, by my calculation, must amount to $14,000,000 a year. My hon. friend must permit me to point out to him—I asked him the question across the floor of the House the other evening, to which he very courteously responded—that of the 46,000,000 pounds of cotton which the Trade and Navigation Returns show were imported into Canada last year, 4,000,000 pounds is what is known as cotton waste. He should know that that cotton waste does not go into piece goods, that it is largely used as machinery waste, although some of it is used for making batting and wadding and such goods. Again, let me point out to the hon. gentleman, that all of the 40,000,000 pounds of cotton imported into Canada, does not go into cotton cloth, but that a large amount of it is mixed with wool in the manufacture of many classes of useful goods. Also a large amount of it is used in making cotton hosiery and cotton underwear. Again, my hon. friend knows that the waste in the manufacturing of cotton is fully 10 per cent, so that if he will deduct 10 per cent from the 40,000,000 pounds, I think he will come to the conclusion that there cannot be much more than 36,000,000 pounds of cotton used in the manufacture of piece cotton goods. In making his estimate the other night, he stated that the average price of cotton goods was something like 9 cents a yard; but I think he would be nearer the true average if he called it 8 cents a yard; and if he will take these goods at 8 cents a yard, I think he will come to the conclusion that the statement which was made by the hon. President of the Council to-day was more correct: that the value of the piece cotton goods manufactured in Canada does not exceed the value of $9,000,000.

Mr. EDGAR. Would my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? The only use I made of the importation of 46,000,000 pounds in 1892 was to compare it with the importation of the same class of material in 1882. Now, does my hon. friend pretend to say that there was either more or less waste in proportion in 1882 than there is now? If he admits that the proportion is the same, as I contend, my argument stands perfectly good.

Mr. KENNY. My hon. friend went further. He said that so many spindles turn out so many yards of cotton goods.

Mr. EDGAR. That is another thing.

Mr. KENNY. Certainly: I should think the percentage of waste would be the same this year as it was in the past. But the hon. gentleman must remember this: that he took as a basis of calculation the assumption that every pound of raw cotton made $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards of cloth, that he multiplies 46,000,000 pounds of cotton by this figure, and thus turned it all into yards of cloth. Well, my hon. friend will see that he is out 8,000,000 pounds by his own showing. He is out 4,000,000, pounds on the cotton waste, and he is out 4,000,000 pounds or 10 per cent loss in manufacturing. I think I am correct in placing the value of the product—and my statement is made on the very best authority—at \$8,800,000. The hon. gentleman himself told us the other night that the wages and the cost of raw material amounted to \$6,000,000, and he deducted this amount from the value he put upon the product, and that was all he deducted. My hon. friend knows very well that this cotton did not fly from Georgia or Alabama or from wherever it was purchased, to Canada; he knows that the transportation of that cotton is a very large item; he knows very well that in these manufacturing industries the motive power costs a very large amount of money. It may be water; it may be steam; it is generally steam, which consumes a large amount of coal. Again, the hon. gentleman knows that in all these manufacturing industries there is a large outlay for supplies and stores. He knows, too, that within the last few years there have been vast improvements made in the processes of manufacturing cotton goods. Every year we are making new goods, which necessitates an outlay for new machinery and for keeping up the general equipment of the mills and duty must be paid on the new machinery imported. The hon. gentleman knows that property has to be insured, and that there is interest to be paid on borrowed capital. So that, with all due respect to my hon. friend, if he will take these additional items into consideration, and deduct them as well as the cost of the raw material and wages, he will see that he is entirely astray in his estimate, and that no such money as he supposes has been made out of the cotton industry in Canada; and the hon. gentleman emphasized his statement, because he made it twice in this House, and it has attracted attention in the country. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely preposterous to try to make the business men of Canada believe that the cotton mills made \$4,000,000 or \$6,000,000 last year. I think, therefore, that my hon. friend, relying as he had to do on data that he received from others, will find, on reconsideration, that some real error has been made in the calculations. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for North Simcoe referred to the iron industry of Canada, and we all know that the iron industry of any country is the basis of all manufacturing industry. He gave us one specimen item. He told us that the cost of Canadian bar iron was \$46 a ton, and that English iron, better in quality, because it was not made from scrap, could be landed in Canada for \$45.05 a ton. Sir, is it likely that we Canadians would pay \$46 a ton for an inferior article when we could import a better article for \$45 a ton? In that statement, I think, the hon. gentleman simply proved too much. If there is any industry that requires protection in its initial stages it is the iron industry, and I assume that my hon. friend, who has taken some pains to inform himself on this matter, must have learned in the course of his investigations that at the end of the first forty years of the development of the iron industry by a protective tariff in England the duty on pig iron was £6 10s. a ton, and yet he says that we in Canada should have firmly established iron industries in the country under a protective tariff which has only existed since 1887; if the evidence of history is worth anything it is all against him in his contention. Look again at the United States, and what has occurred there. Under the protective policy the iron industry of the United States has wonderfully developed. In 1870, the amount of pig iron produced was 1,665,000 tons; in 1880, it was 3,835,000 tons; in 1888

it had increased to 6,489,000 tons, showing an immense development, which could not possibly have taken place unless the iron industry had been protected. Now, what has been the effect of protection on prices? In 1860, the price of pig iron per ton was $22.75, but, in 1889, it had decreased, under a protective tariff, to $17.75. My hon. friend said that there had been no great development of the iron industry. I regret to say that is largely the case, and it is a disappointment to those of us who realize the importance of the iron industry as the basis of all manufacturing industries, that greater development has not yet taken place in Canada. But allow me to point out one industry in the eastern section of the Dominion to the notice of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). It was in 1887 that the tariff was adopted whereby Canadian labour engaged in the manufacture of iron was protected. Hon. gentlemen know that it takes a long time to gather the necessary capital even after you secure the area, and the ores suitable for smelting works and in Pictou county, N.S., although immediately after the adoption of the tariff of 1887 efforts were made to secure suitable properties and to acquire skilled labour and the necessary capital for the development of these industries, it was only in August last that the blast furnace at Ferona was lighted, although ever since 1887 or 1888 people have been working at that industry. To-day the capital employed at Ferona amounts to $750,000. In that neighbourhood a charcoal furnace has been erected, where a higher grade of iron is produced, and the investment in that immediate neighbourhood connected with the Ferona iron furnace and the charcoal furnace, the steel works amounts to $1,300,000 to-day. I do not think that this is a very discouraging result for the few years of protection which the iron industry of Canada has had. Let the hon. gentleman consider that, in England, which owes her manufacturing supremacy largely to her iron and coal, the iron output for the first forty years of the existence of that industry was protected to such an extent that, at the end of that period, the protection amounted to $31.50 per ton. I have dealt with the iron and cotton industry. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) referred to the wall-paper industry. But, as I am not familiar with the trade, and have no expert or technical knowledge of my own, and have not had time to acquire information, I will not venture to discuss it. These here are the principal items to which he has referred, and it is in connection with those he attempts to persuade us that he has established a case which should induce us to abandon a policy that has resulted so advantageously to this country. When the hon. gentleman was referring to the discontent prevailing in Canada—a discontent so great, he said, that the country was on the verge of disloyalty and rebellion—he was asked why he would not give Home Rule to Ireland, and he appropriately replied that he would give his reasons at a suitable time. If any one had asked him why he would not give a National Policy to Ireland he might have given his opinion immediately, and he might have told us that a national policy of protection for Ireland would have benefited the Irish people as it has benefited the Canadian people. Nothing could be more unfortunate for a country than that the energies of its people should be confined to one industry, as nothing can be more profitable to a country than that diversity of employment should be furnished to its people. To a large agricultural community, you can offer no greater boon than a home market for surplus agricultural products. The hon. gentleman knows that if our manufacturing industries were closed, as they would be if hon. gentlemen opposite had their own way, and our industrial establishments had to wind up their business, the agricultural community would be great sufferers, and our labouring classes now engaged in these industries would be again driven out of the country as they were previous to 1878. It is infinitely better for the farmer of Canada that he should have a home market for his produce than that he should be obliged to send his wheat to England, the great market of the world, and meet there the competition of the cheaper labour of India and Russia and all the other countries of Europe and South America, and any hon. gentleman who has followed the shipping business knows what that competition means, and how low the freights are from these countries to England. Grain, to-day, is transported from the River LaPlata and from other points in South America at the rate of 12 to 14 shillings per ton, to the great consuming centres of England, so that the Canadian farmer, if all these cotton mills and iron mills and other industries were shut down would be obliged to send his wheat there. He cannot send it to the United States, because they do not want it. He would thus find his wheat depreciated by the cost of transportation and the competition he would have to contend against, and unexchanged he would have to buy his cotton and other goods which he requires for his family and pay the transportation of the same across the Atlantic. Is it not infinitely better for the farmer to have his market alongside of him, where he can supply the men who are engaged in the iron and cotton and other industries with their daily bread and meats and the other produce of the farm which they require, than to be obliged to force them on the English market in competition with cheap foreign labour. The hon. gentleman said that the whole burdens of the tariff fell upon the farmers and that they receive no protection. I suppose he wants to go back to the condition of things which existed when hon. gentlemen opposite controlled this country. But I can hardly think he can have very much in common with them. If we are to judge by the sentiments which he expressed the other night, the great ambition of the hon. gentleman, after all, is—and I would be sorry indeed if he should change his opinion in that respect—to strengthen the ties that bind Canada and the mother country. But the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has been to loosen those ties, irrespective of the consequences, and, therefore, I do not see how the hon. gentleman can have very much sympathy with the Opposition. But let us look at the condition of the farmer in years gone by, when hon. gentlemen opposite controlled the Government of Canada. At that time the farmer was taxed 6 cents a pound on his tea; now it is free. He was then taxed 2 cents per pound on coffee, and now it is free. He was taxed 2·37 cents per 100 pounds on his sugar, and now raw sugar, under 14 Dutch standard, is free. Has the farmer any protection? Is not the wheat he raises protected to the extent of 15 cents per bushel? Is not the flour he raises protected to the extent of 75 cents per barrel? The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) jeers. I wish he would come down to Nova Scotia and run an election there, and he would have that tax flung at him in every constituency in the province. Further, what about his oats? If I understand aright, oats are now protected to the extent of 10 cents per bushel. My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) may jeer at the tax on flour, but if he says there is no tax on flour, let me tell him he has deprived his friends in the Maritime provinces of their stock argument against the National Policy. I am sure it will be a pleasure for me hereafter to refer them to my hon. friend from Lambton. I can tell them that when I referred to the fact that the farmer was protected by this duty of 75 cents a barrel on flour,—and I want him to be protected, I think he has as good a right to be protected as any other man—the hon. member for Lambton laughed. I have mentioned the fact that my idea of a protective tariff is the protection which we accord to Canadian labour. I do not care what a man is engaged in, whether in raising wheat, or in producing iron, or in digging coal in the mines, or in our fisheries, I desire that he shall be protected in that industry. I referred to the fact that the farmer is protected. Do my friends from Ontario deny that? Does my hon. friend from Lambton deny that 75 cents a barrel duty on flour is no protection to the Canadian farmer?

Mr. LISTER. That protection does not affect the price of his product by the one-hundredth part of one cent.

Mr. KENNY. But the hon. gentleman's leader (Mr. Laurier) stated in Abbotsford, in 1890, that the Tory Government had increased the duties on agricultural products in order to enrich the Ontario farmer. Here is a statement on one hand that the duty on flour is no advantage to the Ontario farmer, yet the hon. gentleman's leader, now sitting in front of him, declared, on the responsibility of his position as leader of a great party, that this corrupt Tory Government had put a duty on flour in order to enrich the farmers of Ontario. Who is right? The hon. gentlemen must settle that between themselves. Why, Mr. Speaker, I am beginning to believe that the hon. gentlemen opposite are not going to vote for the resolution. As I have pointed out before, the only portion of the speech of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), gentlemen opposite cheered, was that in which he referred to something injurious to Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. KENNY. Why it is not the first time you have done it; you have done it steadily for years. Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me to speak for fifteen minutes longer—

Mr. LISTER. Tell us about the Halifax Sugar Refinery.

Mr. KENNY. I will tell you all about sugar at the proper time. Hon. gentlemen opposite, I believe, would applaud me even if I were to say any thing injurious to Canada. But it will be a very serious matter if gentlemen opposite do not agree with my hon. friend from Simcoe. I see it stated in the newspapers that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has actually sent around the province of Quebec, in his newspaper, the photograph of my hon. friend from North Simcoe. I must admit I did not see it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Can the hon. member prove that, I am afraid I shall have to bring an action for libel against him if he cannot.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is he only trying to put a good face on it?

Mr. KENNY. I sympathize with my hon. friend from Simcoe. When, as I mentioned early in my address, I discovered about Giffin and the statistical abstract, I was surprised and disappointed at the conduct of my hon. friend from Simcoe. But, as he says himself, if this really was true, that his likeness had been published and circulated as stated, I would pity him. It is said in the province of Quebec that it is actually a race between the member for Simcoe, the member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), and Count Mercier, as to which of them is to lead the Opposition. Certainly, if the member for Simcoe can follow the hon. member for L'Islet in all matters, ecclesiastical and spiritual, in return the hon. member for L'Islet must follow the hon. member from Simcoe in all secular and mundane affairs. But who is going to vote with the hon. gentleman, the hon. and amiable and gracious leader of the Opposition? The hon. gentleman's amiability can always be relied upon, and I really think he will vote for it. And if it was absolutely necessary to protect the hon.

member for L'Islet, and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in their new happy combination, the hon. leader of the Opposition, no doubt, would shoulder his historic musket. And then there is the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He has hitherto been looked upon as the guide of the hon. gentlemen opposite in all matters of trade, commerce and finance, but the hon. gentleman will have to surrender his position under the new arrangement to my hon. friend from North Simcoe, who has taken charge of this department, as the hon. member for L'Islet has taken charge of spiritual matters. I expect to see the hon. member for South Oxford jump up as quickly as the leader of the Opposition to vote for this resolution. If not, I think the hon. member for Simcoe will be very much disappointed.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Has the hon. gentleman enlisted for Ulster under Clarke Wallace?

Mr. KENNY. I do not turn my coat or my Ulster. Sir, my idea of protection is that we should protect Canadian labour, wherever it is employed. I think there are certain anomalies in the present tariff which should be amended and I believe they will be. I think this system of specific and ad valorem duties is cumbersome, troublesome and vexatious, and that it should be, if possible, abandoned. I think that so far as is consistent with that measure of protection which should be accorded to Canadian labour, we should adopt an ad valorem system. There are certain incongruities and anomalies in this tariff which should be obliterated. I find myself that the greatest grumbling that reaches me in connection with the tariff, comes from merchants who are engaged in the importing business and who are subjected to petty annoyances and vexatious demands from the customs, as, for instance, the duties on an imported sample card, or some other little matter, worth five or six cents. There is another class in the community who are very apt to grumble at the tariff, and these are my lady friends when they get dresses from Paris or London. I do not believe that the majority of the people of Canada desire the destruction of our industries, or that we should abandon a system which affords a fair measure of protection to every man engaged in the development of Canada's resources. I shall therefore vote against the resolution.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not rise with the intention of adding to the discussion which has taken place, nor even to answer the criticism of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat. The question has been well threshed out, and those hon. gentlemen opposite who have not yet been converted by the speech of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) are simply past redemption; they are condemned to die unrepentant sinners. My object in rising is simply to explain the vote which I intend to give upon this question. If I were to give a silent vote, my action would be, perhaps, misconstrued, as is evidenced by the speech of the hon. gentleman. I may say, without astonishing the House, that there is a great deal in the motion of the member for North Simcoe which I altogether approve; neither will I astonish the House by saying that there is something in it with which I cannot agree. I could not vote for it in its entirety, neither could I vote against it in its entirety. Were I to vote silently for the motion without giving a word of explanation, it would be supposed that I am voting for matters as to which it is well known that I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. Were I to vote silently against his motion, it would be supposed that I have recanted some of the opinions which I have already expressed on this question. The motion, in some particulars, is most commendable, in some other particulars it seems to me objectionable. Unfortunately it is an amendment to a motion to go into Committee of Supply, and therefore, according to the rules of the House, is not amendable. We have to take it as it is, with such explanations as we may give upon it. It is not amendable, and, therefore, the only course which is left for every member who must vote upon it, is to consider whether the objections against it or the reasons for it, preponderate. Now, in this motion I find that, first of all, it asserts of the protective system:

That since the introduction of the protective system, sufficient time has elapsed for the establishment and development of such manufacturing industries as, under existing conditions, can be successfully carried on in Canada.

The proposition here laid down has been approved again and again by gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House; it has been approved by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, who, after extolling the National Policy, said it was susceptible of amendment, that there were incongruities in it, that it ought to be remodelled and recast. It has also been approved by the Minister of Finance in the speech which he delivered to the House; for, although he was not prepared to bring down an amendment this session, still he recognized that the policy was amendable, and he promised to look into the matter so as to be prepared next session to make some amendments to it. Then the motion asserts:

Moreover, many manufacturers, sheltered behind the rampart thus erected, have formed combinations and trusts which prohibit competition and create and maintain monopolies.

Sir, that is a proposition so true that it requires no enlargement at my hands. Then the motion asserts:

That the existing tariff, defensible only as a protective measure, has proved in many instances oppressive and burdensome to the great mass of the consuming classes; and especially to those engaged in agricultural pursuits.

It has been established in this debate beyond a possibility of doubt, that the farmers of Canada are very much oppressed by the present tariff. Then the motion goes on to affirm:

It is unfair and unequal in its incidence, and has been productive of discontent verging on disloyalty among those who suffer from its injustice.

Now, Sir, no man who will look upon this question dispassionately, laying aside all party bias, can deny the proposition which is here affirmed, that there is in this country, deep, growing, and ever-spreading discontent arising out of the injustice of the present tariff. Then, Sir, the conclusion which is asserted by the hon. member for Simcoe, is:

That in the opinion of this House the tariff ought to be at once amended in respect of the matters herein indicated.

What matters? That is to say, that the tariff ought to be amended so as to remove the shelter behind which combines take refuge in order to exact from the people of Canada extortionate profits; that it should be amended at once in order to remove from the shoulders of the farmers the burden of taxation which they now carry; that it should be amended at once in order to remove the discontent which is spreading through the land to such an extent as to make the future of this country, perhaps, doubtful. Now, Sir, for these reasons I am prepared to vote for the motion of the hon. gentleman; for these reasons, which we have asserted again and again on this side of the House, I am prepared to cast my vote in favour of this motion. The principal proposition which is laid down there seems to me to be true, and the conclusion drawn from it appears to me to be a logical conclusion, and to be based upon the facts herein set forth. While I say emphatically, and without hesitation, and without the slightest equivocation, that I am prepared to vote for the motion of the hon. gentleman for the reasons I have given, and I must say that while voting for it, I do not intend to be bound by the proposition which follows, and to which I must take exception. The proposition which follows is this:

That the tariff ought to be amended also by the substantial reduction of customs duties in favour of the United Kingdom, in whose markets all Canadian products are admitted free of duty, and of those nations which, under treaty obligations with Great Britain, would be entitled to the same advantages.

I am not prepared to be bound by this resolution. Were it possible, according to the rules of the House, to offer an amendment to this resolution, I would offer an amendment in the direction I have indicated; but, as I said a moment ago, we are obliged, under the rules of the House, either to adopt the proposition in its entirety or to reject it in its entirety; so that the only course which is left to us is to weigh and balance the advantages and disadvantages which the motion presents to us. While the balance of advantages seems to me to be altogether on the one side, at the same time I am bound to put in a disclaimer against every other proposition contained in the motion which is not a legitimate conclusion of the first part of the motion, but which is, in my judgment, an excrescence, which has no logical connection with the foregoing part of the proposition. This latter proposition of the hon. member for Simcoe is based on sentiment. But if the proposition were to carry, sentiment in this case would carry consequences so wide and so large, they would simply, in my estimation, prove a weight to Canada with respect to what we hope is the future of this country. If the proposition were to prevail, that we should reduce the duties in favour of British goods only, the proposition might be debated from another point of view; but, when the proposition of the hon. gentleman is not only to reduce the duties on British goods, but also to reduce the duties on goods of all countries with which Great Britain has commercial treaties, the proposition, if it were adopted, would offer a serious obstacle to the future course of Canada. The President of the Council made an enumeration, this afternoon, of all the countries with which England has commercial treaties, and if we were at once to declare that the duties on all goods from those countries should be reduced, it would involve a serious disturbance of the revenue, and it would also create a wide economic revolution, while at the same time it would be ultimately imposing an impediment in the way of Canada negotiating her own commercial treaties. I have always claimed that the time has arrived when the Dominion of Canada should have power to negotiate its own commercial treaties, but whether we have that power technically or not, it is contended by hon. gentlemen opposite that we possess that power practically to-day; and, moreover, all parties in this House, whether they sit on this side or on the other side, are agreed as to this, that it would be most conducive to the interests of Canada that we should have a treaty of commerce with the great nation to the south of us, whether wider or less wide in its scope, is a question of difference between this side of the House and the other; but as to the necessity, or rather the utility, or the advantage of having such a treaty, it seems to me, not only to me, for there is no discussion as to that, to be obvious; but if the proposition of the hon. gentleman were to carry, we would create a state of things such that it would be impossible to negotiate a treaty with the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. Yet you are going to help the hon. gentleman to carry his motion.

Mr. LAURIER. The statement of the hon. gentleman is too light to have any weight whatever. If it were open to me to amend this motion, I would do it, as I have stated to the House. But, because it is not within my power to amend the motion of my hon. friend, shall I be asked to say that there should be no amendment to the tariff? Would the hon. gentleman have me to say here, and this is what I would have to say if I did not vote for the amendment, that there is no depression, that the farmers are prosperous, that there are no combines and the tariff should not be amended? Sir, I would seriously stultify myself, if I so acted. We have asserted this on the floor of Parliament. I know the hon. gentleman cannot vote for this motion, because he says the farmers are not depressed, that there are no combines, that the country is prosperous and the tariff is not to be amended this year; but, as I hold the very reverse of every one of these propositions, I say it is my course on this occasion to vote for the motion. I affirm that every proposition laid down is true, and, if so, there is but one consequence, and it is to assert, as it is asserted by this proposition, that the tariff should be amended at once, and not next year. While I adopt this course, I do so for the reason I have just stated, and at the same time I do not hold myself bound by the latter proposition of the hon. member for Simcoe, that the tariff should be amended in the direction he has indicated, that is, a reduction in the duties on British goods and on the goods of nations with which England has commercial treaties. I will say at once to the hon. Minister of Finance, and he can take what advantage he pleases from my words, that, if this motion were to carry, and if the Government were to be defeated on it, the Opposition would not be committed to the proposition that the duties should be reduced on goods from Britain and countries with which Britain has commercial treaties. That is my proposition. The hon. gentleman will attempt to make something out of it; but, as I cannot amend the resolution, I will amend it in so far as I can possibly do so by my words, and I now say that I do not intend to be committed to anything else than what I indicate by these words I now utter. The stand I take on this motion is this: That the first part of the motion contains a recital of facts which is true; the second part contains a proposition which is a logical consequence of the statement of facts; the third part contains another proposition, which is not at all a logical consequence of the statement of facts, and to that part of the resolution I do not hold myself bound. I may say this, in conclusion, on this subject, that the only reason which impels me to vote in favour of the proposition is, that it contains a strong, unanswerable condemnation of the system of protection followed during the last fifteen years in this country, the baneful effects of which are therein powerfully condemned. Hon. gentlemen opposite are like the Bourbons: they forget nothing; they learn nothing.

Mr. LAURIER.

They are like the idols of the pagans: they have eyes, but they see not; they have ears, but they hear not. They are like the ostrich, which buries its head in the sand, in order not to see danger. They are like the stump in the field, which rots in its place until kicked away by the foot of the farmer. Having eyes, with which they do not see, burying their heads in order to avoid seeing danger, they will not budge until they are kicked away by the foot of the farmer. Not only so; they will not even consider statements made on the floor of the House, which do not bear out their own views, and such statements drive them into a passion. When the hon. member for Simcoe made the statement, that the issue fought in the last election in the United States had been an issue between free trade and protection, and that free trade had triumphed, that statement of fact at once aroused an angry concert of protestation and disclaimer.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. I observe hon. gentlemen opposite still protest. I will quote for the benefit of those voluntary sceptics, for those hon. members afflicted with voluntary blindness, some extracts from the language made use of by President Cleveland in his inaugural address. This is what he said:

The verdict of our voters, which condemn the injustice of maintaining protection for protection sake enjoins upon the people's servant the duty of exposing and destroying the brood of kindred evils which are the unwholesome progeny of paternalism.

Can anything be plainer than this language: the verdict of the people has condemned protection, for protection's sake, and has imposed on the servants of the people the duty of destroying the brood of kindred evils which are the result of protection. Nothing can be plainer than that language. Mr. Cleveland says, a little later on:

When we proclaim that the necessity for revenue to support the Government furnishes the only justification for taxing the people, we announce a truth so plain that its denial would seem to indicate the extent to which judgment may be influenced by familiarity with perversion of the taxing power.

Well, we know this perversion of judgment in this country also, and we have the evidence of it every day on the floor of this House. But, Sir, I made this quotation only to show that in truth the issue which was fought in the United States was an issue between freedom of trade and protection. In the words of President Cleveland, protection has been condemned in the most emphatic terms, and the duty is enjoined upon the servants of the people to destroy the progeny of evil which is the result of protection. I assert that the second election of Mr. Cleveland to the Presidency marks the second era of the development of free trade throughout the world. It has been stated often and many times on the floor of this Parliament, that free trade in England has been a failure because the expectation of its promoters have not been fully realized. Free trade a failure! What a word! Free trade has made the small Island of Great Britain the banking counter of all the nations of the earth, and the distributing warehouse of the trade of all nations. It is certain, however, that the anticipation of Mr. Cobden and of Mr. Bright with regard to other nations have not been realized. It is quite certain that Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright expected that the other nations of Europe—France, Germany, Italy, Spain—would follow in the van of England. In this, however, they were mistaken. But what does it prove? It proves that in matters of trade, as in many things else: while wisdom is scarce folly may be very abundant. Perhaps it was not the most natural thing to expect that the nations of continental Europe would follow in the van of England. There were other nations, however, from which this was to be expected. John Bright once compared England and Rome, and he recollected the well-known phrase of the poet with regard to Rome: "The lone Mother of dead Empires"; and he called England "The living mother of living nations," and so she is. England has produced, not only the greatest commercial race, but the greatest colonizing race the world ever saw. Rome has conquered the world by violence; England is conquering the world by commerce and the arts of peace. England is not only dotting, but covering the earth with nations of her own kith and kin, and although these nations in course of time may be separated from her politically, still they remain attached to her by her language, by her literature, by her civilization, and it might have been expected indeed that the principle of free trade laid down fifty years ago in England would germinate and bear fruit amongst those nations of kindred origin. We see to-day, in the example of the United States, that the first nation to follow the example of England in free trade is the first daughter of England—the Anglo-Saxon Republic to the south of us. I heard it stated on the floor of this House a few days ago that the free trade movement in the United States was ephemeral. Why, Sir, look at the movement which is going on there from west to east and from north to south. Look at the state of Massachusetts, ever in the van of freedom and progress. It is very true that during the last election Massachusetts pronounced itself in favour of protection, but by an ever-decreasing majority. Look at the young generation of her public men. Look at Governor William Russell. Look at the Congressmen Hoar and Adams, all sons of Republicans and protectionists; but they aver to-day that as the mission of their fathers was to destroy the curse of slavery, their mission to-day is to destroy the slavery of protection. And, Sir, I venture to say to hon. gentlemen opposite, that the third nation to follow the example laid down by England fifty years ago will be this Canada of ours. I will not indulge in any boasting, but I can see all round me evidence that the dawn is approaching of the day which shall see the highest development of British civilization on the basis of ever broadening freedom of trade.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker.—

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I think I had the floor first.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is customary to give the leader of the House the floor.

Mr. FOSTER. I will give way to the hon. gentleman, if he wishes.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) towards the close of his remarks, made the observation that hon. gentlemen opposite only cheered the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) when he said something that was derogatory to Canada. The hon. member probably forgot that the only occasion upon which the Tory members upon this side cheered the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was when he said that the British farmer was in a most deplorable condition. Now, Sir, whatever the result of this debate may be, whatever the result upon the country may be; one thing is very evident, and that is, that the motion of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has excited, not only in this House, but in the country, a degree of interest and a degree of importance that has seldom been accorded to the motion of any private member of Parliament. And, Sir, the fact that so great an effort is being made to meet his arguments and to disparage his political position, and to prove him guilty, if not of insincerity, at least of inconsistency, proves how the position that he has taken is felt by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. At the very beginning of the debate, an hon. gentleman well known for his eloquence—and certainly the speech that he gave us on that occasion was one fully up to his reputation—devoted the principal part of the time, after evidently very careful preparation, to endeavouring to prove the insincerity, or at any rate the inconsistency of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). But what did the hon. gentleman for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) succeed in doing? He unearthed a speech delivered five years ago, delivered upon an election hustings, in which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said with perfect consistency, both with his past and his present career, that he defended the National Policy. The rest of that speech was some very amusing chaff at the expense of the then leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake) and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), having no bearing on the question in the slightest degree. Against that was the declaration made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) himself, by quotations from the speeches, bearing all the in-press of being delivered with the utmost gravity and premeditation, which clearly and distinctly declared what his course has been, and how far his present position is consistent with it. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) had a little to say about some acrobatic feats. I wonder if the hon. gentleman can remember that in days gone by, when he and I were much younger and more agile, that there was a game played at school called "follow my leader." The great object of that game was that those who followed should do everything the leader did, and as the hon. gentleman gave us some little exposition of his ideas upon party Government and party discipline, I think they might be very simply embraced in that proposition "follow your leader." The leader not only had to climb fences and jump over walls, but he would probably occasionally jump into a ditch, and all who followed him had to besmirch themselves with mud as he did. I do not know how far the agility of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) will enable him to follow in that respect. But I must say that if we have a few more such exhibitions on the part of the Administration as we had to-day in regard to the treaty with France, I think the hon. gentleman's agility will be pretty well tried. Now, let me say that it is not often that a member of this House enters upon a task so great, so laborious, so difficult as that essayed by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I venture to say that if some of those gentlemen, whom I have heard remark that he does not know anything about figures—if they had attempted to do all that my hon. friend has done—they would have failed at the very first table they would have encountered. Now, the hon. member for Haldimand entirely failed, in all essential particulars, to meet the case presented by the hon. member for North Simcoe. It is true, he found some little inaccuracies, and talked about a resolution moved before a board of trade at Lethbridge, which my hon. friend should have said was lost instead of carried. Well, I believe it was lost by a majority of one, so that the hon. gentleman cannot derive any very great satisfaction from that matter; but the hon. gentleman's speech was valuable in this, that it proved most conclusively, if any proof were needed—and I do not think that there was much needed—that the Government have no serious intention of interfering with the present protective system. He spoke, as the mouthpiece of the Administration; he was put forward with a carefully prepared speech to meet the arguments of the hon. member for North Simcoe. His speech was a protectionist speech from beginning to end, and not only a protectionist speech, but he admitted, and not only admitted but defended, the existence of one of the greatest combines now existing among the manufacturers of this country. I say that his speech was made for the purpose of establishing, which hardly needed to be established, after all that has taken place, that the Government have no serious intention of interfering with the present tariff. But, Sir, we had a speech from another hon. gentleman—an hon. gentleman who speaks with a good deal more authority even than the hon. member for Haldimand, with more authority, I might almost say, than the Finance Minister. In fact, I do not know that he does not speak with almost as much authority as the leader of the Government. At any rate, he regulates us all; I do not know but he regulates the Finance Minister, and, with that exquisite good taste and breeding which characterizes that hon. gentleman in all his parliamentary functions, he undertook to regulate the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hodgins). Well, the address of the hon. gentleman, coming from one who regulates this House and therefore regulates us who regulate the tariff, must be taken as very authoritative. That hon. gentleman proved to his own satisfaction, if not to the satisfaction of the House, that the farmer, of whom we have heard so much lately, paid no taxes, or at any rate, if he did, he did not pay any more than $4 a year. Now, the hon. member for Haldimand, who was very severe in his criticisms on little matters which I think may fairly be admitted to be inadvertences—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If hon. gentlemen will wait until I have done, they will not crow so much. The hon. member for Haldimand was guilty of a misrepresentation—I do not mean to say wilfully, but he was guilty of a misrepresentation of facts far more serious and far more important than anything committed by the hon. member for North Simcoe. He would lead this House to believe—and, of course, as his speech will no doubt be scattered broadcast through the country, he would lead the country to believe—that a reduction of the duties on English goods really means nothing to the farmers. Now, what did he say? As this was a very considerable portion of his speech, I will take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to it, and pointing out what a grave and serious misrepresentation it was. Speaking of the hon. member for North Simcoe, he said:

He goes into the house of this hard-working farmer and he says: My dear friend, I see that your floors are bare, I am going to lessen the duties against Great Britain in order that you may put Brussels carpet upon these floors. I see that your hands and your face are brown, and I intend to reduce the duty in order that you may have silk parasols and English kid gloves. The Minister of Finance is a temperance crank—

Is that true, I wonder?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not now.

Mr. FOSTER. That is only a quotation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not say that the hon. member for Muskoka was a temperance crank.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If the hon. gentleman had said that he would have made a mistake, that is all. The hon. gentleman went on :

I propose to reduce the duty on ale, on Dublin stout, on brandy or gin, on wine and whiskey. In order that your farmers' wives and daughters may be comfortably clad, I propose to reduce the duty on silk ribbons, on laces, on velvets, on fringes, on bracelets, and on artificial flowers. But the farmer says: You have not taken any duty off on agricultural implements. Then my hon. friend from Simcoe says: I am coming to that after awhile, and I am going to make bicycles free, in order to reduce the burdens upon the shoulders of the farmers.

An hon. MEMBER. Read on, it is very good.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Of course, if hon. gentlemen are so ill-informed as to what our imports from England are, they are justified in applauding that little bit of wit on the part of the hon. member for Haldimand.

Mr. LISTER. Do you call it wit?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Well, I do not pretend to be a judge of what is wit and what is not wit. One would suppose that the hon. member for Haldimand did not know, as of course he does know, that the value of the dutiable goods which we import from England is about $31,000,000, and he certainly must know that at least one-half of these goods are goods which enter into general consumption. So that when he talked about reducing the duties on silks, velvets, ale and wine, and so on, as the result of such a proposition as that made by the hon. member for North Simcoe, he was entirely misleading the House and the country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him where he gets the statement that $31,000,000 is the value of the dutiable goods we import from England?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think that was the value of the dutiable goods imported from England according to the last return.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Duty paid?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Goods liable to duty.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thought you said duty paid.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am sorry I am so incapable of making myself understood. The value of dutiable goods imported from England, according to our last return, is, I believe, $31,000,000, of which, at least one-half—I make it rather more than one-half—are goods that enter into general consumption. Now, let us take a few of those items as to which it seems the farmer and the general consumer would not derive any benefit from a reduction of the duties. The first item on the list is printed books. According to ideas of the hon. member for Haldimand, we are not to give the farmers the privilege of reading anything but those trashy novels, reprints which are published in this country. Printed books they are not to have; $233,000 is the amount of printed books brought into this country. The farmer and the general consumer is not to have the benefit of this importation. We import $100,000 worth of bibles and prayer books, but, according to the Minister of Finance, the other day, it is not of much consequence whether the farmer gets them, because every farmer is to be a divinity to himself, and a priest to himself, and so he can do without bibles and prayer books. But I am happy to think that that view of the case is not one generally accepted by the people. The farmer and the general consumer is not, under the hon. gentleman's contention, to have any books and to get the benefit of this importation at all. Well, on this point, I will call the attention of the House to the fact that there is not, in our whole tariff, any item more thoroughly unjustifiable and indefensible than that tax upon books, and I was glad to see public attention called to it lately by Principal Grant in an article in the new magazine, in which he declared that whatever other changes or alterations might be made in the tariff, this duty on books ought to be done away with, and I do trust, when the tariff is revised, if it be revised, that the Finance Minister will take that advice into his serious consideration. We know that the hon. gentleman is not a very deep scholar, we have had evidence of that a good many times in this House, but he has always been a student, and therefore ought to have sympathy with those who find it exceedingly difficult, at times, as Principal Grant says, to get the books necessary for the prosecution of their studies. Then, we come to boot and shoe laces, which are imported to the value of $25,333, but, I suppose the farmer is to tie his boots and shoes with binder twine. We import suspenders to the value of $27,734, no part of the duty on which the farmer pays, as no doubt, according to the Minister of Finance, he can tie up his trousers with a hay band. Neither is he to have arrowroot or tapioca, or buttons, which are rather important articles in the household, for they too are taxed. Cement is another thing which enters into the consumption of farmers very often, and that also is taxed. Cotton, we import to the value of $1,578,000. With regard to cotton manufactures, I would say to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) that when he made that statement by which he endeavoured to show, I am sure with perfect honesty, that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was entirely mistaken in his statement, concerning which there has been so much controversy, he omitted to notice that the difference between him and the hon. member for North Simcoe consists in the fact that the hon. member for Simcoe did not include in his calculation the article of cotton yarn, but took manufactured cottons alone, and in doing so he was perfectly fair, because, without knowing very much about cotton, I take it that cotton yarn is not an article which generally enters into consumption, and it is that which makes the difference in the calculation.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Is that all you know?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Of course, I always bow to the superior knowledge of the hon. member for Inverness. Spools and thread are imported to the extent of $241,000. Does the hon. Minister of Finance think that the farmer uses no spools or thread? The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) said something about the farmer not washing his face. Evidently, the hon. gentleman did not intend him to have a towel, because, among the articles imported, are towels to the extent of $37,000. And so we could go through a very long list, with which I will not trouble the House, but the simple result is that, excluding the articles of luxury, which can in any sense be termed such—articles which need not enter into general consumption—my calculation is—and I think it will be borne out by the Trade and Navigation Returns—that there are $18,000,000 worth of goods imported from England to this country in which the farmer and general consumer are directly interested. A great many qualities of these goods might be regarded as luxuries, but the great bulk are articles that everybody will consider himself entitled to share in, unless indeed it is taken as granted, as we were told the other day, that the farmer has to clothe himself in fig leaves or vine leaves, which ever be most convenient, and eat and drink nothing but what he produces on his own farm. I do not think he will be complimented or flattered by being placed in any such classification. In addressing myself to the general question, I would like to say that I have, perhaps, in my humble way, made as many speeches on the subject of the National Policy as any man in this House, having supported it in 1878,—not in this House, because it was not my good fortune then to be elected—and having supported it on subsequent occasions up to the last general election, and here I will say this, that the last general election was not fought, or was only partially fought, on the National Policy. It was mainly fought upon the issue of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, and the real issue of the National Policy came very little into the question; and I am much inclined to think, from what I know of public opinion, at any rate in the province of Ontario, that had the Opposition not committed themselves to such an impracticable, I was going to say stupid policy, as they did, with regard to financial matters, the probability is that the issue of the last election would have been very different. I do not agree with the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in many of the statements he made, and the views he has put forward as to the financial position of the country. I think he has taken very exaggerated views, and I will endeavour briefly to point out, because it has an important bearing on the subject, in what respects the hon. gentleman's arguments are fallacious, and then I will try to show that I think the Finance Minister is endeavouring to bolster up his case by statements which are equally fallacious and equally misleading. Now, these are the three bases on which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and those who take the same view that he does, treat the doctrine which they have put forward. They take the general depression which prevails in this country among the farmers, they take the fall in the value of farm lands, and they take the emigration out of this country to the United States. I firmly believe, and I think I can fairly establish, that none of these causes are at all connected with the existing tariff. With regard to the general depression under which our farmers are now labouring—and that they are labouring under depression of course goes without saying—that is due to a fact common to agriculturists in all parts of the world, and that is over-production. It ought not to be a matter of regret, I suppose, that the world has more food than it actually requires, and yet such would seem to be the case. Consequently there has been a fall in breadstuffs and all articles of food, and in some articles, at any rate, there has been a fall of 50 per cent. Well, now, the fact of this depression might be used as an argument both ways. It might be said if this depression is common to farmers all over the world, why interfere with the National Policy? My reply is simply this, that the farmer, no matter from what cause, is suffering from depression. His products are reduced in price, his purchasing power is 50 per cent less, and therefore every effort ought to be made to reduce, as far as possible, the burdens under which he is labouring. No matter what the cause may be, his purchasing power is less, and it is the duty of the Government and Parliament to do all they can to help him to meet that deficiency by reducing the taxation to which he is subject. Take the other point, the reduction in the value of farm property. Upon that point, I think, the case is exceedingly simple. Shortly before the development of the North-west, farm lands had risen to an abnormal figure. Anybody who knows anything about farming, knows that even when wheat is at $1.00 a bushel and possibly $1.50 per bushel, it is impossible to make money, when you pay rental on a basis of $100 per acre. It is clearly impossible. Land, I say, had gone up to fictitious value. Then the North-west was opened for settlement and immediately heads of families who had sons to settle in life—and we know the Ontario farmer is not content to put his son on less than 100 acres, and he prefers 160 or even 200 acres if he can get it—instead of buying land in the neighbourhood, left in a body for the North-west. Many of them moved out. I regret very much to say, to Minnesota, Dakota and other Western States. They were led by the laudable desire to establish their sons in a position to make a good living out of farming. They were ambitious and they were not content to leave their sons forty or fifty acres, as in many other countries, and that was one reason why the depression in land took place. An immense quantity of land was thrown on the market, the supply exceeded the demand, and, necessarily, there was a fall in the value. With wheat say at $1 a bushel, a man might afford to rent a farm—or own a farm, it does not matter whether he pays so much in the form of rent to another, is out of the interest on his own money invested in the place—at $80 or $100 an acre. But when wheat fell to 75 cents a bushel he could not afford to pay so much and, necessarily, the value of the land fell in sympathy with the value of the productions from it. That is quite sufficient reason for the fall in the value of the land without attributing it in any way to any tariff. That depression would have taken place no matter who might have been in power and no matter what tariff might have been in force. Then, with regard to the exodus. I think it is evident to every one who has paid attention to the subject that, in a small country like this, inhabited by an ambitious, pushing, thriving people, especially with our present system of education (when everybody, at least the great mass of the people are, not over-educated in the abstract, but over-educated for the positions their fathers filled and which they would naturally fill) there must be a very general desire on the part of the people to find a living in the centres of education and population. And, of course, in the great cities of the United States, with the enormous variety of employment, a young man going from this country had a chance of employment which he could not have had probably anywhere else. And it is a very remarkable thing, and one of which we ought to feel proud, though it has affected us injuriously, that whenever a Canadian goes to the United States he is almost sure to get employment. On the railways, in the mills, in the lumber camps, on the farms—everywhere where honesty, integrity, industry and perseverance are valuable qualities, there the Canadian will obtain a position. Also, it must be borne in mind, this movement of which we complain so much, and which is certainly to be regretted, is one common to all parts of the continent. There has been a movement from the Eastern States to the Western States, which is precisely similar to the movement noted in this country. The census commissioner of the United States, in a late census bulletin, says :

In Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont the rate of increase between 1870 and 1880 has not been maintained, probably due to the fact of a large migration of the farming population to the far West and manufactures not having yet assumed sufficient prominence.

In agricultural states generally the rate of increase has declined. The commissioner says :

In Ohio it has fallen from 20 to 15 per cent; in Indiana from 18 to 11; in Iowa from 36 to 18; in Missouri from 26 to 24, in spite of the rapid growth of St. Louis and Kansas City; and in Illinois—

And this is the most remarkable statement, and I commend it to the attention of the hon. gentlemen opposite :

—dropping Chicago from consideration, from 149 to 59. In these states the agricultural interest, which is still the prominent one, has begun to decline, owing to the sharp competition of western farmers.

Then he goes on to deal with another subject which has also been made a topic of many remarks on the other side, and that is the encumbrances on farm lands. I have always contended, and I think rightly, that a very considerable portion of the mortgage indebtedness on farm lands is not to be regarded as a debt; it is simply capital invested. If a man borrows money on his farm to purchase more land, to buy better stock, or to put up new buildings, that is simply an investment of capital and it does not matter in the slightest degree whether it comes out of his own pocket or somebody else's. If he has it he is entitled to interest upon it; if he borrows he must pay the interest. Of course if he borrows to pay off a debt, the amount still represents a debt. And so borrowed money is, in many cases, not a debt, but capital invested. I do not wish to labour that argument, but as hon. gentlemen are fond of comparing our country with the United States, I would simply point to the facts that the American census shows that the amount of money by which the farms of the United States are encumbered is very largely increased in all these states. So, if that is an argument against the existing state of things in this country, it is an equally strong argument against the country that has all the benefit of the "60,000,000 market." Now, Sir, very interesting questions arise in comparing our position. We find the agricultural population of the eastern states have moved to the west, and that states formerly producing large quantities of grain now produce none for export. A century ago, the valley of the St. Lawrence was an exporting grain country. I can remember when the Genessee Valley was the centre of the wheat trade. That centre has moved west to Minneapolis. Illinois does not now produce wheat for export; it produces pork, beef and so on. The census commissioner says there is a steady diminution in the product of breadstuffs in all these states. The centre of the grain-producing region has moved west, even the farmers in Illinois can no longer hold their ground in competition with the western states. That proves that the time must come when these states which have ceased to be wheat-producing will necessarily require supplies from elsewhere. And I think we may look forward to the time, not very far distant, when, instead of St. Paul and Minneapolis being the centre of the wheat trade, Winnipeg will be the centre, and the milling interests, instead of being confined to Minneapolis and St. Paul, will be distributed between Winnipeg and Montreal. And, when that time comes, it will be a matter of very little consequence whether we have a protective duty or not, because then the American consumer, no matter how strong the interest opposed may be, will compel the free admission of Canadian bread-stuffs in order to feed the people in these states. In regard to population, it will have an important effect, because, when those western states get filled up, as is evident they are getting filled up—because the commissioner shows, for instance, that the state of Illinois, outside of Chicago and Cook county, is standing still in population—there will be an overflow of population. That overflow must go back to these worn-out lands in the east, or, as is much more likely to be the case, it will flow into the Canadian Northwest. So that, for my part, I have no fear about agriculture in this country. A very important change has taken place already, and it has an important bearing upon this tariff question. The advocates of the National Policy who defended the agricultural interests, did so upon the ground—and that is what carried the policy, as has been stated by the hon. member for North Simcoe—that the prices in the states in 1878 and subsequent years, for almost everything, were lower than they were in Canada; and, therefore, it was to the interest of the Canadian farmer that these cheaper productions should not come into this country, and therefore, he had a direct interest in this protective tariff. But things have changed. I was surprised to hear an hon. gentleman on this side of the House, the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith), I think it was, say, the other day, that the prices of grain were better in Canada to-day than they were in the United States. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. I think, for twelve months past the only article of agricultural produce which has been higher in this country than in the States, is the article of pork. It follows, therefore, that so far as the farmers are concerned, the duties upon American grains are of very little value to him; all the more, therefore, is he entitled to consideration, if he has lost the only thing that reconciled him to the establishment of the National Policy in the first place. That point has not been dwelt upon so far, but it is evident that the conditions with regard to the farmers have entirely changed from 1878. In that year the price of grain and of all agricultural produce in the United States, speaking generally, was lower than it was in Canada; and, therefore, the farmer benefited by protection, but, in 1892, the price of almost every article produced is higher in the States than it is in Canada; and, therefore, the duties have ceased to be of any value to the Canadian farmer. Whether that sort of thing is to continue, I won't pretend to say; I simply state the fact as it exists to-day. Well, so much for what I think are the erroneous views held by hon. gentlemen opposite. I must say, I cannot help saying, that I think the frequent enunciation of these views, the frequent depreciation of this country, entirely, as I think, upon false premises, has seriously affected this country, has caused a flow of people out of it, has caused Canadians to lose faith in their own country, for which loss of faith, I think, there was not, in reality, the slightest foundation. Now, I want to say a word or two to the Finance Minister. The hon. gentleman, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, has, I think, been guilty of a great many misleading statements. He laid a great deal of stress upon our foreign trade. His figures with regard to foreign trade formed the principal basis of his whole argument. I think that his comparisons were exceedingly unfair and exceedingly misleading. He took a comparison between 1873 and 1891-92. Well, as a matter of fact, speaking of foreign trade, our exports in 1873 and 1874 were equal to those in 1885, 1887, 1889 and 1891. The imports in 1873, 1874 and 1875 were larger than in any subsequent year except 1883, when the balance of trade against us was $34,000,000, and that was a year under the operation of the National Policy. Our trade with Great Britain in 1892 was less than it was in 1873 and 1874. So that so far as regards our general exports and imports I say that the comparisons made between the year with which the hon. gentleman commenced his statement and the year with which he compared it at the end was altogether misleading, because he did not convey in any way a true statement of what our trade has been, and to say that this country is prosperous by that comparison would be making a statement which is entirely set aside by the figures I have quoted. Our trade with Great Britain in 1892 was less than that in 1873 and 1874. Then he spoke about our trade with foreign countries, and a great deal he made of that. Now, the fact is that it has really increased steadily since 1873 with Germany, Holland, China, Japan and with other countries generally. The only real increase of trade—because I do not call our trade with Japan and Australia an increase trade, it is entirely a new trade—but the only foreign country with which our trade has really and steadily grown is Germany, and with Germany it has grown from $1,000,000 to over $6,000,000. It has fallen off with Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Newfoundland, South America and Switzerland, and with France it has remained stationary. It is, therefore, entirely misleading to take the figures of 1873 and 1892 or any two years. I do not care which two years, at the beginning and end of a period, and make a comparison. These figures show that it is utterly baseless. Our exports alone to Great Britain in 1889 and 1879 were less than in 1873, and higher in 1881, than in any year except 1891, when they were the lowest of any year except 1879. So that to compare the exports of 1873, when they were the lowest of any year except 1879, with 1892, when they were the highest, is altogether misleading. So our exports to the United States in 1873 were higher than in 1892, and to France they were just double. Therefore the hon. gentleman has no basis whatever for the argument that he based upon his figures as regards our foreign trade. Then he laid a great deal of stress upon the census. Now, it unfortunately happens that that census is going to be a source of more trouble to statisticians who endeavour to arrive at any conclusion as to the true position of this country than anything that has ever appeared in any country up to this time. Of course, we know, as a matter of fact, that the same instructions were given in 1881 as were given in 1891. I take the town of Barrie, with which I am familiar, as I know every house in it, and I find first, that the number of establishments has increased from 77 to 139; that the capital invested has nearly doubled; the number of hands employed has increased about 75 per cent, and the value of the material used has increased about 50 per cent. Now, it is a singular thing that with this enormous increase in the number of establishments, the increase of capital invested, and the increase of hands, the cost of material used has only increased from $265,000 to $378,000. Now, there is an inconsistency on the face of it. With all this enormous increase in the number of establishments, capital invested and hands employed, the material used has only increased by $100,000, and the value of the produce has risen from $497,000 to $789,000. Now, that statement is absolute and perfect rubbish; no other name can be applied to it. I know, as a matter of fact, that there is no increase, either in the number of establishments or in the number of people employed. I can say nothing about the capital, but as for the rest, the statement is entirely astray. Now, we had a curious instance here the other day in regard, I think, to the town of Bowmanville. The census commissioner made out that the number of establishments had largely increased there, the capital had increased ever so much, the number of hands had remained about the same, and the population had diminished. Surely no hon. gentleman in his senses will contend that that can be a beneficial policy which increases the number of establishments and reduces the population. If anything can justify a protective tariff it is the asserted fact which has been so often heard in this House that it gives employment to people, and makes a home market. But here the home market, in spite of all the advantages, in spite of the alleged increase in the number of factories, had actually increased. I should like to know where the home market was. I must say that these figures rather make one lose confidence in the infallibility of the Minister of Finance, and when that hon. gentleman asks us to perpetuate a policy based on figures such as those I have just quoted, I must say it shakes my confidence in the wisdom of the hon. gentleman.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It does not shake the confidence of some hon. gentlemen. Some hon. gentlemen's confidence cannot be shaken. They adopt a policy of follow my leader, no matter how much mud there is. Now, all these circumstances combined naturally lead us to ask, in this condition of affairs, what ought to be done? I listened to the Minister of Finance with the greatest attention. I heard him pile up sentence on sentence; I heard him, for the gratification of our ears, indulge in rounded period after period, of most eloquent language from a most eloquent tongue, and he went on sentence after sentence, and we all thought something was coming. We listened to catch the result. He admitted there was unrest and discontent. Yet did he propose to do anything? He said he was going to take the matter into consideration and give us something at the end of another session. The hon. gentleman spoke as if the Government was a sort of deputy providence, a sort of providence that had controlled and overruled everything and out of whose extreme beneficence all sorts of good things were to come. The hon. gentleman talked about reducing the sugar duties. One would believe that the Government were paying all this money out of their own pockets to hear them talk. He spoke of the great things they were going to do; he told us the Government would do this, the Government would do that, the Government would take this into consideration. One would think they were like the gods on Olympus, instead of being ordinary mortals, and so far as some of them are concerned, very ordinary mortals. That kind of language is not exactly the way to meet the wants and feelings of the people. This Government is very fond of doing things by committees and commissions, and this will be done by commission. The late Minister of Customs, and if there was anybody who knew about the condition of our trade affairs he ought to know, could not get on with this task until he obtained the assistance of two level-headed men. So the affairs of the country are dependent on the exertions of two level-headed men, who are to bring us out of the slough of despond into a state of prosperity. I did not know that the Government depended for carrying on public affairs on any two men, especially on two men who, with all due respect to them, had very recently come into office, and could not be supposed to know all that was necessary to be done ; but to say that the Minister of Finance, who is constantly dealing with facts and figures, who has had control of the financial affairs of this country for many years, does not know what he is going to do, does strike me as extraordinary. One would think the hon. gentlemen had been asleep for the last few years, that they did not do anything whatever to earn their salaries except to talk platitudes when the opportunity offered. In supporting this resolution I have not much to say, because the subject has already been pretty fairly discussed, but there are one or two points to which I call the attention of the House before I close. One of them is with respect to the rolling mills. The hon. member for Simcoe made a statement, which was jeered at and treated with great contempt by hon. gentlemen, that the rolling mills showed a profit of 60 per cent. If there is any fault to be found with that statement, the fault lies with the Minister of Finance, for the figures are his, and the figures quoted by the hon. member for Simcoe entirely bore out the statement. The figures as given by him were: capital invested $78,000, buildings the same amount, machinery $265,000, working capital $590,000, or a total of $1,000,000. Add to that sum wages, raw material, interest on capital, and interest on value of plant, add anything you can possibly think of, and there remains a surplus of about $678,000. If there is anything wrong in that statement, the President of the Council can settle it with his colleague the Minister of Finance, for the figures are given in a return presented to the House. It was asked with respect to agricultural implements and some other articles: how is it, if these articles are much cheaper in the United States, they do not come into this country? That statement was made in regard to barbed wire. I am not in the trade, so I cannot pretend to answer the question. But we have two facts clearly established. First, that barbed wire can be bought and the duties can be paid for, $3.75, or at all events, less than $4; and, second, that it is sold here for $4.50, and that there would be a very considerable reduction in price if it were not for the duty. I do not know how this half dollar difference in price does not cause the article to come in, but such is the fact, notwithstanding. We have the evidence of hon. members in the North-west, and in the hundreds, I might almost say a thousand, petitions sent in, all complaining of the heavy prices charged for barbed wire, and so with respect to many other articles. The unsatisfactory part of the business is that, while we are paying those heavy duties, we are receiving no return. Take the article of wall paper. There we have duties imposed equal in some cases to over 100 per cent, in the form of specific duties, and the whole number of establishments is given in the return as four, and the number of hands at 139, but some hon. gentlemen who have written on the subject never heard of the fourth establishment, and did not believe there were more than three. The idea of paying an enormous duty for the employment of 139 hands is absurd. It shows that the evils of the tariff are certainly much greater than one could possibly have supposed who had not made an investigation in regard to it. As to the discontent prevailing in the country, hon. gentlemen choose to deny it and will not admit it. As the leader of the Opposition said, the Government do not choose to see it or admit it. I have no doubt about this fact, that there is, especially among the farming population, a feeling, as the Minister of Finance said, of unrest, which has developed into this, that they want a reduction in these duties. As I have said, no matter whether the duties are unfair or not, the purchasing power of the farmer is diminished by at least one-half, and, therefore, they say they have a right to have the duties reduced; and the feeling is correctly described by the hon. member for Simcoe, that while they do not want to change their political conditions, they have got so far that they look forward to it as a possible alternate, in case they do not get the relief they want. That is the position of affairs. How is it to be met? Is it to be met by promises, which I have shown by the evidence of many hon. gentlemen do not mean an intention to deal with the tariff in any substantial way? What is the meaning of all these speeches? They mean that the Government have no intention of departing from the protective policy. I say as an advocate of the National Policy from its beginning, that I never was a protectionist in the sense in which the Government are now protectionists. I never looked upon the National Policy in any other light than as explained by Mr. Colby, which was the first speech I read respecting the introduction of protection in this country. Circumstances which he mentioned where the National Policy or any protective system should be done away, have come to pass, and, therefore, the defence of the National Policy falls to the ground. The hon. gentleman said he was going to stand by the old land marks, but I say that so far as the National Policy is concerned, it is he who has departed from the landmarks. It is not myself, nor the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), nor the thousands of people in this country, former supporters of the National Policy; it is not we who have departed from the old landmarks, but it is the hon. gentleman who has established in place of what was intended for a National Policy, a system of protection pure and simple, from which it is quite evident from all that has been said that these hon. gentlemen do not intend to depart. Believing these things, and not intending to take more time than I have already done in giving views which I trust may at any rate have been reasonable, and expressed in a manner consistent with my position as a member of this House. I support the resolution now before us as being a correct exposition of the views I hold. There is another thing I wish to say. I do not agree with the hon. gentlemen opposite in the belief that the United States is our best market. I think they are wrong there. It would be simply folly to ignore the enormous trade which is carried on between this country and the United States, notwithstanding the barriers erected on each side of the frontier. It would be folly to say that that trade is not of importance to this country, but speaking as a farmer, and speaking in general terms, I say that I do not think the United States is our best market. I think the time may come. I think the time shortly will come, when the consumers of the United States will give us a market in spite of anything the protectionists may say to the contrary. In the meantime I say that the market which fixes the ultimate price of all these productions must be the best market, and our business is to get there. There is one thing for which I give credit to the present Administration—at any rate, especially to the late Minister of Agriculture—and that is, the pains and care they have taken, and the efforts they have put forth to get a better footing in the English market. Although things have gone wrong in some respect, although the two-rowed barley has not succeeded so far, I have great faith in that market ultimately. I believe the fault is mainly with ourselves. The Dairy Commissioner told us before the Agriculture Committee to-day, that one reason why our products did not get that reception in the English market which they otherwise would get, was owing to the stupidity of our own producers, who thought that anything was good enough, and that the people over there wanted food and would take anything they sent. Mr. Robertson showed that that was an entire mistake, and that we must study the English market, and put aside any prejudices which we may have, and adopt the prejudices, if you like to call them, of the English consumer. He showed us that with regard to butter and cheese, and the same thing applies to barley. If we had sent to England two-rowed barley of as good a quality as we grew—and we grew lots of it of good quality without any of those admixtures which render it valueless to the English maltster, I believe a fair trade could be well established at the present time. Unfortunately, either through ignorance or greediness, dealers send barley to England which they should have known was altogether unsuitable to that market, and, consequently, we lost it. But I believe the market is still open to us; I believe it is one we may always fall back upon, and it is our duty to promote it in every possible way. Hon. gentlemen may remember that a letter appeared a short time ago from an old Canadian living in England, with reference to the apple trade. He said that he knew Canadian apples were good, but he had seen barrels of Canadian apples which had been sent to England, which were so fraudulently put up—good apples on top, but inferior apples all through the barrel—that it completely spoiled the sale of the article in that market. If our people do such things as that, if they are so stupidly ignorant or wilfully fraudulent, it is impossible for us to make a trade. They must study the market, they must find out what it wants, and send that, and if they do. I am satisfied that with a little perseverance we will have a market in England more reliable, and more valuable both as regards conditions and everything else than the United States markets. It will not be so liable to fluctuations, consequent upon changes of policy which we have so often found redound to our disadvantage. I am not myself very much in favour of reciprocity and I have no hesitation in saying so. I would much rather deal on the basis of following our own interests in every article which we have to dispose of, and if the Americans want our produce let them take it, and if they do not want it I believe we will find another market. If you have a treaty of reciprocity in all products somebody has got to be sacrificed, and I will say further, that I also object to making treaties with a people who have in many respects not acted up to the high sense of national honour which we would expect a great country to act up to. Therefore I think the less we have to do with them in the way of treaty-making the better. If we wait a little I believe they will be anxious enough to take what we have to sell. There is a motion on the Order Paper with reference to the export duty on saw-logs, but as it is not likely to be reached this session, I wish to say something on the question. In this, I will be following the example of the Finance Minister who dragged these export duties into the debate when it had no possible relation to any of the matters under discussion. My position on this question is somewhat peculiar. I represent a constituency which is, perhaps, the most interested in the matter of any in the Dominion of Canada, and no man in this House or in this country, can feel more regret and more vexation than I do, at seeing the saw-logs, the raw material, exported out of this country and manufactured in the United States. No man would go further than I to adopt any practical method of putting an end to that loss to this country. The only question with me, and the only question I feel inclined to discuss at this moment, is this: It is a fact that if we reimpose the export duty, that the $2 per thousand duty on sawn lumber would come into force as a matter of law, without any action of Congress, and then behind that is the Bill mentioned by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) held in reserve in case an export duty was reimposed. Now, the Minister of Finance was very careful to go out of his way, I think, to tell the American producers of saw-logs that they need not think they were going to establish any vested rights, because if the interests of the country required it, he would set all such things at defiance. I think the language was unnecessarily strong, was not calculated to soothe the feelings of our neighbours on the other side, and was not germane to the discussion. The whole question for the present, resolves itself into this: There is more than a probability that the American Congress, at its next session, will take the duty off our sawn lumber. As the matter stands at present, with the duty on, and without any export duty, it is just the turn of a feather, whether these purchasers of saw-logs manufacture them on this side or tow them across to the other. As a matter of fact, we know that many men who have purchased limits have also purchased mills. A man named Peters purchased limits from the Midland and North Shore Lumber Company, and he has not only purchased the limits, but failing to purchase the mill, it is well known that he has been looking about for a site on which to build a mill for himself. The purchasers of the principal limits from the Georgian Bay Lumber Company also purchased the mill, with which they will cut a large portion of the logs which they will produce. As a simple matter of fact—I am not basing my argument upon it—there has not been one single mill closed so far, except the mills at Midland, and the mills at Midland will, I am very much afraid, be closed in any case, because the owners of those mills have not the limits to work them, and if a man has to tow logs from the Georgian Bay, he might as well tow them to Saginaw or other places in Michigan as to Midland; so that the trade of that place cannot be taken into account. But the statement which is often made—it was made to me in a letter the other day—that an immense number of men have been thrown out of employment as a result of the sale of these logs, is, I know, absolutely untrue. I know, as a matter of fact, that employment has never been so abundant or wages so high in the Georgian Bay district as during this winter; so that so far—and I am only speaking so far—the general labourer has not suffered; there is not a man in the Parry Sound and Georgian Bay districts who has not had all the labour he wanted. To that extent, the situation is unchanged. I must say that I think the lumber interest is hardly fairly treated in the discussion of this question—I speak of our own Canadian lumbermen. The hon. Minister of Finance was ready enough to threaten the purchasers of the logs with a reimposition of the duty, but he had not a word to say as to its effect upon our Canadian lumbermen. There is no industry in this country that employs as much labour and capital as the lumber industry, and therefore it should be treated with every consideration; and we know that the reduction in the duty of $1 a thousand has enabled them to get rid of a large quantity of lumber that was lying on their hands, and to cut up large quantities of saw-logs that would otherwise have been burned in the woods. All I would say now on the subject, as my own view, is that it would be the height of folly to do anything at the present moment which would imperil the placing of lumber on the free list. If lumber is placed on the free list, the export of logs will at once cease, because it would be to the interest of nobody to export logs and cut them on the other side instead of cutting them in this country. I can understand that even the threat to re-impose the export duty places our lumbermen in a very uncomfortable position at this moment. With such a threat hanging over their heads, how can they make contracts for the coming season? How can they tell what price they can charge? Because $1 a thousand makes a tremendous difference to them. Therefore, to re-impose the export duty now would be to embarrass our lumber trade, imperil the possibility of getting free lumber, and cause most serious loss to all. But, having said this much, I say further, that if, at the next meeting of Congress, nothing is done to give us free lumber, then the question will assume an entirely different shape. Then it will be the duty of all interested in the preservation of our forests—and I do not know who is not interested—seriously to consider the question, even at the risk of all damage that would happen to the lumber interest, whether it would not be the duty of the Government to step in and re-impose the export duty. But to do it now would result in no good, but would cause infinite harm.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I cannot help feeling that one owes an apology at this late hour, almost an early hour of the morning, for offering any observations at all to the House. But there are some matters in connection with the question that we have now before us about which I feel I must say a word or two. I must say, Mr. Speaker, in the first place, that it affords me a great deal of pain to find myself obliged to differ a second time during one session, upon a most important question, from an hon. member of this House, with whom I have been on terms of the closest intimacy, both personal and political, ever since I came to Ottawa. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) I have always regarded, and I still regard, as an ornament to this House. I prize his personal friendship as highly as I ever did, I admire his conspicuous ability as much as I ever admired it, and I am only sorry to think that an hon. member who has been such a brilliant supporter of the Conservative cause should, on this occasion, at any rate, be acting in opposition to what we consider to be Conservative principles. However, these things will occur in public life, and we can only lament them. I should have liked very much, had it been possible for me, to act shoulder to shoulder with my hon. friend, as I have done in the past. But in this case, and on this resolution, I find it is quite impossible for me to do so. I regard this resolution of my hon. friend as nothing less than a declaration that the policy of protection to the native industries of Canada, which we have pursued since 1878, is to-day a mistaken policy, that it should be reversed, and that we should go in for a policy of so-called free trade. There is one part of the resolution to which I should like to call attention for a moment; it is the proviso at the end of the fourth clause, in which, after expressing the opinion that "the tariff ought to be at once amended in respect of the matters herein indicated and also by the substantial reduction of duties," he goes on to say, "so as not unnecessarily to prejudice the business of the country." Now, Mr. Speaker, there is just where my hon. friend and I differ—where the roads on which we travel diverge. He sets the business of the country in the second place, and the reduction of the duties in the first. Now, I think the first thing we have to see to is that, by giving employment to the people, we provide our people with the purchasing power; and, in the second place, we have to take care that, as far as possible, we reduce the prices of what they have to buy. I do not put the second first. I think that is really the difference, to a great extent, between the principles that underlie the policy of free trade and the policy of protection to native industries; and I was very glad indeed to find from the utterances of my hon. friend the Finance Minister, that the Government are fully satisfied and assured that the policy which we have pursued since 1878, is a sound and salutary policy. My hon. friend said, as a matter of course, that a sound and wise and strong protective policy did not necessarily imply that every item in the tariff was to be regarded as rigid and immutable. It is quite evident that duties which may have been perfectly reasonable fourteen years ago, may, under altered conditions and circumstances, have become unreasonable and excessive, and it is just as clear, on the other hand, that duties which may have been supposed to be sufficient, may be, on investigation and under altered conditions and circumstances, found to be insufficient and inadequate for protection. But while my hon. friend the Finance Minister said so much as this, he gave us distinctly to understand that the Government were determined to abide by and to nail their colours to the mast upon the old policy that this country has so long approved and under which it has so steadily prospered, and under which its credit has gone so high among the nations; and I was exceedingly glad to find that there was no uncertain sound on that subject. Now, I do not intend to discuss the theoretical bearings of free trade and protection, and I do not intend to discuss either what to me did seem the extraordinary arguments and calculations to convince the House and the country that we ought to reverse our policy, adduced by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). These arguments and calculations have already been replied to by several members in this House in several respects. There is one matter to which I should like to have referred, but it is so late now that I shall not enter into it, but no doubt others will, and that is with reference to the calculation my hon. friend made as to the amount of benefit the farmers have received from protection—the calculation he made with regard to the output of the farms and the $12,000,000 worth of produce imported into this country. I think my hon. friend in that calculation was mistaken in his argument, in his premises, and in his conclusion. He altogether left out of consideration the fact of the greatly enhanced prices which the farmers in this country have received for the goods they have to sell. However, I do not wish to elaborate that. I wish to call the attention, however, of my hon. friend to one fact, which I think has a good deal of bearing on this subject, and that is, that when he asks this young country to reverse the policy we adopted in 1878, and to adopt a policy of so-called free trade, more properly called free imports, he asks us to do something which is opposed to the judgment of every civilized country in the world, with one exception only. I say that the whole civilized world is against my hon. friend in this matter, with one exception only, and this is with the exception of England.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. But that is an exception which year by year can be pleaded with less and less authority, because year by year there is growing up a greater and greater body of opinion in opposition to that policy in England.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend may say "hear, hear," but his jeering does not in any way alter the fact. It is notorious that it is so. Why, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) himself did not venture to deny that there was a growing feeling in favour of protection in England, and I will show in a moment very good reasons why there should be such feeling. When my hon. friend cheers that statement, he ought to remember that the Prime Minister of England last year told us himself, in a very famous speech which he made at Hastings, that in his opinion, in order to enable even the great industries of England to hold their own in the markets of the world, they ought to have recourse, in some degree at all events, to a reimposition of duties.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He revised that the other day.

