assume for the purpose of this argument, and only for this purpose, that the taxes average 30 per cent. In that case our taxes on the cotton goods consumed in Canada would amount to considerably over \$5,000,000, and the amount that goes into the treasury is only \$1,100,000. In the case of sugar, of which the hon. gentleman has boasted so much, while I agree with him that the consumption is about 344,000,000 lbs., the tax is $\frac{3}{16}$ of a cent per pound, and though it may be quite true that the refiner was not able to extract the uttermost of his pound of flesh, but the people are compelled to pay at least \$2,000,000 a year for the benefit of the refiner, while only about \$80,000 goes into the public treasury. I take the case of binding twine, which the hon. gentleman has graciously been pleased to reduce from 2 cents to 1 cent. What was the amount of tax last year? It was shown to be $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents, or 25 per cent, on 10,000,000 lbs., meaning a tax of \$250,000 a year, of which the revenue only received \$42,000. I take the case of rice, and in regard to that article his calculations differ from mine. We imported of clean rice about 3,000,000 lbs., and of paddy or uncleaned rice about 20,000,000 lbs. I do not know exactly the loss in the conversion of unclean into clean rice, but all rice consumed in Canada paid $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound, that being the tax on the cleaned articles. That means that the people paid somebody, though not into the treasury, a tax of at least \$250,000, while the revenue received is only \$80,000. I will not dwell on the results of this oppressive system as regards coal oil or iron, which enters so largely into the consumption of all agriculturists, or binder twine; but taking those articles together, the taxes on the four which I have enumerated amount to from \$8,000,000 to \$9,000,000 a year, while all that is received by the revenue is only \$1,250,000. I have paid no attention whatever to the well-known fact that in many of these cases the tax is enormously increased by the middleman's charges. It is well known to everybody that if you put a tax on an article and it passes, before it reaches the final consumer, through two or three hands, the tax is enormously increased. I have left that wholly and entirely out of the question. I have merely called attention to the enormous amount which, under the operation of any protective tariff, is taken out of the people's pockets over and above the sum which goes into the revenue. On most of those articles the taxes are imposed so as to hurt the farmer more especially, and you must remember that over and above this high taxation, over and above the high bonuses given to protected manufacturers, the condition of things is such that almost the whole weight falls on the farmers under the McKinley Bill, because, although it may not benefit the United States consumer, it does injure the Canadian producer. You will find my other statement is perfectly correct, that under the combined operations of these three heavy systems of taxation, taxation for Government purposes, taxation for the benefit of protected manufacturers, and taxation under the McKinley tariff, every acre of land now under cultivation in any portion of Canada is practically subject to a heavy rent. In fact, in many parts of Canada that rent is, I believe, after a careful examination, fully equal to the outside rent that is paid in any part of England for ordinary farm lands. Sir, the hon. gentleman was good enough in a recent discussion to tell us that after all said and done it was really a law of nature, and that people nowadays will rush from the country to the towns, and there is no help for it. In other words, the policy of the Government may be defined as follows: They are aware there is a determination of blood to the head, and it is their policy by overtaxing the farmers, by making agriculture unproductive, to do everything in their power to increase it. That is practically their policy so far as the farmers are concerned. I turn to the manufacturers, the hon. gentleman's special proteges and friends. I am very dubious indeed if the great bulk of the manufacturers, as contradistinguished from a few specially petted interests, have gained anything under this tariff, and I make this assertion boldly. I think there is very strong reason to believe that the great bulk of the manufacturers in Canada would have prospered much more under the revenue tariff of 1878 than under the present system. Sir, those census statistics on which the hon. gentleman relies are essentially, I might almost say, on the face of them, statistics on which no thorough dependence can be placed. The hon. gentleman alluded some time ago to the very large increase in the number of industrial establishments. Well, Sir, that statement had attracted my eye also. I took eleven towns in Ontario which I knew best, and examined the list of industries, or rather industrial establishments which were credited to those towns, and I recommend hon. gentlemen in this House and my friends out of it to pay special attention to this list. I find that in Bowmanville, with a population of 3,377 souls, there were 86 industrial establishments; in Cobourg, with 4,829 souls, there were 83 industrial establishments; in Collingwood, with a population of 4,940, there were 78 industrial establishments; in Napanee, of which I know something, with a population of 3,434, I was happy to learn, for the first time in my life, that it possessed 84 industrial establishments; Oshawa, with a population of 4,066, had 94 industrial establishments; Trenton, with a population of 4,300, had 62 industrial establishments; Whitby, with a population of 2,786, had 92 industrial establishments; Port Hope, with a population of 5,042, had 140 industrial establishments; Strathroy, with a population of 3,316, had 132 industrial establishments; Mount Forest, with a population of 2,214, had 92 industrial establishments; in other words, in all those favoured places under the influence of the National Policy every five, six or seven families had an industrial establishment between them. I believe if the hon. gentleman's census commissioners had counted every tinker, tailor, cobbler, carpenter, blacksmith and sewing girl in all those places they would not have made up the list. When I look at what they call manufactures, if I am to judge from the census taken under the auspices of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1881, although they may be technically correct, there is not the slightest doubt that a very false impression will be created in the minds of the people by the grandiloquent statement that so many hundred millions of dollars worth of articles are manufactured. I have not the details for 1891, although the Minister of Finance may have them, and we will probably receive them in due course; but I have those for 1881, and I desire to call the special attention of the House to the way in which the list of manufacturing industries in Canada was made up. We had \$309,000,000 worth of manufactured articles in that year. Of these there was flour to the value of \$42,000,000; bakeries, \$9,500,000; tanneries, \$15,100,000; boots and shoes, \$13,000,000; sugar, \$9,600,000 (it took 700 hands to produce that value in sugar); meat, \$4,000,000; cheese, \$5,500,000; clothes, \$15,000,000; dressmakers' products, \$5,000,000; hatters' goods, \$3,300,000; carpenters were \$3,900,000, blacksmiths were \$7,200,000, carriage-makers were \$6,500,000, saw mills \$38,000,000, sash and door factories \$4,800,000, printing offices were \$2,700,000—what particular description of manufacture that is, I do not exactly see—paper mills were \$2,400,000, pulp mills \$4,750,000, ship yards \$3,557,000, and shingle mills \$776,000. In other words, out of their \$309,000,000, there were \$202,000,000 which, to say the truth, could have been in no possible respect benefited by the National Policy, or a policy of protection, except, possibly, the single article of sugar. I do submit, that in calling these things manufactures, the hon. gentleman has parted, not, perhaps, from technical accuracy, as his predecessors did, but he most assuredly contributed to convey a very false opinion to the majority of the people as to the extent of our manufactures. I suspect that when these \$470,000,000 of alleged manufactures come to be examined, that you will find in every case as in this, that an enormous mass of these so-called manufactures are hardly things that would be called manufactures at all, and that, in any case, from the very nature of the fact, they could derive no possible benefit, but rather the reverse, from a protective policy. I noticed amongst the \$7,000,000 worth of manufactured goods which the hon. gentleman boasted of having exported, one item for which I give the National Policy full credit. I notice that among these \$7,000,000 worth of goods, there was over \$1,000,000 worth of settlers' goods belonging to emigrants leaving this country for the United States. As to manufactures generally, I desire to say most explicitly, that I neither overrate nor under-rate, nor wish to overrate their importance. Every man knows perfectly well that manufactures must have a place, and a very important place, in any country at all civilized. I have not the slightest wish to underrate in any shape or form the great importance of manufactures, but, Sir, for all that, I contend that the hon. gentleman is wholly wrong in endeavouring to convey to the people of Canada the idea that Canada has special advantages for becoming a great manufacturing country. I say that Canada is, above all, a great agricultural country; next to its great agricultural resources stands its mineral, its lumbering, and its fishing resources, and next after these, and I admit they are very important, come its manufactures. But, Sir, it is not in our time that Canada is likely to become a great manufacturing country, unless some very extraordinary scientific discovery occurs, and unless the conditions of manufacturing are totally altered, the very circumstances in which we are placed would appear to forbid it. Neither in age, nor climate, nor in density of population, nor from our products, nor our geographical situation, do we possess the advantages for becoming a great manufacturing country which other nations possess, and the Government, I believe, have been doing a very ill service to the manufacturers of Canada, by inducing many men to embark their capital and to risk their whole fortunes in manufactures for which this country was not well suited. There are manufactures which Canada might develop to an enormously greater extent than it has as yet done, and were the United States markets once thrown open to us, and were there free trade from one end of this continent to the other, I would look to see very great development of very many important industries in Canada. As it is, Sir, we resemble men who, having an inexhaustible gold-field at their feet, have chosen to devote themselves to the manufacture of artificial flowers, or, to borrow a metaphor from the hon. gentleman opposite, we seem to be at the present moment like men who, possessing the finest and most fertile wheat region of the world, choose rather to grow oranges in hot houses than to devote themselves to the proper exploitation of the soil. What are the remedies which are offered by us on this side of the House? The hon. gentleman desires to know our policy. I will tell the hon. gentleman what has been our policy from first to last. Our policy from first to last has been to destroy this villainous protective system which has been grinding out the vitals of the people of this country. I do not care in what particular way the reptile is destroyed. I do not care whether it is cut off by the head, or the tail, or in the middle; I do not care whether it is by free trade positive or absolute, or by revenue tariff or continental free trade. I wish to see my people redeemed from the degrading slavery which a few political and commercial knaves imposed upon them. With respect to free trade with the United States, we have had some very remarkable admissions from these hon. gentlemen opposite. A few years ago they were constantly telling us that there was no possibility of obtaining reciprocal trade with the United States; but a few weeks ago the Premier of this country admitted in Toronto, that there was no difficulty whatever in obtaining reciprocity with the neighbouring republic. It follows, Sir, that when I first proposed that measure five years ago, Canada might have had reciprocal trade, if the Government had chosen to work for it; Canada to-day might have had 500,000 people which she has lost since that proposal was rejected, and Canada might also have doubled or trebled her trade with the United States, but these hon. gentlemen opposite would have none of it. Had they been honest in this matter, had they stuck to their original declaration, had they adopted and stood fast by the policy which the Finance Minister himself declared when I first brought forward this matter in 1888, why, Sir, then I would have said, that at least they have the credit of consistency. But what has their course been? When in 1888 I proposed that we should open negotiations with the United States, they refused deliberately, on the ground that they would make no effort whatever to have free trade with the States, unless they could secure the interests of the protected few. When in 1889 I repeated that motion I was met with a direct negative, and in 1890, as the House knows, when the motion was again proposed, Mr. Colby was good enough to blurt out the truth that the Government did not want anything to do with it, and that the Government did not even believe in the exchange of natural products. Now, Sir, what are we to say of the miserable falsehood which preceded and followed the elections of 1891, when these hon. gentlemen opposite dared to go to the country under the pretense that they required the mandate of the people to enable them to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States, which they had not the remotest idea of honestly attempting to do? Has the House forgotten the humiliation to which Sir Charles Tupper was subjected when over his own head, he was obliged to report to the Government of Canada that he had to proceed with Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British Ambassador, to the presence of Mr. Blaine, and there humbly to recant all that he had said to the people of Canada as to the alleged invitation of the United States Government to come and treat with them? Do they remember their whole conduct since 1886? What has been their policy as regard the United States? Their policy has been to snarl and to run away, their policy has been to bluster and to cringe, and I, for one, felt humiliation when the Finance Minister, rising in his place, told us that he, the Finance Minister of Canada, had to appeal to Mr. Blaine, the Premier of the United States, to be instructed in what way he might raise taxes out of the people of Canada. I, for one, reaffirm my position. I say clearly and distinctly that as matters stand to-day in Canada—although it need not have been so, and although it was not always so—no great development is possible unless in some form or shape, either by the voluntary good-will of the United States or by a reciprocity treaty, the markets of the rest of this continent are thrown open to us. I say, Sir, that that condition is fixed for us by geographical considerations. I do not mean to say that we cannot enjoy a moderate prosperity without; but I do say that after the chances which Canada has thrown away, as in 1867, when she entered on the race of national existence, with extraordinary advantages over the United States, and which were thrown away by the folly of the Government of the day, and afterwards, in 1878, when we had pretty well extricated ourselves from the effects of the villainous improvidence of preceding Administrations—I say, Sir, that after throwing away those chances, it is no longer possible for us to hope for any great development of the really great resources which Canada possesses unless it is through obtaining access to the markets of the United States. But, Sir, although we may not be able to obtain that; although I am perfectly willing to own that the conduct of the Government of Canada for the past seven years has been such as to put a great impediment in our way; although there is no doubt that, from first to last, whether under Cleveland or under Harrison, they have so conducted themselves as to become objects of just suspicion to the American Government; yet I say that there is a good deal that still remains for us to do. We can reform this system. We can, beyond all doubt, if we choose, grant a great and permanent relief to the people of this country. We can reduce the taxation which now presses upon them. I am not now discussing what is abstractly the best; I am simply discussing what is the best possible. I say it is right that time and due consideration should be given. I say, although this is a case, not of cutting away mouldering branches, but of cutting down the entire Upas tree, it is right and proper that the bystanders should be duly warned. It is true that the Government have made reciprocity with the United States in their time and by them quite impossible; but there is no doubt that the tariff which we now have to deal with is a tariff vicious in the extreme. It is not merely a tariff under which great waste and huge extortion are perpetrated. It is a tariff that sins in every possible form. Now, what are the universal notes or marks of a good system of taxation? I will tell the hon. gentleman. A good and honest taxation will take as little as possible out of the pockets of the people beyond what goes into the treasury. A good and honest taxation will be uniform in its operation on all classes and sections; it will spare the necessaries of life; and, although this is a lesser matter, it will take the taxation in such a way as to cause as little inconvenience as possible. Now, Sir, what is the character of the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite? By means of it they take twice as much out of the pockets of the people as goes into the treasury. They so arrange the taxation that it is specially unfair and unjust to the poorest classes of the community, specially unfair and unjust to the great consuming classes of this country, and sometimes specially unfair and unjust to the inhabitants of one section as compared with another. They tax food, fuel, light, clothing, the means of knowledge. Sir, there is another and further thing; this system of tariff protection, as instituted by them, has this further evil in it, that it practically organizes corruption. It practically makes it the interest of a large class of business men in Canada, controlling large sums of money, when appealed to by the Government, and especially when the hon. gentleman, as he now proposes to do, goes around the country taking their views and ascertaining what they will pay rather than have a particular tax abolished—it makes it their special interest to keep a corrupt Government in power if only that Government will give them the power of plundering the people in return. There is one fault in this system of taxation which requires particular attention. The whole system of specific duties levied by the hon. gentleman is distinctly bad. In the first place, it disguises the amount of the taxation; in the next place, the tax is always relatively increasing. Just as fast as scientific discoveries enable goods to be cheapened in price, a specific tax rises relatively in proportion. But the chief and greatest offence against good government is that such a tax invariably discriminates, and heavily discriminates, against the poorest consumer. I have taken a few cases, and only a few, to show the extreme injustice wrought by the present system. I take ordinary cottons, which are taxed 2 cents a yard and 15 cents ad valorem, or 55 per cent on the lowest grade consumed by the poorer classes, and only 30 per cent on the high grades, consumed by the wealthier classes. On the low grades of blankets consumed by the poor there is at least 50 per cent against 30 per cent on the higher grade. On shirts there is 60 per cent on the low grades against 25 per cent on the high grades. On rough coatings there is 60 per cent on the low grades against 25 per cent on the high grades. On oil-cloth there is 80 per cent on the low grades against 25 per cent on the high grades. On wall paper there is at least 100 per cent on the low grades against 30 per cent, and even considerably less, on the high grades. Sir, I have always believed, and I will make the hon. gentleman a present of the statement, that in a true and sound system of taxation, the object of the Government should be so to equalize matters, that as many days' income should be taken from one man as from another, with this very important qualification, that incomes which are so small as not to do more than supply the recipient with the necessaries of life, should not be taxed at all. Sir, I advise the hon. gentleman, if he desires to have before him a true ideal system of taxation, to work towards that end, and I tell him that huge accumulations, under any circumstances, ought to be discouraged by wise statesmen; they are politically and socially dangerous. I tell him that it is his duty, and the duty of the Government, to do all that lies in their power to restrain combinations and corporations of every kind—to see that all these bodies, which derive their existence from us, are kept in their proper place as servants of the state and not masters, as too many of them seem to be. There is no doubt, also, that, under the hon. gentleman's policy, the cost of living in Canada has been enormously increased. It may not be in his knowledge, but it is in mine, that in the case of men possessing moderate incomes it is possible to-day to live in greater comfort in England at barely two-thirds of the expense that is necessary here. That is partly due to the natural condition of things here. In a climate with such extremes as ours, there is no doubt that living is, in many respects, more expensive than in more temperate climates. But the fact remains that, whereas, a comparatively short space of time ago, Canada was a cheap place to live in, under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite it has become a decidedly dearer country than England, and, I fear, in many respects, a dearer country than the United States. Now, I said awhile ago that one result of the policy of the Government had been, beyond all doubt, enormously to aggravate the exodus from this country, and I added, and now repeat, that there is one result of that exodus which has not been entirely or properly appreciated by our people. Sir, you cannot go on for many years, from year to year, driving away the very choicest part of your population without doing a great moral as well as physical injury, and I believe that the statement made some years ago by Mr. Leckie on this subject, in dealing with another country, well known to most of us, may be literally and properly applied to Canada. In speaking of the effect of the emigration from Ireland, he used these words. The examples he refers to are the Irishmen who have distinguished themselves abroad:

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

These examples might easily be increased, but they are quite sufficient to show how large a proportion of the energy and ability of Ireland was employed in foreign lands and how ruinous must have been the consequences at home. If, as there appears much reason to believe, there is such a thing as a hereditary transmission of moral and intellectual qualities, the removal from a nation of tens of thousands of the ablest and most energetic of its citizens must inevitably, by a mere physical law, result in the degradation of the race. Nor is it necessary to fall back upon any speculations of disputed science. In every community there exists a small minority of men whose abilities, high purpose, and energy of will, mark them out as in some degree leaders of men. These take the first steps in every public enterprise, counteract by their example the vicious elements of the population, set the current and form the standard of public opinion, and infuse a healthy moral vigour into their nation. In Ireland for three or four generations such men were steadily weeded out. Can we wonder that the standard of public morals and of public spirit should have declined?

But not only were the healthiest elements driven away: corrupting influences of the most powerful kind infected those who remained.

Sir, placè Ireland for Canada, and you will have a very excellent illustration of what the policy of this Government for the last fourteen years has been employed in effecting. Sir, in the early part of the eighteenth century, to which these words refer, it may have taken five or six decades to do what, under existing conditions, has been done in Canada in ten or twelve years. And one of the chief counts I make against the policy of which these hon. gentlemen are so proud, is that, from first to last, the inevitable tendency of their policy has been to organize political corruption of the very vilest kind. The danger is vastly increased in such a country as ours by the exportation of the best of its youth, so that, while the danger increases, the resistance to it is diminished. In the United States it is different. There, whatever be the evils of their policy, at any rate the youth of the population remain, and it is to that fact very largely the success of the American people in emancipating themselves, as they have done, from the shackles of protection is to be ascribed. I have not time to-night to review our scale of expenditure. I will simply say that our general scale of expenditure for a population of 5,000,000 is monstrously extravagant. Our clothes are far too big. They were cut out for a population of 20,000,000 or 30,000,000. I need look no further than the benches opposite to illustrate this. What possible use can there be in a country like Canada for a Cabinet of fifteen Ministers, besides the Deputy Ministers? Why, Sir, 50,000,000 of people might be administered with the same staff. Look at the cost of administration and legislation. We have practically $14,000,000 to expend, exclusive of charges for collection of revenue and interest, and it costs us every year $2,000,000 to spend that amount. Turn to our Estimates, and review the number of clerks these gentlemen require. In Mr. Mackenzie's time, to do the same work, his Cabinet only required 480; hon. gentlemen opposite employ 826, and a whole regiment of extras besides. The hon. gentleman spoke very lightly of the consequences to Canada of the United States revising their tariff. I cannot agree with him there. If the United States do very largely reduce their tariff they will very largely cheapen the cost of living in that country. They will very largely cheapen the cost of production. The

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

United States farmers have to-day a very great advantage over ours in many ways. They get more for what they produce, and with the single exception of the article of woollen clothing they are enabled to purchase what they require at much lower rates, and even if we are fortunate enough to get our raw products admitted free, we will still be comparatively at a serious disadvantage compared with them. What is the part of true statesmanship, and what would be wise policy under such circumstances? Not, as these hon. gentlemen are doing, looking to Washington, and waiting until they know exactly what the United States are going to do before they proceed to bring down their tariff and announce their policy; but to anticipate the Americans, to give Canada, if they can, a little start; to give Canada the advantage of being made comparatively a cheap country to live in, which it is in their power to do by a reasonable and prompt readjustment of the tariff. Now, I have briefly to say this: I, for my part, indict the present policy of the Government, and I indict its present tariff on all counts. I say it is radically false in theory, and vicious in principle. I say that it is in the highest degree an unjust and an oppressive tariff. I say that it is most eminently unsuited to the genius and geographical position of the people of Canada. I say that it is in the highest degree an unjust and of the people, and that it discriminates against special sections. Practically, these hon. gentlemen reverse Robin Hood's good old rule, for whereas Robin Hood robbed the rich for the purpose of bestowing gifts on the poor, they rob the poor for the purpose of bestowing gifts on the rich. I say that these hon. gentlemen and their tariff are very largely responsible for the fact that a million of the best blood of Canada are now exiled in the United States. I say that their tariff directly fosters extravagance, that it is a veritable hot bed of corruption, that it debases and enslaves and is fast emasculating our people, and I say that we have no chance whatever of ever developing Canada, as it should be developed, until this thing is utterly and completely reformed, root and branch. And that there is no mistake about our intent and our policy, I move:

That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"it be Resolved, That the present Customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly upon the great consuming classes of the Dominion and should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of freer trade, and that the amount of taxes collected be limited to the sum required to meet the necessities of the Government efficiently and economically administered."

Mr. HAGGART moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will ask the consideration of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to a proposition that the debate just adjourned be continued from day to day and have precedence over all other business except questions to be put by members.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I, for my part have no objection. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) is absent, and I would be better pleased if the First Minister waited until he were here. Still, I think I may say that there is no objection.

Mr. DAVIN. If the Prime Minister will permit me—probably the motions on the Paper that would lead to no discussion might be taken on the private members' day?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We can agree to that afterwards, I presume. I move:

That the adjourned debate on the motion for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto, be made the First Order on Thursday next, after Questions put by Members, and on each subsequent day until concluded.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 16th February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Western Counties Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to the Yarmouth and Annapolis Railway Company.—(Mr. Mills, Annapolis.)

Bill (No. 39) to incorporate the Ocean Accident Insurance Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 40) to incorporate the Canada North-west Land Company, Limited.—(Mr. Denison.)

Bill (No. 41) to incorporate the Eastern Trust Company.—(Mr. Stairs.)

REPRESENTATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 42) to amend the Representation Act. He said: This is a short Bill which I introduce for the purpose of amending the Representation Act of last session in certain particulars which are of a clerical character, and which merely relate to the correction of the boundaries without making any change in any of the principles on which the Act was founded. The first section is more accurately to define the boundary lines of the electoral district of Nipissing. It enumerates the parishes, and gives the boundaries with more technical accuracy. The second section is to correct an error in respect to the city of Ottawa. While the Bill was in committee, the committee adopted a section stating that the electoral district of the city of Ottawa should consist of the city of Ottawa, &c. &c., the limits of which had been changed since the passage of the previous distribution Act; but the law clerk, in placing the section, placed it as a paragraph to a section which provided that the places thereafter mentioned should return one representative. This would have had the effect of depriving the city of Ottawa of one of its members. Therefore, we provide that the city of Ottawa shall consist of the city of Ottawa, except that part thereof known as New Edinburgh, and shall return two members. Then there is an amendment substituting the word "east" for the word "west," in order to correct an error in respect of the boundary of one of the new districts of the county of Ottawa. In the next section we correct a mistake in respect to the electoral district of Hochelaga, providing that it shall consist of the towns of Ste. Cunegonde, St. Henri and Cote St. Antoine, and St. Gabriel ward of the city of Montreal. The Act of last session describes Cote St. Antoine and St. Gabriel as being wards of the city of Montreal, whereas St. Gabriel only is such. There was a parish left out in the description of Rouville and also in that of the electoral district of Bagot, and in Provencher some of the rural municipalities were left unenumerated.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman explain what is the technical error which he intends to correct by his amendment in the district of Nipissing?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I can describe it in a general way by saying that the description in the Act of last session did not suit the amended boundaries of the province of Ontario.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE CRIMINAL CODE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 43) to amend the Criminal Code of 1892. He said: Some of the errors it is intended to rectify are errors in printing, such as the numbers of sections, &c., which are referred to in other sections. There are also some clerical errors to be corrected. It is also intended to give the correct name to the quarter sessions of Ontario, because in one section that is described as general quarter sessions or general sessions. There is one other change, and one more important. We reduced certain specified offences to offences punishable with five years imprisonment, and in a general clause as to unenumerated offences of the same character, they were left with a punishment of seven years. The latter should be reduced as well as the former to five, so that they will both fall into the same class, as they were misdemeanours formerly. If left open to the larger punishment the procedure would be somewhat different, especially in the matter of challenges. The only change from the policy of the Act which I will ask the House to consider, is the section containing the provision that in the case of any offences committed before the Act came into force, the procedure should be the old procedure. That is, any offences committed before the 1st July, 1893, should be tried according to the procedure as it now exists. It is eminently expedient that the procedure should be uniform. Some years may elapse before some offences committed before the 1st July next will come to trial, and it would be inconvenient to have to ascertain, when they come to trial, what the former procedure was.

Mr. EDGAR. I would ask the hon. gentleman if the House is going to receive some valuable information which, we see by the newspapers, has been communicated to the hon. gentleman on the subject of the Criminal Code by one of the judges of the Supreme Court? If such a document exists, it is very important that the Government should lay it upon the Table, especially as we are going to legislate upon the Criminal Act of 1892.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection to communicate to any hon. gentleman the letter referred to from Mr. Justice Taschereau. I did not receive it more than anybody else. It is one of those documents called an open letter, given to the public and not to the individual to whom it is ostensibly addressed. The observations it contained as regards the policy of the Act, were not overlooked. The subject was well considered by the joint committee, and the views of the learned judge are contrary to the professional opinion of both Houses of Parliament, and utterly condemned by nearly every judge of the United Kingdom who has expressed an opinion on the subject.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

U. S. QUARANTINE REGULATIONS.

Mr. TAYLOR asked, Will the quarantine regulations adopted by the United States against Canadian cattle affect or prevent our Canadian cattle being shipped direct to the World's Fair, at Chicago? If so, as we have no pleuro-pneumonia disease in our Canadian cattle, does the Government intend withdrawing from the exhibition altogether?

Mr. FOSTER. I may say that information was received yesterday by the Department of Agriculture, by which it will be seen that regulations will be made by which Canadian cattle may be exhibited. It will be necessary for intending exhibitors to notify this department and obtain permit before shipment. They must give numbers and description of cattle, and show a statement of where they have been a year previous to shipment, and accompany this by a certificate of a Canadian veterinary inspector that no contagious disease has existed in respective localities. On arrival they will be subject to inspection by a veterinary surgeon of this department.

THOMAS J. WATTERS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, 1. Date of appointment of Thomas John Watters in Customs Department, also salary in 1891, 1892 and the present year? 2. Is he still an employee of the Customs Department? 3. Has it been brought to the notice of the department that he is engaged in business with a view to derive profit therefrom? 4. Has the Governor-General in Council given his express permission allowing said T. J. Watters to engage in trade with a view to derive profit therefrom? 5. Has any person or persons during November and December, 1892, made charges against said T. J. Watters? 6. How often has said T. J. Watters been absent from his departmental duties without leave since March, 1891, up to 9th February instant? 7. Does he have to report each morning and sign the register the same as other clerks; and if so, how often has he not done so, and has any notice or action been taken of such neglect? 8. What action does the department propose to take in reference to the charges made against Mr. Watters?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Watters was appointed 1st July, 1869. His salary in 1891 was $2,200. His salary in 1892 was $2,250 up to March, 1892; it was $2,800 after that date. His salary for current year is $2,800. In answer to second question, yes. In answer to third question, yes. In answer to fourth question, no, such permission has not been asked. Fifth question, yes. Sixth, there is no record against Mr. Watters of any absence without leave from March, 1891, to 9th February instant. Seventh, Mr. Watters has not reported each morning or signed the register the same as other clerks, and has not been expected to do so. Eighth, No action has yet been taken, but at the close of the session I shall take up the complaints and give the same careful consideration.

MR. GASTON P. LABAT.

Mr. BRODEUR (Translation) asked, How long has Mr. Gaston P. Labat been employed in the Montreal post office? What are his duties? Has he passed the Civil Service examinations? Of what origin is he? On whose recommendation was he appointed? Is his position temporary or permanent?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I beg to state that Mr. Labat was temporarily employed as letter carrier in Montreal, from the 7th to 31st December, 1892, at $360 per annum. He has not passed his Civil Service examinations, and so could not be continued in the service of the Government. Since the 1st January last, he is employed temporarily as labourer in the post office. He is of French origin. He has lived in Canada for several years. He was sergeant-major in "B" battery and served during the trouble in the North-west. He was recommended to me by several persons who were acquainted with him.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to point out a very gross misrepresentation in the "Empire" with regard to myself. In the "Empire" of 15th February we have this statement:

Mr. Davin's "ideal protection" is not exactly what this country wants. Practical, useful, serviceable protection is what it requires.

If, Sir, I had only referred to ideal protection and then gone on to speak of some other subject I should have allowed that paragraph to go as the emanation of a—however, I shall not name the animal, because he has long ears and he might hear me and he might not think the metaphor complimentary. But, Sir, I will show that it was a gross and wilful misrepresentation. What I stated was this:

There must, therefore, if you have a protective policy, be an ideal tariff which you must seek. There must be a tariff, moving along the lines of which you will give that protection to native industries which will foster them and keep them healthy, and at the same time protect the people from the grasping policy of the manufacturer, protect the people from being mulcted in the goods they buy by being made to pay more for them than they ought. Any man, looking over the existing tariff and carefully comparing it with the tariff of 1883 in the United States, or 1890, or with the tariffs in Europe, or comparing one part of our own tariff with another part, cannot fail to come to the conclusion, that if we are to have a fairly good protective tariff—because that is all, I suppose, in practical affairs we can have, an ideal, a perfect tariff being so difficult to frame as to be really an impossibility—our present tariff needs very thorough and careful revision.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, in the very sentence, or in the very context, where I used the phrase "ideal protection" I stated that I did not think the ideal was possible of attainment, but I contended that, if we were to have that practical and serviceable tariff which is the only tariff any practical man desires, we must aim at an ideal tariff. The only way a man can explain that paragraph in the "Empire" is this: that the people on the "Empire" think that, if any member of the Conservative party shows the least evidence that he has a brain that will think for itself or a particle of independence, this paper has a right to either belittle him in one case, or bludgeon him in the other, and I say it is in the interest of the Conservative party that I should—

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to call the hon. member's attention to the inconvenience of entering upon a discussion of this nature. It is quite permissible, by the acquiescence, by the indulgence of the House to deny improper or imperfect reports that may be made in the newspapers, but I think it would be very inconvenient to enter into a discussion of the reasons that actuate a newspaper.

Mr. DAVIN. I am always most deferential to the Chair, so I will be guided by you.

THE PRINTING BUREAU.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that a very great inconvenience to members has resulted from not receiving the Budget debate which took place the day before yesterday but which was not printed yesterday afternoon. I cannot understand why it was found necessary to suspend operations in the printing department, thus preventing members from receiving the report of the speech of the Finance Minister and the reply of the hon. member for South Oxford. If we are to discuss the important matters contained in the Budget debate, it is highly desirable that the report of that debate should be in the hands of members as soon as possible, but because the Printing Bureau suspended operations yesterday this report has only been put in the hands of members a few moments ago. I would draw the attention of the House to the report adopted last session. If the hon. Secretary of State, under whose department the Bureau is conducted, will turn up the Journals of the House of last session, he will see there the report adopted on the 2nd of July, clause 3 of which reads as follows:—

The printing shall be performed daily on such size of sheet as may be directed; and shall contain the speeches which shall have been delivered at the previous sitting of the House, and these shall be published as reported, in the language in which they are delivered. The said sheets to be delivered at the Distribution Office by 3 o'clock p.m., after each sitting.

I contend that the postponement of the printing of the Budget debate is in direct violation of that report, which was submitted to this House on the 2nd of July last and was adopted by this House. I would like to know on what grounds the bureau was allowed to suspend operations at such a very important juncture as the delivery of the Budget Speech, the report of which it is so important to have promptly in the hands of members.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Knowing that this subject would be brought up to-day and some information required, I sent to Mr. Dawson for an explanation, and I am sure the hon. member will accept the explanation he has given me for the House. Mr. Dawson says he has found difficulty in arranging for the work on holidays such as yesterday, and he admits making the mistake of thinking that, this being a holiday in all the departments, his also would follow the same rule. But he says that on reflection it was a mistake on his part and one which is not likely to occur again. In view of that fact, I think the hon. gentleman will accept for this time the explanation.

WAYS AND MEANS--THE TARIFF.

House resumed the debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, before replying to the criticisms of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) on the speech of the Finance Minister, I may be permitted to offer my congratulations to my colleague, the Finance Minister, on the splendid speech he has made to this House, and on the splendid statement which he has made, showing that without increasing the expenditure of this country and without increasing the indebtedness of the country, great development has taken place in the form of public works and by assistance rendered to public works from one end of the country to the other. I congratulate him upon his presentation of the evidences of increased prosperity, as shown by the savings banks, by the trade of the country, by the reduction of insolvencies, by the deposits in the banks and by the banking loans and discounts, evidences taken by every person in the country as sufficient to prove our general prosperity. I shall not enter into detail of these items at present, because, in my criticism of the speech of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), I shall have to deal with them more fully as they come up. The hon. gentleman prefaced his speech with some personal reflections upon my hon. friend the Finance Minister. He started out by saying that he was a professional philanthropist; and he quoted from some remark of the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald when he formed his Cabinet, to the effect that in the formation of his Cabinet he always chose two or three professional philanthropists for the purpose of appeasing public sentiment, and bringing up the average of the Cabinet. He stated further, in reference to the professional philanthropists, that they were apt to part with so much virtue in their peregrinations throughout the country, that there was very little left of them but a few immoralities. I suppose at that time the hon. gentleman from South Oxford was a candidate for a position in the cabinet of the right hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I take the trouble of telling the hon. gentleman that he knows that is not true.

Mr. HAGGART. Well, the hon. gentleman was at least a waiting candidate; I suppose that in the eyes of the right hon. gentleman at that time, he did not possess the balancing qualities which entitled him to a position in the Cabinet. If the hon. gentleman is remarkable for anything, he is remarkable for being the antithesis of a professional philanthropist. He excels in distributing throughout the country speeches of a vitriolic character, predicting blue ruin; and considering the amount of this literature with which the hon. gentleman has drenched the country, I should suppose that nothing but the virtues were left in him now. I suppose if the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald was alive now and wished to form a Cabinet, there would be enough virtue in the hon. gentleman now to entitle him to a seat in a Tory Cabinet. He stepped quickly down from that subject to what he calls the most infamous piece of legislation that was ever perpetrated in a free country, the National Policy, the result of which he has so graphically described time and time again in this House. Now let me give you a little history of the National Policy. When the Conservative party came into power in 1878, they found a deficiency between the revenue and expenditure; they found that the country had been getting into debt. In fact, since the departure from power of the Conservative Government in 1873, the indebtedness of this country had been increasing from year to year, and when the Conservative party came back to power they propounded this National Policy, in 1879. What was the effect of it? There was no longer any deficiencies. The country was able to meet its expenditure from year to year, manufactures were fostered, and the country became prosperous. The result was that after a certain number of years we were able to keep our young men at home by employing them in manufactories, thus increasing the population of the country, and preventing the emigration of many who would otherwise have gone to a foreign country. In the course of ten years, from 1882 to 1892, the Conservative Government were able to take off imposts from the people of this country which, if they had been collected, would have amounted to nearly 24 millions of dollars; besides that, they placed upon the free list goods which, under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, paid a duty, placing 113 articles more upon the free list than were upon it between 1874 and 1878. I may state that that is still the policy of the Government at the present day. The National Policy in this country has tended to the development of the country; has enabled us to make the tariff reforms which we intend to make; it has created a large class of manufacturers, in addition to the mining, agricultural and fishing industries which existed before, and the trade of which the hon. gentleman said the country should be confined. This policy has developed a large class of manufacturers in this country, and had enabled them to sell goods as cheaply as they could be obtained in any other country in the world. The people of Canada are able to purchase cotton and woollen goods manufactured in this country, and agricultural implements, of quite as good a quality, and as cheaply, as any other people on the face of the globe. In addition to these advantages, we have the articles manufactured in this country, and keep our own people at home to a much larger extent than we otherwise would. Then the hon. gentleman passed quickly on to his favourite subject, the exodus. You will remember the letter in the "Economist" last year, in which he stated that in each decade this country lost by emigration, 1,500,000 people. You all remember, too, his description two days ago of the condition of the agricultural classes in this country; how the poor farmers were being "bled white," and forced by the infamous tariff of this Government to abandon their farms and move into the towns, and then, reduced so that they were hardly able to walk, being forced to emigrate to the United States. I would like to know where the hon. gentleman got his figures of the amount of the exodus which took place between 1874 and 1878. I suppose he took them from the returns of the American officers on the frontier, which were so uncertain that Mr. Nimmo, who was presiding over that department, ordered them to be dropped for the future. Now, I have taken pains to look into the figures in order to find out exactly, from the United States census returns, the number of Canadians on the other side. According to the United States census returns of 1890 there were 980,000 people born in British America then living in the United States, less those from Newfoundland, which reduced that number to 973,752, as the total number of Canadians in the United States in 1890. In 1880, according to the United States census, the number of Canadians in that country was 712,368. That gives an increase in ten years of 261,385, to which ought to be added the average death rate on that number of people for the decade. The total number of Canadians in the United States in 1880 was 712,368; the total number in 1870 was 490,041, showing an increase in ten years of 222,327, to which number, of course, must be added the death rate for that time. That is the exact number of Canadians in the United States at those several periods, according to the only correct statistical record which we can find. So we see that an average of perhaps 25,000 people per year have emigrated from this country into the United States. Now, the hon. gentleman states that it is the policy of this Government which has forced these people to emigrate to the United States. In making that statement the hon. gentleman says something which is known to every person who has relatives in the United States, to be untrue. As every one in this country knows, emigration from Canada has been continuous since the first Government in Quebec drew the attention of the Imperial Government to it, and gave reasons, which have been true from then to the present time, of the immigration of the people of this country to the other side.

Every one is perfectly well aware that the reason is that our people imagine they will be able to better their condition in the United States. Is this immigration attributed to the taxes levied by the present Administration, or to our form of Government? No, Sir; the people know well, even from the statement of the hon. gentleman himself, that this is not the fact. Let me ask hon. members to listen to some remarks made in 1887; I think some hon. gentlemen opposite will remember the remarks when I read them. They are as follows:—

I find, Sir, on looking over the returns for the province of Ontario, the largest and most populous province in the Dominion, that out of thirty-eight counties into which it is divided, there were only thirty-five in which the increase was 10 per cent during the ten years. Precisely the same thing has occurred under the same conditions in the great state of New York and other states of the Union which are in the most highly prosperous condition.

I thought I heard the hon. gentleman opposite complain that comparison had been made with individual states, and it was asked why the whole of the states of the Union were not taken for purposes of comparison. The remarks to which I have referred were continued as follows:—

I am therefore justified in warning the House that, so far as regards the older provinces of the Dominion, we ought not to look for any very large increase of population. Although we may fairly expect that our people will grow rapidly in wealth, we cannot look for any great increase in their numbers. Any hon. gentleman who is desirous of further examining the matter and testing the correctness of the statements I have made, will find upon reference to our own returns and those of the United States, that they are only too well founded. The stationary position of our population does undoubtedly bear very strongly upon the question whether we cannot expect any very large increase in the gross income of the country.

Surely such a statement could not have been made by any hon. gentleman opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Who made the statement?

Mr. HAGGART. Hon. members will find these remarks in the Budget speech of Sir Richard Cartwright in 1874, page 18. That hon. gentleman has prophesied as to the probable result. For a number of years, until the large nation to the south of us was in a large degree developed, the trend of population was naturally in that direction, instead of northward. But now that has ceased, and we may look to the future, when the hon. gentleman, if he lives to see the result of the next census, will find that his prophecy of woe has been altogether wrong. Now I will deal with the trade policy of the hon. gentleman. The House will remember that in 1888 the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved a resolution on the motion to go into Committee of Supply, and I suppose that resolution formulated the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. I will read its language for the benefit of hon. members who may not remember them. It ran as follows:—

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps, at an early date, to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

Whenever the people understood on what terms we could obtain unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, whenever they knew that it was by parting with our heritage as an independent nation or as a portion of the British Empire, whenever they knew that, in order to obtain unrestricted reciprocity, we would have to adopt the tariff of the United States, a tariff against the whole world, and especially a discriminating tariff against the country which was the birthplace of a great many of us, and from whose people we have all descended, whenever the people knew that we would have to part with everything that an Anglo-Saxon, a Briton held dear, and to dispose of the management of our own affairs, hon. gentlemen opposite were compelled to drop it. They dare not proceed further; no man could be elected on that doctrine when the people understood what they would have to pay for unrestricted reciprocity. In 1891 they commenced to drop the cry for unrestricted reciprocity. As my leader stated in Toronto the other day, we could have had unrestricted reciprocity. It was offered to us down at Washington. We all know the terms on which it was offered; that we should have a discriminating tariff specially directed against Great Britain. It was acknowledged, on all hands, that the effect would be to destroy our manufactures, and our commerce would pass from our ports to the ports of the United States. What odds, it might be asked, and perhaps was asked, Canada might be in the position of several states of the Union, without commerce and without manufactures, but still having mining, agriculture and fishing, and, perhaps, be even a rich community. Those were the conditions on which we could obtain unrestricted reciprocity, and those conditions are known to every intelligent man—parting with our birthright as Britons, becoming part and portion, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, of this immense continent to which no rules of political economy apply, affiliated with the United States, which is an immense continent and a world in itself, consisting of kingdoms in the form of states, greater than any in Europe, a perfect paradise, a portion of the Elysian fields, into which we could enter on condition that we dropped our manufactures, did away with our connection with Great Britain, handed over the control of our tariff to the United States, and destroyed the commerce of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite saw the folly of their position. They commenced to abandon that policy in 1891. This is seen in the following resolution, moved by the hon. gentleman opposite:—

That the situation of the country requires that the Government should forthwith reduce all duties on articles of prime necessity, and more particularly on those most generally consumed by artisans, miners, fishermen and farmers; and further, that the negotiations which the House has been informed are to open at Washington in October next, should be conducted upon the basis of the most extended reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States, in manufactured as well as natural products.

Not one word of unrestricted reciprocity in that; we were only going to have extended reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States. We come down now to the resolution of 1893, moved the other night by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), which says:

That the present Customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly upon the great consuming classes of the Dominion and should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of free trade, and that the amount of taxes collected be limited to the sum required to meet the necessities of the Government efficiently and economically administered.

I suppose, as an explanation of this, we must look at the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition, made in Toronto recently and reported in the "Globe." I will read what he says:

I will repeat that there is but one remedy which must be applied, and it is decreased taxation and increased markets. Reform the tariff and reform it in the line of absolute free trade, such as is known in England, that shall be the goal for us. Of course, in our present position, it is not possible for us to adopt free trade in its entirety, as it is in England, but then England's free trade was not adopted at a fell sweep, but gradually, and so as not to jeopardize any existing interest.

Let us see what the Hon. Mr. Blake says upon this matter. He was speaking of free trade, and in his address at Malvern, he said:

No man, I care not how convinced an advocate of free trade for Canada he may be, has yet suggested—no man, I believe, can suggest—a practical plan whereby our great revenue needs can be met otherwise than by the continued imposition of very high duties on goods similar to those we make or can make, within our bounds, or on the raw materials. I invite the most ardent free trader in public life to present a plausible solution of this problem, and I contend that he is bound to do so before he talks of free trade as practicable in Canada.

That is our contention. The man who advocates free trade is bound to prove the possibility or practicability of our acquiring it:

I have not believed it soluble in my day, and any chance of its solubility, if chance there were, has been destroyed by the vast increase of our yearly charge, and by the other conditions which have been created. The thing is removed from the domain of practical politics.

Notwithstanding the statement of Mr. Blake, free trade is not yet removed from the domain of practical politics by these hon. gentlemen opposite. It is by free trade they propose to get into power and govern the country ; as the hon. leader of the Opposition says : Free trade such as in England, which is not possible at present, but possible in a few years. Perhaps the Hon. Edward Blake was only speaking for himself when he made this speech, but I invite the attention of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to the following words of Mr. Blake and we will see whether Mr. Blake was speaking by the book or not :—

I may add that the Liberal party are agreed as to this, and that between myself and Sir Richard Cartwright, whom I mention particularly because the opposite has been declared by our opponents, there is a general consonance of opinion.

Was the Hon. Edward Blake speaking by the book then ? Had he the authority to voice the opinion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) ? I ask the leader of the Opposition, did the Hon. Mr. Blake receive his consent, and was he speaking for the Liberal party when he made that speech ? These hon. gentlemen opposite are condemned from their own leader ; they are condemned from their own mouths. They are proposing a policy which they have declared impracticable, and I shall endeavour to prove, independent of the statement of the Hon. Edward Blake, independent of the consonance of the Liberal party and of the opinion of Sir Richard Cartwright that Mr. Blake's statement was true. Let us look at the revenue and expenditure of this country. Every one knows that, first of all, we have to consider the interest on the national debt, which must be provided for, and which amounts to $12,000,000 a year. I am speaking in round numbers for the purpose of illustrating my argument. That $12,000,000 is a charge upon the revenues of the country. It is for the payment of interest upon our indebtedness, and for the indebtedness the members of the Opposition are as responsible as the members on this side of the House. I can give details to show how our debt was incurred, and to show that the hon. gentlemen opposite are as responsible for every cent of it as we are. Then we have other charges for the subsidies to the provinces, which amount to $4,000,000 a year. How are hon. gentlemen opposite going to get out of that charge, when they adopt free trade ? I suppose they will get out of it by following the plan proposed by Mr. Mercier, and adopted by the conference of the Provincial Governments in Quebec, viz., by adding $2,000,000 more a year to the subsidies for the different provinces. That plan, I believe, received the support of the leader of the Opposition. If I am not mistaken, I heard him state in this House, that if he got into power, he would see the plans proposed at the Quebec conference carried out, and that plan, as I have said, would add $2,000,000 a year more to the subsidies. Then, we have the charge for the collection of revenue, amounting to $9,250,000. Do the hon. gentlemen opposite propose any plan by which that shall be decreased ? Is not the rate per cent for the collection of Customs as low now as it was when they were in power, from 1873 to 1878, and is there not between that time and now but very little difference in the cost for collection of the inland revenue ? The expenditure on the Post Office is an increasing amount from year to year, as the business of the country increases, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to show one single item by which the cost shall be decreased. I will show to the hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in power, from 1873 to 1878, the deficits which they had on the Intercolonial Railway, which then only extended 714 miles. From 1874 to 1875, the deficit was $281,000 ; from 1875 to 1876, $243,000 ; from 1876 to 1877, $507,000 ; from 1877 to 1878, $482,000, and from 1878 to 1879, $716,000. These were their annual deficits on a railway 714 miles long. The Government is managing that railway, which is now 1,175 miles in length, and I promise the people of this country, that the management of that road will not cost the country $50,000 a year. This year it will not cost us that much, nor will it for a number of years to come. How do hon. gentlemen propose to decrease that amount ? For the Administration of Justice there is $700,000 ; for civil government, $1,300,000 ; for Indian affairs, $1,000,000 ; for penitentiaries, $350,000 ; for legislation, $1,000,000 ; for militia, $1,300,000 ; for police, $750,000 ; for lighthouse and coast service, $500,000 ; for immigration, $250,000 ; for public works, $1,500,000. The last item they can strike out altogether and save the whole amount ; but how does the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), like that ? And what do the hon. gentleman's supporters from Quebec think of striking out the sum of $1,500,000 for public works ? The hon. member for Queen's, the other night, said he could not find fault with this Government for being niggardly in its expenditure on public works ; but he complained—I will give his whole sentence—that when the expenditure was for political purposes it was extravagant. Then for ocean and river service there is $400,000, and for fisheries, $340,000. Now, if the hon. gentlemen are going to proceed towards free trade, I challenge them to mention the particular items on which they propose to make reductions, and to tell us exactly how the expenditure of this country is going to be made lower than $35,000,000 a year. What a farce it is for them to talk in their resolution of moving in the direction of free trade, unless they can show the particular manner in which they intend to do it. How do they propose to do that in the face of the statement made by Mr. Blake at Malvern, with which they will be met in every part of the country ? In that speech Mr. Blake stated that he voiced the views of the Opposition, and that he had the particular sanction of the hon. member for South Oxford in making the statement he did. And still we find the hon. gentleman trimming his sails to catch what he calls the uneasy feeling in the community, although, according to his statement in 1887, the community were then mad. Now, I stated a while ago that the hon. gentlemen opposite were as responsible for every bit of the indebtedness of this country as the Government and their supporters in this House. Let me prove my assertion by showing how the debt of the country was contracted. The provincial debts assumed at the time of Confederation amounted to $109,430,146. Afterwards, by an Act we allowed to the different provinces $30,743,392. Then, $43,911,351 was expended on the Intercolonial Railway, and both parties, Reformers and Conservatives alike, were in favour of building that railway and were perfectly agreeable to our assumption of the indebtedness of the provinces. Then add one single other item, that is, the Government expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway, amounting to $61,977,948; and, independently of a dozen other items, the sums I have mentioned aggregate more than the total indebtedness of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite accuse us on this side of the House of having heaped up the debt of this country; but our management of the finances of the country is such that we are paying a smaller sum in interest than hon. gentlemen opposite were when they managed the finances of the country; and for the total amount of interest we are paying every hon. member opposite is responsible as well as the party on this side of the House. Besides making these enormous expenditures I have mentioned, we have expended on public works, the development of the North-west and other undertakings throughout the country the enormous sum of $193,000,000. The hon. gentleman gave us a long description of how the poor farmer in this country was forced from his farm by the iniquitous National Policy of this Government, and stated, in the words of his letter to the "Economist," that the farmer was being "bled white," and that the taxes were so framed that nearly the whole burden of our taxation fell upon the poor agriculturists of this country. He made the amazing statement, that the people of this country not only pay $30,000,000 to the revenues of this country, $30,000,000 to the manufacturers, but $30,000,000 more in the shape of interest for money borrowed from the old country, and, over and above all this, suffer a loss of nearly an equal amount in the reduced prices of what they have to sell, owing to the McKinley Bill. In other words, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, this National Policy imposes a burden upon the poor agriculturist, or at least the labouring portion of the community, of nearly $120,000,000 a year. This statement has only to be made to show its absurdity on its face. It is ridiculous. The amount of interest which we pay on money borrowed is properly marked by the amount of interest charged against us on loans made in the old country, amounting to nearly $12,000,000 a year, and this amount is included in the $30,000,000 which the hon. gentleman says is paid on money borrowed in the old country. There is no way of verifying the amount, but the simple statement will bring the laugh of ridicule from every financial man in the country, that $120,000,000 a year is forced out of the pockets of the people of this country every year by the infamous National Policy. Then, the hon. gentleman stated that we were responsible for the McKinley Bill. If I remember rightly, the McKinley Bill was introduced in the House of Representatives and nearly passed before the hon. Minister of Finance made his Budget speech.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; it was not passed till October, and our Budget was brought down in April. The assent of the President was given on or about the 5th October.

Mr. HAGGART. Every item in it in reference to farm products was in the Bill before the hon. Minister made his Budget speech, and was passed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; it was not passed.

Mr. HAGGART. The Bill was introduced in the House long before the tariff statement was made by my hon. friend, and it is absurd to say that it was the policy of this Government that brought about the passage of the McKinley Bill. Anyway, it would not make any difference, according to the line of argument of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), whom I do not see in his place. In looking over the "Debates" yesterday for the purpose of my argument to-day I had the pleasure of reading some of that hon. gentleman's speeches on the McKinley Bill, in which he argued that the principle adopted in the McKinley Bill would not have the slightest effect on the people of this country. He spoke of farmers taking barley from the county of Essex to Detroit, and stated that when they came to Windsor they found that barley there was worth $1.70 per 100 pounds, and when they reached Detroit it was worth $2. They took it over to Detroit, where they had to pay 30 cents a bushel, but got, it is true, $2 per bushel. What was the statement of the hon. gentleman who represents Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in this House? He asked who paid the duty, and replied that no injury was done the Canadian farmer at all; that it was the brewer on the other side who was obliged to pay 30 cents duty, and exclaimed what a ridiculous affair it was. According to the argument of his friend, the farmer who went over there, if we have to pay 30 cents on our grain going to the United States, we should impose a duty of 30 cents on grain coming in here, and we would then be taking, according to the argument of the hon. gentleman, 30 cents out of the pockets of our people for the purpose of revenging ourselves for the 30 cents taken out of the pockets of the brewers on the other side. These hon. gentlemen change their views on political economy to suit their case. In this, no doubt, they follow the lead of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who said that in that large country, the United States, which is a continent in itself, no rules of political economy apply as they do in the older countries of Europe. What is the whole thing underlying the motion which the hon. gentleman has made in amendment to the motion to go into Supply? What does he offer to the people of this country? He says that the expenditure of this Government is extravagant, and that if his party get into power they will reduce the expenditure, and so rearrange the duties in the direction of free trade that they will bear equally on all classes of the community; that specific duties are wrong in principle, and that they will apply ad valorem ones. That was the statement made by the hon. gentleman up west, and that is the statement embodied in his present amendment. They are going to reduce the expenditure and apply ad valorem instead of specific duties. The question whether an ad valorem is better than a specific duty I will not discuss. A good deal can be said either way. In principle, the ad valorem duty is perhaps the correct form; but there are some articles which require specific duties. I remember the arguments of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in this House in favour of specific duties. I have heard him argue that perhaps it was the proper way for the purpose of levying taxes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; you never did. You may have heard that it was, on a particular article, but never that specific duties were proper.

Mr. HAGGART. I have heard the hon. gentleman say, when putting specific duties on tea and coffee—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART—that the effect of putting specific duties on tea and coffee, although the rich man who drank his Bohea would have to pay the same amount as the poor man who used a cheaper and adulterated quality, was to prevent fraud. I have heard his remarks when he applied specific duties to wines coming into the country, in which he spoke of the advantages of such duties, and I have heard him on several other occasions speaking in the same sense. The philosophical question, whether ad valorem or specific duties are the best, was equally balanced in his mind, but he was inclined to favour specific duties. I remember his reminding us that the Australian colonies had all adopted specific duties.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why, no they never did. You will find no such statement of mine.

Mr. HAGGART. I will read from Sir Richard Cartwright's Budget speech of 1873, page 35, which is the best authority I have on the subject. He was announcing the increase of some liquor duties, and he said:

In doing this, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the same remark applies to our course on some other duties, that we prefer to place specific duties instead ad valorem duties.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On particular articles, but you never heard me advocate general specific duties.

Mr. HAGGART:

I am aware that ad valorem duties appear to be the fairer mode, but I believe that this is one of these cases in which the theory is one way and the practice another. Practically we find that frauds are attempted under this system, and valuers really do themselves in a sort of rough justice, what we propose to do here. I find that in the Australian colonies, which are closely akin to ourselves, the specific duties are to some extent replacing the ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Aye, on that class of articles, but on none other.

Mr. HAGGART. I will leave it to the House whether that does not corroborate every word of the statement I have made with reference to the hon. gentleman. He is a new convert to the belief in the ills which are perpetrated by specific duties. He was a friend of free trade principles when it was impossible to apply them to this country. He afterwards acquiesced in his leader, the Hon. Mr. Blake, making the statement he did in Malvern. The only two things in the resolution proposed by the hon. gentleman are a free trade tariff and a reduction in expenditure. I defy any one to find a single item in which the hon. gentleman proposes to reduce the expenditure. Let the hon. gentleman show where he will reduce it, so as to enable us, inside of fifty years, to have free trade such as exists in England to-day. The House should ask hon. gentlemen opposite, when they get up and move a policy, to show how that policy can be carried out. The country has a right to know how they propose to carry out their free trade principles. But from day to day these hon. gentlemen alter their utterances. One day they say, through the Hon. Mr. Blake, that it is impossible to carry out free trade principles in this country; and before we entertain the idea that it can be done, we should, first of all, ask the person who proposes it, how it can be done. To-day, abandoning his Elysian field of unrestricted reciprocity, the hon. gentleman proposes this to the people of Canada as a panacea, or the something which will hurl us from our seats and place him and his party in power. What argument has he offered in support of his proposition? Not a single one, and I hope that the speakers who follow me will be prepared to offer to the House and the country something substantial in support of it. The hon. gentleman, in criticising the remarks of my hon.

friend the Minister of Finance, who instanced the increased deposits in the savings banks, the increased circulation in the country, the large consumption of sugar and a lot of other things, as evidencing the growth and prosperity of the country, rather underrated these. He asked how did the $40,000,000 which were in the savings banks show an increase in the wealth of the country. He asked had the Finance Minister any gold for the purpose of redeeming it, and said we all knew that he had no gold, and that if a run were made upon the banks of the country, although they are well managed, good institutions, not one of them could stand the drain. Does the hon. gentleman not know that this $40,000,000 reduces the outside amount of our indebtedness to a foreign country, and that the interest we would otherwise be obliged to pay outside this country goes to our own people? Does he forget his remarks in 1878 with reference to one of the signs of the prosperity of the country. What did he give as some of the principal evidences by which we should judge of the prosperity of the country? He said: Look at our savings banks; look at our circulation, especially look at the amount of life insurance in force, because if the country was prosperous the people would pay their money to maintain their life insurance. His views are entirely changed to-day. Those who were listening to the hon. gentleman the day before yesterday must have been struck by the change in his tone. He now says that savings banks are no sign of prosperity, insurance is no sign of prosperity, the increased circulation of the banks and the increased deposits in the banks are only evidences that the people of this country are not trading on their own capital, but trading more on borrowed capital than they used to do. Let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to what he said when he was more careful of his remarks upon the same subject. I will put the hon. member's statement at one time side by side with his statement of the day before yesterday. In the Budget speech of 1877, page 7, he declares:

Banks do undoubtedly afford us certain standards by which we may estimate with tolerable precision the increased volume of business throughout Canada.

These standards he declares are usually considered reliable. What are these signs? For instance, circulation—(is it possible that he should have entertained such sentiments)—the increase of banking deposits, increase of deposits in Government savings banks (and these he thinks are specially valuable), the increase of the fishery product, the increase of exports of agricultural products and the products of the forest and the increased export of manufactures, the quantity of sugar imported, and the amount of life insurance in force. The hon. gentleman gives this last as a valuable sign, indicating the prosperity of the country. These were the signs of prosperity which were quoted by my hon. friend the Finance Minister. These were the signs which the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) gave as evidences of prosperity in 1877.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Which you repudiated.

Mr. HAGGART. Not at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They did not exist then.

Mr. HAGGART. Every financial authority regards these things as signs of the prosperity of a country. In this connection I would give a quotation from the "Monetary Times" of 3rd February, 1893, to show how closely this paper follows the line of my hon. friend the Finance Minister and the line taken by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his statement as Finance Minister in 1887:

The following are universally held to be indicators of prosperity in any country, namely:—

1. A large diminution in insolvencies.
2. A large increase in the deposits in banks.
3. Considerable increase in banking loans and discounts.
4. Considerable increase in the return of clearing houses.

Of course they had no clearing houses in 1877 and the hon. gentleman could not quote their operations as evidences of prosperity at that time.

5. Considerable increase in the bank circulation, in spite of the low prices of some commodities.

The above five conditions are all undoubted facts relating to the country, as a whole, at present, every province of the Dominion being included. Let us see what the figures show in these five conditions. In 1892, as compared with 1891, the decrease in insolvencies was $3,000,000. In 1892, notwithstanding the increased business of the country and the great number of persons engaged in mercantile pursuits, the insolvencies, compared with the period from 1875 to 1879, when the hon. gentleman had the direction of the financial affairs of this country, were less, on the average, by $12,924,000 a year. The increase in the deposits in the banks in 1892, compared with 1891, was $19,300,000, and, as compared with the average of the years from 1875 to 1879, the increase was $97,938,000. The increase in the banking loans in 1892, compared with 1891, was $7,500,000, and, as compared with the average of the years from 1875 to 1879, the increase was $85,200,000. This is a considerable increase in the circulation of this country, and shows the enormous quantities of produce that must be moved, compared with the years I have quoted, because the low prices give the dollar a far greater purchasing power in agricultural products than at that time. This is further evidenced by the shipping returns of the country. Those returns show that the shipping that is required for the purpose of carrying the produce of the country is nearly four-fold what it was in the average of the years between 1873 and 1878. Now, I would like to know how the tests apply—though to some it might, perhaps, seem invidious to inquire—to the time when the hon. gentleman was ruling the destinies of this country from 1873. The year 1873 is his favourite year of comparison. But we know that was the last year of the Conservative Government. I would like to show what these statements prove in regard to the decrease in prosperity of the country from 1873 to 1875. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated, as I have shown, that the amount of life insurance in the country was specially likely to show the increase of wealth among the people. Let us look at the comparison as to life insurance between this year, 1890, which, I think, is the last year for which we have the returns, and the period between 1873 and 1878. The total life insurance in force in 1875 was $85,009,264. In 1878 it had decreased to $84,751,937. In 1890 the total life insurance in the country was $248,424,567. In 1875 the total life insurance effected per annum was $15,074,258. Compare that with 1878, because, when the people are not prosperous there is nothing that they more quickly drop than the payments on their life insurance. In 1878 the total amount of life insurance effected was $12,169,755, a decrease in this item as the total life insurance in force. In 1890 the amount of new insurance effected reached the enormous sum of $40,523,456. Now, another test which the hon. gentleman wished to apply as showing the prosperity of the country was the enormous amount of bank deposits. In 1874 the bank deposits amounted to $78,790,368. In 1878 they had decreased to $71,900,195. In 1891 they have increased to the sum of $149,431,573. Thus, testing the prosperity of the country by the very rules laid down by the hon. gentleman, is it not clearly established that this country is prospering to an extent, and an increasing extent, as great as that of any other country on the face of the globe? The country, as the hon. gentleman stated in his speech in 1877, might not show the expected advance in population, because he stated that there had been no increase of population in the older provinces. But the result has fulfilled his expectations, and his statement in 1877, in that there has been an enormous increase in the wealth of the country. Now, I do not think that any hon. gentleman will deny the fact that this country has prospered; at the least, the evidence is, to me, incontrovertible. Now, how has this advance been obtained? By bleeding the farmers till they are white? No, Sir. Let us compare the percentage of Customs duties levied on the people under the Conservative Government with the percentage levied upon the people when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. The tariff of Customs by percentages averaged in 1879, 16.10 per cent; in 1892, 17.56 per cent, or 1.46 per cent more in 1892 than in 1879. Yet in the interval, under that increased duty, what has been the progress of this country? We have built 8,500 miles of railway; the tonnage carried by these railroads has nearly trebled, the exact figures being 7,832,000 tons in the former period and about 23,000,000 tons at present, while the number of passengers carried has increased from 6,444,000 to nearly 14,000,000.

Mr. CHARLTON. Between what years are the comparisons made?

Mr. HAGGART. Between 1879 and 1892. We have expended upon our great lines of interprovincial trade nearly seventy-nine millions of dollars. We have developed and improved our canal system; and I may state to the House that in nearly three years our canal system will be completed to the depth contemplated by the commissioners; the Welland Canal has been completed to that depth, the Cornwall Canal has been completed, and the Lachine Canal is nearly completed. Although we have been making such enormous expenditures, the revenue has been equal to them for the last five or six years. There was a little increase in the indebtedness last year, which increase was fully explained by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, in the assumption of nearly $900,000 of the bonds of Quebec for building the North Shore Railway, and giving them over to the company. That was the transfer of one of the assets, and, by so much, increased our debt. Then, there was the sale or the transfer of a certain amount of our floating indebtedness, about two millions and a quarter sterling, or nearly ten million dollars. That added to our nominal indebtedness over two million dollars. It is only a change in the name. We are paying less interest than we did before, but the operation nominally adds to the increased indebtedness, and leaves a small expenditure of about $1,300,000 on capital account above revenue. For the three or four years preceding, our revenue nearly equalled the expenditure on capital account for all other purposes. I think the Finance Minister will be able to promise the country that when the large expenditure on the Sault Ste. Marie locks, for the purpose of completing our canal navigation, will have ceased in about three years, we will be able to make further tariff reforms in the direction the hon. gentleman wishes. Then, in addition, I am happy to be able to say, without making any egotistical remarks, that I have been able to remove another incubus on the revenue of the country of six or seven hundred thousand dollars annually, in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. With but a little increased expenditure, we will be able to undertake and complete all those things which we have promised; and at the expiration of these three years we will be able to return to a considerably decreasing annual expenditure, although

I hope to see a large expenditure on public works for the purpose of developing our harbours and building works of utility in different sections of the country. I do not suppose that the actual expenditure of $1,500,000 will decrease, it will continue from year to year; but the Finance Minister may be assured that he will be able to lessen the taxes of the country three years from the present time, by a further amount of $2,000,000 annually. Sir, I will state, in conclusion, that the people of this country are to be congratulated upon the management of their finances. The Government have done everything that it was possible to do towards the reduction of the expenditure, having a due regard to the requirements of the country, the extension of our railway systems and our public works; so, on the whole, I feel confident that the verdict of the people will be that we have managed the affairs of the country in an economical and prudent manner.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In rising to address the House on this occasion I desire, first of all to agree, so far as I can, with the remarks that have fallen from the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me. I am happy to be able to agree with him so far as to extend my congratulations to the Finance Minister for the clear manner in which he made the financial part of his speech. I wish I could compliment him as heartily on the fairness of his manner; I wish I could compliment him also upon being as clear with reference to what is to be the policy of the party opposite. They have asked for ours. They think we are indefinite; but I think any one reading over carefully the remarks of the Finance Minister, seeing how he balanced this way and balanced that way, and never got down on either side—I think it would be difficult for any one to say that his exposition of the future policy of the Government was made as plain as his financial statement. I think it was made in such a way, and I regret it, that it will tend to upset and demoralize trade for a whole twelve months in the Dominion of Canada. It is rather a serious matter. I am afraid the Finance Minister did not give it proper consideration; but pressed for changes in the tariff, and not knowing how to answer them very well, he had to take refuge in seeking time, and therefore was unable to adopt any other language than the language he used. The hon. Minister of Railways congratulates the Finance Minister on the increased exports of the country. I do not know that I can congratulate the Minister particularly on the increased exports. I could congratulate the country as a whole if the Finance Minister had done anything to increase the value of the exports; then I would have been very glad to extend my congratulations to him also. But when I fail to see that he has done anything at all in the direction of increasing exports, I can only congratulate the country, but I am forced to withhold congratulation from the Minister himself. The hon. Minister of Railways lost much valuable time in addressing the House from either one or two causes, neither of which is very creditable to him, I must admit. When an hon. gentleman is discussing a resolution that is printed in the Journals of the House, it is inexcusable ignorance, especially if he happens to occupy the position of a member of the Government, if he does not read that resolution, especially when it is confined to a few lines; and I might add that it is inexcusable if he does not read it with sufficient care to read it aright. There might be another suggestion, but I will not use that as applied to the case of the hon. gentleman, because that would suppose something disreputable; it would be to the effect that, knowing the language of the resolution was not what he read, nevertheless he read it in the way he did in order to distort it, and to lead to false conclusions about it. The hon. gentleman read the resolution that was offered by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as follows:—

That it be resolved that the present Customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly upon the great consuming classes of the Dominion and should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of freer trade.

The words "freer trade" were read by the Minister of Railways as "free trade." The hon. gentleman then, for a long time, proceeded to point out that it was impossible we could just now have free trade in this country, that Edward Blake had said it was impossible, and that, therefore, the policy we were advocating was impracticable, that we did not mean it and that no attempt would be made to carry it out. We were asked where we would obtain our revenue; yet, at the same time, a resolution was before the hon. gentleman, in which we declared:

That the amount of taxes collected be limited to the sum required to meet the necessities of the Government efficiently and economically administered.

That is how we propose to get the money to carry on the affairs of the country. So you see, Mr. Speaker, all the space of time wasted in denouncing free trade as being the policy of the Liberal party, and using arguments with respect to how the revenue would be raised, when there is a declaration in the resolution as to how taxation is to be raised, that it is to be raised by collecting an amount to be levied only as the necessities of the Government, honestly and economically administered, require. Sir, the hon. gentleman was scarcely fair in his strictures on the remarks of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) on many points. I touch upon one. He charged that my hon. friend had said that the deposits in the savings banks and in the chartered banks were no evidence whatever of the prosperity or wealth of a nation. What he did say was this:

I grant you that it is a good thing that the savings-bank deposits have increased; I grant, if you like, it is a good thing that certain cities have grown and prospered; but, after all, how far do these things go?

The argument of the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was that these increases afforded some indication of growth; but they were not all that was claimed for them on the part of the Government, and yet the Minister of Railways charged my hon. friend with stating that they afforded no indication whatever of the wealth or prosperity of a country. Congratulating the Minister of Finance on the increased exports and imports and the grand balance of trade, I would desire to point out to the House that when that hon. gentleman made his comparisons between different years he was variable in his selection, that he did not use the same years at all times. We find him jumping from 1868 to 1878, from 1878 to 1892, from 1878 to 1891, and from 1891 to 1892; but his favourite year for purposes of comparison, when dealing with certain subjects, was 1878, I suppose because it was the last year of the Mackenzie Administration, and because the figures of the total trade of the country for that particular year suited his purpose. The hon. gentleman compared 1878 in its total aggregate trade, imports and exports, with 1892, and he told the House there was an increase of 26 per cent in those fourteen years in our grand aggregate of trade. We can rejoice with him on that fact. But if this statement was made to show that it was an unprecedented increase, I beg to remind him that if he will take 1878 and see what the aggregate trade of the Dominion was in the last year of the Mackenzie Administration, I will not ask him to go back fourteen years, but only ten years. He will find that there was in 1878 31 per cent increase in ten years, as against 26 per cent increase in the fourteen years in question. The Minister of Finance congratulates the House upon the fact that our trade with Great Britain had increased. Sir, I rejoice in the increase of trade with Great Britain. I rejoice in the increase of trade with any nation that will trade with us. Canada wants trade and commerce; but I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman this: he takes the position, that because a greater quantity of our products had been marketed, since the adoption of the McKinley Bill, in the United Kingdom than hitherto, no injury had been done to Canada. Let me remind him that the very diversion of trade to England proved that a barrier had in the meantime been raised against us in a country that provided a more accessible and profitable market for us. Who will deny, that if we take an article to Great Britain, we will sell it at some price? The question Canada has to consider is, in which country can we sell each article for the best and highest price? When the hon. gentleman rejoices in the fact of increased exports to Great Britain, I can only go with him in so far as he recognizes that those increased exports to Great Britain have been forced there because we have been shut out of the market that would have been better for us and where more profit would have been realized to the producer and the country. I now come to notice a point which has been dwelt upon very largely by hon. gentlemen opposite, one which was dwelt upon by the Minister of Railways and also by the Minister of Finance. I come to speak now of the manufacturing industries of this country. They have engaged a great deal of the attention of this Government during the past fourteen years. They have been called fond names, their praises have been sounded, their prosperity declared, and the Government has taken credit for it all. I grant you, there is a little change in the tone of the Finance Minister this year. He has discovered that there is a feeling of unrest and disquiet in the country; he said, it has reached this Chamber, and therefore he has taken his halting position, his waiting position. It has burst upon him very suddenly, it has burst upon hon. gentlemen opposite very suddenly. If their National Policy, with reference to the manufacturing industries of the country, had been all they claimed for it during the past fourteen years, how comes it that in a few short months they find out that it is not all that was claimed for it, that it needs revision, that it needs a commission appointed, and that they must go and inquire into it and find out all about it? How comes it? Have the hon. gentlemen opposite lost faith in their own policy? Have not they the courage to stand by their own policy, when for fourteen years they have declared in our hearing, that Canada's prosperity lay absolutely in the direction of maintaining it, and, if necessary, strengthening the protection that was given to the manufacturing industries of this country? Now they tell us they are not so very sure about it. The Minister of Finance will take some experts with him and he will visit the different manufacturing industries and see how they are getting on, and he will be gracious enough, he has told us, to even open his ear to let the farmers and the artisan have a word with him in reference to the working of his great National Policy. I will deal with that a little more in the future, but just now I want to refute the arguments which are now made, and have been made by these gentlemen for years past, with reference to what their policy has done for the manufactures of this country. Sir, I resent it as a piece of effrontery for hon. gentlemen to stand up in this House and claim that the great manufacturing industries of Canada are the products of the National Policy, or owe their existence to the National Policy. That they multiplied manufacturers, I will grant, that they have given to a very few of those who are engaged in manufacturing lines exceptional facilities, I will not deny; but that there are manufacturing industries in this country, is not, I claim, due to the National Policy, but due to the people who saw that in Canada there was opportunity for development in that line as well as in any other. When these gentlemen talk to you about 1878, and say that there were then no manufacturers in this country that were doing anything, and that ruin and desolation was upon them; I challenge them to the proof. I deny the statement. There was a committee of this House appointed in 1876, and the report of the committee refutes their statement. Take the list of failures that occurred during the Mackenzie Administration among the manufacturers of this country, and take the record of failures among the manufacturing classes since the inception of the National Policy, and I venture to say, you will find more capital sunk, wasted, and destroyed under the National Policy, than there was during the whole time the Mackenzie Government was in power. Why, Sir, do the hon. gentlemen forget that in 1876, sixteen years ago, Canadian manufacturers exhibited at the World's Fair in Philadelphia, and that the manufactures of Canada at that time challenged the admiration of the world? Do they not know that under the influence of that exhibition, aided by the Mackenzie Government, which was always ready to aid in a legitimate way all the industries of this country, that a great trade sprang up with neighbouring nations, until in 1878, not only were we manufacturing in all the great staple lines for the people of this country, but we were exporting to other nations $4,000,000 worth of manufactured goods each year. Sir, I want to tell the hon. gentleman this: that in the last year of the Mackenzie Administration, which they picture as a year fatal to manufacturers, the manufacturers of Canada were not only supplying their own markets, but they exported that year to other countries, as many manufactured goods as the manufacturers of this country have been able to export on an annual average for the last ten years, under the National Policy. And yet they speak as if our industries were all due to them. These statements may be doubted, but allow me to read the countries with which we had opened up an export trade at that time: Great Britain, United States, Newfoundland, British West Indies, Australia, Norway and Sweden, Germany, New Zealand, South America, Spanish West Indies, French West Indies, Danish West Indies, Hayti, British Guiana, Mexico, St. Pierre, Central America, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Holland, Africa, East Indies, Labrador and the Falkland Islands. To all these countries the manufacturers under the Mackenzie Administration were shipping the products of their factories, and to the extent, as I said before, of over $4,000,000 a year, an extent equal to the average exportation of these articles during the last ten years of this Administration. What were these goods which we then exported? Do you tell me they were merely in one or two articles? I will read you the list of what we were exporting, and then you will be able to recognize whether these manufacturing industries were in existence or not at that time. Mr. Speaker, I will venture to say that you will find all the great manufacturing industries of the country at the present time were in existence and doing well. Agricultural implements, trade was opened up with Australia and with other countries in that line then; carriages, clothing, cordage, ropes and twines, cottons and furs, glass and glassware, grinding stones, ground plaster, hats and caps, India rubber manufactures, iron castings and stoves, pig iron, machinery, sewing machines, other iron and hardware, leather, sole and upper, boots and shoes, harness and saddlery, other manufactures of leather, organs, pianos, oil cake, soap, starch, steel and the manufactures of, wrought stone, tobacco manufactures, vinegar, all kinds of manufactures of wood, and woollens. Will the hon. gentleman opposite tell me any industry of great importance that is in existence to-day that was not in existence during the Mackenzie Administration? And yet, these gentlemen claim that they have been the means of fostering and developing and promoting these industries. Well, Sir, that all arose under a revenue tariff, was a legitimate growth under which the manufacturers were doing well, growing with the country, meeting the requirements of the country in these lines, and steadily pushing out and on with their trade. When the National Policy was adopted, an undue stimulus was given to those industries. Capital was rushed into them and sunk in them, and in some lines the men who had invested their capital were forced, in order to save it from destruction, to amalgamate their concerns and restrict the output. For much of the disaster that had taken place among the legitimate manufacturing industries of this country, this Government is responsible; for the benefit that has come to the legitimate industries, I deny their right to any credit; on the contrary: in the great majority of cases their policy has been to the actual detriment of those industries. Now, I have read to you a list of the different lines that we were manufacturing, and the different countries to which we exported, and I would ask the Government one question: If the manufacturers of this country are in the feeble and weakly condition that they describe, unable under fair conditions to hold their own in competition with the manufacturers of other countries, what is the use of their spending the public money of this country to enable those manufacturers to exhibit their productions in the city of Chicago against those of the other nations of the world? Is the exhibit to be made there for the glory of the American nation, in order to merely swell the number of exhibits? No; the manufacturers of this country who will exhibit there will exhibit with a business purpose, that is, in order that the people of all nations who come there shall view the manufacturing capabilities of Canada side by side with those of other nations, confident that they can secure under fair conditions a fair share of the trade in manufactures in the markets of the world. That is the confidence they have in themselves. Sir, what is the position of the great bulk of those manufacturers under the National Policy? Increased protection has been given in many lines, which has had the effect of bringing on the manufacturers the condemnation of the people, when the manufacturers themselves have not deserved that condemnation. Why? Because the Government, in the adjustment of their tariff, while putting additional protection upon many manufactured articles and thus enhancing the cost to the consumer, have nevertheless failed to give the manufacturer greater protection than he enjoyed under the revenue tariff of 1878. Why? Any man who is conversant with trade knows it; because they have burdened the great manufacturing lines with duties on their raw material, which have compelled them to raise their prices to the consumer, or else they would be in a worse position than before. I need not endeavour to enforce that statement. When Sir Charles Tupper was putting the increased duties on iron he alluded to that fact, and what did he say:

What I propose to ask this House to do, in adopting the policy of vitalizing this great industry for Canada, is to take the duty off anthracite coal and make it free. The moment that is done we shall have blast furnaces at Cobourg, Weller's Bay and Kingston, at all events, served by anthracite coal, making that description of anthracite iron which is so highly valued by gentlemen connected with foundries.

He saw that those additional duties on iron would add to the cost of the different lines of manufacture, and into how many lines does iron enter as raw material? Seeing that he said:

The effect of the removal of the duty on anthracite coal will be not only to give great relief to the public who use anthracite coal, but also to give a great relief to the manufacturers of iron, who will have to pay on their raw material a larger price than before; but they will receive a considerable portion of that back in the form of remitted duty.

So Sir Charles Tupper understood, as any business man can understand, that the amount of protection accorded to any one particular industry is the difference between the duty on the article produced and the duty levied on the raw material that enters into its manufacture; and you can see that when you commence putting a heavy duty on that which is the raw material in some branches of trade, and as you progress higher and higher, your taxes must increase until the manufacturer seems to have an amount of protection, which he really has not, but which compels the consumer to pay a higher price for the goods he produces. He is not to blame for it; but it is done in the endeavour to foster some particular article which it is thought is not susceptible of being maintained under fair conditions in Canada. Now, having alluded to the previous exports of manufactured goods and having compared them with the exports under the present Government, I would like to be permitted to seem to digress for a moment from that subject, in order to read to you what was said in this House—you will remember it, I dare say, Mr. Speaker—five or six years ago by a gentleman who then became the Finance Minister of Canada. He was replying to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who was pointing out that there would be a deficit that year, and in order to quiet fears and to soothe my hon. friend, Mr. McLelan replied to him in the following beautiful and poetic language:

He has talked about the people of this country being depleted; but we know that there is nothing of the kind, as an actual fact. The same old story is being re-enacted all over the Dominion; love is being made in the frosts of winter and in the sunlight of summer; the orange blossoms are being worn, and marriage bells sounded and new homes are being formed from one end of this land to the other. We do not take up a newspaper but we find that a new home has been founded, and by and by, in obedience to the great command to be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth, there will be a new cradle put in a new home, to be added to the 200,000 cradles in this Dominion which are now rocking young Canadians who will grow to Canadian men and women and give their strength and their energies to the development of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I can imagine that these words echo in your ears as they do in mine. It is a scene I delight to think upon; but when I allude to it in connection with this matter of the export of manufactured goods, you will wonder where it comes in. It comes in because I was rudely awakened from the dream of the happy condition of this country by an item, in black and white, inserted by the Minister of Customs among the exports of manufactured goods. What is it? Household effects? Oh, what disillusion is involved in these words! What is it? new homes being founded and babies being rocked in Canadian cradles to become Canadian men and women to build up and develop this country, the babies, cradles and all have fled to another country. I could stand the loss of the cradle, but I bewail the loss of the baby. How do these gentlemen, who say there is no exodus, get over what they are forced to enter in their records, that $1,166,059 worth of household effects have been exported? What does that mean? Why, it means that the homes have been broken up. It means, not that our young men have crossed the line for temporary employment, as they perhaps did under the Mackenzie Administration, when we find no such item of export, but that these homes, which Mr. McLelan pictured, in which Canadian infants were being rocked and brought up, have been torn up, the parents have gone, the household effects have gone, the families gone; and that these people, instead of lending their aid and energy to bring up and develop this Canada of ours, are giving their capital and strength to build up a foreign nation. Sir, the Government may, perhaps, after this revelation made by the Minister of Customs, in his returns, console this House by saying that, while they cannot deny that homes have been broken up, that the babies and the cradles have been taken away, they yet can rejoice in the possession of something which takes their place, and which they claim peculiarly their own and can hug to their bosoms stronger than ever. They have still their infant industries. We are referred to the census returns as an indication of the great growth and development of the industrial institutions of this country; we are told that they have increased by many thousands. So they have, as they are enumerated. We are told that we have 75,768 industrial establishments; but, if you will look into the returns, you will find that there is only one in every eight of the industrial establishments tabulated which are worked by steam-power. I am inclined to the belief that the development claimed by those hon. gentlemen of the manufacturing industry under the National Policy took place largely three or four years after the adoption of their policy, when, as I pointed out, under the undue stimulus given it, capital was rushed into different manufacturing industries, to the ruin and sacrifice of capital and the withdrawal from other walks and avenues, into the factories, of thousands of individuals only to be thrown out of work and out of wages. Since then, I think it will be difficult for hon. gentlemen to show that there has been any material increase at all. In 1884, just when our Finance Minister thought that the country was showing remarkable development and prosperity in the various manufactures, he sent a commission to visit different factories and industrial institutions in Ontario and Quebec, and make a report upon them. And what did he find? I will read the results of a few of them. I find from the census of 1891, that there were 199 agricultural implement factories in Ontario and Quebec, employing 3,813 hands. In 1884, 57 establishments out of the 199 were visited, and they gave employment to 3,219 souls; so that the total increase in the last seven years of the National Policy in this line has been 142 establishments and 594 hands. This takes in large factories and manufacturers who employ, perhaps, not more than one or two hands. Of furniture factories, the census tells us there are 1,263 establishments, with 6,688 souls employed in them. When forty-three out of 1,263 were visited in 1884, about one-third the total number of hands that were found in this industry in 1891 were engaged in these forty-three establishments. And in foundries and machine shops, you will find that in the 172 which existed in 1884, the number of men employed was only one-third less than the number employed in the 676 reported in the census of 1891. And so of the 4,285 boot and shoe establishments found in the census, which employed 15,648 men. In sixty establishments visited out of the 4,285 there were found in 1884 about one-half that number of employees. So in cotton mills. The commission at that time were able to discover three more cotton mills in Ontario and Quebec seven years ago than are noted in the census of 1891. I say this looks like stagnation since 1884. It does not look like industrial development, and I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite to compare those figures and say whether they think that all the credit they have been claiming for themselves is really due them. Now, Sir, I want to speak with reference to the subject which is contained in the latter part of the amendment, the necessity of limiting the collection of taxes to the requirements of the Government, honestly and economically administered. When the Finance Minister rejoices in the large exports of 1892, as a source of wealth for this country, I also rejoice, but I do not give the credit to the Minister of Finance; I do not give credit to any enactment passed by the Parliament of Canada. I give the credit where hon. gentlemen opposite will join with me in giving it; I give the credit to a kind Providence that in 1891 smiled upon our fields and gave us such a harvest throughout this vast Dominion as we never had before. Sir, it is well known that the returns of June, 1892, contain the record of sales of the harvest of the previous year. But, Sir, I think that the Minister of Finance, even if he were more anxious than he is for praise, would not ask me to accord to him the praise of giving sunshine and rain to make a fruitful season and to bring forth an abundant crop. There is one way in which, perhaps, the country might have been indebted to the Minister of Finance in relation to the increased exports. Providence blessed us with a large crop; if the Minister of Finance or the Government had been the means of opening markets for this country that would have enabled the farmers to realize a larger price for their crops than they would have got in the market in which it is sold, then, Sir, I would give them credit for it. But will they tell me where they opened a single market for the farmer? I believe that by their policy they in part contributed to closing one of the most profitable markets for much of that which the farmer has to sell. I believe some millions might have been added to the export of $20,000,000 in 1892, by reason of the higher prices the farmers would have received, had they been free to enter the market to which the Liberal party say it is desirable the farmers of Canada should have access. But while it was impossible for the Government to cause good crops, I believe it was possible for them to have done something in securing better markets, which would have added to the value of the crops and to the wealth of the country, and they failed to do it. They have done this, on the other hand, for which I hold them responsible—they have minimized the effect to the people of the crops by the excessive expenditure they have entailed upon this country by their administration. I desire to give a few figures with reference to this matter. I have taken off a table of the total exports of Canada for the past ten years, and a comparative statement of the taxes taken from the people during the past ten years. When I have read this, Mr. Speaker, I shall have answered in part a serious inquiry among the business men of this country during last year and this year, a question which the people felt themselves unable to solve and that was: How is it, with such a magnificent harvest in all parts of the Dominion as we had last year, that trade is so stagnant, that money is so scarce that it cannot be obtained with the freedom we thought it could, that it is not to be found in the channels of commerce? Sir, they will find from this table one of the reasons. It is that money that came into the country, that was the wealth of the country that ought to have circulated through the channels of trade and commerce enriching every one, has been taken by this Government out of circulation; it has been taken out of the wealth of the people and has been squandered by the Government in a manner they will be unable to defend. Sir, I do not hold them to too strict a line. I take these figures from their own Trade and Navigation Returns. I ask them to take it on the basis on which they put it there and no basis could be fairer. Take the Trade and Navigation Returns and read the per capita tax imposed by the Government from Confederation to the present time. Divide it, as I have done, for the purpose of comparison, into three periods of five years each. Taking the five years of the Reform Administration, what do we find? We find that in those five years there was an average per capita Customs tax taken from the people of this country of $3.44 per head. Take a period under gentlemen opposite, the five years, from 1883 to 1887, and you will find there was an annual average per capita tax laid upon the people of Canada of $4.60. I take another period of five years, from 1888 to 1892, and I find the annual per capita tax was $4.77. The increase of the per capita tax in the period from 1883 to 1887 over the period from 1874 to 1878 was $1.16 per head of the population, which, estimating on a population of say four and one-half millions, means that they took in each of these years $5,220,000, or in the five years $26,100,000 more in taxation than was taken by the Mackenzie Administration when they were in power. I desire the House to mark, Mr. Speaker, that this is a per capita calculation. It would not be fair to charge the Government with that increased expenditure while making no allowance for increased population and consequent increased expenditure. This is based upon the actual population at the time, so that, as the taxes increased the population increased. It is a per capita tax and they must be held absolutely to the results. Of course, if the population remained stationary at the figure it was in Mr. Mackenzie's time, and if you figured the per capita tax from 1883 to 1888 on that basis, it would be far more than $4.60 per head. But they have taken the estimate of increased population into account, and, therefore, for purposes of comparison, this is absolutely accurate, so far as I can judge, and cannot be assailed from any point. Take the second period from 1888 to 1892, when the annual tax per capita was, as I have stated, $4.77. That was $1.33 per head more than was taken under the Mackenzie Administration. Figure that upon an estimated population of 4,750,000 and it gives $6,317,500, or, in the five years, they took $31,587,500 more than was taken by the Mackenzie Government during their period of occupancy of the Treasury benches. Sir, what does that mean? Putting these two amounts together, it means that in the last ten years $57,687,500 of excessive taxation has been wrung out of the people of this country, taken out of their wealth and squandered by hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, it is on the per capita basis, they get the credit for increase of population; and when I point out that $57,687,500 are taken from the people that ought to have remained in their pockets, then, I think, we can begin to see, in part, how it is that while Providence has favoured us, as Providence has scarce favoured any other nation, with a rich inheritance, this Government has been equal to the task of destroying the prosperity we would have had if these blessings of Providence had been left to us undisturbed. They have succeeded in doing that, without, I maintain, any resulting advantages to the people of this country. Sir, there is only one possible answer to the figures I have given, one possible way in which they could be weakened, and it may be in this direction, that hon. gentlemen opposite might say: You did not raise enough taxation under the Mackenzie Administration to pay the expenses of the Government; you had your deficits. I reply: The Mackenzie Administration had their deficits, but they also had their surpluses. I reply that the present Government have had their surpluses, they have had their deficits also; but whether under the Mackenzie Administration, or the Thompson Administration, or the Macdonald Administration, deficits and surpluses, come how they may, will, either on the one side or the other, manifest themselves, and take their place in the public debt. Let me point out that while, during the five years of the Mackenzie Administration, the increase to the public debt was $6,407,421 per annum, there has been, under these gentlemen, during their ten years, an average increase per annum of $8,266,472. They have taken $57,000,000 of the people's money, and they have added $2,000,000 a year more to the public debt than was added under the Mackenzie Administration. In this calculation I have said nothing as to the wealth taken from the people of this country through the manufacturers that have been forced, for one reason or another, to take extra prices for goods the people consumed. I am not one of those who believe that the consumers of Canada pay in all cases the full amount of duty on the Canadian manufactured articles; I do not take that extreme position, I do not believe it is correct. But it is a more incorrect, a more indefensible statement, should it be made, that the imposition of taxes upon manufactured goods is not taken advantage of, and is not in any case added to the price of the goods that a person buys. Sir, an honest protectionist will not hold that position, he will not advance the argument that the price to the consumer is not increased, but he would argue compensating advantages as his reason. But that it does take an extra amount of money from the pockets of the people, not only on the goods they import, but on like goods manufactured in the country, I think is beyond the cavil of any man who desires to discuss the question intelligently and fairly. But I leave that one side; and we will consider just what this Government have taken in actual cash, out of the taxes collected from the people by the custom-house. I desire to enforce that, as it can be best enforced, I think, by some comparisons. We talk about millions in this House, and we talk about them very glibly, so that they lose their force and their meaning; but I will give you one or two facts, and ask you to endeavour to realize, if you can, the impoverishing course of the Government upon the people of this country. I have taken here from the Trade and Navigation Returns, a table of the total exports from the Dominion of Canada during the ten years that they have taken this extra fifty-seven millions of money from the people, and let us realize what a sum $57,000,000 is by comparing it with each of the following items. In ten years, the total exports of our magnificent barley crop, aided in its value by the freer access we had to the United States market during many of those years—that magnificent crop, gathered from all parts of the Dominion, added to the wealth of this country $7,000,000 less than this Government took from them. All the wheat, the flour, the oats, the hay, that this vast Dominion was able to export from Manitoba, from British Columbia, and from every other province of the Dominion—the total exports of all these articles, including the magnificent harvest of last year, was $57,798,397, and that Government, during the last ten years, took almost every dollar that was brought into this country to add to its wealth as the result of the export of all the wheat, flour, oats and hay that were exported from this country. Sir, if they rejoice over the increased exports sent from this country, which add to the wealth of this country, they do well; but when they wipe out an item like that by the excessive taxation they are wringing from the people of this country, I trust they will get some conception of the course they have been pursuing, and of the state to which they have brought the country. Then there is the magnificent trade in horned cattle, which has developed to $63,460,497 in ten years. Magnificent receipt, but all but thirteen millions of it was taken by that Government in excessive taxation. Of horses, there were $18,558,463 worth exported in ten years; but three times all the money that you received from all the exports of your horses, has been taken out of the wealth of the country by that Government opposite. Of the product of the mines, all the iron and all the other products, the total exports in ten years were fifteen millions less than the amount of money in extra taxation that this Government have taken from the people of Canada. The total exports of our magnificent fisheries from the Atlantic to the Pacific and on the sea-coast, amounted in ten years, to $81,938,067—seven years out of the ten, the benefit from the total products of the fisheries of this country have been wiped out by the Government, taken from the people in the way of Customs taxation. The total products of the forest amounted to $230,779,664; two and a half years out of the ten years, the product of our forest, that magnificent source of income, has been wiped out by excessive taxation. The total export of the manufactures of this country amounted to $43,841,000; $14,000,000 more than the total export of manufactures have been taken by this Government. Of animals and their products, embracing cheese, butter, and all the other products of animals, amounting, in ten years, to $243,163,515; the receipts of nearly two and a half years out of the ten have been taken and lost to the people by this Government wringing them out of their pockets in extra taxation. Of the total of agricultural products, embracing everything that you grow in the field and on the farm, exported in ten years, amounting to $162,752,312 over three and a half years' product out of the ten has been taken by this Government in excessive taxation during the last ten years, over and above what the Mackenzie Government took, and with which they carried on the affairs of the country in all its departments, keeping up its public works and developing the country; and in addition to taking $57,000,000 of money by extra taxation during those ten years the Government added $2,000,000 per year more to the public debt than was added during the Mackenzie Administration.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When the House rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to show the excessive taxation that had been levied on the country during the period of the administration of this Government. From the tables I submitted, I think it was manifest to any one that we had a country that is grand in its resources, a country of which we might justly be proud, or, I venture the suggestion, it would not have borne as well as it has done the strain that has been placed upon it. Now, Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me, I should like to point out what I might term one of the many fallacies—perhaps I should not use that term—one of the many one-sided and misleading statements that are to be found in the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance. If you remember, Sir, he stated with great emphasis that on the articles of sugar, tea, coffee and rice, four articles, the Government had levied a small amount of taxation, that if the rate of duty that was levied under the Cartwright tariff had been applied to the imports of those articles during the past year, there would have been a difference of $5,823,442; and he added:

There is that saving between the two rates of taxation to the people of this country.

I do not stop now to inquire as to the effect of placing raw sugar under No. 14 on the free list on the quantity imported. Everyone knows that if you make an article cheap the consumption is greater. It is not with that point I wish to deal; but I wish to point out how utterly misleading it is to suppose that there has been a reduction in the taxation of the people by that amount of $5,000,000 odd, which, it seems to me, such an expression, standing as it does, stated as it was, would lead the country to understand. The hon. gentleman did not tell the people at the same time as he made the statement, which I conceive would only have been fair and proper on his part, that while they had saved, if we take the statement of the hon. gentleman, $5,000,000 odd to the people on those four articles of taxation, he had taken more than double the amount from them by increasing the taxes on other products. What does it matter to the country whether $5,000,000 had been levied on this or that article, save and except that the articles he mentioned had this merit, that all the duty levied on them would go into the public treasury, while it was possible to impose a rate of taxation upon other articles that, in order to bring such an amount of revenue, would involve the imposition of a large taxation indirectly on the people, but which did not go into the treasury. What the people of the country are concerned about is not so much the articles on which taxation is levied, though in that case and in that light the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is not to be compared in the interests of the people with the policy that prevailed before, but what they are concerned about is, what amount of money have you wrung out of the people by the scale of your taxation on all articles. That is the question that gives them concern, and the Minister knows that the Government had taken $8,000,000 more taxation that year out of the people than did the Mackenzie Administration. The Minister of Finance is well aware that for some years before that time the Government took between $10,000,000 and $11,000,000 annually more from the people than the Mackenzie Administration had done. What is the use of talking to the people of saving them $5,000,000 of taxation on certain articles, if the hon. gentleman has taken double the amount of that taxation out of their pockets on other articles? The Minister of Finance told us further—and he was fair in doing so—it was brought out in his explanation of his inability to keep the public debt at the figure at which it was and not increase it during the past year, when some millions have been added to it, that when he gave this relief from the burden of taxation on sugar, he had not been able to maintain the public debt at the point at which it stood because of the loss of revenue sustained by placing sugar on the free list, and he was forced to make up the amount lost by that condition of taxation by borrowing money and adding it to the public debt. He said he thought it was fair that posterity should bear part of the expense of the public works which were being constructed. I do not find fault with that contention; but the fact remains, and the country will note it, that the hon. gentleman was not able to keep the public debt at the point at which it stood and raise a revenue equal to his expenditure with the reduced duty on the article of sugar. We heard this afternoon from the Minister of Railways allusions to a change of policy on the part of the Liberal party. He alluded to unrestricted reciprocity; that that had been dropped and no one was thinking about it; that it involved discrimination against Great Britain; that it involved the total destruction of our manufactures, and that we had discovered that it would not do to appeal to the people on that line. Sir, those hon. gentlemen give their own definition of unrestricted reciprocity. It would be better, I think, if they would define clearly what their own policy is, and allow the Liberals to define theirs. The hon. gentleman asked, what does unrestricted reciprocity mean? Hon. gentlemen opposite have professed, I wish I could say in my heart that they have done anything else than professed, that they desired freer trade relations with the people of the United States, and desired to secure a reciprocal arrangement with them; but they took care to inform us that, while they might enter upon negotiations, they would be on a restricted basis, that the discussion would be confined to reciprocity in natural products, and that the consideration of manufactured articles would not be allowed to enter into the discussion. The Liberal party, in contradistinction to that policy, were in favour of entering into negotiations, talking over the practicability of obtaining freer trade relations or reciprocity with the people of the United States, and they would not restrict the subjects discussed and passed under review, and would not withhold manufactures from the discussion, but the discussion on the whole items which enter into the trade with the two countries would be unrestricted, and an effort would be made to ascertain to what extent we could secure reciprocal trade arrangements with the people to the south of us. That has been our policy. It involved no dishonour. Not one on this side of the House desires any reciprocity treaty with dishonour. The Liberals believe that it would be in the interest of the people of the United States, and that it would be in the interest of the people of Canada, if they could trade more freely together. The Liberal party thought that an object such as that was worthy the attention of statesmen, and they believed further, that an honest attempt ought to be made to get it. And, Sir, if the people of the country only rightly understood the position of hon. gentlemen opposite in reference to that matter, if they only thoroughly comprehended the manner in which these hon. gentlemen have played with it, I think they would agree upon the point that if it be in the interests of this country to have freer trade relations with the United States to a greater, or to a lesser or to such a degree as was possible, then the way to attain it, the most likely means, rather, of obtaining it, would be to put in power men who are in favour of reciprocity and who would make an honest attempt to secure it; and to take the reins of power out of the hands of men who, while professing to seek it, have, by their speeches on the platform and elsewhere, made clear the fact that they did not desire it; men who have made it more difficult to obtain, by reason of the course they have pursued in the negotiations that have already been entered upon. Speaking as a member of the Liberal party, I am to-day in favour of securing the freest possible trade relations with the people of the United States, consistent with the dignity, the honour and the stability of both countries. We are told by gentlemen opposite: "You will blot out your manufacturing industries if you have free trade with the United States." I denounce that sentiment as unworthy of the men who utter it, and as unpatriotic in its nature. What does it involve? To speak of the manufacturers of Canada not being able to hold their own with the manufacturers of the United States in a fair field and no favour, is to depreciate the intellect and the brain of Canadian manufacturers, and to underrate the skill, the energy, the industry of every artisan in Canada. I repudiate such a sentiment. I hold that Canadians are the equal of the people of any other nation in the world, and as proof of the ability of the Canadian manufacturer and artisan, I point to the fact that they are able to hold their own in fair competition and in a free market with the United States manufacturers and artisans. I point, as proof, to the positions occupied by tens of thousands, nay, by hundreds of thousands, of our fellow-Canadians, who are to-day in the United States many with their capital invested in manufactures there. I point to the Canadian artisans, who by their skill and their energy are building up the vast industries of that country, and I tell you that, take them man for man, the Canadian artisan in the American workshop does not fear comparison with any man from any country or from any clime, who stands beside him. I tell you, Sir, that the Canadian brain, pitted against the brain furnished by any other nationality—in a country where there are representatives of almost every nationality—the Canadian brain holds its own with the best brain that can be found in the United States. Yet these gentlemen opposite say: If you have reciprocity in manufactured goods and free and fair markets for all, the Canadian manufacturer and the Canadian artisan, being of inferior material, would go down in the strife. I repudiate that. Oh, that Canada should be governed by men who take such a view of the capabilities of her people? I tell these hon. gentlemen opposite that what the Canadian manufacturer, as well as the Canadian farmer, the Canadian lumberman, the Canadian fisherman and the Canadian miner want, is larger markets and freer trade with the people of the world. If the Finance Minister could secure to these manufacturers a larger market for that which they produce, he, although he says now it would ruin them, he, in my judgment, would soon find out that he had benefited the manufacturers, as well as he would benefit the agriculturists and all other industries in this country. The hon. gentleman has spoken of preferential trade. He has sought by his language to lead the people of this country to believe that perhaps there is something in that, and that if they will only submit to the burdens which his Government has placed upon them, by and by, he says, he thinks there may be a change in the feeling in England. On what is this hope based which he holds out to the people? It is true that he admits with fairness and honesty that there is a strong prejudice, as he terms it, against preferential trade in England, but he thinks that England will by and by learn the lesson which he himself has learned, that a nation can enrich itself by protection. But the English people seem slow to learn that. Not very long ago, Lord Salisbury, the leader of the Conservative party in England—if I read his words aright—in speaking on this subject, said: He doubted not only its expediency, but he doubted its morality. If you find an English statesman of the position of Lord Salisbury believing that a certain course is immoral, it will take a long time to have a high-minded statesman of the British Empire enter upon a course that is viewed in that light. It is not only Lord Salisbury who has the same view on this question in England. Last summer there was a great meeting of business men in the city of London, England, representatives from all the self-governing colonies of the Empire, meeting with the Chambers of Commerce of Great Britain and Ireland to discuss questions of trade and commerce, to see by what means commerce might be developed between Britain and the outlying portions of the Empire, and how closely commercial union might be established between the colonies and the mother land. One of the resolutions that was submitted in that commercial congress, comprising, I suppose, the best business men that were to be found throughout the length and breadth of Great Britain and Ireland, comprising the representatives of the chambers of commerce and boards of trade of the different Canadian cities and of the Australian and other dependencies, the following resolution was brought forward by Mr. Medley, of the London Chamber of Commerce :—

That in the opinion of this congress, any fiscal union between the mother country and her colonies and dependencies by means of preferential duties, being based on protection, would be politically dangerous, and economically disastrous, and that the arrangement which more than any other would conduce to an intimate commercial union, would be by our self-governing colonies adopting as closely as circumstances will permit, the non-protective policy of the mother country.

Sir Charles Tupper moved an amendment to the resolution in the following words :—

Whereas, the British Empire, covering one-eighth of the habitable globe, with a population of 350,000,000, can supply the home market with the production of every clime at the lowest possible cost, and whereas a national sentiment of mutual interest and brotherhood should promote more extended trade relations between the mother country and its many colonies and possessions,—Resolved, That in order to extend the exchange and consumption of the home staple products in every part of the British Empire, a slight differential duty should be adopted by the Imperial and Colonial Governments, in favour of the home productions against the imported foreign articles.

Slight differential duty ! The vote was taken: the amendment was put first, and it was voted down by thirty-three in favour of it to fifty-eight against it. Among the thirty-three who voted for it only seven of the English chambers of commerce are to be found, while among those who voted against it we find thirty-eight of the English chambers. So that thirty-eight to seven of the English chambers of commerce voted down the proposition that you could promote trade between the countries by the imposition of slight preferential duties ; and the original motion of Mr. Medley was then adopted by a vote of forty-seven for to thirty-four against. I have not a record to show how the English chambers stood in that vote ; but judging by their vote on the amendment, I presume that they stood in about the same proportion ; and in adopting Mr. Medley's motion they put upon record their belief that "any fiscal union between the mother country and her colonies and dependencies by means of preferential duties, being based upon protection, would be politically dangerous and economically disastrous." Sir, whether the chambers of commerce there represented, a large majority of them, or the Finance Minister, may be right or wrong, I need not attempt to decide. But I will say that the Finance Minister had a ground for stating there was a strong prejudice against it in the minds of the English people, and I will say also, that he holds views very radically different from the views held by the English chambers of commerce ; for what they declare would be politically dangerous and economically disastrous, he, desiring to please the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), declared if it could be carried out—I speak from memory—would be the grandest thing that had ever been accomplished since man was created. Well, Sir, whether it be desirable or be not desirable, the Minister himself admits that it cannot be brought about soon, and what the country wants to know is whether, after that admission, you have no relief for the people of this country save that proposition. You do not propose it yourself ; you say it cannot be accomplished for years at any rate. What the people have a right to ask is, what are you going to do for the country now ? Is it to remain burdened by taxation, with its energies crippled, its markets restricted, during all these years, and not a hand is to be put forth or an effort made in any direction to secure freer trade ? Is that to be the course of the Government ? Such it would seem to be ; for while professing to seek reciprocity or freer trade arrangements with the United States, they are taking the ground that they will exclude manufactures from the consideration of the question, that they will limit themselves to natural products, although the leading men of the United States have told them over and over again that they cannot hope to secure reciprocity on any such lines. Well, I come now to consider the policy that the Minister was expected to propose ; I have to put it that way, for he did not propose it. Balancing his speech, as I said, this way and that way, it is impossible to tell what the course of the Government is to be, save and except that they are at sea and do not know what to do, and tremble lest they should take a step that might lose them their position on the Treasury benches. But with what gravity of countenance, with what solemnity of manner, with what emphasis did the Finance Minister play with the House the other day. He is not a practical joker ; yet, I was going to say, if I might use the expression, it looked very much as if he had been attempting a "sell" upon the House. We were listening, not on this side of the House alone, but on his own side as well, to see what the Government intended to do. After the Minister had pointed out how there had been a divergence of sentiment on this question ever since 1878, how some held this view, and some held that view, and some held another view, and how this difference of opinion had been accentuated by the low prices of grain, and had been further accentuated by the McKinley tariff and other causes, the question had been brought to the Houses of Parliament and it had reached the ears of the Ministers, and he would now deal with the question. And so the House expected that now we should have the policy of the Government detailed, that we should have something plain and explicit. They are asking from the leader of the Opposition the details of his policy before he is charged with the duty of formulating it, while they themselves are declining to give even an intelligible cue to what their policy is to be. Sir, after the many minutes that had been taken in leading up to the question by a discussion of all the different views that were taken, the Finance Minister announced—and Government supporters crept down to chairs nearer to him with expectant ears to hear his policy :

So that the Government, while it wishes to give due weight, and no more than due weight, to any of these causes, and to any one of these complaints; while it acknowledges the varying forces, varying in proportion to their merit and their strength; although the Government does not intend to be either frightened or forced into doing something which it does not believe to be right; the Government takes this stand to-day, and is willing to have it known broadcast,—

The expectancy was great.—

--that what it proposes to do will be done after the most careful, and earnest, and due consideration, not extended beyond a reasonable period--

Movement on the part of the hon. gentleman's supporters who think, at least, they have got it.

-- they propose to do that which, as a matter of trade and tariff policy, is best for this country as a whole.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is not for me to explain; it is for the Finance Minister to do that; he left them a little more in doubt. You will find hesitancy on the part of the gentlemen supporting the Government this time, I fancy, in this debate. It was plain sailing during previous sessions for fourteen years. All you had to do on the other side was to utter the words "National Policy," in order to elicit the cheers of hon. gentlemen.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is a single cheer now, and that comes from the gentleman who tried the other day to pull out one of the bricks. It did not matter whether Sir Charles Tupper put 50 cents a ton on coal; when he did it under the name of the

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

National Policy, lauding it in the same breath, cheers were heard to the echo. When Sir Charles Tupper took the duty off anthracite coal, and told them it was a great relief to the burdens of the people, using the words "National Policy" at the same time, like cheers were heard; and so with every article, whether the duty was put on or whether it was taken off. The Finance Minister put an increased duty on sugar, coupling it with the National Policy, and cheers rang through the Chamber. He took it off, and said: I have thrown off $3,500,000 of taxation from you, and then they cheered because it was the National Policy; but where are they now? The Ministry are not only going to, after due consideration, what is best in the interests of the whole country, but the Finance Minister has given us to understand that, as a cry, the old flag and the old policy is played out, and now it is to be the old landmarks, and it will take hon. gentlemen opposite all their time, while this Budget debate lasts, to find out what these landmarks are and where they are, so that I am afraid they will not be able to give us the benefit of their views and ability on this important occasion. Well, what do you think the Minister proposes to do? He has told us that he wants time for consideration. I do not wonder at it. After declaring for fourteen years that they had a policy which was the very quintessence of all that was good in the interests of this country, after not hesitating to denounce as a traitor anybody who would question that, to be obliged now to come down, after a short interval between two sessions of Parliament, and hint that possibly the whole thing was wrong from top to bottom, is rather hard. The hon. gentleman wants time to consider. He wants time to break the news to the country. He is not prepared to admit just yet that the National Policy proved a failure. Rumours that it is a partial failure have reached his ears, but he is not in a position to know. It is generally supposed that a Ministry, especially when their members are so strong that they can divide up subjects among themselves, would be able to have some idea of the necessities and requirements of the country, and of their duty as a Government. One would naturally suppose that the 130 or 140 of their supporters, coming from the east and the west, coming from provinces large and provinces small, possessed of information as to the state of the country and its requirements in their different localities, would be consulted by the Government. One would naturally suppose that the duty of the Government would be to take their advice and learn what might be learned from those trusted representatives of the people. During the many years I have sat here, I have noticed that Government supporters have been insulted, as I thought, in many ways. I have often wondered at their lack of courage, I have often wondered at their submission to the treatment they received, and I say that, in the proposition of the Minister of Finance, if ever there was an insult rendered to members of Parliament, it is rendered them now in the plan he has just declared he is about to pursue. Why not consult the members of this House? I speak not of members of the Opposition, but surely he might consult the 130 or 140 of his supporters, and find out the state of the country, the feeling of the country, the condition of the country, and of commerce, from them. But no, he declares, in fact, that they are not able to guide him in this matter, that he himself will associate with himself three other experts, and that, during the recess, they will ascertain the state of the country and what the duty of the Government is. These four gentlemen will do what? They will make a personal inspection of the different industries of the country. I trust they will do that in a thorough manner, if they will undertake it at all. Does the hon. gentleman know the task he is undertaking? Does he propose, when he says that, only to select two or three or a dozen manufacturers, and ask their views, and learn from them what the Government ought to do in the best interests of the whole country? Sir, if he assumes that line and is actuated by that idea, I beg to remind him that his own officials have reported to us that there are 75,768 industrial establishments in this country, scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and I beg to remind him that whether these establishments be small or great the proprietors of them are citizens of this country and are as much entitled to have their voices heard and to have weight given to their opinions as are the few who may have attained greater proportions so far as capital and the employment of labour are concerned. Has the hon. gentleman figured what it will take, what labour it will involve, to say nothing of the insult heaped upon his followers in this proposition?

Mr. FOSTER. It will take all summer, won't it?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The commission surely will not work on Sunday. If they do not, there are some other days they will not work, and I take it there will only be 300 days in their working year. First, you must leave out fifty-two Sundays; then, as patriotic men, the commissioners cannot work on the Queen's Birthday, and certainly not on the First of July. And it is possible that there might be another day near the middle of July on which part of the troupe would refuse to play in that comedy. So that, taking these holidays out, they have only about 300 days in which they can work. Now, he did not detail to us whether these four are to go in the one car Jamaica or whether there is to be a separate car for each, one to make for the Pacific and another down to the Atlantic, for I take it that the people of British Columbia and the people of Prince Edward Island will want to have an opportunity of presenting their views on this as well as those of the other provinces. So, whether they will divide the party and one go one way and another another way, I do not know, but if they do it will take a long time to compare notes when they get back. If they do not divide, they will have to do 252 industries per day. But if they do divide, then each man will have to see not more than sixty-three a day and talk to the proprietor and ask him how trade is and what he thinks the duty of the Finance Minister in this matter is and whether he thinks he could do with a little reduction in the rate of protection given him. That would allow them ten minutes conversation with each man, working ten hours a day and travelling at night. When they come back they will have ascertained the views of the heads only of the different industrial establishments. But, on the basis of this ten minute interview, how about getting the views of the men, the artisans, that are working in these factories burdened under the rate of taxation that is upon them? Is no time to be taken to hear these men, whose interests are just as dear to them, whose rights are to be maintained by a righteous Government as much as those of the man who employs them? What about the great agricultural class, are they to be heard, are they to have time to present their case? I ask the Minister if he has not laid out a large task for himself and the three gentlemen he has associated with him, in order to arrive at a wise decision as to what is the best in the interests of the whole country? Sir, the Minister made a speech last year. He was not then ashamed of the old flag or the old policy. He was, like his supporters behind him, ready to stand up for both, and speaking on the question of reciprocity, he said:

If the Canadian manufacturers cannot have a fair entrance into the markets of the United States, where we would, of course, meet with strong competition from the accumulations of skill and capital that are there, he can at least under the shelter of a proper protection, supply the great and growing home market for manufactures, and with the stability insured at home, he can push his wares into those countries where they find entrance on more favourable terms.

Stability was necessary to the success of the manufacturer, according to the Finance Minister's speech last year; but what is the keynote of his speech this year? Is it stability? It is wavering; it is doubt. Business men of the country and manufacturers cannot tell what is to be the policy and what changes are to be made by the Government. I venture to say the hon. gentleman has unsettled business, and has created a feeling of disquiet and fear, if not panic, throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion. Sir Leonard Tilley told us, when he was Finance Minister, and when the House was dissolved before the proper time upon one occasion, that the reason for this action was that millions of money were waiting for investment, and that it would not be invested before the election because those who owned it did not know what policy was to prevail. If he was right then, how can the Finance Minister expect investments now that no one can tell from his speech what his course is to be? Sir, it would have been better if that portion of the hon. gentleman's speech had been omitted; it would have been better in my judgment, it would have been safer for the country, if he had met the question fairly and squarely and dealt with it. It would have been better had he recognized the necessity of change and acted upon it, or, if he believed what he had been preaching for the last fourteen years, that the Government were right, he should have had the courage and manliness to stand by it and say so, and not produce this feeling of unrest and disquiet which the announcement of his speech will make throughout the country.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am told it is not necessary to notice the interrupter. Now, without wishing to detain the House longer—for I wish to give my friend the Minister of the Interior, who is to follow me, a good portion of the evening, and not to detain him until too late in the night, and as I am getting tired of long speeches when made by other members of the House, and I suppose they are equally tired of long speeches when they are made by me—let me ask why should the confidence of the people of this country be continued in the present Government? Is it for anything in their past record that ought to commend them? Is it their present course, with their self-confessed inability to grasp the condition of the country or to tell what it is their duty to do? Sir, I allude to certain things in the history of the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, not with a view to casting ridicule upon them, but with this one object in view: I hold, Sir, that in trusting the destinies of the country to any set of men, it is desirable in the interests of the country, that they should be men possessed of that breadth of mind pertaining to a statesman that can forecast, with moderate accuracy, the condition of affairs under a certain line of policy, so that the country should not be committed to a policy which must involve loss and the laying of burdens upon the people greater than they are able to bear. Sir, what is their record? I arraign the Government that sits opposite, and that has sat opposite for the last fourteen years, and charge that they have been wrong in almost every forecast they have ever made with reference to this country and what was best to be done. I say not only they have been wrong, but they have been so utterly and enormously wrong that they have brought this country to a comparative state of poverty that would not have been conceived possible in case of a country as rich as Canada and with her immense resources and possibilities. Sir, they started out on a wrong basis. I did not believe their basis; but they started out with legislation upon this basis when their Finance Minister declared that the reason the country was not more prosperous was because they allowed too many foreign goods to come in this country; that the secret of the prosperity of a nation was to be found by putting on duties and shutting out imports. If you had a larger import than export, the balance of trade was against you; and that balance of trade against you, represented the measure of the loss to the country. Sir, I did not believe it; it was a fallacy, and I think the hon. gentlemen themselves are beginning to ascertain it. In one year they turned the balance of trade in our favour; and I remember the cheers that went up when they declared that now they had found the secret, now they had entered upon that course of legislation which would give prosperity to the country. Year succeeded year, and what was the result? Why, the result was, that from 1881 to 1885, a period of five years, the balance of trade against them was $20,636,841 annually, just about as great as it was during the Mackenzie Administration, when they said it was evidence that the country was misgoverned. In the five succeeding years, down to 1892, their annual adverse balance of trade has been greater than it was during the Mackenzie Administration. If gentlemen lay down as a cardinal principle, that if you have the balance of trade against you, you are poorer by that extent, I ask them how they can deny, according to their own reasoning, that the country is poorer now than it was during the Mackenzie Administration? Sir Charles Tupper, when he imposed the iron duties in 1887, I think it was, still held to that fallacy, as I consider it; but it is a fallacy that these gentlemen hold as statesmanship. He alluded to this balance of trade that was against us and urged as one of the reasons for putting on the excessive duties on iron, that it would be produced in this country, and the vast imports of iron and the manufactures of iron, coming from other countries, would wipe out the adverse balance of trade that was against us and thus ensure stability to the country. In their forecast of what they would do in this matter, they were wrong, and I am glad they were wrong, for I do not hold that the balance of trade against a country proves by any means that the country is poorer by that amount. In reference to the theory of expenditure, what did they tell us? They denounced the Mackenzie Administration for a yearly expenditure of $23,000,000 or $24,000,000, and declared that $23,000,000 was enough to run the country upon, and what has it come to now? Thirty-six million dollars where they said twenty-two millions would do. Admitting there is more population in the country, and adding the percentage, they will find that they are expending ten millions more to-day than they were under the Mackenzie Administration. If, then, there was danger to the country under the expenditure of Mr. Mackenzie of ten millions less than their own, is there not greater danger to the country now? Where is the statesmanship of these men who said they could hold the expenditure to that amount, and have allowed it to increase until it has reached the enormous sum of $36,000,000? Sir, in no way is their blundering, their incapacity to be seen more clearly than in Manitoba and the North-west. Sir, as a Canadian, desiring, as every one of you desire, to see my country become great and prosperous, and above all things, that the people may be happy and contented, I have desired, with strong desire, and do still desire, that the North-west and the province of Manitoba should fill up with a people that might find happy homes there, a population that would develop the resources of that country, that would give us strength in numbers, stability as a nation, and prosperity as a people. Sir, these gentlemen promised us, when they led this House into an expenditure of tens of millions of dollars, that it would not be a burden too great upon us, because we would see that under their management thousands and hundreds of thousands of people would flow into that country, settle this land, and help us to bear the burdens that we were taking upon ourselves, and reduce the rate of taxation that was upon us. What has been the result? Sir, the prediction of the then First Minister and the then Minister of Finance was that by the year 1890, at the lowest calculation, which they said was a calculation absurdly low, we should have 637,775 souls in the North-west and Manitoba.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Rot.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, my friend, if it is rot, I would advise you to take less of it. There are certain courtesies, Mr. Speaker, that are due from one hon. member of this House to another. I would be the last man to resent a good-natured, pleasant interruption, but persistent interruption, rude and vulgar in its nature, you would not expect me to submit to. Well, Sir, I was telling you what the First Minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, said would take place in that country, and what he said was endorsed by the votes and the cheers of the men who sat behind him; and now what is the result? Where was their wisdom, their forethought, their forecast, in that matter? The census counted the people in those countries, and found but 221,996, found only one-third of the number of people that we were assured would be living there when we were induced to make that expenditure. I remember when they asked Parliament to sanction their policy, that Sir Charles Tupper himself, who did not often hesitate at anything, hesitated in asking the House for that enormous vote, pledging the resources and the wealth of this country to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, because he said, it would be a burden greater than the people could be expected to bear if they had to bear it alone.

But he said there need be no fear on that point, and the First Minister endorsed what he said and declared that as the result of the sales of land in the North-west, we would have by 1892, two years ago, in the public treasury either cash in hand or securities as good as cash to the amount of $69,000,000, and, therefore, the Canadian Pacific Railway would not involve this country in any burdens in the shape of increased taxation. That was the calculation. What was the result? Will the Minister of Finance tell me, taking the total sales of land in that country from that day down to 1890, taking the total receipts on the one hand and the disbursements on the other and including the charges for all surveys, whether a dollar of profit has been derived from that source. That is where we are landed. We have not the money, the debt is upon us, and the taxation has to be borne by us. That has been the course of hon. gentlemen opposite. They predicted increased wealth to the country through the National Policy. Have they increased the wealth of the country under it, as we increased the wealth of the country before it was adopted? Have they increased the value of farms in the provinces of the Dominion in this year 1892 over the value of farms in 1878? Is there any hon. gentleman who will answer that question now?

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then I think the hon. gentleman's answer will not receive credence on this side of the House by any one fortunate enough to own farm lands. Perhaps the hon. gentleman may know a certain tract of land, some small parcel of land which has increased in value; but I am asking if the great farm lands of this country would sell to-day at a higher price than they realized in 1878, with like buildings and in like condition? Sir, the people of this country will answer that question for themselves, each one according to his own experience, and I am quite willing, having asked the question, to leave the intelligent agriculturists of this Dominion from one end to the other to supply the answer, and if they can say that those lands have been increased in value by virtue of the National Policy, then I would say to them, support it; but if they say that those lands have not increased in value, then they are bound to acknowledge that this Government misconceived the effects that would be produced by the National Policy in the direction of conferring benefits on the agriculturists. I do not desire to continue the debate longer, but to allow the Minister of Interior, who will follow me, to speak at a comparatively early hour. In conclusion I must say that, taking the history of this country, the history of its management of its lands and its resources, the amount of taxation that has been wrung from the people by its administration in all departments, I am unable to find that which ought to commend it to the support of the electors, and certainly if the history of their past legislation does not justify confidence being reposed in them, I ask what there is in the present position and attitude of the Government, sitting in their seats helpless to determine what they ought to do or what the country requires, to justify the maintenance in power of these men, and whether it would not be in the interests of the country to replace them by men who believe they know what ought to be done in the interests of this Dominion, and, knowing it, are prepared to do it, and do it now if the opportunity was given them.

Mr. DALY. You can naturally understand, Mr. Speaker, that I am somewhat abashed, having to reply to an hon. gentleman so old in debate, so old in experience, and so old a politician as the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. And more particularly do I feel my position as I have had to sit here during two hours and a half listening to the hon. gentleman's stentorian tones, and seeing his fiery eyes, and having his manly finger pointed at me, as if his voice were not sufficiently strong, and if his manner was not sufficiently earnest, and as if he could not impress upon the House his arguments except by enforcing them by pointing his finger at me. I can only say that, listening to the hon. gentleman, I have listened to what I have listened to before; I have listened to what hon. gentlemen have listened to before, and I have listened to what numerous audiences throughout Ontario listened to during the last general elections, and during the by-elections. It is the same old story, the same old wail; and I suppose that will continue until such time as the condition of affairs unhappily shall be changed in Canada, and those hon. gentlemen occupy the seats which we occupy at this present time. The hon. gentleman has, I take it, made the best possible argument he can, and made the greatest onslaught possible on the policy of this Government. And what does it all amount to? It amounts simply to this, that we have a reiteration of the old chestnuts that have been used for years, and exception taken to the Minister of Finance's announcement of the policy of the Government. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) said the Minister of Finance's words meant nothing, that they could not be construed to mean anything. The reason the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is not pleased with the words of the Finance Minister in announcing the policy of the Government is, that he considered that the hon. gentleman would possibly have acted, not the manly part he did in presenting the views of the Government and supporting them as Finance Minister, but that he would have taken the cowardly part adopted by politicians in years past. The Finance Minister, in making his announcement to the House the other day, told hon. members that he was telling the truth, that he had no reason to disregard the truth, and he desired to make a manly, straightforward and open explanation of the policy of the Government. And what is that policy? That policy is that we will remain with the old landmarks—those were the words which the hon. gentleman used—with the old flag, and with the old policy. And more than that, he said there was a feeling of unrest throughout the country and the Government were prepared to meet the condition of affairs in Canada to-day by making such changes in the tariff as would meet present circumstances. But the Minister of Finance had the manliness and courage to say, and the Government have the manliness and courage to say that they do not believe they, with one fell swoop, within the very short time they have occupied the Treasury benches, can go to work and undo a tariff framed some fourteen years ago. The hon. gentleman ridiculed the statement of the Finance Minister that he intended, in company with his colleagues, to visit different parts of the Dominion during the recess, in order to ascertain the condition of affairs. The hon. gentleman said that the Finance Minister would have to visit some 700,000 factories, that he would have to interview so many hundreds of thousands of mechanics, that he would have to work night and day and even on Sundays and holidays in order to fulfil his mission, and that even then he could not accomplish it. While my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) was banteringly alluding to this, it occurred to me that, if the Minister wished his views to reach all the manufacturers and the supposed distressed agriculturists of Canada, he should hire a hall and get the hon. member from Brant (Mr. Paterson) to proclaim upon the roof tops the position of affairs, for I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman's voice would reach through many constituencies, and would make the announcement far and wide. My hon. friend who has just spoken takes exception to the initiation of the National Policy. He said that there was no occasion for this policy, but he forgets that when the National Policy was announced by the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, who then led the Opposition in this House, there was a feeling of unrest throughout the length and breadth of Canada such as does not exist to-day. He remembers, no doubt, however, that he was a supporter of the Mackenzie Government which had been in power for about four years, and which had as Finance Minister, the present member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. member has forgotten that the Finance Minister of the Mackenzie Administration was not prepared, as the present Finance Minister is, to listen to the voice of the people with reference to trade matters and the condition of affairs, but that on the contrary, he turned a deaf ear to them. They asked for bread and he gave them a stone, and, Sir, so intense was the feeling of the country at that time, that when the Mackenzie Administration appealed to the people, the electorate of Canada hurled them from power. When Sir John Macdonald came into office, he carried out the promises he had made to the people when he was in opposition, and he brought forward in due course the resolution upon which was based the National Policy. If I mistake not—"Hansard" may not record it, although history does—the member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) had some ideas in favour of a policy, which if not the National Policy, was at all events akin to it. I do not think that the hon. gentleman himself was in accord with the policy of Sir Richard Cartwright at that time. It would occupy too much of the time of the House if I were to follow the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) through all his peregrinations, and I shall but briefly allude to some of his arguments. He quoted figures to try to show that the exports of Canada were as great during the time of the Mackenzie Administration as they have been since, and that we exported to as many countries then as we do now. I do not gainsay the hon. gentleman's figures. No doubt we did export largely then; but the reason was that we had to export our manufactures, because at that time we had no market for them in our own country. The cry of the people against the Government of that day was: that the Americans were making a slaughter market of Canada; that they were running our home products out of our home market, and I do not suppose that any class of the people felt this more than did the fellow-citizens of my hon. friend who lives in Brantford. I am glad to be able to say that we are exporting in a greater ratio to-day than we did then; that we are exporting to the same and to other foreign countries, and that we are exporting to a great market which we had not at that time, namely, the market of Manitoba, Northwest, and British Columbia. We have got our home market to-day, and we have got as well other foreign markets, which we had not in 1878. The hon. gentleman would lead us to believe in his statement that the National Policy has done nothing for this country, and that Canadians are not to-day in a prosperous condition. It seems to me almost a waste of time for the Finance Minister and other speakers on this side of the House to give figures here day after day; to show that this country is in a most prosperous condition, when hon. gentlemen opposite do not want to believe it. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) gave figures the other night in reference to our aggregate trade, and he endeavoured to make the House believe that under his Administration this country had enjoyed as large a volume of trade as it does now. We have only to look at the Trade and Navigation Returns to show the incorrectness of this statement. The total exports of Canada in 1868 were of the value of $131,027,532. In 1874, under the wise Administration of Sir John Macdonald they rose to $217,565,510, an increase of $86,537,978, but in 1874, when the Liberal Government came into power, although our aggregate trade amounted to 217,000,000 odd dollars, I regret to say, and the shame is upon gentlemen on the other side of the House, that our trade decreased to $153,445,682 in 1878, or a loss in a few years of $64,119,828; but, Sir, a new era had dawned upon our country, and the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald assumed power, and announced his National Policy, and the trade which in 1879 dwindled down to $153,445,682 has risen in the year 1892 to over $241,369,443, an increase in the thirteen years between 1879 and 1892, of $87,923,761. That should indicate to any fair-minded man, that Canada is, in an immense degree, more prosperous to-day than she was under the Liberal regime. My hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) lives in the manufacturing city of Brantford, a city which is shown, by the census returns, to have gained in population and wealth in a greater ratio than almost any other town in Ontario, and it is extraordinary to me that he should have the hardihood to stand here to-night and say that this country is not prosperous. I find, by the census returns, that the city of Brantford had, in 1881, a population of 9,616 and in 1891 a population of 12,753, an increase, in ten years, of 3,137 or 32.6 per cent. So far as trade is concerned, in the city of Brantford, I find by "Bulletin No. 12," that in 1881 there were 140 manufacturing establishments, and in 1891, 250. The capital invested in that city in 1881 was $1,028,983, which, in 1891, amounted to $3,231,879. In 1881 the number of hands employed in Brantford was 1,306, but in 1891 it amounted to 2,185. The wages paid in Brantford in 1881 were $433,828, while in 1891, that sum increased to $1,031,675. The cost of material in 1881 was $1,122,747, and in 1891, $1,894,926, while the value of the products of the factory in 1881 was $1,931,097, which rose, in 1891, to $4,280,009. These are the figures pertaining to the condition of affairs in the town in which the hon. gentleman lives, but, forsooth, he would lead this House, and the people of the country to believe that the province of Ontario—the banner province, we may say, of the Confederation—is not in as prosperous condition as it was in 1878. He would lead us to believe that the farmers and manufacturers are poverty-stricken, that the people are unduly weighted by taxation, on account of the National Policy, that they cannot earn a livelihood here, and that the farmer cannot get fair prices for his produce. One would think, to hear his lamentable tale, told in stentorian tones, that the people residing in the province of Ontario, were in a worse condition than those of the southern states of America. But when I quote to you the statistics furnished by the Ontario Government, not by this Government, I think you will come to the conclusion that, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, she is in a pretty prosperous condition, and that—

I say it without fear of contradiction—there is no state in the Union to-day, having a population and soil similar to those of Ontario, in one-half or one-quarter as prosperous a condition as that province. I find that the value of farm property in Ontario in 1891 was placed at $971,886,063, made up as follows:—$621,245,223 of farm land, $191,268,327 of buildings, $50,651,442 of implements, and $108,721,076 of live stock; and the total value of field crops of the province was placed at $129,923,667; and the report says:

The growth of the farming industry is seen in the fact that during ten years the value of farm buildings has increased by 44 per cent, of farm implements by 36 per cent, and live stock by 35 per cent.

Now, the hon. gentleman said that he would ask any member of this House to say whether the value of farm lands had not decreased throughout the length and breadth of Canada, compared with ten years ago. I will admit that in the province of Ontario farm lands have decreased in value during the last ten years; but they have not decreased below their proper value. I say that the farm lands of Ontario to-day are at their proper value. The value placed upon them ten years ago was a fictitious value, fixed by the fact that there was not sufficient uncleared land ready for cultivation, and that consequently land was greatly in demand by immigrants coming here from other lands and by men who desired to increase their holdings or who had sons they desired to place upon farms. For these reasons farm lands went up to $75 of $100 an acre. But if the value of farm lands is lower to-day than it was ten years ago, is it right to charge this Government or their policy with that depreciation? I say that an argument of that kind is the height of absurdity. The value of lands in Ontario and in the other older provinces in Canada has been affected by the same cause as the value of farm lands on the other side of the line, namely, by the fact of farmers moving away from the older sections of the country and going to the western portions of Canada and the United States where farming land is very much cheaper. That is the chief reason for the depreciation; and if farm lands have decreased in value in the province of Ontario, they have also decreased in value in New England and other states of the Union. When the Toronto "Globe" was engaged, as I think in a very unpatriotic work in sending correspondents throughout the province of Ontario to ascertain the feelings of the people on different subjects, it sent them to visit the state of New York. It published one letter from that state, and then stopped. Was it because it found that the farmers there were in a worse condition than ours? I think it was, because I think the quotations that I will read will show that the farmers there, if not in as bad a condition as hon. gentlemen allege our farmers are, they are at least in an equally poor condition, and their farms have decreased quite as much in value.

Mr. English, the president of the village of Albion, said: Some of our farmers are well off but the majority are not. Fruit, beans, barley and wheat are our staple crops, but there is no money in the latter article at its present price, which is 72 cents a bushel. A good many farmers are heavily mortgaged, although the excellent crop last year helped to raise them somewhat.

Mr. Fitch, a lawyer, acquainted with the farming district said: It is the exception where the farmer owns an unencumbered farm in Orleans county, although as a rule they do not live extravagantly.

Mr. Marvin Warner, a farmer, gave some startling figures regarding the depreciation of property in his county. He said the depreciation in farm lands during the last decade has been, at the least, 30 per cent. Land that I refused $150 an acre for ten years ago I could not get $100 for now. Lands assessed ten years ago at $100 are now assessed at $70 and $75.

Mr. Oscar Foster, a farmer of Barrie Centre, said: The greater half of our farms are encumbered. Land is lower in value than it was owing to the development of the grain raising country out west.

Mr. Marvin J. Grinnell, a member of the Local Farmers Institute, said: The depression under which our farmers have been labouring is due partially to mismanagement, partially to unavoidable causes. The rapid progress we have made in wiping out our national debt is offset by the constantly increasing pension debt.

Mr. Stephen Hallock, a wealthy farmer said: The condition of the farmer is generally poor.

Now, I am not going to weary the House with any more quotations, but I think I have shown conclusively, from the statements of farmers in western New York, that those people are in a worse condition than our farmers. Now, Sir, my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Paterson, Brant), with the view, I suppose, of showing the country, or those who may read his speech, that we have not prospered under the National Policy, made a quotation from a speech delivered in this House in 1835 by the late Mr. McLelan, the then Finance Minister; and the words are so apt and suit the present condition of affairs so well that I will quote them again; but I will endeavour not to do so in that mournful, dolorous tone assumed by the hon. gentleman. What Mr. McLelan said, and what the hon. gentleman tried to ridicule and make so much fun of, was as follows:—

The same old story is being re-enacted all over the Dominion; love is being made in the frosts of winter and in the sunlight of summer; the orange blossoms are being worn and the marriage bells sounded and new homes are being formed from one end of this land to the other; and bye and bye there will be a new cradle put in the new home to be added to the 200,000 cradles in this Dominion, which are now rocking young Canadians, who will grow to Canadian men and women, and give their strength and their energies to the development of this country.

Now, Sir, although that is poetical language—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Now, honestly, didn't I read it better than you do?

Mr. DALY. I do not think so. The hon. gentleman read it with the idea of ridiculing it and in a tone to indicate to any one listening to him that the statements contained in it were not true. As I was going to say, it is in flowery language, and the hon. gentleman, in attempting to ridicule it, said that the cradles were not here. He quoted from the Trade and Navigation Returns to show that so many million dollars worth of household effects had been exported from this country, and he said that among them the cradles must have gone. It may be true that the Trade and Navigation Returns show that we have exported household effects, and amongst these there may have been cradles; but I am glad to say, as a Canadian, that if those goods are going out of Ontario or Quebec into the United States, we have the happy spectacle in Manitoba and the North-west Territories of seeing these misguided people, who left this country for Dakota, returning with their cattle and horses and their cradles and their babies. And the mother, with the British heart in her, who has been living under the Yankee flag for four or five years in misery and destitution, hugs that dear little baby to her breast and thanks God she is back under the British flag again. I am not overdrawing the picture. I have seen myself on the prairies of Manitoba, in the summer of last year and the year before, men who had left this country nine or ten years ago for Dakota, who told me they went there because they read in certain Canadian newspapers that Dakota was a good place to go to, and because they were influenced by the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. They were Grits when they left, but they said they had come back as good Tories as there were in the land. They had been misled into going to a country, pictured to them as flowing with milk and honey, but where they found nothing but desolation and blizzards and no fuel. They got together what little they had left, their oxen, with the big covered wagon, and their children, and they brought along their cows and their horses, or whatever they had, and they brought their babies, too. And mark my words, if those mothers are what I know other Canadian mothers to be, they will ever instil into the minds of their young ones such sentiments of loyalty that you will never hear them calling out for unrestricted reciprocity, commercial union or any other anti-Canadian policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite are continually referring to the exodus. I do not think that, either sleeping or waking, the hon. member for South Oxford is ever so happy as when he is rolling his tongue around the word "exodus." My only regret on his account is, that there is not an "r" in it, that he cannot pronounce it, for instance, "exordus," so that he might roll the "r," which, no doubt, would give him great satisfaction, because when speaking of the National Policy, he is ever fond of denouncing its "wringing" thousands of dollars from the pockets of the people. We only get the oyster in the months in which there is an "r," and we only hear these adjectives with the long burr when we hear the hon. gentleman speaking of the National Policy. I hardly believe that the hon. gentleman would endeavour to mislead this House by making a statement he did not believe to be true, and I will be charitable enough to say that when he made the statement which I will quote from his speech of last year, he was carried away by that feeling which seems to permeate the breasts of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that is their desire to do everything or anything to get into office—anything that will crush "the villainous" National policy. In connection with the exodus, I find in his speech, page 207 of last year's "Hansard," that in order to make a point which might be quoted in the Toronto "Globe," and other Reform papers, and reach the electors of Canada, he said:—

We have lost, at least, an average of 100,000 of population per annum for the last ten years, and they actually ask us to be content with things as they are.

I do not believe that the hon. gentleman willfully made that statement; but it is in black and white. There it is in cold type upon the "Hansard," that we lost in the last ten years from Canada, by people leaving it, 100,000 per year, or a million in all; but according to the figures quoted by the Minister of Railways to-day, taken from the American census, there are exactly 980,000 Canadians all told in the United States to-day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Native-born.

Mr. DALY. Take it native-born; he has the hardihood to say that there had gone into the United States this last ten years 1,000,000 Canadians. If other statements made by himself and other members on that side are on a par with that statement, what are the people to believe? Why is there an unrest in the country? Is not such a statement as that sufficient to create unrest—a statement in which there is not a word of truth. Worse than that. The hon. gentleman is very fond of saying that we are losing our choicest young men—the cream of our population. I am not so foolish for one moment as to gainsay that we are losing young men from Canada. But what is the reason? In Toronto and Montreal, and in every city in Canada, where there are medical schools, they are grinding out doctors every year. Osgoode Hall, in Toronto, is grinding out lawyers four terms in every year; veterinary schools are turning out veterinary surgeons; and dentists and chemists and other professional men are being turned out rapidly. Is there room in our population for all the doctors and lawyers and dentists and veterinary surgeons and chemists that are being turned out from year to year? No; there is not, and naturally those men have to go to a people numbering 60,000,000 in order to practice their professions. More than that, those young men have been going there in a greater ratio during these past ten years, because these lawyers, doctors, and other professional men have been graduating more rapidly during that period. And who are they? Mostly the sons of farmers, sons of men who have made their money on farms, and have been able to give their children a superior education. If we examine the census, will we find the same number of professional men went from Canada to the other side of the line from 1871 to 1881, as from 1881 to 1891? They will not, and that emphasizes this fact, that the farmer of Canada, although he imagines he is not so prosperous to-day, instead of sending his boys to a log school-house, as he did twenty years ago, sends them to college at Toronto or Montreal, and his daughters take music lessons, and where there used to be nothing but the scrubbing-board in the house, in days gone by, they have now a piano and an organ. As one born in the province of Ontario, and who left it not more than twelve years ago, I remember seeing the farmer and his wife, instead of coming in in their dog-cart and buggy, with silver-mounted harness and beautiful horses, coming in on their ox-sled; and instead of the young ladies being decked with bonnets and hats, and feathers and flowers, they were content with shawls over their heads and very little on their feet. But the condition of affairs, as I find it in Ontario, on my return, after twelve years absence, so far as the farming community of Ontario is concerned, marks a progress that has not been reached in any state of the Union. And you, gentlemen, know it, and if you do not, you wilfully shut your eyes to the progress of events about you. Take the western counties, take the Huron tract; go there and ask the farmers as to their condition to-day as compared with that of fifteen years ago. You find the bank barn where there was a log barn, the comfortable brick house instead of the log house, and improvement after improvement on all hands, marking great progress. Going back to where I left off, I say the census does not show that we have lost a million young men in the last ten years, as the hon. gentleman contends. I have the figures, authentic figures, taken from the United States census of 1870, 1880 and 1890. The total increase in the number of people that left Canada for the United States from 1880 to 1890 was 263,938. The hon. gentleman said a million. That is not much of an error, I suppose, for a Grit politician. Where are these young men gone to? Have they gone to the western states, to New York or the middle states? No; out of the total of 263,938 Canadians that left Canada within that decade, we find that 147,207 went to the North Atlantic division. Now, the North Atlantic division is composed of the states of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and of the grand total of 980,938 that left Canada from the beginning of time up to 1890, 490,229 of them went to these states. Now, the increase in Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Rhode Island was 132,068, and in Massachusetts alone the increase was 88,299. Of the total of 980,938 Canadians that went to the other side up to 1890, 490,229 were in the states that I have named, showing very conclusively, to my mind, that if there was an exodus from Canada it was from the province of Quebec and the Maritime provinces to these states. What does that mean? Does that show that there is unrest among our farmers, that these Canadians who move to the other side are of the agricultural class? Does anybody believe, who knows anything about these states, that they hold out any inducement to a Canadian farmer to give up his farm in Quebec or New Brunswick or Nova Scotia or Ontario, and go over there? I was there last year, and I never saw a field of wheat throughout the length and breadth of these states. You will find only occasionally a field of oats and a few patches of corn and hay and potatoes, and does that condition of affairs hold out any inducement to farmers accustomed to life in this country? These figures indicate to me that the Canadian population in the United States are largely artisans or operatives. I will say further that, in addition to these and the professional men, the Canadians in the United States are in a large measure made up of men connected with the railways. I remember myself, some years ago, in the town I came from in Ontario, a railway centre, we were turning out firemen and engine-drivers and fitters and other machinists in the shops. We had only the Grand Trunk, the Great Western and the Northern railways at that time. When these young men learned their business there was nothing for them to do but to go to the other side and get work, but many of them have got back again, and, as you travel from Port Arthur to the Pacific on the Canadian Pacific Railway, you will find many of these men employed there. At every point where there is a machine shop you will find that the foreman is a Canadian, who got his trade at the old Grand Trunk Railway shops in Montreal or London or Stratford, and were compelled to go to the other side to find work. The conductors and station agents are the same. All these men, previous to the building of this great road, were compelled to go to the other side. What did gentlemen opposite do to remedy that? Did they make an effort to complete the Canadian Pacific Railway, to make this great railway, which has brought back these young men to Canada? No, they did not. So far as this question of exodus is concerned, when we realize the fact that we are only a population of 5,000,000 and the United States have 60,000,000, it is a mere bagatelle. We, hardy northern people, with sound brains, strong muscles and good morals are able to send over our young men to take the highest positions in the land. If it is an argument proving that Canada is not in a prosperous condition to show that there are many Canadians there, the principle ought to hold good throughout. We find that in London there are more Scotchmen than in Edinburgh, more Irishmen than in Dublin and more Jews than in all Palestine. Does that mean necessarily that Scotland is not prosperous, that Ireland is not prosperous? It simply means that they have a hardy race in Scotland and a clever race in Ireland, and that their young men go abroad as our young Canadians go abroad. I have my own flesh and blood on the other side, and not only they but every person I know of, my native-born Canadian friends is doing well and rising to the top of the tree. I am particularly interested in this question of exodus, because I am one of those who—I do not know exactly how to put it—but let us say I am part of that exodus. When I found my profession overcrowded in my native town twelve years or so ago, I had my opportunity to go to any state of the Union. The province of Manitoba was then in its infancy, with only 130 miles of railway within its boundary, but I chose to go there, even though I had to go through the United States to get there, and forego all the advantages held out to me in Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and other cities. I went there, just as hundreds and thousands of other young Canadians did. If I have not convinced the hon. gentleman by the figures I have given as to the exodus, I have convinced the friends behind me and every reasonable, reading person that this matter of the exodus is entirely exploded. Particularly so, when we find a gentleman occupying the position the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) has occupied in this House, deliberately getting up, as he did last session, and stating that there was an exodus of a million people to the United States in ten years, when, as a matter of fact, the statistics of the United States show that there was an exodus of only 260,000. That hon. gentleman is not alone in these statements. We find leading him the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) who seems to make this his pet hobby. Notwithstanding the months, and we might say years, that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) used his opportunities to go up and down the province of Ontario and parade his fad of commercial union, afterwards unrestricted reciprocity and so on, the people did not agree with him. He and his friends met with defeat in the general elections and with even worse disaster in the by-elections, and so chagrined, so soured, so incensed, was the hon. gentleman, because his arguments and statements had not met with the encouragement that he thought they deserved because the people had rejected him and because this Conservative Administration was again returned to power, we find that, without regard to his native land, without regard to the prosperity of his native country he was bound to wreak his revenge.

He could not have his way at the polls, but, in revenge, he wrote that celebrated letter to the "Economist." He wrote to the "Economist," but he did not economize the truth when he wrote, because we find that in connection with this question of the exodus the hon. gentleman stated:

That even in a comparatively short space of time this ill-advised policy had resulted in a tremendous exodus of the very choicest portion of the population of Canada.

Now, that is very complimentary to the 490,000 that went to the Eastern States. Does the hon. gentleman say they are the very choicest people of Canada? Worse than that, he says:

That two or three cities, and perhaps a score of towns have increased considerably later on, but the great mass of the population, and particularly the agricultural class, are distinctly poorer and less prosperous than they were twelve years ago.

He concludes by saying:

One thing, I think, ought to be clear to all intelligent Englishmen, and that is, that it is utterly impossible that Canada can prosper under her present conditions,—isolated, and in danger of being still more completely isolated, from trade and commerce with the entire continent to which she belongs geographically, losing her population at the rate of one million and a half in ten years.

Now, I have shown, out of the mouths of those two gentlemen, that either they were not sincere, or they were making statements they knew to be wrong. I have shown conclusively by the figures of the Census Bureau of the United States that, instead of the exodus having been one million, as one gentleman said, or a million and a half as another one said, from 1880 to 1890, our total exodus was 260,000. Now, the hon. gentleman said that he would like any person to show that farm values had not improved. I admit that farm values in Ontario are not what they were; but I am glad to say that farm lands in the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories have increased in value; that where you could buy a farm for $2.50 or $4 an acre ten years ago, you have to pay $15 or $20 now. What has been your loss in Ontario has been our gain in the province of Manitoba. Now, hon. gentlemen have dealt considerably with the exodus both in the House and outside, but I never yet heard the figures given in connection with the census of Manitoba. We have heard from those hon. gentlemen that the increase of population in that province has not been so great as it should be, commensurate with the amount of money expended upon immigration, has not been commensurate with the amount of money spent upon Dominion lands, has not been commensurate with the amount of money spent on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, I have here a table of statistics, extracted from the census returns, showing the progress of that province in population, agriculture and manufactures, in the decade between 1881 and 1891:

Sir, I venture to say that with the same population and under the same circumstances, there is not a state in the Union that can compare with Manitoba in the figures I have given, showing the same ratio of increase in the number and value of the articles of agriculture that I have named. Now, having given these figures showing the prosperity of that country, and knowing the facts from my own residence there during all these years, all I can say to my hon. friends opposite is that if they are dissatisfied with their lot in Ontario, or in the other eastern provinces, get up and migrate to that western country, and they will find by hard work and industry that they will get a good livelihood, and remain under the old flag. The hon. gentleman tried to make out that we in Canada are suffering in the same ratio as they are on the other side of the line. I read in a paper to-night a despatch from Chicago which I will read to the House :

A despatch from Chicago of Monday says that 3,500 families—equal to nearly half the population of Ottawa—are receiving aid from the Cook county charitable agent, to keep them from starvation. These are merely a few of the people in want in that great city. The Chicago papers, however, devote considerable attention to the business dullness in Toronto.