Mr. McNEILL. That is all very well. I made the statement with reference to what Lord Salisbury said last year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He said he was entirely misunderstood.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon friend says that he said something different this year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not say that he said something different, but I said that he explained that he was entirely misunderstood, and did not mean to say what the hon. gentleman says he did say.

Mr. McNEILL. I will refer to that in a short while, and my hon. friend will find that he is entirely mistaken. He will find that Lord Salisbury virtually repeated what he said last year. I have his words, and will quote them, showing that he is as strongly in favour of what he said last year as he was then. Therefore, I say there is but one exception, and that is the only plank hon. gentlemen opposite have to float upon at all; and that one exception is becoming less and less of an exception to be applied in their favour. The leader of the Opposition to-night expressed his belief that a wonderful change is about to take place in the policy of our friends to the south of the line, but I will believe that when I see it. I am not so sanguine as he is on the subject. I have kept poultry, and find it is always well not to count my chickens until they are hatched; and if my hon. friend will follow that course in this case, he will follow a safer course than in assuming what the policy of the United States is to be. If there be one thing crooked in this world, it is the course of Yankee politics, and I should be very sorry to say where that will land us. I say that there is not a nation to be found to-day, not even including England, that, situated as we are, could be induced to follow the policy suggested to us by the hon. member for North Simcoe. There is not one that would be prepared to denude its young industries of that protection, which every other country in the world, except England, thinks it necessary to cast around its great industries. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to admit at once that, under certain conditions, perfect freedom of buying and perfect freedom of selling is a very much better thing for the country enjoying it than any possible system of protection. I am perfectly willing to admit, I state with the greatest confidence, that if the nations of the world had allowed England to follow a policy of free trade when she wished to, she would have dominated the markets of the world to-day.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). She does.

Mr. McNEILL. That she would have dominated the markets of the world—let me say to please my friend—to a much greater extent than she does to-day, and would have been the workshop of the world for many years to come. She would have dominated the markets of the world more than she has done, and, just to that extent, the manufacturing industries of these other countries that, under a system of protection, succeeded in manufacturing goods for themselves would have suffered, the industries of France, of Belgium, of the United States, of Germany would, just to that extent, have suffered. I am not prepared to say that that would have been a benefit to these countries, while it would have been a benefit to England. That would have been the case provided the nations of the world had permitted England to follow a system of free trade. But as they would not allow her to follow that policy, she was obliged to do the next best thing, and adopt a policy of free imports. I am prepared to give some weight to the position of my hon. friends opposite. I admit not only that under a system of free imports, the manufacturing industries of England enormously progressed and developed, but that because of that policy these industries progressed and developed. That was the only result that could follow, because at that time all the other countries of the world almost were dependent upon England for their manufactures, at least for those lines of manufactures which England turned out. And the fact that these countries were in this way dependent upon England made it possible for England, without risk or competition to her own manufacturers, to open her markets freely, and by opening her markets she admitted free the raw material and the food-stuffs which were necessary to enable her to manufacture cheaper than she had manufactured before. After that time, of course, matters changed. Just at that time there came to her assistance that wonderful agency, call it giant or wizard, or what you will, which set a thousand spindles revolving where ten revolved before, which crashed, and hammered and welded, and planed, and lifted and carried without hands; that whirled men and merchandise across the earth faster than most birds can fly; and that, on the sea, set tides and calms and contrary winds were at defiance and reduced the uncertainty of ocean traffic almost to the regularity of that by land. Mr. Speaker, it is not a hundred years ago since I heard a gentleman of philosophic frame of mind, in a deliberate assembly, rise in his place and gravely question whether it was of any benefit, whether it was even of any importance to a trading community that there should be an extraordinary shortening of ocean voyages. I do not think it is necessary for me to say to the business men of this House that among all the agencies which have conspired to advance trade and commerce the world over, none has been greater, none has occupied a more conspicuous place than the extraordinary shortening of ocean transit, which has been brought about by the use of the steam engine. Because of the position of vantage England held at this time, because she had the capital, the skill and the experience, she was able to utilize this discovery of the application of steam power to manufactures and locomotion. She was able, therefore, to turn out her goods by the hundreds in place of by the tens, thus wonderfully cheapening the production of these goods, so that she flooded the markets of Europe and the United States with the product of her cheap labour and her skill. And all went well; none could compete with her. But, Mr. Speaker, the day arrived when, under a system of protection, whether it was right or whether it was wrong I do not argue; I simply state the fact—these countries, or many of them, which England had been supplying with her manufactured goods were able largely to manufacture these goods for themselves. The day arrived when they were so independent of England's manufactures that they were able by tariff arrangements, largely to exclude the products of England's labour from their market. And the day arrived, still further, when they were able, not only to supply themselves, but to send the surplus of their products to compete with the products of England in the neutral markets of the world. And, Sir, the day has now arrived when, not only are they able to compete with the products of English labour in the neutral markets of the world, but when the open market of England does not mean only an open market for breadstuffs and raw material for the purpose of cheapening her manufacture, but it means the importation of millions upon millions sterling worth—hundreds of millions of dollars worth—of products of foreign manufacturing skill to compete in her markets with the products of her own people. Now, Sir, that time having arrived, the conditions have been entirely changed; and, as the conditions have been changed, so we find that the policy which worked well at a time when foreign countries were dependent entirely upon England for the product of her manufactures, works well no longer, and the result is that there has been an enormous falling away in the trade which England has been carrying on successfully for so many years with foreign countries. With the permission of the House I will give a few figures in reference to this point. In the first place, the total of export of English produce and manufactured goods has fallen away from £263,500,000 in value in 1890, to £247,000,000 in 1891, and £227,000,000 in 1892. This is the gross result. But it becomes still more remarkable when you look at it a little more deeply, because you will find that the export is becoming less and less through all the great lines of manufacture. The Trade and Navigation Returns classify these manufactures, and I will read a table showing the figures in millions and hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling, which represent the value of exports in the various articles mentioned:

Yarns and textiles..	£1,123	£106	£100
Metals.....	45	39	33
Machinery.....	16.4	14.8	14.7
Apparel.....	11.2	11.3	10.4
Chemicals.....	8.9	8.8	8.5
All other....	34.5	32.2	28.6
Total.....	263.5	247.25	227

Sir, I think these are figures of such gravity as that they might almost impress hon. gentlemen opposite with the absurdity of the suggestion that we should sweep away protection from our industries, in face of what we see is the result in the great industries of England. If England herself, with all her vast experience, with all her vast skill, with all her vast wealth and appliances of every kind, finds that her giant industries are unable to stand the strain of the policy which is suggested by the member for North Simcoe, surely it is absurd to suggest that our comparatively insignificant industries, after a protection of only 14 years, should be denied that defensive armour which the Prime Minister of England last year stated ought to be taken up again, and ought to be brought to the assistance of some of the great lines of industry in the mother country. Now, Sir, we have heard that it was freer trade and not free trade that hon. gentlemen support. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, what I am going to say you may think unparliamentary; if so, you must call me to task for it; but we have heard a great deal about free trade, and freer trade, and continental trade, but I was going to say that I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite care one continental what trade it is, whether it is free trade, or freer trade, so long as it only frees them from those sombre and sorrowful shades in which, during all these weary, weary 14 years, they have wandered, and wailed, and sought for a policy and found it not. Those hon. gentlemen in their sore distress, I fancy, have been looking towards my hon. friend from North Simcoe to assist them out of their difficulty and provide a policy for them. I had thought there was some hope for them, because I think my hon. friend would be a most talented leader; but the hon. leader of the Opposition repudiates the suggestion, and I am afraid that they are as badly off as ever. However, Sir, I had hoped from some observations that had been let fall, that they were going to change their course, that they were going to head with that hon. gentleman in the direction of the mother country, and away from the United States. I do think that if such a result were to follow, if we found that the only difference between hon. gentlemen on this side and hon. gentlemen on that side was a difference as to how we could best develop trade with the mother country and with the outlying portions of the Empire; if hon. gentlemen would look a little less towards Washington and a little more towards London; if the only difference that divided the great parties in this country was emulation as to which of them could devise a policy that would best develop, and strengthen, and cement our common Empire, then I do think that we might hope that a better era would dawn for party politics in Canada, and that the prosperity of this Dominion might be expected to advance with leaps and bounds. I had begun almost to hope that was the desire of hon. gentlemen, because it has been said—and I hope you will not consider that I am unparliamentary in referring to a previous debate—it has been said that the hon. gentlemen were strongly in favour of a policy of taking the duty off goods in favour of England; but however anxious I may be to accept that statement, I find it altogether impossible to believe that hon. gentlemen are very much in earnest in that regard. They may consider themselves consistent, but for my part I am unable to reconcile, and I have never yet met any one who was able to reconcile a proposition with its logical opposite. Therefore, so long as the member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), for example, does not repudiate that policy of which he has been so distinguished and persistent an advocate in this House, the essence of which policy, we are told, is discrimination against English goods—so long as he and his party do not repudiate that policy, I cannot think that he is very serious when he desires to lead us to believe that he is in favour of a policy to discriminate against the United States in favour of English goods. Let hon. gentlemen opposite either repudiate their Yankee policy and go in for a British policy, or else they must expect we will regard what they have been saying, and what they did last session in respect to this matter, as a mere unadorned party move. There is no dispute here about stealing the party clothes, of which we heard from the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). This thing has no covering of any kind. It stands there, nude and shameless in all its grotesque deformity. I will just say a word with respect to the proposal that the hon. member for Simcoe, who I am sure is serious in the matter, has made in regard to the reduction of duties on English goods. He unfortunately, and I agree with the leader of the Opposition in that regard, includes along with England all those nations that are entitled to preferential treatment from England, and that makes this an exceedingly wide suggestion indeed. Not only so, but by doing so, we would throw away a lever we might have possessed, by which we might have secured the abrogation of these obnoxious treaties. I cannot help asking, in passing, why it is when so many nations are included, our own colonies are not included also. It seems to me that is rather a curious position for the hon. member to take, whose views on such questions I always thought I knew pretty well. I do not wish to take refuge in any kind of subterfuge. This resolution, loaded as it is with prepositions altogether obnoxious to my views, I would be obliged to oppose at any rate; but I wish to say distinctly with respect to this question of reduction of duties on English goods, that if that proposal stood by itself, simply a reduction of duties on English goods without including other nations, at the present time and under the present circumstances I would most unhesitatingly record my vote against it. Such a resolution coming from this House could only have the effect of strengthening the hands of those free trade fanatics in England who are opposed to the policy which this House adopted by so large a majority last session, the policy of preferential trade with England in return for preferential treatment in her markets. It could have no other result on the minds of the people of England than that, because they would naturally say, what is the use of our giving preferential treatment in our markets to Canadian products in return for preferential treatment in her markets, when the Canadians are ready to give us preferential treatment without securing preferential treatment in our markets. From an Imperial and English point of view, I think nothing could be a more mistaken and more short-sighted suggestion than the adoption by this House of any such proposition. The great need and the great desideratum of England to-day is the building up and development of Greater Britain. England's future lies with her empire. That is a proposition, the truth of which is becoming more and more evident and more and more impressed on the minds of the English public. England's best customers are to be found within her own empire. Her own people living in her own empire are infinitely better customers than are the subjects of foreign powers, and by increasing the number of purchasers in her markets abroad, in the colonies and in Greater Britain generally, she will develop her trade enormously. By giving preferential treatment to Canada in her market, in the market which is equal to the market of the United States and the markets of several great European powers added together, she will induce immigration in this country and add to the number of the consumers of her own goods in this country to an exceeding great extent. There is no gainsaying that proposition. I think the probability is that under such circumstances we would find ourselves not troubled by having too few, but by having too many immigrants. Our climatic conditions, however, would always prevent our having the scum of southern Europe poured upon us, as has been the case in the United States. But be that as it may, the possibility of trade in this direction from England is, as I have said, simply enormous, and giving England this preference in our market without asking preferential treatment in return, if it would have the effect of delaying this great Imperial policy, should be repudiated by every hon. member of this House. I desire to refer to a remark made by the hon. member for Simcoe as to the improbability of this policy being accepted by England. There have been references made to the speech of Lord Salisbury, a copy of which I have in my hand. Before I leave the question of corn I wish to say this. When Lord Salisbury said that it was beyond the dream of the politician to impose a duty on corn, we ought to understand that, under the pressure of this free trade policy of England, the protective spirit has risen so high that the proposals for a duty on corn have become very extreme. It has been proposed, not merely that a duty should be imposed on corn—and when I speak of corn I mean wheat, as is understood in England—but it has been proposed that the price of wheat should be raised from 30 or 35 shillings a quarter up to 42 shillings a quarter. If hon. members consider that the duty is probably divided about equally between the consumer and producer, they will see that that means a very high duty must be imposed in order to increase the price to 42 shillings. So when Lord Salisbury said a duty on corn is outside the dream of a politician, it must be remembered that he had this in mind, and in comparison to that any proposal we have made is insignificant. But I may say further that I think personally this trade policy, which we shall have, I have no doubt whatever, sooner or later, will in all probability be carried, not en bloc but in detail. I think in all probability that it will come about by degrees. It is quite possible that the last thing we may receive will be the reduction of the duty on corn. So far as my province is concerned, the duty upon wheat is not a matter of such very great importance, but to other parts of the Dominion it is. I wish to say this, Mr Speaker, with regard to this duty on corn: There is a very strong feeling rising up in England in favour of the imposition of this duty upon corn, and Lord Salisbury has told the people who are advocating this policy that what they have to do is to educate the people of England, and that he is prepared to carry out that policy which the majority of the people of England are in favour of. At the great conference held in England, the other day, one of the delegates from Birmingham mentioned that at one meeting of labouring men, there having been some dispute as to the true feeling about this matter of the duty upon corn, he asked the 323 people who were present for a show of hands, and he found that out of the whole meeting there were just three hands held up against the duty upon corn. Some hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that Lord Salisbury has in some way retracted what he said in reference to protection, and with the indulgence of the House I wish to show that that is not the case:

Mr. McNEILL.

Having put that question aside [that is the corn question], I will invite your attention to the very curious and remarkable fiscal problems which are now being worked out for our benefit by other nations. The great question which I think really divides us on the question of fiscal legislation is whether it is lawful, and if lawful whether it is expedient to use your tariff as a fighting weapon. I have always been of opinion that the doctrine held by distinguished free traders on this subject is somewhat too absolute, and when people say that reciprocity means protection I am tempted to doubt whether they have taken the trouble to clear their thoughts, which is necessary in dealing with fiscal science. But the matter, I hope, will be one which need not be settled in controversy. Mr. Blaine, by his calm legislation, undoubtedly succeeded in securing some very advantageous stipulations for his country in negotiations with other powers. The results have not been so definite nearer home. France and Italy, France and Switzerland, may be said in a tariff sense to be at open war. One thing is quite certain—that that war does infinite harm to both parties concerned. How it will end it is impossible for us to guess, but we must watch the issue of the campaign with the very deepest attention, for it is full of lessons for ourselves. Everyone will agree that such a war is usually injurious to both parties concerned, and that we ought to keep out of it as long as we can. But my impression is that with tariff wars, as with other wars, it may happen, in spite of the terrible injury which the making of war inflicts on all who take part in it, that it may be necessary to avert greater dangers. I earnestly beg of you to study this question with an open mind and a clear appreciation of the issues concerned, and not allow yourselves to be pushed aside from it by any preconceived opinions or any watchword from scientific men.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that is as clear a statement in favour of the views which Lord Salisbury had announced last year as could very well be imagined. We have been told that it was utterly improbable that we would obtain this policy from England. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) rung the changes upon the absurdity of our asking or suggesting such a policy. He said that the suggestion of it, was enough to bring ridicule upon the poor foolish heads who had thought of such a policy, and he repeated these statements this session. When my hon. friend repeated these statements, I could not help thinking it was a great pity that he did not do more justice to his ability and talent, because when an hon. gentleman in his position makes a statement of that kind on the floor of the House, a statement which is so far removed from fact, it must depreciate his influence in any deliberative assembly of this kind. This policy was adopted by this House last session, on the 25th April, and on the 27th April the great exponent of public opinion in Great Britain, published a leading article on the subject. It commenced by saying it was an important resolution that had been passed, not a trifling and absurd resolution as my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) would have us believe, and it went on to say:

We have not disguised our opinion that if the colonies as a whole, and without arrière pensée, were prepared to enter into a Customs Union with the mother country on mutually advantageous terms, there would be a strong body of public opinion in favour of meeting the offer, if possible, even at the cost of some departure from the rigorous doctrines of free trade.

It is certain that for the consumer generally, absolute free trade is the best, but it is not certain that the interest of the consumer, as such, is the only thing that ought to be considered. If not by too great a departure from the strict lines of free trade, it were possible to bind the great self-governing colonies in close and permanent commercial alliance with the mother country, securing not only a vast reserve of political strength, but the command of a large and rapidly growing markets, it would probably be thought well worth while to incur some sacrifice. When nations like the United States, Russia and France are strengthening their exclusive systems against us, and when Central Europe is involved in a network of commercial treaties, it is not pleasant to contemplate the possibility that, under protective tariffs of increasing stringency, our colonial trade may slip from us and the political allegiance of our colonial fellow subjects may be gradually broken down. We hail, therefore, the action of the Dominion Parliament, as a most encouraging sign of loyalty and good-will, but we cannot pretend to ignore the immense difficulties that have to be faced if the question comes to be seriously raised. In the first place, though Canada is a most important colony, we could not for a moment think of establishing a differential tariff for the advantage of the Canadians alone. Were Canada to be joined by the colonies of Australasia and South Africa in opening the colonial markets freely to British goods, there would be a substantial basis for negotiations.

If, however, there is a general disposition on the part of the colonists to move in the direction indicated, the lead given by Canada may be widely followed and may possibly create a new situation altogether.

And yet, in the face of that article, it has been argued here that it was perfectly absurd to suppose that the people of England will ever consent to such a policy. Now, Mr. Speaker, I may just say that from my own observations when I was in England, I am satisfied that there is an enormous growth of public feeling in the mother country in favour of some such policy. I was in the United Kingdom for some five months; I was in England, Ireland and Scotland—in each of them two or three times; I saw a great many people while I was there, and I can only say that it was really a revelation to me to find how great a feeling there was there in favour of such a policy. If you go to certain classes in London, you will find that the old policy of free trade has a very strong foothold there still; but if you go to the great centres of industry in the provinces—to Sheffield, Manchester, Belfast and similar places—you will find that there is a very strong feeling growing up in those places against the existing tariff arrangements in England, and in favour of such a policy as this which has been approved by the Canadian House of Commons. I may say that the "Belfast-News-Letter," which has, I believe, the largest circulation of any paper in the province of Ulster, on the 14th October last, had a leading article in support of such a policy. I am almost afraid to weary the House by reading it, but the article is as strong and striking a one as could very well be penned, and I will read a small portion of it:

Our empire is world-wide; it can provide us with everything we require; and the dwellers in Canada, Australia, and other British possessions are our own people. There are no bounds to the possibilities of our colonies; and by developing the resources of the Empire we would be developing our best market. On the other hand, foreigners whom we are favouring at our own expense, by our present trade policy, are our commercial rivals, and they are doing their utmost to injure our trade in every part of the world. We are helping foreigners to undermine that trade upon which so much of our greatness rests; and we are neglecting to cultivate the friendship of our own kinsmen, who might be of immense benefit to us.

When my hon. friend from North Simcoe says that all this is to be changed because of the election of President Cleveland in the United States, I can only reply that I myself, subsequent to that election, addressed a meeting in Manchester composed of delegates from the different workmen's associations in the counties of Lancashire and Cheshire; the meeting knew perfectly well about his election; the matter was referred to during the proceedings; yet the meeting unanimously endorsed the policy which has been adopted by this House. There was no evidence whatever of any departure from the position that had been previously taken up by reason of Mr. Cleveland's election. I may mention also that the great meeting of the Conservative Association took place long afterwards, and at that meeting this policy was brought forward. Although it was notorious that the leaders of the party were opposed to taking up the question at that time, and although a very strong plea for delay was urged, nevertheless the resolution in favour of this policy was carried by an overwhelming majority. Since then, in the month of January, in John Bright's own constituency, the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce passed a resolution referring to the resolution passed in this House last session, and commending it to the Imperial Government on the ground that England's trade with her colonies was the trade that she could most rely on. And I have here a letter which I received yesterday from that indefatigable worker in this cause, Colonel Howard Vincent, and he does not tell me that there is any failure of the cause in England. On the contrary, he tells me that it is progressing in England, and that he has addressed large and sympathetic meetings all over the country, and even in Radical centres and clubs. Now, I do not think I need weary the House any longer. I have to thank you exceedingly for the great patience with which you have heard me at this hour of the morning, and I will only say that I think that when we find our friends doing their best for us in England, we in Canada, by the vote we are giving here tonight, will show them that we, at all events, are going to do our part.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, there are several yet to speak on this question, and if the leader of the House will look at the clock, perhaps he will agree to an adjournment.

Mr. FOSTER. We are ready for the vote now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. leader of the Government takes the responsibility of saying that they are ready for the question, though I intended to speak on this subject, I shall occupy the time of the House only for about five minutes, and then I shall give way to its evident desire to have the vote taken. Now, I vote for the resolution proposed by the hon. member for North Simcoe, not because I agree with it in all particulars. One particular that has been noticed by speakers on both sides of this House, is that it involves in some degree discrimination against our neighbours to the south. I should very much have preferred this resolution to be on the same lines as that proposed a year ago by my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), that the duties on such goods as we mainly import from Great Britain should be reduced, which would of course apply to all countries. At the same time there is, as my hon. leader has already said, so much of truth in this motion that, under the circumstances, considering that we cannot move an amendment or express our views more particularly, we have to choose between voting yea or nay on the very words before the House. I cannot bring myself to vote against it, I cannot bring myself to abstain from voting, and, therefore, I am bound to vote for it. As to the general question involved, I shall not at this moment, as the House is anxious to vote, go into details, but I must say that the remarks of the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Stevenson) were the most refreshing and original that have been addressed to this House during the whole course of this discussion. He told us he was in favour of the National Policy, no matter what might happen, that his feet stood firm on the rock and that he would not wobble under any circumstances. It reminded me irresistibly of a good old Highland Conservative in my county, who has gone to a better place than this. He used to say some of my friends call themselves Conservatives, and Liberal-Conservative and Union and progress men, but, for my part, I love the good old name of Tory. That seems to be the position taken by the hon. member for Peterborough. He said that several of the factories in that town were paying no dividends, that the highest dividend he had yet received from any of them was six per cent, and yet he maintained that the National Policy was doing everything for Peterborough and creating a grand boom there. He said also that they could make things cheaper than they could be made in the States, but yet they were afraid this irruption of costly Yankee goods would drive our cheap Canadian goods if these barriers were taken down. That is the sum of the whole argument in favour of protection from the other side. They say we make these things cheaper than they can be made or sold at anywhere else, but still we dare not face competition. If that is the argument, I do not think we need fear it very much. As my five minutes are up and the House is eager to have the vote taken, I will not say anything more on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. If it is any consolation to my hon. friend, who is in distress at not having time to deliver the speech which he evidently had prepared, I would say to him that I am in the same box. I had an excellent speech all ready, but I forgot making it in order that we may have a division at once. My hon. friend and I are therefore in the same boat.

House divided on amendment (Mr. McCarthy) :

tween Her Majesty the Queen and the President of French Republic regulating the commercial relations between Canada and France in respect of the customs tariff be printed forthwith for the information of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no objection and approve of the motion, but I understand that there are more papers to come down. When will they be brought down ?

Mr. FOSTER. As soon as I can get them arranged, they will be brought down and printed with these.

Motion agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows :—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons, further Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1893, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

OTTAWA, 16th March, 1893.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 1.40 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 17th March, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 101) to amend the Seamen's Act.—(Mr. Foster.)

Bill (No. 102) to amend the Inland Waters Seamen's Act.—(Mr. Foster.)

VAUDREUIL ELECTION.

Mr. LAURIER. I am informed that the returning officer for the county of Vaudreuil, Mr. Bastien, has not yet received the writ of election. It should have been issued as far back as last Sunday, and I cannot understand the delay.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot account for it either. I do not remember the day on which I made the announcement, but I know that the Order passed. I will make inquiry.

EXPORTS—CONSULAR FEES.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) If it is not out of place, I would like to make inquiry for information with regard to the certificates required, under the regulations of the American Government, from their consuls in this country on all goods shipped to the United States. I think the practice has grown up in the trade between the two countries, that everything shipped from Canada to the United States must be accompanied by a certificate of the consul, for which the exporter has to pay a fee. I do not understand that anything of that sort is required, on goods shipped from the United States to Great Britain or to Canada, from the British consul. It seems to me that this is placing the trade of Canada upon a different footing from the trade of any other country in Christendom, and different I am told from the regulations which the United States require in respect of goods exported from any other country to the United States. I would like to ask the Minister whether he has looked into the matter, and whether any representations have been made to the United States Government on that subject, because it seems to me that it is a practice that ought not to be continued, and that Canada should in this respect be put upon precisely the same footing as any other country when we ship goods to the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say just now from memory as to whether these fees are actually required by law; but I know that the practice has prevailed for years, and has been growing all along more uniformly, that all goods shipped, no matter whether it be $2 worth or $2,000 worth, are accompanied by the consul's certificate, for which the shipper has to pay him a fee. Whether that is necessary under the law, I am not prepared just now to say; but I know the impression prevails among the shippers that unless this is done the difficulty will be greatly increased at the frontier, or at whatever port the duties are collected.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My point, the Minister will see, is this: that this regulation is not applied, so far as I can learn, to goods shipped from any other country into the United States, and it is not required on the part of the British Government in respect of goods shipped from the United States to Great Britain.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the consular certificate is not necessary for goods shipped from other countries into the United States?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is my understanding, and I think we are unfairly dealt with. The United States consuls, under this arrangement, are practically pensioners on the Canadian people.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt; but I rather think these consuls are nearly all of them paid fees, and I think my hon. friend will find that the same practice prevails in respect to goods shipped to the United States from other countries; but I am not certain. I do not think it is obligatory by law; but it has come to be considered in practice as the best thing to do in order to avoid greater difficulties on the frontier. The practice amounts, as my hon. friend says, to a heightening of the customs tariff on goods going into the United States, and a large amount of fees are gathered in Canada in that way, because consuls are being multiplied very rapidly in our ports. However, I will get further information.

THE CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. CASEY. I would like to ask the Minister whether the Controller of Customs has returned to the city, and whether he is likely to be in his place to-day?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose I may say that I am not my brother's keeper in that respect. I have not been informed as to whether the Controller is here or not. If it would be a favour for the hon. gentleman, I will have inquiries made.

MR. BRODEUR, M.P., AND THE Mc-CARTHY AMENDMENT.

Mr. BRODEUR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the House that last night I voted for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and I find that my vote was not recorded in the Journals of the House of Commons.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman's name does appear in the Votes and Proceedings, in the English version, at all events.

Mr. BRODEUR. In the French version I see that my name has not been entered.

INDUSTRIES IN MONTMAGNY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to draw the attention of the House to the following facts. On the 23rd February last I put the following question:—

What are the names of the 37 manufacturers mentioned in the last census as existing in the town of Montmagny?

To which the leader of the House replied:

The information in the census schedules was obtained by sworn enumerators, on the understanding that nothing but general statistical results should be published. No names nor personal particulars can, therefore, be communicated.

I see that all these particulars are given now and I should like to have an answer to my question.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman had better put his question on the Order Paper again.

STEAM-BOAT INSPECTION ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 6) further to amend the Steam-boat Inspection Act.

Motion agreed to. Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is proposed by this Bill, as I explained when introducing it, to amend the 43rd section of the Revised Statutes by substituting the word "minister" for the word "board." I want to ask the consent of the House to make a further change. In the present Act power is given to impose penalties on vessels proceeding without having been inspected, and the penalties are recoverable by process of law, and half of the fine is payable to the person making the complaint. Experience has shown that this is liable to abuse and I propose to make the following change in the law:—

All penalties recovered under this Act shall be paid to the Minister of Finance and Receiver-General, and shall be by him placed to the credit of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, provided that the Governor in Council may, if he sees fit, authorize the payment of a portion of any such penalty to the informer if the informer be not the inspector.

To strengthen my request to adopt this clause, I may relate an experience which occurred while acting as Minister of the department. The owners of several steamers usually made it a point to run until the inspector came to inspect their vessels; but last year, the office of inspector was vacant and as no inspector had been appointed, three of four vessels went on their trips without inspection. Some individuals took advantage of the law and prosecuted these people and put them to great cost and under the present law they could not get relief. This section is proposed in order to give the Government a little discretionary power. We do not propose that any of the penalties shall go to our own officer, and the proposition is that any such part of the fine as is considered fair may go to the informer.

Mr. WELSH. I think it is a good proposal to lessen the premium to the informer.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The premium is a little too high, I think, at present.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to inquire of the Minister in charge whether the words, "no person shall serve as engineer on any passenger steam-boat," are intended to apply to the case of any little steam yacht or steam launch that a private owner may choose to run for his own purposes?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The department understands that the law does not include the class of steamers referred to.

Mr. CHARLTON. There is one class of steam vessels not provided for here at all. I refer to tugs. Would they be classified as freight steam-boats?

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The department has never considered tugs to come under the operation of this section, because they do not carry passengers; but they come under the law regarding the inspection of boilers and hulls.

Mr. CHARLTON. Must they have certificated engineers in all cases?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is no certificate required for a tug.

Bill reported.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 75) to amend the law relating to Holidays—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Foster.)

Bill (No. 76) to correct a clerical error in the Bank Act—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Foster.)

SUPPLY—CABINET CHANGES.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the House and the Government to a matter of vital importance to a very large and important class in this Dominion: I refer to the agriculturists. We had several changes in the personnel of the Government during last year. At the present time the head of the important Department of Agriculture is a lawyer. I have no objection whatever to lawyers filling any positions either in the Cabinet or in this House. They are a class of men whom I respect and who are unquestionably entitled to their fair share of representation, both in the Cabinet and in the Legislature. At the same time, I contend that at this particular juncture the interests of the farmers should be intrusted to the hands of a master, a man of extensive personal experience, and one who is fitted to lead in the education of the farming class; but at the present time this department is in the hands of a gentleman who neither by personal knowledge nor by theoretical knowledge, is sufficiently posted to give agriculturists advice on any practical subject. I contend, if there ever was a period in the history of agriculture in this Dominion when this department required a man of extensive personal knowledge with respect to matters of agricultural detail, that time is the present, especially when some of our trade channels for farmers' produce are being closed and others are being opened, and when the methods of agriculture are undergoing changes in the different provinces, and I hold that to place a man at the head of the department who knows no more about farming than he does of astronomy, is nothing short of an insult to the agricultural community of this Dominion. I do not think the Government were so driven for want of suitable material that it was necessary for them to take a lawyer into the Cabinet as Minister of Agriculture. I see on the Government side of the House several hon. members who, from personal, practical experience, are fairly well fitted to fill the position of Minister of Agriculture. But it appears that every other interest will receive fair consideration at the hands of the Government, except agriculture. If a man is required to efficiently fill the position of head of the Department of Justice, a lawyer is selected. I would like to know to what extent the lawyers of this Dominion would acquiesce in the appointment of a farmer as Minister of Justice. Why, all the barristers of this Dominion would raise their voices in indignant protest at the injustice done their profession by such an appointment. I would like to know, should a vacancy take place in the Supreme Court, whether it would be considered advisable, in the interests of the legal profession, and of those who are forced to go to law, that it should be filled by a farmer. Every lawyer would loudly protest against such an utter disregard of the rights and intelligence of the legal profession. I would like to know whether, at this moment, when it is most desirable that we should have the best men as quarantine officers, we would endorse the action of the Government in placing at the head of our quarantine service a farmer who necessarily, from his training, could not be supposed a competent judge of the best means to prevent the introduction into this country of the fatal disease of cholera. On the contrary, we would insist on the most skilled and experienced medical man being put in that position. If you want a Supreme Court judge, you must take an experienced and admittedly able lawyer, and if you want a Minister of Justice, you select also a leading member of the legal profession. I ask then, how can you expect the farming community to patiently submit to the policy of taking a man from the legal profession, who must necessarily know very little about agriculture, and placing him at the head of that department? It is nothing short of a piece of gross injustice. I have heard that, in the United States, a lawyer was once put in nomination for the position of Minister of Agriculture in some particular state. When he got on the stump, the farmers of his constituency began to question him concerning their agricultural interests, and he got so terribly mixed in his replies that he made himself a laughing stock. For instance, when asked what kind of cows he would recommend for that particular state as the best fitted for the purpose of giving milk and making butter and raising stock, he said that his careful study of that question had led him to the conclusion that the best kind were Southdown. Then they were anxious to know his views with regard to the best breed of horses, and he replied that, after seriously considering that question, he had come to the conclusion that the Durnam breed was the best. When asked to give his ideas with regard to sheep, he said that he was in a position, from careful study, to give them an intelligent answer, and had come to the conclusion that Polled Angus were, all things considered, the most preferable breed. Then, as poultry was a very important industry in that state, the farmers were anxious to have his ideas on that subject, and he replied that the best kind of chickens was the Berkshire. When they came to the subject of hogs, he thought that of the numerous breeds of hogs extant, Plymouth Rock hogs were the kind he would recommend most strongly. Now, this was the experience of a lawyer in dealing with agricultural matters; and we may expect that the lawyer, who is now at the head of the Department of Agriculture, will, in all probability, become as badly mixed as the lawyer down south to whom I have referred. This is a matter of very great importance. There never was a period in the history of the Dominion when our farmers were more driven to their wits' end to find out the best kinds of grain to grow and the best line of agriculture to follow. Our cattle are scheduled, and if that scheduling should continue it will seriously interfere with that branch of industry. Our horses are shut out from the United States by the enormous duty, and our country is full of them, so that our farmers do not know exactly what is best to do. And in many other lines the same trouble exists. In what position then will be a lawyer, who knows nothing at all about agriculture, to advise our farmers in these matters? Instead of our new-cast Minister of Agriculture going into the country and teaching the farmers, they will have to instruct him. I say further that the Minister of Agriculture should have a seat in this House. Besides appointing a lawyer, the Government have placed him in the other Chamber, where he is not directly responsible to the people, and where we cannot have the opportunity of questioning him concerning matters of vital interest to agriculturists. Now, Sir, the whole thing looks like this: The Government were in a box; they had to take Mr. Angers into the Cabinet; they could not get him a seat in this House, they were afraid to make the attempt to elect him, and they gave him the position of Minister of Agriculture and relegated him to the Senate, with many others there who are of very little use to the country, and of very little use to anybody except themselves, and that in the drawing of their salaries. I presume Mr. Angers will perform that part of his duty very admirably, but, so far as the agriculturists of this country are concerned, he will not be able to give them that advice and assistance and instruction they need. He is not going to lead in the matter of progressive agriculture, but he will have to remain behind until he gets his education, for he has yet to learn the very A B C of the profession of agriculture. It is nothing short of a gross piece of injustice to the agriculturists of this country to place a man of this stamp at the head of the department, and to put him in the Senate where he is beyond the reach of the elected representatives of the people, particularly at a time when the agriculturists are more anxious about their future and about the changes that undoubtedly must take place and are now taking place in the calling of agriculture than at any time since Canada became a home for farmers. It seems to me an insult, nothing less, to expect the farmers of this country to quietly submit to this condition of things, and it is to be hoped the Government will take such steps as will place at the head of the department a man possessed of extended knowledge in the calling of agriculture, a man who will be able to take his place either on the platform or in this House in the discussion of questions of vital interest to the farmers of this country, and not a man who is a complete stranger to that calling, and totally incapable, from profession, and from the Chamber in which he is placed, to discharge the duties of this office.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I appreciated the compliment my hon. friend paid the legal profession at the outset of his speech, but he has evidently overlooked the fact that the new Administration of the United States, Mr. Cleveland's Administration, to whom my hon. friends on the other side look for example and for everything else that is good, have, within the last few days, appointed a lawyer as Minister of Agriculture. My hon. friend evidently overlooked that fact, and, while the story he told about the legal Minister of Agriculture was a very amusing one, he surely did not expect any one in this House to believe it. In this part of his speech he was something like the witnesses we sometimes get in the box who hurt the case they would like to help by proving too much. If the Minister had anything to do with the understanding of crops and was supposed to know the rotation of crops and about the Clydesdale hogs and Berkshire sheep, and that kind of thing, perhaps my hon. friend himself (Mr. McMullen) would be a better man for the position than a lawyer. But I find, on looking over the report of the Minister of Agriculture, that the work does not require a farmer more than a lawyer, or a lawyer more than a doctor. In fact, so far as I am able to see, it requires a man of general executive ability. Not only have the farmers an interest in the Department of Agriculture, there are many others that have an interest. I find in the report of the Minister a list of the branches taken up in his department: Crops, cattle trade, cattle quarantine, investigation of animal diseases, public archives, agricultural societies in the North-west. Then there is a report on phosphates, one on the experimental farms, one on dairying, one on exhibitions, and one on the World's Fair. The Minister has also the patent department, copyrights and trade marks, the general quarantine department, census, statistics, immigration, and other important duties besides. Now, I say that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken would place a farmer in a very embarrassing position if he put him in such a department and expected him to run it. I say that without disrespect for the farmers, and, especially when I find myself surrounded by so many in the House, I am bound to show my respect in the proper way. What is wanted at the head of the Department of Agriculture is a man of general executive abilities capable of managing men and with enough knowledge of human nature to employ the officers of the department so as to call out the best service from each of them.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee)

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, we will take up the remaining items of the Supplementary Estimates, those first brought down.

Further amount required for Census and Statistics—(Governor-General's warrant... ..$2,672

Mr. FOSTER. That was an item in the Agriculture Department which was allowed to stand over pending the bringing down of the instructions and schedules for the census. I placed these on the Table within a day or two after, and I suppose there is no objection now that the item pass.

Mr. CHARLTON. For what reason was this item allowed to stand?

Mr. FOSTER. As I have explained, it was because a discussion arose about the census figures and I had not the papers with me. I brought them down afterwards.

Mr. CHARLTON. Were these census enumerators instructed to take seamstresses, making dresses for people in the neighbourhood, as industrial establishments?

Mr. FOSTER. The whole of that is detailed in the instructions which I brought down; we had a full discussion of the matter.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; but we have had some revelations since that discussion. The returns read before the House by the hon. Minister are most astounding, as they seem to show that everybody except kitchen maids, engaged in any industrial employment, were enumerated as constituting industrial establishments. These returns are the height of absurdity. For instance, the milliner engaged in making dresses, is an industrial establishment; the woman who is doing a little work for her neighbours and a little work for herself, is an industrial establishment; the blacksmith who is shoeing horses, running a single bellows, working in a little shop for his neighbours, is an industrial establishment; a single cooper, repairing old tubs and butter firkins, is an industrial establishment. Why, Sir, the whole thing is a farce, and we failed to understand the character of it until we got these returns which the Minister of Finance laid before the House in detail the other day. Now, if this is the general character of these instructions, I think that the census is entirely unreliable. I received a letter a day or two ago from a gentleman in Port Dover, who informed me that one of his sons had been enumerated three times, and the boy had actually been out of the country over a year. These are some of the glaring inconsistencies and inaccuracies that are complained of all over the country, and they show the evident intention on the part of the Government to swell the number of industrial establishments in this country, the number of persons engaged in manufacturing pursuits, the capital invested in these various concerns, and the output—why, almost everything in the country is tabulated as being an industrial establishment. I wonder they have not got the farmer who is raising cattle put down as an industrial establishment. It would scarcely be more absurd than the returns that have been brought down. I express the opinion that the money has not been earned in getting these census statistics, and that we have got a set of statistics that are totally unreliable, and that, whether it was the intention of the Government or not, they have presented us with returns the result of which is to place the National Policy and its operation before the country in an unduly favourable light. If there was not an intention on the part of the Government to do this, if these instructions were not intended to bring in as industrial establishments, seamstresses, milliners, coopers, blacksmiths, and all these persons, then a serious bungling has been made. The result is that we have a set of census statistics that are practically useless for the purpose of comparison and furnishing reliable information as to the progress of the country during the past decade.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the Minister in a position to inform us whether the statement made by the hon. member for North Simcoe was correct, that in making the census of 1881 no special allowance was made for the industrial establishments therein enumerated, but that on this occasion 15 cents for industrial establishments was allowed?

Mr. FOSTER. I would rather have the discussion on the census take place on an item that will come up afterwards in the Estimates, when I shall be prepared to give the hon. gentleman more information than I am able to do to-day. I have not had time to look into all the papers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no objection to that, only I would ask you to leave one or more items in the Supplementary Estimates for that purpose. I do not care which.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a census item in the succeeding Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To prevent further confusion I will ask you to take a note of certain points on which I desire further information. In the first place, as to this matter of payment; in the next place, I would like the hon. gentleman, for purposes of comparison, to bring down the list of industries for 1881, similar, for instance, to those mentioned in the question which my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Grieve) asked the other day—bring down the lists for 1881, that will give us some chance of making a comparison. I only ask for a few samples of them, and those that you gave the other day will do just as well as any—just give the corresponding list for 1881. If you do that, we can then consider what steps should be taken to prevent what I agree with my hon. friend in considering is likely to vitiate the value of these statistics.

Mr. FOSTER. In the meantime I wish to enter my protest, and have it on file, against the statements made by my hon. friend just now.

Mr. CHARLTON. I base these statements upon the returns presented by the Minister of Finance, and there can be no doubt about their correctness, I suppose.

Mr. MULLOCK. Would the hon. gentleman produce the census returns for 1881 in regard to some matters that I got an order for in 1891?

Mr. FOSTER. What was the order?

Mr. MULLOCK. I will get it and send it across. I want to make a comparison between 1881 and 1891.

Militia — Ammunition and Cartridge Factory at Quebec. . . . $30,000

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the Minister give us some information about this item?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The $30,000 is made up of the following items: material purchased in England for the cartridge factory, steel cylinder, $584; brass and strips and material, $3,000; pay of staff of factory from 1st December, 1892, to 1st June, 1893, estimated at $2,000 per month, $14,000; fuel, iron and machinery, $5,000—that makes up $23,000. Then there is also paid for ammunition for militia and artillery, 9,900 pounds of artillery powder, $1,485; fuses and artillery ammunition bought in England, $3,000, and the balance is made up of general supplies required for the next 12 months.

Mr. CHARLTON. Are all the cartridges used by the militia and the mounted police manufactured in this factory at Quebec?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The cartridges are all manufactured in this country.

Militia Stores$20,000

Mr. CHARLTON. What class of stores are being supplied?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). There were purchased in England, through the High Commissioner, from Her Majesty's Government, miscellaneous and ordnance stores to the value of $7,000; 200 sets of saddlery, $6,325; small-arm materials, being interchangeable parts of rifles, $1,000; waist-belts, $500; flags, $300; Metford rifles, $150, and other stores amounting in all to $15,260. There were purchased from contractors in Canada, militia stores, $1,500; military tents, $3,360; marquees, $1,640; 4,000 blankets, $4,400; accoutrements, $740; haversacks, $1,040; mess tins, $620; flags, $275; transport, $220, and one or two other items. These are the various items of supplies let by contract.

Mr. MULOCK. How does it occur that saddles, flags and belts were not ordered in Canada?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The 200 sets of saddlery were imported from England on the order of my predecessor, the late Minister. It is stated that the saddlery of that quality could not be obtained in this country. That is a matter into which I will inquire, and if the saddlery can be obtained here at a cheaper rate, I will give Canadian manufacturers the preference.

Mr. CHARLTON. Do the Ministers think it proper to place themselves as a Government in a different position from private citizens? If a private citizen finds it necessary to import goods, he has to pay duty, and the manufacturers in this country are thus protected. The manufacturers, however, do not obtain the benefit of protection if the Government does not pay duty upon its importations, or rather does not treat the matter on the same basis as if the goods were increased in cost by the amount of the duty the private citizen would be required to pay on the same article.

Mr. MULOCK. The explanation given by the Minister is that the saddlery, flags and belts were purchased by his predecessor. I have not that supreme confidence in the immaculate character of the hon. gentleman's predecessor in matters military to accept that as an entirely satisfactory explanation, and as one to justify the Government passing by all Canadian manufacturers. The present Minister gives as a reason for these importations that the manufacturers of Canada are not up to the standard and cannot do the work efficiently. That is not intended, I suppose, to be a wholesale allegation against the efficiency of Canadian manufacturers. But since the hon. gentleman does not really know what is the answer to this particular question, and as his adviser, the ex-Minister of Militia, is in his place, perhaps that hon. gentleman will favour the committee with the explanation.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The departmental explanation is the only one I can give, for I do not pretend to know the subject personally. The explanation is that a special kind of saddlery was required, which was not then made in the country, but which I hope will be manufactured here. When I give orders, I shall be able to give the fullest explanation with respect to them.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend has asked me to give some explanation, as the Minister has stated that the order for this purchase was given by his predecessor. The hon. gentleman forgets that, since my immaculate administration of the Department of Militia, two other Ministers have been at the head of the department. I have no manner of doubt that the compliment to that hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowell), the benefit of whose presence we had in this House, was justified. I can tell the hon. gentleman that in my time every saddle used by the militia was manufactured in Canada, except the models which I imported from England in order to have our saddles made here; and, as one having some little experience in saddles, I say that you can buy as perfect a saddle in Canada as you can import from Veith, who is reported to make the best saddles in the world. In my time orders were given to Canadians and the saddles were manufactured in Canada.

Mr. MULOCK. I am exceedingly glad that the present Postmaster-General has testified to the efficiency of Canadian saddles. It is unfortunate that his successor should have passed by the Canadian manufacturers and have gone to England. He had forgotten how we were called on to protect native industries, and, contrary to the policy of the Government, had paid out money even in the old land. The Ministers of Militia have changed so rapidly that it is a little difficult to refer to them. Therefore, I will call the last speaker Minister of Militia No. 1, and the one who was transferred to a higher sphere Minister No. 2, and the present Minister No. 3. We were told, when Minister No. 2 came into office, that he was going to go back on all the old records, that there had been unpopular things done, that Minister No. 1 was not up to the standard, and that there was a new man at the helm. Now, I understand why he has been removed from the helm. It is because he went back on Minister No. 1 and because he went back on our own manufacturers, and so he has escaped public opinion by being transferred to the other branch of our Legislature. The present Minister, No. 3, when asked about a certain thing, says he knows nothing about it, as it was done by Minister No. 1; but when we put Minister No. 1 on the witness stand, he says: "I know nothing about it, another fellow who has gone away from here has done the wrong." I think that the item should stand over until we get a real answer. In view of the testimony of the Postmaster-General, that the manufacturers of Canada could supply these things, we want to know why they were not purchased in Canada. So much for the saddles, but what about the flags? Cannot we raise any old flags in Canada? Have you got to import all of them from England?

Mr. FOSTER. They have been waved so vigorously that they are all worn out.

Mr. MULOCK. Where does the supply come from now?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). When the main Estimates come up, I will give all the information as to the reason which inspired Minister No. 2 to get these saddles from England.

Mr. MULOCK. I am inclined to do a good deed for my hon. friend, but I think we should know why he has not purchased the old flags in Canada? We have cotton industries here.

Mr. PRIOR. They are not made of cotton.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I will remember the point about the flag and give you the information.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not want to hit the Minister below the belt, but would he tell us why he went to England to buy the belts? Are they not made of leather, and are they not manufactured in Canada?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). We will put the belts with the flags.

Mr. CHARLTON. The item had better stand until we get the information. Minister No. 1 tells us that saddles can be purchased in Canada of better quality than elsewhere. The amount involved may be small, but it is a matter of principle to get the information. If we do not let this matter stand it will be forgotten when we reach the main Estimates.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Oh, no; I have taken a note of the matter and will bring it up myself.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the main Estimates come up there may be a fourth Minister of Militia.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I will leave the information to my successor.

Mr. McMULLEN. With regard to this matter of saddles, Minister of Militia No. 1 is willing to saddle himself with the responsibility of getting the saddles in Canada, and my hon. friend from York (Mr. Mulock) has saddled the second Minister of Militia with the responsibility of getting the saddles from the other side of the Atlantic, and after saddling him so forcibly with regard to that, he mounted him with regard to the flags.

Mr. MULOCK. I should like the Minister of Militia to tell us, when we come to the main Estimates, as to who are the present contractors for the supply of militia clothing. I want him to be prepared to pass a good examination on that point.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Very well.

Gratuity to Lieut.-Col. Alger... $1,200

Mr. CHARLTON. Would the Minister of Militia explain this item?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Col. Alger was a great many years in the public service. He is now upwards of 80 years of age, and on his retirement he was recommended for a gratuity equivalent to two years' pay.

Mr. MULOCK. I know Col. Alger very well, and I believe him to be well worthy of the recommendation.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish the Minister to explain the gratuity of $1,000 to Captain J. A. Martineau, Lévis Garrison Artillery, who received injuries by falling from his horse.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I will note the request and answer it.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the Minister of Militia decided on placing the various brigade and district officers on the same footing as other officers with regard to superannuation allowance?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That matter is under consideration.

Compensation Claims--Accidents and Injuries at Militia Drill... $1,500

Mr. CHARLTON. What is this for?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). One case is that of Capt. McKinnon, of No. 8 Company of the 50th Battalion, who lost his right arm by a rifle shot in 1878, while on active service in Montreal. He received some compensation, and it is recommended that he receive $500 more.

Mr. McMULLEN. This practice of going back and trumping up old claims has been taken exception to by the Opposition, and unless there are strong grounds and undoubted evidence in favour of this claim, I do not think we should quietly pass it over. If the man was entitled to compensation, he should have received it before, and if he is not entitled to it, it is the duty of this committee carefully to investigate the grounds on which he bases his claim. Before we pass the item I think the Minister should give the committee full details as to how the accident happened, the necessity of making this grant, and the reason for the delay.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The claim went before the proper board, was inquired into by the medical authorities, was recommended by the general in command, went through Council, and, as it is considered a meritorious claim, I would urge my hon. friend to let the item go through.

Mr. CHARLTON. Has it been under investigation for fifteen years?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). In 1880, $800 was voted by this House for this man, and this is an additional amount. I suppose that he is really disabled, and incapable of earning his living, and this further gratuity is given to him in consideration of the exceptional circumstances attending his misfortune.

Mr. MULLOCK. I think we have not yet got all the explanations that would warrant us in voting this money. We have certain rules laid down for compensation in these cases—so much for the loss of an eye, so much for the loss of an arm, so much for the loss of a leg, and so on. This may be a meritorious case, but it does seem extraordinary that, after voting $800 thirteen years ago, we should now be asked to vote another $500. I suppose that the case went before the Military Board, and that there is evidence and the finding of the Board. I think that these ought to be brought down before the item is passed. I sympathize with all persons who suffer in this service, but sympathy is one thing and the public money another.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). In view of the fact that we have no means of pensioning in cases of this kind, I hope the hon. gentleman will let the item pass, and I will bring down all the details. I can assure my hon. friend that this is a meritorious case. My information is that this man had his arm shot off when on active service in aid of the civil power in July, 1878.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was that on the 12th July of famous memory?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I cannot tell. That is the extent of my information. The other item is to pay $1,000 to the widow of Corporal R. Macdonald, of Prince Edward Island Garrison Artillery, who died from injuries received at drill in 1891. He was crushed by a gun, while acting in the discharge of his duties.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I do not object to this item, but I would like to know if this is a precedent which is to be applied in the cases of all who have been wounded or killed in the employ of the Government or on Government railways?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This is not a case of a man having been killed on Government railways. This man was a volunteer who came from Prince Edward Island to the Island of Orleans to compete at the annual competition. In the shifting of the gun, it fell on him, and he was killed on the spot. There has been no compensation granted to him, and his widow is entitled to compensation, as a matter of right.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is all right, but the other case is different. Seeing that com-penetration was previously granted, there is a possibility that there might be some irregularity in it, and we should have full explanations before we pass the vote.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I do not object at all to this vote, but I would like to know if it may be taken as a precedent, and if in the case of persons killed by accident while travelling on the Intercolonial Railway, after having paid their fares, the widows have not the same right to compensation? There are many cases of this kind pending against the Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has raised a very important point, but it is scarcely within the lines of this vote, that is, how far the Government are bound by contract to carry passengers, and whether in case of a breach of contract, they are liable for damages. Now, the hon. gentleman will remember that last year I called the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that the judge of the Exchequer Court had ruled that the Government were liable, and had given his ruling upon the changing of the statute since the case of McLeod and the Queen. The Minister of Justice did not concur in that decision, and he told me that the Government intended appealing the case to the Supreme Court; and I have been waiting patiently to learn the decision of the Supreme Court, because I am in the same position as my hon. friend. I know of many meritorious cases of passengers who were seriously injured, when travelling on the Government roads and compensation refused. To my mind, the refusal of the Government to acknowledge liability is indefensible. I know a good deal may be said about bogus claims, but it appears to me that when the Government undertakes to carry passengers and freight for money, it becomes a common carrier and is equally liable. If the Minister of Justice were here, I would press him very strongly for his opinion, one way or the other, as I have one or two most meritorious cases, which I desire to press as soon as a conclusion is reached.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The cases I referred to arose from the said accident on the Intercolonial Railway, in which a late lamented colleague was killed, Mr. Dessaint, as well as five or six others.

Mr. FOSTER. This is not the place to bring that matter up.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I quite admit that, but merely ask the leader of the House to call the attention of his colleagues to this matter, because I know it has already been brought to the notice of the Government by a petition. The action was dismissed before the Exchequer Court, but I was told to file a petition to the Government and that they would look into the matter.

Mr. CHARLTON. As the item under discussion is for compensation of claims, it might save time if the Government were to give their opinion now as to whether they hold themselves above the law which governs common carriers.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That question cannot be discussed on this item.

Mr. CHARLTON. With regard to this $1,000 vote, I am perfectly satisfied; but with reference to the $500 vote, as the accident occurred fifteen years ago and compensation has already been given, we ought to know all the circumstances before passing it. It is a matter of principle, although the sum involved be not large.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the usual allowance for the loss of an arm in the case of an officer holding the rank of captain?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I could not state from memory. There is a regular scale.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. colleague's proposition is a fair one. The item is a small one mixed up with others, and it is not convenient to have little items of this kind left standing over in the different estimates. The Minister will bring down the report in full, and the whole matter can be discussed when the item, which has been allowed to stand in the main Estimates, comes up.

Mr. CHARLTON. We are so liable to overlook these matters that it is much better to have them explained when the item is before us.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I will bring down the information on the item, which has been allowed to stand, on Tuesday, and will then give full details.

Costs of Litigation.....$10,000

Mr. FOSTER. I have a full statement of the different cases, but have not got it in my desk, and if the House will consent to pass the item I will bring down that statement to-night.

Mr. CHARLTON. Better let this item stand.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is a question of legal expenses amounting to a considerable sum, and we ought to know the details before passing the item. I am glad to know that, since we have a Solicitor-General, we are not likely to be troubled with items of this kind in future, for it is to be earnestly hoped that he will attend to this kind of thing, and that we will no longer have the first page of the Auditor-General's Report covered with a long list of legal expenses.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the Minister will promise to give us the details within three hours, we might let the item pass.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make no promise to furnish it within three hours. If the hon.

gentleman chooses to catechise and be domineering in that way, I will not bind myself to any such promise.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman had much better keep his temper. This item has been allowed to stand already, in order that we might have the information before passing it; and since we have not got that information, I ask that the conditions of the agreement be carried out, and that it be allowed to stand until the details are furnished. It is not unreasonable to suggest, as the hon. gentleman proposed to bring down the information this evening, to let the item stand until he does so. I do not want to be captious; I do not wish to impede the work of the committee; but I submit to the Minister, he should not take exception to a reasonable request such as this. The request was acceded to before and it is perfectly proper the item should be carried over now.

Mr. FOSTER. I have been some considerable time in Parliament, and I never heard an hon. member say that he would not allow an item to pass unless the Minister would give a categorical promise to bring down papers within three hours; I do not think it is courteous.

Mr. CHARLTON. I understood the Minister to say, in reply to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that he would bring these papers down after dinner. Understanding that to be the case, I suggested that, if the Minister was going to bring the information down, it would be better to allow the item to stand until the information was down.

Mr. FOSTER. No; the hon. gentleman said that if I would promise to bring the information down after dinner—

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister says he has been some considerable time in Parliament and never saw an item held over for particulars—

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman should not misrepresent me. I said I never had a gentleman make a demand of a categorical promise that papers should be brought down within three hours, or he would not allow an item to pass. This whole affair took place between the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and myself. The item stood because I had not then the information asked for by the hon. gentleman. I got the information from the Justice Department, and to-day asked that hon. gentleman if the item might pass, that I would bring the information down after dinner. I have it in my desk in the office. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to say that he would. If that is satisfactory to the hon. member for Queen's, I think other hon. gentlemen should be satisfied.

Mr. McMULLEN. Had the Minister in the first place stated that he had made such an arrangement with the hon. member for Queen's, in all probability the committee would have consented to that arrangement. I certainly have enough respect for my hon. friend to consent for my part. The hon. Minister must admit that, so far, the Opposition has treated the Government with great courtesy in the discussion of items in Committee of Supply. We have got along, so far, fairly well. I would venture, at the risk of not being thanked, to suggest that in order that we may close the session with that feeling, the hon. Minister should not allow his temper to overcome him. It is just as well to guard against anything of that kind.

Mr. FOSTER. I generally have it pretty well in hand.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; I am in this position: It was asserted by the Minister that I had dictated terms to him, that he was to bring this information down in three hours. He stated twice that he did propose to bring the information down after dinner. I suggested that as he was going to bring the information down in three hours, the item might as well stand until the papers were brought down. This item has stood for that information, and I propose that it shall stand until the information comes down. If the hon. Minister has the information to place before us after dinner, let it be brought down and in the meantime let the item stand.

Mr. CASEY. If, as the hon. Minister seems to indicate, the information has been ready for some time, he might have had it here this afternoon, and, no matter what arrangement was made with the hon. member for Queen's, it is more proper that the information should be given and the discussion take place before the item is passed than after. If the information is not brought down until after the item is passed, there will be no opportunity for discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. There is an item coming up after dinner on which you can discuss the whole thing—an item of $100,000, a much larger item than this, so hon. gentlemen can discuss it longer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A hundred thousand dollars for litigation?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I beg your pardon. I thought we were still on this militia business.

Mr. CASEY. Is there any other item of litigation on which this item can be discussed?

Mr. FOSTER. There will be in the main Estimates.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the Minister of Finance propose that we should vote the money and afterwards be told why we voted it?

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. CASEY. That is what it comes to.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not understand this bringing down of information four hours or four days after the money has been voted. When will the opportunity arise to discuss the wisdom of the expenditure, if we pass the item now?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My only interest in the matter was this: When the item came up I asked for particulars of this expenditure, and the hon. Minister said he would get it and, meantime, the item was allowed to stand. To-day he said he would bring the information down after dinner and I said I was satisfied. I see there is an item in the further supplementaries, an amount for damages in the case of Allen vs. Attwood. Perhaps it may be possible to discuss the whole thing on that item.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is just as possible to discuss the whole thing on this item, because the item was to stand until the information came down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, yeas and nays?

Mr. MULOCK. I am extremely anxious to meet the Minister of Finance, but, with all respect to him, I submit that he is inclined to be rather arbitrary with the committee. He is asking us to vote $10,000 for an item of litigation, an expenditure already incurred. If it was for something in the future, there might be a reason in the position he has taken, but as the expenditure is for something that has already happened, he must have the exact accounts, or very nearly the exact accounts, for it. I submit that the Minister of Finance is not adopting a very good plan to get on with public business. He may not have respect for the Opposition, but, before he drives us into opposition with regard to himself, I think he will be wise to reconsider his determination to say "carried." It is monstrous that he should ask the committee to carry an item of $10,000 without affording a word of explanation of what it is for. We would be derelict in our duty to vote it without information as to what this expenditure is for and who got the money. I appeal to him, and it is not our duty to appeal, it is our duty to point out in a respectful way what the Minister's duties are. It is not a sacrifice of dignity on his part to quietly and gracefully yield to a reasonable request and defer pressing this matter upon the consideration of the committee until he is prepared to advise the committee as to the details of this expenditure. Think for a moment what would be the result if the whole of the public business was transacted on these lines. You might as well ask for a vote of $36,000,000 and tell us: Give us the money and when it is too late for you to discuss it, we will tell you what we are going to do with it. I ask him whether he would not make better progress by yielding in a reasonable way as suggested and allow this item to stand?

Mr. FOSTER. I will consent to let it stand.

Customs Department—To provide for the payment of Mr. J. R. K. Bristol, private secretary to the Controller of Customs, from 8th December, 1892, to 30th June, 1893, the same being a revote of the balance of an appropriation for the same period to pay the private secretary to the Minister of Customs $338 71

Mr. McMULLEN. Is this private secretary supposed to accompany the Minister to various places when he addresses meetings, and hold demonstrations? Is he in the city just now, and has he been up to Orangeville lately?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot tell.

Mr. McMULLEN. What are the duties of this private secretary?

Mr. FOSTER. Exactly the same as the duties of a private secretary of the Minister of the Crown.

Department of Agriculture—To pay the following clerks their salaries from the 1st to 31st January, 1893, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act:—John Thomson, $50; R. E. Armstrong, $38.75; T. H. Morgan, $50; T. B. Bassett, $46.50 $185 25

Mr. FOSTER. These are clerks in the Department of Agriculture employed in the patent office, and now paid out of contingencies; this is for their salary for one month to supplement contingencies. They have been paid out of contingencies since then.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How comes it that you take it out of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. FOSTER. They have not passed the Civil Service examination, and are paid out of contingencies. They are engaged in different employments in the patent office.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the cause of so many extra clerks in the patent office?

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend has visited that office and looked into the returns, he will see that a vast deal of business is done there. It returns a revenue of some $60,000 a year. The number of patents issued every year is very large.

Mr. CASEY. I do not like to see this principle introduced of overriding the Civil Service Act. The Minister has explained that these clerks have not qualified themselves by passing the preliminary examination, and, therefore, they are paid out of contingencies. It is evident that clerks are being employed in contravention of the Act. Considering the immense number of young men and women who have passed the Civil Service examination, there is no need for this state of things at all. There are thousands of persons in the country qualified by having passed those examinations, for employment in that service, and it is introducing a vicious principle to pass over all these who have taken the trouble, and time, and expense to be examined, and to bring in those who have not passed examinations.

Mr. FOSTER. They have been there for some time, and have had experience.

Mr. CASEY. Then if they have been for a long time in the office without having passed the prescribed examination, it only makes the matter worse.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If they have been paid out of the contingencies from 31st January, what is to prevent their being paid for the time mentioned here?

Mr. FOSTER. The want of $185.25.

Amount required in consequence of the transfer of several clerks from specific votes to contingencies $2,000

Mr. FOSTER. In some of the services, for example, health statistics, the Year-book, and services of that kind, as in other departments, so in this vote, a vote has been given for the work, and then the clerks have been charged against the work. We have entirely done away with that system at the seat of Government, so that a vote is taken for that work, whatever it may be. Then for a public work, or whatever it is, there is just voted what is sufficient for that work, so that clerks are not charged against it. It is by far the best system.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Am I to understand that the system of having clerks at the works is practically at an end?

Mr. FOSTER. Not clerks of works in the technical sense. For instance, take the Public Works Department for illustration. We vote, say, $40,000 for a public building somewhere. The system heretofore has been that all the extra clerks which were employed in the Public Works Department in Ottawa were paid out of those different works. It was the practice to pay the work done by a clerk with reference to certain work, out of the appropriation for that work. Any one can see that that could only be got at in a very rough way, and it might be only a payment for the clerks that were required here for the different works, appropriating a sum to one work and a sum to another. That method we decided to change. This is the principle we are pursuing in all the departments.

Further amount required for printing, paper and binding... $75,000

Mr. CHARLTON. I should like some explanation in regard to this item. Has this work been performed in the Printing Bureau?

Mr. SPEAKER. The work is performed at the printing establishment and the paper supplied from the Printing Bureau. I may say, with respect to this large sum now asked, $75,000, that it is accounted for in this way: The custom has been, for a number of years, to take a vote of $70,000 each year. Some years ago, that vote was sufficient to pay the whole of the expenses connected with the printing of Parliament, but within the last three or four years, and notably since the House has ordered such large numbers or editions of the Dairy and Experimental Farm Reports, the amount has not been anything like sufficient. For instance, for the year ending 30th June, 1892, a vote of $70,000 was taken in the main Estimates, and a vote was also taken in the Supplementary Estimates for $35,000, making $105,000 in all. There was a balance from the year ending 30th June, 1892, of $26,000, which was paid out of the vote for this year, 1892-93, thereby reducing the amount available for this year's service, as voted last session, to $44,000. With the large expenditure, as I have already stated, in connection with the Experimental Farm and Dairy Reports, it has been found that an additional sum of $75,000 will be required for this year's service.

Mr. CHARLTON. So it makes the estimated expenditure, in round numbers, $120,000.

Mr. SPEAKER. $119,000, as against $131,000 last year.

Mr. CHARLTON. About how many copies of the Dairy Report were printed altogether?

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not the information with regard to the number of copies printed; but the information I have is, that the cost of the Farm and Dairy Reports ordered during the session of 1891 was $24,214, of which $19,340 was for paper, and the balance for composition and press-work; and the reports ordered last year cost over $8,000, of which $5,800 was for paper.

Mr. CHARLTON. No doubt that is a very valuable report, but there appear to be irregularities as regards its distribution. I received no less than sixteen bags.

Mr. FOSTER. Did you use them?

Mr. CHARLTON. I sent them all around.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may say, with respect to the distribution of these reports, last year, at all events, I do not know what system was adopted previously, that each member of the House was asked to indicate how many copies of the Dairy Report and Experimental Farm Report he required. I have heard some hon. gentlemen say, during previous discussions, that they had not received any copies of the reports. The reason was that they did not ask for any copies, for the number asked for by each member was distributed, as I am informed by the Queen's Printer.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. CHARLTON. If there was a surplus, they were not sent along "pro rata." I made a pretty liberal requisition, and I received the copies asked for, and more, too.

Mr. SPROULE. The department appears to have been more liberal to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) than to some other hon. members. I believe the explanation is this: that, owing to the fact that some members asked for very large supplies, the Printing Committee decided to cut down the number from 300,000 to 100,000, and distribute them on the same principle as was adopted in other years. It afterwards turned out that some members did not get any copies, and yet it is stated that the distribution was made on the same principle as other distributions were made in that branch of the service. As the number was reduced from 300,000 to 100,000, of course each member received a reduced supply of copies.

Mr. McMILLAN. I received copies of the Dairy Report, but my copies of the Farm Report only reached me the day before I left home for Ottawa. I left four bags of them at home. These copies should be either distributed earlier, or allowed to remain at Ottawa and be distributed to members here.

Mr. SPEAKER. Unless a very much larger staff is employed at the Printing Bureau it would be impossible, so the Superintendent of Printing informs me, to have these reports distributed at an earlier date.

Mr. SPROULE. The recommendation of the committee was that, in the event of the report not being issued early in the season, it would be better they should be kept until members reached Ottawa, when they could be distributed to them here. Unfortunately that recommendation was either forgotten or neglected.

Mr. CASEY. It is better, I think, to speak plainly in regard to these reports. The Dairy Report is a good and useful one, but, after having gone carefully through the Report of the Experimental Farm, I am of the opinion that it is not worth the money it costs to print, and the trouble taken with distributing it. I do not find much information in that report that is useful to the average farmer of Ontario, no more than can be obtained in two or three copies of an agricultural journal. No doubt there is a good deal of matter respecting new kinds of wheat suitable for Manitoba and the North-west; but, according to the latest investigations, it appears that some of the new wheats have been false and misleading lights, like the two-rowed barley. In fact, there is a great deal of matter respecting two-rowed barley and Ladoga wheat, but neither has proved successful, the climate being very different to what it is here. The issue of these reports appears to be intended more to furnish members with a means of doing the polite thing to their constituents than to serve any practical purpose. The experiments have been conducted in a climate limited to a small area, for twenty or thirty miles outside this city. Moreover, those experiments are carried on at a farm where there is not the typical soil of the province, but a very poor soil, from which no practical farmer could make a living. For these two reasons: first, on account of climate, and, second, on account of the nature of the soil in which the experiments have been made, and on account of the arbitrary manner in which they were conducted, very little value can be attached to the report. It will also be remembered that many of the experiments were conducted on small plots of ground, covering only a few feet, and results were deduced from those experiments. Such experiments, however, do not fairly test any kind of grain or vegetable. A great deal has been spent on that farm in fancy landscape gardening, as well as in those little garden plot trials of grain, which are of very little value. For that reason I think that not much good has resulted from the distribution. Then, in regard to the part of this item which refers to the Printing Bureau, I have an inquiry to make. It will be remembered that two years ago, when looking into the affairs of that Bureau, it was shown that the transactions with regard to the purchase of paper were of a very peculiar character. That one bargain in connection with that had fallen through, because the New England Paper Company could not, or did not, supply the kind of paper that could be used, but that immediately after arrangements were made with a firm in Montreal, and another firm near Toronto, for the supply of paper, that these firms had been large contributors to election funds, that they got very large orders without tenders, and so forth. I wish to ask the Minister in charge, on what system the paper for which this money is required has been bought? Has it been bought by tender, or has it been purchased at the discretion of the Queen's Printer, or of the Minister; what prices are being paid for it, compared with other years, and all such particulars as will suffice to give us a knowledge of how this money has been spent?

Mr. COSTIGAN. My understanding is that the paper used in the Bureau is purchased by contract.

Mr. CASEY. Since when?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I cannot say exactly since when, but I will get the information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CASEY. I want to know whether this contract was made by public tender, or whether it was ordered at the discretion of the Government?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have not the information just now, but I will obtain it.

Completion of Census.....$13,500

Mr. CHARLTON. How much is the cost of this census to be altogether?

Mr. FOSTER. About $500,000.

Mr. CASEY. How does that compare with the last census?

Mr. FOSTER. That sum, I am told, is less than the census expenditure in 1871, but a little over the census expenditure of 1881.

Mr. CHARLTON. Could the Minister give us the exact figures for each of these decades?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the information just now, but I will get it.

Mr. CASEY. There are a number of questions in regard to industries in various towns and villages on the Order Paper. These questions may not be reached, and I would suggest that the information relating to them should be brought down in the form of a return, and published during the session.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there will be no difficulty in getting the information before the House closes.

Mr. MULOCK. When will all the bulletins in connection with the census be in the hands of the public?

Mr. FOSTER. In about three months.

Mr. MULOCK. Would it not be possible by putting on a larger force, to get the returns out sooner?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it could be economically done any more rapidly. There is also the printing department to be considered, as well as the census department.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think we can let this vote pass without making a few remarks on the nature of the information already given by the Minister as to the so-called industries in the different towns and villages.

Mr. FOSTER. Probably my hon. friend was not here, when we had a conversation across the floor this afternoon, the purport of which was that we should have a general discussion on this matter at some time when I have all the papers with me.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I might explain to my hon. friend that there was an item somewhat similar to this, and a request was made to the Minister for complete information, which he promised to bring down and discuss when a reserved item in the main Estimates is reached. If there are any points my hon. friend specially wants to have information on, he had better add it to this now.

Mr. CASEY. I was not asking the Minister for information. I wish to make some remarks on the information we have already got. All that has been said about the peculiar manner of enumerating the industries of the country and of making capital out of them, has, to my mind, been amply justified by the information already laid before us. When people speak of industrial establishments in ordinary, common-sense language, they mean factories employing some considerable number of hands. For instance, a foundry and a place where cabinetware is made in large quantities, are looked upon as industrial establishments. With all due respect to the Minister's personal aversion to such things, even a brewery or a distillery may be looked upon as an industrial establishment. But when it comes down to speaking of a photograph shop, a millinery shop, a blacksmith's shop, or a cobbler's shop, where one man does all the work, as an industrial establishment and a proof of the success of the National Policy, the whole thing becomes so ridiculous that the usefulness of this report is utterly destroyed. The list which has been read includes a number of such cases. One of them was a cider press, which is hardly an industry. Many farmers have a cider press to squeeze and crush apples for their neighbours, and each of these has an equal right to be called an industry. If the hon. gentleman goes to the back districts of Quebec or Ontario, he will find cases where all the woollen and linen goods for the family are woven and spun; and each of these is as well entitled to be ranked as an industry as many of those that have been included in the roll given to the House during the last day or two. An Indian who makes boxes or axe-handles has the same right to be ranked as an industrial establishment. I do not know whether it is fair to charge all this to the slight bonus offered to the enumerators, and to say, as the newspapers have been saying, that these are fifteen-cent industries. I think the enumerators must have had directions from the Government, apart from the small temptation offered in their terms of agreement, to count every establishment where anything was made, as an industrial institution. For these reasons, I think it is not fair to let this item pass without saying that the census, so far as it relates to the industrial products of the country, has of late become a matter of ridicule, and nothing else.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose the item in the main Estimates will give ample scope for a discussion on quarantine?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes.

Quarantine and Public Health...$15,200

Mr. FOSTER. There was an expenditure of $9,000, in consequence of additional pressure put upon the several quarantine stations last year, including $2,000 for medical advisory assistance in the department. Then, there is $3,200 for a steamer which was bought at Victoria for quarantine purposes.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it would be advisable for the Minister to inform the House as to what precautions the Government are taking to prevent any contagious diseases finding their way into Canada during the approaching spring and summer, with more particular reference to cholera.

Mr. FOSTER. All the ordinary precautions which are taken by any country upon the threatened approach of cholera, have been, and are now being taken by the Government. These precautions consist, in the first place, of organizing regular quarantine ports at available points on the coast, both east and west. Of course, it will be impossible to have every port equipped for taking care of cholera patients. It will be necessary for all infected vessels to go to the ports where there are regularly equipped stations. Vessels which are not infected may go to any port, and the customs authorities there, with the medical advisory authorities, will see that all vessels are inspected. The principal ports are at Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Grosse Isle and Albert Head, the new station which is being fitted up in British Columbia. Everything that science has suggested up to the present, for the destruction of cholera germs and the fumigation and cleansing of vessels, and every reasonable means of caring for passengers who are not infected, together with hospital accommodation for passengers who may be infected with disease, have been taken advantage of. These hospitals, of course, whilst being well equipped, are built on but a reasonable scale, as it would not be advisable to have hospitals which would provide for infected passengers to the number of all the passengers who might come into the country. We hope that we will have none infected, and we certainly do not think that we will have a very large proportion. If the disease were to spread and become very virulent, and a large number of the passengers should be infected, of course, extraordinary measures would have to be taken. Then there are a second order of ports, such as Sydney, C.B., Charlottetown, P.E.I., and Chatham, on the Gulf coast, where, although there are not all these large equipments, there is yet what is considered necessary for taking sufficient care of those ports. These are, briefly, the preparations that have been and are now being made. I might say as well that Dr. Montizambert is in charge, as heretofore, of the St. Lawrence station, which is the most important one we have. It is also intended by the department to have a medical adviser and inspector, who shall travel, if necessary, to the different ports and see that the conditions there are in perfect order.

Mr. CASEY. What arrangements are made with regard to railway travel? Cholera is just as apt to be imported by rail as in any other way.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a matter which it is largely the province of the provincial authorities to attend to. The arrangements made there are those which take place when cholera is actually within or approaching the country. They would have to place sanitary officers at each port or place of entry to inspect every train. A sanitary conference was held between the Dominion authorities and the different provinces, at which these matters were discussed, and measures taken for co-operation in every way to prevent the spread of cholera, should it approach our coast. Of course, on the United States border, from which our railway travel comes, we have the advantage of having the assistance of the United States. The United States authorities are making elaborate preparations for a patrolling quarantine along their coasts, so that they provide a fence for us on that side. Unless cholera breaks through that guard and gets into the cities of the United States we are safe on that side, and as far as possible we protect our own coast by the means I have mentioned.

Mr. CASEY. It is too much to ask that the quarantine will be absolutely effective. If a vessel imports cholera, no doubt it will get into some port in the United States. There might be cholera in the West India Islands from which it might be imported into the United States. As regards the inspection, I do not think that is much of a preventive, because the parties infected might be landed in Canada and be there some time before the disease showed itself. It is quite possible a man might become infected in New York and be landed in Canada before the disease developed itself. Then can the hon. gentleman tell us anything with regard to the inspection of clothing? Even if the inspector found a case of cholera on the train, he would be helpless to deal with it in that respect. At the different points where railways cross the border there ought to be facilities for isolating the patients and disinfecting their clothes. If cholera reaches Canada, it will be in this way it will come. The hon. gentleman does not seem to be prepared with details to-day. An official statement of all the precautions taken published broadcast throughout the country would do a great deal to reassure the public mind.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman was good enough to make some general observations in reply to my inquiry. Has he adopted the recommendations of the medical officers who met at the conference?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know to what extent they were adopted.

Mr. MULOCK. Does he know what they recommended?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not.

Mr. MULOCK. How does he know that the department has adopted proper precautions?

Mr. FOSTER. I know it has.

Mr. MULOCK. On whose advice does he say the precautions adopted are sufficient?

Mr. FOSTER. Dr. Montizambert is, I suppose, recognized as an authority, and he is one of our chief men in the quarantine service. The Deputy Minister informs me that he adopted what these experts considered necessary to protect the country.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Grosse Isle is in my county, and Dr. Montizambert told me last summer that he had frequently made application to the Government for what he thought necessary, and the Government always refused to take the precautions he advised. He complained bitterly against the conduct of the Department of Agriculture in not following his instructions. I met him last fall at Montmagny at the closing of navigation, and he said he was very sorry the Government had not taken his advice. While I am on my feet, I would like to ask the hon. Minister the reason why the $20,000 voted last session for repairs and maintenance at Grosse Isle were not spent? I wrote to the Department of Public Works about the 10th July last, asking information. I wanted to know whether they were going to do the work, and, if so, whether they were giving out the work by tender. There were many carpenters in my riding who were thinking of going to the States or elsewhere to get work, but they thought that if this work was to be done, they might as well stay and find work at home. I received a letter signed by D. A. Macpherson, stating: (1) that the work was going to be begun during the month of July, (2) a certain part of the work was to be done by day work, and the balance by contract, (3) the works would be under the control of an officer of the department, and (4) the Government would employ men from the county so far as they could be found. I published this letter, this official letter, and many carpenters spent nearly the whole of July and August waiting for the work to be begun, thus losing nearly half the summer. I think they have good ground for complaint, and I think I have a right to ask why the work was not done, and why this $20,000, appropriated for the benefit of the public, which might have benefited also the working classes of the neighbourhood, was not spent.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman labours under a mistake; this work does not belong to the county of Montmagny more than to the whole Dominion, and to Bellechase and L'Islet, which are in the neighbourhood. These have as much right to the patronage as the constituency of my hon. friend.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I have no objection to that at all.

It being six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I desire, with the permission of the House to present a petition for leave to present a petition for an Act to amend an Act "To incorporate Les Dames Religieuses du Sacré Cœur de Jésus."

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid this is unusual.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I desire to move that this petition—

Mr. SPEAKER. These motions may be made, of course, by unanimous consent. There is no doubt about that. But my view is that it is better to keep within the rules unless there is special reason for the contrary.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Of course, I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to go contrary to your ruling in any way. But I understand that it is important, the company deem it important, that this should come before the House if it be possible, and it is upon these grounds that I ask this indulgence of the House. If I can bring the matter forward now, it will save three or four days.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that we are in Supply, except for the Order of Private Bills. If it is desired to make this motion during the present sitting, it might be well to defer it until the Committee of Supply rises. That will not delay the proceedings in any way.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 98) to amend the Act to incorporate the Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company (Limited).—(Mr. Stairs.)

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MULOCK. At six o'clock I requested the Minister, if he deemed it necessary, to have present such officers as might be necessary in order to answer certain questions. I suppose he has either the information himself, or he has the officers here. I now desire to obtain some more specific information as to what has really been done. The Minister, before dinner, gave the committee in his usual way some very general statements in regard to the perfection of the quarantine arrangements. The condition is, doubtless, as he says, but I should like to ask him a few questions. First, has any officer been appointed to inspect any or all of the quarantine stations in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I think arrangements have been made for the appointment of a general officer, whose duty will be to inspect all the quarantines and see that they are in perfect order in regard to their sanitary and scientific arrangements.

Mr. MULOCK. Has that appointment been made?

Mr. FOSTER. If it has not been actually made, I think it has virtually been made.

Mr. MULOCK. This is a medical officer to be on duty during the season?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, to be at headquarters to advise the department and to be sent wherever necessary.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman describe the details of all the quarantine arrangements?

Mr. OUMET. We have provided for three steam disinfectors, which are to be completed and in position before the last of this month. A contract has been entered into to that effect with Messrs. Carrière & Lainé, of Lévis. The foundation for these has been laid in cement, and concrete. All the machines have been placed in position, with the exception of one, which, I think, was taken from Lévis to the Island yesterday. There is one boiler for each disinfectant. Everything will be in readiness before the end of this month. The disinfection of ships has also been provided for, by means of the sulphur blast and the dioxide blast; both systems are to be used. This apparatus will be placed on a tug, and will also be ready before the end of the month. Then, we are providing an apparatus to boil water, (a condenser), in order to have a full and wholesome supply of drinking water for the people who may have to make a stay on Grosse Isle during the summer. We have repaired, cleansed and put into first-rate order all the present buildings, and our men are there now erecting other suitable buildings for the suspects, and also for first-class saloon passengers who may be detained by reason of cases of cholera being found on board the ships on which they may have come over. An apparatus was shipped last week, for the purpose of sinking an artesian well: so that we expect to have the purest water possible.

Mr. LANGELIER. What provision has been made for the landing of passengers? I understand that the Government do not intend to have built this year the wharf which has been suggested. At present, as the hon. Minister must be aware, it is very difficult to land passengers at Grosse Isle.

Mr. OUMET. We shall have two large boats at the disposal of the director of the quarantine, to be used for the purpose of landing passengers. I think we have now the "Challenger," and we shall have the "Druid," and, if necessary, we shall have another boat. We shall have ample means of landing passengers, either sick or in health.

Mr. MULLOCK. I have been told—I know nothing about it myself, as I am not a scientist—that it is idle to expect to obtain pure water at Grosse Isle by boring, owing to the formation being Laurentian.

Mr. OUMET. I am not sure that we shall get pure water; we have to make the trial. But in case we should not, we have provided the means of getting pure water by way of a large condenser.

Mr. MULLOCK. How does the hon. gentleman propose to disinfect the ships in rough weather?

Mr. OUMET. I think they cannot be disinfected in rough weather. But, if the ships have to wait for a few hours, they will not be any worse off than they would be, if we had a wharf, because it is the opinion of the pilots that in rough weather the ships could not reach the wharf. The channel to the Islands is very difficult, so that, in case of accident or mistake, the ships would be in danger of getting stranded. These are the principal reasons why the Government have not thought it well to incur the expenditure necessary for building a wharf. It is not because we have been afraid of the expenditure, because, if it had been advisable, it would have been done.

Mr. MULLOCK. I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the report of Dr. Montizambert, who, I understand, has been in the service of the Government at Grosse Isle for the last twenty years, and who is, probably, quite as familiar with the navigation of the channel, and, perhaps, quite as good an authority on this subject as anybody else, even the pilots. Dr. Montizambert has, over and over again, advised the construction of a wharf. The hon. gentleman says that in rough weather he is going to land the passengers without a wharf. He may not be able to accomplish it. The disinfecting appliance is placed on board a vessel and brought alongside the ship to be disinfected, so that the process of disinfection cannot take place in rough weather. Therefore, without a wharf, a cholera ship may be lying off in rough weather and not be able to land her passengers. The hon. gentleman will see how important it is to have a wharf, even from a humanitarian stand-point alone. How is the hon. gentleman going to land his passengers in rough weather?

Mr. OUMET. In rough weather a large boat will take the passengers and land them at the wharf.

Mr. MULLOCK. Where experts differ, I am not able to express an opinion, but if cholera should come, time will tell whether Dr. Montizambert or the Minister is right. I do attach a great deal of weight, indeed, to the professional opinion of a gentleman of Dr. Montizambert's standing and experience, who has been so many years stationed at the point in question. Besides, the report he has made has been endorsed by the highest medical authority in the country. The last time the Canadian Medical Council met in Ottawa, there were present medical gentlemen of high standing from all parts of the Dominion, with the exception of Nova Scotia, and they unanimously endorsed Dr. Montizambert's recommendation. The predecessor of the hon. gentleman, Mr. Carling, said at that meeting that the Government were fully alive to the importance of the subject, and that everything necessary would be done before spring. With regard to the deep water wharf, he said that it would be built, and that if the channel were not of sufficient depth for vessels drawing twenty-five feet, that would be remedied. He added that although Dr. Bergin said the cost would be $200,000, the chief engineer of Public Works estimated it at $100,000. In reply to this, Dr. Bergin said that they might add 50 per cent to that estimate. Mr. Carling proceeded to say that if it was necessary to have more steamers, they could be got by telegraphing for them, and that the question of expense would not be allowed to stand in the way. The wharf would be commenced almost immediately at Grosse Isle or at a new station, if it was found necessary to make the change. Special steps were also being taken for protection at Albert Head, B.C., at Halifax, St. John's and other points, all of which points would be well supplied with steam disinfectors. For some reason, however, the present Minister has overruled and disregarded that pledge.

Mr. OUIMET. I did not disregard the suggestion, because I have every respect for Mr. Carling's opinion.

Mr. MULOCK. You are not going to carry out that pledge and have taken serious responsibility in not doing so. How is the hon. gentleman to disinfect the vessels?

Mr. OUIMET. During last season, in the port of New York, over 5,000 ships were disinfected out in the harbour.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman knows that New York is a land-locked harbour, where a vessel can run into shelter in any weather, no matter what way the wind may be blowing.

Mr. OUIMET. I may say that ship-owners, who will be the principal losers by any delay in the landing of passengers, sent a delegation to the Government, which distinctly stated that it would be quite useless to build that wharf as the vessels could not get to it.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. They do not know the place if they say that.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman say what accommodations are provided for the suspects and the sick when landed?

Mr. OUIMET. We have a hospital for the sick, we have a building for the convalescents, we have a building for the suspects, and we are now building what the medical assembly required, and that is better accommodation for the first and second-class passengers. In fact we are doing everything these gentlemen asked for, with the exception of building the wharf. We did not object to building that on the ground of expenditure. We have done everything that could be done under the circumstances. I would suggest one thing—that, if there are people who are more responsible than others before the public, they are those who create unnecessary fear by repeating everything that is said that will lead the people to believe that we are not prepared to receive cholera if, unfortunately, it should come. We are ready to receive it, and I think we will successfully cope with it. I hope that if it comes into the St. Lawrence it will never pass Grosse Isle.

Mr. MULOCK. I hope the Minister's prophecy will be fulfilled, but the best way to allay the fears of the people is to let them know that the necessary steps are being taken, and if any questions are successful in eliciting that information, they will have accomplished great good. Now, will the hon. Minister be good enough to say—still referring to the harbour of Quebec—what provision is made for taking care of the passengers who are not suspects and not sick? I presume they will be allowed to land at some point?

Mr. OUIMET. Who are these people?

Mr. MULOCK. Suppose a ship comes in with a clean bill of health and is allowed to pass quarantine. She comes towards the city of Quebec. There are some passengers who do not intend to remain in Canada, but are going to the United States. I understand that, according to the United States regulations, such passengers will not be allowed to pass from Canada into the United States unless it can be shown that they and their effects have been disinfected before being allowed to land, and that being the case, that the officers have recommended to the department to provide another landing station, say at the Louise Embankment or some other convenient point at Quebec City, and to have the necessary apparatus in order to disinfect the effects of those supposed to be in a sound state. If you do not do that, these people will be quarantined in Canada for whatever time the United States require. Is any provision made for these cases?

Mr. OUIMET. One of the great difficulties we meet in treating this question of quarantine is the conflicting powers of this Government and of the local and municipal governments. Last year, for instance, a ship coming in had her clearance at Grosse Isle and was stopped by the medical authorities at the harbour at Quebec. We had no right to interfere, because, after ships received their clearance from the quarantine station which is under our jurisdiction we have nothing more to do with them. If the municipal authorities or the provincial authorities take upon themselves to add any precautions to those we have already taken at Grosse Isle, we have nothing to do with that; we have no jurisdiction. The same ship of which I speak was afterwards, I think, stopped at the port of Montreal. We could not interfere and we did not. Every municipality has the right, I am sure, to protect itself when it has what it considers good reason to be afraid of being infected, and it is within their power to stop any one coming within the limits of the municipality. The steamship companies have some responsibility also, because, after all, these companies, when they sell through tickets from Liverpool, say, to St. Paul, are under obligation to take care of the passengers who have paid them for their transportation. I am sure every case will be treated with the greatest liberality on the part of every one in order to assist these poor people who may be detained, but in such cases as I speak of, we have no jurisdiction.

Mr. MULOCK. If the hon. gentleman has no jurisdiction, I want to attach no responsibility; far from it. But I submit it is part of his duty, having to do with quarantine and with the general health, to put himself in communication with local authorities in order that, between the two conflicting powers, the general public may not suffer. I think it would be well for him to do that, and surely he would win the gratitude of the people. I assume that up to the present time, so far as this Government is concerned, there is no provision for dealing with the class of cases I have referred to.

Mr. OUIMET. Arrangements are being made at the Louise Embankment to take care of these people.

Mr. MULOCK. Made by the province?

Mr. OUIMET. No, by this Government.

Mr. MULOCK. Why, they have no jurisdiction.

Mr. OUIMET. As I said in the beginning, it is a very difficult question to solve, and the Provincial Governments, not later than three or four weeks ago, sent delegates to consult with this Government and settle this question of jurisdiction. But, I think, they had only one way of settling it, and that was to place upon the shoulders of this Government the whole expense and responsibility. I desire to say further, so that the public may not be misled by what the hon. gentleman is saying, that the responsibility for quarantine does not rest with my department, and if I make statements which are in some degree inaccurate or incomplete, I do not want the public to believe that the hon. Minister of Agriculture is responsible for them. My department is only responsible for carrying out the plans that are sent to us by the Department of Agriculture. If they want a building, we build it; if they want anything in the shape of disinfectors, we supply them. But we have no responsibility as to the policy of quarantine.

Mr. MULOCK. The Government as a whole is responsible.

Mr. OUIMET. We are willing to face the responsibility.

Mr. MULOCK. The Government as a whole is responsible and, if the public service is not covered wholly by one department, the Government should see that some other department supply the hiatus. I am not going to try to find out which department is responsible; I asked the Government as a whole what provision was being made at Quebec to deal with the class of cases to which I refer. The Minister told us nothing; he said they had no responsibility. Now he tells me they are doing something by a reasonable arrangement made with the province of Quebec under which the whole responsibility is cast on the Dominion and therefore they are at work. That being the case,

I ask what precautions are being taken at Quebec?

Mr. OUIMET. I understand that a disinfecter will be placed there.

Mr. MULOCK. Is it built, or in process of building for the class in question?

Mr. OUIMET. I do not know.

Mr. MULOCK. I am told that these matters are most material for a proper system of quarantine, and if any pressure is necessary on the part of the public to force the Administration to do these things, I want to assist on putting that pressure on the Government. I therefore want the Minister to tell the House and the country, if there is provision being made for the disinfecter at the landing point in Quebec. I am told by the medical authorities that that is a most necessary requirement for quarantine. Now I will go to Halifax.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me a word before he goes to Halifax?

Mr. MULOCK. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is founding his remarks on the report of Dr. Montizambert, and I have before me that report. He may be perfectly satisfied that everything Dr. Montizambert has recommended will be carried out, so far as medical equipment is concerned. I find in that report, dated 31st of August, 1892, that Dr. Montizambert recommends fifteen different things. The first requirement is a deep water wharf. That wharf has been recommended by Dr. Montizambert on several occasions from year to year. It has not been built this year, and the Government takes the responsibility of not building it for these reasons: In the first place, it cannot be built to be available this year, and in the second place, if it were built, it would be of no avail for steamers in rough weather, as was the unanimous testimony of the steamship owners who have visited the Government. The second thing he recommended was putting a second steamer on, as a supply, disinfecting and inspecting boat. That has been provided for. The third recommendation has reference to accommodation for cabin passengers. That is being provided and will be ready when the season of navigation opens.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To what extent will that accommodation go?

Mr. FOSTER. It will go to a reasonable extent. The accommodation for cabin passengers is furnished for somewhere between 200 and 500. The third recommendation is: "Accommodation for intermediate passengers." They have buildings there which will be sufficient for about 2,000, and these buildings will be ready for the opening of navigation. The fifth recommendation is: "An adequate water supply for drinking purposes from artesian wells or by condensing and aerating for drinking purposes." The Minister of Public Works has explained what has been done in that regard in the way of sinking wells and providing condensers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the department satisfied that there is any reasonable probability of obtaining the water by the artesian system?

Mr. FOSTER. They cannot discover that except by experiment, and that is being tried now. Suppose they cannot get water by artesian wells, they must get it in some other way, and they have provided for that by condensation. The 6th recommendation of Dr. Montizambert is: "An adequate water supply for washing, and similar purposes, with a reservoir on the hill with pumps and pipes." That is being provided. The 7th recommendation is: "Completion of steam disinfecting appliances; by the early connection and testing of all three chambers; the fitting up of rain baths; of mercuric chloride tanks; of electric contact thermometers with gongs, and automatic registering dials; the providing of baggage wagons to run to and from the end of the pier; and of galvanized iron wire trunks (with lock and key) to fit into racks on trucks, to prevent mixing of clothing of passengers." As there is no such pier, the arrangements recommended are being made from the pier there at present. The 8th recommendation is: "The providing the steamer "Challenger" with incandescent electric lights, to be charged from her own dynamo. This will save expenditure for coal oil, and greatly obviate the present constant risk of fire." That was not considered necessary, but that is a trivial thing in itself. The 9th recommendation is: "Galvanized iron berths, to replace wooden ones in all the passenger buildings." These are contracted for, and are being made. The 10th recommendation is: "Completion of bath and closet building as per list of 1st September, 1891. That is being carried out. The 11th recommendation is: "Fitting stronger pumps to this building, or in some way increasing the water supply to it, so that the water may come into the tanks as rapidly, at least, as the use of the baths and closets by immigrants takes it out." That is being attended to. The 12th recommendation is: "Completion of bacteriological laboratory by the necessary appliances, as detailed in my official letter and list dated 18th October." That is also being carried out. The 13th recommendation is: "The opening of a telegraph office in the western division for the convenience of vessels and passengers. The present office is in the central division, the most convenient place, as a rule. But a branch office at the wharf, to be attended by the operator whilst a passenger vessel is in quarantine, would be a great convenience. Estimated expense, one instrument, three-quarters of a mile of wire, no poles." That has not been considered necessary, and has not been done. The 14th recommendation is for three more telephones, and that is provided. The 15th recommendation says: "If it be decided"—it shows that Dr. Montizambert must have had some opinion of reserve as to that—"to disinfect luggage and clothing from healthy vessels, some other locality than the quarantine station, which is constantly liable to become infected, would need to be selected and fitted out for that purpose. Arrangements are being made to carry out that. The Dominion Government has a building on the Louise Embankment, and it is proposed to fit that up, and the luggage and clothing from the healthy vessels and passengers will be landed there. So that, on the hon. gentleman's own statement, that we ought to try to do everything that Dr. Montizambert urges, almost all that he has recommended has been, or is now being carried out, with the exception of the deep-water wharf. I think that is a very satisfactory showing for the department.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, a very satisfactory statement. I only wish that it was confirmed by the medical officer. I presume that the hon. gentleman is making his statement on the evidence, probably, of carpenters and people of that kind. This matter is too important to be passed over with glib words, and it is the duty of the Government to send a proper medical expert to examine and to advise on all these matters, and to see that they are being carried out in a scientific way.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought you were satisfied with Dr. Montizambert.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman state that the work has been done, on the authority of Dr. Montizambert?

Mr. FOSTER. I make the statement on an authority which the hon. gentleman ought to take. The department is carrying out the request of Dr. Montizambert, and it is only befogging the issue with words for the hon. gentleman to say that he will not accept this testimony, unless a medical man comes here and states it.

Mr. MULOCK. I say again, that the Minister has no expert evidence to warrant him in making the statement he has now made. If he has, let him say so.

Mr. FOSTER. I have the evidence of the officers of the department who are carrying out this work.

Mr. MULOCK. I hope they are.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not admit it unless you have evidence to the contrary?

Mr. MULOCK. Because the hon. gentleman before dinner made general statements that everything was satisfactory, but now I find his specific statements are inconsistent with that general statement.

Mr. FOSTER. What have you found unsatisfactory ?

Mr. MULOCK. You have not carried out the first recommendation to build the wharf. You have no disinfecting system at Quebec City, and you have not the first provision to supply patients with pure wholesome water.

Mr. OUIMET. I beg to inform the hon. gentleman that there are no sick patients there now.

Mr. MULOCK. Navigation will be opened on the 15th April, and you are talking of boring an artesian well on the 17th March, before the 15th of April. Perhaps after boring through the Laurentian rocks you will not have pure water, and then you will have an infected ship and no water for the patients.

Mr. OUIMET. They have three wells there now, and they have only to boil the water.

Mr. MULOCK. Fancy having suspected persons on an island full of cholera patients, and compelling them to drink water from surface wells. The simplest novice in sanitary science would not make such a proposition as the Minister of Public Works has made, that wells receiving more or less drainage water, when the whole island is full of the excreta of cholera patients, should supply the water for drinking purposes. The Minister has made a most unfortunate slip in making any such suggestion, and no medical officer will sustain him in it. What has been done for the quarantine at Halifax ?

Mr. OUIMET. The same thing that we have done at Grosse Isle, with the exception that it was done on a smaller scale. For instance, instead of having a three compartment disinfector we have a two compartment disinfector. The disinfectors were built and have been sent down and have been placed in position now. We are building a wharf there and we are erecting buildings which will be ready for use when required.

Mr. MULOCK. What has been done for the quarantine at St. John ?

Mr. OUIMET. The same precautions have been taken there.

Mr. MULOCK. Now, with reference to the protection of the border between the United States and Canada. I am told that the principal danger that Canada runs is from cholera being brought in from the United States. However that may be, the conference recommended proper precautions at leading points of contact, and I would ask the Minister to briefly state what provision has been made for quarantine regulations at Niagara, Suspension Bridge, Kingston, Montreal, Windsor and other points of entrance into Canada ?

Mr. OUIMET. There is no danger of the cholera coming that way until it has reached New York and the Atlantic cities. We will take the same precautions then, on a more extended scale, that we took last year. All the collectors at the ports where railways or boats come into this country from the United States are being made officers of the quarantine departments, with authority to retain the services of medical men in order that every train that comes in will be examined and proper disinfectors will be provided. Of course, in that, we expect the co-operation of the Provincial Governments.

Mr. MULOCK. Are you building disinfectors now, in case they should be required at these different points ?

Mr. OUIMET. They can be bought in Europe and brought here in ten days.

Mr. MULOCK. So that you are depending on a foreign supply. I understand that, at present, no precautions have been provided at ports between the United States and Canada, and that you are going to wait until cholera establishes itself in the United States, and then that you are going to send over to England and get disinfectors.

Mr. OUIMET. There is no fear of cholera coming to Canada from the United States until it reaches the United States, and it is not probable that it will establish itself in the United States this year. Last year they coped with it with very inferior resources, and now that they are warned and well prepared, I should think there will not be much danger. You will find any amount of newspaper talk about the danger that Canada and the United States are exposed to. Reports of that kind do a great deal of harm and no good service. I had a conversation with Dr. Jenkins, who kept cholera at bay at the very doors of New York last summer, and, although he had to contend with the shipping interests and the commercial interests of New York City, and the Washington authorities, who wanted to interfere with his business, he said that one of the worst things he had to contend with was the false reports in newspapers. It was announced all over the continent that four cases of cholera had appeared in New York, but afterwards that was found to be absolutely untrue. I say to the hon. gentleman that the Government is doing all they can in this matter, and the people of this country can rely on us that everything will be done that possibly can be done, to prevent cholera coming to Canada. The best way to prevent cholera coming in is not to alarm the people with false reports.

Mr. MULOCK. I hardly think we have arrived at that stage of faith cure in medical science that we must not do a little to help ourselves. Perhaps the panicky feeling may not be the best for health, but the worst thing for the public health would be neglect on the part of the department. I will read what the Medical Conference advise. I will read from the report of their proceedings in the "Globe" of 23rd September last.

There were sixty-five medical officers present, and I understand the report was unanimously adopted.

Mr. OUIMET. Every one of them was willing to sacrifice his life for the country!

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think the hon. gentleman need sneer at the sixty-five medical men. They came down disinterestedly in the public service for the good of the Minister of Public Works and his family and other people's families, and I think it is unjust for the Minister to sneer at them for giving a report advising the country what to do. At all events, whether they are deserving of the sneer of the hon. Minister or not, this is what they advised him to do. No wonder he belittles them when he ignores their advice:

That quarantine regulations must be made applicable to the protection of all the internal borders of the country, and that houses of observation and for the accommodation of suspects, and hospitals for the treatment of such, be supplied and equipped at Niagara and similar border posts.

The Minister of Public Works tells us that he has entirely ignored that recommendation. He has made no provision whatever for protection as between Canada and the United States, and he intends to wait until cholera breaks out in the United States, and then he will send to England to get the necessary disinfecting appliances to be brought out here for the protection of the public health. He is satisfied with the assurances he has received; he has information in advance that cholera will not come here. The hon. gentleman is living in a fool's paradise, he is going against public opinion, going against the advice of the medical experts and is probably taking on himself one of the gravest responsibilities a Minister ever assumed.

Mr. OUIMET. I protest against the hon. gentleman's strictures. We have done everything that has been recommended by those medical authorities, with the exception of the wharf. I say the wharf is not a necessity, and the hon. gentleman is very unfair.

Mr. MULOCK. In what way?

Mr. OUIMET. In trying to make the public believe we are not doing our duty. The hon. gentleman at once jumps to the conclusion that we are sneering at the medical authorities. The hon. gentleman is not a medical authority. We have followed every recommendation which those medical authorities have made to us, and I say it is unfair for the hon. gentleman to say otherwise. I will say more, from the way he talks it would seem that he would be very glad if cholera would come into the country, so as to be able to say that he was right in charging the Government with incapacity or negligence.

Mr. MULOCK. That is about on a par with all the hon. gentleman's character. I say he is unworthy of his position as a member of this House, I say he is unworthy of his position as a member of the Government—it is a cowardly, an ungentlemanly, a ruffianly observation.

Mr. OUIMET. What is it that is cowardly? A coward sits in your chair—he does not sit here.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think the Minister in attributing to an hon. member a desire to see cholera in this country, in order that he might be able to say that the Government had not done their duty, made an assertion unworthy of the hon. gentleman. He had better withdraw the remark.

Mr. PRIOR. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CHARLTON. This is a very unfortunate charge that has been made by the Minister of Public Works, and it should be withdrawn.

Mr. OUIMET. I have not said one word that was not parliamentary.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman is in error there. When a Minister of the Crown accuses a member of the House of desiring to have disease brought into the country to sweep away many thousands of people, there is not the slightest doubt he has transgressed the limits of parliamentary propriety.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the first transgression? I think the hon. gentleman transgressed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think he said anything that would warrant such a charge as the Minister was pleased to throw across the floor. I should be very glad to have it established that he did.

Mr. MULOCK. I asserted, and I assert again, that the Minister of Public Works in disregarding the advice of those experts has assumed one of the gravest responsibilities that a Minister of the Crown can assume. I repeat that charge.

Mr. OUIMET. I again protest that we have not disregarded one single recommendation of the medical authorities, with the exception of the building of a wharf at Grosse Isle. I say it is unfair to the Government, and still more unfair to the country to let people believe we have not done all that could be done in order to protect the country against cholera.

Mr. PRIOR. Before this vote is carried I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if I understood him correctly in saying that a medical inspector would be appointed to take charge of all the medical officers in the Dominion?

Mr. FOSTER. A quarantine officer.

Mr. PRIOR. Because I think this is a very serious matter, especially on the Pacific coast. I believe there is much danger, if not more, of cholera coming from the Orient than there is of coming from Europe. At the present time there are five or six steam vessels running regularly between China and Japan and British Columbia, and on several occasions lately they have brought small-pox to our port. Last year the cities of Victoria, Vancouver and Seattle were all visited with the scourge of small-pox, and there is no doubt it was brought on the steamers running from China and Japan. I have been told during my visit to the departments, especially the Departments of Agriculture and Public Works, that the Government are about to put up first-class quarantine buildings at Williams Head, just outside the limits of Victoria, in the Straits of St. Juan de Fuca, where all ocean vessels have to pass. I am very glad to hear that statement, and I hope the Government will erect first-class buildings, which will give proper accommodation not only to the poor unfortunates who may be stricken down either with small-pox or cholera, but also that they will provide proper buildings for suspects, who have been taken off the ships and who have been in contact with those invalids, and that they will also receive proper treatment in proper buildings at the hands of medical practitioners. I am sorry to say that this has not been the case heretofore, and although the Government are going to do what is right now, for everybody will be thankful, still I believe they have been very lax in the past, and Victoria especially has suffered at their hands. I have no doubt that small-pox in the city has cost the municipal authorities $75,000 at least, besides the great loss caused to all the merchants and business men in the city. That is attributable, I may say, to the neglect of this Government in not giving us a proper quarantine station before now. The representatives of the province have, for the last eighteen months, been pressing on the Government the necessity of providing a proper quarantine station, but up to the present time we have not been able to induce them to act. They have now, I believe, made up their minds that the matter is serious, because they are threatened with cholera. But small-pox is also a most dangerous disease, and has the effect of causing great loss to everybody in the country. I would like the hon. Minister of Public Works to state publicly here whether he has given orders to have a really first-class quarantine station built there without any further delay, because every day's delay is of the greatest moment to the people of British Columbia. My hon. colleague received a telegram yesterday from Victoria stating that another Chinese steamer had come in with small-pox on board. These steamers carry from 200 to 500 Chinamen on almost every trip, and it is most dangerous to allow them to land unless there are proper buildings, fences and guards to look after them.

Mr. OUMET. I assure the hon. gentleman that we have taken every measure to have a first-class quarantine station established at William's Head, and that we are going to spend $97,000 for that purpose. We had Mr. Gamble brought here to confer with the authorities of the Department of Agriculture and our own architect, and he has received every instruction necessary for carrying on the work. Contracts have been let for the steam disinfectors, and they will be ready very soon. I understand that contracts are to be let at once for the buildings. Tenders have been called for the 23rd of this month for the wharf. Everything will be done to make the quarantine first-class.

Mr. PRIOR. I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance if he has not received a claim from the city of Victoria for losses sustained last year, owing to the Government neglecting to have proper quarantine facilities to prevent the small-pox coming into the city. I think that under the circumstances the Dominion Government should stand at least a portion of the expense to which the city was put, and I think that any gentleman who looks into the case and goes through all the correspondence will be of the same opinion.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not sure that such a claim would not come to my department. I cannot state for certain about it, but I think I remember some claim being made by the city of Victoria in the direction in which the hon. gentleman speaks.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Is the Government going to appoint a second medical assistant at Grosse Isle?

Mr. OUMET. Another assistant will be provided. We shall provide as many assistant doctors as will be necessary.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I hope the hon. minister will appoint Dr. Cote.

Mr. OUMET. If he is recommended to the Minister of Agriculture by the hon. gentleman, I am sure he will be appointed at once.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I am informed that the buildings there at present will accommodate from 200 to 500 first-class passengers, and about 2,000 second-class. Are there to be any new buildings in addition?

Mr. OUMET. New buildings are being erected, and they will be ready for the opening of navigation. They have been prepared at Quebec, and they were to go down the day before yesterday. We have sent our own man, Mr. Billings, along with another first-class man, to superintend the work and see that it is done properly and as quickly as possible.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. These buildings are not done yet?

Mr. OUIMET. They are made in sections, and the sections are taken to the island and will be put together there.

Mr. BORDEN. I understand the hon. Minister of Finance to say that all the recommendations made by Dr. Montizambert, with one exception, had been or were being carried into effect. I also understood him to say that a medical inspector would be appointed. I would like to know whether the buildings under construction, the wells being dug, the disinfectors, and all the preparations being made, have been carried on under the inspection of some competent medical expert. I think it is important that that should be done, and that such an officer, if he has not yet been appointed, should be appointed at once. It seems to me that the whole service should be under the inspection of one competent man or a board acting together. I think it would be the greatest mistake possible to have the arrangements carried out in a disjointed manner, with one man at Halifax, another at Quebec, and another at Grosse Isle. I think there should be an acknowledged head at least for the whole Atlantic coast, instead of leaving all the arrangements to the ipse dixit of some officer in the department at Ottawa, who perhaps knows very little experimentally about a matter of such importance. I understand the Minister of Public Works to say that nothing was being done at the towns on the Canadian side of the border between Canada and the United States. I would like to ask him whether means are being taken on the American side to prevent cholera going into the United States from Canada. I understand that there are. At any rate, I know that not very long ago a number of immigrants who were landed at Halifax and passed on to St. Croix on the border between New Brunswick and the state of Maine were not allowed to go into the state, but were all sent back to Halifax. The hon. gentleman seems very sure that there is not the slightest danger of an outbreak of cholera in New York this year. I hope he is corrects in that opinion; but I think that medical men—and I am sorry to see he has not the highest opinion of medical men—who know something of these things, differ with him. I find from very excellent authority that there were cases of cholera during the past season in New York, and it is well known that while the cholera germ becomes dormant during the cold season it only requires warmth to break out again. I rose, however, to ask whether the precautions that have been carried out already have been carried out under the inspection of a medical man.

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. Billings has had charge of this quarantine matter for some time. He is an architect and has studied the matter with Dr. Montizambert, and besides that, he was sent to Galveston and some other of the best quarantine stations in the United States to make a special study of the appliances in use there, and he has had plans prepared according to the opinions of Dr. Montizambert. If there has been some delay, it is due to the fact that these plans were not quite matured; but everything has since been pushed as rapidly as possible. The hon. gentleman says that I have not much respect for medical authority; but he knows that when doctors differ, laymen have to take one side or the other, and when I said there had been no cases of cholera in New York, my authority was no less than that of Dr. Jenkins, who was really the man who prevented cholera from coming into that city last year. I do not know of any better authority.

Mr. BORDEN. I made the statement I did in view of what I understood the hon. gentleman to say concerning the medical conference which took place here last summer. I think I heard him ask how many of them would risk their lives, so that he seemed to throw doubts on their sincerity. I may tell him that in Halifax, a few years ago, when a ship arrived infected with cholera, four medical men from Halifax volunteered to go on board that ship and to the island at which the patients were landed, and two of these doctors lost their lives in ministering to these unfortunate people.

Mr. JONCAS. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Public Works have told us that they have complied with the recommendations of Dr. Montizambert, and of the medical men who met here last summer, with the one exception of building a wharf at Grosse Isle. When this question of building that wharf came up, I expressed myself very strongly of the opinion that it should be built. Since then, I have taken the trouble of consulting some medical men, and my hon. friend from Cornwall, who is an authority on these matters, told me the other day—and I am sorry he is not here to confirm my statement—that, in his opinion, a deep-water wharf was not necessary at all at Grosse Isle. Now, I have written to Dr. Taché, who has been for a number of years, Deputy-Minister of Agriculture, and who has given much attention to this quarantine question. I have asked Dr. Taché if the disinfection of vessels could be made as easily, as rapidly, and as thoroughly, outside in the stream, as at the wharf, and I asked him if the building of a wharf at Grosse Isle would lessen the danger of the introduction of cholera, and he answered me thus:

To your first question I beg to say that I am of opinion that the disinfection of vessels can be made as rapidly, as easily and as thoroughly outside as at the wharf. I may add that this disinfection can be made with even more security. A vessel cannot be more effectually disinfected than when she is lying at anchor. To the second question, I answer that the construction of a wharf at deep water cannot in any way diminish the dangers of an epidemic. A wharf is necessary at the quarantine station for the services of the station, but it is sufficient that this wharf should be accessible to vessels employed by the station.

I think it is well that the committee and the country should know that, in the opinion of Dr. Taché, the construction of a deep water wharf at Grosse Isle is not, after all, a necessity, and that the dangers of the introduction of cholera into the country cannot be lessened by the construction of such a wharf. Now, as to the other matter, the Minister of Public Works has just told us that the buildings which are to be erected at Grosse Isle have been sent in, yesterday, in sections. Navigation will not be open on the St. Lawrence for nearly a month and a half—I mean outside navigation.

Mr. LANGELIER. Steam-ships can come up to Quebec even now, without any trouble.

Mr. JONCAS. But, as a rule, navigation does not open at the port of Quebec before the 20th of April, so that we have more than a month in which to put up those buildings. I have no reason to suspect the veracity of the assertions of the hon. Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Finance, when they say they have followed the recommendations made to them by Dr. Montizambert. I do not think they are to blame for the course they have thus far taken.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think the reasons given for not building the wharf are not satisfactory. It is all very well to quote the opinion of Dr. Taché, who has never lived at the quarantine station of Grosse Isle. On the other hand, Dr. Montizambert has been there for twenty years, and knows better than anybody else what is required, and what can be done. The Government admit that, for the last three years he has been recommending the construction of a deep water wharf. No medical man who is acquainted with questions relating to quarantine, says that this wharf is not desirable. The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) says, on the authority of Dr. Taché, that ships can be easily disinfected in the river, but Dr. Taché has never been at Grosse Isle when it is blowing a strong north-east gale, and when disinfection would be impossible. I have visited that station myself when the previous medical superintendent lived at Grosse Isle, and I went with him on board ships when only a light wind was blowing, nothing at all compared with the gales which prevail sometimes for two or three days; the sea was very rough, and I say without hesitation that, during one of these north-east gales, which may prevail for three or four days at a time, no ship could be disinfected; it would be impossible to get alongside a ship with the disinfecting apparatus, and the steamer would have to lie three or four days before anything could be done. No man, who has any knowledge of the River St.

Lawrence at that point, and of the roughness of the sea when the wind blows from the north-east, will say that it is possible to disinfect a ship in the stream. That is the reason why Dr. Montizambert, who has been living there so long a time, is of the opinion that a deep-water wharf is absolutely necessary. I admit that, in ordinary weather, when there is no wind, it would be very easy and very safe to disinfect ships in the river; but at other times, when the wind is blowing, especially from the north-east, it would be completely out of the question. The hon. member for Gaspé knows very well that, at times, we have, in the River St. Lawrence, gales from the north-east, which last for three, or four, or five days; and it is generally during those days that sailing vessels come in large numbers, and when we are more exposed than at other times to see cholera-stricken people coming into the country. Now, as to the objections which have been made to the construction of that wharf, I think they are not at all as great as has been represented. It would require some dredging between the present ship channel and the wharf. Without dredging it would be difficult, if not impossible, for large steamers to come alongside that wharf. But I am told it would not cost much to dredge the river between the present steamship channel and the proposed wharf. Whatever it might cost, if it is necessary to protect this country against a cholera epidemic, we should not hesitate to make the expenditure. It is said that the wharf would not be available this year. I admit that, but if we delay the construction of that wharf, another epidemic may break out at a future time unexpectedly, and the wharf would then become very useful. It may be too late for this year, but not too late for another year. I am told that the dredging could easily be done so as to make the wharf accessible.

Mr. JONCAS. The hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) has not understood the drift of my argument. I did not quote Dr. Taché to prove that vessels could be disinfected in the middle of the stream in bad weather; but I quoted him to show that the construction of that deep water wharf will not lessen the danger of the introduction of cholera into this country. As to the other question, I have often been at Grosse Isle myself, and I am aware that these north-east gales which occur in the spring and sometimes in the summer, may last several days; but if it is impossible to disinfect a vessel in the stream during one of those gales, it will also be impossible for the vessel even to come up to Grosse Isle. If the weather is bad enough to prevent a vessel from being disinfected in the stream, it will certainly prevent these vessels from coming up to the wharf, even if you had a deep-water wharf there.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. No.

Mr. JONCAS. I have read the reports of the pilots on this matter, and they declare emphatically that in bad weather, not only are the steamers unable to stop at the wharf, but they cannot even get inside the bar. They say they would not take the responsibility of piloting a steamer inside the bar during a gale.

Mr. LANGELIER. If it is left in its present condition, but it can be improved by dredging.

Mr. JONCAS. It is impossible to remove the sand bar by dredging. It has been proposed to deepen the channel outside by dredging, but it is no use to try to dredge in sand. I repeat that it is very dangerous for a steamer in severe weather to come inside that bar. I say again, that I have quoted Dr. Taché, not to prove that a vessel may be delayed sometime by rough weather, but to prove that the construction of a deep-water wharf would not lessen the danger of the introduction of cholera. If the Government have not decided to build this wharf it is because it has been demonstrated by pilots, by ship-owners and by medical authorities, that it would be a useless expenditure.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I have great respect for the opinions of Dr. Taché and Dr. Bergin; but I think we might also take the opinion of our own official, and what did he say?

I can only repeat that the deep-water wharf at Grosse Isle is the one essential, all-important, ever-pressing need of the St. Lawrence quarantine service. Until that is supplied and fully equipped as above the service cannot be depended upon, nor be expected to protect the country from the invasion of epidemic disease.

If our officer, the man who ought to know, says that, he must be either right or wrong. If he is right, the Government ought to take his advice and act upon it; if he is wrong, then he is not an efficient officer, and the Government should put Dr. Taché in his place. But as long as Dr. Montizambert insists that this measure is necessary for the protection of the country, the Government ought to heed his advice. Now, as to what the Minister of Public Works said about the difficulties of navigation, I admit that some dredging will be required at the wharf, but not to a great extent, to make it easy for steamers to approach the wharf. I know some pilots have given a contrary opinion; but the great number of pilots and navigators, and those who live on the spot, say that it is quite possible to build a wharf there, and possible for steamers to reach the wharf.

Mr. AMYOT. It strikes me that Dr. Montizambert acts in two qualities, first, as a doctor, secondly, as a seaman, and as an expert in maritime affairs. As a doctor, the Government have accepted the greatest part of his advice, but so far as navigation is concerned, the parties who are interested in navigation do not agree with Dr. Montizambert. If Dr. Montizambert insists, in spite of the maritime interest, in spite of the reports of pilots, in spite of the opinion of all those who know anything about navigation --if he insists in making reports that cause so much trouble, the time has come when the Government should give him some assistance. It is well known by every one who has visited that Island, that it is impossible, on account of the quality of the soil, to build a large and useful wharf there. It is also well known that further down, there are islands where a wharf could very easily be constructed; and then the city of Quebec and its neighbourhood would not be exposed. In case of a cholera epidemic, to the danger of a large number of people being buried on that island and thus exposing to contagion the inhabitants of the city. It will be a constant danger to the city if, in case of an epidemic, the island should become a cemetery for the burial of those who may die there. Under these circumstances I strongly urge upon the Government not to build a wharf at Grosse Isle without first ascertaining whether there are not other islands where it would be much safer for the general public to construct a wharf which would be at all times easily accessible to large steamers. I approve of the course of the Government in adopting all necessary precautions against the introduction of cholera, but I also approve of their hesitation in going to a useless expenditure, which would also be a source of danger to the city and neighbourhood of Quebec.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is evident from the discussion to-night that the Minister of Public Works, at all events, takes an optimistic view of the matter of the introduction of cholera during the coming season. This question, above all others, is one in the consideration of which we ought not to lose our temper, but we should approach it with a desire to arrive at a just conclusion as to what is best to be done. Great interests are involved. The introduction of a pestilence into this country is something to be dreaded; and if we settle down to the belief that there is no likelihood of cholera coming this summer, I think we are making a great mistake. There are symptoms just now on the continent, which are not of a reassuring character. Cholera is in fact manifesting itself at various points in Europe, and many cases of it have broken out during the winter. The indications are that we are in danger of an outbreak during the coming season. If precautions are to be taken, they must be taken in good season, and the circumstances do not warrant us in believing that we will escape a visitation of the pestilence during the coming year. It reached the shores of America late last season, and we have no reason to suppose that it will be as late in coming in during the present season. It reached Hamburg rather late in the season, and it is there now. The disease will appear, in all probability, in Hauburg and other seaboard cities in Europe, as soon as the warm weather begins. If immigrants are to be brought into this country again this year, it will be almost a miracle if the disease is kept out of the country. I doubt whether we do not need a deep-water wharf at Grosse Isle. Possibly it would have been judicious to remove the quarantine station to some better point. But I believe the greatest sources of danger will be at inland points. The greatest stream of immigration comes to New York and passes on towards the west. I apprehended that one of the most dangerous points is at Suspension Bridge, a point on the great trunk lines from New York to the west. It is a point that should be guarded with as much care, I think, as the entrance to the St. Lawrence. There are other interior points also, and it is the duty of the Government to make preparation at those points. If there is any conflict of opinion, any question as to the jurisdiction between the Provincial and Dominion authorities, this is not the time to haggle about it. Let the Dominion Government assume its national responsibility in this matter and see that proper precautions are taken at all these points. It is insufficient to guard the entrance into our seaboard ports; we are more likely to have cholera introduced at inland points from the United States. Cholera, beyond all question, will be found in New York before it is found in Quebec, and will be transmitted from New York westward; and if it once gets a foothold in New York, it will require the utmost vigilance to prevent its becoming epidemic in Canada. Now, the fact that there has been a claim made upon the Government for a large sum of money because it has not discharged its duty in the matter of quarantine against small-pox at Victoria, is a significant one. If a claim has been made for $100,000 damages against the Government, it would seem to indicate a very strong belief, on the part of the inhabitants of British Columbia, that the Government has not discharged its duty in regard to quarantine matters there. Although we are naturally anxious to guard against expenditure, yet this is a matter where so great interests are involved, that the Government may well dismiss the economic and prudential considerations that should govern them under ordinary cases, and take the steps that may be necessary, that will be necessary, in case the disease is introduced here—not assuming that it is not likely to come. I am sorry to see the Minister of Public Works take the ground, that probably we will not have the disease this year. I do not want to say a word here that will create a feeling of alarm or uneasiness among the people, but it would be folly to shut our eyes to the probabilities of the case. We want to be prepared, and we want to realize that there is great danger, indeed, more than danger, that this disease will be introduced this year. Now, it strikes me that the duty of the Government at interior points has not received that consideration it deserves. We have seen the Medical Council that met last September, sixty-five doctors, making recommendations, and the Minister of Public Works speaks of that declaration of physicians in rather deprecating terms, indeed almost sneeringly. The occupants of the Treasury benches have no right to assume that they understand this case better than do the medical men. They are bound to give due and favourable consideration to the formally expressed opinion of those gentlemen, arrived at after full discussion and concurred in by all. We want to realize that this is a matter of grave importance, that we are dealing with a question of greater moment than matters of merely material interest and progress. It is different from subjects ordinarily dealt with by the Government for it is a matter of life and death, and let us so grapple with it. Let us not deal with it from a party stand-point or with party feeling or with a desire to make political capital out of it. I hope the Government will review their decision on all these points. I hope they will not be guided by the assumption that the disease is not likely to be here, but that they will be on the alert to the danger that is threatened, that they will see the necessity of the utmost efficiency in the arrangements made in order to guard against this threatened epidemic. Whatever money may be necessary to ensure the adoption of proper precautions, will be cheerfully granted by Parliament and the people, and it will be a crime for the Government to withhold arrangements and refrain from taking all precautions necessary, simply on money considerations

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have listened carefully to the debate, and I frankly admit that I did not at once appreciate the importance of the suggestion made by Dr. Montizambert, which the Minister of Finance says is the only practical recommendation the Government have not accepted. The hon. gentleman from Montmagny read part of the report, and I have read the report since. I begin now to see the meaning of the deep-water wharf and why it is necessary, as part of the appliances to protect us from this dreaded scourge. I do not desire to press on the Government the necessity of building it, until the Minister has answered one or two questions. I think the hon. member for Bellechasse intimated that Dr. Montizambert's opinion was very well from a professional stand-point, but that the pilots said it was impossible to construct a wharf there. If the Government has determined not to carry out that essential requisite for prevention, they should be prepared to state authoritatively to the House, whether the statement of the hon. member for Bellechasse is true, whether they have information before them which satisfies them beyond a doubt that a wharf cannot be constructed there, on account of lack of water or other physical impediment.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Bellechasse did not make that statement, and that is not the current of the discussion to-night. The whole question is, not whether it is possible to build a wharf, because, if you have money enough and time enough, you can build a wharf anywhere, but the question is, whether, when such a wharf is built, it will be productive of adequate benefit.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I mean a wharf for practical utility.

Mr. FOSTER. If so, that is quite different from what the hon. gentleman said a few moments ago. The whole point is, whether if a wharf was built, it could be utilized and would act beneficially as regards vessels, from a quarantine point of view. Nobody doubts that, if the wharf was built, as suggested, it would be very convenient in fine weather for vessels to come to it and discharge their passengers and be disinfected. That would save time to the steam-ship owners and facilitate the operation. But the question is, whether that would be a benefit in rough weather; and there is doubt on that point. Some of the pilots think vessels could go there, but most of them think vessels could not utilize the wharf in rough weather. The main thing, however, is as to what the steam-ship owners themselves think, and their opinion is, that in rough weather no owner would bring his vessel there. That is the very time when the wharf is required for disinfection. My hon. friend, if he will look into the question, will find there is not a quarantine station in the world where there is a wharf at which vessels are disinfected, and at many of them there are rougher currents and rougher weather than we have in the St. Lawrence. The work of disinfection is done by a vessel that lies alongside the incoming steamer and disinfects it. That is about the position of the question as regards the deep-water wharf.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not understand that you can carry it out with a vessel lying alongside the infected vessel.

Mr. DALY. It was done in New York last year.

Mr. CHARLTON. And there were great complaints respecting it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Dr. Montizambert concludes his report by stating that these modern methods have been in use on the St. Lawrence for several years and have proved effective during ordinary years, but until the deep-water wharf was built and equipped as described by him, the St. Lawrence quarantine station would be quite insufficient to cope with disease during an epidemic. My point is this: With a report such as that of the medical superintendent before them, the Government were bound to do one of two things; to ascertain, beyond a possibility of doubt, whether, from a medical stand-point, that opinion was good or bad, and, if they came to the conclusion that the doctor's opinion was well-founded, and that a wharf could not be built at Grosse Isle, it was perfectly apparent that it should have been built somewhere else. If Dr. Montizambert's statement is true, that the methods the Government have at present in operation there may do during an ordinarily healthy year, but are quite insufficient to keep out disease in an epidemic form, then the fact is that all the money spent has been thrown away and we are resting in a very false state of security. Of course it is impossible for me to give an opinion on this question, but I assume the Government have received the assurances of practical gentlemen as to whether a wharf can be built so as to be useful after it is built. If the exposed condition of Grosse Isle is such that a wharf would be of no service there in rough weather, surely the alternative must have presented itself to practical men to build the wharf elsewhere, if it is an absolute necessity for grappling with the cholera. If the Government have taken the opinion of others as reliable as Dr. Montizambert, and found that his recommendation for this wharf is unfounded, then, perhaps, we need not go to the expense of building it; but we cannot afford to have an epidemic in Canada, and, if a wharf is necessary to keep it out, and Grosse Isle is not the proper place for it, build it somewhere else.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. gentleman is arguing on the assumption that the cholera cannot be kept out without the wharf.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No; I say that it should either be built, or the Government should get evidence to prove that Dr. Montizambert's recommendation of a wharf is not justified.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand that the wharf would be useful principally for landing passengers and handling baggage more easily; but if the hon. gentleman has given any attention to the subject, he must know that, last summer, vessels were miles outside of the harbour of New York when they ran up the yellow flag, as a signal that there was cholera on board, and that the health officials went out and disinfected them there with every success. It is true, it was not done as conveniently or as quickly as it would be done if the vessel were run up to a wharf, where the appliances would be stationary and where the baggage would be transferred to trucks that could run from the vessel to the chamber for disinfecting them and back to the side of the vessel; but that is only a matter of convenience and a little time. With regard to what was said by the hon. member for King's N. S. (Mr. Borden) about the danger of cholera patients coming into Canada from New York, I wish to say that, when I saw a rumour in the press that cholera was allowed to get a foothold in New York, I looked into the medical reviews published in that city, and I found in them no authentic account of cholera getting into the country, from which I concluded that it was not the case. Notwithstanding the fact that there is ten or twenty times as much shipping at New York as comes through the St. Lawrence, the health officers there grappled successfully with the cholera without the convenience of a wharf, and, therefore, we may conclude that it is not by any means impossible or improbable that we shall be able to do the same in Canada. I may state that the Deputy-Minister of Public Works was brought before the Committee on Agriculture the other day to state what was being done in regard to quarantine, because some members of that committee, like members here to-night, were anxious to know whether active measures were being taken to avoid the danger of cholera; and the committee were told that almost the whole staff of the department had been engaged, during almost their whole time in the last three months, in getting out plans and pushing on the work of properly equipping the quarantine stations. The information given, I think, satisfied every member of that committee that everything that was possible was being done in the direction aimed at, and that there was no ground for apprehension by reason of any laxity on the part of the department. I admit that we would be safer if there were quarantine regulations on the frontier between Canada and the United States; but hon. gentlemen must not forget that there are quarantine stations at New York, Boston and other ocean ports, along the United States, where vessels arriving will be disinfected. But, if the disease should pass those stations, we have an Act which prohibits the carrying on railways of passengers having infectious or contagious diseases. But, with regard to regulations made by this Government, if it was attempted to enforce them against passengers coming into the province along the frontier, we might encounter the same difficulty that we had a few years ago when it was proposed to establish a Dominion health association, that is, a conflict of authority between the Dominion and the province. Supporters of the Government of Ontario protested against the right of the Dominion undertaking anything of that kind, contending that the province had the right, in connection with municipal regulations, to look after the public health and to detain passengers known to be infected with contagious or infectious disease. Therefore, in the event of any cholera patients escaping the health officers of New York or Boston, and coming to Canada, our provincial authorities could stop them at the frontier. They could even stop intercourse between the two countries until they were satisfied that no passengers having infectious disease would come in. So that I apprehend there is no danger from that source. With regard to these quarantine stations, I think the Government are doing all that can be done. The committee satisfied itself the other day that the department was attending to the work most energetically, and that, before navigation opened, every one of these quarantine stations would be ready for the reception of passengers who might be infected with cholera or any other contagious disease.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask whether the precautions taken against the introduction of cholera are being extended to Charlottetown?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Militia and Defence—To provide for payment of annual drill to be performed in camps of instructions in the month of June $100,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you to cut down the grant for next year to this extent?

Mr. FOSTER. The drill has for several years taken place in June, and we have been in the habit of paying from the vote which became available on the 1st of July. That plan was an irregular way of doing it, and it was thought better to make this year a supplementary grant of $100,000, which will enable the bills to be paid this year. We have the whole grant next year, but that cannot be lowered because next June, if drill takes place, $100,000 will be required for that drill.

To pay claim of the City of Ottawa, Taxes from 1880 to 1892, inclusive, on the unused land, Rifle Range at Ottawa, leased by Government $3,693 22

Mr. OUIMET. This is a settlement between the city of Ottawa and the Government with reference to lands used for rifle ranges. The chief part of the claim is brought before the Government and was met by a counter claim that we had, and the whole matter was referred to the Justice Department. The claim of the city of Ottawa consisted of several items, one of which was taxes for that part of the land which was not used for a rifle range, although included in the lease, and the city complained that they should not be deprived of the revenue, as the ground was not really held for Government purposes. The greatest part of the claim was for taxes for local improvements, and the Government came to the conclusion that it was not fair to have these improvements paid for by the citizens when they benefited our buildings. These improvements consist of drains, sewers, &c., which otherwise we would have had to build at our own expense.

To pay T. J. Galbraith, landing waiter in Her Majesty's customs at Dunnville, Ont., in addition to his salary for services as acting sub-collector from 1st March, 1892, to 28th February, 1893. . . . $300

Mr. FOSTER. For several years we have not adopted the principle of paying officers for over-service ; but this is a special case in which this officer saved the expense of appointing another officer. He had one port which he took charge of, and the other was six or eight miles further away. His son, a young man, took care of the home office, while he drove out to the other port. His son had the salary.

Committee rose and reported the resolutions.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 20th March, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 103) to amend the Act respecting public officers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Explain.

Mr. COSTIGAN. With respect to the issue of commissions, the present law provides that the Governor in Council may decide as to the officers and class of officers of the Civil Service that may receive fees for commissions issued, and some doubt has arisen in regard to the payment of such fees, it being held by some officers that those fees could not be demanded from them. This Bill is to remove the doubt in that regard as to commissions that may be issued.

Mr. OUIMET.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BREWERIES AND DISTILLERIES.

Mr. FORBES (for Mr. Flint) asked, What was the number, according to the last census, of breweries and distilleries in Canada and the location of each ? The number of employees therein ? The quantity and value of raw material ? The quantity and value of the output ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Census of 1891. Number of breweries, 144. Located according to provinces as under : Manitoba, 9 ; New Brunswick, 4 ; Nova Scotia, 5 ; Ontario, 82 ; Quebec, 25 ; British Columbia, 18 ; Prince Edward Island, 1 ; total, 144. Employees, 1,840. Wages paid, $891,381 ; raw material used, $2,530,631 ; finished product, $5,717,873. Number of distilleries, 8. Located as under : Nova Scotia, 1 ; Ontario, 7. Total number, 8. Employees, 404 ; wages, $178,950 ; value of raw material, $1,226,019 ; value of products, $2,199,600.

TRANSPORTATION OF CATTLE.

Mr. JONCAS (for Mr. Henderson) asked, Is it the intention of the Government this session, for the purpose of preventing speculation in vessel space, to introduce legislation fixing a maximum rate to be charged by any person for the transportation of cattle from the port of Montreal to ports in Great Britain?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation this session for that purpose.

SCHEDULING OF CANADIAN CATTLE.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, What progress has been made in the direction of getting the embargo now placed upon the shipment of live stock to England, removed? Do the Government expect to get the order scheduling Canadian cattle removed by the opening of navigation?