Now, Sir, we have not any soup kitchens in Canada to-day ; we are not feeding 3,500 people in Toronto, in Montreal or in Ottawa, as they are in Chicago ; but there was a day, long to be remembered in the history of Canada, when we had soup kitchens right in the city of Ottawa. That condition of things has changed, and I want to say to the hon. gentlemen opposite that if they are dissatisfied with the policy that has been announced by the Minister of Finance, they must remember—and I think that our farmers and our people will remember—that this Government has not yet been formed three months. Rome was not built in a day. You do not expect a Government composed of young men, some of them who have never been in office before, to take hold of a matter like the National Policy, and to reform our tariff in that short time. But I can say to hon. gentlemen and to the country that this Government is composed of Canadians, every one of whom is animated by one desire, irrespective of our political leanings, and that is, to do the best, according to our light and according to our conscience, in the interests of Canada. We can be actuated by no other motive ; we can have no other desire. The prosperity of Canada is our prosperity ; the prosperity of this Government is the prosperity of the Empire. I desire as a Canadian-born, and as a member of this Canadian Government, to uphold any policy framed in the best interests of this country, and representing as I do those great prairies of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and British Columbia with its untold millions of undeveloped wealth, so long as I have breath I wish hon. gentlemen behind me and all hon. members to believe that I, equally with the hon. Premier and all the members of this Government, am actuated by one desire, and that is to promote the best interests of Canada as a whole

PRIVILEGE—THE NOVA SCOTIA COAL FIELDS—DEPUTATION TO HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before the Orders of the Day are called—and, in order to put myself in order before the House, I shall move the adjournment of the House—I desire to bring to the attention of the House, for its consideration, a matter which seems to me of very considerable importance. I suppose that we all recognize here that we have, or are supposed to have, well-established parliamentary institutions. We have not only our various departments of legislation under our federal system, but we have a responsible Executive Council which advises His Excellency on all those matters which pertain to the Crown. Now, Sir, there has grown up within the last two or three years a practice which seems to me wholly at variance with the principles of parliamentary government. A few years ago there was carried through the Legislature of Quebec a measure which was claimed to be within its jurisdiction. This measure the Government here, the advisers of His Excellency the Governor-General, were asked to disallow. A motion was made in the House calling upon the House to urge upon the Government and upon His Excellency the propriety of that disallowance. That motion was lost. Subsequently, a self-constituted committee waited upon His Excellency the Governor-General in Quebec and advised him as to the course which he ought to take in reference to that measure and censured him for, as it was said, giving a reply which was dictated to him by the Minister of Justice for the time being. Now, Sir, if I rightly understand our parliamentary system it is this, that, while His Excellency, or the Sovereign, may call to her councils the leaders of the party enjoying the confidence of Parliament, the persons thus called are solely responsible for the acts of Her Majesty in the United Kingdom and for the acts of His Excellency the Governor-General as representative of Her Majesty in this country. There are no back-stairs advisers, there are no voluntary organizations of councils of the Crown recognized under the constitutional system. It is true, Sir, that frequently the House of Commons, in its collective capacity is regarded as the paramount authority for the guidance of the Crown with regard to matters of public authority. Then Senate, too, may tender its advice. I understand Sir, that a measure within the jurisdiction of the Government and Legislature of the province of Nova Scotia, as that jurisdiction is defined by the British North America Act, and about this there can be no differences of opinion, has been passed by that Legislature, and that His Excellency has been asked to interfere and to disallow that Act. Now, that advice was not tendered, as I understand, by the responsible advisers of the Crown, and it is important that this House should know how far members of the House or persons who are not members may, with propriety, organize themselves into committees of council, wait upon His Excellency and tender him advice with regard to matters of very great public importance, matters that might result, if their advice were recognized or acted upon, in producing a political crisis in the province, might overturn the Local Administration within that province and frustrate the policy upon which it had entered with the sanction and approval of a majority of the people's representatives in that province. I do not recognize as having any place in our constitutional system, the private and individual opinions of parties who have no representative character. They have, no doubt, a right to speak, Sir, but they have a right to speak through the constitutional organ, the organ which, under our system, is provided for the reception of any opinions which they have to express or any grievances of which they believe they have a right to complain. I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, that others than these I have mentioned; the two Houses of Parliament and the official and recognized advisers of the Crown, have any authority to approach His Excellency any more than they would have to approach Her Majesty. I do not think, Sir, that an instance can be found during the whole reign of the present Sovereign where parties having any ground of complaint, or having any grievances for which redress is sought, have approached Her Majesty personally. In every instance they have gone to some Minister of the Crown, usually the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who is the organ between the Crown and the public with regard to all matters that concern the people of the United Kingdom. We have not, perhaps, differentiated our departmental duties with the same particularity that they have in the United Kingdom; but we have here, as organs for the expression of the opinions of the Crown, and for the receipt of advice, persons designated by statute, whose duties are well defined under some Act of Parliament, or under the constitution itself. I dare say that many will remember that in the case of the impeachment of Lord Danby, who was recognized at that time as the leading Minister, or the Prime Minister, so far as there was a Prime Minister in England at that time, among the charges brought against him was this, that although he held this position of First Minister, so far as that position was recognized, he was impeached because he undertook to act as the organ of the Crown with regard to foreign matters when there was another party, a colleague of his, who was possessed of those functions and those duties. But later, when the Reform Bill was under discussion, it will be remembered that the Duke of Wellington, acting in his capacity as a Privy Councillor, wrote a letter to the King advising him with regard to the then state of public affairs, and the King answered this communication before he had communicated its contents to his colleagues. Well, it is well recognized as within the technical rights of a Privy Councillor that, although holding no other official position, he may, in an emergency, tender to the Crown his advice. But Lord Grey, at that time Prime Minister, expressed the opinion that that duty could not be discharged consistently with the duties that devolved upon Ministers who were responsible to the Crown for the advice which was tendered, and for the acts of the Crown in connection with public matters. After that discussion the King informed his Prime Minister that he would not in future undertake to hold any communication, or to give any answer to any party upon any public matter without having submitted it to his advisers for consideration. Every one will understand how thoroughly incompatible it may be to give advice even for one who, under the old doctrines of the constitution, was competent to give that advice—how incompatible that is with the theory and practice of ministerial responsibility as they are recognized in our day. Now, it is said that this is an Imperial question, that this was a question affecting Imperial interests, and that it was a matter about which any party was at liberty to give advice. I do not admit any such doctrine at all. I do not know His Excellency, in any other capacity than that of Governor-General, has any power to act in the way in which it was suggested he should act. How could His Excellency disallow a measure, how could he interfere with regard to a measure, falling within the exclusive jurisdiction of a Local Legislature, whether it was a wise or unwise measure to adopt on their part, except in his capacity as Governor-General? It is in that capacity that he is supposed to take action; it is in that capacity that advice is to be given to him, and I think that no system could well be more incompatible with the proper responsibility of Minister, more incompatible with our notions of parliamentary government, than for persons, either inside of Parliament or outside, constituting themselves into a committee of council, and as such, undertaking to advise the Crown.

Now, Sir, I would like to know how far Ministers have given their sanction to this course, I would like to know how far they have advised His Excellency that it is proper to receive parties who were not Ministers of the Crown in order to receive from them advice with regard to great public matters. I think that the acts of His Excellency, in his public capacity, are acts for which his advisers are responsible; and it does seem to me that it would be introducing a system wholly at variance with English parliamentary government, wholly incompatible with the responsibility of Ministers of the Crown, if this practice should obtain any foothold in this country. I think, Sir, that for members of this House, or even Ministers of the Crown, to undertake to interfere with acts of the Local Legislature of any province that are within the exclusive jurisdiction of that Legislature, or acts within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Provincial Administration, is a very serious matter indeed, and is one which ought not to receive countenance and support, even when undertaken by Ministers of the Crown, much less ought to receive any countenance when undertaken by those who have no ministerial responsibility to this House and over whose actions, in this respect, the House can exercise no other than judicial control.

Mr. WELDON. I ask the liberty to address myself for a moment to the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). Inasmuch as I, in company with three gentlemen—Mr. Wood, an influential resident of Sackville, in the province of New Brunswick, and Mr. John McDougald, of Westville, in the county of Pictou, in the province of Nova Scotia, and Mr. Alex. McNeill, who resides in the town of Warton, in the north riding of Bruce, in the province of Ontario, holding ourselves to be loyal subjects of our Queen, had our attention called to a danger which, as we believed, threatened the interests of the Empire, and having, as we thought, some facts that were of value and that we thought ought to be laid before our Queen, we took occasion, not to go in person to the foot of the Throne across the seas, but to go to the representative of the Queen in this country. Our apprehension was that as four humble—I speak, I think, without offending my three associates—subjects of Her Majesty, we had a right to approach our Sovereign by petition. That, we understood to be the undoubted right of every subject of the Queen, a right which, if the petition were couched in courteous language, would not be denied. If the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will draw any distinction between the right of written representation and the right of verbal representation, I would like to hear it made and sustained. The point was taken that we four gentlemen had no representative capacity. There is no doubt about that; we did not pretend that we had any representative capacity ; but, being children of British parents, under the common law we were subjects of the British Queen, and had, therefore, the common law right of approaching the foot of the Throne. It had come to my knowledge before I left the city of Halifax, through a conversation with a naval officer of very great experience and influential citizens, that under the terms of an arrangement recently made and a charter recently enacted and signed, there was given over to a syndicate of capitalists, with power to assign their rights to foreign corporations, coal lands, including two-thirds of the coal deposits of Eastern Canada. It appeared that in the future, within the term of 99 years, with which those gentlemen would exercise control over more than two-thirds of the coal areas of Nova Scotia, these areas might under the lease fall absolutely into the hands of a foreign corporation. It further appeared that, under a Nova Scotia Act of last year, those same gentlemen could, if they had sufficient capital to buy them, also obtain control of all the other mines in Cape Breton and on the main land of Nova Scotia, and that under the arrangement those properties might some day fall into the hands of foreign corporations which had a political purpose, and that there was danger that this important and only coaling station in Her Majesty's possession on the northern hemisphere on the west side of the Atlantic ocean, which was at present a source of strength to the North Atlantic and West Indian squadron, would be in danger of being crippled, or destroyed at a critical time. It was said by those gentlemen that, for example, in the case of war between our own country and Russia, a foreign corporation owning those mines might be induced by Russian gold to destroy, blow up or fire those mines, by which the coal supply of Nova Scotia would be cut off, and English fleets, instead of having coal in Nova Scotia to rest on, would have to spend their time in protecting barges bringing coal across the Atlantic, and in fighting for their own lives instead of being engaged in protecting Canadian ports and Canadian merchant ships. These were not the views of Mr. Weldon ; but they were the opinions of men of experience, who took occasion to speak to me, believing I was a loyal subject of Her Majesty the Queen. Being in possession of those views, I admit I could not say I fully shared the apprehension entertained by those gentlemen, I did not know, and I am not sufficient of a naval expert to have an opinion in that regard ; but being in possession of that information, and having in my hands copies of the Mining Act, under which such powers might be given to a foreign syndicate, having a copy of the lease which was given to the Boston syndicate or the Whitney syndicate, having a copy of the old lease under which the present mines are operated in Nova Scotia, having a copy of the most remarkable charter given to the Whitney syndicate, I thought it was not only my right, but, if I am not taking myself too seriously, I thought it would be very judicious to place this information in the hand of our Queen. To talk of indictment or criminal procedure and impeachment and to compare the case of Lord Danby with the action of Mr. McNeill, Mr. Wood, Mr. McDougall and Mr. Weldon, who desired to place certain facts before the Queen, was absurd, for Lord Danby accepted millions of French gold in the shape of a bribe. If I followed the example of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who took himself too seriously in describing the other day his mission to Washington, I should detail our visit. If the hon. gentleman had any spirit of banter and badinage, had called us tailors of Tooley Street, we would have accepted the laugh ; but he takes the matter too seriously and describes this visit of ours as a grave constitutional matter, and I should like him to name the constitutional sin that has been committed, and to state the grounds on which he denies our right to address the Queen. If information is required as to what was done, I am perfectly willing to afford it, and as I am a candid man like the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), I am perfectly willing to tell what we did. We visited His Excellency, and Mr. McDougald made some pungent observations, to which His Excellency listened with admirable politeness. Mr. Wood spoke at greater length, with the clearness and moderation which always characterizes him when he speaks, and His Excellency listened to him with attention. Mr. McNeill, always the guardian of the Empire, by day and by night, in summer and in winter, in season and out of season, would see no peril threaten the British nation, and your humble servant, who made a rather poor fist of it, as they told me afterwards, said what I wanted to say. Then His Excellency, with most vice-regal tact and prudence, acknowledged that he was very pleased indeed to see four British gentlemen—

Some hon. MEMBERS. What did he say ?

Mr. WELDON. I have told hon. members what the sum and substance of the interview was, and I have mentioned nearly all that happened. I leave the House to say if this is not a tempest in a tea-pot.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) has altogether misunderstood my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). My hon. friend never questioned the motives which actuated the hon. gentleman and the other hon. gentlemen who took in their hands the interests of the British Empire ; he simply questioned the constitutionality of their actions. It was certainly open to the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), and still more open to the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill), to take such legitimate and constitutional steps as they thought advisable to save the interests of the Empire, if they thought those interests were in danger. They appear to have thought that this action of the Legislature of Nova Scotia was a danger to the Empire, and they wanted to draw the attention of the Queen to it, and therefore visited the Governor-General. But I ask why? Had they so little faith in the loyalty of the Prime Minister, who is the adviser of the Queen in these matters? Did the hon. gentleman believe that the Prime Minister was not up to the requirements of the situation, that his loyalty was not up to the mark in this matter and he would not give His Excellency proper advice? Of course, it is open to any subject in the land to approach the Throne; but my hon. friend will agree that the manner of approaching the Throne has changed a little from the time of the old Saxon Heptarchy. In the time of Edward the Confessor it was possible to go direct to the king, but now Queen Victoria, represented in this country by His Excellency, has constitutional advisers to advise her, and the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that His Excellency could not give him any answer. The only thing he could do was to act on the advice of his Ministers. The information should have been communicated in the first instance, as I believe it was communicated on a subsequent occasion, to the Prime Minister, who would have advised His Excellency as to what course was to be taken, if really the Empire was in danger. Whether the Empire was really in danger or not, is more than I can say at present. I have not yet seen the resolutions of the members of the Legislature, but I am bound to say that when I know the resolutions have the support of such a loyal man as the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen), I do not think the Empire can be very much in danger.

Mr. McKEEN. I do not consider I have much to say at this time, but having listened to the explanation of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) in regard to his mission to the Governor-General, I must say that, looking at the matter from my standpoint, I cannot but think that he was needlessly alarmed. It certainly gives one a sense of security to know that we have men who are so vigilant and so watchful as to be ever on the alert, and who are not satisfied with the Administration that we have here, but take upon themselves the responsibility of going to the Governor-General to warn him of the dangers to be apprehended. I am glad to know that there are gentlemen here like our friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), whose interest in our great Mother is such that he is always so ready, not only to attend to the interests of Ontario, but also to go down into the Island of Cape Breton and there safe-guard the common weal. Let us look at the facts, Mr. Speaker. There are several large coal areas in Cape Breton, bordering on the Atlantic coast. These mines are worked, and have been worked for the last twenty years. We will assume that a war breaks out between England and the United States, or any other power. It has been alleged that in such an event the American, or foreign owners of these mines can flood them, or else destroy them by blowing them up, or in some other way. We know, and every one acquainted with these mines knows that it is impossible to blow them up with gunpowder, and that it would take at least two months to flood any of them. We are within telegraphic communication with the garrison at Halifax, and suppose such an attempt was made, in five minutes afterwards the commander of the barracks at Halifax would be notified. He must be notified by any loyal magistrate in the country, and in ten hours, if necessary, a company of soldiers could be on the ground to protect these great interests. Looking at the matter from a business stand-point, the apprehension of these loyal gentlemen who are infinitely more loyal than the Queen herself, seems to me most childish.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to discuss with my hon. friend the question, whether or not it is prejudicial and dangerous to the interests of the Empire that an alien corporation should obtain control of all the coal fields in the Maritime provinces. I do not rise to discuss that question with the hon. gentleman, because it is a matter that does not admit of discussion, for it is patent and clear upon the face of it that it is not only dangerous to the best interests of the Dominion, but dangerous to the interests of the Empire—if the interests of the Dominion be connected with the interests of the Empire. But what I do wish to say, in reply to what has fallen from my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, is this: That no discourtesy was intended towards my hon. friend the leader of the Government, or towards the Government, when we went to see His Excellency on this question. I take it that the Government of this Dominion are the custodians of the interests of the Dominion, but that they are not the custodians of the interests of the entire Empire. I should no sooner have thought that I was debarred from going to the Dominion Government rather than to the Ontario Government, with reference to a matter that was connected with the interests of the Dominion, than I should think that I was debarred from going to the Governor-General rather than to the Dominion Government, in reference to a matter that was connected with the interests of the Empire. If the matter is injurious to the best interests of the Dominion, I take it that the Dominion Government, primarily and directly, is the body to appeal to; but if the matter is injurious to the interests of the Empire, I take it that the representative of the Empire is the person primarily to be approached. The representative of the Empire, in this country, is, as I understand, the Governor-General, and not the Dominion Government, and it was from that point of view that my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) and the other gentlemen approached His Excellency. I have yet to learn, and I shall be very glad to be enlightened upon the subject, wherein that view, which we hold, is a mistaken one.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not intend to enter into the merits of the question, having but an imperfect knowledge of the facts, but this much is known to the House and was made known to my hon. and enthusiastic friend, who guards so zealously the interests of the Empire, that the Bill which he complains of related to a subject-matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Parliament. As a member of this Parliament, I take it that he may or may not have a right to discuss any question that he puts on the Order Paper, but if he wishes to give expression to his views so that they may reach the proper quarter, namely, His Excellency's advisers, he should take advantage of his presence in this House to discuss the question openly and fairly here. The hon. gentleman must see that he is trying to establish a very hazardous precedent. If His Excellency can receive a private deputation of members upon this subject, and take his advice from them, he might do a similar thing upon almost any subject which any clique of members in this House choose to urge upon him. Therefore, the precedent is dangerous. I believe that the House is thoroughly satisfied on this point, that the hon. gentlemen in their zeal for the public service, and in accordance with that ever bubbling loyalty which distinguishes them, have done that which they are now sorry for.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). Not at all.

Mr. McNEILL. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They have acted unconstitutionally.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They have attempted to usurp functions which belong to the Prime Minister and his colleagues. If they have lost confidence in the advice which the Prime Minister and his colleagues give to the Governor-General, it was their duty and their right to move want of confidence in this House, and to express their views here. But, Mr. Speaker, I rise chiefly for the purpose of asking the Government, led by the Prime Minister, how far they are prepared to endorse the action of private members of this House, waiting upon His Excellency and seeking to influence and advise him upon the public matters of the day. I think the House will agree with me, that those only have a right to do that who compose the Executive Council of His Excellency. I would like to hear from the Government, whether this delegation, in any way, met with their approval or sanction.

Mr. McNEILL.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I am one of the members against whom this charge is made, and I would like to say in reply to the hon. gentleman, that we did not go to His Excellency with any intention of giving him advice or of seeking His Excellency's advice upon any subject. We look upon this matter as very much more serious than my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen) would have this House believe it is. In our opinion, the action which has been taken by the Nova Scotia Legislature in reference to a large portion of the coal in Nova Scotia may be fraught with very great danger to very important interests in this country. We think, in the first place, that the consumers of coal in the lower provinces may be very seriously affected. This interest is one which comes under the control of this Parliament, and with which His Excellency or the Imperial Parliament would have nothing to do; but we think, besides, that Imperial interests may be jeopardized by the extraordinary action of the Legislature of Nova Scotia. As for our conduct in going to His Excellency to represent certain facts which had come to our notice with regard to this matter, I have never heard it contended before that it was not the privilege of any subject in this country to go to His Excellency and inform him of any fact which came within our knowledge, and which we supposed might be of interest either to him personally or to the Imperial authority which he represents here, to understand. Those were the motives which actuated me in going there, and I must confess that I was very much surprised, on coming into the House just now, to learn that any imputation had been cast upon us because of our proceedings in the matter.

Mr. FRASER. I would not rise if this question did not relate to the province from which I come. I want to call the attention of the House to the difference between the position taken by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and that taken by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood). Until the latter hon. gentleman rose, the only point raised was the Imperial character of the danger; but the hon. member for Westmoreland has raised another point, namely, that the price of coal is likely to be increased. So that, so far as he is concerned, and overshadowing the Imperial interest of this country, is the fact that he is going to pay a little more for his coal. And it has come to this, that legislation that is going to affect in a little degree what a man pays for a commodity, is sufficient warrant for him to constitute himself an adviser of the Governor-General.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I did not say that.

Mr. FRASER. I have taken down his words: "Fraught with danger to persons in this country and as affecting the price of coal."

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I never said anything about the price of coal. I distinctly said that, so far as the interests of the consumers of coal were concerned, it was this Parliament and the Local Legislature that had to deal with them.

Mr. FRASER. If the hon. gentleman said that, I certainly did not so hear him. If so, I accept his statement; the "Hansard" will show it; as I took it down, it was the very opposite. But let that be as it may. "Fraught with danger to persons in this country!" How could the affair be fraught with danger to persons in this country except in so far as it affected their interests? What I contend is, that if the Legislature of Nova Scotia had the right to pass the legislation in question, then these hon. gentlemen had no right to take the course they did, because in doing so they might have seriously affected all the interests with which the Local Government were dealing in the country. While I do not deny the right of any subject to approach the representative of Her Majesty, I ask, should these gentlemen be the sole judges of the question which it is right for them to approach His Excellency upon? I say that the gentlemen themselves are not to decide what that question is.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Who should?

Mr. FRASER. The occasion, and not their judgment of the occasion. Now, I do not look on His Excellency as having two sides, one for his regular advisers and another for other people. I should regret very much if this should be the case; but, after the playful allusions of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, particularly those of my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), who, I know, is not capable of any malice in his breast—he is too good for that—we find that it was really the overflowing loyalty of those men to the Queen, and not considerations relating to this country or as to what affected the best material interests of Nova Scotia, that moved these gentlemen in the course they took. I am glad, however, that the matter has been brought up, as the result will probably serve as a warning to others in the future.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not understand that any of us differ with regard to the constitutional usage in a matter of this kind. There seems to be, between the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and my hon. friends who waited upon His Excellency, a concurrence of opinion that it is quite beyond constitutional usage for any person to approach His Excellency for the purpose of giving advice. I am sure that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in bringing the matter to the notice of the House, was influenced by an opinion that the facts were different from what they now transpire to have been. The hon. member probably learned from newspaper reports, as I did myself, that these gentlemen, who were supposed to be a delegation, had waited upon His Excellency for the purpose of urging His Excellency to disallow a statute of one of the provinces of Canada; and the hon. gentleman, naturally enough, supposed that a grave breach of constitutional usage had been committed in that regard, and, for that reason, brought the matter to the attention of the House. But it transpires, from the explanation given by my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), and my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), that the facts were about these: That these gentlemen, in accordance with the custom that prevails at every session of Parliament, had occasion to call upon His Excellency, as other members of Parliament had, and that, in the course of the conversation which then took place, it was ascertained that subjects which were there spoken of affected Imperial interests, in their view, and possibly in the view of His Excellency, and affected, also, the consideration which his advisers should give to subjects of public importance. His Excellency, it seems to me, with great delicacy and propriety, immediately requested that any facts which they wished to lay before him, or which they had mentioned in their conversation, should be laid before him in such a form that they could be presented to his advisers for their consideration. So far, perfect courtesy appears to have prevailed between the members who attended His Excellency for the purpose of paying their respects, and who had this interesting conversation, as well as perfect dignity and propriety on the part of His Excellency in receiving them; and it would seem, likewise, that the interview passed off with the utmost harmony on both sides, and that the constitution was not broken after all. Under these circumstances, it strikes me that we shall all feel more comfortable for the matter having been brought to the notice of the House this afternoon, because, in the first place, we have the assurance that nothing of the grave character which the newspapers reported occurred on that occasion, and, in the second place, we have the assurance of the great interest which these gentlemen take in interests which are Imperial and which concern, likewise, the people of Canada; and, for my part, while I am not prepared at all to discuss any feature of the coal transaction—not having seen the statute in question, not having yet had time to read the debates on the subject in the Provincial Legislature, and being in a state of expectancy for the arrival, any hour, of that statute for review and for advice to His Excellency whether it should be allowed or disallowed—I merely mention, as a further point upon which we can congratulate ourselves, the active and lively interest which gentlemen on both sides take in the welfare of my native province, and in the interests of the Dominion as they might be affected by the legislation of that province. But above all we shall feel more comfortable and pleased because we find that when there was the slightest suspicion, arising from newspaper reports, that there was any want of confidence in the Executive of this country, on the part of any members on this side of the House, those who are willing to spring first to the rescue are gentlemen sitting on the Opposition benches.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, we of the province of Quebec were happy, very happy, to hear the hon. the First Minister determine so clearly the responsible system and state how it ought to be carried out in this country. For two years we heard notions very different from these in the province of Quebec. And I am asking myself how it is that there should be a rule for the English element and a different one for the French element of the province of Quebec? I always thought that the true constitutional theory was that the Crown can only be approached and advised by responsible Ministers, by those who received the duty and mission to advise it. And that which is for me a matter of surprise, after hearing the First Minister, is that he should have called to sit with him a political man who did away with the constitutional rules just stated to us. The province of Quebec will, I am sure, be happy to learn that constitutional rules ought to be respected. But then it will be grieved to learn that whenever the French province of Quebec is concerned, these constitutional rules are done away with. I thought I could not let this opportunity pass without making these remarks. It is for us a matter of concern to know whether there is a law for the French province of Quebec and a different one for the other provinces. I do not see the French Ministers in their seats.

Some hon. MEMBERS. There is Mr. Ouimet.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Yes, I see one of them there. I will ask him to publicly endorse the statements just made by the honourable the leader of the Government. Is he willing to say that the province of Quebec ought to be dealt with in a different way than the other provinces? I have heard and read speeches which he delivered outside of this House, and which were far from being in harmony with that of the hon. the First Minister. We will have an opportunity, in this House, to ask that the parliamentary theories just expounded by the hon. the First Minister be put into practice.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I cannot help congratulating the Minister of Justice on the explanation he has given of the conduct of the new Council. There was, in the time of George the Third, a body of zealous friends supporting His Majesty, known as the King's Friends, who, on many occasions overturned Administrations. I dare say the First Minister is not at all afraid that the hon. gentlemen who have constituted themselves into a new body of advisers to the Crown, will seriously interfere with the safety or permanency of the Administration, but they do very seriously interfere with constitutional principles and constitutional practice. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) has told the House that he simply approached His Excellency the Governor-General as he would have approached the Queen as a humble petitioner, and did not go there for the purpose of giving advice—

Mr. WELDON. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell)—for the purpose of giving information.

Mr. WELDON. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is the position taken by the hon. gentleman. Well, I would say this to the hon. gentleman, that if he were in the United Kingdom and desired to communicate his views to Her Majesty, he would find it necessary to make that communication through some responsible Minister of the Crown. He would hardly be permitted to wait on Her Majesty and give that information which he thinks must necessarily lead to some kind of parliamentary or administrative action. The hon. gentleman has waited upon Her Majesty's representative, and it is to that I take exception. These hon. gentlemen have no right to wait upon His Excellency for the purpose of giving information upon which they thought administrative action ought to be based. There is but one conclusion to be drawn from the statement made by the hon. gentleman. What was his object in waiting upon His Excellency and giving this information, which he thought important to communicate in the interests of the Empire. Why, it was to secure the disallowance of a particular measure, to put an end to a particular contract, to frustrate the policy of the Government and the Legislature of one of our provinces, that was what the hon. gentleman aimed at. It was for that, he purposed giving that information; and in his estimation, if he failed to accomplish that object, then his mission to His Excellency was a matter of no practical importance and of no direct consequence. Now, I say again, that the parties upon whom the hon. gentlemen ought to have waited, if they had anything to communicate, if they had any information they thought it necessary Her Majesty should possess, were the constitutional advisers of Her Majesty who sit in this Parliament. They were the parties, and the only parties, if they desired to communicate information, apart from this House, except by resolution in this House, upon whom they could constitutionally wait for the purpose of giving this information. Her Majesty possesses all power, legislative and administrative, and Her Majesty can do alone no act whatever. She must act through the constitutional organs with which the law has provided her.

and she must receive information through those channels. She can receive information constitutionally in no other way, and when these hon. gentlemen undertook to wait upon His Excellency, as the representative of Her Majesty, they undertook to violate the principles of parliamentary government, as they are established in England and in this country. Now, I say that that is a matter, whatever may be the practical result in this particular instance, of very great importance, and this House can never look with indifference upon an attempt to establish a practice or a usage of this sort by a number of gentlemen who may constitute themselves—I care not whether they are in or out of Parliament—into a council for the purpose of informing or advising Her Majesty's representative; because in a legal or constitutional point of view, there is no difference between waiting on His Excellency for the purpose of giving him information with a view to lead to action in a particular direction, and undertaking to advise him to act in that specific way. The result in either case is equally wrong and equally at variance with the principle of ministerial responsibility. The First Minister has congratulated himself on the support which he has received from this side of the House in this matter. Well, Sir, I think the hon. Minister is entitled to that support. The hon. Minister has resting upon him the responsibility, and responsibility and power should always be commensurate with each other. We intend to hold the hon. gentleman to strict parliamentary responsibility, and if we countenance for one moment the attempt of other parties to intervene to advise His Excellency in a manner which gives the hon. gentleman no control, we would be relieving the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches from the constitutional responsibility which the law imposes upon them. I think that that responsibility should be preserved, that it should be kept in the full measure, and, in order that it may be kept in the full measure, it is not proper that a party, either upon that side of the House or upon this side, or outside of the House, should undertake to discharge the duties which the law has assigned to the Ministers of the Crown. Sir, I have accomplished the object which I had in view in making this motion, and with the leave of the House I will now withdraw it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before the hon. gentleman withdraws his motion, I would like to ask a question, and that is, whether he thinks he is right in arguing that a person cannot give information to the representative of the Sovereign without also assuming that a certain course is to follow? What right has he to assume that the gentlemen who waited upon His Excellency advised him or in any way gave him to understand that they wished him to disallow the Act? He has no right to assume that. If that doctrine is to be carried out, it means that the Governor-General is to close his ears and shut his eyes to what is going on around him. What difference does it make whence he gets his information? If he sees a statement in the newspapers affecting Imperial interests, according to the hon. gentleman, he is not to notice it because he has not got it from the Secretary of State. This doctrine would lead to ridiculous conclusions, and I think the hon. gentleman carries his doctrine a great deal too far when he assumed that the information in this case was given with a view to attaining a particular end. I take it that the doctrine is this: If His Excellency thought the question of sufficient importance, he would go to his constitutional advisers, and would not take action without their advice. But to say that he is not to receive information because the receiving of that information is to be assumed as intended to lead to a particular course, is stretching that doctrine to a point which would entirely destroy the common law right, which I do not understand the hon. gentleman to deny. It would bring the thing to a ridiculous extreme, and I think the distinction may be drawn, at what point I do not say at this moment, between matters strictly and purely of Imperial interest and those affecting the Dominion or a province.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have a healing suggestion to make. I fully recognize everything that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has stated on the constitutional question, but I do think, after what the First Minister has stated, that it would be a thousand pities if strained relations should exist between him and four such loyal supporters as the hon. gentlemen referred to. Could not the hon. First Minister make them Ministers without portfolios and without pay? If he did so, all these constitutional difficulties would vanish.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has asked me a question; if it is in order I will answer it. The constitutional channel for giving information to His Excellency on public matters which it is intended shall be—

Mr. O'BRIEN. There! The hon. gentleman says "intended." He has no right to assume that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am saying what the hon. gentlemen themselves said. They had been advised by officers of the navy that if this measure was passed it would lead to certain results, and, believing what they were told and taking alarm at it, they waited upon His Excellency. The proper channel through which information should be communicated to His Excellency is his constitutional Council. The proper organs through which the public are to convey information to the Crown, are the constitutional organs of the Crown. They are not to constitute themselves such organs, and I repeat the words of a distinguished English Minister more than a century ago who said: "I will never consent to a body of political janissaries organizing themselves into advisers of the Crown in order to apply the bow-string to my neck." That is practically what I object to, and it is because these proceedings must in the end lead to this abuse that they are not permitted by law.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman lectured my three friends and myself for our course on Friday last. I think I can remind him of a little lack of courtesy on his own part in making a direct personal charge against ourselves, which, in his judgment, should lead to our impeachment, without giving the usual courtesy of notice that the matter was to be brought up. When we spoke to His Excellency on this matter, there were a number of practical and very obvious suggestions which we did not feel bound to urge, but which might well have occurred to Lord Stanley or the Imperial Government. For instance, if they thought it advisable now or in the future, twenty, thirty, forty or sixty years from now, they could do as Lord Beaconsfield did when he bought the shares of the Suez Canal. They could have bought a coal mine of their own, and thus have had Imperial ownership and protection to safeguard the North Atlantic and West India squadrons' coal reserves in Nova Scotia without raising any constitutional question.

Mr. McKEEN. If I might be allowed to explain, I think the hon. gentleman for Albert (Mr. Weldon) is mistaken. These coal mines are all sold already. So what opportunity would the British Government have of buying coal?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would not have attempted to address the House on this occasion had it not been for the observation made by the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). That hon. gentleman, in his speech to-day, indicates that the Government we have in this House are not advisers of Her Glorious Majesty. In the capacity of British Empire Loyalists, he and his friends went kindly and considerately to the Governor-General, not in order to advise him to disallow the Bill, but merely for the purpose of enlightening His Excellency. I do not know whether the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) or the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) had lost confidence in the Government because the members of the Government have recently been down to Washington a great many times, but they thought it incumbent upon them, in order to have His Excellency informed, to go and convey this information to him in this irregular manner. It is said that the subject can, at any time, have access to the foot of the Throne occupied by Her Majesty the Queen. Still, it is understood that petitions are often presented irregularly to Her Majesty, and that those who present them are generally arrested and taken charge of by the police.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

I am glad that this fate did not befall these British Empire Loyalists who went in this irregular manner to the foot of the Throne last week. They are all free still, but whether His Excellency or those who advise His Excellency will allow this violation of the constitution to remain without due punishment is for them to consider and determine. I was very much astonished when I heard of the action of my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), for he is understood to be a very strong loyalist; but I think these gentlemen acted more like rebels when they departed from the old landmarks which the Minister of Finance has asked us to stand by. In leaving these old landmarks they occupied a position like those who disregard the constitution and the practices which have been handed down to us, and I for one very much regret it. If I did not know the gentlemen I would be inclined to believe that they were rebels. They would not have taken this course if they were not rebels, and knowing that they are plausible and fair men who occasionally shout for the old constitution and the old flag, I would put them down as being ultra dyed rebels. If I had the formation of the Cabinet perhaps I might adopt the proposition made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and give these gentlemen portfolios without pay, or make them Privy Councillors without portfolios and without pay. I think the First Minister would be more troubled with them in that capacity than he is now. He would be then, to a certain extent, held responsible, although he would not be able to gloss over as nicely as he did to-day the peculiar and irregular act which they manifested on this occasion. However, if their efforts will be productive of keeping down the price of coal, we will excuse the irregularities; we will overlook the violation of the constitution of which they were guilty, and we will excuse them to a certain extent. Although they did not obey the constitution, still, if they have brought down the price of coal, or if they get the duty taken off coal, we will, perhaps, forgive them for this violation. I hope that in future when they go to the foot of the Throne they will go through the constitutional advisers of His Excellency the Governor-General. I would like to see our Tory friends keep in line. There are some Tories who are radical when they are out; it may be that this wing of the Tory party are out, and they are radicals now. They are striving to get in. It may be that the cold wave that swept over those benches at the birth of triplets the other day has made some impression on some of our friends over there. It may have been this that decided them to take the course they did, and ask His Excellency to take this irregular step. I hope the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will not again have to bring up any ultra violations of the constitution, though unintentional, I will give these gentlemen the credit of believing. I wish them to understand that we on this side of the House wish to maintain the responsibility of Her Majesty's advisers to this Parliament, and if they have any petition, or if they think that any wrong is being done to the coal interests of Nova Scotia, they will address themselves to the local Administration.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1893.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons, Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1893, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

OTTAWA, 17th February, 1893.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the Message and Estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster for the House to go into Committee to consider Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. EDGAR. I fear it will be rather hard to draw the attention of the House away from that very interesting and somewhat amusing constitutional debate that we have just listened to, and ask them to consider again the dryer subject of the tariff. The latest incident of the Budget debate was the speech which we had the pleasure of listening to last night, of the Minister of the Interior. I think most of his friends will be willing to admit that it chiefly consisted of the old stock arguments of former years and of former campaigns. I admit, Sir, that those arguments were delivered with a great deal of force and with considerable volubility. I suppose that maiden speeches of Ministers are entitled, to a certain extent, to be exempted from criticism, like the maiden speeches of members of Parliament. If it were not so, I would be a little tempted to comment upon the rather undignified attempt at mimicry which the Minister of the Interior tried last night at the expense of an old and honoured member of this House; and I would be inclined to recommend him, in the future, to assume, even if he did not feel, more of the dignity suited to an occupant of the Treasury benches. I remarked one great omission from the speech of the Minister of the Interior. I heard not a word from him as to a promise or even a hint of any immigration policy for the North-west. I think, Sir, that the country expected that the Minister would have taken some stand upon that important question. The most we heard in that direction from him last night was a reference to the bringing back of a few settlers from Dakota, who had left the older provinces of the Dominion. The repatriation of a few families is all very well; but it is not migration from the older provinces of Canada into the North-west that we want; it is immigration from other countries. It is better, I admit, that the settlers who leave the older provinces should go into our own North-west than that they should go into the United States. But mere migration of settlers from one part of Canada to another will never make this country rich or great. Surely now, after we have spent so many tens of millions of dollars opening up the North-west, we were entitled to hear some comprehensive scheme of immigration suggested, by which the best settlers from England, Ireland and Scotland and the pick of settlers from Europe, would be drawn to the North-west, where we should have tens of thousands going in and not a few scattered hundreds of repatriated Canadians. I was surprised, I must admit, and disappointed, to hear the Minister of the Interior speak with the highest degree of satisfaction, and even of pride, of the increases that have been made in the population of his own province of Manitoba during the last ten years. He seemed to glory in the fact, that in ten years that province has added 92,000 to its population. Why, Sir, that is just as nearly as possible the number that has been added in the same time to the population of the one city of Toronto, and yet that is a cause of rejoicing for the Minister of the Interior. He should have apologised for it instead of being proud of it. We should have had half a million increase of population in that time. The Minister, however, displayed a good deal of frankness on some points. He apologized for the inaction of his colleagues in the matter of tariff reform on the ground that they had been so short a time in office. Well, Sir, imagine the Minister of Finance allowing his new colleague to apologise for him, and to say that he cannot yet undertake any reform of the tariff because he has been so short a time in office, after being five or six years in that position. The Minister of Interior must have been thinking of himself and his colleague, the member for Sherbrooke, when he spoke about Ministers having been so short a time in office. At all events, we know that the member for Sherbrooke, who is now President of the Council, has been sufficiently long in office to have changed his mind on a very important question of tariff reform and to have decided, although a few weeks ago he deemed it most important to allow the importation of corn free for feeding purposes, that no such necessity exists now. I do not think I can do better, in supporting the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford, than to pass by the general considerations which might be made use of in support of his motion, and confine myself to a certain specific class of tariff reform which I think urgently demands, and has for some time demanded the attention of the Government. I think that while general considerations have great weight, they have been very well put so far in this debate, and will be still further brought forward; but we know they are very often attempted to be answered by some general assertion to the contrary, some contradiction, some perversion of the facts or figures. But I propose to bring forward today a sample case of tariff reform, in which I will give facts and figures which cannot be set aside and cannot be ignored or refuted by general assertions about the prosperity of the country, but that must be met face to face and dealt with. I propose to deal with one of the most interesting of those famous infant industries of the National Policy, I mean the cotton trade of Canada. This is probably the largest and best grown of all those infants. I think it has been the most spoiled, and is the most saucy, and it certainly is the most dangerous of them all. The proposals I will make as to that industry are covered by the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford, which calls for a general reduction of the customs duties, and I think, before I have spoken very long, the House will agree with me that such a reduction is imperatively necessary at the present time. I venture to say those duties are too high. They are so high as to be most burdensome to the people, in the first place. Then they are so high as to be a source of actual loss to the revenue. Then they are also so high as to be an obstacle to the extension of trade to Great Britain, and finally they are so high as to afford unreasonable profits to insatiable combines. To look at this question fairly and fully we should examine first as to what those duties are, both as to the rates, the percentages of the duties, and as to the gross amount of the tax. The duties collected in 1892 upon imported cotton manufactures amounted to $1,114,424, or 27⁹/₁₀ per cent, call it 28 per cent, of the value as shown in the Trade and Navigation Returns. Those duties so collected varied from a minimum of 10 per cent ad valorem on prunella for boots and shoes, which is raw material to a certain extent, to a maximum duty of 48 per cent on the item of shirts of cotton. The above duties are paid to the revenue as duties, and are received by the country; but the tariff is so arranged that on the coarser goods the specific duties per yard or per pound are so heavy that they are not paid at all as duties, and the poor man pays the higher tax on them to the protected manufacturer. That is, of course, what those high duties are for, and the result works beautifully. One or two examples of the effect of those specific duties in addition to the ad valorem duties upon the coarser kinds of cotton goods, the goods used by the poorer classes, will illustrate what I mean. I am not going to weary the House by a long list, such as I might give it, but I will only take three cases. Cotton shirtings, for instance, such as are worn by workmen, are taxed 2 cents per square yard, specific duty, in addition to 15 per cent ad valorem. Imported goods of this kind, 27 inches in width, cost from 2d. to 4d. sterling per yard, averaging 3d., which in our currency is 6 cents per yard. This would be a tax of 2.40 cents per yard, or 40 per cent on cotton shirting. Woven cotton materials, such as gingham used for women's and children's dresses, aprons &c., are taxed to the same extent as cotton shirtings, namely, 2 cents per square yard specific duty, and 15 per cent ad valorem. These cost from 1¹/₂d. to 4d. sterling per yard, making the tax from 35 per cent to 45 per cent. One other item, and a very important one, of these specific duties is, cotton hosiery. The specific duty upon cotton hosiery is 10 cents per pound and 30 per cent ad valorem. On cotton hosiery costing 2s. per dozen the tax would be, as nearly as possible, 65 per cent on the value. So much for the duty paid, first to the Government and second to the manufacturer. I have already said that the Government collects $1,114,424 per annum; and now let us see what is annually paid by the consumers of this country to the manufacturers. In order to ascertain that, you must make a calculation to find out what is the value of the gross output from the mills in Canada. There are no statistics available to the public which will show that in its simple form, but there are, however, several ways of making the calculation which are quite satisfactory. For instance, from the Trade and Navigation Returns we find that taking the year 1882, and comparing it with the year 1892, there was an increased importation of raw material for the manufacture of cotton goods in the latter year as compared with the former of 26,000,000 lbs., which increased importation of raw material caused a decrease in the importation of manufactured goods to the value of $7,000,000. That means that $7,000,000 worth of goods less came into the country by importation, and were therefore manufactured at home, because we cannot assume that as the population increases we consume less. The Trade and Navigation Returns gave us the total importation of raw cotton for 1892 as 46,000,000 lbs., and that will show in the same proportion that the home manufactures of that year were to the value of $12,380,000, because, if an extra importation of 26,000,000 lbs. raw material showed an increase of $7,000,000 in home manufactures, then a total importation of 46,000,000 lbs. will give a total home output of $12,380,000 worth. That test can be checked very readily in another way. In the report of the Montreal Cotton Company, presented at their meeting held in Montreal on the Tuesday of this week, they state that their output for the past year was to the value of $1,468,000. Now, from another return, I know that this company has 54,000 spindles in operation, and I know that the total spindles of all the cotton mills in Canada amount to 520,000. Taking the cost of the output of that one mill of 54,000 spindles, at $1,468,000, therefore, the value of the output of the 520,000 spindles in operation in the mills of Canada would be $14,000,000, or considerably beyond the other estimate I have made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is exclusive of importations.

Mr. EDGAR. That is the value of the output of the whole mills of Canada, exclusive of importations, which amount to $4,000,000 in round numbers, so that the total consumption of cotton in Canada would be $18,000,000 worth. I heard my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the other evening, estimate the total consumption at from $17,000,000 to $20,000,000, so that his estimate corresponds with my figures. We are now dealing with the portion of that total consumption which represents the output of the mills in Canada at $14,000,000. Now, what taxes are paid by the people of Canada to the Canadian manufacturers upon that output? We have seen that the Government collects at the rate of 28 per cent on the value of goods that come in, and we have seen that duties which exclude many of the other goods range from 35 per cent to 40 per cent and 45 per cent and even 65 per cent. We know that in selling these goods, the manufacturers are obliged to put the prices at the mills a shade below the protective duty. They cannot take it quite all, for if they did, they would invite importation and competition; and so they put it just a shade below, in order to prevent competition from abroad. I want to be very moderate in my estimate, and although I believe I could really put the rate of taxation that is paid to the manufacturers at 35 per cent, I shall only, for the purposes of my calculations, place it at exactly the same rate which the Government receives on the goods that come into the country, namely, 28 per cent. That percentage of duty on $14,000,000 amounts to $3,920,000 per annum, which, according to the most moderate estimate of the tariff, is put into the pockets of the Canadian manufacturers. If we are to pay that from year to year, and year in and year out, as a tax upon the people, we may capitalize that annual sum so as to see what it amounts to. Why, Sir, capitalized, it would amount to $100,000,000, which we are paying to the Canadian cotton manufacturers in order to foster this infant industry. I will try to show what this tax of $4,000,000 per annum for the benefit of the mills means. Remember, Sir, that this tax is in addition to the $14,000,000, which would be the value of the output of cotton, if imported into this country without a tax. It is the value without the duty. They get the $4,000,000 annually, and they get the $14,000,000, too. Now, the question is, does not that $14,000,000, which is the imported price of their output, pay them well for manufacturing? I say that it pays them very well, and I will prove that it does. We all know that the most important items in the manufacture of cotton are two: one great item is the cost of raw material, and the other great item the wages paid. Do these two items cost them $14,000,000 a year or anything like that? Fortunately we can arrive at an exact estimate of what the expenses under these heads are. Referring again to the Trade and Navigation Returns of 1892, I find that the 46,000,000 lbs. of raw material imported into this country in that year—of course, it was imported free—is put down as having cost $3,673,933. Now, how can we ascertain what wages were paid in the manufacture of this $14,000,000 worth of cotton? In the last census returns the total number of cotton operatives in Canada is given as 8,033. Those returns also admit that less than half the operatives are men; 58 per cent of them are women and children. Of men, women and children there are only 8,033 employed in that industry; and by the census bulletin we find the average wages, not of all these operatives, but the average wages of the cotton operatives in the province of Ontario, which, I am sure, is not the lowest average. From the way in which the census bulletins are made up, I do not think that the compiler, for the purpose of boasting about high wages, would have given the lowest wages paid in all the provinces. He has given the average wages paid in the cotton mills in Ontario, which are $280 per head. That would make the total wages of the 8,033 operatives amount to $2,249,240; and this amount, added to the cost of the raw material, $3,673,933, makes a total of $5,923,173, or say, in round figures, $6,000,000. Deducting this amount from the $14,000,000 worth of cotton produced (without taking into account the $4,000,000 of taxes which they received), there is a margin of $8,000,000 left to these cotton manufacturers on their output at the import price, over and above the cost of management, dividends and interest. This certainly puts an end to the story we often hear in favour of the protected industries, in this case at any rate, that the taxes we are paying go as wages to the operatives. Why, Sir, the wages and the cost of raw materials are paid out of the actual cost of the $14,000,000 worth, and there is $8,000,000 left, and after that the manufacturers come and take the $4,000,000 of taxes out of the people besides for their own benefit. Who dares to say that one cent of that amount goes to pay the wages of the operatives? Now, Sir, under a fair management of any business concern, I say that this $8,000,000, which is 57 per cent beyond the amount of wages and raw material, should leave a profit without any protection at all; and I think the proof that it does leave a profit without any protection at all, will be complete, if I can show that the Canadian cotton mills can successfully compete in the outside world with England and the United States without any protection. And, Sir, they do it; they do it in the market of China. The Canadian mills sent large quantities of manufactured cotton last year to China; in that year they sent to China $228,958 worth of cotton manufactured goods to compete with those of England and the world without a single cent of protection. Our Canadian mills can supply the heathen Chinese with cottons without protection, while they extort $4,000,000 per annum from the long-suffering Canadians by means of this tariff. I will show, too, that they had fortune favouring them to an extraordinary extent besides. Not only had the mills the $4,000,000 of protection, but in 1892, as the Trade and Navigation Returns show, the raw material had fallen in price very much. In 1890 the price averaged 10.2 cents per pound, whereas in 1892 it averaged only 7.9 cents per pound. Therefore the 46,000,000 lbs. imported in 1892 were cheaper than they would have been under the rate of 1890 by over $1,000,000. The manufacturers thus saved $1,000,000 on their importation of raw material in the last year of which we have a record, and, of course, you would suppose when making that immense saving in addition to their protection, they must have raised the wages of their employees. No, Sir; that was not what they were there for. They would raise the dividends; but never the wages. Then did they reduce the prices of cottons to the consumer? Oh, no, Mr. Speaker; they were there to make large reserve funds, and not to reduce the prices to the consumer. On the contrary, within the last twelve months they have raised the prices from 10 to 25 per cent upon the goods they have manufactured. When the cost of their raw material tumbled down $1,000,000, did they offer to reduce the duties? Did they come to the country and say: You have been protecting us; we required a support in years gone by; we do not require it now; reduce some of the duties; we can stand alone; we can compete in China with England, and we will give the people of Canada the benefit? No, Sir; they did nothing of the kind; but they watered their stock in order to absorb the enormous and unreasonable profits which they had been making. Now, it will be remembered that last session I called the attention of this House to the powerful combines which were being formed among the cotton mills in Canada, namely, the Dominion Cotton Mills Company, with a capital of $5,000,000, and the Canadian Coloured Cotton Mills Company, also with a capital of $5,000,000. These two companies were chartered by a few men in Montreal in 1890 and 1892, and they swallowed up nearly every one of the independent mills in Canada. I will read you a list of the mills which have been absorbed by the Dominion Cotton Company:—

1. Hochelaga, Que. [two mills].
2. Coaticooke, Que.
3. Craven, Ont. [which makes cotton for the China trade].
4. Kingston, Ont. [which makes cotton for the China trade].
5. Chambly, Que.
6. Moncton, N.B. [which also manufactures for the China trade].
7. The Nova Scotia, N.S.
8. Windsor, N.S.
9. Magog, Que.

Now, the Coloured Cotton Company, which is formed by the same organization, with the same president and the same management, and largely the same shareholders as the Dominion Cotton Company, controls the following mills:—

1. Lybster, Ont. [which is not only controlled but, I believe, closed].
2. Dundas, Ont. [also closed].
3. Canada, Ont.
4. Stormont, Ont.
5. Hamilton, Ont.
6. The Ontario, Ont.
7. Merritton, Ont.
8. St. Croix, N.B.
9. Gibson, N.B.

What are left outside of that combine? There is the Montreal Cotton Company, I admit, but although that company nominally stands outside this concern, it is really in it. The same gentleman is president of the three concerns. It is not managed by the same management as these other two big companies, but it is in the combine all the same, so that there is no relief for the country in that respect. Then, what have we outside? We have the Merchants' Cotton Mill at St. Henri, with 27,000 spindles, and I believe that is the only mill in Canada which practically gives any sort of competition to the combine. It gives competition in white cottons, and is controlled by some wealthy men, who find it better to go on as they are, but who, no doubt, will permit themselves to be swallowed up when it suits them. Then we have a little mill at Yarmouth of 4,500 spindles, and a small one at St. Johns, and a small one at Montmorenci. These mills have a total of 67,500 spindles, out of 520,100 in the whole Dominion. All the rest are absolutely controlled by this combine. I have said something about the watering of the stock of these companies. Now, here is a little bit of recent history of the Dominion Cotton Company. It is the one of these two great combines which was first incorporated—in incorporated in 1890—soon got into full swing and is making admirable profits now. On the 1st of September, 1892, the paid-up capital—I shall not inquire how it was paid up, for I do not know—was quoted as $1,500,000. I will assume it was all bona vide paid up, either by the present shareholders in cash, or by the transfer of interests in the mills which were swallowed up, or one way or the other. Now, on the 7th of the same month, September last, a scheme for watering the stock was made public, although outsiders knew it for some time and had been quietly buying up the stock. The statement made by the company was that they had only been paying 8 and 10 per cent dividends, but that their profits for the last three years had been from 22 to 27 per cent, and they therefore proposed that, by paying $10 per share, each stockholder would be entitled to a fully paid-up share of $100 of the new stock, thus increasing the capital to $3,000,000 by that delightful method. They watered their stock to absorb some of these dividends that they were becoming ashamed of.

Mr. MULOCK. They needed protection in that way.

Mr. EDGAR. What is the effect of that watering. It is this: The original shareholders, the shareholders with the $1,500,000 stock—I do not know how they got it, but call them the original paid-up shareholders—those who subscribed for the first stock and paid for it at par, got two paid-up shares of $100 each at a cost of $55 each. They paid $110 for the two shares, worth, at par, $100 each. As to the value of the watered stock, I see by the Montreal "Gazette" of this morning that 140 per cent was paid at the Board of the Stock Exchange for paid-up stock of the Dominion Company. Now, that gives to each shareholder who, as we have seen, only pays $55 per share, a profit of $85 per share, or over 154 per cent profit on his capital. He can realize that rate to-day on every share he holds, besides receiving the regular dividends of 8 and 10 per cent. Then the Coloured Cotton Co. has been less than a year in existence, and it is doing admirably, I understand, probably quite as well as the other company, and, no doubt, getting ready to make the same sort of a deal. And I have no doubt that this Government and this Parliament will facilitate their action in every reasonable way. Now, I said that the Montreal Cotton Co. was practically the same concern, although not under the same management as these two big combines. Mr. A. F. Gault is president of this and of the other two. Well, they had their meeting this week, and their stock is selling as high as 159 and 160, and it is stated in the Montreal "Gazette" of the 7th of February, that the profits for the year are figured at about 15 per cent on the actual working paid-up capital. The nominal paid-up capital is stated to be $1,000,000, and, Mr. Speaker, you will be surprised to learn that they admit a surplus reserve of $645,934. They have added $80,000 to that this month, that is they have either added it or have set it aside to be added. I am not quite sure whether the total I have given includes the $80,000 or not. But, in addition to paying their dividends, they have piled up a surplus reserve of $645,934. Now, Sir, the annual general meeting of this company was held on Tuesday of this week, and they proposed to increase the stock from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000. Of course they have to get the sanction of the Government to do that, and I have no doubt they will get it with great facility, and then they have to go through such processes as they may be advised, and as their experience will readily suggest, for watering that stock or otherwise getting the greatest profit out of it. Now, Sir, I say that this tax is so high as to destroy the revenue of the country from the importation of cotton. In 1882 the revenue received by the country on the importation of cottons was $2,476,640. That was before the great inrush of capital, or when that inrush, to which I will refer more fully in a moment, was just beginning. And now, under the high protective duties which have come into force, but which had not fully come into play, we have got, as I show you, a revenue reduced to less than one-half its former amount, or a total of $1,114,000 this year. All this tax is clearly levied upon the Canadian consumer, the bulk of this tax is levied against British manufacturers, and it is levied in favour of the cotton combine. That is, perhaps, the simplest way to put it. Now, levying it on the Canadian consumer may be called patriotism, but it is a patriotism that favours only the few, the very few, stockholders of these combines; it is a patriotism that plunders the whole of the rest of the population of Canada for the benefit of these stockholders. So much for that part of this patriotism. Then, by this tax, we shut out British manufacturers. Is that loyalty? That is the 50 per cent loyalty, that is the old flag loyalty, the cotton flag loyalty which we hear so much about, shutting out the British manufacturer by taxing the Canadian people in favour of the cotton combine. Next, Sir, let me inquire, for a moment, who have been sufferers from this high protective tariff since 1879, when it was brought into existence? I contend that there are two classes that suffer. I have only spoken to you, so far, of one class, the consumers. But, Sir, the first to lose money were those who had been deluded into rushing into this business to share the enormous profits that were made at first when the high duties were put on. What were the natural results? There was a great inrush of capital, and twice as many millions of dollars of hard Canadian cash were put into the construction of cotton mills and their machinery as could find profitable employment. The companies cut one another's throats; they competed to the death, and the time soon came when they paid no dividends. The Canadian consumer for a short time got the benefit of that, I will admit; but who wants to get the benefit of cheap goods at that expense? Nobody; that was never the policy of our party. Mr. Speaker; but, Sir, those who, invited and encouraged and urged by the advocates of the National Policy, and dazzled by the prospect of high dividends, put their money honestly and fairly into the business, suffered the natural result; they lost their money, or at least a large part of it. Some people lost their all. The market was glutted. I turned up the quotations in the Montreal "Gazette" of the various cotton stocks on the 25th July, 1885. The Canadian Cotton Company, now part of this combine, was then quoted at 35 cents. These are the buyers' offers that I give, and there were no transactions reported on that day at all. The Montreal Cotton Company, the one that had the meeting this week, and the one that is to double its capital, is quoted at 52½ cents on the dollar. That stock is now quoted at 160. Then there is the Dundas mill, which is also in the combine now, then quoted at 30 cents on the dollar. The Stormont mill, another of the combines, stood at 25 cents on the dollar. The Hudon mill stood at 64 cents on the dollar; this mill is also in the combine, under the name of the Hochelaga Company. It was amalgamated with the St. Anne's Company, and became consolidated in the combine under the name of The Hochelaga. These quotations, and I do not think they are the lowest, show that the men who invested in these industries were then standing to lose or had lost in many cases 75 per cent of the money they had put in. Then the strong, as is usual, drove the weaker to the wall. The wreckers came and wrecked some of these companies, froze out the stockholders, grabbed their mills, water privileges and machinery, and combined against the rest, and, as they became stronger, by cutting prices when necessary, and by all sorts of schemes, which these long-headed business men knew how to work, they forced the owners of other mills out and gave them stock at what figure they choose, and bonds at what was agreed upon, and got the control of their mills also. Mighty little cash they paid for it. It was done nearly all in bonds and stocks of these two big combines. I understand there was a little class who made money, too, but the original men did not. There were certain men given a hint of this thing, friends of the combine, who expected it would come. They went and bought up stocks at a low rate, and then, when the combine was ready, they came in. I heard of one case of a man making in a very short time, and with very little trouble, $100,000 in that way. He was not one of the original combine men, but he made his little profit on the turn-over. Now, Sir, the Canadian public are paying that $4,000,000 annually to keep up this infant industry, formed, as I have shown you, and as is undeniably true, on the ruins of thousands, and inflated with millions of fictitious capital. I hope the fathers of the National Policy are proud of their work. There is another important matter to which I must refer. What position is the dry-goods trade absolutely at the mercy of this great combine. They must have cotton goods, and they have got to buy them from the combines; they can buy them nowhere else. They have got to take what they are given and pay what they are asked. Sir, if you, or any members of this House, go among your wholesale constituents, the merchants who buy from these combines, and ask them privately what they think of it, they may tell you privately; they dare not let you use their name in public, because they would be hounded and driven out of their business by this haughty combine, if they chose to do so. It is legalized tyranny and wholesale robbery. Will anybody say that under these circumstances competition is possible, because there is no law to prevent any man starting another mill and making competition? Why, Sir, with half of their present strength, or half of their present resources or prosperity, the combine killed out all competition. No sane man dare venture in, for he would be undersold and ruined, if it cost the combine $1,000,000. It would be nothing to them, when they are getting four millions and upwards out of the people every year. Talk about competition under circumstances like that. You might as well expect competition against the whiskey combine, which was another institution created, also, by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. LISTER. The biggest combine in America.

Mr. EDGAR. With their provision for two years' storage for whiskey. They knew it was to be an enormous combine, it was worth while paying for it, and I have no doubt it was paid for, or it would not have been created by a paternal Government. Now, Sir, I contend that the Government have a double responsibility in this matter. The high tariff maintains that monopoly now, and the Government with its own hands created these two great companies. Last session I moved here for returns as to the increase of the stock of these two companies. The result? They show that the Dominion Company, of which I have been talking, as having just watered their stock 100 per cent, a million and a half of dollars were incorporated with only $100,000 capital, on the 28th November, 1890. In December of the same year, they petitioned the Governor-General in Council to be allowed to increase that capital stock to $5,000,000. The petition stated that the increase was required for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the company, and it was evident on the face of the papers that the object was to buy up a whole string of these companies, a list of which I read you a while ago and which they have already bought up. Now, what has the Government to do about that? What responsibility had they? Well, I will tell you, Sir, the Joint Stock Companies Act, under which this company applied for an increase of its capital from one hundred thousand dollars to five millions, a fifty-fold increase of its capital says that this cannot take place until a by-law has been passed, until proof has been given to the Governor-General in Council of the expediency and bona fide character of this increase. The Minister has brought down, and I have on my desk here, returns showing the evidence before them, and it was as I tell you, that this increase was required to buy up these other companies. The Government considered that that was expedient, they were satisfied of the expediency of this object, and of the bona fide character of this increase. It was undoubtedly bona fide intended by the promoters. But if the Government thought that it is expedient to increase the stock in that irregular way—because it is an irregular way to give any company such an increase as that—I say they have an extraordinary notion of what is expedient in the interest of this country.

Mr. MULLOCK. Does the hon. gentleman say that the papers submitted to the Government on which they asked for an increase, on their face disclosed the nature of the increase, that it was to enable the petitioning company to buy up all these other cotton mills?

Mr. EDGAR. It was set out on the face of the papers on which the application was made. Undoubtedly that was the explanation that they received, and the evidence that they received, of the expediency. Very well, that was the case of the Dominion Cotton Company. Then I want to say a word about another point. Now, in the ordinary incorporation of a company, the Minister of Justice knows that with a capital of $100,000, fifty thousand only is required to be subscribed. And remember, Mr. Speaker, their capital was, as originally patented, $100,000, which they subscribed to qualify them for the increase. They got their increase to $5,000,000, and if they had had to go in the ordinary way to the Government to get an incorporation with a capital of $5,000,000 for any legitimate object whatever, they would have had to subscribe one-half of that, or $2,500,000 before they could have got the charter. But that would never have satisfied their book, because it would not have given them an opportunity to form this combination in the first place, and to water the stock, as they have done, in the second place. They would have had to assume a liability by the subscription of $2,500,000, which no law would enable them to water, which they must pay up in hard cash or its equivalent, or the courts would know the reason why. But by this back-door system, they, by a subscription of the $100,000 only, got from the Dominion Government a charter for $5,000,000 of capital, showing on the face of the application an intention to absorb these companies. Does the Minister of Justice imagine that we will think he was so simple as not to know that was a combine, and so simple as not to know that it was suspicious on the face of it, that its objects were apparent, that is to say, to form a combine and to water the stock? If the Minister of Justice does not know it, has he no colleagues in the Government who would know it? That was what was done in the case of the Dominion Cotton Company. But, Sir, the facts are still worse, if possible, in the case of the Coloured Cotton Company. The Dominion Cotton Company got this increase in December, 1890. This Coloured Cotton Company was composed of the same men, the same applicants, who were prepared to buy up the coloured mills, the long list of which I have read. In doing so, they knew the trick. They did not subscribe stock to the amount of $5,000,000; not at all, they placed the stock at $100,000 and obtained a charter for that amount; they subscribed the $100,000 and paid up 50 per cent on it. I desire to call the attention of the House to this fact, that the charter issued was dated 27th February, 1892, with a capital of $100,000, and on the same day, without waiting one hour—and they must have got the news of the granting of the charter by telegraph—the parties held a meeting of shareholders and a meeting of directors, and they passed by-laws and decided to petition for power to increase the capital up to $5,000,000. This was done even before they had seen their charter, for it was done on the day the charter was dated at the office in Ottawa. The papers I have in my desk disclose the same state of facts, namely, that $100,000 stock was subscribed, and as regards the increase of the capital to $5,000,000, it was an irregular proceeding and a monstrous breach of the power of the Governor in Council, to dispense with the subscription of $2,500,000 of that stock and leave the company with a subscription of only $100,000. No doubt, the company intended to secure all the cotton mills in Canada. The Government must have known everything as to what was going on, and yet with indecent haste, on 7th March, they issued supplementary Letters Patent allowing the increase, one week after the date of the original charter. Suppose the Government were innocent and careless in the first instance, they could not plead that they were innocent in the second case. I hold that the Government are responsible for this condition of affairs, that by their executive acts they placed it within the power of these companies to frame these combines, and by their legislative action they have made themselves responsible for maintaining them in power. They are responsible in a double sense. I ventured to hint, when moving for these papers a year ago, that that was their object. The object was evidently a combine, partially carried out then and which was to be carried out further. What did the Minister of Justice say to me at that time? He said:

If it were established, as the hon. gentleman seems to assert, that the tariff was the means of enabling such a company to act oppressively to the consumer, it would certainly not very long remain so.

Now, Sir, I call on the Premier, who was then Minister of Justice, to make good his words. I have demonstrated beyond a peradventure that the tariff is the means of enabling the companies to act oppressively to the consumer, and I say that the Government of this country are derelict in their duty not to know, as well as I do, that it is so. When the facts are open to my inquiry and my investigation, surely the Government, with all the means at their command can ascertain the facts as well as a private member of Parliament, and I can give them no excuse. The resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is correct in stating that the tariff should be at once thoroughly reformed, and if there is one reform more than another which is demanded by the circumstances of the case, and by the country, when the people shall know one-half or one-tenth of the facts established, it is the substantial and real reduction of the cotton duties. This reduction must not be put off until the Government and the Minister of Finance have perambulated through this country, the Finance Minister hunting for a grievance with a bandage over his eyes, taking round as his menagerie the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Controllers, which he can exhibit as being new and curious varieties of animals, not of much use, it is true, but very expensive. I warn the First Minister that the country will not be satisfied with his allowing the present condition to continue, as a thoroughly vigorous reduction of the tariff at this session of Parliament is imperatively demanded.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster, and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Finance, last Tuesday, for the first time in many a long and weary day, drew a smile to the faces, and I hope, sent a thrill of pleasure to the hearts of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition; for then, for the first time, they heard from that unexpected source, the dear old familiar story that, in some parts of Canada, there was a degree of unrest and dissatisfaction; and, I venture to say, Sir, that if the members of that august body have any sense of humour in their composition, another smile must have flitted across their faces during the progress of this debate, for, if anything could call up such an expression, it would be to see the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) berating the tariff because it is not as satisfactory and not as favourable to the manufacturers as the old tariff of 1878; while his faithful followers from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) and West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), in their turn, with equal acerbity, berated the same tariff on account of the monopoly it has created by the untoward protection it has afforded to these same manufacturers. Sir, I am sorry to see that the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) is not in his seat, for I do not intend to follow him in the attack he made this afternoon on the one particular branch of the tariff which was supposed to be exemplified by the combination in the cotton trade of this country. It seemed to me, looking at the matter with all seriousness and sincerity that while we all recognize the loss that this House would sustain if that hon. member were to transfer his versatile talents to another sphere, it possibly might not be unwise on his part to transfer those talents from this sphere, where they seem to be doomed to perpetual oblivion, to the stock exchange of a neighbouring city, where, judging from the financial knowledge he has displayed this afternoon, he would soon become a monarch. After hearing him say this afternoon that the cotton manufacturers had last year derived a profit of $8,000,000, I turned to the stock reports of the Toronto "Globe" of yesterday, and found that none of the stocks of the cotton companies were quoted at an unreasonable figure. I found the Canada Cotton Company quoted at from 111 to 109, the Montreal Cotton Company at from 155 to 152, and the Dominion Cotton Company at from 138 to 139; and I think, Sir, that it is rather casting discredit on the intelligence of this House—a thing that perhaps some hon. gentlemen are sometimes too ready to do—to suggest that those three companies can accumulate the enormous profit of $8,000,000 in one year, while the people of this country have so little idea of the way they are being robbed by them, that capitalists are willing to pay on the open market no higher prices for their stocks than those I have read. Without looking further to see whether the National Policy had anything to do with the alleged combination, the subsequent remarks of that hon. gentleman when he said that on the 25th of July, 1885, six or seven years after the inauguration of this policy, cotton stocks were offered at 35 cents and 52½ cents on the dollar without bidders would surely be sufficient to show that whatever burthen, if any, the people of this country are labouring under, they cannot be attributed to this National Policy; but in an attack a great deal depends on the source from which the attack comes, and as a resident of an unfortunate city, which was robbed of $300,000 some years ago, I remember a piece of legislation on the part of the Ontario Legislature, by which one of the great railway companies of this country was allowed to gobble up all the smaller railways of the country, and by which the city of Belleville was robbed of $300,000 which it granted to one of those roads on certain conditions, and I remember that that scheme was assisted, as has been said and never denied, among others, by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). When he condemns the Ontario Government for the most gigantic act of spoliation that was ever authorized by any Legislature, it will be time enough for him to take up the cudgels in this House to attack the operations carried on by these corporations. I believe that in some parts of this country there is a feeling of unrest and disquiet, and no wonder, for many gentlemen in speeches throughout the country, and in the public press, have been telling the people that the election in the United States was based on the distinct issue of protection versus free trade. I would not venture to say that any gentleman sitting in this assembly could be ignorant of the issues in that campaign; but it has been stated by some gentlemen throughout the length and breadth of this land, that the true issue therein was protection versus free trade, and that the United States is now on the threshold of free trade. Therefore, I say it is no wonder that a feeling of unrest and disquiet is permeating the people of this country. I found such a feeling existing in my riding a short time ago, and I was urged to entreat the Government not to remove the duty on corn imported into this country; for our farmers, having learned from the practical tests made by the Experimental Farm that they can feed their stock with their own grains, feel that it would be the height of madness for this Government to remove the duty on American corn, and thus deprive them of the advantage of a protective tariff. These farmers, looking at the subject as a matter of common sense, say that if the duty is taken off corn, the next demand will come from the butchers to have the duty taken off beef, pork, lard and other things of that kind; and then the days will return that existed before this Government put them to an end by increasing the duties—those days when the Americans were delivering meats from Chicago in the markets of Canada at prices which would have driven our farmers to poverty if they had not received sufficient protection upon the things they were producing. But it has been found that the prices of the products of our farmers have been improving, and for them, as well as for the manufacturers and other classes of the people, protection has indeed been a good thing. It has seemed to me—and I hope I am not presumptuous in saying it—that in days to come, when the historian takes his pen in hand to write the history of this country, no page will seem more incredible, and certainly none will seem more grotesque, than that which describes this august assembly, composed of men from the Atlantic to the Pacific, sent here to legislate in the interest of the community, spending day after day in session and after session in an interminable debate on the merits of the National Policy. Surely by this time, after that policy has been tried for fourteen years, not only every member of this House—we take that for granted—but every man in the country, has an opinion which will not be altered by anything that may be said here, whether that policy has been a success or not; and I venture to think that it will be thought an almost incredible thing by the historian looking back to this time, that the members of this House should be willing to waste their time at such an enormous expenditure of money in discussing this threadbare and oft-repeated question. But, Sir, when we come to consider a question of this kind, there are different kinds of arguments used, and certainly some are not used by gentlemen who are anxious to expedite matters and come to the conclusion of the debate as soon as possible. There is one form of argument which has been outside of this House—I will not say inside of this House—which consists of very industriously and laboriously constructing a tremendous man of straw, and then, lance in hand, swooping down and demolishing him, reminding one of the tilt of the famous Spanish knight at the windmill. Is it not beneath the dignity of a member of a body like this to waste the time of his fellow-members, if not his own time, in such a discussion? When we find hon. gentlemen opposite time and again protesting the loyalty of the Liberal party, when no man on this side has ever denied their loyalty, they are simply raising a man of straw for the express purpose of knocking him down; and I venture to say, if I may depart from the strict historical ground of truth and take a flight of fancy, that the very man who does that is the man who, if challenged from the opposite side of the House to repudiate a newspaper, a supporter in his own riding, which had come out with articles which were a disgrace to the constituency and a scandal to the member representing it, such a man would be perfectly certain when challenged to repudiate and deny such an article, to hold his peace and not offend his annexationist supporter. There is another style of argument we sometimes hear, a style that reminds one of a certain estimable bird, the ostrich, which, when warned of impending danger, buries its head in the sand, and then, seeing no ill, fears none, and with perfect complacency awaits the coming danger. That is the style of argument often used in this House, and which was used the other night by an hon. gentleman who said that the policy of the Government was so detestable that in order to get rid of it he was prepared to adopt a revenue tariff, or a continental free trade, or unrestricted reciprocity, or he did not care what else. It is not surely treating this House with proper consideration for hon. gentlemen to be so utterly blinded by political prejudice as to be utterly indifferent what policy will succeed the National Policy, provided that policy can be overturned; and to be so utterly regardless of the consideration due the people as to imagine they are prepared to overthrow the National Policy, which they have adopted and ratified again and again, when the party advocating its overthrow has nothing better to suggest than one of these three widely divergent policies. As has been pointed out by the hon. First Minister in Ontario, a short time ago, and it cannot be too often emphasized, people sometimes think that the National Policy is synonymous with the tariff; and this despite the fact that, time and again, election after election, they have been reminded that the tariff is but one branch of the National Policy, namely, the fiscal branch. When, in 1878, after suffering depression and all the evils of an unwise Administration during five years, the people were called to give their decision at the polls, the paramount subject in their minds was the evils they had suffered, and the people of Canada, smarting under their burdens, grasped at the policy put before them by the then Opposition, the National Policy, which seemed to afford a remedy for the ills under which they were suffering, and, no doubt, in supporting the National Policy, as they did, in 1878, they supported it mainly as a fiscal policy. But time rolled on, and when, in 1882, the Government again appealed to the people and sailed into the fight under the old banner of the National Policy, the fiscal branch of that policy was by no means the only or the most important factor in the fight. The construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was then the main issue which divided the two parties, although the fiscal policy was by no means lost sight of. The Government went into that fight under the old banner, which stood also for national progress, and came out victorious. In 1887 the Government again faced the people at the polls, again under the old banner, and they relied not only on the fiscal branch of their policy, but on the national prosperity with which it has proved itself synonymous as well. So much was this the case, that the then leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake), in his Malvern speech, admitted that it was impossible to carry on the affairs of the country with any other policy, and in 1887 the Government again achieved victory, under the same old flag which symbolized National Policy, national progress and national prosperity as well. When last the Government appealed to the country, when the tocsin sounded in 1891, and the forces on both sides prepared for war, and when the Opposition propounded the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, which, rightly or wrongly, the majority of Canadians, every American statesman, every American politician, every American newspaper writer of any repute, unhesitatingly said was one which Americans should support because it tended to annexation, that policy which drove from the leadership of the opposite side of the House the ablest man who ever filled that position from the time of Confederation down to the leadership of the genial, courteous gentleman who at present controls its councils, when the circumstances were such as to ring from the venerable old chief who so long directed this House, his stirring battle-cry, "A British subject I was born and a British subject I will die," we went into the fight with the old banner, but this time it stood also for national preservation. Since then we have continued to march under the old National Policy banner, which means national policy, national progress, national prosperity, and national preservation. But attacks are made first on one item of this fiscal branch of the policy, and then on another item, and I sometimes wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite think hon. gentlemen on this side are so easily to be deceived, and the wool so easily pulled over their eyes, that they will be induced to support first this attack on the

National Policy and then another attack, and after that still another, so that finally, after long waiting, hon. gentlemen opposite may awake some morning and find that the National Policy has at last disappeared. We suspected on this side of the House that such was the policy of our friends opposite. But, if we had any doubts about the matter, the Toronto "Globe" came forward and gave us to understand the position occupied by hon. gentlemen on the other side :

The fact that the member's views as to the tariff reform are confined to one or two articles is no reason why his aid in detaching these articles from the national policy structure should not be cheerfully accepted. If every one removes the particular brick that he objects to, there won't be much of the noble structure standing by the time they get through with it.

But gentlemen on this side of the House, I am satisfied, are prepared to stand by the Government in their determination not to allow the National Policy to be destroyed item by item ; and I feel that however the utterances of the Finance Minister may be misunderstood and misrepresented, there has gone forth through the length and breadth of this land a clear understanding of his statement that, as circumstances change, as our industries multiply and increase, as business extends, as competition widens, as new avenues of trade are opened up, as all the changes occur that time must necessarily bring, changes in details must be made in our fiscal policy, from time to time, as they have been made from 1879 to the present day ; and that the Government, in setting about the task of making these changes, is as determined in 1893 as it was in 1879 to stand by the principle of the National Policy in all its branches, fiscal and others. Before proceeding to discuss other points, I hope I will be pardoned if I call attention to what seems rather a misunderstanding than anything else in the speech of hon. gentlemen opposite, perhaps more outside than in this House. It is unfortunate that it has become altogether too much the custom to bandy about charges of disloyalty freely. Heaven knows politics are bitter enough at their best. The best of friends, starting in on an election fight, in the heat of the contest, and with the party prizes in view, will naturally give vent to their excitement and a'low feelings to prevail which they will regret when the contest is over. There is nothing more irritating than those charges of disloyalty. It has often seemed to me that if gentlemen who repeat the charge of disloyalty would thoroughly grasp the distinction between patriotism and loyalty, we would find fewer charges of disloyalty brought than we do. I have found that gentlemen, in replying to that charge, unfortunately are apt to confuse patriotism with disloyalty, and repudiate the charge of one when they intended to repudiate the charge of the other. To illustrate what I mean, when our volunteers were called to the front in 1896 to repel a foreign horde of miscreants prepared to overrun our land, they were inspired by patriotism ; but when in Britain's hour of need, some of our brave citizens volunteered to serve under the British flag in the Crimea and in Egypt, they were inspired by loyalty and not patriotism ; and it seems to me that hon. gentlemen, in discussing this question, might consider whether or not, in advocating a discrimination against the mother land, admitting their patriotism to the full, there might not be ground at least given to excuse those who differ from them in having some doubts as to their loyalty. While, at the same time, if gentlemen will persistently run down their own land, if they will decry the land which gave them birth and in which they live, if they will tell of the terribly mortgaged state of the farmers and the people of this country without telling at the same time of the mortgaged state of the farmers and people of other lands, if they will tell of the distress which is supposed to exist in this land, while telling nothing of the distress which exists in other lands, if they will tell of the ruinous prices of the farm produce of this country and not of the ruinous prices of farm produce in other countries—if in this way they continue to minimize the virtues of this country and exaggerate the virtues of other countries, I think, however loyal they may be, they must not be surprised if some unthinking people are inclined to suspect that they are not as truly patriotic as they should be. Now, Sir, proceeding to discuss the question which seems to be before the House more particularly than any other, the practical results of the National Policy, as to whether or not that policy has been a success, it seems to me that everybody will admit that in this world we cannot judge of anything save by comparison. The man who is rightly considered a well-to-do man in the rear townships or the small village, transferring himself and his assets to a metropolitan city, is found to be little better than a pauper, and so on all through the world, every judgment we form must be based on a comparison and, therefore, there are certain standards which must be set up, from which we draw our deductions and according to which we form our opinions as to the success or failure of this, that or the other matter. Now, it seems to me that the question at issue is whether the country is or is not prosperous. There are certain obvious ways of testing the question as to the prosperity of the country. One would think that if it were found that the railway mileage of the country had vastly increased, that the passengers carried and the freight carried had vastly increased, if the shipping of the country had vastly increased and the freight and passengers carried had vastly increased, if it were found that the savings in the banks had vastly increased, if it were found that in the mother land, in the market of the world, where the keenest capitalists make it their life study to judge the prosperity of other lands and the value of securities of other lands, that our securities rank among the highest and that these keen capitalists believe that we are a successful and a prosperous people, we might be content ourselves to take for granted what seems to be testified on every hand within our country and also without. Perhaps because these sources of judgment all tend to the same conclusions, our friends opposite are afraid to trust them and they have brought forth the most extraordinary argument to prove that the National Policy is a failure and that the people of this country are not truly prosperous. Putting their argument in a very few words, I think it comes to this: Granted that the population of this country in 1881 was, in round numbers, 4,300,000 granted that in 1891 the population was about 4,800,000—I am speaking in round numbers—the increase was about half a million. Granted that the average rate of increase is more than 12 per cent in a country that is prosperous, they argue that because we have only increased this half million in ten years, making only a little over 11 per cent, and other countries have increased in larger proportion, therefore, Canada is not a prosperous country. I think that is the first of the argument addressed to this House this session, as well as innumerable times last session. In discussion this item perhaps it would assist in the understanding of it if we express it in syllogistic form. I think we would express it thus: Every nation that is prosperous increases more than 12 per cent in ten years; Canada has not increased more than 12 per cent in ten years; therefore, Canada is not prosperous. Now, looking at the argument as an argument, there is no doubt that there is not a flaw in it. If it be true that every nation that is prosperous increases more than 12 per cent in ten years, if it be also true that Canada did not increase more than 12 per cent in ten years, then it is perfectly certain that Canada is not a prosperous country. But, in considering the argument, we have naturally to examine the statement of facts to see if those statements are in accord with the facts or not. The first statement is that all nations that are prosperous increase at a rate of more than 12 per cent in ten years. The simplest way to verify such a proposition, of course, is to look at the records and study the experience of other countries and find out what that experience really is. Let us first take a country which is very dear, as it well may be to many gentlemen on this side as well as on the other side of the House. Look at the increase of population in France. That increase is so slight as to be hardly worth expressing in the form of percentage. In 1886 the population of France was 38,218,903; in 1891 it had increased to 38,343,192, only a hundred thousand in a population of 38,000,000 in five years. I will not bother carrying that into the percentage; it is too small to pay attention to. Taking Germany, we find that in 1885 the population was 46,855,704, and in 1890 it was 49,416,476. The annual rate of increase in Germany during these years was 1.06, making for the ten years not 11 per cent. If we go back over German history, from 1871 to the present day, we find that at no time until last year, with one exception, was the increase so high as during that period. It may be said that the emigration from Germany was so great as to account for this small increase. But, as a matter of fact, the emigration was not sufficient to affect the comparison. The emigrants from 1886 to 1890 were only 456,136, which, compared with the population of 49,000,000, is too small to affect the result. Then, look at Belgium and the Netherlands. From 1876 to 1889 the annual increase was .85 per cent, or at the rate of 8.50 for ten years. From 1880 to 1890 the annual increase was at the rate of 1.02 per cent, or 10.20 per cent for ten years. In the Netherlands in 1889 the population was 4,411,415, and in 1890 it was 4,564,565. In the ten years the increase was but .09 per cent, or at the rate of only 90 for ten years. And if we look to the mother land, Great Britain, we find that in the last decade, from 1881 to 1891, the increase was only 8.17 per cent. In 1881 the population was 35,241,482, and in 1891 it was 37,888,153. Looking at Scotland, we find that the increase in the same time was only 7.96. And so we find, looking at all these countries, that the rate of increase is not more than 12 per cent, and therefore, the first premise laid down by our friends opposite is contrary to the fact, for the increase of population in the country being less than 12 per cent is not proof that that country is not prosperous. The second proposition is that in Canada we have not increased more than 12 per cent in the last ten years. I suppose every member in this House is conversant, as most of the people of this country are, with the fact that the census of 1881 was taken in one way and the census of 1891 in another way. There was a time for discussing the comparative merits and values of these methods, but whatever may be thought of the comparative merits, we may all admit that the census of 1881 shows all the people that were in this country, and certainly some more, and there is no reason whatever for saying that the census of 1891 shows more than the actual number of people in the country at the time it was taken.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh, oh!

Mr. NORTHROP. Why, Sir, in 1881, if a family were living in Ottawa here, and the census enumerator came round and wished to know the number of that family he would be told, perhaps, that there were the father and the mother, two children at home, one in Montreal, one in Quebec and two in the States. They were all put down as in Ottawa. And when the census enumerators in Quebec and Montreal went their rounds they found the two referred to as living in those cities and recorded them there also. Those who come from the lower provinces, and who know the extent of the emigration from Quebec to the other side of the line, can see what a monstrous difference it would have made with the population of Quebec if the census had been taken that way, that not only every member of the family who had only temporarily left his home was put down as living here at the time, but also all others unless the head of the family happened to state they would never return. If hon. gentlemen will refer to the "Debates" in 1882, page 165, they will find that the census returns of the previous decade were before the House, and the question was as to whether they had been taken 'de facto' or 'de jure'; and Mr. Blake arose in this Chamber, and said:

In some cases they have counted every person who belonged to a house, even although that person had been a very long time resident in foreign parts, unless the head of the household would say he was quite sure the person was not coming back. In other instances men who have been absent eight, ten or twenty years have, as I have been informed by persons in the locality who were familiar with the circumstances, been counted.

It is entirely uncertain then, under the circumstances, what our population numbers. Nobody can tell by this mode of taking the census, the actual number of our Canadian population.

Now, Sir, when we find a gentleman who is admitted to be the pride of the Reform party, from his place in the House, making such a statement as that the census of 1881 was taken in such a way that no person could tell what the population of the country was. I ask, is it fair for hon. gentlemen opposite now to take it for granted that that census was perfect, and to argue from that census so as to exaggerate the number of people who have left this country, and to draw the deduction that this country is not prosperous? Surely we can appeal to gentlemen opposite, surely if the National Policy is the failure and the fraud that they charge it is—and we quite recognize the right of hon. gentlemen to hold such an opinion—surely if it is such a failure, there must be bona fide grounds for complaint, there must be grounds for complaint against it which can be verified by facts, without basing their complaint on the census of 1881, which their own leader publicly declared was utterly fallacious. Now, when I am speaking on this subject, without wasting more time, a cognate subject occurs to my mind. Speaking in a similar way a few nights ago, the hon. member for South Oxford, a Privy Councillor, too, I believe, slurringly attacked the Government for the late addition to the Cabinet, and stated that in Great Britain there were only eleven or twelve Cabinet Ministers, while here we have but seventeen or eighteen. Now, I think it is beneath the dignity of this House for a gentleman occupying his position—for nobody disputes his ability—it is beneath his dignity and beneath the respect due to this House for any gentleman to make any statement like that. He said that there were eleven or twelve Cabinet Ministers in the old country (while they have eighteen or twenty), and if that were all, a difference of nearly 100 per cent would surely be enough to entitle hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to ask him for a withdrawal of the statement. That hon. gentleman must have known, he is too acute a historical student to not have known that the number of the Ministry in the old country is upwards of fifty—fifty-three, I believe, is the exact number.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh, oh!

Mr. NORTHRUP. I speak by the books. It is a very easy matter to verify. I am drawing a distinction between Cabinet Ministers and the Ministry; perhaps my hon. friend does not know the difference. Perhaps it has been so long since some hon. gentlemen have been concerned in a Cabinet that they have forgotten the distinction; but there is a distinction between a Cabinet Minister and a Minister not of the Cabinet, and if they will take the trouble to investigate the matter they will find that there are over fifty Ministers in Great Britain to-day. If you look at the various colonies—and they, after all, are the only places to which we can look for any light on this subject, because in those colonies alone have the people a system of government resembling our own—in those various colonies it will be found that the number of Ministers is not disproportionately small as compared with the number of Ministers that govern this Dominion. Take, for example, Newfoundland, with a population of 197,000. They do not seem to think that seven Cabinet Ministers are too many. If we look at New South Wales, with a population of 1,000,000, they do not think that nine Ministers are too many. Victoria, with a population of 1,050,000, has ten Ministers. In South Australia, with a population of 320,000, seven Ministers are required. In New Zealand, with a population of 640,000, of whom 41,000 are Maoris, there are seven Cabinet Ministers. So we will find, if we look around the colonies, that this Dominion will compare very favourably with the other British possessions in the number of its Ministry, looking to the respective populations and respective wealth of the colonies. Now, Sir, in conclusion, there is just one point to which I would like to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite. In looking through the census returns of Ontario I have discovered either a most extraordinary coincidence or a judgment of Providence—I confess I do not know which. In studying the census returns of that province, I found, as I say, a marvellous coin-vidence, or a judgment of Providence, that they tell the story they do. Without pretending myself to attach any blame to hon. gentlemen opposite, I think they at least might take advice in a friendly way; and when they find that Providence—admitting they are always right—is always on this side of the House, it would be good judgment on their part as soon as possible to range themselves on the same side as Providence. Now, we know perfectly well that whatever may be the faults of this side of the House, we have never been accused of running down or maligning our country. We may, perhaps, over-estimate the virtues of our province; we may, perhaps, sometimes be led to discount too largely the possibilities of our country; but certainly we, as a party, can not be accused of maligning or running down our country. I will not say that members of the Opposition are justly so accused, but it is most certainly a fact that hon. gentlemen opposite are accused of maligning the country. Certainly hon. gentlemen opposite, if they are not prepared to distrust their own ears, must have heard many of their own number and their supporters throughout the country singing in one endless chorus the praises of another adjoining land, to the discredit and disadvantage of this land. When we come to look at the census returns of 1890, it is surely, as I say, either a marvellous coincidence or a judgment of Providence, that the counties from which the exodus is so striking, are the very counties that are not represented by gentlemen on this side of the House; and the counties in which the increase has been striking, are the counties that are represented by gentlemen on this side of the House. Now, I see the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) meets that statement with a ghastly smile. I have no desire to wound the feelings of that hon. gentleman; I wish rather to please that urbane and genial disposition which has promoted so much hilarity in this House; and, therefore, with all respect, I bow in admiration of the eloquence which has been exercised so successfully in the past as to diminish the population in South Grey by 2,031 souls in one short decade.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is no record.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Yes, that is the record, and the hon. gentleman has employed his abilities in a manner less patriotic and loyal than we might have hoped.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is the portion of the riding where I do not live, where they are under the influence of my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule).

Mr. NORTHRUP. They seem, at least, to have been influenced by the member for South Grey, or else he would have us believe that the member in the adjoining riding was accountable for his presence here. But looking over the division list of this House, I think it will be found that, speaking in round numbers, the Government majority from Ontario is about twenty-eight out of a representation of ninety; so that, I think, I am correct in saying that if the Government had two more supporters, they would have two-thirds of the members from Ontario. Under these circumstances, it would be fair to assume that, if we take the number of ridings in which there have been decreases, there would be two-thirds Conservatives and one-third Reformers. That is a fair way of comparing it. But that is not the tale told by the census. If we look at the ridings that show Conservative losses we find thirteen; if we look at the Reform losses we find they number twenty-two, so that although nearly two-thirds of the representation in this House from Ontario is Conservative, two Reform ridings show a decrease to every one Conservative riding. Then, again, there are ridings that show gains, and here, too, we might expect we would have two-thirds; but if we look at them we find about thirty-eight Conservative ridings showing gains and only thirteen Reform ridings. So we find, if we take one riding after another, the practical result of the policy pursued by hon. gentlemen seems to be this, that in the ridings in which the people have been told continuously and unceasingly, year after year, that the country was going to the dogs and that it was not a fit country to live in, the people have left the Dominion and gone to seek a foreign and more blessed land; whereas, in other parts of this country where the people have been educated and informed as to the true facts, in fact the constituencies represented by hon. members on this side of the House, we find the gains have been great and the losses have been few. Surely if there was no higher motive than that of self-interest, we might, in view of such result, appeal to our Reform friends to join with us in trying to bring about a truly national policy, for I sometimes think we are liable to err in the one way and to go to one extreme, just in the same way as hon. gentlemen opposite are liable to err in the other direction. I think we sometimes hear so much about the wealth of this country, of its inexhaustible soil, forest and fisheries and mineral wealth, we are inclined to think Canada is already a great country, whereas it is at the best only potentially great. We have all the factors which go to constitute true national greatness, but though we have the factors, those factors of themselves will no more make us a truly great country than will the coal while it lies buried under the earth serve to warm and cheer those who walk on the ground above it. We need not only those great factors, which themselves are indispensable, but we require all the ability, skill, experience and harmony that possibly can be secured in this country if those factors are to achieve the great destiny which Heaven has laid out for us. Now would be a most opportune time, when hon. gentlemen opposite have been pressing for certain tariff changes, pressing to have reductions made in the duties.—and their last attack on the duties seems to come down merely to that,—for hon. gentlemen opposite to come out like men and instruct the Government, if the Government is in need of advice and if they have all the wells of wisdom in their ranks and we have none, and give the Government the benefit of their advice and experience as to how the National Policy, not alone in its fiscal branch, but in all its branches, could be made more perfect and thorough than it is to-day. On the contrary, instead of doing this, their very last motion placed on the paper by the hon. member for South Oxford embodies a deliberate, I will not say a wilful, but an unfortunate attack on the farming community. It is, of course, only following out the lines of his famous motion of 1891 in this House, when he moved to reduce the duties on all articles of prime necessity, but the amendment moved the other day to reduce the tariff in the direction of free trade on the articles necessarily used by the great consuming classes, the hon. gentleman must be aware was striking directly at the corn, breadstuffs, meat, pork and such articles as are largely produced by the farmers. And therefore, as representing an agricultural constituency, I stand here to claim from the Government that they will give to my constituents, who are agriculturists, the same degree of protection as is extended to manufacturers, and when I find hon. gentlemen opposite differing though they may among themselves as to the degree of protection given and the value of that protection, when I find it is stated that manufacturers are growing wealthy through protection, I, as the representative of an agricultural constituency, stand here to demand from the Government of which I am a humble supporter, that, in the revision of the tariff during the coming twelve months, the interests of our agricultural people, which are the largest and most important class of the community, shall be duly considered.

Mr. FRASER. I congratulate the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House on the clever manner in which he balanced his speech, following very closely the tactics of the hon. the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman began by extolling the glories of the National Policy, and stating that it was not to be interfered with. He ended by a pathetic appeal to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to extend our assistance to the Government to bring about tariff changes. The National Policy in all its glory was to be continued; but the under-current is now even striking him as well as others, and he now appeals to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House for assistance. I can truly tell him that, except the assistance which this side of the House has always given to hon. gentlemen opposite, in pointing out their faults and showing how far astray they have been in neglecting the interests of this country, advice to which, up to the present moment, they have turned a deaf ear, hon. gentlemen opposite will receive no assistance. On the eve of the change that must come, I can understand the whining heard on the other side for a change of method, that we, animated by a desire to promote the welfare of this country, should join with hon. gentlemen opposite in bringing about a change, in order that hon. gentlemen opposite may get the glory resulting from the action of the Opposition during all these years in pointing out the defects of the National Policy. The hon. gentleman has referred to the counties in Ontario. I am not able just now to verify his statements, and I accept them. But of all the cruel thrusts that Ministers have received from their supporters, the thrust administered by the hon. gentleman was the most cruel. He spoke about the counties represented by Conservatives as increasing. He forgot that the county represented by the Minister of Finance made the most disreputable change in that respect of any county in the lower provinces, and that the Premier's own county went back on the party to the extent of nearly 2,000 votes at the last census, that the late Minister of Customs, in his county, in Ontario, fell woefully behind, and that the Minister of Fisheries, in the county of Pictou, likewise fell badly behind. The hon. gentleman did not know these facts; he thought he would make a point by intimating that there was more human vigour about Conservatives and, therefore, there was an increase in population.

Mr. NORTHERUP. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will pardon me for a moment. The constituency of the late Minister of Customs gave an increased majority of 1,734.

Mr. FRASER. If I am wrong in that statement, it is only one county to be taken from the list. I am satisfied as to the accuracy of my statement respecting the counties in Nova Scotia, of which I have made a study. It was very cruel on the part of the hon. gentleman to bring disrespect on the Minister of Finance and also to call attention to the county represented by the Premier, and to show that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had fallen back in the greatest county in Nova Scotia, Pictou, and, for that matter, the greatest county in the Dominion, because it possesses more industries than any other county. During the last ten years, for every man, woman and child who came into the county, and for every child born there during that period, an able-bodied man and woman left the county, and 1,000 more. Yet we are to be grateful for that census. The hon. gentleman has intimated that there is a great difference between the two methods of taking the census. We have heard that statement again and again. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will show the House in what the difference consists and what would be the results of the census under the two methods. It is very easy to say that these results have been brought about simply by a difference in the manner in taking the census; but the hon. gentleman has been very careful not to point out the difference in the two methods. While on the question of the census, in regard to which the hon. gentleman seemed to make a very strong point, I will call attention to some statistics, but I will not go beyond the lower provinces for examples. Let me say that the hon. gentleman was very unfortunate in the counties he selected. Fancy an hon. gentleman in Canada, with its boundless resources, rich beyond any other country in the world, its virgin soil, farm lands ready for cultivation, comparing it with a country like France or Belgium or Germany, and adding the statement, that we should thank God if we prospered better than they did. It was unfortunate that he selected the only protectionist countries in Europe to prove it, and when he refers to Great Britain and shows that the rate of increase is not so much, he forgets that Great Britain is peopling the earth, and that she is sending forth her men and her women to India and Australia and to all her possessions to strengthen British connection throughout the world. There is no country in the world that sends out so many of her people from her busy hives of industry with greater good to herself than Great Britain does. After all that can be said against free trade Britain, and after all the people she sends out to her colonies throughout the world, she comes up in her increase of population nearly to Canada, a country which has the finest resources in the world and the greatest opportunities for increasing the number of her people. Why is that? It is because England is right in her fiscal policy. She gives that freedom to commerce, and those advantages to skill and labour, which add to the wealth of the greatest country. Let me speak of the province of Nova Scotia. There, for example, we increased 2·25 per cent in the last ten years. In Prince Edward Island they increased ·18 and in New Brunswick they increased ·02 per cent. The hon. gentleman told us that it was hardly worth while taking into consideration the increase of 100,000 in the population of France, but let me ask him is ·02 of an increase a very big thing for New Brunswick, or is 1·17 a very great increase for the whole of the lower provinces for the last ten years? I claim that we have a rich country down by the sea. I claim that we have many advantages, and I claim that were it not for our fallacious fiscal policy we would keep our people at home, and have a great increase in our population. Last winter, when I looked at the province of New Brunswick, and found that for the ten years they had only increased ·02 per cent I was rather surprised, and I rather hinted that the members themselves ought to feel that that was not just as good a showing as they ought to make. What is the proof of wealth, Mr. Speaker? Is it the savings bank deposits? That may be one element of proof, but the only real proof of the advance of any country is the proof of its increasing population.

Mr. GILLIES. Take China, for instance.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman thinks that is smart. It is a proof of the advance China is making, even though she is not so far advanced as other nations, but if the hon. gentleman knew anything about the history of China, he would know that, surrounded as she is by walls, by customs, and language, and everything that keeps her within herself, except the few that she sends to the outer world, or, rather, the few who are sent out by companies in order to make money out of them—her people do not wish to leave their own land. But the people increase there, and the country is great in respect to her own institutions, and great in respect to everything that makes her in her own estimation a great country. I was taught in my young days that the greatest glory of any country, aye, and the greatest glory of any family, was increase. I was taught that when the ancient Hebrew patriarch was called out at night and asked to look at the stars, and when he was told that he could not count them for number, that the blessing of all others that the Creator promised him, as making him the King that he was, that his seed should be like unto the sand upon the sea-shore. That does not appear to suit the modern methods of the protection policy. Foolish old man that he was, to accept a promise like that. Had he lived in these golden days of protection, he would have been told that the greatest glory of a country was an increase of ·02 per cent in ten years. In the census bulletin that was prepared by the statistician I find a reason given for this want of increase of population. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER. I beg pardon; I was addressing members on this side of the House. You know, Mr. Speaker and hon. members, that no report is now brought down by the men employed by the present Government without that official document giving a reason, if there is anything against the policy of the Government. Your Year Book, and your everything that gives statistics, must have a reason given if there is anything in the figures which tell against the policy of the Government. Just fancy, Whittaker's Almanac, or the Statesman's Year Book, after giving the cold facts about any country, setting out to give some reason why they did not suit the particular fancy of the editor. Well, the man who published these statistics gave a reason why our population had not increased. He first of all speaks about the lower provinces, and, so far, he admits that there is really an exodus down there, notwithstanding the oft-repeated remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite to the contrary. He says :

The tendency to reduction in the size of the average family observed in the Maritime provinces is in accord with the teaching of all recent census takings in other countries. But the reduction in the average family does not account in whole for the stagnation of population revealed by the census returns. The population has moved in larger numbers than in previous decades.

So far as that is concerned, he admits that there has been a greater exodus from the lower provinces than in previous decades. But then he treats here with reference to the result of the general census. He says :

The causes for this decrease are : 1st, the decay of early marriages, and 2nd, the increasing tendency to celibacy.

That means, first of all, that the people do not get married soon enough ; and secondly, that they do not get married at all.

The first cause is the effect of the increasingly complex conditions of life.

That is good. These complex conditions of life are rather good when you consider the whole question.

The second is due to the spread of education which enables females to become better wage earners, and therefore less interested in marriage.

Now, that is the opinion of the statistician himself, and that is the reason he gives for there being no increase in population. In other words, he says that our female population never were educated before ; oh no, and when they get little better educated they will not get married at all. I can very well understand from that how such a brilliant gentleman as the hon. gentleman from West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) has continued in his state. It is because when the ladies get educated, for example, they won't get married. I ask hon. members seriously, did any person hear of a slander upon our country like that ? Talk about all that is said of our country by all the Grits in this Dominion and you won't find a worse slander upon the people of Canada than that. Are the eyes of our bright maidens less attractive than they were ten years ago ? Are our modern mothers less anxious to make family connections with bright young men to start a household, than they were before ? Has it come to this, Mr. Speaker, that all these charms added to that disposition of our nature planted by the Divine Creator, is such, that we are dying out, and that we do not want to live in this beautiful country. Added to all that we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that those who go away are no good, and that the country is better without them. Well, perhaps so, but I am here, Mr. Speaker, knowing something of the young men and young women of our country, and following out that which was so eloquently said by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) last evening, I say : That the very flower of our country leave us. I regret it, and I want to state here, and now, that knowing all the circumstances, I regret it all the more, because I would rather see the young men and young women of this country live in Canada even to less advantage than they do across the border, in order that we might build up a country. The man who closes his eyes to the fact of our decrease in population, and who says that we are rich and prosperous and increasing, is a man who has never learned to go deep into the causes that bring about such a sad state in any country. Do we not all want that this country should increase in population ? What else is going to build up this country ? What else is going to enable us to pay the debt of this country ? What else is going to enable us to make this country what it should be but keeping our people here ? I am not going into the causes why they leave : but I have heard it from platform to platform, dinned into the ears of the people of Canada, that somewhere there was a magician who would, with a Prospero's wand, call up at his bidding our young men and young women who had gone from us, and would bring them home again. Has it failed ? What is the cause ? Mr. Speaker, the man who says that the weaker part of our population goes and that this country is better without them is a slanderer, and I so denounce him here. I know myself that the young men and the young women who leave their country love their country as well as others do. I know them ; and the hillside and the brook and the woody dell, aye, and the music of the waves, are as dear to them as to any people in this world ; and when they leave their country, they leave it why ? To better their fortune. I have seen them leave, parting from father and mother, sister and brother, as they went to push their fortunes elsewhere. And after they went away, what was the first thing they did ? Was it to dress themselves, to conform to the fashion of the country, to spend all they made upon themselves ? No ; but the first missive that came from the dear one who was absent, contained $5 or $10 to lessen the burden at home ; and that came continually until the little mortgage was paid. And yet these are said to be the weaklings of this country, without whom the country is better off. If there are slanderers in this country, they are those who hint that the stronger and the better remain at home while the weaker go away. As good stay as go, I admit, but as good go as stay. Now, how are we going to improve this state of things ? We are not going to improve it by simply saying that it does not exist—that there is no exodus—when the statistician who gives us these beautiful reasons for it says that there is. I heard an hon. gentleman last night speak of the marvellous growth of the North-west. Well, I rejoice in that ; but the growth is small, and is confined to a very small area. It reminds one of the story of the man who wrote up a town, and who spoke of its marvellous growth, saying that it had increased in population in one year a hundred per cent. when the fact was that the year before he was there alone, and during the year one family had added itself to the place. You cannot give a fair indication of the real increase in the Northwest by merely stating the general percentage. That country is the hope of Canada. I would rather see our young men going there than to the United States; but the fact is, they are not going here, as they should. It is useless for hon. gentlemen to say that the census does not disclose this state of things. It does, and it would be well for them to meet the question squarely. They will have to meet it; they are going to meet it now; they know that they must meet it. The hon. gentleman said it was very wrong that members on this side of the House should move special resolutions against special industries, and he called upon the Government to protect corn. The man in this House who seemed anxious, not simply to overtake, but to surpass all others in his effort to get a resolution on the Notice Paper in favour of taking the duty off corn, was a supporter of the party on the other side of the House, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope). Therefore, it was specially cruel for the hon. gentleman to say that we must not move special resolutions, when his own friends are moving them. And why are they moving these special resolutions? Simply because they find they have to, that is all. The most hopeful feature of the recent election in the United States was the number of men who left the Republican party to join the Democratic party. There are a few hopeful signs of the times in this country, and I am thankful for them. Believing, as I do, that this country will never be what it can be or what it is designed to be, until these shackles are broken, I welcome right heartily all the tariff reformers who are now speaking and writing and moving in the direction of compelling this Government, who for so many years have been entrenched in their own security, to give us tariff reform. What are the most hopeful signs of the times? Such papers as the Toronto "News," the Toronto "Telegram" and the Montreal "Star," and the two brightest cartoonists in Canada, have caught the spirit; and even in the room in this House where hon. gentlemen opposite congregate, you can find evidences of the spirit that is abroad. Bengough and Hunter are teaching the people. Then, we are receiving the assistance of men who formerly and perhaps strongly were attached to the hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says there must be tariff reform. The hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn) says there must be tariff reform. The hon. member for Assinibola West (Mr. Davin) says there must be tariff reform, notwithstanding that his face now almost shows the trickling of the blood from the bludgeons used against him, when he dares to say it. When he is speaking in favour of tariff reform, I know that he does so because it is the popular thing in his own constituency, and I have no doubt he will vote, as he always does, in his own interest. Then, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) has moved in this direction, and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Cleveland) finds that he must do something. And the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Tyrwhitt) is thinking over the matter. That hon. gentleman, a true son of Mars, fears that perhaps he should not go too far. Judging by his attitude, as he looks at the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and then at the Government, he is thinking: How happy could I be with either were the other dear charmer away; and he is not just prepared,—he is almost persuaded,—but he fears. Discipline keeps him, and a Tory he was born, and he is afraid a Tory he will die. I fear that too; but I am thankful even for moments when the light breaks in upon a man, and shows him that there is something about him that he never conceived, and which he feels is in the air. And then we have the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and I will say that, so far as he is concerned, anything he will say, if I am not very much mistaken in that hon. gentleman, will be the result of conviction; and when that conviction comes he will go where it leads him. These are signs of the times. And I might mention innumerable instances outside of men, perhaps not so prominent, but men of ability, men who are looking about them, the presidents of boards of trade and others. And then we have resolutions passed by farmers and others. Why, it was a fortunate thing for the Minister of Finance that he got through with his Budget speech and made the enormous changes in this tariff he did, before that representation of 100,000 Patrons of Industry came down here. Does the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) think he knows more about the farmers than the Patrons of Industry? As the hon. member for Assinibola (Mr. Davin) once said, fancy any man leading a great movement and he only a nisi prius lawyer. Does he think a nisi prius lawyer understands as much about the farmers as the hundred thousand Patrons of Industry who know what the farmers want, who know what they can sell, who balance their accounts, and know what is left after they have paid their debts and squared with the world? If he says he knows more than the hundred thousand men who have urged this platform in no uncertain sound, then he has more confidence in his judgment than I have. As a class, the farmers understand as much about their business as any other men in the country; and they will not be content until such time as the burdens are removed, which will make easier the lot of that class, the foundation of classes. What do these men say? They ask for a tariff for revenue only. Just exactly the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). But no, says the hon. gentleman who last spoke; they want no such thing as a tariff for revenue only; protection is what the farmers want. How grossly ignorant these hundred thousand men are. Perhaps they are unsanctified Grits who are desiring annexation.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER. Hear, hear, says an hon. gentleman opposite. I recommend the Patrons of Industry in East Northumberland to that hon. gentleman. I say these men know what they are talking about, and they are asking for reciprocal trade on fair and equitable terms between Canada and the world. Strange that these farmers, these men whom hon. gentlemen opposite have always looked to as the dark back-ground of the picture to bring out the manufacturers of the country—good enough at election times—strange that these men should want a reciprocal trade with the world. They are not afraid; they have the instinct of the Britons from whom they come, those Britons, who, when the nations of Europe raised their wall of protection against them, were not afraid, but took the raw material from all countries in the world to their own busy hives of industry in England, and sent that raw material back to the very countries from which it was taken, and compelled these countries to buy it in a manufactured state. They never knew what it was to fear any man. Our farmers have the right stuff in them. They are not the kind of men who have been nursed all these years and who think that nothing will suit them but nursing. They work all day; they know exactly what it costs to raise a bushel of wheat, and what it brings, and are not afraid of competition with the world. They are not afraid of competition with the men to the south of them, who have larger farms; and although England is getting up a large trade with India, selling more goods to India, and buying Indian wheat, our Canadian farmers are willing to compete in the British market against the products of India. To follow up what has been so eloquently said by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), I too feel humiliated every time I think that a wall must be raised about us to give us protection. Fancy men with a land and climate unsurpassed wanting these privileges. I have heard hon. gentlemen speak in this House of the glories of protection—men in whose counties there was not a single industry except farming and fishing. How were they benefitted by protection? But the cry of the old policy caught them, the National Policy, the policy of progress, of prosperity, and of preservation, as the last speaker said, when ringing the changes on the phrase. He was alliterative, certainly, but I cannot say he was convincing. I think the policy might be described by one word, so far as Canada is concerned. It is a national poultice—that is what it has been during all these years. So far as the manufactures of Canada are concerned, only a few of them wanted it. The best men in Canada did not want it.

Mr. SPROULE. They showed by their votes that they did want it.

Mr. FRASER. I did not know that the manufacturers were the whole of Canada. The farmers were told that this National Policy was going to enhance all the prices of their products. Has it done so? The hon. member who last spoke said we had better markets and better prices. I will refer him to the farmers to settle that question. All I know is that the quotations are all against him. Then we are said to be disloyal, and the hon. gentleman drew a nice distinction between patriotism and loyalty. How very disloyal Mr. Gladstone must have been the other day when he made Her Majesty say in her Speech from the Throne that she regretted there was agricultural depression in England, and Mr. Gladstone said that while he was in power. It would be bad enough if he were in opposition, but he is honest enough, even when in power, to admit that there is depression when he finds it exists. These gentlemen say we are disloyal because we tell the people the truth. Would it not be far worse if we did not speak the truth? Should we not be prophets of evil if we cried Peace, Peace, where there was no peace? That is what these hon. gentlemen are doing. I commend them to the judgments that were pronounced upon such men. The penalties were severe. Now, Mr. Speaker, coming to one other question: the hon. gentleman (Mr. Northrup) spoke about the United States election, and he said that the tariff had nothing to do with it. Let me just read you one or two things on that point. If ever there was an election that was run upon a square issue that election was the last election in the United States. Now, let me read the resolution of the Republican party:

Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. gentleman should not say that I said the tariff had nothing to do with it. I was not such an idiot as to say anything of that kind.

Mr. FRASER. If I misunderstood the hon. gentleman.

Mr. NORTHRUP. No one could misunderstand me. I did not say anything resembling that. I said it was not issue between protection and free trade, which is a very different question. But that is about as near as hon. gentlemen get to accuracy.

Mr. FRASER. Did the hon. gentleman say a question of free or freer trade?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I did not say freer trade, I said free trade—free, free.

Mr. FRASER. No one has said it was an issue between free trade and protection. The hon. gentleman need not quibble. He said this was a resolution for free trade. He ought to have learned from the castigation the hon. member from Brant (Mr. Paterson) gave the Government last evening. There is not a word here about free trade. The hon. gentleman should read the resolution.

Mr. NORTHROP. The hon. gentleman should not misrepresent what I said.

Mr. FRASER. I am not misrepresenting him. Who would have thought the hon. gentleman would have spoken about an election involving a question of free trade when he was discussing an amendment about freer trade. Is he dishonest? Is he bringing in issues that do not belong here? The issue of free trade is not raised here at all; when it is raised I shall be ready to discuss it. In the meantime let us understand the record and keep to that. It is a question between freer trade and protection, and these are the questions I am going to discuss. These are the questions before us now and if the hon. gentleman's remarks meant anything except to deceive, they meant that the fight in the United States was not one between freer trade and protection. There is no free trade now discussed either here or in England. It will be discussed, and that right early, but in the meantime let us keep to the subject before the House. There never was an issue more squarely joined between two parties than the issue of tariff reform between the parties in the United States. The Minister of Finance saw nothing in all this to show that the question was raised. Let me read the Republican platform:

We maintain the American doctrine of protection. We call attention to its growth abroad. We maintain that the prosperous condition of our country is largely due to the wise revenue legislation of the Republican Congress.

Now, turn to the Democratic platform. It will be remembered that there was a section of the Democratic party tainted with a sort of pseudo-protection, but this is the platform of the party as adopted:

We denounce the Republican policy of protection as a fraud on the labour of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of the few.

The Finance Minister would lead us to suppose that protection was a good thing until it had done its work, when it could be got rid of. But the Democrats declared it to be a fraud now and always. It is not a fraud that grows from that which is good in the beginning, but is in itself a fraud.

We declare it to be fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties except for the purposes of revenue only.

That is in accord with the resolution of the hon. member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright):

And we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of the Government when honestly and economically administered.

Mr. FRASER.

That was the issue, and to the country they went upon that issue. We cannot raise the question as to whether protection is constitutional or not. I admit, but I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that it is just as illegal to have protection in Canada as it was unconstitutional to have it in the United States. What, after all, is the pact between Government and people? Every man is born with a right to use the blessings of Providence as he sees fit—to get wealth, to keep wealth, to make wealth and exchange wealth. And he gives up his liberty, when he comes to be governed, only to the extent that is necessary for the safety of the country. But never in that pact between the people and the Government did we give up the right to the Government to single out one man in the country and provide that he should have an advantage over his fellows. So that, so far as we are concerned, it being against the spirit of our constitution, I maintain that protection is an infringement upon the right of every citizen in Canada, just as much as it would be if a municipality passed a by-law by which they made a number of tax-payers pay the taxes of another. So I, from a different point of view, declare, as the Democratic party did, the belief that no Government has a right inherent within itself, nor has it received from the people the right, to give one man in the country a single advantage that is not guaranteed to every other. We boast of our glorious freedom, but where is that freedom, when one man is made to pay more than he ought in order to build up an industry in the interests of another? No person but the Almighty can so adjust a protective tariff as to make the burden fall equally upon all the people. If the latter asks for protection and gets it, the shoemaker who makes his shoes, must receive equal protection for what he furnishes to the other, and so with the coat-maker, and so all round, until every man gets back from every other man the amount he has given him. That is why it is that to take a step even in this direction is wrong. It is wrong and immoral, and this was the question before the people of the United States in their last election. Men who towered high above their fellows, like Judge Gresham and Wells and Carl Schurz and other great men in the United States, maintained and declared that protection was immoral. Any man who read the open letters that were invited by the reviews during the time of the election, will find that these men gave forth no uncertain sound, declaring that the whole system was immoral. And how are gentlemen opposite going to meet the situation? It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the methods proposed are not of the best character. I could have understood it very well, if the Government had said: We will not do anything. I am sure they have not yielded without some reason. And now we are to have four gentlemen two Ministers and two Controllers, sent out all over the Dominion to find out the state of the country. Did it occur to the hon. Finance Minister that it was a little late for him to begin to think about this? Did it occur to him, that if the result is going to be a good one, he ought to have been looking around the country some years ago? If the people were suffering, if any wrong existed, the fact should have been known to him. Ah, Mr. Speaker, the thing is not honest. There is a reason for it, but the reason is not given. The reason for the whole thing is, that great changes are going to be made by the Congress of the United States and we must follow in its wake. Of course, the Government could not be honest about that, for where would the old flag be, if they had to acknowledge that they must wait to see what the Americans were going to do? Why not tell the truth, and say we are bound together in the lot of life, not only as human beings but as nations; that where one suffers another suffers. It is an eternal truth "that no man liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself," and the nation that attempts to rise upon any other platform than the fact that we depend upon our neighbours as they depend upon us, that they exercise an influence on us as we must on them, is a nation that is binding itself, or rather enclosing itself with a wall of selfishness that is dictated by motives inconsistent with and antagonistic to the best interests of the country. Why, they will wait at the bidding of the United States while shouting for the old party and the old flag. They took the duties off sugar. They never would have done it; they never would have been able to boast of free sugar, only the Americans compelled them to do it. Why not be honest? Now, I agree with the Finance Minister that the Americans are not going to pass any tariff for our advantage unless it will be for their advantage. I admit that; but they know that trade is beneficial to all the parties concerned, and they are going to have it. Trade is not for one nation or for one people, and the nation that thinks that by enclosing itself by walls, it is going to build itself up and become strong and populous has yet to learn the primary lessons of history. I listened to the beautiful passage in which the Finance Minister spoke about preferential trade. It was a beautiful idea—all parts of Great Britain trading with each other. My individual opinion is that that is the honest dream of a visionary experimentalist. It is a beautiful idea; but I can see no point at all in a ship owner in Nova Scotia with a load of fish, or a load of lumber, or a load of coal, or a load of iron ore going around to Australia to sell it for the glory of the federation of the Empire, when he can run ten or fifteen times to the United States and make freight all the time, exchanging it for the goods we want, and getting wealth. There is a more beautiful picture still, and that is the whitened sails of every nation passing and repassing one another on the great seas, each carrying the wealth of one nation to another, exchanging the goods as free as the air that the Great Creator sends equally to all nations, to the palace of the rich and the cottage of the poor. It is only the selfish man that takes the Creator's gifts that are given with every bounty and throttles them for the purpose of selfish individuality. They are all free to us. Now, I know that time has not yet come; we have not yet reached that stage. We must learn. It took England a long time to learn many of the salutary lessons of her present history. It took ages for her to learn that land might become free in the hands of the common people, and still the nation be prosperous and great. It took ages for her to learn that each individual man has the same right as any titled lord or duke in the realm. So it will take a long time for any nation to learn this great truth that free trade—and in the end come it will—is for the advantage of all nations. No sane man can deny that. I look to a picture far in advance of the little circumscribed picture of the Minister of Finance—I look to this world trading as freely as neighbours with one another. Such was the dream of a great English statesman who became converted—the hon. Minister of Finance is not getting converted, but I know his education, his better reason, teaches him that the policy of protection is the policy of the few who are seeking to enrich themselves at the expense of the many. He has adopted a new word, he calls our industries "nascent" industries. Now, it seems to me he is going back, Mr. Speaker. That is not so far advanced as an infant industry. A nascent industry is beginning to exist, beginning to grow, and entering upon being. A nascent state is a state—I think, perhaps, that is what he refers to—"the state of a gaseous body at the moment of its liberation from previous combinations." That is just exactly what it means. There is going to be a liberation from the combinations in which the Government have been held for the last fifteen years. When the hon. gentleman gets information from the people there is going to be a liberation. I do not know whether he will be successful. Perhaps the nascent passions and interests that are now controlling him may lead to better results, but I think the term is certainly not as good as the other. I suppose he thinks it is time to get another name for what he used to call an infant; at least, it is nearly time that this infant ceased to be nursed by him. He is not like myself, a powerful man, and I can fancy him struggling with a fourteen-year-old infant. 't is a heavy burden. The whole country is put under contribution to feed it 30 per cent pap. It won't take anything but that, and it kicks, and squirms, and yells if the poor over-burdened tax-payers offer it only 20 per cent, or 25 per cent nourishment. So he wants to get another name for it. It will be infant no longer, it will be nascent. Well, perhaps, it will after he returns from his search for information. I want to say one word to my hon. friends from Nova Scotia. I felt very much humiliated when I found they were not consulted in this matter. Of all the policies I have yet heard, here or elsewhere, the one that seeks to gain information in a few short months as to the state of the country, by going around the country, is the worst. Take my own province. Could not the members for Halifax tell him something about Halifax county. The senior member (Mr. Kenny) could tell him something about the dry goods business. He could tell him something about the wholesale importers, he could tell him he is going out of the business now, and the chances are that the Government will utilize the building which he has been using for dry goods. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Putnam) could tell him something about shipping, without going very far from his place. He would tell him what freight he is getting just now. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) might tell him about trade in that county. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) might tell him something about trade in that county, he might tell him something about the parts of the county where they find that trade is absolutely necessary with the United States. The hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White) could tell him something about the state there also. The hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Patterson) could tell him something about the rich marshes and beautiful land of that lovely county. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper)—well, he is in the Government and could tell him all about that. The Premier represents Antigonish. The Finance Minister need not go there, because the Premier could tell him all about it. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) could give him just as correct information as he could get if he went down there himself, about the state of the country, but the hon. member for Richmond does not seem to be trusted. Both the hon. members for Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen and Mr. McDougald) could tell about the trade down there, but it seems that they do not know. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McDonald) might tell him about the great wealth that the people of that county are making. Then the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) might tell him—but I suppose he will not listen to that hon. member now, because the Minister is trying to find some bricks that he can take out of that beautiful edifice. The hon. member told him that if he took out one brick, the whole structure would be gone, and so the Finance Minister has lost confidence in him. Then, while he would not go for information from hon. gentlemen who are opposed to him, he might, in Yarmouth, get some information from the man who gave up his Dominion office for a little while to oppose the hon. member for that county (Mr. Flint), and then went snugly back into the old office again. The hon. member for Digby, who was defeated twice, and who understands all about the county, could give him some information, and the gentleman who contested King's could tell him something of the condition of the farmers there and the number of encumbrances on land. The gentleman who contested Queen's could tell him, at least, something about Newfoundland, and that might be very important in framing a new tariff. I, in Guysborough, was opposed, too, by a gentleman in the Government employ, at a small salary, and he might tell the Minister something about the county. So, as regards Nova Scotia, there are abundant opportunities for the Government to obtain all the information required.

Mr. LISTER. How about Lunenburg?

Mr. FRASER. Did I pass it? The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) can give the Minister information in regard to all the counties in Nova Scotia. But the proposition of the Minister of Finance is one of the most ridiculous proposals ever made. Fancy a Chancellor of the Exchequer of Great Britain making a statement to the people of the nation that he would consider the question of the tariff after he had visited Manchester, Hull and Bristol, gone up to Scotland and taken a peep at Ireland? Such a proposal would be received with derisive cheers by his own supporters. For what purpose are the representatives of constituencies here except to give the Government information as to the condition of trade? Do not the public journals furnish such information? For what purpose are the various delegations coming to the Capital, and for what purpose are public bodies passing resolutions and forwarding them to the Government? Are not these the channels through which hon. gentlemen opposite should obtain information? Does the Minister of Finance think that his critical eye can detect the faults of the present system better than hon. members who represent the people in this House? Such is not the fact, by any means. This whole proposal is an attempt to deceive the people by making them think that the hon. gentleman is in earnest in regard to effecting changes in the tariff. When he obtains all his information and is compelled to alter the tariff in compliance with that adopted by the United States Congress, he will say that the information he received was to that effect. But if, perchance, no change was made in the United States tariff, the Minister of Finance will come back to this House and declare that there was no need of changes, and he will be backed up in that opinion by men who will always be found ready to stand by the old policy, by the same methods as in the past. I am glad this issue is directly raised. I appeal with confidence, as every member on this side of the House can appeal with confidence, on this issue to the people of Canada. They have learned their lesson by suffering, and they have made this demand. The Government are nothing but the pipes to express the opinions and wishes of the people, and the people demand that the tariff shall be reformed. Tariff reform is the cry everywhere, and those hon. gentlemen need not think that they can avert it by burying their heads. They are sleeping, as did the Republican party in the United States, when they believed that the people were so impregnated with protection that nothing could dislodge that party, and they awakened to the fact that the whole country was against them. So it will be here. Tariff reform is consonant with the best interests of this country. I will vote with pleasure for the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford, because it means that by tariff reform the people will gain what they have lost, that the farmers and toilers of this country, the men who have to toil for their daily bread, will have something done for them in the direction of lightening the burdens imposed on them. I wish the Minister of Finance would exhibit an honest desire to come back to first principles, and that next year he would be able to enjoy a like reflection to that indulged in by the great English statesman, who became a convert during the corn law agitation, that at least he could rejoice that those whose lot was the most hard and difficult could now eat their bread with greater pleasure because cheaper, and he had the satisfaction of knowing that he brought about this result. You cannot stem the tide that has risen in this country for freer trade relations: you cannot stem it by a loud outcry of loyalty to the old flag or anything else. The old landmarks are fading away, and despite the cry of injuring the National Policy and its unity, and that this question of tariff is only part of it—which is the plea we have heard this session only—tariff reform must come. I commend the hon. gentlemen opposite to study with their constituents the condition of this Dominion. You cannot follow a wrong policy year after year and not have its effects return with terrific force. Believing that protection as administered here is a wrong against this country. I believe a reformation is at hand. I believe that this wrong must be rectified. I believe the men and women in this country, who have at last found that this policy is not what it was represented, who accepted it upon the pledge of hon. gentlemen opposite, but who have found from its enforcement that it is a sham, a fraud and a pretense, will at the first opportunity declare that they want freer trade relations with the world, that their interests are bound up with the interests of others, and that man for man they fear no competition with any foreigner, be he on this continent or not. They are willing to open their gates to the freest trade possible with all nations of the world, confident that their skill, their honesty, their brawn and muscle, their power to labour will equal that of the people of any nation, that Canadians need fear no fair competition, that they are not pampered children who need to be protected in their nurses' arms, but they are brave men and women, who, conscious of their own power and ability to labour, who, feeling they have the best country to live in, a heritage handed down to them to make better by individual effort, cry out for such a tariff reform as will sweep away the miserable refuge of lies which has so long detained them from participating in the privileges and blessings of this country.

Mr. BENNETT. It is not often the leader of the Opposition is to be congratulated on the results he has achieved, but he can be fairly congratulated on the success he has accomplished to-day. This afternoon, in the person of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) he introduced a tragedian, and to-night he introduced a comedian of the highest order. We have had something in the shape of tragedy, and the whole has finished up with a screaming farce, furnished by the hon. member for Guysborough, and I think he may fairly congratulate himself on his success in that role. We in Western Ontario have been led to believe that the people by the sea, who were accustomed to partake of large quantities of fish, developed an immense amount of brain power, but I must doubt the truth of that statement henceforth, and believe that fish, instead of producing brain power, produces gas, and that not of a very brilliant quality. How does this Ministry meet this House to-night? I ask hon. gentlemen to compare the Ministry to-day with the Ministry of 1878. At that time there was a party in power supported by a majority equally large as the majority which supports the present Government. Did the Finance Minister of the Mackenzie Administration proclaim to the country that he was in a position to meet the evils that then existed? Did he state that the Government were able, by legislation or in practice, to change the current of events and bring about a different state of affairs to that which then existed? The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who doubtless is so exhausted after his great speech of the other evening, that he is not in his place to-night, made the following statement then:—

I have not attempted to deny, neither has any man eminent in mercantile life attempted to measure accurately the extent of the depression which now exists, and which from various causes has been increased to a most unwonted extent.

Sir, is that the statement of the present Finance Minister? I ask is that the statement of the Conservative press of this country—that we are in such a state of depression, and that the country is so stagnant that the like had never been seen before? Does the Finance Minister, and do the Cabinet of the present day confess, as the Finance Minister of the Mackenzie Administration confessed, that they were powerless to act, that they were utterly unable to cope with then existing evils and that they were helpless to raise their hands to stem the tide of stagnation that was then in force? No; the Government of to-day offers a remedy. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), speaking at that time, said:

We do not believe we can attain prosperity by Act of Parliament. The people of Canada can only grow richer by the exercise of greater frugality and hard work.

Was not that a peculiar policy to offer to the people? Was not that a plain intimation to them that if they would work harder, eat less and dress more meanly they would be able to succeed? Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite take the ground that the Finance Minister has not made sufficient intimations relative to changes in the tariff; but we on this side of the House will, I believe, support the principle which he has set in motion, namely, that changes in that direction should be gone about quietly and systematically. That is the principle that has been adopted since the National Policy, since its inception, and that is the principle which, I trust, will ever be held to, and will ever be kept in view by the Government. I wish now to direct the attention of the House to a matter which the Finance Minister referred to in his speech. I speak of the lumbering industry of this country, in which the constituency which I have the honour to represent is greatly interested. I need not dilate upon the merits, or upon the extent of the lumbering industry, because every gentleman in this House, from whatever province he may come, be it from a lumbering centre or not, must realize the importance of this great industry and recognize its good effects on the prosperity of the country at large. It is not a trade that has invested in it, money by the thousands, but by the millions. It is a trade that gives employment, not to hundreds of men, but to thousands of our people. For that reason, that line of industry should be considered most carefully, and should be treated with the greatest possible attention by the present Government. Moreover, Sir, we in the province of Ontario do complain with a great deal of cause, and with a great deal of justice, that the Local Administration in that province has not only been inimical to that industry, but that they have done it on all occasions where they have had the opportunity a most positive injury. The present policy of that Government, a policy which has existed since Confederation in the province of Ontario relative to the timber limits is this: that there shall be sold from time to time, limits paying so much of a bonus as a right to cut timber on such limits, that in addition to the bonus so paid there shall be paid dues in each year, and in addition to that the payment of ground rent. To-day there are under license in the province of Ontario upwards of 4,500 square miles of timber lands. These sales have taken place from time to time, not as the circumstances of the case warranted, not as the desire of the people was evidenced, but as the requirements, and as the wants, and as the interests of a depleted exchequer in that province necessitated. Now, Sir, what has been the result of these timber limits sales? The result has been that there have been sold in 1881, 1885, 1887, 1890 and 1892, limits amounting in all to some 4,500 miles, the bonus upon which has been over $5,000,000. Quoting from the "Canada Lumberman" of the month of January last, I read the following:—

McArthur Bros., of Toronto, recently sold a body of Canadian timber for $550,000 to Hurst & Fisher, of Michigan, which cost them fifteen years before $75,000. Sound common sense and shrewd business foresight have played successfully with this concern.

By instituting a comparison it will be seen that the limit purchased by these lumbermen had advanced in a few years to seven times its original cost, and applying the same principle to the other limits sold, you will find that the Ontario Government have sacrificed $30,000,000 of the lumber resources of the people of that province. If it were possible on the part of the McArthur Bros. to purchase the limit for that amount, and it was possible because they did purchase it, then it must be quite plain when they sold at such an advanced price, that had the Ontario Government conserved these pine limits, as they could have done, and as they should have done for the people, then the province of Ontario would be $30,000,000 richer at the present time. The answer given to this complaint is: That it was impossible for the Government to hold the limits on account of the fact that fires might occur. Now, if the McArthur Bros. could hold a limit despite fires why could not the province of Ontario? And if the McArthur Bros. could thus hold one limit why could not the province of Ontario hold a great many more? What has been the policy of the Ontario Government all through in respect to these timber limits? I will grant that when the first sale of timber limits was made the trouble that we have now to face was not then imminent. Up to that time limits had been sold freely to Canadians, the lumber was manufactured in Canada, and as a result our own people got the benefit of the manufacturing. But in the year 1881 a new change of affairs presented itself. On that occasion at the sale in the Legislative Assembly room in Toronto there were present a large number of American buyers, and it was generally announced then that the reason of their being present was to purchase Canadian limits, and to tow the logs across Lake Huron to the United States. That was an opportunity when the Ontario Government could have interfered. That was an occasion, when with the most open notice, they could have placed such restrictions upon these sales that it would have been an utter impossibility that the people of the province should be brought face to face with the great difficulties which present themselves to-day. Now, Sir, what followed after that? In 1885 another sale took place, and there was another opportunity afforded the Government to prevent our present difficulties, but what excuse did they then shelter behind? They took shelter behind the same statement as was adduced by the commissioner of the Crown Lands in the month of October last year, namely, that if they did not give free and fair competition between Americans and Canadian the result would be that the prices would not have been so high. I say it would have been better if the sales had been so made, that the limits should have actually been sacrificed to Canadians, and the timber afterwards manufactured in our own country. Even after failing to do that, there was another plan which they could have adopted, and which would have the same effect, and which it is not too late even yet to adopt. That plan has been asked and demanded from the Government time and again, but up to the present they have refused point blank to comply with the request. The proposition was to impose upon the limits a restriction of say an advance of $5 for dues with a rebate of $4 on such lumber as was manufactured in the country. Let me ask what was probably the principal reason for these sales being made without restrictions. If the hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to turn up the records of the sales, they will find in the list of purchasers on that occasion such ideal and practical lumbermen as John A. Barron, who was formerly member of Parliament in this House, Robert Jaffray, purveyor-general for grocery supplies to the colonization roads in Ontario, and other gentlemen of that ilk; men who never expected to work these limits but men who expected to sell them at an advanced rate; men who had thrown about them the guardianship of the Ontario Government and thought that whatever the Dominion Government might do, the Ontario Government would be prepared to stand by them in regard to letting the timber go out of the country. But when this state of affairs was going on, was the Dominion Government silent? Was the Administration of Sir John Macdonald—because he was then Premier—permitting this to go on? On turning to the records you will find that in 1886, when this great difficulty had been presented to the Dominion authorities, after the local Government had been appealed to in vain to stop these vast, these almost unlimited quantities of timber going out of the country, there was then placed upon pine timber exported from the province of Ontario, a duty of $2 per thousand, with this further reservation, that under an Order in Council the Dominion Government might, at any time, cause to be imposed a further duty of $1 per thousand on such timber. But, Sir, that was not all. The Order in Council did at last go into effect, with the result that on the 13th November, 1888, the Dominion Government caused to be placed on logs exported from the province of Ontario to the United States, a duty of $3 per thousand. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen to contrast the policies of the two Governments in this regard. Here was the Ontario Government, the actual owners of the pine limits; here were the men who had the custody and control of those limits, who could have surrounded them with such safe-guards that it would have been impossible for the state of things to take place which we see staring us in the face to-day, offering no help, while the Dominion Government was doing all in its power to prevent these vast quantities of timber going out of the country. But at that time, I confess, the danger was not so plain as it is to-day, by reason of the local causes that existed on the Georgian Bay, the district which is most seriously affected. Local causes, then, tended to draw off attention. At that time there was a large demand for lumber in Manitoba and the North-west, because the Rainy River district had not then been worked. The Canadian Pacific Railway was also under construction, and for that work large quantities of lumber were purchased in the Georgian Bay district. In addition, there was at that time a large lumber trade with South America, and owing to these causes the great danger that exists to-day was not then so patent and so plain. Well, what happened afterwards? With the end of the wedge inserted, with the political leverage firmly placed behind, with the Jaffrays and the Barrons, and other Grit politicians in the province of Ontario selling these limits to American buyers, at once the machinery was set in order on the other side of the line, and a move was made. A threat was made that unless the export duty was removed, there would be placed an additional duty on sawn lumber going there from the Dominion of Canada. The result would have been, if not fatal, at least very injurious to the lumber industries of this country if that increased tariff had been imposed. Then on this side the lumbermen, irrespective of their political leanings, were drawn into a union, and on May 19, 1888, in answer to the hon. member for Pontiac, Sir John Macdonald intimated that in the event of the United States Government lowering the duty on white pine, the export duty would be taken off sawlogs; and to-day the duty on lumber going into the United States is $1 per thousand, while there is no duty on timber going out of this country. What is the result of this? I will now point out. When the pine was owned by many mill-owners along the Georgian Bay, a large number of small tugs brought logs to the mills in rafts; and the crews of the tugs lived in different towns of that district. But where there were many tugs then there is hardly one in use to-day. It is true we do sometimes hear the whistle of a tug. The solemn stillness of the Sabbath is sometimes broken by one of the tugs belonging to the hon member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) going in there; and I hope that hon gentleman in his Sunday observance Bill will insert a clause to save us from such annoyances on that day. Some other difficulties we are face to face with to-day. There are brought into the country large numbers of men from the United States. I do not say that the Americans refuse to allow Canadians to work in their lumber shanties. They do not; but the better class of men are brought from the United States, and the reason is apparent. In the first place, they have their own tugs, and these tugs bring with them from Michigan their supplies of pork; and I hope that this session the Finance Minister will place such a duty on pork as will prohibit any coming in this way to the north shore of the Georgian Bay. They also bring in a large number of men. It is an acknowledged fact that a large number of Americans are employed in the camps on the north shore, whereas Canadians are prevented from going to work in the lumber camps of Michigan by the Alien Labour Law. That there are large numbers of men from the States employed in these lumber districts I will prove by extracts from papers. Here is one:

Messrs. Ring & Merrill, the American lumber firm, are lumbering extensively in this neighbourhood with gangs of men mostly brought from Saginaw, Chicago and other United States points.

Mr. W. C. Simonson, land-looker for A. Pack, who had been over in Canada, and who spent some time in the camps in the Spanish River country, arrived home Saturday night. He reports everything in that vicinity as moving along nicely, and says that in the three camps there for Alpena parties there are about 120 Alpena men, all enjoying the best of health. They will put in there this season about twenty millions, which will be rafted to this city for sawing.

Now, they not only bring in men, but they even introduced supplies for camp purposes. On this subject, here is an extract from the "Canada Lumberman," of 8th November last:

Merrill, Ring & Co. have shipped a large cargo of utensils to be used in their logging operations in your country. Among the stuff are forty logging sleighs made by a local manufacturer, on which the duty of course will be a considerable item.

Now, I say that this is a matter which demands at the hands of the Government the most serious and careful consideration. This year, on a low estimate, I am assured by responsible men, there will be taken from the north shore of the Georgian Bay 400,000,000 feet of lumber. How long can this go on? Figures prove that to-day, of the once great pine region of the north shore, only about 10 per cent remains; and unless vigorous steps are taken difficulties will result, and that before very long. Not only do we suffer in that regard, but there is also great disadvantage occasioned to towns on the shores of the Georgian Bay, which, at great expense, have constructed docks for the accommodation of the immense quantities of lumber which in the fall of every year had been sent out from the mills and shipped away. And why? Because the lumber is not being sawn on the north shore. Now, I want to be fair in my statement for this reason, that the interests of my riding are diverse. I will admit that the man who to-day owns a Canadian limit and mill would infinitely prefer that the state of affairs should continue which exists to-day rather than return to the $2 duty. I will admit that under the McKinley Bill, by an automatic movement, so to speak, there would be a return to the $2 duty; but even if there were, it would be infinitely better that should exist than we should continue in the position in which we are now. I regret that the Government have been in the past very much misled by statements in this House. In fact, I regret to say that I believe they attached some little importance to the remarks of my predecessor from East Simcoe in this House, when he assured the Government that if they did not at once promise that the $1 duty imposed on lumber would be removed many mills on the Georgian Bay would be closed, and that if they dared to impose an export duty—mark you, this gentleman who was looking after the interests of a large constituency, dared the Government to do this—on logs, they would close up all the mills. My predecessor, Dr. Spohn, misrepresented the conditions of affairs there, and stated what was not in the common interests of all, but only what was in the interests of a few. What we contend to-day is that there should be one of two courses. There should be either a return to the export duty or we should have our lumber admitted into the United States free of duty. I know that it is not within the province of this House to legislate that our lumber should be admitted there free of duty; but it is within the province of this Ministry to make a representation to the United States Government, that if they will not admit our lumber free of duty, we will at once impose a prohibitory export duty on logs going into that country. I do not blame the lumbermen who have bought, or the Local Government, who have sold these limits, if they wish to sell more at high prices, through competition between Americans and Canadians; but I do say this, that, as the Ontario Government have determined to sacrifice the interests of the masses, this Government should not hesitate to do what is fair to all, irrespective, as the Minister of Finance has said, of whether it interferes with vested interests or not. It is true that these limits have been bought and paid for, but there was no guarantee to the purchasers that they would forever have the privilege of exporting logs out of the country free of duty. I may add that when there was $2 duty against lumber, we were able to export lumber to the United States in large quantities; and to-day, owing to the depletion of their own forests the Americans are prepared to buy our lumber even to a grater extent than when the $2 duty did exist. As regards the matter of export duty, I have only this to say that a return to the old export duty of $2 or $3 would be suicidal. It would only provoke on the part of the Americans a return to the duty of $2 or perhaps further reprisals by imposing a higher duty. If an export duty is placed on logs, it should be a prohibitory duty. I will grant that the question is a vexed one, and that the interests are diverse; but I say that the interests of the thousands of people who are engaged in the work of their hands in the lumber industry should be first looked after rather than the interests of these men who are today wealthy. Now, the Budget debate has taken a very wide range. Hon. members have gone from Dan to Beershebah. In fact, the last speaker, the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) went a little further, and I do not propose at this late hour to trespass on the time of House with any remarks on that score. I would be pleased to see a little unanimity on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite as to their policy. Let them go, as the Minister of Finance has said, into the open and there tell us fairly and honestly what it is. Is it the policy of the Reform Association as announced at North Norfolk, and as enunciated by their secretary, Mr. Donly, a policy of annexation with the people of the United States? If it is, then the Conservative party are prepared to meet them in open fight on that question and abide the result. If, on the other hand, it is a policy of reciprocity with the United States, all that can be said must be this: that we cannot, as has been pointed out from time to time, enter into any arrangement with the people of the United States for free trade, save on one condition, and that condition must be this, that we must place against Great Britain a tariff uniform with the United States tariff against other countries, as they will not permit Canada to be a dumping ground for British manufactured goods through which they could be smuggled across the line. After the gloomy predictions of hon. gentlemen opposite, I must say it was a complete change to hear the amusing speech, as I may term it, to use a mild phrase, of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), who for once forgot his cry of distress and mourning. It is absurd to point, as hon. gentlemen do, to the people of Ontario as being in such abject poverty. So far as the census figures go, they show in my riding a very considerable increase in the past ten years, and that is due to this fact that it is a comparatively new riding. There were hundreds of acres of land owned by the Canadian Land Company, and lands from which the pine had been taken, and which had been sold to the farmers' sons, and the result was that the townships returns show a most decided increase in the assessment rate. As far as the mortgage question is concerned, a careful reference to the state of mortgages all over the province of Ontario will show that there are causes other than those ascribed by hon. gentlemen opposite for these mortgages. For instance, it was only a few weeks since when a case came to my notice of a farmer who bought the adjoining farm to his own for $1,000, which he paid for with $600 cash and raised the balance by a mortgage of $400 on his own farm. So you will find many such reasons, from one end of the country to the other, to account for mortgages; and surely hon. gentlemen opposite will not argue that it is not a proof of prosperity when a farmer from his savings is enabled to purchase the adjoining farm by means of ready cash and a small mortgage on his own. The hour is late, and I do not propose to go further into this matter. My object was to bring to the attention of the Minister and this House this grave question of the depletion of the forests in Ontario. I contend that it is a grave question that American capitalists should come into Canada and invest in timber lands, as they have done, and deplete those lands at the cost of the labouring men of this country, and when you look at the timber business in all its present bearings you see that it is not only the man who works with his hands in the saw-mill or who is employed in getting out the logs who is affected, but also the mercantile classes who live in these towns and the farmers in the neighbouring parts of the country. And it must be borne in mind that this summer this vast quantity of pine, four hundred million feet, would be sufficient to run forty large saw-mills employing a great number of men, distributing money through the country and increasing our wealth. And I do trust the Minister of Finance will not wait until the report has been made, but considering the stand the Government have taken upon this question, will recognize that the appeal is to this Government and to this Government only, because the Ontario Government have been appealed to but in vain, and will seize the opportunity which now offers and I trust they will pass such legislation as will prevent and prohibit the continuance of the export of this vast quantity of logs from the province of Ontario year after year.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11 p.m.

TONNAGE OF CANADIAN SHIPPING.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, What was the total registered tonnage of Canadian shipping on the 31st December, 1892?

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The department have no means of knowing the number of vessels registered out of Canada but owned by people residing in Canada. It is understood, however, that several large steam-ships and many sailing vessels owned in Canada wholly or in part are registered in the United Kingdom. The following is the tonnage registered to December, 1892, viz. :—

POST OFFICE AT KEMPTVILLE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) for Sir Richard Cartwright) asked, Whether the Postmaster-General is aware that complaints have been made to the department by Mrs. Leslie, of Kemptville, that several letters addressed to her have been opened at said office? Whether any investigation has been made into said complaints? If so, whether any report thereon has been made? Whether said report has been acted on? Who is the postmaster, and who is the assistant postmaster at Kemptville?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Complaints have been made to the department of the nature mentioned, and an investigation has been made. A report was made in February, 1891, but no recommendation was made by the inspector, and no action was taken. The postmaster is H. G. Ferguson, and the assistant postmaster, J. D. Ferguson. Mr. Leslie, the husband of the complainant, was for many years assistant postmaster at Kemptville, his father being postmaster. On the appointment (owing to the resignation of the late postmaster) of the present postmaster, Mr. H. G. Ferguson, Mr. Leslie's services as assistant were dispensed with.

FISHING IN COUNTY OF RICHELIEU.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked, Has the fishery overseer for the county of Richelieu been instructed to prohibit fishing within the limits of his district at this season of the year? Have the Government been informed that the fishermen of the county of Richelieu, and more particularly of the parish of Ste. Anne de Sorel, have been notified of such prohibition?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The fishery overseer for the county of Richelieu has been instructed to prohibit net fishing under the ice within the limits of his district. Similar instructions have been given to other overseers in the province of Quebec. The department has been informed that the fishermen of the county of Richelieu, and more particularly those of the parish of Ste. Anne de Sorel, were notified of such prohibition.

WALKERTON MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Whether the contract for carrying the mail from Walkerton to the railway station has been recently let? 2. If so, to whom and at what rate per year? 3. Was it let by public tender? 4. If so, who tendered, and what was the amount of each tender? If not let by public tender, why not? 6. Does the party who received the contract hold any other Government position? If so, what, and what salary is attached to it?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1. Yes. 2. Andrew McLean, 25 cents per trip. 3. No. 5. The existing contract was renewed under statutory authority on the same terms and conditions. 6. The department is not aware that Mr. McLean holds any other Government position, but I will have inquiry made.

ST. PASCAL AND KAMOURASKA MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. CARROLL asked, Whether the Government called for tenders for carrying the mail between St. Paschal and Kamouraska, in 1892? Was the lowest tender accepted; and if not, why not?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The existing contract for this service will expire on 31st March, 1893. On 25th October last notices were issued inviting tenders. On 3rd November the existing contract was renewed, and the notices withdrawn.

I. C. R.—ST. CHARLES BRANCH.

Mr. CARROLL asked, Under the direction of what engineer was the St. Charles branch of the Intercolonial Railway constructed?

Mr. HAGGART. The engineers in charge of the work were Mr. Peter Archibald and Mr. W. B. McKenzie.

PIERS AT KAMOURASKA.

Mr. CARROLL asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to carry on the work begun in 1882 on the piers at Kamouraska and at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere?

Mr. OUMET. The work on these piers has been completed.