Mr. FOSTER. The last telegram that has been received is one from Sir Charles Tupper, dated the 17th inst., as follows:—

Mr. Gardner stated House of Commons last night he had arrived conclusion should not be justified restoring privilege free entry Canadian cattle until in possession additional evidence which systematic examination extending over reasonable and sufficient period of lungs cattle landed for slaughter at ports would afford. He trusted result such examination would confirm view slaughter at port could be waived with reasonable security against importation diseased animals, in which case and absence any unfavourable news from Canada he considered should be bound under statute allow free entry be resumed. He added examination would not be prolonged beyond period found necessary for purpose, and that the more numerous the cattle arriving the shorter will necessarily be period examination.

REPAIRS TO QUEBEC DRILL HALL.

Mr. FREMONT asked, How many masons have been employed to the repairs made to the Drill Hall in Quebec, in September and October last? How many days were they employed? What wages were allowed them per diem? What amount has been actually paid them per diem? Is it the intention of the Government to pay them the difference?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I am informed that the work was performed under contract, and the Government have nothing whatever to do with the payment of the men employed, CONDUCT OF DETECTIVE SKEFFINGTON.

Mr. OHOQUETTE asked, Whether the Government, the hon. Minister of Railways, Mr. D. Pottinger, General Manager of the Intercolonial Railway, or Mr. Schrieber, Deputy-Minister of Railways, have received, since 1890, any complaint as to the conduct of Detective Skeffington, employed on the Intercolonial Railway, or in some other capacity.

Mr. FOSTER.

city, by the Government? If so, what person or persons made the said complaints, and what were the grounds thereof?

Mr. HAGGART. Neither of the parties named has received any complaint against Detective Skeffington.

SPEECH OF THE CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. CASEY (for Mr. Davin) asked, Whether the Controller of Customs is correctly reported as having said, in the course of a speech at a banquet at Kingston, on Friday: "Our friends (meaning Orangemen in Ireland) over there will never submit; Britain may cast them out, but if she does she has no right to look for their further allegiance. They are preparing for action. Their unalterable determination is never to submit to Home Rule, and they will have the sympathy of the Orangemen of Canada. Aye, more than sympathy, they will have our active aid if that active aid be necessary. We shall be unworthy of our ancestors if we fail in our duty at such a crisis."

Mr. FOSTER. The Government is possessed of no information on that subject.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the Controller of Customs give the information, if the Government cannot? He is here.

Mr. WALLACE. I am ready to give the information at any time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Speak now.

Mr. WALLACE. I have not been asked yet.

IMPROVEMENT OF SPANISH RIVER.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Devlin) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place in the Supplementary Estimates a sum sufficient to dredge the bars at the mouth and otherwise to so improve the Spanish River, in the province of Ontario, as to permit deep draft ships to navigate said river?

Mr. OUMET. The hon. gentleman will have to wait until the Estimates are brought down.

ATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. FREMONT asked, By what lines of steam-ships are the mails carried between Canada and Great Britain? Are there any contracts entered into with such lines, and if so, for what period of time? What does the Government pay for such service? Has the Government abandoned the idea of having a Canadian fast line of steamers carrying the mails to Great Britain? If not, what progress has been made towards the settlement of this question?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the first question: By the Allan line, by the Cunard, the White Star, North German Lloyd via New York. 2nd. There is a contract for the carrying of mails by the Allan line for one year, from 24th December, 1892. 3rd. The amount paid to the Allan line is $126,533.33. For the mails sent by New York, payment is made to the United States Post Office, at the rates fixed by the Postal Union regulations, namely, 5 francs per kilometre for the letters and 50 centimes per kilometre for other matter. 4. No. 5. Negotiations are still going on in reference to that important question.

TOBACCO DUTIES.

Mr. DUGAS asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make a change in the mode of collecting the duties on tobacco?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It is not.

MR. ALPHONSE GUAY.

Mr. WELSH asked, 1. Is Mr. Alphonse Guay, who was employed in the Government Printing Bureau, and who left last fall to accept a situation in the Weights and Measures Office in Quebec, the son-in-law of Mr. Simard, M.P. for Charlevoix? 2. At whose request was Mr. Guay so transferred?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That application was made when I was Minister of that department. It is my opinion that he is a son-in-law of Mr. Simard. He was appointed to fill a vacancy on the recommendation of some members in that district.

PORT ALBERT HARBOUR.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron) asked, 1. Has the Government advertised for tenders for repairing Port Albert harbour? 2. If so, has the contract been let? 3. If let, what is the amount of the contract? 4. How many tenders were put in? 5. Was the contract awarded to the lowest tender? 6. What is the name of the contractor? 7. If tenders have not been called for, is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the work during the coming summer?

Mr. OUMET. 1. Yes; 25th January last. 2. Yes; contract signed by contractor 10th March inst. 3. $10,497. 4. Six. 5. Yes. 6. Patrick Navin.

WHARF AT ILE PERROT, IN THE COUNTY OF VAUDREUIL.

Mr. LANGELIER (Translation) (for Mr. Brodeur) asked, 1. What is the cost of the wharf constructed on the south side of Ile Perrot, in the county of Vaudreuil? 2. To whom was the money given for the construction of the said wharf?

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) The total cost of the wharf constructed on the south side of Ile Perrot, in the county of Vaudreuil, was $12,410.55. The work was done in 1887-88 by contract. The lowest tenderer was Mr. Denis O'Brien. His tender reached $4,065; the amount was paid to him on completion of the work undertaken by him; no extras was paid to him. In 1889-90 and in 1890-91 the work was prosecuted by day's work under the superintendence of the Government engineer. The local superintendent in 1889-90 was Mr. John Middleton; in 1890-91, Mr. Emilien Séguin.

WHARF AT POINTE-A-VALOIS, IN THE COUNTY OF VAUDREUIL.

Mr. LANGELIER (Translation) (for Mr. Brodeur) asked, 1. What is the cost of the wharf constructed at Pointe a Valois, in the county of Vaudreuil? 2. To whom was the money for the construction of the said wharf given?

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) The cost of the wharf constructed at Pointe a Valois, in the county of Vaudreuil, in 1889-90 and 1890-91 was $4,621.64. The work was done by day's work, under the superintendence of the Government engineer, the local superintendent being Mr. Carolus Leroux. The wharf was constructed at Mr. Hugh McMillan's demand.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) The hon. Minister will allow me to remark that he did not reply to the first portion of the question put to him, namely, as to whom the money for the construction of the wharf was given. The same remark applies to the first question put.

Mr. OUMET. The papers at hand do not supply the desired information.

THE WHARF AT THE VILLAGE OF VAUDREUIL, P.Q.

Mr. LANGELIER (Translation) (for Mr. Brodeur) asked, 1. What is the cost of the wharf constructed at the village of Vaudreuil, P.Q.? 2. To whom was the money for the construction of the said wharf paid?

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) The cost to the Government of the wharf constructed at the village of Vaudreuil in 1887-88, was $2,400. The money for the construction of this wharf was paid to Mr. G. W. Brabant, for materials supplied only. The manual labour was supplied by the people of the village.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 104) relating to juvenile offenders in the province of New Brunswick.—(Mr. Costigan.)

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. DICKEY. I wish to direct the attention of the Government to the papers that were brought down a few days ago in connection with the French Treaty. There are certain other papers, I understand, which do not appear, so far as I have been able to see, in this return, and I think they might throw some light on the matter. I refer to a letter from Sir Charles Tupper to the Premier, dated Paris, 6th February, and the Premier's acknowledgment thereto, dated 2nd March; also, a letter from the Colonial Office to His Excellency the Governor-General, covering a letter from Lord Dufferin to Lord Rosebery, dated 6th February, and one from Sir Edward Grey, dated Foreign Office, 10th February, to the Colonial Office. I would like to ask the Government if these papers are in their possession, and if so, whether they intend to lay them before Parliament?

Mr. FOSTER. In reply to my hon. friend I would say, as stated the other day, that the papers already laid upon the Table, are but a partial list. Others are being prepared, and I expect to be able to lay them on the Table after dinner. Some of the papers to which he refers are included in those that are being prepared; as to one or two others, I will make inquiries.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman cannot say whether he will bring them down or not.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say until I look at them. The hon. gentleman would not ask me to say that, would he?

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to call attention to a personal explanation which was made in this House by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) a few evenings ago, of which I gave him notice the other day. If it is necessary for me to do so, I shall move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then I make that formal motion. The hon. gentleman, I am sure, did not want to misrepresent the character and pecuniary standing of a gentleman not in this House. He made an explanation the other day with reference to an article which appeared in the Moncton "Transcript."

Mr. SPEAKER. My hon. friend cannot refer to a former debate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have not quoted from any former debate. I merely referred to the fact that the hon. gentleman made a personal explanation with reference to an article which had appeared in the Moncton "Transcript." I have received a telegram to the effect that the hon. gentleman was incorrect in some of his statements.

Mr. SPEAKER. My hon. friend, I am afraid, is getting further into the mud, because he will remember—

Mr. DICKEY.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope I have not got there yet.

Mr. SPEAKER. He will remember that I ruled on former occasions, and in strict accordance with parliamentary practice, that no letters or communications from persons outside the House, in reference to what transpired in the House, could be brought up in the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As I am prohibited from reading the telegram, I shall have to content myself with asking the hon. gentleman whether he desires to amend any statement he made in this House, or to correct any statement he made in his personal explanation; and shall have to depend upon his honour to make the matter straight.

Mr. WELDON. By looking at the unrevised "Hansard"—I have not at hand a revised copy—I find I am reported on the 6th March as having said, respecting an action I brought last summer against Mr. Hawke, that "I got my verdict, but I have not yet got my money."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Read what you said a little further.

Mr. WELDON. I thought that was the point referred to in the notice the hon. gentleman sent me across the House. I said further:

I think, therefore, my civil remedy as practicable against Mr. Hawke, would be of very little service.

That statement made on the 6th of March is perfectly accurate in word and in substance. Some five days afterwards, my solicitor wrote me that Mr. Hawke had paid the judgment. I should add that he does not name the date of the payment.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) On the 1st day of January last, nearly two months before the statement was made.

Mr. WELDON. I should add that my solicitor does not write me when the judgment was paid; but from the tone of the letter, I think the judgment was paid before I made my statement, although I did not know it. A very few days previous to that, I had heard from my solicitor that the judgment had not been paid. I should have added that my solicitor gave as a reason for his delay in notifying me, that he had been confined to his house by severe illness, and that consequently his business had been neglected for some days.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

WATER-WAY FROM LAKE SUPERIOR TO THE ATLANTIC.

Mr. TISDALE moved:

That in view of the early completion of the canal around the St. Mary Rapids upon the Canadian shore, and of the enlargement and increased depth of our canal system to the Atlantic sea-board, and also of the ever-increasing volume of traffic tending in that direction, it is desirable that Canada should have a complete and uninterrupted water-way from the head of Lake Superior to the Atlantic Ocean through her own territory; that in furtherance of such object the Minister of Railways and Canals should with all reasonable despatch proceed to have made explorations and surveys to ascertain the most direct and feasible manner of connecting Lake St. Clair or the River St. Clair by canal with Lake Erie through Canadian territory, and report the same, with an approximate estimate of the cost thereof, to this House.

He said: It is an old and a wise saying, I believe, that to forecast wisely the future we should refer to the past. Speaking in support of the resolution of which I have given notice, I think it will be the proper time and place to review the relations and the international transactions we have had with the great republic to the south of us. In doing so, I wish the House to understand what my feelings are in regard to this matter. I wish to repeat here, as I have before stated in this House and in other places, that I have the most kindly and friendly feelings towards the people of the United States. I have a great many personal friends and also those dear to me by ties of blood and affection in that country, and I have personal relations of an intimate character with the people of the United States. I wish the American people, under their form of government, the greatest measure of prosperity and happiness, but, at the same time, I love our own institutions and our own country better, and, therefore, although I shall endeavour to present this subject in a manner so friendly, so just and fair that even an American cannot find fault with me in that respect, yet I do not propose to try to be either so friendly or so fair as to be afraid to be just to my fellow-countrymen. Reading the records as I do, it looks to me as if, on our part, it had been one long period of patience, tolerance and concession as contrasted with one long period of affront, assumption and aggression on their part. The matters are somewhat weighty and the instances somewhat numerous, so, while I wish to be brief, I am afraid I shall have to crave the indulgence of the House for a longer period than I would desire. I propose to commence, Sir, with the first convention that we ever had with the United States; the convention concluded by our patriotic forefathers with the people of the United States in 1783, at the end of the revolutionary war. By that convention, among other things, it was agreed:

That Congress shall earnestly recommend it to the legislatures of the respective states to provide for the restitution of all estates, rights and properties which have been confiscated, belonging to real British subjects, and also of the estates, rights and properties of persons resident in districts in the possession of Her Majesty's Arms and who have not borne arms against the said United States. It was also provided that Congress would recommend the several states to revise all inimical laws regarding the loyalists, so as to render the said laws perfectly consistent not only with justice and equity, but with that spirit of conciliation which on the return of the blessings of peace should universally prevail.

I propose to quote from some American authorities to show how that treaty was observed. Sabine says:

In some parts of the country there really appears to have been a determination to place these misguided but then humbled men, American Loyalists, beyond the pale of human sympathy.

Mr. Lodge, in his "Life of Hamilton," says:

There was an active determination to take vengeance on all who had sided with the Crown and were now helpless, and this was done in utter violation not only of wise policy, of public morals and of the law of nations, but also in direct contravention of the treaty with England.

The next illustration we have of the friendly spirit of the United States in her transactions with this country was the war of 1812. Mr. Madison, in my opinion, declared that war without any justification, and it is pretty generally conceded now by all impartial authorities, without any contravention on the part of Great Britain of the then existing law of nations. Great Britain had been compelled by the decrees of Napoleon to take strong measures to protect her trade, and although the great Frenchman had given the United States much greater cause to find fault with his actions, the United States took no notice of them whatever, even although then Napoleon was endeavouring to overthrow the liberties of the world. But the United States declared war against Great Britain and invaded Canada; Canada that in no way had anything to do with even the alleged cause of the war, and to show the spirit that prompted the invasion, I will quote from the proclamation of the commander-in-chief of the invading army. Before doing so, in addition to what I have said, I wish to quote from Mr. Schuyler's American History, in which he declares that the best people of the United States, and particularly the New England states, were against the war and condemned it as unjust and barbarous. General Howe, in his proclamation to the invading army, as quoted in Lossing's History, said:

The first stroke of the tomahawk, the first attempt with the scalping-knife, will be the signal for an indiscriminate scene of desolation. No white man found fighting by the side of an Indian will be taken prisoner. Instant destruction will be his lot.

This, of course, alluded to the expected alliance with the great Indian Chief Tecumseh, an alliance which was quite proper and a matter of course, and an alliance which resulted in a very few days in the pusillanimous surrender of this brutal braggart and the whole host of invaders to the British and Canadian forces. I may say that this proclamation was at first sustained at Washington, but so great was the horror that it provoked among the people, that it was eventually repudiated. I shall not further allude to this period, than simply to remark upon how, even in these early days, our forefathers, though untrained to arms and although few in numbers, rose as one man and joined together, and drove back in dismay and disgrace their much more numerous invaders. Even at that early date two things were proved: first, that the battle is not always to the strong, and secondly, that neither force of arms, nor unfriendly acts, nor threatening proclamations, were then, are now, or please God will ever be, the way to influence the Canadian people. As a further illustration of the spirit of the people at that time, I wish to quote again from Schuyler's History:

"Strange," said John Randolph, that we should have no objection to any other people, civilized or savage. The great autocrat of all the Russias receives the homage of our high consideration. The Dey of Algiers and his Divan of Pirates are very civil, good sort of people, with whom we find no difficulty in maintaining relations of peace and amity. Turks, Jews and Infidels, Melinelli Prince of Tripoli, or the "Little Turtle" Chief of the Miamis, barbarians and savages of every clime and colour are welcome to our arms. With Chiefs of Banditti, Negro, or Mulatto, we can treat and can trade. Name, however, but England and all our antipathies are up in arms against her, against those whose blood runs in our veins.

The next period to which I wish to allude, and the next illustration of our relations with the United States is the period of 1837-38. The open attitude of hostility then assumed by the people of the United States during that unfortunate period is too well known to require remark. I shall content myself by quoting from Withrow's History, and from official documents to show generally the transactions on the part of the Americans at that time:

The American Government was guilty of grave dereliction of duty in permitting its frontier to be made a base of hostile operations against an unoffending neighbour. Secret societies, known as "Hunters' Lodges" were organized in many of the American border towns, for the purpose of aiding the Canadian rebellion.

On the 13th December, a mob, described by the Buffalo paper as a "wretched rabble, ready to cut any man's throat for a dollar," under the command of an adventurer named Van Rensselaer, took possession of Navy Island, about two miles above Niagara Falls. They were supplied with artillery and stores taken from the United States' arsenal, or contributed by American citizens. They threw up entrenchments of logs, mounting thirteen guns, and opened fire on the Canadian shore.

Early in January, a force of several hundred men, from Cleveland and Detroit, well equipped with muskets and artillery, taken with the connivance of the authorities from the United States' arsenals, made a demonstration against Sandwich and Amherstburg.

In utter defiance of international comity, simultaneous attacks on Canada were organized at Detroit, Sandusky, Waterdown, and in Vermont.

The Legislature of Upper Canada in 1838 appointed a Select Committee to report upon the state of the province, which continued its work into 1839. Extract from the report of 1838.

Mr. TISDALE.

The occupation and conquest of Texas in the south, and the assembling of an armed force on its eastern frontier, openly recruited in its principal cities and towns, commanded by its citizens, and by them also supplied with arms, ammunition, clothing, money and provisions, and transported in the presence of and unrestrained (if not encouraged) by its magistrates and public officers, in steam-boats and other vessels into this province, and landed in it for the avowed purpose of overthrowing the Government and wresting the colony from the Crown of Great Britain, sufficiently prove that, if the countries bordering on the United States desire to protect themselves from the inroads of freebooters, pirates, fugitive traitors and outlaws, they must look for security to their own fleets and armies, and not to the honourable forbearance of the American people, or the efficiency or moral influence of their Government."

After a year's further experience and examination the committee, amongst other things say:

Your Committee are well assured that nothing could afford your honourable House greater satisfaction than to feel justified in recalling the imputation which this declaration conveys upon the integrity of the people with whom it is the inclination as well as the interest of all Her Majesty's subjects, and especially those residing in this province, to keep up the most friendly intercourse. The detail of facts, however, which it will be the duty of your Committee to lay before your honourable House and the British nation, will too painfully and undeniably prove that the apprehensions entertained of want of faith and of outrage and aggression on the part of the people of the United States upon Her Majesty's subjects in Upper Canada, was far from being exaggerated in the report referred to; nor was it less truly stated by the illustrious Duke of Wellington, whose patriotic and powerful advocacy of the interests of his grateful fellow-subjects in these provinces can never be forgotten by them—that these outrages and aggressions were committed for no other reason than that the people of Upper Canada were loyal to the Sovereign.

It was clearly ascertained that a secret combination or conspiracy, of vast extent, including many of the most wealthy citizens of the republic, as well as officers of the general and state governments, and possessed of great resources in money and military stores, was then in active progress, and had been on foot for some months within the jurisdiction of the United States, for the purpose of waging war upon both provinces of Canada. This combination extended from Maine to Michigan and was carried on by means of local associations resembling Masonic lodges, formed in every town and village along the frontier. The lowest estimate of the numbers of the confederates was 40,000; and the depositions of some of the informants who had been admitted into the secret of the conspirators, carried the number very much higher. A pretended national bank was organized, to be established and maintained by the seizure of public and private property in the provinces; and the chief officers who were to compose the "New Republic" were chosen and determined upon, all of them being citizens of the United States.

The superior lodges of the conspirators were established at Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit and Cincinnati; arms and warlike stores were purchased to a very large amount, and secreted in different places; and the services of at least nine steam-boats on Lake Erie, as well as of several on Lake Ontario, were secured by the leaders in this felonious association.

It has been with feelings of the deepest concern and, at times, of indignation, that the loyal people of the Canadas have observed the apathy of the Government of the United States, notwithstanding the repeated appeals which have been made to them, in restraining and punishing the brigands who are within its reach. It is a fact not only undeniable, but almost universally admitted, that the conduct of the United States is, and from the beginning has been, such as to show that they regarded with satisfaction rather than disapprobation, the attempts made to sever these colonies from the British Crown.

Notwithstanding the repeated invasions that have taken place, the murders that have been committed, the acts of piracy and arson that have been perpetrated by thousands of persons that are well known, and who are now living unmolested in the adjoining states, openly boasting of their infraction of the laws of the Union as well as of this country, not one of them has been subjected, so far as your Committee are aware, to any legal punishment. Neither does it seem in any degree probable that any of them will be molested. In like manner the conspiracy so extensively organized during the last summer and autumn, for the overthrow of the Government of the country, although undoubtedly known to hundreds of persons holding official situations, was not only not suppressed, but received direct encouragement and support from those whose duty it was to break it up, and to expose and punish all engaged in it.

Now, Sir, I come in the order of succession to the times of 1865 and 1866. It will be remembered that in 1864 and 1865 the great civil war between the North and the South was in full operation. It will be remembered also that in the fall of 1864 a raid was made by southern refugees upon the town of St. Albans, in the state of Vermont. That raid was planned and perpetrated in a part of the country sparsely settled, and was carried out privately, so that we had no knowledge of it. After raiding the town, the raiders returned to our borders. Now, what was our conduct on that occasion? Because I wish to illustrate fairly the conduct of both sides under similar circumstances. Without waiting to be asked, without any request on the part of the United States, we promptly took steps to compensate, and did compensate, the parties who had been injured in the raid, though it had been planned and carried out without our knowledge or consent. Not only that, but we sent out a large force of volunteers in the month of December following the raid, who patrolled our frontiers at great sacrifice and expense to themselves and the Canadian Government; and these volunteers, for several months from that time to the end of the American war, remained on duty to prevent any recurrence of the raid. How was this action of ours reciprocated by them? In 1865 the American war terminated, and during the mid-summer of that year our citizen soldiers were allowed to return to their homes. Shortly afterwards the Fenian organization in the United States prepared to make a raid on Canada. They publicly solicited money, purchased arms, enrolled, equipped and drilled men, and openly announced their intention to invade Canada. They commenced by making a demonstration in the month of April, 1866, on the New Brunswick borders. Our Government called out a force of 10,000 men for the defence of the Dominion. Though the United States Government were fully and publicly aware of the intention of these ruffians to invade Canada, though they publicly fixed a date for the invasion, and though in the month of June, when they crossed the Niagara River at Fort Erie, there was an American fort occupied by a regiment of United States soldiers in sight of the very place where they crossed in broad daylight, never did the United States authorities raise a hand until after they had come upon our shores, destroyed our property, killed a number of our citizens, and were driven back by the Canadian forces. Then, when the trouble was all over, when the outrage had been consummated, when the death of a number of our young men had taken place, a number of the Fenians on their return were arrested. What took place in the month of December following, when the President, in his Message to Congress, announced the action which he had taken in arresting a part of the gang on their return from Canada? Did he express any regret for the outrage, the destruction of our property, or the murder of our citizens? Not one word of regret. On the contrary, all he found to express regret for was that "some of our citizens," as he called them—thus acknowledging the responsibility of his Government—had been arrested and were now on trial. He expressed a hope for their release, and he announced the "discontinuance of the proceedings which had been instituted in the courts of the United States against those who had taken part in the expedition." And to this day we have never been able to get one cent of compensation or one word of apology for the outrage, or for the destruction of property and life which we suffered at the time of that raid. Lord Monck, in opening Parliament in the month of June, 1866, said:

The province has been invaded by a lawless band of marauders, but I congratulate the country that they were promptly confronted, and within twenty-four hours compelled to make a precipitate retreat. I deplore the loss of life and the sufferings which have been entailed upon the gallant body of the Canadian volunteers in the engagements which took place in repelling so promptly the invaders who had attacked the country, and I feel assured that you will not omit to alleviate, as far as may be in your power, the miseries so wantonly inflicted on many families. But, while I grieve for their individual loss, I must congratulate the country that the first note of danger has shown that Canada possesses in her volunteers a body of men ready to imperil their lives in defence of their Queen and country.

Now, in Hall's International Law, probably the highest authority, at all events one of the highest, referring to the action of the United States in 1837 and 1838, and to the Fenian raid in 1866, uses the following language:—

It would be difficult to find more typical instances of responsibility assumed by a state through the permission of open acts and of notorious acts, and by way of complicity after the acts. Of course, in gross cases like these, a right of immediate war accrues to the injured nation.

There may possibly be room to hope that the United States have become more alive to their duties in respect of such acts as those described; for in 1879 they showed a disposition to press state responsibility to the utmost possible extreme as against Great Britain. A body of Indians under Sitting Bull took refuge from United States troops in the then very remote and inaccessible British territory north of Montana. There was apparently reason to expect that they might make incursions into American territory. Mr. Grant, in a despatch to Sir E. Thornton, called the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the gravity of the situation which may thus be produced, and expressed a confident hope that Great Britain would be prepared on the frontier with a sufficient force either to compel the surrender of the Indians to our forces as prisoners of war, or to disarm and disable them from further hostilities, and subject them to such constraint of surveillance and subjection as will preclude any further disturbance of peace on the frontier." (Wharton Digest, 18.) In other words, the country, which had been guilty of direct complicity with raids on a friendly state from settled country close to the seat of government, did not hesitate when its own interests were involved to ask that state to undertake a distant and difficult expedition into wild and almost uninhabited regions.

I think that further comment is needless. I would further call attention to the contrast between our treatment of their soldiers during the civil war, in regard to transportation, and the treatment they extended to us on the occasion of our two North-west rebellions. During the civil war, I have seen myself whole regiments of armed American soldiers passing by railway through our territory, from one part of the United States to the other. We did not object to that, although we were blamed at the time for sympathy with the South. But what happened on the occasion of our first trouble in the North-west, when we had no railroad communication with that country? The Americans positively refused to allow us to send our soldiers through the United States to the far North-west, and we all remember the difficult march they had from Port Arthur through the wilderness to Fort Garry. At the time of the late North-west rebellion, also, they even refused to allow our troops to go through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, and you remember the hardships our citizen soldiers then had to endure going by the Canadian Pacific Railway, in its then uncompleted state. The next step I propose to trace has reference to the Confederation of the provinces of British North America. In 1867, when, instead of being frightened into annexation by the repeal of the Treaty of 1854, we determined to unite these provinces into one great confederated nation, under British institutions and in alliance with the Empire, what did the United States do? Mr. Banks, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a joint resolution respecting the proposed confederation of provinces on the northern frontier of the United States; which was read a first and second time. The joint resolution which was read at length, declares that the people of the United States cannot regard the proposed confederation of the provinces on the northern frontier of this country without extreme solicitude: that a confederation of states of this continent, extending from ocean to ocean, established without consulting the people of the provinces to be united, and founded upon monarchical principles, cannot be considered otherwise than a contravention of the traditions and constantly-declared principles of this Government, endangering its most important interests, and tending to increase and perpetuate embarrassments already existing between the two Governments immediately interested. Fancy such a resolution as that solemnly passed because we dared as free men, in the state of affairs then existing in this country, to attempt to bring about a union of these British provinces—a union which laid the foundations of a nation that in time to come, I have no doubt, will excel that of the people who assumed such an arbitrary attitude towards us under those circumstances. Another significant action in June, 1866, showed the trend of American desire. The chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, in the House of Representatives, reported the following Bill:—

That, when the Department of State should be officially informed that Great Britain and the several British provinces in Canada accepted the proposition of annexation, the President shall declare by proclamation that Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Lower Canada, Upper Canada and the territories of Selkirk, of Saskatchewan and of Columbia should be admitted into the United States as states and territories.

Now, I propose to come next—for I am endeavouring, as far as possible, to deal with events in their chronological order—to the question of reciprocity, about which there has been a great deal of discussion. As we all know, up to 1854 there was no reciprocity, and each of the countries imposed such duties as they saw fit. I shall not here enter into a discussion as to the merits or demerits of reciprocity, as it would not be pertinent in this connection and would take up too much time. I purpose merely to review the transactions and compacts that, from time to time, have taken place with reference to that question between the two Governments. The circumstances which led up to the Treaty of 1854 will be more properly detailed, when I come to deal with the fisheries matter. The Treaty of 1854, as we all know, was a broad measure of reciprocity in natural products, or raw material, between the two countries; and it will be remembered that it remained in force until abrogated in the most peremptory and unfriendly manner by the people of the United States. Not only was it so abrogated, but when Earl Russell, on receipt of the notice, wrote the American authorities, asking:

Whether the notice given by Mr. Adams in terms so peremptory is intended to put an end to the treaty, or whether it leaves open the door to negotiations,— he was informed that no negotiations would be entertained. Everybody knows now that the real cause of the abrogation of that treaty by the United States was the feeling engendered by their belief that Great Britain and Canada had sympathized with the Southern Confederacy during the great civil war. There is strong evidence in support of that contention in the report of the select committee of the United States Congress on the relations between Canada and the United States, presented to Congress 20th July, 1890, by Mr. Hoar, in which was the following paper by Mr. H. V. R. Poore.

Owing to the ungracious conduct of Great Britain towards the United States during the civil war, the upper or Canadian provinces being the headquarters of great numbers of malcontents seeking the overthrow of our Government, and the ports of the lower provinces being the resorts of privateers and vessels of war preying upon our commerce, no sooner were we relieved from the stress of war than on the 16th March, 1866, the necessary notice of one year was given for the abrogation of the treaty.

Now, there is no foundation for those assertions, and all authoritative writers now concede that they were not well founded. The fact is also well authenticated that, during the American war, from 50,000 to 75,000 Canadians fought in the Northern army. But the American authorities expected that the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 would strike such a blow at Canada as would materially check her development and progress and probably compel her to seek admission into the Union. The American people are slow to learn that such proceedings are not the way to affect the Canadian people favourably towards them. When will the American people learn the capacity of our people and the capacity of this country? They are slow to learn and slow to believe how fixed is the determination of the great majority of our people to hold and develop it under British institutions which we love so well and under the aegis of Great Britain. Their desire, however, to drive us into annexation is no proof of their friendliness. I propose next to deal with the unsuccessful efforts to obtain reciprocity. That those efforts have not been successful all people in this country will agree is owing to the persistent hostile attitude assumed by the authorities of the United States. As I have already stated, when they gave notice of the abrogation of the treaty of 1854, the British Government asked if negotiations would be entertained for its renewal, and were answered in the negative. Consul Wilkins, in a report of 7th September, 1855, on the Detroit convention, said :

The New York delegates had been well educated in the school of opposition. On behalf of the latter it was argued that no treaty should be made with an unfriendly people, and hints were thrown out that the annexation of Canada to the United States must follow the abrogation of the treaty.

The British and Canadian Governments joined in attempts to renew the treaty, and sent

Sir A. T. Galt and Hon. W. P. Howland from Canada; Hon. W. A. Henry, Nova Scotia, and Hon. A. J. Smith from New Brunswick, to Washington, to co-operate with Sir Frederick Bruce in friendly attempt to renew the treaty; but the United States authorities refused. Again, in 1869, Sir Edward Thornton made another attempt, and was refused. And in 1872 the Canadian Government, in response to a resolution of the Dominion Board of Trade, said :

That both Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Canada have availed themselves of every suitable opportunity since the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty to press upon the Government of the United States the desirability of a renewal of reciprocal trade relations between the latter country and Canada upon a broad and liberal basis; and submits for the favourable consideration of Your Excellency in Council, that the Dominion Board of Trade be informed that should the Government of the United States comply with the wishes of the United States National Board of Trade, the subject will receive the fullest consideration of the Government of Canada.

Again, in 1874, Sir Edward Thornton and the Hon. George Brown, after much discussion, negotiated a treaty; but the Senate refused to ratify it, and the United States Government, though they had encouraged the negotiations, and had agreed to the treaty, used no effort whatever to influence the Senate in favour of its ratification. In 1888, when the Fishery Treaty—which I will refer to later—was negotiated with Mr. Cleveland, our Government wanted to discuss reciprocity; but President Cleveland declined. Last session, under Mr. Harrison's regime, our Government succeeded in getting an informal discussion of the reciprocity question. With what result? With the result that they were plainly informed that the only terms upon which the Americans would negotiate a treaty was that it should be a treaty covering both manufactured and raw material, that we should have a uniform tariff fixed by the Government of the United States, with discrimination imposed against all countries, and especially against Great Britain, and with a uniform excise law also fixed by the United States. These terms, I am satisfied, no right-minded or independent Canadian would for one moment think of entertaining. They were terms that, in my opinion, if accepted, would hand over this country to the United States and to direct taxation. With regard to those efforts to obtain reciprocity, and with regard to the other matters I have discussed, I wish to say that the fault lies almost entirely with the American authorities. The political lessons they instil from time to time into the people seem to be such that whatever be the will of the other portions of the United States, as expressed from time to time, the politicians are so powerful that they goad up a continuous trend of public opinion against anything British or English, and this they have done from the time of the revolution up to the present. Now, Sir,

I come to some more important considerations; I come to the fisheries, the transit in bond, reciprocal use of canals and retaliatory proceedings on the part of the United States. These run so into each other that I shall deal with them as they occur in the different treaties. The first convention in regard to fisheries was contained in the treaty of 1783, which, as I before stated, ended the revolutionary war. That remained in force until abrogated by the war of 1812. The Treaty of Ghent, which was made in 1814 and terminated the war of 1812, was silent as to the fishery question, because the United States and Great Britain failed to agree upon any convention in regard to it, so that the treaty of 1783 was abrogated. The consequence was that the American fishermen not only claimed the old privileges of the treaty of 1783, but they smuggled and committed serious violations of the law. I quote from a letter of Lord Bathurst to Mr. Adams, dated 30th October, 1815, in which, speaking of American fishermen, he said, among other things:

They forcibly excluded British vessels from places where the fishery might be most advantageously conducted. They had likewise (i.e. Her Majesty's Government) reason to complain of the clandestine introduction of prohibited goods into the British colonies by American vessels ostensibly engaged in the fishing trade, to the great injury of the British revenue.

These flagrant breaches of the law continued down to the treaty of 1818, which granted the United States fishermen "liberty" to fish on certain North American coasts, and they "renounced forever" any liberty heretofore claimed to take, cure or dry fish within three marine miles of the bays, etc., not in the permitted territory, and obtained permission to enter bays, etc., for shelter, for repairs of damage, for wood, and for water, and for no other purposes whatever. This treaty was constantly broken, down to 1854.

Mr. FORBES. Is that treaty in force to-day?

Mr. TISDALE. Certainly, but they constantly broke its provisions down to 1854. But they have got other privileges to-day, which I will come to presently. I call attention to that fact to show that they have continuously acted on the same line. Every time they got a concession, they wanted more; every time they got a concession they took more under it. When they had not concessions, they took them, particularly in those times. During the period between 1818 and 1854, they were encouraged by their public men, both in Congress and out of it, as their own papers and documents will show, to encroach upon our rights. In proof of that, I will quote from Schuyler's American Diplomacy:

Very many seizures and confiscations of American vessels by the British authorities took place on the following grounds:—1. Fishing within the prescribed limits. 2. Anchoring or hovering in shore during calm weather without any ostensible cause, having on board ample supplies of wood and water. 3. Lying at anchor and remaining inside of bays to clean and pick fish. 4. Purchasing and bartering bait and preparing to fish. 5. Selling goods and buying supplies. 6. Landing and transshipping cargoes of fish.

Those difficulties were finally settled by the treaty of 1854, by which we got reciprocal trade, and their fishermen got material concessions beyond those granted under the treaty of 1818. As I have already mentioned, the Government of the United States, in 1866, in the most peremptory and unfriendly manner, abrogated the treaty of 1854, and they refused even to consider negotiations for renewal. This, of course, terminated their fishery rights under the treaty of 1854. What did we do? Following our invariable custom of concession and friendliness, we agreed for a nominal consideration, if they would take out licenses, to allow them the benefit of our inshore fisheries. What followed on their part? The number of licenses taken out shrank from 354 to 25 in three years, although the number of American vessels fishing in our waters increased to from 700 to 1,000. Even with that concession, for an infinitesimal consideration, they took advantage of it to such an extent that, although they took out 354 licenses at first, there were only 25 in existence when the treaty was terminated. Besides that, they paid no attention to the terms of the treaty of 1818, but they simply took greater advantages. They openly defied the law, they transhipped cargoes, and refused to pay customs duties, they smuggled liquors, disturbed the peace, and, in some places, our people were compelled to put a guard by night over their property. That was the state of affairs among the fishermen while they were enjoying the concession that we, in a friendly spirit, granted to them. Then, because our Government took steps to punish offenders and to maintain the rights of Canadian citizens, General Grant, in his Message to Congress, in 1870, gave utterance to threats that were as undignified as they were unjust, in a state paper of that sort. One or two extracts will suffice to show their spirit. He says:

The Imperial Government is understood to have delegated the whole or a share of its jurisdiction or control of these inshore fishing grounds to the Colonial authority known as the Dominion of Canada, and this semi-independent but irresponsible agent has exercised its delegated powers in an unfriendly way.

And further:

Anticipating that an attempt may possibly be made by the Canadian authorities in the coming season to repeat their unneighbourly acts towards our fishermen, I recommend you to confer upon the Executive the power to suspend, by proclamation, the operation of the laws authorizing the transit of goods, wares and merchandise in bond across the territory of the United States to Canada, and further, should such an extreme measure become necessary, to suspend the operation of any laws whereby the vessels of the Dominion of Canada are permitted to enter the waters of the United States.

However, notwithstanding this, their failure to observe even the terms of this friendly concession that we made to them was so open and flagrant, that there was nothing left for our Government to do but to make the necessary measures to enforce the terms of the treaty; and so they equipped a protective service, which, aided by the British gunboats on duty in American waters, seized and confiscated a number of American vessels. I think some fifteen. This, seemingly, had a healthy effect for a time, because, shortly after that, we were able to make a fishery treaty, called the treaty of Washington, in 1871. We all know the important features of the treaty of 1871. I will mention some of the most important points of that treaty, which are pertinent to a discussion of this sort. The first feature was the reciprocal use of the canal systems of the respective countries by their respective citizens, upon the same terms as they were enjoyed by the citizens of the country to which they belonged; secondly, the transit through the respective countries of foreign goods in bond; thirdly, the transit in our vessels and railways, of goods, etc., from one part of the United States to another part of the United States, and "vice versa"; fourthly, each country was granted the right to use the inshore fisheries of the other. Fifth, that a board of arbitrators be appointed to assess damages, if any, that either country may have suffered by the use of the fisheries of the other during the disputed period, of which I have spoken. Sixth, the Americans gave us the right to import fish free. No better illustration of the spirit of two Governments in dealing with each other in regard to international matters can be quoted than this one. The British and Canadian authorities immediately passed legislation, so that almost at once the Americans, not only the fishermen, but the whole American nation, became entitled to use in the broadest sense—I say the broadest sense, because we followed not only the letter but the spirit of the agreement—the benefits granted by Canada. Not only so, but during the time the treaty existed, in spite of numerous instances contrary to the spirit of the agreement, to which I will presently refer, the Americans acted in the very opposite spirit, notwithstanding the fact that we have allowed them from that time to the present, and are allowing them still, the full use of all those benefits. What was the conduct of the Americans? Three years elapsed before they named arbitrators who were to assess the fishery damages; and when they did give us independent and unprejudiced arbitrators, we obtained an award of $5,500,000 as damages, for the use of our fisheries. Further, when the award was made, the American agent took a technical objection to it, and it was paid under an ungracious protest. Although the treaty was conceded to be friendly to them, they tried to enjoy more rights than were conceded to them and kept up an aggressive attitude. Five years elapsed before they allowed us to enjoy the use of their canals, even according to the letter of the agreement, and before they would permit our boats to go as far as Albany. Even then, they deprived Canadians of all benefit by refusing to allow the use of the Hudson River, so that our vessels could get no return cargoes, though we allowed them the use of the Ottawa and Richelieu rivers in parallel cases. They nullified the concession in favour of the Canadians in reference to free fish by exacting a duty of 1½ cents on the cans. The United States applied to have Prince Edward Island, which was not then part of the Dominion, extend the privileges of the treaty to American fishermen, which it did, and the United States Government promised to use its endeavour to get refunded all duties paid on fish or fish oil during the period which would elapse before Congress confirmed the treaty. This they subsequently refused to do. Further, because the treaty was signed in July, 1871, two months before British Columbia became a part of the Dominion, although their Act giving force to the treaty was not passed until 1872, and although we gave the United States fishermen the full benefit of the treaty from its date, they have always refused to allow British Columbia the benefits of the clause regarding free fish. The abrogation of the treaty of 1871 was entirely the work of the United States. In July, 1883, under authority from Congress, the President gave notice, terminating on 1st July, 1885, the fishery clauses of the treaty. Though the notice was silent as to the clause relating to the transit of foreign goods through the respective countries, the President has lately held that that was abrogated. Here again came an illustration of the spirit of American diplomacy. So anxious were the Americans to repeal the treaty that it was abrogated in the midst of the fishing season, many of their vessels being at that time fishing on our shores. The President again appealed to the good-will of Great Britain and Canada, and obtained an agreement or modus vivendi by which their vessels were allowed to continue their operations in Canadian waters until the close of the season. The President promised, as part of the understanding, to bring the subject of the fisheries before Congress, and recommend the appointment of a committee to consider the matter and see if any new arrangement could be made. What the President said was as follows:—

In the interest of maintaining good neighbourhood and friendly intercourse between the two countries, thus affording a prospect of negotiation for the development and extension of trade between the United States and British North America.

In his Message to Congress in December, 1885, the President recommended the appointment of the committee in question in these words:

The fishing interests, he said, being intimately related to other general questions dependent on contiguity and intercourse, consideration thereof, in all their equities, might also properly come within the purview of such a commission and the fullest latitude of expression on both sides should be permitted.

The Senate, with the usual exhibition of friendly feeling towards Canada, rejected it by 35 to 10 votes. The benefit to their fishermen having been acquired for that season at the expense of Canada, any "further latitude or expression" was unnecessary. Notwithstanding the concession of this modus vivendi for 1885, on 2nd July, 1885, the very next day after the notice expired, the United States Treasury issued an order cancelling the right of shipment of goods in transit in either Canadian or United States vessels to pass through Canada to the United States. In twenty-two days, however, they rescinded that order as to United States vessels, because they found this hurt themselves, and to this day we have allowed them the benefit of that concession, although they have refused a like concession to us. Further, they continue their regulations, which practically prevent our boats from using their canals, except the St. Mary's Canal, and we still allow them to enjoy to the full extent the use of our canals and the rivers connecting them. They are not ashamed to accept benefits from the generous spirit of the Canadian people, while declining to reciprocate. The rejection by the Senate of the President's proposal of a commission for inquiry left no course open for Canada but an enforcement of her rights under the treaty of 1818. The seizure of a number of American vessels for infringement of our rights brought about a renewal of correspondence, which led to the appointment of plenipotentiaries in 1887 to negotiate a treaty. On 15th February, 1888, a treaty was duly signed, in reference to the fisheries, between the negotiators. President Cleveland forwarded the treaty to the Senate, with his Message on 20th February, 1888, in which he said :

As a result of such negotiations a treaty has been agreed upon between Her Britannic Majesty and the United States, concluded and signed in this capital under my direction and authority on the 15th of February instant, and which I now have the honour to submit to the Senate, with the recommendation that it shall receive the consent of the body, as provided in the Constitution, in order that the ratifications thereof may be duly exchanged and the treaty be carried into effect.

And again he said :

Especially satisfactory do I believe the proposed arrangement will be found by those of our citizens who are engaged in the open-sea fisheries adjacent to the Canadian coast, and resorting to those ports and harbours under treaty provisions and rules of international law.

Again :

The hospitality secured for our vessels in all cases of actual distress, with liberty to unload and sell and tranship their cargoes, is full and liberal.

Mr. TISDALE.

Again :

The treaty meets my approval, because I believe that it supplies a satisfactory, practical and final adjustment upon a basis honourable and just to both parties, of the difficult and vexed question to which it relates.

Again :

The treaty now submitted to you has been framed in a spirit of liberal equity and reciprocal benefits, in the conviction that mutual advantage and convenience are the only permanent foundations of peace and friendship between states, and that with the adoption of the agreement now placed before the Senate, a beneficial and satisfactory intercourse between the two countries will be established so as to secure perpetual peace and harmony.

Again, referring to the modus vivendi offered by the British plenipotentiaries of their own accord, pending the adoption of the treaty, he said :

This paper, freely and on their own motion, signed by the British conferees, not only extends advantages to our fishermen pending the ratification of the treaty, but appears to have been dictated by a friendly and amicable spirit.

Mr. Bayard, his Secretary of State, referring to the conference, said :

He hoped and believed that the conference had led to a basis upon which Canada and the United States could look forward to a period of enlarged intercourse and increasingly friendly relations.

The treaty was submitted to the Senate, but after a prolonged debate, it was rejected. Now, what was the action of the President of the United States, who had expressed himself in a satisfied and friendly manner in the utterances which I have briefly quoted, and whose plenipotentiaries, on the 5th February, alluding to the modus vivendi, had thanked the British and Canadian plenipotentiaries for, as they expressed it :

This manifestation of an intention on the part of the British plenipotentiaries by the means referred to, to maintain the relations of good neighbourhood between the British possessions in North America and the United States.

Let me quote from the Message of the President on 29th August, eight days after the rejection of the treaty by the Senate :

The co-operation necessary for the adjustment of the long-standing national difference with which we have to deal, by methods of conference and agreement having been thus declined, I am by no means disposed to abandon the interests and rights of our people in the premises or to neglect their grievances ; and I therefore turn to the contemplation of a plan of retaliation as a mode, which still remains, of treating the situation. * * *

I deem it my duty, therefore, to call the attention of Congress to certain particulars in the action of the authorities of the Dominion of Canada, in addition to the general allegations already made, which appears to be on such marked contrast to the liberal and friendly disposition of our own country as, in my opinion, to call for such legislation as will upon the principles already stated, properly supplement [the power to inaugurate retaliation already vested in the Executive.

One hardly knows what language to use to properly characterise such a lamentable exhibition of inconsistency on the head of a great nation. In 1887 what may be called the retaliatory policy of the United States was inaugurated by Mr. Gorman in passing the following resolution :—

That the President of the United States is authorized whenever it shall appear to him that there is an insistence on the part of the Canadian authorities with the obstructions, indignities and annoyances above recited, to issue his proclamation, prohibiting the transit through the United States or the territorial waters thereof from point to point in Canada or from Canada to the ocean, of any engines, cars, goods or vessels proceeding from Canada.

Upon this resolution an Act was passed, on 3rd March, 1887, enabling the President to cut off all privileges from British or Canadian vessels, which were alleged not to be granted to American vessels in Canadian ports. It did not matter to them whether there were any treaty obligations—in fact these obligations did actually exist—the President was authorized to debar our vessels from all privileges. The violation of existing treaties by the Legislature of the United States, I think you will see before I am through, is an added jurisdiction that they have assumed in modern times. To show the spirit of the American Senate in passing this Act, I will make one quotation—I could make many of them which are equally offensive and equally unjust to us—Senator Dolph said :

The Congress of the United States by the Act of 3rd March, 1887, conferred upon the President of the United States power to deny to the vessels of the Canadian and other British provinces of North America, the privileges in the ports of the United States which were denied to American vessels in the ports of the Canadian provinces ; and it further conferred upon him power to retaliate upon the Canadian provinces for the unlawful, unjust and brutal treatment of our fishermen in Canadian waters, and for the denial or abridgment of the rights of our citizens, under the treaty of 1818 or under International law, in Canadian waters.

At this very time the American fishermen were enjoying privileges under the modus vivendi which we had voluntarily granted them in connection with the treaty of 1888, and which they had rejected. Fancy a man getting up in Congress and using such arrogant, insulting and untruthful language under such circumstances. We still allowed them these privileges, although the time was long since past that they were entitled to them under the modus vivendi, and although they rejected the treaty, we gave them the privileges and still allow them without any return. In September, 1888, the Retaliatory Bill of President Cleveland was passed, and, although he never acted upon it, it was used as a threatening and disturbing element in connection with our transportation relations with the United States. In August, 1888, the Senate adopted a resolution to inquire into the question of transportation relations between Canada and the United States, and in December of the same year, the Inter-State Commerce Committee were instructed to make inquiries. In May, 1889, Mr. Collum, from that committee, submitted a report which, among other things, contained the following :—

At no period in our history have the American people been called upon to consider a scheme of encroachment upon American commercial interests more injurious than the scheme by the Dominion of Canada in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the subsidizing of British steamer lines on the Pacific Ocean in connection with such railway, and finally, by an arrangement by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with an American steam-ship company by which goods are carried in bond between Port Moody and the seaports of Washington, Oregon and California to and from the east via the Canadian Pacific Railway and rendering certain the destruction of American steamer lines now engaged in our foreign commerce and the diversion of our Asiatic commerce from American seaports to the ports of British Columbia.

It is beyond question, from this, that American politicians look upon the legitimate attempts of a great transport corporation to compete for business as an international offence, and call upon their Government to retaliate, instead of themselves resorting to intelligent competition to meet it. In July, 1890, Mr. Hoar, from the Select Committee on Relations with Canada, presented a great bulk of evidence, but no summary of conclusions, and in that there were included two offensive and untruthful papers from Levi Woodbury and Joseph Nimmo. The testimony that they called before that committee was largely collected with a view of showing the worst possible state of affairs in Canada, and showing unfriendly sentiments in regard to closer relations with them. The McKinley Bill was passed in September, 1890, and we know that the object of that Bill was unfriendly to Canada. In July, 1892, the Retaliatory Bill of President Harrison was passed, under which, he, in August, 1892, issued a proclamation imposing tolls on Canadian vessels passing through the Sault Ste. Marie Canals. I wish to say one word with regard to this. In the long series of transactions, of a diplomatic and international nature with the United States, from 1783 up to the present time, that is the only one that I can find, after a fair perusal of the records, where it was even discussable as to which might be right and which might be wrong. In regard to these canal tolls, I believe that, putting the same construction upon the treaty, and considering the narrow construction that they put upon the way they allowed us to use their canals, our Government were fully justified, so far as the letter of that treaty went, in imposing the canal tolls in the way they did. But our Government having done that, what was their treatment of us ? Did they exhibit the conciliatory spirit that we have exhibited from time to time, and even for years together, in regard to the friction that arose from time to time under the treaties ? No ; they said at once : We are right ; you are wrong, and you must do so-and-so. There was no question of referring the matter to any authority—no disposition to meet the conciliatory spirit in which our Government suggested that they should wait, at all events, until the existing season was over, so as not to disturb the arrangements that had been made for the season. Not at all. They were bound to retaliate, and a Bill authorizing the President, not only to retaliate in that respect, but giving him much wider power, was passed by Congress.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I think the hon. member cannot continue to speak upon this motion, as it will require an expenditure of public money. I think it should come from the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. ACTING-SPEAKER (Mr. Tyrwhitt). I think the hon. gentleman is perfectly in order.

Mr. TISDALE. I hope the other hon. gentleman was in order; it is impossible for me to say. Lastly, we had the farewell Message of President Harrison, in which he suggests that, whether there is any treaty in force or not, allowing us to transport goods through the United States, they should make such internal regulations as to render it impossible for us to take advantage of the transportation concessions, and to render them as nugatory as the privileges that we supposed we had in connection with the use of their canals. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to some excuses or pretenses frequently put forward to justify the unfriendly attitude of the United States in the way of retaliation. There are two in particular. First, that we have subsidized the Canadian Pacific Railway so unduly, and so far beyond anything that the American Government have done for their transcontinental lines, as to make it unfair to allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to come into competition with their railways; and, secondly, that both the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, being beyond the control of the inter-state commerce law, have an advantage over the American lines, and have not complied with that law in reference to thorough business. Now, President Harrison, in his Message, states:

The statutes relating to the transportation of merchandise between the United States and the British possessions should be the subject of review. The Treasury regulations have given to these laws a construction and a scope that I do not think was contemplated by Congress. A policy adapted to the new conditions growing in part out of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railroad should be declared and the business placed upon a basis more just to our people and to our transportation companies. If we continue the policy of supervising rates upon the railroads of the United States we cannot in fairness at the same time give these unusual facilities for competition to Canadian roads that are free to pursue the practices as to cut rates and favoured rates that we condemn and punish if practised by our own railroads. I regret that circumstances prevented an earlier examination by me of these questions, but submit now these views in the hope that they may lead to a revision of the laws upon a safer and juster basis.

Now, Sir, I have taken the trouble of ascertaining, and I propose to read the true figures in regard to the subventions given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and those given to the great American transcontinental lines. In regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway, I find that the Government built 708 miles and the company the balance, being 1,917 miles, making a total of 2,625 miles. Our Government granted to the railway 25,000,000 acres of land, of which they took back, at $1.50 an acre, 7,000,000 acres, making a value of $10,000,000. The balance, 18,000,000, I value at $2 an acre, making $36,000,000. The cash granted by the Government was $25,000,000. This makes in all $71,000,000, or, say $37,000 a mile for what was built by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The 708 miles built by the Government, including all explorations, trial lines and surveys, cost $37,000,000. This makes the total cost of the 2,625 miles $108,000,000. Now, take the main line of the Northern Pacific Railway, from St. Paul to Tacoma. I only deal with the main lines, because I cannot get the proper statistics in regard to the branch lines, though I venture to say that in the case of the branch lines you will find as great a disparity as you do in the case of the main lines. The total length of the Northern Pacific main line is 1,911 miles. The land grants from Wisconsin and Minnesota were twenty sections or 12,800 acres a mile. I estimate that grant at $4 an acre, which is a lower relative rate than $2 an acre for the lands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The land grants from Dakota, Montana, Idaho and Washington were forty sections, or 25,000 acres, a mile, which I put at $2 an acre, the same value as I have put upon the Canadian Pacific Railway lands, though, at the time, the former were considered the more valuable. That gives the Northern Pacific an average of $51,200 a mile, as compared with the $41,000 a mile granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway, or $10,200 a mile more, making the total grants for the 1,911 miles $98,000,000. But, when we come to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific, what do we find? The mileage of the Union Pacific Railroad, from Council Bluffs to Ogden, is 1,034 miles, so that the land grant of 12,000,000 acres for the whole mileage, at $2 an acre, would amount in value to $24,000,000. The report of the Commissioner of Railways of the United States to the Minister of the Interior, on 30th June, 1882, shows that the amount due on bonds of the United States delivered to the company, was $62,000,000. Then, we take the Central Pacific Railroad proper, from Ogden to San Francisco, with a mileage of 985 miles. For this the land grants from the United States amounted to 8,000,000 acres, which, at $2 an acre, gives a sum of $16,000,000; and the report of the Commissioner of Railways of the United States to the Minister of the Interior dated 30th June, 1892, shows that the amount due on bonds delivered to the company by the United States Government was $64,000,000, or a total grant to the whole system of the Union Pacific Railroad of $166,000,000. This, on a total mileage of 1,929 miles, gives $87,000 a mile, or $46,000 a mile more than the Canadian Pacific Railway got. To summarize: The Northern Pacific, for 1,911 miles, got subventions amounting to $98,000,000; the Canadian Pacific Railway, for 2,625 miles, or 714 miles more than the Northern Pacific, got subventions amounting to $108,000,000, or only $10,000,000 more; the Union and Central Pacific, with a mileage of 1,929 miles, or 696 miles less than the Canadian Pacific Railway, got subventions to the extent of $166,000,000, nearly double the subventions for a little over two-thirds of the mileage of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, in reference to the non-observance of the inter-state commerce law by our two great railway corporations, I wrote to the general manager of each road. In reply, I received from Mr. Van Horne a reference to a letter which he had sent to the New York "Times," and from which I quote, as follows:—

As to the Interstate Commerce Law, permit me to say that so far as the Canadian Pacific is concerned every pound of United States freight it carries is carried in accordance with the requirements of that law. If there has been any violation of that law on the part of the Canadian Pacific Company, some specific cases must surely have come to the knowledge of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, and if this Company has in any case defied the law or shown any disposition to withhold information from the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, the Commissioners must surely know of it.

In the sixth annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners just published, it is somewhat broadly hinted that the Canadian railways are evading the law. The Commissioners may not have had the Canadian Pacific in mind, but as the public may have taken their strictures as applying to it, I desire to say, in the most emphatic terms, that if the Interstate Commerce law has been violated by this company, it has been without the knowledge of the directors and executive officers, and I have yet to hear of the first specific complaint of anything even looking like an international violation of the law on our part.

Mr. Sergeant, general manager, replied as follows:—

With reference to the inquiry which you have made as to the observance by this company of the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Law, I beg to say that when this Act was passed by Congress a general consultation with our counsel, American and Canadian, took place, with the object of formulating such regulations for the guidance of the company's staff as would, in their judgment, strictly carry out the provisions of the Act. As a result, my predecessor issued general order No. 85, dated 25th March, 1887, of which I have the pleasure to enclose copy. This will evidence the spirit in which we dealt with the question.

A number of rulings have been made by the Commission which may possibly have varied, to some extent, the very stringent instructions then issued.

You are probably aware that states to states tariffs, both east and westbound, are the result of conference between the whole of the carrying lines. These tariffs are separately deposited with the Commission and have been since the date of the enactment by the Grand Trunk.

Tariffs are also deposited with the Commission from Canadian to States points by the company.

Our local tariffs have been the subject of examination by the Commissioners. They were forwarded to Washington as a matter of courtesy in order that the fullest opportunity might be given of checking them, and in no case has it been found that any one provision of the law has been infringed.

The Grand Trunk was cited before the Commission in a case which involved the question whether the law extended to tariffs from points of origin in the United States to points of destination in Canada. It was held by the Commission that it did. In one of the United States courts, however, a subsequent ruling of the judge was that the United States jurisdiction did not extend beyond its territory. Whether this ruling is sound or not the company has declined to avail itself of it, as we have always been willing to comply with the provisions of the Act apart from any technicality.

I am under the impression that the agitation upon this subject in the United States is mainly due to the efforts of rival railway companies who allege that the non-application of the Act in Canada itself affords this company some mysterious means of manipulating through rates, forgetful of the fact that Canada is precisely in the same position as the State of New York, or any other state in the Union, to which this legislation does not apply.

If I can give you any further information upon the subject, I shall be happy to do so.

These extracts and figures, I think, dispose very effectually of either one, or rather both, those charges. I do not propose here to refer to the Behring Sea matter, further than to call attention simply to the high-handed manner in which the American gun boats seized our fishing vessels on the high seas, carried them into hostile ports, confiscated the cargoes and ships and treated the crews in a very high-handed and unfriendly manner. You will remember, Sir, that they paid no attention to the protests of Canada, and at first to the remonstrances of England, and it was only when Lord Salisbury gave them to understand that if they did not pay attention to his protests he would send the British fleet out there and blow their gun boats out of the water that they came to terms, and this matter is now in a proper way of adjustment by international arbitration. Neither do I here propose to do more than cast a passing glance at the question of the delineation of the boundaries of Oregon and of Maine. We all know that, as regards Oregon, the Americans got an immense tract of country which they were not entitled to, and with regard to the Maine boundary they obtained that in a way which reflects great discredit on the diplomatic methods employed by them, because they got thousands of square miles of territory by the suppression and concealment of a map, about the existence of which the other plenipotentiaries knew nothing. Another marked contrast between their treatment of us and our treatment of them is the letting of contracts for public work. No Canadian can get a dollars worth of a public contract in the United States, no matter how low he may tender, while we throw open our public contracts to the Americans. Although we have plenty of able contractors in this country, we let our contracts out to open competition, and if an American tenders sufficiently low he will be given the preference. In closing this branch of the subject I wish to call attention for a short time to an illustration, which I think is an excellent one, of the peculiar notions and methods of American authorities, both executive and legislative, in dealing with solemn treaties and international compacts. I refer to clause 29 of the treaty of 1871. The joint resolution providing for a notice to repeal the treaty read as follows :

Joint resolution providing for the termination of articles numbered XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and article numbered XXX of the treaty between the United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, concluded at Washington, May 8, 1871. Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That in the judgment of Congress the provisions of articles numbered XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and of article XXX of the treaty between the United States and Her Britannic Majesty, for an amicable settlement of all causes of difference between the two countries, concluded at Washington on the 8th day of May, A.D. 1871, ought to be terminated at the earliest possible time, and be no longer in force.

When that joint resolution came up for approval in the Senate it was considerably discussed, and I will read part of the debate which took place :

Mr. WINDOM—I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont whether section 3, which repeals “An Act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington, the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries,” will repeal the Act under which goods are imported in transit through American territory.”—[That refers to clause 29.]—I desire to say that I am very unwilling to repeal those clauses of the treaty and those laws which relate to transportation in bond through this country, because it is a very large business, and a very great interest would be injured if it should be done. The question is whether the law which is proposed to be repealed affects transportation ?

Mr. EDMUNDS—The 29th article of the treaty provides for complete transit from the sea at Portland to Quebec, and from Port Huron, in Michigan, to Buffalo, for another illustration ; reciprocally.

Mr. FRYE—No notice is given as to article 29. I said to both the Senators from Minnesota that it did not interfere at all with the rights and privileges which were of advantage to us. I refer to the 29th article, which was not repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS—To guard against all possible misconstruction about it, I move to amend—so that we repeal the Act only that far.

Mr. McMILLAN—I think that covers it.

Mr. WINDOM—I am sure it does.

In Congress, upon the same question :

Mr. WASHBURN—I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the passage of this joint resolution will in any way interfere with section 2866, Revised Statutes, which provides for the carrying of goods in transit through this country ?

Mr. TISDALE.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts [who moved the resolution]. Those provisions are excepted from the operations of this resolution in terms in the resolution—this applies only to the fisheries.

President Arthur, in issuing his proclamation, terminating the treaty under the authority of the joint resolution, used the following words :—

Now, therefore, I, Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States of America, do hereby give public notice that Articles XVIII., XIX., XX., XXI., XXII., XXIII., XXIV., XXV., XXX. and XXXII., of the treaty of Washington, concluded May 8, 1871, will expire and terminate on the 1st day of July, 1885, and all citizens of the United States are hereby warned that none of the privileges secured by the above-recited articles of the treaty in question will exist after the 1st day of July next ; all American fishermen should govern themselves accordingly.

In January, 1877, Mr. Cleveland's Secretary of State wrote as follows :—

This document is reprinted in full in the recently printed executive document in relation to the rights of American fishermen in British North American waters (Executive Document No. 19, House of Representatives, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pages 199-210) a copy of which is also inclosed herewith.

The treaty of Washington between the United States and Great Britain did not relate solely to the Canadian fisheries. Only the fishery articles thereof were abrogated, as enumerated in the President's proclamation of January 31, 1885.

The remaining articles, comprising those which relate to commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American possessions, are still in force.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) T. F. BAYARD.

The Retaliation Bill of 1887 assumed, from its very terms, that clause 29 was still in force. It said :

And upon proof that the privileges secured by Article XXIX of the treaty concluded between the United States and Great Britain on the 8th day of May, 1871, are denied as to goods, wares, and merchandise arriving at the ports of British North America, the President may also, by proclamation, forbid the exercise of the like privileges as to goods, wares, and merchandise arriving in any ports of the United States.

When, in 1888, President Cleveland's Retaliation Bill was passed upon the assumption that this article 29 was still in force, Representative Nelson, in discussing that Bill, to which he was opposed, because he claimed that clause 29 was still in force, used these words, and I quote them as an illustration of the arguments used and deemed sufficient to induce American Representatives and Senators to vote in a certain way on matters relating to England and Canada :

The truth of it is, and we might as well state it in plain terms without any circumlocution, that the President in his zeal to “un-English” himself before the American people has permitted himself, in a sort of mental hallucination, engendered no doubt by the stress of a political campaign, to recommend the unwarranted abrogation of a solemn international compact—a compact, too, that concerns one of the most important and momentous interests of the country, and from the abrogation of which we would suffer far more than our neighbour. And he asks our legislative sanction for such abrogation.

And we as legislators sitting here, not to be outdone in what has jocosely been termed torturing the British lion, will no doubt after mild verbal protests complacently pass the President's little bill.

So to-day, when the President attempts to carry aloft, perched on his banner, that bird of freedom before us and the American people, although we can see little or no occasion therefor, yet a glimpse of that bird, however slight or momentary, engenders in each bosom a spirit to do or dare all that the Republic may ask, whether right or wrong; and in this spirit do we acquiesce in yielding to the President what little he now asks, for we all have a love for our land as if she were our daughter: her pipes in peace, her tomahawks in war.

Then, Mr. Cleveland, in his Message of August, 1888, used the following language:—

In any event, and whether the law of 1873 construes the treaty or governs it, sec. 29 of such treaty. I have no doubt, terminated with the proceedings taken by our Government to terminate articles 18 to 25 inclusive and article 30 of the treaty.

If by any language used in the joint resolution it was intended to relieve sec. 3 of the Act of 1873, embodying article 29 of the treaty, from its own limitation, or to save the article itself, I am entirely satisfied that the intention miscarried.

Mr. Harrison affirmed this attitude in his farewell Message, because he says:

I have asked the opinion of the Attorney-General upon this question, and he is of the opinion that article 29 has been abrogated * * * * *
I have come to the conclusion that article 29 of the Treaty of Washington has been abrogated.

We certainly have here a not very reassuring illustration of the consistency of American opinion in regard to their international relation. Neither in the resolution that I read, authorizing the President to give notice of their intention to terminate the Treaty of Washington, nor in the Proclamation subsequently issued abrogating the Treaty, do you find clause 29 mentioned; and in both Houses of the American Congress, gentlemen who said they were opposed to the repeal of article 29, arose in their places and asked those in charge of the motion whether it would affect that clause of the treaty, and they were solemnly assured in both Houses that the legislation asked for would in no way affect clause 29. Four years after the Secretary of State of the United States wrote an official letter, declaring positively that clause 29 was still in force; and later, both branches of the Legislature joined with the President in passing an Act which assumed that that clause was still in force. Yet we find that in 1888 President Cleveland, in face of a political exigency, turned around and solemnly declared that the treaty was repealed, and asked both branches of the Legislature to pass an Act, which they did, based upon that assumption.

Lastly, we find President Harrison, in his farewell Message, backed up by his Attorney-General, without any explanation whatever, as to how he arrived at the conclusion under this state of facts, solemnly affirming that it had been repealed, and asked for legislation accordingly. Now, that brings me to consider, for a moment, what, under these circumstances, our attitude ought to be in regard to the United States people and Government. I have shown that our fishery relations with them are precisely where they were in 1818, with this important exception, that the fishermen of the United States are to-day enjoying all the benefits that were obtained under the "modus vivendi" in connection with the treaty of 1888, which treaty they promptly rejected, and they still continue to enjoy them, practically, to the full extent, without our getting anything in return. I have shown that the privileges granted our vessels under the treaty of 1871 have been abrogated in the most peremptory and unfriendly manner, and they have persistently refused them to us, though we continue to allow them their full enjoyment for no return. I have shown that, in regard to our canals, they are enjoying to the broadest extent the full benefits that were granted to them under that treaty, while, by the internal regulations that they exacted from us, except on the St. Mary's canal, we do not enjoy anything; and that their extraordinary rulings in reference to the abrogation and construction of solemn treaties and international compacts and the retaliatory nature of the authority bestowed by the Legislature upon the President, are such that, coupled with the unfriendly and menacing Messages submitted to Congress from time to time by the President, we can never feel certain how soon all commercial relations and interchange of traffic may be prohibited. As to reciprocity, in my opinion, we have taken every possible method to secure it that any right-minded or independent Canadian would consider we should take. I think we are now more than ever entitled to use the language which was used in 1878 by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), then Finance Minister, and the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, then Prime Minister. The member for South Oxford, in speaking at Halifax, on August 19, 1878, used these words:

For my part, I deny that we are dependent upon them in one way or another. No Canadian statesman can do a worse service than to spread that idea among any great number of his fellow-countrymen.