GASPE AND CHICOUTIMI JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. FAUVEL asked, What is the reason that the judges of the Superior Courts in the judicial districts of Gaspé and Chicoutimi are paid $500 each less than other judges of the same courts in the province of Quebec? Is it the intention of the Government to place the judges of these districts on a uniform salary as their colleagues in the said province of Quebec?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I presume that the direct answer to the hon. gentleman's question would be that the law fixes the salary at $500 less; but I presume the hon. gentleman desires to know the policy of that difference, and upon that I have only to say that the statute for many years has remained as at present. I presume that the difference was suggested by the reduced expense of living in those districts and the smaller amount of labour which devolves on the judges there. It is not the intention of the Government to propose to change the salaries of those judges until a general measure is adopted dealing with the salaries of all the judges of that class.

NEW HARBOUR, N.S., BREAKWATER.

Mr. FRASER asked, Has the Government received the report of Mr. Shewen, C.E., on survey made as to cost, &c., for the breakwater at New Harbour, Guysborough County? If so, what is the nature of the breakwater he proposes? Estimated cost? Do the Government propose to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates to build said breakwater?

Mr. OUMET. Yes, a report has been received. The engineer in his report on New Harbour, Guysborough County, suggests the construction of two piers of piles, brush and stone, at the mouth of St. Catherines River, with the necessary dredging. The cost is estimated at $27,550. The question as to placing a sum in the Supplementary Estimates for the work is now under consideration.

ADMISSION OF AMERICAN CATTLE INTO THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron) asked, Whether settlers' cattle are admitted into the Canadian North-west from the United States without quarantine; on inspection only? If so, is it the intention of the Government to enforce quarantine regulations against all American cattle entering Canada? Have representations been made to the Government at any time, either written or verbal, of the danger of the British Government scheduling Canadian cattle if settlers' cattle were admitted into Manitoba and the North-west Territories from the United States without quarantine?

Mr. FOSTER. Settlers' cattle are not admitted into the Canadian North-west from the United States without quarantine, and they are admitted on inspection only.

Mr. LAURIER. Since when ?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government is now enforcing quarantine regulations against all American cattle entering the Canadian North-west. No representations, either written or verbal, of the danger of the British Government scheduling Canadian cattle if settlers' cattle were admitted into Manitoba and the North-west Territories from the United States without quarantine, were before the Government previous to Canadian cattle being scheduled by the British Government.

Mr. LAURIER. Since when has this order gone into force ?

Mr. FOSTER. Since Saturday.

PHIDIME BELANGER.

Mr. TARTE asked, What is the position now held by Phidime Belanger, surveyor, formerly of L'Islet ? What is his salary ? How long has he been in his position in the employment of the Government ?

Mr. DALY. Mr. Belanger is at present a Dominion land surveyor in the employment of the Department of the Interior. His salary is $1,500 per annum. He has been in his present employment since 29th April, 1892, and he is one of the most capable men in the profession, and has been engaged in survey work for the Government at various times, and for varying periods for the past ten years. He is not, and never has been, in the permanent employment of the Government.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, ST. JOHN.

Mr. COLTER (for Mr. Gillmor) asked, Who were the tenderers for the copper work on the roof of the Custom-house at St. John, N.B., and what was the amount of each tender ? Was any tender accepted ? If so, whose tender ? Did the successful tenderer proceed with the work ? If he did not, was the contract offered to the next lowest or any other tenderer ? If not, why not ? Was the deposit of the unsuccessful tenderer forfeited ? Under what arrangement was the work done, or is now being done ? Who has been or is inspecting the work, and what has been or is the amount of his pay ? Who is supplying or has supplied the copper and what price is the Government to pay for it ?

Mr. OUMET. The tenderers were John E. Wilson, St. John, $5,380 ; G. Hebener, $5,900 ; Douglas & Plunkett, Toronto, $6,725 ; Douglas, Douglas, Matthews & Bell, $6,920 ; McGourty & Donaghue, St. John, $8,158 ; James McDade, $8,884. The lowest tender, that of John E. Wilson, was accepted. The Mr. McMILLAN (Huron).

successful tenderer did not proceed with the work. The contract was awarded to the next lowest, who declined. It is not the practice of the department to forfeit the deposit made by unsuccessful tenderers. The work is being done by day labour, under the direction of the chief architect, represented at St. John by S. Adams, one of the clerks of works at headquarters, who has direct charge of the work. S. Adams has been inspecting the work. His salary is $90 per month. The copper has been supplied by W. H. Thorne & Co., at 14 cents per pound for the original quantity tendered for, and 15½ cents per pound for some additional quantity.

POSTMASTER OF CAP ST. IGNACE.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation) asked, 1. Whether the Government is aware that Mr. A. Beaulieu, postmaster of the parish of Cap St. Ignace, has left the said parish in order to reside elsewhere ? 2. Did Mr. Beaulieu send in his resignation as postmaster, on leaving the parish ; if not, is it the intention of the Government to cancel his appointment ? 3. Have any persons made application for appointment to the position of postmaster in the place of the said Beaulieu ; if so, who are the said persons ?

Sir A. P. CARON. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I beg to state the department was informed that Mr. Beaulieu spends three days each week away at Cap St. Ignace, and when he is thus away the business of the post office is under the charge of assistants who perform their duties in a satisfactory manner. Mr. Beaulieu has not sent in his resignation. In answer to the third question, MM. Gamache and Bissonnette made application.

POST OFFICE OF NOTRE DAME DU ROSAIRE.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to comply with the petition of the inhabitants of Notre Dame du Rosaire and others, asking that the post office be located in close proximity to the church ?

Sir A. P. CARON. (Translation.) This matter is under consideration : I asked for information which has not reached me yet.

THE EMPLOYEES UNDER THE SUPERVISION OF MR. F. X. BERLINGUET.

Mr. DESAULNIERS (Translation) asked, What was the amount paid to employees of the Government, whether permanent or temporary, in the districts placed under the supervision of Thomas F. X. Berlinguet, C.E., between 29th June, 1891, and 29th June, 1892, and from 29th June, 1892, to 31st December, 1892 ? What are the names of the said employees, and the amounts paid to each of them respectively ? What amount of money was spent by the Government in the said district during that period, exclusive of sums paid to Mr. Berlinguet ?

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) The names of the persons employed by the Government in the district placed under the supervision of the engineer, Mr. Berlinguet, are included in so many pay-lists that it would be impossible to get them in an answer to a question. If the hon. member for St. Maurice (Mr. Desaulniers) is willing to make a motion to that effect, he will have all the information he requires in this question.

THE HERCHMER COMMISSION.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to point out that there is a motion of mine on the Paper calling for the report of Mr. Justice Wetmore, who inquired into the charges against Mr. Commissioner Herchmer. I venture to suggest to the Government that this report should be brought down without waiting for us to arrive at the motion in regular form. It has long been in print; it has been given from Minister to Minister, and it has been shown to outsiders, I believe. I hope my hon. friend the President of the Council will bring it down immediately.

Mr. IVES. I will have the papers prepared so as to bring them down at the earliest moment; perhaps before the hon. gentleman has an opportunity of making his motion.

Mr. DAVIN. If my hon. friend will allow me, I can hardly think there is any necessity for delay. The report is in print.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I might suggest, Mr. Speaker, that, according to the understanding we arrived at last session, no papers should be tabled except on motion made here. I would, perhaps, suggest that unopposed motions should be taken, and then the papers can be brought down without delay. If it meets the unanimous consent of the House, I would suggest that we should proceed with the unopposed motions.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that refers to motions which are not the subject of debate and which are simply for the production of papers.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. I think we might do that.

HOUSE OF COMMONS AND SENATE— OFFICERS.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for :

Return showing : 1. The names, age, birth-place, salary, origin and religion of the permanent officers and servants of the Senate and House of Commons, and the permanent officers and servants employed in the Library of Parliament, as they stood at the end of the first session of the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada. 2. The changes, with dates, which have taken place with respect to the said permanent officers and servants, in each and every succeeding session, up to date. 3. The names, age, birth-place, salary, origin and religion, of the permanent officers and servants of the Senate and House of Commons, and the permanent officers and servants employed in the Library of Parliament, as they now stand on their respective pay-lists; and the same particulars respecting the extra clerks, or those having temporary or sessional connection with the said Houses and Library at the present moment. 4. The sums paid for extra work or outside work to the permanent officers and servants of the Senate and House of Commons, and the permanent officers and servants employed in the Library of Parliament, from the first session of the Parliament of Canada up to date.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am afraid I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to let that motion stand. It calls for a return from the Senate, and it is not in the power of the House to order returns from the Senate. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that, when he comes to move it, he would consider the propriety of restricting it somewhat, because it calls for the birthplace, salary, origin and religion of many persons who are dead, and it might take a long time to ascertain these particulars.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will withdraw it and put it in another shape.

Motion withdrawn.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Before entering upon the consideration of the matter before the House—the National Policy, its promises and its failures—I wish briefly to answer the charge made by the hon. gentleman who last spoke on the opposite side against the administration of public lands by the Ontario Government, and show that such a charge comes with very bad grace from a supporter of the administration of the public lands by this Government. He charged that the administration of public lands by the Ontario Government was inimical to the best interests of the people of that province and caused them a loss of $30,000,000 in money. That charge is one which, in my opinion, should not have been made in this House. If made at all, it should have been made in the Ontario Assembly, where it would be met and where it would be satisfactorily shown that no such loss, or any loss, ever resulted from the administration of public lands in that province. I wish, however, to show briefly to those who may believe in the opinions expressed by that hon. gentleman, that the administration of public lands in Ontario has been more in the interests of the people of that province than has the administration of public lands in the Dominion been in the interest of this country. The mode adopted by the Ontario Government of selling their lands came before the Legislature of that province several times during the last few years, and met with the approval of both parties there, who agreed it was the best plan that could have been put in effect. In fact, when the discussion arose regarding the system of placing these lands on the market, the late leader of the Conservative party in the House then, the Hon. M. C. Cameron, gave his adhesion to the plan adopted by Mr. Mowat and his Ministers. Some time later an objection was raised by one of the Conservative members and the question again came under discussion, and during that discussion the system in force was endorsed by the present leader of the Conservative party, Mr. W. R. Meredith, only four members of the Conservative party objecting to it. Under that system, at certain intervals, timber limits are put on the market for sale. Advertisements are scattered throughout the length and breadth of the country, so that several months previous everybody had notice to attend the public sale and could purchase limits if he bid high enough. In 1887, the Ontario Government realized from their sale of lands no less than $2,859 per square mile. For a limit of fifty miles the result would be $142,950 at that price. The ground rent would be $150, or $3 per square mile, and the timber dues would be $12,500 for the limit, which would make a total of $155,600 realized by the sale of 1887. Now, according to the regulations of the Dominion, they would realize upon the same number of miles as follows:—A bonus on fifty square miles, nothing; ground rent at $5 per square mile, $250; timber dues, 75 cents per thousand feet of board measure, $9,625, or $9,875 as against $155,600 realized by the regulation of the Local Legislature, or a sum in favour of the regulation which the hon. gentleman criticised in his speech, of $145,725. Now, the hon. gentleman could not bring any charge of extravagance or corruption in connection with the administration of the department in Ontario, but if he knew the history of the administration of public lands at Ottawa, he could not have said so much. For, in 1883 and 1884, according to the land regulation of the Dominion Government, they issued Orders in Council to thirty-two of their own supporters for 1,507 square miles, for which they did not receive one dollar of bonus. Now, if that 1,507 square miles had been in the hands of the Local Legislature to be disposed of, it would come out in this way: A bonus, according to the average price, of $3,722,290. But, according to the regulation of the Dominion, that $3,722,290 went into the pockets of private individuals and supporters of the Government. I think, in view of the history of the administration of public lands, it came with a very bad grace from my hon. friend the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) to bring a charge against the Ontario Government for the administration of the public domain. I may take time to refer to a few other facts of which he should have taken notice. He does not remember the history of Hunters' Island, when, under the administration of the Dominion Government, the timber there was sold for $7,500, and, a few months afterwards, sold to a Chicago syndicate for $650,000, or nearly three-quarters of a million, which came out of the public domain of this country and was about to go into the pockets of private individuals. But Sir Oliver Mowat got possession of the disputed territory just previous to the bargain being consummated and saved to the province of Ontario this large quantity of timber. The hon. member also must remember the story of the Rykert timber limit. That gentleman received 100 square miles, according to the regulations of the Dominion Government, for the sum of $500. He afterwards resold that for $200,000, put a large portion of it in his own pocket and in the pockets of those who were with him in the transaction. And who does not remember the question that came up here a few years ago in regard to the timber limit of Mr. Robillard, a member of the House at that time as he is at present, who received seventy-nine square miles of timber limits for the small sum of $316. Shortly after that he sold that timber limit for $50,000 and pocketed his share—one-third of it. That timber limit was worked for two years and then sold for $60,000. It was worked for two years afterwards and then sold for $100,000, so that the $316 in the Treasury of the Government multiplied to $100,000 in the pockets of private individuals. Now, I challenge any person in this country to bring charges of that kind against the administration of the public lands in the province of Ontario. Therefore, I think, as I said before, that it came with a very bad grace from the hon. gentleman to make a charge here in reference to that question. Mr. Speaker, I now come to deal with the National Policy, its promises and its failures. In order that you may have the full wording of the so-called National Policy resolution, I read it to you. The resolution moved in the House of Commons by the late Sir John Macdonald, in 1878, was as follows:—

That the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing, and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving, as it ought to do, in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade.

I want to show how far these promises have been carried out and how far they have failed. First, it was promised to develop the agricultural interest. The Tory party of that day sought to make the country believe that the depression arose from the peculiar fiscal system of that day, that is, a revenue tariff. They sought to make the farmers of this country believe that if protection was introduced and established in this country it would produce a home market for the products the farmers had to sell and that the prices which they realized then would be much increased under the stimulus which this protection would give them in keeping out American cattle and American products which came in competition with their own. That was their argument. Now, at that time it was a very plausible argument. We believed then, as we believe now, that no protective system could be established to protect the farmers, as the farmers of the country produced surplus products, and these products had to be sent from this country to find a market on their merits, and that these products, coming into open competition with the similar products from other countries, a protective tariff could not raise the price to the farmers. But, as I said before, the argument was plausible to the farmer and many of them accepted it. But they have been sadly disappointed. In fact an hon. gentleman who was a supporter, and is still an inconsistent supporter of the party in power, admitted in his speech the other day that we could not protect the farmer. The member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) said it was impossible to protect the farmer. I do not know where he got that new light, but I think it must have been from the very able speeches presenting the facts which have been made in this House from time to time. If not, he must have received the light from the pressure brought to bear upon him in that great North-west country by the farmers who had had practical experience to teach them that the farmer could not be protected. He stated, as I understood, that the only way to protect the farmers was to give them a cheap market to buy in. Last session the hon. gentleman made a remark to me that we got things cheaper under the National Policy than we could possibly get them if the National Policy was removed. But, Sir, by the same pressure, and by the same influence of his constituents, and his practical experience in buying in the markets of the world, he was forced to come to a different conclusion, and he was forced to express that conclusion on the floor of this House in opposition to his conclusion of last year. That shows you, Sir, that the country is bearing down on the politicians, and bringing an influence to bear upon them, forcing them to express the true public sentiment in regard to this matter, instead of speaking from a party stand-point. Now, to show you that the farmers are not satisfied, I will read a few extracts from some of the Tory papers of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. The Minister of the Interior represents the district from which this paper comes; it is a Tory paper, and I suppose supported him in his election. I will quote from the Brandon "Mail":

Under the proofs we have already advanced, and that may be advanced from day to day, there is no longer an argument for adhesion to the National Policy as it exists in its relation to the farmer, and no man will defend it, except those who are either under the influence of the manufacturer or wedded to a fad for what it may bring.

Now, Sir, that is strong language by a Conservative paper, and I am sure that the editor of that paper was brought to this conclusion by the influence of the farming community in that neighbourhood, by knowing their wants, by knowing what they paid for the things they bought, and the prices which they received for what they had to sell. Now, let me give you an expression of opinion by another Conservative paper in that section of the country, the Moosomin "Spectator":

The time has come for the duty on implements and twine to be reduced, as also that on coal oil, and we believe, further, that the wishes of the people in these respects must be met by the present Government and perhaps at the present session of Parliament. The country expects it, and the North-west not only expects but has a right to demand it.

So we see that there are organs of public opinion speaking out boldly, speaking out freely, speaking from a personal stand-point, and a knowledge of the wants of the community, yet speaking in opposition to the party which they formerly supported in this country; and this, to my mind, proves clearly that the men who understand their own interests, who know what they pay for those articles under the National Policy, are perceiving that it is in their interest not to support that policy any further, but rather to support their own interests as they should do. But there is another paper in the North-west Territories from which I wish to quote a few words. I understand that the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is the proprietor of that paper. It says:

We are in a position to say that a revolution has taken place in the rural districts of Ontario on the subject of the tariff, and we know what the opinion is here and in Manitoba. We are quite certain that the members from the counties will have to vote in favour of those resolutions.

Sir, there is the opinion of a supporter of the Government, a paper which has supported the Government in all the elections, not only saying that there has been a great change in the North-west, but there is a great change in the province of Ontario, among the farmers in regard to the tariff. Here we have, coming from all parts of the Dominion, testimony from the farmers themselves that the National Policy, so far as they are concerned, has been an absolute and complete failure. Now, we can only benefit the farmers in three ways. First, we can benefit the farmers by improving the condition of the soil; but I do not think that any Conservative will go so far as to contend that the National Policy can have any influence in increasing the fertility of the soil. The second way that we can benefit the farmers is by giving them better markets to sell in. Now, the National Policy has had a tendency to take good markets away from them. It has, to a very large extent, prevented them from selling their products in their natural markets, the United States. A large number of the articles which they sent there in years past are now kept out by the double line of Customs that has been established by two foolish Governments. Now, have the farmers received any more for the products of the soil? Have they received any more for their wheat, for their flour, for their barley, for their eggs, for their horses, for their poultry, their lambs, their potatoes, their hay, their cheese and their butter? Now, I am in possession of facts to show that the prices obtained under the National Policy are lower, on the average, than the prices obtained before the National Policy came into existence. I have here a statement showing the number of cents higher that each bushel and each pound brought under the old regime, under the revenue tariff, than it has brought under the support of the so-called National Policy:

Wheat	1.11	.96	.15
Barley85	.65	.20
Oats42	.38	.04
Pease71	.66	.05
Dressed hogs	7.04	6.80	.24
Butter23	.20	.03
Apples, per barrel	2.69	2.30	.39
Hay	18.00	11.00	7.00
Wool34	.22	.12

Now, any farmer can see that the National Policy had no influence whatever in increasing the price of his products, and, therefore, it has been of no benefit to them. But it may be said, and probably will be said: Now, you do not really suppose that any Government is able to increase the prices of those products; the price of those products is fixed in the English market where they are sold, and, therefore, we cannot expect that, under any fiscal policy, the prices of these articles can be increased. That is what we always contended; but the authors of the National Policy promised that it would increase the prices of these products to the Canadian farmer, and now we ask the Conservative party, who inaugurated the National Policy, to make good, so far as they can, the promises they have made, or else acknowledge that those promises were false and misleading. Now, Mr. Speaker, on the other hand, have the articles which the Canadian farmer requires to consume been increased in price, or are they cheaper than they were before? We know that they are not as cheap as they would be if the duty was less or removed, because we have the testimony of these very men from various parts of the country, seeking to remove the duty on agricultural implements, for one thing, evidently testifying that the price of agricultural implements is higher than it should be, under the influence of the National Policy. I do not say that agricultural implement manufacturers are deriving all the benefits from the protective duty given to them; for, on the one hand, they have to pay a large duty on the raw material which enters into the manufacture of those implements, and this counterbalances nearly all the advantages that they receive at the other end from the protection which is given them. Now, if the duties were removed from the raw material, from the iron which enters largely into the manufacture of agricultural implements, the manufacturers could make those implements much cheaper, and the farmers could buy them much cheaper, than they do now. Has the price of woollen goods in this country fallen, comparably with what it would under a different fiscal policy? It is well known that we pay millions in duties on woollen goods used by the Canadian people, and the larger proportion and the higher duties are paid by the working classes and the farmers, who use that class of goods on which there is a specific as well as an ad valorem duty, which press very heavily on those who consume the coarser and heavier woollen goods. Have the Government made binding twine cheaper than it would have been under a different trade policy? The farmers have paid during the last ten years $2,000,000 on binding twine which they would not have paid if the duty had been the same as was paid on binding twine imported into the United States. This can easily and conclusively be shown, because the other day the Minister of Finance, speaking on the Budget, gave the House to understand that on binding twine he was prepared to reduce the duty to 12½ cents instead of 25 cents per pound, which was the duty previously. What has been the result throughout the country? Binding twine has already fallen 1 cent per pound on the open market, testifying that the presence of the duty on the article increased the price to the consumer, for so soon as the announcement made by the Government became known binding twine fell in price 1 cent per pound. So it is evident those articles under the National Policy are not so cheap as they would otherwise be. Take the article of cotton. This House the other day heard a very able, clear and explicit speech on the question of cottons, in which it was shown beyond any possibility of contradiction that the people of this country had paid over $3,000,000 in duties on cottons more than would have been paid if there had been reasonable duties imposed on those products. If those duties were removed, a large proportion of the amount paid would be saved to the people, just as has been found to be the case in regard to articles on which duties have been removed. Take coal oil, for instance. When the Minister of Finance promised to remove the duties, or rather what he called the hidden duty, a change soon followed. That duty was supposed to amount to a very small sum. We find, however, that a marked result has taken place, even in the town from which I come. When I left, Canadian oil was selling at from 18 cents to 20 cents per gallon, and now the price is announced in the papers to-day as being 12½ cents. There has been a reduction of 6½ cents per gallon on account of more favourable arrangements made by dealers. My hon. friend who opposed me the other night on this question came over to me the other day, and we had a conversation on the fact that coal oil had fallen in price all over the country, in consequence of the removal of this hidden duty, by which the manufacturers have no longer the power to charge the consumers as much as formerly, thus consumers can save money by the removal of this so-called hidden duty. These facts prove to my mind at least that the farmer has not been placed in a position in which he can sell his products at a higher price, or buy the articles he consumes cheaper than formerly. I might show a similar state of facts existing both in regard to hardware and iron. I have, however, shown this House clearly that the National Policy has not fostered or benefited the agricultural interests of the country. The next question is, has it fostered and developed the mining industries which it promised to develop? There is no country in the world possessing the same facilities as Canada for the development of the iron industry, the copper industry and the nickel industry. There is no country in the world that possesses the same amount of wealth in copper as we possess on the north shore of Lake Superior. There is no more extensive region possessing copper ore than the Lake Superior region, and yet there is hardly a sound of a hammer to be heard there, and for the hum of industry we listen in vain. It is not so on the other side of the line, in Michigan, which is a generation younger than Ontario, for we find there thousands and thousands of men engaged in the development of the copper industry, notwithstanding the fact that they are obliged to transport that copper 1,000 miles to the smelting furnaces of Pittsburg, to meet the fuel there, and that trade is booming every day while our copper regions are lying silent. Yet the National Policy is supposed to develop that industry. Has this policy developed the iron industry in the country? There is no country in the world—I can truly repeat these words with respect to iron—that possesses the same facilities for developing the iron industry as Canada possesses. The iron ore of Nova Scotia is of first-class quality, the coal region is contiguous to the iron beds, the limestone rocks are in the same neighbourhood, they being used as flux in the melting of iron, ships are within a few miles of these places, railways are penetrating the mountains of iron in every direction for the purpose of providing facilities for transporting the manufactured articles. I repeat that no other place on the continent possesses the same advantages and facilities for carrying on this industry. The Dominion has incurred a very large expense in protecting the iron industry. We have imported during the last ten years 755,000 tons of pig iron, on which a duty was paid of $2,234,000. A bounty was also paid on pig iron produced here during those years to the amount of $329,000, or making a total sum paid by this country for the purpose of protecting the pig iron industry, of $2,563,000. Let us see how much we have received from that expenditure. The production of pig iron in 1878 was about 16,000 tons, the production of pig iron in 1892 was a little less than 20,000 tons, or an increase of only 4,000 tons, after spending $2,500,000 in granting protection to that industry. Last year we imported 68,918 tons, on which we paid $275,000 duty. We paid on 20,000 tons manufactured, $40,000 bounty, and the profit which the manufacturers were able to place on the home product on account of the duty, was $80,000. We have paid to protect the iron industries for one year $395,800, and that sum was paid for 20,000 tons, even supposing that the protection was the cause of the production of those 20,000 tons. We have paid on every ton $19.75, in addition to purchasing the iron after it was manufactured, at a cost of $10.50 per ton, that being the cost of production last year; or, in other words, we paid twice as much for the protection as the iron was worth after it was placed on the market. But did this protection increase the iron ore product in Nova Scotia? Let me give the House some figures in connection with the production of iron ore in that province. In 1880 iron ore was produced in Nova Scotia to the amount of 51,193 tons; in 1881, 39,843 tons; 1882, 42,135 tons; 1883, 52,410 tons; 1884, 54,885 tons; 1885, 48,129 tons; 1886, 44,388 tons; 1887, 43,532 tons; 1888, 42,610 tons; 1889, 54,161 tons; 1890, 49,206 tons, these being the last figures I can obtain from an authentic source. Take the period of five years, from 1880 to 1884, inclusive, and we find the average production of iron ore in Nova Scotia was 48,000 tons, and taking the last five years, from 1885 to 1890, we find that the production was 47,000 tons. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in 1888, when Sir Charles Tupper in his Budget speech proposed to put on an extra duty for the protection of the iron industry, he portrayed in glowing language the extraordinary bounds which the production of iron was to take. He pictured in his own mind that in two or three years we would have at least 25,000 people engaged in the production of iron, and although there was a duty of $4 a ton and a bounty of $2 a ton put on at that time, in two years afterwards, notwithstanding all this fostering of the industry, the production of iron was less than it was before. This proves that we are paying far too much out of the pockets of the people for all the improvement in the production of iron that we get in return. There is another point which I wish to make. Last year we imported, in round numbers, $10,000,000 worth of iron, and we have paid on that $2,800,000 duty. When it came into the hands of the importer, he would at least add 25 per cent as profit before it passed out of his hands to the consumer. That would amount to $700,000, or taking the duty and the profit, it would represent an extra cost to the people of $3,500,000. As far as I could ascertain from the different documents through which I looked for information, as well as from information which I received from other sources, I find that the protection of the iron industry in this country will cost a similar sum to the consumers by reason of the increased price which it enables the sellers of iron to put on the home production of all kinds. The Canadian people are, therefore, paying $7,000,000 annually on account of the duty upon iron products including what is imported, and what is manufactured in this country. Just think of it for a moment, Mr. Speaker, $7,000,000 a year coming out of the hard-earned money of the people of this country, and principally from the farmers, because, as we all know, the agricultural implements used by the farmers are largely composed of iron. Their threshing machines, their mowers, their reapers, their drills, their ploughs, their rakes and all implements that they use on the farm, are largely composed of iron. Therefore, a larger proportion of this $7,000,000 comes directly out of the pockets of the farmers than out of the pockets of any other class of the people. Did you ever consider how much this enormous sum would amount to in, say, ten years only? That would be $70,000,000 of money which in ten years is drained from the people of this country in order to give protection to the iron industry without any good result whatever accruing from it. Had this iron industry developed under protection, and if there was a prospect of its being able to stand on its own foundation after a few years of protection, then it would not be so bad; but when we find that there is no improvement, then I think it is time for the Government to call a halt in this matter, and relieve the consumer by reducing the duty $70,000,000—as much as the Canadian Pacific Railway cost our people in cash ; half as much again as the whole system of the canals of the Dominion has cost ; twice as much as the original cost of the Intercolonial Railway ; twice as much as the total annual expenditure of the Government for the conduct of the affairs of the country and the construction of public works ; as much as would pay the interest on the public debt for seven years ; that is what comes out of the pockets of the people every ten years in order to give protection to the iron industry. This amount which comes out of the pockets of the people for the protection of the iron industry and which, be it remembered, does not result in an increased production, would buy a strip of land one mile in width, extending from Halifax to Vancouver, at $25 an acre. If that amount of $70,000,000 was transformed into gold, and then a ton put on each wagon, there would be 150 wagons, requiring 150 teams to draw them, and it would form a golden procession of one mile in length. Need we be astonished, when such a drain is made on the people of this country, and largely from the farming classes, that we are under a cloud and in a state of depression. We need not wonder that the country is depressed when we look into the matter in this way. I come to a point now on which my hon. friends opposite may say : There they are again defaming their country. I am going to speak for a short time in reference to the exodus, and I suppose that hon. gentlemen opposite, taught by their superiors in office, will say : There goes the Liberal party again, defaming the country and spreading before the world that our people are leaving us to find a home in foreign lands. How unpatriotic ? How wrong to make the statement that our people are not doing well. Well, I do not believe it is anything of the kind. I believe that when we come here, we come to consult together in reference to the country and its conditions. It is the same as when two doctors are called in to consult over a patient who is very sick. The patient may have the best character in the world, but we come to investigate his present condition, and that is the thing to seek. I do not think it will be any reflection on the part of the doctors to say to him : Mr. So-and-So, you are sick. You have certain troubles, and we must consult together to find a remedy in order to restore you to convalescence and health. It would be no reflection on the man's character. His character would be as good as it was before, but he was sick and he required a certain remedy. We are here to-day, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of considering the condition of this country, and if we find that the people of this country are not in a good condition, it is for us frankly to express it one to the other, and to seek by the wisdom of both parties to put them in a better position than we find them to-day. I suppose that was the position that the leaders of the Conservative party took when they spoke in very nearly the same language as we are now speaking in reference to the state of the country.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Except that they lied.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Probably as my hon. friend says. Let me read to you the opinion of the "Empire," and I suppose that Tory opinion will be considered good by gentlemen opposite. The "Empire" blames the Liberal party for the exodus and for the present condition of the country, and in the issue of 27th August, 1891, it says :

That the last decade has not shown a larger increase, is in no inconsiderable measure due to the tactics of these politicians who have persistently preached discouragement. They have induced men to leave the country and assailed and hindered in the money markets of the world, the great commercial undertakings of Canada.

Then, in order to prove, or to give a foundation for this statement, it quotes an extract from the speech delivered by the Hon. Edward Blake on 18th April, 1880 :

There has been great shrinkage in bank stocks. There has been great depreciation of the value of real estate. There has been a depression in trade and commerce.

And the "Empire" remarks :

Pleasant reading this must have been for intending emigrants.

Now, I will give you some pleasant reading for intending emigrants from another source, which the "Empire" did not quote and moralize upon in the same way. They are similar statements to those made by Mr. Blake, but they were made under different conditions :

I regret to say that we must point to depreciated values and small dividends. To-day we have limited markets with low prices. To-day the country is greatly depressed.

You would almost think, from the language used, that it was the same gentleman who spoke in the one case as in the other. But, Sir, this was not spoken by a Liberal, but by a man who stood high, and who still stands high, in the estimation of the Conservative party—a man who was at one time the Finance Minister of this country. He made use of these words while delivering his Budget speech in this House. Since that time he has been elevated to a higher position still ; he is now the Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick. I mean Sir Leonard Tilley. Sir, if it was unpatriotic on the part of Mr. Blake to make statements of that kind, how was it on the part of the Finance Minister of that day ? But, Sir, let me give you some further samples of the literature which was cast abroad a few years ago. Here are some choice specimens :

The Dominion in all its provinces has now for some years been suffering from commercial depression and financial stringency, unexampled in severity in the memory of the most active man of to-day.

This would have been splendid literature to send to England and Germany to induce emigrants to come to this country. Surely, if the Conservatives endorsed this language, they cannot find much fault with the mild language in which Mr. Blake expressed his opinion that the country was sore depressed. The extract goes on :

These have gone on increasing in intensity, until now, it may be said, that the sound chiefly heard on our streets is one of complaining.

History has repeated itself, and we now hear from one end of the country to the other a wail of complaint. It goes on :

Many of the farmers in the favoured province of Ontario have been impelled to import large quantities of corn for provender, and even in some districts, wheat.

Now, Mr. Speaker, was it not very foolish indeed for any man to say that it was due to the policy of the Government that wheat did not grow? I do not think any Government has the power of bringing refreshing showers of rain and sunshine. I think that is in the hands of Providence. The reason the people of that day were compelled to import wheat and grain was that their own lands at that particular juncture refused to yield a sufficiency. That was not the fault of the Government; and yet it was impressed on the people of the country that the late Mackenzie Government was responsible for that. But the gentleman whose speech I am quoting went still further. He said :

The aggregate amount of money borrowed by them and secured by mortgages upon their homesteads during the last nine or ten months is undoubtedly larger than was ever before borrowed by them in the same space of time.

When we speak about mortgages, we are told that we are decrying our country, that we are sending a bad opinion of it to various parts of the world; but here was a gentleman who spoke of more mortgages having been placed on property during the nine or ten months previous to the time he was speaking than ever before. Then he winds up :

Is there no science in statesmanship? Are Cabinet Ministers only cashiers to receive and distribute the revenue, and officers of the law to preserve the peace? If these are their duties our Ministers are too many and vastly overpaid.

Now, who was it that made such a tirade as this against this country? Who would hon. gentlemen opposite imagine would do it? He was a member of the late Sir John Macdonald's Government. He was afterwards elevated to the Senate and became the leader of that body. He ultimately received tokens of esteem at the hands of Her Majesty Queen Victoria and was dubbed knight, and is now known about this country as Sir David Macpherson, one of the leaders of the Liberal-Conservative party. And yet neither in the "Empire" nor in any of the other Tory papers of this country has one word of reference been made to the language used by these men a few years ago. But I want to quote a little more, so as to silence these men for ever.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Blue ruin.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). When blue ruin is the cry on both sides, we would have very little to say, and when you take the blue ruin from these speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, there is very little left in them. Now, an hon. gentleman occupying a very high and proud position in the councils of this country, spoke as follows :—

Our credit was good in England, in the United States and all the world over, but gentlemen, what do we see now? Instead of confidence there is distrust. Instead of solvency, look at the official Gazette, and every Saturday they show a long string of insolvencies.

Look around you, and you see the horny hands of toil asking leave to labour. They are now beggars. They do not desire to have silver spoons placed in their mouths, but they desire to have a fair day's wages for a fair day's work.

But what do we see? We see them drifting off to the United States. We see the skilled artisans, the strong-handed young men and the active young women of Lower Canada drifting off to Lowell, to New Hampshire, to Maine, to Connecticut, adding to the wealth, to the power and the strength of a foreign nation, and depleting poor Canada.

Now, who was the man who was so unpatriotic as to stump this country from end to end preaching such doctrines from the public platforms? Sir, he was the man who said on one occasion that "a British subject he was born and a British subject he would die"—a man whose memory is revered by gentlemen sitting on the opposite benches. The same man said in 1877 :

We have no workpeople. Our workpeople have gone off to United States. Let any man visit any of the manufacturing of the United States and there he will find the Canadian artisan working and doing well, and therefore not going back. It grieved me to the soul as a Canadian, when in Sherbrooke the other day, to be told that the population had decreased under the malign influence of the Liberal Government. People whom we ought to have kept among ourselves, men, women and children that ought to have been working in our factories, have been driven away by the unwise, by the demented—to use a good Scotch phrase—by the insane policy, or want of policy, of the Liberal Government.

You see he attributed the whole exodus to the malign influence of the Liberal Government, although the hon. Finance Minister, while delivering his Budget speech the other day, said that whatever the fiscal policy was, whether it was free trade or a revenue tariff or a protective tariff, the people would go away. He goes on to say even worse than that. He says :

The people we ought to have kept among ourselves, the men, women and children who ought to have been working in our factories, have been driven by the unwise, by the demented, to use a Scotch phrase, by the insane policy, or want of policy, of the Liberal Government out of the country.

Will any of the hon. gentlemen opposite accuse us, in the face of such a torrent of invective, of decrying and bewailing our country? Now, I do not say that Sir John Macdonald or Sir David Macpherson, or any of those men, if they believed conscientiously that the country was in that condition, were wrong in expressing their opinion. On the contrary, it was their duty to do so and to try and influence the people to adopt any change of policy which they conscientiously thought would bring about an improvement. It is equally the duty of the Liberal party to-day to point out the means of safety and induce the people to bring pressure on the Government to adopt such means and thus remove the depression under which we are suffering. The hon. gentleman proposed a remedy. He said:

If the country had a judicious system of taxation the working people would be toiling and doing well in their own country.

Well, he could judge for himself what was a judicious system of taxation, and he established what, in his opinion, was such a system; and we had the right to expect that, if his remedy were a good one, the people would remain in the country and its condition would improve. Have they remained with us? I am not going at length to argue out the census, but I will give a few figures which I challenge any gentleman on the Treasury benches to answer satisfactorily. I hope the hon. gentleman who is to follow me will take a note of this. We had the right to expect in this country a natural increase equal to the United States. It has always been the general opinion that the natural increase of Canada was greater than that of the United States. We know, as a fact, that the families in Canada are, as a rule, larger than those in the United States, and, therefore, without straining a point at all, we could expect, at least, a natural increase in this country equal to that in the United States. Very well, if that assumption is correct, we know that the natural increase during the last decade in the United States was 14 per cent, and that the immigration into the United States was from 10 to 12 per cent, making altogether an increase of about 25 per cent. Now, if our natural increase had been equal to that of the United States, namely, 14 per cent, that percentage of our population in 1881 would give 604,000 of a natural increase. Then, according to the report of the Department of Agriculture we find that we brought into this country 886,000 of immigrants since 1881, who expressed their intention of remaining in Canada, and it cost us about $3,000,000 to bring these people in. If you add the 604,000 natural increase which we had a right to expect, to these 886,000 who came in, intending to settle here, you get a total of 1,490,000. Subtract from that our actual increase, which was 504,000, and you have 986,000 missing. Instead of an increase of 1,490,000, which we should have, we have only 504,000. Where are the 986,000 gone? If it will be said that our natural increase was less than that of the United States, let hon. gentlemen opposite give us their reason for that opinion, because it used to be larger, and if the number I have mentioned, and which I have taken from the Government reports, actually came into the country, I repeat my question. Where are they gone? They are not found in any of the provinces of the Dominion, and therefore we must conclude that the 986,000 people we should have here, have gone somewhere else. With regard to the number of Canadians in the United States in 1871, 1881 and 1891, I have nothing to say. I do not say that 986,000 Canadians went away from Canada. There may not have been 300,000 who went away; but the people whom we brought in to be settlers and citizens of this country—they and the Canadians together, to the extent of 986,000, have gone, according to the census returns. In the American census returns no special notice would be taken of foreigners who went into the United States from Canada; but that number has undoubtedly gone from Canada and gone somewhere, and I want a reasonable and plausible solution to the question: Where have they gone? Hon. gentlemen opposite say we are not fair, when we compare the census of one section of the United States with another section of ours. I am going to take up the challenge thrown out by the Minister of Finance the other day in his Budget speech to the hon. member for South Oxford, when he said:

Let me call my hon. friend's attention to the North Atlantic states, nine in number, and when he is going over census statistics, let me ask him to thoroughly consider that portion of it, the New England States and the North Atlantic states, nine in number, running from Maine down to Pennsylvania, taking in, of course, the great state of New York and all between. It is more fair to take those two great stretches of country and compare the two.

He asked us to take the nine North Atlantic states and compare them with those portions of Canada which are comparatively settled, and I think that would be a fair comparison. What does that comparison show? I find, after having gone over the census of the nine states referred to—Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Vermont and Connecticut—that they had in 1880 a population of 14,507,407, and in 1890, ten years later, a population of 17,364,429, or an increase of 2,887,022, or a percentage of increase of 19.69, as compared with Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Ontario, which show an increase of 7.84. That is nearly three times as much increase in those very states, which he said would furnish a fair comparison, as in the provinces I have mentioned. Let me now select a few states, of which the following table will show the growth of population:—

Name of State.	1880.	1890.	Increase.	Per cent.
1 Maine	648,936	660,266	11,330	1.75
2 New Hampshire	346,991	375,827	28,836	8.3
3 Massachusetts	1,783,085	3,233,407	1,450,322	25.3
4 Rhode Island	276,531	345,343	68,812	25
5 Connecticut	622,700	745,861	123,161	20
6 New York	5,082,871	5,981,934	899,063	17.7
7 New Jersey	1,131,116	1,441,017	309,901	27.4
8 Pennsylvania	4,282,891	5,248,574	965,683	22.5
9 Vermont	332,280	332,205	-75	-8.1
Total increase	14,507,407	17,364,429	2,857,022	19.69

In the last state an increase was not expected, because it is a very poor state, much poorer than it was ten or twelve years ago, and some of the land has been washed from the mountain side, leaving the bare stone, and some of the land besides has greatly depreciated, so that the people have had to abandon their farms. No condition of that kind can be found to exist in any of our provinces, and, therefore, the same conditions were not operative, and a comparison between Vermont and many of our eastern provinces would not be just. Now, take the increases in our provinces. In Nova Scotia the increase was only 2.25 per cent. Notwithstanding that it is a fair agricultural country, notwithstanding that it is a great mineral country, notwithstanding that it is a great fishing country, it had increased in population only 2.25 per cent. New Brunswick, a province having large capabilities of expansion and land comparatively good, much better than the land in Vermont, only increased .02 per cent. Prince Edward Island, also a rich and fertile province, with magnificent fisheries, only increased 18 per cent. Quebec increased 9.53 per cent, and Ontario 9.65 per cent, making an average, as I said, of 7.84 per cent, as compared with 19.69 per cent in the North Atlantic states, with which the hon. gentleman asked us to make a comparison. Thus, we have taken up his own position, we have accepted his own challenge and have proven by the figures placed before us in the census of Canada and the census of the United States that Canada has not increased as we would naturally expect it to do. Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to another point. The National Policy has failed to find many new markets for the Canadian people. The Finance Minister, four years ago, in 1889, boasted in these words :

South America with its different Governments, with its vast natural resources, with its demand for certain articles which we can supply of the best kind, is ready to trade with us.

Well, Sir, we could not say anything against that statement in 1889. But how much have we traded with them and they with us since that time? Our export in that very year, when these words were spoken, was $1,489,000, and, in 1892, after waiting three years for what we expected to be a great trade, we find that it has fallen to $1,027,500, or $461,500 less than when he boasted there was an opening for the great trade for Canada, or nearly 40 per cent less. But in the same speech he said :

The West Indies, rich in elements of trade which complement ours afford a field for which we believe to be a permanent and profitable trade.

Now, Sir, in 1879, we had an export trade with that country of $3,500,000. Now, after thirteen years of expectation, after a visit of the Finance Minister to these islands for the purpose of establishing a larger and more extensive trade, after an exhibition of the Canadian products made there under the commissionership of Mr. Brown, at large expense to this country, after all these efforts have been made, we find that our export trade in 1892 was only $46,000 more than it was thirteen years ago, or an increase of only 1.3 per cent. And yet we are told that new markets are being opened up and developed for the sale of the products of the Canadian people. This increase would not pay the expense of the commissioner. More than that, since that time subsidized steamers have been placed upon that route, running from St. John and Halifax to the West Indies, subsidized by the Canadian Government, and, after several years of that expenditure, we have only $46,000 worth of goods sent to that country more than we had in 1879. And still, the Finance Minister tells us that we are opening up a great trade with foreign countries. The Finance Minister goes on still further and says :

Lying out to the east are China and Japan, and the Government, mindful of the possibilities of trade in that direction which have already been developed,—

Then he went on to say that development had occurred in this way—that the Canadian Pacific Railway had now been built across the continent, making an iron band carrying the trade of Canada, and then the Canadian Pacific Railway steamers were on the Pacific subsidized to a very large amount by this Government, carrying our trade with China and Japan. Now, Sir, let us see what has been accomplished. In 1878, the last year of the Mackenzie Government, when there was no Canadian Pacific Railway, when there was no subsidized steamers running from Vancouver to China and Japan, when, in fact, there was no Vancouver, and when the Rocky Mountains formed a complete barrier between us and the Pacific coast, and products had to go by a roundabout way, $102,500 worth of Canadian products were exported to China and Japan. And in 1881, when they possessed these great facilities of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the subsidized steam-ship lines, they only sent $78,800, or about $24,000 less than they had sent thirteen years ago. Sir, last year there was an upward bound in this export trade. In 1892 Canada sent to China and Japan $283,000 worth of goods. You notice that is over double what was sent in 1878. But of that amount $229,000 was cotton, sent from the mills of Canada. And the Finance Minister would take to himself pride and credit because so large a quantity of cotton was shipped to China and Japan. But I would like the hon. gentleman who is to follow me to tell how the Canadian mills can compete with the United States and Britain and sell on equal terms in China and Japan, when they cannot sell on equal terms in Canada? I will tell you how it is, Sir. They have slaughtered, to a certain extent, $229,000 worth of cottons for the purpose of clearing out the overplus in the Canadian market, and, no sooner did they export that quantity, than they raised the price to Canadian people 15 per cent higher than it was before. So that, in reality, this export to China and Japan has been a burden on the Canadian people. The tariff enabled them to sell cheaply in these markets and make up the loss, if there was a loss, by charging it to the consumers of cotton in this country. Now, I will refer briefly to two or three other countries where they have failed to increase our trade. We exported to Belgium in 1878, $50,000 worth, and in 1892, $56,000, not as much more as would fill a village store. To Newfoundland, our sister colony, we sent $2,095,000, and, in 1892, the export fell off to $1,751,000, or $344,000 less than we sent thirteen years ago. To Australia we sent, in 1878, when we had not the same facilities for sending as now, $652,000, and now, with all our facilities, we only sent $745,000 in 1892, or $93,000 more. Take France, a country with which our people should trade very largely, as many of our people are of the same nationality, the same tongue, the same religion, the same sympathy. But, instead of a larger trade, our trade has been reduced. In 1878 we exported to France $370,000, and, in 1892, $368,000. To Spain, in 1878, we exported $48,000, and, in 1892, $93,000. To Italy, in 1878, we exported $152,000 and only $149,000 in 1892. To Great Britain our exports were $46,000,000 in 1878, and in 1892, $65,000,000. That $65,000,000 requires a little explanation. A large portion of that trade was diverted from its proper and natural market by the operation of the McKinley Bill. For instance, a large portion of our horses, a great part of the eggs exported from this country and many other things were diverted to the British market, and in that way our export to that country was increased last year. The percentage of increase to Great Britain during the last twelve years was 41 per cent. To the United States, in 1878, we sent $25,000,000 worth, and last year $39,000,000, or an increase, notwithstanding the obstacles that were thrown in our way to get into their market, of 56 per cent, as compared with 41 per cent increase to the British market. Sir, the National Policy has not materially enlarged the labour market. We remember that the promise was made in 1878 that if the National Policy was established a large number of manufactories would be erected in different sections of the Dominion, which would employ a far greater number of hands, and the people who were standing idle, according to Sir John A. Macdonald's testimony, would be picked up and taken into those factories. Now, I have taken considerable trouble to go over twenty-nine of the principal industries of the province of Ontario, and to ascertain the number of men employed in each of them in the years 1871, 1881 and 1891 respectively, to see if there was a greater labour market open to the people of the country under the National Policy than during the period between 1871 and 1881. Everybody will see that I have selected the most important ones. In three parallel columns I give the number of persons employed :

From 1871 to 1881--15,407=29%
 1881 to 1891--15,504=23%

In other words, from 1871 to 1881 there was an increase in the number of hands employed in those different factories, of 15,407, or an increase of 29 per cent. From the year 1881 to 1891 there was an increase in the number of hands of 15,504, or 23 per cent. So you will see, Mr. Speaker, that before the existence of the National Policy, the increase in the number of hands employed in those factories was greater than under the protective system. I do not say that these factories have not turned out a greater product; they have done so, by reason of introduction of better machinery; but they did not give a better labour market to those to whom it was promised, and therefore the National Policy did not give those promised blessings to the labouring classes of this country whom Sir John A. Macdonald said were being driven out of the country, who were asking for bread and were being given a stone. Another charge that I bring against the National Policy is that it discriminates against the poor man, and the farmer in particular, in that it imposes higher duties upon the articles principally used by them. I believe that in any policy where taxes have to be gathered from the people care should be taken to levy the lower tax on the poor people, and the higher tax on those better able to pay it. Now, the National Policy has been in direct opposition to that principle, which I can prove from facts and figures of an authentic character. Let me give you another table in the articles of cottons, hosiery and sewing machines, showing how the duties bear more heavily upon the poor man and the farmer than upon the wealthier classes:—

	$	Duty, per cent.
Carpets (cotton warp), at per yard.	0 20	45
do do do	0 50	30
Carpets, all wool, at per yard....	1 00	30
do high grades.		25
Sewing machines, each.	25 00	32
do do	65 00	24½
Hosiery, per dozen.	2 00	30
do do	8 00	22½

Now, let me give you a few other facts which I wish to go before the farmers of this country:

Ordinary grass scythes—Canadian duty $2.40 per dozen, making actual rate of duty 66½ per cent.

Manure forks (first quality), 4 prong, plain, long handles—Canadian duty $2 per dozen and 20 per cent, or $2.72 per dozen, making actual rate of duty 75 per cent.

Hay forks and hoes (first quality)—Canadian duty 60c. per dozen and 25 per cent, making an actual duty of 55 per cent.

Garden rakes, twelve teeth malleable, ten teeth malleable—60c. per dozen and 25 per cent. Actual duty 65 per cent., 73 per cent.

Spades and shovels, ordinary plain black, polished steel—Duty $1 and 25 per cent. Actual duty 50 per cent.

Picks, mattocks, &c.—1c. per lb. and 25 per cent. Actual rate 60 per cent.

Barbed wire (galvanized)—Quoted in foreign papers, 1890, $3.30 per 100 lbs. Duty 50 per cent.

Building paper or straw sheathing—Duty 50c. per 100. Duty 60 per cent.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Bolts and nuts—Duty 1½c. per lb. and 30 per cent, making the actual duty 70 per cent.

Clothes wringers—$12 per dozen and 30 per cent, making the duty 103 per cent.

Coal oil—140 per cent.

Common wood screws—1 inch, 11c. per lb. or 90 per cent duty.

Cut nails, steel or iron—$1 per keg, or 60 per cent duty.

Cutlery (table knives)—50c. per doz. and 20 per cent, or 75 per cent.

Now, these are examples to show you plainly that the National Policy is unfair in its application of duties upon different classes of people in this country. Where we can get silks, jewelry and fine things of that kind for 20, 25 and 30 per cent, the tariff charges 50 to 75 per cent on the class of articles required by those men who earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow; and I say it is unjust, it is impolitic, it is unnatural, to place such burdens upon the people who are the least able to bear them, and relieving those who are better able to pay. Now, I want to place before the House a few wise remarks made by one of the wisest statesmen Canada ever had, a man whose eloquence frequently rang through the House, and entertained the people as well as instructed them, a man who had a deeper and a wider grasp of public affairs in this country, probably, than any other statesman who ever sat in this House, an hon. gentleman who has now left us, and I hope he will be successful in the mission he has undertaken—I mean the Hon. Edward Blake. He says, in regard to the National Policy:

Its real tendency has been towards disintegration and annexation.

Is there anything more true? Is there not unrest and agitation through the country at the present time for constitutional changes, owing to this protective system? Is that change desired because the people are tired with their connection with the British Empire? Not at all. Is it because our system of government is not the best that you can find among men? We all admit that it is. It possesses the permanent principle of a monarchical form of government and the liberal and progressive principle of a republican government; in addition, it combines many principles suggested by the experience of the Canadian people. There is no one to-day who would exchange our system of government for that of the United States. Is it because England interferes with our freedom of legislation? No, she does not interfere with us. We have ample room to legislate for our own country. She never throws any burdens or difficulties in our way; we always have gone forward and legislated in our own interests, and therefore it is not because of interference by the British people that a cry for annexation is raised in the country. It is because the people's burdens are doubled, it is because heavy burdens are imposed on them by the protective system inaugurated in 1879. The people have not been prosperous, and they believe that whatever change may come, they will be more prosperous in another country and under some other form of government than they are at the present time in Canada. Give the people prosperity, give them more money in their pockets at the end of the year, and the tendency to annexation will pass away, and our people will be perfectly satisfied to live under the good old flag that waves over us, and that has waved over the British Empire for a thousand years. Mr. Blake goes on further to say :

It has left us with a small population, a scanty immigration, and a North-west empty still.

Is not this the fact? Has not the census proved the correctness of this prophecy, made before the statistics were published, that we were left with a small population, and that our population has not increased as we expected? Has it not left the North-west empty still, after 20 years of efforts on the part of the Canadian people? Is not this shown by the fact that, notwithstanding the rich lands offered free by the Government, Manitoba, the richest of all sections of that country, only contains 154,000 people? Mr. Blake might well say, "and a North-west empty still." Then he said further :

It has left us with an enormous debt, an extravagant expenditure, an expensive tariff, with restricted markets, with trade diverted from its natural into less profitable channels.

Has not all this prophecy proved to be true? Have we not an enormous debt? Sir Leonard Tilley, twelve years ago, said that he could run the Dominion expenditure efficiently with $22,000,000, and yet the expenditure to-day is between $36,000,000 and $37,000,000; and in view of this fact, is not Mr. Blake's statement true, that we have an extravagant expenditure? Have we not an expensive tariff? Is not a tariff under which the Government places enormous duties on the necessaries of life an expensive one? Have we not diverted trade from its natural market on the other side of the line? Have we not diverted trade in barley, poultry, horses and eggs from its natural market in the United States to markets that are less lucrative to the people of Canada? We must admit such is the case under the present condition of affairs in Canada. Mr. Blake further said :

Worse far worse; it has left us with a lower standard of public virtue; it has left us with our hands tied, our future compromised.

Is not this the case? Is not the standard of political virtue lower than it was twelve years ago? Have not the Government tied our hands by the gerrymander and by the Franchise Act? They tied the hands of the Liberal party by the Gerrymander in 1882, with the result that the Tories were again returned to power. Notwithstanding the influence of the National Policy they were afraid to face the general elections of 1887, and they prepared themselves by passing the Franchise Act, which again tied the hands of the Liberal party, placing the power in the hands of their own friends to prepare the voters' lists and thus, in the language of Mr. Blake, our hands were tied. Were not our hands tied by the enormous amounts of money spent illegally throughout the country? The investigation held two years ago showed there was bribery and corruption in the departments of the Government. The charges made against the Postmaster-General proved that large sums of money were spent in order to carry the elections in the province of Quebec, and in this way our hands were tied, not only by the gerrymander of 1882, not only by the Franchise Act of 1885, but by the money spent in bribery for the purpose of carrying the Tory party once more into power. It may be said that my statements are not true. I can prove that my statements are true; that our hands were tied. In this House to-day the Liberal party of Ontario is only represented by 33 members, while the Conservatives are represented by 59 members. If our hands were not tied that could not be the case. The number of votes polled by the Conservative party in the general elections, corrected by the by-election returns, was 186,000; the number of votes polled by the Liberal party was 182,000, showing almost an equality between the Liberals and the Conservatives. Are we dealt with fairly as regards representation in this House? If our hands were not tied by the action of the Franchise Act and the Redistribution Act we would more evenly balance the conditions than we do under the present condition. For every 3,150 votes polled by the Conservatives a member was returned to Parliament by the party. For every 5,550 votes polled by the Liberals, only one member of parliament was returned to Parliament by their party. Does not this fact prove to a demonstration the inequality of the present system? On what condition and on what principle should we be required to poll 5,550 votes to secure a representative when the Tories secure a representative by polling 3,150 votes? It is truly, as Mr. Blake said, our hands are tied by the iniquitous legislation passed by the Conservative party, by which they have kept themselves in power—and the country knows it. In conclusion I have shown that the National Policy has not fostered or benefited the great agriculturists of Canada. I have shown that the National Policy has failed to develop the great mining resources of our country, although burdened with duty and bounty to accomplish that end, and it has been abundantly shown that, although the tariff gave great advantages to some manufacturers who obtained their raw material free, or nearly so, it burdened others with a high duty upon their raw material. It was proven, beyond a doubt, that it has not kept our people in the country, as it was promised to do, but that nearly a million disappeared somewhere. It is shown that the country is not as prosperous as it should be, and that the National Policy is unable to bring any relief, as it has failed to secure reciprocity with the United States, towards which it was said to move. It has also failed to give new markets for the products of our country, and failed to enlarge, to any considerable extent, the markets we possess. It has shown that it has burdened our people with heavy and unnecessary taxation, in the form of Customs profits on duties, and profits afforded manufacturers by reason of the duties. It has been shown that it unfairly discriminates against the poor man in placing a higher duty upon the class of goods consumed by him. It has been abundantly proven that it is largely responsible for the present unrest in the country, and the agitation for organic changes. It has been proven to be one, at least, of the causes of the depreciation of farm lands. It has been shown to be the parent of the monopolies which prey upon the material interests of the people. It has prevented the people of Canada from making the most of the product of their labour in buying and selling, and it is, therefore, a violation of the most sacred rights of the people.

After Recess.

Mr. McLENNAN. Mr. Speaker, I have to compliment the Minister of Finance upon the able and very satisfactory statement which he furnished to this House in his Budget speech, a statement which proves the prosperity and development of our country, and which shows as well his able management of the finances of Canada. We find from that statement that the average annual increase in our debt for the last four years has been only about $900,000, and when we take into consideration that the North Shore bonds were charged up to capital account, and also the fact that the discount on the loan floated in England should really not be a charge upon the financial transactions of last year, we see that the average increase of debt is really very much less than it would seem at first sight. Every one understands that if that loan was placed on the market at a higher rate of interest, it would not stand against the debt of the country to-day, and consequently it is but fair to take this into consideration in making an estimate of the financial condition of the country. If the debt were relieved of these charges, as it should in all fairness be, it would bring the average increase down to $377,000 a year. Now, when we also take into consideration the fact that the Government, by its policy, wiped off burdens of the people to the amount of five or six millions of dollars a year, we must admit that the Finance Minister was enabled to make a very favourable showing to the House. This present condition of our financial affairs, when compared with the financial showing of the Mackenzie Administration, between the years 1874 and 1879, is very satisfactory, and very creditable to the Finance Minister of to-day. During the last four years of the Liberal Government, it increased the debt of the country to the extent of between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000 a year, and if you add to that $4,500,000 received by them from the Fishery Award, it would make the increase of the debt under their administration, at between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000 a year. Taking all this into consideration, I think the statement of the Finance Minister was the most satisfactory that could possibly be placed before the House. Now, Sir, it will be necessary for me to deal with some of the arguments of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald). He is an old parliamentarian, a man who has been in this House for many years, and I was rather surprised that during his two hours' speech, he adduced arguments, some of which, at least, were most ridiculous. The hon. gentleman stated that the price of grain was higher during the administration of the Mackenzie Government than it is to-day. I admit that the price was higher then than it is now, but we must also remember that the price of grain was higher in Great Britain in those days than at present. Every one knows that the markets of Great Britain govern the markets of this country in prices. Now, I find that in 1873, just before hon. gentlemen opposite went into power, the price of wheat in England was $1.78 a bushel, whereas, when they went out of power, it was $1.33 a bushel, or 45 cents less than it was when they took charge of the affairs of this country. However, though I point out this fact, I admit that it is no argument at all against a Government, and it is not necessary for me to waste any time over it. The hon. gentleman says that the National Policy has taken away from the farmers their market. How can he seriously argue that? The Government of this country do not prevent the farmers from exporting their goods. Do not the United States Congress legislate in the interest of the people of the United States, and if they see fit to levy duties on articles going there from this country, is it reasonable to blame this Government or their policy for those duties? The hon. gentleman knows that the United States have extensive trade with other countries than Canada—that they are getting larger quantities of goods from other countries than from the Dominion of Canada; they are legislating in their own interest entirely, and we cannot possibly compel them to legislate merely to satisfy the people of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite waste hours in talking about the price of a dozen of eggs or a bushel of potatoes in the United States or Great Britain. I would like some of the hon. gentlemen who speak in this way to explain to us how they propose to remedy that condition of affairs. They have never undertaken to do so. If they have such a thing as a policy, they should place it definitely and distinctly before the country. They should inform the farmers and tax-payers of this country what they propose to do if they are successful in their aspirations. The hon. member for East Huron speaks of the protection on woollen goods and the protection on iron. Well, his own argument, and the argument of other hon. gentlemen opposite, is sufficient to answer fully what he advanced on those subjects. We know that these hon. gentlemen have advocated unrestricted reciprocity with the United States; and, were they to get it, they would certainly then have to accept the American tariff, under which they would be paying higher duties on both iron and woollen goods than they are paying to-day. That is, I think, a sufficient answer to his contention in that matter. He speaks of mortgages, but he cannot furnish any record of mortgages that will substantiate the statement he has made. These hon. gentlemen have, for years, been decrying this country. It looks, Sir, as though there were two parties in this House—one party upholding the country, and the other party defaming it. Nothing too bad can be said by the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House against Canada; and when they charged Canada with depression, they never ventured to make a comparison of the condition of this country with that of any other country. The hon. member for East Huron has also spoken about the exodus from this country to the United States. He called special attention to that subject, and asked that whoever should follow him should answer his question, where the Canadians who had left this country for the United States had gone? Well, since the hon. gentleman asked me especially to attend to this question, I am going to deal with it fully later on. The hon. gentleman argued, just as he and his friends have been doing for years, that the farmers were leaving Canada to better their condition—to secure the advantage of the magnificent market of 65,000,000 people in the United States. He says there is an unrest in the country, and that their hands are tied. Well, Sir, I am not surprised at his saying that there is an unrest. I have here a list of the elections that have taken place since the general election of 1891, and I am not surprised at these hon. gentlemen being rather uneasy at the situation of affairs in this country. The hon. member who has just been speaking attaches great importance to the remarks of a Tory paper published in the North-west. It is well that he can find a Tory paper now and then that shows a little sympathy for his party. No doubt the editor would like to increase the circulation of his paper among the hon. gentleman's Grit friends in that country, and it is natural that he should give them a little encouragement now and then. Now, to show you the cause of the unrest which disturbs the soul of the hon. gentleman, I will give you a list of the by-elections carried by the Conservative party, and if I were to give you the majorities, the statement would show still worse for the hon. gentlemen opposite. There is North Lanark, Glengarry, Laval, Halton, East Middlesex, South Victoria, Prince Edward, East Elgin, Quebec West, Two Mountains, Richmond, N.S., Montcalm, Brome, Lennox, East Bruce, North Victoria, Soulanges, Vaudreuil, South Perth, Montmorency, East Hastings, South Ontario, East Simcoe, West Huron, Monck, West Northumberland, Montreal Centre, Brockville, Selkirk, Frontenac, Terrebonne, West York, Sherbrooke, North Hastings, East York, West Assiniboia and Soulanges; and in many cases the Conservative candidate was elected by acclamation. No wonder that there is an unrest, and that their hands are tied. Now, why are their hands tied? Their hands were tied when they lost the assistance of Mr. Mercier, the toll collector, and their gang, in the province of Quebec. That was what caused the results in the by-elections.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes; it was not your policy.

Mr. McLENNAN. The hon. member for East Huron said that it took many thousands to elect a Reformer. Well, I admit it. But that is really the most ridiculous argument that has ever been advanced in this House. For instance, we carried the whole St. Lawrence district, westward; we carried twenty counties, and there is not one Reformer representing them. Add the population of these counties together, and see how many votes are required to elect a Reformer. The hon. gentleman has acknowledged that we reduced the tax on coal oil to a very great extent, and that it is selling now at several cents a gallon less than it was before. He also acknowledges that the price of binding twine has been considerably reduced. With regard to getting a treaty with the United States for our farm produce and everything else we have to export, our Government have done everything they could to obtain such a treaty of reciprocity, and there is no doubt that both they and the hon. gentlemen opposite as well, if in power, could get a treaty of reciprocity with the United States were they willing to give preferential treatment to American industries and discriminate on the same terms as the Americans against the whole world, and Great Britain in particular. Our neighbours want a uniform tariff—which must be the tariff of the United States—for both countries. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says he does not care how we get it so long as we can manage to deal with the United States on equal terms. Well, they insist on our excise duties being the same as theirs, and I do not see how any Canadian Government could accept reciprocity with them on that basis. I would ask the leader of the Opposition, to say yes or no, whether he would be willing to accept a treaty with the United States on the terms laid down by Mr. Blaine, namely: preferential treatment to American manufactures, discrimination against the world, particularly Great Britain, and a uniform tariff and excise. I do not think he will answer that question. I will await his answer. He makes no reply! If the Opposition would, had they the power, accept what they pretend to be seeking to get, they must admit that they are willing to accept a protective tariff which is twice as high as the one we have at present, and would be willing to sell their birth-right and their nationality for the sake of obtaining free access to this market of 60,000,000, about which they talk so much and which they say would bring so much prosperity to the farmers of Canada. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has told us that our people have left Canada because they have lost faith and hope in their country on account of our protective tariff, and because our country has sunk to a frightfully low condition: but it is rather strange to find that people would leave this country on account of our high tariff, and instead of going to England or some other country, where the tariffs are low, in fact, where there is next to no tariff, go to the United States which is protected to the extent of 60 to 65 per cent, while Canada is protected only to the extent of 30 per cent. It would seem that our people, according to this hon. gentleman, like protection so well that they are eager to go where they can get it in larger doses. With regard to the exodus, I wish to explain to this House the position, from a farming stand-point, of the farmers in the eastern, middle and western states, where hon. gentlemen opposite say our people seek refuge from the baneful effects of the policy of this Government. I want to place a fair statement before this House, that we may form some idea whether the contentions of these hon. gentlemen are well founded. I think, Sir, I shall be able to show conclusively that their statements are entirely unfounded. First of all, as this is a protective country and Great Britain is a free trade country, let me draw your attention to some extracts of evidence given before the Royal Commission on the depression of trade and industry in Great Britain, to show what the condition of that country really is. Looking into Mulhall's Dictionary of Statistics, I find that the value of land in the United Kingdom has decreased, from 1880 to 1887, to the extent of $1,036,690,000. I find that in Great Britain, according to this report, the annual decrease in value is $150,000,000, or $7 per acre per year. We can understand that land is much higher in Great Britain than it is in Canada or the United States, which will account for the large decrease per acre. There is also a decrease in grain produced from 1840 to 1889, of 88,000,000 bushels in that country. Now, I have a report here of the Royal Commission on the depression of trade and industry in the United Kingdom in 1886. Mr. G. Rea, who is a practical farmer and an authority on agricultural matters, before this commission on 11th March, 1886, said that he thought the depression was due in a great measure to the fall in prices and the great increase of expenses and taxation, and that a great many farms had been thrown up. He said:

I have not a doubt that there is not a farmer in the country who, taking his capital into account, is not 40 per cent poorer than he was twelve years ago. His capital is reduced 40 per cent in consequence of the reduction in the value of animals and stock in general.

He thinks that for the last few years every tenant has been losing a portion of his rental, that is, he has paid it out of capital, and, during the last year, he thinks that 15 to 20 per cent of the rent has been paid out of capital. Sir James Caird, who is an acknowledged authority on agricultural matters, was examined on the 4th March, 1886, and gave evidence as follows. He was asked:

Have you made any generalization of the results of this depression?

He answered:

Yes, I have. The present as compared with ten years ago would show on an average that the landlords have lost 30 per cent, the tenants 60 per cent, and the labourers 10 per cent. Forty per cent loss on farms, which are chiefly arable; secondly, upon farms which are half pasture and half arable, 30 per cent; on hill farms, where it is all moor or grass, 20 per cent. That is with regard to the landlords. With regard to the tenants, in first case chiefly arable farms, capital ordinarily lost, and no income as a matter of fact from the farm. On the first class, the chiefly arable farms, the tenant's loss is 40 per cent; second class, 25 per cent, and very little income, and on the third, 10 per cent, and very little income. Wages have fallen 15 per cent from what they were ten years ago.

Now, Sir, here are the records of that country, taken from the best authority that is to be found up to that time, an authority which nobody can dispute. There is so much said about protection and free trade, that it is necessary to make a comparison between the farming interests in that country and this. I will read you from a recent address of Lord Salisbury. This is what he says:

The mother country is suffering from a severe depression which affects all branches of production. The competition of America and Australia has told heavily upon agriculture, and her manufactures are confronted in every quarter with hostile tariffs. The consequence is stagnation in her productive activity, and suffering among the labouring and mechanical classes. This unhappy condition of affairs has led recently to a feeling in favour of imposing protective duties upon imports, resolutions in favour of that policy having been passed by the Conservatives and Constitutional Union and by a great agricultural convention within the past few months.

Lord Salisbury's position in England is well known, and he has a broad and comprehensive knowledge of the requirements of the people of that country. I have no doubt, therefore, that the next great issue in that country will be free trade or protection. Let me draw your attention to a statement made by the Right Hon. Mr. Chaplin, M.P., formerly Minister of Agriculture in Lord Salisbury's Ministry and agricultural leader of the Conservative party in England. Addressing 3,000 agriculturists a few days ago, he said :

With regard to foreign competition the remedy which he knew perfectly well would find favour in their eyes before all others, was protection. On that point he could add nothing to what he said in London, but they must not suppose for a moment he was in any degree hostile to protection. On the contrary, all his sympathies were very much with them, and very much in that direction. He never had much sympathy with the doctrines of the extreme free trader, and he had less than ever now, as he saw before him the results which, day by day, they had produced.

Now, Sir, this is the condition of affairs in Great Britain, and it is rather peculiar that, while the friends of the farmer in that country are advocating protection, the people who claim to be the friends of the farmers in this country, are advocating a policy which has brought the British farmer to the very verge of ruin. My hon. friend from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) called my attention especially to the fact, as he holds it to be, that the farmers and the people generally of this country are going to the United States. I will now make a comparison, based upon the best authority that can be found as to the prosperity which those who go to the United States find there. I base my figures on the census bulletins of that country, which have cost the people of the United States many millions of dollars to furnish, and I think this House will agree that this is the best authority that can be got in that country. I was anxious to make a fair comparison between this country and the United States with regard to population, position and condition generally. First, I found that in the United States census they had taken separately cities and towns as low as 1,000 population, while in Canada they have only taken those separately as low as towns and villages of 1,500 population. I went to Mr. Johnson, the statistician, and asked him if I could in any way get the population of the small towns between 1,000 and 1,500 inhabitants, so that I might be in a position to make a fair comparison between these countries. He endeavoured to get them for me and did get Quebec and Ontario, but said that in the lower provinces he could not give them, as they were not kept separate from other municipalities. So I have Ontario and Quebec, and I am going into this matter fully, as I desire to explain the case to the people of this country, whom the gentlemen opposite have been trying to influence to leave this country to take advantage of this "sixty million" market. The population of Canada, as we all know, is 4,832,679. Ontario's population is 2,114-

321. Of these, there are in towns and villages of over 1,000 inhabitants, 634,053; the country population, outside of towns and cities, is 1,449,668, or 68.57 per cent of all the people outside of towns and villages of over 1,000 inhabitants. In Quebec the population is 1,488,535; in towns and villages over one thousand, 449,801; country population outside these towns and villages, 1,038,724, or 68.79 per cent. Take Ontario and Quebec together, and you find that the population outside of towns and cities of 1,000 and over is 69.18 per cent. Turn now to the United States. We find that New York has a population of 5,997,853. Of these, there are in cities and towns of over 1,000, 4,125,782; country population outside of these towns and cities, 1,872,071, or 31 per cent, as against 69.18 per cent in Ontario and Quebec. This should be almost enough of itself to convince the people of this country that the farmers of Canada are not leaving this country to take up their abode in the United States. Now, Sir, there has been a great deal said about the New England states. The hon. gentleman who asked me to pay so much attention to this matter mentioned, I think, nearly all the states within the New England group. The population of Vermont is 332,422, according to the census of the United States. In towns and cities of over 1,000 inhabitants there are 251,079; country population outside of these towns and villages, 81,343, or 24.1 per cent, as against 69.18 per cent in Ontario and Quebec. In Maine we find a population of 661,086; in towns and cities over 1,000, 507,103, or 23 per cent, as against 69 per cent in Ontario and Quebec. In New Hampshire the population is 376,530; in towns and cities over 1,000, 300,803; country population outside of these cities and towns, 75,723, or 20 per cent. Connecticut's population, according to the census, is 746,258; in towns and cities over 1,000, 682,416; country population outside these towns and cities, 63,842, or less than 9 per cent. Now we come to Massachusetts. This is the state which the hon. member for South Oxford has been comparing with Canada, of course, showing how its population is increasing. We are all fully aware that this state is a strong manufacturing state. We find there is a total population of 2,238,943; in towns and cities of over 1,000, there are 2,176,938, and a country population of only 62,005, or less than three per cent outside of the towns and cities, as against 69 per cent in Ontario and Quebec. Now, I think it will be admitted by every member from the Maritime provinces that more people emigrate from those provinces to the state of Massachusetts than to any other state of the Union. Why do they go? I will undertake to show you later. Now, I will take the state of Rhode Island, a manufacturing state, where a great many of our people go. The total population is 345,506, in towns and cities, 342,122, leaving a country population of only

3,384, or less than 1 per cent, as against the 69 per cent of a rural population in Canada. The total population of New England is 4,700,745, or nearly the same population as all Canada; and outside of towns and cities containing over 1,000 population, there are only 440,280. You may say that there are small villages in the United States, and there are small villages in Canada under 1,000, and so I make the comparison between towns and villages containing over a thousand in both countries. It will be clear that our people do not go to the United States in order to better their condition as farmers. The whole country population of New England is only 9.36 per cent as against 69 per cent in Ontario and Quebec. Now, let me make a comparison with the Maritime provinces, of which so much has been said. I have taken the towns and villages containing between 1,000 and 1,500 population in Ontario and Quebec, which make about 2 per cent of the total population, and I have applied this on the same basis to the Maritime provinces. In those provinces I find a total population of 880,737; in cities and towns of over 1,500, there are 169,514; and in towns and villages of over 1,000 and under 1,500, at the same percentage as in Ontario and Quebec, there are 17,600. This would leave a population of 693,623, or 79 per cent outside of towns and cities, as against 9 per cent in the New England states. Now, this is 253,000, or over 57 per cent in the rural sections of the Maritime provinces, more than the whole of the New England states. There are 1,900,000, or 226 per cent more in the rural sections of Ontario, than in the whole of the New England states, though the population of the New England states is about equal to that of Canada; and there are 598,000, or 136 per cent more in the country sections in the province of Quebec, than there is in the New England states. Now, the land acreage under crop in Massachusetts and Rhode Island is not as much as the average county in the province of Ontario, and the municipal and state debt of New York and the New England states is $347,593,000, or $110,000,000 more than the whole debt of Canada. The interest on this debt will have to be collected and paid by direct taxation on the people. To give an idea of taxation in the state of New York, I will give some figures from the Toronto "Globe," and I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will not dispute that authority. According to a statement I saw in that paper some time ago, there is in the state of New York a direct municipal tax and a state tax—on 200 acres, $132; on 150 acres, $125; on 90 acres, $60. In the city of New York over $33,000,000 are collected every year, which last year was over $22 per head of the whole population, or $12,000,000 more than the whole Customs tax of Canada. If you take into consideration the fact that the floating population cannot be reached by direct taxation, and if you charge this up to each individual who pays taxes, I have no doubt it would reach to $50 or $60 per head of the taxable population of that city. It would be well for the farmers of our country to take into consideration this comparison of taxation between the two countries, and to ask themselves whether they would like to have such a taxation levied upon them in Canada. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said as reported in "Hansard," on page 338 of the year 1892:

I believe that it is to-day calculated by American statisticians that there are more New Brunswickers and Nova Scotians, between the ages I have mentioned, 20 and 40, to be found in Massachusetts and sister New England states, than remain in the provinces which the hon. gentlemen and their colleagues represent.

Now, I find that in these provinces there is a population of 880,737. In the whole of the New England states there are only 440,280 in the rural sections, or less than one-half of the total population in the Maritime provinces. Now, these people from the Maritime provinces have gone to the New England states to seek employment in the industries of that country. I think that the leader of the Opposition was down in Boston some time ago, where he addressed his fellow-countrymen. It was asked: What are these emigrants from the province of Quebec doing in New England states? Certainly they cannot be on farms. There are only 440,000 that we can find there, so they must be engaged in manufacturing industries. They are engaged in manufactures fostered and encouraged by the American people, and it must strike any hon. gentleman in this House very forcibly that the more manufacturing industries we have in the country the more people we can employ and keep within our own borders. Now, Sir, I have no doubt that the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite have done more to drive our Canadians out of the country than any other cause. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not only driven people out of this country, but they have prevented other people from coming here. So favourably have they spoken of the United States, and especially of certain sections of that country, that the portraits of hon. gentlemen opposite have appeared as frontispieces of pamphlets circulated among immigrants who come here, to prejudice them against this Dominion. Hon. gentlemen opposite speak so strongly in favour of the interests of the United States and especially of Kansas and certain states, that our people were induced and encouraged to go across the line, but they learned by sad experience that that country is not what it is recommended to be by these hon. gentlemen. When a man is entrusted with the representation of a constituency in this House, when a gentleman has occupied the position of Minister of Finance and has received a title from Her Majesty, and making statements of the character made by the hon. gentleman and his friends, for many years past, I say it is cruel on the part of any Canadian with a heart within him, and entertaining any true Canadian feeling, to make statements that place our country at a disadvantage with every other country in the world. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk loudly of the depression in Canada, but they do not present facts to maintain their allegations. Hon. gentlemen opposite are always declaring that Providence did not favour them when in power. They earnestly desire that Providence should be in their favour on the eve of an election, and they would be glad to see depression existing at such a time; but they have not found depression to prevail since the hon. gentlemen who now conduct the public affairs have been in office, and in fact they have carried on public affairs to the satisfaction of our people, as expressed so often in thunder tones at the polls. Many statements have been made respecting mortgages, and I desire to draw the attention of the House to the position of the United States respecting mortgages. I base my calculations upon the American census, which cost some millions of dollars to prepare. The mortgage debt on 1st January, 1890, in Alabama was $39,027,000, or $26 per head; in Iowa, $119,034,000, or $104 per head; in Illinois, $384,299,000, or $100 per head. It will be remembered that Iowa and Illinois are situated in the very heart of the United States, and are considered to include the best farming sections in the country. Kansas, that country whose immigration circulars contain portraits of some hon. gentlemen opposite, has a debt of $235,485,000, or $170 per head, or $850 for every family of five, or a mortgage against every 4.77 of the whole population of the state. When I speak of a mortgage of $850 against any family, I do not mean against each family mortgaged, but against every family in the state. Those five states had, on 1st January, 1890, real estate mortgages amounting to $906,669,000, or an average of $83.80 per head, subject to an interest charge for one year of $67,505,000. I have not time to go over the statistics of each state separately, but I will read to the House a statement covering the whole United States, prepared by Mr. Porter, the census commissioner. He says in Extra Census Bulletin No. 3:

A small army of 2,500 special agents and clerks has been employed to make an abstract of every mortgage placed on record in every county in the United States, and that the agents of the Census office have as a matter of fact overhauled the records in every state and territory. They have travelled on horseback and on foot through the most sparsely settled districts of our vast domain in search of mortgages and have done their work so industriously and so thoroughly that we have now on file in Washington as a result of their labour, the abstracts of about 9,000,000 mortgages.

There are about 12,000,000 families in the United States. Comment is unnecessary. The census commissioner says there are 9,000,000 mortgages. These facts will bear out the statement I venture to make, that that country is not so prosperous as it is represented to our people. There appears to be one mortgage for every seven of the people over the whole of the United States; there are no two families, on an average, who are not mortgaged; yet these are the people who have the advantage of the 65,000,000 market. I have stated the facts, and if any hon. member wishes to dispute them, I can furnish him with the census records. I will now deal with some of the best agricultural counties in the United States, so that people in our own counties may make a comparison. In Cass county, Iowa, the debt is $2,584,099. There is 95½ per cent on acres and 4 per cent on lots. The debt per head is $137. When I mention acres it means farms, and lots means towns and villages, so that you will see that the large percentage is on farms. There is one mortgage to every seven people. Of the assessed number of acres 67½ per cent are mortgaged. In Delaware county, Iowa, which is represented as being one of the most prosperous counties in the state, the population is 17,349, a decrease of 601 in ten years. The total debt is $1,636,109; 90 per cent of the total is on acres and 10 per cent on lots. There is one mortgage to eleven of population, and a debt of $94 per head. Johnson county, Iowa, has a debt of $1,769,666, of which over 87 per cent is on acres. The debt is $77 per head. I will now read the report from the census bulletin in the United States of one of the best counties in the state of Illinois:

Bureau County (Illinois) is a standard agricultural county of the better sort, organized in the year 1837, containing 35,041 inhabitants, and 547,429 taxed acres. It is about 100 miles south-west of Chicago, and is traversed by two trunk railroads and their branches. The present owners and occupants of the soil are largely the descendants in the first or second degree of the pioneers who settled the county and prospered from the first fruits of the land and the opportunities offered by the development of trade and transportation.

When this county was selected for special investigation it was represented to the Census office that its people, during the past decade, had been suffering from continued business depression, that while crops and live stock were flourishing, it cost more to raise them than they were worth in the market; that land values had consequently declined, that the farmers had become poorer, indebtedness had increased, and that many farms had been mortgaged for money to defray the living expenses of their owners or had been sold at a sacrifice in order that the owners might remove to newer states.

This county has an existing debt of $4,766,139, of which $4,396,763, or 92.25 per cent of the total, is on acres and $369,377, or 7.75 per cent of the total, is on lots. The population being 35,014, the per capita indebtedness is $136 and the per family indebtedness $656, and there are 12.31 persons or 2.56 families on the average to each mortgage in force.

Now, Sir, as they very often speak of chattel mortgages, I will deal with them. The only official record that I can find in Canada is in the province of Ontario, and the only official record that I have in the United States is in the state of Nebraska. Two years ago the Legislature of Nebraska passed a law requiring the registrar of deeds in each county to keep a tabulated record of the mortgages filed and released, both real estate and chattel. The law took effect in 1891. For the year ending 31st May, 1892, the chattel mortgages filed amounted to $25,138,216, or $23.74 per head of the population of the state. In Ontario, on 31st December, 1891, the chattel mortgages amounted to $8,595,417, or $4.01 per head. You will therefore see that the chattel mortgages in Ontario, Canada, amount to $4.01 per head, as against $23.74 in the United States. The chattel mortgages against farmers in Ontario were reduced, in 1891, by $125,696. The percentage of farmers in Ontario is 68.57 per cent and the proportion of the total chattel mortgages against them is 34.61 per cent. This shows that, although they form more than two-thirds of the population, there is only one-third of the total chattel mortgages against them. Let me quote from the letter of General Weaver, one of the presidential candidates in the November election. In that letter General Weaver thus describes the western farmer :

The people are in poverty ; their substance is being devoured by heartless monopolists, trusts and money sharks ; labour is largely unemployed, and where work is obtained, the wages are for the most part unremunerative, and the products of labour not paying the cost of production. This is a matter of serious concern to the whole people.

Further than that, Sir, the "American Farmer," a leading agricultural journal, says, in its last issue :

The farmers are fast being reduced to the condition of serfs and the American workingman is becoming the American slave. Such is the position of the American farmer in the highly favoured and advantageously situated western states.

As a contrast to this, let me give you the figures as to the condition of Ontario, a province which hon. gentlemen opposite often refer to as being on the verge of ruin. I have taken my information from the Report of the Bureau of Industries, the most reliable record that can be obtained, and which is published by Sir Oliver Mowat's Government. Sir Oliver Mowat may have faults, politically, but he is loyal to the interests of Canada, and he is willing to extend to this country that fair-play and justice that is due to it. He has the means at his command of getting a true record of the condition of Ontario ; he has an army of officials throughout the province ; he has the municipal machinery of the country which he can take advantage of ; so that he has opportunity for obtaining an accurate record that hon. gentlemen opposite do not possess, although they profess to know a great deal about the province. Now, in thirteen of the staple crops in Ontario I find the average under crop from 1882 to 1891, inclusive, ten years, was 7,517,606 acres. The average for the last six years is 7,814,893. In 1891 they had increased to 7,834,213. This is 316,607 acres above the average for the last ten years, and 219,320 acres above the average for the last six years. The value of these crops in 1891 was $8,677,906 over the average for ten years. There is a very small falling off in the value of farm lands in Ontario. This is more than made up by the increase in the value of stock and implements. There is a total increase of $959,033 in farm stock and implements in 1891 over 1890. Now, here is a statement from the report of the Ontario Bureau of Statistics for 1890 :

The value of the farm land of the province of Ontario is about 2 per cent below the average derived for the nine years, but owing to additions in the values of buildings, implements and live stock, the total farm property is about 1 per cent higher than the average annual value.

This shows that our country is not in the deplorable condition that hon. gentlemen opposite represent. When they wish to make any comparisons they ought to furnish some record that is reliable to back their statements up. Now, we find that in the United States the farm population has very largely decreased, yet farm stocks have very largely increased there as well as in Canada. Horses have increased on the farm by 4,500,000 ; mules by 600,000, and milch cows by 4,389,000 ; and other cattle 16,500,000. The price of horses in the United States, the average for the whole country, is put down at $65.01, which is not any more than the average price of horses in this country. The average price of milch cows in the United States is $21, which is less than the average price in this country. Now, Sir, the point which I wish to make is this, that even if the market of the United States should be opened to us, the farmers there are overstocked with horses, owing to the general adoption of electricity in the cities and towns, reducing the demand for horses, and lowering the price ; so that the market of the United States in that particular branch would not be as valuable to Canada to-day as it was some years ago. Now, Sir, we hear men speak of free trade as if it meant nothing more than free trade ; but the question has often been asked from this side of the House, how they were going to raise the necessary revenue, and the same question has been asked throughout the country. But they refuse to tell ; they never have told. We must have a revenue ; we cannot get along without it. Now, if these hon. gentlemen are going to place any policy before the people of this country, they should do as Sir John A. Macdonald did in 1878 : they should tell the people clearly and distinctly what they propose to do for them, so that the electors will be in a position to record their votes intelligently, knowing what they are voting on. We know why the hon. gentlemen have not revealed the great secret to the people of the country. We know that it is because their policy would mean direct taxation upon the farmers and property owners of this country. We know that they tried to steal a march on the people and obtain their confidence without telling them what they were going to do. The adoption of direct taxation would be a serious step for the farmers and tax-payers of this country to take. The rich man can invest his money in many ways, not only in this country, but in other countries, and in that way escape taxation. The floating population cannot be reached by direct taxation. We know that you cannot reach the total population by a direct tax, but you can reach the farmer. The farm and chattels are there. The tax collector, the bailiff and the sheriff will take charge of them if payments are not made promptly. Hon. gentlemen opposite speak of tariff reform, as if they could wipe off so much of the burdens of the country and that nothing more would be done, but let the people go scot free, without their having to pay anything. They speak of tariff reform in the United States, but before we can make a comparison between the United States and Canada, we must compare the administration and position of both countries. Let us suppose, for a moment, that Ontario is one of the states of the Union. What would be the first burden levied upon her? Instead of having to pay an indirect tax of 30 per cent, she would have to pay an indirect tax of from 60 to 65 per cent. She would then have to support herself, because she would get nothing from the central Government. She would have to build her own public works, her own canals, bonus her own railways, bear the expense of her own administration of justice, support her own militia, and she would have to do all that by direct taxation, as have other states of the Union. But what is her position to-day? The Dominion Government are only taxing the people 30 per cent upon Customs imports, and the greater portion by far of that is borne by the wealthier classes of the population. We have assumed the debts of the provinces. We are collecting the revenue and paying out in cash every year to the provinces at 4 per cent, on the responsibility we have undertaken, $4,360,000. We are paying also to the provinces in subsidies over $4,000,000 a year, so that we have to collect money to meet the liabilities of the provinces to the extent of over $8,000,000 a year. That is the amount our Government is raising and paying in cash, out of the revenue they collect, to the provinces for interest on the debts of the provinces, which they have assumed, and on the provincial subsidies, amounting to about $40,000 for each average-sized county. All this we are paying out of our 30 per cent tariff. In order to make a fair comparison between the United States and Canada, the United States would first have to reduce their tariff from 65 to 30 per cent and assume the debts of the State Governments, and give the State Governments a subsidy of about $60,000,000 a year, which would be in the same proportion as Canada is giving her provinces, and besides this amount relieve them of the responsibility of building their railways, canals and tunnels, maintaining their militia and administration of justice, and a thousand other things too numerous to mention. When they do for their State Governments what we do for the provinces in Canada, and when they have reduced their duty to 30 per cent, then you can commence to make a comparison between the United States and Canada, and not till then. I have made a comparison between Canada and Great Britain and the United States, based upon the best authority, authority which no man in this House can dispute. I have given facts which cannot be denied, and my object in doing this was to place the different conditions of the different countries mentioned fairly before the House and the people of the country generally; and as there is so much said by hon. gentlemen opposite about the inducements held out to our people to go to the other side, that it was but right the people should know what they have fairly to expect, if they yield to the inducements held out by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have shown the depression in Great Britain, a depression amounting to $7 per acre every year in the value of land, 30 to 40 per cent every year in the income of the owners, 30 to 40 per cent in the income of the tenants, and 15 per cent in the wages of agricultural labourers. I have also read a report of the mortgages as given by the United States commissioners, which shows that there are 9,000,000 of mortgages in the United States to about 12,000,000 families. I have shown you that the east, middle and western States are in a condition of depression unknown in this country. It is not many months ago since the people of Dakota, that land to which our people were recommended to go by hon. gentlemen opposite, were appealing to Washington and elsewhere, even Toronto and other parts of Canada, for assistance to keep them from starving and to enable them to buy seed grain for the coming spring. Such a condition of things never existed in this country, the nearest approach to it being during the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, when our cities and municipalities had to furnish the people with soup kitchens to keep them from starving. In conclusion, let me say that I believe Canada to-day is the most prosperous country in the world. There may be many more millions in Great Britain and the United States; but our wealth is better distributed, and there is no man in this country to-day, willing and able to work, who cannot secure work and make a respectable living. I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will cast out the policies they have submitted to this House, and will adopt one which will be a Canadian policy, for the general benefit of the country, and that every man in Canada will feel that he is a Canadian and a British subject, and will proudly hold up his hand and say of Canada: "This is my own my native land."

Mr. DEVLIN. If I cannot agree with all that has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, I must pay him the compliment of having treated the House to a speech, in which he quoted figures at great length, and in which good nature, in so far as his own country is concerned, abounded. But I cannot say he was even just in dealing with the United States. He said that we must admit that the markets of Great Britain govern the world, and, furthermore, that we cannot possibly compel the United States to legislate for our benefit. We never pretended that we could compel them to do so. The hon. gentleman added, we have not undertaken to give a remedy. A remedy for what? He admits by this that evils exist since a remedy is required. He says we are running Canada down and that there is nothing too bad which we will not say of it. I thought that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) in his excellent speech had disposed of that argument. Further on he complains of unrest, or rather contends that we complain that this feeling of unrest exists. If the hon. gentleman will carefully read the speech delivered in this House on Tuesday last by the hon. Finance Minister, he will find that the Finance Minister himself complains of the unrest that exists in this country. And this unrest is not in the ranks of the Liberal party, but in the ranks of the Conservative party. The unrest is to be found in the mind and heart of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and others. The hon. gentleman did not forget to pay his compliment to the Hon. Mr. Mercier, attributing to that gentleman evils that we are now beginning to hear repeated very frequently. I shall not deal with these to-night, as I think hon. gentlemen representing the province of Quebec disposed of them very effectively less than ten days ago. The hon. gentleman said in regard to the treaty of reciprocity that the party to which he belonged had done the best they could. Mighty little! What have they done? They have taken a couple or three trips to Washington. They have returned as they went, empty-handed. That is all they have done. The hon. gentleman spoke furthermore, and at great length, on the exodus. I shall refer to that part of his speech later on. He says that our people do not go to the United States to better their condition. What do they go for, for fun? He says that if we were to abandon our manufacturers it would be a bad thing for Canada. I agree with him. He finally complained that the speeches delivered on this side had driven the people out of the country. It is not very good evidence of the force of the attractions provided by the Government of the day to say that a speech or two can overcome the effect of all the alleged good acts of the Administration which the hon. gentleman supports. He finally spoke of depression and of Providence, put in a word of abuse against the United States, and said that any man in this country who wants work can get it. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to tell him, there are men here to-day, there are men here every day, trying to get work and who cannot get it, and it would surprise me very much to know that the hon. gentleman has not seen them, that he does not receive a card or perhaps three or four or five cards every day from supporters of his, or admirers of his in the city who are anxious to get work, whether in the buildings or elsewhere. The hon. gentleman also spoke some words of strong praise of the speech delivered by the hon. Finance Minister, and with that portion of the hon. gentleman's address I cannot possibly agree. Certainly, since the first day of Confederation there have been many remarkable Budget speeches made in this House. It is no exaggeration to say that not one of them was ever awaited in this House and this country with more feverish suspense and manifest anxiety than the one delivered on Tuesday last. I think, further, it is no exaggeration to say that no former Budget speech created so much and such well founded disappointment. What were the expectations of the country, and how were they treated? It is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, to refer to the historic promise, and especially to the historic expression conveying that promise, made by the Prime Minister when speaking in the great city of Toronto a few months ago, to the effect that the mouldering branches of the existing policy would disappear. The policy has been announced, and yet, if we except a couple of chips taken off, the branches remain. It was expected, indeed, that such a change in this policy would be made that when it would be announced in the House it would be one which would be almost a total stranger. The position reminds one very much of the famous answer given at a coroner's inquest; one of the witnesses had been warned to be very careful as to statements he made. The question was asked of him: "Do you know this man here who was found dead on the track? Is he a total stranger?" and witness replied: "No, Sir; he lost a leg entirely: he is only a partial stranger." But Mr. Speaker, we cannot even say that much of this policy; it has not lost a branch in its entirety. The fact is that when the Prime Minister went out into the country and came in contact with the people, when he felt the pulse of the people, he perceived that what we on this side have been asserting all along was correct, namely, that there were mouldering branches forming part of this policy, and he immediately promised remedial legislation. Now, no doubt when he returned to Ottawa some colleagues of his thought differently upon the subject, and though there is no official record of what took place at the meeting called to discuss the subject, we have every reason to believe they found it a terrible task. It has been brought out in debate in this House, and it has been brought out in the speech delivered at Stayner by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that the late Prime Minister is not the creator of the National Policy; that it owes its existence, not to the late Sir John Macdonald, but that the gentlemen who inspired the inception of this policy were the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and if all that has been said is true, they were largely indebted in their advocacy of this cause and in the formation of the policy to Messrs. Goldwin Smith and Farrer. It was pretty hard indeed to expect from such a combination a healthy product. We are charged with treason for saying this much, as these gentlemen are now, that they have had their eyes open and see daylight as it is, and have declared that this policy is causing sad havoc in more than one section of the country, and that it should, if not in whole, at least in great part, be done away with. We have heard the speech delivered in this House a few days ago by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and in that speech he complains bitterly of the effects of certain portions of the National Policy. But he went still further than that in an article appearing in his paper:

What the manufacturer desires is something wholly different from what the protectionist statesman desires. The latter desires to foster home industries; the former desire—McKinleyism—a rampart under cover of which they may prey on the community. According to Edmund About, members of the Greek Government at Athens, in his time, were in league with the banditti. There is no or little moral difference between such a league and the over-protection of manufacturers whereby the farmers are heavily salted; but there is this great practical difference, that Hadgi Stavros and his robbers made comparatively few victims and their victims were the rich and idle; but two or three combines like those of the binder twine, the coal oil, and the implement men, levy ransom scientifically, by contract and legal process, on the whole farming community. Like the Irish landlord prior to Gladstone's agrarian legislation, they take the blood and sweat of the agriculturist and live in splendour and become princes in the land.

Sir, I do not think that a Liberal ever used language as strong as that which I have just quoted and which I have not the slightest doubt, was written by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). Then, again, I could refer to the speeches delivered by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien); we could recall the utterances of the President of the Young Conservative Association, of Toronto; we could likewise recall what was telegraphed down to this city the other day concerning the Young Conservatives of Winnipeg; and we could lay particular emphasis upon the statement made only a few moments ago by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), a statement which was made before him by the Minister of Finance, that unrest prevailed in this country. Why, Sir, this is the first session we have been told that unrest and uneasiness prevailed in this country. Up to this time their common song was that blessed peace prevailed in every part of the country; and now they come and tell us that unrest is in their ranks—at all events, we know that it is. When the National Policy was again placed on the table of the Ministers for inspection, I have not the slightest doubt they found there was not a branch of it but was mouldering, not a feature connected with it but was distorted and disfigured, not an element in its composition but was putrid. The soul of the thing was bad, the body worse, and the limbs tottering. Yet these gentlemen come and ask us to pay tribute to this their idol. When motion after motion was made in this House attacking this policy, what was the answer of the Prime Minister? Wait, said he, till to-morrow; wait till you have heard my own Finance Minister. At least, if he did not use those exact words, we could infer them from his significant glance. Wait till you have heard this Finance Minister who will now appear in all his strength, who has had his last moment of weakness. Wait till he performs this great financial feat which will astonish the House and the country even more than his previous efforts astonished the powerful organizations with which he had long been connected. Sir, we have heard the Finance Minister; we have heard him struggling to describe what he considered to be the great difficulty of the question. He has, as usual, abused the Liberal party, but that will not satisfy the country. He has not cut off the branches that we were promised would be cut off. Sir, he has stabbed in vital parts, not the National Policy, but the very best interests of this country. Now he tells us that he cannot make these alterations which were promised until he has the aid of the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue, who are to accompany him on a pilgrimage throughout the country. These three gentlemen will travel through the country, no doubt, under the guidance of the Minister of Trade, to find out—what? To find out what we know already; to find out evils which have been pointed out in this House over and over again, and which exist. Has the evidence not been already sufficient? Let me take an instance. He wants to find out, no doubt, how the cotton tax has affected this country. It was pointed out by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) the other day how the people of Canada are suffering under the imposition of this tax. Will he be able to tell the House on his return that this tax, in a particular manner, has benefited Canada at large? Will he be able to tell us that there is no such a thing as a cotton combine? That this tax imposed, not for revenue purposes, but for the purpose of protection, has indeed given birth to a great many cotton factories throughout the land? No, Sir. After he has returned from his pilgrimage he will come and tell us that the result of this tax is that a huge cotton combine has been formed in the country, which is fleecing the taxpayers and which is putting millions of dollars into the pockets of a few at the expense of the many. That is the result of the Conservative policy. We know, Mr. Speaker, what has been done in regard to the sugar tax, which, it is claimed, has been remitted. The Finance Minister tells us to-day, in a boastful spirit, that he has remitted millions of dollars to the people, and literature is circulated in every part of the country calculated to induce the people to believe that millions of dollars are being handed right back to them to be put into their pockets. Why, Sir, when he stands up here and makes this boast he forgets that he is doing what the Liberal party in this House and in the country have been demanding for years, that is, to take the sugar tax off. He has simply stolen a branch from the great tree of the Liberal party, and he has put it in his hat and feels proud over it. Why, he need not go out into the country to find that the tax on binder twine is bearing heavily upon the community. The Conservative Association with which, I believe, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is connected, has told him so; the farmers from every part of the country have invited him to take that off; and so, Sir, with all these taxes which have been levied during many years for the benefit of the few. If he were to travel from one end of the country to the other; if he were to inspect every factory and every house in the community, he will never be able to establish, in the matter of cotton, in the matter of sugar, binder twine, and coal oil, that the taxes imposed upon them have been beneficial to the country. I propose quoting further remarks made by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) in regard to the tax on agricultural implements. I think if that hon. gentleman is sincere in his advocacy of tariff reform, if he is sincere in his desire to obtain those benefits which we have been advocating, and the removal of the heavy taxes which exist in those branches he has mentioned, the best thing he can do is to support the amendment before the House, which demands tariff reform, pure and simple. He quotes a farmer as saying:

That hundred thousand dollars recently donated by Monopolist Massey to an educational institution, was really given, not by Mr. Massey, but by the farmers of the North-west.

Sir, in regard to this gentleman, who, no doubt, is the most heavily protected manufacturer in Canada, by this tax on agricultural implements, it has been well pointed out that he is able to compete in Australia with English, American and German manufacturers, and there to sell at prices as low as they do, and even at prices lower than they are being sold at in Canada to-day. All these taxes have been imposed, so we are told, for the purpose of encouraging manufacturers, and they must be continued. The House and the country know well that the Minister of Finance can offer no other excuse than this: that he is afraid to discharge the duty required of him by the circumstances of trade in this country, and by the conditions of the country; that he is afraid to estrange a few political followers, and, perhaps, to estrange in the country a few political supporters. A few weeks ago we heard in this House the eloquent periods of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), when he recalled certain pages of history. He spoke of the courage manifested by the Athenians, if I mistake not. He did well to recall these grand lessons which are to be found in history. He could have gone further, and quoted the courage of the Carthagenians and the Romans. Sir, when Carthage was in danger, when the resources of that great city had been exhausted, the sons of Carthage went out generously to defend the city; and it is even said that the very maids of Carthage surrendered their gold and their jewels for their country's sake. There were patriots in those days, and no combinesters. Sir, when the Roman was called by duty from his business in the city, or from the Roman fields, he cheerfully responded to the call. But it must not be forgotten that there were patriots in those days, and they did not live in a "red parlour," nor did they take their orders from a "red parlour." Our Tory Catilina is at the very gates of our country. He has taken possession of its seven hills and valleys, he has fastened his fangs in the very heart of the country, he has forged shackles, and the slavery which he has enacted by statute is simply appalling. All this is done for the sake of special interests. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), I think, the other day said this policy is a good one. While an hon. member on this side of the House was speaking, that hon. gentleman declared that the policy was a good one and worthy of the support of the people. I am afraid the hon. gentleman has a poor memory. Only four or five years ago the farmers of his county returned him by a majority of nearly 500, but when they found out the true intent of the National Policy, they returned him by five or six votes. A little more of such support and he will have to seek pastures new and fresh fields.

Mr. SPROULE. That was not due to the National Policy, but to the Jesuit question.

Mr. DEVLIN. If the hon. gentleman wants to know what the farmers think of his policy, I ask him to consider the resolution moved in Kingston on 20th January, which demands that in view of the depressed condition of Canadian agriculture—I am not stating this, but the farmers are stating this—and of the important bearing which this industry has on the prosperity of this country, in the opinion of this convention, a reorganization of the fiscal policy of the Dominion, with a view to lighten the burdens on the farmers and promote freer trade relations with Great Britain and foreign countries, and open larger and better market for agricultural products, would be in the best interests of the farming community. I also call the attention of the hon. gentleman to resolutions in favour of tariff reform adopted by the Farmers' Institute when it was closing its proceedings on 9th February, in Toronto. The hon. gentleman who preceded me, spoke at great length of the exodus which exists. That subject has perhaps been more discussed by hon. gentlemen opposite than by hon. members on this side of the House, for they are well aware that they must defend it in some way or other. The Minister of Interior himself spoke on the same subject, and he referred to the fact that he himself—and I congratulate and admire him for it—thought enough of his country to go into a far province, there to build up his own fortune. He did well to do so, and he has certainly built up a fine fortune. He declared that he was proud of the province from which he came and I repeat that I admire him for it. There are many others who are equally anxious to remain in their own province and in their own country, but they are unable to do so. Is this because the sky of the foreign country is dearer to them than their own Canadian sky? Is it because they see there those who are more dear to them than those who, during previous years in their own country, tenderly cared for them and looked after them? No, they would much prefer remaining in the old home, the dear home of early days. They favour more the Canadian sky than the foreign sky, but they go to a foreign country to improve their fortune and to seek that success which they fail to secure at home. The Minister of the Interior, in endeavouring to answer hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, denied that there are, at the present time, in the United States over 1,000,000 Canadians. Did the hon. gentleman deny that in the United States there are a great many Canadians? Not at all. The Minister of Railways and Canals, during this debate, stated that the number was not so large as was represented. I think the hon. member's statement was satisfactorily answered by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald). The Minister's statement was that there were 490,000 Canadians in the United States in 1870, and 973,000 in 1890; and he asked where was the one and a half million of Canadians which the member for South Oxford declared now resided in the United States? The hon. gentleman did not state that those were native-born Canadians. He never referred to the 886,000 emigrants, who, at great expense and after great labour, were induced to come to this country; and we may fairly ask where are those 886,000 emigrants who were brought to this country. Are they to be found in the North-west? No; not even in that land of promise, spoken of by Sir Charles Tupper, when, fourteen years ago, he declared that if the Conservatives were returned to power, there would not be a scanty population in the North-west, but there would be millions there. Where are the millions to-day? Certainly they are not to be found in that country. The hon. gentleman who preceded me spoke at great length in regard to the prices which farmers are obtaining for their products. Let me refer to a few prices which the farmers are obtaining on this side, and the prices which the farmers are obtaining on the other side of the line. A farmer at Sarnia went over to Port Huron in order to obtain figures to make a comparison as to the prices realized for grain and some farm products there, as compared with the Canadian side, and the result was as follows:—The price of wheat at Port Huron was then, and had been all summer, 8 cents per bushel higher than on the Canadian side. Oats in Sarnia were sold at 28 cents per bushel, while they brought 34 cents in Port Huron and 36 cents in Detroit. Barley, which is, this year, a poor sample in Michigan, realized from 40 to 60 cents at Port Huron, while the highest price obtained at Sarnia was 35 cents. The writer goes on further to state that in Port Huron the best American coal oil can be bought at 6 cents per gallon wholesale, and by retail 12 cents per imperial gallon, while in Sarnia, Canadian oil, which is a very much inferior article, sold recently at 28 cents per imperial gallon. Special attention is called to the fact that barbed wire brought a much lower price on the other side than on this side, and also that at Port Huron $2 bought a keg of nails, while at Sarnia the cost was $3.50. A change is now suggested in the Government policy, and it is in the direction of an imposition of an export duty on logs. Last year the President of the Council advocated the imposition of an export duty. The proposition was not entertained by the House, but, no doubt, now that he has a seat in the councils of the nation, he thinks he is bound to see that this export duty on logs shall be imposed. I, myself, in this House last year, read a number of letters from the most prominent lumbermen of the Ottawa Valley, all protesting against the imposition of this import duty. It would simply have the effect, Mr. Speaker, of upsetting to a certain extent existing contracts, and of creating uneasiness and uncertainty in the lumber trade. It will result in injuring our mills, perhaps of lowering wages, and it certainly, on account of such reasons, will have the effect of lowering the value of the limits of the mill owners. Remember that all these special taxes which are imposed and which have been maintained for years, are simply maintained because of special interests and because of certain invested rights. Special interests, remember, that make one man the master and the other a slave, one man a monopolist and a capitalist and the other a pauper, one man the occupant, perhaps, of a palace or a castle, drives the other into exile and makes him a supplicant at a stranger's door. These special interests that were denounced in the parable of Dives and of Lazarus, which have crimsoned the pages of history, and in whose very wake follow deceit and ruin, poverty and crime and starvation. It was only a few years ago that a great war was waged upon this continent in the cause of special interests, and in order to maintain the greatest system of slavery which ever existed. That was the plea set up, Sir, and to-day, when the people are suffering beneath the lashes of a cruel and oppressive policy, the only excuse offered is: that special interests must be protected, that we have created combinesters and we must not unmake them, that we have created a Red Parlour, and that we have sworn, from that Red Parlour we must get our orders. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) referred at great length to the United States. He quoted figures to prove that depression existed there, and that the farmers there are not as well off as they are in Canada. I hope that our farmers will have more prosperity, not that I wish our neighbours any harm, but that I wish that our own people shall occupy a high position. But, Sir, I do not think, in view of what has transpired during recent years, that it is well to speak of this foreign people in this way. I, myself, do not advocate, never did advocate, and never will advocate annexation to the United States. I believe that our country should be perfectly well off as it is, and I believe that the link connecting Canada with Great Britain is capable of providing all the happiness that our people may require. I certainly do not believe that this link shall always continue in existence. A day may come when a change in our condition may be imperative; but I do not believe that that change will ever be in the direction of annexation. It will be higher; it will be grander, and it will be better. It will be more in keeping with the tone and pulsation of the national heart of this people. It will be independence when the people of this country shall have sufficiently multiplied, and when the country shall have sufficiently grown to warrant such a change. Sir, we know what a year we have just gone through, and I would remind my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan) of the fact that it was a great year for America, that we celebrated the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America, and that such an occasion as that would naturally bring back to us recollections which it would be well to weigh. History confirms us in the belief that the discovery of America was in more than one sense a blessing to humanity. Here upon this continent the toiler can hope for the reward of his labour; here the persecuted of every nation, whether of his politics, whether of his faith, can hope to find peace, security and shelter; here, there was to be not license, but honesty and liberty of speech and of thought and of action, as well as the protection that wisely framed, wisely designed, and wisely administered laws could afford. There, where the Atlantic's billows lash the American shore; there the restless spirit of tyranny must stop, for it has been written above that the soil of America should be consecrated to freedom, and that it should be the natural haven of man's happiness and of his prosperity. I would remind my hon. friend that our heritage in common with those across the line extends even beyond such considerations, if we consider origin, language and affinity of feeling. Why, Sir, the very lessons of history loudly proclaim that those descended from a common parent should live in harmony and in peace. We naturally must admire very much what our neighbours have done to build up their country, and the manner in which they have lavished their wealth to promote its progress. We have much to learn from them; they have, perhaps, not a little to learn from us; but we both together should learn this great truth: that we must live in amity and friendly intercourse. Our American cousins cherish freedom and independence; so do we. They love their country, with its laws, and its institutions; so do we ours. They proclaim that their country is the grandest in the world. We admit that it is after ours. They boast of having independence, and we have gradually secured ours. They boast of the grandeur of the beginning of their national history; we are not ashamed of ours. We are proud of the early history of Canada, proud of the sacrifices made by our Canadian heroes in the time of peace as in the time of war, under the flag of old France and under the proud ensign of Britain. And, Sir, to pursue this, I can say that both nations are anxious to make even more rapid strides in the path of progress and in trade and in science and in agriculture, and in all the fine arts of modern civilization. Both are anxious to extend their domain over all that is good and worth having; and, situated as we are, side by side, with nothing but an imaginary line intervening, with like and with common interests, descendants of the same parent races, we should live as brothers, and understand that our mission will have failed if we cannot follow it out in peace and harmony. There is not a difficulty arising which cannot be adjusted honourably by means of wise statesmanship, and in a manner agreeable to the dignity of each state. I will not detain the attention of the House longer in dealing with the arguments of the hon. gentleman who proceeded me, but I will point this out: That it is at all events satisfactory to us to see hon. gentlemen opposite now rising in their seats in this House one after another, admitting that the Liberal party in Canada is loyal, admitting that the leader of the Liberal party in Canada is loyal and that the members following him are loyal. An hon. gentleman the other day said: But we never charged that you were disloyal. What a poor memory he has! He must have been asleep for the last four years, when they had no other song against us, or at least when they had no other cry against us than this, that we were traitors to the flag of our country, and traitors to our country itself. And, Sir, our leader, who, to-day, on account of the grandeur of his character, and on account of the purity of his motives, triumphs over the machinations of the men who tried to ruin him, must feel proud, and it is satisfactory to know that the Conservative Hamilton "Spectator," the most violent Conservative paper of this country, was forced the other day to admit that this grand leader, whom it is our honour to follow was not only a graceful and distinguished orator, but that he was a man of the highest personal integrity, who did honour to his province and to his country. And our own Prime Minister, than whom there is not a man in the country I more respect, in the city of Toronto, no doubt, felt that it was necessary that he should stand up and proclaim that there was not in the House of Commons a man deserving of more admiration than the leader of the Opposition. What a grand vindication all this is, and what a grand triumph it is for our leader and for the party to which he belongs. And why were we proclaimed traitors? Why were we charged with treason? Simply because we refused to fall down before this very policy which we are told to-day by its progenitors is a bad thing for Canada. Because we refused to accept this policy; because we asked these hon. gentlemen to show us the tall chimneys which we were promised would rise in every part of Canada, to attract the millions of population who were to come into the country and to promote the prosperity we were told would flourish in every part of Canada; and simply because we accepted the facts as we found them, and not such facts as were presented to us in figures that were not always accurate. We have been reminded twice to-day of the victory of 1891; we have been twice reminded of the victories obtained in the by-elections. Well, Sir, we accepted the verdict of 1891. Let me, however, recall to the hon. gentleman who reminded us of these elections, an answer that was once given on behalf of the old guard that surrounded a great emperor. When fortune went straight against that emperor, when all seemed lost to him, when the shades of night were falling upon the grandeur of his life, when everything seemed to have been sacrificed on the battlefield, there stood still the old guard, with its captain at its head. The victorious enemy, admiring the bravery that had been displayed by the old guard, and wishing to spare the lives of its members, approached and said: "Surrender, and I will spare you your life;" and the answer came quickly, "The old guard may die, but the old guard never surrenders." Sir, we have been reminded twice here to-day, and frequently during this debate, of the fact that we were defeated in 1891 and in the by-elections; but our artillery is beginning to tell in the ranks of our opponents. It is bringing down such prominent generals as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) and the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), as well as many other men throughout this country. The Minister of the Interior, the other day, asked us to admire his province, the province of Manitoba. When he speaks of the grandeur of that province, I am with him. I admire that province as much as he does, and look forward as hopefully to its future; and it is not only that province that we have to think of. Our whole country is a magnificent country, with a wonderful wealth of land, forest and stream, with minerals in abundance and with a soil which in fertility yields to none. We have a magnificent race of men, a splendid race of Canadians, as active and thrifty, as temperate and industrious, as any race in the world; and, if I were permitted here to say so, our Canadian women, possessed of every personal charm, of every grace of mind, of every quality of heart, of high physical and mental culture, have not their equals in the wide world. We have also an excellent form of government; and, although it may not be a perfect one, we must admit that it possesses safeguards and privileges of a very high character indeed. Our country is broad, extending from ocean to ocean, having ample room for the settler, offering a warm welcome to him from whatever land he comes, who is honestly anxious to make this country his home. It matters not, Sir, at what altar he kneels, what language he speaks; so long as he pledges fidelity to the obligations of Canadian citizenship, he is welcome to our country—welcome, Sir, to a country which does not desire strife, nor religious, national or racial hatred; welcome to a country that is bound to preserve the honour of its flag, to maintain the peace of its homes, and to promote the prosperity of its people. We on this side believe that tariff reform, good, sound tariff reform, will procure this measure of happiness for our country; hence our reason for supporting it. We believe that it will bring back to our country the Canadians who have left it; we believe that it will build up the tall chimneys, increase our population, assure the stability of our institutions, and brighten our future.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, it is with some hesitation that I follow the eloquent address which has been delivered by the hon. member who has just sat down. I wish, however, to ask you to come down from the clouds and back to this prosaic earth, while I discuss for a short time the questions that have been raised in this debate. The first question that occurs to my mind is the one that we have heard so much about in this country—a question which it is very desirable to answer in a proper way, and which I desire to answer in as fair a spirit as I can to both sides of the House. That question is, is Canada prosperous? It is a question that has been answered by the Conservative party in the affirmative. They have declared that Canada is fairly prosperous. We have heard another answer given on a great many platforms in this Dominion, as well as in this House by hon. gentlemen sitting opposite, who say that this country is not prosperous, but that it is being ruined by the policy of the party now in power. They say that the people are taxed so heavily that it is impossible for them to enjoy the comforts of life. Now, I wish to ask what do we mean when we talk about prosperity? I suppose we do not mean for one moment that every man in this country is a rich man. Such a state of things has never happened since the world has existed, and I suppose never will happen. I suppose when we talk about prosperity we mean that there are rich men, that there are men in moderate circumstances, that there are men whom we call poor men, but who are able to earn a sufficiency for their daily wants. That is a state of affairs which I would define as a prosperous state for a country. If I found that there were thousands of men in this country out of employment, thousands who were starving for lack of the necessaries of life, if I found that bread and everything required to make a man fairly comfortable was not to be had in this country, then I should say that this country was bordering on a state of ruin. But, if I found, as I do find, going through the country, that there are many men who have amassed great fortunes here, that there are other men who have amassed small fortunes, and have such a sufficiency for their wants that they are able now to retire from active work and live on what they have acquired; when I find as I travel through the country that people are well dressed and comfortably clad everywhere, and when I do not find any signs of starvation, even in those parts of the country where ruin is said to exist, then I am led myself to answer this question in the affirmative, and to say that Canada is a fairly prosperous country. If we wish to find a country that is not prosperous, I am sure we would not pick out Canada. We might go to Russia and see the starving peasants of whom we have heard so much and for whom we have felt so much sympathy. But if we wanted to find a country which is not very prosperous, we might go to some parts of Europe, where we would find the workingmen, not feeding as ours do, on the best of bread and butter, but who never see butter and very seldom see meat, but live on what is called black bread and thick milk. We might well say of such a country as that, that it is not prosperous, and even if we went to England itself, if we went through that country and visited the manufacturing towns, and saw how a great many people live there, if we saw how a great many people live in the city of London, we would say that England does not compare for one moment with the country to which we are proud and happy to belong. What is the standard of hon. gentlemen opposite when they decry Canada? They hold up the United States almost always as a paradise. They tell us that there a man has the best of everything. Now, I am very glad to agree with them in saying that the United States is a prosperous country. There are a great many wealthy men in it, and a great many men who are in comfortable circumstances. In fact, the majority of the people are, but still I believe we will find, if we go into their large cities, that there is more destitution in one of those great centres than we would find in all Canada combined. Is Canada, as a whole, less prosperous than the United States? If we take a fair view of this question, and that is what I desire to do, if we ask the merchants of this country and the manufacturers—though I suppose our friends opposite would not include the manufacturers at all, for they seem to think that these people are all making fortunes out of the National Policy, though I am not aware that on that point our manufacturers would agree with them—but if we ask the workingmen of this country, and the farmers, we would find very few of them complaining that they were being ruined and driven to desperation because of the policy, so much condemned by hon. gentlemen opposite. I believe that the people of Canada are fairly prosperous. I know that we have not many millionaires among us, I know that our young men are sometimes fascinated on hearing of men in the States worth fifty millions and a hundred millions and ten millions, and fancy that they could do equally as well, and I must say that our young men, as a rule, do well in the United States. I must say that, by their early training, their stability and integrity of character, they generally are successful on the other side of the line; but if we will go into our large cities in Canada we will find them equally successful. We will find our young men from the farms and the small country towns occupying positions of great responsibility in the large manufacturing establishments in our cities. I admit that the McKinley tariff has pressed rather hard on some of our farmers. In the constituency I have the honour to represent, I know that is the case. There barley used to be extensively raised, and when the McKinley Bill came into force many of our farmers complained of the high duty very much; but I am glad to say that we have, in our part of the country, an industry which takes the place, in a great measure, of barley raising, and that is the raising of pease. In Port Hope, for instance, I know a gentleman who deals largely in pease and pays high prices for them. I am not aware whether this is the case in other parts of the country, and I refer to this simply to show that I am treating this question in a candid spirit, and am willing to admit that the McKinley Bill presses hardly on a good many of our farmers. We have been blamed very often for quoting statistics to prove our prosperity, and I was rather amused at the witty remark which the leader of the Opposition made at the board of trade dinner at Toronto. At that banquet the Minister of Finance, in his eloquent speech, quoted many statistics to show that this country is prospering, and the leader of the Opposition, in reply, remarked that if his party were in power they would not need any statistics to prove our prosperity, because the people would know that they were prosperous and would not require any proof. That may be very witty, but, after all, why is it necessary for us to quote these statistics? It is necessary for the very good reason that a great many people do not know what is going on and require to be enlightened, for people are apt, sometimes, to fancy that things are not as good as they are. Then there is another cogent reason, and that is because our friends opposite are constantly exclaiming that Canada is going backwards, so that, in order to refute their assertions and show that we are really prospering, it is necessary to quote figures and facts. Suppose these statistics pointed the other way; suppose they showed that Canada was going down, does any one suppose that hon. gentlemen opposite would not use them, and could we blame them if they did? For my part, I think they would be perfectly justified in doing so; but, unfortunately for them, instead of the figures proving the country is not prosperous, they support our contention that the country is advancing. Why do hon. gentlemen opposite deny that Canada is prosperous? I do not believe it is because they believe what they say, for I cannot imagine that they do not know that Canada is going ahead. I cannot imagine that they do not know that the people are moderately well off, or that they do not agree with the First Minister of Ontario, who said that the farmers of this country are more comfortably off than those of any other country in the world. Why, then, are these hon. gentlemen constantly telling the people the contrary? There can only be one reason. It is said that everything is fair in politics, and while I do not hold to this maxim, still, very often, it is acted upon by the Opposition in order to discredit to the Government and its policy. They say to the people: You are not prospering, Canada is going backwards, we have certainly a fine country, but its resources are not being properly developed; turn out the Government in power, and put us in their places, and then you will see a change. Well, while I do not like to recall unpleasant reminiscences, I cannot help at this moment thinking that the country at one time did take these gentlemen at their word and put them in power, in order to see what they could do. What was the result? Did the country prosper? I admit that at that time there was a general depression all over the world. I admit that the Government of that day had a difficult task, but they failed in that task, and it was left for the Conservative party to show the people how they could help to bring about prosperity. I do not think that any Government can make a country prosperous. I am not one of those who believe that any Government can give good crops to the country or raise the price of crops, but I believe that there is a good deal which a good Government can do, and I believe that this Government has done a great deal in the last fourteen years to bring about prosperity. Now, the easiest thing in the world is to criticise. I have often found that out myself. I may look at a man doing something and think I could do it much better myself, but when I undertake the task, I find it more difficult than I expected. It is very easy to say that the Government are not doing right, put us in power and we will show what ought to be done, but I think before the country is willing to take these people at their word, we will require to know what their policy is. Now, Sir, what is their plan? I am not sure that they have abandoned unrestricted reciprocity. I have heard some say that they have done so; but I do not know whether they have or not. I suppose they have not; but I think they are trying to modify it or put it in some other form of language. I find that unrestricted reciprocity, however, is one remedy; I find that freer trade relations is another remedy. I suppose the amendment we have had presented to us by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is the latest remedy. Well, Sir, I agree with part of that amendment. I agree with the amendment where it speaks about the Government being efficiently and economically administered. I think the taxes collected are now limited to the sum required to carry on the affairs of the country. I do not think that money is collected that is unnecessary. I believe that the Government is efficiently and economically administered, and I find that nearly all the taxes or all the taxes are required to do this; and so with that part of the amendment I can quite agree; but, Sir, it is to the first part that I am unable to agree; that amendment says that the present customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly upon the great consuming classes of the Dominion. Now I do not know who "the great consuming classes are." We have very few classes in this country. We are all workingmen here. I find very few people who do not work; who are not engaged in business. I do not know if the hon. gentleman means the farmers. Perhaps they may be the great consuming classes; but they are the producing classes as well. But take the workingman. In what way does the tariff bear heavily and unjustly upon him? I step in to see him; he is getting his breakfast; let us stay. I ask what he is having for breakfast. Well, he says, I have coffee. How much tax do you pay on coffee? None at all. Well, what else have you? Well, I have bread and butter, and perhaps an egg, and I have sugar. There is no tax on that; and so I find that all he has for breakfast is free. We have really a free breakfast table in this country. I find also that what he has for his tea at night is free. He has no tax upon his tea. There was a time when there was a tax on tea and a tax on coffee. At that time we did not find the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) declaring in this House or in the country that the customs tariff bore heavily or unjustly upon the workingmen. Well, I ask that man how much he is taxed on his clothes. A very good suit of clothes can be bought for $15, I believe; perhaps less. Perhaps a very good suit can be bought for $10. I do not think there is much tax in that. I do not think the workingmen will complain much about that. How much for his shirt? I find a good shirt can be bought for 75 cents, and I think the workingmen would not complain of much tax about that. Well, what does he pay taxes on. One thing I can find he pays taxes on, is his necktie. That is made of silk. How much did he pay for that? He bought it for 25 cents. I do not think he can be very heavily oppressed on that. And so we do not find that he is oppressed on what he eats or what he wears. Perhaps he pays a little tax; he will not complain of that. He is living in this country enjoying its benefits, and is willing to pay something towards the maintenance of the country. I think the workingman of this country will agree with me, if I put this case to him. For my part, I cannot see that he is oppressively or unfairly taxed, and, therefore, I cannot agree that this customs tariff "bears heavily and unjustly upon the great consuming classes." Apply the same questions to the farmer. I find that with the farmer there are compensating advantages. I find that the farmer has some benefits from this tariff, which is so "unjust" and "oppressive." He is protected on his beef, on his mutton, on his pork and on his corn. I do not think the farmer will grumble much about that. He might, perhaps, say: I think I pay too much for that reaping machine and some of these implements that I use. I do not know that he does. I am not prepared to go into that question now. I am assured by some, that he pays no more than he would pay on the other side of the line, no more than he would if there was no duty at all. For this reason also, I cannot agree with that part of the amendment. Now, there is another part of the amendment which declares that this tariff "should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of freer trade." Now, I think we come in the direction of the policy of the leader of the Opposition. I do not want to do him injustice, and if I am wrong, I desire to be corrected. But I think he advocated a policy moving in the direction of free trade, declaring that his party should keep that end always in view. We have not got there exactly yet. This is for "freer" trade, which, I suppose, is not quite so free as free trade. Well now, Mr. Speaker, while I can agree with the latter part of the amendment, I must reject the greater part of it, for the reasons I have given. And now I come to another policy, the policy of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson). He laid down this idea of reciprocity. I have taken down his words, so that I might make no mistakes. He advocated "the freest system of reciprocity consistent with the dignity, honour and stability of both countries." Now, I do not know whether he believes in unrestricted reciprocity or not. I do not know what sort of reciprocity he wants. He defined it in that way, but, as he has given it, it might mean anything or nothing; it is a very indefinite statement. I ask myself this question: Is discrimination against Great Britain and the rest of the world consistent with the dignity, honour and stability of both countries? Now, Sir, I am in favour of reciprocity. I have said so every time I have spoken in this House on this subject.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How far would you go?

Mr. CRAIG. My constituents are favourable to reciprocity; I say that distinctly. I hope the Government are also; I believe they are. But I was asked how far I would go. I will go as far as the hon. member for South Brant. Reciprocity to please me must be consistent with the dignity, honour and stability of both countries. That is the distance I go, and I think every member on this side of the House is willing to go just that far and I do not think we are willing to go any further. So that I think we may accept the statement of the hon. member for South Brant as the statement of our policy. Now, Sir, I ask what definition does the hon. member for Brant apply to a treaty that would allow our tariff to be framed at Washington? I think that is the question which might be answered by some of the gentlemen opposite. Although I am in favour of reciprocity and of reciprocity such as I have spoken of, a fair reciprocity, a reciprocity which would allow us to have our own tariff, a reciprocity which would not ruin our manufacturers. I am afraid that some of our friends on the other side of the House are not in favour of reciprocity. They say they are, but I am afraid they are not. I am afraid their attitude on this question has prevented, or has helped to prevent, our getting fair reciprocity. Why, Sir, what is reciprocity after all? It is a bargain. But if I want to make a bargain with somebody else and another man comes along and says: Don't make a bargain with him, make a bargain with me; I will give you everything for nothing; I will give you everything you want. He will not make a bargain with me. And when our commissioners went to Washington to talk reciprocity, I can imagine the representatives of the United States saying: We don't want to deal with you; there are other people in Canada who tell us that they will give us a better treaty than you are ready to make; we will not make a bargain with you at all. I think the Reform party by their attitude on this question have in some measure hindered the arranging of a fair reciprocity measure in this country. Now, I say further, I have great hopes myself, from the recent election in the United States. Some of my friends on this side have not quite as much hope as I have in this respect. I think we shall secure better treatment from the Cleveland Administration than we have had from the present Administration. I cannot help thinking so. I have heard it said sometimes that we make a great mistake in having any such idea. Now, I do not think for a moment that the United States are going to adopt free trade, I do not think any country in the world is going to adopt free trade. Free trade is a very nice thing to talk about, but there is no such thing at present in the world; I do not think there ever was, and I doubt very much if there ever will be. Every country must have a revenue, and how can they get it except by taxing articles that come into the country? But the contest in the States was fought, mainly, on the McKinley tariff, and the party who sustained the McKinley tariff were defeated, overwhelmingly defeated, at the polls in the recent election. I believe that the McKinley tariff will be repealed, and that we shall obtain better treatment from the United States under the coming Administration than we have had in the past. Now, Sir, I wish to refer to a subject which has been on my mind for some time, a subject on which, I think, both parties in this House will agree with me, and that is the desirability of having friendly relations with the United States. Sir, whatever we may say about reciprocity, however we may differ as to what kind of reciprocity is desirable for this country, I think we all ought to agree, and we all do agree, in the desirability of having friendly relations with that great country. Now, Sir, I have great respect for the press, I think we all have, I think all politicians have. I have great respect for the press, because I believe it is the greatest power at the present time; and I wish to say here, without any offence to the press, that I think some harm has been done by the press of both parties. One section of the press has written in such a manner as to give the United States the idea that Canada cannot exist without their markets, that Canada cannot get along without the United States. They have written in that strain almost entirely. Well, Sir, I do not think it is desirable to give them that impression, because it is a false impression. But on the other hand, another portion of the press goes to the opposite extreme. They have said that we do not care anything about dealing with the United States, we can get along without them. Now, I do not deny that sometimes the action of the United States Government has almost justified these remarks; but, at the same time, in my opinion, these remarks are not wise. I am of the opinion that they are not calculated to promote what is so desirable, the most friendly feeling between these two countries. I have sometimes seen sarcastic references to the States, which, perhaps, in themselves do not amount to much; but I am satisfied they are copied in papers on the other side of the line, and used by those who do not desire friendly relations with this country, and they are magnified and exaggerated. Now, Sir, I appeal to the press to correct these ideas. They can do it better than any one else. From what I know of the people of this country, it is their desire to live on the most friendly terms with the people of the United States. The United States Government, like all Governments, have a large constituency to please. It is impossible for them to please every one. Sometimes they do things which, I am sure, are against their own judgment. Now, in saying this, I do not advocate, for one moment, a truckling policy. I think such a policy would make us despised by them, and despised by our own people. I believe in maintaining our self-respect; but, at the same time, I think we should do everything we can to bring about and maintain with that great country the most friendly feelings and the most friendly relations. After all, they are a great market for us. They are a desirable market. We are a good market to them for a good many things, and they buy from us. Now, let us have patience. Providence has made us neighbours; let us see to it that we are friends. In listening to the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) the other night, I noticed one remark of his which deserves a little attention. In referring to the statistics given by the Minister of Finance of our large exports to Great Britain, he said: "Well, I do not think the Government deserve any credit for that. Providence gave us large crops, and hence we had large exports." Well, I agree with him that the Government did not give us large crops; but at the same time I think that the Government deserve great credit for developing the British market. When the markets of the United States were shut against us in a great measure by the McKinley tariff, the Government did not sit down idle; but they helped the exporters of this country to find new markets, and they helped to develop the markets which had already been found. In this connection I would give special praise to the Department of Agriculture for what they have done in this matter, in sending to England and Scotland Professor Robertson to develop the trade in cheese and the trade in butter. I think his mission over there will prove very successful, and that we shall reap much benefit from it. I am sure that all fair-minded men will think that the Government deserve great credit for acting in this manner. Now, Sir, we hear a great deal about natural markets. Well, some argue that Britain is our natural market. So it is for some things. Britain is our natural market for cattle, for cheese, for butter, for apples and some other things. But, at the same time, the United States is our natural market for other things. Some argue that Britain is our natural market, and our only natural market. I do not think so. Britain is our natural market for the things I have mentioned, and for some others which I cannot refer to; but at the same time, I maintain that the United States is our natural market for barley, for eggs, for horses, for lambs. I find these things are constantly being shipped; I find that large numbers of lambs are constantly shipped now to the United States in spite of the duty, and more, I think, would be shipped there if the duty was less, or taken off. I mention this fact because I believe in cultivating both markets; I believe in developing the English market, and I believe in cultivating, as far as we can, the American market. Now, Sir, I come to a point which, I think, is of much importance at the present time, and that is the question of tariff revision. I am very glad to know that the Government recognize that there is a feeling in the country for tariff revision. In my opinion, this is the case: I believe there is a feeling in favour of tariff revision. I think the Government, in recognizing the feeling, are acting wisely. I remember there was a Government at one time who did not recognize the feelings of the country; we know the result. Now, I believe the Government should not always follow the spasmodic feelings in the country, if they are spasmodic; but, after all, if the people of this country are determined to have a thing, they are going to have it, there is no doubt of that at all. If there is a widespread feeling throughout the country for a certain thing, I hold that the Government are not acting a wise part by saying: We know better than you do, you know nothing about this matter at all. We have certain ideas on this question. We do not believe in the doctrines that are advocated at this moment, and we are going to maintain our own doctrines. I do not believe that is a wise policy. So, Sir, I think the Government are acting wisely in recognizing that there is a feeling in the country in favour of some tariff revision. I know there is a feeling of this kind in my constituency, I am free to confess it; and I think it is right the Government should know it. I suppose it is a natural feeling among Reformers. I am not speaking of them; I suppose they constantly advocate that policy except when they are in power themselves—of course that makes a difference. But I must confess that Conservatives in my constituency are in favour of tariff revision, I want to say that frankly. I am in favour of it myself. I think there are changes that could be made in the tariff which would be to the advantage of this country. We have a National Policy. These things do not last for ever; the country does not always continue in the same condition. I believe one reason that brought about this feeling in this country was the result of the recent elections in the United States. I think they have had considerable effect in stirring up an agitation in this country. What are the Government doing? I want to refer, for one moment, to coal oil and binding twine. I know there was a strong feeling among a good many people that coal oil should be free; I believe that feeling was worked up in the country, and I do not know but that it was right. It does look anomalous to have such a heavy tax on an article largely used by the people all over the country, and if the Government could have seen their way to have coal oil free, I should have been much pleased to support the resolution. There was, however, only one reason why it was not made free, and that was because millions of dollars were invested in the development of the coal oil industry. Under the policy of this Government and of the Government that preceded it, wells have been sunk and the coal oil industry has been developed, and it would seem a rather harsh proceeding to strike a fatal blow at this industry, upon which depend 2,000 men for their livelihood. In order to show the feeling of the working classes on this subject, I may mention this circumstance: a workingman spoke to me in regard to coal oil when I was home on Saturday. He asked if the Government were going to take the duty off coal oil, and I replied that I considered it probable that they would take off part of the duty, although, of course, I did not know. He then said that such a reduction would make coal oil cheaper. I then pointed out that if the duty were wholly removed, no less than 2,000 men now engaged in that industry would be thrown out of employment. He then was quite willing to pay his share of the tax, in order that the industry might not be ruined. I believe the effect of what has been done by the Government will be to reduce the price; in fact, I understand the price has already fallen. Moreover, it will tend to make the men engaged in the business more pushing and energetic, and compel them to see that exorbitant prices are not charged by retailers, as has been the case in times past, I think they should do that, and they should have taken such steps long ago. The producers affirm that there is no necessity for high prices being charged; if such is the case, they should, in their own interest, see it is not done. In regard to binding twine, I am satisfied with the reduction proposed. I have two interests in binding twine. There is a large binding twine industry in my constituency, and I also know that a good many farmers want binding twine free. At all events, I believe binding twine will now be reduced in price by the change in duty proposed by the Government. While this feeling prevails in this country, or is supposed to prevail, what action should the Government take under the circumstances? Should they turn a deaf ear? I have discussed that question already, and I think the Government should not do so. I consider the people have a right to have their views brought before the Government, and also have them attended to. What is the attitude of the Government. It is declared by some persons that the Government should at once, during this session, have revised the tariff; but, in my opinion, it is not so easy to revise the tariff as it is to talk about revision. It is easy to say that this and that duty should be reduced, but it is not so easy to do justice to all interests. Yet this is what, not only the members of this House, but the members of the Government desire to do—they want to do justice to all interests in this country. They do not want to do something that will prove to be a mistake. Now, how is this going to be done? Can it be done by taking items haphazard and looking over the tariff hurriedly and striking out this duty and the other duty, without making inquiry? I think you will all say no. What, then, is the Government's plan? It is to hear all sides. If there are any propositions to reduce the duty on certain articles, the Government will hear what the manufacturers have to say in the matter. If they are able to show good reason for retaining the duties, if they can show that the prices are not increased and that a reduction of the tariff would not materially reduce the price, I suppose the tariff will not be reduced; but if it can be shown that the tariff is extravagant and oppressive, that there is no necessity for retaining the duty, I suppose it will be removed. The member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), in speaking on the matter, made a great deal of fun by quoting portions of the speech of the Minister of Finance. He said the Minister of Finance was going to travel over the country with a menagerie. It is easy, however, to ridicule anything. It is desirable that members of the Government should travel over the country occasionally and see the people and let the people see them, visit some of the towns and see what industries are established there and talk with practical men who know the subjects on which they speak. It is easy to theorise, but it is different when we get hold of men who thoroughly understand a certain business. I know this is what the Government propose to do, and I commend them for it. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) read in a very amusing manner the statement that the Government are going to do what is best for the country as a whole. I do not see anything ridiculous in that statement. If the Government do not intend to do what is best for the country as a whole, we would blame them. The Government are perfectly right in desiring to do what is right for the country as a whole; we would blame them if they proposed to do otherwise. They must look at the different parts of the country, and we have entered into Confederation not that one part shall receive all the advantages but that the benefits shall be reciprocal. I do not know that it will be very interesting to this House if I give my own views on this subject; but my views are these: moderate protection for our manufactures. I am not in favour of uprooting the National Policy. I think the National Policy has been a boon to this country, and members on the Opposition side of the House, if they were not talking politically, would confess that in some lines that policy has benefited the country. I do not deny that the National Policy has defects. I do not deny that there are parts of the National Policy that can be removed with advantage. It takes time to find these defects out. Of course, hon. gentlemen opposite will say that they have been talking this way all the time. But when we have wholesale condemnation, it does not amount to anything. Hon. gentlemen opposite have condemned the whole system continuously. If we had adopted free trade they would have condemned it as being a policy that would be certain to ruin this country, and so we cannot be guided by what hon. gentlemen opposite condemn. So I am in favour of moderate protection, and I am not in favour of excessive protection on any line. I think, however, there are some lines that ought to be protected, and those cases should be brought to the attention of the Government. I have some matters that I will bring to their attention, and I believe the burdens will be removed when brought to their notice. I believe we should have a low tariff, as low as is consistent with the revenue of the country, on goods imported that are not manufactured in the Dominion. There are goods which are not made in this country, there are goods which cannot be made profitably in this country. There are goods which men have tried to make in this country, but have failed to make with any profit to themselves or anybody else. I believe a protective tariff was put on some of these goods in order to encourage their manufacture, but when we find that they can not be profitably made here, I believe that that tariff should be reduced. I am in favour of as low a tariff as possible, on goods not made in this country, so that all the people of this country may, as far as possible, get everything at as low a rate as they can. I do not believe in the encouragement of monopolies. We have heard a great deal about monopolies. There may be some in this country, but I do not think that all combines are monopolies. I think that sometimes a combine is a necessity, because it may occur that the prices of goods are cut so low by competition that there is no money made at all. Where there is a combine, but where reasonable prices only are charged, I would not call that a monopoly;

but where I find excessive prices are charged, and that a monopoly is formed in order to extort excessive prices from the people, then I would take away all encouragement from them. I agree with gentlemen on the other side of the House in advocating economy. I believe we all agree in that. I am happy to say that I believe that we have an economical Government; I do not know whether gentlemen on the other side of the House will agree with me here, but, I think, however, they will agree that we have an economical Finance Minister. I have sometimes heard that he was too economical, and that he was not willing to grant even what was necessary to carry on the Government of this country, but I think that is erring on the right side. I believe in having a man to look after the finances of this country who is economical, and perhaps a little too economical, so that if there are any members of the Cabinet who are a little extravagant he may keep them in order. I apologize for detaining the House so long at this late hour. I wish to say here, that I accept the promise of the Government in all good faith. We have the promise that they are going to hear what the people have to say, and I think the promise goes a little further, and reaches to the extent that they are going to give us tariff revision next session. I think it was said that we should have a general revision of the tariff. I accept the promise of the Government in all good faith. I am satisfied with what they say on that question and I look with confidence to the future and when the mouldering branches are lopped off and a fair reciprocity treaty made with the United States, I look forward with confidence to Canada entering on a new era of prosperity.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat on the apparent sincerity which characterized his speech. I regret, however, that after fully approving of the amendment now before the House, he should have concluded by saying that he would continue to support the Government. Since the beginning of this discussion, we are witnessing a strange spectacle: we have seen the hon. members on the other side standing up successively and asking for reforms of the tariff, asking that the duties upon certain articles be removed. These gentlemen complain that the taxes are too high on certain necessaries of life. They bring up petitions sent to them by the Conservative associations of their counties asking for a reduction of the duties in the spirit of the amendment now before the House; and yet they conclude by saying that they always have faith in the Government. It is a strange spectacle, I must repeat, and it reminds me of the inscription Dante puts on the gate of Hell: "Let ye who come in here leave all hope at the door." It seems to me the members who occupy seats on the ministerial side, when they go in room No. 16, see written on the door: "Let you who come in here leave all freedom, if not all hope, at the door." Notwithstanding the representations which reach them from all parts, the hand that guides them is stronger than they; they cannot vote the way they would like. We are satisfied of this after what we have heard since the opening of this debate; were they as free as we are, they would vote for the amendment. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat told us with much ingenuousness he was in favour of our policy; he did not exactly say so in words, but we shall know it by his vote. Then he stated that the duties were not too high, and that upon certain necessaries of life, upon articles consumed at breakfast and supper, there were no duties. It is true, there are no duties upon sugar, tea and coffee, but, Mr. Speaker, although the duties are removed from certain articles, it is nevertheless a fact—according to official data—that the duties per capita are higher than under the Mackenzie regime. Thus, by referring to the Public Accounts, we see that in 1878, the rate per capita was only $4.32, while now it is $6.36. Now, although the duties were removed from certain articles, it is plain it must have been imposed upon others, since we now pay over $2 a head more than in 1878. It is alleged as a crime against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that they state the country is not prosperous. We are blamed as depreciating the country. Warning a man that he is following a wrong path, going in a wrong way, seems to me rendering him a service and not disparaging him. Moreover, we have only to refer to public documents, to the census and to the Conservative newspapers, to ascertain whether the country is prosperous or not; for the policy inaugurated in 1878 had for its object to make it prosperous. And the then leader of the Opposition, Sir John A. Macdonald, made the following statement in a motion:—

That this House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion.

Therefore the famous policy advocated in 1878 was bound to make the country prosperous. We are thus entitled to ask the Government for an account of the promises they made to us. What do we see now? We see the hon. members on the other side standing up one after another and stating there is much uneasiness in the country. We see the political associations of their counties asking for a reduction of the tariff. We have only to take the ministerial mouth-piece in Toronto, the "Empire," of the 9th instant, which, speaking of the failure of a certain Michael McConnell, says that three or four years ago, he was worth $250,000 and that now his properties have decreased to $100,000. When the ministerial organs concede that much, are we not playing the part of patriots when accusing the existing fiscal system? Have we not the right to cause these facts to be known by the people and the Government? But there is more than that. It appears the Government have not much faith in their friends, since they informed us of a committee of investigation on the state of affairs in the country; and the hon. member who has just taken his seat, approved of this committee. Well, I think it is an insult to offer them; it looks as if the Government had no faith in their representatives, no more than they have confidence in the Government, since they take upon themselves, as it occurred some days ago, to advise the Governor-General. The Government are insulting their friends, when composing this committee of the Minister of Commerce and the two Controllers so as to know what to do. But why on earth are elections ordered? It is to send here representatives who will state the needs of the people. And what time will it take that committee to run through the country so as to be informed? In the first place, they will have to learn several languages, and when they come in the province of Quebec, they will have to learn French. When they come in my county to be informed as to the condition of the thirty-seven manufactures there existing, according to the census, while in reality there are hardly five; when they go to Caughnawaga they will have to learn the Indian language, in order to examine the forty-five manufactures which happen to be there according to the census, but they will possibly be able to get information from the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier), who is said to be conversant with the Indian language. It is not only an insult to the friends of the Government, but it is a farce. The Government would be better off were they to state plainly, as stated already by some hon. members on this side of the House, that they are willing to wait till the fiscal policy of the United States be made known, and then they will change their own policy. It would have been more courageous, not to say more honest, on the part of the Minister of Finance, had he not left the House and country in doubt, but stated that they are waiting till the policy of Mr. Cleveland and his Government towards this country be made known to base their own upon it. I say our country is not prosperous; does any one want another evidence of this? Let us walk over the streets in Ottawa, and, at every two or three houses we will find a poster showing that the house is to let. People are constantly urging their political friends to get them placed. I again say we are not disparaging the country, our provinces and our counties when we represent to the Government what their very friends are constantly saying to them. Now, another argument brought forward by these gentlemen to show that the country is very prosperous and that the people are contented, is the result of the general election in 1878, 1882, 1887 and 1891. They are, it seems, glorious halting-places for these gentlemen. If we only knew the secret of their success in those times as well as we know the secret of their defeat at certain times, I am sure they would not have to boast; on the contrary, I think they would have to be ashamed. As already stated by me in this House and proclaimed by others, the policy of the Government was never plainly and honestly put before the people. In 1878, the Conservative party were telling us that we ought to readjust the tariff and adopt a policy which would keep in this country the people who were going away and leaving their homes because the country could not give them what was necessary for their living. We all know how the Conservative party succeeded in 1882. The counties were gerrymandered so as to drown out the Liberal counties. In 1887, we had the Franchise Bill, which is, I could say, a disgracefulness through which they succeeded in taking away from the Liberal party a good many electoral divisions, through the assistance of revising officers, which at that time allowed themselves to be the tools of the powers that be. Through these means they succeeded in taking the majority away from us. In 1891, an election occurred notwithstanding the promises made, and in spite of that, the Government came very near being ruined, and through the disclosures which were made later on, through the initiative of the gentleman who now sits on my left (Mr. Tarte) it is true that, should these monstrous scandals have been known then, these gentlemen would not have succeeded in securing even the slight majority they had when this election was over. But let us take as an evidence of the popular feeling, the election of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), who came out victorious in spite of the hon. Postmaster-General (Sir Adolphe Caron), who went down into the county, and remembered that, while he was the War Minister, he had not failed to bring with him many ammunitions. In spite of that, how is it that he has not succeeded? It is because, Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Government and our own policy were readily brought before the people. After this sincere and honest statement of our policy, we fought like men, and notwithstanding all the ability of the hon. Minister, seconded by the utmost devotion of his friends, he bit the dust. Yet it was a very close county; the strength of both parties had proved almost equal in the previous election, the Conservative candidate having been returned by a majority of five. In spite of that what has happened? The Government there underwent a defeat they must regret more than others, on account of the circumstances which attended it. Now, these gentlemen state that the results of the popular tests referred to by them are an evidence in favour of the policy of the Government. It is an argument worth nothing, for the reasons alleged by us, but supposing it should be worth something, how is it that the Government intend changing their policy? If the people are so much in favour of that policy; how is it that the Government do not keep their tariff, and why especially should they leave the old flag of which we have so much heard? If this tariff is worth anything for the country, how is that they pledge themselves to change it? They seem, it is true, willing to do away with the old flag; that is, I suppose, on account of the old leader being away. He being gone, they feel bound to change the system. I say that at the next election, and I hope it will take place as early as possible, we will find that the public feeling is not in favour of these gentlemen. When we say the country is not prosperous, we are charged with crying the country down. Be that as it may, the results we are witnessing, being considered, are we not entitled to state that this prosperity of which they speak so much exists nowhere? In fact, the official documents state that we have caused to come to this country, at a large expense, for the last ten years, 830,000 emigrants. Well, according to the census, we have only increased 500,000, as far as population goes. We, therefore, lost in round numbers, 330,000 on that sole emigration. Further than that, for that is not all, we have lost all the natural increase in the population of this country. With this result, I am right when saying that we have lost, for the last ten years, upwards of one million and a half, that is, comparing the population as stated, and that which we should have, the emigration and natural increase of our population being considered. That is what we have gained by ten years of the protectionist system. Under this bad regime of the Liberal Government of Mr. Mackenzie, things had another turn. Let us see in short what the state of affairs was then, and let us make a little comparison. We shall then be in a position to see under what regime the country was most prosperous. In 1871, the province of Ontario, and I admit this country has benefited in a certain proportion of the policy called the National Policy, the increase in population was 18.6 per 100 during the period between 1871 and 1881. Now, we find that, according to the census of 1891, this increase has only been 9.93 per 100 for the ten years between 1881 and 1891. Wherefrom it appears that under the protection system, so boasted by the hon. members on the other side, Ontario, which is inhabited by industrious and enterprising people, has only increased its population by 9.93 per 100, while under the Liberal policy the increase was 18.6 per 100. In the province of Quebec we had increased 14 per 100 from 1871 to 1881, and during the period between 1881 and 1891 the increase was only 9.53 per 100. Therefore, in summing up, during the ten years of the Liberal regime we had an increase in population of 18.97 per 100, while under the protective system now in force, that increase was only 11.74 per 100. In the presence of such results, in the presence of official figures brought down by the very officials of the Government, have we not the right to state that they have realized the promise made in 1878, that the protectionist policy did not give us the results promised? Instead of keeping our people at home, emigration is more active than ever. Instead of increasing our population, this policy is the cause of its being decreased. But, Mr. Speaker, let us examine another part of the census. In 1881 there existed in Canada, according to the census of that year, 46,583 vacant or unoccupied houses, while in 1892, according to the last census, the number of those unoccupied houses reaches 54,182, that is to say in 1891 there were 7,599 unoccupied houses more than in 1881, or, in other words, there were 7,599 unoccupied houses more under the protective system than under the old system. Therefore emigration has increased, since there is a greater number of vacant houses. This policy of protection was therefore no cause for keeping into the country the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who went to the United States to work and earn their living and that of their family, and who were to be kept into this country through this policy of protection; it neither peopled the North-west as promised. But let us go a little further in the official documents containing the facts made known by the officers who had the charge of the last census. Let us see what was the result of the protection as regards the minor towns. It is important to know how far the protection policy favoured the industrial and other interests of these minor cities. Let us take Berthierville: in 1871 there was there a population of 1,433; in 1881 the population was 2,156, and in 1891 it went down to 1,537. The village of Laprairie, where the Government made such an expenditure, where they erected a magnificent post office, where, in a word, they made a large expenditure, that village had, in 1871, a population of 1,259. In 1881 the population had increased a little, and it reached 1,340. But in 1891, after ten years of the protection system and ministerial favours, this place has only got 1,246 souls. It is a decrease of 100 in round numbers. L'Assomption, which, in 1871, had a population of 1,210, and in 1881, 1,313, has only got 1,256 in 1891. Levis, a little town located in the county so well represented by my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Guay), which was not favoured, as was Laprairie with a magnificent post office, since they decline to put one there, had in 1871 a population of 6,691, in 1881 a population of 7,597, and in 1891, that population had fallen down to 7,301. Take likewise Dunham, in the county of Missisquoi, in 1871 that place had a population of 3,316; in 1881 a population of 3,702 and in 1891 a population of 2,466. There lies a great decrease. Stanbridge—well, they will not say that if that locality has not prospered, and if its population did not increase, it was owing to being represented by a Liberal; on the contrary, the county in which Stanbridge is included has for its representative here a good Conservative. I make this statement because they often charge us with being the cause of the despondency which happens in the part of our people and causes them to go away, for they freely say that it is through our fault that the Canadians cross the line. In 1871, Stanbridge had a population of 5,024. In 1881 that population reached 5,348, and in spite of what the protective policy did during these last ten years, in 1891 the population of Stanbridge was only 941. The town of Montmagny, situated in the county which I represent, had, in 1871, a population of 1,512. In 1881 it had 1,738, while in 1891 it had only 1,697. Be that as it may, I might say, by the way, the census gives us thirty-seven industrial establishments, although, as I have said a moment ago, I only know four or five. To reach that number of thirty-seven manufactures in Montmagny they must have taken in all the candy stores. It is quite absurd to say that Montmagny has thirty-seven manufactures, while there are hardly four or five there. I must repeat it. If the census was stating the truth, I would, indeed, be the first to support the Government, or rather, I would be inclining to give them my support, should their policy have for its result the opening of manufactures in my county. The population of Montmagny fell down from 1,738 in 1871 to 1,697 in 1891, after ten years of the protective system, of a policy deemed national. However, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to state to you that in my county, we have very good lands; we have a population sober, intelligent, honest; we have the advantage of a railway which crosses the country of Montmagny; moreover, the town is bound on the north by the St. Lawrence river, which affords it great shipping facilities. Besides, it is, so to speak, situated at the doors of Quebec. Well, notwithstanding all these advantages, the population of Montmagny has decreased. The reason of it is very simple: the people had to go, had to take the road to the United States, in order to find work which they could not find at home. If the Canadians emigrate to the United States, it is not for the pleasure of leaving their country, but because they can live better there. The policy of the Government, Mr. Speaker, sends away, not only the industrial classes, but especially our hardy farmers. The farmers are obliged to give up their farms because they cannot sell their produce at paying prices. The county of Quebec was for a long time represented by the hon. Postmaster-General. Let us take the three divisions of the city of Quebec, and the county of Quebec. This was a place of industry and commerce. In the course of the last ten years—this is unbelievable, but the official documents stand as a proof of the fact—the population of Quebec, the three divisions of the county, has decreased by 111 souls; and yet, from 1871 to 1881 it had increased by 4,300. One can thus take the list of the counties and find everywhere the same result. Let us see, how, the city of St. John, N. B., represented here by three friends of the Government. During the last ten years the population of that city has decreased by 3,392. Well, it is our right to call the attention of the Government to this state of things, and to say to them and their friends that they are wrong in not accepting the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), especially when it is known that many of them are in favour of this amendment, that they are wrong to cause it to be said everywhere by the papers that we take an unpatriotic stand by denouncing this state of things. When they feel that the policy which they uphold is bad, and necessarily leads the country to ruin and political anarchy. In my opinion we do the work of good citizens in notifying these gentlemen that we are ready to lend them a hand in remodelling the tariff and remedying the situation. As I said before, the policy inaugurated in 1878 had as its object the development not only of the manufactures, but of agriculture, and the other interests of Canada. Some have progressed a little. Some manufacturers, by forming themselves into combines in order to control the prices, have succeeded in building fortunes. I admit that there are some persons who are ready to open their purses in election times, in order to keep up this system of protection, in which they find their profits. But apart from them there is not a man who can claim to have been benefited by the National Policy. I especially address my friends from the province of Quebec, to whom I have just shown that the very city of Quebec has decreased in population. As a compensation for this policy the Maritime provinces have a tax against the foreign coal, which allows them to reap certain benefits. For Ontario there is a duty on the flour which helps to bear the burden of taxes. But for the province of Quebec there is nothing. And more than any, the inhabitants of that province are in need of a change, or a remodelling of the fiscal policy of the country. In the Maritime provinces, and in the province of Ontario, one tax is offset by another—people take from one pocket and put into another. I own that this is not much of a protection, but at least they can say they have something. In the province of Quebec there is not even such an offset. Therefore, we must work with all our might to bring about the change required by the amendment. The hon. Minister of Finance was saying the other day, boasting, as he is wont to do, that he had succeeded in putting into the consumers' pocket the sum of four millions of dollars through the reduction of taxes. I admit that the tax has been reduced on sugar, as well as on tea and coffee, but as the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) so justly said a moment ago, it is a tax, then, which you have removed, and your admission of it is in your very statement. It is ten years that we have been saying that. It is ten years that we have been telling you that the burden of taxation is heavy on the consumer; it is ten years that you have been taxing us, in order to prevent such competition as would lower prices and favour consumers; and now you come and show that we were right by claiming that you have relieved the people from four million of taxes. Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Government to do the same in respect to flour, coal, corn, agricultural implements and binding twine. Your would-be protective duties on those goods are as many taxes which the people will have to pay in the future, if you maintain them. If you wish to know, Mr. Speaker, the amount which this policy has cost the country, I am ready to give it. Here is, from official documents, what has been the increase of taxes since the advent of these gentlemen into power. In 1878, the last year of the Liberal regime of Mr. Mackenzie, eighteen million dollars only were paid into the Dominion treasury. To-day the revenue from the same sources is thirty millions. It is, therefore, twelve million dollars more that the consumer has to pay under the present regime. Remove the surplus of twelve millions, for I do not see why the country cannot be governed with a revenue of twenty-four millions, as was done in 1878. But, I would probably be told, there are additional expenses to meet. Well, I will say in answer to this objection, that the amendment by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) provides for that. If, under the Mackenzie regime, twenty-four millions were enough to meet all the legitimate expenses of the country, I do not see why twenty-eight millions would not be enough now. However, I see that it is again the same amount that the Government is to collect this year. I say that it would be easy to meet all the legitimate expenses with less revenue, that is to say, with a reduction of taxes. But, of course, the expenses would have to be reduced. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) said the other day that the Intercolonial Railway would give this year a deficit of about fifty thousand dollars, only I do not say that such will really be the case, for, if I believe information which has come to me, it would appear that the rolling stock is in such a dilapidated condition as to necessitate a considerable expenditure. If this expenditure is not made now, it will simply be in order that there be shown a reduction of the expenditure toward the extinction of the deficit. But let us take this statement as true. This will mean six hundred thousand dollars off the total expenditure. Now, strike off the revising officers and reduce the expenses of the administration of justice; cut off all the useless employees who burden the Civil Service budget—for to-day there are eight hundred employees, while there were a great many less under Mr. Mackenzie; with all these savings you will be able to remove the duties on sugar, coal, flour, agricultural implements, etc. Notwithstanding all such reductions in the tariff, the Government would still have a revenue of from twenty-eight to thirty million dollars—which should be quite sufficient to meet the legitimate requirements of the public service. But these gentlemen are not satisfied with saying that their policy makes the country prosperous; they also boast of economizing. This economy is like our prosperity—much spoken of but never seen. You never meet a Conservative newspaper man in public meetings who does not maintain that the Government is a model of economy. Everywhere these gentlemen on the right, and their friends, constantly speak of great savings made by the Government. But where are they? There is so little saving done, these gentlemen have conducted the affairs with such extravagance, that they have increased the debt by a very considerable amount. Thus the debt, which at the downfall of the Mackenzie Government was only one hundred and forty million dollars, is now two hundred and forty millions, which means an increase of over one hundred million dollars. Such is the way the affairs of the country have been administered since we have a Conservative Government. I will not detain the attention of the House any longer, but I thought it to be my duty to offer these few observations. In conclusion I will refer to a motion made in 1878 by the then leader of the Opposition:

That this House is of opinion that the welfare of the country requires the adoption of the National Policy, which, by means of a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will favour and encourage agriculture, the mines, the manufactures and other interests of Canada.

It is evident in the face of what is going on and of what we see, that their promises are not being fulfilled. Was the then Opposition in good faith? I do not know. Was this motion made with the object of capturing the confidence of the people? I do not know. If it was made in bad faith it was doubly unfortunate. But if that motion was made in sincerity there need be no shame in reversing it to-day. There should be no harm in saying that there is a remedy for the general depression in reciprocity or in a remodelling of the tariff. There should be no harm for the hon. gentlemen opposite in saying that they favoured a reform of the tariff, since they could not fulfil their promises with the protective system. The second portion of this famous motion of 1878 reads as follows:—

That such a policy would keep in Canada thousands of our countrymen who are now obliged to exile themselves to find employment which they are denied at home.

The second paragraph is as fallacious as was the first. We find the proof of this in the census, in the number of empty houses, and also in the number of immigrants, who after having come to settle in this country, have left us. If we take into consideration the natural increase of the population of the country, we find that we have not kept our own people at home. Therefore we see that the two propositions of this motion have failed. The country is less prosperous and the country has decreased. I therefore cannot see in what we can be considered disloyal to the country, when we say that the Conservatives have not fulfilled their promises. Now what do we propose as a remedy? We wish for no revolution. We do not ask for annexation nor any system of special government. We propose simply to be loyal to the country by adopting a policy which will secure its welfare. We also propose to be loyal to England. But for my part I am before all loyal to the country that gives me my life. I am loyal to the country, under whatever flag that allows me to earn my living and that of my family. We would be unworthy of the position that we occupy if, with a view to a simple and political advancement, with the object of overthrowing the Government, we were to deny the prosperity of the country if such prosperity existed. But, Mr. Speaker, we are told, you say this in order to attain power, to gain the favour of the people, to get possession of the Treasury. It is easy to reply to this. If such were our object we would have only to do as certain members do, we would only have to say the majority is on the other side of the House, let us join the majority. But we believe, we sincerely believe, that the Government's policy is bad, that they are in a dangerous way which leads to a financial and commercial abyss, and we ask them to stop. If they refuse, we warn the country and are not responsible for the consequences. The hon. members on the right who have spoken on this question think as we do, and have declared so, yet they vote for the Government notwithstanding. Then they must be as disloyal as we, since they admit that the taxes are too onerous on the consumer; they must be as disloyal as we since they admit that a readjustment of the tariff is necessary and that the country should be administered more economically. The hon. members on the right said that they were in favour of important changes in the tariff, then why, I ask, do they intend to vote against the amendment before the House? Are they not free agents? They well know that if they voted against the Government, and according to their conviction those who furnished the money for their elections would drop them and they could not be returned any more. This is why we see them take the singular position which they assume whenever the tariff is discussed. This is why they speak in one sense and vote in another. I do not wish to detain the House any longer, as I am speaking a language which is not understood by all. I have said enough, however, to justify the conversion of many, if they are capable of conversion. We have a right, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House and of the country to the promises of these gentlemen on the right, and to ask their condemnation when we prove that they have not kept them. However, they may accuse us of crying down the country, we will continue to give voice to the just claims of the consumers and the tax-payers of this Dominion, and our course inspired by duty, will be in the direction of the greatest good of the country in general and of our province in particular.

Mr. BELLEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—DEATH OF MR. GORDON.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House. He said: Mr. Speaker. In moving the adjournment of the House, I feel it my duty to call the attention of hon. members to the fact that we have received authoritative news to-night of the death of one of our colleagues, the late member for Nanaimo, B.C. (Mr. Gordon). I am sure that I can say, with the greatest earnestness, on behalf of the gentlemen who sat with him on this side of the House, that ever since he entered Parliament, and that is something over ten years ago, he has proved himself a most useful and faithful member. The devotion which he gave to his constituency has not been exceeded by that of the most assiduous member of Parliament, and those of us who had occasion to observe the manner in which he was respected in his own constituency, and the manner in which his public services were appreciated there, felt more honoured than ever by his acquaintance, and by the fact that we were co-operating with him in public life. It is very regretful indeed that he has been taken away under circumstances of unusual distress. His health has been failing for years, and many of us remarked during last session that he was then almost struggling with death. The knowledge which has come to us since indicates that his departure was especially melancholy. I feel bound, in moving the adjournment—as I would have done at an earlier period of the day, if we had been assured certainly of the announcement—to call to the attention of the House the sad loss of so worthy a member.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I very sincerely join in every word that has been uttered by the Prime Minister as to the esteem in which everybody held our late lamented colleague, Mr. Gordon. Though on this side of the House we have not had the same occasion to associate with him as his political friends had, still it is a pleasure for me to bear testimony to the high character which he always maintained here. The hon. gentleman seemed to be one of those happy men who had no enemies, and who, while they can differ from opponents, still can always remain on the best of terms with them. It was always a pleasure on this side of the House to look at his genial and cheerful countenance, and whenever he took part in our debates, it was always a pleasure to listen to the way in which he put forth his arguments and his own views, and which he always did in a manner so as to give offence to nobody, but pleasure to all. I am sure that his death is a great loss to his political friends especially, but it is also a loss to the whole House; to his opponents as well as to those who were most intimately associated with him. Once more I beg to say that I join in the expressions of regret which have been given utterance to by the Prime Minister.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 21st February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 59) to incorporate the Canada Carriage Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish, with the indulgence of the House, to say a few words by way of personal explanation. I find by the report in the "Empire" of what occurred here the other day in reference to the visit of certain members of this House to His Excellency, that my hon. friend the First Minister is reported as follows:—

It transpires from the explanation of Mr. Weldon and the other gentlemen that the facts were about these:

I may say the "Hansard" report mentions my name as one of those who made the explanation.

That these gentlemen, in accordance with the usage which prevails during every session of Parliament, took occasion to call upon His Excellency, as other members of Parliament do. (Laughter.) I understand that to be the substance of what they state. In the course of the conversation which then took place, this subject, which, in the view of these gentlemen might possibly affect Imperial interests, was mentioned, and as it might be a matter requiring the consideration of his advisers, His Excellency, with great delicacy and propriety, immediately requested that any facts in their possession should be laid before him in such a form that they could be presented to his advisers for their consideration. It would seem that the interview passed off with the utmost harmony on both sides, and that the constitution was not broken after all. Under these circumstances it strikes me we shall all feel more comfortable for the matter having been brought up in the House this afternoon, because, in the first place, it appears that nothing of the grave character which the newspapers reported as having transpired on that occasion really took place.

I find by reference to the official report that that is, in substance, what my hon. friend said on that occasion. I had fancied at the time that he had said as here reported, but I could not hear very well, for we all know the acoustic properties of this House are not what might be desired, but I found on speaking to several members on this side of the House, that they differed from me as to the purport of the remarks that had fallen from the First Minister. However, I find that this is practically what he did say. I am quite sure the majority of hon. members, on this side of the House at least, understood that my hon. friend the First Minister was simply pursuing the same course the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) had pursued in poking a little fun at the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and that he was not in any degree expressing the deliberate opinion that this was the explanation we had offered of our visit to His Excellency, nor that he in any degree endorsed the extraordinary constitutional principles which the hon. member for Bothwell attempted to lay down in this House. But I find that is not the view which the public have taken of those remarks. A very general misconception prevails, for it is supposed that the First Minister really meant to say that this was the explanation which we had given of our visit. I am exceedingly unwilling to bring the subject before the House, or at any time to occupy the time of the House in reference to anything personal to myself; but it is quite impossible that I can allow myself to stand before the public in the position of having endeavoured to escape from an embarrassing position by making a misstatement of the facts. The facts were these: that we approached His Excellency for the express purpose of laying certain facts before him.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, for the purpose of laying certain facts before him. I do not wish any misconception to exist, so far as I am concerned, with respect to that matter. That was the object, and the sole object of our going to see His Excellency on that occasion. We had previously brought this matter to the notice of the Dominion Government. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) had done so, and I understood he was received by the First Minister and by the Minister of Finance with the greatest courtesy, and that they listened with the greatest attention and patience to what he said. However, the hon. gentleman can speak as to that. We had brought that matter, from the Dominion point of view, before the Dominion Government. We considered that we had another avenue by which we might approach the end we had in view, and that was by bringing the matter to the notice of the statesman who is here to represent Imperial interests, as well as to be the head of this Government. We considered that His Excellency is here in a dual capacity, as the head of the Dominion Government and also as the representative of the Imperial Government and as the representative of Imperial interests. I wish to enter into no argument with respect to that point, whether we are right or wrong in regard to it; but I merely wish it to be distinctly understood what our objects were and why we called on His Excellency. We believed there was an imminent and pressing danger, not only to this Dominion but to the Empire. We understood an immense alien corporation had secured from two-thirds to three-fourths of all the coal measures in the province of Nova Scotia, and were in a position to secure the balance; and we understood also, and indeed we knew, that they had secured those measures under a lease which was altogether unprecedented in character in Canada. Whereas under all leases that have been granted to our own people for the prosecution of the coal industry—

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to confine himself to a personal explanation.

Mr. McNEILL. I am at once ready, Mr. Speaker, to bow to your ruling. I am explaining why we went to see His Excellency, and the motives which induced us to go. If you, Sir, rule that I am going too far, I will bow to your ruling. I was merely going on to say that this was a lease which differed altogether from any other lease that had been granted.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McNEILL. Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you have ruled that I should not proceed further?

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman should go into the question of the lease itself or the motives that may have induced the Nova Scotia Government to issue that lease, but he should confine himself to a statement of the facts and of the object he had in view.

Mr. McNEILL. I certainly did not wish to say anything respecting the motives of the Nova Scotia Government. I will not say more on the subject than this, that we had no idea of offering advice to His Excellency. I am quite sure such a thought never entered into the mind of any one who went to His Excellency, but we visited him to lay these facts before him in his capacity as an officer of the Imperial Government. As I understand it, his own Government do not offer him advice in his capacity as an Imperial officer. We considered, and we still consider, that we were perfectly within our constitutional right in going to him to call his attention to this matter, which we looked upon as of the very gravest importance to the Empire. From a Canadian point of view, we had already brought the matter before the notice of our own Government. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to add.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). Mr. Speaker, before the Government Orders are called, I wish, on the question of fact, to endorse what the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has said. I have re-read my remarks in the discussion of Friday last, and any one who will take the trouble to read them will see from the whole tone of what I said, that we meant to be understood as going directly and expressly, as we did go directly and expressly, to His Excellency for the purpose mentioned by my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill). I was sorry that my remarks were misunderstood by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). In truth, I thought that his observations were not intended seriously. It was only when I heard his leader and his colleague from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) supporting him—and these latter two speeches having been made after I had spoken and had lost my right to speak again—it was only then that I discovered that the thing was really seriously meant. When the criticism upon us was first made it seemed to me so perfectly preposterous that I could not think the hon. gentleman was in earnest. The flippancy of my remarks was due mainly to that fact. I have the same opinion now that I had when we first arranged to call upon His Excellency as to the gravity of the danger. I repeat again that I do not claim to have that authority on military or naval subjects which could enable me to speak on my own behalf, but I was in receipt of news in reference to this matter which seemed to me to be very grave. I claim the right asserted by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), to go to His Excellency, without any discourtesy to our leaders, in reference to a matter which could not come before him in the ordinary way as the head of the Canadian Government, and to represent the case to him as an officer of the Imperial Government. I was glad my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) put me right by saying that we have urged the Canadian aspects of this coal deal upon our leader at the earliest day. The very second day after I arrived in Ottawa I did go to my leader, and I can testify to the courtesy and sympathy and patience with which my leader heard me, on a very busy morning. I had an opportunity two days later of going into the question pretty fully with the Minister of Finance, so that the notion which seems to prevail here in the House, that there was any misunderstanding or that there was any intention of going behind the back of our leaders, is not founded at all upon fact.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it is not without hesitation that I rise for the first time in this House to express my humble opinion on the important question which occupies us in this moment. And, must I say it, I would have remained silent still longer had I not counted on the indulgence of the hon. members on both sides of this House; I do not, Mr. Speaker, flatter myself with the idea that I shall bring into this debate, arguments which the hon. members who have preceded me may have forgotten, or not thought of. I simply wish to take my share in the present debate. It would be enough in order to justify my support of the policy of the party to which I belong, to go over the events which have taken place in the country within the last eighteen years, and which are the living, palpable evidence that the Conservative party has not failed in the task which it had undertaken, of giving new life to the affairs of the country, and that it had shown itself jealous of the progress and general prosperity of the nation. To deny this progress, to deny this prosperity, which is everywhere to be seen, is to deny evidence, is to deny facts which have manifested themselves in the country during the last eighteen years. It is to court disappointment before the people, who after all, have eyes to see, and ears to hear with, and who will always know how to distinguish between the regime which protects the farmer, the merchant and the working man; and the regime under which they started during four consecutive years. One remembers that epoch of 1878, when Sir John A. Macdonald, after having covered the Dominion, carried his signal victory over the Liberals. One remembers that it was in 1878 that he unfolded to the country this idea of a National Policy, a policy which has since then not only been approved in its conception, but sanctioned in its practice at three different times, namely, in 1882, 1887 and 1891. Yes, Mr. Speaker, this idea brought forth by Sir John Macdonald has been sanctioned at different periods by immense majorities. Therefore the policy that we defend to-day is not to speak, our policy; it is the policy of the people; the policy which they have commissioned us to defend before the country, and before the House. It is then the duty of Conservatives to support this policy, and try to have it sanctioned by the greatest majority in this House. I say then, that when the Liberals claim here that this policy has been ruinous—some have even said that it was immoral—it is not the Conservative party in this House that is accused, but it is the people who are so accused of supporting a ruinous and immoral policy. What have been the results of this policy inaugurated in the year 1878? They are easy to see. We have to-day manufactories everywhere; trade has taken a new start; the agricultural community is a hundred fold more prosperous than it was in 1878. These are facts which nobody can deny. One has only to go over our rural counties to become convinced that this policy has succeeded in bettering the condition of the farmer, not only by the direct effect of the principle underlying it, but also by the fostering which, owing to the revenues brought in, the Government was enabled to afford to all the public enterprises and the great improvements needed throughout the Dominion. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) asked last night: "What have we gained in the province of Quebec through the National Policy?" We have gained all the public works existing to-day; all our railways built in consequence of this National Policy. If we have to-day in the district of Quebec the Lac St. Jean Railway, is it not thanks to the subsidies granted by the Government to this enterprise, which has been called a national one? Is it not thanks to revenues brought in solely by this policy? I ask the House, could we have built this railway, which to-day offers to colonization an immense territory, and which in the month of June next will extend as far as Chicoutimi, shortly to reach the fine parishes of St. Alphonse and St. Alexis? Now, I will ask, was this railroad built in the interests of the manufacturers or of colonization? Again, the Baie des Chaleurs railway. Has that railway been built for the manufacturers or for colonization? The answer is easy. The hon. member for Montmagny said that we have had nothing in the province of Quebec out of the National Policy. Well, I say he either does not know what is going on, or he lacks good faith. I cannot believe that he would come before this House to deceive it, I would rather believe the first alternative. Now let me look at the progress made in Montreal, the great commercial metropolis of Canada. What gave birth, in Montreal, to the cotton manufactories, and other great industries, which make its prosperity? Was it the Mackenzie Government policy, or that of Sir John A. Macdonald's Administration? But let us come down to Quebec, which the hon. member for Montmagny knows well. Upon what are sustained the great boot and shoe manufactories of Quebec? What gives bread to the thousands of workmen employed in the manufactories of St. Roch's? Is it the Mackenzie policy or the National Policy? Let us ask these workmen; they will tell us that unrestricted reciprocity will ruin these industries and close the doors of these manufactories. They understand that we are not able to resist the influence and the capital of the United States manufacturers. This is perfectly reasonable; but the hon. member for Montmagny seemed to overlook it last night. Thus the improvement of our canals, and the construction of our railways have been the work of the Conservative party and of the National Policy. And if to-day our workingmen can earn bread for themselves and their families they owe it to this National Policy, which we defend, and which I hope will last long. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) said last night "the people are with us." Unfortunately, they do not vote with you. However, he mentioned the election in L'Islet, and said this election proves it. We have had there fair-play, he said; we have met on equal ground and with equal arms, and we have brought them down. I will take the liberty, Mr. Speaker, to differ with the hon. member. I say that in the recent election in the county of L'Islet the question of protection versus unrestricted reciprocity has not been so frankly, so honestly put as he said last night. To begin with, Mr. Speaker, we must not forget that the county of L'Islet was a former Liberal stronghold, that we had by accident, so to speak, carried at the general elections of 1891. It was not, therefore, a county where the two parties were on the same footing as to their respective strength; but moreover the election of the hon. gentleman for L'Islet has not been made on the question of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, as was said by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) the question of protection versus reciprocity was not squarely put. Consequently no such conclusions as those drawn by the member for Montmagny can be derived from this election. The member elected at L'Islet was not the candidate of unrestricted reciprocity, but rather the representative of protection, if I am to believe his declarations. I hold in my hand several extracts from his newspaper—the newspaper which he has edited for many years—the late "Le Canadien." And what did he say in this paper? Let us see, Mr. Speaker, how the hon. member for L'Islet appreciated the Liberal policy, and we will see that he is far from holding the same views of his neighbour for Montmagny:

Whatever may be said, on the whole our affairs are very prosperous. It is evidently wiser to continue with new ardour the works which we have so well begun, rather than to unsettle our people, paralyze its efforts by projects impossible to realize.

This was written on the 2nd June, 1887. Referring to unrestricted reciprocity, the main programme of the Liberal party, he, the member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), now one of the Liberal leaders of the province of Quebec, the leader of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette), wrote on the 14th August, 1887:

We conclude that in any project of development of our commercial relations with the American republic, we shall also have to be guided by the principle of protection for our national industries. This will be an efficient means of obtaining reasonable compensations for the concessions which we may think fit to make. It is easy to see by what we have just said that we strongly disapprove those who continue the untimely movement in favour of unrestricted reciprocity.

Again, on the 28th May, 1888, the member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), one of the Liberal leaders who supports the Opposition, one of those whom the member of Montmagny supports, wrote the following:—

If the opposition makes the political blunder of continuing before the electoral body the campaign, which it has so ingloriously conducted in the House of Commons in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, all the friends of protection for our national industry shall have to join their forces in order to oppose an invincible resistance to those who so strongly misappreciate the interests of Canada, and the result of the new struggle will not be doubtful. The national policy will triumph for a fourth time.

These are, Mr. Speaker, the very words of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), one of those whom the hon. member for Montmagny supports, and the election of whom he holds up as an evidence that the people is against us and does not want the protective policy. What did the member for L'Islet say again on the 3rd of November, 1888? and I wish especially to draw the attention of the House to the words which I am going to quote. I will also point to the hon. members of the Opposition that these words do not come from us, but from one of their leaders of this day. On 3rd November, 1888, the member for L'Islet wrote:

Our farmers have now an excellent market in their own country, and they will not commit the folly of handing it over to foreign competition.

Well, Mr. Speaker, was I not right in answering as I did the assertion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) when he said that the fight in L'Islet had been square against protection, and that the result showed that the people are against the policy of the Conservative policy, and favourable to that of the Opposition. In claiming this, he made a mistake—a grievous mistake. It was a protectionist who was elected in L'Islet, and not a supporter of unrestricted reciprocity. The hon. member for Montmagny spoke of the L'Islet election as an evidence that the people is against protection and favourable to the political programme of the Opposition. Where then were the people in the various by-elections which took place in the district? In Quebec West, how is it then that the hon. member who represents that division was elected by a larger majority than had ever been given in that riding for a great number of years? Was not the policy of unrestricted reciprocity crushed down at that election where the Conservative majority reached a figure unheard of until then? After having returned a Liberal, has not the county of Montmorency elected in 1892 a Conservative, my hon. friend, Mr. Turcotte, who so worthily represents that county? What happened at that election? Did the policy of unrestricted reciprocity carry the day? Is it not true, on the contrary, that the Oppositionist candidate felt that the popular feeling was so strong against him that he had to withdraw from the struggle and allow the Conservative candidate to be returned by acclamation? In the counties of Chicoutimi and Saguenay, have the Liberals hoisted the flag of unrestricted reciprocity? No, Mr. Speaker, there were even three candidates in the field, and not one of them dared to speak in favour of that policy. All proclaimed themselves protectionists, and my opponents even tried to make the people believe that they were more so than I am. Why did they not speak against the National Policy? Because the people is favourable to this policy and repels that of the Liberal party. Why is the people in favour of the National Policy? Because this policy has worked for the good of the country and has allowed the Government to do great things. No one will ever succeed, Mr. Speaker, in getting the people to believe that they must give up protection and adopt the programme of unrestricted reciprocity, this delusion, this chimera, which cannot give the results anticipated. My opponents declared themselves favourable to the Government's policy, and note, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal party gave all its support to those opponents of his. Just as in 1891 when they succeeded in defeating the now hon. Postmaster-General (Sir A. P. Caron). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) last night spoke words to be regretted, and which it is my duty to take up. Speaking of the Conservative members, he told the House that when we entered Room No. 16, we leave our freedom at the door: that we are only slaves in the service of the Government, and that we cannot vote any more against the policy of the Government, because in doing so we risk losing the money furnished by the manufacturers to insure our elections. I consider these words insulting to the members who give their confidence to the Government. I protest against these words because I believe that the Conservative members in this House are as independent as the hon. member for Montmagny. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) is not a man so superior, morally, intellectually, or in the matters of fortune, that he can boast of being more independent than we are. We can, I think, stand on his level. We are no more slaves to our party than he to his. When we follow our leaders whose lines are towards the good of the country, we do nothing but our duty as free and independent men. As to the manufacturers' money spoken of by the hon. member, I can assure him that we will never fall in our duty for such consideration. As to myself, personally, I have not received a cent from the ministers; I do not know whether the party got money from the manufacturers, but what I do know is that the Liberal party made its election in 1891 with the sweatings from the public treasury of the province of Quebec. What I know is that fifty or sixty thousand dollars were taken from the chest of that province for the Dominion General Elections for 1891. It is the Liberal party which benefited by the plunder revealed by the Baie des Chaleurs, and other scandals. I recall these matters, Mr. Speaker, not as a useless recrimination, but because we have been taunted as slaves ready to follow their leaders anywhere. We follow our political leaders, not because we are not free to do otherwise, but because they deserve our support and our confidence in every respect. We may well follow our party and do so through conviction. We may well support the present Government and the policy which they are carrying out, because we believe that this policy works for the good of the country. At any rate no one may deny us our convictions. These are, Mr. Speaker, the few observations, which I had to make on the subject before the House. The work of the Conservative party is not over. It must continue the work it has carried on since 1878, keeping abreast of circumstances of time and place as they present themselves. The Conservative party has laid the foundation, it has built the walls of the edifice, it must now crown its work. It will have to follow in this the same scheme of architecture: for it is evident, that another would illy crown the monument. The same principle has to be followed and applied to the new circumstances, while the work may be done with different material and in forms more delicate. The hon. member for Montmagny said last night, now that the old chieftain is dead your policy must change Mr. Speaker, we do not change policy. We may modify it, but we respect the principle which the old chieftain, as he is called, laid down in 1878. We are not ashamed to follow the line he has traced for us. He has left lasting traces. I have not known him personally, I have never even seen him, but everything within these walls still tells of his high personality. The best gift he left to us, however, is the worthy continuer of his work, the present Prime Minister. This Premier, by the leave of the hon. member for Montmagny, will know how to carry victoriously the Conservative flag throughout the Dominion, and that in the interest of our common land.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, even if I were not bound by parliamentary custom to congratulate the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay on the manner in which he has made his "debut" in this House, it would be a duty and a pleasure to me to render him homage for the ability which he can put into a bad cause. Recently elected, by the help of the high and powerful protection of the Postmaster-General (Sir A. P. Caron), it is quite natural that he should hasten to pay his tribute of praise to the National Policy, which probably brought into his own election fund subscriptions which have not a little contributed to give him a seat in the House of Commons. I believe that there is in that quite ground enough upon which to grow feelings of gratitude. However, it seems to me there should be limits to gratitude, and my hon. friend, the member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay would not have impaired the power of his eloquence, would not have lost his reputation as a thorough and through partisan of the system of political dependence, if he had bridled a little the expression of his admiration and enthusiasm for the National Policy. Truly, in witnessing such solemn gestures, in hearing such a magnificent voice as his, in listening to the pompous eulogy of the National Policy, and recollecting the animated phases of his election, I was expecting that the member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay, in his great admiration for the National Policy, was going to tell us that it was that policy that had invented the telegraph which enabled Mgr. Bosse, during his election, to fortify the weak points of his electoral organization. I was also expecting that the hon. member would attribute to the merits of the National Policy the invention of the match boxes, which sometimes also replaced the official tin boxes in which are to be deposited the voters' ballots. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has stopped short of that. Besides his eulogium of the advantages of the National Policy was pompous enough to allow him to stop short of these absurdities which I was prepared to hear. He could also have checked himself from many other things which he, however, had the audacity to say, as, for example, to repeat to satiety how prosperous this country is, and how this prosperity is due to the National Policy. It is true that the Minister of Finance has said the same thing, but the Minister of Finance is obliged by his position to do all he can to make us believe what is not true, and he acquitted himself fully. But with us members our duty is to believe only what we know to be true, and especially not to believe what we know to be false. Truly, when we consider the misery in which a great part of the people, especially the rural population, suffer to-day; when we realize that they are obliged to emigrate to the United States because of the prevailing distress, and when, on another hand, we witness the emphasis with which we are told that the country is prosperous, can the members who say these things expect to be taken seriously; should they not rather be taken as strangers to the country in which they live? I am astonished that the Tory party, which lectures us at every turn, which constantly accuses us of treason because we do not mimic closely enough the English nation—the mother land—I am astonished, I say, that they should allow to enter into their own customs, precedents so contrary to what is practised in the Imperial Parliament. One would truly think, Mr. Speaker, that speaking the truth is to be avoided, while the contrary holds elsewhere. I was reading lately in the Speech from the Throne pronounced at the opening of the Imperial Parliament now in session in London, a whole paragraph devoted to regret over the misery suffered by the population in certain parts of England. Here, on the contrary, truth must be hidden. Is that the proper way to remedy the evils pressing upon the people? Is it by hiding the ills that they can best be remedied? In making this statement which I have just mentioned, in the Speech delivered from the Throne in the Imperial Parliament, has Mr. Gladstone belittled himself, has he lowered himself as a statesman, and will he be considered as a man inferior to—say the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley), who, in the wake of the hon. Minister of Finance, declared that this country is prosperous? It is not disloyalty, Mr. Speaker, to speak simply the truth. It is to show one's sincerity. It is to show one self patriotic, to face the situation of the country in order to study and remedy it. The hon. member made another error in his speech, when he accused us of being disloyal, of decrying the country when we say it is not prosperous. These charges have already many times been refuted by a great number of members on this side of the House. However, it seems that these refutations are of no avail with members who know how to flourish their arms in a show of eloquence, but upon whom arguments seem to be powerless. We have seen them launch into comparisons. I am willing to follow them on that ground. Here is a comparison that I am going to make. Let us suppose that the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley) be the country, or rather—this would be too much honour—let us suppose that the hon. Minister of Finance be the country. The physician of the hon. Minister of Finance finds that he is afflicted with a serious disease, but this physician thinks that he must not discourage the patient, and, with that object in view, he thinks proper to hide the truth from him. He must not tell him he is sick, but on the contrary, he must make him believe that his health is perfect. On the complaint of the hon. Minister of Finance, saying to his physician: I am suffering from a general depression of the whole system; what is the matter with me? The physician answers: Oh, it is nothing but a moment of weakness; it will be over in a moment; your health is really unimpaired; have no fear. You can imagine, Mr. Speaker, what fate would await the hon. Minister of Finance at the hand of such a physician, if he did not seek the services of another doctor who would apply another regime and would tell him the truth as to the state of his health. Who is our best friend, I pray, if not the one who tells us the truth? And is not the best physician also the one who recognizes the gravity of the case and sets about to treat it seriously? Surely, the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley) cannot deserve to be called the best friend of the Government. I said, Mr. Speaker, that we should face the situation. It is useless to deny it, there prevails in the country a general depression. The Conservative press, as well as the Liberal, ask for a remedy for this state of things, and what does the Government reply to our prayers? We are going to have an investigation; we are going to appoint a commission to this effect, and we will try to remedy whatever evil there be. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is not what should satisfy and reassure us, considering especially the iniquity which for the last thirteen years has been perpetrated upon the agricultural community. Let one read the tariff and see what infamy it constitutes to the prejudice of the farmers. The farming implements are subject to a tax altogether disproportionate to those on other goods. The agricultural implements are taxed 35 per cent, while the musical implements pay only 25 per cent. It would seem that the Government thought less of a plough than of a tune on the flute or the fiddle. The dental and surgical implements are only taxed 20 per cent, that is to say, 15 less than the agricultural implements. Is this reasonable, I ask, Mr. Speaker? Iron pays $3 a ton, and steel $13 a ton. Now, there is not a single farming implement in which iron does not enter, while nickel, which may be considered and is really a thing of luxury, comes in free. Is this reasonable? Coal oil pays 7 cents duty per gallon. It is here that a reduction has been made in the cost of barrelling this oil, and I congratulate the Government on this; but I am entitled to complain of nothing more having been done in the way of reform, for when you are doing right you should not stop half way, especially when the people have been suffering for twelve years. As I have just said, notwithstanding the reduction made, coal oil is still cumbered with a tax of 7 cents per gallon, while the oil of roses which the dukes use on their hair and handkerchiefs comes in free. Steel pens—I will be told, perhaps, that this is an insignificant item, but I only mention it because it seems that the purpose has been to tax the poor heavily, while dealing gently with the rich—steel pens, I say, bear 30 per cent, while gold pens only pay 20 per cent. Why this difference? Ebony and mahogany, which hardly enter in the furniture used by the poor, are imported free. This is not more reasonable than the cases I have mentioned already. Precious stones, mother-of-pearl, which are only used by the rich, are free, while the instruments which are used in agriculture bear a burden of 35 per cent. Tin is also admitted free. Not even for the velocipedes has an exception been made; they pay 5 per cent less than the farmers' implements. I have mentioned these articles in order to show the House that the tariff is particularly onerous on the agricultural class, and that it is framed to the advantage of the rich. I could point out other articles, but I would fear to occupy uselessly the time of the House. Where has this system landed us? Let us take the facts and examine them. I will for this purpose confine myself to an altogether rural community, and let me first choose the county of Napierville, which I have the honour to represent in this House. What are figures of the last census. The village of Napierville had in 1881 a population of 922; in 1891 it had come down to 860. In 1881 the parish of St. Cyprien had a population of 1,887, while in 1891 it was only 1,703, having decreased by 184. I will point out that in the parishes the decrease is still greater than in the villages; the decrease is enormous. The parish of St. Edouard counted in 1881, 1,499 souls, and in 1891, 1,290, a difference of 209. It is easy to notice, also, that beside this decrease we have also lost all the natural increase of population. In 1881, St. Michel had 1,651 souls, and in 1891, there were only left 1,619. The other parishes also show a decrease. In fact there is not a single parish in the county but has decreased in population. In the aggregate the county has lost 666 souls of a farming population during the last decade. In the county of Laprairie, a county represented by a friend of the Government, the parish of Laprairie had, in 1881, a population of 1,841 souls. In 1891 this figure had fallen to 1,574, a decrease of 267. It will not be said that it is the speeches of the Liberals, those dishonest and disloyal men, which have caused this depopulation, considering that this county is represented by a good Conservative, notwithstanding which fact we find a decrease of 267 for the last decade. The village of Laprairie showed a population of 1,341 in 1881; in 1891 it had fallen to 1,246, a decrease of 94. Caughnawaga, a place so greatly favoured by the National Policy that the manufactories have increased there to a number of 45, if we are to believe the census—I suppose basket-making has been counted as manufacturing—Caughnawaga, I say, shows an increase of 252 for the last ten years. The parish of St. Constant had in 1881, 1,722 souls; in 1891 it had only 1,572, a decrease of 150. St. Isidore had 1,591 souls in 1881, and 1,463 in 1891, which is a loss of 128. St. Jacques-le-Mineur, counted 1,603 inhabitants in 1881, and 1,393 in 1891, a loss of 210. St. Philippe counted 1,655 in 1887, and 1,716 in 1891, an increase of 62. Thus, I have just enumerated the parishes of two counties, and among them all there is only that of St. Philippe which shows a slight increase of 62. Of ten parishes, nine have decreased, and largely decreased. What is the teaching which is to be derived from this decrease of our population? It is that the agricultural class, the rural interests, are ill-treated under the present system, and that it is time some thought should be given to protecting them, not by such a system of protection as we have, but by giving them markets and openings for the disposal of their produce, such as they would get from reciprocity. With a protective tariff we only work in antagonism to these interests. I could mention other counties, the figures regarding which I hold in my hand, but such enumerations are pretty monotonous, and they all go to show the same result, a general decrease in the population. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay is incapable to prove, figures in hand, and by a pure and simple argument, the efficiency and the advantages of the National Policy, without pointing out, as those who have an argument always do—to the results of the ballot. We have been supported in 1882, in 1887, and in 1891. We have especially been supported in the election of Chicoutimi and Saguenay. Hearing him, you would think that all the Liberals had gathered there in his county to work for Mr. Savard, his opponent, whom he defeated in his last election. Is it not time to cease giving such bye-elections as evidence of the approval of the country in general? A bye-election, when canvassers have gathered in a county to work the public sentiment, can not be held as a criterion of public opinion. And besides, even if my hon. friend for Chicoutimi and Saguenay had been fairly elected—we know, however, how he was elected—but even, I say, if he had been elected fairly, and without undue influence, should we not have the same reason to say that, in the county of L'Islet, where the Liberal candidate was elected, the people are with us. There was there a fair and open battle, and yet the member for L'Islet to-day is among the Opposition to the present Government. Are we not right in saying, after the election of L'Islet, that the people are with us? And let it not be said that the other party did not do its best. We know very well that the hon. Postmaster-General had it at heart to defeat the member for L'Islet. We know very well that certain Ministers and certain occupants of the judicial bench had an interest in his defeat, and yet he has triumphed through the will and free vote of the people. Is this election not enough to off-set the argument drawn from the other bye-elections where corruption did more work than the discussions on the hustings? The member of Chicoutimi and Saguenay has also found much to praise in the National Policy for the subsidies granted to railways. He has had the audacity to mention the subsidy given to the Lac St. Jean railway. The hon. Postmaster-General is not in his seat. If he were, it seems to me he would blush in hearing the mention of the subsidies granted to this railway. There was recently a commission of investigation appointed by the Government which held its sitting in Quebec, and the hon. Postmaster-General—who is so pure and honest—the hon. Postmaster-General, whose mission it is to direct the opinions of the counties where an election is being held, has owned before this commission to having received from Mr. Ross, Mr. Beemer's money-man and the Government's bounty giver—the sum of $25,000. What has he done with these $25,000? Used them to pay for masses? Certainly not. To pay for prayers for the recovery of our violated rights in Manitoba? Surely not. And yet, had there not been other pecuniary help towards the election of the Conservatives, I am pretty sure that the member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay would not be sitting in this House. Mr. Speaker, I have held the floor long enough, and I do not mean to continue. I will only take the liberty to point out to the Government to what class they do the most wrong in maintaining the present tariff. I have no confidence in the commission which it is the Government's intention to appoint. The hon. Minister of Finance told us that he would probably go over the country to gather information. Whom will he interview? The manufacturers. But are the manufacturers going to give information against their own interests? Is he going to question the farmers, those who really suffer from this protection? But we, the representatives of the farmers, we, the members for the rural districts, do we not tell the Government in what misery the farmers are living? We are not alone in informing them on this point. Their friends in the House, and the Conservative press of the country are constantly doing the same. Well, if you refuse to listen to the voice of the members—their representatives—whom are you going to hear before that commission? I suspect that we will soon have a general election, and that the manufacturers, seeing themselves in danger, will subscribe twice more than usual to carry the elections. If that is not the object, there is need of a commission to bring about the changes that are required to-day. You have assailed the farmers last year in redistributing the seats of this House, in reducing the number of their representatives; but they have enough members left yet to make you understand the sense and the necessity of the tariff reforms which we claim for the agricultural community. And woe to the Government if they do not understand this demand. As I said before, you have assailed the most numerous class of the country, one which could crush you like glass should you venture soon to go to the polls. You have assailed a class which you cannot buy when it once understands the programme of the present Opposition. You have assailed a class which produces everything, the class which, should it fold its arms for some ten years, would reduce to famine all the others, all the other classes that have only to eat, sleep and idle. You have assailed a class, a great part of which have been forced to emigrate, leaving here fathers and brothers to avenge them. And this vengeance will be all the more terrible because it will be exercised on the polling day.

Mr. SPROULE. Seeing that we have the liberty of using the dual language in this Chamber, I will not attempt to follow the hon. gentleman who has just spoken so eloquently in his own tongue, because he has, I appre-

head, an advantage over me in understanding English, while I cannot speak French. Therefore, I will take the liberty of speaking in my own language. At the outset I may say that I think we have a fair right to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance upon the plain, business-like statement of the condition of this country which he presented to this House in his Budget speech. He is the man above all others charged with the duty of looking after the financial affairs of this Dominion, and keeping an account of the income and the outlay, and it is the duty of the Government to which he belongs to so shape their policy that the financial statement which he makes at the end of the year will commend itself, not only to the judgment of this House, but to the country; and he is to be congratulated on being able to present such a favourable statement to the people of Canada, in regard to the management of their affairs and the economy which he and his colleagues have displayed, as well as their energy in developing the country and promoting its relations with other countries. The hon. Finance Minister has given us the thirteenth statement that has been made since the National Policy was introduced, and it is for this House to judge whether or not that policy has fulfilled the expectations with which it was introduced in 1878, or whether it has been a failure. Now, what was the first thing it was to accomplish? The first was to raise a revenue for the needs of the country. We know that our country, like all others, requires a large amount of money for its public works, its railways, and all other means of perfecting the highways of commerce and enabling the people to bring to their doors the necessities and conveniences of life, so that they may carry on their operations successfully, economically and comfortably; and one of the problems which the Government has to solve every year is how to raise that money so that the people will feel it the least. The National Policy was devised for that purpose in 1879, because in 1878, 1877 and 1876 there had been deficiencies in the revenue every year. I need not turn to the public accounts to show that the National Policy has been the means of providing us with ample revenue for the needs of the country, for I think that no one will dare to dispute the fact at this time, even though we have been spending money lavishly in various ways for the development of the country from 1878 to the present time, over and above what has been necessary to keep up our payments on the public debt. The next point was, would the National Policy give employment to the people of the country? Before its introduction a great many of our people were out of employment, and our opponents say that the National Policy has not given them employment, so that we are obliged to give facts and figures to show that it has accomplished that end. In this connection I may be pardoned if I refer to a number of lines in which there has been a development. When hon. gentlemen say that the National Policy has not given employment to any considerable number of people, I would like to ask them who were the people who made the $165,769,637 worth of manufactured goods made in 1891 more than were made in 1881. Surely they were the artisans and labouring men of the country. Therefore, the National Policy must have given employment to those who were engaged in increasing the output of our manufactories to that extent. Then, if you look at the statistics which we have at hand, you will find that 112,930 more hands were employed in the manufactories of the country in 1891 than in 1881. If the National Policy so stimulated the manufacturers of the country as to enable them to employ that number of additional hands, it must have given employment to them. We might ask further, who made the machinery and plant, constructed the buildings, and carried on the other different operations in connection with the additional manufacturing establishments which have been brought into existence between 1881 and 1891? In 1891 we find that there were 25,845 new industrial establishments more than there were in 1881. Is it possible that the buildings and the machinery, most of which was made in Canada, could be got for these establishments, and that operations could be carried on in them without giving employment to a large additional number of workingmen? It seems to me so plain that you would scarcely expect any reasonable man to contradict the statement that the National Policy has given employment to the people of Canada. Then, again, in 1878 we exported to other countries only about $4,000,000 worth of manufactured goods. We find that last year we exported no less than $4,000,000 worth of manufactured goods more than we did in 1878; and we exported that quantity of goods more than we needed for home consumption, we must have given employment to a great deal of additional labour. Therefore, I think I may fairly claim that the contention is made good that the National Policy has given employment to labour. The next object of the National Policy was to keep the home market for our own people. Has it done so? Well, we find that last year there were consumed in Canada, of manufactured goods made in the country, $157,769,637 more than in 1881. Deduct the $4,000,000 worth of exports that went out in 1878, and the $8,000,000 worth that went out last year, and still there were no less than $150,000,000 worth of goods consumed in Canada. Now, why were they consumed in Canada? Because foreign goods were shut out to that extent, and to that extent Canadians had the advantage of their home market for the products of their own labour, and largely made from raw materials produced in the country. Therefore, we may say that the National Policy has given our people the home market. But we are told that the farmers of Canada have not received any advantage from the home market, for their products are not consumed in Canada. I am surprised that hon. gentlemen who speak in that way do not look at the Trade and Navigation Returns, otherwise they would come to a different conclusion. I will not give the figures for every year since the introduction of the National Policy; I will simply show the value of goods that have been kept out of the country in one or two years, so as to enable us to judge how far the National Policy has benefited the farmers of Canada by giving them the home market for their products. We put a duty on corn, wheat and oats, and what was the result? The first year it kept out American grain, which formerly competed with the grain of Canadian farmers, to the extent of 12,000,000 bushels, and to that extent the Canadian farmer must have been benefited. And in addition to the benefit which he received from the additional market given him at home for that very large quantity, he had also the benefit of the saving he must have made in the cost of transport of that grain to foreign markets, through his having found for it a market at home. The Americans were competing with us in the furnishing of meats to our own people—to the artisans, labourers, and, in many instances, the farmers themselves. We put a duty on beef, pork and mutton, and with what result? In one year we kept out no less than 15,000,000 pounds of those meats, and thus gave our Canadian farmers an additional market to that extent at home. Some people may say that we did not consume as much, but such a statement cannot hold in face of the natural growth going on in the country all the time, through the large increase in the number of hands employed in the manufactories of the country, which were turning out $165,000,000 more of goods per year than before the National Policy. But as the value of meats kept going down in the western states every year, the western farmer again became our competitor in a very deleterious manner. And we induced the Government to raise the duties again. The Government did not raise the duties quite as high as our Canadian farmers desired, but still they raised them to some extent. They raised the duty on some lines of pork to 3 cents a pound, and on other lines to 1½ cents per pound, and on beef to 3 cents a pound. We asked to have the duty 3 cents all round. What was the result? The operation of that duty, during the last year, has kept out no less than 19,672,000 pounds of meat, nearly 20,000,000 pounds of meat, which, formerly, was supplied by the western farmers, largely from Chicago, in competition with our own. That amount was kept out by virtue of that policy, and the Canadian farmer had an additional market at home to that extent for the meats he raised. Taking the Report of the Bureau of Industries, I find that the development in the province of Ontario in that line has been very large on account of that policy. They increased their production in one year nearly three-quarters of a million dollars worth, and will go on increasing in proportion as the demand creates a market. That policy furnished them, in the line of beef, pork and mutton—which although only one line—a larger market to the extent of $1,011,144 than they had before, and it gave that market to them at their own doors—a market created by the increase of the number of hands employed in the factories and the consequent increased consumption. In addition to that this policy shut out millions of pounds of American lard, something like 7,000,000 of pounds, and millions of pounds of American butter, which was not the healthy butter made in Canada, but oleomargarine, a spurious and inferior grade, which sold at a small price, came into competition with the Canadian product. The result is that to-day the Canadian farmer enjoys the benefit of increased home consumption for his own butter. It gave an additional market by the consumption of the increased number of hands employed, not only in our factories, but in building our railways and our canals and harbours, and in making machinery for the various lines of industry in which the people are engaged. It was also claimed for the National Policy that it would reduce the cost of living. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the cost of living is not reduced. I cannot understand how they can set up such a contention, in face of the fact that you can go to any store in the country and see, on comparing quotations with prices before the National Policy was introduced, how the necessaries of life have become cheapened since then. To-day, for instance, you can buy twenty-five pounds of sugar for $1, when in 1878 you could only buy eight pounds for the same money. I refer to granulated sugar. I would ask, is not the cost of living cheapened when you can get nearly three times the quantity of tea for $1 that you could in 1878? To-day you can buy flannels at from 12 to 17 cents per yard which in 1878 cost from 35 to 45 cents. I have here a quotation of cottons which I got at one of the stores on Sparks street, giving the prices at 3½ cents per yard up to 6 cents, and for best prints, guaranteed fast colours, only 5½ cents. In 1878, these cottons could not be bought at lower than from 8 to 10 cents, which now you can purchase at 3½ cents per yard. We were told by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar), the other day, that the cotton combine of this country is one of the most nefarious institutions we have. I am not going to make any plea in favour of combines, because there can be no doubt that if they unduly enhance the prices to the consumer they to that extent are an injury, but there is no just reason for throwing the responsibility on the National Policy. To-day we have the benefit of purchasing cotton at about one-third of the price at which it was sold in 1878, and this is due to the greater number of factories in the country to-day, as compared with 1878. Take tweeds. I looked into a store to-day, and I saw them quoted at from 35 to 40 cents per yard, and the proprietor assured me he had sold the same goods in 1878 at from 65 to 85 cents, and as high as $1. I take these various lines, and I ask, do they not show that the cost of living is reduced? The average reduction in the cost of woollen goods has been about 45 per cent in the last twelve years.

Mr. BORDEN. Has the hon. gentleman made a comparison between the prices here now for these goods and the prices in the United States or England?

Mr. SPROULE. I will refer to that further on. The hon. gentleman has drawn my attention to it, and I intend before leaving the subject to discuss it. Of course, I do not attribute the full reduction to the National Policy. It would be bad logic and a very bad precedent to do so, but I do attribute it very largely to the National Policy, on account of the competition brought about in the country through the increased number of establishments due to that policy. Before the National Policy was introduced we had very few. Now, as hon. gentlemen opposite themselves say, we have more than the needs of the country require, and the result is that competition is so strong, they are cutting down prices so low that to-day we are told it does not pay to manufacture. But we held that the National Policy would reduce the cost of living, and I am giving this as an argument that it has done so, and that one of the elements of that reduction has been the competition. I say we find to-day that woollen goods have been reduced in cost during the last few years about 45 per cent. We find cotton goods have been reduced over 60 per cent to the people of Canada. And when, by the operation of the National Policy, the number of cotton mills that have been established, the large amount of raw cotton that has been brought in, a reduction has followed, we have a right fairly to give the National Policy credit for a large share of it. It is true the raw material has been reduced somewhat in price, but there is a reduction of the prices of cotton to-day, and the Canadian people get the benefit. Groceries have been reduced, but not by the National Policy, with the exception of, perhaps, one or two lines, tea, sugar and other classes of groceries, which we bring direct from the countries where they are made or produced. By the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway and putting the Canadian Pacific Railway steamers on the Pacific we get a direct route to China, Japan, Hong Kong and those eastern countries that supply us with the raw sugar and tea and other lines which are found so cheap to-day. And by virtue of the policy we are able to bring these goods in direct and at less cost for transportation, and, therefore, we are able to sell them so much cheaper to the people of this country. By the National

Mr. SPROULE.

Policy we have a large number of sugar refineries in Canada which have brought raw sugar in in very large quantities, and the result is that you are able now to buy twenty-five pounds of sugar to-day for a dollar where you could only buy eight pounds in 1878. For these reasons I contend that no one can fairly say that the National Policy has not reduced the cost of living. Then, again, it was said that the National Policy would benefit the people by giving them better wages. Our opponents say that wages are lower to-day than they formerly were. I take the report of the Bureau of Statistics of Ontario, and I assume that is the most reliable information we have at the present time, and I find, that wages have not been materially reduced, but that they have been increased very largely in many lines. And if I look at the amount of wages paid by the manufacturers of the country in the last few years, over the amount they paid in 1878, I cannot but come to the conclusion that wages are getting higher. The amount of wages paid in manufacturing establishments, in 1891 over 1881, was $40,333,000. Forty millions of dollars in wages to-day more than in the earlier years of the National Policy! Then tell me the National Policy is ruining this country. I have dealt with these lines very briefly, and I want to diverge for a short time to reply to some of the arguments that have been advanced by gentlemen opposite regarding what they claim to be the baneful effects of the National Policy. I read in the "Hansard" report of the speech of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson):

We will consider just what this Government have taken in actual cash, out of the taxes collected from the people by the Custom-house. I desire to enforce that, as it can be best enforced, I think, by one or two comparisons. But I will give you one or two facts and ask you to realize if you can, the impoverishing course of the Government upon the people of this country.

And then he goes on to say:

In ten years the total exports of our magnificent barley crop, aided in its value by the freer access we had to the United States markets during many of those years—that magnificent crop gathered from all parts of the Dominion added to the wealth of the country $7,000,000 less than this Government took from them.

Then he goes on to say that the total exports of the wheat and flour, and hay and oats that have been sent out of this vast Dominion from British Columbia and from every other province, including the magnificent harvest of last year, was $57,798,397, and the Government during the last ten years took almost every dollar that was brought into this country to add to its wealth as the result of that export of wheat, flour, oats and hay. This, he says, was done by the operations of the National Policy. He goes on:

Sir, if they rejoice over the increased exports sent from this country which add to the wealth of this country they do well; but when they wipe out an item like that by the excessive taxation they are wringing from the people of this country I trust they will get some conception of the course they have been pursuing, and of the state to which they have brought the country.

Then he says :

Then there is the magnificent trade in horned cattle which has developed to $63,460,497 in ten years. Magnificent receipt, all but thirteen millions of it was taken by the Government in excessive taxation. Of horses there were $18,558,463 worth exported in ten years ; but three times all the money that you received from all the exports of your horses has been taken out of the wealth of the country by that Government opposite. Of the product of the mines, all the iron and all other products, the total exports in ten years were fifteen millions less than the amount of money in extra taxation that this Government have taken from the people of Canada.

Then he speaks of "our magnificent fisheries." and says that "seven years out of the ten the benefit from the total product of the fisheries of this country have been wiped out by the Government," taken from the people of this country by the National Policy. Then he goes on to say that the total product of the forests amounts to $230,000,000, and says "two and a half years out of the ten years the product of our forests, that magnificent source of income, has been wiped out." by the operations of this policy. The total exports of manufactures, he says, has been $43,000,000 ; "fourteen millions more than the total export of manufactures have been taken by this Government." He proceeds :

Of animals and their products, embracing cheese, butter and all the other products of animals, amounting in ten years to $243,163,515 ; the receipts on nearly two and a half years out of the ten years have been taken and lost to the people by this Government wringing them out of their pockets in extra taxation.

What does the hon. gentleman wish to convey by that, other than to lead the people to believe that the returns we have received from all these various lines have been neutralized to the people, that this wealth has been taken away from the people, leaving them so much poorer ? I have here a clipping from a paper printed in Brantford, the hon. gentleman's own town, and evidently they noticed his speech. I regret that the hon. gentleman is not in his seat at this moment, because I would like him to hear what is said about him :

Mr. W. Paterson has made his annual attack in the House on the National Policy. The member for South Brant has prospered vastly under the fiscal administration of the Government, and five years after its introduction in a business notice of the firm it was announced that the concern had "doubled itself."

It had "doubled itself" in five years after the introduction of this policy, that, according to him, was impoverishing the manufacturers of this country. Yet he is one of those manufacturers.

And that he (Mr. Paterson, M.P. for South Brant and kicker against the National Policy) would be obliged to "increase its facilities and increase its quarters for manufacturing more extensively."

This article quotes the "Globe's" report of the hon. gentleman's speech as follows :—

Three or four years after the introduction of the National Policy, under the undue stimulus given to manufacturing industries, capital was rushed in, to the ruin of capital and the sacrifice of trade of other countries, and ultimately to the injury of the wage earners. Since then, he would ask the hon. gentlemen opposite to show that there had been any increase at all.

But here is a history given by this paper of what the National Policy has done for his own town, and surely the hon. gentleman is intelligent enough, when he is walking about the streets of that town, to keep his eyes open and see what is going on around him. I cannot but think that he is cognizant of it, but he conceals the fact in this House and goes on to attack the National Policy :

In 1883, as already stated, Mr. Paterson was himself enabled to report a "doubled business" and the factory has since been further enlarged.

This is one of the manufacturers who are being reduced to poverty by the National Policy :

In 1883, A. Harris, Son & Co. were reported as giving "employment to about 150 artisans and labourers." To-day the same concern has 475 men on the pay-roll.

Was that an evidence that the manufacturers of the country are being impoverished, that their business was being reduced, and their capital swept away ?

In 1883, the Waterous Engine Works were announced as having 180 men. To-day they have 230.

This is right under Mr. Paterson's nose, right under his eyes ; and notwithstanding that fact he tells the people of this country that they have been impoverished by the National Policy.

In 1883 the Brantford Carriage Company did not exist. To-day it is a prosperous concern, employing 100 men.

They are all right in Brantford, where Paterson lives.

In 1883, the Gould Bicycle and Bee Keepers' Supply Companies did not exist. To-day they employ about sixty hands between them, and are putting up a new factory. The Cotton Mill is the very outcome of the National Policy, and Mr. Paterson cannot object to the whole credit of it being attributed to that measure. The concern to-day employs 205 hands, an increase since 1883 of about sixty.

And this is the only way that we can account for the fact that cottons and prints are so cheap to the consumers of Canada to-day, compared with what they were in 1878 :

In 1883, the Brantford Box Factory employed probably about a dozen of hands ; to-day the concern is an enlarged building, with about fifty hands. In 1883, the Cordage Factory did not exist. To-day some seventy-five hands find employment in it. In 1883, the Cockshutt Plough Company had thirty-three hands ; to-day they have sixty-five, or double the former number. Here is a total of some 900 additional hands employed in that town, without referring to Buck's Stove Works, the Soap Factory, the Baine Waggon Works, the Starch Works, the New Farmers' Binder Twine Factory, and other enterprises, which are all prospering apace, and have greatly increased their capacity. Mr. Paterson, in view of such facts and figures, ought to have more sense than to get up in the House and talk the rubbish to which he gave utterance on Wednesday.

Now, I think I may appeal to the members of this House if it is not unfair in the hon. member to tell the people of this country that the manufactures are waning under the effects of the National Policy, when he himself, who is one of them, in a few years developed the output of his factory and increased his wealth, and has been increasing it rapidly from that day to the present time. Then, I take the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) who tells us that the National Policy has been an injury to Canada. He says that the National Policy has caused an exodus from Canada. Now, I need not say anything about that, because many hon. gentlemen in this House, have already given sufficient arguments to convince at least all reasonable men that such has not been the case. There is really no ground for such a contention, nor can it be successfully established. He says the National Policy has increased the debt of the country. Well, our debt has not been increasing rapidly of late years; for the last three or four years it has scarcely increased any. We find that to-day it stands at about what it was four years ago. He says that it did not reduce the cost of the necessaries of life. I think I have answered that in the figures I have given. He says it did not increase the farmers' market; I think I have also answered that. He says that the National Policy that we want to-day is a tariff for revenue. Well, that is just exactly what the National Policy has been. It has raised a revenue, and after it raised more than sufficient revenue for the wants of the country, the Government commenced to take off the duty upon those articles that represent the prime necessaries of life. The hon. gentleman goes on to complain and grumble. He says "our hands are tied." They are tied by what? He pretended to say they are tied, somehow or other, by the operations of the Government. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who tied their hands? It was the electorate at the polls during the last election; it was the votes cast at the last election that tied their hands, and the people thought they were doing a wise thing for the country when they did so. I believe that since then the people would be very glad if, in addition to tying their hands, they had also tied their tongues, because it would have been better for the people of the country, for if so we would not find them decrying Canada as they are doing to-day; we would not find these unfair comparisons made between our country and other countries, that they are making to-day. Now I will take up some of the remarks of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and what do I find? I think it would be a good thing for Canada had she been able, by the votes of her people, to tie the tongues of hon. gentlemen opposite as well as their hands.

Mr. SPROULE.

Sir, I think if that hon. gentleman is given to one thing more than another, it is to indulging in the use of adjectives in the superlative degree. He is something like John Bunyan, in his "Pilgrim's Progress"—he is always in the "slough of despond," when he is talking about Canada, and he is always upon the pinnacle, when he is talking about other countries. His abuse is characterized by language peculiar to himself. I will give you a few of his beautiful adjectives, in order that they may be taken down, because they appear from year to year in his speeches in reply to the Budget speech, and it will be satisfactory for the people of this country to know the opinion he has of it:

I never heard that argument used, he says, without putting down the gentleman who used it, either as a charlatan, or as a man who is utterly and hopelessly ignorant of the very primary geographical conditions in which this country is placed.

Then he speaks of the United States and draws a comparison between the two countries. Look at the bright, beautiful picture he draws there. Then he draws a comparison between the capabilities of this country and those of the United States for manufacturing. Of the United States he says:

You have a large country—

Thereby assuming that ours is a very small one, and yet we have more territory than they.

—containing a population equal to two first-class European nations, producing every article which a nation can produce, having every variety of climate, from the tropic to the pole, and enjoying in itself a vast and most perfect system of free trade among 25 or 30 nations called states.

This is the country he is always looking to, and he asks our people to look to it. Now, let me draw attention to his remarks regarding Canada:

You have a group of countries separated from each other by physical obstacles,—

Something very hard to overcome, or that cannot be overcome.

—of a most formidable kind; separated from each other by large tracts of inhospitable country,—

This is the picture he draws of Canada, and which he compares with the United States.

—producing almost identically the same articles; and not a homogeneous people by any means, with a very small population.

"Not a homogeneous people." No, there are always French and English in this country. They are not a homogeneous people, and, therefore, it is not to be supposed that we can manufacture successfully in this country. I wonder if he thought for a moment of the number of nationalities that are represented by the population of the country to the south of us. Going on, he says:

You have combined in Canada every possible combination of circumstances which can make a protective system a huge and vicious mistake.

These are very strong words, but I presume he intended them to have their full weight when speaking of Canada. There is nothing bright in the picture of Canada, the brightness is all on the other side. He does not even give us the silver shield that he was once represented to have held up in speaking of this country. Regarding the contention that manufacturers are now able to produce in Canada as cheaply as in any other country, he replies :

I doubt if a more impudent claim was ever advanced.

And yet the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) says that they are producing cotton so cheap that they can compete with the whole world, they have been sending millions of yards of cotton to China and Japan in competition with the whole world. Still, his leader says he doubts if a more impudent claim was ever advanced :

I cannot for one moment allow the hon. gentlemen opposite to mislead the House, or to mislead the people into supposing that Canada has any peculiar aptitudes for great manufactures. Neither in age, nor in density of population, nor from her products, nor her geographical situation, do we possess advantages for becoming a great manufacturing country.

Is not this a fearful picture to draw of a country that has developed so rapidly during the last ten or twelve years? This is his opinion of a country with the vast resources that nature has put at our disposal, in the mines, in the forests, and in the natural products that enter into manufactures. Has he forgot the magnificent water powers that we have, the highways for commerce, the numerous lines of railways that cheapen the cost of transport over our great extent of territory?

He is aware that it is the habit of hon. gentlemen opposite to support the false contentions by impudently claiming for themselves, the benefit of all natural improvements, which must take place in a country like this. And of all the wonderful scientific discoveries which from day to day are cheapening the process of manufacturing; these causes, I grant you, have partly undone the enormous mischief that protection has caused.

Then he goes on to speak of this country, and he draws a comparison between the condition of this country and the United States. Speaking of Canada, he said that the Minister of Finance had declared that the country was prosperous; how did he attempt to prove it? He, the Minister of Railways, stated that there were more miles of railway than in 1878—8,500 miles more; that we had deepened and enlarged our canals, which carried millions of tons more freight than in 1878; that there were millions of dollars more in the post office savings banks and other savings banks and monetary institutions as compared with 1878. While the Minister of Finance had given these evidences that the country was prosperous, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) turns around and said: Admitting all this to be true, what of it? Then he told us that the savings banks deposits had on the whole increased; that our bank deposits had likewise increased; that the railways had increased, and the growth of certain towns and cities. He said:

I grant you that it is a good thing that the savings banks deposits have increased; I grant you that it is a good thing that our bank deposits have increased; I grant you that certain cities have grown and prospered; but after all, how far do these things go?

How far do they represent wealth and development?

He told us of the great increase of the savings banks deposits; well, sir, where is the money? the hon. gentleman has not got it. If a run was made on the banks he would have to borrow it. What does the deposits in the savings banks prove? It proves that the people of Canada owe the money to a few individuals. Where is the money? But after all is said and done, where are these same bank deposits, and by what are they represented?

One would think that the hon. gentleman wished to create a panic in the country, and a run on the banks. We do not claim that the Minister of Finance carries the money round in his pocket, ready to dole out at any time; but when the depositors ask for their money they will find it placed at their disposal. They have saved that money by their economy and enterprise, and as the result of the condition of things due to the management of public affairs by the Government which during the last fourteen years has been conducting the administration. They have saved that money, and it represents wealth, and it is in the savings banks to-day. Speaking about the decrease in the value of property, he says:

There has been a most unusual and extraordinary decrease in value, and at the same time an enormous increase of the debt, along with this decrease in the value of property. Does he not know that our federal debt has increased enormously; that our provincial debts have increased enormously; that our municipal debts have increased enormously?

The hon. gentleman speaks in the superlative degree. He says: "Moneys borrowed by the loaning companies have increased enormously." When he comes to the debt, he says: "The debt has been enormously increased." He dwells on the fact that the provincial debts have enormously increased, or that the municipal debts have enormously increased, and, therefore, I presume the responsibility for all the burdens on the people he places at the door of the National Policy and the Dominion Government. He has nothing to say about the acts of the Provincial Government, and as to how much debt they are rolling up, but he places all the responsibility at the door of the Conservative party here. I have here some of the hon. gentleman's beautiful expressions, and the collection is an interesting one. I will read a few of them for the benefit of the House: "Enormous amount of money we pay into the Treasury." "Enormous loss to the native-born population."

"Enormous loss to the foreign imported immigration." "Enormous decrease in the value of property in towns, villages and farm lands." "The Finance Minister has been monstrously injudicious." "His, the Finance Minister's ideas are excellent, but his works are detestable." "It is the absurdest nonsense to talk about per capita reduction, or a per capita anything else, in connection with the National Policy." "There has been an enormous shrinkage in values." "Canada is an enormously taxed country." "The tax is enormously increased by the middleman." "Our general scale of expenditure is monstrously extravagant." Everything is enormous, from his point of view. Then the hon. gentleman continues to decry this country, not only here, but in the country from which we draw our immigration. Writing to the "Economist," the hon. gentleman says that during thirteen years Canada has trebled her taxation; that there exists a tremendous exodus and very great depreciation in farm lands; that there has been an immense increase in the aggregate debt of this country; that the great mass of the people, notably the farmers of Canada, are distinctly poorer than they were twelve years ago; that the census shows that Canada lost, in the last ten years, 1,500,000 of her people; that the agriculturists of this country have been simply bled white, and that $60,000,000 are taken annually out of the pockets of the people for federal taxation; that it is utterly impossible for Canada to prosper under the present condition; that if there is no change Confederation must perish, rotten before it had time to become half ripe, as a result of the vice and folly with which its affairs have been administered. That is the information the hon. gentleman gives the world through this English journal, which is circulated in the country from which we hope to draw immigrants. Let me show how true these statements are, and how far they are justified by the facts. He states that the farmers of this country have decreased in wealth during the past twelve years. I have not the statistics which would enable the House to judge in reference to the whole Dominion, but as the province of Ontario is noted for its farming—and, of course, for its manufacturing—I have, fortunately, for that province figures which can be appropriately quoted in this connection. What do we find, from the report of the Bureau of Industries for 1889, published by the Ontario Government? The hon. gentleman told us that the farm values in Ontario have greatly decreased in recent years, but, in contradiction of that statement, we have the evidence furnished by this report of the Ontario Government, furnished by a source over which the Conservative Government has no control, and furnished by the Mowat Government, which is hostile to the Government here, and, therefore, very unlikely to make the figures in any way favourable to the contentions of the Conservatives. From that report of the Ontario Government, I find that, in 1882, the values of farms in Ontario were, in round numbers, $632,000,000; in 1883, $654,000,000; in 1884, $625,000,000; and going on to 1889, without giving the intervening years, I find that the farm values are set down at $632,000,000, the same as they were in 1882. This is the land, without the buildings or crops or cattle. Some hon. gentlemen may say: Yes, but the farmers have been improving their farms since. I admit myself that there has been a shrinkage in the value of farm lands in Ontario, as there has been all over the world, but I distinctly and emphatically deny that it is of serious import to the farmers of Canada, or to the farmers of Ontario, who are living on their farms from year to year and who do not intend to sell. What matters it to a farmer if his farm is worth $10,000 or $5,000, if he makes as much out of it when it is worth $5,000 as when it is worth $10,000, or makes as much out of it when it was worth $10,000 as when it was worth $5,000? What matters it to the farmers if there is a reduction in the value, so long as they are not parting with their farms, when they are getting the same return from them and when they are getting sufficient returns to enable them to carry on the operations of life? It is a matter of very little concern to them whether the value of the farms go up or down, except, of course, unless they want to sell out and leave. Now, let us take the value of the farm buildings, and it will give us an idea as to whether the farmers are getting richer or poorer. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated in his letter to the "Economist," that the farmers are bled white and that they are distinctly poorer than they were twelve years ago. In answer to that, I again take the statistics of the Bureau of Industries and it shows that, in 1882, the farm buildings in Ontario were worth $132,000,000, while in 1889, they were worth $192,000,000. I have not quoted the values for the intermediate years; but that increase of $60,000,000 in these seven years proves conclusively that the farmers are not getting poorer in respect to the value of their buildings. Now, with reference to farm implements. Some hon. gentlemen say that implements are getting dear, but, as a matter of fact, the very reverse is the case. Implements are 25 per cent cheaper to-day than they were in 1879, but notwithstanding that they are getting cheaper every year by virtue of the active competition in their manufacture. I find from this same report of the Ontario Government, that, in 1882, their implements were worth to the farmers of Ontario $37,000,000, while they were worth, in 1889, $51,000,000. Surely with implements $14,000,000 more valuable in 1889 than in 1882, the farmers are not poor in regard to the implements they are possessed of. Let us see now as to the value of the live stock owned by Ontario farmers. Again, according to the report of the Ontario Bureau of Statistics, they were worth $80,000,000 in 1882, but in 1889 they were worth $105,000,000. Since 1882, therefore, the value of live stock to the farmers of Ontario has increased $25,000,000, and yet the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that the farmer is distinctly poorer to-day than he was twelve years ago. I take the value of the farms, and the farming implements, and the live stock in Ontario, and what do I find? Notwithstanding the reduction in the value of the farms—and I hold that is of little consequence to the farmer who does not want to exchange his land—I find that in all these lines the farmers of the province of Ontario were worth, in 1882, $882,000,000, while to-day they are worth $982,000,000, or in other words they are worth $100,000,000 more than they were a few years ago. These figures are taken from a source which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will not challenge the correctness of, and based on them, it is easy to refute his contention, and to come to the conclusion that he has made a statement which is not borne out by facts or figures as far, at least, as the province of Ontario is concerned. The farmers of Ontario being worth, in those three branches of industry, $100,000,000 more in 1889 than they were in 1882, then, I ask, where is the contention of the hon. gentleman that the farmers are growing poorer by virtue of the National Policy? I say that such a statement cannot be supported by the facts. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) went into another calculation, and he said that the farmers were growing poorer because they had more mortgages on their farms, and he also has stated that they had more mortgages than the farmers of the United States. I shall only deal briefly with that, because it has been referred to at great length time after time in this House, and very conclusive arguments have been drawn from the figures that were presented. However, I shall give a few figures in reference to the matter. In the province of Ontario there are 54 loan companies lending money to the farmers, and what is the story told in their returns to the Provincial Government as published in this same report of the Bureau of Statistics? The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) told us that the farmers are growing poor, that they are hopelessly burdened by debt, and by their chattel mortgages and their land mortgages. Now, what do we find from this report? In the year 1889, these 54 companies loaned out in the province of Ontario $20,391,348; while in that same year the people paid back to these same companies $19,941,263. They borrowed $20,000,000, and they paid back $19,000,000. We come now to the year 1890. If the farmers were getting poor you would expect them to borrow more and to pay back less, but in the year 1890, I find that instead of borrowing $20,000,000, they borrowed only $17,263,028, and they paid back $19,114,906. In the year 1891, if they were getting poorer they would still be borrowing more of necessity, and paying back less, but instead of borrowing $20,000,000, as in 1889, they only borrowed $16,797,699, and they paid back $19,943,157. They paid back over $3,000,000 more than they borrowed in that year. In 1889 they borrowed more than they paid back, in 1890 they paid back more than they borrowed, and in 1891 they paid back nearly $4,000,000 more than they borrowed. Surely this shows that the Canadian farmer is not so hard up, or so impoverished as the hon. member for South Oxford tries to make out that he is. I come now to chattel mortgages, and from the official report of the Ontario Government, I find that in 1891 the total chattel mortgages against the farmers of that province were 10,989, amounting to $3,097,601, or an average of $282, while in 1890 the total chattel mortgages amounted to $3,223,297, an average of $305. That shows clearly that the statement of the hon. gentleman in this particular is not borne out by the facts. Now, let me ask what represents the wealth of a country? It has been said that its prosperity may be fairly measured by its wealth, and the condition of its people, and not by its population. We hear hon. gentlemen constantly contending that because our population has not increased as rapidly as they would like, therefore, the country is becoming impoverished. To my mind it is not the population of a country that indicates its prosperity, but it is the condition of its people. It is not a matter of so much importance to us to know whether our country has 5,000,000 or 50,000,000, as it is to know that the 5,000,000 are well fed and well clothed, while the 50,000,000 might be in poverty and starving. China has a population of 450,000,000, but every year some hundreds of thousands of its people die of starvation. There is an increase of population in that country, but not an increase of wealth. When Ireland had a population of 7,000,000 she was worse off than she is now, when she has only between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000. Therefore, it is of less importance whether we have 5,000,000 or 50,000,000 than it is to know that, whatever number we have, they are properly housed, comfortably clad, and sufficiently fed. Do hon. gentlemen find many vacant houses in the towns and cities of our country to-day, or that the public treasury is drawn upon extensively to keep our people from starvation? I say they do not. Take up the public papers, and you do not find the indications of such starvation in our cities as you find in Chicago or New York or other great cities in that highly favoured land which hon. gentlemen opposite highly eulogize; but our people, as a whole, are comparatively well off. There are a great many reasons why our people have not increased in number so rapidly as some hon. gentlemen think they should. Every medical man and every man who has paid attention to statistics knows that the more wealthy people become and the more luxuries they have, the lower is the natural rate of increase in population; whereas, according as the necessaries of life decrease, even to the very verge of starvation, the more rapid becomes the natural increase of the population. This is a fact that cannot be denied. Along with the increase of wealth and luxury there is a decrease in the number of births from year to year, whereas, along with an increase in poverty, starvation and hard work, there is an increase in the number of births. Now, what are the signs of wealth and prosperity in the country? Surely they are to be found in the development of the country, in its railways, which have increased to the extent of 8,500 miles in fourteen years, in the number and the magnitude of our canals, in our telegraph lines, in the tonnage and number of our vessels, in the extension of postal facilities and post offices, in the trade and commerce of the country, in the imports and exports, in the amount of freight carried on our railways, in the amount of money saved, out of the earnings of the people, as shown by their deposits in the savings banks and in other banks of the country, beyond what is required to carry on the business operations of the country. Then, we have a moderate debt, we have our people employed, we have comfort in our homes, and we have no considerable want in our country to-day. Go through the country in whatever direction you please, look into any farmer's home at meal time, and he is able to give you a good meal; look at his children, and you find them comfortably clad. This has been a long and severe winter, and yet you do not hear any considerable complaints of want on the part of the country people. They have better farm buildings, better stock and implements, better homes, supplied with organs, pianos and luxuries of different kinds, where a few years ago they had only the necessaries of life. We find all these things in our country to-day; and yet hon. gentlemen opposite continue to decry their country and to make out that it is not wealthy, that it is bled white, impoverished, in debt, and going to destruction. Now, the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), in dealing with the intentions of the Finance Minister regarding changes in the tariff, proceeds to say that the Finance Minister is going to alarm the people. These are his words:

But what is the key-note of his speech this year? Is it stability? It is wavering; it is doubt. Business men of the country and manufacturers cannot tell what is to be the policy and what changes are to be made by the Government. I venture to say the hon. gentleman has unsettled business, and has created a feeling of disquiet and fear, if not panic, throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion.

Now, that is the hon. gentleman's opinion, that the hon. Finance Minister has created disquietude; but what would be the disquietude and the panic in the country if the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) were in a position to carry out what he declared he would do? We have had the National Policy before the country for a great many years, and how has it been fought? The hon. member for South Oxford has been telling the House and the country what he and his friends would be prepared to do if they were in power. When the National Policy was introduced in 1878 it was fought by the Reform party for all it was worth, and they were defeated. The country believed that we required a National Policy. It was again fought in 1882, when they also fought our policy with regard to building the Canadian Pacific Railway. In 1887 they had a new policy. It was then commercial union, which was to be the panacea for the commercial ills of Canada. At that time Mr. Blake announced that they would fight the National Policy no longer, and that his friend, Sir Richard Cartwright, agreed with him in that. But they found that their policy of commercial union did not take with the people, and in 1891 they came forward with their policy of unrestricted reciprocity, or continental free trade; and every time they appealed to the electors of the country they were defeated, and each time they have changed their policy and adopted something new. Now, the Finance Minister says to them: You have condemned everything we have done; what is your policy? Let the people know what you are going to do in the event of your getting into power, so that they may be able to judge whether or not it is likely to injure the country. Well, I will read the information that the hon. member for South Oxford has given on that point, so that you may compare it with the criticisms of the hon. member for South Brant, and judge whether it would be likely to disturb the manufacturers of this country, or unsettle affairs or create a panic. This is what he says:

The hon. gentleman desires to know our policy. I will tell the hon. gentleman what has been our policy from first to last. Our policy has been from first to last to destroy this villainous protective system which has been grinding out the vitals of the people of this country. I do not care in what particular way the reptile is destroyed. I do not care whether it is cut off by the head, or the tail, or in the middle; I do not care whether it is by free trade positive or absolute, or by revenue tariff or continental free trade. I wish to see my people redeemed from the degrading slavery which a few political and commercial knaves imposed upon them.

He does not care what the result is. He is going to destroy the National Policy. He does not care whether he cuts off its head, tail or middle; he has got to the verge of despair. He reminds me of the story of an ancient maiden lady, who had reached that time of life when she became afraid she would never get a husband. One day she went out to the woods to pray for one, and she prayed: "Oh, Lord, for a man!" An owl that was sitting on a tree close by, said: "Who, who." She thought it was an answer to her prayer, and said: "Anybody, so long as it is a man." In like manner, the hon. gentleman is ready for any policy, no matter what, provided he can get rid of the National Policy. He is ready for commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, continental free trade, anything at all, so long as he can destroy the National Policy and put these men out of office and get into their place. He is like Bunyan's character in the "Pilgrim's Progress," standing in the slough of despond. He knows that the time is passing, that the country is not willing to let him and his friends into power, and he is ready for anything, whether detrimental or otherwise, whether it may or may not unsettle trade, so long as it will put him and his party on the Treasury benches. But the people are not likely to do that in the present or in the near future. Is trade so very bad to-day in the country? I take up our Canadian "Journal of Commerce," and I find it reviews the trade of the country as follows:—

The wholesale houses report a continuance of the brisk trade noted last month. Winter stocks have been very closely sold up, which is not usually the case, while orders for spring trade have been all that sanguine people expected. To use the expression of a commission merchant, who has been thoroughly over the ground, trade has not been better among dry goods men for the past twelve years.

Notwithstanding that hopeless condition of the country, which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the hon. member for North Brant depict to us, the "Canadian Trade Journal" takes the hopeful view I have just quoted. It proceeds to say:

Notwithstanding this there has been quite a sprinkling of retail failures during the month. These may be due to exceptional causes, as the bank reports, regarding the way payments were met on the 4th February, show that a much greater than ordinary percentage of notes has been paid—at least such has been the case throughout Ontario and Quebec. Reports from the mills are very satisfactory. The cotton mills report trade in very good shape, all the factories running to their full capacity, except the Dundas and Lybster, while the Brantford wincey mill will be started on cotton goods. The woollen manufacturers are in equally good spirits, many of them being sold up for the whole season to come and being compelled to refuse good orders that are beyond their capacity to carry out. The only thing they desire is a little better price.

This I take from the "Journal of Commerce," a non-political paper. It shows the trade and condition of the country to be very satisfactory. But hon. gentlemen opposite say: We have an exodus, our people are going to a foreign country, and we cannot get them back; and they say this is because of the National Policy, which has increased everything that the farmers buy and decreased in value everything they have to sell. Their farming implements have increased in price, while the value of their stock has decreased, and consequently they are leaving the country. Well, I have a few letters here, written by Americans who went out to our western country to examine its fitness for settlement and to compare the conditions of life there with those of their own localities in the States. Mr. James Hudson, of Groton, South Dakota, writing to a friend, says of the Alberta district:

We examined this district thoroughly. After driving over it for several days, and visiting a number of farmers and stockmen, we pronounce this the best country we ever saw for mixed farming and especially for stock-raising. Stockmen here are all making money. Steers selling for 4 cents when we can get only 1 to 2 cents in South Dakota. Taxes are very low. There is yet lots of homestead land where any man over eighteen can take up a quarter section timber, water, coal, hay and grass without limit; good laws, good society. We know that this is just the place for men to make homes and where industry will meet a certain reward. In conclusion we tell our friends in South Dakota that are not satisfied with their success there, that if they go to either Prince Albert or Edmonton, and go into either mixed farming or stock-raising we believe there is no place on this continent where success is as likely to crown their efforts.

Other gentlemen, speaking of the number of men they met in that country, say:

As a result of our visit here, we have no hesitation in saying that this is without exception the best stock country we have ever seen, in our opinion. While here we met men from Idaho, Washington Territory, Nevada, and in fact almost every state in the Union, and there was but one opinion expressed by those and that was the same as ours. We never believed that such a country as this could be found. As far as the eye could see in every direction it was nothing but a succession of rich, tall grass, beautiful lakes, clear running streams, groves of trees for shelter, in fact the whole country presented a park-like appearance more beautiful than our imagination could have pictured.

The farmers we met here were all delighted with the country, and those of them who had been there for a number of years were doing well and are increasing their herds in large numbers. We saw cattle there that had never seen the inside of a stable and were rolling fat and fit for the butcher's stall, in fact equal to our beef after having been fed three months on corn. We are well aware that that is saying a good deal for spring beef having lived out all winter with nothing but the natural grass and no shelter; but it is nevertheless the truth and we feel bound to state it exactly as we found it.

This is signed by Adam Stafford, R. D. Cass, Frank Caldwell and John G. Gibbon, all of Scotland, South Dakota, who came from those elysian fields painted so brightly by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Here is another extract:

We consider the country far ahead of our part of North Dakota, and we are going there to make our homes. Three of our party took up homesteads, one of us buying railroad land. Each quarter has about forty acres of timber. We believe Alberta has no equal as a stock country. We never saw such stock as is grown in Alberta, almost without the help of man! We made inquiry as to the price of agricultural implements as compared with the price in North Dakota, and we find that, quality for quality, implements are fully as cheap in the Canadian North-west. We also carefully examined the relative prices of groceries and clothing; we found woollens of all kinds one-third cheaper, groceries about the same. As many of our neighbours in North Dakota are anxious to find some place where it is possible to make comfortable homes, we have no hesitation in telling all such that in the Canadian North-west such a place is to be found. We found the cities of Winnipeg, Brandon, Calgary and others far beyond our expectations. We were glad to find taxes very low as compared with North Dakota. We found excellent schools.

Now, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), referring to this matter, said that in that country, above all other places in the Dominion, do we find experienced the baneful effects of the policy inaugurated by the Conservative party. If such be the case, how is it that throughout all that country—through the disputed section of Ontario, through Manitoba and the North-west Territories, down to the Pacific slope—through all that vast territory, where the burdens of life have been made so heavy by virtue of the National Policy and the mismanagement of this Government, the people are so ignorant of what they are suffering from that they will not send a single man here in opposition to the Government? How is it that all through this vast territory hon. gentlemen opposite are unable to convince the people that they are injured by the policy of this Government? Surely, reasonable people must admit that the people out there cannot be so much disaffected, as we are told they are, by the policy carried out by this Government, when they do not send a single representative here to express their dissatisfaction? And that is one of the strongest arguments to the contrary. Notwithstanding all these things, I say, we are living on, and we believe we are living in prosperity. It may be we are living in a fool's paradise, but we get enough to eat and enough to drink and enough to wear, and there is no great destitution in our country. We find that our railways are increasing their mileage; we find that the highways of commerce are being perfected; and we find development going on in every quarter of the country. And yet we are told there is no prosperity in Canada. Now, while all these things are being done, there are some things still to be done, I admit, before we stay our hand. The Government have a work to do. What is it? To uproot the National Policy? I say no; their work is not to uproot the National Policy. What, then, do we still need? We need to perfect the National Policy where we find that it is bearing injuriously upon any class. The Finance Minister has said that we intend to make inquiry and, having ascertained where the policy is defective, we will endeavour to make it as perfect as possible. Gentlemen opposite say that he will injure trade, because he is going to ask the people what they want. That is one thing that his predecessor, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), would not do. He knew better than the people what they ought to have, and, therefore, he would not consult them. He knew more about manufacturing than the manufacturers did, and, therefore, even though they asked it, he would not give them assistance. He would not condescend to examine into the condition of affairs in various parts of the country, as the Finance Minister now proposes to do. I believe that in some lines combines are being formed and that they will keep from the people the benefits which would otherwise come to them through the National Policy. I believe that is a matter for the Government to examine into, and, as far as possible, to prevent these combines. Combines may be found under the National Policy, but they are found also in countries that have free trade, and the effects of them are being felt in free trade countries as well as in countries that have protection. I believe we want an export duty on logs. I am not going into that question now, because I have a notice on the Paper relating to it, and I intend to go more fully into the subject when that order is called. But I may say a few words with regard to it now. The principle of the National Policy is to give employment to our people at home. If we send out of our country raw material, logs, the getting out of which gives employment to over 7,000 men about Georgian Bay, we give employment to 7,000 men in manufacturing them into lumber in the United States. In this we are not acting in accordance with the National Policy. If we allow an amount of money to be expended over there that should be expended here, we are not carrying out the principles of the National Policy. Therefore, we must make a change, and we must put an export duty on logs. We must perfect our steam-ship lines. One of the great needs of the present day is a fast steam-ship line to England. With that line we should be able to compete with foreign countries. If we have refrigerators put upon these steam-ships we will perfect our highways of commerce so that we may take the products of the Canadian farmers and lay them down in the mother country where we find our most profitable market. If the Government do this they will prove themselves equal to the occasion as they have always done. Then we want to educate the farmers of this country in reference to the best lines of production. This is being done to-day through the Experimental Farms. This work is already being done. It is a commendable work, it is a valuable work, and the country is getting the benefit of it. Notwithstanding all that is said, I say we ought to stand by the National Policy, because it proved Canada's salvation in her hour of need. It has given us a revenue, it has given employment to our people, it has afforded a home market for the Canadian producer, it has led us on to prosperity, and we ought to stand by it and by the men who introduced it and have carried it through to success.

After Recess.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). In rising to address the House upon the very important question that we have been discussing for the last few days, allow me, before I enter into any of the arguments of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), to make a few remarks with respect to what was said by the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig). I find, Sir, that that hon. gentleman, in addressing the House, said the workingman was not taxed either on what he eats or on what he wears. He stated that the farmer had a free breakfast table. But, in saying so he forgot to tell this House, and through this House the country, that the table itself was taxed to the tune of 35 per cent, that the chair upon which the man sits at his breakfast is taxed 35 per cent. He also forgot to say that the flour that might be made from his own wheat was taxed 75 cents a barrel, and that the workingman also has to pay this tax. He forgot to say that when the workingman rises in the morning and goes to wash himself, the soap he uses is taxed 14 cents per pound, or something like 30 per cent. He forgot to tell you that the towel also was taxed 25 per cent. He forgot to say that if he had a comb to straighten his hair, it was taxed to the tune of 35 per cent, and, if he had a looking-glass, it also was taxed. His sugar is taxed, his coffee is taxed, almost everything that goes upon the workingman's table is taxed, except what comes directly from the farmer. The blankets that the workingman uses when he goes to bed are taxed from 40 to 60, 70 and even 80 per cent. The clothes of the workingman and his family, which cost something like $90 per annum, represent a tax of over $30. His coal oil is taxed. And yet they will tell the workingman that he is free of taxation on what he eats and what he wears. I suppose that in their explanation, gentlemen opposite would say that the workingmen ought not to wear any of the finer tweeds of the goods coming from the old country, that the goods he ought to wear are goods of Canadian manufacture. Let me remind the hon. gentlemen that the Canadian manufacturer is benefited upon his cotton goods and upon his woollen goods to the whole extent of the protection. The merchant going to the old country purchasing goods and bringing them into Canada, pays a duty upon woollen goods of an average of 30 to 40 per cent. Upon cotton goods he pays a duty of from 24 to nearly 40 per cent, and before these goods reach the workingmen the duty is represented by an increased cost of 40 to 60 per cent. And yet they tell us that the workingmen pay no duty. Let me say, Sir, that the only difference between the goods imported into this country from Britain and the United States, is that the individual purchasing foreign goods in Canada has got to pay the whole amount of the duty along with the price of the goods, while there is little under 2 per cent of freight and insurance to be added to the price of Canadian goods put upon the market. That is all the advantage the workingman gets; he has got to pay the whole cost of the goods and the amount of duty added. I was astonished at the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) stating that he was in favour of the duty being removed from coal oil, and what reason did he give for the Government not removing that duty? Why, he told us that there were several millions of money invested, and that we could not see this money swept away. I would ask: Where did the manufacturers get these millions of money to invest? We know that the oil industry is not a new industry in Canada, that it has been established for a length of time, and we know that those who have been engaged in that business have all become independent as regards their pecuniary circumstances. He stated, also, that there were 2,000 workingmen engaged in that business, and they would all be thrown out of employment at once. They accuse us of decrying Canada; was there ever a stronger statement made in this House to show, either that Canada is not naturally fitted for carrying on that industry, or for taking the raw material and manufacturing coal oil, or that our workingmen are not as intelligent, not as energetic, as the Americans, and therefore not able to cope with them? I hold that if we take this view of the question, we will never sweep away a single item of the National Policy, because all the different industries can come forward and say that they have large amounts of money invested, and a large number of workingmen employed. Is that any reason why the consumers of this country should be taxed to the tune of 134 and 135 per cent upon coal oil? Is it any reason why the raw material should be protected to the tune of nearly 1,000 per cent? Sir, I hold that the argument adduced by the hon. gentleman is no argument whatever. The workingmen of Canada to-day pay a duty annually to this Government, on account of the National Policy, of between $30 and $40 if not more, when we take into account everything they consume in their houses, and that is a grievous burden upon the workingmen of this country. There is not a single hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who has had the hardihood to rise and say that the National Policy has increased the per capita wages of the workingmen. They have stated that some $40,000,000 have been given as wages to the artisans of this country. I hold that the artisans in this country is not as well off to-day as he was before the National Policy was imposed. Now, I will take up the statements of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and I find that one of the first statements he made was a very misleading one, indeed. He told us that in 1878 there were $4,000,000 worth of manufactured goods exported from the Dominion of Canada, and then he turned around and told us there were $34,000,000 worth of goods exported during the last year. Did he mean to say these were manufactured goods? He did not say that this $34,000,000 represented manufactured goods, and I am unable to understand what the hon. gentleman really meant, when the whole amount of manufactured goods exported, excluding household goods and rags, amounted to $6,471,000 in 1892. I find that during the regime of the Mackenzie Government, in 1876, there was $5,972,000 worth of manufactured goods exported from Canada, only $49,000 less than during the last year. That is not great progress for the manufacturing industries of this country to make from that time down to the present, and that was long before the National Policy was imposed. I find that during 1876 and 1877 there were $10,088,000 worth of manufactured goods exported from Canada, and that is more, in proportion to the population, than the amount that was exported in 1892. Now, we were told that the farmers were protected in the articles of beef, pork and sheep, and we were told the amount of protection that we had got, and the large quantity of goods that were shipped out of this country under that protection. Just allow me to show you what protection we enjoy at the present time with respect to hogs, cattle and sheep. I find that some of the latest quotations give the price of live hogs in Chicago at $8.60, and I find in the same paper that dressed hogs are quoted in Toronto at the same price, $8.60. That is the protection that we get against hogs coming to Canada from the United States—their live hogs bring as high a price in Chicago as our dressed hogs do in Toronto. Now, with respect to beef. We all know that during the last few years, in the United States, their beef cattle brought a better price during the shipping season, and during the winter season as well, than they did in Canada. What is the condition of things to-day? Beef cattle in Chicago are worth from $5.90 to $6.10 per 100 pounds while in Canada we find that our best beef cattle are worth a little, if any, over $4.50. That is the protection that we get against cattle, hogs and sheep coming in from the United States. During the last year we sent to the United States 290,925 sheep, and what was the result? Why, we were protected to this extent, that we had to pay $228,000 to get those sheep into the markets of the United States. Sweep away the duty, and I fear not to state that the markets in a very short time will be equalized in the two countries. Now, we have been told by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), in language most emphatic, that the condition of the farmers in this country was more miserable than I ever heard it described upon this side of the House. Let me quote the hon. gentleman's language, and when a man is condemned out of his own mouth it is the strongest condemnation that can be brought against him. Only a few days ago, when we were talking of what had taken place in Canada, the hon. gentleman said:

The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) endeavoured, two years ago, to convince this House it was for the purpose of feeding cattle that we required free corn, because the object was to get the feed at the lowest possible price, so as to provide beef at the smallest cost to export to England. I said then, and I repeat to-day, that if every man were a cattle-feeder, it would be to his advantage to bring in free corn to feed his cattle, because, if he could not raise the quantity of food requisite for the purpose of fattening cattle, it would be very important he should get it at the lowest possible price. But it is unfortunately the fact that a very small percentage of our farmers are cattle-feeders to-day.

Yet the hon. gentleman told the House that the number of barns were increasing and the farmers were erecting them so as to enable them to feed cattle, which was a most profitable business. He further said:

In the first place, a large percentage of them have not the money to build suitable barns and stables in which to keep their cattle during the winter, and feed them so to make them prime beef. In the second place, they cannot afford to be out of their money the length of time involved if they raise cattle.

No member of this House has yet endeavoured to represent the farmers of Ontario in such a miserable and depressed condition. We have always held that the National Policy bears heavily on the agriculturist, but we never heard an hon. gentleman on the Government side of the House make such a statement as that volunteered by this hon. gentleman. I believe the hon. gentleman, in a moment of weakness, spoke what he believed to be the truth with respect to the farmers in his own section of Ontario. No doubt, eighteen out of twenty farmers to-day are obliged to depend on the sale of their coarse grains, and anything that entered into competition with them would prove injurious to the farmers. The hon. gentleman further said:

Not only through the summer would they have to wait, but through the fall and winter, some six months, and in the meantime, feed their cattle a very large amount of what means money before they could get a return. I believe that eighteen out of every twenty farmers are obliged to depend upon the sale of their coarse grains, and anything coming into competition with these coarse grains in our market, must be detrimental to the Canadian farmers. Just in proportion as a man becomes a feeder of cattle, like the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), who feeds a hundred head of cattle per year, becomes antagonistic to the interests of the great majority of Canadian farmers.

I hold that any one has done a good service if he has been able to convince the farmers that the purchasing and feeding of stock constitutes a remunerative business. The statement presented to the House by that hon. gentleman respecting the condition of Ontario farmers was given undoubtedly in a moment of weakness, when he did not expect it would be turned against himself at a future time. Another argument he presented was this: He stated that the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) had alleged that the Government have spent large sums of money, more than all the manufacturers had brought into the country during a number of years. But the hon. gentleman ought to have been sufficiently honest to have shown the connection in which this language was used by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). That hon. member showed that the per capita tax on the people was much larger than that imposed by the Mackenzie Government, that the per capita tax amounted to $3.40 from 1873 to 1877, and from 1880 to 1892, $4.77, and the hon. member made a calculation showing that, during the latter five years, the Government had taken out of the pockets of the people, for the purpose of governing this country, $26,100,000, for which they had made no adequate return. Further, that calculation was a fair and honest one, because it took the per capita tax and included the increase of population. The hon. gentleman further showed that the per capita tax from 1888 to 1892 was $4.77, and that it amounted, during each year, calculating the population at 4,750,000, to $6,317,000, which, for three years, gives a total of $31,587,000. He went on to show that, during those ten years, no less than $57,687,500 had been taken out of the pockets of the people by the present Government more than the Government of Mr. Mackenzie would have taken out of the treasury, if they had remained in power and had conducted public affairs in the same honest and economical manner they adopted from 1873 to 1877. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) never attempted to show that the argument of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) was not a fair statement of the facts, as laid down by him to the House with respect to the per capita taxation and the amount of the Government expenditure. We have heard much during this debate with respect to the condition of the country, and, for the first time, we have the Minister of Finance admitting that there is a considerable amount of uneasiness, and that this uneasiness is pervading all classes. I am glad to know the hon. gentleman has come to that conclusion, and that this uneasiness has been brought to his notice. I shall, however, attempt to show that a very false estimate prevails as to the prosperity of Ontario farmers. If I can show that the farmers of the Dominion, especially those of Ontario, are obliged to pay as much to produce the products which have been, of late, exported in large quantities, as they obtained, I shall establish the fact that the trade is not a paying one, and that the farmers are not in a prosperous condition. The agitation against the present duties is not confined to Reformers, but is taken part in by Conservatives. The Central Farmers' Institute recently passed a resolution to this effect:

Resolved, that this institute composed of farmers representing every electoral district in Ontario, memorializes the Dominion Government and asks them to allow all goods manufactured in Britain to be imported into Canada free of duty.

I am happy to say that the farmers in Ontario are becoming alive to their own interests. I was much pleased to see the other day a deputation from the Patrons of Industry at the capital. They came here under instructions to ask the Government to reduce the duty on coal oil, binding twine and corn, and to pass a law to prevent any combination raising prices beyond fair rates. At the Farmers' Institute, a Conservative spoke plainly and gave his views to the Government. I now call the attention of the Minister of Finance to his statement. The gentleman is Mr. Torrance, reeve of Stanley, and he is reported in the "Empire" to have spoken as follows:—

He thought that the duties imposed on imports were a hardship upon the Canadian consumer. The farmers should not look to Washington or any foreign capital, for relief, but should apply to Ottawa to have the embargoes upon foreign manufacturers removed. He thought that if the Government took such a step the country would at once commence to advance with great strides.

My friend thought the mouldering branches were going to be stripped, and the protection tree left pretty bare; but by this time he will have found that the reduction simply amounts to the removal of a very small twig in the shape of the reduction on binding twine from 25 to 12½ per cent, and a reduction in the duty on coal oil by the amount of one cent per gallon, and I suppose to remove the inspection fee altogether, but about that I am not certain. I was astounded to hear the Finance Minister state the other day that, after examining the coal oil question very closely, he had come to the conclusion that the protection for the coal oil refiners had amounted to something like 2 cents a gallon. Let me tell the hon. gentleman what I pay for coal oil myself. I buy it by the barrel because we use a large quantity in the house and stables, and we get it at wholesale prices, but I have to pay 24 cents a gallon for it in Seaford, and an oil manufacturer has shown me conclusively that this protection amounts to something like 134 per cent. I yet hope that the hon. gentleman will take into consideration the prayer of the petition presented by the Patrons of Industry in Ontario. They are a respectable and a numerous body in that province. They have 2,000 lodges, with something like fifty members in each, so that we have 100,000 Patrons of Industry in Ontario, all asking for tariff reform. I tell the Government that if they ignore the petition of these gentlemen that they will find during next election that these gentlemen have been watching them very closely. I was rather surprised and amused to hear the Finance Minister, the other evening, ask the leader of the Opposition to come out of the bush and to define his policy and defend it. Why, Sir, the statement of the Finance Minister itself shows that the policy of the leader of the Opposition is approved all over the country to-day. The Finance Minister stated that, together with the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue, he would go through the country and interview the manufacturers. Evidently the manufacturers hold more of the trade destinies of this country in their hands, according to his view, than the Government itself, and so they will be asked to give the Government an idea of what their policy should be. The hon. gentleman also said that they would interview the farmers. That is the first time I ever heard them admit that the farmers of Canada were not flourishing under the National Policy; because, if they are going to interview the farmers, they must feel that the farmers are aggrieved and are not so prosperous as we have been led to believe by hon. gentlemen opposite. The Finance Minister also told us that charlatans and agitators went amongst the farmers and told them that the National Policy was the cause of the low prices in grain, and that this statement was not correct. Let me ask if the hon. gentleman himself ever makes a statement which is not thoroughly accurate. Does he ever make a statement to mislead the people of this country? Let me read this language to the House, and then they will be able to judge. He says:

The idea of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) of preferential trade relations between all parts of the Empire, one which in its intrinsic worth and in favour of reciprocity ought not to be laughed at and cannot be scouted even though its accomplishment be years in the future. It was an idea which had its ground-work in a thought which was wider than the interests of any one country, and was replete with the leaven of grandeur. If it could be brought about it would be the finest and noblest idea that has been concentrated into action since the world began. And it would be well for Canada and every British country to hold the strongest position in preparation for its public achievement. Canada and other colonies were pledged to preferential tariff.

Did the hon. gentleman pledge Canada during the time he was in England last, or when was Canada pledged, or how was Canada pledged? That is something I would like to know. I was not aware before that Canada had been in any way pledged to preferential duties. I knew that the people of Canada were free to adopt their own tariff, but I never knew that they were pledged to retain their present tariff against English goods unless the British Government gives us, as a colony, a preferential tariff on our goods going into the British market, as against foreign goods. He goes on:

And there was a growing sentiment in its favour in the old country, where it has to meet the prejudice of a half century of economic teaching.

Now, Sir, let us see how far this grand idea has spread in the old country. I hold in my hand the following taken from the Ottawa "Citizen" of February 5th, 1893:

SALISBURY ON TARIFF WAR.

London, Feb. 4.—Lord Salisbury opened the Liverpool electric railway to-day. Accompanied by the Earl of Lathom and Lord Kelvin, the mayor of Liverpool, and the directors of the railroad, his Lordship entered a train and passed along the line. The train ran smoothly at the rate of twenty-two miles an hour. Crowds of spectators thronged the route and occasionally cheered. Afterwards, at the Liverpool town hall, in replying to an address from the Chamber of Commerce, Lord Salisbury referred to the increased difficulties with which the British merchants had to contend in the way of foreign competition. Lord Salisbury said that a tariff on corn was absolutely outside of the dreams of any politician. He questioned both the morality and expediency of the use of tariffs as a weapon against other nations, and mentioned as an instance in illustration of his argument, the fiscal wars between France and Italy, and France and Switzerland, as producing disaster to all concerned. Lord Salisbury defended the colonial extension of English rule. The whole world, he said, was benefited by British colonization, and should other nations obtain the colonies they might not use them in the same generous manner as the English, but they might fence them round with a wall of brass against English commerce.

When Lord Salisbury, the leader of the Opposition in England at the present time, gives utterance to such a statement, he must be a long way behind our friend the Finance Minister here. He does not see this grand idea of the Canadian Finance Minister. It will take a good deal of economic teaching, and I do not doubt but it will be necessary for the Finance Minister, and for the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) to go across the ocean once or twice more to educate the statesmen of England up to the condition of taking up this question and dealing with it. Now, Sir, we have been told by hon. gentlemen opposite time and again in this House about how prosperous the farmers in this country are. There is one argument we can use with respect to the prosperity of the farmer, and it is this: If the farmers have been producing at a loss, if the crops they have been raising have not been paying the amount that has been spent in their production—and I am positive they have not—then the country must be rather in a bad condition. I will give a few facts to prove this. I may mention that the prices which I am about to quote are taken from the Seaforth "Expositor" for the month of December, and they were the ruling prices in the markets for grain at that time; and the cost of production is taken from a table in the Sessional Papers of the province of Ontario for the year 1887.

STATEMENT of cost of production and value of grain raised in Ontario in 1892.

We find, as the result of this calculation, that, last year, there was a total loss to the farmers of Ontario, on the value of these crops, as compared with the cost of production, of $26,970,844; or, allowing them the value of their straw, a loss of $14,152,539. Now, Mr. Speaker, I need not say to you that there is not an industry in the province of Ontario that could have stood the strain that the industry of agriculture has stood for a number of years past. This industry has been taxed to the very utmost. Wherever there is an industry in which the cost of production exceeds the amount received for the goods produced, it is impossible that that industry can be in a healthy condition. Now, Sir, lest it should be supposed that my statement is not correct, I will fall back upon an authority that I do not believe will be disputed by a single gentleman in this House. I will fall back upon a statement given by the Ontario statistician, Mr. Blue, of the cost of producing fall wheat, spring wheat, barley, oats and peas for the years from 1885 to 1889. He gives the cost of production and the quantity produced per acre, and he shows that, between those years, the annual loss per acre, on the fall wheat, was $3.77; on spring wheat, $4.15; on barley, $1; on oats, $3.32; on peas, $3.92, and on corn, $4. These are statements that cannot be set aside, and, in the face of them, how can any one say that the farmers of the province of Ontario are in a prosperous condition? Nor is this condition of affairs peculiar to the province of Ontario. Here is a statement taken from a Conservative paper, the Seaforth "Sun," in 1891, showing that in the state of Michigan, in 1889, it cost $18,200,000 to produce wheat which was valued at $16,728,000, or a loss of $1,471,000. It also shows that the total cost of the corn crop in the state of Michigan, in the same year, was $12,269,000 and its value $7,254,000, a loss to the farmers of Michigan, on that one crop, of $5,014,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite may tell us that the farmers are not as well off in the state of Michigan and other states of the Union as they are in the province of Ontario to-day; but we are told that the National Policy would increase the price of grains for the farmers of this country. Now, according to the statements I have made, the total acreage, in the province of Ontario, of the grains that I have mentioned was 4,753,000 acres. The total number of farms in Ontario containing one hundred acres is something like 215,000, and there are 21,000,000 acres of occupied land in that province, which would give some 215,000 farms of one hundred acres each, allowing 895 acres to go for waste land upon which grain cannot be raised. The average cleared land upon each farm in Ontario, according to the Bureau of Industries, is fifty-two acres, and supposing that each farm has twenty-two acres of grain, the statement I have made shows a loss of $66 to each farmer annually. But supposing each farm had forty-four acres of grain, the loss would be $132 per year. With respect to the prices of grain, I hold that the promises to the farmers have not been fulfilled. Although we are told by the hon. member for North Grey to-day that the National Policy has given us a market of over 12,000,000 bushels of grain annually, and that the farmers of Ontario had been benefited to that amount. I beg to differ from him, and I want the hon. gentleman to give a fair solution of the statement I am about to give. My statement is this: In 1887 oats were 11 cents per bushel higher in Toronto than in Chicago. In 1878, they were 8 cents higher. I found that in 1877 there were over 8,000,000 bushels of Indian corn brought into Canada and consumed; in 1878 there were over 7,000,000 of bushels imported into and consumed in Canada. When I come to 1880, a year after the National Policy had been imposed, I find that oats were only 6½ cents higher in Toronto than in Chicago. In 1881 they were only 2 cents higher, and yet only 2,000,000 bushels of grain came into Canada in that year against 8,000,000 in 1878. While oats were 11 cents higher in Chicago in 1878, they were only 2 cents higher in 1881, showing conclusively that the coarse grains of the farmers of Ontario are not in prices of wheat. I have given it to this country free. Let me take a statement from the abstract of 1886 with respect to the prices of wheat. I have given it to this House before, but it will stand giving again. It is such an awful example of what the National Policy has done to the farmers of the Dominion. I find that wheat in Montreal was $1.33 per bushel in 1881, and in New York $1.11 per bushel, or 22 cents higher in Montreal than in New York; and remember that 1881 was just after the National Policy had fairly commenced to make its influence felt in this country. In 1882, wheat was $1.30 in Montreal and $1.18 in New York. In 1883, it was $1.14 in Montreal and $1.12 in New York. In 1884, it was $1.05 in Montreal and $1.06 in New York. In 1885, it was 93 cents in Montreal and 86 cents in New York. In 1886, it was 85 cents in Montreal and 87 cents in New York. Mark that during those six years, while wheat had fallen 24 cents per bushel in the United States, under the influence of this blessed National Policy, it had fallen 48 cents in Canada. That was giving the farmers of this country protection with a vengeance, and that is continuing at the present time. I have quotations here taken from the "Evening Mail," of 19th January, 1892, of grain in Buffalo and Toronto:—

	Buffalo.	Toronto.	Difference in favour of Buffalo.
Spring wheat.....	$1.00½	87½ cts.	13 cts.
Fall wheat.....	99	91½ "	7½ "
Oats.....	40	34½ "	5½ "
Barley.....	89	50 "	39 "

I have taken the "Mail" during the last few years, and have culled from it a statement of the prices of grain in Toronto and Buffalo, and I find that fall wheat was 10 cents higher per bushel in Buffalo than in Toronto; spring wheat also 10 cents higher, barley 36 cents higher, and oats 5 cents higher in Buffalo than in Toronto. Now, let me show what amount of money the Canadian farmer is losing through not having access to that market. On 966,522 acres of fall wheat he lost $2,029,696; on spring wheat he lost $814,127, and on barley $4,403,166, compared with the American farmer. On oats he lost $3,332,000, or in all there was a difference between what the Canadian and the American farmer received, taking the amount of grain raised in the province of Ontario, of $10,579,217. This is what the National Policy has done for Canada, and I fear not to state that if we had reciprocity with the United States the markets of that country and those of Ontario would be equalized within a very short time, and the farmers on the other side of the line would not have the advantage they now enjoy over the farmers of Ontario. Let me just go over a few articles sold by the ordinary farmer in Ontario, which he can easily sell off a hundred acres of land annually, and on which he has to pay duties before he can bring them into the United States. The duties on these going into the United States are as follows:—

1 horse.....	$30 00
20 lambs at 75 cts. each.....	15 00
60 lbs. of wool.....	7 20
200 bushels of barley.....	72 00
200 bushels of wheat.....	20 00
300 dozens of eggs.....	9 00
200 bushels of oats.....	10 00
5 tons of hay.....	20 00
100 bushels of potatoes.....	25 00

and although we have been told that we have supplemented the market we lost in barley by putting peas in their stead, let me state that we have lost on peas. The United States purchased our peas before the McKinley Bill, but now they put a duty of 40 cents a bushel on peas, so that we lose $40 on 100 bushels. On 20 barrels of apples at 75 cents per barrel we lose $15, making a total loss of $263. There is a loss of $263 to the Canadian farmer in placing that quantity of goods upon the American market as compared with his American neighbour. Now, we have been told that the Canadian farmer pays no duty. Why, Sir, let me enumerate a few articles that the Canadian farmer will purchase. On binding twine, say 80 pounds, $2.50; barb wire, 5000 pounds, $7.70; coal oil, 20 gallons, $2; boots and shoes, $40 worth, for a family, at 25 per cent duty, $10; agricultural implements, $1,000 for a farm, would represent $30 a year. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that this is too large an amount to be paid for implements upon a common farm in Ontario; but let me state, Mr. Speaker, that the amount spent for agricultural implements upon the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa is between $6,000 and $7,000, and it was commenced only some three or four years ago. So I do not think $1,000 for implements upon an ordinary farm too much. A set of implements will last only ten years, so that the duty upon them represents $30 a year. Now, the farmer must pay 75 cents a barrel on flour ground out of his own wheat, because the miller takes his wheat at the market price, and gives him flour at the market price. He will use six barrels a year, so that the duty he pays is $4.50. Then take cotton goods, upon which he will pay a duty of, say $5—so you have a total of $61 upon these articles. Between his purchases being increased by $61 and his losses on his sales as I have shown, there is a loss of $320 a year to the Canadian farmer, which he would not suffer if he had unrestricted trade with the United States. Now, let me say that I do not believe he would benefit to the whole extent of that sum, but I am quite positive that over $150 a year would go into the pocket of every farmer upon a good fair 100-acre farm in the province of Ontario if we had reciprocity with the United States. Now, let me compare the condition of the farmer with that of the workingman. We have had a good deal said about the workingman. Let me say that one reason why the population of the province of Ontario are gathering into the towns and cities and leaving the agricultural districts is that the farmers of the province are not able, under present conditions, to hire the help upon the farm that they would like to do, and let me say that if it were not for the industry, frugality and economy practised by the farmers they could not have stood the enormous strain which has been put upon them within the last few years. Why, Sir, the hired man is in a better position than the farmer at the end of the year. The average wage of a young man hired by the year is $158. We will give the $58 to keep him in clothing. What does he pay to the Government upon that? He has to pay not less than $20 duty upon the clothing he wears. Then he has $50 to take a little pleasure trip and enjoy himself, and he has $50 to the good at the end of the year, which is more than the majority of farmers in the province of Ontario have to-day. The average man with a family has a wage of $257 a year. Most of the men with families have a house, they get a cow kept and they have fire wood and a garden, so that, in reality, most of them will receive as good as $300 a year. Still, I do not envy the workmen in the province of Ontario, with a wife and large family, to be supported out of $300 a year. It will cost him over $90 for clothing for the average family, and he will pay over $30 duty upon that clothing and other necessary articles for the use of his family. That is the condition of the workmen in Ontario when compared with the farmers of the province. Now, Sir, we are advocating free corn to come into the province of Ontario. Free corn would be a great blessing to the farmers of this province. I know whereof I speak; I know that free corn would not injure the farmer in the sale of his coarse grains. I am convinced, and the farmers are convinced, that free corn would be a boon, and I am glad that this is one of the articles the Patrons of Industry ask the Government to remove the duty from. For a number of years we asked to have the duty on corn removed, or at least that the farmer should be placed upon a footing of equality with the distillers, and have a rebate upon the corn fed to cattle exported out of this country. I am not aware whether the rebate is still paid to distillers upon the corn used in distilling liquor which is sent out of this country. In 1892, 1,865,000 bushels of corn came into Canada for consumption. Now, into Great Britain during that year there was imported 86,875,000 bushels from all countries. From the United States Britain imported 46,453,000 bushels of corn; from Canada 2,049,000 bushels, which came from the United States and which was sent to the old country. Now, Sir, into Great Britain 642,000 cattle were imported from all countries. From Canada 107,000 were imported; from the United States 384,000. The Canadian farmer has to meet in the markets of the old country the British farmer and the American farmer, who have both free corn, and thus the Canadian farmer is placed at a great disadvantage with his competitors. Let me refer you, Sir, to the statement of a large cattle buyer in Toronto lately. That gentleman stated that cattle from the United States that had been fed upon corn in going into the British market, weighed 100 pounds on the hoof more than cattle coming from Canada fed on softer grains. If the farmer could sell 200 bushels of barley at 64 cents per bushel he would have $128. For this he could purchase 290 bushels of corn at 44 cents. That would give him 290 bushels of feed, eight pounds to the bushel better than the barley. I am positive this would give relief to the farmers of the province of Ontario and would do more to improve their position in the market of the old country than anything else would. I have here another statement showing that when in Toronto fat cattle were selling on 30th January, 1893, at 4½ cents, in Chicago the price was 5 to 6 cents, and, for shippers, from 4.70 to 5.70 cents, being higher than our Canadian beef cattle were selling for at that time. And yet we are told the Canadian farmers are protected against the importation of cattle, hogs and sheep from the United States. No greater fallacy was ever imposed upon the people of this country than to say that we have protection against the cattle coming from the United States. Why, Sir, if we had a free market and free ingress and egress to and from the United States to ship our cattle to the English market, we would be in much a better position. During 1891-92 cattle were being shipped from Boston for 25s. and 26s. per head, while we were paying 66s., and as high as 70s. per head. Thus we are placed at a disadvantage in every respect. Free corn would certainly give us relief, and let me say again that this has been shown by experiment. The same was shown with respect to pork by the experiment made in the Ontario Experimental Farm, when the corn fed pork shrunk only 14 per cent from the live animal to the dressed meat. Pea meal, 17 per cent; barley and middlings, 15.6. The corn and pea meal were equal in fairness to the barley, showing conclusively that corn is one of the best grains that we can get to feed in the province of Ontario, and that it would be a great benefit to our farmers, if we could get free corn. Now, with respect to binder twine, I am not going to say a great deal. I will repeat what I said in the debate a few days ago, and that is, that in the province of Ontario, while last year we put into the Treasury $7,932, we paid over to the cordage companies, $194,755. For $1 that went into the Treasury, $22 were taken out of the pockets of the farmers. Binder twine will have to come down in price, not by reason of the action of the Government, but in spite of their action. I see by the papers to-day that the Government of the province of Ontario are turning out binder twine in the Central Prison, Toronto, at a cost of 9 cents per pound. They cannot produce it at present as cheaply as they will be able to do by and by, for the reason that the prisoners are not yet adpets at the work, and it requires some time for them to get a knowledge of the industry, which will enable them to produce the article at the lowest possible price. In the county of Huron, the farmers paid $8,673 for binder twine, of which only about $300 went into the Treasury. That is a very large tax indeed upon the farmers. I have a statement here drawn up by a manufacturing company of binder twine in Philadelphia, dated 29th July, 1891 :

To Messrs. Keyle and Barrell Nutshell.

DEAR SIRS, --At the request of Messrs. Coon Bros. & Co., of this city, we mail you samples of binder twine as follows :--

Standard mixed, sisal and manila, 7½ cents per lb. ; mixed russian, all free on board at Philadelphia, 7½ cents, less 2 per cent for cash in car lots. We shade these prices ½c. per pound. These are very low prices, and the reason is the lateness of the season.

The rate from Philadelphia, 28 cents in car lots ; 41 cents for less.

Hoping to be favoured with an order.

JOHN F. BAILEY & CO.

There is a statement showing that binder twine, in 1891, could have been laid down in the province of Ontario at some 8 cents per pound, paying freight, because that amounted to quite a cent per pound, and 41 cents for less than car loads. Here is another statement dated 8th January, 1892, from a manufacturing firm in Belfast :

BELFAST, 8th January, 1891.

Our to-day's prices are as under :--

Manila binder twine, about 650 feet per pound, 5d. per pound.

Sisal binder twine, about 550 feet per pound, 4d. per pound.

Free on board at Liverpool. Payment by 90 days sight draft net or less 2 per cent discount for cash against documents.

These are the prices at which binder twine could have been laid down in the province of Ontario in 1891. The farmers in the province of Ontario were paying 14 and 15 cents for binder twine, and, during the last year, binder twine cost me 13 cents per pound for what it took to bind my crops. So we find that we have not to thank the Government to-day for the reduction on binder twine, because circumstances have almost compelled them to reduce the duty from 25 per cent to 12½. They are also manufacturing binder twine in Brantford, and the very company that is manufacturing in Brantford, backed up by the Patrons of Industry, are asking the Government to-day to remove the duty, because they believe they can manufacture binder twine as cheaply as any company in the world. Now, as to the duty upon iron. In 1878 the product was about 16,000 tons ; in 1890 it had gone up to something like 21,000 tons. The duty of $4 per ton yielded $86,800, and the bounty of $2 per ton amounted to $43,400, so that $130,200 went into the pockets of the iron manufacturers of Canada during that year. Let me say that we have not increased the output to any great extent, and the duty upon iron is a grievous burden, not only upon the farmers but upon the manufacturers of agricultural implements. Let me show the duties upon some of the articles. Upon barbed wire we pay 1½ cents per pound, and there is a duty of nearly 50 per cent on the cost of the barbed wire. Upon scythes we pay 70 per cent, upon hay knives 70, and upon spades 50. A large number of agricultural implements come into Canada. Now, I will give you the opinion of an iron manufacturer in Canada as to the effect of the duty upon iron, both as it affects the manufacturers of agricultural implements, and the farmers :

Take pig iron for instance, which is very largely used, and it will show the position of the Canadian manufacturers :--

One ton of 2,240 lbs. costs at furnace in United States.....	$9 15
Duty on 2,240.....	4 48

It will be seen that the duty is 48 per cent on the price paid for the iron, while the duty on agricultural implements coming into Canada is 35 per cent. Now, how does this operate when the United States manufacturer sends his goods into Canada? The iron for his machines is bought from the same smelting furnaces, and at the same price that the Canadian manufacturer pays. Both manufacturers buy a large portion of the stock in the early fall, but as the machines are not required until the following spring and summer, the manufacturer in the United States does not ship his machines into Canada until about the time the machines are required for use; hence the duty is not paid for at least six months after the Canadian manufacturer has paid his 48 per cent duty on the iron he has been manufacturing. Thus the Canadian manufacturer loses six months interest on the duty paid. The United States manufacturer brings his goods into Canada at 35 per cent, while our manufacturer pays 48 per cent on the raw material. To illustrate still further how our manufacturers are oppressed by the tariff, take the following :--

Pig iron, as purchased by the United States manufacturer, 1,000 tons (gross) at $9.15 per ton	$ 9,150 00
--	-------------

This iron is bought 1st October, and the machines shipped into Canada on 1st March, when the duty is paid.

Now we will see how it is with the Canadian manufacturer. He buys 1st October :--

1,000 tons (gross) pig iron at $9.15 per ton.....	$ 9,150 00
Duty on above paid 1st Oct.....	4,480 00
Interest on duty from October until March.....	274 50

Total cost for 1,000 tons of iron.....	$13,908 50
Total cost of 1,000 tons of iron to U. S. manufacturer	9,150 00

Excess in cost of 1,000 tons of iron to Canada manufacturer.....	$ 4,758 50
--	-------------

The above statement clearly shows that the actual cost of pig iron is 53 per cent more to the Canadian than to the American manufacturer. In the face of this 52 per cent, the United States manufacturers are permitted to bring their machines into Canada at 35 per cent, which is 17 per cent less than the Canadian has to pay for his raw material. It will be seen by this that the enormous duty on pig iron is a heavy burden to our manufacturers of farm implements, and even a much heavier burden on our farmers, as iron enters very largely into the construction of all farm machinery and tools.

We have been told time and time again by hon. gentlemen opposite that we scarcely receive any agricultural implements from outside countries. I have examined the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I find there were imported last year: 361 drills, on which a duty was paid of $4,395, or $12 on each machine; harrows, 146, on which a duty was paid of $707; binders, 670, of the total value of $65,070, on which duty was paid of $22,774, or $34 on each machine; ploughs, 2,033, duty $10,499, or $5 each; scythes, 1,005 dozen, duty $1,655; spades and shovels, 1,084 dozen, duty $2,679; other agricultural implements paid a duty of $25,926. I contend that these figures prove that the Canadian farmers have to pay the cost of agricultural implements and 35 per cent duty over the price charged the United States farmers. During last fall I paid a visit to the North-west. I met Mr. Symmonds, who was coming down from Prince Albert, and who was in charge of a party of Mennonites, who were proposing to settle in the North-west. I am happy to be able to agree with the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule) that the country around Prince Albert and Edmonton form as fine sections as any in the whole North-west. The land is unexcelled, the country is well watered, and there is plenty of timber, while in the Edmonton district fuel is abundant, and that district is certainly one of the most advantageous for settlement. The party had visited that country, having come up from Kansas. Mr. Symmonds had conducted those gentlemen through Manitoba and the North-west, intending, as I have said, to locate in Canada. They had brought a list of prices of agricultural implements and other goods in Kansas, so that they would be able to make a comparison with prices in the North-west, and Mr. Symmonds told me that on binders alone there was a difference of $40 on the price of each machine as between the North-west and Kansas. On account of the very high duty on agricultural implements, and the lower price that our farmers receive for their grain—because they had examined into this matter and found that the farmers in southern Manitoba were receiving from 5 to 10 cents per bushel less than the farmers in North Dakota—they had decided not to come to Canada to settle, notwithstanding any statement that may be made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I now come to woollen goods. In 1870 we imported wool goods to the value of $8,533,000; in 1882, $10,341,000, or an increase of $1,805,000. The duty paid in 1892 amounted to $3,095,000. Of wool we imported in 1878 the value of $6,230,000; 1892, $10,224,000. That I hold to be a great injustice to the farmers of Ontario. While they have been called upon to pay 30, 40, 45, and even 60 per cent on the cost of woollen fabrics, no less than 10,224,000 pounds of wool came into Canada, duty free, thus preventing our farmers realizing the price for their wool which they should fairly obtain. There were over 900,000 pounds of wool sent to the United States market from Canada in 1892, on which we had to pay 12½ cents per pound duty. That, no doubt, involved a loss of $659,000 to the farmers of Ontario on the price of wool alone, because during 1890 the production of wool was 5,498,000 pounds, upon which we lost 12 cents per pound on account of foreign wool being admitted into Canada duty free. We have been told a great deal in regard to reduction in the price of woollen goods, and this matter was referred to by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). I have looked into the statistics. I find according to the British trade table that from 1870 to 1874 the prices of woollen goods averaged 13½d. per yard, while the price was 9d. from 1885 to 1889. It thus appears that in Britain the price was reduced at least 50 per cent, and yet we are told that any reduction in price here on woollen goods is due to the National Policy. The cost of goods has not, however, been reduced in Canada as in Great Britain, because we have had an increase of duty on those goods from 7½ to 30 per cent. I consider that the farmers of Ontario to-day have to pay duties on woollen goods coming from the manufacturers of Canada, and the whole full price besides, and there is a small margin of 2 per cent for freight and insurance for putting Canadian goods on the Canadian market. I now come to cotton goods. In 1878 cotton goods to the value of $7,418 entered Canada. In 1892 the value of these goods imported was $3,992,000. Of raw cotton there were imported in 1878, 7,243,413 pounds; but in 1892 the imports reached 42,075,000 pounds. We were told to-day that there had been a marvellous reduction in the price of cotton goods in Canada. Let me point out that between 1865 and 1869 the price per 100 weight of raw cotton in Britain was £5 11s. 9d., but between 1885 and 1889 it had been reduced to £2 12s. 2d., or less than half its former price, and yet, notwithstanding this reduction, which is the real cause of the reduced price, gentlemen opposite claim credit for the reduction of the price in Canadian cotton goods. I find also that "piece goods" had fallen in Great Britain from 3.41d. per yard between 1869 and 1874 to 2½d. in 1885, which is also nearly one-half the former price. This is a greater reduction in England in the price of cotton than my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) told us had taken place in Canada under the National Policy. While at the present time we only take into the public treasury $1,014,423 in duty on cotton, yet, as was shown by the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) by reason of this high protective duty, $4,000,000 went into the pocket of the cotton combines, so that for every dollar that goes into the public treasury more than $2 goes to the cotton manufacturers. I quote the following as showing the state of the condition of the cotton industry in Canada to-day :

THURSDAY, 2nd February.

The local stock market showed improvement to-day and although not remarkably active seems to some extent to have got out of the rut it has been in for some days. New York and London prices were just about steady on the whole.

The cause of the improvement here is largely due to a bull movement in the cotton stocks headed by Montreal. It is understood that this company is proposing to make a new issue of stock, increasing the present capital of $1,000,000 to $1,500,000, and the stock to be allotted to present holders in the proportion of a share for two. What the terms of the issue are is not known as yet, but it is said that the stock is to be watered to a considerable extent as was the case in the Dominion Cotton Company, to cover up the enormous profits the company have been making, which last year amounted to over 22 per cent. In order to increase their capital it will be necessary to obtain power from the Government to do so, as the present amount, $1,000,000, is all they are authorized to have. The stock opened a full point higher at 147, and went up by leaps until 153½ was reached, which was the closing figure. On Monday it sold at 142, so that the stock had risen 11½ per cent in the last four days. The other cotton stocks were firmer in sympathy, Dominion selling ½ higher at 140, and Coloured ¾ higher at 108½.

If our cotton manufacturers are able to send goods to China and Japan to compete with the United States and Great Britain in that market, it is time there was a reduction on the cost of the goods in this country. Is it fair or just to impose such a tax on the farmers and workingmen of Canada so that our cotton companies can afford to go into foreign countries amongst the heathen Chinese and Japanese and give them goods cheaper than they are sold at in Canada? It is a slur upon civilization to say that the people of a free country can be imposed upon to such an extent, and yet that is the condition in Canada to-day with reference to cotton goods. We have been told by the Finance Minister that our markets had increased to such an enormous extent in goods going from Canada to the British market, and that whilst we had increased the export of agricultural products over $15,000,000 during the last year or two to the British market, that it more than repaid us for the small reduction of $2,000,000 lost in sending goods to the American market. The hon. gentleman referred to horses. I find that in 1890 we exported 16,180 horses, while in 1892 we only exported 9,261, leaving 6,982 horses in the country, calculating the value at the prices of those exported, leaving $1,096,174 worth of horses in Canada that cannot find a market. Is it to be wondered at that all over the province of Ontario, and Quebec, too, there is a large surplus of horses upon which the farmers cannot realize, and yet we are told by the Government that they have found a paying market for us in Great Britain? Such is not the case. I have a letter from a relation of mine who takes horses to the old country. His son went there last December, and he tells me that the market is so very dull in Britain that he does not think he will come out here next summer. To-day buyers are purchasing the best horses in my own county and in the neighbouring county of Perth and Stratford and taking them to the United States and paying the enormous duty. We have, therefore, lost a market for over $1,096,000 worth of horses in the United States, and that market has not been provided elsewhere. Another item of our export trade is eggs. In 1890 we exported 12,825,000 dozen of eggs, and in 1892 only 7,931,000 of eggs, so that there were 4,894,000 dozens less exported from Canada last year than before the McKinley Bill, or representing a value in dollars amounting to $21,000. Although the Finance Minister told us that eggs sent to the English market had realized 1½ cents more than they did in the American market, even according to his own statement those engaged in the industry in Canada, if they had not to pay 5 cents per dozen duty on eggs going into the United States, would have realized 3½ cents more per dozen if we had reciprocity, than they realized in the English market. We have been told that the Government found a market for us for pease in Britain, and that this supplants the market for barley. In 1890 we exported 9,937,000 bushels of barley, most of which went to the United States, but in 1892 we only exported 5,202,000 bushels, or 4,736,977 bushels less than in 1890, or a loss of $2,392,000. Therefore, on these three items of horses, barley and eggs, alone, the Canadian farmer for want of reciprocity with the United States, has lost a market amounting in value to $4,210,000. It is no use for the Canadian Government to tell us that they have found a market for us in Britain, and that they are cultivating that market. We have always had the British market. We have always been sending our produce to the British market when it paid, and our farmers found that until the McKinley Bill was passed it did not pay them to send their horses, eggs and barley to the British market to any great extent. I hold our Government in a great measure responsible for the McKinley Bill. Mr. McKinley himself stated in the Congress of the United States, during the time his Bill was under discussion, that while it had been said that the Bill was a retaliatory measure against the Government of Canada for not observing their own tariff statute of 1879, and for reimposing certain duties in 1890 which they had removed in 1888, and while it was not a retaliatory measure, yet they could not forget entirely the action of the Canadian Government in that respect. Therefore, I hold that our Government are to blame for the loss of the United States market for $4,210,341 worth of our horses, eggs and barley. Now, just let me go over a few articles that we sent to the United States in 1892, giving in each case the number or quality and the amount of duty that we had to pay to obtain access to that market for them :

Article.	Number or Quantity.	Duty Paid.
Horses.....	9,261	$276,830

Yet hon. gentlemen tell us that the American market is not the best market for the Canadian farmer for these classes of products. Now, Sir, the Finance Minister, in his Budget speech, told us that he had taken off $5,821,422 of taxation, every cent of which would have come out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country. But he told us also that this amount of taxation was taken off goods that were not manufactured in Canada. That is just where we find fault with the present Government. We believe that the true policy of a Government in imposing tariff taxation is to impose it for revenue purposes only, and for that reason duties ought to be imposed upon goods not manufactured in the country, and not for such goods as iron, where, perhaps, $2 comes out of the pocket of the farmer for every one that goes into the Treasury; not on binding twine, where $22 comes out of the pocket of the farmer for every one dollar that goes into the Treasury; not on cotton goods, where for every dollar that goes into the Treasury, $2 goes to the combines; not on sugar, where over $2,000,000 goes into the pockets of the refiners and only $75,000 goes into the Treasury, or in reality where for every dollar that goes into the Treasury, at least $25 goes into the pockets of the refiners, on the calculation of 70 pounds per capita which was given by the Finance Minister. Now, Sir, we have heard a great deal about the misery that exists in the United States. We have heard about the great distress that exists in the state of Northern Dakota. Well, I have a quotation here from the Ottawa "Citizen" of 4th April, 1892, with respect to the measure of prosperity that prevails in certain states of the Union. It is a good Conservative paper, and, therefore, its statements must be true. We have never heard anything from hon. gentlemen opposite about the United States except blue ruin; and yet this is what the "Citizen" says:

The following taken from the Breeders Gazette relative to the movement of the farming community of Illinois will be of interest. The farmers, like ours are going west and leaving their farms, but not quite for the same reason as applies in Canada:—The following reports from counties in Central Illinois, from which farmers are moving west, clearly shows that the cause of this exodus is the enhanced value of farming lands in this state. From Bloomington comes the following. The hegira of farmers from McLean County and other portions of Central Illinois, which set in earnest about a year ago, continues this year in even more remarkable proportions than anticipated. It set in this immediate vicinity with the emigration last year of some 30 families in the neighbourhood of Heyworth, who nearly all located upon lands about Webster City, Ia. The high price of land and the advancing rents for farm acres in Central Illinois are the impelling forces which have set in motion this wholesale departure of agriculturists for Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas and Missouri, and also for portions of Indiana and Southern Illinois, where land is cheaper. Within the last four years farm land in McLean County has advanced in price at least 40 per cent. This year the sales of land have been unusually numerous, prices ranging from $80 to as high as $110 an acre. While farming pays a fair profit even at these prices for land, holders here have concluded that by selling out their possessions at the prices which they can now obtain and emigrating with their cash and stocks to states where lands are from 40 to 60 per cent cheaper, they can do better. Many of this class have realized 100 per cent profit or even more upon their investment in lands in a region within a few years, and besides have accumulated heavy bank accounts from the profits of farming and stock raising.

Now, Sir, let me give you a quotation from a farmer who left the county of Huron and went to the province of Manitoba to settle:

To read some of the papers of Manitoba a person would be led to believe that Dakota must be nearly depopulated and impoverished, while Manitoba is the reverse. However, we have our own ideas about that part of it and would like to ask why, if that country is so much better off than ours, do they not get as good a price for their grain and also why North Dakota is flooded with labouring men from Manitoba nearly every harvest. In one of the Manitoba papers of a recent issue I saw an item from a small town where barley was selling for 13 cents a bushel, but had risen two cents. In Langdon, at the same time, barley was selling for from 24 to 34 cents a bushel, and, at the same time, oats that were selling in Manitoba for 16 and 18 cents, were being sold in Langdon for 23 cents. Wheat has also been selling from 5 to 10 cents a bushel higher here than in Manitoba, till the last two weeks, when the millers of that country raised the price about 5 cents, which will not benefit the farmers much, as they have a very small share of wheat on hand now, and I have no doubt if there was a large amount of wheat held by farmers, the price would have remained as it was. Last harvest there were plenty of men came from Manitoba and worked with farmers around here. I had the pleasure of having one myself from that famous country, and a good one he was, too. Being asked why he came here to work, he stated that there wasn't enough money over there for him. It seems as if Manitobans were jealous of any prosperity in Dakota, and try all they can to hurt and keep us from going ahead. One paper, the Manitoba Free Press, had the gall to say that Manitoba hard wheat was worth more in Liverpool than Dakota hard wheat was, as if an imaginary line would make a difference in the wheat of Manitoba and Dakota.

Let me state that I have never believed in a country building up its own character or reputation upon the misfortunes of another; and, while I admit the North-west is an excellent country, a country far beyond North Dakota for settlers, let me state that as long as the Government pursue the policy they are now pursuing, it will be impossible for them to get settlers to go there. We have heard a great deal about the exodus. According to the census returns, 440,000 native Canadians have left Canada and gone to the United States from 1881 to 1891. I wonder if any gentleman in this House understands the whole meaning of this. I have taken the province of Ontario and the towns and cities in Ontario, and I find that their population is as follows:—

Toronto.....	181,220
Hamilton.....	48,980
Ottawa.....	44,154
London.....	31,977
Kingston.....	19,264
Brantford.....	12,753
Guelph.....	10,539
Windsor.....	10,322
Belleville.....	9,914
Peterborough.....	9,717
Stratford.....	9,510
St. Catharines.....	9,170
Chatham.....	9,052
Brockville.....	8,793
Woodstock.....	8,612
St. Thomas.....	10,370
Galt.....	7,535
Total.....	441,882

There is only a population in all these cities of Ontario of 441,882. Think of the devastation that has taken place by the emigration of the best blood of the Dominion! Why, the statement was made long ago that every man coming to this country was worth at least $1,000! If that be the case, what must have been our loss through the young men who have left us and gone to the United States? Calculate that number of individuals at $1,000 each, and you have a loss to the Dominion of $440,000,000, according to the estimate which came from that side of the House, that every immigrant was worth $1,000 to Canada. Let us see how that would affect the rural districts. Ontario is divided into ten districts. Take two of those districts comprising Bruce, Huron, Middlesex, Essex, Elgin, Bothwell, Lambton and Norfolk, and in these, the two most populous districts of Ontario, we have a population of only 450,000, so that, had the exodus been entirely from those two districts, it would leave them with only 10,000 of a population, or we have an exodus only 10,000 short of the population of these two districts. It is painful to think of the effect the National Policy has had on the Dominion. Now, the Government tell us it is not the National Policy which has had this effect, but the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me show from a source that cannot be doubted the opinion of gentlemen who came to this country to examine into its capabilities and report what kind of a field Canada would be for immigration, the effect which the National Policy has had on this country. I refer to the report of the tenant farmer, Mr. McQueen, who, after going through the Mr. McMILLAN (Huron).

I must now give the conclusions I have formed from an emigration point of view, of the capabilities and resources of the Maritime provinces. Any one reading my report will have some idea of what they are. I may here say my co-delegate and I held exactly the same views, and came to the same conclusions regarding the state of the country. As many former delegates to Canada and the Maritime provinces have given such glowing, and I think rather misleading and overdrawn reports of the country, it places me in a delicate and unenviable position to be compelled to do the reverse. I cannot say anything derogatory of the resources and capabilities of the provinces: they are great, and capable of great development, particularly the mineral. But facts prove that agriculture or farming has for a number of years, but more clearly since the McKinley Bill came into operation, been on the down grade and in a very depressed state. Nearly all the young people are leaving the old folks on their farms and going to the States. Land consequently is badly farmed and getting run down, houses and buildings in many instances falling out of repair. Any number of farms can be purchased at very low figures, often at less than the houses and buildings on them cost. A large number of farms are heavily mortgaged. The output of coal is increasing very slowly, and the iron industry is not developing as it ought to do. The census returns issued some months ago showed that the increase of population in the Maritime provinces during the last ten years was very small, not at all commensurate with the natural increase of population and the number of emigrants coming into the provinces. The questions naturally arise: What is the cause of this depression? And can I recommend farmers, labourers or artisans to emigrate to the Maritime provinces? In answer to the first question, from my own observation and from all I could hear and learn, it is from the want of better trade relations with the United States, the natural market for the surplus produce. Some may say you have nothing to do with the question—it is out of your province and touches on politics; but I hold it so closely associated with our mission and the object of our report that we are bound to bring it forward. In answer to the second question, as to recommending emigrants to go to the Maritime provinces, until there is unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, so that farmers would have a better market and be able to command higher prices for their produce, I must decidedly say "No." In coming to this conclusion I may say I went to the provinces unbiassed and unprejudiced, and have endeavoured to give an honest and just report.

(Sd.) JOHN McQUEEN.

Oakwood, Selkirk, Scotland, Jan. 18th, 1892.

The same gentleman sent a letter to the "North British Agriculturist," published in Scotland, in answer to a correspondence in that paper, and in that letter he states that he believes the policy pursued by the Government of the Dominion will drive the people of Canada into annexation. Here are the feelings and views of a gentleman who came out here with nothing but the best wishes for the Dominion, and who has given his views of the results of the Government policy as he found them. What he has said with respect of the Maritime provinces, hold good with respect to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, as regards our trade relations with the United States, and it holds good also with respect to our North-west Territories. When in British Columbia, in conversation with a number of gentlemen there, I asked them what their views were with respect to the trade question, and I was told that they had no feeling in common with eastern Canada, so far as trade was concerned, that their whole interests lay in having trade relations with the United States. There was a statement made with respect to loan companies in the province of Ontario. I went to the "Statistical Record," and I found the statement of loan companies from 1882. In that year they had $68,025,000 loaned on mortgages. In 1886 they had $84,573,000, and in 1890 this had risen to $105,532,000. That shows that, while there was only $16,000,000 of increase in the four years from 1882 to 1886, there was an increase of $31,000,000 from 1886 to 1890, showing that the people of this country are not in the same prosperous condition they have been in the past. If the present Government hold the reins of power for a short time longer, I am satisfied they will find that, perhaps not three-quarters, but at least one-half, of the farmers of the Dominion of Canada will have to give up their farms. I state what I know, when I say that the farmers of the province of Ontario never were in such a depressed condition in any time within the forty-nine years of my residence in this county. Their debts have become greater and their mortgages greater within the last few years than they were formerly. The farmers of Ontario and the workingmen of Ontario have been a long-suffering people, but the signs of times are that they are not going to suffer much longer. I believe that the organization that has been formed, will bring such pressure to bear on the Government that if they do not give us relief before another election comes around, they will find themselves occupying the benches to the left of the Speaker. The Government must feel and must know these things, and if they do not feel and do not know them, that itself is proof that their policy is made regardless of the interests of the farmers and workingmen, and proves that they are unfit to manage the affairs of this country.