And at Charlottetown, in August, 1878, referring to the failure of the Hon. George Brown, in connection with that treaty, he said:

It is said we must have reciprocity and cannot along without it; I deny this. We will seek out new markets. We have men and we have ships and will carry the war into Africa.

Mr. Mackenzie, on 18th February, 1878, questioned as to efforts for reciprocity, said :

As that question has been put here categorically, I may say once for all, that since the effort made by the Government through the Honourable George Brown, the Government had made no effort to secure Reciprocity—when the United States made any propositions, the Government would be prepared to consider them.

The more I examine the records, the more I am struck with astonishment and admiration at the patient and tolerant spirit of the people of Canada. Let us continue this spirit coupled with a dignified self-reliance. I am satisfied, for my part, that it will be better for the people of the United States and better for us, the sooner we give them unmistakably to understand, "come weal, come woe," we purpose to hold and maintain Canada as Canada, for the Canadians; that we purpose to stand by British institutions and British connection against all comers; and that we are determined to construct, upon the boundless heritage which God and nature have given us, a great British Canadian nation. Sir, taking the history of Canada, whether with or without reciprocity, we have every reason to be satisfied, hopeful and confident—no reason for doubt or alarm, let alone despair or craven fear. Let us treat our neighbours with friendship, firmness and independence. If they are coercive and aggressive, let us be self-reliant but not boastful, patient but not cowardly. That brings me to the practical consideration of the resolution of which I have given notice. It is pertinent to consider, in connection with the subject of an all Canadian water-way from the head of the great lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, whether we have one now, or will have one when the St. Mary's Canal will be completed. I am bound to concede that, so far as the treaties go, we have the right to use the St. Mary's Canal, because, under article 7 of the treaty of 1842 :

It is further agreed that the channels in the river St. Lawrence, on both sides of the Long Sault Islands and of Barnhart Island, the channels in the river Detroit on both sides of the Island Bois Blanc, and between that island and both the American and Canadian shores, and all the several channels and passages between the various islands lying near the junction of the river St. Clair with the lake of that name, shall be equally free and open to the ships, vessels and boats of both parties.

Under article 17 of the treaty of 1871, it is provided :

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada, to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and further engages to urge upon the State Governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

So far as a treaty can bind our volatile American cousins, we have full right, on the same terms as themselves, as neither of these clauses are, according to the terms of the treaty, revocable. This resolution practically involves three things: Is the scheme feasible; what will it cost; will the benefits be worth the cost? As to the feasibility of the scheme, I cannot do better than quote from practical and scientific men. As long ago as 1855, an engineer, Major R. Lachlan, read before the Canadian Institute a report, the substance of which, on this subject, is as follows:—

At the junction of the east shore line of Point Pelee Peninsula, and the north shore line of Lake Erie, is a harbour called the Two Creeks, in the township of Romney; the name of Two Creeks is derived from two branches happening to unite within 100 yards or so of the beach of Lake Erie. The western one is small, shallow and marshy towards its mouth, but the eastern or main one, which is peculiarly calculated to form a commodious harbour capable of containing one hundred vessels, consists of a fine clear channel, from twelve to sixteen feet deep, and about twenty rods wide, extending fully half a mile inland, beside being skirted to the eastward by a marshy bay of less depth, about 100 yards wide, the mass of vegetation on the surface of which being known to rise and fall with the level of the water in the lake, might easily be broken up and floated down into the lake, and thereby add much to the capacity of the harbour; the land on the east side of this bay is low, but on the west side of the East Creek forming the point between the two branches, and also the right bank of the west branch is high and commanding, and well suited for a village, being from twelve to sixteen feet above the water level, with steep banks. The soil also is good, being a light coloured sandy loam, resting upon yellow clay, and there is no indication of rocks or stones in the neighbourhood. Supposing two vessels to start from Buffalo for the Upper Lakes, they might voyage together until they arrive near Two Creeks aforesaid. We will suppose one to be a Canadian vessel, not allowed to pass through the St. Clair Canal; the other an American vessel. The Canadian vessel will part company at this point and enter through one lock (five and a half feet rise) into the St. Clair and Erie Canals, and through that into and across Lake St. Clair and through one of the channels east of Walpole Island, until she gets by the most convenient route into the St. Clair River. The American went around by Detroit and the St. Clair Canal, and when she arrives at the same location she will have travelled fifty-seven miles more than the Canadian vessel; and if they are destined for the same port on the Upper Lakes, the American vessel will have travelled 114 miles when they arrived at Buffalo, on their return voyage. The most desirable work to be considered here is not a harbour but a canal, to be constructed between this proposed harbour, along near the boundary between the counties of Kent and Essex to Jennett's Creek, near the mouth of the Thames, or some place near it. By looking at a good map of Ontario, it will be seen that to continue northward along the eastern boundary of Lake St. Clair, there are two passages or channels along the eastern boundary of Walpole Island, leading into the river St. Clair, which I think, in all probability, could be made navigable at a comparatively trifling expense, considering its importance in shortening the voyage from Lake Erie through this proposed canal, northward and southward on the return trip. Why it is supposed that a canal passing through those two counties would help to drain one million acres of the most fertile land, and help to make that part of those two counties, both as to soil and climate, the garden of Canada. Military men can understand what an advantage it would be in case of war in avoiding the passage of Detroit, &c., &c., &c.

I find, also, that an engineer, Mr. Pinney, in 1857, made a survey, and I will quote briefly from his report :

SANDWICH, 19th May, 1857.

To the Committee of the Two Creeks and St. Clair Ship Canal.

GENTLEMEN,—In accordance with instructions received from you directing me to proceed with a survey of a canal from Two Creeks, in the township of Romney, in the county of Kent, to a point at or near the St. Clair River, and report as to the feasibility of building the proposed canal, I beg to lay before you the plan, profile and estimates thereof, and this report thereon.

I have, &c.,
CHAS. PINNEY,
Civil Engineer.

REPORT.

Being in possession of a copy of the plan of the harbour of the Two Creeks, which was most thoroughly surveyed by Wm. Scott, Esq., C.E., by order of the Government, I found it totally unnecessary to make any examination of the survey of the same, as it showed conclusively the natural facilities for a good harbour, and saved both time and trouble in re-endorsement that which had already been most satisfactorily ascertained; and I therefore proceed to commence at a point on the main branch of the Two Creeks, and ran a line directly straight for Baptiste Creek, which place I made at its intersection with Wilson's Creek. At the spot where I made the junction there was 12 feet of water, and at no part from thence to its emptying into the Thames was there less than 12 in the channel, the deepest part being 20. I then followed the course of Baptiste Creek to the Thames, the distance from the river to the Two Creeks being 15·85 miles.

The line was continued thence up the Thames about two miles, and Lot 6 in the 3rd concession of Dover West, and then with the same bearing as the tangent from the Two Creeks to Baptiste Creek, I ran the line also directly straight for Little Bear Creek, which place I made at its junction with the Chenal Ecarté. I examined said creek, and found that there was 13 feet at its mouth, and for nearly a quarter of a mile up the same depth of water, which gradually shallowed down to 9 feet, the distance from River Thames to Little Bear Creek being 13·28 miles.

The face of the country through which I passed in making the above survey being so remarkably level and without the slightest obstacle intervening, I found it unnecessary to run another.

Then I have later information from an engineer named J. C. McNabb :

About 1850, the townships of Mersea, Romney, Tilbury East and Tilbury West contributed $250 each for the purpose of having a thorough survey made and estimate of cost. The levels taken at this time showed a difference of level between Lake St. Clair and Erie, of five feet ten inches (5 ft. 10 in.) and these figures were practically corroborated by Mr.

Molesworth, Government engineer, in 1869, whose figures differed but two inches from those of Mr. Peeny, in 1850. The admiralty charts give four feet as the difference of level between the two lakes, but as this finding, is from barometric readings, it is at best approximate. The route of the canal would doubtless follow the line of least resistance, and this would be from near the mouth of Baptiste Creek on Lake St. Clair, southerly, taking advantage of the low levels of Baptiste, Tremblay and Two Creeks, to the mouth of two Creeks on Lake Erie, and this line gives almost a straight run from Lake Huron to Lake Erie, effecting a great saving in time and distance. The physical characteristics of this route do not involve any engineering difficulties as the thirteen or fourteen miles of cutting necessary consist of clay loam with possibly some sand in the neighbourhood of the summit and these materials with the improved machinery of to-day can be handled expeditiously and cheaply. With a lock at the northerly terminus to control the waters of the River Thames and Lake St. Clair, the point of discharge for the drainage of the adjacent municipalities would be about on a level with Lake Erie or five feet below that now obtainable, and once this is attained it will put at rest at once and forever all contention regarding drainage matters in those townships

I wrote to Mr. McNabb then, and inquired as to the feasibility of the route from the mouth of the canal where it struck Lake St. Clair, to get east of the Walpole Islands, to which he replied, on the 28th February last :

CHATHAM, Ont., Feby. 28th, 1893.

DEAR SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 25th instant, I would beg to state that there are no difficulties in the way of constructing the St. Clair and Erie Canal wholly within Canadian territory. The shores along the line of the proposed extension consist of fenlands, and the bottom of St. Clair is sand from four to six feet on a stratum of blue clay. The work on the extension would consist of a dredge cut, across Lake St. Clair, in a line with the canal shown on plan to the mouth of the Chenal Ecarté, or to the Johnston's channel, this cut would have to be protected by a dyke on the lake side, and a rough estimate of the work necessary would be

Dredging.....	$250,000
Dyking.....	200,000
Incidentals.....	20,000

or in round numbers, say $500,000. Then you would have a route with all the difficult and dangerous features of the present route eliminated. The present route via Lake St. Clair and Detroit River, is anything but a satisfactory one, the obstructions met with are, Colchester reef in Lake Erie, Bar Point, Grosse Point and Limekiln Crossing.

The St. Clair Ship Canal is not self-scouring and requires constant dredging, but in the proposed channel such would not be the case, as the swift current of either Johnston channel or the Chenal Ecarté would be sufficient to keep it free from sedimentary deposits. The current is such that a steamboat turning north at Johnston's bend out of the Sydenham River, has about all she can do to make the turn. The easterly shore of Lake St. Clair from mouth of Thames to Walpole Island, is very shallow, and a dyked channel, similar to the St. Clair Ship Canal, is all that is necessary. The correct and complete scheme is such as you describe, and in comparison with the enormous sums being spent by the Government of the United States, is inexpensive. To complete their waterway, they contemplate the following expenditure ;—

Sault Ste. Marie Lock and Channel	$7,000,000
St. Clair River improvements	$3,000,000
Niagara Ship Canal	$23,000,000
Erie Canal improvements	$250,000,000

Whilst if the Chicago and Mississippi scheme is carried out, the expenditure will reach $500,000,000. These amounts are the estimates of United States engineers.

In the matter of a waterway, nature has been kind to Canada, and with a small expenditure, she can control the lake traffic.

Yours respectfully,
JOHN C. McNABB.

D. TISDALE, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

The Pinney route is, of course out of the question. His object in going two miles up the Thames was, undoubtedly, to get a tow path, because, at that early day, they knew nothing about steam propulsion or steam barges for use, or passage through canals. The practical scheme is the one which Mr. McNabb advises: a short canal, fourteen miles long, and then a canal with a dyke, built in this inexpensive way, on one side, which will strike the channel back and east of the Walpole Islands.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all documents, reports and correspondence between the Government and the Quebec Board of Trade, or any other person, in relation to the treatment endured by Canadian fishermen from Newfoundland fishermen along the Canadian Labrador coast.—(Mr. Joncas).

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of British Columbia and the Minister of the Interior, relating to the boundary of the Railway Belt in the province of British Columbia.—(Mr. Mara).

Copies of instructions issued to the fishery overseers of Berthier, Maskinongé, St. Maurice, Champlain, Nicolet, Yamaska and Richelieu, since 1st January, 1892, and of all correspondence on the subject between the Government and the said fishery overseers; or between the Government and any other persons, from 1st January, 1892, up to this date, in relation to such instructions and the enforcement thereof. 2. A statement of fishing licenses issued in the counties aforesaid during the year 1891 and 1892, separately. 3. A statement of the quantity and value of the various kinds of fish taken in the said counties—separately—during the years 1891 and 1892.—(Mr. Bruneau.)

Copies of all documents, claims, petitions, correspondence, reports of the Superintendent of the Chambly Canal, reports of experts and others, plans, agreements, proposals, and decisions of the Government in relation of the claim of Joseph Lacouture, of the parish of St. Luc, for damages caused to his property by the waters of the Chambly Canal.—(Mr. Lavergne.)

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

LONDON AND PORT STANLEY RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 47) respecting the London and Port Stanley Railway Company.—(Mr. Moncrieff.)

Mr. TISDALE.

In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. TISDALE. By an Act of last session it was enacted that the bondholders should have the same power of voting as the shareholders, and under this clause as at present it may be doubtful whether they have that power. I move therefore:

That the words, "and for the purpose of this section the mortgage debentures and bonds of the company shall be deemed stock, and the holders of such bonds and debentures shall be deemed shareholders of the Company," be inserted at the end of subsection 1.

This was agreed to by both parties, but was inadvertently left out of the Bill in Committee; and, as it is purely a formal amendment, I hope there will be no objection to my having it inserted in the Bill now.

Mr. LAURIER. I would simply point out that this is a vicious practice, and that the better way would be to send the Bill back to the committee. If the leader of the House is satisfied, he must take the responsibility.

Mr. HAGGART. The amendment is merely declaratory that the powers they had before are not taken away.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not like the phraseology. No doubt, a bondholder would not like a clause saying that, even for any limited purpose, he was only a shareholder. The same end could be attained by a different set of words, as, for instance, "carried by a two-thirds majority of the shareholders and bondholders, ascertained as in section 2."

Mr. TISDALE. I take no interest in the matter, except that as the chairman of the Railway Committee I was asked to bring it up in the House, and I supposed, being purely formal, there would be no objection to it. I would prefer that the amendment should pass in the shape in which it has been given to me. I understand that all parties concerned agree to this amendment.

Mr. MULOCK. These sets of words become precedent for imitation later on, and I do not think, even by consent of the bondholders, we should put in a set of words not quite sufficient.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 35) to incorporate the Calgary Irrigation Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 36) to incorporate the Calgary Hydraulic Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Alberta Irrigation Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 45) to incorporate the Cleveland, Port Stanley and London Transportation and Railway Company, and to confirm an agreement respecting the London and Port Stanley Railway Company.—(Mr. Roome.)

Bill (No. 86) respecting the Chilliwack Railway Company.—(Mr. Corbould.)

Bill (No. 89) respecting the Nelson and Fort Sheppard Railway Company.—(Mr. Mara.)

ALLEGED UTTERANCES BY CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. CASEY. I beg leave to give notice that I will, on the first occasion when the House is moved into Committee of Supply, call attention to certain alleged utterances by the Controller of Customs at Kingston on Friday week last, and I hope the hon. gentleman will be present on that occasion.

Mr. WALLACE. I will be on hand and ready to meet your charges.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 2) to disfranchise electors who have taken bribes.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WELDON. I will take occasion at this stage to call the attention of the House to the fact that, following the suggestion made by hon. gentlemen across the floor on Wednesday evening last, I invited a number of members who evinced the most active interest in this Bill during the debate to meet informally as a committee and run through the remaining sections of the Bill. Accepting that suggestion, the hon. members for Bothwell, for Bellechasse, for Quebec Centre, for Cumberland and for North Grey, were good enough to meet and spend a considerable time in running through the measure. The changes suggested by them were inconsiderable, though enough to make it desirable to have the Bill reprinted, embodying the substance of the amendments moved the other night and one or two amendments which I announced my intention to move, as well as some minor changes suggested by this informal committee. The most important point taken was in regard to the very excellent suggestion thrown out by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), to shorten the operation of the inquiry by having the petition sent direct to the court and the money deposit also sent to the court. Therefore, with the consent of the committee, I will ask that this newly-printed Bill be considered. I may add that it has been printed in English and French and distributed.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I am afraid the hon. gentleman cannot proceed after that manner. We have a copy of the Bill before the Committee, and we have considered clause 5. We will, therefore, read the clauses as printed, and the amendments desired to be moved and considered.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose when the Committee rises and reports, we can move that the House resolves itself again into Committee of the Whole to consider the first five sections. This will simply alter the order in which we consider the sections.

On section 6.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Was section 6 passed?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Section 6 as printed cannot even be put in force, since the section in the new Bill reads as follows:—

Sec. 8. All persons duly summoned in accordance with the rules of court in that behalf shall attend, and shall answer all questions, lawfully put to them, touching the matters to be inquired into, and shall produce all books, papers, deeds and writings required of them and in their custody or under their control.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman is right. Section 6 was not passed.

Mr. AMYOT. The number of the sections are not the same as in the other Bill, and I would suggest that we should commence the Bill again.

Mr. WELDON. I would wish with the consent of the House, to adopt that suggestion.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. We cannot proceed without the consent of the House.

Mr. WELDON. There is a rearrangement of the clause; but it is a mere matter of numbering largely. I hope the House will not stand on a formality, but allow us to go on with the Bill.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I have not the Bill as amended; therefore I object to its being any longer discussed, and I rise to a question of order.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Does the hon. gentleman wish to begin over again the whole debate? He complains of not having read the Bill. We may take it up from the beginning, if he wishes.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I do not wish merely to peruse the new Bill, but to have time to study it.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Under the rules of this House, the consideration of the clauses of the Bill should be proceeded with in their proper order; all amendments are to be reported by the Chairman to the House, and should any one propose any new amendments the Bill may be referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) Under the rules of this House, the procedure to be followed is the one pointed out by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont); but, as the Bill has been so materially altered, I think it might with the leave of the House be considered over again from the beginning.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) As just pointed out by the hon. member from L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte), the Bill just submitted to us for consideration offers some new features which make it quite different from the former Bill; this new Bill possibly has been studied by the members of the sub-committee; but the members who do not belong to this committee have not had the opportunity to consider it.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Though but slightly conversant with parliamentary procedure, I find all the same this is an extraordinary mode of procedure. The Bill was first taken up for consideration last week; a private sub-committee has since then sat outside this House, and to-day we are asked to concur in amendments altogether new, and so, from day to day, they may keep on amending the Bill, till we never know where we stand on the matter.

Mr. DICKEY. There can be no doubt, I think, that the hon. member for L'Assomption is quite correct in his contention. When the great majority of the House wishes to give the Bill a fair consideration I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw his objection. He said this was a secret committee.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I did not say "secret." I said it was a private committee.

Mr. DICKEY. It was a committee to assist the Committee of the Whole House in getting through this Bill. There is merely a question of procedure standing in our way now. It seems to me more logical to begin at the beginning, and I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jeannotte) will not object to what the great majority of the House want to do.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I am sorry I cannot comply with the request of the hon. member in the latter case. Either I have a right to insist or I have not. I stick to my right. I insist on a further ground: the Bill has been altered almost beyond recognition; the contents of the new clause, 6, having been reduced by three-fourths. What need is there of hurrying on this legislation, as if the House of Commons were on fire? The first error of the promoter of this Bill was his refusal to accede to the wise proposal of the hon. member for Bothwell, who suggested referring this Bill for consideration to a committee consisting of four or five members of this House, who should report to the House. The hon. member for Albert thought it below his dignity to condescend to this. Well, let him bear the responsibility which devolves upon him. As, under the rules of parliamentary procedure, the Bill cannot come again before the House, I withdraw my objection.

On section 6,

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) If I take it right, clause 8, such as it stands in the newly printed Bill, is substituted to clause 6 of the original Bill. Clause 8 reads as follows:—
Mr. CHAIRMAN.

8. All persons duly summoned in accordance with the rules of court in that behalf shall attend and shall answer all questions lawfully put to them touching the matters to be inquired into, and shall produce all books, papers, deeds and writings required of them and in their custody or under their control.

As I already previously remarked, the last time the Bill came up before the House, the object of this Bill, while tending to prevent bribery at elections, will not effectually put a stop to bribery. The Contested Elections Act was enacted, if my memory serves me right, in 1873; it was amended in 1874 and in 1875, then in 1879, 1887, 1888, 1890 and 1891, which goes to prove how difficult a task it is to make a law with a view to putting a stop to bribery and preventing electors to sell their votes. To prevent bribery such has been the main object of all the amendments introduced up to this day. And did we succeed in preventing it? Were I to believe the statements made on the floor of this House by certain members, bribery instead of decreasing is on the increase. Why so? It is beyond my knowledge to answer this question.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) By no means.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) The amendments made so far, with a view to stamping out bribery have only resulted in encouraging it and making it more secret than before. The object of the Bill now under consideration, though excellent in itself, is reflective in this sense: that it has a tendency towards introducing, in this free land of ours, where every one has the full enjoyment of his rights, a law of an inquisitorial nature. The Bill will, as already said, result in developing bribery, while restricting the elector's liberty to sell his vote. This is a false principle, grounded on false promises, from which will proceed equally false consequences, when, after studying for over eighteen years the Contested Elections Act, this House, composed of many eminent lawyers and other professional lights did not succeed in framing a perfect legislation calculated to prevent bribery. I have a right to question the efficacy of the present Bill. It has been said that it would prove a profitable affair for lawyers, and it was likely to multiply law suits, thus giving them a chance to replenish their pockets. I must say in this connection that as lawyers wishing to earn honestly their living, we do repudiate such an imputation, as money thus earned is little short of ill-gotten gain. I consider that, in spite of all present and future amendments, this Bill is not calculated to stamp out bribery. In my opinion it will only result in developing and encouraging this crying evil and involving very high costs. After discussing the Bill in committee, the other day, the hon. member for Albert found out that almost every section of it was defective. He, therefore, was wise enough to prepare a revised and corrected edition of his Bill; but it remains unaltered, as far as its principle and its practical operation are concerned. He did not exert himself to bring down the costs, nor did he aim at making the meaning of his Bill more obvious; he did merely confine himself to condense the subsections, shortening them by half. The hon. member is labouring under a strange delusion, were he to flatter himself of obviating thereby all chances of law suits. Under this Bill, every witness called upon to give evidence is liable to be disqualified on his own evidence, which is contrary to the principle of English law by which no one is obliged to criminate himself. I venture to hope that this House will not allow such a Bill to become law. From a careful analysis of this Bill, the conclusion is easily reached, that an elector, in consequence of his telling the truth under oath, may be incarcerated and deprived of his political rights during the space of seven years. I sincerely trust that, in this Dominion of Canada, we have not yet come to that; I trust that freedom is not to be infringed upon to such a degree. As to the province of Quebec elections, I may say, are carried on without any scandalous bribery being indulged in; apart from a certain amount of chicanery, bribery and corrupt practices do not prevail extensively in our midst, and I may state here, that such a legislation as is now under consideration is uncalled for, as far as our province is concerned, notwithstanding the statement made in the English press to the effect that I bribed my electors and bought the seat which I now occupy in this House. I need not repeat my denial of such an absurd and gratuitous imputation, on the ground that having been returned by acclamation, bribery was altogether out of the question; but, in spite of my denial, I should not wonder at seeing the imputation repeated in the press. In my constituency—L'Assomption—thanks be to God, people do not take bribes. I hold that the principle of the Bill—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that we are no longer discussing the principle of the Bill. Should the general discussion on the principle of the measure begin over again, why, it will take us two weeks before we see the end of it. The debate on the principle of the measure having occupied two days, it is, to my mind, quite sufficient. We are now considering clause 6. I call the hon. member to order, and I beg that he will confine his remarks to the clause under consideration.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the explanation just given. I will now deal exclusively with clause 6 of the Bill. This clause reads as follows:—

All persons duly summoned in accordance with the rules of court in that behalf shall attend and shall answer all questions, lawfully put to them, touching the matters to be inquired into, and shall produce all books, papers, deeds and writings required of them and in their custody or under their control.

It is, therefore, a court, Mr. Chairman. I had made out, however, from the remarks fallen from the promoter of this Bill, at the outset of the debate, that they were to be only commissioners appointed to make inquiry, whenever asked for. This is a new feature which comes for the first time under my notice. We had simple commissioners, now we have judges, regularly constituted into a court.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) The first clause of the Bill provides for it:

In each of the provinces of Canada, the court which has power, jurisdiction and authority with reference to election petitions therein, shall be held to be, and is hereby constituted in such province a court for the purposes of this Act.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) This refers to the first clause, which I am forbidden by the Chairman to discuss at the present time. I move that the following words be added to clause 6: "No voter shall be disqualified on the grounds of his giving evidence." Formerly, persons were condemned on their own evidence: this procedure was still in force in France and elsewhere towards the close of the 18th century; but it is done away with now in civilised countries.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) This is already provided for in the law concerning contested elections. Under this law, no witness is liable to prosecution on the ground of any answer given by him in his evidence. All he requires is a certificate from the judge to that effect. The present Bill is but an amendment to the Contested Elections Act.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I call the attention of the hon. member from Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), that we have not to deal with a court of justice, but with commissioners appointed to inquire as to whether corrupt practices has been committed. Under this clause, witnesses shall be bound to answer all questions put by the tribunal, whether or not these questions call forth answers tending to criminate them. And let it be borne in mind, Mr. Chairman, that once the inquiry is over, the commissioners are bound to publish the names of the parties found guilty and disqualified by him; he is to report to the Governor-General in Council, and the revising officer of the county shall be directed to strike off the list of voters the names of all electors thus found guilty of taking bribes. There is no provision in the Bill to the effect that the witness who has given evidence criminating himself, shall not be prosecuted. I am aware that the contested elections law decrees that a witness is not liable to be indicted on the ground of any answers he may have given criminating him, in the course of his evidence; but there is no provision for it in this Bill, and I hold that a witness who has stated in his evidence that he has taken bribes is liable to be indicted on the strength of his own evidence. No such law should find place on our Statute-book. Let us suppose that, as an elector, I took a bribe of five dollars for my vote; under this Bill, I am bound to tell the commissioners who may disqualify me or incarcerate me, and will have my name published in the official "Gazette." Hence I infer that this law will be inoperative.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) Under the Contested Election Law, an elector, who has taken bribes shall not be excused from answering questions put by the judge. The court reports his name to the Speaker of this House, and he can no longer be an election agent; anyhow, were a candidate uncautious enough to employ him as such, he runs the risk of having his election annulled.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) This Bill is no amendment to the Contested Elections Law; it is a copy, they say, of the law passed by this House at Mr. Blake's demand. Under this Bill a candidate elected by a majority of five votes will not be unseated, were this new court of enquiry to find one hundred cases of corrupt practices committed with the view to further and secure his election. This candidate although elected through bribery, will not be unseated. Let us suppose one hundred witnesses stating under oath that they have taken bribes: the commissioners, within the meaning of the Bill as construed, are empowered to disfranchise the witnesses for seven years. Such a provision is beyond my comprehension. Not so with the Contested Elections Law, which provides that the votes cast in favour of a candidate are struck off the list. The commissioners are quite at liberty to conduct the inquest as they think fit. Whereas there is no law to prevent any one having a counsel to represent him, the commissioners may say: We have the right to conduct this enquiry as we think best, even privately, with closed doors, and closeted in our room; you have nothing to do with it. And the commissioners have a right to oblige witnesses to answer. Were this Bill to become law, it will only remain for us to introduce immediately another Bill, providing for the putting of the witnesses to the rack, and so we will have a complete set of inquisitorial laws.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) The hon. member is utterly mistaken; the commissioners are done away with.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Then it is no longer the same Bill.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) The commissioners are altogether out of question now; the Bill now deals with judges assigned by the court for the purpose of making inquiry into acts of bribery under the Act.

Mr. JEANNOTTE.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) If the hon. gentleman is right, then I rise to a question of order. As we no longer have to deal with the same Bill, and as judges have been substituted for commissioners in the clause, I contend that the committee should not go on with the consideration of this Bill. I have been ruled out of order just now on the ground that I was dealing with the principle of the measure, which was not at issue; but, as the measure has been altered almost beyond recognition, I consider I am quite in order now in discussing the principle of the measure.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I raise a question of order. The committee should rise, as, obviously, they can no longer continue examining a Bill which has been so materially altered. Clause 6, which is now under discussion by this House, is no longer germane to the Bill, as it refers to a court of justice. The first Bill provides that "on a solemn declaration being signed by twenty-five electors, the Governor-General shall appoint commissioners for the purpose of making inquiry into bribery." But now, we have to deal no longer with commissioners, but with a court of justice.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I press on the objection just raised by the hon. member for L'Assomption. The amendment is not germane to the preamble of the Bill; it even involves a contradiction with the preamble as the amendment refers to a court, while the preamble has reference to commissioners. There is a question of order which ought to be attended to first.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The hon. member cannot offer an amendment and raise at the same time a question of order. We are now discussing the amendment.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Well, then, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment of the hon. member for Albert does not agree with the principle of the Bill. The amendment deals with a court of justice, while the preamble of the Bill implies a commission.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that when he speaks to the amendment, he speaks to a new clause of the Bill.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Exactly so, but I maintain that the hon. member for Albert is out of order in moving this amendment, as it utterly alters the principle of the Bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The hon. member forgets that another amendment has been moved by the hon. member for L'Assomption.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) He has withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, it is not an amendment, but an addition. I add words.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) In parliamentary parlance it is an amendment.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Well, I ask leave to withdraw it.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. FORBES. When a judge comes to hold his investigation, you will find there is very little difficulty in getting from the witnesses, not only the name of the man who received the bribe, but also the name of the party who offered the bribe. In nine cases out of ten, you will find the men who take bribes, are not those who go round a constituency asking for them, but those who are induced to accept money by others more influential than they, who have their pockets well lined during election times. I have seen such men go to the fishermen and farmers, and show $5 or $10 bills, and tell these people that there was no crime either in offering or accepting the money. I have heard men put seriously the question to these people as to whether they would be doing wrong, morally or legally, in accepting that money, and they have been told: "Not at all. I do not want to influence your vote, but here is a $5 or $10 bill; do what you like." The crime is with the man who offers the money, and not with the poor fellow who takes it. I would, therefore, move that these words be inserted.

Mr. WELDON. That raises a question which I discussed when I moved the second reading of the Bill. It goes to the very heart of the matter in this way. The principle of the Bill is not wide, but narrow, and intended to deal with a specific evil. It is not meant to be a punitive measure. If it does punish incidentally, it does so in pursuance of another object. It is a protective measure, intended to protect the commonwealth and the state, by providing that those who cast ballots, must be men who value them. The man who gives a bribe, is a criminal now, under our law, and if my hon. friend feels it necessary to make that law any more drastic, let him do so. We are not in this Bill disfranchising that or any other criminal. I quite agree with the spirit of my hon. friend's remarks, in a general way; but I am pursuing another idea, the idea of disfranchising a person who is not qualified, not because he is a criminal, but because he is like a child and not fit to cast his vote. He does not prize his right, but lets another give him money for it. If my hon. friend brings in his amendment, it will be a new idea. I had thought of that at first, but it was pointed out to me that it would not be logical.

Mr. LAURIER. If a man is bribed not to cast his vote, and does not cast it, is he disfranchised?

Mr. WELDON. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. Would not that apply as well to the man who bribed him?

Mr. WELDON. A man in that case has abandoned his right for corrupt purposes, and should be treated as a child, but the man who gives a bribe is a criminal and our law makes him a criminal. A strong reason that induced me to abandon this clause was this: It was pointed out by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) who, I am sorry is not here to-night, who gave this Bill such an intelligent and clear support the other night, that if this disability were inserted, it would put it out of our power to succeed.

Mr. FORBES. Why?

Mr. WELDON. The only possible hope of practically succeeding in any single county in Canada with this Bill, is the hope of getting evidence from the bribe-giver. If my hon. friend's amendment were accepted, there would be a new difficulty in the way of getting evidence, and that is a very strong reason against it, but, mark this, if this Bill becomes law and the machinery is put in motion, and it turns out that eight or ten men have been buying voters in blocks of from five to twenty, and you get evidence that by these eight or ten some 200 have been bribed, in that way you will succeed. Is not the man who is publicly proclaimed by a Supreme Court judge in a province to be a bribe-giver, notoriously and openly, not severely punished by that fact alone, if he is a man of any standing and influence in the community? The Bill will have a very salutary effect in that way, that men of good standing, respectable, highly esteemed citizens will be unwilling to be found to have been handling election money; and the fear of this exposure in connection with this discreditable business will be very salutary and effective.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I never can see where the exposure comes in. The judge is not allowed to ask, or to permit to be asked, any question which may tend to criminate a third party. The only man I want to punish is the man who offers the bribe. I care very little for the other men at all. If they will keep out of my county with their money, I will answer for the virtue of the voters.

Mr. DALY. You would have it all your own way then.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The men in the county do not bribe. It is the money which comes from outside that does it. I ask the hon. gentleman to point out some clause which justifies a counsel or a judge in asking any question tending to incriminate third parties not before the court. The question would be stopped the moment it was put.

Mr. FORBES. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that the principle of the Bill is a sound one, but I do not see why he should refrain from going as far as he possibly can. The witness is asked whether he has accepted a bribe or not and evidence is given. Possibly evidence can only be got from the man himself. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) claims that the exposure of the briber will prevent him committing that offence and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) said that the commission will not be allowed to take evidence of that point. Could the judges allow evidence to be given with respect to a man offering a bribe to an elector? The question could not be asked. If the object of the Bill is not to punish at all, but simply to treat those who receive bribes as incapable of being citizens of the commonwealth, why is it any more praiseworthy or honourable to offer a bribe to a man than it is to take it?

Mr. MASSON. The amendment is not only useless, but worse than useless. With such an amendment it would be impossible in any case to obtain a conviction except where the party who had bribed, did so for that purpose, and then came and voluntarily gave evidence for the purpose of wreaking revenge upon a man. Instead of rendering the Act serviceable, this amendment would make it worse than useless, because it would be possible for evil-disposed persons to levy blackmail upon the parties whose names he might mention, or upon the parties that these persons represented. Therefore the amendment is not entitled to support.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) has raised the point of order, and we ought to have the decision of the Chair upon that point of order.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I submit to the Committee that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Albert is out of order, as involving a contradiction with the principle of the Bill; and on the ground that, in the preamble of the Bill adopted by this House, a commission of inquiry is mentioned, while the amendment refers to a court of justice.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I refer the hon. gentleman to the Bill as previously brought up before the House, and he will be satisfied that the Bill speaks of the commissioners as being judges of the Superior Court; now, the amendment of the hon. member for Albert has reference to a court of justice, to a Superior Court.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I do not think the point of order is well taken, because the amendment of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) is simply to strike out the first part of section 6, and to retain the words in the last five lines. Now, these words are nearly the same in the clause proposed by the committee, except one or two words, which are germane to the clause. In fact the words "commissioners" or "court" appear in both clauses, consequently the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Well, as the clause is in order, I move again my amendment.

Section agreed to.

On section 7,

Mr. WELDON. I move that section 7 be dropped, and the following be inserted in lieu thereof:—

The evidence shall be taken under oath, and shall be in writing, and stenographers may be employed in the discretion of the court.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I object to this clause. I hold that it is useless to take this evidence in writing and still more so to employ stenographers. This would only result in making these inquests unnecessarily expensive, much more so than election trials. The deposit made by the petitioners to meet the necessary expenses will be utterly insufficient. I have not the least doubt that a deposit of $1,000 will be required to cover the costs of stenographers. I would ask the hon. member for Albert to modify this clause so as to have the stenographers dispensed with by the court.

Mr. FREMONT. (Translation.) I consider that the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Albert is quite to the point. It is material to the good administration of justice that the evidence at the inquest be taken down, and, if necessary, by stenographers. They against whom prejudicial evidence is brought during the inquest, are entitled to know, subsequently, the contents of the depositions taken against them. How will they know such evidence unless it be taken down? How will they be enabled to defend themselves and object to the evidence if the court or the commissioner neglect having the depositions taken down. The matter of costs is, to my mind, of minor importance, where justice has to be meted out; and were not such evidence taken down, the accused parties would be unjustly deprived of a means of self-defence.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I may tell the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Frémont) that this commission of inquiry will dispose of cases summarily. In my opinion, the attendance of the respondents before the commissioners, after notice has been served upon them, will be compelled; such evidence as they intend objecting to will be taken down and noticed; this would suffice, to my mind, to enable them to object to the evidence. Where the deposit made is so small, I think it unfair to make the respondents liable to pay the costs of shorthand. Let us put a case: Five or six witnesses are summoned to give evidence as to whether electors have committed corrupt practices; each one of these witnesses will be taxed from three to four dollars. Now, let us suppose the case of twenty or twenty-five persons accused of having taken bribes, and you see at one glance what an enormous bill of costs this legislation may involve. Formerly, justice was administered as now-a-days; there were no stenographers to be found, and evidence at the inquest was not always taken down. In the Court of Circuit, to-day, evidence is not taken by writing, and justice is being administered all the same; witnesses are summoned to object to the evidence of other witnesses. I would ask the hon. member for Albert to adopt more summary proceedings and do away with the employment of shorthand writers.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) If I am not mistaken, the fact of selling one's vote is an act involving a penalty, and a very heavy one, as it goes to deprive an elector of his franchise for seven years. But, with a view to establishing the evidence required for the purpose, it was thought that such evidence should be better taken down by stenography. It is only fair to give the respondent the right of cross-examining the witnesses who have made a deposition against him; unless he be well posted in law, he will, of course, secure the help of a lawyer. Time and a full knowledge of the evidence will be required for the preparation of his defence. I go still further than the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) and I put the case of a hundred electors accused of taking bribes at an election. As each one of the respondents has to cross-examine two or three witnesses, this examination will take more or less time. Now, stenographers are employed for taking down evidence in order to facilitate the reading of the evidence to be objected to by the respondent. The motion of the hon. member for Bagot is no extraordinary or new departure. How is it that a man can be sentenced to be hanged without a word of the evidence being taken down? I consider that the latter is in more critical circumstances than an elector who only runs the risk of being disqualified. I consider that the man who is disfranchised is not in a worse position than the man sentenced to penitentiary. All those who appear in our criminal courts suffer, when found guilty, ignominious punishment; and, though individual liberty, a right which excels all others, be at stake, still no stenographers are required to take down the evidence. The judges dispose of the case summarily, and forthwith the jurymen, when the trial takes place before the Court of Queen's Bench, give their verdict, and the judge pronounces the sentence. And, though penitentiary be the lot of the guilty party, the law does not provide for the employment of any stenographers. The question, in this instance, is far from having very material consequences. Should this clause be adopted, the bill of costs will be something enormous. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) stated that the taking down of the evidence would amount to something like $3 or $4 per deposition. Obviously, the hon. gentleman is not practised in handling these questions of costs of parties calling witnesses for evidence, for he would know that the Bill of costs runs up much higher than that. Any lawyer he would know, could tell him that the costs amount to something like $25 up to $40 per deposition. And who knows? The Quebec Government are, perhaps, contemplating already to impose and levy a stamp duty on these depositions. This would create an additional source of revenue, and they would quite likely collect it, as this is to be a court of justice. Who, then, is going to be saddled with the costs? The Federal Government, I presume, as they have plenty of money. The costs, at any rate, will not be defrayed by the poor electors; they could not afford it. And the briber? No mention is made of him. Why so? This court of new creation will have nothing else to do but fishing for cases of corrupt practices. Nobody is to be held answerable for the costs! Truly, this is acting too blindly.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) The costs, it is to be presumed, will be defrayed by somebody.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Many things may be conjectured; but a law ought not to be framed in this way. In cases of appeal, it will be a multiplication of lawsuits, and lawyers will find it a profitable business. Should the costs be saddled on the Government, I suggest that no lawyer be chosen, in order to give each lawyer a chance of replenishing his pocket. For lawyers to be mixed up in one of these inquests, will be one of those golden opportunities they will avail themselves of to make enough money to allow them to live comfortably till the next election.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I should wish that the members who favour this Bill, would condescend to answer the objections offered to it. The hon. Ministers who are intrusted with the mission of watching over our legislation, the French-speaking Ministers who fully catch the meaning of this Bill, ought to give a reply, should the promoter and his friends not understand our idiom. The hon. the Postmaster-General (Sir Adolphe Caron) and the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) ought to remember that it is within their province to give a solution to our objections. I would beg of the hon. Ministers to express an opinion on the objections raised by the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) and by myself, for, I dare say, were this Bill to pass, it would be a blot upon our Statute-book and a discredit to the Government who suffered such a retrograde legislation to become law.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I consider that the Government share in the opinion of their friends: they find, like us, that the objections so far offered are so groundless as to be hardly worth answering.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I was not aware that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) was so fervid a friend of the Government. So much so, indeed, that he usurps the role of the Ministers, when we ask them for a solution to the objections raised. Notwithstanding all the esteem I profess for my hon. friend, I may tell him that it is to the responsible Ministers I addressed myself, and from them I expect a reply. I wish to know, whether it is intended to organize secret inquisitorial courts unworthy of our nineteenth century, and to enact laws with a view to reviving the torture, in order to force from the electors a confession to the effect that they have taken bribes. I, therefore, hope, Mr. Chairman, that the Government will tell us their way of thinking on the clause at issue, and whether it is fair to allow electors to become a victim to such persecutions and become liable to pay such heavy costs? The committee, in my opinion, cannot adopt such a Bill without the Government giving expression to their views on the matter, whether they approve or disapprove of it. Again I beg of the Government to condescend replying to my question.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The vote is to be taken; it is too late. The amendment is lost.

Amendment negatived.

Section agreed to on a division.

Mr. WELDON. I move that the following be section 8:—

The judge sitting on such inquiry shall be a court of record.

Mr. WELDON. I desire to explain that the object of this clause is to make it clear that the judge shall have common law jurisdiction and power to commit for contempt of court, which might be found to be necessary.

Section agreed to on a division.

Mr. WELDON. I move the addition of the following clause:—

The allegation sworn to in the petition, that the election took place, shall be prima facie evidence thereof.

This clause will dispose of a number of preliminary and technical objections.

Mr. MASSON. A preliminary case must be made out at some time, and it should not be made out on a petition sworn to in general terms. A person should not be put on his trial simply by the presentation of a petition, of which he has no notice. This clause is very objectionable, and should not be adopted. It can have no beneficial effect, and it may be productive of injury.

Mr. DICKEY. This clause is only intended to cover prima facie evidence of one fact, namely, that an election was held. Great difficulty might be experienced in proving that fact, and it might be necessary to obtain the original writ from Ottawa.

Mr. MASSON. If the section were changed so as to embody the intention expressed by the hon. gentleman, there would be no objection to it.

On section 10,

Mr. WELDON. I move that clause 10 read as follows:—

The judge may if he deems fit, award to any witness who appears before him a reasonable sum for travelling expenses and maintenances.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Who is going to defray these costs? I wish to know whether it is the elector who has been found guilty, or the informer? The Bill does not provide for it. The Bill merely says that the judge may, if he deems fit, award to any witness who appears before him, a reasonable sum for travelling expenses and maintenance; but it does not contain any provision as to who shall pay.

Mr. WELDON. Section 16 provides a handsome sum.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You see in section 8, that all parties duly summoned shall attend. The serving of subpoenas on them is not duly summoning them, unless you tender fees to the witness. You ought to state in some section that they shall be compelled to attend without the fees being tendered in the first instance.

Mr. WELDON. That seems to be a very good suggestion and I think the hon. gentleman ought to reduce it to writing.

Mr. McLEOD. A man should at least have his actual travelling expenses before he is compelled to attend. It is rather severe to compel a man to go a long distance without money.

Mr. MASSON. I should think that section 8 would cover the matter. It refers to persons duly summoned in accordance with the rules of the court. The rules of the court would provide for the payment.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. You should not compel a poor labourer who has not a cent, to travel twenty or thirty miles without money.

Mr. MASSON. I agree that a witness should be paid in the first instance. It would be a great hardship to compel a poor man to attend without giving him his travelling expenses.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I move as an addition to the eighth section:

All persons duly summoned in accordance with the rules of the Court in that behalf and paid their travelling fees according to the scale allowed in the court, shall attend and shall answer all questions.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Is it the intention that the costs shall be paid out of the deposit of $500 made by the parties complaining, whether the plaintiffs prove their charge or not? If that is so, I have no more objection to the Bill.

Mr. WELDON. Under the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) the witnesses are to be paid beforehand.

On section 11,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In this section you provide that the Secretary of State shall instruct the revising officer to strike off the list of voters the names of all voters who have taken bribes. I do not think these words are necessary, because you subsequently provide that it shall be the duty of the revising officer to strike off the names. If the Secretary of State neglected to instruct the revising officer there might be some doubt as to whether the names ought to be left on the list or not.

Mr. MASSON. I would also point out that the mode of procedure proposed seems to relate to the state of things that existed prior to the passage of the Franchise Act, when the clerk of the municipality made out the list of voters shortly before an election. At present the revised list is sent to the Secretary of State, and it might be very difficult for the revising officer to carry out his instructions, and there might be several by-elections within a few years. Would it not be better to provide that the names should be struck off the last revised list, and should not be replaced for a certain length of time?

Mr. FORBES. It is easy for the revising officer to revise every list; but I would suggest that, as the object of this Bill is to kill bribery of every description, this section be amended by inserting after the word "taken" the words "given or offered," so that the names of all voters who have given or offered bribes shall be reported as well as those who have taken bribes. There is no use of passing an Act which is going to entail such a great expense as this is, and stop half way in our good intentions. The object of all our legislation should be to get at this fearful corruption, which is sweeping over the country, and which, I believe, is in its infancy. You at once draw a line of demarcation very pointedly. You say virtually in this Act that the man who takes the bribe is branded as unfit to be a citizen of Canada; on the other hand, you say the man who tempts him with gold is not a bad man, because you say that the judges who make the investigation shall not report his name to Parliament as having been guilty of offering a bribe, in other words he shall not be classified among those who are unfit to have the right to vote.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) The first subsection of section 13 seems to me greatly open to objection. It reads as follows:—

13. The judge shall report the names of all voters whom he finds to have taken bribes; but he shall not report that any voter has taken a bribe unless and until he is satisfied that such vote has been served with a notice of the charge against him, and has had an opportunity of meeting it or that it was impossible to give him such notice by reason of his intentionally evading service.

Electors are not expected surely to abstain from travelling, as it happened in the past. A good many are away from their home during two or three months in the year. Let us take, for instance, the case of an elector who is working in the shanties. Even when served with a notice he will be said to have evaded service; and who is to produce the evidence? The bailiff commissioned to serve the notice? Fishing for cases of corrupt practices should not be the object aimed at by a law. Even when a single action of $5, or even 25 cents, is brought, should the respondent evade summons he is served with the notice through the newspapers. With this Bill it is quite the contrary; notice shall be served on respondents, even when away from their house, and this will suffice to have them condemned. As just remarked by the hon. member for Queen (Mr. Forbes)—and let him allow me to congratulate him, as he is the first English-speaking member who has not been afraid to give out his opinion—why should not the briber be punished just as the elector who takes bribes? The Bill of the hon. member for Albert may reach its object through having a notice served upon people absent from home; but the candidate will remain in his seat. Let it, at least, be enacted that the names of those electors who have taken bribes will be struck off the list; but no such provision is made by the Bill. Though the member elect may, after the inquest is over, find himself in a minority, he will nevertheless retain his seat. Bribery, therefore, far from being put down by this clause, will, on the contrary, be practised on a larger scale.

Mr. DICKEY. I think the proposition of the hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Forbes), would be a very radical change. If the hon. gentleman will look more carefully at the Bill, he will find that it is not directed against corruption at all. If he will look at section 15 of the new Act he will see that the evil that is aimed at in this Bill is a very narrow one indeed, it is simply the taking of a bribe. He will notice that not even the promise of an office will strike a man off the list. I take issue at once with the hon. member. I think that the man who really does take money for his vote, is, in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, the inferior of the man who gave him the money. I agree with him that the man who gives the money is the greater public enemy, and deserves the greater punishment; but taking intelligence as a test of a right to be put upon the voters' list, I say that a man who gives a bribe is nearly always the more independent man, the more intelligent man, and the man better able to cast a vote. If you adopt the principle that the hon. member for Queen's, N.S., wants us to adopt, you will have to incorporate all the clauses with regard to corrupt practices. It is not only the giving of bribes that you are going to make a corrupt practice as such, to be punished by disfranchisement, but you must extend the provision to all corrupt practices. The proposition of the hon. member for Albert is not to deal with corrupt practices, as such, at all. He is taking the lowest, what I may call the most degraded, form of corruption—that personal contact with money of which no man, I believe, can be a recipient and be fit to be trusted with the franchise. The Bill does not strike at that, perhaps, still more dangerous and subtle form of corruption, the promise of an office, for the reason that a man might be induced to vote against his convictions by the promise of an office. But at the same time, it is not such a transaction as shows that the man is utterly devoid of the moral sense which is involved in taking money, or the equivalent of money, for his vote. Therefore, I am entirely opposed to the amendment of the hon. member for Queen's, N.S., as being not only illogical, but inexpedient.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I desire to add a few words. If I understood aright the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) he said that the briber, the man who gives the money, is more intelligent than the man who takes the money for his vote, and consequently it is the man who is inferior in intelligence who is punished. For instance, one man steals and another receives the stolen goods; the robber is punished and the receiver goes scot free. I cannot join issue with the hon. member. I enter my solemn protest against such a wrong principle.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I enter my protest against the immoral principles advocated by some hon. members. The briber, it was asserted, should be spared, and the poor wretch who takes the money, who is less intelligent than his tempter, he who takes a bribe of a few dollars, is worthy of every chastisement. Well and with great apropos might we apply to this law the saying that according as one is powerful or weak the judgments of the courts will make him white or black. The hon. Ministers have not deemed it fit to express their opinion on the Bill. I notice also that the hon. leader of the Opposition and his principal friends are silent on the matter. When these gentlemen canvass for the votes of electors they grow eloquent and profess a great devotion to the interests of the people; but when in this House, they stand in presence of tyrannical and retrograde laws, like the Bill now before us, the same gentlemen, who stand at the head of the great parties, are silent; their lips are sealed.

Mr. CASEY. I think, in spite of the remarks of my hon. friend who has just sat down, that the man who offers the bribe, the tempter, is the more guilty; the other is the weak man who yields. Of the two, I think the tempter should be punished, as I believe the law at present provides for his punishment. Whether the man who is tempted, should be punished, is a different thing altogether. If you provide that the man who is tempted is subject to a penalty, you stop the source of information in regard to the tempter. I am afraid if we pass this law no information will be obtainable as to the man who has offered the bribe, because no man is going to tell of the offer of the bribe when he himself is liable to suffer by the information he gives. In the second place, if any such law is going to be enacted, it will be necessary to provide that it shall be the duty of some person, the Attorney-General of the province or the Crown prosecutor of the county, to prosecute those parties who are supposed to be guilty of such offences. If such provision is not made, the parties who are guilty will not be prosecuted. Neighbours do not prosecute neighbours in matters of this kind, that when elections are over the matter is looked upon as settled and neither party is willing to prosecute for offences of this kind. I urge on the hon. member for Albert that provision should be made so as to have the prosecutions conducted by the proper officer.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Let me call your attention to the fact that our hon. friends, the members who favour this Bill, and do not understand French, indulge in bursts of laughter over the triumph they have just secured; but I will tell those who are silent: "You are the victors; but you lack the necessary courage to bring in arguments in favour of the measure now before the committee."

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I raise a question of order on the clause now before you. It is not a court of record, but of commissioners.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) The preamble of the Bill reads as follows:—

1. Whenever, within sixty days after the publication in the "Canada Gazette" of the receipt by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of the return to a writ of election, a petition has been presented to the Governor-General, signed by twenty-five or more electors of such district, (the postal address of each elector signing the same being added to his name), stating that they believe or have reason to believe that bribery has extensively prevailed at the election, and having annexed thereto a solemn declaration, signed by the petitioners stating that they are such electors and that the allegations of the petition are true to the best of their knowledge and belief, the Governor-General shall appoint one or more persons to be a commissioner or commissioners under this Act, for the purpose of making inquiry into such bribery, such persons being judges of the Superior Court of the province; and if any of the commissioners so appointed die, resign or become incapable to act, the surviving or continuing commissioners or commissioner may act in such inquiry as if they or he had been solely appointed to be commissioners or a commissioner for the purposes of such inquiry; and all the provisions of this Act concerning the commissioners appointed to make any such inquiry shall be taken to apply to such surviving or continuing commissioners or commissioner, and in case a sole commissioner is originally appointed, then to such sole commissioner.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) All this clause has been altered.

Mr. FREMONT. (Translation.) The hon. member has just been reading to us clause 1 of the old Bill; this is not the preamble. The preamble reads as follows:—

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

That is all the preamble.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The hon. member meant to say the first clause.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) This clause is not consonant with the fundamental principle of the Bill. There is nothing in the Bill as to whether this commission being a court; now, I may ask, Mr. Chairman, was ever a commission created to fish after cases of bribery constituted into a court of record? In virtue of the principle of the measure, such as presented to the House, provision was made for the creation of commissioners appointed to hold an inquest, in a determined manner. The old Bill has then been replaced by a new one. Had it not been taken away from us, we might have studied it to greater advantage. It is the first time that such a proceeding takes place and I confess my surprise at this new departure.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I shall very much doubt the motives of the mover of the Bill if he refuses to accept the amendment. I do not see why the man who offers a bribe should not be as guilty and be punished in the same way as the man who accepts it, and words should be added to the clause that the judge shall report the names of all voters who have been found to have been given or offered bribes.

Mr. WELDON. I shall be very sorry to have the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) doubt my sincerity, but I must incur that penalty in refusing to accept an amendment which in my judgment, and after giving the matter some months reflection, will make it in practice impossible to secure a successful result. My only hope of getting a successful result is to put in the box the man who has given the bribe, and get the evidence from him. I am sorry that I cannot hold the respect of the hon. member for Montmagny, whose sincerity I would be very slow to challenge, but at the risk of losing his confidence in my sincerity, I must hope that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Forbes) will not be adopted, and mainly for the reason I have just given.

Mr. FORBES. I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), but do not concur with those expressed by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey). The hon. gentleman has said that the amendment is illogical and that the object of the Bill is to punish offenders, and he stated that worthy citizens are generally bribers and members of the higher class. I consider these remarks entirely illogical. The object of the Bill is not to punish, but simply to mark or brand every person guilty of having accepted a bribe. Why should you discriminate? Why should we not as well brand the man who offers the money as well as the man who takes it. I admit that there is a law in the Statute-book which renders a briber liable to heavy penalties, but under our law, until these parties are proved guilty, they are supposed to be innocent. We are all aware, personally, from our knowledge of elections, that many persons who have offered the bribes have not been prosecuted, and that such can still continue their calling, for there are people practically engaged in that business, one or more of whom I know to my sorrow as prominent Conservatives. There is no necessity, as was alleged by the hon. member for Cumberland, to incorporate all the corrupt practices Act in this Bill. In addition to the penalties imposed in the other Acts for bribery, why should we not disfranchise and mark the briber as well as the bribee if defendant? There is not the slightest reason for separating the giver or the taker of bribes. Neither should be entrusted with the confidence of the people. The man who will offer bribes directly or indirectly is as quite unfitted to receive the confidence and respect of his fellow-man as the man who takes a bribe. In every way in which we look at this question, the same principle will apply to the man who gives as to the man who receives the bribe. In addition to other penalties attached to the breaches of the law, a man should be disfranchised. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. We have at present laws to apply to both parties. Clause 85 of the present law punishes any one who receives a bribe. We have, therefore, a law now to punish both parties. In framing a new law, I do not see any reason why you should only punish the person who takes the bribe and not the person who gives it.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) The amendment should be adopted. The briber should be made punishable by this clause just as he who takes the money. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), as well as the hon. members who lend him their support, desire that the weight of the all-powerful arm of justice may be felt by him who has succumbed to the voice of the tempter, and has taken money for his vote, by the poor wretch who was unaware of the extent of the offence committed against society by selling a sacred right; and still nothing is provided for against the one who speculates coldly, with full knowledge, upon the credulity of the elector. I see no reason why, Mr. Chairman, this amendment should not be accepted.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I move:

¶ To insert in line 34 between the words "taken" and "bribes" the following words "offered or given," also on line 46 after the word "taken" the words "offered or given"

Motion negatived: yeas, 28; nays, 30.

On section 13,

Mr. WELDON. I move that clause 12 be struck out and the following substituted:—

All voters whom the judge reports to have taken bribes shall be incapable of voting at any election of a member of the House of Commons of Canada, held for seven years after the same has been reported to the Secretary of State.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I move that the words, "given or offered" be inserted after the word "taken" on the first line of clause 13.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) What is being done with clause 12?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I already told you that this clause had been altered.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) This clause ought to be amended in the sense as just proposed. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) ought to understand that the committee are of opinion that this amendment is quite fair and ought to be adopted, from the fact that the majority has only been of two against an amendment similar to this one. I beg of those members who have just voted against the principle of the amendment to think and consider attentively before rejecting the one just moved by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette). It is quite evident that the man who takes a certain sum for his vote is less guilty than the tempter who prevailed upon him to commit such an offence. I ask the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) and his friends to accept the amendment.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Last Wednesday the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) accepted an amendment to the same effect. I was the mover, and my amendment was unanimously carried.

Mr. BERGIN. I think this clause ought to be amended so as to refer only to the last previous election. That may be the intention, but it is not so expressed. I do not think the House will consent to inquire into all previous elections. I move that it be amended to that effect. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should have another clause of the same kind referring to the person who gives the bribe, who, I think, every fair-minded man will admit, is far more guilty than the one who takes the bribe. The briber is generally an intelligent man, whereas, the poor, ignorant fellow who can neither read nor write, trusting to the character of the man who gives the bribe, believes that he is committing a lawful act in taking it, and one for which he should not be punished. I submit that this sort of legislation will not increase the reputation of the members of this House.

Mr. DUPONT.

Mr. WELDON. If the words, "the said election" are substituted for the words, "any election," my hon. friend's object will be obtained.

Mr. FORBES. I heartily agree with the views of the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), and upon the third reading of this Bill I will have an opportunity to support them.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I want to know why the words referring to the promise of an office, place, or employment, as a form of bribery, which were in the original Bill, are left out of this one. If a man is bribed by the offer of a situation worth $2,000 a year or so, it seems he is not to be punished, while the poor man who receives 50 cents for his vote is to be punished.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) No more cash money will be given, but promises only will be made. It is an omission much to be regretted. Promises made to electors to prevail upon them to vote should also be included in the Bill. Things likely enough will come to pass, as follows:—In order to avoid falling under the effect of the law, the canvasser will address himself to an elector as follows: If you vote in the right direction, as suggested, you will get a position of $100 per annum. Certain people, they say, have no very expensive tastes, and are quite moderate in their desires; they do not want any very high situation. The canvasser, to convince his man, will tell him: Instead of a place, I will give you $100. Should the man be influential, as is often the case in our parishes, if the man commands fifty or sixty votes, the effect of such a promise is readily seen. Again, an elector may say: If you promise me to use your influence to get a situation for my son, I will vote for your candidate. The promise made, he will vote accordingly. And still, these corrupt practices are not reached by your law. These promises may be made either to the elector himself or to any other person. It is immaterial for the purpose of influencing the vote.

Wiser, in a certain sense, the Controverted Elections law looks upon it as a greater offence to lavishly scatter promises of places or other advantages. The deposit of $500 is quite insufficient as a security for the costs of the inquiry; it ought to be $1,500 or $2,000, such a sum being quite reasonable and in proportion with the probable costs of the inquiry, while $500 is a ridiculous sum. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) did not look upon the promises of situations as a corrupt practice; however, everybody knows, and the members of this House better than any others, that the great evil of Canada is the too large number of place-hunters. This tendency of our young men acts unfavourably on agriculture and commerce, on the arts and industries, from the very fact that it kills all spirit of initiative in those suffering from this malady. Young men are heard to say: See how happy such a one is, he has nothing to do. I have a well-educated boy, and I wish him also to live without working, as a gentleman. Every member of this House can testify to the truth of what I just said. As a matter of fact, the greatest portion of our time is taken up with this kind of place-hunting business. Should there happen to be a vacant place, fifty will apply for it. In his Bill, the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) intends to reach the poor wretch who, in a moment of error, took a few dollars, much needed for the maintenance of his wife and family; but he is quite silent as to the corruptor who, to my view, is a hundred times more guilty than the former.

On section 14,

Mr. BERGIN. I look upon this as one of the most objectionable clauses in the Bill. The amount paid out as a guarantee for the expenses ought to be at least $1,500. Less than that would be no guarantee to the party who is put under fire. I move that the amount be increased to $1,500.

Mr. SPROULE. It is entirely too much already, because whatever amount you may make it, it will be gobbled up by the lawyers, whether you make it small or heavy.

Mr. WELDON. The expenses will consist of summoning witnesses, the employment of a stenographer, payment of a judge's expenses, and there will be left considerable for other purposes.

Mr. BERGIN. A whole county may be summoned under this Bill. When you take the expenses of the witnesses from all over the county, and the judge's travelling expenses, you will find that $3,000, in a large county, will not cover the cost.

Mr. McLEOD. The petitioners will have to pay the witnesses' fees in advance, before they can compel the witnesses to come. If the $500 be not sufficient, it will be their loss.

Mr. OUMET. What will become of this money?

Mr. FORBES. Supposing the $500 be not spent, should not a provision be made to refund the balance?

Mr. WELDON. I think the hon. member's suggestion is a very good one. In my judgment, in most cases, the expenses will not be $500. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has not given as many hours as I have given weeks to the consideration of this Bill, and I am satisfied that the way in which the Bill will be carried out, will not be by summoning fifty or sixty or seventy witnesses, but by summoning half-a-dozen or so witnesses, who are bribers, and the expenses in practice, will be found very small. Therefore, I think, when hon. members who, in the nature of things, cannot be supposed to have given this measure so much consideration as others who have been puzzling their brains over it for a year or two—when they have given it more consideration, they will see that this is the only way the Bill can be worked, and it will be in a very inexpensive way.

Mr. BERGIN. My hon. friend from Albert says he has given a great deal of time to this Bill. Now, I was inclined, knowing the high character of the member for Albert, to give this Bill a most sympathetic consideration, and I abstained the other evening from opposing it, but the more attention I give to this Bill, the greater I perceive to be its anomalies, and the more satisfied I am that it will be impracticable for the purpose he intends to serve. I cannot for a moment believe that twenty-five respectable men can be had in a country to have a smelling commission established for the purpose of wrecking the characters of their neighbours—that is really what will be the result of this Bill. I would be satisfied, if my hon. friend would place in this Bill a clause to punish the so-called respectable men, the upright, honourable men, who give bribes to the poor, ignorant dupes who receive them. His refusal to put such a clause in the Bill, and the inadequate amount that he places in the Bill for the purpose of carrying it out, shows to me plainly that he is not disposed to punish that class of men.

Mr. OUMET. I have not seen the new Bill, as it is reprinted, and that is the reason I asked how this money is to be appropriated, when I heard the Chairman read clause 16 in the old Bill as being just as it stands there. I have not expressed any dissent from his Bill or from the principle of his Bill. I think his intentions are the best possible, although I do not know that through this Bill he will attain the end he has in view.

Mr. SPROULE. I move that the amount be reduced to $300. I think that the larger sum might prevent an inquiry being held that otherwise would be held.

Mr. MASSON. The new clause differs from the old more particularly in the last words relating to defraying the expenses of the inquiry. That is entirely changing the nature of this deposit. It is not to meet the expenses to which one or ten or one hundred men may be put in defending themselves, their character and their votes. There is no provision made for their costs at all; there is nobody liable for their costs. Now, if this $500 is not to be applied towards paying, under the direction of the court, the costs of the men who are being prosecuted, who are brought there to defend themselves, then I think that provision should be made. As this clause now stands, not one dollar of that would go to these men to pay their own expenses, or the expenses of the witness that they might bring there to rebut the evidence that had been given against them. My hon. friend from Albert may believe that such expenses may not amount to $500; I assure him that wherever an inquiry is instituted, wherever a court of this magnitude is known to hold sittings, when you take into account the expenses of the judge who attends, of the officers who attend, and the evidence which may take days to hear—when you take all these things into consideration, $500 will not cover the expense. I do not suppose the promoter of the Bill had any idea that the twenty-five men who petition were going to pay the expenses of the court. I do not think this House should ask them to pay the expenses of the court; but these should be borne by the country, as they are in all other cases.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. FORBES. I move that the following be added as a subsection to section 16:—

That any of the funds remaining in court after defraying the expenses mentioned in clause 14 be paid out to the petitioners "pro rata."

On section 19,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has my hon. friend considered that fully? It seems a pretty drastic measure that a single judge on circuit should disfranchise a man for seven years on evidence which might be considered very weak, and which another judge might reverse, and the man could have no possible opportunity of appealing from that. Some men value the franchise very much, and a man would not want to have a stigma attached to his name and to his family, such as would be done by an order of the court, against which there was no appeal. I hope there will be some mode found of giving a simple and inexpensive appeal, if it be desired to take it.

Mr. McLEOD. If nothing is specified, a writ of certiorari will go.

Mr. DICKEY. I hope the hon. member for Albert will drop this clause, because it is too severe.

Mr. MASSON.

Mr. WELDON. I am willing to drop it. It was a suggestion made in the committee the other day, and was not in the original Bill.

Mr. OUIMET. If it is intended to give a right of appeal, provision must be made to give it. This is a special jurisdiction that is being created. If you make no provision for carrying an appeal, which court will have jurisdiction?

Mr. BERGIN. I suggest that some provision should be made for paying the costs of the petition, because if the costs are taxed against the petitioner, he should be protected, and there is no protection given against costs. There is not sufficient guarantee that men, summoned as witnesses will be paid their expenses. If the hon. gentleman makes provisions of this kind, I will withdraw my further opposition to the Bill.

Mr. WELDON. As we have the matter of appeal to consider, the suggestion of the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) can, at the same time, be dealt with.

Bill reported.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS.

Bill (No. 24) further to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act (Mr. Lavergne) was considered in committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

THE CONNOLLY TRIAL.

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has been served with a subpoena to attend the High Court of Justice of Ontario, in and for the county of Carleton, with the Roll of the House of Commons of Canada from 1878 to 1887, inclusive, showing the list of members of the House during those years, with the oath of office.

Mr. OUIMET. I move:

That the Clerk of the House or other officer have leave to attend the High Court of Justice of Ontario in and for the county of Carleton in the case of the Queen vs. Nicholas Knight Connolly and Thomas McGreevy with the Rolls of the House of Commons from 1878 to 1887, both inclusive, and that he be permitted to give such evidence as may be necessary in the interests of justice, but he shall not allow the said Rolls to go out of his possession.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 21st March, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SECOND READING.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 106) respecting the Ladies of the Sacred Heart of Jesus.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). With the consent of the House, I would move that the said Bill be now read a second time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

WORLD'S FAIR COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee, to-morrow, to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide for the payment to two honorary commissioners, to represent Canada at the World's Columbian Exposition, to be held at Chicago in 1893, of such sums for their services as are determined by the Governor in Council.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman would do well to strike out the word "honorary." If the commissioners are to be paid, they are not honorary, as the meaning of the word is commonly understood.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion cannot be discussed at this stage.

Mr. CASEY. Do I understand your ruling, Mr. Speaker, to be that this motion is not to be discussed?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not debatable at this stage.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—SPEECH OF THE CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. CASEY. In pursuance of a notice I have already given, I beg leave to call the attention of the House and the Government, and especially the Controller of Customs, to certain alleged utterances of the latter gentleman at Kingston on Friday week last. I think it was. I have taken the report of his remarks from the Kingston "News," a paper which I believe is not unfriendly to the hon. gentleman. That paper published an abridged account of his remarks the day after he was supposed to have made them—because I cannot assume as yet that he really made the remarks that are ascribed to him. But on March 15 it published an article headed in large type, "What Mr. Wallace said," which article reads as follows:—

Inasmuch as one portion of Mr. Clarke Wallace's recent speech in this city has become a subject of inquiry in the House of Commons, we may as well give the entire passage exactly as it was delivered. Our first report was somewhat abridged, but the shorthand notes were preserved, and they are herewith transcribed in full. After sketching the growth of the Orange order in the several provinces of the Dominion, Mr. Wallace said:—

"We find to-day in the old country that brethren, the descendants of the heroes of two hundred years ago, are perhaps facing difficulties of a similar character to those which their ancestors had to face in 1688—that the men of 1893 are threatened with a rule which is antagonistic to freedom there, to the liberty which they have always enjoyed as citizens of the British Empire. What is proposed is not only to shake off their allegiance to Great Britain—the bonds of love that bind them to the Empire—but to put them, forsooth, under an alien and hostile Government. We have their (the Home Rulers') public declaration of what they would do if they obtained power—that they would never cease agitating until the last link that bound Ireland to the British Empire is severed. That is their object to-day. They are trying to take the loyal men with them; but our friends over there say they will never submit. Britain may cast them out, but if she does so, she has no right to say what may be their future allegiance. Our friends in that land are preparing and have asserted their unalterable determination never to submit to that Home Rule which Mr. Gladstone and his Government have laid out for them. (Applause.) I am sure that in their efforts they shall have the sympathy of the Orangemen of Canada—more than sympathy: they shall have our active aid, if that active aid is necessary. We should not be worthy descendants of the heroes of two hundred years ago—we would not be worthy of our ancestors of old, if we failed in our duty in that respect. I believe we are not unworthy descendants of the men who, driven from Dublin, stood at bay at Enniskillen and at Derry. In the history of the world there are no such records of heroic bravery, and I believe their descendants are not unworthy sons of such noble sires. Then, to come nearer home, we have questions that are agitating ourselves here."

Then Mr. Wallace, according to report, diverged to the Manitoba school question, which I am not going to discuss to-day. Now, Sir, this language, used by a gentleman who, if not a member of the Cabinet, is yet in a sense a member of the Ministry and a gentleman for whose utterances the Cabinet are responsible, deserves the serious notice of this House. When he endorses in such thorough-going fashion the utterances of the Orangemen of Ulster, we have to consider what those utterances are. I have in my pocket a report of some remarks that were made on the occasion of a meeting in Belfast on 2nd March. I take the report from the telegrams of the day to our Canadian newspapers. I might have obtained a fuller report from the English newspapers, if I had taken the trouble to look through them; but the telegram says:

Five thousand people were present. Dr. Kane, the chairman, said that Ulster was determined to defend herself to the last against the proposals of the Home Rule Bill.

The men of Ulster need not feel, however, that they would be alone and unaided in the fight for their liberties.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). I rise to a point of order. I did not come here to discuss Irish politics, and I think that is the feeling with a great many of the members. I do not think it should be brought up in this way, as we are not here to settle Irish questions.

Mr. CASEY. I did not rise to discuss Irish politics either, but to discuss the hon. Controller of Customs, and I intend doing so until I get through with him. I read this to show what it is the Controller of Customs endorses in his alleged speech at Kingston:

The men of Ulster need not feel, however, that they will be alone and unaided in their fight for liberty. We have the sympathy of Englishmen throughout the world. We have received letters from military and police officers in England and Ireland and telegrams from Canada and Australia promising to co-operate with the men of Ulster if the latter resorted to arms to defend their liberties against the tyranny of their historic foes.

Is the Controller of Customs one of those who sent telegrams from Canada?

A hundred thousand Orangemen were ready to the death to fight the Home Rule Bill.

Then Mr. Johnson, M.P. for Ballykilbeg, swore on a Bible that he would never submit to a Home Rule Bill. Mr. Kane tore up the Home Rule Bill, and Gladstone and Morley were burned in effigy. I have given the hon. Minister, or quasi-Minister—it is hard to define his position—at all events, the under secretary of the department, every opportunity to affirm or deny that he used the language I have quoted from the Kingston "News," or language to the same effect. The Government to which he belongs are responsible for his utterances, as well as his actions, and I have given them an opportunity to say what they think about it. It was only yesterday that I asked the question formulated by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), as to whether this was a correct report of the hon. gentleman's speech, and the Finance Minister replied that the Government had no information on the subject. They had no information on the subject, although the Controller of Customs was sitting about four yards from the Minister of Finance, and it must be supposed that he had some conversation with his leader on this question. Is it to be supposed that he did not tell any of his colleagues whether he had used the language attributed to him by the Kingston "News," or not? In the meantime, in the absence of any information from the hon. gentleman, as to whether he used that language or not, we must accept the report of the Kingston "News" and the statement of this Conservative newspaper, that they have preserved the shorthand notes of his speech, and that he is correctly reported. I had hoped yesterday that the hon. gentleman would have told us what he really meant to say, and I judge from the fact that he shirked answering my question, that he was correctly reported. If so, nothing more disloyal, nothing more tending to incite revolt and rebellion in this country has ever been uttered by any man, whether a Minister of the Crown or not, in this Dominion. He has distinctly, if correctly reported, said that the Orangemen of Canada would support the Orangemen of Ulster in physical resistance to a measure of Home Rule passed by the Lords and Commons of England, and assented to by the Queen, and, if such physical resistance is not treason I should like to know why the late lamented Mr. Riel was hanged. If the one offence is treason the other is. I say that when a law is passed by the Parliament of Great Britain and assented to by the Queen it becomes a law for the whole Empire, it becomes the law for Ireland, it becomes the law for Ulster, and if the Parliament of Great Britain should choose to pass a Bill granting Home Rule to the people of Ireland, that will become the law which must be respected and against which Orange resistance constitutes treason. I say that the Orangemen of Ulster, in their conclave at Belfast, have talked treason against the Empire and the Queen. If the Controller of Customs is correctly reported, he by endorsing their words, has talked treason against the Queen, and I say I require from him to-day an explicit and distinct statement of what he did say and did mean on that occasion and of what course he is to take in the future with regard to this question. Having said that I will sit down and wait for his version of the matter.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken accused me of cowardice because I did not reply to the question he put yesterday from his place in the House. I did not reply to that question at the time, because I was informed that the question was coming before this House in a more formal manner, when a more suitable opportunity would be given me to make whatever statement I may choose. I may also say further with reference to the question which the hon. gentleman asked yesterday, I do not choose to reply to it, because he has given a more full and accurate version of what I am reported to have said in Kingston on Friday week last. I may inform the hon. gentleman and those other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who are so anxious for information upon this matter, that the amended statement in the Kingston "News" of 15th March, which the hon. member for West Elgin has just read, is, I believe, a correct statement of what I said in Kingston on the night alluded to. So far as I know, that statement is a correct report of my remarks; and for the information of the hon. gentleman, I would further say that that was my opinion then, that it is my opinion to-day, and that I do not take back one word of the statement I then made.

Mr. CASEY. I do not want you to.

Mr. WALLACE. You could not get it if you did. Sir, I repudiate the charge of disloyalty made by the hon. member for Elgin. Men whom I represent and men who hold the views that I do, do not need to take lessons in loyalty from the hon. gentleman. The record of those men is one long record of unimpeachable loyalty to the British Empire. In the remarks I made then, I was but following out the views expressed by the late Premier of England, Lord Salisbury, on the 6th day of May, 1892, when Premier of England, and which remarks I may take the liberty of reading to this House. They are as follows:—

I am a Tory,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE :

—yet I cannot accept in all their width these doctrines of unrestricted passive obedience. I believe that the title of both Kings and Parliaments to the obedience of their subjects is that these Kings and Parliaments should observe the fundamental laws and the fundamental understandings of the compact by which they rule. Parliament has a right to govern the people of Ulster. It has not a right to sell them into slavery; and I do not believe in the unlimited unrestricted power of Parliaments any more than I do in the unrestricted power of Kings. Parliaments, like Kings, may take a course which, while it is technically within the legal limits of their attribution, is yet entirely at variance and in conflict with the understanding of the institutions by which they rule. James II. forgot that law. He stepped outside his attributions. He stepped outside the limits of the spirit of the constitution, and we show how the people of Ulster met him. If a similar abuse of power—be it on the part of a Parliament, or on the part of a King—should ever occur at any future time, I do not believe that the people of Ulster have lost their sturdy love of freedom or their detestation of arbitrary power.

This is the utterance of a Prime Minister of England; I think my own was somewhat moderate in comparison. But, as I have already said, they were my own views at any rate. I do not know, Sir, that this House of Commons has any right to interfere with my views upon British politics or upon any such subject. I hold these views; I hold them, I hope, honestly and sincerely. The holding of these views does not interfere in any way with my duties in this Canadian Parliament, so far as I know or so far as I can see. The Government of this country are not responsible in any degree for my utterances in this respect; I did not consult them; I did not ask their opinion before I spoke. I did not think it was necessary then, and I do not think yet that it was necessary. Other members of this House have given their views upon the political situation in the old land, as they had a perfect right to do. My hon. friend to the right here, the Secretary of State (Mr. Costigan) has given his views upon the other side of the question, as he had a perfect right to do, and as I had a perfect right to do, in discussing a matter which does not interfere with the performance of my duty as a representative of the Canadian people. I have nothing further to say, Mr. Speaker, except this, which I repeat, that I shall, from time to time, as occasion may require or as my opinion may decide, express my views upon questions as freely as I may choose to do, and I do not think that this Parliament of Canada has any right to interfere with the expression of my views upon these questions. Sir, what are these views? Is this a time when it is not desirable to do one's best to maintain the integrity and unity of the British Empire, because that is what the men of Ulster are trying to do, and that is what my remarks point to as well. Is it disunion, is it disintegration we desire? No, Sir. It is, as I expressed it, to maintain the unity of Great Britain and Ireland, and I know some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who are not so strong in their views on such questions. I hold the view strongly that the state of this country and of the Empire demands that we should draw closer the bond of union and not do anything that would lead to disintegration.

Mr. DAWSON. The hon. gentleman states that he has been correctly reported in the Kingston newspaper on the 15th of March. I am sorry he has felt himself called upon to make such a frank admission. I am sorry the report is a correct one. All who dwell under the shelter of the British flag make the proud boast that they are the freest people under the sun. We have the right to make laws for our own government, and the representatives of the people are called upon to use every care in framing those laws. In the British House of Commons, absolute freedom of speech prevails. A measure introduced in that august assembly is subjected to the most severe criticism, and may be debated day after day by any one opposing it. It can only be passed after everything that may be urged against it has been presented by those opposing it. A Bill introduced in the British Parliament must run the gauntlet of the House of Commons and then be submitted to the criticism of the House of Lords, after which it may or may not receive the assent of Her Majesty, and, until it does receive that assent it does not become law. But after it has received the assent of the Crown it becomes law, and then men who are loyal to the institutions of a free people will submit to that law. For generations, a portion of the Irish people have been asking for Home Rule. The proposal has been under consideration for nearly a century. Earnest men have opposed it, and every aspect of the question has been discussed; everything that could be urged against it has been said, and it has been defended by men equally earnest. Seven years ago a Government was defeated on this question, and since that time it has occupied a large share of public attention. The recent elections in Great Britain were run mainly on that issue. This question overshadowed every other question, and, as we know, it was discussed on every platform in the land day after day, and night after night, and discussed in the press, column after column, so that every man in England, every man in Scotland, or Wales, or Ireland, had the fullest opportunity of making himself acquainted with the merits of the scheme proposed. The elections came on, and Home Rule won the day; the electors of the British Isles declared, by their votes, that they desired their representatives in Parliament to introduce legislation designed to give Home Rule to Ireland. In obedience to the views of the people, so expressed, Mr. Gladstone has introduced his Bill into the House. It will be subjected to the fullest and freest criticism, and will be attacked by those opposed to it, day after day. The Opposition are free to put on record every possible objection, but it may be that, in the end, the voice of the people, as expressed by their votes, will be obeyed, and the Bill will pass the House of Commons. It will then go to the House of Lords, where the cold steel of calm criticism will be applied. And yet it may live and pass the House of Lords. It will then be submitted to Her Majesty, who may assent to or may veto the Bill. Following the advice of her responsible Ministers, she may give her assent, and the Bill will become law. Thus it will be Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords and Commons of Great Britain and Ireland, who will give Home Rule to Ireland. In short, it will be Her Majesty who will grant Home Rule to Ireland. In no other way can a Parliament in Dublin be called into existence, save by legislation for which the Queen, the Lords and Commons are equally responsible. We will suppose this Bill has become law. Men may think it unwise legislation; and if so, the constitutional means are left in their hands by which they can agitate for repeal of that law. Because men are opposed to it, are they justified in threatening an armed resistance to an Irish Parliament, if called into existence? We have had a rebellion in this country, and there is no man who will say that there were no causes leading up to that rebellion; but, although men deemed themselves justified, I dare say, in rising against the constituted authority, all loyal men uniting in putting down that rebellion. In the North-west, doubtless, there were many who believed they had grievances, it is admitted they had grievances, but they were not justified in rising. The rebellion was put down, and afterwards the grievances were removed. Because some men may think that the proposition to grant Home Rule is unwise, are they justified in declaring that they will never submit to Home Rule, and that if Her Majesty dares to give effect to the voice of the people, constitutionally expressed at the polls, they will, to quote the words used by the hon. gentleman, say that “she has no right to determine what may be their future allegiance.” I was pained when I read the report of the speech of the hon. gentleman, that he should have given utterance to such sentiments as these. Sir, the hon. gentleman is sworn to stand by Her Majesty, to uphold the Crown, to maintain her laws; yet here we find him applauding his friends in Ireland for declaring they will not submit to the law if it establishes a Parliament at Dublin; nay, more, proclaiming that the Sovereign has no right to say what may be their future allegiance if she enacts a law displeasing to his friends. He goes further, and pledges these people the support of his friends in Canada. I regret that any man should utter such sentiments as these. Had they been uttered hastily by an unthinking man, some allowance might be made, but when they are made by a member of this House, by the Controller of Her Majesty's Customs the circumstance demands more than a passing notice. I was also pained because he presumed to speak for the members of an association whose principles, I believe are outraged by this speech, whose principles of loyalty to the Queen and loyalty to the laws which she enacts are outraged by this speech. There is nothing in the teachings of the order over which the hon. gentlemen presides to warrant him in assuming that they are ready to throw off their allegiance to the Queen, and rise in rebellion against her, should she, through her Parliament, enact laws which they think ought not to be enacted. The hon. gentleman fears that the liberties of the minority will be invaded. He must have but little confidence in Her Majesty if he supposes she will give her assent to any Bill which will make it possible for the Dublin Parliament to invade the rights of the minority. It is not for me to prophesy, but I think that hon. gentlemen will live to see a Parliament in Dublin and they will look in vain for legislation which will invade the rights of the minority. Those rights are safeguarded in the Bill which is now under discussion in the British House of Commons, and those safeguards are provided with the unanimous consent of the friends of Home Rule. Why, then, should the hon. gentleman endeavour to arouse his friends in this country to rebellion against such a Parliament, knowing that rebellion against a Parliament of the Queen's creation is rebellion against the authority of the Queen? If the speech of the hon. gentleman is allowed to pass unchallenged many people may think that the members of this House agree with his sentiment; that any man has a right to consider himself absolved from his allegiance, “cast off by the Crown,” if and when Her Majesty enacts a law with which he is not in accord. I think the utterances of the hon. gentleman cannot be justified in this House, and I beg therefore to move:

That all the words after the word “That” be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—

Whereas N. Clarke Wallace, a member of this House and Controller of Her Majesty's Customs, is reported to have spoken, as follows, at a public meeting held in Kingston, the 10th March instant:—

"We find to-day in the old country that brethren, the descendants of the heroes of two hundred years ago, are perhaps facing difficulties of a similar character to those which their ancestors had to face in 1688—that the men of 1893 are threatened with a rule which is antagonistic to freedom there, to the liberty which they have always enjoyed as citizens of the British Empire. What is proposed is not only to shake off their allegiance to Great Britain—the bonds of love that bind them to the Empire—but to put them, forsooth, under an alien and hostile Government. We have their (the Home Rulers') public declaration of what they would do if they obtained power, that they would never cease agitating until the last link that bound Ireland to the British Empire is severed. That is their object to-day. They are trying to take the loyal men with them, but our friends over there say they will never submit. Britain may cast them out; but if she does so, she has no right to say what may be their future allegiance. Our friends in that land are preparing, and have asserted their unalterable determination never to submit to that Home Rule which Mr. Gladstone and his Government have laid out for them. (Applause.) I am sure that in their efforts they shall have the sympathy of the Orangemen of Canada—more than sympathy: they shall have our active aid, if that active aid be necessary. We should not be worthy descendants of the heroes of two hundred years ago—we would not be worthy of our ancestors of old, if we failed in our duty in that respect. I believe we are not unworthy descendants of the men who, driven from Dublin, stood at bay at Enniskillen and at Derry. In the history of the world there are no such records of heroic bravery, and I believe their descendants are not unworthy sons of such noble sires."

And whereas on the floor of Parliament the said N. Clarke Wallace has admitted the accuracy of said report:

Now, therefore, this House declares it to be the duty of all Her Majesty's subjects loyally to submit to the law; that the constitution contains within itself the means whereby all grievances may be redressed by constitutional methods, that no changes in the law should be sought to be brought about by resort to armed resistance, civil war or other physical force, and that an attempt to depose Her Majesty in respect of any portion of Her Empire, is unwarrantable and treasonable, and should receive the uncompromising resistance of all loyal citizens:

That the action of the said N. Clarke Wallace in expressing sympathy with, and holding out the hope of active aid to those who threaten to levy war in Ireland against Her Majesty, is deserving of the severest censure at the hands of this House, and if allowed to pass unnoticed would expose Canada to the slanderous imputation of being disloyal to Her Majesty, the very reverse of which is the fact:

And further, it is the duty of this House promptly to repudiate said utterances of said N. Clarke Wallace, lest his political connection with Parliament and the Government might lead the public to the erroneous conclusion that his views so expressed were shared in by this body, a conclusion which would give additional influence to such utterances, and the more endanger peace, order and good government throughout Her Majesty's Dominions.

Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. Speaker, I was anxious to hear an expression of opinion from the Secretary of State and from the Solicitor-General with regard to the language uttered by their colleague. We do not complain of the British politics of the Controller of Customs.

What we complain of is what he says Canadians will do, and we complain of that because he attaches to his utterance all the responsibility which goes with the utterances of a Minister. If the Mr. N. Clarke Wallace who is referred to as having made use of this language were not a member of the Canadian House of Commons, and were not Controller of Her Majesty's Customs; perhaps not such importance, nor such weight would attach to his remarks. He says he did not speak as a member of this House. He spoke, no doubt, as the Grand Master of the Orangemen of the Dominion of Canada. With what he has to say as Grand Master of the Orangemen of the Dominion of Canada, I have nothing to do, but I have to do with him as a member of this House, and as Controller of Customs. And, Sir, I ask you to consider this: if it is not painful for a large portion of the people of this country who think differently from that hon. gentleman on this subject, who feel hurt when they hear a member of the Canadian House of Commons and Controller of Customs, paid with the taxes levied from them, use such language. I ask if they have not a right to feel hurt when this gentleman stands upon a public platform, and states that if Home Rule should be granted Ireland—remember, Home Rule could only be granted after having passed the House of Commons and the House of Lords, and after having been sanctioned by the Queen—that notwithstanding all this, if this measure be granted to the people of Ireland, that he and those who think with him are ready to go across and fight against this measure, are ready to go across and fight against the constitution, and are ready to go across and fight against their Queen. I have nothing to do with his British politics; but I have certainly reason to find fault, that he, speaking in a House of liberty, speaking in the Canadian House of Commons, speaking as the Controller of Customs in a Canadian temple of liberty, says that although Canada may have liberty, and although Canadians may govern themselves, he is not prepared to allow that the people of another country shall have the same liberty, and shall have the same right to govern themselves. I say, Sir, that that was the most shameful expression that was ever heard in this House since the day that the Canadian Parliament was established here. I say, Sir, that when he gives utterance to this language he does not reflect the sentiments of any other member of this House, that he insults the Canadian people, and that he insults the intelligence of the Canadian House of Commons. Sir, if any man should go across the ocean to fight the Queen in her old age, it may be the Controller of Customs, but I do not think he will have anybody to help him in that fight. Loyalty! He speaks of loyalty!

Mr. LANDERKIN. A rebel.

Mr. DEVLIN. Does he understand what loyalty means? Does he understand that if he wishes to be loyal he must be loyal to the constitution and loyal to the Queen? But, he comes here with his threat, that he is prepared to fight against the constitution, and to fight against the Queen if justice should be granted Ireland. An hon. gentleman opposite interrupted the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) and said: We want no Irish politics discussed here.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN. He does not simply understand what the question is. It is not only an Irish question, Sir; it is a question affecting the British Empire. It is a question in which the whole Anglo-Saxon race is interested. It is a question which, when settled, will bring peace and happiness, not only to the people of Ireland, but to the whole of the British Empire. That gentleman stands up here every now and then to dictate to us. He forgets that we are hurt, and that a great portion of the people of this country are hurt by the utterances of the Controller of Customs; and have we not the right to stand up here to protest against this language, and to affirm the feelings that are entertained by that portion of the population which has been so hurt? I, for one, protest against the language of the Controller of Customs. I say that the language was unworthy of a British subject, unworthy of a member of the House of Commons, and unworthy of a Controller of Customs. It is language calculated to prevent people of Irish origin and pertaining to the Catholic faith going with anything like peace and comfort to the Department of Customs whenever they may have business to transact there. They know that when they go before this officer of the department, they go before a man who has insulted them publicly in the country and trampled upon their feelings in every way. Sir, I do not wish to deal with the question further. I trust that the utterances made use of by the Controller of Customs will be denounced by his colleagues the Secretary of State and the Solicitor-General, who are in a position to be better champions of the rights of Ireland in this matter than I am.

Mr. KENNY. Mr. Speaker, I always assume—my parliamentary experience, however, is not very lengthy—that we occupy here a judicial capacity, and that it is not desirable to unnecessarily incorporate into our deliberations, questions which pertain wholly to race or religious sentiments. I do not yield to any gentleman in this House in my loyalty to my Queen, and I certainly say that I should not consider myself as giving very strong evidence of my devotion to my Sovereign, if I stated, after a measure had passed both branches of the Imperial Legislature, and had been approved of by Her Majesty, that I would personally, or induce others, or assist others, in taking up arms against such a measure. I think that such conduct is injudicious and is unconstitutional. I will go further and say that I consider that we members of the Canadian Parliament should, even the most humble of us, be guarded in our utterances. I was individually astonished, and shocked, and horrified, in going to the reading room the other day and in looking over the files of the recent Halifax papers, to find that one of the organs of opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite in the province of Nova Scotia had its editorial article headed "Mr. Kenny's views," and I realized then that the most insignificant member of this House should be careful in his utterances on such difficult questions as the one now before us. Mr. Speaker, I need not intimate to you what is due to your position, but if you transgressed in that way, I should think you would be more culpable than myself, and that the higher the position an hon. gentleman occupies in this House and the country, the more careful he should be in his utterances. These are my opinions. I was not here when the resolution was introduced, nor when the hon. Controller of Customs made his statement; but I have no sympathy with any body of men on either side of the Atlantic who, after a measure of Imperial concern has been approved by both branches of the Imperial Legislature, and has been assented to by the Queen, would consider it their duty, or a patriotic or loyal course, to take up arms in opposition to that measure. I hardly think, with my knowledge of my hon. friend the Controller of Customs, that that was what he meant. Now, let us look, for a moment, at the position in which this resolution places us. We are called upon to vote certain supplies for the Government of the country, and before we are allowed to do so, a motion is brought forward arresting that vote—a motion involving a vote of want of confidence in the Government of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. KENNY. That is exactly what it seems to me to mean—a vote of want of confidence in the Government of Canada, because a member of that Government expressed himself outside the House in a manner which I entirely disapprove. The motion is so made that it is impossible for us to move an amendment, and is brought in with the evident intention, the avowed intention, the well-known intention, of simply embarrassing the Government. Now, I was sent here by the citizens of Halifax—the Irishmen of Halifax are divided in politics, some of them voted for me—to support this Government, and I cannot see how I can go back to them and say that I voted against this Government simply because one of its members made, on an outside question and outside the House, an indiscreet and injudicious speech. Therefore, while I entirely disapprove of any such utterances as those attributed to the hon. Controller of Customs, while he was dealing with a question that was not a Canadian question. I do not see how I could vote for a motion of want of confidence in the Government.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), in referring to this motion as a motion of want of confidence in the Government, takes a wholly erroneous view.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, I will undertake to show that I am correct in the statement I make. It is quite true, Sir, that a Government may treat any motion, even a motion for the adjournment of the House, as a motion of want of confidence, but no Government is obliged to treat an ordinary motion as a motion of want of confidence, and, so far as I know, no Government has hitherto treated as such, a motion in amendment to go into Supply. Why, Sir, let me refer the House to a motion which I myself made two or three years ago, on going into Supply, with reference to the distribution of public moneys for the construction of public works. The leader of the House on that occasion, the late Prime Minister Sir John Macdonald, accepted that motion and supported it in opposition to the Government's own proposition to go into Supply. Let me refer to another case:—A few years ago, on the proposal to go into Supply, the late member for Niagara, Mr. Plumb, moved a motion on the subject of the boundary award, and the Government supported that motion against their own proposition to go into Supply. So, when the hon. gentleman speaks about this being a motion of want of confidence, a motion to embarrass the Administration, he takes a wholly mistaken view as to the nature of the motion. Sir, the hon. gentleman said that the speech of the hon. Controller of Customs was an indiscreet speech. He said he could not suppose that the Controller of Customs meant precisely what his speech critically read, would necessarily imply. But the hon. Controller of Customs has interpreted his own speech. He says that he stands by the revised report of that speech which appeared in the Kingston "News," and that he still entertains the view that he there expressed. He declares that those who seek Home Rule in Ireland are not honest in their declarations—that they do not mean simply to acquire local self-government for Ireland, as we have local self-government in Canada. He says that behind that there is the intention to throw off the authority of the Queen, to establish the independence of Ireland, to give it a separate existence, and that he is prepared to sustain the Ulster men in resisting that measure from its inception. Well, Sir, I would refer the hon. gentleman to the Secretary of State, who sits beside him; I would refer him to the Solicitor-General. Both of those gentlemen are his colleagues in the Administration, and one of them is a member of the Cabinet. They are as ardent supporters of Home Rule as any who support it in the British Parliament. Does the hon. gentleman say that his colleagues are not honest in declaring themselves in favour of Home Rule solely for the purpose of local self-government? Does he say that they are not honest in their professions of loyalty to Her Majesty? I admit that hon. gentlemen in this House may honestly take exception to the policy of Home Rule. There are many of us who believe that it is a proper measure—that it will allay discontent, and unite the Empire more strongly together than it has ever been under legislative union. That is a question on which there may be differences of opinion, and I find no fault with the views the hon. gentleman entertains as to the propriety or impropriety of Home Rule. That is not the question before us; that is not the question dealt with by this resolution. The question dealt with by this resolution is that the hon. gentleman, a member of this House, a member of the Administration, a man who has taken the oath of allegiance to the Queen upon entering upon the discharge of his duties as a Minister of the Crown, declares that he intends to disregard that obligation—declares that he intends to take up arms—declares that he intends to stand by others who take up arms—in resisting the authority of the Imperial Parliament. That is the position which we criticise; that is the position which we condemn; that is the matter dealt with by this resolution, and the matter upon which the House will be called upon to vote. Sir, the hon. gentleman has stated that Lord Salisbury had declared himself opposed to the principle of Home Rule. Well, the hon. gentleman, correctly, no doubt, represents the views of the late Prime Minister of England, in saying that the late Prime Minister was opposed to Home Rule. Every man in the United Kingdom who chooses to give his mind a holiday, and who is satisfied with the constitution as it is, may be disposed to take the same view as that expressed by Lord Salisbury; but we, in this country, have had experience of local self-government. We here deal with our own local affairs, and every hon. gentleman knows that before the introduction of parliamentary government into the colonies in British North America there was growing up on this continent, within the domain of Her Majesty, a condition of discontent not unlike that which exists in Ireland. How have the people of this country become contented and united with the United Kingdom? By conceding to them what the Home Rule Bill proposes to concede to Ireland. Whether that be the correct view or not, is not a matter of any consequence here to-day. What is of consequence here to-day is that a Minister of the Crown, one who is specially pledged to sustain the authority of Her Majesty, has declared that if the Imperial Parliament, in the exercise of its undoubted constitutional rights, chooses to carry a measure of Home Rule, then he will be prepared to disregard his obligations and to take up arms against Her Majesty, and resist the authority or the attempt to establish the authority, of that local parliament thus created by the law of the land. That is the position which is condemned in this resolution, and every hon. gentleman who opposes this resolution will commit himself to the principles enunciated by the Controller of Customs in his Kingston speech.

Mr. FOSTER. I am surprised at the speech of my hon. friend. He is generally calm and philosophic, and in the main fair; but I can scarcely conceive of a more unfair rendering of the sentiments of a political opponent than that which he has just given of those expressed by my hon. friend, as reported in the Kingston "News." Now, I hold that it is well for us to look at this matter calmly and moderately. I approach it with a good deal of doubt in my own mind as to the bona fides of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not sure that it is out of hearts overflowing with deep and abiding loyalty and love for the mother country that they approach this matter. I do not think that their past history, to say the least of it, proves that they are more loyal and devoted to the integrity of the Empire than hon. gentlemen who sit on this side. It strikes me that the motion is what you might call a mischievous party motion, meant simply to embarrass the Government, and brought forward for that purpose, and that purpose alone. Well, whether it be brought up for that purpose and that alone, or not, I am at least within the sense of every member of this House in stating that it ought to be discussed calmly and deliberately. Let us give to every man his perfect right in this free country, and let us give every expression of opinion its fair rendering in this House; or if it be made out of this House, let us render it fairly when it comes before us. And, while it is fresh in my memory, let me say that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has been most unfair in stating that the Controller of Customs advised armed resistance against his Queen and country if a certain event should take place. There is nothing in the language, nothing in the statement my hon. friend made to-day, to back up that rendering for an instant. Let us examine what my hon. friend the Controller of Customs said. We find that there are two parties in Great Britain, the one in favour of Home Rule and the other deadly opposed to it. I am not going to discuss the merits of that question to-day, as it is not my place to do so. I may say that I do not think such a discussion would be very profitable. I must say that we have sufficient disturbing questions of our own and sufficient important questions to discuss, without taking upon ourselves to argue and discuss all these questions upon the other side of the water.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

At the same time, I do not deny that you cannot put a wall around this country or any other country. You cannot put a wall around the sympathies of human beings; and so long as they live and breathe they will have their sympathies for and against causes the wide world over. Our people will not confine their sympathies simply to Canada; and any great struggle going on in any part of the world must evoke sympathies on one side or the other on the part of intelligent and reading men. But it would be better for this Parliament to confine itself to the questions more particularly germane to this country, in its progress, advancement and legislation. I do not mean by that to say that we should shut ourselves up, and refuse the sympathies of our hearts and feelings to great causes, wherever they may have their central sphere of action. But I do say this, that, in that respect, we must be in the last degree, tolerant to each other, and in relation to any causes which appeal to the sympathies of the world, but which do not affect our country directly, we must be very tolerant and large minded in allowing people to express their feelings for or against them as they may think best. We must carefully distinguish between what a man says outside the sphere of his parliamentary duties, outside the sphere of political questions and action, outside the sphere of policy, and what he has a perfect right to express, as an individual, as a member of a society, as one who has sympathy with outside causes, in one direction or another, and that is the first point of difference I want to ask hon. gentlemen in this House to think upon before they vote for or against this resolution. Now, there was a very instructive occurrence which took place in this House in 1876, and which was very widely debated in this House, and which was debated, I am bound to say, in a spirit of greater liberality and tolerance than this promises to be debated to-night. In 1876, when Mr. Mackenzie led the Government, there was a gentleman who belonged to his Government by the name of Huntington. He was, I believe, Postmaster-General. There was an election going on in a county in the province of Quebec, and he went down to take part in that election, and made a violent and strong attack upon the Roman Catholic hierarchy, or, at any rate, upon a portion of it. In this way he touched that vexed question of religion and creed in the province of Quebec. It happened that another member of that self-same Government was Mr. Cauchon, the President of the Council. As soon as he read that speech, he came to the Premier, Mr. Mackenzie, and complained of those utterances of the Postmaster-General—which were not merely the utterances of his private opinion, for he took occasion to say that if they were not the opinions of the Government to which he belonged, he would not remain a member of it. Mr. Mackenzie said frankly and fairly: I do not agree with those sentiments ; but, at the same time, I do not hold the Government responsible for them. The matter was brought up in this House. Mr. Holton, one of the best authorities on constitutional matters, and as fair-minded a man as sat in the House at that or possibly any other time, condemned the speech of the Postmaster-General. He asked Mr. Mackenzie, as leader of the Government, to state whether he repudiated the sentiments therein expressed or not. What was Mr. Mackenzie's answer ? It was, in brief, that Mr. Huntington had a perfect right to go down to his province and speak on matters connected with his province, and, although he did not agree in the sentiments, the Government were not responsible for them. The House was satisfied with that declaration, Mr. Cauchon was satisfied, Mr. Mackenzie never repudiated the sentiments of his colleague, nor do I think he was called on to repudiate them ; and the House, after discussing the matter, let it drop. Mr. Cauchon saying he had in reality gained his point when the Premier said he had no sympathy with the utterances of Mr. Huntington, and that the Government were not responsible for them. Now, Sir, that is in every way a stronger case than this. Mr. Huntington was a member of the Cabinet ; Mr. Huntington went down into his province when an election was taking place for the Dominion House of Commons ; and in speaking upon the issue and before the country, he made that statement and he raised that storm ; yet Mr. Mackenzie, in the broad spirit of tolerance, contended, and contended successfully, that though he did not agree with the sentiments of the Postmaster-General, he did not hold the Government responsible for them, and did not propose to repudiate them. Now, Sir, this is a different case. My hon. friend, as is well known, is a member of the Loyal Orange Order. Gentlemen on the other side and on this side of the House may be members of that order ; they may be members of an order of an entirely different aim, so far as that is concerned. We allow them all to belong to such orders as they please. No man in this House has a right to dictate to me to what society I shall belong, how often I shall attend its meetings, what my sentiments and expressions shall be with reference to that society. The member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is a member of the Orange order, and he, in right as a member, went to one of their meetings, and at that meeting, he spoke upon a question which, of course, evokes a great deal of discussion, the question of the struggle for Home Rule for Ireland. Now, what did he say ? The first part of his speech is simply a representation of what he thought to be the position of Home Rulers in Ireland. Some gentlemen may get up and say that that representation is not a correct one. I venture to say that you may take any twenty-five men and ask each one of them to state what he thinks is the position of the Home Rule party, and the position of the Anti-Home Rule party, in Great Britain, and no two of them will entirely agree. It is a matter of opinion, formed upon reading, more or less extensive, formed upon other bases, but so formed that not two men out of twenty-five would come to the same conclusion upon the matter. My hon. friend stated his opinion as to what was the attitude of the Anti-Home Rule party. What did he state next ? He stated what they themselves have stated upon their platform, and he gives it as their statement, and the only point in which the Controller of Customs, in his speech, really went a little beyond the record, I think, is where he touched upon the question of allegiance. Now, mind you, that is beyond the record as regards my own feeling on the subject, and as to what I would have thought politic to say. My opinion may not be the opinions of my hon. friends opposite, it may not be the opinion of my hon. friends here. Each of us has a right to his own opinion. But I simply ask the House to remember that it was his own opinion, and he so expressed it. It may not have been to the taste of all hon. gentlemen, but at the same time it was a private opinion expressed by himself at a meeting of a lodge of an order to which he belonged ; and as such I do not consider that he bound the Government in any respect, I do not consider that the Government is responsible for those utterances in any respect. I believe, as the hon. member for West York says, that he is as loyal to the British Crown, and as devoted to the interests of the Empire, as any other gentleman who sits in this House ; and I do not believe that, privately, there is a gentleman in this House who would doubt the sincerity of that hon. gentleman's statement. He spoke nothing at all about armed resistance ; he went on to say that they were making resistance, that they were determined not to submit ; and he went on still further to say that they would have the active aid and sympathy of Orangemen on this side of the water. What does that mean ? My hon. friend opposite jumped at the conclusion that the hon. member for West York is going to shoulder his musket and to take up arms against the country. Well, Sir, I think we had a little episode about shouldering a musket in this country before ; and it strikes me that I have heard it stated that a gentleman in this country, holding the very responsible position of leader of a great party in this country, actually stated—if he did not he was greatly misunderstood, and he has over and over again had an opportunity to correct the misstatement—that he was quite willing to shoulder his musket and fight against the volunteers of this country in putting down the rebellion in the North-west. Sir, that is rather a celebrated case, but I never knew of any gentleman on this side of the House being so foolish as to move a resolution asking us to censure that hon. gentleman. In this case what my hon. friend said was his own opinion; he stated it, not in his public capacity, but in a private capacity. He did not bind the Government—he could not do it. It is not a matter of policy with reference to the Government, and the Government does not hold itself bound by these utterances, or responsible for them in the least degree. Now, let us ask what this resolution proposes to do. Instead of bringing up the question and getting the opinion of my hon. friend, hon. gentlemen opposite think it is their duty to go a little further, and bring a claptrap resolution before this House in order to embarrass the Government, and to make it appear that those hon. gentlemen are the only loyal men in this country, and that it is the duty of this House now to vote for this motion, if this House desires to have any reputation for loyalty. I do not submit to a proposition of that kind. Now, I want to analyse this resolution in two or three respects. This resolution says:

Now, therefore, the House declares it to be the duty of all Her Majesty's subjects loyally to submit to the law; that the constitution contains within itself the means whereby all grievances may be redressed by constitutional methods; that no changes in the law should be sought to be brought about by a resort to armed resistance, civil war, or physical force; and that any attempt to depose Her Majesty in respect to any portion of the British Empire, is unwarrantable and treasonable, and should receive the uncompromising resistance of all loyal citizens.

I congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite that, for the second time in their history, in this Parliament, they have put a good, square, loyal sentiment before this House. They did it once before when the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), moved by an impulse of great loyalty, placed a resolution before this House, which was bereft of all disagreeable incidents in connection with it, and was accepted loyally by the House. Now, for the second time, they have engaged in this outburst of loyalty. I think they are to be congratulated on once in a while, in a moment of weakness, giving expression to loyal sentiments. The resolution goes on to say:

That the action of the said N. Clarke Wallace, in expressing sympathy, and holding out a hope of active aid to those who threatened to levy war in Ireland against Her Majesty,---

I say that is not a true representation of the case; there is not a word of truth in that representation of the case; and, as one who is desirous of simply voting for the truth and not for an error, I refuse to endorse that sentiment. I do not understand that any such threat was made. I understand that men who believe in Home Rule, are canvassing this country, as they have a perfect right to do; they are holding meetings, they have organizations, and are raising money, in order actively to aid those who are engaged in furthering the cause of Home Rule on the other side of the water. There is a great deal of activity in that movement, and they are perfectly justified in doing it. I do not understand that the hon. gentleman whose action is now under discussion, went any further, in the expression of his sentiments and in the aid and sympathy he was ready to give, and by subscriptions, such as are now made on behalf of both parties who are warring at this time on the other side of the water. Now we are asked to say, that, because he expressed sympathy with the movement against the party opposed to Home Rule in Ireland, he is deserving of the severest censure at the hands of this House.

And if allowed to pass unnoticed, this would expose Canada to the slanderous imputation of being disloyal to Her Majesty, the very reverse of which is the fact.

I do not believe that any such opinion can be sustained by the expressions referred to. You cannot make any country believe, you cannot make Great Britain believe, it is the height of absurdity to argue, from an individual utterance here and there throughout the country, that the country, as a whole, is disloyal. It is impossible. The only thing that would commend itself as an argument to Great Britain, as a public utterance that would be at once so strong and overpowering as to make itself felt to be unanswerable and absolute, would be a resolution of Parliament, or something of that kind, and I do not think the House is called on to affirm that—I do not think it is true—and affirm it on the private utterance of an hon. gentleman who is Controller of Customs in this House, spoken at a meeting of that organization to which he belongs, and to which he has belonged the greater part of his lifetime.

And further, it is the duty of this House promptly to repudiate said utterances of said N. Clarke Wallace, lest his political connection with Parliament and the Government might lead the public to the erroneous conclusion that his views so expressed were shared in by this body, a conclusion which would give additional influence to such utterances, and the more endanger peace, order and good government throughout Her Majesty's dominions.

I think the House is not bound by those words as a body. Individual members may have views exactly similar to those held by the hon. gentleman, but to say that the private utterances of any person outside of this House, be he member of the Government or not, binds this House, as an expression of the House, is to say a thing which, to simply state it, proves it to be manifestly untrue. I think I have said about all that is necessary, so far as a slight analysis of this resolution is concerned. Now, I put it to hon. gentlemen opposite, whether they have served the interests of this country, whether they have served the interests of good government here, whether they have served the interests of any cause that is good under the sun, by bringing up this matter in the House, as they have done to-day, by inducing an acrimonious debate on it, and by causing outside views and outside sentiments to be greatly worked upon by what, probably, has very little effect in this House. Hon. members, as this resolution was read, and as it has been spoken to, have shown by their jocund faces, their rubicund countenances, their smiling appearances, that they were not very deeply moved, that there was none of the deep patriotic indignation that swells every vein, but that it was rather a piece of by-play among themselves. They think they have the Government in a corner, and they are playing with these resolutions in a wholly partisan and half-political way, in order to see what capital they can make out of them. I do not think they will make much capital out of them, for I believe steady, sensible people outside of this House will come to the conclusion, that this is simply a small, and not very effective, explosion of partisan artillery. I think the people outside of this House who are sensible and intelligent and reflect upon this question, will feel, with hon. members on this side of the House, although they may not, and as many of them do not express themselves as agreeing with the utterances of my hon. friend, as he does not agree with all the utterances I myself may state outside of this House, will come to the conclusion that this is a very small matter to make so great a time about, and that they will, while expressing their own opinions and asking latitude for their own opinions, outside of this House, accord to other hon. gentlemen, be they members of the Government or not, the utmost liberty of expression on matters outside of this House, not connected with the policy of the Government, and not connected germanely with Canadian affairs at all. I desire, before I resume my seat, to again call attention to the case I have cited, which occurred during the Mackenzie Administration, the calm way in which that was treated, the explanations that were made, the explanations of the leader of the Government and the stand he took; and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, whether, after all, it would not be wisdom on their part to withdraw this resolution and allow the House to go on with its work in Committee of Supply?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It may be wisdom on our part to allow that course to be taken, after the Government have formally and distinctly repudiated the exceedingly injudicious and uncalled-for statements made by the Controller of Customs, and reaffirmed by him on the floor of this House. As to the view which good and sensible people will take of this matter, I think I am in a position to assure the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat, that good and sensible people of Canada will hold, that a man who occupies a position at the hands of Her Majesty, greatly derogates from his position, and is guilty of a gross breach of good faith towards the Government of which he is a part, who uses such language as the hon. Controller of Customs is proved, out of his own mouth, to have used on this subject. I am not myself of the opinion, that Mr. Gladstone is going to lose many nights' sleep because he may be advised by cable or otherwise, that the Controller of Customs of the Dominion of Canada contemplates a hostile invasion of the province of Ulster. But, notwithstanding that, I do hold that any man with Her Majesty's commission in his pocket, using words the plain and obvious sense of which is directly to advocate armed resistance to an enactment of the Imperial Parliament, commits an action which calls for prompt repudiation on the part of the leader of this House and on the part of his colleagues. Sir, this may be a mischievous motion, as the hon. Minister of Finance states, but it is not half so mischievous as was the speech of the Controller of Customs. If there be one thing more clear than another, from the speech we have just listened to, it is this, that the Government have no right, under the circumstances, to attempt to treat this motion as a motion of want of confidence. As my hon. friend pointed out, there are numerous cases when the Government have chosen to accept motions on going into Committee of Supply, and he might have added to the motions to which he alluded, a motion moved by myself, defining the authority of the Committee of Public Accounts, and which was accepted by the then leader of the House and allowed to pass, although it was moved on going into Committee of Supply. Sir, what the Government must do with this matter is, either to assume responsibility for the utterances of the Controller of Customs, in which case, if they assume the responsibility, if they declare that they, like him, are of the opinion that resistance, and armed resistance, too,—for on this point I differ from the Minister of Finance—is justifiable, under the circumstances, as against a law enacted by the Imperial Parliament, then they may ask their followers to view this motion as a vote of want of confidence. But if they do not assume that position, if they repudiate the hon. gentleman's utterances, then I say they are abusing their position if they call hon. gentlemen behind them to vote on this matter contrary to their own individual opinions. Let us look, for one moment, at the real position of affairs. It is perfectly idle for the Minister of Finance to say that the advocates of resistance to the legislation now pending in the British Parliament, look to a peaceful or constitutional agitation. Sir, they perfectly well know that to-day, all over the north of Ireland, demagogues and firebrands (I am sorry to say they include in their ranks some men who should know much better, peers of the realm, as well as commoners), are doing their best to stir up racial and religious enmity between the various sections of Ireland. They are declaring publicly that they are opening communication with officers in Her Majesty's army. They have dared to cast a slur upon the loyalty of the commander of Her Majesty's forces in Ireland. They have dared to declare that Her Majesty's soldiers and policemen will not act against them if they rise in arms. Under such circumstances, and while the Controller and his friends know this kind of agitation is going on, we find a member of the Government, although a man in an inferior position, I grant, endeavouring to create a similar state of affairs here; we find that hon. gentleman, who is connected with what, despite his declarations, I am willing to regard as the Loyal Orange Order, openly advocating a breach of allegiance to Her Majesty's Crown. I was very much pleased, indeed, to hear the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson), who, I believe, is a distinguished member of that same order, rise in his place to repudiate those sentiments as they should be repudiated; and hon. gentlemen may depend upon it, that if the Controller of Customs fails to do this also, he will most assuredly leave himself under this imputation, an imputation justly brought against gentlemen of his political persuasion before, that they are good and loyal men just so long as they have their own way, and no longer. Sir, the kind of loyalty of which the Controller of Customs is the exponent, is the true legitimate, spiritual descendant of that kind of loyalty of which we have seen a specimen or two in this country when these same loyalists rotten-egged Lord Elgin in the streets of Montreal, is a specimen of the same kind of loyalty which led many of their leaders to sign annexation manifestoes, and of the same kind of loyalty which, if their peculiar views are interfered with, would, I have not the slightest doubt, lead them—as they appear to be leading the hon. Controller of Customs, and his friends—to advocate active aid and armed resistance to any measure which the Commons, either of Canada or the mother country, may pass, and which does not happen to jump with their particular passions and prejudices. Sir, what did the hon. gentleman declare? He declares that he advocates the union of the British Empire, and he says that the way to bring about the union of the British Empire is to aid and abet the people of Ulster in organizing a rebellion against the same British Empire. Now, Sir, I know that we have loyalists and loyalists. I know that there are very many men who call themselves by that honoured name, and who never did any one thing, and never will do any one thing to deserve the title. Sir, we have 35 per cent loyalists, and a great many of them in this country. We have loyalists who, as I said, just so long, and no longer than they happen to be exponents of the Royal Will are disposed to insist on all possible occasions, and under all possible circumstances, on obedience to Her Majesty, and obedience to constituted law and order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

But, Sir, let the case be changed; let these gentlemen's prejudices be interfered with for one moment, and we have, as in the case of the Controller of Customs, a very clear and a very practical proof of the real value and extent to which the loyalty of such gentlemen as himself will go. Now, as I have said, I am not very seriously alarmed as to the result of the hon. gentleman's threat. I think we have heard that kind of threat before. I think, if his memory will take him back to the time when Mr. Gladstone disestablished the Irish Church, he will find that there were loyalists of the same description, who were willing to kick Her Majesty's Crown into the Boyne, and publicly threatened to do so; but I never heard that the threat went any degree further. Perhaps, however, as the Controller of Customs has indicated his intentions to organize, and, I suppose, head a movement, in the way of active aid to the loyalists of Ulster, it may become the other members of the Government who do not entertain precisely the same views, to take some measures to repress his martial ardour, and, unless I greatly mistake, as my hon. friend the Minister of Militia was in times gone by a pretty pronounced Home Ruler, I would suggest that as the Supplementary Estimates are not all down, that a vote might be placed in the Estimates to provide for volunteers to repel any hostile invasion of Ulster which may take place from these shores. However, Sir, the Government must not suppose, and the Government cannot suppose, that it is possible for them or any other Government to escape responsibility for the utterances of one of their members. I must say that as the Controller of Customs is not a very old member of the Government that it is possible that he may not be quite aware of the responsibilities he undertakes when he becomes even a subordinate member of the Government. But it is the business of the elder members and the superior members to see—I use the word in no offensive meaning—to see that these young hounds do not run riot, but that they must be disciplined to proper action. They must be compelled to understand that when a man becomes a member of the Government he compromises a great many other people than himself by his utterances. That is all that I wish to say, but the hon. gentleman, the Controller of Customs, and the Minister of Finance, and all other members of the Government ought to understand this: Here in Canada, as everybody knows, we have two different religions and we have two different races. One thing the hon. Minister of Finance did say, which I heartily agree in: That man is no true friend of Canada, that man is no true patriot, that man is no true friend of the British Empire, who does anything to bring forward these discords more prominently than they already exist. And, it is just, because the language used by the Controller of Customs in his position as a member of the Government is eminently qualified to make ill-blood between the two great divisions which exist in Canada, because it is eminently calculated to set one class of Irish Canadians against the other, that I think that this motion is properly put. As I said, Sir,—and I think the Finance Minister admitted it—I believe that the vast majority of this House feels disposed entirely to repudiate the obvious deductions to be drawn from that hon. gentleman's speech. I am very sure, Sir, that even the Loyal Orange Order—unless possibly it may be the Grand Lodge—would, if they were fairly consulted, entirely repudiate any idea of active aid and interference, and whether they do or not, I feel certain that our people all through Canada do believe: That if it pleases Her Majesty and the British Parliament to grant Home Rule to Ireland, they will at least do so with the hope, which we all trust will be fulfilled, of removing one of the very greatest obstacles which ever existed to the progress of the British Empire. Sir, I know, and I have known long, that the best of British statesmen have believed that until peace and concord were obtained in Ireland that it was utterly impossible for them to hope for anything like solidarity in the Empire. For many and many a year I myself have advocated that object, and I have advocated it in the interest of the British Empire at large. I believe, moreover, that until Ireland is satisfied and pacified, that there is very little hope of securing that cordial friendship with the people of the United States which every English statesman who is worthy of his salt ought to strive for. I know this, being myself in part of Irish descent, that taking the last ninety years, I do not care what the future Irish Parliament may do—it would be utterly impossible as a whole to govern Ireland worse than it has been governed in the period which has elapsed since the time of the Union. Be that as it may, I here call upon the Government to state distinctly—what the hon. gentleman did not please to state—I call upon them either to adopt the views of the Controller of Customs; and in that case they are justified in calling upon their friends to vote this motion down; or I say that if they will not do that and if they repudiate all responsibility for his utterances, then they have no ground whatever for treating this motion as a motion of want of confidence or for using their majority to vote down sentiments which they themselves admit to be correct and true.

Mr. HUGHES. I have listened with a good deal of attention and interest to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). If I remember aright, in the year 1876, when Mr. Mackenzie was Premier of this country, both of these gentlemen occupied seats in his Cabinet, and I find in the "Hansard" for that year, that the gentleman who rises to-day to make this motion (Mr. Casey) was in his place in the House to move the Address. I find that the Hon. Mr. Holton rose on that occasion and drew the attention of the Speaker as follows:—

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of my hon. friend the First Minister to a matter of very grave importance which has stirred the public mind, in the province from which I come, to its very depths, during the last two weeks; and before the first step in the business of legislation is taken in response to the Speech, I think it but fair to him, and to those who support him on the floor of this House that he should be given an opportunity of making the explanation, which I am satisfied in my own mind he would be able to give, and which would be received by the country, or at all events by his friends, with the utmost satisfaction. I allude to the speech, which I cannot but characterize as an unfortunate one, made by the Postmaster-General in a neighbouring county not many weeks ago. The Postmaster-General was undoubtedly, and it was quite proper, detailed by my hon. friend the First Minister to explain the policy of the Government and to promote the interests of the Government in an important election then pending in the county of Argenteuil.

The address of Mr. Huntington referred to by Mr. Holton was delivered in an election campaign. He was detailed, as Mr. Holton says, by the First Minister, the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, to go and make the speech, and he made it; and he repeated the speech in Parliament. But we do not find either the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) or the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) on record on that occasion as demanding that the Government should be held responsible for the utterances of their own Postmaster-General, a gentleman speaking in his official capacity as the delegate of the leader of the Government to the electors of Argenteuil. On the contrary, here is what the First Minister himself said, when he was appealed to on the subject:

I believe that every member in this House has a perfect right to discuss politically in his province local questions which may come up, that he may consider it a duty to do so, and that for their share in any such discussions members of this House are not to be held responsible here.

We all know what the subject under discussion at that time was. It was an insult on the part of Mr. Huntington to a large section of the French-Canadian people who did not choose to agree with him and his friends in politics. We find further that, in consultation, I presume, with the Government, Mr. Huntington, the Postmaster-General, made the following explanation:—

No member of the Government is responsible for that speech, and I have the right to express my individual opinions there to my own people. The opinions which I expressed are my opinions; they were my opinions then and are my opinions now.

Such we find to be the precedent laid down by the Cabinet of which these gentlemen were members on an occasion within the easy recollection of the members of this Parliament, and, Sir, I think it is a safe rule. If we are to have the privilege of examining into the expression of the private opinions of members outside of this House—although on that occasion the matter very properly came within the purview of Parliament—what is to prevent us establishing that system of espionage and of paternal government which has been highly injurious in the history of all lands. Now, I shall not enter into a discussion of this question, for several reasons. One is that I do not think it would do any possible good. I heard the speech of the hon. Controller of Customs at Kingston, and I may say here that while I admit the right of every man to differ from him, I endorse every word he said. What did he say? Hon. gentlemen opposite, as the leader of the Government has said, have brought up a clap-trap resolution in the hope of getting a little sympathy in this House. We have had a great many such resolutions brought into this House before by members of the Opposition, and every resolution of the kind which they have brought in has recoiled on their own heads. The people of this country are capable of reading between the lines; they are an intelligent reading-people, and they will not be misled by any such clap-trap resolutions as this, brought in for the purpose of alienating if possible, those who support the Government, and who yet disagree with the views expressed by the hon. Controller of Customs. On the occasion in question the hon. Controller of Customs said:

What is proposed is not only to shake off their allegiance to Great Britain—the bonds of love that bind them to the Empire—but to put them, forsooth, under an alien and hostile Government. We have their (the Home Rulers') public declarations of what they would do if they obtained power—that they would never cease agitating until the last link that bound Ireland to the British Empire is severed.

We all remember the famous speech delivered by the late Mr. Parnell in Cincinnati, when in an unguarded moment, possibly in a moment of weakness, he let the cat out of the bag, and stated that if they ever got Home Rule for Ireland they would never cease agitating until the last link that bound Ireland to Great Britain should be severed—until, in other words, they had an independent Irish republic of their own. That being the view the hon. Controller of Customs took of the case, and that being the view held by a great many other citizens of this country, whether rightly or wrongly, he went on to say:

That is their object to-day. They are trying to take the loyal men with them; but our friends over there say they will never submit. Britain may cast them out; but if she does so, she has no right to say what may be their future allegiance.

In case Great Britain allowed Ireland to become an independent republic, you might as well say that Britain had a right to control the action of the citizens of the United States after they had declared their independence, as to say that she could control the action of the citizens of an independent Irish republic. What would be the allegiance of any man in Ireland under the circumstances? You might as well say that Austria, after giving up the Netherlands, could retain control over them, or that Spain, after being forced to abandon her South American possessions, could assert her right to control the people of the South American republics. These are the lines on which the hon. Controller of Customs was speaking, and I am satisfied that there is not an hon. member of this House who will deny the right of any citizen of this country, in case such an event happened in Ireland, to act even in the line of the extreme views laid down by the hon. Controller of Customs. Now, Sir, let us take another view of the question. After the United States rebelled and rightly rebelled, against the tyranny of Great Britain, and obtained their independence—though I regret that they did not remain in connection with the old land—a very large number of the citizens of that country came over and settled in the Maritime provinces and in these upper provinces of Canada, and to-day, Sir, the descendants of the old United England loyalists, in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, in Prince Edward Island, in Quebec and in Ontario, are ranked among the best citizens we have. In case the United States had undertaken to prevent those people leaving the country, who would deny the right of any British subject in the empire to take up arms in defence of those people in their desire to come to this country? You might as well say that those British subjects who went to assist Greece in her stormy times were disloyal. Great Britain has again and again encouraged people to go and take up arms in support of those who were struggling for liberty in other lands. Look at the Huguenots of France who were determined to worship God according to the dictates of their consciences, and were persecuted by other people. Great Britain encouraged her people to go to their assistance. When the Netherlands asserted their independence in the time of the Dutch Republic, Great Britain encouraged almost whole armies of her people to go across and assist those people. Now, I do not wish to prolong this discussion to a great length. It is a pretty warm subject, and I am afraid that if I kept on I might get warmed up—I might get excited. But I would just draw the attention of the House to this one fact, which may possibly be a justification of us who fear. Not that we are afraid, in this enlightened age, of the tyranny or intolerance of the Roman Catholic Church, which—because there is no use disguising the fact—is what the Protestants of Ireland are afraid of. I have no fear on that score. But, five or six years ago, I took the liberty of writing a letter to Mr. Parnell, in which I suggested to him that, instead of agitating for Home

Rule for Ireland, he should ask for the establishment of a municipal system, such as we have in our county councils. Indeed, in the opinion of many, provincial rule in Canada is a failure. We were told, before Confederation, that there was great discontent and danger of the people seeking some change in the form of Government, which discontent it was that brought about our present system. These hon. gentlemen, today, do not seem to be very much taken up with our present system. We are justified, probably, in our suspicions of the ultimate aims of those seeking Home Rule, by the fact that the hon. gentlemen who bring up this motion, are those who are anxious to bring about annexation by gradual steps. They are, in fact, anxious to make two bites of the cherry. It would not do for them to come out and say that they want annexation at once; but they first asked for continental free trade, which will be the first bite of the cherry, and then, when the people are educated up to it, they will agitate for annexation. I am satisfied that this resolution will meet the fate it deserves, and that the same fate will befall the hon. gentleman who took the opportunity of moving it in this House.

Mr. McINERNEY. I deprecate entirely the discussion of such questions as this in this House, because I know they are calculated to lead to bitter feelings and sometimes to expressions of sentiments, in the heat of debate, that the speakers afterwards regret. I cannot, however, give a silent vote on this question. The county from which I come, represents, in a small degree, the different discordant elements which go to make up this country. We have a large French-Acadian population, who are in the majority. We have then a large English Protestant population and a very small Irish Catholic community. In that county I have endeavoured, as far as I could, to keep down all religious bickerings, so that peace might prevail; and, as the best proof that we are free from these bickerings, I may say that, in the different elections I have run, at least nine-tenths of the Protestant vote have been cast for me, against all competitors. The stand I take here, both by words and vote, is one which I wish understood properly by the intelligent men of the different nationalities and religions in the county of Kent. I cannot fail to admit that the words of the hon. Controller of Customs are not calculated to promote peace and good-will in this country. They are, on the contrary, opposed to peace and good order in Canada, and should not be supported or upheld by any person in this Parliament or country who wants to see Canada contented, happy and prosperous. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) endeavoured to raise a question which I do not think is germane to the subject. He submitted the proposition, that this was a vote of want of confidence in the Government, and that, as he was sent here to support the Government, he could not vote for the amendment. Then, we have the leader of the House, in whom I have every confidence, declaring, immediately afterwards, that the Government were not responsible for the utterances of the Controller of Customs. If the Government do not hold themselves responsible for these utterances, how can a vote of censure upon them include a vote of want of confidence in the Government? I cannot understand the logic of that conclusion, and, therefore, in voting for this amendment, I claim that I am not voting want of confidence in the Government. I wish to censure the remarks made by the Controller of Customs, because I think they were un-called for, unnecessary and harmful. I would like to ask that hon. gentleman a simple question. The leader of the House stated, that he did not see in the utterances reported in the newspapers, any declaration of the Controller of Customs, that he would carry armed resistance to the Home Rule Bill into Ulster. Now, I wish to ask the Controller of Customs, if he meant, by the words "active aid," armed resistance or anything of that nature? What did he mean by those words? I would be glad if he would do me the honour of giving me an answer, because, throughout this country, the impression is growing, and the impression will grow still further, that active aid, as expressed by the Controller of Customs, meant armed resistance, and that is the interpretation which has been put upon these words. I think that every member of this House ought to be free to vote according to his own conscience and views in this matter. That is what I intend to do, and I wish to be in the position of being able to go back to the independent, honest, sturdy, intelligent and stalwart Protestants of the county of Kent, and tell them it is for these reasons I vote for this amendment.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am very glad that the tone of the discussion has been very moderate; but one who has occupied a seat in this Parliament as long as I have, would be disappointed, if it took any other direction. On all questions that have come up for discussion here, we have always found gentlemen who occupy seats here, meet those questions, no matter what they may be calculated to give rise to, in a calm, deliberate way, just as they have done to-day. I rise particularly for the purpose of explaining my vote—and it is even necessary sometimes that a member of the Government should explain his vote—and to put right, as far as my understanding goes, the statement of the hon. member for South Oxford, that the leader of the House had called upon his followers to vote this motion down. I do not so understand him. Perhaps, I am not interpreting the words uttered by the leader of the House, properly, but I feel on this question a good deal like the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McInerney). The leader of the House has very properly—as any gentleman occupying a seat in the Cabinet of this country, should do—repudiated and refused a semblance of responsibility for the utterances attributed to my hon. friend and endorsed by himself to-day. Therefore, I feel that I am in this position, that I agree with the hon. gentleman who spoke and who refused to take the responsibility of those utterances, but I go just a little further, and say that, in repudiating these utterances, I cannot, at the same time, assume the responsibility of them, by voting against this amendment, as I would do if I voted so. I would have preferred, had the mover of the resolution left out that personal allusion to the Controller of Customs. By doing so, he would have obtained the same object, he would have affirmed the same principle. He would have done more. He would have freed the resolution from the semblance of any personal charge. It is not the individual, as I understand it, that the House of Commons is dealing with, nor is the case similar to that of Mr. Huntington, that has been referred to, although our friends took strong grounds against his utterances at that time. The language used at that time was most offensive to a section of the people of the country; but the question now before us is whether the language used is consistent with the obligations of a loyal citizen in this country? It does not affect a particular class, it does not affect a particular nationality. The question is whether a loyal citizen has any right to give utterance to such language. Therefore, this question is of wider scope than the one already mentioned. Now, some gentlemen, in this House or elsewhere, have drawn attention to what they call the parallel case of some language of my own uttered outside this House; and it has been said that it was a very singular thing that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) should be condemned for his utterances in Kingston, when I should be left free to preach disloyalty, or words to that effect, in other parts of the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, I challenge any man in this country to point to any utterances of mine, in this House, or in the country, or in the press, or anywhere else, that had the slightest resemblance to disloyalty, or showed me wanting in my duty and obligation to the Crown, or to the country in which I live.

Mr. WALLACE. Do you mean to say that I did anything of that kind?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am clearing myself. It is not my character to insinuate. I am only referring to some remarks made in reference to myself. The motion that has been placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, is one of principle. While I do not think that the question of Home Rule should be discussed at the present time in this House, while I do not express any opinion as to whether the Anti-Home Rulers are seeking the dismemberment of the Empire, and while I do not place too much importance on the talk of armed and active resistance to Home Rule, I do not think that these affect the question of the interpretation to be put upon the words of the Controller of Customs. But we must remember that in this country, men are liable to be tried for their lives, and have been tried, and have paid the penalty of their lives, even in our country, for rebellious acts and want of allegiance to the constituted authority. I say that the question of allegiance and obedience to the laws and constitution is one that affects every portion of the people and our laws and constitution must be observed and respected. Holding these opinions, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Mr. SPROULE. It appears to me that a good deal of excitement is being created over a little matter. It occurs to me that many hon. gentlemen are virtually evading the essence of the question. If I understand the question is, how far has this House the right to control or call in question what is said by any member of the House outside? The Controller of Customs, exercising the right that belongs to any other member of the House, goes out, and, in his private capacity, attends a meeting of the Orange Society, and gives his opinion on a certain public question relating to Imperial affairs. Now, how far has this House a right to take cognizance of what members say when they are not within the precincts of this House, and when they are acting as private members of a society? If we have a right to take cognizance of every statement of this nature that is made by members of the House, then I think we can go a little further, and we can cite cases where opinions have been expressed by members of this Parliament, and by members of the British Parliament, that are much more wide in their application, and yet no attention has been drawn to them. The hon. Controller of Customs has a right to say what he did without being called to account for it by this House. He says: "I am prepared to state that the society with which I am allied will give active aid." Any individual of this House may put what interpretation he likes upon these words, but we ought to be very careful that we do not put a wrong interpretation upon them. We can remember instances where members of the British Parliament have used language in respect to Home Rule, on platforms in the United States, and on platforms in Canada, at Toronto, quite as strong as the language now complained of, but no member of this Parliament took any notice of it, nor did any member of the British Parliament, of which these speakers were members, pay the slightest attention to their language. Now, if we have a right to take cognizance of the language under discussion, were we not entitled to take cognizance of the statement which was made by the leader of the Opposition when, speaking in his private capacity, on the Champ de Mars, in Montreal, he said that had he been on the banks of the Saskatchewan he would have shouldered his musket and fought against the Queen's authority there? Is not that a stronger statement than the one made by the Controller of Customs? But no member of this House moved a resolution condemning him for using such language, because they believed he had a right to speak as a private citizen in accordance with his own views without being indicted for it here. Now, I notice that the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) in speaking upon this resolution, showed, to my mind, that this amendment had been carefully prepared, that he, at least, was well acquainted with it before it came before this House, because he could recite the very language it contained, although he was not reading the resolution. Evidently this resolution is moved for a specific purpose, for the purpose of creating political animosities that might be turned to the advantage of the Opposition. I think they are engaged in a very unfortunate work. It is a work that I do not think the people of Canada will endorse, it is a work for which hon. gentlemen opposite will not receive credit when they go to the country. It is something they should keep out of this House, and if there is one thing more than another they should endeavour to do, it is to allay every acrimonious feeling that might arise in respect to a question of this kind, rather than try to arouse such feelings by entering upon such a debate as the present one. If I understand correctly the terms of this motion, it is a vote of want of confidence, if I know what such a vote is. I understand, provided that the House will not vote supplies with which to carry on the affairs of the country, and if the Government are unable to control the House in that respect, they are not worthy of its confidence; and if a motion to go into Committee of Supply is met by an amendment, and that amendment carries, it is clearly a motion of want of confidence. Such a motion is submitted with that view in the present case, as I understand it. I shall, therefore, vote against the amendment for two reasons: First, I vote against it because I view it as a vote of want of confidence in the Government; and second, because I think any hon. gentleman has the right which every citizen possesses, of expressing outside of this House his views in connection with various topics with as much freedom as the Controller of Customs exercised in expressing his views at Kingston.