Mr. BERGIN. If it were not that the hon. gentleman is here in the flesh, I might believe all the tale of desolation and poverty and decay which the last speaker says has come to the farmers of Canada. Anyone who knows that hon. gentleman, will not for a moment believe that if this country were in the state of almost destitution that he pictures, he would remain in it for twenty-four hours. His presence here is the best proof that the statements he has made with regard to the farmers of Canada are not correct. He tells us, Sir, that every interest in this country is in almost as ruinous a condition as that of the agriculturist. He pictures to us the sad condition, not only of the farmer, but of the working classes, and he went over a long list of the articles which are used by the farmer and by the workingman, and which are taxed 30 to 50 and 70 per cent. I think he overlooked hardly one article that is used by these classes, nor did he fail to show from his point of view that the farmers and labourers of the country generally are taxed from 30 to 40 and 50 per cent, and in some instances I think he went as high as 1,000 per cent. Now, judging from the way in which he has condemned the tariff and the duties imposed upon these different articles, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how he proposes to conduct the affairs of this country. I would like to ask that hon. gentleman how he intends to carry on government in this country. If he will not permit any article that goes into consumption in this country to be taxed, I would like to ask him how he comes to be in Parliament to-day? Because if, ever since 1878, the Government of this country had been conducted upon the principles he has laid down, we would have no Parliament, we would have no country, we would have no people. This, Sir, is the natural result of such doctrines as have been laid down by the hon. gentleman. I ought not, perhaps, to complain of the hon. gentleman, because any one who has listened to him to-night would know to which party he belonged, and would know that he is a typical member of his party, and that he is carrying out the principles of that party, which, from the day it lost power, from 1878 until to-day, has sought to degrade and destroy, if possible, the character of Canada, its people and its institutions. He has been a faithful follower of his leaders, and he has given us the party doctrine, "usque ad nauseam." This hon. gentleman tells us that he met a Mr. Symmonds, and from the description he gives of him, I should fancy Mr. Symmonds to be very much the same kind of politician as himself. I ask those who have heard the hon. gentleman to-night, what sort of information they would expect the hon. gentleman to give to Mr. Symmonds, who, he says, desired to make his home in this country. I ask what sort of a British subject Mr. Symmonds must have been, who, because he would have been obliged to pay a few dollars more for his agricultural implements, would prefer to go to the United States and live under a foreign flag to remaining in Canada and living under the British flag. But Mr. Symmonds did not tell the truth. I have here a paper edited by a Reformer, published at Edmonton, a thousand miles further away than Winnipeg, showing that the statements made by the gentleman were not true. He said that in Dakota they could buy agricultural implements, reapers, and so on, from $40 to $60 cheaper than they could be bought in Winnipeg, or Manitoba. This paper, "The Edmonton Bulletin," published by a Reformer, with the sole object of giving information to intending settlers, shows in its answers to letters that were sent to the editor from the United States, that these statements are not true. This is the correspondence, with the answers given by the editor :

LETTERS OF INQUIRY.

WALLA, P. O., Grand Forks Co., N. D.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—There are several families getting ready to start for your country in the spring and we wish to know about the time it will be safe to fetch our cattle that they may live on the grass or whether the frozen prairie is all burned off or not—we would like to come as soon as possible in order to get some crops in. I hear the Beaver Lake country is all located that is any good. We intend to fetch a sawmill with us as we hear there is plenty of timber in that district. I would like to know if the Beaver Lake district is surveyed and in the market. We are all ready to come as soon as we can learn the snow is all gone so that our stock can live. Yours, etc.

GEO. G. SMITH.

REPLY.

The ground is generally bare of snow in the beginning of April sometimes sooner, and crops are sown in the latter end of that month and throughout May. The Beaver Lake country was surveyed last summer and is now open for settlement, the good land is not nearly all taken up and there is some very fine timber throughout the whole of this district—Tamarack, spruce, birch, poplar and cotton wood. There were no prairie fires in this district last summer so all the frozen grass is still under the snow. Ed.

FAIRFIELD, Spokane Co., Wash., U.S.A.

EDITOR EDMONTON BULLETIN,—There are quite a number of people in this vicinity who think of migrating to your part of the country next season. I being one of the number, from what I have read so far I think I shall like it. I should like a little more knowledge of the cost of all kinds of agricultural implements, the cost of lumber, lime, doors, windows and also prices of live stock of all kinds poultry and in fact I should like to find out the price of things generally that a farmer would likely want to buy, especially hay, oats and wheat. I have a full supply of all kinds of farming implements and stock and I want to find out whether it would be better to sell here or take them with me when I come. I should like to know as much as possible of the climate in regard to severe storms, the depth of snow, how cold it gets and whether you have severe wind storms and snow blockades. A number of neighbours have got the "Alberta fever" very much. Do you raise winter wheat or spring wheat mostly in your parts and what are wheat, oats and barley selling at now?

Hoping to hear of some of those inquiries in your valuable little paper.

I remain yours truly,

WM. F. SIEGLE,

Massey-Harris binder $155 each, time $175 two payments; Toronto mower 4 feet 3 inches cut $60 cash, $70 time two payments; Sharp's rake $30 cash, Mr. BERGIN.

$35 time two payments; seeder, two-horse $85 cash, $95 time two payments; harrows, 60 steel teeth $16 cash, $17 time two payments; disc harrows, $37 cash, $43 time two payments; fanning mills $35 cash, $40 time two payments :

I paid $10 for a disc harrow this summer, but that is 3,000 miles nearer by. These gentlemen were satisfied and they came into the country. Now, I do not think any one will have discovered any symptom of regret in the heart of this hon. gentleman that things have gone to ruin in Canada, that the farmers and the labourers had been reduced to such straits, because he wound up with a warm eulogium on the state of Dakota. He said the Manitobans were jealous of it, and that they could buy everything cheaper in Dakota. The inference is irresistible that the hon. gentleman's sympathies are entirely on the other side, and that if he is here it is because he cannot, perhaps, dispose of his property, for he would no doubt like to be where his heart is, in the United States.

I cannot conceive for a moment of a man who really loves Canada, whose children are born in this country, speaking of Canada as this gentleman has done, if he has any love for its Government or the flag under which he lives. In dealing with the taxation of this country, he makes misleading statements. To listen to him one would suppose that no one purchases anything in this country but goods manufactured in England, France, Germany, or some other foreign country; because, when speaking of the cost of an article, he adds to it the duty, which he magnifies very often, and is not always correct, I am sorry to say. But going before an audience who did not know whether he was telling the truth, I have no doubt that he would mislead a great many people, and lead them to think that this country was not such a country as we represent it to be. We believe that we have one of the greatest countries, if not the greatest, upon the face of the earth. We believe that we have in Canada as proud, as intellectual, as industrious a population as God ever sent upon the face of the globe. We believe we are able to hold our own with any nation under the canopy of heaven; and yet we have men getting up in this House and speaking of this country, of its people, of its commerce, as if there was nothing good within our borders. A pretty character he gives to the farmers of Ontario. Sir, he had the indecency, upon the opening of his speech to-night, to taunt my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) with having slandered the farmers of this country. He said that no man on that side of the House, whatever he thought, had said that the farmers of this country were paupers or were ignorant. Why, Sir, his ears must have been closed. This sort of thing is slung across the House to us every day. Even the ex-Minister of Finance tells the people of this country that it was owing to the ignorance of the farmers that the Tories had succeeded in carrying the elections in 1878. That is the belief of all those people on the other side now, and it is for that reason that he tells us to-day—what is not correct—that the loss of grain to the Ontario farmers, leaving out the straw, on account of protection last year, was $22,000,000. This gentleman deals in formidable figures, his arithmetic is of an extensive character. He told us a little while ago that whilst there was a loss of $22,000,000 on grain, we have lost, through people who had left this country, something over $400,000,000 last year. That may be, in the estimation of that hon. gentleman, sound logic, but it sounds to me very much like bosh, and I think it will be so regarded by the people of this country. He says, too, that the labourers and the people generally are not fit for manufactures, and he finds, also, that the country is not adapted to manufactures; yet, Sir, we have made the most magnificent progress in manufactures in this country since the introduction of the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen say that the National Policy has been a failure. Well, if the National Policy has not been a failure it is not because of the honest efforts of gentlemen opposite to benefit their country; it is not because gentlemen opposite have given anything like a fair or intelligent consideration to the National Policy. The National Policy was inaugurated for the purpose of taking us out of the sad and sickening condition in which this country found itself before 1879. Why, Sir, we might go back to those days and contrast the condition of the country with its condition to-day, feeling that we did a great, a noble and a patriotic work when we initiated the National Policy. We remember that at that time trade was almost stagnant, as it was on the other side of the line. We remember that in those days we had—as my hon. friend, the other stalwart Tory from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), said last night—we had soup kitchens everywhere. We had in this province itself, not only Canadian tramps, but American tramps, filling our highways to such an extent that the farmers were afraid to go to their beds at night without thoroughly examining their barns, lest they should be burned out before morning by these tramps. All that has passed away. There is nothing in this country to-day but prosperity, except in the hearts of gentlemen opposite. It is true that hon. gentlemen say the National Policy has failed, to a certain extent. We never pretended to say to the people of this country that the National Policy was perfect, and that, as we initiated it, it would meet every change of time and of condition. What we did say was that we would endeavour to put these struggling industries upon their feet, and sustain them until they were in a condition to sustain themselves, and I contend, Mr. Speaker, that we have accomplished that; but gentlemen come before this House and they ask us to do away with the duty upon binder twine; they ask us to do away with the duty upon coal oil; they ask us to do away with the duty upon agricu-tural implements; they ask us to do away with the duty upon barbed wire, and I agree that not only should the duty be reduced on barbed wire, but barbed wire should be prohibited altogether, and a sensible wire, which will do no harm to cattle, or to horses, or to sheep, should be introduced. They ask that the duty be taken off corn. For my part I am prepared to meet the question fairly and to consider it, and if I find that the duty is onerous on any one, I am willing to have it removed from the article complained of. I am not prepared to say that to-night, or any time during this session. I shall so vote, on the contrary, I shall not vote for a reduction in the duty on any of those articles during this session. I prefer to trust the Government to trusting hon. gentlemen who in advance seek to bring up motions on many different articles so as to commit weak-kneed people, and there may be some on this side of the House, to their fallacies. They know it is not possible for them to put this tariff in a condition that will render it perfectly acceptable to the people, as the Government will be able to do. In the first place, they have not the confidence of the country, and when they have not the confidence of the people, everything they do or propose to do will be looked upon with suspicion, and people will not credit them with any desire to advance the country's interests. The men who have slandered it from the day they left office until now are not the men who have the true interests of Canada at heart and are not the men who will be trusted by honest Canadians. I think I have said all that it is necessary to say with respect to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who preceded me, but I have some comments to offer in regard to the remarks that were made the other night respecting the industry which has made the little town in which I live one of the most flourishing of Canadian towns, whose people are as happy and contented, as well off and as comfortable as they can be in any town on this side of the Atlantic. Let me contrast the condition of that little town in 1878—the Factory town as it is known all over the country, Cornwall—with its condition to-day. There was no work in our town. The one cotton mill we had was not running, even at half time. Sometimes it had not cotton, and it could not run at all. The woollen mill was in very much the same condition. Trade was stagnant, it was dead. Our people were trying to get bread at home, but they could not find it. The grass grew on our streets, all because a deaf ear was turned to the different industries of the country by the Minister of Finance of that day. The people could not starve, they were determined to have bread; they drove that Government from power, and they sent me here to represent them and to vote for the National Policy. I, therefore, have taken a deep interest in the manufactures of our town. I have made it my business to become thoroughly acquainted with all the operations of the various industries in the town, and I am here to-night to say that the statements made with respect to the cotton industry by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) have no foundation. That hon. gentleman made a very strong speech, and I was amazed when I read it, because I felt he was entirely astray. I do not believe the hon. gentleman wilfully made the gross misstatements which are contained in that speech; I believe he was misled. I do not know whether he was misled by himself or by some one else, but, at all events, he adopted a method of calculation which could not fail to lead him into a maze, and, as a consequence, he propounded to this House a mass of absurdities with respect to the condition of that industry, which it would be difficult for him to have exceeded if he had been working at it for a year or more. That hon. gentleman's speech foreshadowed what I said a little while ago, that hon. gentlemen opposite were endeavouring, by bringing up particular industries and submitting motions and carrying them to a vote to discredit us in advance, and, if possible, prevent the Government carrying out any amendments that might be necessary to the tariff. And hon. gentlemen opposite had this further object in view, that should we, unfortunately, because I think it would be unfortunate if we took their advice on anything, for they have always been on the wrong side, take their advice and remove the duty or reduce the duty on certain articles, they would go to the country and say they compelled the Government to reduce the duties on binding twine or on coal oil or on anything else. So far as I am concerned, no such opportunity shall be given to them. I shall, as I said before, trust the Government, and not leave myself to their tender mercies. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) said:

I do not think I can do better, in supporting the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford, than to pass by the general considerations which might be made use of in support of his motion, and confine myself to a certain specific class of tariff reform which I think urgently demands, and has for some time demanded the attention of the Government. I think that while general considerations have great weight, they have been very well put so far in this debate, and will be still further brought forward; but we know they are very often attempted to be answered by some general assertion to the contrary, some contradiction, some perversion of the facts or figures.

I say the contradictions and perversions of facts and figures come from the gentleman who makes the attack on the cotton industry, not from this side of the House. He further said:

But I propose to bring forward to-day a sample case of tariff reform, in which I will give facts and figures which cannot be set aside and cannot be ignored by general assertions about the prosperity of the country, but that must be met face to face and dealt with. I propose to deal with one of the most interesting of those famous infant industries of the National Policy, I mean the cotton trade of Canada. This is probably the largest and best grown of all those infants. I think it has been the most spoiled, and is the most saucy, and it certainly is the most dangerous of them all.

This cotton industry, since 1879, has given employment to about 7,000 more hands than were employed previous to 1878. Previous to that year we had a few struggling mills, as I described a few moments ago. We had the Valleyfield mill, we had also the Hochelega mill and a few other mills, employing 2,000 hands altogether. To-day there are in the Dominion twenty-four mills, all thriving, all working full time, and the operatives are happy and contented. In contrast to the blue-ruin exposition of my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) I will give you the list of the mills of that time and the number of hands employed, sometimes employed three days in the week and sometimes two. The Dundas mill, 450 hands; Canada Cotton, 500; Hudon, 280; Parks, 120—which was after all only a yarn mill with a few looms;—the Valleyfield mill, 450; and the Lybster mill, 200, or 2,000 hands in all. After the introduction of the National Policy the Dundas mill increased over 30 per cent, but in consequence of bad management and other causes it did not succeed, and was bought by the Dominion Cotton Company; part of the machinery was removed to the Falls of Montmorency mills, and the remaining portion to the Cornwall mills. After the introduction of the National Policy, in 1878, the Canada Cotton Mill was doubled in extent, the Hudon mill was increased to three times its former capacity, the Parks mill has been wiped out, and the Montreal Cotton Company has been increased more than 50 per cent. As I have stated we have twenty-four mills in Canada at present. Those mills have cost $13,700,000, and the yearly production is not as the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) said of the value of $18,000,000, but $8,750,000, and the yearly wages paid to the 9,000 hands employed amounts to $2,350,000. The hon. gentleman came to the conclusion that these mills produced $18,000,000 worth of cotton per year by a peculiar mode of calculation of his own. He says:

Fourteen million dollars is the value of the output of the whole mills of Canada, exclusive of importations, which amount to $4,000,000 in round numbers, so that the total consumption of cotton in Canada would be $18,000,000 worth. I heard my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the other evening, estimate the total consumption at from $17,000,000 to $20,000,000, so that his estimate exactly corresponds with my figures. We are now dealing with the portion of that total consumption which represents the output of the mills in Canada at $14,000,000. Now, what taxes are paid by the people of Canada to the Canadian manufacturers upon that output? We have seen that the Government collects at the rate of 28 per cent on the goods that come in, and we have seen that the other goods range from 35 per cent to 40 per cent and 45 per cent and 65 per cent taxation. We know that in selling these goods, the manufacturers are obliged to put the prices at the mills, a shade below the protective duty. They cannot take it quite off, for if they did, they would invite importation and competition; and so they put it just a shade below, in order to prevent competition from abroad. I want to be very moderate in my estimate, and although I believe I could really put the rate of taxation that is paid to the manufacturers at 35 per cent, I shall only for the purposes of my calculations, place it at exactly the sum which the Government receives on the goods that come into the country, namely, 28 per cent. That percentage of duty on $14,000,000 amounts to $3,920,000 per annum, which, according to the most moderate estimate of the tariff, is put into the pockets of the Canadian manufacturers. If we are to pay that from year to year, and year in and year out, as a tax upon the people, we may capitalize that annual sum so as to see what it amounts to. Why, Sir, capitalized, it would amount to $100,000,000, which we are paying to the Canadian cotton manufacturers in order to foster this infant industry.

His mode of calculation is this: He says that 26,000,000 pounds of raw material were imported in 1879, as against 46,000,000 pounds of raw material in 1892, and he says, taking the price of that 46,000,000 pounds which is nearly $4,000,000, and adding it to the wages paid to the hands, you will have in round numbers the sum of $6,000,000. This $6,000,000, taken from the value of the output, which he placed at $14,000,000, would leave $8,000,000 as a profit to the manufacturers. Let me state to the hon. gentleman that I have in my possession the figures taken from the books of the company and that the output is not $14,000,000 a year, but, as I told him a little while ago, it is $8,750,000. My hon. friend evidently knows little about the cotton industry. He evidently imagines because 46,000,000 pounds of raw material were imported, and so many million dollars worth of goods sold in the same year, that he had a right to estimate that that 46,000,000 pounds of raw material would make $14,000,000 worth of goods. The hon. gentleman is not quite fair in his calculation, because he says that the wages and the cost of the raw material deducted from the imaginary $14,000,000, at which he values the output, shows what the profits of the mills were. The hon. gentleman does not seem to be aware that there is very great loss and very great waste in cotton. He does not seem to know that there is a large amount of cotton lost in the picking-room, and a large loss even before it reaches there. He does not seem to be aware that there is a considerable loss of cotton in the carding-room, and a considerable loss in the dyeing-room. He does not seem to be aware that besides all that, there is a large amount of waste. He does not take into account the expenses of management, nor has he taken into account the interest on the capital of $13,700,000, which these mills have cost. He has not taken into account either the amount of duty which these mills are obliged to pay to the Government year after year upon machinery that they import, solely for the purpose in repairing the machinery in use, exclusive altogether of the duty they pay upon new machinery which they are obliged to bring into this country when they change the character of the goods they are manufacturing. He does not take into account that for cartage alone, between the mills and the steamers and the railways, they are obliged to pay $500,000 a year. He does not take into account that these mills purchase in Canada of stores and goods manufactured in Canada to enable them to carry on their business, over $750,000 worth a year. All this he has forgotten, and in that way he has contrived to pile up a monument of $8,000,000, which he says are the net profits accruing to the cotton manufacturers of Canada. Why, Sir, the statement is a monstrous exaggeration. No such thing could possibly occur. He tells us, moreover,—and it is a statement which should not go to the country unchallenged, that the merchants of Canada are obliged to buy from a corporation of so tyrannical and arbitrary a character the goods that they require for their customers, and they dare not refuse to pay the prices which these companies ask. I ask the hon. gentleman himself, how he can make such a statement as that, in the face of the fact that there is the St. Henri mill in Montreal, and that there are five or six other independent mills. If there is room for these mills, there is also room for many others. Let these hon. gentlemen—wealthy men like my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) and my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)—imitate the conduct of leading Conservatives; let them put their hands into their pockets and help to assist the industries of this country, instead of decrying them. If these mills are the profitable institutions that they say they are, these gentlemen would be ready to assist them at any moment. We know that nearly all the capital of a number of the mills was wiped out; we know that the proprietors had to sell to save a shred of their capital; we know that they were glad to sell to the Dominion Mills Cotton Company and to the Dominion Mills Coloured Cotton Company. These men have taken their lives in their hands, and they are now doing what they did from 1878 to 1889: they are hanging on, as it were, by the eyelashes; they are stretching their credit to the utmost in order to make their mills profitable and successful. If they fail in this, the principal men in this combination will go to the ground. And why was this combination necessary? Why was it that all the other mills failed to make money? It was because they were too small; the management of them cost too much money, and the labour necessary to enable them to turn out goods suitable for the market, had to be skilled labour. Thus, so much was added to the expense, that it was impossible for these mills to succeed, and their failure was the natural outcome of endeavouring to do too much with too small capital. It is now hoped that, with better machinery and increased skill in labour—because we now have skilled labour in Canada, as we had not in 1879—they will be able to put goods on the market at a cheaper rate. Heretofore, every mill was manufacturing gray or white or coloured goods, and every time an order came, the manager was obliged to change the machinery, which involved loss of time, loss of labour, and stoppage of the mill, very often for days at a time. No industry could prosper under such methods. But to-day, as I have said, it is believed that, with increased and improved machinery, and by producing only one kind of goods in each mill, it will be possible to turn out goods, as they are being turned out to-day, equal, yes, better than those produced in the old country and imported into Canada. The hon. gentleman says that the people of this country pay $4,000,000 duty upon the cotton goods imported, and that they pay this sum into the pockets of the manufacturers. I would like to know, from the hon. gentleman, how he is going to make it manifest to me that $4,000,000 worth of imported goods, which, according to his own showing, paid only 28 per cent, could have placed in the coffers of the manufacturers the sum of $4,000,000. If he had considered, he would have seen that the amount paid was not $4,000,000, but the interest on $4,000,000 at 28 per cent. That is one of the cards of the hon. gentleman's house that has toppled and fallen away. The hon. gentleman, when he adds that amount to the $14,000,000 which he arrived at by the rule of thumb, and by making these false charges, is placing this industry before the country in such an obnoxious light as to make it appear that men—honourable men, the foremost men in the Dominion of Canada, men who have hitherto borne an irreproachable name, men who are known as thorough business men—are so many sharpers and swindlers. He did the same last session, when the Prime Minister stated that if the hon. gentleman could show that the prosperity of any interest was interfered with by these combinations, the Government would consider it their duty to inquire into the matter, and would prevent anything of that kind being done illegally. What did the hon. gentleman say in his speech the other day? Did he show that these "combinationsters," as he calls them, have done anything wrong? Did he show that they charge higher for their goods than the price of goods of equal quality brought from the mother country? Not at all. The only article upon which he was able to place anything like a doubt was that of cotton shirts. That cotton shirt business troubled him terribly. It was over 100 per cent; and he compared the Canadian cotton shirts with English goods which sold in the market at the same price. If he knew anything about the cotton shirt industry, why did he not tell the House that the cotton shirts brought from the old country and sold at the price he stated were China clay-filled, with scarcely any cotton in them, and that the cotton shirts manufac-

ured in this country are far better and last much longer, because they are composed of pure material? This is the sort of indictment that he has laid against the cotton industry of this country. He asked us whether, after pocketing $8,000,000, which he says was drawn from the hard earnings of the people, these men, living in their palaces, had offered to give any increase in wages to those they employed. Why, Sir, I do not suppose there is a more happy and contented class of people anywhere in any country than the people employed in the cotton factories of this country. I invite my hon. friend to come and spend Saturday and Sunday with me at my home in Cornwall, and if, when he comes back here, he does not say that he has seen more beautiful women, better dressed young women, and better dressed young men, and more signs of prosperity there than in any other place in Canada, not excepting the city of Toronto, then I will agree that all he has said about the cotton industries is not true. I will take him to the homes of those people. I will show him the little homes they have earned working in these cotton mills, furnished and arranged with a taste and a show of luxury that will astonish him. And they will tell him that they owe it all to the cotton industry. They will tell him more—that they are all National Policy boys and girls. And they will tell him more than that, that if he wants to get a second look at them and be again invited inside their doors he must be a National Policy man too. This hon. gentleman told us that not only did the mill owners reduce the wages of their employees, but that they refused to sell goods to any but those who hold their tongues and would decline to make any complaint as to the character of the goods or as to their price; and he branded them as cowards and dishonourable men. The mercantile community are neither cowards nor dishonourable. And I venture to say that the hon. gentleman cannot name a man in the mercantile world of this country who will make such a statement before this assembly. So far from the goods of this company not being regarded as fit for the market by the merchants of this country, they approve of them very highly. They order them in advance, and, more than that, they declare that there never has been such a good quality of goods produced before in Canada as are now being produced by these cotton mills. The hon. gentleman told us that the National Policy did us no good, because it did not reduce the price of goods, and he adds that these mills have increased the prices of goods lately. I have here a telegram which I received this afternoon from David Morrice & Sons upon this subject, in which they say that on a few goods bought—when these mills were purchased at 50 per cent—at 50 per cent below the cost of production, they considered they were entitled to make a profit on, and they did raise the price of those goods, but not to the price of goods they are manufacturing in their own mills. The telegram which I received was as follows:—

Few advances were made on goods absolutely sold under cost owing to previous competition of small mills. Raw cotton largely advanced in price last fall, notwithstanding this prices of goods continued the same. The best proof of goods being sold under cost was the fact of the Dundas and other mills losing large sums in their manufacture. The entire trade were perfectly aware and fully realized the losses being made.

This was legitimate business, but on that slight foundation the hon. gentleman built his serious charge that these mill-owners, now that their mills were placed on a proper footing and making money, were undertaking to fleece the people and make them pay larger prices for their goods because the people could not go anywhere else. I think I have answered every serious point this hon. gentleman has raised. I have shown the House that the promoters of these industries, previous to 1878 and up to about a few years ago, all sunk large sums. They lost at least 50 per cent of their capital, and, in some of the mills, they lost all their capital, which is the best evidence we can have that the bloated monopolists, of which my hon. friend spoke, do not exist in Canada. No such creation has been the result of the National Policy, so far as the cotton mills are concerned, and, to-day, we are selling goods at prices much lower than they brought before. Denims are being sold to-day at 25 per cent, gingham at 30 per cent and gray cottons at 30 per cent less than they were sold at formerly, and other goods in the same proportion. My hon. friend said that coarse goods were taxed much higher than any other and that the poor people were obliged to pay more for them. What is the fact? I have here a statement, which is in the hands of every wholesale merchant and jobber in this country, and which shows the prices for goods in 1878 and 1892 respectively:

I have a word to say with regard to the meeting of the Montreal Cotton Company, to which my hon. friend alluded the other day. He said that at that meeting the directors took power to increase the capital stock of the company $2,000,000. Now, Sir, the Montreal Cotton Company, the Valleyfield mill, has been in existence since before 1878, and, like all the others, it paid no dividends until within a few years. It did, at one time, pay a dividend for one year, just as the Hochelaga did for two years, and as did some of the others, but which others, I am sorry to say, paid their dividends out of capital and not out of their earnings. To-day the Montreal Cotton Company is the proprietor of the Magog mills. They are the only mills that are turning out prints to-day in Canada, and they are turning these out at the rate of 80,000 yards a month, and yet cannot keep up with their orders. They have, therefore, asked for an extension of $2,000,000 in their capital, so that they may be able to increase the capacity of the mill at Valleyfield and of the print mill at Magog, and they guarantee that every dollar of that increased capital will be used, not in watering stock, but in extending the capacity of these two mills. Mr. Speaker, I have done. I have nothing more to say to the hon. gentleman except to repeat my invitation, and I am satisfied that if he accepts it, and has a little talk with my little girls, he will come back here a supporter of the National Policy.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley), has thought proper to refer to the recent election held in the county of L'Islet. I really fail to perceive what glory or profit he has hoped to get out of it. However, that concerns him. I believe that I have been elected in the county of L'Islet, and am sure it has been without false pretenses, after one of the most vigorous contests that has ever been carried on in that part of the province. I have had after me two Ministers of the Crown, and if I have triumphed, it is due to the most absolute devotion of my friends and to the intelligence of the county that I now represent. The hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay

(Mr. Belley), said that I had run as a straight protectionist in the county of L'Islet. I believe that my political career, already pretty long, has been absolutely without cowardice in the various positions that I have thought it my duty to take on subjects of public interest. I have never attempted to deceive any one as to my views concerning the politics of my country, and in L'Islet I have followed the same line of conduct. In order to avoid any misunderstanding, I had taken the trouble of preparing a written programme. I will not read the whole of it, but here are a few excerpts therefrom, touching the question of the tariff :

I am resolved to turn all my efforts towards obtaining changes in the tariff, such as to permit the agricultural class to buy cheaply the things they need, and to sell dearer the produce of the soil.

The manufacturers in the large cities who realize hundreds of thousands of dollars profit per year, by means of the present tariff oppose these reforms. They are organized into an association, and without party distinctions they support the Government, the policy of which builds their fortune. From their point of view they are right. The so-called National Policy, adopted in 1879, with the object of favouring the establishment and development of our industries in preventing foreign products from entering Canada, has not to-day the same raison d'être.

The interests of the manufacturers have been protected long enough. The hour has come for protecting the interests of agriculture. The manufacturers' interest is to keep the Canadian market closed against the manufactured products of the United States, in order to sell their own goods at higher prices.

The interest of the Canadian farmer is to work towards having the American market opened to him, in order to sell dearer his produce.

And further on I said :

Let us see that the American market which is practically closed against us, be opened to us, so what we may sell there, our horses, our potatoes, our eggs, fowls, &c.

The Canadian farmer will find in that a double interest. First, he will pay less for what he needs, and he will sell his produce to better advantage.

The struggle is then really between the farmer who needs the American market and the manufacturer who is afraid to make less profits if the American manufacturer can come and compete with him for the sale of furniture, farming implements, cottons, fabrics, vehicles, &c.

I believe that it is impossible better to define a political situation. As I said before, the contest in L'Islet was vigorous. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) did me the honour to come down into the county accompanied by the train of promises which always follows so important a man. The hon. Postmaster-General (Sir A. P. Cram) also saw fit to pay me a visit during the campaign, we received him well—as the people of L'Islet always know how to receive those who visit them. The hon. Minister had decided to defeat me anyhow. Like Bonaparte haranguing his soldiers, he said : "From the height of the victories which we have won together, you are watched." All that the Government can command of influence ; all that it can bring into play in the matter of patronage and of seductions calculated to lower the consciences, all that was brought to bear against me. Yet, I asked it then—and I ask it again to-day—what had I done so bad as to deserve the war which was waged against me ? During the session of 1891, I had a seat in this House. I had voted three-quarters of the time with the members on the other side. I had, it is true, publicly and firmly taken up a question of public morality, the same position as other men had taken, but which they did not have the courage to keep to the end. That is what I had done, and I see nothing to justify the violence which I met. The hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley) has boasted of the numerous by-elections carried by the Conservative party. There is no denying it, the Opposition has lost a good deal of ground since the last appeal to the public—when it came very near to capturing the power. But what is the good of arguing from successes obtained by the Government in the by-elections ? For those who know how those elections are made, there is nothing surprising that the Government should carry them. I have made elections with the members who sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, and without betraying any secret, I can say here, that I know how these successes are brought about. The influence of the Government, too often scandalously exercised, plays in them a very considerable role. The hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley) knows that if he was elected, it is because he appealed to the public cupidity during his election. He was the candidate of the Government, the Government was ready to vote money, subsidies. That is what I read in the newspaper which he inspires.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am not the inspirer of that paper.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am glad of it on the hon. member's account, for never, in my long experience as a journalist, have I read writings more conducive to the degradation of public sentiment than those of the newspaper which he now repudiates. The fight which returned the hon. member was simply between those who wanted money, and those who wanted to vote according to the dictates of their own consciences. And the hon. member did not accept the candidature offered him until he had come up here to Ottawa, to have himself consecrated with the ministerial holy oils. In L'Islet, as I have said, the hon. Postmaster-General did me the honour of leading the campaign against me. We fought open-faced, frankly. Of course the dollar bags were against us. But we had in the county of L'Islet, a county which, thank God, was not for sale. It is a great consolation after all—whatever be the parties with which they sympathize, to find such counties. The contest was largely upon the question of the tariff. The county of L'Islet borders upon the international line, and I am certain to be the expression of my electors when saying that in this county, there is a very earnest desire for a change in the treated from a doctrinaire point of view, tariff. The question of tariff cannot be They are essentially business questions, and consequently must be judged according to the times and according to the circumstances—the circumstances not alone of a country, but of the different lands with which such country does, or may do business. I am of those who believe that in 1878, and in the preceding years, there was certainly a deep desire for a change in the fiscal policy. And surely if Sir John Macdonald ever gave a manifest proof of his great ability, it was in seizing the current of opinion which then manifested itself. I am also of those who believe that the changes then brought about, have responded partially, at least, to the hopes which the authors of the policy called the National Policy had founded. In 1878 I took an active part in the campaign which then took place. I fought through that campaign in company with some of the present ministers, and especially with the hon. Postmaster-General and the hon. Minister of Agriculture. Our base of argument was this: We wanted to develop the industry of the country by protecting it against foreign competition. But we had in view the object which all desired then, of bringing the American Government to renew with us the treaties which it had itself abrogated. Who does not remember, Mr. Speaker, the by-elections that we fought, for instance that of Drummond and Arthabaska in 1877? It is one of the contests that I regret the most, be it said by the way. Well, we carried those by-elections and the general elections by saying, let us adopt a protective tariff, and we will force the American Government to treat with us. The illusion we had then must have vanished to-day; but it has even served to carry the elections of 1891. And Sir John Macdonald gave proof then again, in my estimation, of his great ability, in asking for the necessary authorization to conclude a treaty calculated to render freer our commercial relations with our neighbours. If we consider the reasons given by Sir John A. Macdonald to the Governor-General to obtain the dissolution of Parliament before the time fixed by the constitution, we will find almost verbatim the motion which is now before us. Sir John A. Macdonald understood that his policy of 1878 had had its day. He has disappeared from the scene. I believe if he were here to-day—and it is a great national loss that we sustained when he disappeared—I believe, I say, that we would have another policy than that which we now have. I have had myself enough political intercourse with him to believe that I speak the truth in making this assertion. He was replaced by Mr. Abbott. Sir John Abbott has now disappeared from amongst us. One must not say more harm than is proper of a man that is gone. However, I believe it is allowable to remember that he was a shrewd lawyer, and a wire-puller extremely cunning. Instead of making fiscal reforms, his mind turned towards carrying elections. The Opposition had committed, at least in the province of Ontario, the error of not contesting as many elections as had been contested against it. Sir John Abbott, surrounded himself with able men, with colleagues who understood campaign tactics, and they resolved to deal a fatal blow to the Opposition. Sir John Abbott resolved to lay hand upon power in the province of Quebec. This is probably not a proper opportunity for speaking at length here of what took place in the province of Quebec during the last two years. However, as the matter has been alluded to before, I will be allowed to say that Sir John Abbott, in securing for the party which he was leading in the Dominion Parliament, the power in Quebec, played for a very high stake. He won the game, he gave to his friends the benefits which are always to be derived from power in a province like that of Quebec, which, however, resembles all the others. After having increased the strength of his party he withdrew, loaded with honours which he had long coveted. He had as his successor the present Prime Minister. This gentleman is without contest one of the most distinguished men of the House of Commons. He formed a government, after having long pondered over the problem. The operation, however, seemed easy, as it must have been expected for some time. The present Government is a singular compound. It is a motley gathering. It caters to all tastes. By the side of devoted servants of the Pope there are devoted disciples of the Prince of Orange. By the side of great men there are men—very great. There are others less tall. Upon the whole, one can say that this administration—which figures now about a dozen and a half—is to-day about complete. It is an astonishing thing that the more complete the Government becomes, the less ready it is to carry on the business of the country. In fact, what do we hear now? If not to-morrow, to-morrow. To-morrow, the school question, which we have been promised would be settled without any delay! If there is one question with regard to which the hon. Prime Minister, among others, has made formal promises—public and private promises—by the voice of many of his colleagues, it certainly is the school question. And what do we hear? To-morrow! next year! On the question of the tariff it is the same. It is quite possible that to-morrow, that next year, the present House of Commons may have ceased to exist, that there may have been made a new appeal to the people. Well, I believe that we are right in asking that something be done now. Why delay any longer? Addressing especially the Ministers who represent my province, I ask them, why these delays? Why these endless puttings off which we witness? The hon. Postmaster-General (Sir A. P. Caron) represents a county next to mine. I ask him to tell us whether it is not true that his county depopulates itself by hundreds every year? My county is one of the richest as to farming. Everything, fruit and whatever can be drawn from the soil, is cultivated there to advantage and successfully. And yet the figure of population lowers, and lowers considerably. Why is this? The reason is easily found and can be given without difficulty. Here it is. The French-Canadian farmer just now cannot sell his produce at paying prices. Who is the man who, representing a rural county, and having some knowledge of the present state of things, would dare deny these facts? The so-called National Policy has formerly had my support. I do not intend to repudiate my past. I believe that this policy has done some good, but I ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Angers) and the hon. Postmaster-General (Sir A. P. Caron), where is the county which to-day wants no modification of that policy? The member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley) spoke of the several elections which have taken place in the district of Quebec, and boasted of them as so many triumphs of the present policy. He has alluded to the election of Quebec West. If he did not live so far from Quebec he would know that the population of Quebec West had decreased by 40 per cent; that the value of property has also decreased in a proportion of forty, fifty, sixty and even seventy per cent; and that many properties that were worth hundreds of thousands of dollars are now being given away. As a question of fact, the state of things prevailing there is incredible. Yet the Minister says: Wait, wait till to-morrow. I do not understand this way of dealing. We have a million of our countrymen on foreign soil. In fact, there are so many French-Canadians on the other side of the border, that we can ask ourselves: Where is our country? and the Ministers tell us: Wait, wait till to-morrow! I accuse them of having, in too many circumstances, sacrificed the interests of their race. The hon. Postmaster-General knows how many times, in our intimate intercourse, I have reproached them with this—it is not, I believe, a lack of discretion to remind him of this—and he knows that he was often of my opinion. We had in the person of the present Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec a man of great talent, who could have done much for his race, but he has abandoned the political arena. I regret to see that Mr. Chapleau has gone out of active politics. He has been replaced by a man who has been my chief, who has had my entire political affection. I was young then, I was at an age when perhaps love is easy. He is a Minister in the present Government, and his portfolio is one of the most important. We have heard it said that before accepting this portfolio he had put to the Prime Minister certain conditions. My intelligent friend, who sits to my right (Mr. Choquette), was present when a Senator declared in a public meeting, that the Minister of Agriculture had only accepted after having obtained the promise that the Manitoba school question would be settled without delay, I therefore hope, that with regard to this question, there will be an end to saying to us, to-morrow; and I trust a solution will shortly be reached. Let there be no delusion, Mr. Speaker. Those who emigrate do not do so for the pleasure of it. No, they may have faults, but they are attached to their native land. Our province may also have its faults, but the climate is good and wholesome, the country is pleasant, and the towns intelligent and cultured. The man who leaves the province of Quebec, leaves us because he cannot do otherwise. I have visited Canadian centres in the United States and have not met a single one of my countrymen who did not say to me: We have been obliged to go. In face of such a state of things, are we to fold our arms and say that there is nothing to be done? As a journalist, I have gone to the trouble of sending agents through the country, to gather exact information regarding the emigration movement. I instructed them to be absolutely impartial, and to tell me nothing but the strict truth. They have reported to me what they saw, and what they heard, and these reports have been published. They show that in most of the counties, for the last three or four years, the emigration has been greater than ever. During my last election I made it a point to ask the railway agents in the county of L'Islet and in that of Kamouraska, to tell me how many tickets they sold for foreign parts. The parish of Ste. Anne situated in the county of Kamouraska is a rich farming locality. Well, the agent at this parish told me that in the months of March and April he sold a hundred tickets, and those to families who leave the province of Quebec to emigrate to the United States. Do the French Ministers realize the condition of the farming community? I hesitate to believe it, for I cannot conceive that they would not seek the means of remedying it, instead of telling us to wait, and giving us more or less frivolous reasons. Thus in a speech by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Angers), speaking of the French Canadian emigration to the United States, he is reported to have said that it was not to be wondered at because the farmers of the states of Vermont and Maine emigrate also. He must know that if the farmers of Maine and Vermont move away from their fields, they at least remain on the American soil, while those who leave us go to a foreign country, leave our land never to come back. I will add this, Mr. Speaker, for I have a habit of not hiding my opinion. If the Government do not realize the terrible position in which the agricultural community now is, they must expect, not only that there will be discontent, but that they will witness a revolt against our institutions. Things must be taken as they are in this world. When the people is not content it looks elsewhere to better itself. Why deny that there now exists in the country a feeling to be deplored but which we should not blind ourselves to. We would be astonished if a plebiscite was taken to-morrow. I do not fear to say that in two-thirds of the counties of the province of Quebec, owing to the difficulty of the situation we are in, people must pronounce for annexation. I am hostile to annexation. But let us face the truth like men. It is not by doing as the ostrich does—hiding its head in the sand—that we will govern the country. Let us take the facts as we should take them. This feeling for annexation does not only exist among the French population of Quebec. The hon. Minister whom I see before me, and who represents here the Eastern Townships knows that there is a strong annexation movement among the English population of that region. Mr. Speaker, if we want to be a nation we must keep our population. We see it go like spilt water, an eminent man wrote me the other day. It seems to me that in face of such a situation it is dangerous, it is disastrous to say always, to-morrow! I am not of those who hold that every thing must be demolished, and if the hon. leader of the Opposition should come into power to-morrow, I do not believe that he would pull down the columns of the temple. That is not what we want. We want a change in the tariff. The hon. member for North Simcoe, from what I have heard, is to propose a motion to reduce by ten per cent the duties on the importations from the mother land. I, right here, declare that I am in favour of this proposition. But I ask why the same thing should not be done as to all other countries? It is shown that our manufacturers can stand competition. They have become exporters. Not only do they supply the needs of the country, but they compete in other lands. We can, therefore, adopt now a policy quite different from that which we adopted ten years ago. And yet the Government tell us that they do not want to do any thing. They do not want to act, but they give no reason therefor. Addressing again the French Ministers, I ask them whether do they want to lead us? During the last three years they have allowed the French language to be abolished in Manitoba. During the last three years they have allowed the schools—guaranteed to us by the constitution—to be abolished. Now, without a word, without a protestation, without an effort to better the situation, they allow the province of Quebec to become depopulated. Whither are they drifting? The delights of office may seduce for a time, but it seems to me that in the end with men whose spirit and heart are well placed, they must not dominate the sense, of duty and preservation. We have been made the richer by many comparisons during this debate. We have been told that under Mr. Mackenzie's regime, things went so and so—there were soup kitchens for the people—there was this and there was that. I would like to be given fewer comparisons, fewer figures and more prosperity. Many things can be done with figures. Some of my colleagues were realising to me here yesterday figures from the census. For instance, in the enlightened town where my neighbour, the hon. member for Montmagny lives, I believe that the census gives us something like thirty-five manufactories. Now, the hon. member tells us that there are not ten. I ask the hon. Prime Minister—and I hope he can understand me in my mother tongue—to open his eyes. I take him for an honest man. I ask him to say whether a census with such errors is not a gigantic fraud? We are given figures and those figures are absolutely false. The same thing may be said of the returns for the town of Sorel, which gives 128 manufactories, while some ten might be found. Well, I ask myself how such a census can be quoted before such an assembly as the House of Commons? In the Senate, one of the hon. senators has put with regard to the census of the population, questions which will have to be met. After having made some studies on this important subject, I have no doubt that, as to population the same system of trumpery was adopted as concerning the manufactories. The census, in my opinion, should be taken over again. Two years ago the city of New York caused her census to be retaken, because the official returns were false. Both sides of the House, and the French element especially, should insist that the census, which was made to our detriment, should be taken over again. One would say that there exists an element which would like to see us disappear. Yet, our race has not been disloyal. It has respected the laws. Until now we have borne our share of the public burdens. The province of Quebec is being depopulated—and nothing is said. Our language is being abolished, and nothing is said, even applause is sometimes heard. The constitution is seen broken, trampled upon where we are concerned, and nothing is said. Truly one would believe that there are groups in the country which resemble that fanatical element which, after the conquest, thought of eradicating us from the soil. Attempts are made to-day to ruin us financially in the province of Quebec, to crush us wherever we are in the minority. And yet the French Ministers remain impassible in the face of a situation which they cannot deny. I do not wish to be uselessly disagreeable to them, but I believe that the combined shoulders of the three of them are not broad enough to carry the mantle of Sir George Etienne Cartier. There is no doubt that, thanks to protection, a certain number of manufacturers have built up large fortunes, but there is no doubt either, that the public fortune is not equitably divided. In Montreal we see men who, poor in 1878, have become millionaires. We see at the same time the rural districts losing their population. I say that the man who knows anything of political economy, must, in the face of such a situation, reflect and look for a remedy. I know in Montreal a number of excellent manufacturers who in the past were good Liberals, and who now are in favour of the present administration. When you speak to them in private intercourse and you ask them what would happen if the duties were lowered ten or fifteen per cent, they answer you that they could live with their industry, but that they would make less money. There is not the shadow of a doubt that the tariff could be reduced without hurting our industries, and I do not hesitate to speak my mind on the subject. The time has come to no longer delay this customs reform. As I said before, I am not in favour of a policy which would consist in demolishing everything. The question is not to demolish but to come to the rescue of those who suffer. We ask simply to restore the equilibrium which should exist between all classes of society. Should we not make a change in the tariff, we would be the only country in the world remaining bound to a policy, the reasons for which circumstances had modified. The American people have given us the example which remains for us to follow. If the Government had behaved—I will not say with more decency, the word would not, perhaps, be parliamentary—but with less arrogance toward the authorities in Washington, we would not to-day have to face the present state of things. The Ministers went to Washington with the intention of doing nothing. There is no hiding it, the only policy of the Government to-day consists in staying themselves on the large fortunes which they have accumulated in the hands of the men who serve them in difficult days. When we are told of successful elections as proofs of the popularity of the ministerial policy, we are mocked. Who does not know that those by-elections cost the Government much money? The average by-election cost five or ten thousand dollars. What was the cost of the L'Islet election? Ah, if the hon. Postmaster-General would speak to me with the confidence of yore, he would tell me. In Soulanges, where we were only defeated by a small majority, the bank notes circulated like letters in a city post office. I believe I know public feeling in the province of Quebec; and if we had elections, I do not fear to say that we would carry them by a majority unknown until now, provided we fought as we should fight. Popular sentiment is against the Government, against its fiscal policy, against its "personnel." Let not the Government believe that they will have too short a session. Of course, I only speak in my own name. We will only leave the floor of this House when the Government tell us what they intend to do. We will not go until the school question is elucidated. I have been commissioned by the electors of L'Islet to ask the Government to keep their promises, and I will endeavour to have them keep them. It is not for us to tell them what they should do; it behooves the Government to develop its own policy. There is no precedent in the history of the parliamentary world for such conduct as that of the Government. Here is a little province, Manitoba, settled with people who for the most part reached there with passage tickets paid by ourselves, which puts the constitution aside, and the Government finds nothing else to say but "We must go to the courts of justice, before we know what to do." They might as well say that they will send the tariff question to the judges. The fact is that the Government seems to have taken to governing us by means of the judges. I can tell them that the country does not want this any longer. Our wish, I repeat it, is not to demolish anything which is useful; but, on another hand, we want to see maintained only what is worth maintaining. On both sides of the House, many figures have been quoted, and in that respect the debate is exhausted. Every one has shown his way of thinking. For my part, I will conclude by saying to the Government: You have not kept the promises which you had made. You carried the last elections by saying that you wanted authorization for a treaty with the American people, and you did all you could do not to obtain such a treaty. After the elections in 1891 you were to settle the Manitoba school question, if that question was to be decided against us by the courts. You made this promise in a report which was sanctioned by His Excellency the Governor-General. You engaged the honour of the Crown, and you want the Crown now to lie to the people of the country. Do have the courage to say what you intend to do, or say, "We have made you promises, but now we cannot fulfil them." Your duty is to give the country peace and harmony, and to maintain the constitution intact. Do not fear, be true to that duty. There is no factious opposition here. As representative of the county of L'Islet, I am ready to act on this school question in such a way as to facilitate the Government's task; I am ready to give them my help if they want to be faithful to their promises and their duty. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I invite the hon. Postmaster-General (Sir A. P. Caron), the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet), and the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Anger), who represents the French element in the Administration, to speak at least a language that we may understand. In the county of L'Islet, at a popular meeting—it is not always easy to enter into complex explanations at such meetings—I asked the hon. Minister of Public Works to keep the promises that have been made by the Premier himself, and to tell the people what course the Government intended to follow with regard to the school question. The hon. Minister thought fit to dispense with an answer to my question, but we are not at a popular meeting now. We can explain ourselves at ease, and renew our request as long as no satisfactory answer is given. In the name of the province of Quebec of which I am one of the representatives, I ask the French Ministers to take the floor after me and state to the House what they intend to do, what the Government intend to do in connection with the school question. Let them tell us whether we are to get the justice to which we are entitled. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the Government may then look for material co-operation from this side of the House. But it is not by telling us that we have built railways, that the Lake St. John Railway is constructed; that wharfs have been built, &c., that they will any longer blind public opinion. All the railways we have, without an exception, have been built with borrowed money. Let there be no delusion on this. I am not of those who will blame the Government for what they have done for the railways in the past, but I enter my protest against all useless delays in the matter of vital questions. In doing so I am certain that I express the sentiment, not only of the electors of my county, but also of the majority of the electors of the province of Quebec.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether the papers in connection with the Kingston Penitentiary have been laid on the Table. I understood the evidence was to have been laid on the Table a few days ago.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; I did not lay this evidence on the Table. It is ready; but I saw a motion on the Paper to produce it, and I was waiting until that motion was reached. I can bring the Papers down to-morrow.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 22nd February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

EXPORT DUTIES ON LUMBER.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 60) to amend the Revised Statutes of Canada, chap. 33 and 51 Vic., chap. 15.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps the hon. member will explain the object of the Bill?

Mr. CHARLTON. The object of the Bill is to place the lumber trade of this country in a position of greater security with respect to export duties than it fancies itself to occupy at the present moment. Chapter 33 of the Revised Statutes of Canada contains a provision, section 6, which establishes export duties, and schedule E classifies the lumber and names the amount on each class. Section 1 of chapter 15, 51 Vic., gives the Governor in Council power to increase those duties or diminish or suspend them. By the action of the Governor in Council the duties have been suspended under the provisions of the statutory offer contained in the McKinley Bill. It was done on 14th October, 1890, and owing to the declaration of the Minister of Finance when delivering his Budget speech the other day, a feeling of unrest and fear exists in the minds of a great many lumbermen that this important interest may be dealt with hastily by the Government, by the reimposition of the duties, or by taking action without due consideration. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance will remember that the course of the Government on this matter has been in the past somewhat erratic. The duties were first placed at $1, then they were increased to $2, and the power contained in chapter 15 of 51 Vic. was assumed by the Governor in Council. The duties were then increased by the Governor in Council to $3, to the great alarm of the lumber interest, and, after a short time, they were placed back again at $2. This seeming want of any fixed principle in dealing with this matter has impressed the lumber trade with a fear that the Government might be induced again, under the provisions of chapter 15 of 51 Vic., to take some action in the matter that might be detrimental to the interests of the lumber trade. The trade feels it is a question of sufficient importance to warrant full consideration in open debate in the House of Commons, and this Bill provides that section 6 of chapter 33 and section 15 of chapter 51 shall be repealed, and that the Governor in Council shall be debarred from dealing with the question of the export duties, except by the consent of Parliament, so that if the matter is considered by the Government and any action is desired in the matter, action shall only be taken after full discussion in open debate, in which all interests may be heard. That is the object of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GOVERNMENT OFFICES AT TORONTO.

Mr. COATSWORTH asked, Whether the Government has been aware, through its officers or otherwise, of the unsuitability of the Government buildings in Toronto for carrying on the Government business in a satisfactory manner? If so, what is the purport of the information or report received? Has the attention of the Government or Public Works Department been called to the advisability of placing all the Government offices in Toronto in one building; and if so, what steps are being taken to carry out that project?

Mr. OUMET. The subject-matter of the questions has been brought to the attention of the Government, and reports have been ordered to be made with a view to giving the public service all the accommodation that may be judged necessary.

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN DALHOUSIE AND GASPE.

Mr. FAUVEL asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to ask for tenders for the service of mails between Dalhousie, N.B., and Gaspé Basin, or to continue the same subsidy of $12,500 to the steamer "Admiral" for the said services?

Mr. FOSTER. The contract which has been in existence for some years between the Government and the steamer "Admiral" has now lapsed, and it is the intention of the Government to call for tenders for a new service.

THE POSTMASTER OF LIVERPOOL, COUNTY OF LEVIS.

Mr. GUAY (Translation) asked, Have the Government accepted the resignation of Mr. Albert Forcade as postmaster of New Liverpool, in the county of Levis? Have any persons applied to be appointed in his stead? If so, who are the said persons? Who has been appointed postmaster of New Liverpool, and on whose recommendation has the appointment been made?

Sir A. P. CARON. (Translation.) Mr. Albert Forcade resigned on the 20th December, 1892. His resignation was accepted on the 28th of the same month. The applications made to the department were from MM. Michel Robert McReady and Honore McReady. Mr. Michel McReady was appointed postmaster on the 28th December, 1892.

CORNWALLIS VALLEY RAILWAY.

Mr. BORDEN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to cause the mails to be carried over the Cornwallis Valley Branch Railway, and when? What are the names of the post offices to be served, and how many times a day will each be served? Will the carrying of the mails from the railway stations to the respective post offices be let by public tender and contract? Has the Government authorized a private citizen of King's county, N.S., either directly or through any official, to negotiate for private offers for the carrying of the said mails?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is the intention of the Government to utilize the Cornwallis

Mr. COATSWORTH.

Valley Railway for mail service as soon as arrangements can be completed, which will be almost immediately. Canning, Kingsport, Sheffield and Centreville will be served four times daily; Saxon Street, Upper Dyke Village and Upper Canard twice daily; Port Williams, Church Street, Lower Canard and Canard and Chipman's Corners once daily; Medford tri-weekly.

Mr. BORDEN. Will the contract be let by public tender?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No doubt such will be the case, as that is always done.

I. C. R.—EMPLOYEES DISCHARGED.

Mr. GUAY asked, How many permanent employees of the Intercolonial Railway at the following stations:—Chaudière Curve, Hadlow Cove, Levis and Harlaka—were discharged between 1st May, 1892, and 1st December, 1892? Have some of them been reinstated in their positions since their discharge? If so, why and how many, and at which of the stations aforesaid?

Mr. HAGGART. The total number of employees dismissed between 1st May, 1892, and 1st December, 1892, was, at Chaudière, 7; Hadlow, 10; Harlaka, 1; Levis, 10. Of those whose services were dispensed with at Chaudière, two car-repairers and one switchman have been re-employed. At Hadlow two call boys have been re-employed. At Levis the assistant baggagemaster and three porters have been re-employed.

THE COTTON TARIFF.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, In view of the very important statement made in this House on the 17th of February by the hon. member for South Ontario regarding the combinations formed by the cotton manufacturers of Canada, and in view of the promise of the First Minister last session as follows:—

If it were established as the hon. gentleman seems to assert, that the tariff was the means of enabling such a company to act oppressively to the consumers, it would certainly not very long remain so,— what action do the Government intend to take in order to relieve the consumers of cotton from the extortion to which they are subjected, whereby four millions of dollars in excess of the value has been abstracted from said consumers during the last year under the present tariff?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am afraid that the hon. gentleman's question is not in order, Mr. Speaker. He will have to withdraw the assertions.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am willing to drop the last clause if the hon. Minister will answer the previous clauses.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The last clause is not the only objection.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then I will put it in another shape.

VALUE OF CANADIAN FISHERIES.

Mr. LISTER asked, When will the supplementary report of the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, comprising statement of yield and value of the Canadian fisheries, be distributed to members?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The supplementary report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, comprising statements of the yield and value of the Canadian fisheries, etc., is now being prepared, and will be distributed to members as soon as printed. These statistics are for the calendar year. They take a long time to compile. The particulars necessary to complete them come from remote districts, where fishing is actively pursued until the very close of navigation, necessarily involving much labour and precluding the possibility of laying them on the Table of the House by the opening of Parliament.

I. C. R.—RATES ON COAL AND IRON.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, What rate of freight is charged on the Intercolonial Railway for the carriage of coal from Stellarton to Londonderry mines; also, what is the rate of freight charged on pig iron from Londonderry westward by the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. HAGGART. 1st. Freight on coal from Stellarton to Londonderry mines, 30 cents per ton; 2nd. Intercolonial Railway proportion of rate on pig iron from Londonderry mines for the west, via Chaudiere, ranges from $1.97 to $2.79 per ton, or an average of $2.38.

WRIT FOR SOUTH MIDDLESEX.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to call the attention of the Government to the fact, that although the Speaker's warrant has been issued for some time for the election in South Middlesex, the writ has not yet been issued by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Of course, no blame is to be attached to the clerk; he is waiting the action of the Government to appoint a returning officer.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will see about that matter to-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). Mr. Speaker, there were two reasons last night why I moved the adjournment of the debate. In the first place, so seldom do I trouble the House that I thought I might venture to ask your indulgence for a short time this afternoon, and in the second place, I felt that some of the statements made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) were of such a character, that I thought they should not be allowed to go unchallenged to the country. I would not consider these statements so objectionable were they made by him simply as the hon. member for that riding, but he is known throughout the length and breadth of the province of Ontario, from his long connections with the farmers' institutes, not only as a practical, but as a progressive and prosperous farmer, and I considered that his assertions might have considerable weight with the farmers of that province. I have the honour to represent a riding which is a typical one in the province of Ontario. It is mainly agricultural, having three towns, in one of which there are extensive manufactures. From time immemorial that riding has had very strong Reform leanings. In fact in 1878 its verdict was against the National Policy, not only in the farming districts but also in the manufacturing town of Oshawa, and this verdict was given notwithstanding that the Conservative candidate was one of the most popular men who ever lived in the riding, the late Hon. T. N. Gibbs. Favours from the Conservative Government had no weight in that riding, because any favours which the riding may have received had been given by the Government of which the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was the Finance Minister, and these favours have been somewhat supplemented by the Ontario Government, the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. From this point of view the question naturally arises: Why has that constituency gone Conservative; why have the farmers changed their votes from Reform to Conservative, and why has the manufacturing town of Oshawa which gave a number of Reform majorities, changed its political leanings, so that now its people support the Conservative Government and the National Policy? I need not discuss the effect of the National Policy on the manufacturing industries, either in the town of Oshawa or in the Dominion generally, because, even hon. gentlemen opposite have admitted that a policy of protection is in the interests of the manufacturers and the artisans. In fact, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has stated that these classes are bloodthirsty monsters fattening upon the farmers' life blood, and the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) the other evening—I do not say in quite so musical a voice, but certainly in a much louder one—stated that the manufacturers of the Dominion were not in as good a position to-day as they were in 1878. The opinions of these two hon. gentlemen are supported by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) who declared that protection was fraudulent and immoral. I do not propose to endeavour to attain that hon. gentleman's high moral standard; the Bible is sufficient for me, because it states that one is worse than an infidel who will not take care of his own.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). As I understand protection, it is a policy by which a country does take care of its own. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) also declared loudly against combines, but he took good care not to state in this House that he was closely connected with one of the greatest combines to be found in this Dominion, the Law Society of the province of Ontario. I take it for granted, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is right when he states that the manufacturers and the artisans of Canada are benefited by the National Policy, and, I take it, that the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson)—almost the only representative of the manufacturers they have left them on the other side of the House—is wrong in his contention. Now let us see if the statement made by these hon. gentlemen, that the success of our manufacturing industries has been purchased at the expense of the farmers, is correct. The farmers are in a very large majority in this country, their interests are predominantly large, and anything that affects them prejudicially must be felt by the whole people. Let me ask, does the country show any ill effects from this National Policy? Is Canada in a worse condition to-day than it was in the past when the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was declaring his donothing and his fly-on-the-wheel policy, which characterized the unfortunate series of years when he was Finance Minister? Figures used to contradict the statements of these hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and they contradict their statements to-day, and when they are driven into a corner on this point, we hear them declare: that hard times during that period were spread all over the world, but that Canada suffered less than any other country. I do not propose to-day to overwhelm you with figures, but I will just submit a few. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has tried to show from our trade returns that the country is not prosperous, and I propose to use some of the same figures that he has used more than once in this House, as well as some of the trade returns issued by the country to the south of us, in making a comparison of the two periods, under Conservative rule and under Reform rule respectively. The total trade of the United States in 1867 was $690,000,000; in 1874 it was $1,153,000,000, an increase of 57 per cent. In 1879 it had only increased to $1,156,000,000—it was almost at a standstill; in 1892 it had increased to $1,857,000,000, or 60 per cent. The trade of Canada in 1868 was $131,000,000; in 1874 it had increased to $217,000,000, or 66 per cent; in 1879 it had decreased to $153,000,000, a decrease of 29 per cent; in 1892

Mr. SMITH (Ontario).

it rose to $241,000,000, an increase of 57 per cent in 13 years. Now, what does this show? It shows that the only period in which the trade of Canada retrograded was that unfortunate period between 1874 and 1879, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. Along with the extension of our foreign trade since 1879 it must be remembered that our inter-provincial trade has increased enormously. Now, the Government policy, as I understand it, is not only for the purpose of raising a revenue, but it has in view also the promotion of the interests of the farmers and all other classes in the community. It was promised that the National Policy would secure to the farmer his home market. Has it done that? Travel upon either of our two great highways, the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway, and you will see a great many refrigerator cars carrying beef. A great deal of that beef may be going to England; but large quantities of it go also to the eastern states to supply the large cities and towns and villages there. We know that this trade would have existed in Canada too but for the increased duty placed upon that article three years ago. So it is with many other articles. Our farmers have certainly gained from the duty on wheat. The local market is unquestionably the best market for wheat, because it insures the farmer getting back some of the refuse of the wheat he sells. The National Policy has also enlarged his market. There has been since its introduction an enormous increase in the importation of raw products into Canada. The census taken two years after the introduction of the National Policy showed that there had been not only a large increase in the imports of raw materials, but a very large increase in the number of artisans employed, and that being the case, there is no question that the home market of the farmers was very much enlarged. In 1878 the artisans and mechanics of this country had very low wages, and along with that, they could only get work during a portion of the year; but that has been all changed by the National Policy. I know that in my own riding, during that period, moulders were getting only $1.50 per day for only a portion of the year, whereas to-day they are, getting work all the year round at $2.25 per day; and the wages of labourers have increased 25 per cent. The farmers were also promised that the National Policy would secure for them better prices. There is no question that prices in Canada to-day for all farm products are relatively higher than they are in New York or London. It was also promised that we should be able to buy cheaper. The hon. member for South Oxford has stated that the farmers of Canada are bled white. Now, what are the facts? Let us see. The machinery we have been manufacturing of late years is very much improved and it is worth a great deal more to us than it was in earlier days. All the goods used by the farmer are cheaper, from the boots on his feet to the cap on his head, from the plough with which he breaks the ground, to the thresher that separates the grain. A binder which cost $325 in 1878, can be purchased to-day for $115; a mower which then cost $80, can be purchased to-day for $55; a seed-drill which then cost $95, can be purchased now for $55; a horse-rake which then cost $35, can be purchased now for $25; a plough which then cost $16, can be purchased now for $12. Wagons, buggies, sugar, tea, coffee, cottons, woollens, boots and shoes are all cheaper in the same ratio. It is stated that articles can be manufactured cheaper. That, to a certain extent, may be true, but in the main it is not. Now, I have stated that to-day we are buying cheaper, and I am prepared to show you that we are selling more. In 1892 we exported of animals and their products $28,000,000, and of agricultural products, $22,000,000, making a total of $50,000,000. In 1878 we exported of animals and their products, $14,000,000, and of agricultural products, $18,000,000, making a total of $32,000,000, showing a difference in these exports between 1879 and 1892 of over $18,000,000. The difference in our imports of breadstuffs for consumption in 1891 over 1878, was nearly $11,000,000. Our imports of provisions have increased in the same time by $3,000,000. Now, our population has increased by half a million, and assuming that it costs $40 a year, as has been stated, to feed each person, the value of the food for this increase of population would be $20,000,000, which makes a total of $52,000,000. I think that proves conclusively that the farmers of Canada are selling more by $50,000,000 in 1892 than they did in 1878. We are not only selling more, but we are able to buy cheaper. Therefore, I can scarcely understand the contention of the hon. gentlemen opposite, that the farmers of this country are in a state of unrest. They were in a worse state of unrest in 1878. I know that there is a certain amount of unrest among the farmers of Canada to-day; I am prepared to admit that; but it is not to be found in the ranks of the Conservative farmers of Canada. The farmer friends of hon. gentlemen opposite are in a state of unrest, and why is it? My experience leads me to this conclusion, that the keenest politicians to be found in my riding are the Reform farmers, who are disappointed because their friends cannot get into office. For that reason they are in a state of unrest, and they are likely to continue so. Now, I want to draw your attention to one of the statements made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) last night, that the cost of producing grain was so high in Ontario that it could not be grown profitably to-day. I admit that there is a certain amount of force in his contentions, but I wish to impress upon this House and the country that we have grown too much grain and that our farmers would do better if they would turn their attention to something else. If they continue on the old lines of trying to produce grains of different kinds, they cannot make as much money as they could by going on other lines. If it takes too much, as the hon. gentleman contends, to produce grain, the farmer cannot blame the National Policy for that, for it lies at his hands to turn his attention to other lines, as the Government have pointed out from time to time. The Government have been experimenting from year to year on their different farms throughout the Dominion in order to show how we can change our mode of farming and reap increased profits, and it is for our farmers to take advantage of these experiments. Another statement of the hon. gentleman was that we are losing so much yearly upon the articles we send into the United States. One of those articles he mentioned was horses. Well, nobody knows better than the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) that his statement in that connection was mere buncombe. He knows that we have lost the American trade in horses, and that it is worth nothing to-day to us. Why is it that the decrease in pure-bred horses to-day is much greater than in the commoner kind, although on the pure-bred there is no duty? There is nothing in that argument. If the American market is worth nothing to us to-day in horses, it is mainly because electricity has taken the place of horses on the street railways in all the towns and cities of the United States. The hon. gentleman mentioned another article, that of hogs, and said they are higher in the United States than they are in Canada to-day, and from this he draws the conclusion that if we had reciprocity we would gain by it. But what has happened this year has happened but once before in the last ten years, and would it be wise for our Government because of this exceptional state of things, to take the course indicated by the hon. gentleman? Then, with regard to the question of corn, the hon. gentleman said that its free admission would be a great benefit to our farmers by cheapening the production of pork. But why is it that Canadian pork to-day is worth more in England than the American pork, although Canadian pork is not fed on corn? It is generally admitted that corn does not produce the best of pork; and if we brought corn in the country and used it to feed our hogs, that article of export would soon lose the hold it has in England to-day. As a farmer myself, representing a constituency in which there is a great deal of feeding done, I have no hesitation whatever in declaring that I do not believe one hundred bushels of corn would be bought in that riding to-day, if it were admitted free, and, therefore, I think that the course of the Government in retaining the duty is highly to be commended. Another of the hon. gentleman's statements was in connection with the labouring man on the farm who, he said, has to pay $20 duty per year on the clothing he wears. Nobody knows better than the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) that that statement has very little if any foundation. Boots can be purchased to-day, such as the labouring man wears, cheaper in Canada than in the United States; his coat, vest, pants and underclothing can be bought in Canada cheaper to-day than on the other side of the line; and if he has saved a certain amount of money and wants to sport imported goods on a Sunday, he has a right to contribute to the revenue of the country. Reference was also made by the hon. gentleman to binder twine. That is a question which has excited a great deal of attention throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and the hon. gentleman has perhaps been one of those who helped most to intensify that feeling. He made the statement that the Central prison was able to produce twine now at 9 cents a pound. Here is the Government engaged in an industry which pays no interest upon the amount invested in the building, which pays no taxes or wages, and yet they can produce the article at 9 cents per pound. Why, in my riding last year we had only to pay from 10 to 12 cents per pound for binder twine, just as good as any manufactured in that prison, and I doubt very much whether the prison-manufactured article will compare favourably with the twine manufactured outside, for the reason that the convicts are only confined for short dates, so that by the time they have properly learned the business they leave the prison, besides being in unjust competition with honest labour. Whilst our farmers may have many difficulties to encounter, and I am prepared candidly to admit that fact, they are selling more to-day and buying cheaper, and I cannot but come to the conclusion that the Government has acted wisely in deciding, before making any great change, to carefully look into the whole matter, item by item, and I venture to predict that a year from now, when these things come before the House, a statement will be made which will be as satisfactory as the course and policy of the present administration of the Conservative party has been in the past.

Mr. CHARLTON. For the last fourteen years we have been engaged from time to time in discussing the system of protection or the National Policy. We have had it discussed in various ways. Some speakers, like the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, have discussed it, for the purpose of making the worse appear the better cause, for the purpose of bolstering up the institution for political and partisan objects, as is generally done by speakers on the opposite side. Other speakers have discussed this question for the purpose of arriving at the truth, if possible, and of ascertaining whether the allegations made with reference to this policy are correct. I think that the evidences of revolt existing in various parts of the country would indicate most unmistakably that the public mind is arriving at the conclusion that the views of the Government are altogether wrong and that those who attack this policy do so on ample and just grounds. We have had in this House this session evidences of this feeling of dissatisfaction. We have had motions emanating from that side of the House against the duty on binder twine, coal oil and corn. These are evidences of a dissatisfaction existing in the ranks of the party opposite, which is not fully laid bare by the slight surface indications we are permitted to note. We have, Sir, evidence that this feeling of insecurity, this feeling of dissatisfaction is a widespread one, from the fact that the Government itself proposes to modify its policy, proposes to take into consideration the various arguments that have been advanced, to have commissioners make a tour of the country for the purpose of examining into the industries of Canada, promising to be governed by the information thus obtained in the modifications of the National Policy which they propose to make. I presume, Sir, they will find the task a difficult one. It is like taking out stones from an arch, with the danger of bringing down the whole structure about their ears. The National Policy interests are so interwoven with one another, are so mutually dependent upon one another, that one duty can scarcely be removed without affecting a great many industries. And when the Government proceed to the consideration of this question and attempt tariff reforms, we, upon this side, shall watch, with a great deal of interest and curiosity, the result of the experiment they may be disposed to make with reference to the reduction of duties. I do not believe, Sir, that the thing can be done unless they change their policy, and, if the position taken by the hon. member for South Ontario is a correct one, if the policy has conferred such blessings and benefits upon this country as the hon. gentleman represents, I should like to know why the Government should entertain, for a moment, the proposition to modify this policy at all. If it is what the hon. gentleman claims, we need no modification and the very course the Government propose to adopt is evidence that the Government and the supporters of the Government are not honest in the representations they make of the blessings conferred upon the country by this policy. It is clear that while they are urging that the policy is all that could be desired, they acknowledge, by their actions, that it requires modifications, and that they are compelled to consider the propriety of making modifications. Sir, we are passing through a period of our history when we may profit by the experience of a much larger country to the south of us. We copied this policy, Sir, from the United States. We have put this policy in operation upon a stage much less favourable for its operation than the United States, in a country of more restricted resources and much smaller population, and so the evils which have followed have become even more palpably manifest than in the United States. We are likely to follow the United States in another respect. They had an election in that country last fall, in which the people declared themselves unequivocally against the "National Policy" of that country. Two years ago an overwhelming majority were returned to Congress opposed to this policy, and, in November last, a president opposed to the existing system was elected by a larger majority than any of his predecessors for many years. The defeat of protection was overwhelming. As we have followed their example in instituting protection and have suffered all the evils the system is calculated to produce, so we are likely to follow their example in the next general election in having an overwhelming popular verdict against this system recorded in Canada as has been rendered against this same system in the United States last fall.

Protection, Sir, notwithstanding all that may be said in favour of it, is neither more nor less than a species of slavery. The slave is deprived of the product of his labour and is obliged to work without compensation. The producing classes in a country where protection is in vogue are deprived of a portion of the products of their labour and are compelled to pay taxes for the benefit of combines and monopolies; they are made tributary to favoured classes, and, to the extent that they suffer in this respect, they are slaves under this system. It is a system as indefensible upon the broad principles of justice as slavery which is absolute and unconditional. What are the farmers of this country compelled to do, notwithstanding all that my hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Smith) says? The hon. gentleman says the National Policy has redeemed the promise made for it to create a home market which would absorb the productions of our farms. And, in the very next breath, he tells us that the farmers of Canada exported last year $28,000,000 worth of animals and their produce and $22,000,000 of their agricultural products. Thus, in almost the same moment of time, he says that the National Policy has made a market for the farmer and also that the farmers have been obliged to export $50,000,000 of their products, notwithstanding the promise that the National Policy would create a market which would absorb them all. The hon. gentleman tells us that the prices of farm products are more satisfactory in this country than they were in 1878. I wonder the hon. gentleman did not blush when he made that assertion. I wish, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers of this country could have the prices they had under the Mackenzie Administration. I wish we could have again $1 a bushel for barley and $1.25 for wheat. Sir, if the farmers of this country could have the scale of prices that were in vogue from 1874 to 1878, we would not have the depression existing in this country which does exist at the present moment. The hon. gentleman makes a comparison between the exportation of produce from this country and the imports into this country for various periods. And he takes a period of depression, a period of world-wide depression existing from 1873 to 1878, and gravely informs us that because there was not a great expansion of trade at that time when there was no expansion of trade in any of the nations on the globe, the policy in vogue at that time, tried in comparison with the one that succeeded it, is thereby proven a failure. He speaks of the desirability of farmers changing their methods of work and mode of farming. I suppose the hon. gentleman is referring to the two-rowed barley business. What he says reminds me of an Irishman in the west, whose cellar was flooded by the bursting of a water pipe. He went to the city clerk to see about it, and the city clerk told him that the city would fix the pipe and the water would be pumped out of his cellar. "But," he said, "my lot has been flooded, too." "Well," said the clerk, "we will get the water off your lot and it will dry up, and the thing'll be all right." "But," persisted the Irishman, "my chickens are drowned." "Then," answered the clerk, "why in thunder don't you raise ducks?" So the farmer is advised to raise ducks; they are advised to raise two-rowed barley, or go into the business of fattening cattle for the English market. A great many schemes are proposed for the benefit of the farmers by the enterprising Government opposite, and these schemes are just now about as reasonable and successful as either of the instances I give. Sir, the farmer of this country is beginning to realize, and it is not the Reform farmer alone who realizes it, that his surplus productions are sold in the open markets of the world. He must compete in England in selling wheat with the Coolie labour of India; he must sell in the open markets of the world, and must meet the widest and fiercest competition from every producer of the same article all over the globe, and must therefore sell at the lowest rate. This is the condition of the farmer when he has anything to sell abroad. But he begins to see that even when he sells at home, the price of the surplus product which is shipped abroad fixes the price at which he must sell in the home market. And, when he comes to buy, he finds that he has to buy in a restricted market. He is not allowed to take advantage of the competition from which he suffers when he sells, but he must make his purchases in a market from which competition is excluded and where the price of everything is artificially enhanced. He realizes that while he sells in the open market he buys in a restricted market in which the restrictions are for the benefit of combines and monopolies. The farmer is beginning to see that this state of things is one that he cannot and must not sanction. It is one which he will vote against at the first opportunity he has to do so. He feels severely the gigantic burdens the Government has placed upon him. He finds that he must pay interest on $60,000,000 of debt incurred in subsidizing a railway built to the lands of the North-west, the result of which is to bring them into competition with the cheaper fertile lands of that country and to depress the price of his own productions. He is paying interest upon a debt contracted for building canals in which he had no interest, which were built for the trade of the western states of America. He is paying interest upon a sum amounting to nearly $250,000,000, a debt of $50 a head resting upon every man, woman and child. Every man, woman and child is required to pay over $2 annually in interest upon that debt. He is helping to pay the expenses of an extravagant Government. He is paying interest on the railway subsidies that the Government have granted from time to time for political purposes, in order that they might make somebody solid in some particular riding, and at the same time have a chance to toll these subsidies to the extent of 20, 30 or 40 per cent for election purposes. He is bearing all these burdens, and he is dissatisfied, there is no question about it. There is a feeling of unrest in the country, as my hon. friend says, and that feeling of unrest is not confined to Liberal farmers. It is widespread, it is general, it pervades all parts and all classes; and those who are upholding this system, when they next appeal to the country, will learn something about the extent of that feeling of discontent that now exists among the farmers of this country. Sir, the farmer is learning some more lessons with regard to political economy. He is learning that the number of dollars of duty paid by him and extracted from his pocket, is not a correct measure of the loss he sustains in consequence of this system. He is beginning to understand that every dollar of duty upon an article is so much added to its cost, and that before that article reaches him, there is added to that duty the profits of the wholesaler and the retailer, making it at least 40 per cent more, and that for every dollar the Government receives, he pays $1.40 at least, in many cases, $1.50. He begins to understand the question of incidental taxation. He begins to understand that the policy of protection is not to realize revenue, but to exclude goods from the country, and that the real operation of protection is to enable the manufacturer to raise the prices of all the goods that he produces to a point just within the amount for which these goods can be imported and the duties paid; and that, consequently, on all articles of domestic manufacture, the farmer is paying what those articles would cost, if bought in the open markets of the world, and in addition to that, he is paying to the manufacturer almost the sum of the duty that the Government would collect, if these goods were imported. The result of this is what? Last year the duties were $20,550,000. The duties, added to the cost of the article and the profit from those duties which the wholesale and retail dealers made, amounted to over $8,000,000, over 40 cents on the dollar. That was the incidental tax the farmer paid. If the basis is correct, which is established by many American political economists, that for every $3 of duty paid into the Government the farmer pays $5 of incidental taxation to the domestic manufacturers, then the incidental tax the farmer has paid in consequence of the existence of the duties upon the class of goods that is brought into the country, and manufactured in the country, has amounted to $34,000,000 more. So the loss of the consuming class of farmers is the amount of the duty, $20,550,000, the profit upon the duty, $8,000,000, and the incidental taxation, or the enhanced cost of the domestic goods produced in this country, $42,000,000, or the sum of $64,000,000 extracted from the pockets of the consumers of this country in order that the Government may realize a duty of $20,550,000. Now, this may not be mathematically correct; of course, it is an approximate calculation. It may be more; it probably is more. It may be less; but in any event the sum is enormous, and the farmer is being bled in these ways I have mentioned. Now, this is a wasteful system. Of course, it would be better to resort to direct taxation than to compel these men to pay three to one, or even two to one, on the amount of customs taxation that is collected. Now, Sir, the assertion is often made, and was made by my hon. friend from South Ontario, that goods are cheaper than they were ten years ago. Suppose they are. The question is: Are goods as cheap as they would be if the duties were removed?

An hon. MEMBER. Cheaper.

Mr. CHARLTON. Some political economist opposite says they are cheaper. I suppose coal oil is cheaper than it would be if the duties were removed. According to his theory, double the duty, and it would be still cheaper. The question is: Would goods be as cheap as they are, or cheaper than they are, if the duties were removed? and the answer of any sane man would be, Yes, and they are dearer to the extent of the duty in almost all cases. If goods are cheaper than they were ten years ago, the question is how much cheaper would they be if the restrictions upon trade were removed? That is the question we have got to deal with, and the other is quite foreign to the inquiry. Now, the system of protection is one that enables the manufacturer, in many cases, to charge a higher rate for his goods than he can afford to produce them for. It is a well-known fact that Canadian purchasers can go to the United States and buy goods for importation into Canada cheaper than the merchants in that country can buy them, in many cases 20 or 30 per cent cheaper, for the reason that the tariff enables the American manufacturer to bleed his own customers where he has control of the market; and if a foreigner comes there to buy and the manufacturer has to compete with outside parties, then he puts the price down to the level where he has a fair profit, which is 20 or 30 per cent less, even than he sells to his own customers. We have an instance of this kind in Canada in the Cordage Company at Halifax. You can go to St. John's, Newfoundland, and buy cordage made by that company 2 cents a pound cheaper than in Halifax. Why is that? Because they are selling it in Halifax, protected by the tariff duties, at 2 cents a pound more than a fair profit for manufacturing it; but if they are selling it in Newfoundland they have to compete with cordage companies elsewhere, and they have to sell it at a figure which affords them a profit which makes it desirable for them to sell there; but it does not enable them to get the price they can get in Halifax where they have control. We find that illustrated in the history of the cotton companies in this country. The enormous dividends they are paying, the enormous sums they are carrying to rest, all indicate that they are making higher profits than they are entitled to make, and the tariff constructed by hon. gentlemen opposite is a machine designed for the purpose of enabling these concerns to bleed the consumers of the country by charging prices greatly in excess of the price at which they might afford to manufacture those goods, and at which they would manufacture them if they were subjected to competition. Now, in view of all these facts we have a demand for a sweeping tariff reform, and if hon. gentlemen opposite can give us that reform, all right. If they cannot give it, the people will, in my humble opinion, try somebody else upon whom will devolve the duty of doing it. As to how fast we should make this change, of course, that is a question to be considered. We have the manufacturers to consider, we have the farmers to consider, the lumberman, the fisherman, the mine owner and the labourer—we have all these classes of interests to consider. Heretofore we have been considering the interest of the manufacturer only. Of course, we must not lose sight of his interest entirely, we must not wantonly do him an injustice, but we must not let him profit at the expense of the other producing classes of this country. We must endeavour to do justice to all, and to remove these enormous and unjust burdens that exist under the National Policy system in vogue to-day.

I propose, Mr. Speaker, to review very briefly a few of the points made in the debate hitherto. It is a question, of course, that has been pretty well thrashed out; to use a common expression, and I shall not have very much to say upon it. I shall not go into it as extensively, or treat of so many subjects, as I should have done had I spoken earlier in the debate. I wish to refer briefly, at the outset, to some statements made by the Minister of Finance in his Budget speech with respect to a question of very great importance to one of the leading interests of the country. I refer to the lumber interests, and I refer to the statements made by the hon. gentleman with regard to the intention of the Government respecting the export duty on logs. I had not the pleasure of listening to the speech of the Minister of Finance, but I find in "Hansard" he is reported to have said:

The facts of the case are to-day that a most wasteful, and I believe entirely unnecessary, drain is being made on the timber resources of this country under present conditions.

And further:

It is well that this matter should undergo most serious and calm consideration, utterly removed from partisanship or trade reprisals, or the like, upon its own broad and sufficient basis.

And still further:

It (the Government) will not consider that it is debarred from taking the course that is shown to be imperatively necessary because any persons have, last year or this year, on the existing state of things, bought limits or invested in timber lands in our country.

That is to say, that no vested interests in this respect are to be considered. He will consider vested rights in manufactures, but the vested rights of a man investing his money in timber limits will not receive any consideration from the Government whatever. The lumber industry of this country has been in a depressed condition for a good many years past, until last year. Last year the lumbermen of Canada were prosperous. They had nearly reached the condition when the shackles on the trade were entirely removed. The duty on lumber going into the American market was $1 per thousand on white pine lumber, the export duty had been removed, and the lumber trade was in a high degree of prosperity. The condition of the trade was satisfactory to those who were engaged in it, and the indications with respect to it were very clearly shown by the result of the timber limit sale held by the Government of Ontario last fall, when 600 miles of timber put up at auction and sold to the highest bidder realized bonuses of $2,300,000, an enormous sum, and one much in excess of the bonuses received on any previous sale. I quote this sale as indicating the state of prosperity and the buoyant feeling existing in the lumber circles of this country. Now, it will be borne in mind that this trade is one which the Government does not foster; on the contrary, it is a trade upon which the Government imposes burdens. The National Policy bears heavily on this trade; the duties upon chain, axes, saws, all kinds of tools, blankets and material used in the lumber camp have been endured without a murmur. The Government have conferred no benefit, they have not fostered the trade in any way whatever; on the contrary, they have imposed heavy exactions on the trade; and the effect of an announcement such as that made by the Minister of Finance a week ago, to-day, is a disquieting one. Here are men who have purchased timber, and the time of the year has arrived when they will be making contracts of sale. These logs will soon be reaching the mill, they will soon undergo the process of manufacture into lumber, and buyers will come to purchase. On the one hand, the buyer does not know whether the export duty will be reimposed and lumber duties go up in the United States in consequence; and the seller, on the other hand, does not know, and this state of uncertainty is embarrassing to both purchaser and seller, and has a demoralizing and unfavourable influence upon that great trade. Sir, I should like to inquire why the Government feels it incumbent upon itself to harry this business. Their policy has been one of change. They first levied an export duty of $1, then they put it up to $2, then they increased the duty to $3, they then put it back to $2, then, under the statutory provisions of the McKinley Bill, they removed it, and they are now considering what they had better do next. The lumber trade does not know what the Government intend to do, and in this case, as in the case of all important industries, uncertainty has a disastrous effect on the trade. I regret that the Minister of Finance saw fit to make such an announcement in his Budget speech. He would have acted more wisely if he had made his investigation first and arrived at a conclusion as to whether a change was desirable, than to first make the announcement he did a week ago. With respect to the export of logs, the American limit holder would, in the great majority of cases, prefer to manufacture his logs in this country; but there are degrees of uncertainty, in various respects, that deter him from doing so. In the first place, the Ontario Government have refused to make the tenure as regards Crown dues permanent; they have refused to give the limit holder a Crown dues' rate of $1 per thousand with the assurance that this will continue for a fixed period, and the American is left ignorant as to how soon that regulation may be changed, and uncertain as to the moment at which the Ontario Government may increase the dues. Then the attitude of the Government here is another factor that deters the American lumberman from engaging in the construction of mills in Canada. He can tow his logs over to the United States and suspend his operations next year, if necessary, but, if he builds a mill, he invests a large sum, and the profit on that investment depends on his ability to use the mill continuously year after year; and if he is subject to uncertainty as regards the tenure of the Crown dues by the Ontario Government, and the additional uncertainty whether there will be an export duty or not and whether there will be an increase of the American import duty, contingent on the imposition of the export duty, he naturally refrains from making an investment, and continues to carry on his business as he has done during two or three years past, towing logs and sawing them at mills already built, rather than making investments in fixed plant in this country under the conditions I have named. The truth is that at the present moment the advantages are in favour of sawing lumber in Canada. The lumberman who tows logs to Michigan does so at a disadvantage. I may take my own case. I gave a contract last year for sawing a certain quantity of logs in Canada at $3 per thousand, which included towing about 10 miles to the mill. It costs $1 per thousand to pay the American duty, and $2.25 freight to Buffalo or Tonawanda, New York, making a total of $6.25. If I had towed those logs to Michigan, the cost of towing to Saginaw would have been $1.50, the expense of towing the logs up the Saginaw River to the mill from 35 cents to 60 cents, on an average 50 cents, the cost of sawing there $2, freight to Tonawanda or Buffalo, $2.25, which makes exactly the same sum as the cost of placing that lumber on the Buffalo market, sawn either at a Canadian mill, situated as the one was where I did my sawing, or taking the logs to Saginaw and sawing them there. In the one case the $1 per thousand duty was saved, but the disadvantages almost exactly compensated for that. There was, however, the risk of towing not taken into account. I presume that no company of underwriters would insure log rafts at 10 per cent, and men engaged in log towing generally place the percentage of loss as equal to 75 cents per thousand.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. gentleman talks of towing logs to Saginaw and sending them to market at Tonawanda. What about the freight from one place to the other?

Mr. CHARLTON. The freight is the same from Georgian Bay ports as it is from Saginaw. The difference in favour of sawing in Canada would be whatever the risk was in towing, whether it is 10 per cent, amounting to about $1, or 75 cents, as is generally supposed. The American who tows his logs to Saginaw to saw is placed at a disadvantage equal to this towing risk. Under these circumstances the Americans would be glad to build mills in Canada, and all that is necessary to secure a transfer of the business of manufacturing from the American to the Georgian Bay side is to give a sense of security and permanence, first, as to the Crown dues of Ontario, and second, as to the policy of the Canadian Government. If that were secured, we would see fewer logs towed, and more lumber sawn on this side.

With regard to the depleting of our limits, which the Finance Minister laments, let me inquire: What were these limits sold for? Was the purpose in selling these limits to prohibit the buyer from cutting the timber, or was it intended, after selling him the limits, to throw obstructions in the way of carrying on his business? I think, on the contrary, that these limits were sold to the buyers for the purpose of being worked. I think that the Government sold them, first of all, for the purpose of securing such revenue as it could by receiving bonuses at the sale, and, secondly, for securing Crown dues on the timber as it is cut by the owner and sent to the markets. Now, with regard to the depletion of the forests. The province of Ontario contains 197,000 square miles. Less than 25,000 square miles of that is under cultivation. The Government have placed under license, since Confederation, less than 10,000 square miles of timber. The amount placed under license before Confederation was 12,500 square miles, and I venture to say, that, on at least one-third of that area placed under license since Confederation, not a stick has yet been cut, and the amount of timber remaining on the other two-thirds is more than one-half the total quantity originally there. If there are 25,000 square miles of cultivated land, and 22,000 miles of timber land, under license, deduct that 47,000 square miles from the 197,000 square miles and you have the amount of unlicensed territory and forest land in private hands in the province of Ontario, which is 157,000 out of the total cost of 197,000 square miles.

Mr. REID. What about the water? Is there any included in that?

Mr. CHARLTON. Of the amount put under license before and since Confederation, the quantity now said by the Crown land authorities to be actually under license is less than 16,000 square miles, which covers water as well as land. It is estimated that there are 197,000 square miles of territory in the province, at least 150,000 square miles of this, besides the amount covered by license, is in forest. Now, there is not more than one-tenth of the forest area of Ontario under license to-day, and the policy of the province of Ontario has been a careful and conservative policy. The Government of that province is wide awake to the necessity of conserving their timber resources, and it does not intend to bring this territory into market faster than the wants of the country require. It intends to reserve a vast area of unoccupied lands, and, consequently, the alarm that is felt with regard to the depletion of the forests in that province is unnecessary and unfounded. If only about one-tenth of the total forest area of that province is under license, surely hon. gentlemen will realize that the alarm felt about the depletion of the forests of the province is without foundation.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not what Mr. Phipps, your commissioner, said in Toronto.

Mr. CHARLTON. I cannot tell what Mr. Phipps says. Here on one hand is the area of the province, here the amount of cultivated land, here on the other hand the statistics as to the amount of that land placed under license and the amount remaining, and you put the two latter sums together, and the balance is the unoccupied territory, which amounts to 150,000 square miles at least, which is not covered by license, and which is still under timber, and from my personal observation I can say that the best timbered sections of Ontario are yet to be placed under license. But it may be asked, why do the people export logs? Simply because it is to their advantage to do so. Why does the lumberman of Maine export his logs to Canada? Because it is to his advantage. Why does the lumberman on the Georgian Bay export his logs to the United States? Because it is to his advantage. Business men will figure up these things for themselves, and if you do not interfere with them they will make that use of their property which is most conducive to their prosperity, and every time you do interfere with them you are doing mischief rather than good. We might as well talk about depleting our mines, we might as well talk about depleting our granaries, we might as well talk about depleting our herds, we might as well talk about an export duty upon barley for the purpose of having it all made into malt in this country, we might as well talk about an export duty on wool, and we might as well talk about an export duty on wheat for the purpose of having it all ground in this country, as to talk about an export duty on logs. The best way to do with this matter is to let it regulate itself. When people talk about the depletion of forests, they fail to remember that, up to this time, the balance of trade in saw-logs exported has been in favour of Canada, and that we have imported more logs than we have exported. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, the year ending 30th June, 1892, our export of logs was to the value of $798,000, and our imports, including an estimate based upon the average of several years past, into New Brunswick, added to the imports given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, amounted to the value of $951,000, or, in other words, we imported last year $150,000 worth of logs in excess of the amount we exported.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. gentleman know that the Trade and Navigation Returns do not keep an account of a large number of them?

Mr. CHARLTON. The Trade and Navigation Returns are supposed to take account of all logs exported.

Mr. SPROULE. But they do not.

Mr. CHARLTON. You cannot get a clearance for a raft without making a return of the quantity of timber in that raft, and a raft is not a nice little thing to smuggle out of the country. You cannot put it in your waistcoat pocket. No logs are sent out of the country that are not reported to the Custom-house, and it is an imputation on the character of our officers to say that our Trade and Navigation Returns are not reliable. I am surprised to hear the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) casting reflections on his own Government.

Mr. SPROULE. The "Canada Lumberman" says that all the logs are not included in the returns.

Mr. CHARLTON. The "Canada Lumberman" is one thing and the Trade and Navigation Returns another, and if my hon. friend places more reliance on the "Canada Lumberman" than he does on the official documents of his Government, why then I have no quarrel with him. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the period extending from 1884 to 1890, the value of our export of logs was $3,289,000, and the value of our import of logs, including New Brunswick, was $8,468,000, and the balance of our imports in excess of our export of logs during that period was $5,179,000. In face of the fact that the trade—if it is an advantage to import logs and saw them—is vastly in our favour, and has been up to this time. I would ask what reason exists for insisting upon the imposition of an export duty? Are we suffering? If we have imported over $5,000,000 worth more than we have exported, why should these hon. gentlemen make a row about it? If we imported last year $150,000 worth more than we exported, what reason was there for that statement made by the Finance Minister, which is unsettling one of the most important industries of the country; I refer to the statement that he proposed to take into consideration, whether he intended to take a step to ruin that industry. What reason is there for medical men, who know more about pills—if they know anything about them—than they do about saw-logs, making such a noise on this matter?

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHARLTON. Sit down, please; I have not time now.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it not under an arrangement of treaty that logs are entered from Maine; or is it not by freedom of trade between the two countries, the same as we allow them to take our logs out? It is a treaty that regulates that, and the Americans enter the logs and saw them in Canada of their own motion.

Mr. CHARLTON. It may be by treaty. It does not matter for what reason they come to the province of New Brunswick. The fact is that they do come in there and are manufactured in the mills at St. John. There is just as much profit derived from manufacturing 1,000 feet of logs in New Brunswick as there is for manufacturing 1,000 feet of logs in Saginaw.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. SPROULE. No, because they will not employ Canadians there.

Mr. CHARLTON. If we reap an advantage of this kind, why should we take exception to another party having a fair show with us? Why should we imperil our lumber interests by allowing selfish considerations to interfere, and by which we want to have the whole benefit and to allow no benefit to the other side? Now, Sir, the Americans understand this matter.

Mr. SPROULE. So do the Canadians.

Mr. CHARLTON. My friend over there reminds me of the old woman who made some tea which was very hot, but very weak.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that all the story?

Mr. CHARLTON. I will tell him the remainder later on, as I have not time now. The McKinley Bill, which went into operation on the 6th October, 1890, made a provision which reduced the duty upon pine lumber to $1 a thousand, and, connected with that proviso, I will read the following from the official document, section 218 of the United States Tariff Act of 1890:—

Provided, That in case any foreign country shall impose an export duty upon pine, spruce, elm or other logs, or upon stave bolts, shingle-wood, or heading blocks exported to the United States from such country, then the duty upon the sawed lumber herein provided for, when imported from such country, shall remain the same as fixed by law in force prior to the passage of this Act.

That is, any person who imported lumber from the country imposing such an export duty would not be permitted to take advantage of the reduction in duty provided by the Act, but would be obliged to pay the duty which existed prior to the passage of that Act, which was $2 per 1,000 feet. In other words, a statutory offer was made by the McKinley Bill to this country, to the effect that if we removed the export duty on logs, the American Government would reduce the duty on lumber to $1 per 1,000, but that if we did not remove the export duty, they would leave the duty on our lumber at $2 per 1,000. Sir John A. Macdonald and his colleagues wisely accepted that offer and removed the export duty, and thereby secured a reduction of the duty on lumber. That was done in the interest of the pine trade of this country, and at this moment the pine trade seems nervous and apprehensive, when a statement is made by the Government that it even thinks of considering the propriety of putting back that export duty, and causing a reimposition of the $2 duty on our lumber going into the United States. Now, the Americans understand perfectly well that this export duty is an indefensible and vexatious one. They understand perfectly well that they have sent us about three times as many logs as we have sent them. Their constitution prohibits

Congress imposing an export duty, wisely prohibits it, and therefore they are disposed to resent our imposition of an export duty. They are disposed to consider it an unfriendly act, and as they cannot retaliate in kind, they propose to retaliate in another way. Here is a Bill, which was introduced into Congress on the 4th day of last month, by a Democratic member, and which shows how they propose to retaliate.

Mr. SPROULE. That was after you were at Washington.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; my trip was somewhat after that. I may govern the legislation of the United States when I am there; but they have to do a little work without me when I am not there. This Bill is as follows:

A Bill to impose duties on lumber, wood pulp, and other articles, in case any foreign country shall impose any export duties on the materials from which they are made.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in case any foreign country shall impose an export duty upon saw-logs, pulp wood or other raw forest products designed for the use of American mills or factories, the import duty upon the product of saw-logs, pulp wood and other raw forest products of the kinds upon which such export duty is imposed, such as lumber and wood pulp, shall, when imported in the United States from such country, be increased by a sum equivalent to the amount of such export duty; and if such article is upon the free list, a rate of duty equivalent to such export duty shall be imposed upon it. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby empowered and directed to make and enforce such rules as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying the foregoing provisions into effect.

Now, in the first place, we cannot put an export duty on logs without getting back the $2 duty on lumber; under the provision of the McKinley Act that is done instantly upon the reimposition of the export duty. We should have also hanging over our heads the prospect of the passage of this Bill, and I consider it almost certain that it would pass. In that case, the position would be that if we reimposed the export duty on logs, we should have to face an American duty of $4 a thousand on lumber; and no practical lumberman needs to be asked whether he would consider that condition of things ruinous to the trade or not. Every one knows that it would be ruinous, and the lumber interest is a dangerous thing for medical men to trifle with. They had better confine themselves to their own business. The lumbermen, who have millions of dollars invested in their business, prefer to attend to it themselves. They prefer that the Government should let matters rest as they are, and they can give good reasons for this. It is true, the spruce men are dissatisfied, and I regret that they were not allowed to participate in the reduction of the duty on lumber, as it was expected they should. But they were not, and if we reimpose the export duty and this Bill passes, the spruce men will have the advantage of an increase in the duty from $2 to $3 a thousand. So that the condition of things is that if the export duty is reimposed, the owner of spruce timber gets no advantage, while the duty on pine lumber will be doubled; and if that should be done, we should have staring us in the face the prospect of this Bill being adopted, and the duty on lumber being placed at $4 a thousand. This is surely a condition of things sufficient to alarm the lumber interest, and it does alarm them.

Mr. SPROULE. Might I ask the hon. gentleman who introduced that Bill?

Mr. CHARLTON. It was introduced by a Democratic member of the name of Weadock. Do you know him?

Mr. SPROULE. I will know more about him after a little.

Mr. CHARLTON. It may be said that the adoption of this provision would not be allowed, because it would be prejudicial to the interests of American lumbermen holding interests in Canada, and also because the interests of American lumbermen in Michigan would not permit its adoption.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. If you canvass the men engaged in the lumber interest in Michigan to-day, you will find that two-thirds of them are not interested in Canada at all, but that they are in favour of the imposition of the highest rate of duty on lumber that they can possibly secure. Go outside of Michigan, and hunt throughout the length and breadth of the United States, and you will hardly find a lumberman who is not in favour of a higher duty. You will find that the lumbermen of Wisconsin, Minnesota, the Southern States, Maine, California, Oregon and Washington, are all in favour of the imposition of a higher rate of duty; and the few Michigan lumbermen who are interested in Canadian lumber would be perfectly powerless in Congress; their influence would count for nothing whatever. I repeat that nineteen-twentieths of the lumbering interest in the United States are in favour of higher duties, and they would seize upon such an act as the reimposition of an export duty on logs by this Government as a pretext for urging upon Congress the imposition of higher duties upon lumber. A deputation of lumbermen visited Washington last winter, and magnified the fact that the Ontario Government in disposing of some timber limits in the Rainy River district had made it a condition that the lumber should be manufactured in Canada, and made that an excuse for urging Congress that the duty on lumber should be increased; and let this Government impose an export duty on logs with the knowledge they now possess of the state of the trade, and we will have legislation introduced and carried through that will add that export duty to the import duty, whatever it may be. That is considered a moral certainty. And we will have urging that legislation, the lumbering interests of the south, of the Pacific slope, of the Mississippi Valley, and of Maine. Now, it may be said that the Americans cannot do without our pine.

Mr. SPROULE. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. The doctor says "hear hear." He knows more about pills than he does about that matter. The fact is, and every lumberman in this House knows it, that the market for Canadian lumber is being circumscribed in area every year. We have been nearly driven from the American market for red pine lumber. We find that the southern pine is encroaching on our markets from year to year; we find that southern white wood is being used in preference to pine for finishing purposes, because it is cheaper. I have the testimony of mill men, who run trim mills, which cut up wood for finishing purposes, and they say that all through the northern states 2,000 feet of white wood is used to every 1,000 feet of pine for interior house finish. It is used all through the northern states to a great extent, and it is used entirely in the south. I have a statement of the owner of a mill at Tonawanda, New York, that he bought cypress at $32 a thousand feet for the purpose of converting into doors, sashes, blinds, wainscoting and trimming for house finishing, and that it was nicer, more saleable and more popular with builders than pine, which he could not buy at less than $45 per 1,000 feet for the same purpose. The result is that our pine has to a considerable extent been driven from the American market. There are vast areas of southern pine. I have seen pine forests in the south almost ready for the lumberman, where you could trace the rows of the old cotton fields, as the pine there renews itself invariably, which it does not in the north, so that the supply in the south, if cared for, can be made perpetual. The United States, therefore, may be, and can be quite independent of us, and we cannot force them to take our lumber, and if we put ourselves in the position the hon. gentleman's statements foreshadowed, we will be met by a retaliation of a kind that will force the Government to do what the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has said they have often done, sneak out of a hole they strutted into. The step taken by the hon. gentleman may be, and probably is, a piece of bluff. He thinks he can bluff the United States into admitting our lumber free. I do not know anything about the game, but I am told it is not considered a safe game where you bluff on a weak hand and your opponent is liable to call you down. I do not think the Minister of Finance has a strong enough hand to play the game, and he had better not try.

With regard to the depletion of our forests, I suppose everybody wants free lumber. I am sure the lumbermen in Canada want it? If we had free admission of lumber into the United States would that arrest the depletion of our forests? If that is the reason which actuates the Minister of Finance in taking the position he foreshadows—if he proposes to impose an export duty in order to arrest the depletion of our forests, and at the same time desires free lumber, which will accelerate that depletion—is his position a logical one? I think not. We all desire free lumber, which would make the business more prosperous. Of course it would lead to a more rapid depletion of the limits under license; but, as I said before, the Ontario Government, with that wise regard for the future which has characterized almost all its policy, has reserved out of its entire area of limits 150,000 square miles, which it has not licensed, and at the rate at which it is putting its territory under license—less than 10,000 miles licensed since 1867—it will take about three hundred years before the whole territory will be leased. Under these conditions we need not borrow trouble on that score.

I have a word to say to my hon. friend, the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). The other night the hon. gentleman indulged in some pretty severe criticism on the policy of the Ontario Government, and in the course of his speech he made this statement:

Let me ask what is probably the principal reasons for these sales—

The hon. gentleman was referring to the sales made in 1885.

—being made without restrictions? If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to turn up the records of the sales, he will find on the list of purchasers on that occasion such ideal and practical lumbermen as John A. Barron, who was formerly member of Parliament in this House, Robert Jaffray, purveyor-general for grocery supplies to the colonization roads in Ontario, and other gentlemen of that ilk; men who never expected to work these limits, but men who expected to sell them at an advanced rate; men who had thrown about them the guardianship of the Ontario Government, and thought that whatever the Dominion Government might do, the Ontario Government would be prepared to stand by them in regard to letting the lumber go out of the country.

This statement made by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is a charge against the Ontario Government, that its own creatures were manipulating affairs and buying timber limits, and that the policy of that Government, in refusing to place restrictions on the exportation of that lumber, was a policy adopted in their interests. They were ideal lumbermen. Well, there was another ideal lumberman there on that occasion, and, while picking out the notes in his brethren's eyes, he ought to have made reference to the beam in his own. There was a gentleman at that sale by the name of W. H. Bennett, who, at present, represents East Simcoe in this House, and he purchased berths 5 and 8, the first containing sixty-nine square miles and the second thirteen and a half square miles, or in all, eighty-two and a half square miles. Mr. Jaffray, one of the other ideal lumbermen he referred to, purchased eleven square miles, so that the hon. gentleman was just eight times as great a sinner as Mr. Jaffray. And, I think, in casting imputations upon these ideal lumbermen, Messrs. Jaffray and Barron, because they were Reformers, the hon. gentleman ought to have made reference to W. H. Bennett, who bought eighty-two and a half miles.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly I shall, as I do not want to do the hon. gentleman an injustice.

Mr. BENNETT. On that occasion I acted as solicitor for Burton Bros., who are lumbermen, and whose men had made a survey of these limits with the view of ascertaining their value. Mr. Jaffray and the others were profiting by their experience, and I did act for Burton Bros., so that the others would not take advantage of their knowledge.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have an acknowledgment from the hon. gentleman that he bought the limits. Now, on what conditions did Mr. Jaffray and Mr. Barron buy the limits they purchased? Mr. Jaffray bought for the Collins Inlet Company and Mr. Barron bought for another company, as solicitors, exactly in the same way as Mr. Bennett did; and I hold it was not the act of a gentleman, knowing all the circumstances, as my hon. friend does apparently, to cast an imputation on these two men for doing exactly the same thing as he did.

Mr. BENNETT. For whom did Mr. Barron buy?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not aware, but he did not buy for himself, and his name does not appear in the records of the Crown Lands Department as a license-holder. If the hon. gentleman wants to know for whom Mr. Barron bought, I will ascertain and inform him, but he bought in exactly the same way as did the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and the conduct of the hon. gentleman is a pretty small piece of business. The hon. gentleman tells us that the Ontario Government ought to have imposed restrictions at the time of the sale, that they ought to have made provision that this timber should not be taken out of the country? Should they? What were they selling timber for? It is a source of revenue. The Ontario Government, like the Quebec Government, have control of the Crown domain, and from the management of this domain they expect to derive a revenue to meet the expenditures of the Government. This is one of the assets of the province of Ontario, and, as wise administrators of the affairs of the province, it is their duty to make the most they can out of their timber resources. Suppose they had put a restriction on the use of the timber sold on that occasion, would they have received the bonuses they did receive? The hon. gentleman is well aware they would not have received one-half the amount. By making such a regulation as the hon. gentleman proposes, they would prejudice their own interests, and, as wise men, they placed these lands on the market and sold them without reserve to the highest bidder, with a view of obtaining the highest price they could and with the calculation that they would obtain it. The hon. gentleman says that they should now make a charge of Crown dues of $5 per 1,000 feet and remit $4 on the logs that are not taken out of the country. They have not the power to do that. They have sold the limits subject to certain conditions, and they must abide by those conditions. It is doubtful if they could increase the Crown dues at all if the question were tested and whether they could do that or not, they could not make a discrimination between the owners because one is an American and the other a Canadian. They have not made any such condition in their terms of sale, and they cannot make the proposed change without violating the principles of justice. Then the hon. gentleman tells us, Sir, that these American lumbermen are bringing in their sleighs and teams and are paying the duty, and that they are actually bringing in men. Well, Mr. Speaker, I admit that that is a reversal of the order of nature, there is no doubt about that. The current of men has been the other way; it has been flowing out of the country. The idea of bringing men into this country is a new one, and I do not wonder that it rather staggers my hon. friend. We have sent about 1,000,000 men out of this country to the United States, but the idea of bringing any back is one that we ought not to entertain, I presume. If the hon. gentleman will introduce a Bill putting a poll-tax on Yankees, as well as Chinamen, no doubt this business can be arrested, that is, if the Bill passes. But, for my part, I cannot see what damage this country would suffer from the importation of a few thousand men. The more of them that will come, I should say, if they are respectable, decent citizens, the better. I know from personal connection with this business that men are needed, that men are hard to get. The effect on the lumber trade of the removal of export duty on logs and the reduction of the United States duties on lumber has been to create a demand for men. I myself went through a Lake Erie district to get men, offering from $22 to $32 a month for common labourers, and still found them scarce, and we were glad to get them at that. I know that these changes have made a great demand for labour. The removal of the export duty and the reduction of the American Customs duty on lumber has improved business in the small towns of the Georgian Bay region. It has given a boom to everything. The idea my hon. friend sets forth that there is no sawing being done there, that the saw mills are idle, is very much like his other assertions. I myself was obliged to tow a raft of logs to Michigan because all the mills in that vicinity were busy and I could not get them sawed. Yet the hon. gentleman tells us that the saw-mills are idle, that there are no mills running. No, Sir; the mills on the north shore, so far as I know, were employed, and they will, no doubt, be employed this season. The statement that 400,000,000 feet of logs will be exported from this country next season is a gross exaggeration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it is desirable to obtain free lumber, I think the prudent course to take would be just to remain quiet for a while. The Democratic party in the United States has as one of its most important principles, the admission of raw material free of duty. Now, lumber is a raw material and it is likely that one of the first acts of the Democratic Government will be to admit lumber free of duty. But I do not think they will admit it free if we carry on this game of bluff that my hon. friend the Finance Minister has instituted. If we adopt his policy of retaliation, we adopt the policy calculated to defeat the very purpose we seek to attain. If we attempt this policy of imposing an export duty on saw-logs, we shall defeat our own object of obtaining free lumber. The Americans, I repeat, will resent our act if we are guilty of the folly of imposing this duty. Now, I hope my hon. friend the Finance Minister will not be cruel to Mr. Cleveland. I would dislike to have him bluff Mr. Cleveland very severely. Mr. Cleveland would not take it kindly, perhaps. And, speaking seriously, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Cleveland is the last man to attempt to play this game upon. I presume, Sir, you recollect that when Mr. Cleveland was President before, he proposed to take very summary measures with Canada. He proposed, Sir, to engage in a kind of retaliation, compared with which the late act of the present President, Mr. Harrison, was mere child's play. I have here a letter written by Mr. Cleveland to a friend of his concerning the relations of Canada, and I have also the message sent by Mr. Cleveland to Congress with regard to retaliation. It will be found from this that Mr. Cleveland proposed to adopt what we might call very arbitrary measures. In his message to Congress President Cleveland says :

Plainly stated, the policy of national retaliation manifestly embraces the infliction of the greatest harm upon those who have injured, with the least possible damage to ourselves. There is also an evident propriety as well as an invitation to moral support, found in visiting upon the offending party the same measure or kind of treatment of which we complain, and as far as possible within the same lines. And above all things the plan of retaliation, if entered upon, should be thorough and vigorous.

These considerations lead me at this time to invoke the aid and counsel of the Congress and its support in such a further grant of power as seems to me necessary and desirable to render effective the policy I have indicated.

Mr. Cleveland proposed to suspend commercial relations with Canada entirely. He proposed to do this because of grievances, real or fancied, that the United States had suffered at the hands of Canada. Now, Sir, in view of the fact that the United States in years past exported to Canada three times the quantity of logs it imports from Canada; in view of the fact that the United States is unable to retaliate in kind, because of the imposition of an export duty is unconstitutional, if our Government now proceeds to impose an export duty on saw-logs, it is manifest it will invite and will receive retaliation from the United States and that retaliation will take the form of the passage of a Bill such as I have read to impose an import duty equal to the export duty levied. There are now two Bills before Congress to admit Canadian lumber free, and both provide that when any nation imposes an export duty on logs, lumber from that country shall be subjected to the duty previously imposed. There is a feeling of animosity in the United States to an export duty. The United States Government and the United States people from the earliest days of their history have considered export duties unwise and unjust. The fact that such duties are prohibited by the constitution proves this and indicates that we will invite and will insure retaliation in some form if our Government takes a step foreshadowed in the remarks made by the Minister of Finance. Sir, the motive of an export duty is in almost every case a selfish one. Some, for instance, advocate an export duty on pulp wood. The object of those who desire this duty is to corner the pulp materials and hold in reserve these woods until they are ready to buy them. Many saw-mill owners have advocated an export duty because they did not want logs sent out of the country. They wanted them made cheap and kept cheap for their benefit. One of the most vigorous of the agitators in favour of the export duty is a firm by the name of Moyle Brothers, of John's Island, in the north channel of Georgian Bay, who clandestinely removed a mill which was mortgaged and brought it to Canada and set it up, and now they are howling about an export duty, because they want the logs kept till they get ready to saw them. They have not got money enough to buy them now, and they want the Government to put a restriction upon exportation, so that they would be made cheap and kept cheap till these men get ready to take advantage of the same. That is about as patriotic as the motives generally are that actuate men advocating this measure, except it may be, now and then, some medical man who takes it up as a hobby.

Mr. SPROULE. That is about as nearly correct as the hon. gentleman usually gets when dealing with the subject.

Mr. CHARLTON. I propose to pass from the question of the export duty. I hope my hon. friend will be relieved. I will give him credit for sincerity, but I do not know how much common sense I would consider he possessed in the matter. But he is sincere, no doubt, he sincerely desires to do a thing which would be very prejudicial to the interests of the country if he succeeded.

I propose now to say a few words about some of the statements made by the Minister of the Interior, who, I am sorry to see, is not in his place. The Minister of the Interior made a statement, during his speech, to the effect that the farmers of the state of New York were worse off than those of Canada, as shown by the "Globe" commissioners' report. Well, they were rather bad authority to appeal to for sustaining his position, as I will proceed to show. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the Government party are very desirous of making it appear to the farmers of this country that there is no advantage to be gained by access to the American market, free of duty, and if they can convince the Canadian farmer that his American brother is no better off than he is, and receives no better prices than he does, and that his condition is just as depressed as his own, and that he is labouring under just as great difficulties in consequence of that depression, why, then, they have succeeded in their purpose. My hon. friend, in pursuance of that line of policy, makes the assertion in his speech that the American farmers are worse off than those in Canada, as shown by the "Globe" commissioners' report. Now, I think the assertion is worthy of being examined. I think it is worth while that I should state the real facts as set forth by the "Globe" commissioners. The "Globe" newspaper was worthy of great credit for its enterprise in sending these commissioners to ascertain the state of public feeling and the state of public business in various parts of the province of Ontario, and then, in sending these same gentlemen to the state of New York to make inquiries in corresponding lines of business there, so as to be able to draw a contrast between the condition of these people in the two countries. Now, here is one of the letters from Albion, New York, written on the 20th day of January, by Mr. Cockin. I do not know what his politics are, I have understood he is a Conservative, but that does not matter, I presume, if he is a truthful man. Mr. Cockin, in describing an interview with a farmer by the name of Stephen Halleck, reputed to be one of the wealthiest farmers in Orleans county, New York, and the possessor of a farm of 200 acres, writes as follows:—

"I feed 54 head of cattle for the New York market. Last year I got $3.80 per 100 lbs., and that is the lowest price I ever got. In 1891 I got $5.50. My farm is valued at $25,000. It is run on the most approved system. I don't buy everything that comes along, but what I do buy I pay cash for it and get the discount. The condition of the farmer is generally poor, but he has only himself to blame—he lives too expensively and won't look ahead; he incurs liabilities in the present which he is unable to meet in the future. I don't want annexation, and a majority of our people you will find are of the same opinion. We have not had an increase of population in this county; in fact, if I remember rightly, one of our local papers showed that the deaths have exceeded the births in Orleans county during 1892."

Below I give Mr. Halleck's figures for the past year's work. It should be remembered that this is a model farm, one worked with plenty of capital, high intelligence, by a proprietor who gives the closest attention to every nickel expended on the place:—

30 acres in barley, 1,500 bush. at 67c.....	$1,005
40 do wheat, 1,600 do	1,200
15 do beans, 350 do at $1.50.....	525
50 do hay, 75 tons at $11 a ton.....	825
Apples and other fruits	1,275
(8 acres in bush and balance of land in pasture.)	-----
Gross value of yield.....	$4,830
Expenditure—
Hired help.....	$ 500
Taxes	132
Insurance.....	30
Improvements (the farm is in good shape).....	50
Day help.....	50

Profit for 1892.....	4,068

Now, I would ask any practical farmer in this House to point out to me any two-hundred-acre farm in the province of Ontario or in the Dominion of Canada, where the net profits for the last year were $4,068. I do not think any such case can be found. Then, in the same communication, is a letter from Mr. Atkinson. I believe he does not give the name of the farmer to whom he refers in the quotation I am about to read. This farmer, says:

We get papers and letters from there [Canada], and we can make a comparison. Your barley is preferred over ours, although I believe we grow some that is as good. Your oats are heavier and worth more. Your lambs are larger and better for mutton, while if the duty were taken off wool you would command this market. We cannot grow pease like you, but have to send over and get our seed every year. Besides these you could sell beans, potatoes, eggs and poultry here. The farmer, too, gave me a list of the products of his farm, as follows:—

Barley, 9 acres, 355 bush., 68 cents.....	$ 241
Wheat, 16 acres, 295 bush., 75 cents.....	221
Beans, 7 acres, 120 bush., $1.60.....	192
Oats, 6 acres, 287 bush., 35 cents.....	100
Corn, 5 acres, 600 bush. (in cob), 28 cents.....	168
Hay, 10 tons, $12.....	120
Fruit.....	600

Total.....	$1,642

Canadian horses, he said, were brought over to New York state and sold for work purposes until the McKinley tariff stopped them. A great many have been purchased from the western states since that time, but the Canadian horses are short-legged and hardy and better liked. "Free trade," he said, "would be a bad thing for us because it would be a good thing for Canadians."

He does not give the size of the farm, but probably it is a hundred-acre farm. Then, in a letter summing up the result of their investigations, which was given to the world quite recently, Mr. Atkinson says:

There is practically no difference of opinion in the country districts with regard to the benefit of access to the United States markets for our natural products.

And later on:

The condition of Ontario farmers, in the face of being shut out of the most profitable market for many of their chief products, is evidence of the fertility and resource of the land and the industry, intelligence and pluck of the farmers of the province. No state of the Union could have survived being walled off from trading with the remaining states, and it must give to those who know the natural advantages of Ontario an abounding faith in the prosperity which would come to our farmers with free trade that in only the most favoured portions of the state are the farmers enjoying a higher standard of living and in a generally better position. The farmers in the states freely acknowledge the superiority of Ontario barley, horses, lambs, pease, oats, wool, cheese and other products, and admit that Ontario farmers would have an advantage under a free trading arrangement. This and other evidence all goes to show the advantages of free trade with the states. * * * * *

To sum up public opinion as it has been found during the inquiry, it calls for an immediate reduction of the tariff, and as wide a measure of reciprocity with the states as can be obtained, as soon as possible, and to include manufactures as well as natural products.

Mr. Cockin, in concluding his letter, says :

In a recent debate in the Dominion House, the Minister of Finance, in reply to Sir Richard Cartwright, quoted our letters from Albion, N.Y., or rather, from a portion of those letters, to show that the condition of the New York state farmer is more deplorable than that of the farmer in Ontario. The Hon. Mr. Foster should or could have readily seen from those letters that the condition of the American farmer in New York state is superior to that of our people. And why? The difference between the two is this: The Yankee farmer in New York state is hard up from high living, unnecessary expenditures, and from having been financially overweighted at the outset of his farming career. If a careful, intelligent man, and not financially pressed in the initial stage, he can hardly fail to do well. The Canadian farmer, on the other hand, is hard up, even when his farm is unencumbered. Each is striving to attain to independent circumstances. The American farmer could if he would. The Canadian farmer would if he could.

A local paper published portions of my second letter from Albion, with the contents carefully elided, giving its readers thereby an entirely erroneous idea of the condition of the American farmer. Amongst other interviews, it alludes to the one with Mr. Stephen Hallock, and prints this much of one paragraph: "The condition of the farmer is generally poor." There it stops. Had it finished the sentence it would have read: "The condition of the farmer is generally poor, but he has only himself to blame; he lives expensively, and won't look ahead." In addition, this paper in question would have given the added information that Mr. Hallock last year made a profit of $4,068 out of his 200-acre farm. It is easy—nothing easier—to make a sentence sound vastly different by the elimination of essential words. The 53rd Psalm says: "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God." When I quote that, I give the psalmist's words and intentions correctly, but if I eliminated everything except "there is no God," and stay my pen there, I place David in an altogether false and unfair position. Everything depends upon how a sentence is put. "I cast my mite upon the crystal sea," said the gentle maiden. "Horribly sea-sick," quoth her more prosaic papa. Yes, everything depends upon how you put a thing

The testimony furnished by the "Globe" commissioners in the state of New York, and the comparison they drew between the condition of the farming community there and the condition of farmers in Canada, clearly and unmistakably points to the facts, that the American farmer, if burdened by debt or in straitened circumstances, is placed in that position by his own extravagance and lack of thrift, that generally he is in a more prosperous condition than the Ontario farmer, and that he receives higher prices for all the products of his farm. If the Ontario farmer, with his energy and knowledge of agriculture, and with his superior land, enjoyed the advantage of the same market as the American farmer, he would exchange a position and condition of depression and want for a condition of prosperity of the most gratifying character. There is no doubt about it. The assertion made by the Minister of the Interior, that the farmers of New York state were poorer than those of Canada, as shown by the reports of the "Globe" commissioners, either betrayed great ignorance or a hasty reading of the article, or no reading at all, or the statement was made designedly and purposely to mislead the House and the country by an assertion that was lacking the very essentials of truth. I know myself, by personal observation, that lands away in the western states, in the centre of Illinois, are more valuable than lands in any portion of Canada. I was there last fall, and lands in the centre of the grand prairie of Illinois, possessing no special advantages, and seven or eight miles from a railway station, realize as high as $90 per acre, while in the centre of Iowa farms are worth up to $70 per acre. Everything in the United States in regard to agricultural interests indicates more wealth and greater prosperity than the conditions here, and if our farmers had free access to the United States markets and obtained the prices American farmers secure, the condition of things here would be vastly changed. The Minister of the Interior spoke of the great progress in Ontario, and drew a comparison between the condition of agriculture nowadays with olden times, when the pioneers were clearing up the forests, and when they were carrying their grist to the mill by wagons drawn by oxen, and attending church in the same way. Naturally there has been progress. We have enjoyed some good times in Canada since then. We had twelve or thirteen years of reciprocity with the United States, a period of great prosperity. Of course there was a depression in the period from 1873 to 1877, and there has been a season of depression since 1890, but on the whole there has been progress. The question is not whether there has been absolute progress or not, but the question is, what degree of progress could be made under the most satisfactory circumstances; the question is, could we have done better than we have done? We assert the affirmative, and we desire that the farmers of Ontario shall be placed under circumstances where they will have an opportunity of showing what they are capable of doing in competition with their American brothers when placed under similar conditions.

I now come to refer to remarks made by the Minister of Railways, and I am glad to see him in his seat. The Minister informed us that when the people understood that, in order to obtain reciprocity we must accept the tariff of the United States, they dropped it and the Liberal party. If am quoting the hon. gentleman inaccurately, I hope he will correct me. What did the people understand? Did they not understand from the assertions of the Minister of Railways and other members of the Government, that the people were going to secure reciprocity, that they were about to give it to the people, that they had it in their grasp, and that they actually dissolved Parliament and appealed to the people on that issue.

Mr. HAGGART. I was speaking of unrestricted reciprocity. Does the hon. gentleman not know the difference?

Mr. CHARLTON. What kind of reciprocity did the hon. gentleman tell the people they were going to get?

Mr. HAGGART. I never spoke anything of the kind.

Mr. CHARLTON. You said you were going to give them the treaty of 1854.

Mr. HAGGART. I did not; I never mentioned anything of the kind.

Mr. CHARLTON. The treaty of 1854 with alterations and emendations. When the question of a reciprocity treaty with the United States was being discussed, a subject which the Liberal party had made an issue and discussed before the people, the Government took alarm and they dissolved the House and brought on the elections prematurely one year in advance of their proper time, in order to forestall the Liberal party and take from us the benefit we would derive from that issue on which we proposed to go to the people. They stole our clothes. Hon. gentlemen opposite would have been naked, blind and destitute to-day if they had not stolen them. They have not, however, made proper use of them. They declared to the people that they were about to secure reciprocity, that the people need not pay any attention to the Grits, that they, the Government, would obtain it; that they were going to dissolve the House and appeal to the country, and obtain a new House fresh from the people, not a moribund House, to consider the reciprocity treaty, which without doubt would be submitted to them. Those were the assertions made by hon. gentlemen opposite when they went to the country. They were false assertions, of course; they were nothing more or less than political fiction. Those were the arguments of the Ministers, stated broadly. They brought down to the House a copy of the despatch to the Home Government, dated Ottawa, 13th December, 1890, and although at this session we have asked the Government to bring down the correspondence in regard to this matter, they cannot do it. They have been two years attempting to do so, but have been unable, and they now declare they have to ask the consent of the Home Government; but we know that they could give on the 3rd February the essential portion of a document sent to the Home Government on 13th December preceding, and they can give the whole or any part of the correspondence that suits their purpose, and they can withhold from the people such portions as do not suit their purpose and would tell against them. They promised the people reciprocity, they asserted they were going to get it, that they were certain to get reciprocity on the lines of the treaty of 1854, with such changes as the altered circumstances of the two countries require.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have my hon. friend understand what he is saying, and the result of such an assertion. I would like to ask him for the proof of that assertion. He just now made the assertion, in so many words, that we said we were certain of getting a reciprocity treaty. Will he show the proof?

Mr. CHARLTON. I will read the hon. gentleman the document.

Mr. LAURIER. At all events there is no doubt that the assertion was false.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the least doubt that it is a false assertion in the mouth of the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not in his mouth, but in the mouth of the advisers of His Excellency.

Mr. FOSTER. Where is your proof?

Mr. CHARLTON. On the 3rd day of February the Government organ, the Toronto "Empire," contained the following—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. We want your proof.

Mr. CHARLTON. Was it not an authorized source of information?

Mr. FOSTER. Something like your Norfolk paper.

Mr. CHARLTON. How did the "Empire" have a Government despatch in connection with that if there was no collusion between the Government and that journal? How did it have that despatch?

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman means to deal fairly he will stick to the one question. He has asserted a thing which I say has no foundation on fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Sit down.

Mr. FOSTER. I have brought it to the hon. gentleman's attention, and I ask him for proof.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Let him get through and he will give it to you.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before I am allowed to read the very first line of the document the hon. gentleman impugns the authority of the medium through which that communication is conveyed. I ask the hon. gentleman if there was not authority in that medium, how did the "Empire" come in possession of the official document in connection with it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. From the "Canada Gazette."

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps it is not necessary to read these reasons given by the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. You cannot bear out your assertion, and you know it; you cannot do it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will read:

In view of the foregoing important statement—

That is a statement of dissolution.

—the question will naturally be asked: What are the reasons which have induced the Government to appeal to the country at the present time? It is understood that the Dominion Government have, through Her Majesty's Government, made certain proposals to the United States for negotiations looking to the extension of our commerce with that country.—

Mr. FOSTER. A long way off from your proof yet.

Mr. CHARLTON:

—These proposals have been submitted to the President of the United States for consideration,—

Mr. FOSTER. Still a long way off.

Mr. CHARLTON. That was not so either.

—and the Canadian Government is of the opinion that if the negotiations are to result in a treaty, which must be ratified by the Parliament of Canada, it is expedient that the Government shall be able to deal with it by a Parliament fresh from the people rather than with a moribund House.

Mr. FOSTER: Miles away from your proof yet.

Mr. CHARLTON. By the declarations of their organs, by statements from the stump and every hustings, the Government did assert that it had received proposals from the President of the United States and that negotiations were in progress. If the Government had not professed to entertain the expectations that these alleged negotiations would be successful, why should they dissolve the House? They assigned as a reason for the dissolution, that they did not want a moribund House to deal with that question, but that they wanted a House fresh from the people. They stated that they were at that moment negotiating and that they expected to successfully consummate that treaty. That was the statement sent out to the people of Canada. That was the assertion made by this Government. That was the plea upon which they went to the people. They deceived the people. They led them to suppose that they were just about to obtain a reciprocity treaty, that they had received proposals from the President of the United States, that everything was going on swimmingly; and the truth was, that they had received no proposal; the truth was, that their assertion was denied by the Secretary of State of the United States, on the 30th January; the truth was, that they were playing a game with the people of Canada which was the reverse of ingenuous; and the truth was, Sir, that the British Minister at Washington had danced attendance upon the Department of State day after day, supplicating for the privilege to send commissioners to Washington, and that the Government of the United States did not listen favourably to this proposal. But after repeated supplications and requests that a commission should be received, Mr. Blaine said there was nothing in the law to prevent the people of Canada from sending a commission, if they chose, and if the commission came to Washington, he could not, without discourtesy, refuse to see them; and then we had this game played in connection with a political struggle in this country. We had that assertion.

Mr. FOSTER. What assertion?

Mr. CHARLTON. We had this assertion made, in fact.

Mr. FOSTER. What assertion?

Mr. CHARLTON. We had this assertion made, in fact, made by the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. You cannot show what assertion.

Mr. LAURIER. I will show again and again that Mr. Blaine himself took Sir Charles Tupper to task for his statement.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Blaine did nothing of the kind.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope hon. gentlemen—

Mr. LAURIER. I will prove it again and again, and read the proof at any time.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHARLTON. I presume, under parliamentary usage, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman will have a chance to reply to me?

Mr. FOSTER. You have not made good your assertion.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is a little embarrassing, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman should interrupt me so often.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must call the attention of the House to the rule that precludes the interruption of a speaker, except on a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) give us his authority?

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman asks me to give Mr. Blaine's letter, and I will do so.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all; I did not ask you for that.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Blaine had his attention called to the fact that assertions were made, that negotiations were in progress between the Canadian Government and the Government at Washington, for the purpose of securing a reciprocity treaty. He had his attention called to that fact by Mr. Baker, a member of Congress from Rochester, N.Y., and Mr. Blaine replied to that inquiry, as to whether this assertion, which was going the rounds of the Canadian papers, and as being assigned as a reason for the probable dissolution of the House of Commons of Canada, was true, and on the 29th January, 1891, Mr. Blaine wrote to his friend, Mr. Baker, as follows:—

I authorize you to contradict the rumours you refer to. There are no negotiations whatever on foot for a reciprocity treaty with Canada, and you may be sure, no such scheme for reciprocity with the Dominion, confined to natural products, will be entertained by this Government. We know nothing of Sir Charles Tupper coming to Washington.

Now, Sir, take the whole chain of circumstances. After the election the three commissioners went to Washington, and how were they received? Why, General Harrison practically told them they might go to Hades, and he would go off on a visit. They were not received at all. They received a rebuff. They turned about and went home without having accomplished anything. There was a deep feeling of irritation in Washington at the conduct of the Canadian Government in reference to this matter, and that feeling of irritation was all the deeper because Mr. Blaine and the Administration at Washington were restrained by diplomatic etiquette from laying bare the facts surrounding this matter, and we could only get at these things by snatches here and there. We have here been denied access to the correspondence, but I dare say the commissioners in Washington were not ignorant of the gossip of that city about this matter, were not ignorant of the fact that it was represented that Sir Julian Pauncefote, when these pretended revelations with regard to negotiations were made, went to Mr. Blaine and apologized in the most earnest manner, for a seeming breach of faith on his part and professed a deep sense of humiliation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Not at all.

Mr. CHARLTON. Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They thought it was a good political trick.

Mr. CHARLTON. No doubt they may think that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You are proud of it, are you not?

Mr. CHARLTON. The United States Government was made a catspaw by a designing and shameless Administration to pull Tory chestnuts out of the fire in an election contest in Canada. They were made the unconscious instruments to forward the interests of the gentlemen opposite, and they felt justly indignant.

Mr. FOSTER. Where is that authority?

Mr. CHARLTON. I was speaking to you about it, and I am asking the hon. gentleman, if he did not hear some of that gossip when he was in Washington? Now, I come to the subsequent visit of this commission. They visited Washington again. Their negotiations were fruitless. Their negotiations were intended to be fruitless, for that was a part of the game. We have the statement made by Secretary Foster, not Secretary Foste, of the Canadian Finance Department, but Secretary Foster of the State Department at Washington, in regard to this matter. Mr. Foster says:

During the Reciprocity Conference of last winter Mr. Blaine did not insist that in a reciprocity arrangement a uniform tariff would be necessary for both Canada and the United States, nor much less that it should be on the line of the present United States tariff. He did ask that the schedule should not be confined to natural products, but that it should include an agreed list of manufactured goods, and that the reciprocity should be confined to Canada and the United States, and because of these two conditions the negotiations were fruitless.

He did not ask for a common tariff; he did not ask for unrestricted reciprocity—neither the one or the other; but that the agreement should include a list of manufactured goods, and that the reciprocity should be confined to Canada and the United States. Now, this is the kind of a treaty that our commissioners could have got. Notwithstanding the bad odour in which they stood at Washington, notwithstanding that the Washington Government believed that they had been guilty of perfidious conduct, it was still in their power to secure a reciprocity treaty on the lines laid down by Secretary Foster's statement, which I have just read, and they would not do it—why? Oh, it would have been discriminating against England. Yes, they would have been guilty of the terrible sin of discrimination, and would have brought down on our heads the wrath of England. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a copy of the draft treaty of reciprocity negotiated by the Hon. George Brown in the year 1874, a treaty substantially of the same character as that which Mr. Foster's letter indicates could have been negotiated in the year 1892, and that treaty met with the approval of the British Government. We have in this document the formal approval by Earl Derby of the conditions. In a communication from the Foreign Office, dated 22nd May, 1874, we have the following from Earl Derby, addressed to Sir Edward Thornton:—

I have received your despatch of the 28th ultimo, forwarding a copy of the memorandum containing proposals for a Reciprocity Treaty, which has been submitted by yourself and Mr. Brown to the United States Government, and I have to state to you that Her Majesty's Government approve this paper, which appears to be drawn up with care and ability.

What was this paper? What were the conditions contained in it? Here is the schedule of the goods that were to be interchanged between the two countries free of duty: schedule A, natural products; schedule B, agricultural implements, forty in number; schedule C, manufactures, a list of thirty-seven articles. We have, in this list, axes, cultivators, forks, grain drills, hoes, hand or horse, horse-power machines, reapers, reapers and mowers combined, spades, shovels, scythes, threshing machines, etc. In the schedule of manufactures, we have boots and shoes, cotton manufactures of all descriptions, cabinet-ware and furniture, carriages, carts, wagons, iron goods, bar, hoop, pig, puddled, rod, sheet or scrap, nails, spikes, bolts, tacks, bracks or springs, castings, leather, harness and saddlery, mill or factory or steam-boat fixed engines, and machines, printing paper, printing type, presses and folders, satinettes of wool and cotton, tweeds of wool solely, and a great variety of other articles. Here was a treaty which Mr. Brown and the British Minister at Washington had negotiated, which had been submitted to the British Government, and which had been approved by Lord Derby, although it discriminated against England in the same sense in which these hon. gentlemen claim that a treaty such as they could have negotiated a year ago would have discriminated. In view of the indications they had of England's intention with reference to the Brown draft treaty, we know that their fears were quite needless, and I think that the reasons they assign are not the real reasons. I think that they object to a reciprocity treaty which will open the Canadian market to American goods of any kind, not because it will discriminate against England, or because England has any disinclination to allow such a treaty to be negotiated, but because of the dictates of the Red Parlour; and, in the interest of that one industry, the manufacturing industry of this country, the Government have controlled and shaped their policy, and have disregarded the interest of the farmer, the lumberman, the miner, the fisherman, the labourer and every other class of the Canadian people except that small fraction represented by the manufacturing class.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him one question, whether he is aware that that arrangement was declared by the Hon. George Brown himself to be without the feature of discrimination against Great Britain?

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like to inquire how that arrangement could be carried into effect without discrimination against Great Britain? It could not be done.

An hon. MEMBER. Answer the question.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have answered the question. There is the treaty, there is the list of manufactured goods; there can be no doubt of it. Now, Mr. Speaker, these hon. gentlemen have been telling the country that they are in favour of reciprocity. I have heard that statement made in this House year after year. Who thinks they are in favour of reciprocity? They are, I admit, in favour of reciprocity in natural products. Of course, they are. So would I be, and so would everybody be on this side of the House. But to talk about reciprocity in natural products, under the circumstances, is to insult common sense—simply that and nothing more. We have been assured by American statesmen every year since the old reciprocity treaty was abrogated in 1866, that they would never again grant reciprocity in natural products. That is a foregone conclusion; we cannot get it. If we talked to the people of this country honestly about reciprocity, we must talk about some attainable measure of reciprocity, not about some unattainable scheme which is foredoomed to failure, as that of hon. gentlemen opposite was when they sent their representatives to Washington on the last occasion. Now, I assert that if the Liberal party were in power they could get a reciprocity treaty with the United States. I assert that without hesitation. I have reason to assert it, from the declarations of prominent men in the Democratic party—from the declarations of Mr. Springer, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and from the declarations of Mr. Carlisle, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. The Democratic party would naturally be disposed to give us reciprocity. It would not be necessary to have a uniform tariff. It would not be necessary to have that bugbear of the Finance Minister, unrestricted reciprocity. I believe we could obtain reciprocity substantially on the lines laid down in the draft Brown treaty; that, I firmly believe; and if we were to make an honest effort to obtain reciprocity, we would succeed. We have made efforts for reciprocity in natural products time and time again. We sent a commission to Washington in 1866, consisting of Sir Alexander Galt, Sir W. P. Howland, Mr. Smith, of New Brunswick, and Mr. Henry, of Nova Scotia, to see if we could get reciprocity in natural products, and failed. We sent Sir John Rose in 1869 on the same errand, and again failed. We sent the Hon. George Brown in 1874, and the treaty to which I have referred was negotiated, but it was lost in the United States Senate. The commissioners of this Government went again in 1892, and again failed; and we shall always fail, if we seek for reciprocity in natural products alone. The Americans will not grant us the privilege of selling to them everything we have to sell, unless we grant them the privilege of selling to us what they have to sell. That is a settled question. If we secure reciprocity at all, we must be willing to have it on lines which will enable the Americans to sell us manufactured goods in return for our natural products of the soil.

That being the case, the next question to consider is, if reciprocity is obtainable upon these conditions, would it be to our advantage to get it? I just want to consider that question very briefly. Would it be to our advantage to procure reciprocity from the United States if we had to go outside of a treaty that was confined to natural products alone, if we had to negotiate a treaty which would admit manufactured goods of various kinds to allow the Americans to sell to us goods we require in return for what we purchase from them? Under the McKinley Bill, I need hardly recapitulate the burdens under which we labour. We pay a duty of 30 cents per bushel on barley; $30 per head on horses; $10 on cattle; $1.50 on sheep; 5 cents per dozen on eggs; 25 cents per bushel on potatoes; 25 cents per bushel on apples; 40 cents on malt; $4 on hay; 10 cents per pound on wool; 5 cents on poultry; 6 cents per pound on butter; 40 cents per bushel on beans, and 40 cents on pease. Now, if these duties were paid by the consumer it would matter nothing to us; but if, on the contrary, we receive for the productions we send to the United States the price in that market less these duties it is a very important matter to us whether we can secure the removal of these duties or not. It is unnecessary to go at this time into the question as to who pays the duty. Every farmer understands that. The quotations in the Trade Returns of both sides of the line settle that question. According to the American papers, barley is 30 cents per bushel, plus the freight, higher in their markets than in Canada. Prices of horses, sheep, cattle, eggs, potatoes, apples, malt—in all these articles upon which duties are levied you will find that the market quotations are lower in Canada than in the United States to the extent of the duty and transportation in each case, and were these duties removed the amount would simply be added to the price in Canada without materially affecting the condition of the American farmers one way or the other. In looking over some American statistics I was very much struck the other day by the fact that, not only has there not been any growth of trade between these two contiguous nations since 1867, but there has been a diminution in the exports of this country. It is a remarkable fact. The United States have doubled their population and trebled their wealth, yet the trade between the two countries has been retrograding. I find by some American statistics contained in the "Tribune" almanac of New York, a publication reported to be a reliable authority, that we exported to the United States in 1866 to the value of $48,528,000, and in 1892 our exports only amounted to $35,334,000, being a shrinkage in twenty-six years of $13,194,000, or 27 per cent. I find that we imported from the United States, in 1866, $27,905,000, and in 1892, $61,715,000, showing an increase in our imports from the United States in twenty-six years of $33,810,000, or 121 per cent. So that our imports increased by that large percentage, 121 per cent, and our exports decreased 27 per cent. Now, the balance of trade against us last year, according to American statistics, was $26,381,000, and the balance of trade in our favour in 1866, $23,623,000. That certainly does not indicate a healthy state of trade; and if we take our own Trade and Navigation Returns, we find that our exports to the United States, without short returns, being added, were $39,950,000, in 1866, and in 1892, without short returns, they were $35,640,000, or an actual shrinkage in our export to the United States, after twenty-six years, of $4,310,000 or 10 per cent. In face of the fact that the American population had doubled, and their wealth trebled, our exports according to our own returns to that country have actually diminished, as compared with twenty-six years ago, leaving out the question of short returns, which do not figure in the return of exports in 1866. There have been but three years since 1866, the last year of reciprocity, when our exports to the United States equalled our exports that year, namely, 1873, 1882, and 1889. With the exception of these three years, under the influence of repressive and hostile tariffs, we have failed to export Canadian products to the extent we did in 1866, when the population of that country was one-half of what it is to-day.

After Recess.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. CHARLTON. Having pointed out the effect upon the commerce between the United States and the Dominion of Canada of re-restrictive tariff legislation since 1866, and having shown that the volume of our exports to that country have actually diminished during that period, and were last year some $4,000,000 less than in the year 1866, I wish next to draw attention to the condition of matters, the aggravated condition of matters, as regards increase under the McKinley Bill of the restrictive measures which had been in vogue before. And for this purpose I select certain articles for which the United States furnish our chief market and draw a comparison between the export of these articles to the United States in the year 1890, the year immediately preceding the McKinley Bill's coming into operation, and the year 1892, the year in which that measure was fully in operation and its effects were fully felt. I take the articles of horses, horned cattle, poultry, eggs, wool, flax, apples, barley, split pease, hay, malt, potatoes and vegetables :

Certainly, if this Bill was designed to put an end to commercial transactions between the two countries, it is rapidly working in that direction, and nothing could illustrate more strikingly the evil influence exerted by restrictive legislation upon commercial transactions between the two countries than the operation of the McKinley Bill during this period. We see very well what the effect of restriction has been, but the probable effect of absolute free trade between the two countries is a very interesting subject to speculate upon, and while we cannot arrive with absolute certainty at a conclusion as to what the volume of trade might become in a given term of years under the operation of free trade and the striking off of the trammels that now exist upon the trade of the two countries, we can arrive approximately at what the results would be. Under the operation of the reciprocity treaty which came into effect in 1854 and which was abrogated in 1866, the exports of the British provinces to the United States increased with phenomenal rapidity. Our exports to the United States in the year 1854 were $10,000,000, in round numbers ; our exports in 1866, according to our own statistics, were $40,000,000, and according to the American statistics, $48,000,000. The increase was a four-fold increase in thirteen years. We quadrupled our transactions with the United States between 1854 and 1866. Now, if the free trade arrangement had been continued, if there had been no abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, and if the increase in exports to the United States had been annually as great as they were from 1854 to 1866, our exports to that country last year, of the productions of the Canadian forest, field, mines and fisheries, would have been $100,000,000. If we quadrupled our export trade with the United States in thirteen years under reciprocity, it is not unreasonable to suppose that we would have quadrupled that again in double that period, in twenty-six years, and that our exports last year, instead of being less than thirty-six millions, would have been one hundred and sixty millions. I have no doubt that if the country had continued under the operation of free trade, we would have had an enormous commerce with the United States, equalling one hundred and sixty millions, at least, of exports to that country and a corresponding increase in the amount of imports from that country. We can readily understand the influence that would have been exerted upon the prosperity and upon the future of Canada by a trade with the United States four times greater than it is, and with every probability that with an increased population, we would have had greater wealth. We would have had, not only this vast increase of trade with the United States, but a large trade also with Great Britain and with other portions of the world. Our position, Mr. Speaker, for trade with the United States is peculiarly advantageous. There is not one of the producing states of the American Union, having their market in the great sea-board cities, as favourably situated for access to those cities and for access to all the consuming markets of the United States, as is the province of Ontario. The states to the west of us—the states of Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, the Dakotas, Nebraska—all these states actually pass across our territory if they take their shortest route to the eastern markets. We are between these states and their market, and I repeat that our position is peculiarly favourable, in a geographical sense. Then, our position is a favourable one in other respects. We have in Ontario, and in the greater part of the Dominion of Canada, excellent climatic conditions, a good soil that produces a great variety of the articles that find a market in the sea-board cities, and of a superior quality to any produced in the American states. We have within easy reach of us 6,000,000 people in cities. The population of the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, Newark, Philadelphia, Albany, Rochester, Buffalo, Boston—all these great centres of trade—are within easy reach of this province. We have trunk lines of railway leading down to each one of them, and if the shackles were stricken from trade, the inevitable consequence to Ontario would be vast accession to the business of the country, a revival of trade and prosperity among the farmers, and prosperity among all classes whose business is in any way dependent upon the farmers of this country.

There is another branch of business which I have alluded to once or twice, and to which my attention has been drawn in connection with my duties, lately, as chairman of the Mining Commission of Ontario—I refer to the development of our mineral resources. Not only have we extraordinary agricultural resources, and peculiar advantages of position in the matter of reaching the markets of the sea-board for our agricultural productions, but we have enormous mineral resources, and our advantages for reaching a market with the minerals of this country are fully as great as our exceptional advantages with regard to our agricultural productions. We have a trade in minerals, an exceedingly small one. With our immense deposits of iron ore north of Lake Ontario, iron ore deposits up the valley of the Ottawa and up the valley of the Gatineau, iron ore deposits of extraordinary richness in the late disputed territory north of Lake Superior, fully as accessible as the iron ore of Michigan—with all these deposits of iron ore, we sent to the United States last year only 7,707 tons; while there was a trade in iron ore from the Lake Superior ports and the Lake Michigan ports to the Lake Erie ports alone of over 8,000,000 long tons. Now, we ought to participate in that trade, we have advantages for doing it. We could participate in that trade quite as advantageously as the mines having their outlets at Escanaba, Marquette and Two Harbours, and we are debarred from participation in that trade by the iron ore duties. We might share almost equally in that trade of 8,000,000 tons, but we have this paltry pitance of 7,707 tons which amounts to nothing at all. Last year we shipped to the United States fifty-eight tons of copper ore, where we should be shipping thousands of tons of copper ore to be smelted in the American works. We shipped last year from Nova Scotia 210,000 tons of coal to the sea-board cities. Now, Nova Scotia is the natural source of supply of coal for nearly the whole of the New England states. It can supply the cities of New York and Philadelphia upon more advantageous terms, and with greater ease, than those cities can be supplied from the coal mines of the interior of the state of Pennsylvania. Nova Scotia ought to ship, at least, 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 tons of coal annually to New England and to the sea-board cities, and would do it if the shackles were removed from trade, if the duty upon coal was removed. Here we are with a trade of 200,000 tons that ought to be at least twenty times that amount, and would be twenty times that amount if the restrictions were removed. The United States last year used $54,000,000 worth of various kinds of building stones, and we sent to that country the paltry amount of $52,000 worth. They used over a thousand times as much as we furnished them. There is no mineral production for the supply of which we have such advantages as in structural material. We have around the great lakes on the north shore, quarries of the most superior quality, quarries of marble, quarries of freestone, quarries of sandstone, quarries of granite, right along deep water on the lake shore where we could load this material on vessels. All around these lakes are great cities like Chicago, with its million of inhabitants, Milwaukee, Detroit, Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo, Erie; and the natural source of supply for stone for all these cities is the Canadian quarries. Stone can be shipped by water through the Erie canal to New York and Philadelphia. In the business of furnishing structural material, in the business of furnishing the productions of our quarries on the north side of our great lakes, we ought to have, at least, one-tenth of the $54,000,000 worth of the trade in the structural material required by the United States. We ought to supply them with $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 worth of structural material in the great lake region. Now, if our mineral resources were developed, as they would be developed under a system of free trade, if we could participate in the American iron business by furnishing ore, if we could send copper ore to their smelters, if we could participate in the coal trade, if Nova Scotia could have its fair share of the business upon an equal footing, with no favours asked, if we had access to the American market for structural material from our quarries, we would build up speedily a trade which would swell to an amount of exports not less than $20,000,000 annually, and which would distribute in money annually paid for labour in this country, from $12,000,000 to $13,000,000 a year. Instead of that we have practically nothing—7,707 tons of iron ore, $52,000 worth of stone, 58 tons of copper ore, and 210,000 tons of coal. We are, in fact, not aware, we fail to realize the enormous opportunities that we might grasp, and that we would grasp if restrictions on trade were removed.

In the discussion of this question, the Minister of Railways, the other afternoon, said, "it was acknowledged that this policy of free trade would do away with our manufactures, as was the case with several new states." The hon. gentleman is not in his seat, and I am sorry. I wanted to ask that hon. gentleman, who acknowledges this? I have not heard of it being acknowledged. I also wanted to ask him, what new states have been deprived of their manufactures by free trade with the other states? I should feel very much enlightened if I received an answer to either of these two questions. It is very unfortunate that the hon. gentleman who made the assertion is not here to substantiate it. The truth is, and it is a very significant fact, that the percentage of increase in manufactures is greatest in the newer of the states and the percentage of the increase is lowest in the old states which form the great manufacturing centre, and the tendency of progression seems to be most strongly in the direction of the newer states in the Union. I find on making a comparison between 1870 and 1880—I have not the figures of 1890, as the compendium is not yet published and the figures are not accessible—that Massachusetts shows an increase of 14 per cent during the ten years, New York 37 per cent, Connecticut 15 per cent, New Jersey 5 per cent, Pennsylvania 5 per cent, Ohio 30 per cent, Indiana 36 per cent, Michigan 59 per cent, Illinois 100 per cent, Minnesota 228 per cent, Iowa 52 per cent and California 74 per cent, and manufacturing industries in the southern states show large increases, notably in Alabama. In the face of the assertion made by the Minister that the manufactures of the newer states were crippled out of existence by the manufactures of older states, I should like to have placed these figures before him. The manufacturing interests of the new states are increasing more rapidly than those of the old states, and I have no doubt the manufacturing interests of the Dominion on the whole would be benefited by obtaining a larger market, and by having 70,000,000 of consumers instead of 5,000,000. The increase in some of the western cities has been very remarkable. For instance, between 1870 and 1880, Louisville manufactures increased by $38,000,000, Chicago by $249,000,000, Milwaukee by $43,000,000, St. Louis by $143,000,000, San Francisco by $78,000,000 and Birmingham, Ala. by $50,000,000. All these statistics prove conclusively that the assertion made by the Minister of Railways was utterly without foundation, or that it was an assertion made recklessly. The hon. gentleman had no foundation on which to base it, or the hon. gentleman purposely made a statement which would not bear investigation. So far as the ability of our manufacturers is concerned, I am not willing to admit that the Canadian is an inferior being, I am not willing to admit that a Canadian, with equal chances, will not hold his own, and be able to cope with, any other man. I think the Canadians hold their own very well in the United States, and I know that as a rule they are succeeding, that no class of the population in the United States are making more headway than our people are doing; they are energetic, they take hold of business with vim, they possess the qualities necessary to success, and they are succeeding, and these men in Canada, if they had the chance to reach a market of 65,000,000 on the other side of the line, would be equally successful in any manufacturing business that is not a pampered concern and requires pap fed by a National Policy to keep it alive, but any business that is a natural business and adapted to the country, would succeed. In some lines, I have no doubt, there would be a phenomenal increase. For instance, manufacturers of anything in the character of woodenware. We have exceptional advantages for carrying on a business of that kind. We would almost monopolize the manufacture of wood pulp and would manufacture paper extensively. We would to a large extent manufacture leather, for we have the tan bark, which is now becoming scarce in the United States. We would also very largely increase our manufactures of woollen goods and tweeds, and I firmly believe that the results of obtaining free trade with the United States and the opening up of their markets to that kind of our manufactured products, would result, not in ruin to our manufacturer, but in a great increase in the output of the manufacturing establishments of this Dominion. I have no fear whatever of any disaster as the result of free trade to manufacturing industries of this kind, and I am happy to say that, in conversation with scores of manufacturers of this country, I have found that in the vast majority of cases they express no concern about this matter, but they say if they can get access to the United States market on equal terms with American manufacturers, all they want is an arrangement to continue in operation as long as possible, that they are perfectly prepared to enter into such an arrangement at any moment, and are quite prepared to take care of themselves.

Another point made by the hon. gentleman was what he asserts to be the revenue difficulty. If we entered into this arrangement, we were told by the Minister of Finance and by other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, we would be obliged to resort to direct taxation, that we cannot make an arrangement for reciprocal trade with the United States without calling on the tax-gatherer and raising part of the additional revenue required by direct taxation. I do not believe there is any foundation for that assertion. If we were to secure partial reciprocity with the United States, that is reciprocity on a list of manufactured goods, which Mr. Foster in his letter mentions, and which indicates that he expected the United States and the Canadian Governments might make an arrangement which would not cover the whole list of goods produced by both countries, if we arrange a certain list of goods as articles to be covered by reciprocity treaty, we should lose duties only on those covered by the schedule adopted. But if we entered into an arrangement, admitting every article from the United States free of duty and sacrificed the whole of the duties derived from American importations, we would sacrifice $8,000,000 annually of revenue. The question is, can that sum be made good without resort being had to direct taxation? I assert that it can. We would have, of course, to readjust our fiscal system, we would have to resort to a certain line of taxes that are purely revenue taxes. We might put a duty on tea and coffee. Those duties are less objectionable than on the class of goods produced in the country, because you thereby escape incidental taxation. The consumer pays for what is imported, and if there is nothing of the kind produced in the country, the article is not enhanced in price. We might impose a small duty on sugar, say 1 cent per pound, and we could furnish sugar to consumers at an advance of only one-fifth of a cent per pound on the present prices, because there is now a duty of eight-tenths of a cent per pound for the purpose of enabling the refiner to meet competitors without protection. A duty of 1 cent per pound would amount to $3,300,000, and the consumer would get this advantage by the amount of the duty going into the Treasury of the country, instead of into the pockets of the refiner. Then we might impose an income tax. That tax was resorted to in England.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, a tax on the wealthy men of the country is something to which the great majority of men would not object. Perhaps the Minister of Finance might object to a tax of 5 per cent on his official salary, which would reduce it by $400; but the country would favour the taxing of all incomes of that kind; it would yield, too, a large sum, and by means of a small revenue tax on sugar of one cent per pound to the revenue, instead of eight-tenths of a cent for the benefit of the refiner, by means of imposing income tax and by means of increasing the excise duty, the $3,000,000 would be provided---

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). They could cut down the expenses.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is another thing I was about to refer, and to which my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell) has directed my attention. We could retrench in our expenditure if we had placed on us the necessity for retrenchment. Is there any reason why, with an increase of 11 per cent in the population, the expenses of this country should have increased 40 or 50 per cent? There is no reason whatever for that. Let us go back to the scale of expenditure which existed ten years ago, and we would save enough to cover the deficiency of $8,000,000 without imposing extra taxes. It is only a bugbear which these hon. gentlemen raise to frighten the people of the country when they threaten that we shall be obliged to resort to direct taxation if we bestow upon Canada the great advantages that will result from free access to the American market. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that we were obliged to resort to direct taxation to provide for this $8,000,000.

what would we have to compensate our people for that? We would have a saving of $8,000,000 on American duties, which, in place of going into the coffers of the Government, would go into the pockets of the people in the shape of their being able to buy goods cheaper. We would have a saving of the profits on these duties which constitute part of the cost, amounting to 40 cents on the dollar, and which would aggregate $3,000,000. We would have a saving to the people of the incidental taxes, that is, the increased cost of goods manufactured in this country, with which these goods on which duties are paid come into competition, which, according to Mr. Springer, amounts to $5 incidental, to $3 direct, and which would amount, in all, to at least $8,000,000 more. We would have a saving to the people of this country of the duty paid on their products going into the United States, which would represent $5,000,000 on the present volume of exports of natural products to that country. We would thus have $23,000,000 in all to compensate for the loss of $8,000,000, even though we were obliged to resort to direct taxation, but I assert that there is no necessity to resort to direct taxation. We can raise a revenue by the imposition of a revenue tax upon articles not now taxed; by the imposition of 1 cent a pound on sugar in place of the eight-tenths of a cent per pound now levied for the benefit of the refiners, and also by an income tax. In these ways we can secure the necessary revenue which would enable us to give this country the blessings of reciprocity with the States.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We could repeal the Franchise Act.

Mr. CHARLTON. We could repeal the Franchise Act and save something else besides our credit. If we had reciprocity with the States, we would have increased production and increased exports, we would have brighter prospects, we would grow in wealth and we would grow in population, not at the miserable rate of 11 per cent in ten years, but at the rate of 25 or 30 or, possibly, 40 per cent in the decade. We would grow in the volume of business transacted, we would grow rapidly in tax-paying capabilities, and even if for a time it were necessary to leave a little gap between expenditure and receipts and to shoulder a small deficit, as we have often done before, we would soon catch up with the measure of our responsibilities and be able to shoulder our burdens and march along with the utmost ease, in consequence of the increased prosperity, the acquisition of population and the increase of wealth which would be sure to result by opening up to this Dominion the market of the 65,000,000 of people to the south of us. These are the points, Mr. Speaker, that I intended to refer to before you left the Chair at six o'clock.

Now, Sir, we are assured by the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, that all this talk of ours is treasonable.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. Some one says, "Hear, hear." Is it a treasonable thing, Sir, to adopt a policy that will make Canada a nation? Is it a treasonable thing to adopt a policy that will enormously swell the imports and the exports of this great country, and utilize its great developed resources? Is it treason, Sir, to adopt a policy that will increase our population, that will increase our wealth, that will increase our power, that will increase our self-respect and make of us the great people that God designed should inherit this grand country, extending from ocean to ocean? This is treason, is it? The poor beggarly policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite reminds me of the story of a Presbyterian elder, who, in giving a charge to his minister, said: "Brother, God keep you humble, and we will keep you poor." That is what the Government design to do by us. They design to keep us humble and poor by this policy of restriction, which is intended to make us too weak and too destitute of ambition even to get up and travel in the direction of prosperity, if it were placed before us. The arguments used by the hon. gentlemen opposite are fallacious. They tell us that unrestricted reciprocity would destroy our manufactures. That is false. They tell us that we cannot get it. There is no foundation for that assertion. We can get it. They tell us it would not give our farmers better prices. Nothing is further from the truth than that assertion. The truth is that it would increase the values of the products of the farmers, and every farmer in this Dominion knows that access to the American market is all that he requires to bridge over the chasm that exists between depression and prosperity. They tell us it would not be permitted by England, but I have shown tonight the draft of a treaty in which England did permit, and sanction, and endeavour to consummate, a treaty that discriminated against her in the same manner, and almost to the same extent as would a treaty such as we are prepared to negotiate with the United States. They tell us, Sir, that it would lead to direct taxation, but I have shown already that there is no foundation for that assertion. They tell us that we are now prospering and happy, and that we can do better without such a treaty. They cannot deceive the country with such nonsense as that. Finally, they tell us that it is a disloyal policy, and that it will lead us to annexation. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that the policy we are pursuing now will lead us to annexation, and if the other policy should lead us to annexation it is not worse than the policy we are under at present. I would rather reach annexation through the door of prosperity, and expansion, and increased wealth, than to go through as a miserable beggar asking to be brought into the American fold because the evils of our policy were so great that we had reached that point when we could no longer live without knocking at the door of the American union. However, this is a question which does not properly enter into the consideration of the matter we are discussing. We cannot forecast what the future political effect of any policy will be. We cannot forecast what the future destiny of this country will be. We do not know what result the forces at work will produce. We have nothing to do with these questions; but, Sir, we have something to do with grasping at an opportunity that lies directly in our path, and the result of which we know will be to give us prosperity, to give us increased wealth, to give us increased population, and to make that population happy and prosperous. I for one, Sir, propose to advocate, at all times, and with all the force I possess, the adoption of that policy so satisfactory in the good results it will produce, so necessary for the prosperity of this country, a policy of seeking for and obtaining reciprocity with the United States of America, a policy which the gentlemen on the opposite side will never adopt, a policy that they have cruelly trifled with, and deceived the people upon, and a policy on which they will be brought to judgment before the people, and condemned for chicanery, fraudulent transactions, deception and mendacity.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, almost every hon. gentleman who has spoken on the other side appears to have got it into his head that the Finance Minister in his speech promised to make changes in the tariff; but, so far as I am aware, the Finance Minister did not promise to make any changes in the tariff. What I did understand him to promise was to look into the affairs of the country to see whether it was desirable or not that any such changes should be made, and that if he found that any changes were desirable and in the best interests of the country, the Government would make them. I think this is the policy that ought to be pursued by the Government, and I would not support any Government that would not be prepared to make any changes that they considered to be in the best interests of the country. We have heard a great deal in this debate of what was promised at the time of the adoption of the National Policy. According to the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the farmers were promised a ready market at home for all they could produce. Now, I have no recollection of any such promise as that having been made. I can understand that the promise was made that the National Policy would increase the home market, and I think it has increased it, and increased it very largely. There was another thing promised in Lennox during that campaign, and, perhaps, there were very few ridings in the Dominion where the question of protection was better and more fully discussed than in that riding, for that was the riding represented at that time by the Finance Minister in the Mackenzie Administration. What was promised there particularly was that the National Policy would not only provide a better market for the produce of the country, but would lower the rate of interest, so that people would not be called upon to pay 9 or 10 per cent for money—a promise which, I think, has been fully carried out, because it is now as easy to borrow money at 5, 6 or 7 per cent as it was during the days of the Mackenzie Administration to borrow it at 8, 9 or 10 per cent. In fact, I have a vivid recollection as a business man how difficult it was to borrow money at all at that time; for the banks were quite as hard-up as ordinary business people, and if you took paper to a bank, no matter how good it might be, the banker would tell you that he could not discount it, not because it was not good, but simply because he had not the money. The hon. member for North Norfolk laid a great deal of stress upon the "Globe's" commissioners who were sent throughout the country to inquire into the condition of the country. Well, I remember seeing a comment upon that matter in a paper published in Hamilton, called the "Templar," which the hon. gentleman probably takes, as he is a temperance man. The writer stated that he never read the letters of the "Globe's" commissioners, because he knew that they would get what they were sent out to get, and I think that is very probable. Now, Mr. Speaker, the great difference between the Opposition and the Government is this: the Opposition say, as the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) said the other night, that it makes very little difference on what we pay duties so long as we have to pay them. Now, I take direct issue with him on that statement. I think it makes a very material difference on what we pay duties. It makes a very great difference to the farmers, mechanics and working people generally, and the Finance Minister told us that had the Cartwright tariff prevailed last year on tea, sugar, coffee and rice, we would have paid nearly $6,000,000 more than we did pay. Now, these are articles which are used by every family in this Dominion, and quite as much by the poor man as by the rich. Consequently, if the old duties had been imposed on these articles they would have weighed very heavily on the poor man. I think the Government acted wisely and well in removing the duties from these necessities of life. That is the policy of the Government, and that ought to be the policy of every Government—to take the duties off the prime necessities of life as much as possible, and to leave the duties on the luxuries of life. Then the rich will pay in proportion to their ability, while the poor man will be favoured to some extent. But, Sir, there is another aspect of this, on which reference has been made in this debate, and to which I wish to refer. I wish to call the attention of the House to a statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his answer to the Budget speech of the Minister of Finance. He said:

Had the Government been administered, as the late Mr. Mackenzie would have administered it, we would not require to-day to raise $30,000,000. I doubt if we would have required to raise $20,000,000.

Now, Sir, I have looked over the Public Accounts as far as I have been able, and I have been thinking about this question for some time, and for the life of me I cannot tell on what the hon. gentleman has based his calculation. He has certainly not based it on anything that happened during the time of the administration of the Mackenzie Government, because in no year during the five that they were in power did they reduce the expenditure to $20,000,000. In fact, in no year did they reduce the expenditure to as low a point as they found it when they took office. What is the fact. The last year of the Macdonald Administration was 1873-74, and in that year the total expenditure was $23,316,316. The next year, 1874-75, which was the first full year of the Mackenzie Administration, the expenditure was $23,713,000; the next year it was increased to over $24,000,000; the next year it was over $23,509,000; and in the last year of the Administration, 1878-79, it was $24,455,000. Now, Sir, I could understand an expenditure like this if times were prosperous and if the country were progressing; but how could we justify an expenditure like that at a time when a general depression was felt all over the country, not only by business men, but by the banks, and by every other class of the community? Then, Sir, we find that these gentlemen added 2½ per cent to the taxation of the people; and notwithstanding this increased burden upon the people, they were not able to meet the expenditure, but they had a deficit during the five years they were in power of over $6,000,000. Added to that, notwithstanding the hard times and the depression among the people, they had added to the net debt of this country $40,000,000. And then they talk about economical government; and the ex-Finance Minister of that Government had the cheek—I was going to say, but I do not wish to use an unparliamentary word—

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, that's all right.

Mr. WILSON,—he had the cheek to stand up in the House and tell us that if the Mackenzie Government had been in power they would have been able to carry on the Government for $20,000,000. Now, Sir, I want to see where these deficits came from, and what was the cause of them. In my opinion it is very important that we should know that, so as to judge whether these hon. gentlemen administered the affairs of the country economically or not. Well, Sir, in 1874, when they took office, our imports were over $128,-

000,000, and in 1877 they had fallen to only $99,327,000, a decrease of $28,885,000. Now, Sir, the revenue yielded, under a 15 per cent tariff, in 1874, when the hon. gentlemen took office, was $14,421,882. But under the 17½ per cent tariff, which they imposed on the people, the revenue in 1877 only yielded $12,548,000, a decrease of $1,873,000. Well, I think it would be fair to suppose that, under an economical government, the cost of collecting this revenue should not be more than it was under the corrupt administration, as hon. gentlemen opposite are pleased to call it, of their predecessors. But what we find is this, that, although the revenue had fallen off, the cost of collecting it had increased over $63,000, under the economical government of hon. gentlemen opposite, and then they would like to make us believe that they had been more economical than their predecessors and far more economical than their successors. I wish to show just how much it cost per cent as between these two Administrations. In 1873-74, it cost 4·55 per cent to collect the revenue on Customs. Under the Administration of the Reform party, for the year 1876-77, it cost 5·75 per cent, or an increase of 1·20, and it cost, in 1891, under the present Administration, 3·83 per cent to collect the revenue, or a saving to the country of 1·92 per cent. Now, I hold that so far as the Customs Department is concerned, the hon. gentleman did not show, and I think he cannot show, any saving that would justify the remark he made with reference to the amount of revenue required to run the affairs of this country. In the Excise the result is about the same. The falling off between 1874 and 1876 was $653,000, and there was a slight increase in the cost of collecting the revenue of $4,222. But when we come to the Post Office Department, that large department which never was expected, in our time, to have a revenue as large as the expenditure, when these hon. gentlemen took office in 1873, we had 4,518 post offices in the Dominion, the revenue from which was $1,406,000, and the expenditure $1,553,000, leaving an expenditure over receipts of $146,619, or an expenditure over receipts to each office in the Dominion, of about $32·50. When we come down to 1878, the last year of the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, we find that the number of post offices had increased to 5,378, and that the revenue had increased to $1,620,000. But the expenditure had also increased until it reached $2,110,000, so that it exceeded the revenue by $490,393, or it cost, per office, during the last year of the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, $93 more than the receipts, or nearly three times as much as it had cost under the previous Administration. That hon. gentleman may not think I am unfair, I am willing to come right down to the year 1892, and compare it with the Administration which is reported to us as being economical, straightforward, honest and pure. In 1892 the number of post offices had increased to 8,288, the receipts were $3,542,000 and the expenditure $4,205,000, or an expenditure over receipts of $663,374; the cost, per office, over the receipts was $80, or $13 per office less than it was under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, the next item I come to is one that hon. gentlemen may feel disposed to look on with some doubt, as they have been continually talking about immigrants coming to this country, and not staying here. But they themselves have a curious experience with reference to this matter. During the last four years of their Administration, from 1875 to 1878, both years included, they brought to this country, according to the reports and Blue-books, 109,904 immigrants, and these cost the people of this country, per head, $8·74. That is what they cost under that economical, pure, upright, shall I say holy Administration. For the last four years, under the present Administration, from 1888 to 1891, both included, there were brought into this country 337,598 persons, at a cost per head of $1·95, or a decrease of $6·79 per head; so that every immigrant brought in under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite, cost this country a little more than what it cost us to bring four in under the present Administration. Is it any wonder that this Administration should have a strong backing on this side, and is it any wonder that when we went to the country in the bye-elections, the people, when they heard these facts, returned almost without a break, Conservatives to represent them? Now I come to a matter of considerable importance to this country, perhaps. I find that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) made a great wail because our exports to the United States had fallen off so much since 1868. Well, I think I can give the hon. gentleman the reason. In these old times we did not have the facilities to export our farming products, and we allowed the Americans to act as middlemen, and they pocketed the profits. Was it to be expected that the American people, who had for export in 1891 $321,671,000 worth of farm products, would require what we have? They had for export, after supplying their own people, more than eight times what we exported altogether, and this is the reason why, I believe, they did not want our products, as they had in the past. In 1890 we exported of farm products $35,442,000 worth. Now, the hon. gentleman simply took a few of the articles which we export more largely to the United States than we do to anywhere else, and I do not think there is any person on this side of the House who is prepared to dispute the fact that there are some things we might send to the United States better than anywhere else, but it does not follow that the Americans are our best customers. I want to give a list of the articles of farm products which we exported in 1890-91: Horses, cattle, sheep, swine and other animals, mutton, pork, bacon, ham, beef, all other meats, hides, wool, lard, butter, cheese, poultry, eggs, wheat, barley, oats, pease, beans, rye, corn, cornmeal, oatmeal, flour, bran, potatoes, flax, flaxseed, hemp, trees, tobacco, fruits, apples, dried apples, ripe and green currants, grapes, plums, and berries of all kinds. Now, I think it will be conceded that that list represents pretty fully the things we raise upon the farm and that we have for export. And, Sir, we exported in 1890 of these articles almost thirty-five and one-half millions worth, and out of that we sent a little over twenty-one millions worth to the mother country, and to the United States we sent a little over $13,000,000 worth. But, Sir, when you come to consider how much we took back from each of these countries, you will see, I think, that the trade between the United States and this country was more a trade for the accommodation of the people than for any great profit there was in it for the people of this country, because, while we shipped to the mother country over $21,000,000 worth of these articles, we only took back about $1,500,000 worth of the same kind of articles; and, while we shipped $13,000,000 worth to the United States we took back more than $10,500,000 worth; showing that except about $2,500,000 worth, we took back from the United States as much as we sent. The same thing applies to the years 1891 and 1892, and I think from this showing it can be readily seen that our natural market is with the people who consume the articles which we have for sale, and that the people of the United States, who raise a great deal more of these articles than they can consume, must find other markets for themselves. I do not consider the United States our natural market. Secondly, I think the Government of the day have done wisely and well in seeking other markets and opening up other markets for our products. While we have been comparatively shut out by the McKinley Bill—there is no getting away from that—still we cannot help that, and if hon. gentlemen were in power, I do not think they could make any very serious change with reference to that matter. I trust the Government of the day will, during the coming year, look fully into this matter. I do not think they should lay down any hard and fast rule; I think they should conduct the Government of this country in the best interests of the people, and if the changes are necessary, they ought to be made, and if they are not necessary, they ought not to be made.

Mr. CALVIN. In view of the flood of eloquence to which we have listened for some days, and looking forward to that which is to follow, it would be presumption on my part to suppose that I have anything to say that would add to the general intelligence on the subject in hand. But, if you will bear with me for a moment, what I have to say will not be in the way of argument, but in the form of a statement of opinion or belief.

My voice is for a revision of the tariff, believing that it is necessary, with a view to the lightening of burdens which press upon our people at this time. In his deliverance at Toronto, the hon. First Minister promised that he would deal with the mouldering branches, but we find that in all his extended vision he has been able to see so far only two—binder twine and coal oil. I say he seems, or the Ministry seems, to see only two, but they have dealt effectually to me with only one. I think we may fairly say that the users of binder twine have had given to them the relief they desired, and that that mouldering branch no longer blocks their way. But with regard to the other, to continue the hon. gentleman's metaphor, I think the result of the action of the Government has been simply to break off enough of the decayed limb to show us how rotten that limb is. However, we have the promise of the hon. gentleman that during the recess they will make full and complete inquiry of the people of this country, of all classes and in all localities, as to the desirability of granting the relief, and, thus fortified with concentrated combined intelligence of the whole people, they will after a few months again meet this House and give the relief that is desired. May I say that I earnestly hope—and I say this in all sincerity—that the scheme which shall be born of this effort will command our admiration and our votes. But I desire for myself to say that I regret that the Ministry have thought that this delay is necessary, and, as my voice is for revision, I feel that I shall be obliged at this time, sorry though I am, to differ from my friends, to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say a few words upon this all important question which has been discussed for several days. I am sure that we hailed with considerable delight the evidently conscientious utterance of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He has come to the conclusion that, in order to meet the demands and wishes of his constituency, it would be necessary that he should support the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think it augurs a better day for the people of this country, and especially for the agriculturists of this country, when we see the evidences given by such hon. gentlemen as the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that revision of the tariff is in the air. And, Sir, knowing that we have a Government in this country that very much resembles a wooden weather-cock on the top of a barn, always ready to turn the way the wind blows, we may hope that the revision will take place. No doubt they will try to find out, in the perambulating course through the country which the Finance Minister and his assistants is to undertake, what the real feeling of the people of this country is with regard to revision. They can ascertain the opinion of the people if they are not very much deceived by the manufacturers, because if they want to get a true expression of opinion they have got to keep out of the clutches and away from the influence of the manufacturers of this country. Now, the hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson) made some reference to the promises that had been made with regard to the National Policy before 1878. The hon. gentleman denied that any promises were made with regard to increasing the home market for the farmers of this country or with regard to the effects to follow the establishment of factories. He surely has not read Mr. Colby's speech. I would recommend him, before he again stands before this House to speak upon this question to read the speeches of his friends, particularly the speech delivered by Mr. Colby on the 12th February, 1878. After he has read that speech, I am sure he will not dare, nor will any gentleman who has read it dare, to say that promises were not made to the people of this country that the inception of the National Policy would be sure to give to the farmers of this country increased markets for a large proportion of the commodities they have for sale. Now that promise has never been fulfilled. He also said that the Mackenzie Government increased the annual expenditure while they were in office, and also that they had increased the debt. Well, it is a matter of surprise to me that any man in this House can venture to charge the Mackenzie Government with being responsible for the increased debt. If any gentleman will look back over the record he will find that the predecessors of the Mackenzie Government, by their policy, and the contracts they had entered into before the Mackenzie Government came into power, had committed that Government to the expenditure of almost every dollar of the increased debt incurred during their term of office. The honour of the country demanded that the contracts they had previously made should be carried out. Sir, it is a policy of the very worst and most brazen kind for hon. gentlemen opposite to repeat, night after night, the statement that the Mackenzie Government increased the debt and increased the annual expenditure. However, my hon. friend appears to have got well back into the past history of the country in his address, but I would advise him, when he undertakes to speak again, to get fed on catchup before he undertakes to address the House on questions of that kind. There is another point mentioned by the hon. member for South Ontario, to which I wish to reply. He says that he sat in this House representing a constituency that had previously elected a Reformer, and some time previous to that had elected a Conservative. He gave us to understand that the people of that county had changed their opinions since 1878, and therefore had sent him to this House. He forgot to mention that the constituency he represents was gerrymandered in 1882. One of the strongest Reform townships in that constituency was taken out of it and put into another constituency, in order, if possible, to change its complexion, and ensure the return to this House of a man holding the political views that he does himself. Then he went on to brag of the improvements in his town, the increased population, the increased number of its factories and their output. Now, what do we find? We find that Oshawa, in 1888, had factories employing 937 hands, and in 1891 they employed 921 hands, or 16 less ten years afterwards than were employed in 1881. In 1881 the value of the factories was estimated at $1,207,300; in 1891 the value was $1,154,583, or $42,715 less in 1891. In his town of Oshawa, by the census of 1891, there was a population of 3,992; by the census of 1891 there was a population of 4,065, or an increase in ten years of 66. The riding of South Ontario, according to the census of 1881, had a population of 20,244; in 1891 it was only 18,371, or 1,873 less than in 1881. Now, it is amusing that, in face of this official record, that hon. gentlemen should refer so boastfully to the great progress and prosperity that attended the introduction of the National Policy in South Ontario, and particularly in the town of Oshawa. Then he referred to the matter of binding twine. I am glad that the Government have decided to take off a portion of the duty on binding twine; I should very much like, indeed, if they had taken it all off, and allowed the farmers of this country to get binding twine duty free. I think they are entitled to that, judging from the hardships and privations to which they have been subjected. I think it would have been a fitting recognition of the sympathy of this House, and the sympathy of the Government, if they have any at all, toward the farmers of this country, that at least they should allow them to have binding twine free. I wish now to refer to a few points in connection with the National Policy, because it is the basis of all this discussion, it is the point upon which the whole question of our trade relations turn. I shall endeavour to prove, in the first place, that the National Policy increased our debt; in the second place, that it increased our taxes; and in the third place, that it has produced financial profligacy in this country. Now, in 1878 our debt was $140,000,000; it is now $240,000,000. Our ordinary expenditure in 1878 was $23,500,000, and at that time Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper declared, from this side of the House, that it was altogether too much to ask a population that then amounted to nearly 4,000,000, to contribute annually for the expenses of government, $23,500,000. They condemned loudly the Mackenzie Government for that outlay. But we find that our annual expenditure has now risen to the sum of $37,500,000. In the two decades ending 1891, the population increased 29 per cent, the international trade, 28 per cent, and the federal taxes, 84 per cent. Now, it has been said boastfully by the Finance Minister, as well as by others, that we have very remunerative investments for a great deal of the money that has been spent. Well, if we look at the way in which the Intercolonial Railway has been handled, an institution in which this country has sunk fifty millions of money, we find that that road has saddled us with an annual loss of about half a million a year. However, we are glad to be able to recognize an improvement in the expenditure on this railway, and the Minister of Railways has announced that he hopes to be able in a short time to make the receipts meet the expenditure. But that only shows that profligacy of the worst character has characterized its management for many years. Had it been prudently and properly managed, had men only been engaged upon it that were necessary for its efficient operation, the road would have, at least, paid running expenses all the time. In place of that, and owing to the profligacy that has characterized the management of that line, we have the pitiable exhibition of an annual deficit varying from $500,000 to $750,000 a year. Next comes the Welland Canal, which has cost this country about twenty-four millions of money. It costs nearly one million a year to keep it open. Last year 90 per cent of its tonnage was from the United States, and 10 per cent was from Canada, or the United States freight that passed through the Welland Canal last year was 877,231 tons against 97,782 tons from Canada. The total value of shipments last year was a little over two millions, while the total cost of keeping the canal open, and the expenditure connected with it, with the interest on the investment, amounted to $1,000,000. Now, the National Policy has increased the customs tax from $3.12 per head in 1878-79, to $4.60 a head in 1889-90. The per capita increase is 48 per cent; and yet our friends opposite will rise and iterate and reiterate the statement that the National Policy has not increased the taxes to the people of the country. I do not understand how they can explain away the figures and facts contained in the blue books, when these figures clearly show that the taxes of the people are very materially increased. The per capita tax in 1878 was $3.12, while in 1890 it was $4.60. But this does not show by any means the increased cost to the people of the goods manufactured. We know perfectly well that the moment you raise the duty on any commodity, if it is manufactured within the country, the price goes up. Take, for example, cotton goods. When the duty was increased from 17 per cent to 27½ per cent, the cost of those goods increased proportionally to the increased duty. Hon. gentlemen may say that cottons have fallen in price. It was a grand thing for hon. gentlemen opposite and for the National Policy that the general price of goods in England declined, and consequently there was a proportionate fall here, except the duty. If it had not been so, it would have been a serious matter for hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WALLACE. There was a fall in the price of raw materials.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the Controller of Customs desires, he may challenge my statements when I have finished; but I defy him to successfully controvert the statements and facts I am now presenting to the House. I have handled goods and sold goods over the counter, as he has done. I know they became cheaper in price. I also am aware that the moment the duty went up here, the price rose proportionately. When the Magog mills first started the duty on prints was increased to 22 per cent, then to 25, and ultimately to 27½ per cent in order to enable that company to compete with imported goods. Notwithstanding the fact that our people were imposed on by being compelled to pay that increased duty, the mills were not successful, and for some time they were closed. These facts prove clearly that the National Policy has increased the price of commodities to the people. Take pig iron. In 1883-84, 29,393 tons of pig iron were manufactured in this country under a bounty of $1.50 per ton; in 1890-91 only 15,147 tons were manufactured under a bounty of $2 per ton; in 1891-92, under an increased duty, the output was 14,246 tons less than in 1883-84. We paid during the last nine years $328,293 in bounty, and the product last year was considerably short of what it was in previous years. In 1891-92 we produced only 15,147 tons, although a bounty was paid of $30,294, as against 29,323 tons 1883-84. Last year we imported 69,000 tons of pig iron, which paid a duty of $275,797. There is no commodity either brought in or manufactured in this country that so seriously affects the farming community as pig iron, in consequence of the duty imposed on it. When Sir Charles Tupper introduced the proposed change in the tariff, in order to secure protection for pig iron in Canada, he painted in glowing colours the results that would follow the adoption of that duty. He told the people that there would be blast furnaces scattered through the country from end to end. He pointed out in glowing terms the advantages of that particular industry being established here, as well as other industries. An injustice now exists at Londonderry Iron Works, Nova Scotia. Those works have obtained new machinery, and are now manufacturing iron pipe from iron produced at their own mines. The company are paid $2 per ton for producing the pig iron, and these works are competing with manufacturers of iron pipe in the country using iron imported under a duty of $4 per ton. That gives the Londonderry company a decided advantage, and it is another proof of the readiness of manufacturers under the operation of the National Policy to take advantage of every change and every opportunity afforded them to place fresh imposts on the people." During the nine years we have paid duty and bounty to the amount of $2,810,556, sufficient to pay about 700 men wages at the rate of $1.50 per day for every working day during those nine years, and leave a good surplus. The statement made from this side of the House with respect to the position of the farmers on the barley question have been challenged in this House, as well as on the stump. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that the farmers are not in a worse condition under the McKinley Bill than formerly, and that if the Bill were repealed there would be little change. That is a fallacy. We know well that that was not the argument which hon. gentlemen opposite used before the introduction of the National Policy. We know that Sir John Macdonald pointed out very clearly that the very opposite would result. He declared that if a farmer in Canada had a farm yielding barley, and there was a contiguous farm in the United States yielding barley, the fact of the duty being paid on Canadian barley going to the United States showed that the Canadian barley on the Canadian farm was not worth within 10 cents per bushel of the American barley. That is a proper argument. Under the operation of the McKinley Bill, however, the farmers are suffering, and they have begun to realize it for themselves. The lack of market clearly shows that our farmers are suffering from the effects of that Bill, and if we could by a change of policy or by the courteous treatment of Americans secure a reciprocity such as was indicated by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) it would be a national blessing to our people. The average price of barley in Canada is 45 cents, while it is 75 cents in the United States. If there was free trade between the two countries the Canadian farmer could obtain six gallons of coal oil for one bushel of barley. Under the present arrangement he obtains only 2½ gallons. Again, take coal oil. The duty on coal oil has not been altered, but the restrictions respecting importation have been removed. The Minister of Finance, I understand, intends to permit it to be imported in tank cars, and the restriction imposed by coal-oil dealers some years ago, has been removed, but even now coal oil that was sold at 12½ cents in the United States, was worth 28 cents in Canada. There is one point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House. The Minister of Finance stated that the importations into Canada this year included 350,000,000 pounds of sugar, and if he had imposed the duty on that sugar that formerly went into the Treasury, no less than $5,418,918 would have been realized. But he did not tell the House that by the alteration two years ago he placed the duty derived from sugar in the pockets of the refiners, and not of the people, by making an imposition of eight-tenths of a cent per pound on sugar manufactured in this country, and the refiners pocketed last year no less than $2,763,349. Taking that from the amount of the duty the hon. gentleman says he would have received, had the duty remained, only $2,655,571. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the gross amount of duty taken from the users of sugar in this country was about $3,000,000. The manufacturers now take $2,763,000 from the consumers, but the country gets nothing of that, so that in reality the Canadian consumers of sugar only escape a duty of $300,000, and not $5,000,000, as the Finance Minister stated. In the United States, sugar—"16 Dutch standard," the quality largely used by the poorer classes—is admitted free of duty. In Canada we only admit sugar up to "14. Dutch Standard," and on all manufactured sugar over that quality we collect $16 a ton, while in the United States they only collect $10 a ton. That shows that the people are paying a considerable tax on sugar, a tax which goes into the manufacturers' pockets and not one single farthing of it into the Dominion Treasury. I contend, Sir, that the condition of the farmers of this country is not at all so prosperous as it was in 1878. Hon. gentlemen opposite boast of the improved condition of our agriculturists under the operations of the National Policy, but I think I can give figures to show that that boast is a false one. In 1878 the farmers were doing well. The average price of wheat in England from 1875 to 1878 was 48s. per quarter, while from 1885 to 1890 the price averaged in England 32s. per quarter, or a decrease of 35 per cent. At that time the farmer raised his products under a revenue tariff of 17½ per cent, but he now has to pay a tariff of over 25 per cent. At the inception of the National Policy the Tories told the farmer that he would have a better home market, that Britain was too remote, that competition in the Liverpool market was too keen, and that under the National Policy factories would spring up everywhere in Canada and he would secure a home market. These statements are in keeping with the fallacies and the humbug and the folly that has been preached from every platform in this country by every hon. gentleman opposite, who, unfortunately, have succeeded so far in misleading and fooling and deceiving the farming community of this Dominion. Have the farmers of this Dominion secured a home market under the National Policy? Let us see. In 1873 we exported farm products to the value of $32,000,000; in 1890 we exported $42,000,000 worth, and in 1892 we exported $60,881,183 worth. That clearly shows that, instead of the export of farm produce decreasing, owing to the introduction of the National Policy, it has increased year after year. Then again, with reference to the population of the country. The population of twenty-one counties in the province of Ontario shows a decrease since 1881. However, my hon. friend from East Grey

(Mr. Sproule) rather undertook to show that the population of a country was no evidence of its wealth or prosperity. It is a very peculiar argument, and it is an argument that would be used only by himself. Under his ideas we should immediately inaugurate a system of sending out of the country all the poorer classes, because, if the prosperity of the country is to be measured by the average individual wealth of each inhabitant, then the less of the poor we have amongst us the better, and, if we adopt that course, according to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), we will show a much better state of things in Canada than at present. Hon. gentlemen opposite have abandoned the idea of bringing the producer and the consumer close together, they saw it would have a good effect on both. They now say that a free British market is the market for Canada. You would fancy, to listen to the glowing terms in which hon. gentlemen opposite speak of the British market, that it was open to none but Canadians. They know, as we all know, that when the Canadian farmer goes to the English market, he has to compete on the same terms with the Americans and with the inhabitants of India, and with the inhabitants of the world, and the sensible Englishman will not give the Canadian one penny more for anything he has to sell than he will give for the same produce of the Hindoo and the heathen. When the Canadian farmer complains of the want of the American market, he is told by hon. gentlemen opposite that he is a traitor and that he is disloyal, and the Minister of Finance, in his speech, has endeavoured to fill the mouths of his Laarkes and his Clarkes and his Sproules, and his Montagues, with arguments to tell the farmers of this country, that when they speak about extended markets in the United States they are disloyal to the old flag. However, Sir, it is amusing to see how quickly hon. gentlemen opposite take advantage of the American flag in order to better their own condition, as they have done in many cases. The Minister of Finance drew the attention of the House to four articles on which he said a less duty was now imposed than during the time of the Mackenzie Government. He referred to coffee, tea, rice and sugar, and he said that he would have secured a revenue of $6,905,000 on these articles if the duty was the same as it was under the Mackenzie Administration. The Finance Minister forgot to mention, however, other articles upon which he is now imposing a heavy duty, and on which in the time of the Mackenzie Government, the tax was much lighter. Take, for instance, crockery and chinaware. In 1876 we imported of these $430,888 worth, and the Mackenzie Government collected a duty of 17½ per cent or $75,409.72. Under the National Policy, last year, we imported $748,810 worth, and the Government collected on that a duty of $250,022.46. Take, again, cotton goods. Under the Mackenzie Government, in the year 1876, we imported cotton goods to the value of $3,554,064, on which, at a duty of 17½ per cent, the Government collected $621,974.53. Last year, under the National Policy, we imported cotton goods to the value of $3,992,440, upon which the Government collected a duty of $1,114,424.33. But, Sir, it would take me too long to go over the different items and show the increases. The best way in which we can measure the operations of the National Policy, and the tariff under which we live, is to compare it with the tariff during the Mackenzie Administration. The total value of imports into this country in 1876 amounted to $119,615,736, upon which a duty was collected of $15,354,099. In 1892, the total value of goods imported was $116,978,943—hon. gentlemen will notice that it was nearly $3,000,000 less than in 1846—and on that total importation the people of this country had to pay a duty of $20,550,581. The people bought $3,000,000 less goods, but they paid $5,196,472 more duty than they paid in 1876. But, Sir, I made a careful and concise statement of the amount of duty collected in the last fifteen years. Taking it year after year and making that calculation in proportion to the number of inhabitants, we find the following results:—In the five years that the Mackenzie Government were in power, the taxes collected were as follows:—

1876-77.....	17,697,914
1877-78.....	17,841,938
1878-79.....	18,476,813
1879-80.....	18,479,576
Total.....	$91,110,666

Or, taking the population at 4,000,000, an average taxation, for the whole period, of $22.80 per capita. Now, during the next half decade, the taxes collected were as follows:—

1880-81.....	$23,942,138
1881-82.....	27,549,046
1882-83.....	29,269,698
1883-84.....	25,483,199
1884-85.....	25,381,529
Total.....	$131,625,610

Or an average tax, estimating the population at 4,500,000, of $29.24 per capita. Deducting $22.80 per capita, which was the taxation during the previous five years, we have an average per capita excess during the five years, 1880-85, over the five years, 1875-80, of $6.44 per capita. In the next half decade the taxes collected were as follows:—

1885-86.....	$25,226,456
1886-87.....	28,687,000
1887-88.....	28,177,413
1888-89.....	30,613,522
1889-90.....	31,587,071
Total.....	$144,291,463

Or a per capita taxation during the five years, on a population of 4,829,411, as given by the census of 1891, of $30, an excess of $7.20 per capita over the five years, 1875-80. The statements I have given show that $28,980,000 more taxes were taken out of the people's pockets during the five years, 1880-85, than during the five years, 1875-80, and that $34,560,000 more taxes were taken out of their pockets in the last five years than in the five years, 1875-80; or a gross sum in the last ten years of $63,540,000 more than was taken during the previous five years. But, Sir, estimating that the people of this country use $5 worth of home-manufactured goods for every $5 worth imported, and estimating that the duty is collected in the shape of increased prices on these goods, the gross taxation to which the people of this country have been subjected during the past ten years amounted to $169,440,000. In the face of this statement it is not much wonder that those who are not producers in this country, but who are consumers, for instance, the farming community, are growing poorer instead of richer. No country in the world approaches us in the way of borrowing and spending money. On the enlargement of the canals we have spent $56,000,000. No country in the world can approach this. Since 1881 the net debt has risen from $155,000,000 to $240,000,000, an increase of $85,000,000. Our neighbours in the United States have developed their country as rapidly as we have developed ours, and altogether by private enterprise without adding a dollar to the national or state debts. Mr. Porter, the superintendent of the United States census, says that from 1880 to 1890 they have paid the federal, state, county, city and town debts over $1,800,000,000. The per capita amount of each of these debts, according to the last census, was as follows: Federal debt, $14.24; state and territorial debts, $3.66; county debts, $2.27; debts, municipalities, $11.48; debts of school districts, 60 cents; in all, $32.25 per capita. With us the federal and provincial debts alone, without taking into account the county or city or municipality indebtedness, amounts to $54 per capita. The net federal and state debt of the United States to each family of five is $90, while in Canada it is $270, or $3 for every $1. Besides heaping up liabilities we have enormously increased taxes, as I have already proved by the figures which I have submitted to the House. Now, it is highly to be desired that we should increase the population of this country, both in the older portions and in the North-west. Unless we can do this, by bringing in immigrants and keeping them here and inducing them to settle on our wild lands, we can never hope properly to develop the country. Now, the Finance Minister made some reference to the increased shipments of produce to England, speaking in that connection of the shipments of horses and butter. If there is any industry in this country which may be greatly extended and developed, it is the making of butter. If we could secure the adoption of the dairying business by the farmers of Ontario in particular, we could make very rapid advance in the general financial well-being of that class, and I am glad to know that efforts have been made in the direction of educating those people to the dairying process, both by the Provincial and Dominion Governments. If the Minister of Finance, however, were disposed to assist the people in the matter of developing the dairy business, I would recommend them to offer a bonus, as is done in Victoria, Australia. There they have developed the butter business with England by offering a bounty of one penny for every pound of Australian butter sold in the British market at over nine pence per pound, and they give an export bounty of three pence per pound for every pound sold in the British market at over a shilling per pound. If my hon. friend would introduce a measure of that kind, if he would offer to the butter producers of this country a bounty on their export of creamery butter, he would undoubtedly largely help to develop the production and shipment of butter, and lead to a very great improvement in dairying. And there is more room in England for the sale of butter than anything else. With regard to eggs, the Minister of Finance made some reference to the fact that eggs brought more by 1½ cents in the English than in the American market. But he must know perfectly well that it costs from 3½ to 4 cents per dozen more to pack eggs for shipment to the English market than to the American market. It will not do to put them up in the same manner. They have to be very expensively packed in boxes of a certain size and description, so that when they reach the other side these packages may be cut in two and made into half boxes. The cost, therefore, of the preparation of eggs for the English market, and the extra cost of shipment, is 3 to 4 cents per dozen more than it costs to prepare them for shipment and pay cost of carriage to the American market; and, consequently, you require to get a considerably increased price in the English market as compared with the American. Again, take horses. The Minister of Finance drew the attention of the House to the fact that in 1891 we had increased our export of horses to the English market. I find, however, that that export was very limited. He said that our export had increased 37 per cent, but carefully refrained from giving the total number shipped. He was willing to snatch at anything in order to try and create the impression that the English market was the market for horses. Now what do we find? In 1891 we exported 1,223 horses to England, and in 1892, 1,369, or 147 more in 1892 than in 1891. The Minister of Finance was careful not to give the figures, but told us boastfully that we had increased our shipment of horses to England by 37 per cent. On the other hand, Sir, despite the McKinley Bill, which imposes a tax of $30 per head on the horses we export to the United States, we sent to that country in 1892, 9,261 horses. However, the Minister of Finance wanted to give his friends something to say on the stump with regard to the increased export of horses to England. He told us that he was going to revise the tariff during next session of Parliament. In my opinion there never was a more injudicious statement made to the people of any country. By this statement the Minister of Finance will disturb the whole basis of trade this year. People who handle shelf and heavy hardware and iron will endeavour to dispose of all that they have and considerably decrease their imports until they know what the Government policy will be. The same effect will be observed in many lines of manufactured goods. If the Minister had made up his mind to limit by an announcement the importation of goods during this year, he could not more effectually accomplish that object than by expressing his intention to revise the tariff next session. Whatever the intentions of the Government may be with regard to the tariff, it was their duty to have kept those intentions to themselves. There has been a good deal said with regard to population. I contend that the best way in which to measure the prosperity of the country is to note the increase or decrease of its population, and the best way in which we can measure our progress is by comparing the province of Ontario with those states in the Union with which we can most equitably make a comparison. Take, for instance, the state of Michigan, which, in point of soil, and climate and otherwise, is very like Ontario. That state contained in 1880, 1,636,539 people, and in 1890, 2,093,000, showing an increase in ten years of nearly 28 per cent. Compare that with Ontario, which is considerably larger than the state of Michigan. In 1880, the population of the province of Ontario was 1,900,000, and in 1890 it was 2,100,000, showing the increase in the ten years of 10½ per cent. Thus, while the state of Michigan had increased 28 per cent, Ontario had only increased 10½. Take Dakota. In 1880 the population of Dakota was 135,000 and in 1890 it was 510,000, showing an increase of 36 per cent. Take Washington territory, the population of which in 1880 was 75,000, and in 1890 345,000, showing an increase of 365 per cent. These figures show very clearly that in these states, the climate and soil of which are very much the same as the climate and soil of Ontario, the increase in population has been considerably in excess of that of our province. That clearly shows there must be something wrong in a fiscal policy which keeps back the population of the magnificent province of Ontario, whose climate and soil are not surpassed by any other state or province on this continent. My impression, from the announcement made by the Finance Minister to the House, is that the Government intend to adjust their policy to meet the changed conditions that inevitably will be made in the United States. The Government of that country will have to carry out the mandate given by the people with regard to tariff reform. The American people have suffered under the heel of restriction and protection for twenty-five years. Hon. gentlemen opposite have pointed to the United States a country in which the farmers are no better off than in Canada. That I quite admit, and have already stated the reason why. It is because the farmers of the United States have suffered from the existence of combines; i. e. is because they have been subjected to the extortions that are the result of a protective tariff. The Republican party, which is responsible for the inception of that tariff, tried its best to keep the farming community in line by introducing the McKinley Bill, and by virtually telling them that by this Bill the party would make them all rich and enable them to compel the city consumers who extorted from them for years their hard earnings, giving little or no return, to disgorge. But the farmers have got their eyes widely opened to the extortions to which they have been subjected by the Republican party of the United States, and they took the bit in their teeth and went with determination straight for tariff reform, or as near free trade as the interests of their country would permit; and the Government of that country will have to follow in line and give these people the relief they require. No, Sir; the Finance Minister knows that we can never keep up the regiment of protective officers along the border of this Dominion to keep the people from smuggling goods from the United States when the prices there go down. If the tariff is reduced in the United States, as it will undoubtedly be, and prices are made considerably lower than they are in Canada, I would like to see the Finance Minister with his Minister of Customs—rather his Controller of Customs—and his Controller of Inland Revenue stop the smuggling that would inevitably result from very considerable reductions of the tariff of the United States. The hon. gentleman knows well that he cannot do it. The very moment the United States took the duty off tea, that moment the Government here fell into line and took off that duty on our side. When the United States took the duty off sugar, gentlemen opposite also removed the duty; and, Sir, even the promised reduction indicated in the speech of the Finance Minister is not promised as a matter of choice on their part, but is given by reason of the reduction of duty in the United States, which compels the change. The Government of Canada will not go into the revision of the tariff this year, but they have signified their intention of doing something in that line next year, because they know that if the United States reduce duties they will be driven to the necessity of making the reductions also. Now, Sir, we have to face the restricted conditions and impoverishing conditions of a large portion of our community, because, while there are many men better off than they were prior to the institution of the National Policy, the masses of the people who are earning their daily bread by the sweat of their brow are not better off; only those who had invested in manufacturing institutions and are reaping the rich reward of their operations are better off. The labouring man, Sir, is taxed for the spade that he takes in his hand 60 per cent; he is taxed on the hoe 50 per cent, on the fork 60 per cent; he is taxed for the shirt that covers his back from 25 to 30 per cent; on the hat that covers his head 25 to 30 per cent; he is taxed for every item that enters into every day use far more than he was taxed under the operation of the previous tariff, and to say to him that his condition is better is to tell him what he knows is not true. But, Sir, it is a matter of surprise how successful hon. gentlemen opposite have been in fooling and humbugging and deceiving the labouring and farming classes of this country. In 1878 they gained power by promising to the people better markets for their products. In 1882 they dared not go to the country upon their record, but they secured the passing of a gerrymander Bill, and by one of the most villainous laws ever placed on the Statute-books of any country, they secured the majority to support them in 1882. In 1887, by passing a Franchise Bill and by increased iron duties and by making many promises of the development that would follow their re-election—promises that were never realized—they managed on that occasion to secure by a narrow majority the support of this House. In 1892, how did they accomplish it? They went before the people of this country, addressing themselves particularly to the farming community. They knew they had the manufacturers, those interested in the operations of the National Policy, who were merely replenishing their pockets out of the earnings of the people of this country. This class had in their own pockets and in their balance sheets the arguments to induce them to support the Government. But the Government felt that it would be necessary to make some impression upon the farming community, and so they went before the people, declaring that they had an invitation to go to Washington on the 4th March and enter into negotiations for an international trade arrangement with the United States. They went before the people of this country, saying what was not true. It has been proved by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to-day, that that statement was not true. All the evidence, every statement made by the people of the United States regarding the conference, proves that it was not true, and, to cap the climax, when Sir Charles Tupper went down to Washington and was challenged with regard to the statements made by the Canadian Ministers and by himself, on the stump,

to the people of this country, he admitted that that statement was not true and that the contention of the United States Minister, with regard to what was said in Washington at the time when the Ministers went down there, was a proper and correct statement. Sir, the people of this country were misled, they were fooled, they were humbugged, and the farmers and the working people of this country have themselves to blame for permitting themselves to place confidence in the people who deceived them upon that and previous occasions. But my impression is, that the days of humbugging the people are coming rapidly to an end. I think the Government will find it pretty hard to get up another will-o'-the-wisp scheme that will enable them again to fool the people. They have to show some evidence more tangible and secure than the evidence and promises they made in 1891 with regard to a trade treaty with the United States. We on this side want to have a treaty made. And for that reason we are charged with being disloyal, with being anxious to sell the country to the United States. But gentlemen opposite have withdrawn these charges which were made on the stump—charges that the Liberal party was disloyal to the Crown of England because we desired freer trade relations with the United States. We desire to live on terms of courtesy and amity with the people of the United States. We do not wish them to fancy that we will get on our knees to beg a treaty of them. But if the Government had used the people of the United States as they ought to have used them, if they had gone to Washington with a desire to make a treaty, they could have had it. But they did not do so. They went there to frustrate the making of a treaty. The hon. Finance Minister, instead of offering reasons why a treaty should be entered into, began to point out objections. He pointed out the difficulty with regard to the manufacturing of woollen goods and asked: how is that to be got over? That in itself shows that they have no desire to make a treaty. They want to bar the door against a treaty. And last session of Parliament the Finance Minister comes before the House and tells us the negotiations are at an end, that a treaty is impossible. We cannot get a treaty, he said, unless we are ready to discriminate against the mother country and unless we are ready to abnegate our rights as a nation and hand over our tariff-making to the United States. Such a statement is not true. The evidence shows the very opposite to be the case. As stated by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), a treaty on the lines proposed by the Hon. George Brown, which would be an advantageous treaty to the people of this country, as well as to the people of the United States, could be got if the Government desired it. But the Government do not want it. They talk of getting a treaty only in the natural products of the farm, the forests, the field and the mine. But we know that they cannot get such a treaty, and the Americans would be fools to make a treaty on such a basis. From 1854 to 1866, when the last treaty of reciprocity was in operation, $240,000,000 worth of goods were sent from Canada to the United States, while the United States sold to us only $126,000,000 worth, so that the balance of trade in our favour was about $120,000,000. Well, in face of that, how can you expect the United States to renew the treaty? What do the people of the United States virtually say by the opposition they offered to the treaty? They say to the people of Canada: You send us horses, we have not horses to send to you. You send us lambs, we have not got lambs to send to you. You send us barley, we have not got barley to send to you in return. But we are willing to take your barley, your horses, your eggs, your lambs, your hay, if you are willing to take, in return from us, the commodities we have to sell. Allow us to prepare our schedule of the commodities that we desire to get rid of, and you prepare your schedule of the commodities that you desire to sell. But the hon. gentlemen opposite want to prepare the schedule of both countries; they want to say not only what we shall sell to the United States, but what the people of the United States shall sell to us. Any person who will consider the enormous trade of the United States will see clearly that by trying to commit them to a tariff of that kind, you are trying to bind them down to something they will never submit to. Now, I contend that, under this condition of things, it was an exceedingly imprudent move on the part of the Government to increase the number of Ministers and thus increase the annual outlay of this country. I contend that the Ministers who held portfolios previous to this year, were amply sufficient to conduct the affairs of this country properly and carefully, if the brains that filled each of those positions were up to the standard that can be secured in this country. I admit frankly that in many cases we are very poorly served. We are paying a very high price for the statesmanship of some of the Ministers that occupy Cabinet positions. I quite admit that. It is composed, in many cases, of men whom nature never intended for any such position, and they have been simply ostracised by a chapter of accidents that has brought them into a position that they were never qualified to fill. Now, I see the President of the Council in his place. He has got a very heterogeneous collection of councillors to preside over; there are seventeen, I believe, altogether. I suppose the hon. gentleman is going to try to manage matters so as to keep them peaceable and quiet. He is going, I presume, to dehorn the Controller of Customs so that he will not inflict any grievous bodily injury upon the Solicitor-General, and he is going to dehorn the Solicitor-General so that he won't stab, in the vital parts, the Controller of Customs. He will keep them all at peace with each other. The hon. gentleman understands how to handle bullocks. He has been in that kind of business many years. He was in it away down in Texas where he did a considerable business of that kind, and I do not know any man on that side of the House better qualified to preside over the sixteen political bullocks he has got around him, than the hon. member who now occupies the position of President of the Council. He must see that judging from the amount of brains, and the intelligence, and the ability that have been displayed by some of them since this House met, we are paying pretty dearly for the services they are giving us. I contend that we have been on the down grade, politically, for some years. Look at the exposures that have been made before the Public Accounts Committee and the Privileges and Elections Committee of this House during the last two or three years. We have had exhibitions, Sir, that have aroused the indignation and called forth the surprise of all enlightened countries, and all parts of the British Empire. There is not a journal published in London, even the most pronounced Conservative journal, that has not denounced, in the strongest terms, the disgraceful state of affairs that has attended our political career during the last ten years. We have seen civil servants stamping around the peacock plumes, living at the country's expense; third-class clerks living in style equal to that of a Deputy-Minister; and first-class rascals living like nabobs, taking the money of the country that has been improperly stolen and abstracted, and putting it in their own pockets. Take for instance an Arnoldi, and his brass dogs and his jolly "Joe" trips—all such cases show clearly the scandalous manner in which the affairs of this country have been handled by a lot of reckless and indifferent Ministers. Take the case of the late Minister of Public Works, who presided over the affairs of that department for some fourteen years. During that time he spent about $43,000,000 upon public works. Now, we could only get at the inside of part of that expenditure. Owing to a quarrel that took place between the contractors, we have only been able to unravel three of the contracts, the Cross-wall in Quebec, the harbour improvements in Montreal and the graving dock at Victoria. Now, what was the result of the investigations that were held with regard to those three contracts? It was proved clearly that those contracts should only cost this country, if done at tender prices, $2,184,000; but they actually cost $3,137,000, or 40 per cent in excess of the legitimate price at which those works should have been performed. The country lost $953,000 in those three contracts. Now, if we could get at the inside secrets of all the other contracts, the other $40,000,000 that was spent in that department, I have no doubt it would be seen that we have lost on them 25 per cent of the total amount. It shows that this country is struggling under an increased debt of $10,500,000 owing to the extravagance, the incapacity, and the neglect of the ex-Minister of Public Works. What has been done with him? He has merely been turned out of the Cabinet; he has been taken down from the lofty position he occupied as Cabinet Minister, and he has been sent over to our side, where he is now sitting on the stool of repentance for the misdeeds of which he has been guilty for a number of years. Then we had the late Secretary of State, who presided over the Printing Bureau. Why, Sir, was there ever a more scandalous condition of affairs on earth than was disclosed in connection with the Printing Bureau, with the Senecals, and the Bronskills, and the Dansereaus, the men with whom he had associated, and who had fleeced this country of something like $50,000 of money that should have been in the pockets of this Dominion? What has been done with him? Why, Sir, in place of having meted out to him the punishment he deserved, and the punishment that he would have got at the hands of the people if they had a chance to inflict it upon him, he has been sent down to Quebec to occupy the position of Lieutenant-Governor for five years. I say that if that man had had a proper punishment administered to him, such as the people of this country would pronounce upon him if they were able, he would now be behind the prison bars at Kingston instead of in the place he now occupies. These scandalous doings have brought Canada into the unfortunate plight in which she is to-day, our debt enormously increased, our annual expenditure enormously increased, our markets cut off. The McKinley Bill has fenced us out from our most desirable markets, and we are here in an embarrassed condition, and in a political condition that is greatly to be regretted. I say it is a great pity that the people of this country ever permitted the hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury-benches to handle the affairs of this country in the scandalous manner in which they have been handling them. I hope that all the evidences of political iniquity that have existed, and of the deceptions practised upon the people of this country during the last ten years will come vividly before their minds, and when they obtain an opportunity they will pronounce their opinion that the men who condoned those crimes, who permitted those men to escape, who allowed such rascalities to be carried on and practices of deception to be practised on the people, and who failed to implement their promises, should be displaced from power, and decide in favour of tariff reform, political reform and a change of Government and the placing at the head of affairs a body of men who will seek to bring about a better state of affairs than have prevailed in this country during the last 15 years.

Mr. ROSS (Dundas). I desire for a few moments to beg the indulgence of the House, not, however, with the hope of adding interest to the debate, although this is assumed to be one of the most important issues in the eyes of the public. I do not doubt that very great interest has been felt all over the country with regard to this question, and when we consider the various positions taken by hon. gentlemen, no wonder that great interest is felt throughout the country. But while the interest in the country seems to be very greatly aroused, I am sorry to say, judging by appearances, the interest manifested at first in this House has quite fallen off. I do not know whether this is due to the vigour of the earlier attacks of the Opposition or to the vigorous replies offered from this side of the House to the attacks made, proving too exhaustive, but from present evidences the interest is somewhat flagging. I therefore enter the debate at a time when perhaps a short speech will be most in order. As I have said, the interest taken in the debate is largely increased by the fact that on both sides of the House certain modifications of the tariff were anticipated. While some demands came from the Opposition, certain requests also came from members on this side of the House. This action on the part of members on this side of the House has been looked upon in a peculiar light. The name of "wobbler," and so on, used in a contemptuous sense, of course, has been given to members who were of opinion that in certain respects the Government might properly make modifications in the tariff; but while, of course, demands would be naturally expected from the Opposition, no doubt hon. members on this side of the House have also the right and they are sent here for the purpose, to advise the Government as to what might be considered a proper course to pursue in regard to certain items of the tariff. The Government in times past, as we know, have lowered or removed the duties on certain articles—sugar particularly. That being the case, hon. members on this side, as well as on the other side of the House, are perfectly warranted in deciding that perhaps the present state of affairs is such as to permit and allow modifications of taxes in some other respects. I did not have my name attached to any motion looking to the revision of the duties on coal oil or the free admission of binding twine, but at the same time I must confess that I had a certain amount of sympathy with the motions in connection with those articles. I make this statement because I reside in a county that is one of the finest agricultural counties in Ontario, and there a feeling prevails that in some respects the tariff might be modified, and coal oil, of course, and binding twine were articles specially mentioned as those that might be dealt with. I may say, however, that my county, being an agricultural county, has very little sympathy with free corn.

It is impossible to suppose that a county raising far more coarse grains than it can consume, would favour free corn. But that is by the way. I consider that this being the feeling in my county, it is my duty to express that feeling, and that I am sent to this House for no other purpose; but I consider, from the matter of fact way in which the Minister of Finance met the issue, the Government favour the action of members on this side of the House and seemingly approve it, because, if I rightly read the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance, we have a promise of a certain amount of tariff revision along the lines we indicate, so far as the finances and condition of the country will permit. While we take this position, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, including the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette), regard it as a most remarkable spectacle. I do not see the hon. gentleman in his seat; but I hope it was not so remarkable as was the oratorical effect he tried to make out of it. We are only doing our duty, and I hope in this respect our course will be approved in whatever way the country will view our proposals. I have no doubt that the course mapped out by the Minister of Finance, to carry out his promise of revision in the near future, will meet with the full approval it deserves. But I am glad to see that, while revision is to take place, the Minister of Finance announces that the National Policy is to be kept in view. I think it should undoubtedly be kept in view, for although we have listened to strong and vigorous indictments of that policy, we are so accustomed to them that we bear them with considerable grace, and I do not think the National Policy should be sacrificed for any such reasons as have been adduced. The figures given by the Minister of Finance and by the Minister of Railways and others, go to prove conclusively that, so far as any human institution can do so, the National Policy has thoroughly and well fulfilled the object for which it was designed, and this notwithstanding all the slurs cast upon it and the attempts made to laugh it out of existence. Among the charges made against the National Policy, I find one charge is framed in this way: We have been told that it was designed as a measure of retaliation against our neighbours, and that by this means we were to secure a reciprocity treaty. If such was its design, it has failed in that respect. But I contend that it was not its design. It was not designed also, as was stated in another place, on the principle that it was the only way in which to make a young and comparatively poor people strong and rich, by surrounding them with a high tariff wall. I consider that there is very little evidence to show that this was the design; and if it were, it certainly has not succeeded. But I hold that it was not designed either with a view of oppressing the poor or benefiting the rich, or placing in their hands a means of successfully squeezing the blood out of the poor; it was designed, I think, on the broad principles of developing our resources and encouraging, within moderate limits, the growth of manufacturing interests and also workingmen's interests as well as the agricultural interests, which have not been slighted in any way. The farming interests have been regarded and carefully looked after, and all interests of the country have been made inter-dependent, which I consider a most important point. While these have been the main points looked after by the National Policy, we must not forget that it was also designed with a view of producing, in an equitable manner, a sufficient revenue with which to run this country. We have heard during the debate the amount of money invested on public works. We believe those sums have been well invested. We believe nothing will conduce to the growth of our country more fully and satisfactorily than such investments and while we feel that those investments were made satisfactorily and with a view to develop the resources of our country, we also feel that for the most part they have been of a right character and have been carefully managed. I feel, then, that when we regard the amount of money invested in manufacturing industries here, the amount of money not only invested in manufactures, but in industries of all kind, we cannot help but feel that the National Policy does not deserve the slur cast upon it. Like every other human institution, it is, no doubt, susceptible of improvement, and there is not the slightest doubt that this Government will improve these defects as they are met with. The chief ground upon which a demurrer can be taken to the success of the National Policy, as a whole, is in reference to its bearing on our agricultural interests, and yet, Sir, if we examine the causes of the present depression in agriculture, we will find that they are dependent, in no way, on the National Policy. I can safely say, for Eastern Ontario, with which I have most experience, that any depression which exists there can be attributed to two or three causes remote from the effect of the National Policy. The first and the chief of these is the failure of crops for several years past, with the exception, perhaps, of the year 1891. Another thing which has seriously affected the agricultural industry is the disturbance of trade created by the McKinley Bill. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to talk as if we ourselves were responsible for the passing of that measure in the United States, but the charge seems so absurd on its face that it is hardly necessary to say that we had nothing to do with it. However, whatever the cause of such a law being brought into force, it has seriously disturbed our financial interests and it accounts in some instances, for depression in our farming interests. There are other reasons which might account for this depression. I think that, in many cases, our farmers have been a little too greedy to acquire land. I know that prices in my own county for some years past have been excessively high, and that the farmers were not warranted in paying them. I think, also, that the success with which agents have pushed the sales of their pianos and organs, and implements of all kinds, has not tended to replenish the pockets of the agriculturists. A transition period in trade is one of great anxiety, and it must necessarily create some loss, which will, no doubt, have to be borne by the agriculturist, to some extent. That being the case, we must feel that the Government has exerted themselves in every way to counteract it, by diverting the attention of the agriculturists to the dairying interest, and there is not the slightest doubt that this interest has been successfully prosecuted and promoted throughout the Dominion. While the results obtained from the land have not been so satisfactory, there is no doubt that our farmers have a mine of wealth in dairying, and, as the industry develops, it will, no doubt, place them in as good a position as ever they were. One thing must be remembered in connection with the development of this industry, and that is, that while the land has been cropped to death, I might say, the pursuit of dairy farming will, to a large extent, enable these lands to be recuperated. This being the case, and as we have also the promise of the Finance Minister that there will be a revision of the tariff, I do not believe that the charges against the National Policy have any force at all. No doubt some of our people feel—they have been told so so often that they must believe it, perforce—that perhaps they are unjustly taxed, and the remarks of the Finance Minister on this point touched the key note of the whole position. I will, with the permission of the House, quote a few sentences from his speech :

But that class or section, wherever it may be, must proportionately to its strength, bear its just and equal proportions of the burdens that are necessary in order to carry on the affairs of this country and to give a permanence and durability.

That is the point of view from which every member of this House, and every man of this country should regard the matter. Each and every one of us must be to a certain extent prepared in the present state of affairs to bear a fair portion of the taxes placed upon us for the development of our country. I think that it does not become the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to try and create class feeling among the people as he endeavours to do in the latter part of his speech. He charges that the working of the tariff is most oppressive to the poorer portion of the people, and that it discriminates against special classes. I do not believe that any such thing is contemplated by the tariff, and I think that it is wrong for the hon. gentleman to endeavour to arouse such Mr. Ross (Dundas).

a state of feeling as that. It may be that in a few of our manufactured goods, where specific duties are levied, they do bear, perhaps, a little hard upon some of the people, but to say that it was designed for that purpose is quite another thing. Against that statement of the hon. member we have the definite proposal of the Government to meet just such cases, and to remodel the tariff in that respect. With regard to some of the particular changes in the tariff which have been asked for by hon. gentlemen, I may say that while coal oil, and binder twine, have received special attention, I seriously hope that the Government will, when taking into consideration these things, as they promised, not forget to give their attention to the iron duties. I wish now to offer a few remarks in reference to the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). In the first place, as an abstract proposition, and excepting the first clause of it, I do not know that there is a great deal about it not to commend it to the minds of the members of this House. As an abstract proposition, so far as it goes, it is satisfactory, and any member of the House might vote for it; but the first clause is, I believe, unjust and entirely out of place. It says :

That the present customs tariffs bears heavily and unjustly on the great consuming classes of the Dominion, and should be at once reformed in the direction of freer trade.

The charge that the tariff bears unjustly upon the consuming classes is without foundation, the proposer of the amendment to the contrary notwithstanding; but that it should be reformed in the direction of freer trade, I do not find much objection to, when we consider that it only goes to the length of the sum required to meet the expenses of the Government efficiently and economically administered. The gravamen of the whole thing is in that. What do we regard as efficient and economic administration? We on this side of the House have no fault to find, or but very little fault to find, with the present administration of the affairs of the country. As the Minister of Railways and Canals said very pointedly: there is no doubt that good value has been, for the most part received for our expenditure, and he very properly asked the hon. member opposite to point out how he was going to run the country with any less money than was at present spent. That, I think, is rather a difficult question to answer, because I believe that our expenditure must continue very nearly as large as it is at present, and we notice that our income and outlay are about on a par. That being the case, it appears difficult to see in what way our affairs could be more efficiently or economically administered. There is a peculiar feature of this amendment of hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), to which I wish to direct attention. It must give great relief to some hon.

gentlemen on the other side of the House to see that there is no mention in it of unrestricted reciprocity, or anything in that direction. I know that my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) will vote for the amendment with a much freer heart on that account, than he otherwise would have done.

Mr. SEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I would not be fulfilling the duty which I owe to my constituents were I not to speak on the amendment which is now before the House, an amendment which I am sure is approved of by a large majority of the farmers of the country. I think, Sir, that the reason the farmers have not received more consideration in the past is that they have not been unanimous in making their demands. We have an instance in the present session of what they can accomplish by unanimity of action. A large number of petitions from farmers were presented here in favour of taking the duty off binding twine, and we see that a little has been done in that direction. Petitions were also presented in favour of the reduction on coal oil, and something in that direction has been done. Therefore, I think that if the farming community state their case properly, and get the support which they have a right to expect, they will receive more consideration from this House than they have had in the past. Now, I intend in what I say to go upon a line which has not been touched upon during this debate that is, to make a comparison between the farming industry and the manufacturing industry. We find by the census bulletins that the manufacturers of this country have a large amount of capital invested, and we find also that a great many manufacturers have received no benefit from the National Policy, but that, on the contrary, that policy has been a positive disadvantage to them. Until I saw these bulletins I had no idea that some of them made such large profits as they have done. In bulletin No. 10 we find a catechism as to what is an industrial establishment, from the view-point of the census, and this is the answer given :

An industrial establishment is a place where one or several persons are employed in manufacturing, altering, making up or changing from one shape into another, materials for sale, use or consumption. Thus, limestone is a raw product, the taking of which out of the quarry pertains to mining. The burning of the limestone is an operation which changes the form, employs labour and capital to effect the change and gives to the product an enhanced value. The census returns do not take cognizance of the quarrying, in connection with industrial establishments. Breaking a big stone into a score of small stones does not change the form though the result is an article of increased value. The preparation of the limestone and its transformation into an article altogether different in appearance from the original, constitute the lime kilns, in which the operations are carried on, industrial establishments to be included in the returns of the census.

The blacksmith takes iron in its various forms and works it up into horseshoes, horseshoe-nails and other articles, increasing its value by his skill and labour. He is just as much entitled to have his smithy called an industrial establishment as is the owner of a nail factory or of a locomotive works.

We do not consider a butcher's shop an industrial establishment, though the "porker" strung up by the heels in the doorway is changed very considerably in appearance in consequence of the operations denuding him of his bristles and depriving him of his interior. But if the pig is cut up into prime mess, short ribs, clear sides, salted, smoked into bacon and hams, canvased, pickled or otherwise prepared, we consider that the establishment in which these changes are effected should be ranked as industrial establishment, just as much as the printing office in which figures and words are stamped upon paper and issued as a label, a poster or a newspaper.

This shows that nearly every place where labour is expended in changing material from one thing to another, is classed as an industrial establishment. I find here a most important statement to the effect that in 1881, after deducting wages and cost of material, the capital invested in industrial establishments had a percentage profit of 42 per cent out of which to pay the percentage of interest, insurance, depreciation and loss by bad debts, and in 1891 the percentage of profit was 33 per cent. So that, when there are a large number of industrial establishments that are not benefited by the National Policy, it must be seen at a glance that some industrial establishments make extraordinary profits. Now, in order to make this clear, I will refer to bulletin No. 8, which classes among industrial establishments, blacksmithing, steel and iron works, carriage-making, harness and saddlery, lime kilns, sash and door factories, boot and shoe factories, tailors, clothiers, hatters and furriers, creameries, cheese factories, saw-mills, planing-mills, bakers, flour and grist-mills, oil factories, and so on. These are all called industrial establishments. Most of them were in existence before the National Policy, and some of them have suffered from the operation of that policy. For instance, it is well known that a large number of blacksmith shops existed in this country before the inauguration of the National Policy, and they have suffered positive loss under its operation. Blacksmiths told me at the time the duty on iron was increased that it caused a loss to them, because it compelled them to pay more for their material, while they could not charge the farmers any higher price for the little jobs they did for them. The saw-mills, who employ 23,000 people in round numbers, have not been benefited by the National Policy. Neither have the bakers. Neither have the creameries. Neither have the cheese factories, which have turned out over $11,000,000 worth of cheese that we have exported to the old country; yet they are classed as industrial establishments, though it is well known that they have received no advantage whatever from the National Policy. Cheese and butter making belong more to the natural industry of farming than it does to manufacturing. So that if we go over the whole list of industrial es-establishments given in these bulletins, we find that the spoon-fed or infant industries only represent a small portion of the industries of the country. I see that the industries which take the largest profits under the National Policy are those which employ very few hands. The cotton mills employ in New Brunswick 1,752, in Nova Scotia 463, in Quebec 3,323, and in Ontario 2,495, making a total of 8,033 engaged in the manufacture of cotton. The sugar refineries, also one of the pet industries with very large profits, and known to be one of the worst combines in this country, employ 212 persons in Nova Scotia and 1,545 in Quebec, making in all 1,757. If we add to these the total number of persons employed in the oil refineries, 270, we find that these three industries employ in all only 10,090 persons. We had also under review the binding twine industry, and were informed that a reduction in the tariff would hurt 1,500 persons engaged in it. But it has been shown very clearly in this House that about 4,000,000 acres of crop in barley, wheat and oats, were cut in the province of Ontario last year; and taking an average of 2½ lbs. of binder twine per acre, that would give an amount of duty of $202,000 of which less than $8,000 went into the Treasury, and the balance, $194,000, into the pockets of the manufacturers. You see, therefore, that these 1,500 persons engaged in this industry cost the people a very large amount. The farming industry in Ontario represents alone a capital of $971,000,000, the assessable property being 225,000,000 acres. That would give 225,000 farmers 100 acres each, and if we add fifty per cent to that number for help, allowing one servant to every two farmers, that would give 338,000 persons engaged in that business, whereas in the manufacturing industries the amount invested in land, houses and machinery is only $172,000 capital, and the capital required to carry on the business for the whole Dominion is $181,000. The House will see, by this comparison, of what paramount importance the farming interest is compared with the manufacturing, and yet the latter always receives the best consideration of the Government. No doubt the reason is that the farming interest is not brought before the House with sufficient prominence every year. We see that four industries representing less than 11,000 people get nearly everything they want. But they use method, they come here and press their case, and their interests are consequently regarded while those of the larger farming community are disregarded. In my opinion, there are only two methods which can be of material advantage to the farmers in this Dominion. One is free trade with the United States, so far as possible, and the other is reduction in the tariff. Now, I do not agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down that the McKinley tariff was not due to any fault on the part of this Government. On the contrary, I believe our

Government are to blame in the matter, and shall give you my reasons for so thinking. Mr. McKinley had his Bill before Congress. In the meantime this House met, and our Finance Minister made his Budget speech, on the 27th March, 1890. Representations were made to this Government by the small fruit growers, the nursery-men in the Niagara district, and the millers and others in favour of an increase of duties on the various articles in which they dealt. Increased duties were asked on flour, and pork and beef, and small fruits. These people said, we want a prohibitory duty imposed so that Canadians may have complete control of their own market; and in accordance with their representations, the Finance Minister increased the duties largely on pork and beef, added 25 cents on each barrel of flour, and raised the tariff on apples, clover seed and small fruits imported from the United States into this country. This House prorogued on the 16th of the following May, and the McKinley Bill went into effect the 6th of October following. The Democrats were in favour of throwing that bill out, and so were some of the Republicans, but on seeing the attitude of the Canadians, the Americans said we will treat them in the same manner. They want to keep their small market for themselves, we will keep our large market for ourselves, and the McKinley Bill was passed. Had the Minister of Finance shown judgment at that time he would have waited; but instead of that, by his actions he precipitated the passing of that measure. He helped it on by putting a lever in the hands of its friends, so that I think our Government are justly responsible for that measure which has done so much harm to this country. I was glad to hear the other evening the moderate speech of the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig). He said he was in favour of reciprocity and of lowering the duties, but he wished to wait. That is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. It was the course they took in shelving the temperance question, on the pretence that they wished to ascertain the sentiment of the country, and in the same way, in this matter of reducing the tariff, they have adopted a waiting policy in order that they may stave off the evil day as long as possible. In discussing the advantages of free and unrestricted trade with the United States, I do not consider it fair to compare 1890 with 1891, because in 1890 the McKinley Bill was in force from the 6th of October, and, therefore, part of the year was under the McKinley Bill and part was not. I shall take the year before and compare 1891 with 1889. Now, there were exported into Great Britain in 1891, 1,369 horses, value $214,785; to the United States, 9,261 were imported, value $1,094,461. You see, Sir, that even with a duty of $30 on each horse, and sometimes $45 and $50, the United States is really the only market there is for horses. It has been contended that the electric railways are displacing a number of horses. That may be true to a certain extent, but we know Sir, notwithstanding the effect of electric railways, that in 1891, the last year of which we have an account in the Trade and Navigation Returns, we received $1,094,461 from the United States for horses. For every horse we sold to Great Britain we sold six to the United States. And still when we sent these horses to England they went free of duty, and those that were sent to the United States were charged at the rate of $30 for the poorest horse, and some at the rate of $45 and $50, and even higher. That proves completely that the Canadian farmer had to pay a duty in order to get his horses into the United States' markets. But in 1889 there was a better showing. In that year there were exported to Great Britain 164 horses, valued at $26,975, while to the United States we exported 17,767 horses, value $2,113,782. So that in 1891 there was received $769,655 less for horses than in 1889. In 1891 there were exported to Britain 2,439,957 bushels of barley, value, $1,233,844, and to the United States, 2,721,168 bushels of barley, value $1,354,485. In 1889 we exported to Great Britain 6,312 bushels of barley, value $3,836, and to the United States 9,716,893 bushels, value, $6,464,603. Of this the large sum of $6,329,505 was received by the province of Ontario alone. In 1891 the amount received for barley by the whole Dominion was $3,716,139 less than Ontario alone received in 1889. In 1891 our exports of eggs to Great Britain was 3,987,655 dozen, value $592,218, and in the same year we exported to the United States 3,918,050 dozen, value $494,409. Now, compare this with 1889. In that year the export of eggs to Great Britain was only 98 dozen of eggs at a value of $18, while to the United States we sent 14,011,017 dozen, value $2,156,725. This shows that when there was no McKinley tariff there was no thought of exporting eggs to England, for only the nominal sum of $18 was received for eggs sent to Great Britain in 1889. The effect of the McKinley Bill was to compel the people of this country to try the British market for eggs, and the result has not been very satisfactory, and it has involved a great loss to the farmers of the Dominion. In 1891, $1,076,927 less was received from the United States for the sale of eggs than in 1889. There has, therefore, been a loss of nearly $6,000,000 on these articles of horses, barley and eggs, the loss mainly upon the province of Ontario. In 1891 we exported to the United States 165,947 bushels of oats, value $54,623 ; 527,912 bushels of pease, value $463,354 ; and 1,489,881 bushels of wheat, value $871,263. These all paid duty. In the same year we exported to Great Britain, free of duty, 5,743,720 bushels of oats, value $1,983,130 ; 3,337,139 bushels of pease, value $2,249,932 ; 6,810,664 bushels of wheat, value $5,726,505 ; and of cheese, a total value of $11,652,412, making a total in these four articles of $21,591,979. Let me give you a few figures showing the duties paid on some of the principal products of the farm shipped to the United States :

Exports to the United States and Duty paid in 1891.

	Duty paid.
2,721,168 bush. barley.....	$ 816,350
9,261 horses.....	277,830
3,918,015 doz. eggs.....	195,900
167,604 tons hay.....	268,268
165,947 bush. oats.....	16,594
527,912 do pease.....	211,164
1,489,881 do wheat.....	297,976
Sheep.....	217,555

Thus we paid in duty $2,301,737. Add to the loss which the farmer thus suffered the difference between what he received in 1891 and in 1889 for the sale of the most profitable products of his farm, and you will have some idea of the great loss which the McKinley Bill has entailed upon the people of this country, and will understand the general anxiety of the producing classes to have it removed. Now, I quite agree with the hon. member for East Durham when he says that in his opinion the McKinley tariff will be removed. I have been frequently asked my opinion on this question and I have always said I believed it would be removed, and for this reason—not that the United States will remove it for the benefit of the people of Canada, but they will remove it for their own benefit. And the policy that has been announced by the Democratic party is a reduction of the tariff to the requirements of the Government honestly and economically administered. But while this tariff has been injurious and even ruinous to large classes of the people of this country, it has, no doubt, been an evil to the people of the United States as well. The Michigan farmers were told the same story, the farmers of Ohio were told the same story, the farmers of New York were told the same story. They wanted to keep the products of the farms of Canada out and protect their own farmers. But in those very places where they expected to make large gains, they were disappointed. Now, as to the barley industry, it has been nearly ruined in this country. Our farmers were in the habit of receiving about 75 cents per bushel for barley, and since that tariff came into operation they have only been receiving 30 or 40 cents. The McKinley tariff has also hurt the maltsters in the United States, because it is a well known fact that they cannot make the best quality of ale except with Canadian barley No. 1. The United States have been in the habit of competing with Great Britain in the export of ale to other countries. They can no longer do so, because their native barley produces an inferior quality of ale. Now, Sir, one reason why I think the McKinley Tariff will be reduced, is to be found in the remarks of Mr. Wilson, Chairman of the Democratic Convention. At the convention Mr. Wilson, in making his speech, which was the key-note of the campaign, said :

Free government is self-government. There is no self-government where the people do not control their own elections and levy their own taxes. When either of these rights is taken away or diminished a breach is made, not in the outer defences, but in the citadel of our freedom. For years we have been struggling to recover the lost right of taxing ourselves, and now we are threatened with the loss of the greatest right of governing ourselves. The loss of one follows in necessary succession the loss of the other. When you confer on a Government the power of dealing out wealth, you unchain every evil that can prey upon it, and eventually destroy free institutions—excessive taxation, class legislation, bullion dollar congresses, a corrupt civil service, a debauched ballot box, and purchased elections. In every campaign the privilege of taxing the people will be bartered for contributions to corrupt them at the polls; after every victory a new McKinley Bill to repay these contributions, which taxes were wrung from the people. For every self-governing people there can be no more momentous question than the question of taxation. It is the question, as Mr. Burke truly said, around which all the great battles of freedom have been fought. It is the question out of which grow all the tissues of government. Until we settle this question wisely, permanently, justly, we build all other reforms on a foundation of sand. We, and the great party we represent, are to-day for tariff reform, because it is the only gateway to genuine democratic government. The Democratic party believes that frugality is the essential virtue of free government. It believes that taxes should be limited to public needs, and be levied by the plain rule of justice and economy. We are for the protection that protects, and for the reciprocity that reciprocates. We are in favour of protecting every man in the enjoyment of his labour, diminished only by his proper contribution to the support of the Government, and we are for that real reciprocity, not through dickering diplomacy and presidential proclamations, but by laws of Congress, that remove all unnecessary obstacles between the American producer and the markets.

The same year there was held a meeting in Cleveland, at which the Democratic Convention contains the following plank:—

We favour closer commercial relations with Canada and the removal of the embarrassing and annoying restrictions which only vex our people without yielding substantial revenue to the Government. Speaking before the convention upon reciprocity, Mr. Thurman said the time is near when the people will express their belief in complete and not restricted reciprocity. If reciprocity, which has always been a Democratic, not a Republican doctrine, is a good thing with South America, why would it not be a better thing in Canada and Europe,

He does not confine his ideas to Canada alone, but he speaks of Europe as well—with which our trade is a hundredfold greater than it is with South America? The time has also come when the people will say to the powers that be, that the honest workingman shall no longer be compelled by law to contribute a part of his hard-earned savings to help maintain those who, under the forms of law, have robbed him for over a quarter of a century; when they will no longer sustain any party which levies and collects one dollar of taxes over and above that which is required to wisely and economically administer the affairs of the Government; when they will give due notice that infant industries that have been nursed for 100 years have arrived at the age when they must take care of themselves; when they will brand a protective tariff as stealing, its advocates as beggars, and demand that we must have a tariff for revenue only.

Mr. SEMPLE.

At another meeting held in the same state, the following deliverance was made:—

We demand the reduction of tariff taxes, and will continue the battle for tariff reform until the cause of the people is triumphant. All money taken by law from the people shall go into the public treasury. Tariff taxes shall be for revenue only. All so-called protective tariff taxes are dishonest, wasteful and corrupting. They plunder the masses to enrich the few. They have crippled agriculture, retarded manufacturing, created trusts, destroyed commerce and corrupted our law-makers. Therefore we are opposed to the McKinley Tariff Bill now pending in Congress.

The state of Michigan, also a Republican state, in convention, spoke on the same subject:

We denounce and condemn the high tariff policy of the present Administration, and demand that our tariff and internal revenue taxes shall not be higher than to maintain the Government economically administered. We especially condemn the McKinley Tariff Bill, which still further restricts the market for American products, while it increases the burden of taxation. We denounce it, because it has not a section or a line that will open a new market for a single bushel of wheat or a single barrel of pork, and also because it still further restricts our market and limits our trade with the world—a policy that must more and more depress American agriculture, lessen the value of American farms, and increase the cost of living to the American people.

These were resolutions passed in Republican states, but the whole voice of the Democratic party in all their conventions was in the same direction. Now, they have a chance to make right that which was wrong, and some wished to have a special session of Congress to do away with the McKinley Tariff. No doubt, they will move cautiously in the matter. When there are so many interests affected they will take ample time to consider, and we shall, no doubt, be gainers to a large extent through the action of Congress. The utterances that I have just read, show that the people have come to the conclusion to stand shoulder to shoulder in the endeavour to counteract the efforts of the monopolists in the combines and trusts that have existed there to so large an extent. I am glad to see that in our country there are gratifying signs pointing in the same direction. We have seen in this House many petitions presented from sources from which heretofore similar petitions have not come—from Conservative associations all over this country. I was much gratified the other day at seeing the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) lay on the Table of this House a bundle of petitions bearing over 13,000 signatures, asking that the duty be taken off binding twine, coal oil, corn and barbed wire. There are other petitions with over 14,000 signatures, asking that it be made criminal for combines to take unjust profits from the people. These are healthy signs of the times, and they indicate that the people are beginning to awaken to the position they occupy. It may be thought that we cannot at present secure free trade with the United States, and that this is not an opportune moment to discuss the question; but the world moves, and we may prove to be nearer that result than the people suppose. If such a treaty were negotiated, every farm with 100 acres of good land would be worth more as regards the value of its products by at least $100 a year than at present and this amount spread over the whole country would be decidedly advantageous, and it would certainly assist in keeping our own people in the country. There is another good sign of the times. In the other Chamber—which usually displays very little interest in the discussion of public questions—there is a thorough tariff reformer in the person of Senator Boulton. He has studied the question thoroughly, and notwithstanding frequent interruptions while speaking the other day, he succeeded in making his point. He showed that in Manitoba, where there is an average duty of 25 per cent, while the export of wheat reached $10,000,000, only $7,500,000 were realized, because of this duty. If Manitoba is to become prosperous, a great change must be brought about. The Minister of the Interior spoke the other evening as if the immigration department was suffering from dry rot, which, I suppose, meant that the country did not get the value of the money expended. He, however, explained nothing with respect to the policy he intends to pursue, although it is evident that if Manitoba is to increase in population, the burdens on the people must be reduced. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) the other day mentioned that barbed wire was sold in Chicago by the car lot for $2.35 and $2.40 per 100 pounds, but in Manitoba the farmers were compelled to pay from $6 to $7 per 100 pounds. It is the same in regard to everything the farmer has to buy, and so while he may raise a good crop, when he has paid the duty and expense, there is little or nothing left. Senator Boulton also mentioned that he sold oats for 13 cents per bushel, and the cost of carriage was 20 cents; wheat he had sold at from 25 to 50 cents and the carriage was 30 cents per bushel. When these facts are taken into account, it is evident that the only way of increasing immigration is to remove these incumbrances. It is useless to bring people into the country at great expense, because no sooner have they reached there, than they leave when opportunity offers, and it is apparent to everyone that that fine country has not made the progress that the people might fairly have expected.

Mr. SPROULE. Where can you buy wheat in Manitoba for 30 cents a bushel? We offered 60 cents and could not get it.

Mr. SEMPLE. That is Senator Boulton's statement regarding the wheat sold by him. At the present time there are three farmers' organizations in the country. One of these is the Farmers' Institute. At a meeting held in Toronto the following resolution was adopted:—

That whereas the farmers of Canada during the last thirteen years have largely supported a protective policy for the purpose of establishing and building up the manufacturing interests of this country, and whereas such manufacturing industries as are suitable for this country have received such assistance for a period long enough to enable them to withstand fair and open competition; and whereas, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, at its annual meeting held in Toronto, 7th February, declares and reaffirms its determination to support and perpetuate the high tariff policy,—

Be it therefore resolved, that this meeting hereby declares and affirms that to continue and perpetuate such high tariff policy will be detrimental to the vital interests of the agricultural community, that we are of the opinion that the time has come for the adoption of free trade with Britain, and the same privilege to foreign countries that will give a like privilege to us.

Last year I received a petition from the Grange, another farmers' association, on the subject. I received the following communication from the secretary of the association, Mr. Wilkie:—

We think it only reasonable that the binder twine of the farmer should be exempt from duty, when the hooks, nets, seines, and twine of the fishermen pays no duty. Not that we find any fault with this, but we ask the same condition for the farmer's binder twine. Little or no twine is imported. The raw material pays no duty and the 25 per cent duty enables the combine to extort just so much more from the consumers for their own extra profits. The American duty is only $\frac{1}{5}$ of a cent per pound, which makes twine cheaper there than here.

Another farmers' association, which has a large membership although it has not been long in existence, is that known as the Patrons of Industry. I understand a respectable deputation was in the city the other day requesting the Minister of Finance to take into his serious consideration the advisability of reducing the duty on binding twine, coal oil, corn and barbed wire. The association's platform includes:

Tariff for revenue only, and so adjusted as to fall as far as possible upon the luxuries, and not upon the necessaries of life.

Reciprocal trade on fair and equitable terms between Canada and the United States.

These are the two great changes needed to benefit the farmers of this country. Now, Sir, a great deal has been said about annexation, and constant taunts in reference to it have been thrown across the floor of this House, but I consider that the present Government is in a large measure responsible for this sentiment in Ontario. I am glad to say that in my section of the province I hear very little of annexation, but in the sections which are contiguous to the United States, and where the people deal most with the United States and know the advantages of that trade, there is, I understand, a wide feeling in favour of political union. These people have been told by hon. gentlemen opposite, in the press, and on the platform, and in this House: that the meaning of unrestricted reciprocity and freer trade between the two countries, is annexation. They have come to the conclusion, from the utterances of the Ministers, that freer trade cannot be obtained, and in consequence they advocate annexation as the only means by which they can get this reciprocity of trade which is so much desired by all the farmers of the country. Much has been said with regard to the future of our country, but that is a question which is not within the range of practical politics. I think that we cannot do better than to remain as we are at present. If we may judge the future increase of our population, by the increase for the last twenty or thirty years, there will be no danger of this country becoming so unwieldy that we cannot remain under the flag of Great Britain, and I hope and I believe that we shall so remain. There are some in this country who advocate independence, but I do not see how that will help us very much. There may be a sentiment in favour of that, but as for annexation only a small fraction of the people favour it. There would be no feeling for annexation at all if the restrictions on trade were removed, and if you remove these burdens you will make the people contented and happy, and opposed to any political change. Our farmers believe that the nearer the market the better, and on the other side of the line they see ten or twelve millions of people engaged in manufacturing, who need what we can produce in the province of Ontario to supply their wants, and they feel that, when they cannot trade with them, they wish to settle the difficulty at once and become part and parcel of that great country. We neither want Independence, Annexation or Imperial Federation. Imperial Federation is only a dream at the best, and very few think seriously of it. The farming industry is one of the greatest industries in the Dominion, in fact it is at the beginning of all industries, and when the farmers are prosperous those engaged in all other industries will prosper as well. If they have not the wherewithal to supply themselves with necessities, every other class of the community is obliged to share in the depression. Hon. gentlemen opposite have compared the exports of last year with the year 1878, but they did not mention that last year we had a very bountiful harvest and that a large amount of grain lay on the farmers' hands for export after supplying the local demands. In 1878 that was not the case, because there were poor crops and the farmers had very little to sell. It is always the case that in some years, we will have good crops and a good harvest, and that at other times the reverse will be the case. It depends on this in a great measure whether the country is prosperous or not. Reference has been made also by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to the prosperity of the country. Every one who knows the rural parts of the country, knows that the people engaged in agriculture are not prosperous. We wish they were prosperous. I have seen the time when Ontario was prosperous, and when we remember all the energy that has been expended by the farmers, and all the capital they have invested, they should be very prosperous indeed. Ontario is one of the finest provinces in the world, and there is nothing in any part of the United States to compare with it. A few years ago I noticed a return in which there was a comparison made for eight years—1882 and 1889—between fourteen states of the Union, and the province of Ontario was, on the comparison, ahead in barley, wheat and oats in the yields per acre. We should naturally conclude from this that the farmers of such a fertile province should be prosperous. I am sorry to say that the population has largely decreased in that province, and that all the time our young men are leaving it for the simple reason that they can do better elsewhere. They can go to a country that is worse to all intents and purposes, and yet they can make more out of their labour than they can in this country with all its natural advantages. Not long ago I met a man whom I knew, who had been in Montana, and he said that he would go there although he acknowledged it was not so good a place as Ontario, because the morals of the people were not so high, and he would like to remain at home, but he said: I have a family and I cannot prosper as I would wish, and if I can sell my farm I will bring my family away also. I know two young men, practical farmers, who were taught in the school of agriculture, as they are taught in the county of Wellington, and they went to the United States. They came back to their father, and they said to him: Father we have rented farms and we would not take 100 acres free and remain at home with you; we can do much better where we are. The young men of our country go to the place where they can do the best, and that is the reason why they leave us. It is a sad thing to see in this young country so many of the best of our population leaving us. Take the returns of the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, and we find that he stated over his own signature that 886,000 immigrants came into this country during ten years, but the returns of the Census Commissioner showed us that the increase for that period was only 504,000, and that we had lost all the natural increase, besides 362,000 souls as well. Whoever studies the matter must know that there is something radically wrong with the Government of a country where such a state of things exist. As it is getting late in the night, and as I have stated my opinions on this very important question, I will conclude by expressing the hope that we will see an improvement in our condition in the near future. I hope to see the farmers of this country, not as they have been in the past, hewers of wood and drawers of water, but well-to-do and prosperous. I hope that they will unite as one man to secure their rights, and to secure what is needed for the progress of their industry, just as the manufacturers of this country have done. I have shown to-night that although a great many of the manufacturers have received no benefit from the National Policy, yet the profits of the manufacturers in Canada in 1891 amounted to 33 per cent on the amount of capital invested. I venture to say that if you ask the farmers of the country, most of them will tell you that they have not made three per cent. Last fall I happened to be in the eastern part of my constituency, where I saw three good farmers who know how to farm very well; and these men being good Conservatives, of course did not want to belittle their country, but they told me that they would not have 10 bushels of wheat to the acre, and most of their land was in spring wheat, which in that locality is the staple crop. When I tell you that spring wheat is quoted in Toronto at 62 cents a bushel, you can easily understand that farming is a very unprofitable business at the present time. Now, Sir, I was astonished to hear the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) say that prices were higher here than in New York or London. When I heard that statement I went to the reading-room and consulted the "Empire" in which I found winter wheat quoted at 77½ cents in Buffalo, against 67 cents in Toronto, oats at from 38 to 39 cents in Buffalo, against from 34 to 35 cents in Toronto, barley, No. 1 at 45 cents, No. 2 at 40 cents, and No. 3 at 33 cents in Toronto, against from 75 cents to 83 cents in Buffalo. I was also astonished to see in that paper that in Albany No. 1 barley was from 92 to 93 cents per bushel, and No. 2 from 84 to 85 cents. I think the hon. gentleman had not consulted the party organ, or else he would not have made that statement. I have noticed that there has been more freedom of expression in this debate than is customary in this House, and I think it is a very good thing. We had the spectacle of an hon. member on the other side of the House making a complaint that the party organ had been trying to gag him, and to deprive him of free speech. Every effort is being made to keep the party in line; but when we see that there is a great division on the tariff, and that Conservatives are as earnest as Reformers in favour of tariff reduction, we may well believe that there is a grand future before this country. We believe that the McKinley Bill will be abolished, and that we shall have a reduction in the tariff. While some are in favour of reducing the tariff on goods coming from Great Britain, some of those who pretend to be ultra loyalists say: No, we do not want to do that for Great Britain unless Great Britain gives us preferential trade. They are not willing to trust their friends any further than they can see them; they want the bargain made before hand. But if we could receive cotton and iron goods at a great reduction from Great Britain, it would be highly beneficial to the people of this country. Now, without trespassing any further on the patience of the House, I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment of the

hon. member for South Oxford, to the effect that the present tariff bears heavily on the great consuming classes of the Dominion, and should at once be thoroughly reformed in the direction of freer trade, and that the amount of taxes collected should be limited to the sums required to meet the necessities of government efficiently and economically administered.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Speaker, were it not for the very deep interest which the question now being debated by the House has for the people that I have the honour of representing, I would not thus early from my place in the House presume to occupy any of the time of the hon. members. But, Sir, I shall endeavour, in a few words, to show you what importance the question has for the people of the province from which I come, and why they take such a deep interest in it. In 1880, 1881 and 1882 the acreage under cultivation in that country was not sufficient to supply the wants of the settlers, not to speak of those engaged in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Every pound of flour, beef, potatoes, and everything else required by the men engaged on that road had to be imported from the United States. Contrast that state of things with the immense crop produced last year by the province of Manitoba alone, which is only about one-fourth of that great country. The Manitoba Government returns show that there were 14,500,000 bushels of wheat, 11,500,000 bushels of oats, 2,000,000 bushels of barley, 2,250,000 bushels of potatoes, 6,750,000 bushels of turnips, and about 200,000 tons of hay. From these facts you will readily understand the number of agricultural implements, and the quantity of binding twine, barbed wire, nails and everything else required to supply the demand in a new country like that. For that reason this question has a special importance for the people of Manitoba. So far as I am personally concerned, and I think I speak the sentiments of those whom I represent, I may say that I am not satisfied exactly with the reductions that have been made. I had expected and hoped for more; but in consultation with the hon. the Minister of Finance, he assured me that it is the intention of the Government at a very early date, during the recess, to go thoroughly into this question, thoroughly to revise the tariff as regards what will be suitable for that province, and also for the whole Dominion of Canada. In Manitoba you will find that almost every farm has from $1,500 to $2,000 worth of agricultural implements. Much of this machinery is old and useless; still we had to purchase it. In 1880 and 1881 we were paying $275 for binders which you could not give away to-day. What has the National Policy done in that respect? In 1892 we have a binder better worth $500 than the binders for which we paid $275 were worth $100, and we get them for $140. Our opponents will say: That makes no difference, you would have got your binders from the other side anyhow. Had we done so, where would our money have gone? Where would our people have been employed? Where would the money have gone that those people got for their labour? It would have been in the United States instead of being in our banks, which are sending it to that country and lending it at 7 per cent. There is not one of the western states where money can be procured as cheaply as it can be in Manitoba for any legitimate business. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat spoke of the low price of wheat. Well, I do not think that the National Policy has anything to do with the price of wheat in Canada, and if the hon. gentleman knows anything at all about the matter, he must know that the price of wheat was never, in the history of the world, so low as it is to-day. There are 105,000,000 bushels visible in the market. The like was never known before, and that is the cause of the low price of grain, and not the National Policy or the Conservative or any other government. I am very much surprised to see an hon. gentleman using that kind of argument. Senator Boulton has said, according to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that wheat sells at 30 cents a bushel in Manitoba. It must have been frozen wheat. The price of wheat in Manitoba has been undoubtedly low, but the present price is 48 to 56 cents, and the price is governed by the Liverpool market and not by the rates in any other part of Canada. The Liverpool market controls the price, and not the Conservative party or the Liberal party or any other party. So far as I am concerned, I am not like the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Calvin). I am not going to support that amendment. Why should I support it? Why should I support those people (the Opposition)? What did they do when in power? They said we were a sink hole and many other things I would not like to repeat. What railway did they ever build for us? Did they open up the country or make any preparation to open it up? According to the policy of our opponents, the people would never be able to get there, and those who were in would never be able to get out, and we would not have 14,000,000 bushels of wheat for export to-day. If I might be permitted to give those gentlemen advice, I would say to them: admit that the policy you have enunciated is wrong, admit that we have outstripped your expectations, admit that ours is a greater country than you thought, and that you made a mistake about that railroad, and promise to build another railroad. If you would talk like that, you would not have solid Conservative ranks from that country facing you to-day, but would have some support. Apparently, however, you have no faith in your country. I do not know why you should not have faith in it. Where is the place on the face of the earth to-day where the people are better off than in Canada? Name the place. Is it England, with 250,000 people in the city of London alone starving, and with dock labourers working for $2.88 a week, and only half of them able to get labour at that rate? You talk about our people, where can you find the people on the face of the earth happier and more prosperous than the people of Canada to-day? Travel from Halifax to British Columbia, as I have done, and where will you find beggars and paupers? I have been in all the large cities in the United States from California back to Minneapolis, and have never been in any city where I have not met beggars seeking alms, and I have yet to meet the man in Manitoba or British Columbia who has ever asked me for a cent. I do not think I will take up any more of the time of the House. I may say that I will support the motion of the Government. I intend to support the hon. Finance Minister, who has promised us that the tariff shall be revised in such a way as will suit the whole Dominion of Canada and be in the best interests of the country. We stood by the Conservative party and the National Policy when probably we might have done better, but the people of eastern Canada built a railroad into our country for us. They opened up the country, and if it had not been for the Conservative party I would not have gone there and would not be here to-day, nor would my friend the hon. Minister of the Interior. Manitoba is willing and ready to pay her share of the taxation of the country, as she has always done, and show her gratitude to the party which has done so much for her. I thank you, Sir, and the House for your kind indulgence and patience in listening to these few remarks.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

MANITOBA SCHOOL CASE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. leader of the Opposition has called attention to the fact that the papers in the Manitoba School question have not been printed. I understand that the papers which are material are those I now move:

That the return to the Address of the House of Commons, laid on the Table on the 10th instant, containing a copy of the report of the Committee of the Privy Council to His Excellency the Governor-General, on the 9th September, 1892, on the Manitoba School Act, be printed forthwith, and that Rule No. 94 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. LAURIER. I was under the impression that the hon. gentleman had moved for the printing of the papers. However, there has been some misunderstanding as to that, and I agree very willingly to his motion. These papers are not all that should be brought down, but in my judgment they are quite sufficient for the purpose of the discussion which will take place on this matter. I apprehend that they contain the report of the sub-committee of the Privy Council and the petition on which the report is based.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was also under the impression that I had moved for the printing of the papers. The House would be greatly delayed if we were to wait until they are all printed; but if any hon. gentleman calls attention to any other documents he desires, I will make a similar motion.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 23rd February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CATHOLIC MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION OF CANADA.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Mr. Speaker, I desire to call your attention to a circumstance, on which I will base a motion, that occurred yesterday, by which the machinery of Parliament seems to have got agog; the cog-wheels are out of place, and matters are not running smoothly by any means. It occurred through the mistake of one of our innocent and younger members of Parliament, and I have to introduce this motion in order to get the parliamentary wheels back in their proper running trim. Therefore, I move:

That the Order of the House of yesterday, referring to the petition of O. K. Fraser, president, and Samuel R. Brown, secretary of the Grand Council of the Catholic Mutual Benefit Association of Canada; praying for an Act of incorporation, to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, be discharged.

That order was in contravention of the rules of the House, the rule being that a preliminary petition shall be first introduced and then placed afterwards before the Standing Orders Committee, who will report to this House whether there have been sufficient excuses alleged in the petition for not presenting the petition in time in the first place.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DEVLIN moved:

That the petition of the Catholic Mutual Benefit Association, presented this day, praying for an Act of Parliament, notwithstanding the expiration of the time for presenting petitions for private Bills, be read and received and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

He said: I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the delay was inevitable. I heard the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Mills) that the petition was presented by one of the innocent and younger members of Parliament. I may say that I do not happen to be that gentleman, as the petition was presented by another gentleman, who is my senior in age and my superior in every way. There has been an unavoidable delay, however, and I trust that the House will be kind enough to pass the motion.

Motion agreed to.

RECEIPT OF PARLIAMENTARY FEES.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 61) relating to moneys payable in connection with proceedings before Parliament.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the nature of the Bill?

Mr. FOSTER. This is a Bill to regulate and bring under the general rule, the receipt, care and payment of moneys in connection with private Bills and the like. Up to the present time they have been received by the clerk of private Bills, and have been deposited in a bank to the credit of the accountant. All return fees have been paid on the order of the clerk of private Bills, and the balance, whatever it was, has been paid to the credit of the Receiver-General. That was also the practice in a good many branches of the service; but of late years the policy has been to have all moneys that are received deposited at once to the credit of the Receiver-General, and to make provision in the appropriations for the payment of whatever is necessary in the different services. It is to bring the moneys referred to under the general rule that this Bill is introduced. It is the same as the British practice.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPORT.

Report of the Minister of Agriculture for the Dominion of Canada for the calendar year 1892.—(Mr. Foster.)

WINNIPEG MILITIA HOSPITAL.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg) asked. Is the building erected as a hospital for the permanent corps of militia stationed at Winnipeg ready for occupation? If not, when will it be finished, and what is the cause of the delay that has occurred?

Mr. OUIMET. The building is ready, with the exception of the heating apparatus, which will be placed in position without further delay.

PORT DALHOUSIE FERRY SERVICE.

Mr. GIBSON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a more efficient and safe ferry service at Port Dalhousie, Ont., in time for the opening of navigation on the Welland Canal?

Mr. HAGGART. It is not proposed to make any change in the present ferry service at Port Dalhousie.

MANUFACTURERS IN MONTMAGNY.

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Choquette) asked, What are the names of the thirty-seven manufacturers mentioned in the last census as existing in the town of Montmagny?

Mr. FOSTER. The information in the census schedules was obtained by sworn enumerators on the understanding that nothing but general statistical results should be published. No names nor personal particulars can therefore be communicated.

NORTH-WEST CATTLE QUARANTINE.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron) asked, Has the Order in Council, in cap. 7 of the Consolidated Orders in Council of 1889, regulating the admission of neat cattle into Manitoba and the provisional districts of Assiniboia, Saskatchewan and Alberta, from the United States, or the United States territories, for stock or for breeding purposes, requiring their inspection and further detention in quarantine for ninety days, remained continuously in force up to the present time? Have the above quarantine regulations been at any time or times suspended or relaxed? If so, at what date, for what periods, to what extent, and for what reason, and at what date were they reimposed?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no order on the subject referred to of 1889; but the order of 1887, which in its terms provides for a detention of neat cattle "in quarantine for a period of ninety days, or such other period as may be indicated by the Minister of Agriculture, in such manner as shall be ordered by him," remained in force until the 18th instant. It was carried on in its exact terms during the whole period of its existence. The order of the 18th instant made the detention of ninety days absolute.

SUPERANNUATION OF G. F. BAILLAIRGE.

Mr. BRUNEAU (Translation) asked, On what grounds was George Frederic Baillairge, an employee of the Department of Public Works, placed on the superannuation list on the 1st of January, 1891.

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) Mr. Baillairge was superannuated on account of his advanced age (66 years) and his infirmities, as well as of the long period of his services.

LEASE BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT AND MESSRS. MCCARTHY.

Mr. BRUNEAU (Translation) asked, Have the Government renewed the lease existing between the Crown and the Messrs. McCarthy, of Sorel, of lands and premises held by the Mr. GIBSON.

Government at St. Joseph de Sorel? What is the date of the said new lease? What is the rental under the lease and the duration thereof? Was the lease executed by a notary, and if so, what notary?

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) The lease referred to has not yet been passed. It is intended to lease Mr. McCarthy's premises from the 1st of January last for a period of five years at a rental of $1,200 per year.

MANUFACTURERS IN SOREL.

Mr. BRUNEAU (Translation) asked, What are the names of the 128 manufacturers at Sorel, as set out in Bulletin No. 2 of the last census.

Mr. FOSTER. The information in the census schedules was obtained by sworn enumerators on the understanding that nothing but general statistical results should be published. No names nor personal particulars can therefore be communicated.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Which, I may state for the information of hon. gentlemen opposite, has always been the practice in taking the census of Canada.

JAMES HOWDEN'S SALARY.

Mr. BRUNEAU (Translation) asked, What is the salary of James Howden, an employee of the Public Works Department, and where does he reside?

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) The salary of Mr. Howden is $2,500 per annum. He resides at Ottawa, and occupies the position of Superintendent of the dredgings in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

CLAIMS OF MESSRS. C. MONGEAU, N. MONGEAU, D. MILLETTE AND M. MONGEAU.

Mr. BRUNEAU (Translation) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to pay the several balances due to Charles Mongeau, Napoleon Mongeau, Dolphis Millette and Maurice Mongeau, vessel owners, of Ste. Anne de Sorel, for carriage of stone in their vessels, in 1890, for the construction of the breakwater at Ste. Anne de Sorel. Has Mr. Berlinguet, the engineer interested with the said works, forwarded the accounts of the parties aforesaid? Are the Government aware that on the 10th of January, 1892, on the eve of the last by-election in the County of Richelieu, the following sums were paid to the parties above named on account of their claim; to Charles Mongeau, $57; to Napoleon Mongeau, $207; to Mr. Dolphis Millette, 165; to Maurice Mongeau, $75. Is there a contract between the Government and Moise Lesperance, farmer, of Ste. Anne de Sorel, for the performance of the said works? If so, what were the terms thereof?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) The Department of Public Works has no knowledge of there being any balances due to the persons named by the hon. member. Mr. Berlinguet has not sent any account. The Department of Public Works has no knowledge of any sums of money having been paid to Charles Mongeau, Napoleon Mongeau and Maurice Mongeau. On the 10th of January, 1892, a cheque was issued to the order of Dolphis Millette for the sum of $162 for stone delivered at the Yamaska dam. There is no contract between the Government and Mr. Moise Lesperance.

TUBERCULOSIS IN CATTLE.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Mulock) asked, Has the attention of the Government been called to a statement which recently appeared in portions of the press to the effect that certain cattle alleged to be suffering from tuberculosis were, on or about the 17th of February instant, slaughtered at Toronto by order of the health officer of that city? If so, what steps, if any, have the Government taken and when, in order to ascertain whether said cattle were actually affected with tuberculosis?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government has not been informed respecting the allegation in the question relating to the slaughter of cattle on the 17th instant at Toronto, affected by tuberculosis. The Government has not up to the present caused the provisions of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act to be applied to the disease of tuberculosis among cattle.

DISCHARGE OF CONSTABLE GIBEAULT.

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Choquette) asked, 1. What are the reasons which led to the discharge of Constable Gibeault of the Dominion Police? 2. Was a sworn inquiry demanded by Constable Gibeault, in relation to his dismissal? 3. If so, was it granted; and if not, why not?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON: This constable was fined for deserting his post while on duty. He retaliated by making charges against his superior officer, principally of fanaticism and partiality, which appeared on investigation to be quite unfounded. These charges were preferred in the first instance by the constable in consequence of this fine, and he requested permission to withdraw the objectionable terms in which they were stated, alleging that his letter containing the charges had been written by another for him, and that being unable to read or write he was not aware of the nature of the language which it contained. Having withdrawn the objectionable language in the charges, the charges themselves were investigated on the 6th of February, 1892, by the Deputy Minister of Justice, who reported that Gibeault had failed to substantiate them. Subsequently, on the 4th of May, 1892, he repeated the charges in the same terms as those in which they were originally stated, and asked for a further investigation. The matter was again investigated by an officer of the Department of Justice, and before the investigation was concluded the constable proposed, through his counsel, to withdraw the charges on condition of his being reinstated in his office, he having been in the meantime suspended. That was declined, and the investigation was proceeded with. After hearing all the parties concerned and their witnesses, the officer reported that the plaintiff had entirely failed to substantiate his charges. On both occasions, Gibeault was represented by counsel; and the latter practically abandoned the charge of fanaticism. It was not deemed necessary to have a sworn inquiry on statements not made under oath. Mr. Gibeault's charges appear not to have been well founded.

J. J. DAVIDSON.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, When was J. J. Davidson appointed dry goods appraiser at Montreal? What was his salary at time of appointment? Has he been transferred from Montreal to Toronto, and for what reason? Has a person named Cuthbert, of Toronto, been appointed dry goods appraiser for Montreal, and what duties is he discharging there? Has there been a young man of the name of Lavoie appointed assistant appraiser in the dry goods department in the Custom-house, Montreal? What is his salary? Has he had experience? Is he a son of one of the collectors? What experience has he had, and is he the same person who made in 1891-92, out of Customs seizures, $287.85?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. J. J. Davidson was appointed dry goods appraiser at Montreal the 1st of December, 1891. His salary at the time of appointment was $1,400 per annum; he was transferred from Montreal to Toronto because an experienced man was required to take the place of dry goods appraiser Sargeant (resigned). A person named Cuthbert, of Toronto, was not appointed dry goods appraiser for Montreal, but is now acting assistant appraiser at Montreal. A young man named Lavoie was appointed assistant appraiser in the dry goods department in the Custom-house at Montreal, at a salary of $800 per annum; he has had experience; he is not the son of one of the collectors; there is no collector at present at that port. He has had experience since 1885 in the dry goods appraiser's department, and is the same person who received in 1891-92, out of Customs seizures, the sum of $287.85.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX.

Mr. LAURIER. I would call the attention of the First Minister to the vacancy in the representation of South Middlesex. Has a returning officer been appointed and the writ issued?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, the returning officer has not been appointed and the writ has not been issued, but it will be on Saturday.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. McCARTHY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to know when we may expect the papers connected with the Manitoba School Acts to be printed and brought down?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They are all brought down. I moved last night, at the adjournment, for the printing of the first set of papers; and I intimated that if any hon. gentleman desired to have the other papers printed, he need only signify his desire and a similar motion will be made. The first set includes the petitions on which the appeal is based and the report of the sub-committee to which they were referred.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It would be very important to have the argument of the counsel before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council printed.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend was not in the House last evening when I suggested, and the First Minister agreed, to have the report of the sub-committee of the Privy Council printed with all the petitions on which that report is based. If we are to wait until the argument before the Privy Council is printed, I am afraid the delay will be too great.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He would be a bold man indeed who, at this stage of the debate, which has now lasted six days, could hope to say a great deal that was either new or interesting, and my main excuse for intruding myself upon the House at present is that I think it right to present a few statements of fact from the stand-point of the Maritime provinces. And while I do so, I do not desire the House to understand that I wish to judge the important question we are discussing from a sectional stand-point at all. I cannot, however, fail to note that the larger number of those, and properly so, who have taken part in the debate, have spoken from the two larger provinces of Canada, and each one spoke from the local stand-point of his own province, and without reference to the Maritime provinces.

Mr. LAURIER

Throughout the whole Dominion, I do not suppose there was any section, in which such great hopes were indulged at the inception of Confederation or so many prophecies of brilliant times made, as in the Maritime provinces, and I think if there is one thing both sides can agree upon, it is this, that, so far as the Maritime provinces are concerned, at any rate, not one of those promises has been fulfilled, and not any province of the three has reached forward to a measurable distance of that prosperity which was predicted and hoped for when we unfortunately joined this Confederation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hon. gentlemen interrupt me with cries of "Oh." I do not wish to disparage the efforts made to form a great nationality in this Dominion. I do not wish to blame other parts of the Dominion for the want of prosperity existing in the Maritime provinces. I am frank enough and honest enough to admit that if there is a part of the Dominion responsible for the National Policy and the evils which have followed in its train, it is the Maritime provinces. It was only a few years ago that a protectionist was something unknown in those provinces. The people had prospered under free trade, or under the nearest approach to it possible, with the debts we owed and the liabilities we had to assume; and every one knows that when the prosperity we had then under practical free trade was joined to reciprocity with the States, there was an enormous increase of wealth in that portion of the Dominion. The man in those days who would have ventured to stand up and announce himself a protectionist would have been hooted from the hustings. But, Sir, a change came over the spirit of their dream, and there is no use of blinking the fact that the National Policy has been supported for the last fourteen years with greater fervour and greater zeal by those members who come from the Maritime provinces than by any others; and if it is fraught with evil for us, if we are suffering from its effects more than the rest of the Dominion, I am frank enough to say that we have ourselves to blame. But, Sir, the National Policy is upon its trial in a way that it never was before. We have been attacking this policy year after year from this side of the House. We have been showing, each from his local stand-point, that it is a failure and an injury to the country. We, from the Maritime provinces, have shown that shipping has decreased, that land has gone down in value, that people are leaving the country and that we are poverty-stricken as compared with what we were years ago. But our cry has fallen upon deaf ears. But the National Policy is upon trial now, not only by its opponents, but in the House by its friends. We have the Order Paper covered with motions presented by its friends attacking this policy, attacking the duties on corn, coal oil, agricultural implements, binder twine, iron and other things. And, strange to say, we have a plaintive cry coming up, of all places in the world, from Cape Breton, voiced by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), who says: Touch not a single brick or the whole edifice will fall. This is a most extraordinary state of affairs. Those who are now most strenuous in their support of the National Policy are those who are being punished most severely by it. Of all places in the Dominion, Cape Breton has suffered perhaps the most. From that island there has been a greater percentage of exodus than from any other part of the Dominion.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It cannot be denied, and to-day, commercial atrophy, which is prevalent all over the Maritime provinces, is more prevalent in Cape Breton than anywhere else.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When I have finished the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity to refute what I have said, not only by saying "no," but by producing some evidence in support of his statements. In the midst of this trial of the National Policy we have the Finance Minister coming forward and putting the best face upon it. He tells us that Canada, after all, is in a state of prosperity. He does not tell us in so many words that Canada owes that prosperity to the National Policy, but he hints at that, or leaves it to be inferred, hoping that the people will draw that inference, and doing what he can to induce those who are attacking the policy to cease those attacks. His method is ingenious, but I do not know that it is one very much to be commended. The hon. gentleman takes a period of twenty years and chooses that year which has the largest amount of trade, 1892, and that which has the smallest amount of trade, 1873, and claims the difference between these two as the measure of the increased prosperity of Canada. Well, Sir, is that fair; is it a candid and honest statement to present to the public? I do not think it is. We have had our ups and downs in trade matters since 1873, but, as a matter of fact, as has been already stated in this debate, the trade of Canada to-day is very little in advance of what it was in 1873 and 1874, nearly twenty years ago. It is a most unfair thing, therefore, to take that year when the trade of Canada was at its lowest and compare it with the year 1892, and claim the difference as the measure of the country's prosperity. But, Sir, I ask the hon. gentleman to take a different line; to take a period and not one particular year. Take that unfortunate period, as hon. gentlemen opposite regard it, that period that is denounced by them as one of the most disastrous in Canadian history, the period from 1873 to 1878, and compare that with the last five years, and then judge of our prosperity. I think that is a fair view of the case. You hear hon. gentlemen say: We are all right; we are going ahead fairly well. They are satisfied with the increase in our population, satisfied with the increases which the census returns show in our manufactures. I am obliged to say, that many of these hon. gentlemen are perfectly honest in what they state, and that the difference between us arises from the difference in the point of view from which we look at it. These gentlemen are satisfied with small things. Why, Sir, if Canada is progressing in population one-fourth or even one-fifth as rapidly as it was hoped she would, and as we had a right to expect, these gentlemen say that is all right. But we are not satisfied. With the great natural material resources that Canada possesses, we had a right to hope and expect that the country would have progressed, not only in population, but also in wealth and manufactures and in output of surplus products, very much more than the statistics show she has done. Why, it would be a singular thing if, with the enormous extent of increased territory, with the enormous increase in the quantity of our lands under tillage, with the increase (though not so much as it ought to be) in our population, within the last twenty years, we should not be exporting now more than we did twenty years ago. And still, Sir, the fact is, that we are to-day exporting very little more than we were in the years 1873 and 1874.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not as much from the same territory.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My hon. friend says that from the same territory we do not export so much. No doubt he is right, for to-day we count in the exports of the great granary of the world, the North-west, which, twenty years ago, added nothing to our exports. Now, Sir, take the increase of prosperity such as the hon. gentlemen have shown to be. Is that prosperity in any way attributable to the National Policy? Was the National Policy designed to increase the export of our surplus products, or did the most enthusiastic prophet of its results or the most ardent supporter of it say that it would result in such an increase? The National Policy was to limit the exports of our surplus and to provide a home market for those products. Therefore, if there has been an increase in the exports of our products, I do not think any supporter of the National Policy can claim that it is owing to that policy. What has been that increase? Why, Sir, if you consult the Trade and Navigation Returns, and examine the details of exports, you will find that the increase is almost entirely in animals and their products. Surely the National Policy has nothing to do with that. If there had been a great increase in the output of manufactures, I could understand giving the National Policy the credit for it. But, as I understand it, there has been an increase last year of only $800,000 in manufactured products exported from this Dominion, including, in those exports, I believe, and, speaking in round numbers, a million and a quarter of settlers' effects. That has been already dwelt upon so effectively that I now only refer to it. But, while there has been this slight increase of $800,000 in the exports of manufactures, there has been an increase of over $15,000,000 in the export of farm produce and animals and their products. The hon. gentleman says that if we look to the savings banks deposits or to the deposits in the chartered banks, or, if we consider the increase in the shipping and railway mileage and freight carriage, and in the life insurance in force, we will find, in all these points, evidence to show that Canada has prospered. Well, Sir, that is a very fair argument to use and there is no doubt that these afford one sound basis to test the prosperity of the country. But, as a matter of fact, allowing for the interest on the deposits in the savings banks, the hon. gentleman knows that the cash withdrawals have largely exceeded the cash deposits. Last year over $1,000,000 was withdrawn from the savings banks more than was deposited in those institutions, and the same has been going on for several years. I do not mean to say that a very strong argument can be drawn from that, but it is a fact. The hon. gentleman says that there has been an increase in our shipping, that our railway mileage has increased, and that the goods we carry upon the railways have increased, and so on. It would be a strange thing, indeed, if, in the last decade, when we have borrowed $100,000,000 from abroad, and spent it in this country, and thereby increased the public debt to that amount, it would be a strange thing. I say, if there was not some evidence in the increased mileage of our railways and in the carriage upon those railways as a result of the spending of that enormous amount of money, and it must show itself in our bank deposits, and in many other ways. But we have danced and we have got to pay the piper; and there is no doubt that in the near future—in the present, I may say—the effects are being felt in the enormous amount of interest which we yearly have to send from this country to pay on our debt. Now, let us examine for a moment or two these census returns to see how far these statements which the hon. gentleman made—and I am going to speak almost entirely from a Maritime stand-point—are borne out by the facts. Speaking generally, we know that if Canada had held her own with regard to population, she would have had to-day over six million people; she ought to have had over six million people. She had 4,324,000, by the census of 1881, and the natural increase, and the immigrants which were brought into the country at the tax-payers' expense, if they had remained here, would make over six millions; and we have got only 4,832,000. We have lost in the ten years, in round numbers, a million and a quarter. Sir, I do not know that any Finance Minister, in the history of any British province, ever had to stand up and face such an appalling fact as that. Canada is not like an old country, where the lands are all taken up, and where the surplus population leaves the country to go abroad, seeking new fields in which to make a living. Here is a new country, a virgin soil, illimitable plains, magnificent fisheries, great coal mines, gold mines, and mines of other minerals, room for millions, a free country, a new country, with as good a constitution, I believe, as is to be found in the wide world. Nature has given it everything to induce the overtaxed people of the old world to come here; nevertheless, in ten years you have lost more people than even Napoleon lost in the costly and devastating wars he carried on during his lifetime. It is the most appalling fact, I say again, that you can meet with in the history of any British province. I do not care where, and I do not care in what period of the world, and hon. gentlemen pass it by as if it was nothing at all. Sir, I do not lay so much stress upon the fact that we lost our immigrants. I do not expect, myself, that these men, when they come to this country, would stay here. They found it a much dearer country to live in than they expected. They found that the National Policy was withering up the country, and they left it. But I do deeply regret the enormous loss which the country has sustained in its bone and sinew which have left the Maritime provinces and other parts of the Dominion. We stand to-day with a loss of from four to five hundred thousand of our native-born population in ten years, leaving the immigrants out of the question altogether. That fact is sufficient of itself to justify any man in saying that the policy which drives half a million people away from the country in ten years must be a ruinous policy. Now, Sir, how are we in the Maritime provinces?—I said I was going to speak from that stand-point. In 1871 we had 767,000 people there; in 1881 we had 870,000; in 1891 we had 880,000. Well, what does that show? There ought to have been an increase in the last decade of 175,000. We are not troubled, Mr. Speaker, in the argument, on this branch of the case with an influx of any immigrants at all, we have no immigrants down there. We are dealing with the population and the natural increase of the population of these three provinces. Well, we should have had an increase of 175,000 in ten years. How many have we had? A pitiable 10,000. We have lost in ten years, in those three Maritime provinces alone, 165,000 people, and all of them in the prime of life, the bone and sinew of the country, the people who made the country, and if they had continued to remain here, would have made it prosperous. But oh, it is said, this is a natural thing. Everybody leaves here and goes to the west. People leave the country and go to the cities. Is that the case with us? Not at all, because if you take the three chief cities in the Maritime provinces, the chief city in each province, St. John, Halifax and Charlottetown, you will find their aggregate population in 1881 was 73,712, in 1891 it was 74,113, a gain in the ten years of 400 people in the three chief cities of the Maritime provinces. Why, Sir, an increase of 2 per cent a year ought to have given us an increase of very nearly 15,000 people, but we have lost in that ten years out of these cities alone—and I am confining my argument for the moment to the cities, to meet the argument which was advanced that the people are going from the country to the cities—we have lost 14,500 people from these three cities in the Maritime provinces. Sir, can you wonder that people come here and complain; can you wonder that we have been lifting up your voices year after year in denouncing the policy which has brought about, and is bringing about, such dreadful results? Now, that was not so in old times. Take the previous decade from 1871 to 1881. The increase in that period in the three Maritime provinces should have been 153,000, and it was actually 103,000; or we lost in that decade 50,000 people, or 5,000 a year. That was bad enough; but what was the last decade in comparison with it? Instead of losing 50,000 we lost 165,000, or 16,500 a year. The exodus which went on in the Maritime provinces between 1871 and 1881 was trebled between 1881 and 1891, and I suppose there is no part of the great world itself so favoured by nature, from which there has been such an exodus and a desertion as from those three provinces. I do not wonder, and I do not blame the young men. I am in a position to be consulted by a great many of them, and I do my best to try and keep them at home; but what inducements have we got to offer them? Our wharfs are bare of shipping. I am old enough to remember when an enormous shipping trade was carried on from all these cities I have spoken of; when the harbours were alive with square-rigged ships, when hundreds and thousands of labourers were employed on those wharfs; but the wharfs are empty now, the warehouses are vacant, and many of them are going into decay; and I say that he is not a true patriot, coming from the Maritime provinces, who, either by thought, word or deed, supports the cursed system which has brought this about.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman swears. He says "cursed."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Cursed, yes; accursed of God and man.

Mr. FOSTER. Don't speak of any one else but yourself.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would not speak for you. The hon. gentleman stated that we ought to be proud, that we ought to congratulate ourselves upon the marvellous increase in the shipping of this Dominion, that there had been such an enormous increase in the tonnage of the shipping employed in carrying off the produce of this Dominion. So far, so good. There has, no doubt, been an increase; but is it an increase upon which we ought to congratulate ourselves? Let us examine the figures and see. In 1873 the registered shipping of this Dominion was 1,073,718 tons; in 1878 it had reached high-water mark, and was 1,333,015 tons, being an increase of 259,297 tons in those five years. That, according to the figures from which the Marine Department make up the value of this shipping, gave an increase in value of $7,778,000. The National Policy came in, and this shipping stands to-day at 964,149 tons, a decrease since 1878 of 363,866 tons, in value $11,000,000. That is a nice showing for the Maritime provinces: the registered shipping of the Dominion has decreased during that period over $11,000,000, three-quarters of that loss belonging to the Maritime provinces, as any one can see who looks at the figures. Our ship-building as an industry is wiped out; it is at an end. We built last year only 52,000 tons, as compared with 190,000 tons in 1873. But take the figures the hon. gentleman himself has submitted. The return of sea-going vessels entering and clearing at Canadian ports, which shows an increase apparently on the face of the figures, does not afford cause for unmixed satisfaction. I make that assertion because the increase is entirely in foreign ships. So far as Canadian ships are concerned, the figures do not show an increase: we are in a stationary condition, and the percentage of Canadian goods exported and carried in our own ships is very much less than it was eight or ten years ago. What are the figures? In 1879 we had 6,088,000 tons of shipping and 1,865,000 tons weight of freight carried. Of that quantity, Canadian bottoms carried 667,000 tons, or 35½ per cent. In 1891 the aggregate trade increased to 10,695,000 tons of shipping, carrying 3,129,000 tons of freight, of which Canadian bottoms carried 683,116 tons, just the same quantity of freight carried in 1879, and just the same tonnage of Canadian ships carrying it. So, whereas the percentage we carried in 1879 was 35·55 in Canadian vessels, to-day we carry 21·83 per cent, Canadian tonnage employed in 1879 was 1,736,000 tons; in 1891, 1,791,000 tons. So hon. members will see there has been no increase so far as Canadian bottoms are concerned, that our tonnage is the same, that we are carrying the same quantity of freight, and that all our increased exports are being carried in foreign bottoms. What does that mean? To-day, of the total sea-borne trade of the country, 80 per cent is carried in foreign bottoms, and 20 in Canadian ships. So this means that the profits derived from the trade are going to foreigners, that the men employed in transporting our surplus exports are foreigners, that the money made out of the carrying trade goes into the pockets of foreigners, and not into Canadian pockets. I consider the Minister of Finance was hardly fair in comparing 1892 with 1878, and it would have been fairer to have compared the five years of famine, as they were called, when the Liberal party were in power, with the last five years, when the country was supposed to be enjoying a period of prosperity. If this comparison were made, what would be the result? Canadian imports: 1873 to 1878, $536,000,000; Customs tax, $68,000,000; 1888 to 1892, imports, $592,000,000; Customs tax, $114,000,000, the increase in imports being $56,000,000, and in Customs tax, $56,000,000. How did the trade in the Maritime provinces during those five years compare with the last five years? The total trade from 1874 to 1878 was, Nova Scotia, $86,344,000; New Brunswick, $73,238,000; Prince Edward Island, $15,184,000, or a total, during the five years from 1874 to 1878, of $174,767,000. Between 1888 and 1892 the total trade of Nova Scotia was $94,755,000; New Brunswick, $63,783,000; Prince Edward Island, $8,631,000, or a total of $167,145,000, showing a decrease in the total trade of those three provinces during the five years of $7,622,474. Comment on those figures is unnecessary. Instead of increasing, we are decreasing, not only in population, but in the aggregate of our trade, exports and imports, and everybody who knows anything about the Maritime provinces knows that the figures bear out the facts. So the House will see that the province from which I come, which had a total trade during the five years from 1874 to 1878 of over $15,000,000, has been reduced during the last five years to $9,000,000. I do not mean to say there is that actual reduction. I think interprovincial trade accounts for some of it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It would be something awful if we had a falling off to the extent of one-half in our total trade during the last five years, as compared with the period from 1873 to 1878. It is bad enough as it is—I do not want to colour it. If I have any object in life, it is to make things look as well as they can be made to appear in the Maritime provinces. All I have in the world, all I hope to have, is centred there. It is my home, and in all probability it will continue to be my home for the rest of my life, and if I have any aspiration, it is to make my home as beautiful, thriving and prosperous as possible. That is my desire and hope. I do not come here to preach blue ruin, to present a black picture to this House; but I come here to tell hon. gentlemen facts, and not to hide them, and I say the man who desires to approach statesmanship and submit measures to improve the condition of the country must know what is its actual condition before he can bring forward the necessary measures of relief. I say any attempt to hide or cover the existing state of facts in any part of the Dominion is dishonest and unfair. I

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

speaking these words in soberness, I speak them in sorrow. I regret to have to put this picture before the House. I regret that the people are leaving the Maritime provinces in hordes, as if a plague were there. I regret more than that, that the only member of the House who can be found to cheer the statement is the hon. member for Cape Breton, who sits opposite me. The hon. gentleman thinks it is fine fun, no doubt, but it is not fine fun for that part of the country; and it is not a matter for congratulation to any true lover of his country who comes from that part of the Dominion, to observe the discreditable showing which its trade makes in the Public Accounts. As to the population, the House has already received figures. It would be interesting to go into some of the details if time permitted. One of the most interesting features is, that the three counties in the Maritime provinces which show the greatest exodus are the three counties represented by the three important members of the Administration, the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine. King's, N.B., shows an actual loss of population of 2,527 in a population of 25,000 odd. Antigonish shows an actual loss of 1,948 in a population of 18,000. Pictou, 994 in a population of 34,000. Now, Sir, if these three counties had retained their natural increase alone, without a single immigrant going in, how would they have stood? King's County would have gained 4,618, and, if you add that to the actual loss sustained, it shows that during these ten years 7,145 people have fled from the county which the hon. Minister of Finance represents. That is prosperity. In Antigonish the increase would have been 3,600, but the decrease has actually been 1,948, or 5,548 have fled from that county. In Pictou the increase should have been 6,900, but, as a matter of fact, there was a decrease of 994, and so 7,894 fled from that county; or over 20,000 people fled the past ten years from the three counties represented by the three Ministers. Yet, Sir, these gentlemen insist upon telling us down by the sea, when this decimating process is going on, that we ought to feel satisfied with the condition of affairs. However, I am sure the House is more interested in dealing with what is to come in the future than with what has gone by, and we have to look at what the Government proposes to do about it. The other night the Finance Minister spoke as the oracle spoke of old, and his remarks can be interpreted to mean anything that anybody likes. I suppose he congratulates himself upon the fact that he used language so nebulous and so mystic that come what will, and whether he makes a tariff revision or not, he will be able to show that there was nothing in his speech inconsistent with his action. Those who hope for a revision of the tariff, if they are optimistic, may read between the lines and find a sort of promise, and those National Policy men who want to adhere to the policy as it is—

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—of whom there is a representative in the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron)—

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—they can find comfort in the statement of the Finance Minister also. But, Sir, for those who believe that the time has come when there should be a thorough revision of the tariff, I am afraid there is not much hope. I do not propose to discuss—and I am sure members will be glad to hear it—many of the figures contained in our Trade Returns, or to single out many articles and discuss whether the duty should be removed from them or not. I have a great deal of sympathy with those members who object to the tariff being interfered with in detail. I think the National Policy, as a whole, ought to be sustained as a whole, or put down as a whole. I do not think it is fair to take, for instance, coal oil, and remove the duty from that, and to leave other duties equally bad and equally indefensible alone. I do not think it is fair to single out cotton and to remove the duty from that article, while an equally indefensible duty is left on other articles.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Nor to single out pork.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Nor pork, as the hon. gentleman says. We have had the cotton question discussed in this House with an ability and thoroughness which leaves nothing to be desired. My hon. friend (Mr. Edgar) who took the question up, has thoroughly exposed the rottenness of the existing system, and if the only answer that can be given to him, is the answer given by the hon. member from Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), I predict, Sir, a very short reign for the cotton lords in this country. We have had the coal oil question discussed in a very able manner, and I do not propose to deal with that, but I propose for a moment to call the attention of the House to the question of iron, which has not received that attention which it ought to, and the reason I propose to call the attention of the House to it is, because I was struck at the time the iron duties were introduced, with the magnificent promises and predictions which were made by Sir Charles Tupper. But, Sir, 'ex uno disce omnes,' and as the National Policy has been a failure with regard to iron so it has with others. We were told by Sir Charles Tupper at that time when the iron duties were increased, that prosperity was to flow all over the Dominion, that blast furnaces were to be opened in Carleton, N.B., and in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and along the shores of the lakes, and away up in the Northwest and over in British Columbia. Twenty thousand able-bodied people, representing a population of 100,000, were to be brought into this county; the balance of trade was to be rectified, and, when the copestone, in the guise of increased duties on iron, as he told us, was put on the National Policy arch, there was to be nothing but peace and prosperity from one end of the Dominion to the other. There were reasons given why this should be the case. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman who introduced the iron duties told us, that if we adopted in this country the policy of the United States Government and protected the iron industry, there were special reasons in Canada why it should grow as no other industry ever grew. He told us that we had here the coal, and the iron, and more than that, we had the fluxes, and the country which had iron and coal and fluxes together, could not help but become a great manufactory of iron products. Hon. gentlemen who were not in the House at that time may think I am exaggerating, but I took the trouble this morning to go through the Budget speech of 1887 made by the hon. gentleman who is now High Commissioner in England, and I propose to give the House one or two short extracts from it, to show the arguments which were used to induce the members of this House to tax the people of this country, nearly a million dollars extra per year for the ostensible reason that we are going to build up a great iron industry here. When he proposed an increase of the iron duties in 1887, Sir Charles said :

The time is not long since, when charcoal iron was one of the most important industries in Ontario and Quebec. I have no hesitation in saying that if the protection we have given to cotton and woollen, and all other industries of Canada be applied to iron to-morrow, it will show what the past history of Canada has shown, that these charcoal iron industries will again be in full blast, and that in Ontario and Quebec they will become most essential and important industries to-morrow as they were in days gone by.

He was not going to wait a year, but the very day after the duty came into force we were going to have blast furnaces established all along the line throughout Quebec and Ontario. A little further on in his speech he says :

Now, charcoal iron from bog iron ore was formerly an important industry both in Ontario and Quebec, and charcoal iron was also made in Carleton, N.B., where to-day, under a policy of fostering the industry in the same way as the cotton, woolen and other industries have been fostered, that blast furnace in Carleton would again be lighted up, and would be the foundation of a new and extensive industry in the province of New Brunswick.

I would like to ask the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Colter), how long the blast furnace has been going on in his county ?

Mr. COLTER. We cannot see it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, nor nobody else ; but the country has paid an enormous sum of money because this House yielded to the arguments with which the hon. gentleman succeeded in foisting these iron duties upon us. Then he went on to rectify the balance of trade ; that was the next thing he was going to do. As to that, he said :

If you subtract the amount of imports paid by Canada for iron to sustain the iron industries of other countries, you will find it is nearly equal to the amount by which our imports have exceeded our exports : and if you want to balance the trade of the country, if you want to have no outgoing beyond the incoming of the country, cut the gordian knot, put the iron industry upon the same footing and foundation that you have put all the other industries of Canada, and you will sweep away to a large extent the balance of trade which stands recorded against Canada up to the present time.

Why, Sir, there was nothing in the world that this gentleman could not do, if we would only allow him to tax the people on the iron they used. He goes on—and I want to embalm it in “Hansard,” so that it will be easily accessible—to say further :

What I propose to ask this House to do in adopting the policy of vitalizing this great industry for Canada is to take the duty off anthracite coal and make it free. The moment that is done we shall have blast furnaces at Cobourg, Weller's Bay and Kingston, at all events, served by anthracite coal, making that description of anthracite iron which is so highly valued. * * *

I think when I have given the distances I shall have settled the problem that nothing will be easier than to establish blast furnaces in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario by which we can not only manufacture unlimited quantities of charcoal iron, but manufacture the iron by the use of anthracite coal. * * *

Now, Sir, you may ask me what about the great North-west.

He had settled the rest of Canada, he had established blast furnaces everywhere, and now he was going out westward, and going by rail too.

Well, Sir, it is well known that you have in the North-west the most boundless supply of coal to be found in any part of this Dominion. And you have not only 50,000 square miles of this bituminous coal in the great North-west, but you have in Big Island, in Lake Winnipeg, a valuable deposit of iron ore and any quantity of timber to make charcoal to convert it into iron. All it requires is the adoption of this policy in order to establish at an early day, industries for the manufacture of iron in the North-west, as well as in other portions of the country. And what more? Across the Rocky Mountains, need I tell you that in British Columbia you have one of the most magnificent deposits of iron ore on Texada Island that is to be found in any place in the world, and that you have in Nanaimo coal fields to furnish fuel to put blast furnaces in operation at an early day. I say that with the prospect of opening up trade with Australia, with China and Japan : although I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, I believe that at no distant day you will have in the province of British Columbia an iron industry built up which will compare favourably with that of any other industry in this country.

Mr. PRIOR. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Sir, I have never had the pleasure or the honour of being in British Columbia, but I call upon the hon. gentleman to tell this House how many blast furnaces have been established there since these iron duties were put on.

Some hon. MEMBERS. How many ?

Mr. PRIOR. Wages are too high there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Now, Sir, the hon. Finance Minister of that day, the present High Commissioner, having established blast furnaces all along the line right out to British Columbia, proceeds to put population into the country. He goes on in these words :

Now, Sir, the result is that by the adoption of this policy you will give permanent employment to an army of men numbering at least 20,000, increasing our population from 80,000 to 100,000 souls, and affording the means of supporting them in comfort and prosperity. * * * Now this estimate of 100,000 souls does not take into account the manufacture of castings and forgings, cutlery and edged tools, hardware, machinery or engines and steel rails. Were we to manufacture these, and there is no reason we should not steadily progress to that point, the population I have mentioned of 100,000 souls would be no less than trebled.

Well, Sir, I admired the hon. gentleman's modesty because he did not want to treble the 100,000 souls just then ; he was willing to leave that for a few years. But here you had in 1887 a balance of trade redressed ; you had 20,000 men living in prosperity, representing 100,000 souls, added to the population ; you had blast furnaces established from Carleton county, N.B., all through Quebec and Ontario, along the prairies of the north-west, across the Rocky Mountains, and flourishing in British Columbia as they did nowhere else. But, Sir, in one of those weak moments for which this House ought to be punished, it yielded to the vote of the siren—yielded to his arguments and his seductive promises, and allowed him to levy on the poor tax-payers of this country increased taxes which since then have ranged at nearly $1,000,000 a year. And what was it all done for, Sir? I am now going to ask the House for one short moment to compare the promises with the performances. Sir, all this was done to build up the pig iron industry, to enable us to make pig iron in this country, and to compel the people to buy it at prices much higher than they could buy it from abroad. We gave in the first place a bounty ; then we levied a high duty on imported pig iron, amounting to a total protection of $6 a ton. We were going to produce all the pig iron we needed in this country. What are the facts? In 1887, the year the duties were imposed, we produced 39,728 tons ; in 1891 we produced 13,400 tons ; and in 1892 we produced 20,200 tons. Why, Sir, the production of pig iron has been reduced almost one-half, notwithstanding the fact that you have taxed the people so enormously in order to obtain an increased output of that article. Then, the importations of pig iron in 1887 were 45,000 tons, and in 1892, 68,918 tons. So that while we have produced only one-half of what we did before, we have very largely increased our imports. Sir, what was the effect of putting this increased duty upon iron? In 1887 we imported $9,746,667 worth of iron on which we paid a duty of $2,168,392 ; in 1888 we imported $9,757,204 worth, on which we paid $2,932,151, or an increased duty of $840,000. Without wearying the House with the details, I will give the results. In 1889 the increased duty was $966,000, and in 1891 and 1892 it was about $900,000. Sir, this country has paid to the tune of nearly $4,000,000 extra in the shape of taxes, since 1887, upon iron and steel and the manufactures of those articles, with the hope that some few of the promises which were clothed in such magnificent language by the Finance Minister of that day would be brought about; and yet to-day, Sir, we stand barren of the promised results; we have neither the people nor the furnaces. Sir, it was the same with reference to every other article. The House has been humbugged, the people have been fooled, the money has been taken out of their pockets; and tariff revision, which ought not to be postponed to the distant future, but at once taken in hand, ought to be applied to iron, as well as to cotton, to coal oil and to other articles. The hon. gentleman was anxious at a certain stage of this debate to know what the Opposition were going to do. I think he was told by the financial leader the direction which his tariff revision was going to take, and I am quite satisfied that there is not a man in the House who calmly and coolly looks at these figures but is convinced in his own mind, though his party allegiance compels him to vote the other way, that it was a scandal and a disgrace to this Parliament to impose these taxes on the people; and now that they know the wretched results, they ought to be prepared to revise the tariff and lower all these duties to their former figures. Now, I want to say a word or two as to the policy the Government has indicated, and as to the references which the hon. Finance Minister has made to preferential trade and reciprocity. With regard to preferential trade, I am sorry that my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) is not in his place to-day. There is no gentleman in the House whom I more admire for his earnestness and sincerity than the hon. gentleman from Bruce (Mr. McNeill). He is the leader of a small band in this House and this country, who hope to obtain, at some period or another, preferential trade with Great Britain; who hope that Great Britain will tax the corn of all other countries and let Canada's in free, and who, when she does that, are prepared to graciously condescend to reduce the differential duties we now impose on British goods in favour of Canadian manufactures. Well, the hon. gentleman was treated to about twenty minutes of taffy by the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance did not want to say anything very harsh; he did not tell the hon. gentleman that the whole thing was a screaming farce, but he told him it was not practicable, and any man in his senses, who takes up the blue-books and looks at the proportion which Canada has of Great Britain's total tariff, will see how ridiculous the thing is. Great Britain imported, in 1891, £420,691,997 sterling worth of goods. How much of this did Canada send her? Just 3 per cent, or £12,600,000 worth. The entire British possessions sent, £96,161,214 sterling worth, or 23 per cent, and the foreign world sent 77 per cent; yet the hon. gentleman actually asks that the foreign trade of Great Britain, which is such an enormous proportion of the whole, should be taxed in order to foster the colonial trade which is such an infinitesimal proportion. In 1891, Great Britain imported 13,262,592 quarters of wheat. Of this Canada sent 634,768 quarters, or a little more than 5 per cent, and yet Great Britain is asked to tax 95 per cent of the wheat which goes into her country in order to encourage the 5 per cent coming from Canada. The thing need only be stated to show its absurdity. Of flour Great Britain imported 3,349,600 quarters, of which 2,740,607 came from the United States, and Great Britain is to tax that, in order that the very small proportion which comes from Canada should have the preference in her markets and her people have the privilege of paying higher prices. In 1890, Great Britain exported £263,530,585 sterling worth of goods, of which British North America took £7,225,911 worth, or less than 3 per cent. Our trade with Great Britain is less than 3 per cent of her total trade, and yet it is really by sensible men argued in this House that the policy should be urged on Great Britain of taxing 97 per cent of her trade in order to encourage the 3 per cent which comes from Canada. The thing is so ridiculous that the facts need only be stated to expose its absurdity.