Mr. CURRAN. The question now before the House has assumed an importance which I did not give it when I read the speech delivered by the Controller of Customs at Kingston. In fact I may say that on reading that speech it did not roughen my temper at all, nor cause me any loss of sleep, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated it would not cause so great a man as even the Prime Minister of England to lose sleep. On the contrary, I felt that really there was not much to talk about in it. I was under the impression that it was very much like the story a police inspector tells about himself. He was crossing the Atlantic, and a certain individual had attracted his attention as being rather suspicious looking. This individual kept his eye upon him, and as they approached the landing, the suspicious character went up to the inspector and said, "Are you with us?" "With what?" he said. "Are you with us?" he repeated. "because we have in Dublin 50,000 drilled men, and we can knock the British Government into smithereens, just as quickly as you can say Jack Robinson." The inspector said, "Why do you not do it?" "Well," said he, "the police won't let us." Now, I felt that any body of men leaving this country, or any other country, and going over to Ireland to invade it might find that the police would not let them. This question is one which has assumed some little importance owing to the debate that has taken place, and I must say that I regret that the Controller of Customs did not answer the question which was put to him by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Melnerney). I fully agree with the proposition, that what a member outside of this House says on a subject which is foreign to our Canadian politics should not be brought up here; but the hon. gentleman who made the speech assumed the responsibility for that speech here. He had a perfect right to tell the hon. member who addressed him and put the answer to him, in the most pleasant language possible, but meaning this, that it was none of his business. The hon. gentleman had a perfect right to take that position. He, however, undertook to assume a different one, and to state that the speech which was alleged to have been delivered by him was actually delivered by him. And the hon. gentleman allowed something still further, he allowed an hon. gentleman to rise and put an interpretation on the words he used in that speech. There is no hon. member on one side of the House or the other who will not coincide with the first part of the declaration contained in the resolution, that here we are all free men, orderly men and law-abiding men. That declaration is correct. But when the motion comes down to allege that the Controller of Customs has declared, in effect, that if Home Rule is carried for Ireland he is prepared to take up arms and fight against the authority of the Queen, I say that, in view of what I thought was held out as a settlement of this matter by the hon. member for South Oxford, so far as he is in a position to speak on behalf of his party, and I presume he is in such a position, if the hon. gentleman had stood up and said: I never intended to say that I would take up arms and defy the Queen's authority, or defy the authority of the British Government that carried such a measure, a measure sanctioned by the House of Commons, by the Lords and by the Queen of England. I never did say so, and I never meant to say that I would take up arms or counsel anybody else to do so—I think that would have settled this question. But the whole point is in that. My hon. friend who spoke last said: What is meant by "aid?"

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Active aid.

Mr. CURRAN. If by "active aid" was meant what the Secretary of State has done, what I have done myself on our side of the question, that is argue the matter in as calm a manner as possible, using all persuasion possible, pointing out that it would be conducive to the interests of the Empire that Home Rule should be granted, and putting our hands in our pockets and subscribing our money to help a constitutional agitation—if those hon. gentlemen, who are against Home Rule, are prepared to put their hands in their pockets and assist a constitutional agitation on the other side, they have a perfect right to do so. The hon. gentleman has as much right to be opposed to Home Rule as I have to be in favour of it. I will not vote for any resolution to hamper the hon. gentleman's right to hold his opinions. My only reason for supporting any resolution that will condemn the hon. gentleman, whom I have always found to be quite liberal and ready to act with all classes, or I would not have accepted office in a Government with him under my leader—the only reason that will induce me to condemn him will be because he refused to rise and say: I never used any language that can be justly construed to mean, and I never did mean, that in case Home Rule for Ireland was granted, I would take up arms myself, or I would advise any other man to take up arms against the Queen's authority. That is the whole point. If the hon. gentleman makes a declaration that he never intended to take up arms, if he makes a declaration in consonance with the statement of the hon. gentleman now leading the House, I say then the whole difficulty is removed. I believe that the question is in a nutshell, and that the hon. gentleman should not have allowed himself to be saddled with an interpretation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman is hardly fair, because the Controller of Customs had certainly the courage of his convictions, and told the House what he meant, and he read from Lord Salisbury's speech, which advocated open resistance.

Mr. CURRAN. The statement of the hon. gentleman shows that he is not anxious to have the matter settled, but is desirous of obtaining some party advantage from it. It is of no importance what a man may say either in England or elsewhere; and I do not care a brass farthing for the utterance of Lord Salisbury or any other lord if it can be construed into disloyalty. It is no justification, if Lord Salisbury made a speech that could be construed in that way. He would be very likely to do it and say that he never meant it to be disloyal. I have nothing to do with Lord Salisbury in this matter; I have nothing to do with his utterances. I have nothing to do with anything but what is before me, and with what I have heard from the other side of the House as to what the main point at issue is. Did the hon. gentleman mean to say that he was prepared to take up arms, or advise other people to take up arms, or give active aid in taking up arms against the Queen's authority in Ireland. That is the whole point.

Mr. MULOCK. Read the speech.

Mr. CURRAN. The hon. gentleman says, "read the speech." I do not see anything to that effect in the speech. I do not care whether it is there or not constructively, but what I want to know is this: Is the opinion that is sought to be attributed to the hon. gentleman the opinion that he maintains, namely: That in the event of a certain Imperial Act of Parliament passing into law, that he is prepared to rebel against the Queen's authority? The whole of this matter is really in a nutshell in so far as any value being attached to the utterance is concerned. Utterances of an equally violent character upon other questions have been made, and those questions once settled there were no rebellions, and the affairs of the British Empire went on just the same as before. All I have got to say in conclusion is, that I am sorry these questions should be brought up in this manner before the House. I am very sorry, for instance, that I, and the Secretary of State should be appealed to in one breath as the parties who should speak first on this matter, and that in the next breath the hon. gentleman who appealed to us should say, this was not an Irish question at all. I am satisfied that the people of this country like to see all classes living together in peace and harmony. I am satisfied that in so far as Canadian affairs are concerned, our people of different races and creeds wish to live together in peace and harmony and work together for our country's good. I should be sorry indeed to see that by any possibility the old strife of contending factions in the Old Country should be implanted on our soil, and I trust that my hon. friend the Controller of Customs will, at all events, state before this debate closes, that he never gave utterance to any sentiments that would lead any one to believe, who had studied the question fairly and studied his utterances in a calm and impartial spirit, that he had said anything that would lead people to believe that he meant to take up arms against his Queen, in the event of Home Rule being granted.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Mr. Speaker, the debate which has intervened since I rose to a question of order some time ago has proved the very point I raised then, namely: That we have enough to do in this country to mind our own affairs without interfering in Irish politics. I wish now to tell the House that the view which I have expressed as to that is the view of the great bulk of the large majority of Canadians. Our people believe in Canadian politics, and in their representatives attending to the affairs deeply interesting to our own country as well as we can, and they believe also that we had better leave Irish politics and other politics of a kindred nature alone. I express my opinion here that there has been too much Irish politics in this country in the formation of Cabinets, and in this sense I speak not only of the Dominion but of the province of Ontario as well. There has been too much Irish politics in the policy of Reformers and Conservatives alike. I, as a young Canadian, and as a young member of this House, protest here and now, against the introduction of Irish politics into the legislative affairs of this country, or indeed I might say into our political questions outside of this Chamber. I may say further, that there has been too much Irish politics in the United States, and we as a country, have suffered therefrom. Irish politics in the United States has interfered as much as any other question in the obtaining of that reciprocity treaty which our friends opposite are anxious for. Irish politics has prevented the negotiation of an extradition treaty between England and the United States, which treaty would be a benefit to our advantage. As a young Canadian here to-day, I protest against the introduction of Irish politics in this House and on the present occasion I hold the Opposition responsible for their introduction. It is patent to us here that hon. gentlemen opposite were not honest in introducing this question, but that they did it only to obtain a partisan advantage. Mr. Speaker, I think further, that a politician in this country, that any man in this country should be allowed to express opinions outside of this House for which he should not be held responsible here, if they are not concerned in Canadian affairs. I shall, therefore, Sir, in the first place, vote against the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Dawson) because I protest against the introduction of Irish politics in our Canadian House of Commons, and in the second place because I wish to uphold the principle, that a politician, that any member of this House ought to be allowed to express his opinion with regard to anything which he believes for the welfare of the country or the Empire.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have regretted to see so much acrimony introduced into the discussion this afternoon. I think it is a very unfortunate thing if we cannot discuss a question of law here—because, practically, this is a question of law—without debating it so warmly. I must say that I do not agree with the position taken by my hon. friend the Solicitor-General—that is in regard to the challenge of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) to the Controller of Customs to state what he meant by the report of the newspaper. I do not consider that it is any part of the duty of the Controller of Customs, at this stage, or at any stage of the debate, to state what is meant by that article, or any words in that article. We have the article here before us, and it is for us to decide what is the meaning of the words. It is for us to decide whether we are right in supporting the acting leader of the House in his declaration that the Government are not responsible for anything uttered by a gentleman outside of the House. Now, I am not going to state what my personal views are in regard to this matter. I have very strong personal feeling about it, and I have regretted to see that, apart from the question actually at issue, many gentlemen have brought their personal opinions in the debate, and endeavoured to impress them upon the House. In my view, we ought to consider this question in the light of a matter brought before us, as to whether members of this House, and as to whether the Controller of Customs has exceeded his privileges in making statements outside of the House. I think the case laid down by the Minister of Finance is clearly a precedent for our guidance in this particular case, and I consider that the attitude that the Minister of Finance has assumed, when he said that the Government could not take the responsibility of such utterances, and that he would accordingly vote against the amendment, is a good one. I feel, Sir, that I cannot do better than follow him in that respect, because I think, as my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) says, that the further we keep Irish politics and the politics of any other country away from this House, the better it is for Canada. I therefore support the Minister of Finance against the amendment.

Mr. BERGIN. Mr. Speaker, I fear, Sir, that we are face to face to-day with a question more fraught with danger to the future of Canada, than any that has ever been brought before this House. I am sorry that this occasion has arisen, and I am more sorry still that the person, from whose speech, outside of this Chamber, this question comes up for discussion to-day, is one in whose liberality I have always believed, and still believe, beyond that of most men in this community. I have always looked upon the Controller of Customs as one of the most fair-minded of men. Although the Grand Master of the Orangemen, I have looked upon that hon. gentleman as a man who possessed really no antipathies and no prejudices, to any great extent. I may say, that I have not lost faith in him by what has occurred to-day. I have not lost that faith in him because of the speech he made at Kingston. That speech was a speech for which, I think, he alone was responsible; the Government was not responsible, nor was any member of the Government responsible; but, Sir, unfortunately, to-day he repeated that speech in this House. Unfortunately, he not only repeated that speech, but he said: They were my sentiments then, they are my sentiments now; I shall not go back on them. Now, Sir, we have to deal with the utterances that he made in this House to-day; we have to deal. I am afraid, with the consequences that may flow from his utterances in this House. The speech he made at Kingston was one which, when I read it, caused me to smile. So far from feeling any indignation over it, I felt very much as they did in the House of Commons at Westminster the other day, when the question was put, whether the utterances of the men of Ulster had been noticed by the Government. The answer was: Yes, we have noticed them. Then the question was: What does the Government propose to do? The Government said: So far as the language of the men is concerned, we propose to take no notice of it; but in regard to the threat of rising in arms against the Government, we propose to take good care of the men who do so. So I felt inclined to look upon the hon. gentleman's speech—I say it not in an offensive sense—as a bit of buncombe on the part of my hon. friend, and not as an attempt to raise strife or ill-feeling in this community.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BERGIN. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose I was discussing the speech made by the hon. Controller of Customs at Kingston. I stated that the impression made on my mind at the time I read that speech was that it was not intended to be serious. My impression was that it was one of those post-prandial orations that gentlemen sometimes make. I took into consideration the time and the place and the surroundings of the hon. gentleman. I took into consideration also that he was as, it were, upon his trial with the members of his order, now that he had accepted the position of Controller of Customs in this Government. Making all these allowances, and bearing in mind his record in the past as a man of very liberal mind, notwithstanding the professions that he had made to the contrary, at other times—bearing all this in mind, I was not disposed to regard this matter seriously; but when the hon. gentleman took occasion upon the floor of this House to-day to repeat all that he said at Kingston and confirm the report made by the Kingston "News," when he took occasion to say that these were his opinions then, that they are his opinions now, and that he would not go back upon them, I feel that I am obliged to treat the statements of that hon. gentleman in an entirely different method from that in which I had intended to treat them when I first saw them. I cannot consent to have it placed upon the records of this House that I gave a silent vote upon this question. I cannot consent to have it placed upon the records of this House that I approve in any way the doctrine announced by this hon. gentleman. I represent a great Protestant county, largely Orangemen, and in the name of those Orangemen I say that there is not in that county one who will approve the words of the hon. Controller of Customs. I say, Sir, that the Orangemen of my county are a noble set of men. Their fealty to me, the loyalty with which they have stood by me during so many years, is proof that they have no prejudices against their Catholic fellow-citizens; and more than that, I know that a large number amongst them are ardent supporters of Home Rule. I know that a goodly number of them believe that the people of Ireland should be placed in the same condition as the people of this country. They believe that if we are entitled to free Government in this country so are our countrymen in Ireland, and refuse to deny to our countrymen there that which we claim for ourselves. I would be untrue to this great body of men, who have supported me so faithfully and long, if I for one moment admitted that there was one of them tainted with the prejudices and views of the Controller of Customs. What is to be the result of such speeches as this which this hon. gentleman made at Kingston and which to-day he approved and confirmed? Are we, Sir, to have the brand of discord thrown into this community by a gentleman who is a member of the Government, although he is not a Cabinet Minister? Are we to have the worst passions raised in this country by speeches such as that which we are now discussing? Are we to have the brand of religious discord lighted and thrown broadcast throughout this Dominion? Are we, Sir, to imperil the future of this country by taking sides upon a question of this kind, as Catholics and as Protestants? No, Sir; the people of this country desire to live in harmony and concord. As the people live in my county, so do our people desire to live in all other counties throughout this Dominion. We do not wish to imperil our future by questions of religion or questions of nationality. We believe that this country is wide enough and broad enough to hold the people of all denominations and of all nationalities, and we believe that he must be a very narrow-minded man, unworthy of our public confidence, who takes advantage of any occasion to do that which will breed strife and discord and rouse the worst passions in a community like ours. If Canada is to have a future, if Canada is to continue a bright jewel in the British Crown, it will only be through the loyalty of her people. And there is no man, I care not what his faith or nationality, who desires the prosperity of this country, who desires to see Canada become some day a great English-speaking nation, who will not repudiate, with all his strength and heart, statements such as those made by the Controller of Customs. We profess that we love Canada, that we desire its prosperity, that we wish to make it a great, a glorious and a free nation. We desire, first of all, that we should have a national feeling. Can we have a national feeling whilst we have the brand of discord thrown among us by men in high places? Is it possible that our aspirations can ever be realized under such circumstances? Had the hon. gentleman, when the question was put to him by the hon. member for Kent, repudiated—as I felt in my heart he would have—that he had any desire to take up arms or that he would expect any portion of this country to join him in casting off his allegiance to Great Britain, had he done this I would have been the last to censure him. But to that appeal, and to the appeal of the Solicitor-General, he did not vouchsafe any reply; and having kept silence during that debate, I for one am prepared to believe that he does feel as he spoke, and what he spoke were his honest sentiments. Believing this, I cannot help expressing my disapprobation of all that fell from him, and my condemnation, so far as it is in my power to condemn. If this motion prevails, I cannot help but feel that this is one of the darkest, if not the darkest day, that Canada has ever seen. If this motion prevails, and if no explanation is given by the Government as to the course it intends to adopt, previous to this vote, we stand face to face with a most threatening condition of affairs. We stand face to face with this prospect: that the country will be divided upon questions of religion and race. Instead of in the future being divided, as we have been in the past, by great political issues, we shall be divided upon the narrowest and most dangerous and most terrible line of religious discord.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There is not a word about religion or race in what is alleged to have been stated by the Controller of Customs.

Mr. BERGIN. I am prepared to admit that the Controller of Customs did not state one word of religion or race, but I am prepared to say when a man, who is at the head of a great Protestant organization, asks this House not to condemn him, he is bringing into issue the question of race and religion, and it will be upon such questions that the future of this country for many a year, and upon such issues, that our politics will be divided, and not upon the great political, commercial and other interests which have divided us in the past. In justice to the great county that I represent, and which has been to me so loyal and true, in justice to that great body of Orangemen, I must repudiate all that has fallen from that hon. gentleman. I do it in justice to them, because if people suppose, for one moment, that that great body in my county is not as loyal—and it has given proof of its loyalty always in time of trial—as any other body in this country, then I must repudiate any insinuation of that kind; and I feel I would be false to them and to my duty, if I did not take this opportunity of repudiating any such feelings on the part of the Orangemen of the grand old county which I have the honour to represent, and I call the attention of the leader of the House to what I am about to say (if he thinks it worth while to pay any attention to what I am about to say). I call the attention of the leader of the House to the measure of doubt which prevails as to whether the Government intend to make this vote one of confidence or not. If they are about to leave it an open question, then they will relieve some of their supporters of a difficulty, but if they are determined to make it a vote of want of confidence, so that we shall be obliged to vote against our own opinions and our consciences upon them be it; it will not be upon us. There is one difficulty which appears to me as almost an insurmountable one in the position in which I stand, and as the hon. Minister has not said whether this is to be an open vote or not, I am not quite as free as I would like to be, and I must ask him to give me a categorical answer to that question.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give the hon. gentleman the answer which I think is fair and honest. If this amendment which has been moved for a purpose—for a purpose which is evident, to sow the seeds of dissension amongst our ranks, and to turn out the Government, if possible—if this motion passes, it will not be by the vote of friends of the Government.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You will have to act judicially now.

Mr. BERGIN. If the hon. gentleman would keep his silence judicially, it would be, perhaps, politically to my advantage. The answer which the leader of the House has given to me, is substantially this: That any one who votes for the amendment is not a friend of the Government. Now, Sir, I do not think that that is an answer which a man of my long service to this party, a man of my fidelity to the party was entitled to get. I deny, Sir, that I am not a friend of this Government. I feel that through the laches of the Government in not calling us together, in not explaining to us what they proposed to do in this matter, in leaving us in the dark until this moment, until I have dragged it from the leader of the House, they have not done to us as they ought to have done. They should not have put us in a false position; they should not have put us in such a position after we had committed ourselves to a certain course. Why, Sir, so strong a friend am I of this Government that, notwithstanding that it is about to violate every principle I hold dear, that it will violate every pledge that I have made—no I have made no pledge, but I have given my friends to understand how I felt after the hon. the Controller of Customs had confirmed his speech to-day. Up to that hour, I treated it as a jest, not worthy of serious consideration, but making that statement, as he did, in the presence of the whole Government, and of this House, I feel, Sir, that I could not but take notice of it, holding the views I do, desiring to live upon the closest and warmest terms of friendships with my Protestant friends, desirous of keeping those ties forever, or rather during the time I live. Because there is no man in the county from which I come, who can put his hand upon a single syllable I have ever uttered that would tend to bring about difficulties between people on account of their race or their religion. But, Sir, when I found the aspersions that this hon. gentleman made were confirmed by himself to-day, I felt that I must be true to my principles, and that I must take the course I am about to take. And if I take it, I do so with, perhaps, a greater love than ever, and a greater respect for my leader, Sir John Thompson, who is now in Paris, where, in two days, will open that great conference, that important mission upon which he goes, and in the conduct of which I know he will display all that ability and that care for Canada and her interests that we know is his. I feel almost as if I were giving a stab in the back to that great leader, to that man whom I love and honour, in voting on this question as I am obliged to vote, because of the reply given to me by the leader of the House. Should this motion prevail, I feel all the evil consequences that are likely to ensue, because, as I understand the leader of the House, if this motion should carry this Government would resign. I can imagine no greater disaster to this country, during the absence of our great leader. But all these questions I have weighed carefully. Perhaps I have not the ability to weigh questions of such character as some people have, but, all the same, I take my political life into my hands, perhaps, but, live or die, I shall vote according to my principles, and I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). These appear to be rather troublesome times for Controllers. I have been considerably amused as well as interested during the course of this debate by the references that have been made to men of my class in the Government. On occasions, when it suits our friends opposite, they are very anxious to belittle the position of Controllers, but to-day they are bound to have this Parliament declare that Controllers are full-fledged members of this Government anyhow, and that they are to be held responsible for all that a Privy Councillor would be held responsible for in his utterances, whether in this House or out of it. I rise, Mr. Speaker, more for the purpose of emphasizing an interruption that I made, which was, perhaps, not Parliamentary, when the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me was speaking. I wish to emphasize this fact—that in the speech that has been so largely criticised, so adversely criticised, there does not appear one single word, sentence or sentiment against the religion or against the creed or race of any man. I wish to say to my friends in Quebec, to those who differ from the hon. Controller in their views, that the inference my hon. friend from Stormont (Mr. Bergin) sought to draw from his remarks, is, to say the least, unkind, unfair. And my hon. friend from Stormont is not the generous friend I have found him to be—and he is a generous man—if he does not, at least, do the hon. gentleman, the Controller of Customs, the justice of correcting that portion of his speech. I would regret if the Controller of Customs, if any member of the Government, or any member of this House, were to give expression to any word which would tend to sow the seeds of religious discord in this country. Goodness knows, Sir, it is hard enough to govern countries where this problem is not present. Government is a matter of compromise in any case, much more must it be a matter of compromise in a country where the interests are so divers, and people of different religions and races are to be found under the same Government. How careful, then, ought we to be to avoid saying anything that would tend to arouse religious passions or prejudices of our people. I must say this for the Controller of Customs, that during an acquaintance extending over many years, I have never yet heard it said of him, though holding the highest position in that order of which he is the head, that in his public utterances he has ever offended the religious feelings of any person, and this fact ought to be stated to his credit here to-night. Now, Sir, ought this matter ever to have been brought up in this House? Do we not understand the motives of hon. gentlemen opposite. Do we suppose that they are brimful of that enthusiasm which would naturally inspire a native of Ireland for the good of the Irish cause? Wishing to give them credit for all sincerity, I firmly believe that the idea of gaining a little political advantage at the expense of the Government, was one of the principal motives that actuated hon. gentlemen opposite in bringing this matter into the House. Now, the leader of the Opposition, for whom I, in common with all my fellow-Canadians, entertain a very high opinion, upon a certain occasion, outside of this House, an occasion, in one respect, similar to the occasion when the Controller of Customs made these remarks—the leader of the Opposition—stated that if he had been on the banks of the Saskatchewan he would have taken up arms and fought against the volunteers of Ontario. If these were not his exact words, at all events, they were of the same tenor. Did any hon. gentleman on this side of the House feel himself called upon to drag that before this Parliament, to move here a vote of censure upon that hon. gentleman for using that language? Supposing I were to ask that hon. gentleman to-night, as my hon. friend the Controller of Customs has been asked categorically, if he is still of that opinion, if he would say now that were he on the banks of the Saskatchewan he would take up arms on behalf of the half-breeds, and if he reaffirmed his language? Sir, there is not an hon. gentleman on this side of the House who would, for one moment, think of parading in this Parliament a resolution condemning him for what he may have said outside of this House, in the course of a heated political discussion. Reference has also been made to what Lord Salisbury has said. Now, it is not my concern to justify what Lord Salisbury has said in connection with the movement in Ulster; but the concluding words of a speech made by that distinguished statesman, when he held the responsible position of First Minister in England, will bear repetition here, and the speech, I may say, was one beside which the speech of the Controller of Customs is very mild indeed:

Be it on the part of a Parliament, or on the part of a king, should it ever occur at any future time, I do not believe that the people of Ulster have lost their sturdy love of freedom, or their detestation of arbitrary power.

As I have said, it is not my concern to justify what any English statesman may say for or against Home Rule for Ireland. But I must say that that speech was made in England, was commented upon by the public press throughout that country, but no Liberal in the House of Commons afterwards ever thought of parading it in Parliament, or trying to make political capital out of it. Now, why is it that my hon. friend the Controller of Customs is treated in this way? I consider it wholly beneath the dignity of this Parliament, wholly unworthy of us as members of this House, utterly inconsistent with the duties which we were sent here to perform, that we should take up, possibly, the whole of this day in discussing a matter which any person must admit is entirely foreign to that legislation which properly comes within the purview of a Parliament like this. I desire, in discussing this question, to bring whatever of cool judgment I may possess to bear upon it, and I must express my sincere regret that this matter has ever been obtruded into this House. I am much mistaken, and I very much mistake the good judgment, the honesty of motive and of purpose, of my fellow members upon this side of the House, if they do not vote this motion down as a piece of political claptrap unworthy of having ever been brought into the House.

Mr. DAVIN. The point raised by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, as to the propriety of this Parliament discussing a question of this kind, has met with a good deal of approval on the part of hon. members; nevertheless, I venture to say that if a Minister of the Crown—because the hon. gentleman the Controller of Customs is a Minister of the Crown—

An hon. MEMBER. No; he is not.

Mr. DAVIN. Who says he is not?

Mr. JONCAS. I say so. If the hon. gentleman wishes, I am ready to prove that the Controller of Customs is not a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman can prove it after I sit down; but meanwhile I suppose the position of the Controller of Customs is considered analogous to that of an Under Secretary of State.

Mr. JONCAS. It is not at all the same thing.

Mr. DAVIN. The Controller of Customs states that he is a member of the Government. He is reported as saying so since he entered the Government. Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying, from my place in Parliament, that anybody who attempts to say that the hon. member is not a member of the Government is quibbling, and is descending to a style of discussion unworthy of this Parliament. The Controller of Inland Revenue, who is at the head of the department, who is in the service of the Crown, and the Controller of Customs, after they took office, went back to their constituents—I forget whether I am right—but if they went back, why did they go back? They went back because they had taken office under the Crown. Why, until this matter came up, nobody thought of denying that the hon. member was a Minister of the Crown. In fact, what does he say himself? I think in the same speech, at all events in another speech, addressing his brother Orangemen, he tells them that the Government of which he is a member stands in this position before the country, and he says:

Suppose the Grits had come into power, would you have had one Orangeman in the Government? No, but now you have two Orangemen, you have the Minister of Trade and Commerce and you have myself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that language used by members of the Government and by members of this House, outside the House are matters with which this House is concerned. I am told that my hon. friend the leader of this House declared, in the course of his speech—and I hope he will correct me if I am not properly informed; I went to the reporters' room and tried to get it—he said that the Government was not responsible for the private opinion of any of its members expressed outside this House on subjects of foreign policy. Well, if the point is in the phrase, "expressed outside of the House," the hon. gentleman who spoke before the Commissioner of Inland Revenue pointed out that, to-day, the Controller of Customs has reaffirmed the language within the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, this motion I have read is none of mine; I was away in Toronto or Kingston when this motion was concocted. But I had a question on the Notice Paper. I put it there, first, in the interest of the Controller of Customs, to give him an opportunity of saying whether or not he was properly reported; next, in the interest of this Parliament; and next, in my own interest. He is one of my leaders—I have not chosen him as a leader, but he has been given me as one of my leaders, without any choice or word of reference so far as I am concerned. The Controller of Customs is one of my leaders; and am I to be told that it is of no consequence to me whatever my leader may happen to say on so important a subject as taking up arms against Her Majesty? I have gone into the four courts of Dublin and seen a man prosecuted for singing a song written by Professor Ingram, a Protestant professor of Dublin University. The song commences: "Who fears to speak of '98?" That event had passed away for more than half a century at that time; nevertheless he was indicted and given penal servitude for singing that song. I have gone into the four courts and seen Lord O'Hagan try a man for singing one of his own songs, composed when that eminent judge was a young man, and sentence him to imprisonment. The leader of the Government and the Minister of Railways and other hon. gentlemen who are my leaders need not be surprised if I, as an Irish Protestant, feel strongly on the subject of loyalty. It seems that it is a very light matter with some hon. gentlemen, whether a member of the Government uses seditious language, uses language that, if used at the time I speak of in Ireland, would have sent him into penal servitude. Do you mean to say that we who are always talking about our loyalty, flaunting the British flag when we want to make a point, if some member of our party asperses that loyalty and encourages sedition and encourages men to rise against Her Majesty, are to sit quietly by and declare: "Oh, it was an after-dinner ebullition, and think no more about it." If it was an after-dinner ebullition, the hon. gentleman should have stated so, and we should have heard no more about it. But, to-day, he has reaffirmed it. Todd says of the position of an Under Secretary of State, that "the responsibilities of a Minister who has no seat in the Cabinet is less comprehensive, although, in its degree, no less complete." And who can deny, for one moment, that although the Controller of

Mr. DAVIN.

Customs may not be in the Cabinet, and may not have to form policies, he, as head of a department, as a Minister of the Crown, as a member of this Government—for nobody ever heard that he was not a member of the Government until this matter was brought up—who can deny that his responsibility is complete? I understand also that the leader of the Government said that active aid might merely mean aid by subscriptions. The proper person to put the gloss on it is the Controller of Customs. It might be quite right to accept a commentator if the author himself were not present, but no one ever heard of sending a man to a commentator or a glossarist to learn the meaning of language when the author himself was present. And so we have the language of the Controller of Customs, and, if he says he sticks by that language, we are shut up to its natural meaning, and the natural meaning of the language when he spoke of active aid, combined as it is with a sentence in which he speaks of throwing off allegiance to Her Majesty, shows what his opinion was.

Mr. WALLACE. Permit me to say there is not such a sentence in my speech, and the hon. gentleman twists it unfairly and improperly when he makes use of that expression. There is not a sentiment of disloyalty from one end to the other. I belong to a society, the foundation-stone of which is loyalty.

Mr. DAVIN. The speech is here in the "Empire," and is put in quotation marks. In speaking of Ireland, he said:

Our friends over there will never submit to Home Rule. Britain may cast them out, and if she does she has no right to look for their further allegiance. They are preparing for action. Their unalterable determination is never to submit to Home Rule, and they will have the sympathy of the Orangemen of Canada—aye, more than sympathy: they shall have our active aid, if that active aid be necessary. We shall be unworthy of our ancestors if we fail in our duty in such a crisis.

I do not understand language if the hon. gentleman does not mean active aid; if he does not, he should rise in his place and say that he does not mean it. If he means, as the Minister of Finance, I understand, has suggested, simply subscriptions, then the hon. gentleman should tell us that he merely meant subscriptions, or sympathy. But other people would understand he meant active aid. Probably the hon. gentleman has a dictionary of his own, perhaps I am not qualified to understand his "copia verborum;" but I was quite ready to take the hon. gentleman's own interpretation. I say, however, that this is a serious matter. Again, I am told that the Minister of Finance said there was no instance whatever of notice being taken by a Parliament of this kind of public action, of public expression of opinion by a member of the Government outside of Parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. I never said such a word.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad the hon. gentleman did not. Let me call attention to what took place in England in 1864. Mr. Stansfeld was a Lord of the Admiralty. Grecco was on trial in Paris. Ten years before some letters had been addressed to the house where Mr. Stansfeld lived, not addressed to Mr. Stansfeld; but Mr. Stansfeld was known to sympathize with Mazzini. He rose in his place in the House of Commons and said he knew nothing whatever about the matter, but he said he believed Mazzini had been maligned. What happened? Because he was under suspicion of having taken part in this foreign movement, a movement, in Italy, that many might sympathize with, because he had taken part in the Mazzini movement, a motion was moved in the House condemning his action. That motion was carried by a majority of ten, or at all events by a narrow majority, and a few days afterwards Mr. Stansfeld resigned. I am sorry the Controller of Customs has not denied that he meant to incite men to sedition, because he is a member of an order that is pre-eminently loyal and pre-eminently attached to British connection; and it would be a most extraordinary thing if a man at the head of an order pre-eminently attached to British connection, should in addressing members of that order in Canada urge them to take a course that would be throwing off allegiance to Her Majesty in another country. I say whether you call it foreign politics or any other kind of politics, it is a matter in which the whole of the citizens of Canada are interested when a member of the Government talks in that way, but specially those of us who are Conservative, and especially those of us who are Irish Protestants. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me tell the Government and the hon. the Controller of Customs, that we Irish Protestants do not regard the Controller of Customs as a representative man of the Irish Protestants of Canada. I was addressing Irish Protestants on Friday night in Toronto, and I could not help dwelling on what the Irish Protestants had done for the Empire. I told them that in every walk of art, in every walk of human endeavour, and in every place, that small body of men had given the very greatest and foremost names to the service of Britain. I could not help recalling that Irish Protestants had fought bravely on battlefield after battlefield for the glory of the Empire. I said that, when England had to face a world in arms, an Irish Protestant led her army, and, if she had to face a world in arms to-day, an Irish Protestant would be her greatest general. If we consider the great statesmen of the Empire, the Irish Protestant names are household words, and wherever the English tongue is used to-day throughout the Empire the statesman goes to an Irish Protestant, as to a quarry, to get materials to fortify his statesmanship and to enrich his rhetoric. I say that in Canada the Irish Protestant—and, not less, the Orangeman—is of the same type as the men who fought and worked for the glory of the Empire, and I say that the Controller of Customs is not a representative of us. Now, Sir, the point was made, that the leader of the Opposition spoke of shouldering a musket. If the leader of the Opposition spoke sedition at any time, he is amenable to the censure of this House as any other man; and presupposing that he did talk sedition, if I had been a member of this House, and if I had known of it, I would have brought the matter before Parliament; that is, on the hypothesis that he did talk sedition. Now, Sir, I have known my hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue for some time, and I have known him as a pretty ingenious man. I think he quoted from Lord Salisbury, in these words:

That the people of Ulster have not lost their strong love of freedom or their disdain of arbitrary powers.

Is that correct? Is there anything improper in that statement?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The hon. gentleman will understand that I merely quoted the concluding portion of the speech, which, I said, compared to that in criticism, was very mild indeed.

Mr. DAVIN. Quote the part that has the sting in it, because there is no sting in what you have quoted.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That speech was quoted before, and if the hon. gentleman had been in the House attending to his duty, he would have heard the speech read before.

Mr. DAVIN. But, Sir, what is the use of quoting the part of the speech that does not help the hon. gentleman's argument? If it was read before, let him read it behind now.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is just precisely what I did. I read the concluding portion of it. I cannot satisfy the hon. gentleman. Like some men, nothing will ever satisfy him.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, Sir, I have read Lord Salisbury's speech, and I say that Lord Salisbury's speech contains nothing in it—

Mr. FOSTER. That is not complimentary to Lord Salisbury.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance is constantly advising those on the Opposition benches to hasten slowly, and I would advise my hon. friend—he is only a little while in the leadership—to hasten slowly, because, since he has become leader, I do not think, in his position as leader, he has been quite as successful as in his position of second man in the Government, and I would, therefore, advise him to hasten slowly. I was about to say, Sir, that there is nothing in the speech of Lord Salisbury, compared to the speech of the Controller of Customs. There is nothing in it calculated to incite insurrection, and I say this: That even though Lord Salisbury were guilty of impropriety, and even if the leader of the Opposition were guilty of impropriety, do you mean to say that their language would excuse impropriety on the part of a Minister of the Crown in Canada to-day? or that I, as a supporter of the Government and a member of the Conservative party, and an Irish Protestant, may be asked to sit tamely here, or indeed be asked to take a still different course, because two or three or four or five gentlemen sitting on the Government benches, say that I should take such a course, against my opinions? Now, what is the position of the Government? I have read this motion, and I must say that any motion coming from the Opposition, if it were framed by the Angel Gabriel, is liable, and fairly liable, to the criticism that it is meant to disturb the Government. Why, it is like asking a hedgehog, when he puts himself in battle array, for what reason has he got his prickles on? It is the most natural thing in the world, that if a member of the Opposition moves an amendment, that he does not intend to help the Government. But that is not the point we have to decide in a matter like the present one. The point we have to discuss now is: Is it a motion—prompted by whatever motive—is it a fair motion, and is it one that we ought to assent to? That is the real question. Now what does this motion say? It affirms the gross impropriety of a Minister of the Crown giving utterances to seditious statements. It construes these statements, as any rational man will construe them, and it says that this House should censure the Controller of Customs. Well, Sir, if the House does not censure him, the House must do the other thing; it must approve of him. If we do not censure the words, we must approve of them. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in response to one of the members, said: That anybody who votes for this motion is not a friend of the Government. I say that that was not after all a straight answer. I have heard answers given under such circumstances by Ministers of the Crown, and they were generally given very calmly, and not in the least with an air of menace. What have answers under such circumstances generally been? The Minister says: I have only to tell the hon. member that if the motion now before the House is carried the Government will consider its position. That is the stereotyped phrase used in the English Parliament if it is intended to declare a motion to be one of want of confidence; but the phrase that we must henceforth use, if we are to put an extreme interpretation on the words of the Minister of Finance, is, I suppose, this: "No friends of the Government will vote for this motion." But, Sir, that does not mean if the motion were carried that the Government would resign, and I do not see why, if this motion were carried, the Government should resign. I do not at all see that it is a vote of a want of confidence in the Government; but I will tell you what it is: It is a vote of want of confidence in the Controller of Customs, and I say that I have no confidence in any man as a member of the Government that I am asked to support if he is capable of using such seditious language as the Controller of Customs says he used. And, Sir, I will tell you moreover why I have no confidence in him. It is because I have reason to believe that the hon. gentleman, in using that language—and to my mind it adds very greatly to the gravity of having used it—has not actually used that language from his heart, or from his calculated opinions at all, but has used it to inflame prejudices, and to awake passions, with a view of filling sails, spread for what purpose it is not necessary for me now to analyse. And I will tell him why I have no faith in his sincerity in this matter. I remember very well when he stood up—here is the book where he is registered—as one of the noble thirteen. He stands before the public as such; he stands before the Orangemen of Canada as such; he stands before the Irish Protestants as having voted with those noble thirteen, and no doubt he voted sincerely; but I know—and I ought to have brought it forward before this—that at the very time he was voting in that way, he was urging his fellow-Orangemen in this House to take a different line and support the Government.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg to state that that assertion applied to me is absolutely false. There is not a word of truth in it, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to name the man that I tried to induce—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman ought not to use the expression "false."

Mr. WALLACE. I say that the assertion as applied to me is absolutely false.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not a proper term.

Mr. WALLACE. It is true, though.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must withdraw the word "false," and substitute some other word.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman's statement is absolutely unfounded, and I challenge him to name the members that I tried to induce to do such a thing.

Mr. DAVIN. Must I give the name?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, yes.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman, I understand, denies it. I heard him myself address his brother Protestant members and urge them to vote with the Government, and to say that he could not from his position vote otherwise than with the minority.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not true.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Name the others besides yourself.

Mr. DAVIN. Nobody who knows me will suppose that I would invent such a thing as that out of the whole cloth.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I see hon. gentlemen laughing. I defy them or any one else in this House—they know me well, and there is not a man who knows me who would suppose that I would for one second invent that statement out of the whole cloth. I heard the hon. gentleman, and I will give him day and date and place. Those hon. gentlemen who took his advice, some of them, have been left at home, and if he had been a chivalrous man and a real man as a member of the Orange body, he would have said: I will take my life in my hand and vote with the Government; but he urged them to vote with the Government, while his name was blazoned before the public as one of the noble thirteen. Therefore, I have no confidence in him.

Mr. WALLACE. I state again that it is absolutely untrue, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to name one man. He says he himself was there. If others were there, I would like him to name them; and if he does, I will bring those gentlemen to state the contrary.

Mr. DAVIN. I will tell where it occurred. It occurred upstairs in room 46, at a meeting of the Protestant members of the Conservative party when Sir John Macdonald brought before us the question how we should vote on the Jesuits' Estates question. As the hon. gentleman wanted it, he has got it out. I heard him say it myself.

Mr. WALLACE. Of those men who were members of Parliament at that time are here to-day. I call upon any one of them to verify, if they can, the statement made by the hon. member for West Assiniboia. They cannot do it.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what party loyalty may lead men to do.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame, shame.

Mr. DAVIN. I have heard men denounce Jesuitism; but, Sir, I have seen as much Jesuitism in politics—I have seen men stoop to as great villainy in politics as to say what is not true.

Mr. WALLACE. We see it now.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman denies it, but I venture to say that if I wish I can get members who will prove what I say. But my statement is enough for the people of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes. My statement, Mr. Speaker, is not only enough for the people of Canada, but it is enough for the Orangemen of Canada, and enough for the Irish Protestants of Canada, and enough for the Conservative party of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIN. I am no heeler; I have no axe to grind; I am looking for no position. I have nothing whatever to do except to attend to the duties of my constituency; and, standing here as an impartial man, condemning the action of the Controller of Customs, and forced to take the course that I have taken, I rather think that the people of Canada who know me, especially the people of Ontario, who know me as well as any man in that Government, will believe my statement. There is hardly one man in that Government whose honour stands as high in the estimation of the people of Ontario as mine does.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Hon. gentlemen laugh. The people of Ontario know me better, happily, than they know them.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman will allow me for one minute, I would like to say—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not going to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can only interrupt the speaker by rising to a point of order.

Mr. SPROULE. I was rising to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. Is the hon. gentleman rising to a point of order?

Mr. SPROULE. I have said so. I wish to ask whether the hon. gentleman is in order in making the statement he has done in the presence of men who were there, without allowing them an opportunity either to deny it or to assent to it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I imagine that every member of the House, except those who have already spoken on this question, will have the right to speak.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, there was a further reason which I had for putting this question on the Paper. When the hon. leader of the House gave me a somewhat short answer, as I thought, when I put this question—when he declared that the Government knew nothing of it, the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) said to me: "Put your question on the Paper; he—meaning the Controller—will glory in it; I heard him say it;" or something to that effect. He also said, committing a high breach of the privileges of this House: "If you put it on the Paper, you will never come back here again." Well, Mr. Speaker, if I can only come back here under favour of the Controller of Customs and his lieutenant, the member for North Victoria, why, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to come back here at all. Hitherto I have thought I was indebted to my seat to the people of Western Assiniboia. I thought they had voted for me in spite of the blandishments of the late Minister of the Interior. In spite of the blandishments of the Commissioner of North-west Mounted Police, in spite of the leader of the Reform party in the riding, and in spite of the head of the Lester-Kaye farms. I thought it was because I had done good service before I was elected originally and after I was elected; and if it should come to be a question of asking permission of the hon. Controller of Customs or the hon. member for North Victoria, why, Mr. Speaker, I hope now, and I hope at all times in the future of my public career, be it long or short, to be able to parody Pope's splendid lines, and say that I did not rise by sycophany, that I did not rise by intrigue, that I did not rise by truckling, that I did not rise by sending deputations to the Premier and bothering him, that I did not rise by pleading and bleating and shedding tears. "Be this one poet's praise," said Pope, "that if he rose, he rose by manly ways." I would to God that I could say that when men rise in Canada, they always rise by manly ways; but, any way, of this you may be perfectly certain and the party may be perfectly certain, that as there has not been in the past, neither will there be in the future, any stooping on my part to those arts which consist in a wriggling from the base of the tree right up to the topmost leaf, and being the same little dirty worm at the top that you were when you left the base of the tree. I want to come back to the gravity of this question. I say that the position taken by the Government is one that will not commend itself to the people of this country. I say that any man occupying the position of a Minister of the Crown—but the hon. gentleman declares he is not a Minister of the Crown, and I suppose we will have some quibbling on that—he will probably try to prove that he is only a three-quarter Minister of the Crown, or a Minister of the Crown north by north-east: but not a full orb'd Minister of the Crown. What did his brother, the Controller of Inland Revenue, do the other day? He dismissed J. J. Cosgrove for having signed a disloyal declaration. Mr. Cosgrove was dismissed because he signed a statement of opinion that was absolutely disloyal. I approve of that; I approve of Mr. Mowat dismissing Myers; but it is quite a different thing when a man gets within the sacred precincts of the Government of Canada. I know what a sacred inclosure that is. I know that we ought all to go down on our bellies and worship every man that becomes a Minister of the Crown. I know that when a man becomes a Minister of the Crown, not only he himself thinks that he is a sacred personage, but that all the members of his party think so too. I know that he is a most-worshipped personage as a rule. I know well that it is not needed that a Minister of the Crown should be an educated man. In fact, we are going fast towards having what I do not think we ought to have, an utterly illiterate Ministry. But I can sit here patiently and allow men to become Ministers of the Crown, who may want administrative ability, and we have had such men. There was one man who passed out of that Ministry, and who had no administrative ability and no weight in this House. I can sit here and bear that patiently; but I come from a stock of men who have served and fought and bled for the British Crown, and have been reared to believe that the most grievous sin a public man can commit is to encourage sedition, to encourage men rising against the Crown, and when any man, whether he be a Controller or a full-fledged Minister, or a deputy-head, whoever he be, especially if he has a seat in this House has uttered seditious sentiments, I will not sit tamely by, knowing him to have uttered such opinions. Mark where I draw the line. If the hon. member had declared that the men of Ulster would use every means of constitutional agitation and constitutional proceedings—and that evidently is what Lord Salisbury referred to—I should not object to that; but when he talks sedition, when he says that which, in the mouth of another man in this House, would call for his strongest reprobation, whether the Ministry declare that the man who denounces that is a friend of theirs or not, I am the enemy of that kind of thing and the enemy of the man who utters such sedition.

Mr. McKAY. As one of the members who attended the meeting referred to by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), at the time the vote was taken on that question, I must say that I never heard the Controller of Customs say one word at that meeting, or at any place outside of it, which would lead me to think that he was not perfectly sincere in his conviction at that time and in the vote he gave. In justice to him, I must say that I never heard myself, nor did I hear any intimation from any other members, that the Controller of Customs was not perfectly sincere in the vote he gave. I wish to make this statement, as one who was present at that meeting. He did not advise me to vote otherwise than he himself did, and I did not hear that he advised any other Protestant members of the House to do so. There were two meetings, and at neither did he give us reason to think that he was not perfectly sincere in the vote he was giving.

Mr. SPROULE. As one who was at the caucus—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoken, spoken.

Mr. CARPENTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem very anxious to muzzle the mouths of any members on this side who wish to say a word in this House which is not in accord with their views. As one who occupied the same room with Mr. Wallace, during all the time of that discussion, and who was at that caucus, and as one who voted, not with the thirteen, but against them, let me say that I never heard in that room or outside it, or at the caucus or elsewhere, the Controller of Customs state one word, or do one act that would lead any one to the conclusion that he was not sincere, nor did he advise any one of us to vote against the amendment he supported. It would be impossible for him to have done this without my knowing something about it. For the first time in my life do I hear from any source that Mr. Wallace ever promulgated such sentiments or advice as those attributed to him. I know that he constantly endeavoured to get me to vote with him, and he also used the same endeavours towards the other friends in the room, and every other person who was brought into the room.

Mr. BOYLE. I was also in room 46 referred to by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and my recollection of the circumstance is very clear. I certainly have no recollection of the Controller of Customs in any way taking the position which he is charged with having taken to-night, namely, of voting one way himself, while he urged other members to vote another way. I have another remark to make with regard to that, and it is this. The evening the discussion took place, followed by a vote, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) the Controller of Customs came to me and said he had the census returns for 1881. He asked me if I did not see my way clear to voting with him and the other members against the Government on that subject. He stated that it would do me no harm, as there was a large Orange settlement in the constituency I represented, and that I would be following in the van of popular sentiment of my constituency if I voted against the Government. I told him I was aware of that, but that my conscientious views differed from his; that I thought the Government were not censurable, and that, although it might be popular to vote with him, I supported the position taken by the Government. He said he was sorry, because he and his friends were in the right, and it would not only be the proper but the popular thing for me to do, to vote in that way. Therefore, I must say that I never knew of the Controller taking the position charged against him by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin).

Mr. COCHRANE. I occupied a room for several years with the Controller of Customs, and during that time, I must say that the strongest words which he and I ever had were over that very question, and I deny most emphatically the assertion made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). With all his eloquence and influence the hon. gentleman cannot influence me to vote with him and vote censure upon the Government, because I think I ought not to vote censure upon the ground that has been taken.

Mr. GUILLET. I also occupied the room that has been spoken of, No. 27. I was also a fellow-boarder with Mr. Wallace at the same hotel during that eventful session when the vote of want of confidence was brought forward because of the refusal of the Government to disallow the Jesuits' Estates Act, and I can say positively that Mr. Wallace never endeavoured to use any undue influence with me either in room 27 or 46, or during our conversation when we met at the hotel or elsewhere, to obtain my support or vote on the lines he was taking. I can say that he never discussed the matter with me, except in a fair, reasonable and logical way, and used no other influence to obtain my vote.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not rise for the purpose of saying anything in regard to the sentiments of the hon. the Controller of Customs at the time mentioned by the hon. gentleman who has last spoken, because I did not hear him say anything about it at that time. I rise because I happened to read this resolution, and I recognize that it is an attack upon the Government. It is not an honest assertion, in my opinion, or I would not have said a word, of loyalty, of desire to show loyalty or attachment to the British Crown, on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. I recognize in this resolution the hand-writing of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who so lately in this House, for the first time proclaimed, so that the people in this country could really understand what his sentiments were—and which I accepted—that he was loyal to the Crown, and I gave him a test to show whether he was honest in his proclamations of loyalty. He went home shortly after and I feel it my duty, as representing part of the same county to inquire, whether his practice coincides with the principles he then avowed. The very gentleman I mentioned here, the secretary of the association in North Norfolk that nominated the hon. member, the editor of the paper that the hon. member, I think, largely controls, openly avowed annexation sentiments and still avows them, yet he still holds his position in the Liberal party, in the riding of the hon. member for North Norfolk, who declared that they dared not put any one in nomination against him on account of his annexation proclivities. I recognize the hand-writing of the hon. gentleman; he produced, though he did not move this resolution which speaks so strongly of loyalty, and, by this means, seeks to induce members on this side to support these sentiments in a manner which would turn the Government out, because of their proclamation of loyal sentiments on this occasion. I have read, also, for the first time, the words of the Controller of Customs, and I defy any man to find in the words themselves anything whatever that is disloyal. I regretted to hear the remarks of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), an hon. gentleman whom I have long known, and of whose loyalty I am satisfied, a gentleman between whom and myself there exist not only sentiments of the highest personal respect, but a community of sentiment in that highest of loyalty, which consists of loyalty to the institutions of Canada and the British Crown. I regretted exceedingly to hear him using such words as "sowing sedition," with regard to the utterances of the Controller of Customs, which I find reported in this newspaper. The hon. the Controller of Customs, like every other member, has the right to his own opinions and the right to express them. And if there is one sentiment more than another that is British, it is that the man who has spoken his honest sentiments shall not be called upon, at the dictation of a political Opposition, trying to put the Government in a critical position, to deny or attempt to deny or withdraw or apologize for the sentiment he has honestly expressed. Let me read the words :

We find to-day in the old country that brethren, the descendants of the heroes of two hundred years ago, are perhaps facing difficulties of a similar character to those which their ancestors had to face in 1868—that the men of 1893 are threatened with a rule which is antagonistic to freedom there, to the liberty which they have always enjoyed as citizens of the British Empire. What is proposed is not only to shake off their allegiance to Great Britain—the bonds of love that bind them to the Empire—but to put them, forsooth, under the alien and hostile Government. We have their (the Home Rulers') public declarations of what they would do if they obtained power, that they would never cease agitating until the last link that bound Ireland to the British Empire is severed. That is their object to-day. They are trying to take the loyal men with them; but our friends over there say they will never submit. Britain may cast them out; but if she does so, she has no right to say what may be their future allegiance. Our friends in that land are preparing, and have asserted their unalterable determination never to submit to that Home Rule which Mr. Gladstone and his Government have laid out for them. (Applause). I am sure that in their efforts they shall have the sympathy of the Orangemen of Canada—more than sympathy; they shall have our active aid, if that active aid be necessary. We should not be worthy descendants of the heroes of two hundred years ago—we would not be worthy of our ancestors of old, if we failed in our duty in that respect.

Now, Sir, I wish to say I have met the predecessors of hon. gentlemen opposite and I have helped to fight them—and it was the first political fight in which I ever took part—when the Protestants and Orangemen of Ontario almost to a man favoured the granting of separate schools to our Catholic friends in Lower Canada. And our opponents were as bitterly against them as they are bitter here to-day and their endeavour was to win the Orangemen to their side by appealing to their prejudices against their Roman Catholic fellow-citizens. I have never sought to make political capital out of any such question. I am a Protestant; I never was an Orangeman, but I claim to be a Canadian and a Briton, and I say that in that fight the Liberals were as bitter in endeavouring to gain an advantage of that kind as now. And, had they succeeded, the Roman Catholic minority in Ontario would never have had the privilege of having their separate schools as we thought they ought to have and in their claim to which I have been ever ready to support them. I am as strong in my religious faith as any Orangeman or as any Roman Catholic among my fellow-citizens. The whole object of this resolution is simply to arouse a spirit of contention in the ranks of the Government supporters. This cry of loyalty is raised, this cunningly devised scheme is proposed by an hon. gentleman who, when his words declaring that he was a Briton and loyal to the Crown were hardly cold, dared not go home to his own county and there show that he meant the words, he dared not go home and ask his fellow-Liberals, many of whom would have been only too glad of the chance to put out of their councils and out of control of the association in their riding the man who is preaching dissolution of this country and handing it over to annexation. These are the general sentiments that are underlying this proposition. I declare to you, Mr. Speaker, that whether the Controller of Customs was judicious or not, his utterances sink into insignificance in comparison with this larger question which is the real one upon which we are to vote. So far as I am concerned, I think it is a boyish trick, it is a patent political trick, and it is too unworthy to capture an hon. gentleman so bright, so intelligent, and so loyal as my hon. friend from Assiniboia. I ask him to consider the broader question that underlies this discussion to-night. I would not have spoken were it not that I have been deeply moved at seeing the direction in which matters were drifting, because I see the larger danger behind this insidious and cunning attempt, which is only worthy of being quarrelled over by school boys, instead of being discussed by statesmen, and made the basis of an attempt to upset the Government.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as the representative of a constituency containing a mixed population—that is to say, a constituency where one-fourth of English Protestants is to be found with three-fourths of Catholics—I think it my duty to say a few words on the question before the House. I am called to pronounce on a very important resolution. I am sorry that circumstances should have given rise to this resolution, and I am sorry that such words should have been uttered by the hon. the Controller of Customs at a meeting held at Kingston. I have not the least hesitation in saying that he would have been wiser and he refrained from using such language as he is reported by the newspapers to have done. But, Mr. Speaker, I hold that the other Ministers are not to be held answerable for his words. Therefore we ought not, especially during the absence of our chief from Canada, the hon. Prime Minister, to show a want of confidence in the Government. From the information I have been given on the matter, I fail to see any reasonable ground, under the circumstances, of overthrowing the Government. If I am correctly informed, Mr. Speaker, the motion which is before you has been moved by the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson), who is an Orangeman himself. I know I may be told that the question is not as to whether the hon. member is or is not an Orangeman. I admit that this is not the issue; but meanwhile it is quite interesting to know that the author of the motion is an Orangeman himself. Then, I submit, that in proposing this motion, he has been guided by one single purpose—not, as it might be presumed, in view of speaking in this House against one of his brother Orangemen—but with a view to create difficulties in the way of the Government and its friends. Were we to propose a motion against Orangemen he would be the first to register his vote against us. This is not the first time that the Liberals, to embarrass the Government, resort to these tactics. But I warn them that they are wrong when they mix up national and religious questions with politics. It is perfectly true that the words attributed to the hon. the Controller of Customs should never have been given utterance to, he has certainly been found wanting in discretion, on that day. It is a fact deeply to be regretted by us French Canadians, but I consider, as already said, that the other Ministers are not responsible for his utterances. While asserting that the utterances of the hon. the Controller of Customs are deeply to be regretted, I wish it to be well understood that I am not opposed to Home Rule for Ireland. Quite the contrary. I sincerely wish that Ireland may enjoy a free government like the one we are enjoying in Canada. We have confidence in the policy of the Ministers, and although, as a French Canadian, my position might be open to criticism under the circumstances, still it seems to be my duty, and it is the duty of all the supporters of this policy to vote with the Government. I do not think this to be a favourable occasion for our party to divide on such a question. As everybody knows, and our hon. friends across the floor would be the first to admit, had they not a party advantage in view, that this motion is made with the single purpose of embarrassing the Government. So much so that with the exception of the hon. member who submitted it to the House, no other member could have been found willing to present it. I am quite positive that the hon. leader of the Opposition himself would never have proposed such a motion. Under the circumstances, I may ask, Mr. Speaker, why we should withhold our support from the Government? As far as I am concerned, I fail to see on what reasonable ground I could do it. Why should we vote for a motion made by an Orangeman, I am told? In doing so, we would be found supporting an Orangeman. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that this motion was made with but a view to overthrow the Government, and, as for me, although representing a constituency the three-fourths of which are Catholics, I think it to be my duty to continue my confidence in the Ministers in general. It may be that by this vote I shall lose the support of a certain number of my Irish electors; however, my duty is to support the Ministers, who cannot be held accountable for the utterances of the Controller of Customs, and I will vote with them. It is immaterial whether I be defeated or not; but should I have consulted my own private interest, I could have voted in the other direction to my advantage. Under circumstances like these, Mr. Chairman, all French-Canadians should unite. Our chief, the hon. the Prime Minister, is absent, and nobody entertains any doubt as to his being well equipped to defend himself, were he present. The time would be ill-chosen to shew any lack of confidence in him. We should not allow ourselves to be led away by this motion, chiefly when we are persuaded that our hon. friends across the floor are not sincere, having but one desire, to embarrass the Government. I am ready to defend the position I now assume, not only in my county, but in any public meeting in the province of Quebec. Should I be defeated by reason of this vote, my opponents shall perhaps have rendered me a greater service than they imagine. I consider, Mr. Speaker, that we must support the present Prime Minister, on the ground that whatever advantage we may hope for will undoubtedly come to us through him, as for instance, the Manitoba School question—for the Prime Minister is one of ours. The motion of the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson) is a motion of non-confidence; I think it is quite obvious.

Mr. RINFRET (Translation.) Should the hon. member allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I will ask him a word of explanation about the words he has just uttered; he just told us that it was a motion of non-confidence intended to overthrow the Government. Now, how does he account for the fact that the hon. the Secretary of State (Mr. Costigan) and the Solicitor-General (Mr. Curran) have both declared that they were going to vote in favour of this motion?

Mr. FRECHETTE. As far as my friends are concerned, it is within their province to ponder this question and pronounce on it. As far as I am concerned, I will vote as I think best. Up to now, Mr. Chairman, both French and English nationalities, in Canada, have lived in perfect harmony; let us endeavour to keep up this concord for the future. As a French-Canadian, having long resided in the midst of English people. I speak from experience, I have been reared in a county where lives an English population, and never have I witnessed any difficulty to arise between both races. I have transacted business with English Protestants and I have often received from these people a support they denied their own people. I must further say that never have I met among them people imbued with hatred and prejudices against us, as some contend. In the province of Quebec, they who think that the Protestant population fosters feelings of hatred towards Catholics, are greatly mistaken. I do not wish to detain the House any longer, as I have stated the grounds on which I will vote on the question.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

Mr. CLEVELAND. The House has now spent a large part of the day in discussing the propriety or impropriety of certain words that have fallen from the lips of the Controller of Customs, and we of the Eastern Townships cannot understand the feeling manifested here to-day in discussing the speech referred to. I represent a constituency in the province of Quebec where the people, composed of Roman Catholics and Protestants, have agreed to disagree on matters pertaining to religion, and to unite on one broad platform in matters pertaining to the good of the Dominion as a whole. I think the example is one that might well be followed by the people of the other provinces, especially the province of Ontario. Sir, I have the honour to represent a constituency, three-fourths of whom are Roman Catholics, of whom nearly three-fifths are French-Canadians, the balance being made up of Irish Catholics, making a total Roman Catholic vote of fully three-fourths. I consider that the very fact that a Catholic majority of such strength elected me, an English Protestant, over the head of one of their own race and nationality, should show to the Orangemen of Ontario how free we are in the province of Quebec from religious prejudices. If Ontario could point to such an instance of Protestant liberality in that province, it would do more towards cementing and binding together people of different creeds in our Dominion, than months of idle talk in this House. Now, in regard to the speech of the Controller of Customs at Kingston, I wish to say that I consider such language uncalled for, foolish, and aggravating to our Irish Catholic friends. Let the people of Great Britain attend to their Home Rule Bill, and if it passes, let every loyal Briton, no matter whether be he English, Irish or Scotch, do all he can to make it a success. I know that in my own constituency there are none more loyal to our fair Canada than our Irish Catholic people, and I am happy to say that I number my most valued friends among them. In conclusion,

Mr. FRECHETTE.

I will say that if our Grit friends had not attempted to make a catch vote of this matter, in fact, to make it vote of non-confidence in the Government, I certainly would have favoured a vote of censure on the ill-advised expressions of the Controller of Customs; but under the circumstances, and in the absence of our honoured chief, Sir John Thompson, I feel it my duty to support this Government, even more loyally than if he were present.

Mr. CASEY. Some very singular reasons are urged against the motion before the House. One is that it is a motion which embarrasses the Government; another is that no good Conservative can vote for it. Now, Sir, there are reasons which might be urged against a great many motions which are brought before this House, but they are reasons which does not in the slightest degree concern the merits of the motion itself. Another reason is that the chief is away, and, therefore no friend of the Government can vote for this motion. There is no doubt that the Finance Minister, who is now leading the House, must feel himself in the position of an orphan, he must feel that there is no guiding hand conducting the business of the House, and that he has no right to expect that his friends will look upon him as managing the business before the House. The argument is by no means complimentary to the Minister of Finance. We on this side of the House may be quite ready to admit its force, but I think it is a very strange argument to come from anybody on the other side. Next we have the argument of the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Fréchette), that he is going to vote against this resolution because it is moved by an Orangeman. Because one Orangeman in this House thinks that another Orangeman has not been loyal, has not performed his duty as a three-quarters Minister of the Crown, whatever that may amount to, in making certain statements in Kingston, therefore, my hon. friend from Megantic will not vote for a motion of censure on the other Orangeman. If this motion was proposed by a Roman Catholic, if it had been proposed, even, by an stingless in-offensive Protestant, who is not an Orangeman, no doubt, the member for Megantic would have voted for it; but seeing the motion was proposed by an Orangeman, he does not find it compatible with his duties to his religion and to his church, to vote for this resolution of censure on an Orangeman. I think this is the best joke of the whole evening. But as the discussion appears to be drawing to a close, it may be well to draw a few general lessons from the tone of that discussion. I deeply regret to see that there has not come from the hon. gentlemen who support the Controller of Customs, a single speech which has tended to justify the language he used. That language was used at a public meeting at Kingston, and it was reaffirmed in this House. The hon. member has said nothing, none of his friends have said anything, to justify that language, and the plain common sense interpretation which every one must put upon it. And that plain interpretation the Controller of Customs and those who support him in this House, are willing to adopt, and it indicates that physical force should be used in a revolt against a law passed by the Imperial Parliament and sanctioned by Her Majesty. If that language means anything else, it means nothing at all. It is quite possible that the quasi-Minister meant nothing by that language, for individuals do sometimes make statements which mean nothing. But if he meant nothing by it, he should have stated so to-night. On the contrary, he affirmed and reaffirmed the language he used. He has, by the language he used, adopted means to incite rebellion against the Crown and the Parliament of England, if a measure of Home Rule be granted to Ireland. The Minister of Finance stands here and asks the supporters of the Government to endorse the language. I deeply regret that, in the course of this debate, not one word has fallen from the ministerial benches to induce loyal British subjects to sympathize with them in the stand they have taken on this question, and no matter what agitation may arise in Ulster from the use of language such as that used by the Controller of Customs and his conferees in the old country, I hope there will still be a sufficient number of loyal men in Ireland to see that a law passed by the proper authorities will be duly carried out, in spite of their fanaticism and bigotry.