Mr. FOSTER. Nobody proposes that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I had hopes that my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) who made a tour through Great Britain last year and told the people of Great Britain that Canada was unanimous in favour of his resolution, would explain to the House how he justified that statement. Canada is by no means unanimous in supporting his resolution. A very large number of Canadians think that the tax imposed by Canada on British goods and the discrimination shown against British manufactures in favour of Canadian manufactures is unjust and improper, and think that tax should be reduced, and a large number of the members of this House put themselves on record here last year in that direction; but I was not aware that the majority, or that a large proportion even of the people of Canada were in favour of the policy which the hon. member for Bruce advocates. I want to call the attention of the House, before closing my lengthy remarks, to the question of reciprocity, which, to my mind, is the greatest and most important that can be raised in the Parliament of this Dominion. Of this I am satisfied, that in the Maritime provinces there is no question which is so much discussed as reciprocal trade with the United States. How does this question stand? There has been—I was going to use a stronger word—a malignant attempt to falsify and misrepresent the policy of this side of the House upon that question the last three or four years. Hon. gentlemen on this side are sincerely desirous of obtaining reciprocal trade with the States; but I do not think there ever was a sentiment uttered by any responsible leader on this side, which indicated that we were prepared to accept a treaty sacrificing the independence of Canada. We desire a treaty and the broadest treaty that can be obtained, but a treaty consistent with the commercial and political independence of Canada. Why, my hon. friend himself, the leader of our party, when he went down to Boston a few years ago, and spoke at the great gathering there, told his hearers and through the press, the American nation, that, anxious and eager as the Liberal party were to obtain an honourable and a fair trade treaty, they were not prepared to sacrifice their political allegiance to Great Britain or their political independence to secure it. The sentiment has been expressed time and again by the Liberal leaders, and hon. gentlemen opposite, when we first tabled our proposition with regard to reciprocity, at once adopted an unfair and a disingenuous course, when they alleged that the policy would involve the surrender by Canada of its commercial or political independence. Sir, we desired unrestricted reciprocity. We were like the late Finance Minister, who desired to go to the United States absolutely unfettered, and we used the term "unrestricted reciprocity." We stated to the Americans: We want to discuss the matter with you without being tied or trammelled in any way. We are not afraid to discuss it. We want an unrestricted discussion of the whole question; we want to deal with every article, face to face, as one business man deals with another. That was our proposition. We did not expect to obtain reciprocal trade in every single article. Not at all. What we hoped to get was as broad and generous a measure as was consistent with the well-being and at the same time with the commercial and political independence of this country.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Unrestricted discussion and unrestricted reciprocity are two different things.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman may please himself with drawing any distinction he likes. He has heard this side of the House give their statement of the policy, and it is the same I am using now—from year to year. We hoped for the broadest measure of free trade that may be obtained. We are prepared, in order to obtain that, to send commissioners or plenipotentiaries to Washington who will be perfectly untrammelled, but there is this always to be said, that when they do negotiate a treaty that treaty must never go into operation until it is laid before and approved by the people of Canada. What were we told? I say that hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for sowing in the minds of the American people the false idea that one-half of the people of this country are disloyal. In order to gain their paltry party triumph, they did not scruple to tell the American people that one-half the Canadian people were disloyal, and that the Canadian Liberal party was a disloyal party. They did that for the mean, unworthy purpose of obtaining power, and there is prevailing to-day all over the United States, as a direct result of the libel of these hon. gentlemen opposite, the idea that the Liberal party are false to their Queen and their country. It is not true, and some hon. gentlemen opposite have the generosity to-day to say so. There never has been any appreciable section of people in the Maritime provinces at least in favour of annexation. Not one section of that country, I would not say not one man, because every shade of opinion has some advocates, but no appreciable proportion of men with us favour this policy. It was always so. The people want to live under the constitution they have now, under the flag they have now, and God helping them, they are determined to do it. And these gentlemen opposite who went about slandering the party to which I belong, slandering one-half the people, knew that it was false at the time they said it, and knew they said it for the contemptible and unworthy purpose of creeping into power again. What has been the history of this question? If one wanted to indulge in reprisals upon this question of the assimilation of the tariffs of the two countries it could be shown that the hon. gentleman's political god was the man who proposed it, not once only, but two or three times. Why, Sir, is it not on record that in 1864 the Government, led by Sir John Macdonald, of which Mr. Galt was Finance Minister, proposed to the American Government to assimilate the tariffs of Customs and Excise duties of Canada with the Customs and the Excise duties of the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. One tariff around both countries?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it not true that that was proposed? Is it not true, also, that Hon. George Brown, the leader of the Liberal party, left Sir John Macdonald because of that very proposal?

Mr. FOSTER. You assume that?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does anybody doubt it? Sir, I will appeal to the record. I say that in the year 1874, Hon. George Brown, standing in the Senate, deliberately stated that he left the Government led by Sir John Macdonald in 1864-65, because of the attempt made by that Government to assimilate the Customs and Excise duties of this country with those of the United States. The words he used were these:

I was not willing that the customs and excise duties of Canada should be assimilated to the prohibitory rates of the United States—and very especially was I unwilling that any such arrangement should be entered into with the United States, dependent on the frail tenure of reciprocal legislation, repealable at any moment at the caprice of either party. * * * My colleagues determined to proceed in the manner I deprecated; I could not be responsible for such a policy; and to avoid responsibility for it, I resigned office.

Afterwards, in 1870, a formal proposition was made by Sir John Macdonald's Government to the United States of America. The proposition contained a number of items, and among them one for the assimilation of our Customs and Excise duties to those of the United States. Hon. George Brown said that he read the "projet," that he saw a copy of it; he declared that, in the Senate, and it is there on record to this day. What did we propose? Did we propose anything of that kind? No. We did not advocate commercial union. Whatever may be its advantages or disadvantages, that has never been proposed by the Liberal party of this country. I do not wish to be tiresome by repeating myself, but it cannot be made too plain that our object was to institute negotiations having for their object the largest measure of free trade that could be obtained consistently with the dignity and independence of this country. Well, Sir, what did the Finance Minister do? He told us in this House time and again, and he told the people of the country from every platform upon which he stood, that our proposition practically meant commercial union, that it meant the assimilation of our tariff to that of the United States, and that it could not be otherwise.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Reciprocity of tariffs.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman said that our proposal meant a uniform tariff, and that that uniform tariff must be the tariff of the United States.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Reciprocity of tariffs.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not dealing with the hon. gentleman who interrupts me; I have paid my respects to him before. He should remember that there are others in the House who have to be dealt with besides himself. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) taught his followers to adopt the same line of argument, and I will undertake to say that throughout this broad Dominion there was not a platform on which reciprocity with the United States was discussed, but the statement was made by the Minister of Finance or one of his friends that our proposal practically meant commercial union and the adoption of a uniform tariff and that the prohibitory tariff of the United States. I believe that the narrow majority which they obtained at the last general election was gained because the people believed that statement. The people thought the Liberal policy necessarily involved a uniform tariff, in the first place, and, in the second place, that that tariff must be the prohibitory tariff of the United States, and the people said: We will not have it, because, if we accept that, better have commercial union and save all the expense and trouble of the line of Custom-houses between the two countries. Now, Sir, what is the fact? The hon. gentleman had made up his mind that it must be so. He went to the people and told the people, in the famous manifesto put forth by the Government: If we are returned to power we will get a reciprocity treaty, or, at least, try for one.

Mr. FOSTER. That is better.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes; and there was not one of your supporters but told the people you would get it. I know that on every platform on which I stood, my opponents, the speakers on the other side, invariably declared: We are for the reciprocity treaty of 1854, with the enlargements and modifications which the change of circumstances have made necessary; we will put in lists of manufactures as well as natural products; our party has been invited to Washington to discuss the question of reciprocity. The lie was told at Toronto and was taken up by every Conservative newspaper, and repeated on every platform, and the people, believing what was told them, believing that the party in power had been invited to Washington to negotiate a broad, a generous treaty of reciprocity, involving more than the treaty of 1854, sent them back to power to carry on these negotiations. Why, Sir, we know that there was nothing those gentlemen scrupled to say in order to gain power. They stooped so low that even their High Commissioner made a statement which he was only too glad to retract when he got to Washington, only too glad to get down on his knees and apologize for. Talk about national humiliation! Canada was never humiliated as she was on that occasion. Think of it! Her High Commissioner, the second in command in the Government, ex-Finance Minister of the country, obliged to say to the authorities at Washington: It is true I carried the election in my country by telling the people that you had invited me here to negotiate a treaty; the statement was false; I knew it to be false when I made it, and I now humbly apologize. That was practically what was done. Humiliation was heaped upon Canada in order that the Tory party might save their offices. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, having made up his mind that these things were involved in the policy of the Liberal party, went to Washington; and he came back, as we all know, empty-handed. He came back, Sir, not only without furthering the cause which we have at heart, but after putting all the obstacles in the way of it he possibly could. The hon. gentleman came back to this House and made a statement, and I appeal to hon. members of independent cast of mind on both sides of this House to say whether this House or the country has been treated by the hon. gentleman in a spirit of fair-play in this matter. There is a record in existence, and they acknowledge it, a record of what they said and of what proposals they made, of the manner in which their proposals were received and of the counter-proposals made on the other side. That record the people of this country are entitled to. That record should have been laid on the Table of this House long since. That record would long ago have been laid on the Table of this House, if there were not good reasons for withholding it.

Mr. FOSTER. That is self-evident.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And the hon. gentleman knows the reasons, and I am going to show him that those reasons are not unknown to us. We know perhaps a little more than he thinks. The hon. gentleman came to this House and told us that he had seen Mr. Blaine and that Mr. Blaine had said that there must be a uniform tariff and that tariff must be the tariff of the United States. He said also that Mr. Blaine had declared that there must be discrimination against the mother country, and so on. But in order that I may not misrepresent the hon. gentleman, I will read from the revised copy of his tariff speech, in which he referred to this matter. Having given details, he summed it all up, and I suppose the summing up will be sufficient. The hon. gentleman said :

I think it is only necessary for me to put in brief the results, and they are simply these : that so long as the present party and the present policy is maintained in the United States, in one branch or the other of the Legislature or in the Executive, we cannot hope for any treaty with the United States, except upon these lines, viz., a treaty which will take in both natural products and manufactured goods ; a treaty unlimited in its scope—

“Unlimited in its scope,” mark you.

—of which the basis is a preferential treatment in our market with discrimination especially against Great Britain and against other countries ; a treaty that must be accompanied by a uniform tariff, and this tariff equalized with that of the United States of America. These are in brief the results which have been arrived at.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the House will see that the hon. gentleman stated five distinct things as essentially necessary ; first, that the treaty should be unlimited in its scope ; second, that it should discriminate against Great Britain ; third, that it should provide for a uniform tariff ; fourth, that such uniform tariff should be that of the United States of America, and fifth, that it should embrace natural products and manufactured goods. So far as the statement was made by him that the treaty must embrace manufactured goods as well as natural products, there is no doubt the hon. gentleman was correct. No sane man, on either side of the House, believes that it was possible to negotiate a treaty in natural products only ; but that is the proposal that hon. gentlemen went there with, and that is the proposal they made to Mr. Blaine, simply a treaty in natural products, as I will prove to him in a moment. Sir, I do not want to accuse the Finance Minister of wilful misrepresentation : I trust I have too much respect for him and for myself to make a charge on the floor of this House, that he would stand up here and wilfully state that which he did not believe to be true. But what I am leading the House to is this : that the hon. gentleman had argued himself into a state of mind that all these things must inevitably follow, and he says they did follow ; but it was all a figment of his imagination. I say it was not required that there should be a uniform tariff ; I say it was not required that the treaty should be unlimited in its scope ; I say it was not required that we should adopt the tariff of the United States of America—I say that not one of these three things were required of us by the United States in the negotiations which took place ; and I am speaking by the book, too ; I know what I am saying. I hold in my hand here—for although we have been treated with disrespect and want of courtesy by gentlemen opposite, although the Government have deliberately and for their own purposes, withheld the record, we have access to the records laid before Congress by the Government of the United States. I hold in my hand now the official statement made to the President, and transmitted by him to Congress, signed by James G. Blaine, the late Secretary of State, in which that gentleman details the whole of this interview, and says what he required, and what proposals the other gentlemen made, and what counter proposals he submitted ; and I propose, with the indulgence of the House, to read that to the House, and I state that not one of the three things which the hon. gentleman stated were essential, were ever referred to or demanded by Mr. Blaine at all. This report is dated Washington, 15th April, 1892, and is addressed to the President. The first part of it, leading up to the interview, I suppose it is unnecessary to read. Afterwards, Mr. Blaine says :

At the first conference, on February 10th, the commissioners stated that they were authorized by the Canadian Government to propose the renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 (which was terminated in 1886 by the action of the Congress of the United States), with such modifications and extensions as the altered circumstances of both countries and their respective interests might seem to require.

In answer to an inquiry, the commissioners stated that the modifications or extensions contemplated in the schedules of articles, should be confined to natural products and should not embrace manufactured articles.

The commissioners were informed that the Government of the United States would not be prepared to renew the treaty of 1854, nor to agree upon any commercial reciprocity which should be confined to natural products alone ; and that, in view of the great development of industrial interests in the United States, and of the changed conditions of the commercial relations of the two countries since the treaty of 1854 was negotiated, it was regarded of essential importance that a list of manufactured goods should be included in the schedules of articles for free or favoured exchange in any reciprocity arrangement which might be made.

The commissioners then inquired if the Government of the United States would expect to have preferential treatment extended to the list of manufactured goods of the United States on their introduction into Canada by virtue of a reciprocity treaty, or whether it would regard the Canadian Government as at liberty to extend the same favours to the manufactured goods of other countries not parties to the treaty on their introduction into Canada.

The reply given to them was that it was the desire of the Government of the United States to make a reciprocity convention which would be exclusive in its application to the United States and Canada, and that other countries which were not parties to it, should not enjoy gratuitously the favours which the two neighbouring countries might reciprocally concede to each other for valuable considerations, and with a large sacrifice of their respective revenues.

Upon receiving this reply, the Canadian commissioners asked that the further consideration of the subject be adjourned till another conference, to enable them to consult as to the course which they would adopt in view of the foregoing declarations.

In the conference of the 11th the Canadian commissioners stated that they had given careful consideration to the suggestion that manufactured goods should be included in the schedule of articles for exchange in a reciprocity convention, and to the desire expressed by the Government of the United States that such American goods, on their introduction into Canada, should be afforded preferential treatment over similar goods from other countries; and they announced, with an expression of regret, that they did not consider it possible to meet the expectations of the Government of the United States in these respects. In the first place, they encountered a serious obstacle in the matter of revenue. If any considerable list of manufactured goods of the United States should be admitted free into Canada it would entail a material loss to the Dominion treasury, and if the same favours were likewise extended to the merchandise of other countries the loss of revenue would be much greater. They felt that they would not be able to recoup these losses by other methods of taxation. In the second place, it seemed to be impossible for the Canadian Government, in view of its present political relations and obligations, to extend to American goods a preferential treatment over those of other countries. As Canada was a part of the British Empire, they did not consider it competent for the Dominion Government to enter into any commercial arrangement with the United States from the benefits of which Great Britain and its colonies should be excluded.

The announcement of these conclusions of the Canadian commissioners was accepted as a bar to further negotiations on this subject, and it was not again discussed except in connection with the fishing privileges on the Atlantic coast.

Now, I have given to the House every word of the official statement made by Mr. Blaine to the President, in order that it might be laid before Congress, of what took place between the Canadian commissioners and the American commissioners, and I appeal to the House if in that statement there is one word which, directly or by necessary implication involves the truth of one of these three statements made by the Finance Minister. Where did Mr. Blaine, or where did any man at that conference, say, as the Finance Minister came back here and reported, that the treaty must necessarily be unlimited in its scope? On the contrary, Mr. Blaine says that he desired to have a fair list of manufactures, the very opposite of what the hon. gentleman stated. I charge the hon. gentleman upon the records now before us, because inasmuch as he has refused to give his record to the House we are bound to accept the only official record made public, that he and his colleagues went to Washington designedly to prevent any treaty being made. There never was a fairer proposal made than that submitted by the Secretary of State of the United States, and never a more insane or silly proposal than the counter-proposal submitted from this side of the line. The hon. gentleman made a proposal that he knew could not be accepted. What did Sir John Macdonald state in this House a few years ago? He said it was nonsense to expect that a treaty in natural products could be negotiated with the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite knew that. Mr. Blaine had told them that, as appeared in the letter which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) read yesterday; Sir Charles Tupper told the same thing, as the result of his visit to Washington for the purpose of entering into treaty negotiations. Everybody knew this to be the case, except the three commissioners who went from Canada to Washington and made a proposal which they knew would be rejected and must be rejected, and I charge on them that the proposal was made for the purpose of having it rejected. I charge the hon. gentleman that there is not a word in the record that justifies in the slightest particular the statement he made that if a treaty was negotiated, it must be unlimited in its scope. I desire to press that point on hon. gentlemen in this House, and so far as my voice will reach on the electorate of this country, that the proposition made on the part of the United States was not a proposition for a treaty of unlimited or unrestricted reciprocity, but a proposal for a treaty in respect of which one side was to propose one article and the other side to propose another article, and after discussion a list was to be agreed on by both sides, as business men would agree upon a list, and the list of articles was thus to be prepared in the interests, fairly and honourably, of both countries. The hon. gentleman told the House not once, but three times, that Mr. Blaine insisted on a uniform tariff between the two countries. I challenge the hon. gentleman, now that the record is here at his disposal, to place his finger on one word that will justify that statement. The hon. gentleman stated three times again that not only must there be a uniform tariff, but it must be the prohibitory tariff of the United States. I challenge him now to substantiate that; I place the record at his disposal, and I will allow him, and I am sure the House will cordially grant him the privilege, to read from his own record which he has not yet submitted to Parliament—I dare him to show that there is any ground whatever for the serious statements he has made for the purpose of destroying and damning the policy of his opponents. This is not a matter which can be trifled with. I am well aware that no treaty can be negotiated between this country and the United States unless it embraces some manufactured articles along with natural products. I say, further, that it is not desirable a treaty should be confined to natural products alone. If we can agree on a list of articles, as the Hon. George Brown did in 1874, it would not only be to our interest alone, but to the mutual interests of the people of both countries. Such a treaty, when negotiated, necessarily must be confined to the parties negotiating it. It is absurd to argue that Australia, the different West India Islands, the Cape of Good Hope and all the dependencies of Great Britain should enjoy the same privileges under this treaty as the Dominion of Canada, which is the party negotiating it. Is it reasonable or fair? Every hon. gentleman knows that the very essence of a reciprocity treaty is that the reciprocal concessions made by the contracting parties shall be mutual and confined to the contracting parties. It is absurd to talk of any other course being adopted; and when you say that if you put down a list of articles and allow them to come in from the United States to Canada, you must also allow the same articles to come in from the Cape of Good Hope, Australia, India and the West Indies, you are doing your best to strangle a treaty, instead of attempting to carry it to completion. I charge on the hon. gentleman opposite, and it is a charge he will have to answer, if not here, before his constituents, that he, more than any one else, is responsible for the failure to negotiate a reciprocity treaty, and he is responsible for all the loss and injury that will follow to Canada as the result of the failure of those negotiations. The hon. gentleman has not only failed to negotiate a treaty, but he has likewise placed obstacles in the way of those who may follow him, of negotiating a reciprocity treaty with the United States. Difficult as it was under almost all circumstances, and requiring as it did the best brains of Canada, by reason of inherent difficulties which, at first sight, seemed almost insurmountable, yet, to have our own representatives going to Washington and raising fresh difficulties, is more than man can bear. I say it is adding insult to injury, and the hon. gentleman is condemned by the record, I have read, for having falsified the facts. Remember, Mr. Speaker, I am not charging—

Mr. FOSTER. You had better be sure of that before you state it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have stated it, and, not only so, I have read the hon. gentleman the record on which I base my statement. Moreover, I have challenged the hon. gentleman to produce the record which he has secreted and kept back, and I have the right to deduce from that fact what I have deduced, because it is principle of evidence that the man who has evidence in his possession, and keeps it back, shall have the strongest presumption made against himself. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is said that, because you negotiate a treaty with the United States, and because, forsooth, you embody in it a small or a large list, as the case may be, of manufactured articles, and because 'ex necessitate' there must be discrimination against Great Britain, so far as that list of articles is concerned, and to that extent, you must therefore abandon all attempts at negotiation. Why? When the Hon. George Brown negotiated the treaty of 1874 what do I find? That objection of discrimination was taken to the treaty negotiated by that hon. gentleman. My hon. friend the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) read the list of articles embodied in the treaty negotiated by Hon. George Brown, and I am not going to recapitulate the list to the House. I am glad, however, they will appear in "Hansard," where they can be read by the people. This list is also set out in the official documents which Mr. Blaine submitted to Congress last year. Suffice it to say it embraced cottons and cotton goods, iron and many iron manufactures, leather and its manufactures, and tweeds of wool solely. It was charged then that Mr. Brown discriminated against England.—

Mr. FOSTER. Who made the charge?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman's friends throughout the country, and that complaint was sent to the old country for the consideration of Her Majesty's advisers. It was sent to the Secretary of the Colonies and by him to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, it was remitted by him to the Board of Trade for the consideration of those eminent authorities on matters of trade; and that board gave its opinion to the Foreign Secretary, and that opinion was, that, although that objection was a tenable one in 1854, and as against the reciprocity treaty of that date, now that Canada had supreme power over its fiscal affairs, the objection was untenable and worthless. Upon this matter, as upon all other matters relating to this subject, I propose to appeal to the record. I want the facts presented to the House and the country. I think it is of essential importance that we should obtain the actual facts on this question, and, having the facts, I am prepared to discuss the justice of the proposition we have made on any platform in this country and before any body of the people. Now, Sir, there were sent to the Home Government the proposals made by Sir Edward Thornton and Senator George Brown to the American Government, and they were remitted, as I say, to the Board of Trade, and, on that point of discrimination, what said the Board of Trade? This is the quotation from the official blue-book:

We shall then make the following proposition: Renewal of the treaty of 1854 for twenty-one years including the fisheries, with the addition of the free admission of salt, manufactures of wood, manufactures of steel articles, or of these conjointly, agricultural implements, and a few other trifling articles.

Here is the reply of the Board of Trade:

To this no objection can be taken. Whatever criticisms may have been made on the original reciprocity treaty, on the ground that Canada was setting up differential duties in favour of the United States, both against this country and countries with which we have most favoured nations treaties, no such objections can be taken now.

Mr. FOSTER. And why?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Let us get to the facts, if you please. Let me alone while I am pressing this argument home. It may not suit the hon. gentleman just now.

Mr. FOSTER. It suits me first-rate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I want to press it home. You will have an opportunity of trying to explain it by and by. When Lord Derby had received that memo. from the Board of Trade, then he penned the despatch approving of the treaty which my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) read to the House yesterday. Let me ask the attention of the Finance Minister for a moment to the wording of that treaty:

It is agreed that the articles enumerated in the schedules "A," "B" and "C" hereunto annexed, being the growth, produce or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada or of the United States of America, shall, on their importation from the one country into the other from the 1st July, 1875, to the 30th June, 1876, both included, pay only two-thirds of the duty payable at the date of this treaty on the importations into such country of such articles respectively; and from the 1st July, 1876, to the 30th June, 1877, both included, shall pay one-third of such duties. And on and after the 1st July, 1877, for the period of years mentioned in article 13 in this treaty shall be admitted free of duty into each country respectively.

Mr. FOSTER. Quite so.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is there a word there more than we ask to have put into a treaty to-day? Do these words not necessarily involve discrimination against the other colonies of Great Britain?

Mr. FOSTER. Will you allow me to ask a question; just one question?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Let my hon. friend possess his soul for a moment. Do these words not necessarily involve discrimination against goods coming from England, and did they not receive the approval of the British Board of Trade, and the endorsement of Lord Derby, the Conservative Secretary for the Colonies?

Mr. FOSTER. Will you allow me to ask you a question?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman read from that treaty one clause, or one line, which states that it shall be a condition of the treaty that the articles admitted free from the United States into Great Britain shall not be admitted on the same terms from Great Britain?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Surely the hon. gentleman is astute enough sometimes to see a point.

Mr. FOSTER. Will you answer my question?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Surely he sees that there are words allowing a reciprocity of trade between two particular countries, and two particular countries alone.

Mr. FOSTER. No, Sir, not alone.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And confining the articles to those which are the growth, produce or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada and the United States respectively. The hon. gentleman may put his construction upon it, but he will not find any lawyer who values his reputation to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. You cannot put any other construction upon it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is completely astray in the matter. If he will pardon me for saying so; he may know something of figures, but he knows little of construing language, if he puts any other construction on these words than I have put on them. They show that after a certain date the articles specified in the treaty, being the growth, produce or manufacture of one or other country, shall be admitted from Canada to the United States, and from the United States to Canada, and no living man could imagine that that involved the admission of goods from the Cape of Good Hope or from Australia or from Great Britain. Nay, more; to show the hon. gentleman that this was understood, this very question of discrimination which we are debating was left by the Secretary for the Colonies to the Board of Trade, and the Board of Trade reported: that whatever objections there might be in 1854, it was now too late, and there were no objections now. So that, not only from the words of the record, but from the facts which transpired in England between the Secretary for the Colonies and the Board of Trade. I say that no man can come to any other conclusion, than that that treaty involved what every other treaty must necessarily involve, namely, that the rest of the world who are not parties to it shall not enjoy its concessions or advantages. Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker; that there may be no possible doubt on this other question which I have referred to, I will ask the House to allow me to read the emphatic denial of the truth of the statement the Finance Minister made to this House of the interview between the hon. gentlemen opposite and the Secretary of the United States. Mr. Blaine's statement contains a denial emphatic and clear, because it details everything that took place and it does not say one word about these conditions which our Finance Minister said he proposed to insert; but General Foster, the present Secretary of State removes every possible doubt, because when he had seen the statement of the Finance Minister in this House he says:

During the reciprocity conference of last winter, Mr. Blaine did not insist that in a reciprocity arrangement a uniform tariff might be necessary for both Canada and the United States, nor much less that it should be on the line of the present United States tariff. He did ask that the schedule should not be confined to natural products, but should include an agreed list of manufactured goods, and that the reciprocity should be confined to Canada and the United States; and because of these two conditions the negotiations were fruitless.

Sir, the Finance Minister occupies what is a pitiable position before this House and before this country. He has made statements on the most important negotiations that have been undertaken for many years between Canada and the United States, which statements have been emphatically repudiated and distinctly and categorically denied by General Foster, the present Secretary of State, and which have been practically denied also by the late Secretary of State, the Hon. J. G. Blaine. I leave the Finance Minister in his dilemma. I leave him, when he addresses the House again to explain how he can reconcile the extraordinary position he holds. General Foster was present at all the negotiations, and he was present because of his thorough knowledge of the facts required to be looked into, when the negotiations were being proceeded with. No more competent authority could be found in the United States than the gentleman who now, with such credit to himself, fills the position of Secretary of State. I state here that the Finance Minister, so long as he remains in power, has placed beyond all possibility the attainment of any reciprocity treaty. Not only that, but he has placed all the difficulties possible in the way of his successors obtaining such a treaty. But I have confidence in the ability of my hon. friends of the Liberal party who sit on each side of me, that when the day comes—as coming it is in the very near future, and make no mistake about that—that the Liberals are intrusted with the reins of power in this country, notwithstanding all that the hon. gentlemen opposite have done, we will be able then to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity in trade with the United States, a treaty which will not only be beneficial to the United States, but which will be enormously beneficial to Canada, as a whole, and especially to that particular province which I have the honour to represent. But, Sir, in the meantime and until we are in a position to carry out these promises which we make to the people, we will turn our attention to tariff reform; we will say that here and now is the time to lop off the mouldering branch. The hon. gentlemen were told last night by a voice from their own ranks, in words they could not deny, that instead of lopping off the mouldering branches they had only broken off sufficient to show the rottenness within. That is where their policy has brought them, this beautiful National Policy, which was to stop the emigration from the country and increase our population, which was to create a home market and render us independent of foreign markets, which was to secure for us reciprocity with the United States. These were its promises; what have been its performances? After making all due allowance for increase in population, as my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) did the other day, it has abstracted no less than sixty or seventy millions of extra taxes from the pockets of the people in the shape of Customs duties, and it has withdrawn from them at least an equal amount and transferred it to the pockets of the manufacturers. It has doubled the exodus from Canada which existed between 1871 and 1881, and trebled it in the Maritime provinces, of which I have given you the figures. It has left us more dependent than ever on foreign markets, and it has taken away one of the strings to our bow which we once possessed in the United States market because there is no doubt that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite provoked those features of the McKimley Bill which specially struck against Canada. It has rendered reciprocity impossible of attainment while the hon. gentlemen remain in power, and largely increased the difficulties of their successors. Sir, in 1887, when Sir Charles Tupper put that keystone upon the National Policy arch, he assured us that prosperity would follow throughout this Dominion. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) came into the treasury, he heard the rumblings of discontent which presaged the storm. He set himself to work to dig about and dung that National Policy tree. He almost tore it up by the roots three years ago, when he revised his tariff from end to end. What is the position to-day? Has the rumbling ceased? No, Sir; in the ranks of his own party he knows that there is unrest and disquiet. He knows that from the very centres of commerce in this Dominion thousands are crying out, not merely for a revision of the tariff, but for a thorough reform of that tariff. He knows that the farming population all over this land are crying out for relief, and their mouthpieces in this House, not on one side alone, but on both sides, are moving for reductions of the duties on agricultural implements and of the other duties which press specially on the agricultural population. But the hon. gentleman feeds them with promises, nothing more. Next year, he says, after he has gone around the country with the apprentices that my hon. friend referred to—

Mr. FOSTER. Chestnut.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Chestnut it is, and a very good one, and I am not ashamed to repeat it. When the hon. gentleman comes back with his apprentices, he will do what? He will do something for the good of the country at large, whatever that may be. Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that his Order Paper bristles with resolutions striking at the root of his policy, proposed by his own men. This National Policy tree, which they are so fond of talking about, and the mouldering branches of which they are going to lop off—this National Policy tree, which we were told was going to luxuriate and bear fruit, one of the hon. gentleman's friends tells us is rotten, and when he breaks off a branch it only exposes the rottenness inside. Sir, I admit that for a small portion of the manufacturers of this country it has borne fruit; but for the people at large it has no blossoms, it bears no leaves, it yields no fruit, and the mandate is going forth all over this country, from one end to the other, that it must be cut down and not allowed longer to encumber the ground.

Mr. COCKBURN. Mr. Speaker, the eloquent, and shall I call it the fervid address of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), is, I regret to say, only another proof, if proof were needed, of the degradation which an otherwise good and noble nature incurs by associating with men whose political creed is one that can only lead to the degradation and destruction of the higher patriotic instincts and aspirations. It may be, Sir, that his near proximity to the representative of North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) communicated to him some of that hon. gentleman's bitterness of feeling to this his native country. It may be that, seated, as he is, with such an easy conductor between him and the member for North Norfolk, the stream of political poison has passed from the one to the other. Perhaps I am wrong in saying that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is an easy conductor, for I should think that in matters of this kind he would be such an absorbent that he would retain all the political poison that might pass from the member for North Norfolk, and not allow it to reach the hon. member for Queen's. Sir, for two blessed hours last night, the hon. member for North Norfolk not only exhausted time, but almost encroached on eternity, in his everlasting praise and defence of the American lumbering system. He depicted to us the glories of that great country to the south of us. He showed what a miserable, poor, craven, stricken lot we were, that we were unable to hold our own in the race of competition. I felt at the time that if I rose to reply I should be compelled to apologize to this House for taking hon. members away from the consideration of the interests and glory of the great republic to the south of us, and asking them to come for a few moments to give attention to the subject that pertained to our own national welfare. Sir, I am sick, dead sick, of the efforts made by the Opposition at all times to thrust down our throats the example held out by the United States. The hon. member for Queen's tells us that he is here as a representative of the Maritime provinces, and in that narrow sectional spirit which he has imbibed from the party, though contrary to his nature, he gives us a discourse pertaining, he tells us, more particularly to the little province from which he hails. Now, Sir, I happen to know something of the island of Prince Edward: and though my hon. friend undertakes to pose as a representative of the Maritime provinces, the Maritime provinces deny his right to assume any such title. They have sent to this House a band of noble men, and with the single exception of the Island of Prince Edward, they unanimously support the Government. Well, I regret to see my hon. friend, a man with good and noble aspirations, so far forgot himself as to take the stand he has done, and to take sides with the hon. member for North Norfolk in the picture he has given of our national degradation. Why, Sir, it was only last night that the hon. member for North Norfolk was bewailing the condition of those poor farmers who have lately become the special property of Opposition; and what did he tell us? He told us that we had incurred a debt of some $250,000,000, that $60,000,000 had been paid towards the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that a large proportion of this was paid by the farmers. In counting up the enormous burdens which were laid upon the farmers, he calculated that no less a sum was paid by them than $63,000,000 annually. Well, I have been brought up in this House by the Opposition to believe that the Canadian farmer is a poor, down-trodden man, and that so far from being able to contribute $63,000,000 per year, he never in his wildest dreams could imagine himself ever being able to pay a tithe of that amount. I take these $63,000,000, which are payable annually by the farmers, as my hon. friend states, and I divide them fairly among the 600,000 farmers of the Dominion, and I find that, according to the calculation of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), every farmer pays in duty alone no less a sum than $105 per year. The statement the hon. gentleman makes in this instance is on a par with the others he has made. He pointed out to us a farmer in New York state as having made on his farm no less a sum than $4,000 a year. I turn to a book recently published in that state called "American Farmer," and what do I find? The hon. gentleman tells us that the Canadian farmer can only eke out a miserable existence, that he can not better himself even if he would, but that the American farmer, if he would only deny himself a few of the luxuries and live like an ordinary man, would soon regain his prosperous position. Well, this impartial authority, which I have mentioned, arrives at the conclusion, after gathering data, that not less than 25 per cent of the farmers in an important section on the American side are in the grip of the usurer, and adds that the evil is a growing one. The writer goes on to say:

The value of farm lands has seldom been lower during the last thirty years than now.

And mind you, Sir, these are not ordinary farmers, who thus suffer; they are not men against whom the imputation of lack of enterprise, thought or skill can be cast, for the authority I refer to thus describes them:

The average farm proprietor of the community is as fine a type of man as the average in any city or country in North America—frugal, industrious, intelligent, quick of wit, and ambitious beyond the average man.

And yet this authority tells us that the average income of the best of these men is only $350 a year, and that:

We have for some time entertained the opinion that thousands of our land proprietors, on less fruitful lands, are in this country, forced to meet necessities of life for their families, and pay the demands made upon them by society out of less than $250 per year.

Well, Sir, we have here the assurance that the farmer in the United States has but $250 per year income, and yet the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) tells us that the Canadian farmer, although less well off than the American farmer, is able, by some hook or crook, to contribute no less a sum than $105 annually, not for purchases, but simply as duties paid on the purchases he makes. Such statements are an outrage on the common sense of this country, and I think it is most disgraceful that, in our political contests, hon. gentlemen should not scruple to have recourse to extravagant statements of this kind in order to make our farmers discontented with their condition. We have been led in this House, by the constant reiteration of the assertion, to believe that a mortgage is something of which we ought to be ashamed. Now, I consider a mortgage simply as so much borrowed capital. A mortgage may often be regarded indeed as a measure of the prosperity of the country. The farmer simply anticipates receipts from his lands, and borrows the money from the loan companies. That is a mortgage. A merchant anticipates the receipts from his goods and borrows the money from a bank. That is a discount. Now we are all proud and ready to acknowledge that our discounts have greatly increased. We look upon that as a proof of increasing business and increasing profits; but when a farmer wishes to borrow money, on the same security, by anticipating receipts from his investment in land, we are told that he is in a most deplorable condition. As an illustration of my contention, that the borrowing of capital by the farmer must not be regarded as any indication of his having fallen into an evil condition, I would direct your attention to a late census bulletin of the United States, and I would commend it to the attention of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who is fully cognizant not only of all the various states of the Union, but apparently of all the various statesmen:

A bulletin recently issued by the United States Census Bureau on certain features of the mortgage indebtedness in the five states of Alabama, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas and Tennessee contains striking evidence of the general truth that mortgages are a sign of ambition and prosperity rather than of the despair and failure of land owners. They show the buying of property of men without capital enough to pay for it entirely rather than the incurring of indebtedness by those already owning land. If this were not so it is certain that Alabama and Tennessee, in which states a once wealthy slave-holding class of land-owners was largely reduced to poverty by the civil war, rather than Illinois, Iowa and Kansas, would show the greater increase in mortgage indebtedness and the highest proportion of mortgages to population and to the value of all the property encumbered. The official records show, however, that in the two southern states the proportion of mortgages to population is only about one-third as great as in the three northern states which have enjoyed much more rapid growth and greater prosperity. In proportion to all the real estate and to the real estate mortgaged, the contrast is also remarkable. In ratio of the debt in force to the estimated true value of all real estate, in 1889, the year covered by the census, was 10.96 per cent in Alabama, 14.06 per cent in Illinois, 17.61 per cent in Iowa, 28.13 per cent in Kansas, and only 8.67 per cent in Tennessee. These figures are sufficient in themselves to show at a glance how absurd it is to treat real estate mortgages in a growing and enterprising country as evidence of general misfortune and industrial distress.

I think, while this general wail on the part of the farmers has been going on, it is well to direct our attention to the results. I speak only with reference to Ontario, representing, as I partly do, that province, and as that has been the province which has been selected by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and others as an example. I find that during the last year all the mortgages on real estate amounted to $106,404,856. I may say that I am a director in two of our leading loan companies, and therefore have opportunities of making myself conversant with the transactions passing through those companies, and I am prepared to state that the mortgages which are incurred are not, as a rule, incurred by men in destitute circumstances, but by men who want to better the condition of their holdings, or who wish to start their sons in life or their daughters in marriage, and feel it necessary to assume some temporary burden. How are these burdens paid off? Are they the dead incubus on the community which they are represented to be? Why, the whole amount in default in 1880 to the loan companies out of the $106,404,856 capital, was only 8.60 per cent. But last year, eleven years later, instead of an increase, we find a great reduction, we find that the amount in default was 2.04 per cent, or $2 per $100. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen in this House if they can have better evidence of the general prosperity of the country than the fact that eleven years ago there was 8.60 per cent on mortgage in default, whereas now there is only a fraction over 2 per cent in default. And, Mr. Speaker, the same tendency is to be noted with reference to unpaid and overdue notes protested. Why, Sir, in 1880 the percentage was 4.24; last year it was only 1.03. I think we may fairly appeal to this as a proof of the prosperity of the country. But, Sir, I am free, at the same time, to confess that there has been a material reduction in the selling value of the farms of the province of Ontario. I am perfectly free to accept the statement of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that that reduction has been, as I think he said, 25 per cent. I should have been much astonished had there not been a reduction; I am much astonished that that reduction has not been greater. But, Sir, I am not prepared to attribute that reduction to any action of the Government or to any policy they have pursued. I think that the cause of this reduction lies deeper and, at the same time, more plainly to be seen. We must not forget, Sir, that during the last ten years, in which time this reduction has taken place, we have brought into competition with the lands of Ontario millions of acres of the best wheat-growing lands in the world. It is impossible to believe that the market can be flooded with any class of goods without the price of that class of goods depreciating. The same laws of political economy that apply to the sale of boots, or vegetables, or anything else must apply to the purchase of land. When we, in Ontario, in a spirit of self-sacrifice, let us say, contributed our quota to develop the lands of Manitoba and the North-west, we did it conscious that there would necessarily follow a depreciation in the value of our own lands. But, Sir, it is a depression that exists not only in Ontario, but, to a certain extent, all over the world. And while we have a temporary loss in the depreciation of 25 per cent in the value of the lands of Ontario, think what an enormous gain we have made in the increased value given to the millions of acres in the North-west. Let us ask ourselves if in that we have not received infinitely great compensation for the sacrifice we have made? I will not speak as does the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and limit myself to the island of Prince Edward, or to the Maritime provinces. I care not whether we come from Halifax or Victoria, or Toronto or Winnipeg. We are here representing no one section; we have to deal with a great and mighty Dominion. And, when I frankly confess the fact that there has been a diminution in the value of lands in the province of Ontario of 25 per cent, I am proud to say that, if there has been a loss in one sense to the province, there has been an infinitely greater gain in the great North-west, and the amount we have added to the value of the national assets is a return of thousands per cent on every dollar of value of which we have been deprived. Why, Sir, the narrow spirit that animates hon. gentlemen opposite is something that is almost intolerable. The very opening remarks, last night, of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) were an attack upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, and how little it had done. And the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), when in Brampton, in 1884, imbued with narrowness of spirit, caught from his associate, told the audience, which applauded him to the skies, that the running of the Canadian Pacific Railway was actually an impossibility, that the grades which the engineers were laying were grades over which no locomotive could ever run.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the hon. gentleman quoting from?

Mr. COCKBURN. I am quoting from the speech of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), delivered at Brampton in 1884.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But what are you quoting from?

Mr. COCKBURN. We have, Sir, the same narrow spirit in the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He made this attack on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Had the narrow policy of hon. gentlemen opposite been carried out, my hon. friend the talented member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) would have been obliged to make his journey here to take part in the councils of the nation in a rather odd way. I suppose he would have come ten or twenty miles by rail, then he would have transferred to another of the shreds and patches of this route and would have come twenty miles further by an omnibus, then, perhaps, he would have been whisked along another twenty miles in a reindeer sledge, then a dog train would have carried him 100 or 200 miles, and, after that, he might have been told: You can make the rest of your way on skates or by toboggan or snow-shoes as best you can. That is the spirit and policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and when my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) drew special attention to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the burdens which he said it laid upon the shoulders of our workmen, he did not know—or, perhaps, he did know but did not wish to say—that the expenditures of the Canadian Pacific Railway alone in the year 1892 for wages paid directly to their own employees in Canada and for wages paid by manufacturers of supplies used by the railway and manufactured in Canada were upwards of $11,000,000. So, Sir, in this one item alone, we have nearly one-third of the whole amount we require for the interest on that great national debt over which my hon. friend shed crocodile tears. And in addition we have there one-third of the cost of the collection of the revenue for all purposes whatsoever.

After Recess.

Mr. COCKBURN. Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock I was drawing the attention of the House to the narrow and puny spirit which characterized the policy of the Opposition in this House. I was drawing attention to the fact that from the beginning to the end of the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they had been opposed to it in all its phases; and I was showing that, during the last year alone, the expenditure of the Canadian Pacific Railway for wages paid directly to their own employees in Canada, and for wages paid by manufacturers of supplies used by the railway and manufactured in Canada, was upwards of $11,000,000; and I said that on that one item alone nearly one-third of the whole amount paid out during the year for interest on the public debt, for collection of the revenue, and for all other purposes whatsoever, had been paid by this road, the building of which had been declared by one of the leading Opposition members to be an impossibility. Sir, the same narrow spirit has been betrayed, and is being betrayed, by the Opposition throughout their whole policy. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), on the wail which he made over the misfortunes which had fallen on the devoted head of his poor country, seemed to cast longing eyes on the fine old square-rigged ships which once frequented the ports of his tidy little island. He drew our attention to the fact that there was formerly a busy hum of industry at every port, that thousands of ships came and went from these ports, and carried on a busy traffic with the whole civilized world. He seemed to regard such modern inventions as the Allan and Dominion line of steam-ships as inventions of the devil that ought to be avoided, things that were interfering with the quiet current of life that pervades that tight little island. He told us that he must condemn the policy which has resulted in the withdrawal of those nice, old square-rigged ships. Why, Sir, if he is to pose here as the representative of the Maritime provinces—

Mr. CAMERON. Oh, no.

Mr. COCKBURN. He claimed that privilege, and I must say 't was a bold effort on his part, disclaimed, I believe, by every province. But he took the position here that he was representing those interests, and he uttered such a cry of woe as to lead us to believe he contracted the same disease from being seated alongside the emblem of woe, and having close to him the other equally decided emblem. Sir, I am afraid our friend from Prince Edward Island, owing to his being shut off during so many months of the year from communication with the mainland, has gone to sleep and will never awake until such time as the great tunnel has been built. Sir, he is the representative Rip Van Winkle of the Maritime provinces; and he seems to dream of the good old time when he thought a passage would be made away to the Pacific Coast in some jolly old omnibus. His thoughts are still of the past, and he can see no trade except the trade which is carried by his wooden ships from port to port. He seems to deny altogether, and not to be aware of the fact, that there is such a thing as inter-provincial trade. In speaking of the deplorable condition of things, while compelled to admit that there is an annual product from agriculture of some $850,000,000, he might have drawn our attention to the fact that only $49,000,000 of that great product was exported, and that, therefore, that interprovincial trade alone must rise to the figure of $300,000,000. Sir, the tactics pursued by the Opposition are most unfair. They take hold of the blue-books, and they twist this figure and twist the other figure, and then wish to send such statements to the country as a fair representation of its condition. Now, one would think that the difficulties under which our shipping is labouring on the island of Prince Edward and in the Maritime provinces, was a malady confined entirely to that particular part of the world. But, Sir, I happened to have lying on that table, at the very time the hon. gentleman was making that statement, a paper published in Montreal, the "Daily Witness," and in this I read an account of a meeting held yesterday in New York, by the United States and Brazil Steamship Company, and one of the directors makes the following statement:
Mr. COCKBURN.

Just now it looks dark for the company.—

—There are 8,000 steam-ships tied up at docks in different parts of the world. American lines cannot stand the competition.

Perhaps my friend, with his Rip Van Winkle ideas, may think that, as these are iron ships, not the fine old square-rigged ships of the Maritime provinces, that they merit the fate that has befallen them; but I want others, who may not be blessed with the same ante-diluvian tastes, to understand that in modern times we run our commerce in iron built ships, and that it is no ordinary case where 8,000 iron steam-ships are tied up idle at their docks. Why, Sir, this was a tribute to the National Policy. What are we to say of the policy of the whole civilized world, which has resulted in tying up 8,000 large iron steam-ships? My hon. friend seemed to think it was a nice day when each little square-built vessel went out with its little cargo and traded from port to port, and stopped a few hours and asked the time of day, and how all the children were, and how madame was; and what a nice thing it would be if we could only return to that primeval condition of happiness, a kind of primitive Eden. But he says that that day has gone and the ships are gone. Did it never occur to him, that while it may have been a source of enjoyment for him to go down and have his little crack or chat with the captains, as they came from the little neighbouring ports and anchored alongside some of the ports of Prince Edward Island—did it not occur to him that that trade was done now at one-tenth of the price by these large steamers and that the charges of conducting trade by these square-rigged ships must have been infinitely heavier to bear than those for conducting trade by the large iron ships, such as those of the Allan and Dominion lines? Suppose a movement were made to transport our grain in the whale-back vessels which would go through our canals and carry our 80,000 or 100,000 bushels of wheat in one vessel, no doubt my hon. friend would get up here and say it was contrary to the National Policy that anything but a square-rigged ship should go through the canals, and that a special toll should be imposed on any ship that was not a wooden ship and square-rigged. Now, Sir, he has shown this narrowness of spirit, which, I am glad to say, does not characterize all the members from the Maritime provinces, not only in regard to this matter, but also in the manner in which he made an attack on the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill). That hon. member when he visited England, thought he might say a word for his own land. He did not go to Washington to hold midnight meetings to see how he could stab Canada, nor did he hob-nob with and know all the intricate secrets of the Washington Cabinet, as they appear to be known to my hon. friend for North Norfolk. My hon. friend was in England as a private citizen, and openly, honestly, in the light of day, he tried to see if he could not draw closer those bonds of loving friendship that he hopes, and I hope, will ever unite us to the dear old mother land. And this action is to be brought up in this House, forsooth. He is to be asked what was the reason of this mission. Mission to whom? To his own fellow-citizens. When an hon. member of this House dares to visit the mother country, which gives us the protection of its army and navy and diplomatic service free of charge, whose people are ready to shed their blood for us, and who, at an expense of £800,000,000, have acquired their great Colonial Empire and handed it over to us, without demanding one farthing or one fraction for the immense sacrifices they have made—when my hon. friend goes to the old country, to the dear old land, and addresses public assemblies, asking how we can enlarge our trade, he is, forsooth, to be called to account. If he had gone privately and shown to our enemies how they could best destroy this colony, if he had told them how best they could place us in such a position that we would be compelled to go down on our knees and accept the foreign yoke, if he had pointed out to them our most vulnerable part and told them how to inflict a death blow upon us, then hon. gentlemen opposite would have been prepared to receive him with open arms, to vote him a true patriot, one of their own party, and a man after their own heart. Shame to any hon. member who can be so narrow-minded in his ideas as to call to account any hon. gentleman because he openly, honestly, and in the light of day, sought to strengthen the ties that bind this colony to the mother country. Not content with attacking every principle held dear by my hon. friend, he attempted to turn my hon. friend's position into ridicule, by stating that he had only 3 per cent of the Empire's trade to offer. My hon. friend has none of the provincial ideas that characterize the speeches of the hon. gentleman. He went there as a citizen, not of Toronto, not of Bruce, not of Canada even, but he went there as a citizen of the British Empire, and as such he spoke to the people of a grand Imperial policy for Canada and the whole colonial empire. But my hon. friend from Queen's P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) has told us that he does not speak to us as a Canadian, as a man with the same heart and sympathies as ourselves, bound to build up a great and mighty Empire, but he speaks to us peculiarly from a maritime point of view, just as if I were to address the House from a Toronto point of view, I had better address the House from the point of view of Toronto Centre, or speak as the representative of St. John's ward. It is too absurd. I might, of course, take that ground because I would then represent more citizens in that ward alone than the hon. gentleman represents in Queen's county; but I hope the day will never come that this country will be governed by such narrow ideas, that its representatives will be driven into such narrow views, or that when they decide the great question of the tariff or the great question of our future, they will consider whether a man is from the north, south, east or west of Canada. It is sufficient to know that he is a Canadian, that he has the same thoughts, the same desires and the same aims, and while I am proud to hail from the grand banner province of Ontario I am no less proud to welcome and see around me those from every other part of this Dominion. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said last night that we had stolen our policy from them, or as he eloquently put it, we had stolen their clothes. Well, Mr. Speaker, when I look at the utter nakedness of the hon.

gentlemen opposite, I think it must be true. A more tattered, ragged, tattered-demonion lot in politics I never saw. Their clothes have been stolen; but if the ideas of the tailor dated back to the time of the ideas of the hon. member for Prince Edward Island, we must cut a sorry figure; they will take us to be masquerading in the clothes of the early part of the fifteenth century. No; we have no desire to masquerade in the clothes of the hon. Opposition. We have our own ideas, and unluckily or luckily for the country they cannot run in consonance with theirs. They are a narrow-gauge road entirely; it is only small traffic they will ever be able to carry. Sir, as I was showing the House, instead of grumbling as hon. gentlemen have done at every stage in connection with the construction of this great highway, the Canadian Pacific Railway, built to open up our great national birthright in the North-west, they as the special protectors of the farmers, as the special protectors of the labouring classes, should have regarded it in an entirely different light, because that very road which they oppose has expended in Canadian labour and in wages and in manufactured goods made in Canada by Canadians, no less than $11,000,000, while this road, according to statements of the hon. member for North Norfolk, is indebted to the country in the sum of $69,000,000. Those $11,000,000 represent five times over the interest we pay on the $60,000,000, and I have no doubt—I am not making one of the prophecies made by Sir Charles Tupper in which the hon. gentlemen profess to have very little confidence, but I am making a statement—that in a few years, instead of paying out in wages and on work $11,000,000, the Canadian Pacific Railway will be paying a sum equal to the whole amount we now spend during the year for interest on public debt, for the collection of our revenue, and for every other purpose. I know no grander investment for this country, and no one can realize how immense is the acquisition made to our national assets by the value that has been given to that immense territory. Sir, I am not speaking of Ontario, or of Quebec, or of the Maritime provinces, or of British Columbia, but I am saying: that admitting there is a reduction of 25 per cent on the value of the farm land in Ontario, or in Quebec also, if you like; yet we have gained in the increased value of the assets of this country, far more than we have lost. And when agriculture in Ontario adapts itself to the changed circumstances of the country, as it will, we shall within ten years have regained much of the value which we have lost, and lost but temporarily, I hope. Sir, so bigoted seems to be the feeling on the part of the Opposition, that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who is no fool, but a man up in many a wile, asked us coolly yesterday: Why do you not pay the farmer $1.25 per bushel for his wheat; as if, forsooth, the Government by its mere fiat could determine the price of wheat or anything else. Such a statement must either have been made with a desire of stirring up strife in this country, or it must have been the result of an ignorance more colossal than I can imagine. Does the hon. gentleman think, as they used to think in the Middle Ages, that the king by his decree can fix the price of commodities? Why, Sir, the price of wheat is fixed neither here in Canada, nor is it fixed in the United States, nor is it fixed in England, nor is it fixed, as we are apt to think, in Liverpool—the price of wheat is recorded, if you like, at Liverpool, and flashed by the telegraph across the Pacific and Atlantic oceans—but the price of wheat is determined far away in the northern plains of India, where we have to compete with the cheap labour that is to be had there, and our only hope of sustaining prices in our great North-west is that the people in India themselves will become consumers of the products they raise, and that then there will be a larger profit left for our Canadian farmers. What nonsense it is to complain of the price of wheat being lower now than it was years ago. Are there any goods for sale that are not lower in price? It would be a miraculous thing, if with all our improved machinery, and our means of multiplying labour, we were not able to provide for the working people and for ourselves, more comfort for the same money. It is a step in the advance of civilization, and the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) shows, that there is another Rip Van Winkle who wants to go back to the primeval times. The hon. gentleman dealt with our farmers, and he indulged in this cry of woe, which, when I first entered this House, I must confess, simple-minded as I was, went to my heart, and I thought what a terrible lot it must be for our poor farmers. Yesterday I began to doubt my own senses as my friend poured forth his lamentations on behalf of the farmer, and had I not got from him the assurance that every farmer in Canada paid a tax of $105 every year—more duty than I think I pay myself—had I not got from him that assurance, and divided this $63,000,000 that the farmers pay among them, I do not know but that I might have been unable to address you here his evening. Of course, after the cry of the farmers, comes the talk about the exodus, and my friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) modestly placed it at a little sum of 1,250,000 people. He has shown, I think, conclusively, how more people have left Prince Edward Island than ever lived in it. Some of our friends can prove anything, but they ought to know that there is a certain brain power needed to discern the proper use of statistics, and not only that, but a certain disposition to regard them fairly, impartially, and scientifically, and if a man by use of statistics, is determined to prove in what a fearful condition this country is, why, he would be a born fool if the statistics did not supply all the information he needs. Lord Bacon, in one of his essays, says: that a man brings back from a foreign country what he takes there; meaning that what he gathers in his travels depends very much upon his previous education, and I think that these hon. gentlemen opposite afford us a very fair illustration of the apothegm of Lord Bacon. Now, Sir, I think it was established very clearly the other evening by my friend, the Minister of the Interior, who I regret to see is not in his seat just now, for whom I have the highest respect, whom I have known from his childhood upwards and for whom I predict a brilliant career—the hon. Minister of the Interior showed us that yearly, during the last ten years, about 25,000 people have left this country; 250,000 in round numbers during the last ten years. Well, I do not think that a very large number. We know in fact that this exodus, about which so much has been said, started nearly one hundred years ago, started, in fact, with the early settlement of the country, and it will go on until such time as a kind of equilibrium is established between the northern and southern parts of this country. I do not know whether all of us are so enamoured of the thermometer 20 or 30 degrees below zero, or even at zero, that in immigrating we should select a country where the cold reaches that point. Accordingly it is but natural that settlers coming from Europe should find their way towards the south, and it is also natural that such of our own people as are obliged to leave the country, should go thither. Looking at this exodus we find the fact: That one-half, or over 13,000 of the 25,000 who left this country for the United States go to New England. Why is that? They go for two reasons; the chief of which is that they can find employment in the factories there. Now, if my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had kept to his original idea of over ten years ago, and built up the large cities in Canada that he spoke of as having been built up and affording such attractions in the United States; if he had kept steadily to his national policy at that time, at a time when he determined that there was nothing like protection to build up a city, the chances are that we would have been able to retain our present population. My hon. friend ought not to be hard on us, because you see we hold still to the opinions which he held some years ago, namely, that the interests of the nation at large would be promoted by judicious protection. Here is what the hon. gentleman said in this very House of Commons:

I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion—

The agricultural interests, above all things.

—would be promoted by protection, and the manufacturer being brought to the door of the farmer—

Not away in Milwaukee or Chicago.

—would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable in a market 3,000 miles away.

And then, warming up to his subject, with that ardent feeling which he displays in debate, he says:

With a home market of this kind established by protection to manufacturers, the agriculturist—

He always has him in view——can benefit his soil by producing a rotation of crops.

He says further:

It has been charged that protection has prevented the extension of foreign commerce in that country.

He is talking as usual of the United States.

That may be true; but it is estimated that the domestic commerce of the United States last year reached the enormous proportions of 200,000,000 tons, valued at $10,000,000,000.

Well, I have just drawn his attention to the fact that our internal commerce last year in natural products was over $300,000,000. Then he says:

What is the foreign commerce of that country compared with the vast domestic trade that goes on increasing without the fluctuations or risks of foreign trade? Look at the progress of the cotton trade in that country. Previous to the import duties on foreign cotton in 1824 British manufacturers crushed out all efforts to establish factories in the republic, but the imposition of 25 per cent duty on foreign cottons had the effect in a few years, not only of building up manufactures, but led to the production of an article better in quality and lower in price than the Americans received from British manufactories before their own industries were established. In 1860 the United States were exporters of cottons, exporting nearly 10 per cent of the whole amount manufactured. The same way with the iron trade. All attempts to establish iron industries were crushed out by foreign competition, and high prices were maintained at intervals—higher, on the average, than the percentage necessary to produce them in the United States at a profit. But when a protective duty was imposed iron manufactories were established, and in a short time the price of iron was brought down several dollars per ton, and it is now sold cheaper than the British iron ever was offered for on that market.

Then, speaking about articles of food, he says:

It is simply because they have by protection built up manufacturing cities with a numerous population that consumes not only the vast products of their own country, but also afford a better market for our products than we in the Dominion possess.

These words are from the Budget debate, and are headed "Mr. Charlton, member for North Norfolk." Now, I ask the hon. gentleman to deal patiently with us. If the same light that dawned upon him has not yet, owing to the high heaven in which he soars, reached the sublunary sphere and illumined our minds, he must know that it is simply because of the transcendent distance of the great heaven above us, from which it sometimes takes a thousand years for a ray of light to strike the earth—and I hope the light will not strike us any sooner than that; and I have the hope that my hon. friend may yet have such light shed upon him that we shall have an illumination suitable to the occasion. Now, Sir, I have said that one-half of this exodus of 25,000 yearly went to New England, and went there because there they could get that work which my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) wished us to secure in Canada for our own people by the policy he was advocating. They are attracted thither by the large cities which he yesterday pointed out to us as our natural market, not thinking of the time when he considered the propriety of our building up large cities of our own where our farmers would find a market for their produce. And, Sir, there is this consideration, which is a very remarkable one, that, owing to the configuration of Canada, the problem that we have of building up our North-west is a much more difficult problem than that which has been given to the United States to solve; for, right alongside the Maritime provinces are these large manufacturing cities, to which transport is easy and cheap, and which access to and from is equally easy and cheap; so that it is but natural that the flow of emigration from this country, especially from the province of Quebec and the Maritime provinces, should be directed towards the manufacturing centres of the New England states; and I have no doubt that the desire of the Conservative party, and a part of their National Policy, is to build up such centres as will enable us to retain our own industries and our own population. Now, Sir, looking to the condition of the whole Dominion, as reviewed by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, I think he will admit that we have fair reason to be thankful, whether we are to look at the immense increase in the deposits of the banks—and here I cannot but draw the attention of the House to the statement made the other evening by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I did not think that, knowing as he did, the responsibility that must go with and the credence which would be given to words uttered by him, he would have been cruel enough to inflict such a wound upon Canada as to make the statement, however true it might be, that, however much we might boast of our deposits in the various banks, if a run were to set in on those banks, they would be unable to meet it. Sir, he knows as well as I do, and as every man in this House knows, that no bank in this world, not even the Bank of England nor the Bank of France, could stand against a run when that run becomes, as the hon. gentleman said, a universal one. It is impossible. Banks are the creation of credit, the creation of confidence, and it was a wrong thing of him to say anything that might tend to break that confidence which exists between the public and our banking system. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island told you that, no doubt, there were large savings accumulating in the banks and in the savings banks of the country, the Government savings banks and the post of-office savings banks; but he said—and a glow of satisfaction pervaded his genial countenance when he said so—but they are withdrawing that money; last year they withdrew a million and a half, and they are going on withdrawing it. Why should it give any pleasure to our hon. friends to think that there should be any lack of confidence in the ultimate power of the Government or of this country to pay its debts? Why, Sir, he was correct in saying that there had been withdrawals, but why did he not mention the reason? He knows well the reason. There is no part of the Dominion where the savings per head are so large as they are in his own tidy little province. And they know both sides of a dollar as well and as clearly as any man in this world. And if they withdrew their deposits for awhile, why did they do so? Simply because the Government, feeling its own strength and feeling confident in the resources of the country, chose to offer one-half per cent less for the use of money. They had been paying 4 per cent before on deposits, and our friends in Prince Edward Island crowded in, but when the Government decided to pay only 3½, our Prince Edward Island friends hunted all round to see if there was any place where they could obtain four. They had a perfect right to do this; and now that the Government savings bank interest stands at 3½, the money is being again crowded in, because the banks, as a rule, are paying less than that. I thank the Lord that these laws of political economy are immutable, and that no Government or Opposition can change them, otherwise I think we would be in a very sad plight. We have seen, as the hon. gentleman says, our trade with the world increased. Last year I was glad to see an increase of $15,000,000 in our trade with the mother land, but I regret to notice at the same time a diminution in our trade with our neighbours to the south of over $2,000,000. Commerce admits of no prejudice. I care not where I trade. I am content to make a dollar from my cousin across the border, or a sovereign from my brother in England, or a franc from the Frenchman, or a lira from an Italian, or a mark from a German. They are all the same to me; all is fish that comes to my net; and, therefore, while I am glad to notice this great increase in our trade with the mother land—and the more glad because that market is not one of convenience like the market of the United States, but one on which we can steadily rely for a persistent and steady demand for our goods, which is of great importance in commercial matters—I regret that our trade has decreased with our neighbours to the south. Attention has been drawn also to the increase in railway travel and freight, which indicates a corresponding increase in the internal trade of the country, and I have already pointed out that our internal trade in farm products alone must be over $300,000,000. We have seen at the same time an increase made in our canals. It is well for us to remember that the transport by canal and by water is less than one-fifth the transport by rail, and I trust the time is not far distant when, in the interest not only of our brethren down by the Atlantic, but in the interest of the North-west—in fact, in the interest of the whole Dominion—those canals will be so enlarged that we shall be able to so cheapen transport down to the Maritime provinces, that the tax which now they cheerfully bear will be so alleviated that they will scarcely feel the burden. I wish to draw attention to the great increase in life insurance. If there is one thing more than another which shows the thrifty habits of a nation, it is the amount of life insurance; and I find that during the last year the amount carried exceeds by $5,000,000 our whole of $250,000,000 debt, which so appals the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). As an indication of increasing confidence in our resources by the outside world. I would draw attention to the fact that the subscriptions to our last loan in England were three times greater than the amount required. The progress of the country is indicated also by the decrease in the number of our insolvencies; and we see additional guarantees of our prosperity and progress in the fact that during the last ten years we have been relieved of burdens which, had they continued to the present, would have approximated some four and twenty millions. We have seen our progress also in the fact that 80 cents per head, or $4 per family, of taxes were remitted last year, and that no less than 113 articles have been added to the free list under the Conservative Government. But yet, Sir, in spite of all these evidences of the great progress which this country has made, a spirit of unrest and disquiet exists; and I am glad to hear that the Government have determined to meet this spirit frankly, honestly and fairly, with such a policy as will be best for the country as a whole. I know that the feeling, rightly or wrongly, is gradually spreading throughout this country; that we are leaving, perhaps unwisely, the safe mooring in which we lodged, when we started the National Policy in the year 1879, and that if the Government is not careful against yielding to the clamorous demands made by many a one for increased protection, the ship of state may gradually drift away from those safe moorings and perhaps get wrecked on the rocks and shallows of Canadian McKinleyism. But I am happy to think that the Government have determined to grapple fearlessly with this matter. I know that the charge has been made from the Opposition side of the House that this commission of inquiry is not such a one as a calm consideration of the whole question would have justified. It has been pointed out that a spirit of unrest and disquiet and dissatisfaction must thereby be engendered. It has been urged that if two Ministers are to stay here at Ottawa during the summer with two

Controllers—embryo Ministers—to help them in this matter, a feeling of distrust will arise, and our industries will be partly, for a time, paralyzed. I think in opposition to that, however fair the argument may be, one may fairly place the confidence which the people have felt in the present Government that they will fulfil to the letter any promises they do make. I trust that the investigation which is about to be made will be conducted with the spirit and determination to carry out fully the promises made by the Finance Minister. I do not think that this policy, if entered upon in the spirit in which the coal oil and the binder twine questions are being dealt with, will be satisfactory to the country. Two very tender twigs have been delicately lopped off, shall I say, or rather pruned or trimmed on the parent tree; but the principle in the case of coal oil has been left standing, that the natural product should be protected by a tariff of over 500 per cent, while the same article, when refined by Canadian labour and brought into competition with American labour, is subject to a protection of only one-third that rate. I think, therefore, that when the commission takes up this question, they should take it up in no mere mincing spirit. Such, I believe, is not the spirit of the country now. I think it is evident that the Government will not be caught sleeping, as our friends were not many years ago, when they had to confess that they were so imbecile they knew not how to deal with the position. I have confidence that the Ministry will probe these questions to the bottom. But while they will apply the pruning-knife, I believe they will be careful how they handle it. Sir, this is a great question, requiring careful treatment. It is an important question how you ought to deal with a capital of $353,000,000 invested in manufacturing; you must proceed carefully when you are dealing with the very life-blood, the wages, of 367,000 workmen, drawing an annual wage of $100,000,000; you have to look twice before you move when you are to legislate so that you may affect $475,000,000 of products, which yield a net profit, I suppose, of $90,000,000 a year. When I look at these figures, I cannot but think of the rash over-confidence of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, who desires us to rush into the tariff revision at once. I can only attribute it to the narrowness of the spirit in which he has regarded everything, that he seems to think it as easy to deal with the $353,000,000 of capital, the 367,000 employees, the $100,000,000 of wages, and the $475,000,000 of products as it would be for the tight little island in which he lives to settle the question of a new bridge, or of the improvement of a macadamized road. Sir, we can never forget that in dealing with the question of tariff we are dealing with the question of revenue. Three courses have been offered to us. We have free trade. But I think, under the present circumstances of our country, as Mr. Blake says, free trade is dead.

We have had Commercial Union. And the good sense of the people damned it. It was then trotted out as Unrestricted Reciprocity. But it was driven back with ignominy from the polls by the common sense of the people. And then these apostles, driven from every corner, found refuge in Continental Union. For a time they blinded the people with a mere shibboleth, but when the by-elections came, and after they had lost the golden money key with which they had solved many a difficulty, when Mr. Mercier was no longer to the fore, when we lay there abandoned by gods and men, when no more sums of $28,000 could be filched from the poor workingmen of the Baie des Chaleurs to put up in elections, when no more sending for another hundred thousand—

An hon. MEMBER. Another ten thousand

Mr. COCKBURN. Ah, gentlemen, there was a time when we went another ten thousand, but they saw us and went ten times better. They called us. And it would require a generation of demoralization for the party of purity and principle to which I belong, to equal one tithe of the ignominy, the brazen, unblushing ignominy, with which they used the money filched from the horny-handed sons of toil of the province of Quebec. Driven to abandon Continental Union, their ideas have changed, and we have hon. gentlemen speaking in a grandiose way of the great Anglo-Saxon Union. But now another policy is propounded. It is no longer commercial union, it is no longer unrestricted reciprocity, it is no longer continental union, it is no longer even Anglo-Saxon union, but it is Freer Trade. But how come they to ask for freer trade? They have stood up there, to put it in their own elegant language, with both feet for free trade, and how can they have freer trade than free trade? I do not know. I cannot understand this wonderful proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He asks me here to agree with this: "Be it resolved that the Customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly upon the great consuming classes of the Dominion." Sir, we understand the term "classes" to mean a body of men distinct from the workingmen. Surely, it cannot be that our friends opposite are going to abandon the cry of the farmer and the workingman and run after the classes. Surely, they have ransacked heaven and earth, and I might say they have gone even lower, in search of some policy to cover them. And yet they seem as naked as the day when their political clothes were stolen from them. Not a step further can they march, and now, forsooth, they seek to pretend that they are the special guardians of the consuming classes; they, the men who tried to stop this $11,000,000 from going to the employees and others through the Canadian Pacific Railway, the men who have tried to block every step of progress that has been attempted within the last five-and-twenty years by the

Mr. COCKBURN.

Liberal-Conservative party, the party that has given to the workingmen all the privileges that they now enjoy. I am asked to say "that the tariff should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of freer trade." I know not what sort of trade this can be. Can it mean that gentlemen opposite, finding themselves naked and utterly helpless and forlorn, weary and dispirited, have determined to throw themselves into our arms and say: We will take your policy; only make the trade a little freer, and let us down easy? I do not know that we ought to treat them as the prodigal son was treated, for their position is not exactly the same—he had at least the satisfaction of having had a good old time before he repented. I would like to offer them a mess of pottage, but I know not what to do with them. They are of our own blood; they are our kinsmen, and in the hour of adversity, in the hour of agony, in the last great trouble of their little existence, they come to us and say: It is only freer trade we want; we abandon Commercial Union, away with Reciprocity; down with Continental Union; trample under the foot Anglo-Saxon Unionism; we see no chance of ever reaching our haven, except by the path you have trodden, and our only hope is in taking lessons from you. Now, there is the question of Free Trade. We have afterwards to consider the question of tariff for revenue only to meet expenses. This seems to be partly what is aimed at by the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford, "Such a sum as is required to meet the expenses of the Government efficiently and economically administered." I do not know what experience my friends have had in the management of government. Their ideas must be somewhat antediluvian. It is many a long day since they have had a chance of practising the art of government, and if there are a few stragglers left, oldish men who once on a time, in the distant past, sat on this side of the House, they may still have ideas left which may be of service to the public, and they may think that this Government is not economically and efficiently managed. I do not wish to say anything about efficiency, that I take for granted; but I can assure them, as to economy, I have tried in vain to melt the heart of the Finance Minister, and a harder and a meaner man, in money respects, I never met. Now, there is the third alternative, if I may use the word, still left to us, and that is, how to deal with the tariff for revenue and at the same time encourage our native industries. Now, I do not go in for free trade, I do not go in for tariff for revenue only. I still adhere to my principles of a national policy, and under the National Policy I wish a tariff for revenue, and I wish it supplemented by such an additional tariff, if I may use the words, as will foster and protect our native industries. It is a difficult task which has been assigned to the Government to determine how this policy shall be apportioned. The quarrel with the Government just now, if there is any quarrel, is not in reference to the National Policy, it is with reference to the application of the principles of the National Policy. People think, after fourteen years' experience, that there are certain industries which have been fostered, and fostered, too, with a delicate hand, and which ought now to be self-supporting; and they think it unfair that if there are such industries, the public should have, out of their hard earnings, to supplement moneys which merely go into the pockets of the manufacturers. To illustrate what I mean, I should like to draw your attention to some remarks made the other evening by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). Speaking of cotton goods, calicoes, he draws attention to the hardships of the tariff as they affect the workingman. Speaking of the duties on shirts, &c., being 48 per cent, he says:

The above duties are paid to the revenue as duties, and are received by the country: but the tariff is so arranged that on the coarser goods the specific duties per yard or per pound are so heavy that they are not paid at all as duties, and the poor man pays the higher tax on them to the protected manufacturer. That is, of course, what those high duties are for, and the result works beautifully. One or two examples of the effect of those specific duties in addition to the ad valorem duties upon the coarser kinds of cotton goods, the goods used by the poorer classes, will illustrate what I mean. I am not going to weary the House by a long list, such as I might give it, but I will only take three cases. Cotton shirtings, for instance, such as are worn by workingmen, are taxed 2 cents per square yard, specific duty, in addition to 15 per cent ad valorem. Imported goods of this kind, 27 inches in width, cost from 2d. to 4d. sterling per yard, averaging 3d., which in our currency is 6 cents per yard. This would be a tax of 2.40 per yard, or 40 per cent on cotton sheeting.

He says further on:

Our Canadian mills can supply the heathen Chinese with cottons without protection, while they extort $4,000,000 per annum from the long-suffering Canadians by means of this tariff.

Now, I consider a statement of this kind most unfair. The gentleman must have known, if he made any inquiry, that such goods are not imported into this country, and that, although the tariff states there is a duty of 48 per cent on those goods, that duty is not exacted. I will illustrate my argument from facts of my own observation. I have here a statement showing the cost of certain descriptions of cotton goods in Manchester, with the rate of duty:

Printed and dyed cottons 32 $\frac{1}{2}$ p. c., as used by the masses.

Silks, satins and silk velvets 30 p. c., as used by the classes.

I want to draw the attention to the fact that, owing to the fostering action of the National Policy, on certain grades of woollen, cotton and other manufactures, we are able now to produce these goods cheaper than we are able to import them; but at the same time I cannot but feel with hon. gentlemen opposite that they have a ground of complaint, and that is, that the tariff should remain fixed as it is. I may be told that the tariff is kept at 48 or 35 or 26 per cent with a view to protecting our country from being made a slaughter-market. That may be the case. But I think our manufactures, especially of this class of goods, are either able now to stand entirely alone or should do with such a moderate tariff in the shape of protection as would enable them to carry on their business. I would not, however, leave it to any Government to interfere directly with the course of trade on the ground that a "combine" might exist. Of course, so long as we have a tariff of 48 per cent on those cottons, we are holding out a direct incentive, an incentive more or less direct, to the manufacturers in this country to combine and raise the price of cottons, and it is perfectly possible under such a tariff that they would reap enormous profits. At the same time I would not wish to establish such a tariff, and leave it to the Government, or leave it to any Government, however great my confidence may be in this Government, to control, by special interference, the commercial interests of this country. Well, Sir, at the same time I may notice with respect to the specific duty that it does bear hardly on the poorer class. We have heard, and we all know, that the poorer classes of goods have fallen 50 per cent in value; they are down to one-half what they were before. The poor man is not getting the benefit of this to the full extent, inasmuch as the specific duty remains the same, while the article itself may have dropped one-half. The specific duty on a pair of stockings would remain the same to the poor man, although the article itself had fallen one-half in value. I think, therefore, in any rearrangement of the tariff it would be advisable, as far as practicable—I know in many cases it cannot be done, and there must be a specific duty—that due regard should be had to placing the duties on the basis of ad valorem duties. In conclusion, I have merely to say that I trust we will remain one country, prepared to assume our own burdens, and that we will be careful to enter into no embarrassing commercial treaties. I think the experience we have had during the past years ought to give us confidence in ourselves. We have seen the McKinley Bill place upon us an iron hand, and for the moment even those who had confidence in this country seemed to waver; but the Liberal-Conservative party stood firm, and we have shown by our action that we are able in an efficient manner to manage our own commercial affairs. You may make a treaty with the United States, you may make a treaty with England or with France. There are certain undeniable advantages, I admit; but, at the same time, you are taking a young country and forcing its commerce into a particular groove, and after ten or fifteen years, when its commerce has fallen into that particular channel, you may find the treaty suddenly rescinded, and the trade of this country thrown back, with all the disorganization of commerce which such a change naturally involves. I trust, therefore, we will be careful not too much to complicate our position with commercial treaties entered into with any country whatever. Naturally enough, we are looking to the new policy of the Democrats in the United States. Our hon. friends opposite seem to laugh, and think it odd we should consider that question. I think that one plea might have been put forward for delaying the tariff, namely, while there were great dangers in delay, especially after the proclamation had gone forth that an inquiry would take place, it was to be expected that we must take account of the changes that might be made by the new Democratic party in the United States. No people can live alongside a nation of 65,000,000 souls, with a boundary line, undistinguishable at many points, extending for 3,000 miles, without our tariff being more or less influenced or controlled by them. I trust in the new tariff to which we are to be treated next session, a fair and reasonable protection will be given, such as is necessary to establish and protect industries that will take permanent root in the country and may be expected ultimately to stand alone. For my own part, I trust that the consumer will no longer be forced to pay a duty under a protective tariff to encourage the manufacture of those goods in this country which have been bonused or offered to be bonused during the last fourteen years, and of which no manufacture has yet been attempted, for this duty neither aids nor protects any one, and fails in its purpose. It oppresses the consumer and it adds unnecessarily to the burden which he has to bear. But this, however, is not the only objectionable result, for if it were, it might be borne; but the English manufacturer, who supplies this market, finding that when the duty is added to the value of the goods, the article he is sending becomes too expensive, produces an inferior article of a value calculated to meet the views of purchasers, and thus we are doing injury to ourselves, and our protective tariff is not contributing to benefit the interests of the country. I trust, therefore, that the protection afforded to such goods will be lopped off, as no attempt has been made or will be made to manufacture them in this country. I am glad to hear that railway bonuses will be diminished. Cheaper living is an essential condition to the progress of the country, and to the filling up of our great North-west, and however much I trust our young friend, the Minister of the Interior, in whom I have expressed such unbounded confidence, to fill up that vast territory under his control, the first and the greatest desideratum will be to make the country as cheap to live in as the corresponding country to the south of us. I trust, therefore, that all expenses not necessary will be cut down, and that some steps will be taken to reduce the railway bonus system. So far as my experience goes, it has not been fraught with unqualified advantage to the country, and I think we have arrived at that time when we may consider how we may considerably reduce such bonuses, and ask such enterprises to stand on their own commercial basis.

Mr. DAWSON. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, sometimes with earnestness and sometimes in a spirit of banter, criticised the motives of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and accused him of narrowness of spirit and of bitterness; but, in all his long speech, he made no attempt to answer the arguments of the hon. member, nor did he dispute one of the statements made by that hon. gentleman. He indulged in the usual frantic effort to prove the prosperity of the country by the use of figures, quoting the values of bank and other stocks, which, according to his argument, prove that the people are prosperous. He referred us to the poverty of the American farmers, and to the fact that their lands were heavily mortgaged, and he implied that the Canadian farmers ought to be content to be poor, because their American neighbours, engaged in the same calling, were poor also. That reminds me of the man whose crop was destroyed by a storm, which had also destroyed the crops of his neighbours, and who consoled himself by piously exclaiming that he thanked God his neighbours were as badly off as himself. Therefore, according to the hon. gentleman, the Canadian farmer, if mortgaged, and if labouring under a heavy load of indebtedness, can also console himself by piously exclaiming that he thanks God that the American farmer is heavily mortgaged as himself. But, singularly enough, after having dwelt for some time on the fact of American mortgages, he assured us that mortgages on farm lands were a sign of prosperity, and that, as discounts indicated a healthy vitality in trade, so mortgages indicated prosperity among the farmers. I commend this view to the farmers of the country who are labouring under the disadvantages of heavily mortgaged lands. The hon. gentleman also offered as an evidence of the prosperity of the farmers, the fact that, whereas some time ago—he did not state the year—the mortgagees were in default to the extent of 8½ per cent; last year, after having marketed a magnificent crop, the farmers were in default only 2 per cent. The fact that they were in default at all, surely shows that there was something wrong, because the harvest of 1891, which they had just marketed, was one the like of which we have not had for very many years. The hon. gentleman accused the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) with having objected to the selection of the route which had been selected by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Why, it is well known that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is going to construct a road from Dunmore to Hope, a town near the coast across the Crow's Nest Pass, so as to shorten the distance between the east and west, but chiefly to avoid the terrible 4½ per cent grade in the Kicking Horse Pass, which shows that the objection to the original route was well taken by my hon. friend. Three times the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) told us of the $11,000,000 that were spent by the Canadian Pacific Railway out of the traffic earnings which were contributed by the people of this country. Exactly what point in support of the policy of the Government he was endeavouring to make I fail to see, as I think hon. members of the House also fail to see. He assured us that the construction of that road, and the opening up of the lands of the North-west was the one sole cause of the depreciation of the values of land in the province of Ontario, but he said we had compensative advantages, and that, while it was true that our lands had decreased in value in the older provinces to the extent of at least 25 per cent, yet the lands of the North-west had increased in value. He waxed eloquent over his breadth of spirit and stated that he was not so narrow as to look at the questions from a circumscribed point of view, but that he looked at them from a national point of view, and so he said that the increased value of the land in the North-west compensated us for the decreased value in our lands. Exactly what share of the increase in the values of North-west lands, the farmers of Ontario are to enjoy he did not tell us. The earnest denunciation of the National Policy, which he made at the National Club banquet in Toronto, on the 21st of December last, found but a very faint echo in his speech of to-night. The hon. member (Mr. Cockburn) then said: That it was the duty of the Government to radically modify the tariff, reform it, and also to cultivate the closest and most friendly trade relations with the United States. Now, after having for years denounced the Liberal party for advocating a policy of "looking to Washington," he calmly to-night advises the Government to delay the readjustment of the tariff until they will ascertain what the people at Washington are going to do. That is certainly a deliberate advocacy of the policy of "looking to Washington." It was rather unfair of the hon. gentleman—and I was sorry to hear him make the allusion after the statement made by the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the other evening—to say that that hon. gentleman had made a midnight visit to Washington to see how he could stab Canada.

Mr. COCKBURN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I never said anything about a midnight visit.

Mr. DAWSON. I accept, of course, the hon. gentleman's correction; but that is what I distinctly understood him to say. Then, amending it, the hon. gentleman alluded to the visit of the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to Washington to see how he could stab Canada.

Mr. COCKBURN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me again to draw his attention to the fact that I never did say that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) went to Washington. I did not say he ever went to Washington. He has a perfect right to go to Washington. I go to Washington myself, and I am glad to meet him there.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Then what did you say ?

Mr. COCKBURN. What I said was, that my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) did not go to Washington. That is what I said, and I know he did not go to Washington.

Mr. DAWSON. Then the hon. gentleman did say that the hon. member from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) did not go to Washington to endeavour to stab Canada, and that was a deliberate allusion to the incident that occurred in this House a few evenings ago, when the hon. member from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was accused of having visited Washington for that purpose. At any rate, a deprecatory allusion to the fact that any hon. gentleman should visit Washington, and that he is esteemed by the statesmen of a country with whom England is at peace, certainly discloses a very serious narrowness of spirit. It is no crime for any man to be esteemed by the statesmen of any land ; that any hon. gentleman in this House is esteemed by the statesmen of that great country certainly must confer honour upon him. Such narrowness is unworthy of any member of this House, though perhaps it might be worthy of a St. John's ward politician. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would have us believe that in these later days it is a crime to visit Kentucky in search of a wife.

Mr. COCKBURN. Order.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, Canada is to be congratulated, and the people of Canada are to be congratulated, that the Finance Minister was in the position to make the statement he did in introducing his Budget speech. He triumphantly says : that the record of our trade for the last year is one for which you might search the Returns in vain to find an equal. He points triumphantly to the figures of our imports and exports, and he makes the announcement in such a tone as to inspire the vociferous applause of his followers : that our imports increased 6½ per cent, and our exports increased 15½ per cent ; that the volume of our exports increased in the year from $98,000,000 to $113,000,000. The people of Canada are to be congratulated, that the Finance Minister is able to make this statement ; but he seemed to take the whole credit to himself for the increase of exports. What was the cause of the increase of our exports ? The simple fact that the harvest of 1891 was a bountiful one, and that the results of marketing it were included in the returns for the year ending the 30th June, 1892. It is the farmers who are in a position to say :

We plough the field and scatter
The good seed on the land,
But it is fed and watered
By God's Almighty hand.

What have the Government to do with it ?
Though the farmer sows the seed, the Government would have us believe that it is they who give the increase. They point to the expansion of the exports, and, while admitting that the farmers had something to do with it, they triumphantly exclaim : " We did this. It was Betsy and I that killed this bear." I look over the exports, and I find that the increase in the value of the exports was as follows :—Pease, $1,400,000 ; rye, $2,000,000 ; oats, $2,000,000 ; wheat, $8,000,000 ; and cheese, $2,000,000. Here is our whole $15,000,000 of increase or more, in these five items alone. Every other item of increase in our exports is balanced by an equal shrinkage in the value of our exports. It is ridiculous for the Government to claim that they caused the increase in our exports. We had $8,000,000 worth of wheat and $2,000,000 worth of rye—these are two items in which the Ontario farmer, the farmer of the province of Quebec, and the farmer of the Maritime provinces have but little interest, for we know that the cultivation of rye is not a very desirable thing, and these provinces are not now producing a very large quantity of wheat. The $8,000,000 put in circulation by this export of wheat was of very little benefit to the farmers in these older provinces. It was circulated throughout the North-west, and it is finding its way east in payments for agricultural implements and other supplies for the farmers of that part of the country. Undoubtedly it was felt in a quickened trade in our cities, but it failed to better the condition of the eastern farmers. For many years the condition of the farmers in Canada has not been what every fair-minded man would wish it to be and what many men think it ought to be. This has been recognized by hon. gentlemen opposite and by the press serving them throughout the country. Some years ago the press undertook to give some advice to the farmers. Among other things they advised them to grow better paying crops, such as two-rowed barley, to raise hens that would lay big eggs, to breed $250 horses instead of $125 horses, and to go in for cheese and bullocks for the English market. Well, Mr. Speaker, the farmers went in for growing two-rowed barley, and their crop was a pretty considerable one. In 1892 they marketed 5,200,000 bushels for $2,600,000 ; but the year before they marketed 4,900,000 bushels for $2,900,000. Although we sold 300,000 bushels of barley more in 1892 than we did in 1891, we received $300,000 less for the crop ; and now the farmers may be justified in saying : Let any fool who may, grow two-rowed barley ; the two-rowed barley advocated so stoutly in the Blue-books of the Dominion, has proved to be a miserable failure and has entailed vast loss on the farmers of this country. The farmers also raised hens that laid big eggs, but they could get no hen to guarantee that her eggs would be fresh when placed upon the English market. It is unpatriotic, perhaps, to doubt the value of the English market ; but in spite of all that has been said and written in favour of the English market, in spite of all the efforts made to put that market to the best use in the past, the ugly fact stares us in the face, and the public records of the country confirm it, that our export trade in eggs has fallen off $80,536. The farmers bred $250 horses, to find that nobody wanted them at that price, and very few at any price. The loss of the United States market, it was said, would be made good by the opening up of other markets. It was said that Great Britain would take from us all the horses that we could raise of a class suitable for the British trade. We have such horses in large numbers; there are stables full of them all over the land, as the farmers in this House can testify, but there is nobody wanting them. Last year we found that England purchased from us only 1,369, against 9,261 which we sent to the United States, in spite of tariff restrictions, while all the rest of the world purchased from us only 433 horses, leaving as I said, our stables full of horses unsold and unsaleable, for want of a market. Our trade in the year fell off $88,000. We raised bullocks for the British market, and last year our exports of live stock fell off a round million of dollars and rather more. The sales of cheese increased $2,000,000. The Government did this, of course. It was to their policy that was due the abundant pasturage of the preceding year, the better prices in the English market the fact that the farmer kept out of their natural market for beans, barley, eggs, horses and many other commodities that had previously been selling freely therein, had enlarged their dairies. None of these facts had anything to do with the increase in our exports. It was simply because of the paternal policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. They take credit for every item of increase in our exports, and among others, our increased exports of cheese last year. In spite of our swollen exports, in spite of the records contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns, the cry has gone up that the tariff must be reformed. Hon. gentlemen opposite have joined us in that cry. The fact that they are crying out for reform betrays their belief in the rottenness of every branch of the National Policy tree. It betrays their fear that that tree, which they planted in 1878, and whose growth and development has been at the expense of the people, is tottering to its fall, and they wish to stand from under. Judging by the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, some of which are very figurative, one would think that they at last saw that this structure which they had so carefully erected, this National Policy temple, which had been built upon the sands of false principles of political economy, is now so wrecked by the floods of criticism which have been falling upon it these many years, that they dare not take out so much as a brick from the wall of the tottering edifice, lest it should fall about their ears and bury them in its ruins. Now, we have heard a good deal of the promises made, that knavish manufacturers who combine for the purpose of plundering the public, should be punished. Many manufacturers have availed themselves to the fullest extent of the privileges accorded to them by the policy of protection pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite. Many big fortunes had been made by those who have had the care of these infant industries. The nursing of such infants seems to have been profitable to their parents and to their sponsors in this House, many of whom, no doubt, owe their seats to the peculiar influences exerted by the owners of those industries. Protected by law against competition from without, they combine to kill competition at home. I admit that it is possible for manufacturers to combine for a legitimate purpose. The Ottawa "Citizen" a little time ago cited the case of an industry of this class. Speaking of the Standard Oil Trust, the Ottawa "Citizen," in its editorial columns, said:

It has aimed at the concentration of identical interests in order to facilitate economy in management and in the methods of operation. It has improved the quality of illuminating oil, lowered the price, and vastly increased the business. The history of this combine is one of remarkable interest. In 1872 refined oil sold at wholesale for 25 cents per gallon; in 1890 the average price was 7 cents per gallon. In the cost of this article $285,000,000 per year were saved to the public by the reduction in price.

Now, if combines would bring about such results as that, we would have very little fault to find with them. They are here represented to aim at the concentration of identical interests, in order to promote economy in operation, with a view to reduction of the cost and consequent lower prices. But this is not the method pursued by the combinesters of this country. There are many manufactures that are of immense value to the country. There are many which are essential to the development of the wealth of the country; there are many which are doing their share in building up our country. In fact, one may say that the great bulk of them are. In so far as I am concerned, the only war I would wage is against the pampered manufacturers who abuse and rob the people to whose forbearance they owe their ability to plunder. The Finance Minister, in his Budget speech, promised reform. He said:

I would not give a measure of protection to any industry which would give it the opportunity of taking unduly from the pockets of the people by creating combines and monopolies, and thus making itself a burden instead of a benefit to the country.

Now, a few days ago, speaking of combines, the Toronto "Globe" said that they were easier to form than to detect. It is not often easy to get on the track of these gentlemen. Hon. gentlemen opposite say they will spend a year gathering information. Well, I can give them some information now, and I will place upon the records of this House a case that I think I can prove against one combine at least. It's not one of the largest, but it is an important industry in this country. I refer to the Trunk and Bag Manufacturers' Association of Canada, limited, of course, in everything but cheapness. There are fifty-six of these factories, according to the census returns, employing 810 hands. Some time ago I received a circular, as follows, re The Trunk and Bag Manufacturers Association of Canada (limited) :—

TORONTO, 12th January, 1893.

DEAR SIR,—We beg to advise you that after this date the above association, which comprises all the leading trunk and bag manufacturers throughout Canada will sell at the prices and "terms" they have agreed upon. Revised price list and terms will be mailed you in a few days.

Yours truly,

(Sd.) R. T. JENKINS,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Shortly after receiving that circular I sent a small order to a firm in Toronto, and received, in reply, this letter :

TORONTO, 30th January, 1893.

DEAR SIR,—Your esteemed order received, but before shipping thought better to send invoice as the prices are slightly increased thereon by the trade association. If you desire goods at once as per invoice "inclosed," please telegraph instructions at our expense.

Yours respectfully,

(Sd.) THE M. LANGMUIR MFG. CO.
OF TORONTO (LTD.).

JOHN DEGRUCHY, Secretary.

I received a price list from that firm on 1st July, 1892, but shortly after the receipt of this letter they sent me another price list dated 13th January, 1893. I went carefully over the whole list and found that it contained 445 articles. They had reduced the price of two only, left sixty-six untouched, and had advanced the price of 377. I carefully added together the values of these 377, and found that the increase in price amounted almost exactly to 11½ per cent, a very considerable advance in six months; so that while neither wages nor raw material had increased, the prices, under the shelter of a protecting tariff of 30 per cent, had increased. They simply followed the lead of the sugar refiners, the cotton manufacturers, the binder twine twistors, and other owners of industries throughout the country, and combined to advance prices for their own gain. With reference to this little industry, I join the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) in his demand, and call upon the Minister of Finance to punish this combine by withdrawing its protection. Protection is profitable to all in the ring. It is very profitable to be able, at a time when the cost of production has not been increased, to increase the price 11½ per cent. But the farmer has no such power. There is no method by which he can avail himself of combinations to raise his prices. The only way in which he can be protected is by letting him buy his supplies in the cheapest market, and find markets into which it will be most profitable for him to sell. He wishes for tariff reform, but hon. gentlemen opposite, learned in the law and medicine, assure the farmers that they require no reformation of the tariff, that their condition is just right as it is. They differ from the Patrons of Industry and the agricultural societies who are petitioning this House for the abolition of the duties on binder twine, coal oil, barb wire and agricultural implements. These men complain that the duties press heavily on the agricultural class, but hon. gentlemen opposite know better, and say that these men do not know what they are talking about. There is a duty of 30 per cent on stoves; 31 per cent on clothing; 33 per cent on flannels; 38 per cent on under clothing; 35 per cent on implements for the farms and on furniture for the home, on horse shoes, harness, chains, gloves, mitts, rubber clothing, on mowers, reapers, drills etc.; 36½ per cent on bar iron; 49 per cent on barb-wire fencing; 63 per cent on clothes wringers; 64 per cent on bolts from England, and 43 on bolts from the United States. These figures are taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns of last year. There is 48 per cent on the farmer's cheap wagon or cart, and 40 per cent if he buys a better one, and 35 per cent on a still better. These are the burdens placed on our farmers and artisans by our present tariff; and if by that tariff you have at last forced the farmer to give up his farm and turn navy, you charge him 30 per cent on his wheelbarrow. Cotton yarns for manufacturers you admit free, but the farmer's housewife, if she wishes to use yarn on her 30 per cent knitter must pay 24 per cent. Surely he can take consolation in the fact that his 48 per cent wagon will jolt less violently when passing the rich man's carriage, which is admitted under 35 per cent. If his back aches under 35 per cent, 38 per cent, 49 per cent and 64 per cent burdens, will it not console him to know that silks and velvets are charged only a duty of 30 per cent; if he has to pay 63 per cent on his wife's clothes wringer, he will be comforted by reflecting that the combiner's wife can import her jewellery of gold and silver at 20 per cent, and can bring in all the costly paintings which adorn her parlours, free of duty. The demand is made that the burdens of the people shall be lightened. I sincerely hope, in the interest of this country, that the Government will listen to that demand. But, also, it is demanded that markets be found, that markets be opened everywhere, but particularly in the great nation to the south of us. It was said that in compensation for the loss of the American market we were developing a trade with the British West Indies. Sir, I hold in my hand a circular signed by a ship-owner, a manufacturer, a brewer and a merchant advocating the employment of a gentleman to travel through Canada to instruct and encourage our people to develop the Canadian West India trade. This circular says: "It is most important that this gentleman's services should be secured, as the Canadian trade"—with the West Indies—"outside of fish is in greater danger of drying up than at any former time." This shows that we are not developing a market with the British West Indies. We are not getting any market that compensates us for the market we have lost, and, therefore, an honest attempt must be made, and made at once, to recover for us the market of the United States. In spite of the colossal tariff barrier, a mighty trade has been flowing across the line which separates these two countries. This barrier has been strengthening for years, and yet the trade in 1891 was 28 per cent greater than the trade of 1878. But the enemies of trade brought their work to a climax in the McKinley Bill, a measure which was meant to be prohibitory, as the National Policy was meant to be prohibitory; yet, under the operation of that Bill our trade with the United States fell off last year less than 3 per cent, and now stands $92,000,000, out of the $241,000,000 of our total trade. Nearly 40 per cent of our total trade with the world is with the United States. If these barriers were removed between the two countries, such a mighty flow of trade would set in between them as would result inevitably in the enrichment of the people who dwell here. Every Canadian enterprise would be benefited. But we have among us some industries, a few limp, boneless, jelly-fish infants, which, after thirteen years of coddling are still crying out for more protection, and, so far as I am personally concerned, I care not how soon the worthless existence of such coddled infants is closed for ever by the inrush of honest competition. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) declared that in the face of American competition our home industries would suffer, our factories would be closed and our commerce destroyed. Let those who will believe this report. No man wishes the manufacturers of this country to be subjected to competition with the American manufacturers without warning. That has been repeatedly set forth by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. But we have in our country unlimited water-power, magnificent transportation facilities, an industrial population which for intelligence, honesty and industry is unequalled on the face of the globe, so, why cannot our manufacturers compete with the Americans on this continent of America? We have in this Canada of ours less call for tall chimneys than other countries, because we have a better power than steam in our unlimited water-powers. There is no reason why our countless streams should not be lined with manufactories, except the fact that we lack a market for the output. Give us the American market and such a hum of industry would arise as would inspire even the Minister of Railways and Canals with faith and confidence in Canadians. Enlarge our markets in that direction for our fishermen, and I venture to prophesy that the increase in our trade would be half a million dollars instead of the pitiful $47,000 of last year. Open the markets for our minerals and I am certain our exports would exceed those of the present time by at least a million of dollars. Open the market there for our lumber and we would have an increased trade instead of a decrease of two millions of dollars as we had last year. There would be no necessity for an export duty on logs then, because the logs would not leave this country. They would be sawn, dressed and manufactured in the building material here, providing employment for tens of thousands in addition to the vast army now employed by this unprotected industry. As to the benefit which would result to the farmer it is unnecessary to argue. It is said, among other things, that Canadians could not stand the competition of the Americans in dairy products. The export of dairy products from the United States, in 1892, was $11,000,000, against about $12,750,000 from the Dominion of Canada. What does this mean? Does it mean that the United States are non-producers of dairy products? Not at all; it simply means that the Americans have in their own country an immense home market and the quantity which they had to sell abroad was a million and three-quarters less than we had to send out. Now, their centres of population are as easy of access to the farmers of our country as to the farmers of the United States. We produce an admittedly superior dairy product, and, if their markets were opened to us, our dairy farmers could compete with theirs in their own market. Both countries are exporters of beef and bread-stuffs. The home market prices in both are ruled by the prices received for the exports. Whether the product is sold at home or abroad, the price remains the same to the farmer. But by the development of trade with the United States, the freeing of trade from the shackles at present put upon it, the farmer would derive untold benefits in the market on many of his commodities, particularly on his eggs, barley, horses, poultry, lambs, hay and dairy products. Let us have this market. Let the hon. gentlemen settle down to business. Let them go to this new government in the United States determined to negotiate a treaty on business principles. As patriotic Canadians, let them consider what is best for Canada, leaving British statesmen to manage the trade concerns of the mother land. To Canadian hands Great Britain has entrusted the destiny of Canada. It is the duty of the statesmen of this country to do what they can to make Canada great and prosperous. It is not disloyal, it cannot be disloyal, to enter into a trade treaty with a friendly power which would benefit Canada. If, to secure that treaty, Canada was called upon to sacrifice her honour, it could not benefit Canada, and no Canadian would favour such a treaty. Let the hon. gentlemen inform the Americans that Liberals and Conservatives will demand as a first principle that the treaty to be agreed upon shall be a business matter, in no sense involving the political destiny of either country. For hon. gentlemen to go into the United States in any other spirit would be sure to bring upon them the contempt of the men who have built up the great nation to the south of us, of which all Anglo-Saxon people are proud. The hon. gentlemen have rendered difficult the negotiation of any trade duty. They are playing into the hands of the jingo minority of the United States by proclaiming what they know is not true—that the Liberals of Canada are advocating annexation and doing what they can to bring it about. Well they know that should danger threaten this country brave Liberal hearts and strong Liberal hands would unite with others to preserve on the map of America the beloved name of Canada. Reform is demanded by the people; enlarged markets are demanded by the people; better markets are demanded by the people. If the hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches will not readjust the tariff so as to remove the intolerable burthens now crushing the people of this country; if they will not remove the National Policy tree, which has been condemned by the people who planted it, whose branches are admittedly rotten; if they will not cease legislation for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many; if they will not, or cannot, negotiate a treaty with our neighbours; let the people of Canada rise and at the next general election drive these hon. gentlemen from the Treasury benches; let them arise and replace these men by others who will make an honest attempt to effect a treaty which will be honourable to both countries and a benefit to Canada, replace them by those whose tariff legislation will not enable the few to amass fortunes wrung from the hard earnings of the sons of toil, replace them by men who will give an equal chance in this country to all, by men who will, above all, give the people an honest, clean, business-like Government whose purity is guaranteed by the spotless character of our beloved leader.

Mr. LACHAPPELLE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the House will forgive me if I spare it the preamble which necessarily precedes the maiden speech of every new member. I will therefore enter immediately upon the subject of the debate; and I will say that the main point of the great contest which has been going on for some years in connection with the National Policy bears, as ever with our opponents, on the Budget Speech by the hon. Minister of Finance. Our opponents hope, every time, that the new speech by the Minister of Finance will be for them something of a Troy horse.

which will permit them to enter the fortress of power. That is the reason why the debate is so keen, so violent, on their side. I will not treat the question, Mr. Speaker, from a dogmatic nor a theoretical point of view. However, before going into details, I will take the liberty to say—and experience is there that shows it—that if one consults the authorities, the men who have given their attention to this serious question, one will find on the one hand that the philosophers and theoreticians are generally in favour of free trade, while on the other hand the practical men of all countries are in favour of protection. Such is, Mr. Speaker, what one finds if one wants to study this serious question from a theoretical standpoint. It is not, however, from that point of view that I wish to speak to this hon. assembly, and I immediately enter into details. Protection, that is to say, the National Policy, was introduced in our country in 1878. We all know under what circumstances it was inaugurated. It was an absolutely necessary means of bringing back to the country a prosperity which had been steadily decreasing during the four years which the Liberal Government had passed in power. It was under those circumstances that the lamented Sir John A. Macdonald thought proper to resort to a new scheme, a move which was absolutely urgent, to rescue the country. He said so himself in proper terms, he wrote it then in the programme of that day, that protection was to have as a result the national prosperity; that it was necessary in a country as young as ours. Now, ever since 1878, has the National Policy been repudiated by the people of Canada? Every time the electorate was consulted—first in 1878, then in 1882, in 1887, in 1891, and in the forty by-elections which took place since the last general elections—was not the verdict of the people always the same? In face of that, the National Policy must be the policy of the Dominion of Canada, and must remain its policy. These are facts on which we must rest. Our opponents could not challenge the force of these facts. The country continues to give the Government its confidence, since it continues to believe that their policy makes its prosperity. This is an unassailable and irrefutable proof. Not to admit such a proof given and reiterated by the electors, is to challenge it, a thing which would hardly be proper on the part of a representative of the people. We, the members who support the Government, have held and continue to hold that this policy has realized the hopes of those who have introduced it in the country, and that it continues to bear the fruits that were expected from it. Such is the reason why we, the supporters of the Government, are obliged to continue them our confidence, and say to our hon. opponents of the Opposition: Your amendment having in view a modification of the National Policy, could not receive our support. Mr. Speaker, a perusal of the public documents showing the public wealth, is enough to confirm us in the opinion we hold. I will not enter into details, as a large number of figures would fatigue the House; the thing has been gone over, and to repeat it would be idle. I will only call the attention of the House to certain special facts which have not, perhaps, been presented, as I wish they had been, and as I purpose to present them. An essential point which seems to me to have been overlooked is the following: The imports into the country have been spoken of. The point I wish to bring under your attention is not the figures which represent those imports, but the special character thereof. I find in that the necessary elements of proof for establishing that the protective tariff is a guarantee of industrial activity and of public wealth. I suppose that if there enters in the country two millions of raw material while there entered formerly two millions of manufactured goods, I am justified in saying that the two millions of raw material represent four times that value by the transformation which this material has undergone. And who benefits by this transformation if not the industrial population? It is the workingmen of our country who get this immense benefit. I will only give a few details without wishing to enter upon long developments. I will draw the attention of the House to the former import returns concerning a class of goods which is now being manufactured at home, giving to our workingmen a considerable sum of employment. Before 1878, the quantity of cotton imported here was eight millions of pounds; to-day we import forty-six million pounds of raw material, which proves the development of this industry, the creation and, I repeat it, the development of an important industry in the Dominion of Canada. On another hand there is raw sugar of which we imported only twenty-five million pounds in 1878; to-day our raw sugar import reaches the figure of three hundred and sixty-three millions of pounds. There are other items in the tables of imports, the figures of which are very large, and which clearly show the truth which I want to establish, to wit, that our opponents are mistaken when they charge us with not having increased our importations since the raw material imported represents a value infinitely greater than before. Such is the truth, and I think that it is the most complete demonstration that I can make of the fact that the National Policy has produced excellent results and consequently that it has increased the public wealth. Mr. Speaker, another argument has been brought forward. It has been contended that the National Policy was instituted and is maintained to make fortunes for the few. It seems to me that there is here a principle which is lost sight of. There is a positive, natural solidarity between the various classes of a community. That which makes the fortunes of the ones cannot be the evil of the others. If a portion of one people is prosperous, the other portion must also benefit therefrom to a certain extent. Such is the principle which I set forth. The National Policy, while making the fortunes of a certain number, as has been contended, must have increased the sum of business done, and had beneficent results for the people of the vicinity of the cities thus favoured by the tariff. This is an undeniable fact which should have its weight. This development of the centres benefited and made prosperous by the National Policy is known to all. See what has taken place in the neighbourhood of the large centres which have been benefited by the policy of the Government. Mr. Speaker, the public wealth due to the National Policy is not to be gainsaid. Indeed I say that the public wealth was enhanced generally by this policy. At any rate, the great centres have really and largely prospered since its inauguration. All our cities have drawn considerable advantages from it. The last census of 1891 is there to prove the large development of the country in point of wealth as well as of population. In all the cities of Canada the population has increased, as I have said, and the census establishes the fact beyond all doubt. Some have been moved with pity about the decrease in the figures of the population of certain parts of Canada, and more particularly in the province of Quebec. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will take the liberty to tell those who have cried out over the emigration, over the depopulation of our rural districts, that they certainly exaggerate as well in the appreciation of the cause of such emigration and such depopulation, as in the appreciation of the results of that emigration and depopulation. The causes of that emigration have not been truly and reasonably appreciated. But, Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that the emigration from the rural districts does not only take place to the profit of neighbouring countries, but to a large extent in favour of our own towns. And why, Mr. Speaker? Evidently this is again the result of the industrial activity fostered under the influence of the National Policy. The large centres developing, the rural parts must evidently allow their population to come and swell that of the great centres. And I may say to my hon. colleague, the member for Napierville, who lamented the other evening the depopulation of his county—which is my own native county,—I may tell him, Mr. Speaker, to come to Montreal and he will find in St. Henri, St. Cunegonde and other neighbouring localities, all the friends whose absence he grieves. I would return them to him. What I say here of the county of Napierville may be said of a large number of others where last census shows a decrease of population. On another hand, Mr. Speaker, I think that in the matter of our people's emigration to the United States, they somewhat overdo sentimentality. With regard to emigration, there is this to say: the Canadian is certainly a traveller by his nature. This love for displacement is due to his peculiar organization, to his nature, and in this, Mr. Speaker, lies to a great extent the explanation of this emigration. I think I am justified in saying that this is one of the causes which send our countrymen to seek their fortune in the neighbouring republic. Many other causes might be mentioned—first, the spirit of adventure, the thirst for new scenes, then the hope of making fortune, a hope which is not always realized, for it is too often but a deceptive dream. And that dream is what allures so many away from the country. These reasons will explain, Mr. Speaker, this undeniable fact of the desertion of the country by our countrymen. But I will not grieve beyond measure over the fact that some have thought proper to cross over the 45th line, for this does not really mean a loss of national strength. We might call this but a transportation. We know perfectly that our Canadians do their duty in the United States as in Canada. The national expansion takes place there as well as here. Then why unduly mourn? I will go further, I hold that this emigration goes on naturally. And being convinced that the emigration is a natural result, and not one due to extraordinary causes, as our opponents would have us believe, I would certainly not be disposed to make large sacrifices, to ask the Government to make large sacrifices, to bring back from the United States those who naturally and spontaneously have thought proper to take the road to that country. Those who will not succeed there are sure to come back. Already there are a large number of them who leave the United States to go and settle in the North-west. As to those who are doing well there, any sacrifices and any attempts we would make to bring them back would be fruitless. That would not succeed nor anything else. But let us come back to the policy which occupies us now. I say that our opponents charge the National Policy with not having given the results which we, Conservatives, expected therefrom. I say that these gentlemen are not in the right of it. The few observations I have offered are from a general stand-point. I could enter into certain details and show how special parts of our country are benefited by this policy. Let us take, for instance, the county of Hochelaga. I arrived in that county in 1876, two years before the introduction of the National Policy. All the houses were closed, so to speak, in the town of St. Henri, in St. Gabriel, Ste. Cunegonde, Hochelaga and St. Jean Baptiste. What happened? As soon as it has been understood that the Government had a policy calculated to help the workingmen, to open the manufactories, revive the sleeping industries, there was a considerable awakening in those localities. The population doubled and trebled. This was a direct result of the National Policy. It is undeniable that this policy could not be disturbed without seriously affecting the Canadian people, the workingman and every citizen. It could not be modified in accordance with the amendment now before us. The hon. gentlemen opposite represent the National Policy as a real evil, and as a remedy they offer free trade, that is to say a policy diametrically opposed to that which prevails since 1878. The name given to this remedy has not always been the same, and I would be much puzzled to use the fittest expression for the remedy which our opponents offer the country to cure a would-be evil which only exists in their imagination. Is the proffered remedy really applicable? I see in the speech delivered by the hon. leader of the Opposition in Hamilton, the following statement intended to meet the objection which we made to his political theories:

They also object to us, gentlemen, that reciprocity would be infeasible, because it would entail uniformity of tariffs between the two countries. The objection is not new, and you are aware of all the lamentable inferences the Conservatives are apt to draw from it. Unrestricted reciprocity! they say, with dismay, but it could only mean common tariffs, and then it would be giving away the control to the most powerful of the two nations, that is we would be governed from Washington, as regards the tariff—

Well, this statement of the hon. leader of the Opposition could hardly be accepted gratuitously. We contend that the readjusting of the tariff, should our opponents reach power, could not be done by Canada, and would be settled in all its details by the Washington Government. That is what we contend. To prove the truth of this, Mr. Speaker, I ask the permission to call your attention to the following extract from a great newspaper—the Chicago "Times"—the value of which cannot be questioned. Here is what I find in that paper:

It must not be forgotten that this proposition implies the full giving away, by the Canadian Parliament to the American Congress, of all control of the principal source of revenue of the Dominion of Canada, that is, of the tariff. Whatever the American Congress will be pleased to do, with respect to the tariff, the Canadian Government will have to accept it immediately. Under this arrangement, our Congress would exercise even a greater power, with respect to Canada than if both countries were politically united, for commercial union, as proposed, would give to the people of the Dominion of Canada neither voice nor right of vote at Washington. Our Congress would not only establish and change, according to its own free will, all the duties exacted from the Canadian people, but, moreover, our officers and courts would frame all rules and give all decisions respecting the tariff, both for Canada and the United States.

There, Mr. Speaker, is a statement which is the expression of opinion of an important American paper, and which justifies us in saying that, should the Liberals come into power, a settlement of the tariff could not be in our hands so as to protect us as we are now protected. This is certainly a statement which tends to prove that the remedy which we are offered would be more injurious and dangerous than the evil which it is calculated to cure. The New York "Evening Post" writes in the same strain:

If Canada wishes to have the same tariff as the United States, the charge of fixing the tariff must be left to the American Congress, or in other words the power of taxing the Canadians must be yielded to the United States, and that power of taxing very soon involves all other powers in its train. All those who are interested in this matter, either in the United States or in Canada, should not lose sight of this. The United States could not allow a small province-like Canada to determine what should be their import duties.

Here we have a second example, upon which I rest, to say to our opponents, and particularly to the leader of the Opposition, that we cannot regard as serious the assertions he made in Hamilton, as to what would happen should they see the triumph of their ideas. Has the question of making up for the revenue which we would lose, and which we cannot spare, been settled by the gentlemen opposite? In 1887, the Hon. Edward Blake declared that he had not yet met a single man who had found a practical means of raising the revenue which we would lose by the establishment of free trade. I will ask the hon. gentlemen if they are further advanced than the Hon. Edward Blake was? I will ask them if they have found the solution of this great and difficult problem, which consists in discovering new sources of revenue to make up for the loss which the triumph of their policy would entail? Mr. Speaker, there is another question which, in the course of this debate, has occupied the minds of the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition. It seems that with a certain number of speakers the analysis of the different political questions, gives little satisfaction. They spoke as if they thought it would be easier to make a point in this House, than it would be, with the same means, to make it elsewhere. I mean this—and render my thought clearer—it is said that the debt figure has increased materially since 1878, since 1880, and the simple statement is made without any explanations being given, which might help to account for this increase. A debt may increase without the debtor necessarily being impoverished by the same. Mr. Speaker, this is a natural fact, that the debt should increase in proportion to the business to be done; only I will tell the hon. gentlemen that if the debt has increased in a rather large proportion, the fact can be easily explained by any serious man who will look at both sides of things, and who wishes neither to deceive himself nor others. The debt has increased, but an equivalent has been given, not only an equivalent, but much more than the increase of the debt. We have built works of different kinds; we have built railways, we have built canals; we have relieved different provinces by means of large subsidies. I may well say, then, that if the debt has been increased by eighty-five or eighty-six millions, and if ninety millions have been given to the country, it is not very reasonable to seek to disturb the people by arguments of that kind. We have increased our assets in a greater proportion than our liabilities, and in face of this statement—es-entially favourable to the country—we must draw the conclusion that the administration of public affairs by the Conservative party since 1878 is calculated to show that this party deserves the confidence of the country. What is the most important enterprise that has been accomplished? It is useless to name it. We have undertaken—in spite of our opponents—the gigantic work of building the Pacific Railway, a work which we have accomplished in the very short space of seven years. This work, which the hon. gentlemen opposite pretended was impossible, we have accomplished, and at a cost much below the amount which they considered necessary for that when they were in power. Well, Mr. Speaker, this great expenditure, which covers half of the increase of the public debt during the last ten years, should the Liberals reproach the Conservative party with it? As was well said by one of the speakers who has touched this point, do the advantages which have resulted from the construction of the Canadian Pacific from the time it was first operated until to-day, not already sufficiently compensate for the sacrifices which we have made in the building of this national railway, indispensable for the connecting of the different parts of the Confederation? I contend that we cannot reasonably be reproached with that expenditure. The same thing holds as to the outlay for the enlarging and deepening of our canals. Could the money devoted to relieve the provinces of debts difficult to meet be again a reproach to us? Can our opponents blame us for having undertaken the sacrifice of some eight or ten millions for those provinces? Well, these are the items which solely constitute the increases of the public debt. They represent beneficial, industrial improvements, and it ill-becomes our opponents to blame us, and to try and have it believed that the public debt has increased at an alarming rate. The country does not look at things in such light. Nor abroad either are things viewed in that way, since, from the time of the completion of the gigantic undertaking called the Canadian Pacific, our standing all the world over has reached such a plane that Canada ranks as the third nation in point of credit, and since, among the fifty colonies which compose the great British Empire, the Dominion of Canada stands first on the London market. I say that it is wrong to come to this House and try to make the supporters of the Government believe that the increase of the public debt has gone on at an alarming rate. Let the hon. gentlemen go and say that in some far-off corner of the country, far from this House, this may be allowed to them; but they cut poor figures repeating here such things which could not stand a moment of examination. Mr. Speaker, my object has been to gather a few observations around these three principal questions. I wanted to show that the National Policy is not an evil. I wanted to show that the modification which is proposed to be made to this policy is not a remedy. And finally I wanted to establish that if the public debt was increased the increase was certainly justifiable. In connection with this last question I might add that it is not always by taking the net figure of the debt that a correct idea can be formed as to the real state of the debt; and that, certain circumstances being given, a debt may well be increased without any one suffering any the more. That is what I wanted to have understood. If we view our debt in the light of the interest thereon, I may say to the hon. gentlemen opposite that our debt has virtually been reduced, for the interest on that debt having been reduced, we now pay less than we did. Well, in face of this, it ill-becomes the hon. gentlemen to say that the debt weighs more heavily on the shoulders of the people than it did six years ago. For, indeed, if we pay less interest we must be less burdened. I cannot conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, without giving a few moments of attention to the speech delivered the other evening by the member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). As an old colleague, an old comrade and friend, I may say, I will be allowed to believe that I am justified in devoting to him the concluding words of my speech. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) after having been aggressive in the first part of his speech, has been less so in the last. I regret that the hon. member should not have thought better to confine himself to that tone. He made the following statement, to wit, that the National Policy certainly produced good results when it was established in 1878. However, he seems to me not to have shown that the policy which was good in 1878 has become bad now. So that I do not find, Mr. Speaker, in that part of his speech a sufficient reason for justifying his political conduct. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) added that the fanatical element which existed after the conquest seemed to be still alive. Is the hon. member very sure, Mr. Speaker, of finding in the ranks of the party which he has recently joined, less fanaticism than in the Conservative party? I do not admit his assertion, but taking it as it is, I say to the hon. member that I don't regard this as justifying his course. I will ask him if he finds men well disposed towards the Canadians and Catholics in the party which he has joined, if he finds in his new party more guarantees than he had in the party whose ranks he has left. I do not see that there is sufficient ground to justify the hon. member in his assertion. Was there anything else in his speech which could explain his conduct? Mr. Speaker, the hon. member protested against the composition of the Cabinet. Is there in this sufficient cause, I ask again, to justify his action? Has the organization of the Cabinet not been done in a satisfactory manner for the province of Quebec, as well as for the other provinces of the Confederation? I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that this third grievance of the hon. member for L'Islet can constitute any more than the two others a sufficient reason for his having taken the position he has taken. The hon. member brought other charges against us. He said we always put off until to-morrow what we could do to-day. Will he find among his new friends a desire of acting more promptly than there exists among the party to which he has belonged until now? Have the Conservative party not always given a serious attention to all the questions which came before them? Again, I think he was wrong. Mr. Speaker, there is another statement made by the hon. member which I wish to take up. He said to us: "I do not want to demolish." This was the conclusion of his speech. Is there in that a justification for his political conduct? Is the party which he now joins not the party the policy of which consists in demolishing? No, if he does not wish to demolish, he should not remain with those who spend one-half of their time in demolishing and the other in building nothing. The different points of his speech seem to offer no serious reason to justify his conduct before the country. He contends, Mr. Speaker, that the county which elected him commissioned him to act as he does, and that is his justification. I do not know whether this is enough of a reason to satisfy him. If so, he is easy to satisfy; for there is nothing in that to justify his course. It is well known that he was only elected by a few votes in a county which generally gives hundreds of votes of majority to the Liberal candidates. Well, Mr. Speaker, I thought it was necessary to devote these few remarks to a former supporter of the Government. I will briefly sum up what I said. The Conservative party inaugurated a policy which has, ever since 1878, always received the sanction of the people, and which has worked for the welfare of the country. Those who are at the head of affairs continue to work with a view to ensuring the country's prosperity, the natural result of that policy. Our leaders say, we are well disposed to enter into a treaty with our neighbours, but never to debase ourselves for that purpose. Our leaders say that it is better to speak well of our country than to revile it. And as a conclusion I will say, that those who are to stay at the head of affairs, those who are to be the masters of the country, are not those who accuse it, those who want to belittle it, but those who want always to defend and to aggrandize it.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that I am entitled to ask very specially for the indulgence of members on both sides of this House, since during last session as well as during the present one, I did not trouble them much with my speeches. Allow me also to offer my most earnest and cordial congratulations to the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle) for his brilliant "debut" in this House. His speech, in style as well as in thought, was indeed a brilliant one, and he has not deluded the expectations of his friends nor those on this side of the House. However, these expectations were not realized from the same standpoint. And I was not at all astonished to see the hon. member for Hochelaga kneeling on the steps of the altar of protection. And so, in his enthusiasm for that great National Policy, he began praying and calling for a very special protection from heaven to his party. He started out by stating a fact which seems to me to be existing in his mind only, for it is not to be found in practice nor in the books written on political economy. The hon. gentleman started out by stating that philosophers were in favour of free trade, but that practical men were in favour of protection. I cannot find out, Mr. Speaker, a better refutation of this statement than in the fact of the mother country which since twenty years declared in favour of free trade. I cannot find out a better disproof of this statement than the fact that on the other side of the line, at the last election, the McKinley tariff was set aside by the people in favour of a more moderate form of protection, of a moderate free trade. The hon. member for Hochelaga referred to this so as to have this House believe that the protective system would last for ever. That was surely not the intent of Sir John A. Macdonald, the father of protection in 1878, as I will show in a little while. Following the practice carried out by the hon. the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Hochelaga has shown that the wealth and prosperity of the country, were shown by the public documents. I cannot see a better disproof of this statement than by reminding the hon. the Minister of Finance and the member for Hochelaga of a caricature published by a newspaper, "The Star," through which the Tory party used to make their elections in the province of Quebec, and which, hardly two months ago, represented Canada under the features of a handsome woman losing the best of her blood owing to the protective system. The hon. member for Hochelaga stated to us one of the great benefits of the National Policy had been the bringing in the country of $2,000,000 worth of raw material. Surely the question is not how much raw material we import in this country, but—if I am not mistaken, by the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) now before us—the question is what taxes the people paid for these $2,000,000. The hon. member for Hochelaga has shown the difference between our imports and exports; he forgot, however, to state that what the National Policy aims at is to prevent the imports, and to decrease them in the interest of exports. The hon. gentleman gave us a portion of the history of the Conservative party. I was rather puzzled when I heard him quoting as one of the pages in the history of the Conservative party the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to refer to that page and to remind the House that, in 1873, the dark side was an enormous scandal, which caused the Conservative party to lose the power which they now hold. They say the history of the Conservative party is written from north to south, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The history of that party not only contains the Pacific scandal, but the Conservative party was in the province of Quebec the cause of a national strife, since it was a religious war. You charged us, we the Liberals, with being atheists and Freemasons. And not satisfied with kindling among your compatriots the flames of the worst of all wars—a religious war—the Conservative party also wrote in the pages of their history the troubles of the Northwest and in Manitoba. A civil war after a religious war? Why? The history of the Conservative party for the last twenty-five years was but the repudiation of the policy of Sir George Etienne Cartier. For the last twenty-five years it steadily interfered, through the Federal authorities, with the powers of local legislatures. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle) referred to the speech we heard the other night; he referred to the statements of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). It goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, I am not here to defend the hon. gentleman, who, as is well known, is well able to defend himself when he is assailed, and even to strike back new blows at his assailants. The hon. member for Hochelaga stated the hon. member for L'Islet was playing the part of one who destroys. It is rather the Government who are playing that part. Is it not a fact that with respect to the school question in Manitoba, where Catholics are no more entitled to their separate schools on account of the law enacted by the Greenway Government, is it not a fact that it is the Government here who are allowing these schools to be done away with? Mr. Speaker, allow me, although I do not see in his seat the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), to criticise some of his remarks. I come from a province essentially French and Catholic, and I can assert I am a French-Canadian and a Catholic. Well, when I heard the abusive language falling from the lips of the hon. gentleman which he used against the Hon. Mr. Mercier, I say a man ready to use such a language is unworthy of being a member of this House. After a Tory Lieutenant-Governor, by the most improper ways, and through the assistance of the hon. member for Centre Toronto, snatched the power from Mr. Mercier, they have boldness enough left to come here and boast of it. I say to the hon. gentleman he would not allow the same thing to be done in the English province of Ontario. There would not be a man there with impudence enough to jump over the constitution as they had the impudence to do in our province. However, to be frank, I must add I am not astonished to hear the hon. gentleman using such a language, for one thing I know, and that is he belongs to the fanatics of the class of Mr. McCarthy and others. The ancient Romans used, when they followed a dead man to his last resting place, to have some one to mourn his loss and extol his kind acts and his virtues. The speech of the hon. member for Centre Toronto reminded me of this moral feature of the Roman people. When the ministerial party is at the point of death, torn up by factions; when I see a prominent member of that party like the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) asking for reforms of the tariff, it is then they use the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) to extol the Conservative party for the putting in force of their fiscal policy. In by-gone days the French kings had at their court people who were intrusted with the duty of keeping the king in good humour, of occupying his mind agreeably; should I judge by the laughters with which the speech of the member for Centre Toronto was received by the Conservative members, I am led to believe that he played for his party the part which the fools played at the court of the French kings. Allow me to state, Mr. Speaker, I represent here not only an essentially agricultural county, but that there is in that county an industrial place, a town in which there are several manufacturing establishments. That town occupies a magnificent geographical position, the fact is there is not a town better situated to be found in the province of Quebec. Well, in what position is that town as regards the well-being of its inhabitants? Allow me to offer you the information I will give, for it is likely to convey a good idea of the results of the fiscal policy of the Government. But before going into this matter I wish to offer a few remarks with respect to the amendment now before the House. The question is whether we can vote for this amendment. The proposition offered to us asks for three things. The first part of this amendment states the present customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly upon the great consuming classes of the Dominion. It is the first statement contained in this amendment, and those who are going to vote against this resolution will state by their vote that the tariff is not a heavy and unfair burden upon the classes which are the largest consumers in the Dominion. Is there a single member, is there a single, earnest man who will be willing to state the tariff we have is not a heavy burden upon the consumers belonging to the farming and working classes? The tariff is framed in an unjust and invidious way. To be satisfied of this, take the agricultural implements on which there is a duty of 35 per cent; the nails which are sold at two dollars a barrel in the United States and which you cannot procure here for less than three dollars and fifty cents. The seed drills on which a duty of 35 per cent is raised; the mowers on which there is also a duty of 35 per cent. The fact is there is a duty of from 30 to 45 per cent on all the implements which are used in farming. I will possibly be told that is in order to favour the manufacturer of agricultural implements. There exists in the city of Sorel a manufacture of agricultural implements, one of the best situated there is in the province of Quebec. I refer to the manufacture of Messrs. Beauchemin; well, they have no need of the policy of the gentlemen on the other side of the House. The fact is there is not a single manufacturer in Sorel who is not opposed to the policy of the Government, and I am in a position to state they are ready to compete with the American manufacturers as concerns the manufacture of these agricultural implements. However, and notwithstanding that fact, the tariff raises a duty of from 35 to 40 per cent on these articles. And the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle) finds the tariff is not a heavy burden upon the class of consumers! As for the working class—it seems to me I have a right to speak in its behalf since I am one of its sons—do I need to mention how much it is taxed? The fact is the workingman is taxed from head to foot, from his hat down to his clothing and shoes; all these articles are imposed in an exorbitant way. If you add to that the illegitimate taxes of the Government of Quebec, the municipal and local taxes, the school taxes, the taxes paid by manufactures, I ask what a figure of taxes we cause the people to pay? Yet the results I have just mentioned were not to happen under the protective system with respect to the farmers. If the hon. member for Hochelaga had read the speech delivered by Sir John Macdonald on the 10th of March, 1876, he would have read the following words which I will quote to the House:—

Should it be shown to us that the adoption of this policy would be detrimental to our farmers, of course we ought not to adopt it.

And further on, he added:

No man is entitled to say that the farmers cannot live happily under the present tariff. But the question is this: whether they are not entitled, under the present circumstances, to a changing of the tariff so as to put them on an equal footing with their neighbours on the other side of the line.

I have, therefore, the right to draw from these data the conclusion that we ought to vote for the amendment now before us, because the customs tariff is a heavy and unjust burden upon the farming and working classes, which are the larger portion of the consumers of the Dominion. The second part of the resolution of Sir Richard Cartwright reads as follows:—

That the Customs tariff should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of freer trade.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that on both sides of the House there is a consensus of opinion as to that point. What have we seen, in fact, since the beginning of this discussion? We have seen the hon. members for West Assiniboia, Richmond and Wolfe, North Simcoe, Durham, Compton, Muskoka, Frontenac, and last but not least, the hon. member for L'Islet, a former Conservative, declaring in favour of freer trade. We have seen more than that, Mr. Speaker; when a freer trade is asked for, we hear a friend of the Government, the member for Hochelaga, advising the Government to continue the existing system in force in its entirety. The hon. gentleman put himself at variance with the Government themselves and their most prominent friends; with the Government who admitted the need of this claim by decreasing the duties on binding twine and coal oil, and pledged themselves to have these duties repealed at the next session and promised to appoint a committee charged with going over the country so as to make the changes our present position requires. Who is not aware that our trade with the United States has not decreased many millions since the adoption of the McKinley tariff? In spite of all that can be said and done, the English market may be good, a very good market for our cheese, our animals and some others of our produce; but the American market will always be our natural market for our hay, poultry, potatoes, eggs, horses and sheep. And at this very moment, if in the county I represent here, the farmers had not the advantage of the cheese factories, three-fourths of them would leave our rural districts. But all our farmers are not to take to making cheese, for that would bring about the same result as protection did, that is, they would surely be over-loaded. What do our farmers say? I think I am voicing their wishes to-night; they wish the barriers would be lowered down between Canada and the United States. They do not wish for an unrestricted free trade, but for a reciprocity treaty that would give them access to the American market. Let us approve, Mr. Speaker, of the policy of the Government with respect to the treaty just concluded by them with France. Without being aware of its clauses, I say beforehand that we ought, all of us on both sides of the House, to approve of this treaty which the Canadian Government has just concluded with the assistance of the Imperial Government. But to come back to the discussion, brought up in this House, I am surely not expecting that the amendment of Sir Richard Cartwright to the motion of the Minister of Finance will be agreed to by this House. I am not to be surprised at that, for every time we have been asking the assistance of the party now in power for a greater sum of freer trade, we have been met by a refusal. In 1882, the Hon. Edward Blake brought up the trade question in this House. He claimed the right for the Dominion to make his own treaties of commerce. We then saw the hon. the Minister of Public Works voting for that motion, while last year he voted against it. We saw the Hon. Mr. Coursol, then member for Montreal East, voting for the motion of Mr. Blake; Mr. Houde, member for Maskinonge and editor of "Le Monde" voting for it; but since 1882, in 1889, in 1891, we have seen the bulk of the then ministerial party voting against every resolution having for its effect to give to the Dominion a larger sum of freedom of trade. Thirdly, the amendment now before the House implies the following proposition:—

I cannot well see how the hon. members on the other side could vote against this third part of the resolution. They claim every day they are realizing economies in the administration of public affairs. They, the Conservatives, are the great saving men of the country! They contend they incur no debts. We have, it is true, a debt which amounts to over $240,000,000. We pay on that debt over $8,000,000 interest annually. The administration of public affairs exceeds $35,000,000 annually. We are asking for a little economy. And how will they answer to us? They will answer by the vote, and show under the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford. I assert, without fear, that for a young country like ours, for a country which only has 5,000,000 of inhabitants, the cost of administration is surely too large. Look at the United States. The cost of administration there amounts to about $5.50 per head, while here it exceeds $7. The amendment asks that economies be realized in a judicious way. I may be allowed to suggest certain reforms in the administration of our public affairs. The Intercolonial Railway entails an enormous cost to the country. Every year the management of this road is figured up by a deficit. If the Government, who are essentially protectionist, would only follow my advice, they would cause the revenue to come in a little more freely, and favour somewhat less the merchants of the lower provinces. In the various departments there are economies to be realized. I think that of the Public Works is the one in which reforms are more needed. I regret I do not see the hon. the Minister of Public Works in his seat, for I have in my county one of the largest sources of patronage in the province of Quebec. There are in Sorel three or four hundred employees of the Government. The Government rent for $1,200 a year a magnificent ground; and all the works that concern the navigation and the deepening of the channel between Montreal and Quebec are carried out at Sorel. I will have a few questions to put to the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet). I told him privately what should be done; he knows he ought to change the existing state of affairs in Sorel, for he cannot but be aware that economies are urgently called for in the county of Richelieu. They could grant a somewhat smaller sum on political patronage and obtain the appointment of a French correspondent, who should answer to the requests made to the Experimental Farm by the farmers of the province of Quebec. I state again those who are going to vote against the amendment brought before the House by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), will proclaim that the taxes do not bear heavily upon the people, that the Canadian people should not be granted the freest possible trade when the contrary is stated by the Government themselves. Finally, they will state there is no need for economies. I may state that from a purely political stand-point, this amendment is altogether awkward. On the 10th March, 1876, Sir John Macdonald said his amendment was awkward from a political point of view, because it indicated to the Government the remedy they should apply to the condition of the country. From that same point of view, the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford is likewise awkward. But we are not here to talk politics from a party stand-point, but to perform our duty as patriots and Canadians. One would say the Conservative party are afraid of going back to 1876, 1877 and 1878. They forget to recall what was to be the result of the famous panacea of Sir John Macdonald. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle) told us it had realized the expectations of the Conservatives. It is, perhaps, true so far as they are concerned, but that policy never gave the results which true Canadians who love their country first and last expected from it. What were to be the immediate results of the protective system so much boasted of by our opponents? In the first place, it was to decrease the emigration of our fellow-countrymen to the United States. Then, it was going to increase and develop the national industries and especially to favour the farming classes by putting them on an equal footing with the Americans. They especially pledged themselves to that result for the Canadian farmers. Mr. Speaker, what do we find to-day? The emigration, especially that of the French-Canadians has not decreased. To ascertain that fact, the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) sent, during last summer, commissioners into a great many parishes of the province of Quebec. The figures collected by these were published on the 20th August. What did "La Minerve," the chief mouth-piece of the Conservatives in the province of Quebec, say? It said:

So that the lists of the "Canadien" only show that there is no emigration. It is a La Palisse's truth. But they by no means show that emigration is the fault of the Government. Our contemporary has enough intellectual capacity to understand that. Is it due to a want of honesty and fairness?

It is La Palisse's truth, so the "Minerve" said. However it is a truth denied by the ministerial party. It is a truth denied by the member for Hochelaga all through his speech. The hon. member for L'Islet is also referred to and characterized as an intelligent man. It is a good showing for our colleague. That editorial of "La Minerve" is the formal condemnation of the ministerial party, for it puts to light a truth persistently denied here. "La Minerve" which, after its chiefs, formerly proclaimed that the emigration of the French-Canadians to the United States was due to the policy of the Mackenzie Government, now says it is no fault of the present Government if the Canadians leave their country. They have, therefore, two weights and two measures. But, it is, it seems, a matter of character and temperament, according at least to the hon. member for Hochelaga. We were told that emigration was particularly going on from the rural districts to the cities and it was due to a natural cause. The hon. gentleman claimed as a glorious thing for the Conservative party the fact that protection was depopulating the rural districts to the advantage of the cities. I represent, Mr. Speaker, a rural county, but I represent also a city, and I do not want a policy which results in the depopulating of the rural parishes to the advantage of the inhabitants of cities. But I will quote figures which will show that the hon. member for Hochelaga made a statement which is altogether ungrounded. In 1876, we were told that if the French-Canadians were going to the United States, it was the fault of the Mackenzie Government, that if that emigration was so large, it was due to their ruinous policy. How is it, they said, that in so young a country as ours is, a country having so many, so large and so varied resources, magnificent fisheries, with our lakes and rivers offering splendid means of communication to the trade and facilities of transportation for the industrial produce, how is it that so rich and so young a country should see its population decreasing and its people going to the United States? They imputed that as a crime to the Liberal Government. After twenty years, an increase is ascertained in this tide of emigration, and as a refutation we are given the same argument the Liberal party formerly used and we are told it is no fault of the Government nor their fiscal policy. I contend a Government whose administration of public affairs is not conducted so as to keep in the country its own people is not a government having a good fiscal policy. Here, Mr. Speaker, I must go into certain detailed figures, which I am compelled to take from the last census. However, I must say I use these figures with the utmost caution. I think it my duty to state, from my seat in this House, the census is an outrageous falsehood. The figures I will quote have reference to the county of Richelieu, and I may say that as concerns that county, returns are given in the census which are far from being favourable to the policy of the Government. According to the census of 1881, the population of the province of Quebec was 1,324,810. According to the census of 1891, the population was 1,632,679. During the ten years between 1871 and 1881, the population increased 18.97 per cent, while during the decade between 1881 and 1891, the population in the province of Quebec only increased 11.74 per cent, which is a falling off of 7.23 per cent in the single province of Quebec. Nevertheless, bulletin No. 4 of the last census, devoted to the province of Quebec, states, page 9 :

That the increase of population in Quebec province has not been so great as was anticipated is partly due to the difference in the method of counting the people. To prevent the indiscriminate counting of absentees a time limit was introduced for the first time in the recent census. The application of this limit restricted the enumerators to taking only those persons whose absence from the Dominion or the province was really temporary.

The first striking thing in the above quotation, is this census bulletin establishes a deception acknowledged by the ministerial party as to the result in the province of Quebec. And, after that, they will come and say to us, when their own officers, paid for the purpose of enlarging the figures, are compelled to acknowledge there is a distinction for the province of Quebec, they will come and say to us there is no emigration. How would it be, then, if the census had been better taken? It is said the only persons who were temporarily away from Canada were mentioned. I deny "in toto" this statement. I could give to the House names which appear in the census—but they are afraid to give names, as was seen when we asked for the names of the 128 manufacturers in Sorel. I can assert positively, the names of parties for a long time away from Sorel appear in the census. I am not making these statements for the purpose of disparaging the country; but I merely want the truth to be known. I want to speak out my mind. I am not acting as a political party man; but, satisfied my county is not prosperous, feeling we are undergoing a commercial depression, due to the fiscal policy of the Government. I insist upon stating to them what are its causes and where the remedy lies. Among the parishes in Richelieu county which remained stationary, or whose population decreased, I will mention the following for the edification of the Government:—

	Pop. in 1881.	Pop. in 1891.
Saint-Marcel	1,330	1,169
Saint-Ours Parish	1,804	1,654
Saint-Pierre de Sorel	877	492
Saint-Robert	2,126	1,879
Saint-Roch	1,020	1,045
Sainte-Victoire	1,550	1,532

These figures are taken from the census; I am not giving our own data. The parish of St. Robert experienced a decrease of 247 souls, although it is in the neighbourhood of a city which has 128 manufactures, seventy houses are closed in that parish. During last summer and autumn, twenty-seven families left from there for the United States, and according to the information communicated to me, I can assert this as the exact truth. Let information be taken from other political men in my county, even Conservatives, and they will state this to be most scrupulously accurate. In the face of these figures, which prove the disastrous effects of the present tariff, have

I not the right to repeat to the Government what Augustus said to Varus after his defeat: "Varus, Varus, give me back my legions." Yes, give us, give us back our expatriated population. And yet, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we have in the province of Quebec given instances of a rapid growth of population. "Plant Gascons, they take root everywhere" was the saying of Henry the IV. What would he not have said of the French-Canadians had he known us? What would he not have said, seeing that after being separated from the mother country for 125 years, without any assistance from France, left to our own resources, to our own vitality, we have grown from 70,000 in 1760, to a figure now exceeding 2,000,000 French-Canadians, including those of our compatriots who are in the United States. "Plant Gascons, they take root everywhere." I beg I may be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to give the following information: The author of the "Guide Francais des Etats-Unis," Mr. de Bonnechose, lately made public the fact—and it was not contradicted—that we had in the American states over 900,000 of our French-Canadian compatriots. And they come and say that protection, which was to decrease emigration, has not increased it! Well, I am not of that opinion. In the face of the large emigration from my county, of the large emigration that leaves my native city, I say the existing fiscal system is defective and that of absolute necessity there must be a readjustment of the tariff. And I am not taking that stand from my own observations only. But, as late as Sunday last, one of the leaders of the Conservative party in the county of Richelieu, said to me: "Of absolute necessity there must be a reform of the tariff." Well, then, on Sunday last, I met a Conservative, not one of the stripe of the member for Hochelaga, who objects to any change in the tariff, but one like the member for Frontenac, who has at least the courage of his convictions and states in plain words he will vote with the Opposition against the fiscal policy of the Government. Protection, then, has not decreased emigration. Has it developed our industries in the way they assert on the other side of the House? Let us again open the census; and, I may say, that with respect to manufactures, it is even more outrageously false than with respect to population. The clear object of the Government was, through the census, to extol the beneficial effects of the protective system. They thought they could say after ten years of that system: See of what immense advantage it was to the country! In order to promote the zeal of the enumerators, instead of giving them three cents for each name entered in the census as manufacturers, they were given twenty cents. They accordingly sent accounts, in proportion, to the Government. I am not at all astonished after that, to see Mr. Johnson striking up, in bulletin No. 12, which has a special reference to manufactures, pages 14 and 15, a general hosanna in praise of the benefits of protection, the victory song of the Conservative party. Here is what he says :

REMARKS.

The increase in the value of products of our manufacturing establishments, as represented by the urban population, is $117,000,000, while in population the increase is 381,968.

The increase in the rural districts in the value of manufactured products is forty-eight and seven-tenths million dollars, and the increase in population, 125,901.

Thus the urban population has increased its output by $306 per each head of its increase in numbers, while the rural population has increased its output by $386 per head of its increase in numbers.

It is plain, therefore, that both the rural and the urban districts have made great advances in manufacturing, and that the experience of the past ten years is that cities, towns and villages from 1,500 inhabitants up, villages with population below 1,500, and the strictly rural districts have all secured manufacturing developments. The cities have not grown in manufacturing at the expense of the towns and villages, nor the urban population at the expense of the rural population. The development has been very generally diffused.

Here is what says Mr. Johnson, who directed the operations of the census. Now, I absolutely deny such a statement, and I state in presence of the Government it is the falsest ever made with respect to the census. I am not a philosopher, for it looks as if, according to the hon. member for Hochelaga, thinkers alone were in favour of freer trade, but I may say the conclusions reached in this bulletin are false, and more so as far as my county is concerned. I know that one cannot draw a general conclusion from a particular fact, but I will give calculations which will show that this census is an immense humbug and an outrageous falsehood. The census of 1881, established there was in Sorel fifty-one industrial establishments. Now, in 1891, I am ashamed to make the statement, for it is not true, but the census states there is a hundred and twenty-eight manufactures, with a capital of $475,802 and 670 persons employed. The wages paid are estimated to $188,849. The cost of the raw materials is $299,173 and the value of products $755,745. I have no intention, I loudly proclaim it, to slight the city where I live. Far from me is the idea of disparaging the place where I live, but it is a notorious and publicly known fact that we have not a hundred and twenty-eight manufactures in the city of Sorel. And if I deny "in toto" this statement of the census, it is because of the endeavours made through these figures, to mislead the country as to the results of the fiscal policy of the Government. We have two hundred houses closed in Sorel, and the value of the property has decreased 50 per cent. Suffice it to say, Mr. Speaker, to show the truth of this statement, that I declined to buy for $2,600 a property which had cost over $6,000. In the district of Montreal, Berthier has, according to the census of 1891, thirty-one manufactures, with a capital valued at $145,000, 163 persons employed, paying wages to the amount of $55,320, using raw materials valued at $102,655, and turning out products to the value of $223,540. Now, let any one go to Berthier and look for these thirty-one manufactures. I now take the city of Nicolet, which is not very far distant from Sorel and which every one knows. Nicolet is entered as having ninety manufactures, according to this famous census. These ninety manufactures have a capital of $413,865, employed 368 persons, receiving $81,886 in wages. The cost of the raw materials is $182,174 and the value of products $337,911. These figures are false; they are known to be false, and yet they are published because they go to show the country is prosperous, and it is supposed there will be found, to a certain extent, people who will believe in their accuracy. I challenge the Minister to show there is in the localities referred to by me the number of manufactures mentioned in the census. This afternoon, they declined to give us, the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) and myself, in answer to questions, the names of the manufactures of these localities. Why? Because they could not give us the names of the owners of bona fide and really industrial establishments. It is a well known fact that our labouring classes in Sorel are unemployed, and the Government alone keeps there a political shop.

Mr. GIROUARD (Two Mountains). Indeed! indeed!

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman says: Indeed! indeed! I should like to see him in the midst of our labouring population of Sorel, now without work nor bread, and crying out: Indeed! indeed! I urge him to come down at the next election.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) We will be there.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) I urge him to come down to Sorel and count the 128 manufactures. I will be there likewise, and I specially invite him to come and repeat what the hon. Minister of Public Works stated on the 4th January, 1892, that the labourers of Sorel who were willing to work had their three meals a day. I wish to call the attention of the Government to the following point, that is, that population has decreased and that it still decreases. Although there is no work, yet the Government stated to me the other day, in answer to a question, they were to prevent the fishing of soft fish between the 15th of April and the 1st July. That will be a means to drive out of the counties of Richelieu, Berthier and several other places, a numerous class of people who could only live on that fishing. After giving us protection, you give us prohibition. Opposite Sorel is a beautiful locality, Berthier. In 1881, it had a population of 2,156 souls, and in 1891, thanks to the fiscal policy of the Government, that population had fallen to 1,537 souls, a decrease of

519. Yet Berthier has, they say, thirty-one manufactures and Sorel 128. This decrease of population is sufficient to show these figures are false. In order to encourage the building of manufactures we voted, in Sorel and Berther, certain bonuses. In spite of that, during the last ten years, thanks to the protective system, the following manufactures have ceased existing: A shoe factory, to which the city of Sorel paid a bonus of $15,000 and for which the citizens subscribed $30,000; a furniture, sash and door factory, managed by Mr. Prevost, and which paid annually wages to the amount of several thousand dollars, also ceased existing. An other furniture factory had the same fate. A manufacturer of engines and boilers, Mr. Bellerose, has also vanished. A tobacco factory, also went down; five or six in all. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the people are unanimous in asking, there as elsewhere, a radical reform of the fiscal policy of the Government. They ask that the tariff be re-adjusted in a moderate way. It is all very well to say the country is prosperous, that the Government carries the by-elections—we know the cause of these electoral fortunes—and as I am one of those who honestly speak out their mind before the people and the House, no fear will prevent me from pointing out the causes of these victories which they so much boast of. In my opinion the Conservative party carried the elections in 1882 by the means of the gerrymander; in 1887, through the Franchise Act, which was an unqualified iniquity and the means of interfering with the powers of the local legislatures. That Franchise Bill placed a weapon in the hands of our opponents, but it is also the cause of a large increase in the public expenditure. In the election of 1891 they promised reciprocity to the farmers for the purpose of raising up obstacles and preventing us from having the true reciprocity we want. Because you were afraid to disallow the law relating to the Manitoba schools, you promised to the clergy of the province of Quebec that you would interfere in favour of our co-religionists, should the courts decide against them, and you did nothing of the kind. You will not do it, and you inquire from the courts whether you have a right to do justice to those who are sufferers through this law. Let me ask, Mr. Speaker, if there is anything more ridiculous than the stand taken by the Government? Yes, we have a right to interfere—

Mr. SPEAKER. I don't see what relation there is between the Manitoba School question and the subject under discussion.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, I have a right to refer to that question.