Mr. DENISON. With respect to the after-dinner speech of the Controller of Customs, which seems to have excited some debate, I may say that I do not approve of his language, because it may be misunderstood. But while I say that, I must add that the hon. member is as loyal a man as there is in this House or in the country. It comes with rather bad grace from the hon. member, who, I understand, has prepared the resolution, to lecture us on what our loyalty should or should not be. What does he want us to do? On account of the after-dinner speech of this hon. gentleman, on a question with which this House has really nothing to do, a question that does not come up before us on any resolution, it is perfectly absurd to ask us, as members of this House, having a majority in the House of 60 or 70, and having been sent here to support the Government on certain great lines of policy, to be asked to turn out the Government because of the speech of one of its members, and that speech one which is interpreted one way by the members of the Opposition, and in an entirely different way by members on this side of the House. The language can have two interpretations. It has been said on the Opposition benches, that it is preaching sedition and so forth, while on this side of the House it has been held that it may mean that the hon. member will put his hand in his pocket and subscribe towards furthering his views. I, therefore, shall certainly vote against the resolution and in favour of the Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think I would have occupied the time of the House, had the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) been in his seat. I think a very uncourteous attack has been made on him by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), during the absence of my hon. friend from the Chamber. The hon. member for North Norfolk is always able to defend himself against any attack made by any hon. gentleman on that side of the House. The hon. gentleman knows that fact, and he took the opportunity of making a very discourteous attack on my hon. friend, when he was absent from his seat. That hon. gentleman said he detected the sentences, ideas and writing of the hon. member for North Norfolk in this resolution. That hon. gentleman is not the author of a single sentence or a single word it contains. So that the hon. member for South Norfolk is quite mistaken in attributing the contents of the resolution to the hon. member for North Norfolk. That is one error he made. In the next place, the hon. member for South Norfolk should have been the last man to rise in this House and cast a slur or endeavour to reproach the hon. member for North Norfolk for trying to arouse opposition to the Government on the resolution now before the House. It is well known, and it is within the recollection of many hon. members, the prominent part the hon. member for South Norfolk took, as chairman of a committee of this House, two years ago, in a scheme for whitewashing a member of the House charged with selling a canal bridge and taking a man's cow and horse in exchange.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is within the recollection of hon. members of this House. It may, perhaps, be irregular and unparliamentary to refer to these matters, but I think the hon. member for South Norfolk has undoubtedly left himself open to a castigation at the hands of the hon. member for the north riding, for the course he has taken. With respect to the utterances of the Controller of Customs, I have only to say that I regret the hon. gentleman should have gone so far beyond the boundaries of truth in the statements he made. I think it was exceedingly unfortunate that the hon. the Controller of Customs should have in a public place even sanctioned, to say nothing of having uttered the words spoken by him on that occasion. I quite agree with the opinion expressed, that there is not a more loyal body of people in the Dominion than the Orangemen, as a whole. They claim to be loyal, and no one has felt disposed to challenge that claim. It certainly would be exceedingly disloyal, were they to take the course indicated by the Controller of Customs, if Home Rule became the law for Ireland. The hon. gentleman has stated, in that speech, that they would virtually go into rebellion against Her Majesty and the Home Rule Law, even if it received the Queen's signature. We all know very well that every law passed in this country is subject to Her Majesty's veto. I carefully read the address delivered by Mr. Gladstone, in introducing the Home Rule Bill, and I read the Bill itself, and I can come to no other conclusion than that every necessary provision is made for the protection of the rights, privileges and liberties of the minority in Ireland. I was much pleased to attend a reception given to the Hon. Mr. Blake in the city of Toronto, before he accepted a seat in the British House of Commons, and at that meeting a resolution was unanimously adopted to the effect that every necessary guarantee for the safety, and liberty, and the rights of the minority in Ireland should be embodied in Mr. Gladstone's Bill. I have never known a single case in which the advocates of that measure have not been prepared to sanction the introduction of every clause, necessary to secure the liberties and privileges of the Irish minority. In the face of that I cannot see any ground whatever for such pronounced opposition to Irish Home Rule as indicated by the language of the Controller of Customs in his overflowing speech at Kingston. It would be well for the hon. gentleman and those who share his views, to wait patiently until they see the full details of that measure when it becomes the law of the land. Then, if the rights and the privileges of the minority are not amply provided for it would be quite right for them to use every constitutional means possible to secure those rights, and it would be right for them even to agitate that guarantee clauses should be inserted while the Bill is passing through its several stages in the Imperial House of Commons. I do not believe that the Controller of Customs would have uttered these words after mature consideration. I regret as a member of this House that the hon. gentleman should have risen in his place and avowed these sentiments. Had he expressed them in an after-dinner speech, or in a moment of excitement, I daresay the House would accept that explanation; but, that he should adhere to them in this House is to be regretted. When men get into the position of being leaders of any party in this country they should be exceedingly careful and moderate in their statements, more particularly on questions which may cause trouble and lead to irritation between the two great classes of people in this Dominion. I regret from that stand-point that the Controller of Customs should permit his zeal to so over-ride his prudence as to cause him to make that seditious statement. If he had thought of the prominent position that he occupied, and the position in which he has placed the Government, of which he is a prominent member, I do not think he would be guilty of the language on mature consideration.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I extremely regret the course which the hon. Controller of Customs has taken in this House to-day. When a question was put in the House and notice was given that this matter would be brought up, I thought the hon. gentleman would have stated that he did not recognize that it was a matter which should be brought before the House, that the House had no jurisdiction in it, and that therefore he should refuse to answer. The hon. gentleman thought otherwise. He thought that he should state at once openly—in the most manly way I must say—that the remarks attributed to him were correct. Thus we are placed in the position that we have now to vote on a motion in amendment to going into committee of supply. Now, it is a well known fact that such motions are not necessarily votes of non-confidence. On the contrary, very often these amendments are carried by the House and the Government does not consider that they should resign, but proceed with supply as soon as the amendment is disposed of. I have seen that repeatedly, and I have even seen the late leader of the Government (Sir John Macdonald) on several occasions accept a motion of that kind, and have it carried in the House, showing that such a motion is not a vote of non-confidence. In this case, the hon. Secretary of State, after hearing the remarks of the Controller of Customs, declared in his speech that he would vote for this amendment. The Secretary of State is a member of the Government and therefore his statement at once disposed of the idea that the motion should be considered as one of non-confidence. That is for the reason that a motion of non-confidence is one that the Government as a whole refuses to accept and votes against, and that those who are opposed to the Government vote for. In this case the hon. Secretary of State, being a member of the Government, says that he will vote for the amendment, and the other members of the Government—perhaps all, and perhaps not all—will vote against the amendment. Therefore it cannot be considered as a vote of non-confidence. The Minister of Finance, who leads the House now in the absence of the First Minister, has stated that those who will vote for the motion are no friends of the Government. How can that be explained when we see one member of the Government, who surely is a friend of the Government, voting in favour of that motion. It therefore seems to me impossible to maintain the contention that the motion if carried under the circumstances will be a vote of non-confidence in the Government. After the vote the Government may do as they please, but no one can tell them on the strength of that vote that they must resign. There is this constitutional privilege in the House amongst the supporters of the Government, that the members may exercise their judgment on such motions. Of course, when there is a doubt, or when their leaning is against the motion, they give the benefit of that doubt to their friends in the Government. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of Parliament for thirty-five years. For four or five years I was not a supporter of the Government, while it was composed of hon. gentlemen who were not of my political convictions; but during the remainder of that period, during thirty years, I went with my party, the Conservative party; I was faithful to my party; I have always been considered a Conservative, and as good a Conservative as I see here. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that when I look at the members of the Conservative party all around this House, when the House is as full as it can be, I do not see one single member who was in Parliament when I was first elected. I see one on the opposite side who came a little before me—the veteran, the “doyen” of the House—that is, the member for St. John, in the province of Quebec. (Mr. Bourassa). But, Mr. Speaker, during all that time I have been a Conservative, I am a Conservative, and I intend dying a Conservative. I may be obliged to vote in favour of this motion. If the hon. leader of the Government wishes to make it a vote of non-confidence, of course I cannot help his saying so; but when the history of the vote that will be taken to-night comes to be written, no historian or constitutional authority will say that the Government could take the vote as a vote of non-confidence in them. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, coming back to the beginning of my remarks, if the hon. Controller of Customs had not renewed here the statement with which he was reproached in the motion which was laid before the House, I do not think I could have voted for that motion, because then I would have considered that he would deny the power of Parliament over him for a speech or an utterance made by him outside of the House. But he has changed the question by stating again in this House what he stated before. Of course, other questions were put to him, as to which he was perfectly free to say yes or no, or to explain them or not. I do not find fault with him for that. But I must say that I regret exceedingly that I have to vote for this motion, especially when it refers to him. From the time he came to Parliament up to the present time, I have been on friendly terms with the hon. gentleman, and though I feel it my duty to exercise my right as a member of Parliament, and vote in favour of this motion, I hope that the hon. gentleman will remember the past, and that, perhaps, the same intercourse may follow afterwards.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, I must, at the very outset, express the very deep regret which I experience at the incident which has caused this prolonged discussion, and which, at this late period of the session, has delayed, during the whole of this day, the work of Parliament. I regret it more especially because, in the discussion to which this motion has led, not only the words spoken by the hon. Controller of Customs have been incriminated, but views have been expressed and words used which, I think, contribute largely to keep up the antagonism and to create between the races which inhabit this portion of the continent, bad feelings. It should be the endeavour of every patriotic Canadian to desire, as much as possible, to remove from our midst all causes of irritation and antagonism, so that these different races might work together for the purpose of developing the resources of the country and making of Canada a country united, happy and prosperous. Now, Mr. Speaker, since the opening of this discussion, and before it was brought before this Parliament, I have read, in the different newspapers of the country, the expressions which have been used by the hon. Controller of Customs. I have endeavoured, as far as my powers of comprehension go, to ascertain the true significance of these expressions, and the intent with which the words were spoken. Well, Sir, desiring, as we all must desire, to do ample justice to any of the members of this hon. House, whether sitting on your left, Mr. Speaker, or on your right, it has been my endeavour to ascertain exactly the significance of the words used and the intent of the hon. gentleman who made use of such expressions. Well, Sir, I must say that I cannot attach the great importance which some hon. gentlemen on the left have attached to these expressions. I seek in vain to find in them indications of a great act of disloyalty on the part of the hon. gentleman who has uttered these words, though I must say that, for one, I do not approve of the expressions used. I am prepared here to state that I regret infinitely that these expressions should have been used by the hon. gentleman. But when they are brought up in a motion submitted by an hon. gentleman to the sound judgment of the members of this hon. House, then it is time for us to leave aside prejudices and every other motive but the one which should determine the course we should follow on such an important question affecting an hon. gentleman. I say that I fail to see, in the terms used, or in the feelings expressed, any indication of disloyalty to the Crown or of a desire to subvert the constitution, or to prevent people from following the laws of the land under which we live. In many newspapers I have read discussions of the politics which are not the politics discussed on the floor of this Parliament, but the politics discussed in another Parliament and under circumstances which do not exist in this country; and, Sir, reading, as I do, the history of a good many years past of our parliamentary life in Canada, I venture the opinion that we attach possibly too much importance, and give possibly too much of our time to the discussion of these foreign questions. Sir, when I read the speech made by the hon. gentleman, not in his place in Parliament, but in another place, I find that that hon. gentleman has permitted himself, as he had a perfect right to do, to discuss the problems which are discussed in the Parliament of England; and frequently in the columns of the press of England I have seen the same sentiments expressed. I have seen, in those papers, the statement that the men in one portion of Ireland would not submit to what the men of another portion of Ireland were trying to obtain. Well, Sir, I know not who will succeed in that discussion, or who is likely to carry the day; but when the hon. gentleman stated that the friends who sympathized with one of those factions in Ireland, felt their hearts beating with the hearts of their friends in Ireland, I see no great treason in the expression of such a feeling. I know that the words which are more particularly quoted as incriminatory, are the expressions used by the hon. gentleman when he says to those friends to whom he refers, feeling as they do for their friends in Ireland, that not only will they give sympathy, but if necessary, active aid and support. It is a fact which cannot be denied that those two factions, for years past, have been organized on the one side and the other, and I understood those words of the hon. gentleman to mean that his friends in Canada would send to their friends in Ireland that help and succor which the other faction have often obtained from their sympathizers on the American continent. It is well known that when the most brilliant members of that galaxy of talent who advocated Home Rule in the British Parliament came out to Canada and to the United States to ask for aid their friends gave them active help and support. I have known the hon. Controller of Customs for years. I have had the privilege of sitting next to him in Parliament and of belonging to the same political party, and I must say that I was surprised to hear him accused of preaching treason and disloyalty. I have never heard that hon. gentleman express one word that could indicate disloyalty or treason or want of loyalty to the Crown, and I think we ought to oppose a motion calling on us, his colleagues in the House of Commons, to pass censure upon him which he does not deserve. But where does this insinuation of disloyalty come from? It comes from a quarter where continually attacks are plotted against the Government of the day. Those of us who have had a seat in this House since 1878 have witnessed these ebullitions of patriotism on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite on more than one occasion. They now consider it as evidence of patriotism and an act deserving of the highest eulogium that this motion should be made the sole object of which is to embarrass the Government, in the form of an amendment to Supply. We recognize the motives by the source from which that motion comes. We know very well that it is not at all intended for the protection of the high privileges of the Crown. We know well it is not for the purpose of making Canada more secure to the Crown of England. We know very well it is not intended to prevent Canada being annexed to the United States. Had this been the motive, hon. gentlemen opposite would have treated this matter as one which took place outside the House, and as the expressions of a gentleman who spoke outside of his functions as a member of Parliament, and gave expression merely to his own views. Hon. gentlemen opposite have selected a time for presenting this motion when it must be looked upon as a direct attack upon the Government. It is all very well to say that it is one which really need not be taken as a motion of want of confidence; but judging it by its surroundings and by the source whence it comes, I cannot consider it in any other light. I have only a word to say in answer to the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), and I take this opportunity of saying how very pleased I was to hear him impart to us the valuable and long experience which he has acquired as Minister of Public Works in the Parliament of Canada. If I understood him rightly he said that he could cite more than one precedent indicating that an amendment on going into Supply was not considered by the late Sir John Macdonald as a motion of want of confidence. I know myself of amendments which were moved on going into Supply, which certainly our late lamented leader, Sir John Macdonald, accepted, or without accepting, did not consider as a direct vote of want of confidence. But I fail to recollect a single instance where Sir John Macdonald, when leading the House, would not consider an amendment to Supply, censuring a member of the Government, as a direct attack against the Government. That is the point which the hon. gentleman stated, if I understood him correctly. I have not looked over the books or the precedents, but from memory I fail to recollect a single instance where a motion directly censuring a member of the Government was considered otherwise than as a direct attack against the Government. Now, this unfortunate incident has taken up a great deal of time already, and I certainly do not wish to prolong this debate; but I hope sincerely that when this amendment has been voted down, the Canadian Parliament will avoid as much as possible all those foreign questions with which we have nothing to do. We have enough to do in looking after the interests of our own country, and in legislating for the future benefit of this country, and there is no need for our taking up in this quixotic manner the affairs of other people. I think that we should occupy ourselves solely with the divers interests of our own country and try to develop it as much as possible. When we did interfere once we were told to mind our own business, and, though it may not have been very pleasant at the time, I think it was good advice, and I hope that when this question has been disposed of we shall try to avoid the recurrence of such incidents which take up the time of the House and create among our population, divided as to race and religion, deep-rooted prejudices that, in the interest of Canada, should be avoided as much as possible.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I can congratulate the last speaker upon having succeeded in keeping clear of the question at issue about as effectually as it was possible for any one to do. I am not aware that the question of Home Rule is involved in this motion. I am not aware that it is a question as to which church one worships at. My idea of the motion is that it involves a plain proposition that one shall live up to the law of the land. It is proved here by the admission of an hon. gentleman that he does not propose to submit to that wholesome doctrine. He proposes to wage war upon a portion of Her Majesty's dominions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MULOCK. He has so declared, if language is capable of any reasonable construction. He has been asked upon the floor of this House to remove any doubt whatever as to the meaning of his words, if any doubt there be. Over and over again during this debate has that opportunity been given to him and up to this moment he has allowed the debate to proceed, members drawing reasonable conclusion from these words that he proposes by physical force to resist the law in a part of the Empire. And not members of this House alone have drawn that conclusion, but the press as well. The newspaper reporter who first reported this speech introduced his report in words indicating this opinion, and when, after some days, the same newspaper, the Kingston "News," again referred to the question, it so indicated that the Controller's intention was to promote civil war. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have a plain issue before us. The words in question do certainly lead any reasonable person to the conclusion that the Controller of Customs intends, if possible, to aid in interfering with a certain Imperial Act should such an Act be passed. And the last member who spoke, a member of the Government took this extraordinary ground, that a man may be qualified to occupy a seat in Parliament and be a member of a Canadian Government though disloyal to other parts of the Empire. Sir, in my judgment, there is no territorial limit to loyalty. The man who is disloyal to one part is disloyal to the whole Empire. The one flag which gentlemen opposite so properly revere floats over the Briton in the old land and floats over the Briton in the new, and, if it is proposed to depose Her Majesty from any part of the Empire, whoever makes that proposal is unworthy to hold Her Majesty's commission in any Parliament, be it Imperial or colonial. That is the issue we are face to face with here, not with the merits or demerits of the great question of Home Rule. A measure of Home Rule has been receiving the attention of the people of Britain. The Parliament of Britain, the legally constituted tribunal is dealing with that question and, if it becomes law, it will be only with the sanction of the supreme power of the people and Her Majesty. And when that Bill becomes law, the hon. Controller of Customs proposes, by physical force, to prevent its taking effect and further to separate, if possible, a portion of Her Majesty's Empire from Her Majesty's rule. When that proposal is advanced, the time has arrived for us to say whether Her Majesty should have such an advisor, whether he be an advisor in matters colonial or matters imperial. I would remind hon. gentlemen of the concensus of opinion in Canada when, a few years ago, we had to deal with an emeute among ourselves. When the rebellion took place in the North-west and we were compelled to send up our own volunteers to fight in arms against their brethren, what was the unanimous expression of public opinion, regardless of politics, of nationality and creed? Was it not declared by all: First, restore the majesty of the law; if there are grievances they will be redressed afterwards. There is but one way of redressing grievances under the British flag and that is within the means provided by the constitution. The British constitution will afford the means of redressing any grievance should any arise in connection with the proposed Home Rule measure. Therefore, this House, in refusing to endorse the utterances which have been called in question here, will remove a slur which has been cast upon the loyalty of the people of Canada. Let me invite the attention of the House to the plain proposition that ought not to require lengthened explanation. I ask any hon. gentleman if he is prepared to vote against these propositions?

It is the duty of all Her Majesty's subjects loyally to submit to the law.

Do hon. gentlemen propose to vote against a declaration of that kind?

That the constitution contains within itself the means whereby all grievances may be redressed by constitutional methods.

Surely if grievances arise under the proposed measure, the constitution itself will afford a constitutional means whereby these grievances may be redressed.

That no changes in the law should be brought about by a resort to armed force, to civil war, or other physical force.

In this case it is proposed to curtail the extent of Her Majesty's Empire and to drive her flag from a portion of Ireland. Sir, if that is not treason, I fail to know what treason is. It is not treason of a vague character, but it is treason that has received a statutory definition, both in the old land and in the new. My hon. friend the Controller of Customs would do well if he had profited by the teachings of a great man, much of whose life work is a subject of pride to the hon. gentleman—if he had studied well and digested well the laws passed in the reign of the great and good King William the III., who took precious good care to pass a law dealing with all classes of traitors. Our own statutes as well declare what shall be treasonable, and they assign serious fines and penalties to persons guilty of such an offence. It is not very long since the hon. gentleman himself and other members now present, indorsed the Government and indorsed the law, in taking the life of a citizen because he had chosen to raise an armed insurrection in our land. And, as has been cited by the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), a comparatively humble individual, within the last couple of months, was removed from a position in the service of the Crown because it was said he had given utterance to some treasonable doctrine, or had otherwise manifested his disinclination to live under the British flag. If those in high office can give utterances to such sentiments, where are we to draw the line? If the highest in the land can declare treason against the Empire, on what principle are you going to rebuke humble imitators of those more exalted individuals? Therefore Parliament will be stultifying itself, in my judgment, if it passes this matter over in silence, or indorses it. The moment Parliament indorses this transaction, if it should make that fatal mistake, that moment Parliament forever renders it impossible, in consistency with its own conduct, to repudiate similar utterances and similar threats on the part of others. Under these circumstances I deem it my duty to support the amendment. I can only express my regret that in regard to the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) who, on many occasions, has declared his undying loyalty to the Empire, when it is now put to the test, party pressure is a great deal stronger with him than his convictions of duty as a citizen. I fancy that when he returns to his constituents in West Toronto he will find there will not be the same weight attached to his utterances upon that subject. He will be told that he has openly indorsed upon the floor of Parliament the doctrine that a member of the Government can enjoy Her Majesty's commission, and be her trusted agent, and that he can on the floor of this Parliament give expression to doctrines of treason, and receive indorsement at the hands of the loyal member for West Toronto. I think when that comes to be known, and when he appreciates what he has done, he will regret his vote here to-night. I venture to prophecy that if this House indorses this transaction, it will strike one of the severest blows that has ever yet been struck at the reputation of the people of Canada. I rejoice to know from the language, not only of the mover of the motion, but from others who are well able to speak on the subject, that the Controller of Customs was entirely in error when he purported to say that others would imitate his example. When the hon. member for Ad-dington (Mr. Dawson) declared, as he no doubt declared correctly, that the Loyal Orange Order would in no sense indorse such treasonable utterances, I am sure he gave expression to a sentiment that will find an echo in the hearts of all loyal citizens, regardless of creed and regardless of nationality. I venture to tell the Postmaster-General that he entirely mistakes the issue if he supposes that this is the commencement of a fratricidal war; on the contrary, it is the protest of the representatives of the loyal people of Canada against treason, whether it be found in men in high or low degree.

Mr. McNEILL. It affords me great pleasure indeed to listen to the loud expressions of loyalty which we hear from the other side to-night. It is exceedingly gratifying to find that this spirit has been stirred up in breasts in which, for some time past, we thought, at all events, it had not been glowing to any great extent. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that in reference to the charges that have been brought against my hon. friend the Controller of Customs, an oversight has been made. I have not understood that it was a disqualification for a position in the Government, or a seat in the Cabinet for a man to be Grand Master of the Loyal Orange Order in Canada. If it be not so, I take it that if a gentleman can continue to be Grand Master of the Orange Order of Canada, and at the same time a member of the Government of Canada, his utterances to an assembly of Orangemen must be considered to be the utterances of the Grand Master of the Orange Order, and not a member of the Government. It is quite clear that if he is addressing an assembly of Orangemen, unless he distinctly states that he is not addressing them as Grand Master, but he is addressing them in some other capacity, he must be taken to be addressing them in the capacity which they are in the habit of regarding him as filling, that is, as Grand Master of the Orange Order. Therefore, it seems to me that the remarks my hon. friend made, whether they were right or whether they were wrong, must be taken to have been made in his capacity as Grand Master. He is in that respect in a position altogether different, I take it, from that of an ordinary member of this House, or an ordinary citizen of the country. He is there filling an official position, and in that official position he speaks. It therefore seems to me that those utterances of my hon. friend must be taken in that regard, and in that regard only. So far as the question of loyalty is concerned, I just wish to make this remark, more especially in reference to what fell from the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who said that the Parliament of the United Kingdom was within its undoubted constitutional right in handing over the people of Ulster to a Parliament in Dublin. I wish to make this remark, that it seems to me that Lord Salisbury, the late Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, may be taken by this House, even, as quite as high a constitutional authority as the hon. member for Bothwell. We all bow to my hon. friend's views on constitutional questions; we all realize what a great constitutional authority he is. We believe, notwithstanding, that there are as great constitutional authorities as he is in the Empire, and most people will agree that Lord Salisbury must be considered as good a constitutional authority as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). Lord Salisbury has distinctly stated as his opinion that it is not constitutional to hand over the people of Ulster in this way. I will take the liberty to quote once more for the hon. gentleman's information, the words of Lord Salisbury in this respect. He said:

I am a Tory; yet I cannot accept in all their width the doctrines of unrestrictive passive obedience. I believe the title of both kings and parliaments to the allegiance of their subjects is that those kings and parliaments should observe the fundamental laws and fundamental principles of the compact by which they reign. Parliament has the right to govern the people of Ulster; it has not a right to sell them into slavery, and I do not believe in the absolute restrictive power of parliaments any more than I do in the unrestrictive power of kings.

Therefore, when the hon. gentleman hurled those accusations of disloyalty against my hon. friend and against the Orange Order, and against the Protestants of Ulster, who are undoubtedly, I am afraid, determined if the worst comes to the worst, to resort to the most extreme measures.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. I am afraid it is so. I cannot conceal from myself the fact that I heard when I was in Ireland, but a very short time ago, that there is the greatest fear to be apprehended that if an attempt be made to place the people of Ulster under the control of a Parliament in Dublin extreme measures will be resorted to. Under those circumstances to which I have referred, I do not think my hon. friend or any hon. gentleman has the right to bring these accusations of disloyalty. As to what the Controller of Customs has said, I do not see so far as I can gather that the words can imply that he was offering in the meantime to give active support in the sense of armed assistance. The time has not come when such an offer would be necessary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McNEILL. I shall be very glad.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. He seems to deny the legal right of the Imperial Parliament to legislate on this subject. Does the hon. gentleman hold that that right is not as full and complete as the right of the Irish Parliament in 1800 to hand over the Government of Ireland to the United Kingdom?

Mr. McNEILL. I have no intention to enter into an argument on the constitutional question with the hon. gentleman. That intention never entered my mind. If the hon. gentleman will write Lord Salisbury he will, no doubt, receive an answer to his question; but that is not my position in this House to-night. I have simply quoted an authority, Lord Salisbury, which will carry as much weight as the hon. member for Bothwell, or any hon. gentleman who has been denouncing to-night the action of the Protestants of Ulster. While I do not wish to take up the time of the House or say anything in any way to incite passion in regard to this very painful subject it is only right that I should enter a protest on behalf of the people of Ulster, and on behalf of the Orange society of Canada against the imputations of disloyalty that have been to-night hurled across the floor against them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is a volunteer under his hon. friend.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by a volunteer; but I do know that the hon. gentleman considers himself to be a philosopher, although I do not know whether anybody else does.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have listened with a great deal of attention to the debate on the motion made by the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson), censuring the Controller of Customs for language used in his speech at Kingston. So far as I can understand, the hon. Controller of Customs declined to be categorically catechised by this House, and was willing to stand by his speech as reported. While I do not intend either to endorse or censure the view he has expressed, and my views on this subject are well known, still I am prepared to sustain the position of the Controller of Customs in declining to be catechised by this House for words uttered outside the Chamber. I think the motion is a most unfair and misleading one. It suggests what is untrue and misrepresents the facts of the case. But the Controller of Customs was talking about the question of Home Rule. What he said was this :

What is promised is not only to shake off their allegiance to Great Britain—the bond of love that binds them to the Empire—but to put them, forsooth, under an alien and hostile government. We have their (the Home Rulers') public declaration of what they would do if they obtain power, that they would never cease agitation until the last link that bound Ireland to the British Empire is severed.

Then, having drawn what, in my opinion, is an imaginary and erroneous picture, which he has a right to believe is accurate if he pleases, although I do not agree with him in that view, he then went on to show the feeling that animates the breasts of his friends, in the belief that this picture is a true one. There is not one word that can be twisted into a sentiment of disloyalty to the Empire in the utterances of the hon. gentleman, when the whole speech is taken together and construed as I have read it; I cannot find one word which can lay the hon. gentleman open to the censure which is charged against him in this motion, and which has been enlarged on most extensively by hon. gentlemen opposite in their remarks this evening. While the member for West York declined to subject himself to be catechised by his opponents, yet, when the hon. gentleman, who had hitherto posed as a friend and a presumed supporter of the Government, rose and made the charge, my hon. friend did rise in his place and deny that he had said one word which could be construed, in any sense, into a statement that he would be false to his allegiance, and he proclaimed himself on the floor of this House as a loyal man, a devoted subject of our beloved Queen, and a supporter of the Empire. Having read this speech, having considered that portion which I read to the House, having shown the remarks that were uttered before the remarks were made which form the subject of censure by the motion of the hon. member for Addington, I have no hesitation whatever in voting against that amendment, which I look upon as a catch motion, intended to embarrass the Government and create ill-feeling between the various nationalities and creeds which go to make up the population of this Dominion. I would also draw the attention of my hon. friends to the fact that our honoured leader is absent from this House, that he has gone to fulfil important functions, which he has entered upon at the instance of the Imperial Government, in the interests of Canada, and in the interests of the Empire; that when he went away he left public business far advanced, trusting to the chivalry and courtesy of his opponents, and to the thrice-sworn fidelity of his supporters, and I should like hon. members to remember this, or, at all events, some of those who are disposed to think they are justified in taking a view of this case which is somewhat at variance with the view taken by the Government. I would like them to remember some of the words they uttered when the hon. leader of the Government was on the eve of his departure. There is no question, whatever, about any man's loyalty in this motion. The picture drawn was such that, if true, it might almost have justified a man in forswearing his allegiance, but, even if true—and I am sure it is not true—the hon. gentleman who made these remarks did not adduce from them the statement which would justify the member for Addington (Mr. Dawson) in putting that charge against a brother Orangeman on the Order Paper of this House. I think, Mr. Speaker, that we have sufficiently wasted the time of the House in discussing questions which are not germane to the business of the House, and we had better proceed with our own business and not interfere with the freedom of speech enjoyed by members outside the walls of Parliament.

Mr. HEARN. Mr. Speaker, having been elected to support the Government, I desire, before the vote on the amendment in your hands is taken, to give expression to one or two ideas that present themselves to my mind in reference to it. I think, Sir, that however much we may differ in opinion on the subject before the House, we will differ but very little indeed concerning the fact that a great deal has been said in reference to the matter that is in no way at all germane or pertinent to it. What is involved in the question before hon. members, appears to me to consist mainly of this: Has the hon. the Controller of Customs given expression to sentiments which are unquestionably disloyal and unwarrantable and unbecoming in him as a member of the Government? He has been charged a dozen and more times by hon. members who have taken part in this debate with having done so. He has been charged again and again with having expressed himself seditiously, and he has been invited by his colleague, the hon. Solicitor-General—he was implored, I may say, by that hon. gentleman—to rise in his place and deny the accusation.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman permit me to say that I deny such charges in toto. I never uttered a disloyal sentiment, nor ever thought of a disloyal sentiment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Just explain what you mean by "active aid."

Mr. HEARN. Well, it is very satisfactory to me, and I am sure it must be satisfactory to a great many others, to find the hon. gentleman make that statement. Nevertheless he is reported as having stated, that if those in Ulster to-day who are organizing for a resort to arms in the event of Home Rule becoming law, in the event of the Queen, Lords and Commons of Great Britain and Ireland, approving that the people of Ireland shall be granted that which during nearly the last hundred years they have been agitating and praying for; that in the event,

I say, of the Queen, Lords and Commons of Great Britain and Ireland consenting to grant what the five-sixths of the whole population of Ireland constitutionally demand—that in such an event, a small minority in Ireland, about one-half the population of Ulster, who threaten to resort to arms, shall have, not alone his sympathy and the sympathy of those he represents, but that they shall have as well their “active aid.” Now, I ask what do these words signify? What is the “active aid” of the body whom my hon. friend the Minister of Customs represents? What is the fair logical inference to draw from these words? Active aid! The so-called Unionists in Ulster are subscribing money for the purchase of arms. Their organs say that already orders have gone forth for thousands and thousands of stands of arms, and that they are in communication with officers of the army and navy who will be at their back in the hour of need. With all this before us, what do the words “active aid” mean? If they do not mean that the Controller of Customs and those whom he represents shall be at the back of those people in armed resistance to lawful authority, then I confess that I do not know the meaning of words. Now, Sir, a great deal has been said by many members of this House about the time that has been taken up with this subject. The hon. the Postmaster-General devoted the greater part of his speech to stating how unbecoming it was, and how out of place it was, for us to occupy ourselves with matters relating to another part of the Empire. Well, who is the party to blame in this instance? Is it the hon. the Controller of Customs, or is it those who believe it their duty to avail themselves of their position here to show to all concerned that they are not in consonance with him upon this question? Let me for a moment suppose that the minority in the province of Manitoba, feeling sorely oppressed with legislation there, were to form themselves into an organization, and send forth a proclamation, to the effect that if redress to them were not given by the Government of the Dominion, they would resort to arms. Supposing that were the case, what, I ask, would be thought of the hon. the Postmaster-General, were he to attend a meeting of Catholics in the city of Quebec and express himself in a similar way towards the organization in Manitoba that my hon. friend the Controller of Customs expressed himself at the meeting in Kingston. Would hon. members here think that the time of the House was wasted in taking the hon. Postmaster-General to task in such a case? I do not think they would. I do not think that the hon. Minister of Finance, in such an event, would take the stand in reference to his colleague the Postmaster-General that he has taken upon the question now before the House. The hon. the Minister of Finance likened the present case to that which took place in the time of the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, when the Hon. Mr. Huntington spoke his mind about ecclesiastical influence and action in the province of Quebec. He assuredly said not a word in the direction of destroying them by unlawful means. The cases would bear no comparison at all. No one questions the right, at least I have heard no one who has spoken in favour of this amendment, question the right of the hon. Controller of Customs to express his opinion or to pledge his sympathy in all constitutional ways to prevent the people of Ireland, five-sixths of Ireland's population, getting what, in the opinion of the people of Great Britain and Ireland, they ought to have. The hon. Controller of Customs is fully entitled to say within the law what he pleases on that subject; but he is not entitled to go to the length of saying that if a small minority in Ireland resort to arms, in so doing they shall have the active aid of himself and those he represents. Now, Sir, this is one view of the subject under debate, and one which, I think, as upheld by the amendment, before the House, deserves support. I come now to the point, whether or not all those who will vote for the amendment, are to be considered, as the hon. the Finance Minister and Postmaster-General have thought proper to declare them—unfriendly to the Government. The question was well put by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), when he asked: How can those be considered unfriendly to the Government who will vote for this amendment, when members of the Government itself have declared they will vote for it? The hon. Minister of Finance surely will not say that the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. Solicitor-General are not friendly to the Government of which they are members, for, if I understood the hon. Solicitor-General rightly, he declared that, unless the hon. Controller of Customs would state that he did not mean by his utterances at Kingston what so many members of this hon. House charged him with having meant, he would vote for the amendment. Then, Sir, I submit very respectfully, that the hon. Minister of Finance has not put his friends in their right place upon this question. I have made professions of support of the hon. Premier of the Government, not alone on the eve of his departure from this country, but from the first time I had the honour and advantage of having become acquainted with him, and, Sir, I will not admit at this moment that I am second to any man on either side of the House, or second to any man in this country, in feelings of esteem and high regard for that hon. and distinguished statesman; and, in supporting the amendment now before this House, I deny that I am fairly open to the charge of wavering in my loyalty to the Government which I have been commissioned to come here and support.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have read, I regret to say, with sorrow

the utterances of the hon. the Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace), reported by different newspapers of the province of Ontario, last week. I believe, up to this day, that these reports were ungrounded; but, I am sorry to say, the hon. Controller of Customs has come and asserted in this House that these reports were correct; that not only were the words exactly reported, but that they were justifiable, and that every British subject should entertain the same notions as conveyed in his speech. I am sorry these words were uttered and I enter my protest against such a doctrine and the course followed by the hon. member at that meeting. Such words as these are inexpedient and impolitic. First, inexpedient: had the hon. member any need of giving utterance to such sentiments. Impolitic also, in so far as calculated to stir up prejudices and passions throughout the country. Impolitic again, because calculated to wound the feelings of one of the races of Canada. Not only will these words wound the feelings of the race, but equally those of the three-fourths of our people who sympathize with all the friends of Ireland. I do not deny the hon. member, Sir, the right of opposing Home Rule, it is an open issue. But what I deny him is the right to rouse up the Orangemen from Ontario against the British Crown. What I deny him again, is the pretended right claimed by the Orangemen of Ulster not to submit to Home Rule, and to take up arms, under such occurrence, against the British Crown. What are Ireland's claims to-day? The very claims put forth by Canadians years ago. It is not the dismemberment of the Empire which is looked for, as asserted by the hon. Controller of Customs, but they demand the right for Ireland to bask in the sunshine of liberty and to take its place among civilized nations enjoying a constitutional system of Government. They ask for Ireland, to-day, what we asked for half a century ago, that which our fathers fought and bled for, and which was finally granted them. They ask for Ireland the same rights the province of Quebec formerly petitioned for, and which they now enjoy in their plenitude. I am aware, Sir, that the utterances of the hon. the Controller of Customs will have no effect on the laws which may be passed with regard to Home Rule. I am aware, also, that the Orangemen will not rise up in arms against the British Crown; but assuming that the Protestants of Ontario should lend their active aid to an uprising in Ulster, I believe there would be found in the country a large number of English, Irish and French volunteers, ready to enroll also, not with a view to fight the British Crown, but on the contrary, to defend it against rebellion and sedition. Were the question brought up before the House, only with a view to censure the course taken by the hon. the Controller of Customs, I would have voted in favour of it; but the end in view is quite different. It is not a motion of censure against the hon. member, but a pretext for embarrassing the Government. The motion before this House is a motion of non-confidence. In my opinion, the Opposition are going too far; they cannot get the support of the Conservative party; and I consider it my duty, equally with all the Conservative members of this House, to support the chiefs of the Conservative party. I openly declare that I prefer supporting Sir John Thompson, whom we all respect, rather than supporting the motion of an Orangeman.

Mr. KENNY. Before the vote is taken I desire, with the permission of the House, to make a personal explanation. It will be remembered that, early in the debate this afternoon, I expressed my disapproval of the regrettable and very unhappy language, as I considered it, used by the hon. Controller of Customs at Kingston. I also stated that, inasmuch as in my opinion, at that time, the resolution involved a vote of want of confidence in the Government, I should be compelled to vote against it. Subsequent to my remarks, the opinion has been expressed by some of the older members of this House that the vote does not involve a vote of want of confidence in the Government; and when I consider the action taken by one of the members of the Cabinet and by one of the Controllers, and in the absence of any emphatic expression of opinion from the leader of the House to the effect that the motion does involve a vote of want of confidence in the Government, I feel at liberty under the circumstances to vote for the amendment.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Dawson):

Amendment negatived.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to a statement made in the Montreal "Star" of yesterday. An interview is reported with Sir Charles Tupper, in which he said that the treaty was essentially a Government treaty, which they were obliged to carry through the House or resign. Has the hon. gentleman taken notice of this paragraph and has he information to give the House ?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not taken notice with regard to that paragraph, and do not propose to criticise it.

Mr. LAURIER. Nor to give information ?

Mr. FOSTER. At present time not.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 22nd March, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of the Interior for the year 1892.—(Mr. Daly.)

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 108) for the relief of Annette Marion Goff—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 105) for the relief of John Francis Schwaller—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Dickey.)

Bill (No. 107) for the relief of James Frederick Doran—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Dickey.)

Bill (No. 109) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act.—(Mr. Daly.)

THE PATENT ACT.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 110) to amend the Patent Act. He said: The object of the Bill is to provide for a third copy of the plan being furnished, it being required by the printers for publication in the "Patent Record." Then, it is provided that patents, of which there are a great many, may be signed by the Deputy-Commissioner instead of by the Commissioner. A further provision relates to registration notices. The fee is $2 for a notice, but the practice has grown up of putting four or five different patent claims into one notice, and so avoiding the payment of the fee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SOFT FISH IN LAKE ST. PETER.

Mr. DESAULNIERS asked, Have the Government considered the petition presented last year to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in relation to the taking of soft fish in Lake St. Peter? If not, is it their intention to so modify the stringent regulations forwarded to the fishery overseers as to extend protection to the poorer class of soft fish fishermen? Who are the parties—Senators, members of the House of Commons and others—who have made representations to Government in relation to the said soft fish fishery? What is the date of each representation? Have fresh representations been made again this year again, to Government, in this matter? If so, by whom and on what dates?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Government considered a petition presented on the 11th May, 1892, to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, relative to the taking of soft fish in Lake St. Peter. It was on the 12th May, 1892, referred to a sub-committee of the Privy Council. It was decided to maintain the prohibition against the taking of soft fish. This petition was signed by Senators Montplaisir, and Guévremont: Messrs. Pelletier, Carignan and Desaulniers, M. P.'s, and Allard, M. P. P. Representations have been made this year by the following persons:—Senators Guévremont and Montplaisir, and Mr. F. L. Desjardins, M.P., on 19th February, 1893; Messrs. A. A. Bruneau, M.P., J. H. Leduc, M.P., A. A. Bruneau, M.P., and L. C. Pelletier, M.P., on 14th March, 1893; Mr. Paul Lavallée and others, Ste. Anne de Sorel, on 7th March, 1893; Mr. Joseph Barque and others, Isle St. Ignace, and Rev. V. S. de Carufel, Ste. Angèle de Nicolet, 14th March, 1893. The above petitions have been considered so important that the Government are now considering the subject to see if the said prohibitory regulations should be relaxed or not.

JAMES CLARK.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether James Clark, an extra clerk in the Post Office Department, is or was a resident of Brockville? Is he now, and has he been continuously, engaged in the Post Office Department as extra clerk? What was the date of his engagement? Has he been off work? If so, what time in each year? Is he engaged at present? Has he been at work in Ottawa all the time of his engagement? If not, where was he and in what way employed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. James Clark was a resident of Brockville. He is not now an extra clerk in the Post Office Department. He was first employed in 1889. He was absent from duty in 1890 about fifty-three days. In 1891 he was absent 162 days, for two months of which he received no pay. His mother was for some time dangerously ill and died. In 1892 he was absent twenty-two days. He was at work in Ottawa all the time of his engagement.

STRATHROY INDUSTRIES.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, 1. What is the description of each of the industries established in the town of Strathroy? 2. What are the names of the several manufacturers? 3.

Mr. DESAULNIERS.

What is the number of hands employed in each establishment?

MR. FOSTER.

LIEUT.-COL. AMYOT.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, 1. Whether Lieutenant-Colonel Amyot has resigned as commandant of the 9th Battalion of Voltigeurs, Quebec? 2. If so, why has not his successor been appointed?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Colonel Amyot has tendered his resignation after ten years' command of the 9th Battalion of Voltigeurs, so as to give an opportunity of promotion to the subalterns in that regiment. His resignation has been accepted, and his successor, Colonel Roy, is now virtually in command. There has been some delay in connection with the appointment of a successor, caused by the necessity for examining into certain shortages in the equipment of some companies of the battalion. The matter is now being satisfactorily settled.

COMMANDING OFFICERS OF VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to retire the commanding officers of volunteer battalions having over five years of service as such, with a view to insure the promotion of subaltern officers in the same corps?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The general officer commanding, to whom this matter has been referred, does not think that such compulsory retirement would be in the interests of the force.

SAINTE-ANNE DE LA PERADE POST-MASTERSHIP.

Mr. RIDER (translation) (for Mr. Legris) asked, 1. Is it the intention of the Government to comply with the petitions of the citizens of Ste. Anne de la Pérade by appointing a postmaster in place of J. A. Marcotte, deceased? 2. If so, are they about to appoint the person recommended in the petitions? 3. If not, why not?

Sir A. P. CARON. (Translation.) 1. It is the intention of the Government to appoint a postmaster in place of Mr. J. A. Marcotte, late postmaster of Ste. Anne de la Pérade. 2. The Government have not decided so far which of the persons recommended to them will be appointed. 3. The matter is still under the consideration of the Government.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. BOWERS. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the Finance Minister if the balance of the questions I asked with regard to the manufacturing establishments in the town of Westport is yet in hand?

Mr. FOSTER. I have it here, and I will send it over to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FRASER. I would like to ask the hon. leader of the House when I may expect the returns I asked for some time ago, and which were approved by resolution of the House. I refer to the return ordered last session, about the indebtedness of the Dominion, and the one ordered this session in relation to the fishing bounties in Victoria county, N.S.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make inquiry about these returns.

Mr. LAURIER. I did not observe whether the hon. gentleman has brought down the papers he promised with regard to the treaty with France.

Mr. FOSTER. No, they are not ready yet. They are being prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I suppose they will be down in the course of the day. But I may say that all the important papers, without exception, are down.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 6) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act.—(Mr. Costigan.)

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. CURRAN (for Sir John Thompson) moved second reading Bill (No. 43) to amend the Criminal Code of 1892.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1 of the schedule,

Mr. CURRAN. The first amendment is to section 133, and is to insert the word "indictable" before the word "offence" in the first line. This is to make it uniform with the other sections of the Act.

On section 2 of the schedule,

Mr. CURRAN. It is proposed to amend section 181 of the Code by substituting the word "or" for the word "and" in the second line.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman explain what amendment he intends to effect?

Mr. CURRAN. Under the section as it stands now, mere illicit connection with a child between the ages of 14 and 16 years would not be an offence. There must be an element of seduction, and the object of the amendment is to make that element unnecessary. In future, the element of seduction is not necessary to constitute an offence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not understand the meaning of the amendment. The section reads now that every one is guilty of an indictable offence who seduces and has illicit connection.

Mr. CURRAN. Seduction is unnecessary, as I understand it. It is the illicit connection that creates the offence. If a man seduces a girl, he is certainly guilty; but we go further, and say that if he has connection, meaning that the element of seduction is not absolutely necessary to constitute an offence, I think it is better to put it all in one section than to create two different offences.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I cannot understand how anybody can have illicit connection with any girl, of previously chaste character, without seducing her. If you make this change here, you are going to make, apparently, two separate offences. Now, will you tell me what distinction there is, if there is any?

Mr. CURRAN. If we restrict the matter altogether, as it is done here, an indictment can only take place under this section, where there is actual seduction. Seduction is absolutely necessary to constitute an offence. But by taking out the word "and," seduction is an offence, and illicit connection with a girl of previously good character generally, not a prostitute or anything of that kind, would be equally an offence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will see that the argument won't hold. This section has only reference to a girl of a previously chaste character; it has no reference to any other kind of woman. Under the present law, there is one offence provided for in the section, in seducing and having illicit connection. Now, you are going to sub-divide it and constitute two offences, and I want to know what they are. One is to seduce a girl of previously chaste character, and the other is to have illicit connection with a girl of previously chaste character. I do not understand the distinction. That distinction will exist when we substitute the word "or" for "and," and the court will want to know what the distinction is.

Mr. CURRAN. The distinction as laid down by the Minister of Justice was this :

The section as it stands in this Act is now the law, embodying the provisions of chapter 157 of the Revised Statutes, section 3a, as amended by 53 Victoria, chapter 37, section 3. As the section stands, however, while illicit connection with a child of these tender years, between 14 and 16 would not be an offence, there must be the element of seduction.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will you tell me what is the element of seduction apart from the illicit connection ?

Mr. CURRAN. The illicit connection under the circumstances set forth in the section will alone constitute an offence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This is confined, don't you see, to a woman of previously chaste character. I fancy the object is this : Under the section as it stands now, forcible connection, against the will of the party, would not be an offence under this section at all. Now, under the section, as you are going to make it, it will be. Do you intend that ? As the section stands now, there must be illicit connection with the consent of the party. Here you are altering the section, and after you alter it, illicit connection against her consent would be an offence under this section.

Mr. CURRAN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Now, you are constituting a new offence of rape. If it is against her consent, it must be rape ; if it is with her consent, it is seduction. I understand that under the section as it stands now, a man must seduce and have illicit connection in order to be guilty of the offence ; that is, the illicit connection must be with the consent of the party and not against her consent. If it is against her consent it is rape. Now, you are going to alter all that.

Mr. CURRAN. There is no doubt that if a person has illicit connection with a woman without her consent, forcing her, it is rape ; but I think it is quite clear that the explanation given here makes the law intelligible.

Mr. CHARLTON. Under the proposed section a man cannot have illicit connection with a girl of previously chaste character, without seduction accompanying it. It strikes me that if the words "of previously chaste character" were omitted, the section would read sensibly. How can there be illicit connection without the girl being of previously chaste character ?

Mr. CURRAN. There is no necessity for seduction. Even if the girl consented, and she was under the age named, the man would be guilty ; consent is unnecessary.

Mr. LAURIER. Why is it necessary to leave the word "seduce" in the clause ?

Mr. CURRAN. I dare say the object might be covered without that word ; but, at all events, it is perfectly certain that in case of seduction there is a crime committed. I repeat, that the element of seduction is unnecessary in order to constitute the offence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As the section now stands, there must be illicit connection, with seduction ; and the object of the amendment is to establish that there can be no seduction of a child under fourteen.

Mr. CURRAN. Suppose a man has illicit connection with a girl of that age, even with her consent, he is guilty of the crime specified.

On section 215,

Mr. CURRAN. It is proposed to add to section 215 the words, "unless the offence amounts to culpable homicide." This section renders every one guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment and to being bound over to prosecute for any offence specified in sections 209, 210 and 211, without lawful excuse. The section makes it an indictable offence and punishable with three years' imprisonment to neglect to provide necessaries of life, without lawful excuse, in certain cases. It is considered desirable to add these words, because the section might otherwise be misinterpreted by an ignorant magistrate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is hardly correct to place the responsibility on an ignorant magistrate, when the necessity for this amendment was suggested by a judge of the Supreme Court.

Mr. FREMONT. (Translation.) The amendment suggested by the hon. Minister (Mr. Curran) will not be understood in French, as by following the wording of the amendment, subsection 2 of the section as amended has no meaning whatever.

Mr. CURRAN. (Translation.) The translator will do that.

Mr. FREMONT. (Translation.) The translator cannot alter section 2 if it is not amended.

Mr. CURRAN. (Translation.) The subsection is amended in the English version so as to make the law fairly read. In the Criminal Code, subsection A begins in the middle of a section, instead of beginning by a word giving the meaning of the sentence.

Mr. FREMONT. (Translation.) It is not the same section, it is section 2 that could not be understood.

Mr. CURRAN. (Translation.) A line is added to section 2. Has the hon. gentleman compared it with the Statute ?

Mr. FREMONT. (Translation.) I have the Statute before me.

On section 507,

Mr. DICKEY. I would like to offer an amendment to this section. I want to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that although almost every species of mischief is provided for in this Act, there is nothing with regard to the protection of natural harbours; and where a harbour exists by reason of a bar, if that bar were cut across maliciously or injured in any way, there is no punishment provided for the person who commits the act. This seems to be an anomalous state of affairs, because a harbour might be of incalculable value to the locality and even to the public. I therefore propose the following amendment:—

That section 507 be amended by adding thereto, "as 507a the following:—

"Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding $50, who wilfully and without the permission of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; the burden of proving which permission shall lie on the accused; who removes any stone, wood, earth or other material forming a natural bar to any public harbour or forming a natural protection to such bar."

I may say that damage to artificial protections to harbours are provided for already in the law, but there is no provision with regard to a natural bar. The matter was drawn to my attention more particularly by the case of a harbour in my county where there is a bar in that position, and which is becoming endangered by reason that it is not protected. My wish is that some law should be made in regard to this matter so that the public should be protected. In order to secure conviction under this you would have to prove there was a natural bar to the harbour, or a natural protection to the harbour, and that the injury was done wilfully, and without the permission of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I think that where so important a matter as a public harbour is in danger, it is not unfair that the criminal law should intervene.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he is not using the word "bar" in a special sense. In the case of a bar formed under the water, his provision might prevent a private party dredging it in his own interest. This seems to me to be rather a matter of harbour police than a matter of criminal law.

Mr. DICKEY. I think the hon. gentleman will agree that there should be some protection to harbours formed by bars. I should be very glad to have his assistance in so framing the clause as to attain my object without doing any harm.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As the hon. gentleman's proposition stands, every time a dredge goes to a harbour to remove an impediment, those in charge of it will be committing a criminal offence unless they first get the assent of the Minister of Marine. I would object to this on general grounds. We have made so many things criminal by this Code that unless the hon. gentleman can state that some real grievance exists, I think we should not enact a provision of this kind. If the hon. gentleman knows of cases in which public injury has been committed by people removing these bars, there may be some grounds for the amendment.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). I think there are many such cases on our coasts, where there are long tongues of land or beaches partially covered by stones. These stones are often taken away by vessels for ballast, and in that way the beach is lowered and the harbour destroyed. I know no way of preventing that being done at present. There is no police of any description having control over the persons who carry off these stones.

Mr. CHARLTON. These statements are made in very general terms. There have been no cases cited where any damage has been actually done. It strikes me that the removal of stones and sand will require to be done on rather a larger scale than it can be done by individuals, to injure a harbour. I can hardly realize how a harbour can be damaged by the individual action of a few persons removing a little dirt or driftwood or a few stones from a beach, and it strikes me that the introduction of a clause making that a criminal offence requires more consideration than we have been able to give to this amendment so far.

Mr. DICKEY. There is in Cumberland county a very old and valuable harbour, which is protected by a narrow bar covered by enormous quantities of driftwood which have been washed up by the sea, and have become matted together so as to form a perfectly natural protection of the bar from breaches of the sea. It is the opinion of persons there that if this wood were removed, on the occasion of the first storm, there would be a breach of the sea through the bar, and a destruction of the harbour which could only be repaired at enormous expense to this Government. I have been looking after this matter for three years. The wood has been carried off in thousands of cords to the United States and New Brunswick at $1 a cord.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it public property?

Mr. DICKEY. I suppose it is no man's property. It lies on the bar. The people who carry off the wood are very careless, only seeking their own gain, and I have tried on several occasions to stop them. I have had notices served on them by the Minister of Marine and by the Minister of Public Works, but they have found, what is the fact, that there is no law against them. The people of the neighbourhood are alarmed for the harbour, and I am afraid that this season, if this practice is not stopped, it will be worse than ever.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who owns the soil?

Mr. DICKEY. It belongs to the Crown.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then, they could be prosecuted for trespass.

Mr. DICKEY. That is no remedy. The first difficulty that would present itself would be the question whether the land belonged to the Queen in the right of the Dominion or to the Queen in the right of the province. Then, you might get damages, but you would not be able to recover. An engineer of the Public Works Department has examined this particular bar and has certified to the department that there is serious danger of the harbour being destroyed. I will gladly accept any precaution that the committee think well to throw around a provision of this sort. I see the difficulty, but I think the committee will agree with me that so serious a matter should be dealt with in some way.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is the hon. gentleman certain that the removal of this driftwood is at all likely to destroy the harbour? The tendency of sand-bars is to increase by the action of the sea rather than to be washed away.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). On the Atlantic coast their tendency is to decrease.

Mr. CHARLTON. How are they formed in the first place?

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). They are thrown up from the sea, but it is only when they are formed at the mouths of rivers, which bring down certain deposits, that they increase.

Mr. OUIMET. There can be no inconvenience in this law, because the offence will only be committed when stone, earth or material which is a protection to the harbour is taken away. The essential element will be to take away something which protects the harbour. When a sand-bar forms itself and fills up the harbour, that is not a protection but an obstruction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I was not objecting to the legislation, but it seems to me rather a matter of police than of criminal law, and the wording is very much wider than what the hon. gentleman aimed at. Take the case of Rondeau Harbour. That embraces 5,000 or 6,000 acres, which belong to the Ontario Government, except 400 acres of a military reserve which belong to this Government. Would you undertake to prevent the Ontario Government disposing of the timber upon Rondeau Point, the removal of which would, in the opinion of many, destroy the harbour?

Mr. OUIMET. That would be a subject of negotiation between the two Governments. If it is important that the trees should remain there, they ought not to be removed before giving notice to the department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the hon. gentleman's friends have sold the timber on the 400 acres there which belong to this Government. There is where the principal danger is. I submit this as an illustration of cases that might come within the clause. I am not objecting to the clause, but the phraseology would require to be changed.

Mr. OUIMET. No doubt, if a case of the kind presented itself, the law might be amended, or the Governments come to some agreement, and I do not think there would be any real inconvenience. This matter is, however, pressing. This very important harbour would be utterly destroyed if the cutting of the timber goes on, and then it would cost us over $100,000 to replace that protection.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No doubt the hon. gentleman made a good case for legislation of some kind; but it is just a question whether it would not be better just to legislate specially for the case he has in view, rather than to incorporate in the general Act a section which will cover the whole Dominion and may give rise to many complications. It would be better to introduce a special Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 13 of schedule,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This seems to be important. Will the hon. gentleman explain the alteration.

Mr. CURRAN. It was deemed advisable to amend this section so that it might conform more nearly with section 289, and we think this is about the nearest approach we could get to it.

On section 14 of the schedule,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the explanation of this?

Mr. CURRAN. If the hon. gentleman will refer to section 743 of the Code, he will find that proceedings in error are abolished, and the reference to writs of error in this section, therefore, was an oversight.

On section 15 of the schedule,

Mr. CURRAN. This is in order to make the proper references. Nos. 318 and 361 were the sections in the Bill introduced in 1891 and the corresponding sections in the Act are 320 and 363, but this was overlooked. So this change merely makes the reference to the proper sections.

On section 20 of the schedule,

Mr. CURRAN. Subsection 2 of the section as it stands, provides that, with respect to offences committed before the Act comes into force, the old procedure shall obtain. It is thought better to make the change proposed in the schedule so that the procedure, after the Act comes into force, shall, with the slight exceptions mentioned, in the new subsection, be uniform in all cases. The provision that in the case of prosecutions commenced before the Act comes in force the old procedure shall govern up to the time of committal, is taken from the English code. The object was to give the inferior magistracy time to familiarize themselves with the new statute.

On section 21 of the schedule,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why do you except these two clauses, 16 and 23 from repeal?

Mr. CURRAN. Would the hon. gentleman allow that to stand a few minutes. In the meantime, I move to add to section 540, part 10, "perjury" in clauses 141 to 150, inclusive.

Mr. HAZEN. May I ask the Solicitor-General if that will have the effect of withdrawing cases of manslaughter and perjury from trial before county court judges?

Mr. CURRAN. Yes.

Mr. HAZEN. In our province, the judges of the county court have always had power to try cases of that sort, and I do not believe that there ever has been cause for dissatisfaction. I believe if that power were withdrawn, it would result in inconvenience. Have the Government considered that?

Mr. CURRAN. It has been considered by the Minister of Justice, who wrote me that the change was made at the request of several parties, who were interested in the legislation. I think, more particularly, the Attorney-General of the province of Ontario, and Sir John Thompson agreed to it.

Mr. McLEOD. In New Brunswick it will work serious inconvenience, because in some of our counties we have only one circuit of the Supreme Court during the year, and, in some other counties, two circuits. The result would be that a man charged with perjury, who could not get bail, might be kept in jail for nearly a year. I think we will have to ask the Solicitor-General to except New Brunswick from the operation of that clause.

Mr. McALISTER. In the county of Restigouche, we have only one circuit court in the year, and three county courts, and if that section is put in force, it will cause great inconvenience.

Mr. HAZEN. I agree with my colleagues from New Brunswick. The county court judges have always had a right to try cases except capital offences, and if this section were put in force, a man might be prevented from having his trial for eleven months. The system of allowing county court judges to try all except capital offences, has always given satisfaction. A county court judge is quite as well able to try cases of this kind as a superior court judge. I believe that the law should not be changed except to effect some good purpose, but in this case I think the change in the law would rather cause an injury.

Mr. CURRAN. Under the circumstances, we will allow the amendment to drop.

Mr. MULLOCK. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee, but if this change has to do with the jurisdiction of the inferior courts, I think the time has arrived when the Government ought to look into this whole matter, and propose some measure in reference to it. Take the jurisdiction, for example, of some city magistrates who have the power to try serious crimes, and to send a man to penitentiary for life, without a trial by jury. Such trials take place free from the public gaze, sometimes in the magistrate's private room, and I think, at times, it results in a failure of justice. It is an unwise system, and requires action at the hand of the Government. Magistrates think that they are despatching business, and they get into the habit of treating human liberty with a degree of carelessness that is not conducive to the ends of justice.

Mr. HAZEN. Under what law do they get the right to do that?

Mr. MULLOCK. The Speedy Trials Act.

Mr. McALISTER. It does not give magistrates that power.

Mr. MULLOCK. Certain magistrates have it. They argue in this way. They say that their experience is that prisoners once convicted elect, when they come up again, to be tried by the magistrate rather than by jury. There is an explanation of that. If the prisoner knows that his trial will not go on until the time of the assizes, he prefers, if he expects to be convicted, to have it come on at once, thinking that he will get a short sentence which will run out before the time of his trial at the assizes would be reached. He is sometimes disappointed by the magistrate imposing a longer sentence than he had expected. I think it is an entire mistake to treat the administration of justice in this way. I think that the trial of all except the most trivial offences should take place in open court surrounded with all the solemnities of the law. I am told that the way these trials are usually conducted before magistrates is something like this: The prisoner in the dock is a good many feet away from the magistrate, while the witness-box is close to the magistrate. The prisoner is perhaps not defended by counsel, and the presiding magistrate, who has acquired, as he thinks, great executive ability in convicting, speaks to the witness, who leans over and tells the magistrate something that the prisoner probably cannot hear. Then the prisoner is hustled out and taken away before he knows that his trial is begun, and hurled into a dungeon. That is called British justice. That is no imaginary representation, but on the contrary represents the administration of justice in a very important court of this country at the present time, or within a very short time, and it all arises from what I consider a radical defect in what is called the Speedy Trials Act under which trials can take place "in camera." It is too important a matter to be dealt with in this way. If the Government look into it they will find, to their amazement, how many convictions have been entered by one man not very far from the city of Toronto.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does he sit "in camera"?

Mr. MULOCK. He does not technically; but he does practically. I asked the Solicitor-General, who must have something to do to justify his existence as Solicitor-General, to look into this matter and see when he is told that a magistrate convicted, perhaps, 10,000 persons in one year, whether he could have done justice in all or any reasonable number of those cases.

Mr. DICKEY. I wish to draw the attention of the Solicitor-General to one matter more, that is, the payment of county court judges under the Speedy Trials Act. In Nova Scotia the county court judges have two counties in each district, and practically all the criminal business is thrown upon them, and there is practically no provision made for the payment even of sufficient to cover their expenses. I would ask the hon. Solicitor-General to look into this matter, and see whether better provision could not be made for the payment of these officers.

Bill reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 29) further to amend the Civil Service Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, at this stage I simply want to ask the House to assent to the second reading of the Bill. I do not propose to go into committee upon it at present, because I intend to make certain changes in the Bill which I will now announce. In the first place, provision will have to be made for the changes caused by the creation of the positions of Controller of Customs and Controller of Inland Revenue. In the next place, in the section providing for the creation of a Civil Service Board it is stated that the Supervisor shall be one not previously a member of the Civil

Mr. MULOCK.

Service. The word "previously" should not be there, because there is no necessity of disqualifying any one who may have happened to be in the service previously. Then, subsection "B," referring to the powers of the Supervisor, states:

He shall have general supervision of the inside division of the service, with constant and ready access to all rooms and buildings in which clerks are employed.

That I propose to amend by adding a clause providing that he shall have no control over papers or records or documents on his own authority. Then, with regard to the hours of attendance, if the Bill bears the interpretation which has been put upon it, that it would take away from the Civil Service the Saturday holiday usually granted, that doubt will of course be removed, as it is not the intention to do so. With regard to the fixing of the hours, they cannot be arbitrarily fixed by an Act. It never was intended to apply to the outside service, nor can it, we think, apply by any cast-iron section to the inside service, and powers will be given to the Governor in Council to regulate the hours, according to the requirements of the service, in the departments. There will also be a clause in the Act providing for the cases of old civil servants who have, by practical knowledge and long experience and faithful service, made themselves masters of the routine of their departments, but who cannot be promoted unless they pass the technical examination required. While it is not desired to open the door too widely, it has been considered only fair that in any department, where a public servant has served five years at the maximum of his class, he will be considered fit for promotion, on the certificate and recommendation of the chief officer of the department, without passing the ordinary Civil Service examination. A memorial has been sent by the outside Civil Service principally, asking the privilege to form associations within themselves for their own insurance and benefit, and a provision will be made in this Act to give them the power to do so. These are the changes; they will be printed and may be discussed when I ask the House to go into committee on the Bill.

Mr. LAURIER. This Bill was introduced on the 3rd of February without any word of explanation at all. The Bill provides for the creation of a Civil Service Board. Certain powers are given that board, and more extensive powers are given to the new officer who is to be appointed and called the Supervisor of the Civil Service. Neither on that occasion, when he introduced the Bill, nor on this occasion, has the hon. gentleman given to the House a single word of explanation which would render necessary the creation of this board. He has not stated directly or indirectly, or given the slightest intimation, as to what is the present condition of things in the service which would render necessary the creation of such a board as this. I submit that, under such circumstances the House cannot, with justice to itself and in the proper discharge of its duties, agree in any shape at all to the creation of this new board until some reason is given to show that the present service is ineffective, that more supervision is necessary, and that more officers require to be created who will keep our present staff up to the discharge of their duties. If I understand the Bill rightly, what the hon. gentleman proposes, under the name of the Civil Service Board, is simply a detective agency to look after the Civil Service. Look at section 4 of the Bill, and see what are the duties it is proposed to place upon the supervisor of civil servants :

9A. The Supervisor of the Civil Service, hereinafter called the Supervisor, shall be under the direction and control of the Governor in Council, and his duties shall be as follows :—

(a.) He shall, as hereinbefore stated, be secretary to the board :

(b.) He shall have general supervision of the inside division of the service, with constant and ready access to all rooms and buildings in which clerks are employed :

(c.) He shall report, at such times and in such manner and form as the Governor in Council directs, upon the said division generally, and specially upon its condition, requirements and practical working :

(d.) He shall, whenever directed to do so by the Governor in Council, examine into and report upon the practical working of any part of the outside division of the service :

(e.) He shall perform such other duties of a like nature as are assigned to him by the Governor in Council.

Now, the duties detailed here are simply those of a chief of police. He is to go whenever he chooses into the offices ; he is to go into the cabinet of the Minister, into the room occupied by the Deputy-Minister ; he may visit the rooms occupied by the clerks, and may remain one second or a minute or an hour at his own discretion. At all events, his duty is to see whether or not the clerks are properly discharging their work. I submit, in all conscience, that the Minister, under whom the department may be, or the Deputy-Minister, or the chief clerk of the department, are quite competent to do that. I cannot see what reason can be urged to have an outside officer to see whether the clerks of the Minister of Finance or the Secretary of State or of any other Minister are properly discharging their duties. It seems to me to be absolutely childish that there should be a police officer—because he will be nothing else—going the rounds of the departments of the Civil Service to see whether or not the clerks there are discharging their duties. If the Deputy-Minister, who is responsible to the Minister for the proper discharge of the duties which belong to the department, is not able to know whether those duties are properly discharged or not, if he cannot look after the fifty or sixty clerks under him, he is not fit to discharge the responsibility and duties of his office. Can the hon. gentleman point to any such system where you have to bring an outsider, for I am justified in calling him so, to see how the work is performed ? There are subsidiary duties given to this officer, but they are all subsidiary to this one idea, that the duties of the supervisor are to consist simply of police work within the departments. I look upon this Bill as a new device to put pensioners upon the Civil List, and there is no other reason for it ; and I, therefore, move that the Bill be not now read the second time, but be read the second time this day six months.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have only this to say, that the amendments I have explained are not yet printed, and that my intention in moving the second reading was not to have any discussion, but simply to allow the measure to pass that stage, and then, when these amendments were printed and the whole Bill before the House, we might discuss all the details on the motion to go into committee.

Mr. LAURIER. But I object to the principle of the Bill.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is a different thing.

Mr. CASEY. I am astonished that the hon. gentleman should ask us to go on with this Bill to-day. I asked the hon. gentleman who is leading the House if he intended doing so, and he said not. I agree with my leader in his objection to the Bill passing this stage, as I think we should have a discussion on the principle of the Bill before giving it a second reading. As to the official proposed to be created, to be called the supervisor of the civil servants, my leader has aptly expressed all the objections to such an appointment, and I will not add anything to what he has said. As to the creation of a Civil Service Board to examine candidates for admission, promotion and so on, so far I can go with the Government. But, Sir, I intend, at a later stage, to propose an amendment carrying out more efficiently what one would understand to be implied by the appointment of an impartial and non-partisan board to manage the affairs of the Civil Service. I believe that the conduct of the Civil Service should not be on partisan lines, but that appointments and promotions and other proceedings should be dictated by a board appointed as judges are appointed and as the Civil Service Board in England are appointed, during good behaviour, and not responsible to any political Minister of the day. I believe the service should be conducted on business principles, that appointments, promotions and all other matters connected with the service should be carried on as in a bank or insurance company or any other institution of that kind, and apart from political considerations. On a subsequent occasion, I shall propose an amendment to this effect, but I am not ready to propose it now. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has brought the Bill up to-day, when it was stated that it would not be brought up.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to explain. My hon. friend asked me if it was the intention to bring the Bill up to-day. I said it was not, and at that time I did not think it was coming up. I understood only the resolution was to be taken up. But as I passed my colleague's desk, he explained that he simply wished, as the Bill was to have a great many additions and amendments, to ask the House to read it a second time "pro forma," and he would have the proposed amendments printed before we went into committee, so that the House would have the proposition before them. That is all the hon. gentleman asked. I think he had a perfect right to ask that, in courtesy, and I think the Opposition have been rather curt in reference to a measure which the Government has been considering, and which is not perfected, and which the hon. gentleman who has it in charge simply asked to advance one stage in order that he might get the amendments proposed before the House. I think my hon. friend, in courtesy, should allow the second reading. The hon. gentleman shakes his head and, I understand, says he will not allow it. Then, of course, it will be necessary for us to have a vote upon it. I must say, Sir, without going into the discussion of the Bill, which it was not the intention of the House to do, I think the hon. gentleman ought to have the courtesy to allow the gentleman who has charge of the Bill, what he has asked, as a matter of information to the House and of justice to the Bill.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman's demand is not logical. If I agreed to the principle of the Bill, I would give every facility to perfect it. But we object to the Bill "in toto" and object that it should go any further.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, will my hon. friend allow me a suggestion. If the House wishes to reject the Bill, is it not right to wait, before doing so, until it is in the shape in which it is intended to be placed before the House? The Bill is now imperfect, and the intention is to present a number of amendments. Should the hon. gentleman ask to be allowed to withdraw his motion, he could have the Bill reprinted and have the vote on the reprinted Bill. My hon. friend shakes his head again and says: "No." He is not fair. He does not wish to give the Government an opportunity to present the measure.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The suggestion I make would be, that, instead of taking up the Bill now, the mover should have the Bill reprinted, with all the amendments, so that we will know exactly what is proposed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But they insist upon the second reading.

Mr. CASEY.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). Yes; that is what they are asking.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think it would be better to have the whole legislation before us. The amendment could be withdrawn; the Bill could be reprinted as the Government intend to bring it forward and submit it to the House. If that meets with the views of the hon. gentleman, I think it should be done.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is impossible. The hon. gentleman has submitted the Bill, which has been read once. If he presents the Bill with amendments, it will be a new Bill, and would require to be reintroduced. I am sure many hon. gentlemen remember that a few years ago, when we had before us the Redistribution of Seats Bill, it was reprinted, and the Government offered their reprinted Bill for a second reading, and objection was taken. The Speaker ruled that it was a new Bill. And so it is perfectly clear that if the hon. gentleman wishes to make important alterations in the Bill already read the first time, he must come forward and have these amendments made in committee, or he must ask to have the order discharged and to have a new Bill introduced and thus begin all over again. Now, the hon. Minister of Finance was not dealing fairly in his criticism upon the amendment of my hon. friend beside me. We object to the principle of this Bill; we are opposed to the Bill altogether. Therefore, we cannot permit the second reading. If objection is to be taken to the principle of the Bill, it is upon the second reading that that objection should be taken. If the House agrees to the second reading, it commits itself to the principle of the Bill. I do not admit that this Bill is a proper Bill at all. It is in every way objectionable. It provides a cumbrous, expensive and inefficient system, and I think if hon. gentlemen wish to make an efficient system, they must assume the responsibility of Ministers of the Crown. We know that the executive of the Government is in the hands of the Crown, and the hon. gentlemen, as representatives and servants of the Crown, ought to assume the responsibility of carrying on the executive government of this country with that responsibility to Parliament which exists under our present constitutional system. Now, what do the hon. gentlemen propose by this Bill? Every measure of this sort that has been introduced has proposed to shift from the shoulders of the Government a certain amount of power and a certain amount of responsibility to the shoulders of some subordinate officers in the departments of the Government. When I read over this Bill, I see that there are certain changes which cannot be made "unless and except upon the report of the deputy-head, setting forth the necessity thereof, accompanied by a report." Why should hon. gentlemen undertake to shift from their own shoulders the responsibility of determining whether such changes are required? The deputy is a subordinate of the Minister. If the Minister may require his deputy to make a report upon the constitution of the department—

Mr. FOSTER. It shows the difficulty of discussing the Bill which my hon. friend has declared to be imperfect. The very point that my hon. friend is discussing, is a misprint in the Bill as it stands.