Mr. SPEAKER. I don't see any relation between the Manitoba School question and the tariff.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation). At all events, that question is one of the causes why we suffer through the existing tariff. In concluding these remarks, I beg to state I will vote for the amendment now before the House for three reasons: In the first place, because I want a decrease of the taxes which bear so heavily on the people. In the second place, because I am in favour of a greater sum of commercial freedom. I want new outlets for our produce. In the third place, because I want a rigid economy in the administration of public affairs. I should like the people to be happy and prosperous, not always remaining the subjects of Her Majesty, as stated by Mr. Blake. I should like to see realized the splendid idea brought forth by the Fathers of Confederation.

Mr. CAMERON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

THE TARIFF DEBATE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Foster for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and on the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto, have the precedence over all other business on Monday next at 8 o'clock, p. m.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to say that to-morrow I propose to take up the Supplementary Estimates for this year, as there are certain expenditures that are urgent.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 24th February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis) moved:

That the time for presenting private Bills be extended to Tuesday, the 7th of March next, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I wish to move for the following changes in the Committees:

Rinfret's name be substituted for that of Mr. Frémont on the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, and that Mr. Tarte and Mr. Belley be added to the Committees on Public Accounts and Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 62) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Equity Insurance Company and to change the name of the company to the St. Lawrence Insurance Company.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 63) respecting the Canadian Power Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 64) to incorporate the Maritime Manufacturing Company, Limited.—(Mr. Stairs.)

SUPPLY—OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. KENNY. I desire to call the attention of the Government and the House to a matter of public concern, to which my attention was directed by a telegram which I received yesterday from Halifax, as follows:—

Canada fast royal mail steamer arrived at 9 a.m. this morning—13 days 20 hours 59 minutes from Liverpool direct.

My informant does not give the name of the steamer, but I telegraphed to Halifax and learned that it was the "Mongolian," of the Allan line. Estimating the distance from Liverpool to Halifax to be 2,400 miles, the rate of speed—if you can call it speed—or the run of the walk—I do not know which would best apply—the average mileage rate of this subsidized Canadian mail steamer would be $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles per hour. I do not intend to make a speech, being physically unable to do so today, but I think it is important this matter should be brought to the consideration of the Government, and especially the hon. Postmaster-General. We all feel that the present Atlantic mail service is eminently unsatisfactory. Just a few words as regards the freight service of these steamers. This steamer sailed into a Canadian port and discharged her mails and passengers, and she then left that Canadian port and proceeded to the foreign port of Portland, where she disbursed a large amount of money in the discharging and loading of her cargo, and all the other expense incidental to a terminal port. At the Canadian port at which she touched, we had our Canadian railway and numbers of men in the city of Halifax, who, at this dull season, would have been very glad to have earned the money disbursed in the loading and unloading of that ship. Under our present system we are subsidizing a line of steamers which is unsatisfactory as regards the carrying of the mails, and which makes its principal disbursements in an American port, to the detriment of our own Canadian port. For some years past we have heard frequently of a fast Atlantic mail service. Canada has the best transcontinental railway service on the continent. On the Pacific Ocean we have the best mail steam-ship service, and I think we should renew our efforts to secure an efficient and first-class Atlantic mail service. We all share the disappointment which the Government must feel, that the efforts the Government has made to secure an efficient mail service have not been more successful, and my object in bringing the matter so publicly to the attention of the House is to urge the Government to renew their efforts to secure a satisfactory Atlantic mail service.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The telegram which the hon. gentleman has read to the House will form the subject of inquiry as to the delay in the transmission of the mails by the "Mongolian." It is quite apparent, from the telegram, that some mishap has occurred to the steamer, and I shall be glad, when I find out what the nature of it was, to give the hon. gentleman the information. As regards his views concerning the necessity of a fast steam-ship service, they are shared by the Government.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) is aware, because he referred to it a moment ago, that it is now five or six years since the Minister of Finance promised us a fast mail service within a short time. If I remember aright, he said that within a very few months from the time he spoke, we would have a mail service equal to the best now crossing the ocean. The hon. gentleman says that the efforts of the Government have not been crowned with success. We are all aware of that; but I would like to know from the hon. gentleman who, we know, is an authority on these matters, what he thinks of the objections made to the Canadian route? I have heard it stated again and again that it was not possible to obtain a fast service over that route on account of the dangers to navigation. I do not pretend to be an authority on these matters, or to understand them. I would hope that these statements are not true. But I have heard them made so many times that I would like to know from the hon. gentleman whether he believes we could have a service over the Canadian route equal to that over the American route.

Mr. KENNY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to reply to the hon. leader of the Opposition, who has done me the honour to ask my opinion. I do not know exactly to what portion of the Atlantic route he refers—

Mr. LAURIER. The Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Mr. KENNY. My individual opinion is, that if we put on a line of fast Atlantic mail steamers, desiring that they shall run with the regularity of a ferry. I think that they should sail from a non-tidal port in England to a non-tidal port in Canada—that they should sail to and from the same ports all the year round—that these steamers should ply between the selected port in England and Halifax. That is my opinion. I may be slightly in advance of the public opinion of Canada on this point; but I think the day will soon come when, if a fast line of steamers is established, the correctness of my opinion will be generally recognized. I do not think it is any breach of faith on my part to say that some years ago such was the opinion of gentlemen who were largely interested in the railway system of Canada. I recognize that their views have changed as regards running to Halifax all the year round. I think they are as anxious as ever they were that a first-class Atlantic steam-ship service should be established, but I imagine that when it became necessary to apply to the Government of Canada for a large subsidy, the influence of the St. Lawrence was against that portion of the project which made Halifax the terminal port all the year round. I am not familiar with the St. Lawrence route. On one occasion, the last time I crossed the Atlantic, I sailed from Quebec purposely in order to inform myself, and I realized that there are difficulties in the navigation of that portion of the route which do not exist if we go to other Canadian ports.

Mr. WELSH. I have listened attentively to the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), and I quite agree that it is possible to have a fast line equal to any line running out of the United States if we will establish the terminus in a non-tidal port, and no doubt exists in my mind that Halifax is the best port in the Dominion to run this line from. I do not think the Government will ever be able to make a contract for a fast line to run by the other route. The navigation of the Strait of Belle Isle and the Gulf of St. Lawrence at certain seasons of the year is attended with difficulties and uncertainties; but from Halifax, the service can be carried on almost like a ferry, as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) remarked. I think the idea of getting a fast line to compete with the New York line by running from Montreal and to convey mails and passengers will not be the best. I have crossed the Atlantic some hundred times; I have taken the route by the Strait of Belle Isle and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, also the route round the coast to Halifax and that to New York, and there is no doubt that there are only certain ports from which this line can be run, and I think the best of these is Halifax.

Mr. HAZEN. I trust this question—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAZEN. My hon. friends opposite seem to applaud even before I begin.

Mr. LAURIER. Patriotism.

Mr. HAZEN. I am glad that what I have to say meets with their approval. I was going to say, when my friends on the other side anticipated me with their applause, that I trust that when this question of a fast Atlantic service comes to be considered, the claims and advantages of the port of St. John will not be overlooked.

Mr. WELSH. Tell us about the fog.

Mr. HAZEN. My hon. friend asks about the fog. On a previous occasion I took the opportunity to point out to my hon. friends, and to demonstrate by proof that could not be denied, that the idea of fog in the Bay of Fundy had been exaggerated to a very large extent, that the returns show that insurance rates from the port of St. John were lower than from the ports on the St. Lawrence, and that statistics show that, after all, there was very little fog, not enough to affect practical navigation. But my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh) always likes to chaff us about the fog. If he were to spend some time in St. John, he would come to a different conclusion. I rose only to say that the claims of St. John as an ocean port ought not to be overlooked. While I do not want to say a word against Halifax, it must be borne in mind that St. John is 277 miles further to the west than Halifax, and that water carriage has advantage in the matter of expense over land carriage. The harbour of St. John is easily accessible and safe. No wrecks have occurred in St. John harbour. The wrecks that have occurred outside, and have been charged against the Bay of Fundy, are wrecks that have happened on the coast of Nova Scotia. The harbour is open to navigation all the year round, and is clear of ice, being the only port north of Hatteras that is free of ice at all times. The city of St. John, with commendable enterprise, is providing ample wharf accommodation. In this work a quarter of a million dollars is being spent. I trust that when the matter comes up for practical consideration, the Ministry will give fair consideration to the claims and advantages which St. John offers. To my mind, as a port for receiving freight and for shipping freight from Canada to Britain in the winter season, it offers advantages over every port in Canada, because of its nearness to the west and because it is open at all times, added to the advantages which it will now possess of having wharf accommodation for a very large trade.

Mr. FORBES. While Halifax and St. John have their claims, and while each is entitled to consideration as the chief port for Atlantic steamers, I wish to call attention to the port of Louisburg in Cape Breton as, of all ports on the Atlantic, the most suitable in every respect. It is nearer to the east, as St. John is nearer to the west. It is cheaper to carry by water than by rail, it is true, but just now some of the most enterprising capitalists in North America are investing their money at Louisburg and are going to build a line of railway from the Strait of Canso to that port. There is going to be the great depot for coal in North America along the Atlantic coast. I trust these things will be taken into consideration when this matter is more practically discussed by the Government. I trust they will not do anything to prevent the consideration of the claims which Louisburg presents as the most advantageous port to be chosen. St. John has its peculiarity. It is further away from the centre than Halifax, and Halifax is still further away than Louisburg. Louisburg is free from ice all the year round, it is easily accessible, it has notable historical associations, and is in every respect entitled to consideration at the hands of the House and the Government as the Canadian port for steamers between England and Canada.

Mr. HEARN. It is not my intention to trespass on the attention of the House by making any reference to the fitness of one Canadian port over another for a better Atlantic service between the mother country and the Dominion. I believe that, at this particular stage, no good result will follow in entering into a discussion on this subject. However, the question being before the House, I avail myself of the opportunity to say that, in common with the great majority of the House, I have full confidence that the Government will do what will be most beneficial to the Dominion as a whole when the matter comes before them for decision. Some of these little out-of-the-way ports, that hon. members have spoken of, compared with the old port of Quebec, have but a mushroom history. I have full confidence that the Government of the day will weigh fairly the claims of the respective ports, and that, in doing so, the claims of Quebec will not be overlooked. There can be but little difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to which port on this side of the Atlantic ought to be selected as the port for the fast Atlantic service between Europe and Canada.

Mr. GILLMOR. There is another port in the Maritime provinces on the Atlantic seaboard, besides St. John and Halifax. My young friend from St. John (Mr. Hazen) urges as an argument in favour of that city, that it is nearer to Montreal and the west than Halifax, and, therefore, the most desirable port. Well, now, St. Andrews is forty miles nearer the west than St. John, and some 300 miles nearer than Halifax, and it is one of the best ports on the Atlantic coast. Further than that, the enterprising inhabitants of St. Andrews started a railroad before St. John or Halifax ever thought of one. I may say here that neither St. John nor Halifax ever did much for railways out of their own pocket; they always depended upon the public chest for their railways, and for almost everything else. More than forty years ago the enterprising citizens of St.

Mr. FORBES.

Andrews started a railway from that town to Quebec, and they now have a railroad that was entirely built through their own private enterprise, without ever costing the Dominion of Canada anything. St. Andrews is the nearest winter port to Montreal and Ottawa and the west, and it is the best winter port, there is no doubt about it. Those who have been there know its advantages. Of course it is not so big a place as Halifax or St. John, but they are both on the decline, they are going down, and St. Andrews is growing. Now, I will read a few words from a slip that I have here, with reference to the port of St. Andrews:

First, the port of St. Andrews is the nearest Canadian port on the Atlantic to Montreal and the North-west, being forty miles nearer Montreal than the port of St. John, and nearly 300 miles nearer than Halifax. It is fifty miles nearer the ocean than St. John and sixty miles nearer Great Britain than Portland, Me. This nearness to the business heart of Canada will tend greatly to reduce the cost of freight, by making the railway haul shorter. It also obviates the tolls at the cantilever bridge, St. John.

Second, it is a commodious port, with an abundant depth of water for the largest vessel afloat: well sheltered, and with excellent opportunities for erecting deep water wharfs at little cost. Admiral Owen, who made a survey of the port for the Imperial Government, has said of it that "there is no port within my knowledge better adapted by nature than St. Andrews for being made a mercantile port with extensive advantages and facilities, and, in short, what Liverpool has been made as a mercantile port at an incredible expense, this point of our colonies has every advantage to adapt it for, and which might be made fully available at trifling cost." Commander Campbell, commodore of the Beaver Line fleet, thus places himself on record:—"There can be no doubt that St. Andrews, both from its geographical position and from the natural advantages of a fine, commodious land-locked harbour, is certainly equal, if not superior to any port in the Dominion, as the natural winter port."

Now, Mr. Speaker, neither my hon. friend from St. John nor my hon. friend from Halifax, can point to any authorities like these in favour of their ports. It is mere local preference on their part. I have the report of admirals and other skilful men, in favour of the port of St. Andrews. I believe both the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have been at St. Andrews, and know something about that port. They have spent their summers there, enjoying themselves, and I have no doubt when they were there they promised the people to give this matter favourable consideration. I have heard those gentlemen very highly spoken of by some of the people. The Prime Minister, I have heard, enjoyed frequent boating excursions about the bay and harbour. He was wise in employing a good Liberal as boatman. I hope he paid him liberally. I have no doubt that he enjoyed the beautiful bay, which is equal, if not superior, to the Bay of Naples, as it is surrounded by lofty mountains and sheltered from the winds in every quarter. On the whole, there is no port on the Atlantic coast like St. Andrews for a winter port. Its natural advantages cannot be ignored, and I am sure we shall have it.

Mr. FLINT. I rise, not to advocate the claims of the port of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, as I do not take the position that it has any very strong claims to be the winter port; but I desire to call attention to the very inadequate grounds which, I think, my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Hearn) has given for his strong expressions of confidence in the Government in regard to its attitude upon the winter port question. If confidence is a plant of slow growth, I presume that on that ground alone my hon. friend would have a reason for allowing that plant to grow in his bosom, for certainly the settlement of this question has been a long time growing towards fruition in the minds of the Government. I think it has been before the House of Commons and the country for the last twelve or fifteen years, and now we are at the end of this long period, and we see these counter-claims made in favour of various localities. I very much regret that the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White) is not present to-day to advocate the claims of his port, because I believe he could make out a claim fully as strong as that made in favour of St. Andrews by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. The port of Shelburne is, probably, one of the finest on the Atlantic coast, or in the world. It has every facility and convenience that could possibly be desired in a winter port for the steamers of the Dominion of Canada trading with Europe. Of course, it has this disadvantage, that it has not yet railway connection with the Intercolonial Railway system and other railway systems of the Dominion of Canada; but I would like to inform the House that a movement is now on foot which gives great promise of success, that in a very short time, long before the Government will have decided this question finally, at any rate, Shelburne will have railway connection with Halifax and the Nova Scotia railway systems, and with the Western Counties Railway, at Yarmouth, and thus be in a position to put in its claim as a winter port. I desire to forestall the discussion in 1895 on this subject, by here putting in a sort of preliminary claim for the port of Shelburne. I have no doubt the Government will continue to take advantage of the various claims put forth here from Quebec, Montreal, Louisburg, Halifax, St. John and St. Andrews to postpone a decision on this most important question. It is not for us on this side of the House to give the Government advice. They have taken advantage, and will continue to take advantage of the division of sentiment among their supporters, and postpone what must be for them an evil day when they decide this question. I think, until they finally resolve on some port in the Bay of Fundy or on the Atlantic coast, they should give the old port of Halifax much more favourable consideration than they have so far. Halifax, it seems to me, until the question is finally decided, certainly has strong claims, indeed strong presumptive claims to the support of the Government, so far as regards subsidies towards a winter port. As has been pointed out by the hon. members for Halifax, who have sat on both sides of the House almost since the inception of this question, that port possesses all the desiderata for a winter port. We have there a large city, a magnificent harbour, every facility for loading and unloading vessels, and facilities for intercommunication with other portions of the province, and the whole trend of trade from the larger portion of the eastern part of Canada is in that direction. I think the Government instead of placing those interests against each other, should do more for Halifax than they have done in this regard. From time to time we hear intimations that steps are to be taken towards increasing the rapidity of steam-ship communication with the mother country, and, while I am not yet convinced that it will pay this country to subsidize, at an enormous cost, a steam-ship line to compete in speed with the great lines running to New York, yet steps could well be taken to subsidize a line of steamers of a speed greatly exceeding those we possess at the present time. I hope the Government will not much longer play off one interest against another, but will soon settle the question, and let it pass out from among those questions which arise every year or two, and more strongly than they should do at the time of the general elections, when each community is persuaded, with more or less seductive intimation, that it will receive the Government's bribe. I shall be safe in stating that those gentlemen who have the good fortune to be present in this House half a dozen years hence, will hear a similar discussion to that indulged in to-day, and that the representatives of St. John, Louisburg, Shelburne, St. Andrews and Halifax will place before the House the various merits of those ports, and every effort will be made to impress on the Government the superior accommodation each port offers as the winter port of Canada.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not rise to prolong this discussion. I am glad to find that the doubts and fears expressed by the leader of the Opposition in regard to this matter seem to be illfounded, because we have not only heard of one port, but of a great many ports that are admirably fitted for the purpose to which the hon. member for Halifax has referred. We find there are a great many ports here from which we could carry on a fast service with the mother country in a very admirable manner, if we can believe the statements made by hon. gentlemen in this House. What I wish to say is simply this, that I do sincerely hope the Government will turn their earnest attention to this matter. I entirely agree with the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member for Halifax in regard to it. It is a most unfortunate circumstance that we should be in the position of having such a magnificent service across this country, and of having the very finest service across the Pacific, and yet of having a miserable service across the Atlantic. That link in our great service between the mother country and the east, which one would suppose would be the link first constructed, and constructed in the most perfect way, is the most weak, and is in a condition which is little short of disgraceful to the Dominion. I am quite sure in thus speaking I voice the feelings of the large majority of the people in western Ontario. The attention of the people there was very strongly drawn to this matter by the speech recently delivered at the Board of Trade banquet at Toronto, by Mr. Van Horne. It is admitted by every one, I think, no matter what may be the political opinions he entertains, that Mr. Van Horne as a practical business man has not his superior on this continent, and he has distinctly laid down in the most explicit terms his belief that we are able to have an Atlantic service of such a character as actually to take a large part of the trade now being carried to New York for this continent. He has stated that we can land our passengers in New York by way of Quebec twenty-four hours sooner than they can be landed in New York direct by steamers sailing to that port.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) During how many months can that be done?

Mr. McNEILL. I am speaking of the summer months. Mr. Van Horne says that during the winter months we cannot make so great a difference in time, but we can make a sufficient difference, as he expresses it, "to take the trade." Under these circumstances, it is the bounden duty of the Government to strain every effort to secure such a service as it is within the power of this country to obtain.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have been unable to learn from the debate what object this country has to gain by accepting the proposition to which the hon. gentleman has just referred. It may be important to some parties to carry the traffic of the United Kingdom to China and Japan across this continent. I do not know that the Canadian people have any special interest in that matter. It may be a matter of very great importance to secure the landing of passengers in New York twenty-four hours earlier; but I do not know what the Canadian people have to gain by doing so. I am expressing no opinion on the subject, but I am simply expressing my own inability to see in what way, from any statement that has been made, the Canadian people have anything to gain by subsidizing a line of steamers to land passengers in New York, by way of a Canadian port, twenty-four hours sooner than they would reach there by a line of steamers sailing direct to New York. If the hon. gentleman can point out in what way that is going to be advantageous to us, I dare say he will do so. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman has stated that the service between Canada and the United Kingdom is less satisfactory than the service across the continent, or the service across the Pacific Ocean. That may be so, but one would suppose that was a matter which would interest the people of the United Kingdom quite as much as it would interest the people of Canada, because it is the goods and the inhabitants of the United Kingdom that are to be carried by this fast line of steamers. How is it that the United Kingdom have not taken the interest which the hon. gentleman himself takes in the enterprise? How is it that a matter which must certainly concern them, even more than it possibly can concern any portion of the people of Canada, has not received the attention and support of the people of the United Kingdom? If the hon. gentleman looks at the traffic, he will see that this route has a very strong competitor in the Suez Canal route, and the hon. gentleman will have to show the people of the United Kingdom, and the people of Canada, that they have a special interest in diverting the traffic from that route to the present route. If he can show in what way we are to gain largely by that, then I have no doubt whatever he will be able to enlist a good many people in favour of the views which he has expressed. But this is in a large degree a question of dollars and cents, and in what way it is to bring dollars and cents to the people of this country it is important to establish this before the hon. gentleman or any other who takes his view will be able to enlist the active sympathy and support of the people of Canada in its behalf. I do not know whether or not we have any special interest in undertaking to secure the transit of passengers and goods across the Atlantic, in four or five days. I am unable to see myself in anything that has been said what we are to gain by the project, and until that fact is established, I do not think that the hon. gentleman will be able to get the people of Ontario, at all events, to take a very active interest in making a very large charge upon the resources of this country to secure the adoption of any such enterprise.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of very considerable concern to the people who live in the province of Ontario, as it is to those who reside in the other parts of the Dominion, that this fast Atlantic service should be brought into being at as early a date as possible. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) asked: wherein would there be any advantage to the people of Canada in having this route established? I can point him to the city of Portland, Me., which is almost entirely built with Canadian money, expended in the handling of Canadian freight on the steamers plying to that city. Were the city of Portland, or the city of Boston, to be located on our Canadian sea-board, consider of what immense importance that would be in supplying a demand for labour and a market for our produce. I care not whether our port be Quebec, Montreal, St. John, Halifax, St. Andrews or Louisburg, so long as we have the Canadian trade going to one of these ports, the money which is expended for the handling of freight, and for wages, and in a thousand and one different ways, would be paid out to the Canadian people. Were this the case, our friends of the Opposition would be robbed of one of their strongest arguments, that the bone and sinew of the Maritime provinces and of the other provinces of the Dominion, our young men and our young women, are forced to leave Canada to seek a livelihood in Boston, Portland or New York. Not only would this service be an advantage to the people of the Maritime provinces, but we in Ontario would find extra employment for our young men along the lines of railways, and at the seaports, and our farmers would have a much larger market in the Maritime provinces for the consumption of their products. Look at the matter from any point of view you may; from the advantages of this rapid service, or from a point of view of building up a national spirit, I am satisfied that it is in the interests of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific to have our own Canadian seaports built up with Canadian money.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am somewhat amazed to hear the statement made by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) in advocating a line of steamers between this country and England. One would imagine, to listen to the statement by that hon. gentleman, that if that were accomplished trade would be established; but at a meeting held in the town of Paisley, in his own county, he described the state of trade in the old country in the following terms: A falling trade; crumbling industries, dying agriculture, penury and want, and a swarming population. To-day, however, he advocates very strongly the establishment of a fast line of steamers with what he describes as a decaying country. What is the use of establishing a line of steamers at an enormous expense to carry a trade that does not exist. At all events, by advocating such a measure now, the hon. gentleman apologizes for the libel he cast upon the old country in the erroneous and fallacious statements that he has made in reference to its agricultural and commercial interests. For my own part I believe that the Government should go slowly in a matter of this kind. We have not got $750,000 a year to throw away upon a fast line of steamers, and even if we had, there are a thousand ways in which we could use it to the better advantage of the people of Canada than by establishing this fast line. Why, what is this fast line for? To carry letters? What signifies it whether a business man's letters can cross the ocean in five or in ten days? Every one knows that now the business between Canada and the old country is not done by letter; it is done by cable. You do not sell any flour or any other goods to the old country by letter. It is too slow. Five days is away behind the times, and you must conduct your business by using the Atlantic cable. It is therefore of little consequence whether our letters go across the ocean in five days or in eight days. There is another consideration, and that is, that in establishing a line of steamers for that purpose they must make such a high rate of speed that they would be unable to carry any freight, and consequently the only advantage we could possibly derive would be that our mails and our passengers would be taken from a Canadian port. Does it make any difference to the people crossing the ocean whether they sail from New York or Boston or from Montreal or Halifax? It would be all very nice for Halifax or St. John, that the people of this country should contribute $750,000 a year to enable these gentlemen who wish to cross the ocean for pleasure or business to sail from a Canadian port; but I say that the great masses of the people of this country are not interested in this subject, and I think it would be well for the Government to go slowly, and consider wisely and well before they make an investment of $750,000 a year for this purpose.

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, just a few words on this subject, suggested by the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who has expressed a doubt as to the service that would be rendered to Canada by the transportation through our territory of passengers from Europe to the Orient. If the hon. gentleman was acquainted with the progress that has been made in the province of British Columbia, he would realize that the travel to and from Australia, China and Japan, through that province, has been particularly beneficial; those travellers as a rule are a wealthy class, who are at all times open to investments. Those who have passed through British Columbia have realized the great advantages which that province offers for the investment of capital, and I know that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been invested by them there, notwithstanding the fact that that travel has been small because we have not a fast Atlantic line, and connections have to be made via New York, so that the Canadian Pacific has to divide the travel with the other transcontinental roads. With a fast Atlantic line, Canada would have the greater part of this travel, and I am satisfied that as a result the amount of money invested would be greatly increased. With regard to the section of country from which the hon. gentleman comes, I do not know what its attractions are. It is quite possible that it does not offer the same inducements to people passing through to invest as are offered by the North-west and British Columbia, but a fast Atlantic service is something that would be of the greatest advantage to the western portion of this Dominion.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I am sorry that I cannot advocate the advantages of Toronto as a winter port; I should like very much to do so if I could. But I would like to say a few words in answer to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell). I was very much surprised at the statement he made to the effect that it made no difference whether the passage across the Atlantic were long or short. The hon. gentleman cannot have crossed the Atlantic many times, or he would quite appreciate the advantage of having the passage made in as few days as possible. I am sure that this country would be greatly benefited, every portion of it, by a fast Atlantic service. I do not think the hon. gentleman can have considered how important it would be to Canada to have a large stream of travel passing through the country. I think it is very much to be regretted that we have so long deferred the establishment of a fast Atlantic service. We knew that when our merchants from Toronto, Montreal, or the members of the Government want to cross the Atlantic rapidly, they have to go by way of New York. For these reasons, I think it is quite time that we had a fast service of our own, and I have no doubt that the establishment of such a service would have the effect of very largely diverting the stream of travel from the ports of New York and Boston to the ports of Canada. I am quite satisfied that every part of the Dominion would realize the benefit of it, and I for my part am quite prepared to back up the Government in any reasonable expenditure that may be necessary for the purpose of establishing such a service.

VICTORIA, B.C., MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Speaker, before the House goes into Committee of Supply, I wish to make a few remarks with regard to a matter of great importance to the province of British Columbia, and one that concerns the veracity of my hon. colleague and myself. My attention has been drawn to an article that appears in the Victoria "Daily Colonist," purporting to be an interview held between the correspondent of that paper and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries in regard to the Marine Hospital at Victoria. I will not read the whole interview, but I hope that the House will allow me to read from it a few extracts upon which I wish to speak. The article states:

Mr. Tupper replied to the interrogation as follows:—Unfortunately, the statements concerning works in British Columbia in charge of the Federal authorities which have been brought to my notice through the press on many occasions have often been so greatly exaggerated that it is difficult to treat them always with that attention that more careful representations would command. I am not aware, nor is there any evidence in my possession to show that the Marine Hospital at Victoria is in a disgraceful condition.

Mr. BARNARD.

He also said:

So far as the expenditure of public money is concerned, I know no part of Canada which has received more attention in this respect in proportion to its population than British Columbia. Personally, I am not induced by hard criticisms to favour expenditure; neither will I be the more disinclined to do my duty to that important portion of the country on that account; but it is regrettable, according to my own experience, that the greater effort I make to keep pace with the growth and importance of the commerce of Victoria, and the larger the appropriations for that purpose, the more angry becomes the criticisms of the Government's policy and of this department in particular. I notice that Col. Prior joined in the attack on my department. I think, therefore, it is only fair that I should add to his remarks this significant statement, that the agent of my department at Victoria furnishes a report which is in complete contradiction of what was said at the meeting. This agent was recommended to me by Mr. Earle and Col. Prior, and they have never seen fit to send me the slightest hint as to the existence of the grievance upon which Col. Prior dwelt, as reported in the "Colonist."

Now, Sir, it is a most painful duty I have to perform to-day, in bringing this matter before the House, because the hon. gentleman in question is a personal friend of mine, and I trust he always will be, as I am proud to have his friendship. Not only that, but he is absent from his seat to-day, and I feel that it is almost unfair for me to say anything when he is not here to return the attack; for I know that he is a hard hitter, and he would reply to me if he were here. I have the greatest respect for his undoubted ability and executive skill; but I feel that if I did not bring this matter forward, I should be open to the charge of neglecting my duty to my constituents. Therefore, I wish to protest most emphatically against the language made use of by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries in regard to my province. The hon. Minister must have known—I do not see how he could help knowing—that my hon. colleague and myself had repeatedly brought before his department the unsatisfactory condition of the Marine Hospital at Victoria. It was most unsatisfactory, and we went several times to see the Minister and also the Deputy Minister; and I must say that I consider that the action of the hon. gentleman, as shown in this interview, of trying to shift the responsibility from his own shoulders to the shoulders of my hon. colleague and myself, was, to say the least of it, for one in his high position, most undignified. Not only have we placed this matter before the hon. gentleman, but the press of the province and also the British Columbia Board of Trade have brought it to the notice of his department, the former by leading articles, and the latter by resolutions passed and forwarded to the department. I contend that representations from such sources are well worthy of the consideration of the hon. Minister or of any other Minister, and I do not think he had a right to make the insinuations that he did. He states that his agent out there had reported differently from the statements made by the press and the Board of Trade. Well, Sir, I think that the members of Parliament for Victoria, as well as the press of Victoria and the officers of the British Columbia Board of Trade are just as worthy of credence from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries as a Government agent, and I repeat here, and I say it truthfully, that the affairs in connection with the marine hospital in Victoria have been carried on in the most parsimonious manner, in a manner very short of disgraceful, and this, notwithstanding that the Government have been in receipt of large sums collected as hospital fees from the ships entering our ports. Sir, the province of British Columbia does not now, and never did, approach the Department of Marine or any other department as a mendicant. We simply wish to get what we consider our fair dues and just treatment, such as is meted out to other portions of this Dominion. The Minister also states that the more the Government gave that province, the more criticism his department got from the press and people. Well, Sir, all I can say is this, if the hon. gentleman can see any large sum that he has given to the Marine Hospital, or, I might say, to almost anything else in British Columbia from his department, he must see through very strong magnifying glasses, for I do not believe a more cheeseparing policy could have been pursued towards that province than has been pursued by the hon. gentleman's department. If the province only paid a small amount into the Dominion treasury, I could well understand his policy, but what are the facts? The people of British Columbia pay the sum of $16.95 per head, in Customs and Excise dues alone, against $5.70 per head in Ontario, $3.75 in Nova Scotia, and $5.92 per head, taking the average of the Dominion; or they pay $11.07 per annum more than the average tax-payer does in the whole Dominion. Taking those circumstances into consideration, I think we have a just right to expect a decent expenditure not only from the Department of Marine but also from all other departments. The Minister of Marine seems to think that a member of Parliament has no right to take objection to any action which he or his deputy may adopt. I cannot agree with him. Not only that—it may be impertinence on my part to say so—but I consider that an ordinary member of Parliament has a perfect right to expect common courtesy from another member of Parliament, either in correspondence or personal interview, even if that other does hold the high position of a Minister of the Crown. As I have said, it has given me pain to bring this matter up, but I felt that I must not let my own personal feelings interfere with my official duties to my constituents. I feel personally certain that if the Minister of Marine will only look thoroughly into the matter, he will find that my colleague and myself have simply done our duty to our constituents in bringing this matter before him, and also that he would have done his duty, had he attended to the representations made, not only by my colleague and myself, but by the members of the Board of Trade of British Columbia.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand that what has attracted the attention of the hon. gentleman is a statement in the press, which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries made to a representative of the press, intimating that the information he had received from his officers did not justify the strictures which had been made with regard to the condition of the Marine Hospital. I do not know, nor am I able to ascertain at this moment, in order to meet what the hon. gentleman has said, what the facts were in connection with the complaint or what the complaint itself was, because, while the hon. gentleman was good enough to intimate to me that he would make this matter the subject of observation before the House went into Supply, he only gave me that notice after three o'clock when it was impossible for me to send to the department for any information. I am perfectly certain that, whatever the facts may be as regards the condition of the Marine Hospital, if the Minister of Marine were here himself, he could give explanations which would justify what he said to the press, and satisfy, I am sure, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) who has just spoken. The words of the extract which the hon. gentleman read, as they fell upon my ear, did not, I think, justify the hon. gentleman in stating that the Minister of Marine had either shifted the responsibility for the state of affairs in the Marine Hospital to his officers, or been guilty of making insinuations as regards the accuracy of the two hon. gentlemen who represent Victoria. On the contrary, the statement made in the press was directed against the strong language used at the meeting of the Board of Trade; and with respect to those very strong statements, such as the statement that the hospital was in a very disgraceful condition, the Minister cites the report of his officer, with whom he had communication after the condition of the hospital has been brought to his attention by the hon. members for Victoria; and I understand that the report of his officer indicates that the state of the hospital was not such as to justify the strong statements I have referred to and which my colleague had in view. I do not understand at all, that to quote the report of the officer of one's department, concerning an institution in a part of the country, which it was impossible for the Minister to have visited since the complaints were made, is at all insinuating that what was stated by the representatives of that locality was contrary, untruthful, or disingenuous. I agree with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), that he and every member of Parliament is entitled to the utmost courtesy in the transaction of business with Ministers of the Crown; and I think we are justified in concluding, from what the hon. gentleman said in the early part of his observations that that courtesy has existed between the Minister of Marine and himself, because he states that he is personally on the most friendly terms with my colleague, and was good enough to compliment my hon. colleague on the way he administered his department generally. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken altogether in the view he takes of the language the Minister of Marine used, and is certainly mistaken in supposing that the Minister made insinuations with regard to the hon. gentleman and his colleague, or was guilty of any neglect of the rule which obliges courtesy between Ministers and their fellow-members in this House. As regards what the hon. member has said with respect to the revenue and the expenditure in British Columbia, that is a subject we can discuss when it comes more properly before the House, but, in the meantime, it seems to me to be beside this question, because, if the Marine Hospital is shown to be inefficiently managed—much less in the state in which it was described by some of the speakers at the Board of Trade meeting and some of the press—it would not be a question as to what revenue the people of British Columbia contribute or what money they receive for public purposes, but it would be the duty of the Government and the Minister in charge of the department to make provision for putting the hospital in a complete state of efficiency. At the same time, I beg to assure the hon. gentleman that the Minister of Marine cannot have intended what the hon. gentleman supposes he did; and, in so far as I am concerned, it seems to me really impossible to draw that conclusion from the language used. I shall communicate, however, with the Minister of Marine at once with regard to the subject, and will make inquiry in the department with the view, perhaps, of drawing the hon. gentleman's attention to the subject later.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it is extremely to be regretted that we should have these daily manifestations of trouble in the family. I have sat in this House for many years, and have until this session observed the utmost unanimity on the floor of the House in public, whatever discord there may have been behind the scenes; but for some inexplicable reason, the ties of the past seem to have become loosened, and public business is daily being impeded through hon. gentlemen here being compelled, in justice to themselves and the country, to express their reasons for not being able to give that hearty support to the Administration which they formerly gave, and were sent here to give it. As a result, what do we find? We find that the Administration, having endeavoured to rehabilitate itself—increased in numbers, but perhaps not in talent—we find that Administration to-day losing grip on the House and country, sparring for time, and public business at a standstill. Now, I can understand how it is, that the Government to-day fails to be able to respond to the needs of the country and legislate for existing needs, but asks for a year's time, while the country is suffering, in order that these family feuds may be settled in private, and that they may be able to present a united front. They stand before the country paralyzed, unable to command apparently a working majority, in order to give effect to the will of the people. Mr. Speaker, I venture to say that of the hon. gentlemen who are now at the back of the Government, there is not to be found a majority having the courage to back up legislation such as the country demands.

An hon. MEMBER. Try it.

Mr. MULOCK. Try it! The Government have confessed that they are afraid to present legislation dealing with the evils of the country. They have stated in their own address that they are afraid to deal with these evils. They have by their action prayed for God's sake to be allowed time to make up their mind, and the men who have caused them to do it are these gentlemen who stand up and declare that there should be reform in the tariff, and that the Government must deal with it; and the Government is crushed between two forces—the combines on the one hand, and an aroused people on the other. They stand, as I said before, paralyzed, sparring for time, unable to move forward, and afraid to stand still.

THE HERCHMER INVESTIGATION.

Mr. DAVIN. As I see my hon. friend the President of the Council (Mr. Ives) in his place, I should like to ask him if he has brought down the report of Mr. Justice Wetmore, on his investigation into the charges against Commissioner Herchmer?

Mr. IVES. I may say to my hon. friend that I shall have much pleasure in laying the papers on the Table in the course of next week. I am bringing down not only the report, but also the evidence and exhibits.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Charges of management—To pay Messrs. Baring Bros. & Co., and Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co., $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent commission on amount of bonds and stock inscribed for the sinking funds of the Guaranteed Loans from 1868 to 31st December, 1892. \$44,274 01

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Upon what ground is this payment demanded? I was under the impression that these things had been met from year to year as the sinking fund investments were made. How do you come to require payment for all the time, for some twenty-three years?

Mr. FOSTER. As my hon. friend will see from reading the item, it arises from the fact that, although under the terms of the contract the agents had the right to charge $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent commission on sinking funds, that is for both kinds of loans, it appears that at the time of the transfer they had accumulated a balance, because they had not charged the $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on guaranteed loans. They had charged it only on the unguaranteed loans. Consequently this charge remains over. They should really have charged it up every year or half year and been paid. The reason they did not do it, possibly, was this: that if the agency had remained with them they would have had 1 per cent commission which they would have charged if they had negotiated the redeeming loan. But as the transfer took place, not having that, they brought the matter up for discussion and for payment. The question was referred to the Department of Justice and properly looked into, and there is no doubt whatever about the validity of the claim and the justice of payment, and it is to square accounts that this item is put in.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If I follow the hon. gentleman rightly, this $44,000 would be, as one might say, a sort of fine on the transfer of our account, and ought to be debited to the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. FOSTER. In one sense that is true, but, fortunately, we have a compensation. Whereas we would have paid to the old agents 1 per cent on the negotiation of the last redemption loan, we shall have paid the new agent only $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent. I had a calculation made by the officers of the department, and on this transaction we save \$8,000. So it is not so bad as it looks at first.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Always presuming we get as good terms.

Mr. FOSTER. The commission is the same whether we get good terms or not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say that is presuming that we get as good terms for the loans. That is altogether hypothetical, but the payment is a fixed fact. Of course, if the money is due to the Barings and the Glyns, as from what the hon. gentleman says, it seems to be, and, as, I have no doubt, after the explanation of the hon. gentleman has given, it is, there can be no objection made to paying it. But I think it will add, more or less, to the doubt that already exists in the mind of many as to whether we are really making anything out of the transaction or not.

Mr. FOSTER. We have already got some return, and I think there need be no doubt as to the wisdom of the transfer.

To pay for services and disbursements in connection with the transfer of the financial agency in London.....$2,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this for?

Mr. FOSTER. That is for certain expenses in connection with making the transfer from the old to the new agents. I was in London myself for a month and arranged the matter, but I could not stay there until the end of the year, and the transfer of the books and accounts had to take place, and it had necessarily to be made by a neutral party. So I engaged the services of Mr. Thomas Skinner, who was well acquainted with both the old agents and the new, and who was "persona grata" to both of them. I asked him to attend to all the minutiae and details of the transfer. The whole of this amount is not for the payment of Mr. Skinner; part of it is for expenses of books, and so on. For instance, the stock books, as I think I mentioned before, had been paid for by the agents, and were really their own personal property. We thought it was necessary they should belong to us, and I authorized Mr. Skinner to pay the agents for the books. Then, there are certain expenses for advertising and other services.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was the sum paid the actual cost of the books?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, only the actual cost.

Civil Government—Department of Secretary of State—To pay salary of C. T. DeLanaudière as a second class clerk from 1st July, 1892. $1,112 50

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How is this? Was this officer not provided for in the Estimates?

Mr. FOSTER. He was not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it a new office?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is not a new office. Mr. DeLanaudière was appointed by Order in Council, but he was left out and this is to correct the error.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then this is virtually a new appointment?

Mr. FOSTER. No; he was appointed by Order in Council and served in the office for some time, but was omitted from the Estimates last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the date of his appointment?

Mr. COSTIGAN. My recollection is that it was about a year ago, but the Finance Minister thinks it was longer than that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How did he come to be brought in as a second-class clerk at once?

Mr. FOSTER. In this way: When Mr. Chapleau was Secretary of State, his former private secretary, Mr. Tache, resigned and left the service. Mr. DeLanaudière was brought in as private secretary to Mr. Chapleau and was appointed as second class clerk, and remained in the service up to the end of the year for which there was an appropriation, but in last year's Estimates, that is the Estimates for the current year, his salary was dropped out.

Mr. LAURIER. But there must have been an appropriation for a second class clerk for the position occupied by Mr. Taché.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but the amount was dropped out of the current year's Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is this gentleman? He was only a year in the service, as I understand, and was made a second class clerk. A man who has been in the service for a reasonable length of time, of course, is sometimes promoted a little more rapidly if he happens to be a Minister's private secretary, and I think there is some special provision for that. But as I understand, this gentleman was just brought into the service for one year, and then placed at a salary of over $1,000. Now, what special qualifications had he to warrant this departure from the ordinary rule of the Civil Service?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. Before his promotion he was appointed permanently, in the first place, as second class clerk, after he had been for a number of years a temporary clerk. He was for some time in my department. I think he has been in the service of the Government altogether about eight years, and is very efficient.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand Mr. De Lanaudière took the place formerly occupied by Mr. Taché, who was provided for in the general Estimates. When Mr. Taché resigned, Mr. DeLanaudière was promoted to the position, therefore he must have been paid out of the Estimates of that year; he was paid under the salary of Mr. Taché. As Mr. Taché went out, Mr. DeLanaudière came in, and this salary was continued. I do not understand why we should take another appropriation for that.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is wrong. As Mr. Taché stepped out, Mr. DeLanaudière stepped in, at a salary of $1,100, and he was paid out of the appropriation for a second class clerk for 1891-92, until the end of that year. Mr. Taché having stepped out, when the Estimates were made up for the current year, the appropriation for a second class clerk was dropped. It was merely an omission, and this is to remedy the omission.

Mr. McMULLEN. How long did he discharge the duties of private secretary to Mr. Chapleau?

Mr. FOSTER. Until Mr. Chapleau's retirement.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice by the Auditor-General's Report that he only drew the sum of $11 altogether as private secretary, for seven days' service last year.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the payment which the hon. member refers to is the payment to the 1st of July, and for some time afterwards he continued to perform the duties of private secretary to the Secretary of State, until the Secretary of State became Minister of Customs, and then he was not continued as private secretary, but remained in the department, and this is to make provision for his salary as clerk in the department.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears from the account that he was appointed on the 8th January, a year ago, and during the first half year of his service he only served seven days as private secretary.

Mr. FOSTER. I will get the Order in Council and show when he was appointed.

Department of Trade and Commerce—To provide for the salary of the Deputy Minister from 1st January, 1893..... $1,600

Mr. LAURIER. Before we are called upon to pay this item, I think we should have some information as to the organization of this department.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend will remember we discussed that question pretty fully on the main Estimates; we had two hours discussion on it. Surely my hon. friend is not so insatiable for information as to wish to have it twice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We spent two hours in trying to get information, but the result was eminently unsatisfactory.

Mr. FOSTER. The demand is sometimes greater than the supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister was particularly requested to give us some idea what on earth the Deputy Minister would have to do in looking after these three or four parties—one second class clerk, one third class clerk, one messenger; I suppose the Minister will look after his private secretary himself. I really do not see for the life of me why there should be a Deputy Minister for this particular office unless it be for the charitable and benevolent purpose of providing for some gentleman for the time being who cannot be very conveniently dismissed. But waiving the question as to whether we are going to get any good from the creation of these very numerous Cabinet Ministers, I must say that I have always understood that the work of a Deputy Minister was such that he was expected to look after a large department, and we were assured that this department would not grow. I do not see how the Deputy Minister can profitably be employed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think, perhaps, the department will grow in this sense, that duties which now belong to other departments will be transferred to this, and the officers who have assisted in the discharge of those duties in the other departments, will be transferred to this. We do not expect it will grow in the sense of new additions to the service; but there will be various branches established in the Department of Trade and Commerce, for matters such as those connected with steam-ship subsidies, the regulation of contracts for such, and things of that kind, the supervision of commercial agencies, the matter of statistics which relate to trade and commerce, and all the matters connected with the enlargement of trade, and correspondence upon that subject, matters connected with the administration of the relations between the Chambers of Commerce and the Government, harbour boards, harbour commissioners and all matters of that kind, will naturally be relegated to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and a staff will have to be provided for that department. It is the intention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that these officers shall be gathered, as I have stated, from the other departments, where these duties are now performed, according as these matters are under his care. It is impossible for us, at the present time, to give the House in detail a statement of what duties will be relegated to that department, considering that only a little over a month elapsed between the establishment of the Ministry of Trade and Commerce and the opening of Parliament. But the Minister has many scores of references to him from the Council of matters connected with trade, and these require the attention of a Deputy Minister. This is to make provision for such clerkships as will be filled, I take it, by transfers from other departments, but they must be payable out of the Civil Government vote from this department.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Will a Deputy Minister be continued in the office of each one of the Controllers as well as in the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; the Act provides the contrary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You will have Commissioners instead of those.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Act on the subject provides that there shall be a Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce. They provide that the salaries of the existing Deputy Ministers of Inland Revenue and of Customs shall continue to the incumbents as long as they remain in office, but that, when vacancies occur in the offices of the Deputy Ministers in those departments, there shall be Commissioners instead.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What will be the salaries of the Commissioners?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Act provides that the salaries shall be $2,800.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What will be the fixed charges entailed by the appointment of the two Controllers; what additional officers will be required in the department?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There will be secretaries. There were two secretaries, and there will be three for the future.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And there will also be two Commissioners?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The gentlemen who fill the offices of Commissioners were in the department before. It will not be necessary to appoint any new officer to fill the position. If a Commissioner were appointed from the outside at any time, he would take the place of some officer in the department.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Are there not Commissioners, and is there not also a Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No one takes the place of the Deputy Minister, I presume?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; his duties will be performed by a Commissioner.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). At the same salary?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; at $2,800. He has not yet been appointed.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Do the Deputy Ministers and the Commissioners take precedence over the Controllers? What is the order of precedence.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is to be found in the Parliamentary Hand-book, it is in the latter part of the book, and the hon. gentleman will perhaps look at it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Controllers were not in existence when the Hand-book was published, and we should like to have the ruling of the Government when there is no written constitution to guide us.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will turn up the table for the benefit of the hon. gentleman, and he will find the deputies have no precedence.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister of Finance on a previous occasion intimated that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would endeavour to gather statistics with respect to interprovincial trade. This has been looked upon as a matter of some moment, and it was intimated that the Minister would prepare statistics in regard to such trade. What course does the Minister of Commerce intend to adopt with respect to the collection of those statistics?

Mr. FOSTER. That I cannot tell. It is for the Minister of Commerce, who is now considering the question, to think out and recommend what steps he considers best to adopt, and to submit his proposal for the consideration of the Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. One feature that is extremely objectionable in regard to this new department, as well as the Department of Agriculture, is, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not in this House. Undoubtedly, if this department is going to be of interest and value to the Dominion, and to commerce generally, the Minister should be in this House, prepared to answer questions and information. It is also desirable that the Minister of Agriculture should be here. Such a department is of vital importance to the country, and yet the Minister is in the Senate, and not within the reach of representatives of the people. With respect to inter-provincial trade, it is unquestionably a matter of considerable interest. It is highly desirable that accurate statistics should be prepared in order that hon. members may be able to estimate the extent of that trade, and be able to more closely gather the amount of and value of manufactures consumed in the Dominion. We should thereby be able to judge more accurately the effects of the National Policy, and the amount of goods manufactured and used within the Dominion. My only reason for asking this question is, to ascertain if any general course has been outlined by the Government in regard to it. Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce been merely appointed to perform duties decided upon by himself and without any discretion being left to the Cabinet? Has he been given no instruction, and is he not following any general line of instructions? The Minister of Finance has stated that it has been left to himself to prepare statistics with respect to interprovincial trade. Have the Government given no instructions?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say that; the hon. gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the hon. gentleman stated, in reply to my question, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was only beginning to consider in what way he would gather those statistics. Have the Government instructed him to adopt his own course, without giving him an idea as to what course he should follow?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government does not give ideas as to how a Minister shall conduct an investigation and arrive at certain conclusions to submit to Council. I stated also that the Minister was engaged in studying the question, and that after he had studied the question, he would submit his plans to the Government. The Government would then have a chance of advising with him, and of suggesting, if need be, any additions or extensions, as is always done. The hon. gentleman left out one-half of what I stated—that the Minister was conducting his investigation, and preparing his plan to submit to Council.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the necessity of creating the office of Minister of Trade and Commerce had impressed itself strongly on members of the Cabinet, they would have been able undoubtedly to have given the Minister a concise view of the duties that would necessarily devolve upon him. It is quite clear that no necessity for the creation of the office existed. The duties were performed by another department, and this Department of Trade and Commerce was brought into existence, not through absolute necessity for it pressing itself upon the Government, but rather for the purpose of getting the Government out of a political difficulty. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has been placed in office, and given a roving commission. He, therefore, goes to work as he pleases, and he gets up anything in the way of statistics as suits himself, and so far as the Government are concerned, no regular instructions have been given to him.

Mr. LISTER. Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce any control over the Controllers?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The two Controllers are to exercise their duties and manage the departments under the general supervision of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. As regards control, there is none. As regards the policy of each department, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is the medium of communication between the department and Council, and makes the reports and so forth.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Under the old system, when there had been appeals in reference to seizures and other matters, the final determination was with the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Inland Revenue. Will that power now be with the Controllers or with the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will be with the Controllers.

Mr. LISTER. Then, as I understand it, the duty of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is merely to make communication between the Controllers and the other members of the Cabinet.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not say that. He is the medium of communication, of course, because reports to Council have to be made by a Minister of the Crown. What I intended to express was: that as regards the policy on which these departments are arranged, for instance with regard to tariff changes and excise, revenue changes, and the general administration by the two sets of officers for Excise and Customs—in all matters of that kind, the Controllers will consult with him, and advise with him, and he has the general supervision with regard to these matters, and matters of policy.

Mr. LISTER. Is the patronage of the department in the hands of the Controllers or in the hands of the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The patronage of each department is in the hands of the Controller, who is the head of the department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I understand, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, has no practical control over the department that he formerly used to preside over.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What position does the Controller occupy? Is he entitled to deal with the various questions that come before him as fully as the Minister of Customs in former days did, or is he under any special supervision? Has he got the right, for instance, to settle claims?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Controller disposes of these as effectually as the Minister did before.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then, Mr. Chairman, the policy which is announced by the Finance Minister in the Budget speech has not been thoroughly matured. The Government have not yet matured the plans upon which they will conduct these tours throughout the country in order to find out from the manufacturers their needs and their requirements. That is not under the control of the Government, but under the control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he has not communicated the plan upon which he is going to obtain this information. How does the Minister of Finance know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is to decide upon taking this course, if he has not yet considered it? What is the medium of communication between the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when the Finance Minister tells us to-day, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has not yet matured his scheme? We should have the fullest information on this before the House is asked to vote the estimates for this department.

Mr. LISTER. I want to know exactly what the position of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is? As I understand, his first duty is to consult with his colleagues as to the trade policy of the Government, and I understood the Minister of Finance to say that his next duty would be to gather statistics relating to the trade of the country. Now, is that all that he is expected to do, and has it been decided that that is a portion of his duty?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say it would be his next duty. I happened, the other day, to mention the fact that we had not as full statistics of our trade as it was desirable we should have, and I ventured to express the hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would take that matter up, and devise some method for obtaining this valuable information. I know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is looking into that matter, but I did not say it was his "next" duty.

Mr. LISTER. Is it a part of his duty at all?

Mr. FOSTER. It strikes me it is a part of his duty.

Mr. LISTER. Then, that has not been decided upon yet, as you say you "hope" he will get statistics of the interprovincial trade, and, so far as we know, his only duty is to consult with the Government and decide upon the fiscal policy. It seems to me that you have appointed a Minister to discharge a duty without deciding what that duty is to be. It looks to me as if the Government have been creating offices merely for the purpose of making places for certain of their friends.

Mr. FLINT. It does seem to me that my friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) is very obtuse. I should think he could gather easily from the statements that have been made, that it is the principal duty of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to find out what his duties are. I would like to ask the Government if they have considered the advisability of amalgamating the business of the two departments in places where the revenue from Customs and Excise is small? It seems to me, from an examination of the Auditor-General's Report, and from other sources of information, that there are places in Canada where the officers of the internal revenue have very little to do, and have necessarily small salaries, and one man who, perhaps, might be otherwise better employed, is struggling along on a low salary, while, perhaps, the Customs officers in the same locality, with abundant leisure on their hands, are being paid large salaries. Of course in large cities, where the collections are large in both of these departments, there is plenty for both departments to do; but there are some small places in which the offices might be amalgamated. I think that this might be one of the subjects which the Minister of Trade and Commerce could deal with. I shall not mention any particular case in this connection, but I have in my mind several places where the suggestion which I make could be carried out with very great advantage to the Government and the persons themselves.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. My hon. friend is perfectly correct. He has mentioned two very important lines of duty which devolve on the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and equally on every Minister of the Crown. The first is to find out what his duties are, and it takes a Minister a little time to find out that. The second is to practice economy in the management of public affairs.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think the first Minister has quite accurately stated the facts of the case. I am sure that he has no difficulty at all in determining what his duties are, and I dare say that the hon. Minister of Finance has equally clear conceptions as to what his duties are. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce was appointed to hold a certain position without having any very definite duties attached to it, but with the hope that by and by he will grow moss; that is about the position of things. Now, I see theoretically what it is proposed shall be the relations between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Controllers; but when you undertake to state accurately what those relations are in fact, and not simply in principle, then a very great deal of difficulty arises. The administrative work, properly so-called, necessarily devolves upon the two Controllers. With that administrative work the Minister of Trade and Commerce will have nothing to do. With the general policy affecting Customs and internal taxation, the Minister may have something to do; but if you allow, as my hon. friend from Lambton suggested, and as I understand the Minister to say, that the policy of the Government with regard to taxation is to fall to his lot, then it seems to me that the real functions of the Minister of Finance will be entirely swept away. I supposed that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would have duties somewhat similar to those of the President of the Board of Trade in the United Kingdom; but I do not precisely see what special functions the Government propose at present to assign to him. What are to be his duties? The duties of the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Inland Revenue were almost precisely the same as those which now devolve upon the two Controllers—very little beyond them; and the policy regarding Customs and Excise taxes was largely dealt with by the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance, in the very nature of things, must continue to deal with those subjects still; but, that being so, it seems to me that there is nothing remaining for the Minister of Trade and Commerce as a Cabinet Minister to do. The hon. First Minister has spoken of the collection of statistics. That is simply an administrative work, which may be undertaken by a chief clerk in a department. The commercial agents appointed abroad, the hon. gentleman says, will be under the control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Well, I understand that is to be simply a certain amount of patronage to be placed in the hands of the Minister, separate from the patronage of the Controllers, and which now belongs to some other Minister, and nothing more; no large question of public policy can grow out of that matter. It does seem to me that the arrangement that existed prior to the bringing into force of the Act which so long remained a dead letter on the Statute-book, was an arrangement better suited to our circumstances than the one which the hon. gentleman has brought into operation. So far as I can see, nothing relating to matters of public policy, which are under the control of the Administration in their capacity as advisers of the Crown, can for a long time to come fall to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, apart from the two subordinate positions politically under his control, that of Controller of Customs and Controller of Inland Revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The fact is, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a Past Grand Master, and the Controller is the existing Grand Master.

Mr. MULOCK. Can the Minister tell us what the new Department of Trade and Commerce will cost, including the head and all the new appointees who are necessary?

Mr. FOSTER. The Estimates will inform my hon. friend. Provision is made for a Deputy Minister, a second class clerk, a third class clerk, a stenographer and a messenger. It is also provided:

That in case of the transfer to this department of any officers or clerks whose salaries have been provided for in the estimates of any other department whether inside or outside service, the amount provided shall be available for the payment of the said salaries by this department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What becomes of the Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. FOSTER. That is provided for in the last clause that I have read.

Mr. FLINT. That is under the Department of Agriculture, is it not?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; the Bureau of Statistics has never been established yet. There is an Act authorizing it, but the Act has never been brought into force.

Mr. FLINT. I mean the statistician.

Mr. FOSTER. He is in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. FLINT. I suppose, from the tenor of the observations of the hon. Minister, that in time his work might be transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce, which I think would certainly be an improvement.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is there any necessity of continuing the statistician, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce is to be virtually the statistician?

Mr. FOSTER. He will be kept at work.

Mr. LAURIER. In whose department?

Mr FOSTER. Where he is at present.

Mr. LAURIER. Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce will collect the statistics which he has been collecting.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We do not say that. It may be desirable in some respects, as the hon. member for Yarmouth says, that the statistics should be assigned to the Department of Trade and Commerce, where they naturally belong. That question has not yet been settled. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has been charged with various duties from day to day by Council making reference to him; but the scheme to be detailed for his department must be by Order in Council, or it may need legislation. That certainly requires experience before it can be formulated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the statistics are taken from the Department of Agriculture and placed under the control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and Immigration is also taken from the former department and put under the control of the Minister of the Interior, what remains for the Minister of Agriculture?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There will still be Patents, and Copyrights, and Agriculture and Quarantine.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman propose to retain Quarantine, and separate it from Immigration?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then the Government are going to have two sets of statistics, one by the statistician and the other by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce to go around with the Minister of Finance? or is it the Minister of Finance and the two Controllers who are to go on this expedition? We want to know all about this wonderful progress of the members of that troupe, so that we may know how to receive them. We ought to know in what order it is going to turn out, and in what garb we ought to meet them.

Mr. FOSTER. Before we go down to your county we will give you notice.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite clear that the appointment of the hon. gentleman as Minister of Trade and Commerce is simply pensioning him off for the rest of his life at a salary of $8,000 per year. He might just as well have been put on the superannuation list, had that been possible. After all the inquiries made from this side as to what his duties are to be, we cannot obtain a distinct answer. In the first place he has to gather information as he thinks best, and in whatever way he may think fit. He is to have a Deputy-Minister, and a number of clerks and a private secretary, and he has a seat in the Senate. Of course, it would be very ungracious to turn him out of harness altogether like an old horse, to die on the roadside. There must be some provision made for him. He has rendered very faithful service to his party, while in the House, and his family have all been provided for—his sons, and his grandsons, and sons-in-law. All are drawing good salaries. One son enjoys a magnificent position as Collector of Customs in Victoria at $2,000 a year. Another son is in another position in Dakota, drawing a good salary, but I do not know what he is doing there for us. It would be too bad to turn out the political hack and let him wander around to die on the roadside. This creation of new offices is an injustice to the people, in view of our present expenditure of $37,500,000 a year. No doubt the Controller of Customs wanted to get a position, and no doubt the party at his back wanted him installed in some place. You could not put two men into the one place, and so to suit all parties, this new departure was taken of putting into force an Act which lay a dead letter on the Statute-book for five years. That Act was brought into existence, as a tempting invitation to followers of the Government, to which they might look forward. It was held out to them as furnishing a prospect of positions in store for them. It was allowed to slumber during five years, and would not have been brought into use now were there not so many individuals pressing their services on the country in the shape of Ministers of the Crown. In order to quietly get over the difficulty surrounding the disposal of these different positions, these new offices were promised. We heard the rumour of their creation during the summer in the public press, and we heard of the various applicants. One man was kicking so vigorously, so the hon. member for Grey said, that he sprained himself and had to go to New York to get cured. I do not know how hard the Controller of Customs kicked, but he has been provided for. There is only one man evidently who did not kick as vigorously as the rest, the man for London, and he was turned out. No place could be found for him; but I think they might have made him Minister of the National Policy. They sent him virtually to Chicago politically, and, indeed, he has been practically Chicagoed. They could not shake the other gentleman whom they sent to the Senate, but had to make a place for him. I say it is unjust to the people, under the present stringent condition of affairs, to thus increase our annual expenditure for the sake of providing a resting place for the balance of his days for an old man who has drawn a salary year after year far in excess of the value of the services he ever rendered to the country, and who was a willing and pliant tool always ready to swallow anything in the interests of the party. They could not get rid of him, and so he was made Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the Senate, with full liberty to make of the position anything he liked, and to make any report he liked. It would have been better to have sent him over to London to assist Sir Charles Tupper in performing the duties of High Commissioner. He could have been named Assistant High Commissioner. It may be intended, however, that he shall devote his time and attention to gathering statistics, in order to bolster up the National Policy, and possibly one of his duties will be to visit in the Red Parlour the millionaires which that policy has created. He may be very serviceable in gathering the commissions, for the purpose of carrying on politics in the future, as they have been in the past. Before the committee was asked to sanction the establishment of this Minister of Trade and Commerce, we should have had a distinct, clear outline of his duties, and we should have also had some evidence from past years of the necessity of creating that office. Nothing has been brought to the eye of the House to at all justify the establishment of this new department. But the fact that the statute under which this office was created lay a dead letter for five years, proves, conclusively, that there was no necessity for it, and that it was only put into effect for the purpose of helping the Government out of a difficulty. It is quite clear that the whole thing was got up, not for the purpose of benefiting the trade of the country, not because the trade of the country required such an officer, but just because the Government had not sufficient positions to divide among the contending divisions of the party; and they established the office in order to find a resting place for an old chief, who was, undoubtedly, a willing and pliant tool for many years, and pension him off for the balance of his life at a cost of $8,000 to the country.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I beg to say a word or two on the subject of the observations the committee have just listened to. We who have our seats in this House are accustomed to be attacked and referred to in terms, which, at times, are offensive, and which we reply to or not, according as their importance seems to necessitate a reply or not. But when an hon. gentleman makes the most insulting observations which he has made with reference to an old public servant—a person who has been an active and respected member of this House, and who is still a Minister, but is not present or in a position to take part in the debates of this House—I feel that, not on his behalf, but on account of the character of the House, it is necessary to call attention to the unworthy nature of those insults. Any person in this country may well be regarded as not worthy of reply who would style the present Minister of Trade and Commerce an old horse turned out to pasture. I am proud to say that, after fifteen years of public service as a Minister of the Crown, in which he administered the most laborious department in the public service, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is, to-day, capable of administering any department in the Government as is any member of this House. And I trust that I shall be able to say that of him for many years to come. I need not remind the House that observations of that character would not have been made if the Minister of Trade and Commerce were here, because if there is any man who is able and willing to take his own part and against whom statements of that kind would be powerless and impotent, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is the man. We have given him, not on account of political exigencies, but for the public good, we firmly believe, one of the most important departments in the whole Government, a department which is immediately connected with every branch of business carried on in this country.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Six years ago the policy was settled in this House, and settled, I think, with only one dissenting voice, that it was desirable to create such a department. The First Minister of the day did not think it expedient or had not the full opportunity of bringing that Act into operation, but when the opportunity was given by the complete reorganization of the Government, we felt that we had the mandate of Parliament, as well as the authority of Parliament, to create that department, and we created it, believing that the Ministry of Trade and Commerce must be, as it now is in this country and as it is in many other countries, not only one of the most important departments of the Government, as I have said, but one of the most useful. And the hon. gentleman's statements with regard to the Minister, a man in the full vigour of life, a man who has had an honourable career in this branch of Parliament, and is leader of the co-ordinate branch, the Senate, are made simply because something like six weeks have elapsed since the creation of the department and we have not yet laid on the Table a detailed list of the duties which are to devolve upon him. I think the same objection could be raised with regard to every department of the Government. With regard to my department as Minister of Justice, the Act which creates the department and which defines my duties is a mere skeleton and there has never been presented to this House, and I believe the Government has never been asked to present, a full list of the duties which devolve upon me and which I have to discharge, and which would tax the energy of any man if he undertake to discharge them fully. The duties imposed upon the Minister will increase as this department grows from day to day, if that department is efficiently managed, as the Department of Trade and Commerce will be. It would be impossible to expect a draughtsman, however skilled, to sit down and draw up an Act to describe, in advance of experience and observation, the duties the Minister will have to perform. We know from the history of departments of trade and commerce in other countries what they embrace. They embrace all matters of inquiry and of policy in relation to trade and commerce, as I mentioned a few moments ago. I think the objection that we are not able to state in detail everything that will consume the business hours of the Minister is a most unreasonable one, and that observations which stigmatize the hon. gentleman as an old political hack, a man who, as I say, acted well his part in life, and has borne an honourable part and has won for himself credit in this House, of which he was long a member, these observations, if not unworthy of the gentleman who made them, are unworthy of being listened to in this House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am not going to allow even the First Minister to misrepresent me. In the discussion of a question with regard to the appointment of a Minister of Trade and Commerce, I pointed out the reasons why I, as well as other gentlemen on this side of the House thought it was unnecessary, altogether, that that department should have been created, and the gentleman who is now Minister of Trade and Commerce given the position he holds. I pointed out that the statute under which that office was created was in existence for six years before hon. gentlemen opposite thought of using it for the purpose of creating a Department of Trade and Commerce. I pointed out the fact that they had pressing upon them the claims of a number of their own men for positions in the Cabinet, which the First Minister has not denied. We know from the public prints, and it was heralded everywhere, that a number of men were pressing their services upon the Government, that the old men they could not get rid of, while the new men wanted their places. And, in order to provide a resting place for the then Minister of Customs, they had brought into existence this Department of Trade and Commerce. I said, with regard to him, that they could not turn him out, like an old horse, to die. Nor could they. I did not compare him to an old horse, but I said that, in order to get the position for the men who were pressing to get into the Cabinet, they had to make this provision for him. These are the remarks I made. With regard to anything I said about the Minister I would say it as willingly and frankly before his face. I never go behind men's backs to say what I am afraid to say to their faces. I say he has been one of the most pronounced Tory partisans that ever sat in this House. That has been his record in parliamentary life from the beginning. And he was always willing and ready to take a partisan advantage, a petty advantage, if he could get it. He has done it more than once on the floor of this House. He has now gone to the Senate to take the place they have assigned him to. But I do not think he is rendering service to this country, or is likely to do so, in the capacity which he now fills.

Mr. MULOCK. I was going to ask the Ministers if they could not give us at least some little outline of the duties of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. You are now asking an appropriation for quite a staff, and we know that this is only the commencement. The country has not increased in trade to warrant this expenditure. You have now three new Ministers, and I do not know how many new civil servants in addition. This increase in the staff can only be warranted on the assumption that there has been an increase in the business in the country. So far as we know, this is simply a division of the work; you are simply taking from one department to give to another. The duties that were formerly discharged by the Minister of Customs are divided amongst three. That seems to me to be all it amounts to. If there is to be this redistribution of the work there should be a redistribution of the staff. I think it is the duty of the House to inquire why the Government is asking for the appointment in connection with this department of a deputy-head, a second class clerk, a third class clerk, a private secretary and a messenger. And this is a mere beginning. Next year half a dozen different officials will probably be appointed. I want to know why you do not utilize those who are already there to discharge these duties.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was going to say that I suppose something else must have attracted the hon. gentleman's attention when I made my explanation, but he will find it in "Hansard" more fully than I can repeat it from memory. It was given in answer to the request that I should give an outline of what the duties of the department are to be. As regards the clerkships and staff generally, I did assure him that we expected the department would not be manned by the appointment of new officers to the Civil Service, but that according as duties are transferred from other departments to the Department of Trade and Commerce, it is intended that some of the officers of those other departments who now attend to the work falling under those duties, will be transferred to fill up these clerkships which we ask Parliament to create now.

Mr. MULOCK. If that is the case, why take a vote of money for new appointments, as you are doing here?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will see we must do that. If an officer is transferred from the Department of Marine and Fisheries to the Department of Trade and Commerce, he can no longer be carried on the pay-roll of the Marine and Fisheries; he must be on the Estimates of the Civil Government for the Department of Trade and Commerce, in which he discharges his duties, and the Auditor would not be justified in paying him, if he found he was really an officer of Trade and Commerce, out of the moneys voted for Marine and Fisheries; and we have a paragraph here contemplating such transfer.

Mr. MULOCK. A paragraph like that would deal with the whole case, instead of our voting the money. To follow the illustration of the Minister of Justice, if there is money voted for that clerkship in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and if, for some reason in the public interest, the clerk filling that office is transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce, that one salary would lapse if there was a new assigned salary voted. But it is not necessary to vote duplicate salaries, all that would be necessary would be to provide that in the case of the Department of Trade and Commerce, if any officer filling some other position were transferred to this department, the salary assigned to him in his other position, would follow him into the new department. But I am afraid that whatever may be the hopes of the Minister—and I am, of course, inclined to accept his statement as his present candid intention—I think he will find himself in this position when the House adjourns: He will have got two sets of salaries voted, one set to be drawn by the present incumbents, and this new set will be a prize to new applicants for office, and you will not be able simply to transfer, but will make new appointments, and thus the money voted nominally as simply a duplicate vote, will turn out to be, in effect, a disbursement and an additional permanent charge. Now, if there is to be no increase in numbers, why not do away with this vote, in numbers, why not do away with this vote, transfer the salaries voted to other departments when the officers in those departments are transferred to this?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think that would be a very irregular way of organizing a department, and I think Parliament and the public would have reason to expect that the Public Accounts and the public estimates should show what the staff estimates have been, and what the staff in any department is, so that Parliament and the public may know from time to time what is being voted for that department, and know what the whole expense of that department is.

Mr. MULOCK. I will conclude my remarks with this statement: I understand the Minister to say to the committee now, that in asking for this vote for additional clerks, it is merely to get over the point he made before, namely, that in the case of the transfer of clerks, the law at present does not allow the salary voted to them in their other position to follow them into this department, and that, therefore, if these salaries are drawn there will be corresponding lapses in the departments from which these clerks are to be drawn. Is that the position?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is my belief. I cannot say that the votes will be used simply for that purpose. It may be found necessary that new appointments should be made. I cannot give any pledge in advance. That is the policy of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that is all I can say.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This arrangement in regard to the Cabinet, I think, will not be satisfactory to the people engaged in trade. Now, it appears from the explanation we have received that we have the Department of Customs under the control of the Controller of Customs, we have the Department of Inland Revenue under the control of the Controller of Inland Revenue, and we have a Minister of Trade and Commerce whose duty apparently is to collect statistics. As to the policy that shall govern trade, whether to restrict or to make it freer, whatever the policy may be in reference to that subject—and that is one of the most vital things that this House has to deal with—it is relegated to the Department of Customs, and the Controller of Customs has no office in the Cabinet. While he is attached to the Ministry, he has no office in the Cabinet. He can say no word inside the Privy Council chamber as to what policy should regulate trade. The Controller of Inland Revenue is not a member of the Cabinet; although he is at the head of that department which regulates trade in connection with all those matters over which he has charge, yet he has no position in the Cabinet. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has no voice as to who shall be appointed in the Customs Department, or as to who shall be appointed in the Inland Revenue Department. I think it does not require a very powerful argument to show you that this is a very unsatisfactory arrangement. Any person who has ever given any consideration to questions of trade or questions of commerce, cannot but be struck with the very anomalous position in which the great trade interests of this country are now placed. Those in charge of trade are outside the Cabinet, they have no voice in shaping the policy that shall govern trade. The position is a most anomalous one, and I do not think it should continue. I think it is a position that will greatly alarm the trade interests of this country. If the Controller of Inland Revenue were a member of the Government, I for one, would say that the interests of that very important department would be well conducted under his charge. I would not say a single word against him, I believe he is competent. I believe he is able, but when he is not present in the Cabinet councils to make known his views, to lay down a policy that shall govern the department over which he presides—and I believe he will ably preside over it—I say it is an anomalous state of affairs, and I do not think it requires a lawyer to see the very unsatisfactory condition in which the trade of this country will be placed. I think I can appeal with confidence to the First Minister to look into this subject, and to see how anomalous the position is, and how dangerous it is liable to become. I think the people who are engaged in trade have much reason to feel great alarm at the condition in which their interests are now placed, and the position they hold in this new Cabinet. Never since Confederation have the interests of trade been placed in the precarious position in which they are now placed. I have nothing to say against the Controllers, I have no contention with men in politics, it is with measures that I quarrel; and I say that the interests of this country imperatively demand that the great and important interests of trade and commerce should be under the charge of men who have some voice in the councils of the nation. I think it is a very anomalous position, and this House should consider, and the Government should well consider, what course they are going to take. Then as to the transfer of the Minister of Customs to the Senate, why one is sent over there and another is left, we do not understand on this side of the House. Perhaps it is none of our business, except so far as it relates to the public interest, why one Minister is taken away and another is left. Could there not be another department created in which the late Minister of Agriculture could get some place? Has he not been as true and as faithful as the Minister who has been transferred to the Senate? Has he not in every contingency and in every emergency defended the councils and the policy of the party? Why, he was about the only man in the Cabinet that earned the title of "Honest John." Is this the reason that he is taken and the other sent up higher? In his speech delivered the other day before the Rifle Association, he said the first information he had that he was to be transferred to the Senate, was when His Excellency said to him, "Cherub, come up higher." It was not the First Minister, but His Excellency who spoke those words. I presume His Excellency thought that his seat was sliding away from him, and so he took him to a place where seats are not required. You know pretty well, Mr. Chairman, that cherubs have no bodies; their wings are attached to their ears. Probably the short ears formed the reason why he was transferred to the Senate. I suppose the Government is run on a religious basis—one is taken, and the other is left, one is given a salary and the salary of the other is taken away. There are other matters that everybody can take notice of in connection with the formation of the Government, and we have a right to speak of these, if fair-play is not administered. This is not altogether a domestic matter. Although we sit on the opposition side of the House we always take a deep interest in hon. gentlemen opposite. We wish to know why those who have borne the burden and heat of the day are not allowed to come to the front. We know many members who had much greater experience than the members of the present Government; there are many men who would add solidity and dignity to the Government as it is constituted to-day, and we have a right to say this, as we think so. We do not want to be offensive. There are certain questions that perhaps it is not well to discuss; but it is very well understood by hon. gentlemen who occupy seats in this House that there are hon. members here who are worthy men, men of character and ability, who have been passed over, while others who are just starting in parliamentary life and knowledge of parliamentary government, are added to the Council. Why is it? That is a question it would take a philosopher to answer.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 15) to incorporate the Dominion Burglary Guarantee Company (Limited).—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 19) respecting the Hamilton Provident and Loan Society.—(Mr. McKay.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 58) to incorporate the Automatic Telephone and Electric Company of Canada.—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Secretary, Controller of the Inland Revenue..... $325

Mr. McMULLEN. In connection with the Inland Revenue Department, I call the Controller's attention to the fact that Charles Curless, chief preventive officer, has a salary of $1,200 a year, and that last year he drew nearly $500 as share of seizures, and in addition to that $3,999.68 for travelling expenses. This appears to be an enormous sum for one man to draw for travelling expenses, and I should like some explanation of it.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I did not expect that I would be asked anything in connection with the expenses of Mr. Curless in connection with this vote in the Supplementary Estimates. When the main Estimates are reached, I will be prepared to give the hon. gentleman any information he desires regarding Mr. Curless' travelling expenses. I may say that Mr. Curless is the chief inspector, and is constantly travelling all over the country, making seizures, when necessary, for violation of the regulation regarding tobacco, and his travelling expenses in that connection would be very large. I will be able to give the hon. gentleman full information about it later.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite willing to do that. My reason for bringing the matter to the attention of the hon. gentleman was, that he might have an opportunity of explaining it later. $10.75 a day travelling expenses for every day in the year seems to be an enormous sum.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I will obtain all information about the matter, and give it to the House when the main Estimates are before us.

Privy Council office—Extra Clerks. $355

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the circumstances of this vote?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Those are temporary clerks in connection with the Privy Council. They are persons whom, I believe, have a great deal of experience and more than usual skill in the work they have to do. The most of them are over the age for passing the Civil Service examination or for permanent employment. Under the circumstances they are continued in the service of the department and paid out of the civil government contingencies of the department. But the ruling of the Auditor-General is that such persons cannot be continuously employed, but must for at least two months after the examination cease to be employed, and be then taken on again, and this vote is to pay them for that period during which they cannot, in his judgment, be paid out of civil government contingencies.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are these gentlemen all employed in the Privy Council office all the year around?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is Mr. DeBrisay one of the clerks?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. At present he is employed as sessional clerk, but the amount that he receives as such is deducted out of his pay as clerk in the office of the Privy Council.

Exchequer Court $1,725

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of this vote $200 is required to provide for the half-year's salary of a third class clerk, who was found necessary in consequence of the increased work of the department. He is required to attend at the counter, and wait on persons who go there, as well as to do type-writing and some shorthand work in the department. Then, $1,500 is required to meet contingencies for the publication of Admiralty rules and otherwise. A new code of rules has been prepared, and the intention is to publish and distribute a large edition. There is $25 to provide for the increment of the registrar's salary as a chief clerk, at the rate of $50 a year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It strikes me that the amount provided for the publication of the Admiralty rules is very large.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it must include some other item, as the rules which I have seen would cost, I should think, about 25 cents each. We propose to send a considerable edition to each registrar for distribution among the gentlemen in practice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have no doubt the hon. gentleman will do all that is necessary in that regard, but I cannot avoid calling attention to that amount, which seems to me outrageous, unless it includes some other expenditure. I must ask him to look into it, and get an explanation from the gentleman who prepared these estimates.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will undertake that that amount will not be spent in the printing of the Admiralty rules alone. The words "and otherwise" indicate that the item includes some other contingencies.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not want to appear factious in stopping the Estimates, but it looks as if something were covered up in this phrase "and otherwise" that ought to be explained to the House. It strikes me that a couple of hundred dollars would cover the publication of the rules.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I should think $500 would cover it. I am not in a position to say what the words "and otherwise" include, but if the House will not trust me, I will strike out the $1,000, and put the item on the Supplementary Estimates for next year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am willing to trust the hon. gentleman, but I think it is rather trifling with the committee to ask us to pass such a vote for the publication of the rules when it really cannot cost one-fifth of that amount. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman let the vote stand until he finds what the gentleman who prepared these estimates proposed to spend this money for.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Let it stand.

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary--
To provide for the salary of a carriage-maker instructor, omitted from general Estimates..... $600

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In passing the main Estimates for next year the committee voted the salary of a trade instructor in the wheelwright business. He was appointed during last year, and this is to provide for his salary until the main Estimates come in force. I explained to the committee that the warden thought it useful that a gang of convicts should be placed under a trade instructor of this kind, because a great many repairs were required to be done to farm vehicles, etc., for which money is being paid out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you going to provide for carriage making at St. Vincent de Paul?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then it appears to me that it is hardly necessary to appoint an instructor for the purpose of having the carriages on the farm repaired. What quantity of land is there?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a pretty large farm. The work will include the repairing of all kinds of farm implements, wagons, wheelbarrows, and so on. The warden explained that we paid for that work now nearly as much as the farm instructor will cost.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This appears to be a carriage instructor, a man who would be able to educate the convicts in that industry.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He would be more correctly described as a wheelwright, and the intention is, in the first place, to use this instructor in teaching a gang of convicts to repair the implements used on the farm, but if they have any spare time, they will make wheelbarrows for sale and articles of that kind.

Dorchester Penitentiary—To provide for the salary of a baker instructor, from 11th November, 1892, to 30th June, 1893, at $600 per annum..... $378 34

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have had no paid baker there for something like four years. When our former baker died, there was a convict there who was very skilled, and who baked very good bread, but his time is nearly up, and it is necessary that we should have a salaried man.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should fancy that you would be able to get a head-baker from one of the other penitentiaries, which would be better than hiring one.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have just one baker in each penitentiary, and have none to spare. He, of course, employs a number of the convicts.

To compensate ex-Guard Will Hutchinson for superintending construction of the fence around Dorchester Penitentiary..... $200

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is an ordinary guard, who, after a very long period of very creditable service, has been, I am sorry to say, completely disabled by very severe illness, which is likely to result in his death in a very short time, and he is in exceedingly poor circumstances. Two years ago the necessity was very great for a wall or fence around the prison, and, for some time, the House voted a sum of money to build a stone wall; but, on the representations of the warden that it would involve a very large sum, and that the work would be more economically done by building a wooden fence, I gave authority to make the attempt. The result was that the pickets were got in the immediate vicinity, I think many on our own property, and, by the skill of this guard, and convict labour, the entire prison premises were inclosed with a very substantial fence at a very small cost, under $2,000. The fence is eight or nine feet high, very substantially built, answers all purposes and was put up with great skill and economy. I thought, under the circumstances, I might, with fairness, ask this gratuity to the guard who was the means of accomplishing the work, and who is about to leave us under these distressing circumstances.

To cover amount expended for French Translation between the 9th July, 1892, and 25th January, 1893..... $2,600

Mr. SPEAKER. This is to pay extra French translators. Owing to the length of last session, the work was much increased, and, year after year, the work is increasing, as can be seen by the volumes of departmental reports, and, in addition, the present session having been called earlier than usual and the recess being shorter, necessitated extra help to complete the work of last session in due time. We must bear in mind also that the permanent staff remains the same in number as it was twenty-five years ago, when the work was very much less than at present. The translators, during recess, are paid by the page.

To cover amount expended in completion of the Official Debates of 1892..... $15,000

Mr. SPEAKER. The sum of $40,000 was asked for, for the current year ending 30th June, 1893. Out of that there has been expended, up to the 1st of January, in connection with the work of the session of 1892, the sum of $14,992. It will be observed that would leave us only $25,000 out of the whole vote of last year, and it is to make up the $15,000 practically, which was expended up to the 1st of January, that we are asking this supplementary estimate. The details are as follows:—Salaries of reporting staff, from 1st of January to 1st of June, $8,500; translators, $10,000; compiling French index, $200; amanuenses, $3,200; printing, binding, paper, etc., $16,500; miscellaneous, $300. Total, $38,700.

To provide additional amount required for sessional messengers for Session of 1893 (revote in part)..... $2,039 50

Mr. SPEAKER. This sum which is asked for sessional messengers arises in this way: Near the end of last session a vote was taken for the amount we estimated would be necessary to cover the cost for sessional messengers up to the 30th June. That vote, however, was put into the year 1892-93 and was paid out of this year's appropriation. By some oversight on the part of the accountant, the sum of $1,116.50 of the vote of 1891-92 was allowed to lapse. Therefore, of this amount of $2,039.50 asked for to pay sessional messengers, $1,116 is a revote, and the balance is accounted for by the fact that the session lasted nine days beyond the 30th of June, and we were obliged to pay the messengers for these nine days out of the appropriation for this year.

Library of Parliament—Contingencies—To provide for the payment of extra indemnity granted by Order in Council of the 7th July last to the following sessional messengers for services during the Session of 1892, viz. :—
Joseph Lafontaine..... $90
Thomas W. Hodgins. 90
$180

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How do these parties come to be especially entitled to $90 apiece ?

Mr. FOSTER. On account of the length of the session

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But surely all other messengers would be entitled to the same. Did these two attend any special election ?

Mr. SPEAKER. A special vote is taken each year for these messengers in the library. I think the amount provided last year was only $250, and I think an additional $90 was necessary in order to make up their full pay at the rate of $2.50, which is the rate at which sessional messengers are paid. I speak subject to correction, because this matter does not come under my immediate supervision.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are not these messengers always provided for by the Library Committee ? Or who does settle the amount of their salary ?

Mr. SPEAKER. A special vote is taken each year for these two extra messengers. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Estimates of this year he will find a sum providing for these messengers, who are extra messengers employed only during the session, and my recollection, which is borne out from the information I get, is that the amount provided last year was $90 less than would be sufficient to pay them at the rate of $2.50 a day.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the meaning of "O. in C. of the 7th July" ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is the order under which their rate of payment is fixed, and, as the Speaker says, this vote, together with what they were formerly paid, will give them the rate of pay they formerly received.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There must be a reason for this Order in Council granting them this special allowance.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The only reason for the Order in Council was that the appropriation was not enough to pay them at the regular rate. I fancy at the time the vote was taken for their payment it was thought the pay was too much, but it was afterwards ascertained that it was the regular rate at which sessional messengers were paid.

To provide funds for the payment of the salaries (during 100 days) of two extra sessional messengers for services during the session of 1893, at $2.50 per day.

Mr. CASEY. Why do we need two more this year ?

Mr. SPEAKER. These are the same two messengers, and the same provision is being made for them for the session of 1893.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Statutes—Printing, binding and distribution of the Criminal Code..... $2,600

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the Code distributed free among all classes of the community ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is distributed free only to justices of the peace and officers having criminal jurisdiction, and members of Parliament. The rest are sold.

Mr. CASEY. What is it sold at ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman ; the Queen's Printer fixes the rate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I suppose you did not put Judge Taschereau's letter in as an appendix ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He has published that himself.

Franchise Act—Further amount required for printing Voters Lists (Governor-General's warrant). $18,000

Mr. CASEY. Are the lists finally completed ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. I am moved to ask that because of the very remarkable delay in finishing and distributing the list. I only got the lists for my constituency about the end of the year, considerably more than a year after the Court of Revision had concluded, and I thought if that delay had taken place there, there might have been similar delay elsewhere and that the lists might not be finished yet. It seems strange that these lists could not be printed and distributed to persons entitled to have them until the next revision is due. I think the delay requires some explanation.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. Minister state what the cost is as compared with the amount paid for like printing when it was done by outside firms ? We are now printing at the Printing Bureau ; can the hon. gentleman tell whether it is costing the country less than formerly ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is costing far less, but I cannot give the hon. gentleman the exact figures.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman certain that these lists have been distributed ? I cannot say that mine were never sent, but certainly I have never seen them. Have we to apply for the lists, or are they sent ?

Mr. SPEAKER. One copy is sent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) To the member ?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. Is the Minister in charge of this item, or to which Minister should we look for information ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Secretary of State has charge. We will let the item stand. The Secretary of State will be here in a few moments.

To reimburse Judge Wilkinson, revising officer for Northumberland County, N. B., for posting lists $124 05

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The facts about this are these: The old law, before the last revision, required the posting of the preliminary lists, &c. I am not absolutely certain what the change was, but the posting of one list was dispensed with by an amendment to the Act. The judge overlooked that fact, and employed officials to go and post up lists in various parts of the riding. The Auditor-General refused to pay it, on the ground that the service was unnecessary. In the meantime he had actually incurred the expense, and this is simply to reimburse him on the ground that he had made a mistake.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman think that is right—to allow such an expenditure of public money? Looked at prima facie, it certainly indicates a sad absence of knowledge and of information which he certainly ought to possess. He acted in direct violation of the law, and it shows either crass ignorance or crass negligence. He should either have posted himself on the law—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He posted the lists.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes; but he was not posted on the law. I do not think myself there is any ground on which this could be justified. This judge simply incurred an expense of over $100, which he had no right at all to incur, and which the law did not justify. We might as well pay any other judge, or any other official, for services he performed, not only without the sanction of the law, but in direct violation of the law, because the law was passed to prevent this very expense from being incurred. It was talked about enough in Parliament, and talked about enough in the press, and if the judge had exercised a reasonable diligence in acquainting himself with the law, he should have known that this expense was not to be incurred, and that Parliament was providing against its being incurred. Personally, I do not feel satisfied to vote the money.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman asked me if I thought it was a proper expenditure. No, I do not. I would not authorize it by any means whatever; but the judge explained away the mistake, and convinced us that he was in good faith and had made a slip. Of course, he ought not to be paid for that; but this is simply to reimburse him the money he had to pay out to his officials for doing the work. It is not due to him, but it is a kind of payment that one would make to an officer or servant of his own who, acting in good faith, incurred an expense through error, and you would not see suffer for that.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not see how he could have been acting in good faith. He was there to administer the law, and if he did not choose to inform himself as to what the law was, the very law which he was bound to administer, there was no excuse for him. He has been guilty of a dereliction of duty—for that is what it amounts to—and if anybody has suffered in consequence, the country is not responsible. I cannot see on what ground the judge can urge good faith here. He might urge the plea of negligence, but if he did not choose to read the statute under such circumstances at all, to say that he acted in good faith, is to use a misnomer.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is arguing as if the judge neglected to take some precaution that the law ordered: he argues as if the judge neglected something, and that if anybody had suffered in consequence, he could have a recourse against the judge. As a matter of fact it turns out that the judge took an extra precaution that Parliament had dispensed with.

Mr. LAURIER. That is to say, he did not read the law.

Mr. CASEY. It looks rather suspicious when these officials of the Government do not take the trouble to read the law in regard to a matter which affects their own pockets.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He took too much trouble.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it was unpardonable in the judge. If this was a matter of an ordinary law which had not been talked about in Parliament and discussed in the press, it is conceivable that it might have escaped his notice. I would not be hypercritical in the matter, nor inclined to force it too much. If it was an ordinary case of negligence I would say: There is no use being too harsh, he wanted to act rightly and he made a mistake. But here is a matter that was talked about from the time the session began; nearly everybody in the House talked about it, and everybody in the country talked about it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is what puzzled him.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The newspapers talked about it, and it was the one subject upon which there was unanimity of expression, that the expenses were disgraceful and should be cut down. So far as my recollection serves me, when the Bill was introduced it went through without a dissenting voice, because there was one direction in which the expenses might be cut down. Now, it is all very well for him to say that he did not read the newspapers, nor the debates of the House, nor the law, and therefore he incurred the expense and we should become godfathers to his ignorance, his culpable ignorance. I say there is no excuse for him whatever, and the fact that he is the only judge in the whole Dominion who made the mistake, is rather against him than for him, because it shows that out of 200 or 300 men he stood alone. Either he must have been culpably ignorant or culpably careless. I do not know the gentleman myself, but I do not think this is a precedent that the House ought to endorse.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The alternative should be that he should either lose it himself, or the Government should lose it for keeping such a law in the Statute-book.

Mr. EDGAR. I see that the salary that gentleman received for his services, amounted to $618.06, besides $46 for travelling expenses. Now, I think that gentleman cannot complain if he has to lose this amount.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That includes disbursements for his clerk.

Mr. EDGAR. He made that bargain himself, and we are not responsible for it. I think a revising officer should certainly know the Franchise Act. He is not like an ignorant man, and he had not the slightest excuse for being ignorant of the law. I think it is a bad precedent, and I think the penalty that he inflicted upon himself ought to be allowed to remain.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If we are to be asked to vote this money, some other reason than that given by the leader of the Government should be advanced. It is not fair to ask this committee to vote $100 or $200 on the ground that a revising officer is ignorant of the law or careless in the performance of his duties.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman must not ask for reasons that do not exist. I have stated the only reason that did exist: The judge made a mistake and took action that was unnecessary. It is now proposed to vote him the money he is out of pocket. Inquiry has shown that the amount of his allowance is something under $400, and of course out of his allowance he has to pay his clerk and incidental expenses. This is not an unreasonable vote, and it is for only a very small sum.

Mr. LAURIER. It is most important that all the judges should understand that it is intolerable that they should administer the law without taking the trouble to read it. If they act so carelessly, they should be called upon to pay for any errors committed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why should the House mete out different treatment to a judge from that extended to any other individual. If any other person made a mistake from not understanding his business or duty, and thereby incurred expense, I am quite sure the Government would not come down and ask that a sum of money be voted to repay him. It is only because this man happens to be a judge that the Government propose to pay him for the mistake he committed, a most careless and stupid mistake, and he should suffer the consequences thereof. It has been shown that his salary is over $600, outside of travelling expenses, which was certainly adequate compensation for the work performed, and if this judge were allowed to bear the expense in this case it would prove a lesson for the future to the judges that when they enter upon the performance of duties connected with the administration of law, they should take care to read the law. I think the committee should not pass an item of this kind.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is to be regretted that Parliament should be asked to ratify payments of this class. It is the first instance in which an error has been committed by a judge and afterwards brought before this House to rectify. If the judge made a mistake, he should bear the consequences. I quite agree with the contention of my leader and by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). If the judge did not thoroughly post himself before he proceeded to perform the duties of his office and thereby blundered, he should pay any cost himself. If anything of this kind occurred in the case of a county judge, no such allowance as this would be asked. We should treat a revising officer the same as a judge, for he acts as a judge, and is supposed to know the law. I am informed, however, that this gentleman is a judge. If he were only a revising officer, he might probably be granted some consideration, but he is a judge, and of course he is supposed to know the law. He cannot therefore plead ignorance, otherwise he is not fit to be a judge.

Mr. LAURIER. That judge, I am sure, in the course of his judicial career has many a time condemned a prisoner who had unwittingly committed a violation of the law, and in passing sentence, no doubt told him: "I am very sorry for you; but every man is presumed to know the law." Yet here is a judge who has to administer the law, and confesses that he did not read over the law that he was to administer, and he now seeks to be recouped for money improperly spent. This action is intolerable.

Mr. EDGAR. This judge is also revising officer in Restigouche, and receives $618 in connection with the office, and as revising officer in Northumberland, he receives more than $310, besides travelling expenses. This judge must have an extraordinary idea of the law and Parliament, or he would not send in such an account. He must have known perfectly well as a lawyer that the bill could not be taxed, and to send in such a preposterous and improper and indecent account and ask it to be paid was an exceedingly reprehensible proceeding, and certainly showed poor taste on his part. The judge could not have known the law apparently, because he did not seem to have posted the list in Restigouche, while he did so in Northumberland.

Committee divided : Yeas, 42 ; Nays, 15.

Further amount required for Census and Statistics (Governor-General's warrant) $2,652

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before this item is voted, I wish to call attention to the very extraordinary doctrine laid down recently in this House. We are not, apparently, according to the Minister of Finance and some other members of the Government, to be permitted to know the names on that wonderful list of industrial establishments that have been enumerated in the census. I gave the hon. gentleman some nights ago a list of about 1,000 industrial establishments in ten towns and villages, which I should like extremely to be allowed to identify ; but judging from the statement on the floor of this House, it is part of the programme of the Government to regard the information about industrial establishments, even in the town of Caughnawaga, as a State secret, to be religiously guarded, for fear, I suppose, that some of the hon. gentlemen on this side might destroy these industrial establishments. I cannot conceive no possible course more calculated to bring the entire census returns into disrepute from first to last, than the refusal to give the information which is asked for by hon. gentlemen on this side. We have very good ground for doubting the accuracy of these statements as to industrial establishments, and before we are asked to vote money for census statistics we certainly ought to know the details, whenever any question of that kind arises, of where these so-called industrial establishments are, and what they consist of. I happen to know extremely well some of these towns, and I cannot conceive it possible in what shape or form from 80 to 130 industrial establishments of any reasonable magnitude can be said to exist in villages of 3,000 and 4,000 souls. If there be any such rule as the hon. gentleman speaks of, it should be abrogated at once. I find it utterly impossible to conceive any sound, legitimate reason why the information that was asked for as to the details of these industrial establishments should not be most cheerfully given. I cannot conceive any possible ground for treating such things as a matter on which secrecy should be observed. I trust the hon. the Finance Minister will be able to give to this House some satisfactory explanation of the statement which was made yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. All I can say about it is, that the census of last year, as well as every preceding census of Canada, and I believe the census of every other country, are taken under certain regulations, and the regulations which have obtained in Canada for all the different decennial periods have been nearly the same as now in regard to this matter. The enumerators have been sworn, and business men when they give the details of their business to these enumerators do it on the understanding that these are sworn officials, and that the names of the persons will not be given. There are very good reasons, I dare say, for that, and I think they can suggest themselves to any person who thinks it over. If my hon. friend looks back to the debates on preceding censuses, he will find that if the same question has been brought up at all it has been treated in the same way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not at all acquiesce in the reasoning, and if that has been the rule, which I am willing to suppose the hon. gentleman has correctly stated, there is every reason why it should be abrogated. It is of very great importance to the people of this country to know whether these census returns, more particularly the records of industrial establishments, are worth the paper they are written on or not. We have ample experience in dealing with statistics furnished by the Government, and notably with statistics regarding the Immigration Department, of the extreme uncertainty, to use a very mild word, attaching to the statistical reports made officially by the Government. In this particular case there is the strongest reason—not, perhaps, for demanding full particulars as to capital, etc., but there is the very strongest reason for demanding to know what are, and where are these industrial establishments. What earthly harm can it do to us. I should like the Minister to explain, to have it known, that a man has an industrial establishment. That is all the information that was asked for. No hon. gentleman on this side of the House asked for information as to the capital invested or the details of a man's business. There could possibly be something to be said pro and con as to the desirability of making that known, but as to giving a list of the industrial establishments, existing in each town, I must confess that it seems to me, not merely the most absurd pedantry on the part of the Government to refuse it, but it seems to me the best calculated means to destroy faith in the census statistics which are laid on the Table by the hon. gentleman. I may tell him here, speaking in my place and on my responsibility, that in two or three of these towns which I know, I find it utterly impossible to understand how, under any conceivable circumstances, the lists of establishments such as are stated in the census to exist could have been brought together. Now, Sir, it is a matter of very great practical importance that we should know how far these so-called industrial establishments have any real existence or place of being. The hon. gentleman and his friends are making a great portion of their argument in defence of their policy on the ground that there had been a great increase of industrial establishments, that there are a great number of persons employed this year more than were employed ten years ago, and when we desire to test these things, when we ask for the simplest information about them, we are told that these are State secrets and cannot be revealed. With all due respect to the hon. Minister, I do not think that a more flimsy excuse was ever offered. I am willing to grant that he may reserve some of the details as to capital and such matters, but that there should be any just reason for refusing the information as to what these industrial establishments are, I confess myself utterly unable to understand.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is altogether too late in discussing this question. The time to discuss the principle upon which a census should be taken and the regulations which should govern it, is at the time that the appropriation is being made to take the census. But, if regulations have been in force year after year, and decade after decade, with the consent and evidently with the approbation of Parliament,—because it has not been questioned, and I never heard of any objection being taken to these,—but if after that has been done and the census has been taken, and men have been approached and have given information on the faith of these regulations, it is quite too late for my hon. friend to wish to break the compact that has been made. He may think that the reasons are not good enough, and his reasoning may be perfectly correct, and he may convince this House that such is the case; but he may convince the House five thousand times over, and the House would not break faith in regard to information taken under regulations which were known to the persons who gave the information when the census was taken. The argument of my hon. friend might be very good at a time when we were approaching the decennial period and when we were discussing the question as to what principle the census should be taken on; but I think my hon. friend is too late to take the objection now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think so. The only point as to which there is any force in the hon. gentleman's contention that the information should be reserved, applies to these other matters which I said I did not propose to press. I cannot understand that there is anything on earth in the oath administered to these census enumerators, to prevent us from knowing what the industrial establishments are. I cannot conceive how any possible compact can be said to exist between the men who own certain industrial establishments, and the census enumerators, which forbids us to know what these establishments are. The hon. gentleman is pushing the argument to a perfect absurdity. We do not ask even for the names. We merely ask for a list of what they were, and the hon. gentleman will state this later on, I fancy, or his enumerators will, when the details are brought down. He surely ought to be able to give the details now, so that before we are asked to vote further large sums of money for the census, we may have some approximate idea of whether we have got value for our money or not.

Mr. FOSTER. We are not voting a very large sum. There will be another vote to finish up the census, and in the meantime I will look this matter up and see just how far the schedules will allow us to go in giving information. My hon. friend made his request a great deal narrower at the last than at the first.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; that was the request made by my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. He does not now ask for the names of the persons. All he requests is the names of the different industries.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman forgets the question put to him not later than yesterday. It was not as to the amount of capital invested; but simply as to the names of the persons engaged in manufacturing in the village of Montmagny.

Mr. FOSTER. That is different from the names of the industries.

Mr. LAURIER. To-day the hon. gentleman will not give even the names of the industries. One day he refuses one thing, and the next day he refuses another thing; he will not give the information. So far as my memory goes, the instructions given to the enumerators were never brought down to the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether they were or not. I dare say they were. If they were not, it would be because they were not asked for. Now, my hon. friend knows that the question of what information can be brought down must be based upon what those instructions were. He would not assert that the instructions should be violated. He might find fault with the instructions themselves; he might say that they were not such instructions as should be given; that is a thing to be debated when the instructions are issued; but whatever faith was pledged to be kept with the people who gave us the information we must keep, and whatever information can be given consistent with those instructions the Government will be happy to give.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman was not so happy yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. Just as happy.

Mr. LAURIER. He refused to give the information as to the towns of Montmagny and Sorel. It was always supposed that these instructions were based upon common sense, and common sense would support a portion of the hon. gentleman's contention, but not the other portion. If he says that the manufacturers will object to the publication of the amount of their capital that I can understand; but certainly no manufacturer can have any objection to his name being given as that of one engaged in such and such an industry at such and such a place. There is no reason possible why the name of any manufacturer and the nature of his business should not be given to the world. On the contrary, he will court the publication of that information, and when the hon. gentleman tells us, as he did yesterday, that he cannot bring down such information, I say he has no reason whatever to support him.

Mr. FOSTER. I gave the answer yesterday because it was the departmental answer.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman cannot throw the responsibility on the department. He is at the head of the department.

Mr. FOSTER. My information is that the instructions on which the census was based does not permit the names of the persons to be given and consequently I cannot promise them. I promise, however, that any information that the instructions permit will be brought down.

Mr. CASEY. These instructions must be interpreted by common sense—

Mr. FOSTER. It depends on whose common sense.

Mr. CASEY. No matter what the instructions may be. The evident reason for the limitation was that nothing should be made public that could injure the person giving the information. As my hon. friend points out, publicity can certainly do no harm to those who are conducting industries of any kind. It often happens that a reporter accompanied by a photographer visits a country town, and goes around not only to all the manufacturers but to the shops of the town, and gives photographs and glowing descriptions of them; and the manufacturers, these conductors of infant industries whom the Minister is so anxious not to injure by having their names and pictures of their establishments published in the Saturday supplement. Does the hon. gentleman think, then, that it would do them any harm to have their names given to this House and published in "Hansard"? He knows that it cannot do them harm, but must do them good by calling public attention to them. I never before heard any objection to the names of manufacturers being given. Whatever the instructions may have been, I say that a common sense interpretation of these instructions must lead one to see that it would be only doing a favour to these people instead of an injury to advertise their names as widely as possible. We have had no information whatever so far as to what constitutes an industry. Can the hon. Minister tell me whether the instructions state what constitutes an industry?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether they do or not. I imagine they do.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman does not know what the instructions state. He has sent out enumerators to find how many industries there are in each town and village, and after making speeches and boasting about the number of industries, he confesses to the House that he does not know whether the instructions given to those enumerators tell them what to class as an industry and what not. If one of those enumerators came across a tinker sitting by the road side, with two or three old broken kettles, a few ship-wrecked umbrellas, broken baskets, cane-seated chairs and things of that sort that he was mending, around him, it would be quite open to the enumerator, so far as the Minister of Finance is able to tell us to-night, to put down this old tinker and umbrella-mender as a manufacturer, and count him in to swell the list of the triumphs of the National Policy. I think it is rather disgraceful on the part of the Government not to be able to tell us even that much—not to be able to tell us even what the enumerators were directed to count as an industry. Then we have to remember that these enumerators were paid extra for every infant industry they discovered. They were paid a comparatively large sum for taking note of every industrial establishment and the number of people employed in it, so that it was to their interest to find as many industries as possible. Pay a man so much for every industry he finds, and he will find a good many. No doubt every blacksmith, even working without an assistant, was put down as a manufacturer. If he turned out one wheelbarrow a year he would be reckoned as a manufacturing industry. It is to get to the bottom of all this humbug that we want to get at the names of the persons classed as manufacturers. In the city of St. Thomas there are 294 establishments recorded in the census; and everybody who knows anything about that town knows that that is an absurd number, unless the enumerator counted amongst them every seamstress and tailor and so on. If we are to make comparisons with previous censuses, we require to know what were called industries in the former ones and what are called industries in the present census.

Mr. LISTER. Judging from my own county and my own town, I may say that if the census represents the industries throughout the country with the same exaggeration as it has represented them in the town from which I come, it is not to be wondered at that the returns should show an enormous increase in the manufacturing industries of the country. I think, speaking from recollection, that the census returns show that there are 117 manufacturers in the town of Sarnia, and I may say that that is one of the very few towns in the Dominion which has grown very much in population during the last ten years. Its population had grown from something like 3,500 in 1881, to 7,000 in 1891; and the census returns show that we have in that town 117 factories. I may tell the House that the only factories there that I know anything at all of, and I have lived there for nearly forty years, are three flour mills, two breweries, two sash factories, one furniture factory, two wagon factories, one agricultural implement factory, one stove foundry, one woollen factory, one hub and spoke factory, making fifteen altogether. If, as my hon. friend who has just preceded me states, every person who has a tin shop, or a little shop for making boots and shoes by himself, is taken into account, the number would be increased quite considerably; but, even with that, I doubt if it would be possible at all to find the number of factories stated in the census. I may say to the hon. gentleman that all these factories, with the exception of the hub and spoke factory, the agricultural implement factory, the stove foundry, the furniture factory and one flour mill, were in existence prior to the National Policy. One of the men, who was a manufacturer of wagons and carriages, and had been in business there for upwards of thirty years, at the time that this policy came into force, was induced by the promises of great profits that that policy would give him, to put all his money into the extension of his business. For three or four years his business grew, and his profits apparently grew proportionately; but, as in every instance of this kind, the moment production overtook consumption, then the crash came, and this man, who had put all his earnings into enlarging his business, found, after a few years, that all his capital had been lost, all the earnings of a lifetime swept away, and he failed. Induced likewise by the profits that this policy would give, two men started a hub and spoke factory, one of the largest in the Dominion. They went on for a few years, and the same fate recently overtook them, and they are now bankrupt. Every dollar of their earnings made in another town, and made after they came to the town in which I live, has been swept away. This delightful policy induced the people of my own town to invest some $80,000 in the erection of agricultural implement works. That was, I think, in 1882. In 1890 the concern went down, the $80,000 invested were lost, and $20,000 besides, and that whole institution, which cost, to erect it and put the machinery in, something like $40,000, sold for the magnificent sum of $6,500, and has been running ever since with very few men. This has been the history, I venture to say, of nearly all the manufacturing industries throughout Ontario. You can go to London, where, a few years ago, shortly after this policy was introduced, you saw a dozen factories; to-day no person can pass through that city without noticing the smokeless chimnies and silent machinery. The industries have failed, and all that is left is a few credulous men, who invested their money under the promise of the great profits this policy was going to bring. As I stated in the first place, if the census returns throughout the country are as unreliable as those of my own town, they are entirely fallacious, and do not represent at all the industrial interests of this country. They have been made for the purpose of swelling the number of establishments and enabling the Government to say that, under this grand policy, which, I have no hesitation in saying, has impoverished the great mass of the country, has had some success. Only those men who have been able to form themselves into combines, for the purpose of limiting production and raising prices, have been able to succeed at all.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend allow me a moment. I stated last night that my anxiety in taking up these Estimates at this time was to have them put through because of the necessary expenditures for which I had not taken Governor-General's warrant in some cases (though I would have been warranted in doing it) because I thought Parliament was close to session and we would get the supplies. Now, all this argument can come up just as well on the main Estimates, in fact a great deal better.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This item had better stand in that case. You have got the money by the Governor-General's warrant.

Mr. FOSTER. We might as well pass the whole. As I said, the debate can come as well on the main Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The point is really important, as the hon. gentleman will see.

Mr. FOSTER. If there was no other item on which it could come up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was going to suggest to the hon. gentleman that he had better bring down the instructions as to this matter under Governor-General's warrant and allow the item to stand.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the instructions will be brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I wish to call attention to the fact that there seems to be an entire misapprehension on the part of the Department of Agriculture regarding the Census Act. When these census bulletins were published, I attended the department myself at the instance of the mayor and council of the city I have the honour to represent. They had asked me to obtain from the department the particulars of the census returns with respect to that city. I was then told it was not open to the departmental officers to give me these particulars. That was a very great disappointment to the mayor and council of the city I represent, and, when I returned to the House, in conversation with my hon. friend from King's N.S. (Mr.

Borden), who, I regret to see, is not here to-night, I mentioned this fact and the regret I felt in common with the officers of the city. He told me he was not surprised, because he had applied for and received returns of some cities in his riding, and had ascertained that they were altogether inaccurate and false, and it was not until he had told the department that these were false that, as he understood, they refused to give returns for other cities. I regret that he is not here to-night, as he would be prepared to give the House the circumstances of the falsity of the returns to which I refer. I rise, however, merely to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that, so far as I am able to understand the Census Act, his department was acting entirely without warrant in withholding these details when asked for. The Census Act which authorizes the expenditure of this money and the taking of the census, does not authorize them to withhold the information from Parliament. On the contrary, as I understand the Act, its genius and spirit would lead me to believe that the full information was to be given to the House. After providing generally that the census should be taken and that the details should be such as the Governor-General, by proclamation, shall direct it, providing, 'inter alia :'

Each census shall be so taken as to ascertain, with the utmost possible accuracy in regard to the various territorial divisions of the country—their population and the classification thereof state and resources of the agricultural, fishing, lumbering, mining, mechanical, manufacturing, trading and other institutions thereof.

It goes on to declare how the commissioners and enumerators shall be appointed and what their duties shall be. Well, Sir, I fail to find, either in the duties of these enumerators, as they are called, or of the census commissioners, or the officers of the Department of Agriculture, that when these returns are made by the commissioners that the officers are authorized to keep this information. The oath is referred to in the fourteenth section, which says :

Every officer, census commissioner, enumerator and other person employed in the execution of this Act before entering upon his duties shall take and subscribe an oath binding him to the faithful and exact discharge of such duties.

But they are nowhere bound to keep secret the information which they obtain. I would gather, from the general reading of the Act, that, so far from being bound by oath to keep this information secret, if the department has assumed to bind them by such oath, it has gone beyond its power and has acted in contravention of the statute. The Act authorizes the officers and gives them very full power to enforce from the custodians of the public records all manner of information that may be required within the purview of the Act. They may enforce the giving of these returns by penalties, and it is provided that after they have got these returns and sent them in, the Department of Agriculture shall prepare an abstract of these returns and tabular statements showing the result as fully and accurately as possible. The last section of the Act says :

A full report of all things done under this Act, and an account of all moneys expended under authority thereof, shall be laid before Parliament by the Minister of Agriculture within the first fifteen days of the next session thereof and of each session thereafter, until such time as all things required to be done under this Act in each decennial period have been fully completed.

I would like to submit to the Minister of Justice my opinion, at any rate, so far as I have been able to grasp the meaning of the Act, that there is nothing in it which can expressly or by implication justify the withholding of information from Parliament that has been gathered legally by the commissioner or enumerator. I can fully agree with what my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) has said, so far as my personal knowledge is concerned. I would characterize the returns in these census reports as laid before the House as farcical and ridiculous. I know pretty well how many factories and how many industries there are in Charlottetown, and I know that in this respect the census is wholly inaccurate. On reading the returns for Charlottetown I thought I must be living in the midst of a great manufacturing centre. The returns are farcical, ridiculous and absurd. I will not say that in this case they are quite so absurd as the Caughnawaga returns which have been referred to, but they are about on a par with the statement made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister). In the face of these returns, when one after another of the members of this House rises, and says that, so far as his own locality is concerned the returns are inaccurate and misleading, to tell us that we cannot get the information necessary to test the accuracy of the statements in the face of the Act, seems to indicate that instructions have been made by the Department of Agriculture at variance with the Census Act, and for the purpose of enabling the officers to withhold information which Parliament is fairly entitled to. We vote a very large sum of money for these census returns. It is a matter of interest, not to one party only, but to all parties, it is to the interest of commerce and manufactures, that these returns should be accurate. If not accurate they had better not be taken at all. The money is worse than wasted if we are to have only inaccurate returns. To have member after member rising in his place and telling us that, so far as the town he represents is concerned, returns are absurdly inaccurate, is calculated to throw discredit upon the whole census of Canada. I would ask the Minister of Justice if he has looked into the law on the matter and whether he agrees with me in the opinion that Parliament is entitled to full returns? As a matter of policy, it may be desirable for the Government to appeal to the House and say that, with regard to the amount of money which is invested in manufactures by John Smith or James Brown, we do not deem it politic to lay that before the members of this House. But I think the House should have the means of testing these statements. The census returns show, for instance, that we have sixteen basket manufactories in Charlottetown. I do not believe there are three, and I would like to get the names of these parties so that I may verify that statement, and to tell me that I cannot get it seems to me to be unreasonable, unfair, and contrary to the statute. I would ask the hon. gentleman to look into that before the matter comes up again, so that we may thresh it out and discuss it fairly.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will discuss it, and we will look into it. I have a distinct recollection that all the regulations under which the census was taken, including the schedules, were laid upon the Table of the House. There is no attempt to make the officers observe secrecy, there is no obligation imposed upon them of that kind. It is not necessarily the duty of the officers to see that before the enumerators give any details to the public—in fact I think the enumerators themselves ought not to give any details to the public—their schedules and their returns have to be compiled and examined; and in numbers of instances, what they have returned as industries, have been struck out of the class that ought to have been enumerated as industries, because they were simply private establishments. The impression I have on the subject is this: That the schedule which is offered to the citizens to fill up with the record of his family, their history, their origin, their religion, their ages and all that, or in the case of industrial establishments, which is offered to the manufacturer to fill up, contains an assurance that all information as regards the individual will not be disclosed, but only the general results. The general results are made public. When the census volumes are completed, all the classifications will be given, showing what these industries are, what is their nature, etc.

Mr. CASEY. The number of hands employed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, I fancy so, and any information of that kind which we can give Parliament in advance, we will do. All that we ask is that the information which we obtained under promise to the individual, will not be disclosed, so far as it concerns himself. If the information does not include the name of the person, it can be given. I think it will be found that in that respect the census is not in any sense peculiar, that the regulations are the same as have prevailed in taking every census of this country, and in the census taken in the United States and Great Britain; and that the standard of what should be known as industries is the same as the standard adopted in the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. FLINT. I desire to remark that the feature which most distinguishes this census is the general want of confidence which is felt by the public as to the correctness of the industrial returns. Now, there are large quantities of statistical matter furnished to the public by the Government which is not disputed; enormous quantities are quoted every day in the House and by the press from which deductions are made, and no person pretends to question the trustworthiness or genuineness of this information. But the instant we strike the census in regard to industrial establishments, I think it will be almost universally admitted that there is a large amount of incredulity, which arises not only from the knowledge of the persons themselves as to the communities in which they live, but from the appearance of the returns upon their face. Now, as to the town in which I live. We are very well satisfied there as to the general growth and progress of the community, and quite proud of it; but, at the same time, the industrial returns given for Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, are offensive to the people of that community for this reason, that either the returns of 1891 are grossly exaggerated, or the returns of 1881 are utterly contemptible. Now, to say that the enterprising and thriving town of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, only had fifteen industrial establishments in 1881 is to insult the intelligence of every person who knows anything about that community; and to say that it had 151 industrial establishments in 1891 is equally absurd.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The figures for 1881 are taken from that census.

Mr. FLINT. Yes, of course, and if some candid and responsible individual could have an opportunity of verifying these returns, he would see where the mistake occurred. There is a gross mistake, either in the census of 1881 or that of 1891, arising either through different instructions given to the enumerators, or to greater carelessness in one case or the other. The town of Yarmouth, so far as my knowledge goes, and the knowledge of those who have paid some attention to this subject, contains no more industrial establishments now than it did in 1881, although I am willing to admit that I think one or two industrial establishments have strengthened and developed, and probably have a larger output and employ more hands; but the number of establishments has not increased to any appreciable extent. If they have increased it must be in minor matters where one person is occupied in his own home, or in his own shop, in the manufacture of some kind of goods. Now, there is another return I would like to mention in regard to the town of Yarmouth, which also gives a very inaccurate idea as to its progress. The enumerator places that community, I think, as the highest in manufacturing development, during the last ten years. in the whole Dominion of Canada. Now, this is utterly absurd. There has been no great increase in manufacturing industries in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, neither has there been any great or alarming decrease. I will read a remark in Bulletin No. 12, which has been copied in a great many Conservative papers as illustrating the good effect of the National Policy in that portion of the province. It says :

Yarmouth, N.S., has made remarkable progress, having been, in 1881, one of the smallest per head in manufactures.

This is not correct. It was a fair average of all the communities in that province or in the Dominion, perhaps ahead of a large number :

In 1891 it reached a figure of 206 per head of the population, having at the same time increased 75 per cent in population.

Now, I can well understand that the statistician, or the department at Ottawa, taking the superficial figures in good faith, would not be in a position to see the incorrectness of that statement ; but any person upon the spot, familiar with the community, and in a position to understand how the error arose, would ascertain in a very few minutes how such an erroneous statement should appear in the bulletin. Now, I wish to point out that it is very desirable in the interests of a correct study of our industrial development, that there should be some method of verification of these particulars. I believe names have been asked for, but a very good study of the industrial progress could be made, and a very good means of verification could be made, even without giving names. If it should be said that within a certain community there was one woollen mill, or so many cotton mills, and so many other industrial establishments of each kind, without giving names ; then these could be verified. Now, the error arose with regard to Yarmouth in this way. I think that previous to 1891 the community had not been a municipality by itself, not an incorporated town, and the place had no legal existence as a town. It was simply called by courtesy the town of Yarmouth, but legally it was merely a certain number of polling sections. The statement as to its great growth, and having increased 75 per cent, arose from the erroneous counting of the various polling sections which subsequently went to make up the town of Yarmouth, and polling sections were added in or left out, which do not belong to the town of Yarmouth at all. I have here a statement showing that while the town of Yarmouth increased during the last ten years about 20 per cent, an increase which is very satisfactory, which about meets the general expectations, the statement in the bulletin that it increased 75 per cent, is entirely beyond the mark, owing to the want of knowledge of the local circumstances, which we could scarcely expect on the part of the clerks up here, or whoever made up the statistics. I do not need to go into other matters, because the Minister has suggested that another opportunity will be given for going into details of that kind. But I think this is a fair illustration, coupled with the other complaints that have been made in the House and before the committee, that it is only fair to these various communities that there should be some means of verifying the rate of progress so as to discover where the error occurred. Any community is just as sensitive in regard to its position ten day, and I know no community likes to have years ago as it is in regard to its position to spread before the world that ten years ago it was far below the mark that every man knew it had reached, any more than it desires to be misrepresented in regard to its present position. So, if the Minister could discover some way in which, without being unfair as a matter of public policy, the figures could be submitted and the discrepancy ascertained, he would be conferring on the House and the country a great public service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think this item should stand over. We should have the instructions given to the census commissioners, and with those in our hands, we could look into this matter with some degree of knowledge on both sides. I cannot conceive it possible that there should be any such restriction as the Minister of Finance appears to suggest. It seems to be contrary to all sound policy.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We thoroughly concur with hon. gentlemen opposite, that according to sound policy the enumerators or census commissioners should not be allowed to give information furnished by any one whom they had visited. Their duty was to collect information from the respective parties to whom they applied, and report that information to the department. So far, both sides of the House agree ; but we on this side of the House differ as to how far Parliament after the abstract has been made by the department, and its correctness has been challenged and disputed in this House, has the right to obtain details of the information. On some points we admit that it may not be desirable as a question of policy not to give the information. If a certain number of blacksmiths shops or carpenter shops were reported in a certain town, and this fact was known by the parliamentary representative to be incorrect, has he not the right to ask the names of the people carrying on those industries ? I contend there would be no breach of confidence and no injustice done when it was evident that a gross error and mistake had been committed. The question, then, is can Parliament obtain the names ? Is there any reason in the statute or on public policy prohibiting our obtaining the names of the different classes of the manufactures in the respective towns so that we may be able to certify the accuracy of the returns.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot answer the hon. gentleman at present, for I prefer to answer him after I have seen the regulations. I think it would hardly be reasonable to ask that the item be allowed to stand, when there was no reason to suppose that this information would be called for on this item. The main sum for the taking of the census was voted with the information before the House, as I understand it. This is a supplementary vote, to cover an amount expended by Governor-General's warrant, and in the Estimates to come there will be another vote which will bring up this question.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman does not seem willing to give the information to which the House is entitled, and under the circumstances it seems to me that the item should stand.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We should not let the item stand for want of information which could not be expected to be called for.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is perfectly reasonable to ask for this information on a vote for census and statistics. The contention is that the money voted has been so badly used that the information for which the money was paid is totally unreliable in every particular.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This item is for compilation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is for census and statistics.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has not yet asked an explanation of the item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes. I say that the statistics brought down are, in one of the most important particulars, with respect to certain towns and villages and also certain towns and villages known to many hon. gentlemen sitting beside me, are wholly and entirely inaccurate, and this is the time beyond all doubt to examine into the manner in which the money has been spent. The request made is strictly pertinent, especially after what the Minister of Finance has said and the First Minister has said. I do not desire to protract the discussion, but the hon. Minister of Finance should allow the item to stand and take up some other items. It cannot be said that any difficulty will arise if this course is adopted, because the Government have already drawn the amount on Governor-General's warrant, and it has been expended.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman wishes to be unreasonable he can be so, and force the Government to allow the item to stand.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is really a question which, I think, the hon. gentleman must admit, is a matter of very great moment. It is a question of the very first moment with respect to the discussions that are at this moment going on, as to how far this particular portion of the statistics is correct, and especially after the hon. gentleman's refusal the other day to give the information and place the committee in possession of the instructions. If I had been aware that the Government had any idea of refusing the information asked for, I would not have allowed the item to stand without further discussion.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman. I trust, will appreciate the force of the position. The hon. gentleman stated, in answer to a question, that he would not give the names of the manufacturers in certain cities and gave his reasons for refusing to do so. However, to-day, I understand that the hon. gentleman and the First Minister are not at all assured of the soundness of the position assumed by the Minister of Finance the other day. Under such circumstances we altogether dissent from the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. We hold that this House has the right to have the names of manufacturers enumerated in the census laid before it. The hon. gentleman a few moments ago gave a reason which seemed to be logical, name'y, that this objection should have been taken when the instructions were given to the enumerators. My impression is that the instructions were never brought down to Parliament. However, if the instructions were submitted and no objection was taken to them by the Opposition, the Government are entitled to the benefit of that argument, but at the present time I contend that the instructions were not brought down to the House. Under these circumstances, I hold we have a right to this information. The item should be allowed to stand, in order that it may be further discussed. But if the hon. gentleman maintains his position and declares he will not give us this information, he need not be surprised if we try to get it somewhere else.

Mr. FOSTER. There has been no disposition not to give information. It is impossible to produce the instructions now, when we have not got them here and when the departments are shut up. I have told the hon. gentleman that the instructions would be brought down, and that there would be another item in which the same question would be brought up, and I told him I was anxious to get these Estimates passed.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman will pardon me for saying that his answer is not fair at all. Yesterday, in answer to a regular question, he said that he would not bring down the information asked. This is the occasion for us to say that we are entitled to it, and that is why we think the item should be allowed to stand. The hon. gentleman will, I think, make more progress if he consents to this.

Mr. FOSTER. Let it stand.

For advance to be made from time to time on dairy products on Experimental Stations, to be refunded from sale of such products.....$6,000

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I want some explanation of what was done with this money last year. I want to know what was the object of purchasing cheese in all the different provinces, where it was sent to, and also the results? I am under the impression that it is a false step for the Government to purchase cheese and send it off, for the simple reason that the Dominion of Canada stands the highest of any country in the British market for its cheese products. I do not think myself that the Dairy Commissioner will be increasing our credit on the cheese market by purchasing this cheese and sending it over. The trade is in the hands of some of the most experienced individuals who have been engaged in it ever since it commenced and they have done a good deal for the industry by going to the old country every year and placing their products on the market. I want some statement of what has become of the 50,000 or 60,000 pounds of cheese purchased last year, for which there is no account in the returns. I also find that there was some 22,000 pounds of butter sent from the different factories, and there is no return for this either.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend wants all the information he has asked for, we might as well let this item stand, too. I cannot carry in my head, or in my pockets, the detailed transactions in butter and cheese for the whole year. I can explain what this vote is for, if that will be sufficient. This is wanted by the Dairy Commissioner for advances from time to time at the Experimental stations. He is not buying cheese, as I understand it, from Tom, Dick or Harry, but he buys it at the Experimental stations which are being carried on under the supervision of Professor Robertson. The farmers bring in their milk and an advance is given to the farmers, and the cheese and butter is sent by Professor Robertson to Great Britain. When he receives the returns from the sales, the proceeds, less the expenses, are distributed amongst the farmers, and this vote is to make advances until the money is distributed. Every dollar will be returned to the Treasury.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I give notice that, when the main estimates are up, I shall require details as to the result of this butter and cheese in the British market. I find from the Report of the Professor of Dairying that it is represented there, that certain quantities of butter brought 23 and 24 and 25 cents per pound, but, according to the Auditor-General's Report, only 19 cents a pound was realized. I shall expect a full explanation of these matters later on.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has certainly a perfect right to ask for the information, and I myself would like to hear it very much. I may say that the object for which the vote is being taken meets with my hearty approval, for one, I understand that Professor Robertson has been engaged to some extent in the Maritime provinces initiating the farmers there, in the method of making cheese, and carrying on their factories; and when he gets it started leaving it to themselves. They have to invest their money to start the factory, and he places a man in charge who shows how the business is carried on and then takes the cheese and sends it to the English market.

Mr. FOSTER. And that for one year only.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I believe the experiment is a good one. I am sure it is in the hands of an excellent man, and I know the results have been gratifying to the province from which I come. At the same time I think the information which the hon. gentleman seeks ought to be given on the main Estimates.

Annapolis and Digby Railway—
Construction $2,200

Mr. FLINT. Is this the balance, or are there other accounts unsettled?

Mr. HAGGART. This is to pay Messrs. O'Neil & Campbell their final estimate of $1,925, and also certain legal expenses.

Ste. Anne's Lock, &c.—To settle with contractor for strengthening old pier below lock.....$1,116

Mr. LAURIER. Who is the contractor?

Mr. HAGGART. Messrs. Brewder & McNaughton were the contractors for strengthening the old pier. The total amount of work done as specified in the contract was $29,917.52. The balance due them under their contract was paid in July last. In August, an account for $4,609.35 was sent in by them to the department for alleged extra work. After careful inquiry, the department found that only $1,115.52 was due to the contractors, nine out of the twelve items of their claims being disallowed. For some reason they refused to accept this amount, but finally they agreed to accept it in full; but the vote being lapsed, this vote is now taken to settle the matter.

The Franchise Act—Further amount required for printing Voters' Lists (Governor-General's warrant)..$18,000

Mr. COSTIGAN. The vote of last year having lapsed, and the work having been carried on after the 30th June, a Governor-General's warrant for $18,000 had to be taken to finish the work. With regard to the complaint about delay in getting out the voters' lists, I find on inquiry that they have been prepared and completed at as early a period if not earlier than formerly, and the whole time occupied in the work at the Printing Bureau was a little over a month less than formerly, so that there has in reality been a saving.

Mr. LISTER. When were they completed?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Quite recently.

Mr. LISTER. These are the lists for 1891, and this is 1893. Can the hon. gentleman tell the committee how much the revision cost—the printing and all other expenses?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I can tell the hon. gentleman what it cost so far as the Printing Bureau is concerned—$30,557.35.

Mr. LISTER. Was any portion of the lists printed outside of the Printing Bureau?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes; that is what gave rise to a previous discussion in the House, and is one of the reasons for amending the law. Under the present Act, the revising officer gets the list from the Printing Bureau and compares it with the assessment roll. He makes lists of the names to be struck off and the names to be added, and of the corrections, and these lists are printed in the localities because they could not be printed in time if sent to the Bureau.

Mr. LISTER. Is that printing done by tender or is it just given by the department to such printing offices as the chief may think proper?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is not given by tender, for there would not be time for that; but the accounts come before the Queen's Printer, who certifies to their correctness, and sees whether they are in accordance with the rates fixed.

Mr. LISTER. Is it the intention of the Government to change that plan and have the whole work done by the Bureau?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is our intention, as will appear by a Bill of which I have given notice, to make some change, and, if that be found possible, to save the additional printing in the localities of these supplementary lists.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It would not be possible to print the preliminary lists in time for revision by the judge. I want to call attention to the great delay in printing the final lists, as revised by the revising barrister. In Kent, the list for 1891 was finally revised by the revising barrister in the fall of 1891, but was not finally printed and distributed until December, 1892, over a year after the time it should have been distributed. I do not think there can be any reason for that great delay. In that county there was no election held, and it did not make any particular difference; but in some counties, notably East Elgin, where an election was held, the voters' lists were not received until three days before the time of polling. This caused great inconvenience. In future instructions should be given to the

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Bureau to show more promptness and despatch, and finish the printing within the time fixed by law.

Mr. PERRY (P.E.I.) How many copies is each member entitled to get? Last year I only got one copy and my colleague one. If any more are to be had, I would like to know where. I do not think that one is sufficient; and, if I wanted another copy tomorrow, I would not know where to go for it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am not very familiar with the details of the department yet, but this point has been raised before and my recollection is that the law provides—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Four copies is it not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes; he is to receive them from the revising officer, and he is supposed to pay for all he gets over the four copies to which he is entitled.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman able to say whether the copies lately printed, just about finished now, I think, have been sent to the revising officer, and if not, will the hon. gentleman see that the proper officer does forward them, because some of us have never received our copies.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I will make inquiries. I may say I feel considerable safety in speaking of the gentleman now in charge of the Bureau. From my personal acquaintance with him and from the observations I have had time to make of the working of the Bureau, I am satisfied that if there has been any delay, he is not at fault. He is most systematic and industrious, and he has the Bureau fully organized and everything seems to work satisfactorily. If there has been any delay it is not attributable to any want of knowledge or attention on the part of the gentleman who manages the Bureau. I will make inquiries about this matter and let the hon. gentleman know.

Mr. FORBES. Will the hon. Minister pardon me if I ask whether he is aware that the revising officer of Queen's County, N.S., has left the Dominion of Canada and has gone to the Southern States, and whether the department or the Government intend to appoint his successor?

Mr. COSTIGAN. If he is gone his successor will have to be appointed.

Mr. FORBES. He is gone. I know that, because he presented to the court in Florida a recommendation of the Prime Minister of Canada setting forth his qualifications to be appointed a judge in Florida. So I suppose the Government must be aware that he is gone. I only want to know whether the Government intend to act upon the knowledge the Premier must have of his absence and appoint his successor, or whether they intend to combine the duties with those of the revising officer for Shelburne County, inasmuch as, by the Gerrymander Act, they have made these two into one electoral division. I would like to know as soon as possible, and, if the hon. Minister can give me the information now, I should feel grateful.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I know that the revising officer has gone from Queen's county. He did not need any letter of recommendation from me. My jurisdiction does not extend to Florida yet; but the Bill which my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, refers to contains a provision dealing with cases in which boundaries are altered under the redistribution of last session, and taking power to appoint revising officers for the new electoral districts.

Mr. FORBES. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me if I make another suggestion? That is as to the length of notice to be given by the revising officer to parties requiring them to furnish proof of their qualification. I might tell of cases in which that section has been grossly abused. The section requires notice to be given to the person whose name it is proposed to strike off, and the revising officer can call upon him to prove his qualification. A citizen questioning another's qualification must give a fortnight's notice; but the revising officer may give only two or three hours' notice, and sometimes it is absolutely impossible for a man to travel the distance to the place where the revising officer is holding his court in the time given, and I would ask the hon. Minister to take a note of the point and see if this section does not require amendment.

Cape Tormentine—to complete payments on Contracts. $13,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Minister was not in his place when this vote came up before. I would like him to state whether this amount is for the completion of the contract. Would he state also the price at which the work was let whether any extras have been allowed, what the total cost of the work will be to the country and whether it is completely finished and received from the hands of the contractor?

Mr. OUMET. The contract has been completed. The estimated cost was $185,000. The final estimate amounts to only $179,200. The amount already paid is $166,000, and the balance of $13,000 now asked for is to complete the payment to the contractor. Some additional work will have to be done, and in the main Estimates we ask for $6,500 to complete the work and put it in order so as to bring the cars on the dock. This will be done at the beginning of the summer, and we hope that the whole wharf will be ready for navigation this season. From what we hear we expect that it will be fully utilized.

Mr. PERRY. I think that work was very much needed; but I want the Minister of Public Works and the Government to understand that on the opposite side, Cape Traverse, in Prince Edward Island, is in great need of better accommodation for navigation. There was a large meeting in the fall which was attended by men of both parties, including members of the Local Government, and I happened to be there, as well as Senator Howlan, and my colleague, Mr. Yeo. Strong resolutions were passed in favour of obtaining a grant from the Government to extend the wharf and breakwater. In fact, the want of this accommodation prevents the proper use of the harbour. We have a railway from Emerald Junction, which runs daily winter and summer, but through want of the extension of the breakwater the value of the train is nullified. There is only four feet of water at the wharf. Several thousands of dollars have been spent at Cape Traverse, but what is the good so long as there is only four feet of water at the wharf? The Government must see how necessary it is to extend this breakwater or dredge the harbour. I had the honour of an interview with the Minister of Public Works, and he gave us to understand that he thought a good plan would be to dredge so that vessels drawing more than four feet could come to the breakwater. I hope that no delay will take place in this matter. The Government have some interest in the railway on the other side. At all events the branch railway from Emerald Junction to Cape Traverse is Government property, and this branch of railway is not getting its legitimate share of the traffic for want of shipping accommodation at Cape Traverse. I want to compliment my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways who paid a visit to Prince Edward Island last spring. I want to pay him a compliment, not for his generosity, but for his penuriousness in starving the Prince Edward Island Railroad.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I cannot let the resolution go without more explanation. I want to know whether, in that $13,000, there are any extras voted, or is this part of the original contract?

Mr. OUMET. This is part of the original contract, with the exception of a few allowances for works which were not included in the contract.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How much?

Mr. OUMET. About $5,000 extras; but as I mentioned to the hon. gentleman, the original estimate was $185,000. The contract was on schedule rates, and some things have been dropped and some others have been included. As a matter of fact, the hon. gentleman will see that the extras did not exceed the amount of the estimate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My information does not enable me to criticise the amount of extras which the hon. gentleman has given this contractor. Whether they are too generous or too little, I do not know; but I want to get the facts so that those who do know will be enabled to determine. I suppose that experts could be able to do that. Now, I want to call the attention of the House and of the hon. gentleman to the fact that they have incurred $185,000 in building a wharf at Cape Traverse. It was justified, or attempted to be justified, only on the ground that that was to be one of the termini of the ferry between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. As a matter of fact there is no attempt being made to establish that ferry. The hon. gentleman will remember that some years ago the Government came down and said that they were in earnest about the establishment of that ferry, and they spent $250,000 in Prince Edward Island in building a branch line from Emerald to Cape Traverse. That branch line has been there ever since, doing very little good to anybody, involving the loss of a large amount of money annually, and it can really be of no use to the public until the wharf at Cape Traverse is finished. Now, the Department of Public Works and the Government generally are very seriously to blame in this matter. They are not attempting to do the slightest thing towards the completion of that ferry. They have spent $250,000, which is the next thing to useless, in Prince Edward Island, in building that branch line from Emerald to Cape Traverse; and they have spent this $185,000 in building a wharf at Cape Tormentine. The hon. gentleman tells us he is going to spend seven or eight thousand more, in doing—what? In building wharf accommodation at the end of the railway. For what? There is no ferry there, there can be no ferry there, there can be no use for this eight or ten thousand dollars you are going to spend, except so far as it may personally benefit the shareholders of the Sackville Railway. There is no earthly reason in the world for expending any more money on that wharf except for the personal benefit of those gentlemen; and I am sorry that the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) is not in his place, who is the chief owner of that railway, so that he might give some explanation of this matter. Now, the hon. gentleman will see that the only excuse they could have given to Parliament at all for the expenditure of this enormous amount of money was that it was necessary to build the wharf on that side, and the wharf on the other side, in order to carry out the terms of union with Prince Edward Island; and the hon. gentleman is treating us, as my hon. friend from Prince county (Mr. Perry) has said, with contempt in the matter, because he is not taking the first step, so far as I know—and I have read his report—to construct the wharf on the Prince Edward Island side, and the two or three hundred thousand dollars he has spent is just thrown away unless he finishes that wharf. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, to-night, whether he proposes to take immediate steps for the construction of a wharf at Cape Traverse, so that a ferry may run

there in the summer months, at least, if it is found desirable to run it. If he is not going to do that how does he justify the expenditure of this money? The only way it can be justified was on the ground on which the House was first asked to vote the money, namely, that it was for the purpose of constructing a ferry which, to some extent, would carry out the terms of union with Prince Edward Island. Now, that object is thrown over apparently. The hon. gentleman has not as yet taken any steps to construct the ferry on the Island side, and the wharf, at a cost of $185,000 on the Cape Tormentine side is a useless expenditure, except for the purposes of the shareholders of the Sackville Railway, of which the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) is the chief shareholder, as I understand. Well, if this wharf is to be built, not in the interest of the people of Prince Edward Island, on whose behalf the money was originally asked, but in the interest of a supporter of the Government, let the public know it, let the people down there know it. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman to-night, and he must give me an answer before this estimate is passed, whether it is his intention to take steps to construct a wharf on the Island side, or whether he has satisfied himself that the wharf cannot be constructed, and is to be abandoned?

Mr. OUIMET. I was not the Minister of Public Works when this particular work was undertaken and I cannot question the correctness of the assertions of the hon. gentleman; but I may tell him that from what I know, and from what I saw, this wharf has not been built exclusively in order to serve as a ferry accommodation with Cape Traverse. It is not a natural harbour, true enough, but it is large enough for the ships that come there. If it had been built only to serve for a ferry, I do not think it was necessary to build it in its present shape.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly, it was for protection for the steamer that was supposed to ply from the railway on the Cape Traverse side to the Cape Tormentine side, and you had to build that wharf as a protection against the north-east storms.

Mr. OUIMET. My information is that when the wharf is completed, and when the cars can come to the end of the wharf, it is intended to have large shipments of lumber from that point.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then we are building that wharf for the purpose of enabling the owners of the Sackville Railway to ship lumber from there. Is that it?

Mr. OUIMET. No, the railway will carry lumber, and the people of New Brunswick will sell it, and both will be benefited by the wharf. The fact that Mr. Wood is president of that railway, is no reason why the people of New Brunswick should not have that accommodation for shipping their lumber. The ferry question is another thing. The Sackville Railway, I understand, was built with the expectation that it would give the people of Prince Edward Island the shortest and best communication with the mainland. I presume that the branch of the Island railway to Cape Traverse was built with that expectation, and the present wharf was built for the same purpose; but on account of the delay in constructing the work, there has been every year an accumulation of sand, so much so that there is hardly sufficient water for a ferry to approach the wharf. Since the work has been carried to completion, communication has been opened with the Department of Railways, and a controversy has arisen as to the success of that ferry scheme. In that view, the Department of Public Works, having been informed by its engineers that $30,000 would be required to construct a deep water wharf there, similar to that constructed at Cape Tormentine, with 15 feet at low water, has decided that it would be better to make an experiment before entering upon that large expenditure; and it is the intention of my department, acting with the Department of Railways, to carry out some dredging near the wharf at Cape Traverse, in order to temporarily make it available for a ferry, and to ascertain whether we will be justified in undertaking that further expenditure of $30,000. I think I am perfectly justified in taking the position that before I recommend such a large expenditure, I must be assured by the Department of Railways that the expenditure will not be useless. If the ferry were abandoned after the first year, this large expenditure would have been made for almost nothing. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will agree that it is better to spend a few dollars on this experiment rather than enter rashly on an outlay of $30,000. If it were possible by dredging to secure ten or twelve feet of water so as to allow the ferry to come to the wharf without difficulty, the work would be carried out at once, in fact it would have been carried out already; but it cannot be done, because dredging would have to be carried on lower than the foundation of the wharf, and in a very short time the wharf would tumble into the cut. I hope hon. gentlemen will be satisfied that the intention of the department is to afford the people of Prince Edward Island all the benefits that the works already constructed can give them, without entering upon, I will not say an extravagant, but an improvident expenditure.

Mr. YEO. I desire to ask the Minister of Public Works how soon we may expect the dredging to be done at Cape Traverse. I was always under the impression that the pier or breakwater at Cape Tormentine was constructed for the purpose of extending trade between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, and unless something is done at Cape Traverse harbour, so far as that trade is concerned, it will prove entirely useless. I think different reports have been made to the Government by engineers sent to Cape Traverse as to the improvement of the harbour at that place. Some have recommended dredging, others an extension of the wharf, and others have recommended that a breakwater be constructed outside of the harbour. The country around Cape Traverse is a very fine one, a large amount of shipping is done there, irrespective of the passenger traffic, and if it is not the intention to make Cape Traverse a port of shipping, the expenditure on Cape Tormentine pier will be money almost thrown away, for I do not think it would be used very much except for the Island trade. Cape Tormentine is the nearest point to the Island, and directly opposite Cape Traverse, where if the harbour is improved there will ultimately be a large amount of traffic. I am sorry the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) is not in his place, for he well knows the very great necessity that exists of improving the harbour at Cape Traverse. My colleague and myself had an interview with the Minister of Public Works to-day, and he assured us that dredging would be done there, but he did not specify the kind of dredging. We have required this improvement for some years. Late in the autumn a large meeting was held there, attended by representatives of all shades of politics, and the meeting petitioned the Public Works Department, asking it to take steps at once to have the necessary harbour improvements carried out, and I hope the Minister will see that this is attended to at once. I do not know whether the vote that is being passed through committee includes the repairs to be made to Cape Tormentine breakwater, which, I understand, was somewhat damaged last year.

Mr. OUIMET. $6,500 have been placed in the main Estimates for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not desire to find any fault with the head of the department for exercising any reasonable prudence before he enters upon a large expenditure. Incapacity, recklessness and extravagance have characterized the expenditures made by the department from the time this scheme was first mooted until now. Any sane man who considers the matter will say that the language I have used was not in any sense too strong. It was proposed to this House to expend a certain sum of money in carrying out the terms of union with Prince Edward Island by establishing a ferry between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse. The Government came down to the House, and asked for a grant to build a railway on one side and construct wharves on the other side. What did they do? Before they had ascertained the proper data on which to found a judgment as to the length of the wharf required to reach deep water, they let a contract and built a small wharf very much shorter than was required and also not exactly in the right place. Then Parliament voted $250,000 or more in building a branch railway to go to the straits and unite the end of Mr. Wood's railway. The Government built a wharf at a cost of $179,000, which cannot be justified in this House or the country, on any ground except that the Government were obliged to build it in order to carry out the terms of union. Now it appears that the whole structure was built as a feeder to the Sackville Railway. I do not think, with all the backing the hon. gentleman has in this House, if his statement was made that that was the only object in constructing the wharf, there are not a dozen men who would sacrifice their sense of duty and regard for purity to vote to expend such an enormous amount. If the hon. gentleman and his engineers informed this House that he cannot build a wharf on the other side so as to make the ferry pay, that he cannot extend the wharf further out, he is not justified in expending any money whatever on that wharf. $175,000 are gone now, and the hon. gentleman's department, which, more than any other department, has been characterized for some years back by an absolute recklessness in expenditure; the hon. gentleman's department, over which he presides (although he himself is not responsible), is responsible for constructing that wharf at an enormous cost before they have had settled the point that the complement wharf on the other side could be built, and that they could supply sufficient water to float a steamer of proper size. $250,000 to build a railway on one side, $180,000 to build a railway on the other, and the wharf which is necessary to enable this railway to be of any use cannot be built. It displays a want of management, a recklessness and an extravagance which does not entitle the department to much weight when it makes a recommendation to this House. When the vote was taken in the first instance, the Government pledged themselves that there would be a branch wharf built on both sides, and they led the people of Prince Edward Island to believe so. We find in this matter, as in most other matters, where that unfortunate Island is concerned, that we have been cheated and deceived. I do not want the Minister to spend money recklessly, if he is not satisfied the wharf can be built, but I do urge that the hon. gentleman shall not abandon works which have already cost $400,000 without making an effort to see if the result of this expenditure can be utilized. The department has thrown away $400,000—$200,000 of which will benefit specially the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), who is largely the owner of the Sackville road, and it appears to me from what the Minister says tonight that he recognizes that fact. He tells us that it will be a place for shipping lumber. They do not want artificial harbours for shipping lumber on that part of the New Brun-

wick coast. The port of Shediac is not far away. They have shipped lumber there for years, and the hon. gentleman knows that you will not get a Norwegian vessel to go to this artificial harbour to load with lumber. That wharf was built simply as a protection for the steamer and for no other reason. I do not want to prejudge the hon. gentleman. I am willing to give him every reasonable time to consult his department before he discusses this matter again, for discuss it I will before the session is over, when I have the engineer's report before me. I can tell him that there are thousands of people who have been waiting year after year for some words from the department which will satisfy the hopes that have been held out to them that such a wharf would be built. If it cannot be built, then let the hon. gentleman come to the House and say so. Do not let the people be deceived any more. Let us know it, and let us stop spending money foolishly. But if it can be done for a reasonable sum of money, surely the hon. gentleman will not "lose the ship for a ha'porth of tar," and having spent $400,000 already, $25,000 should not stand in the way of his endeavouring to make that large expenditure useful. The hon. Minister of Public Works has an opportunity of earning for himself a name which his predecessor neither earned nor deserved in our part of the Dominion. We were treated by his predecessor with contempt. We were deceived year after year with promises in this House which never were fulfilled, and which, judging from the result, I am bound to say he never intended to fulfil. We have our breakwaters, our wharves, and our harbours in Prince Edward Island in the most abominable and disgraceful condition. I have had an opportunity of bringing one or two to the attention of the Minister of Public Works, and I trust he will see to them. I trust the Minister will examine into the question. If there is a reasonable chance for the construction of a wharf which will enable that ferry to be carried out, when we have already spent $400,000, we ought not to pause at $25,000 in the completion of the work. I cannot compliment the department on the way this has been managed, and it looks very much to me, judging from the results, as if the interests of a certain hon. gentleman behind the Government were more kept in view than the interests of the public or of Prince Edward Island.

Toronto Drill Shed..... $53,000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How much has been expended on that drill shed already?

Mr. OUIMET. It is to cost $280,000.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What was the value of the site given by the city?

Mr. OUIMET. We estimated it at $100,000; but the people of Toronto considered it was worth $150,000.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). $280,000 for one drill shed and $10,000 for another. Is that the hon. gentleman's idea of impartiality? I think, perhaps, after what has been said about Cape Tormentine, I had better not go into that matter at present, but I will ask the hon. gentleman to keep these figures in mind.

Lieut. - Governor's Residence,
Regina..... $3,913 47

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the total cost of this building?

Mr. OUIMET. The total cost, including the furniture and linen, is $50,502. The furniture cost about $8,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the department any schedule of the work?

Mr. OUIMET. We had our own clerk of works there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who is he?

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. Peters. All these accounts have since been inquired into. I may say that part of the expenditure is for furniture and linen, and part for wages paid to labourers. The principal reason why these accounts have been left behind has been that the expense had not been at the time regularly authorized by the department, and Mr. Peters took upon himself, at the request of the Lieutenant-Governor, to go into the expenditure without referring to the department. But since then all the items have been inquired into, and we have found that the works were necessary, the goods were furnished, and the labour for which wages were demanded was given.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is just as I expected, that this money was expended without any authority whatsoever, and now the country is called upon to pay it. The hon. gentleman says he has inquired into it. May I ask him what kind of an inquiry it was?

Mr. OUIMET. I sent one of the officers of the department, Mr. Ewart, to inquire into the whole subject in the summer.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has he made a report in writing?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman bring down the report I have reasons for asking.

Mr. OUIMET. I will.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Our experience of taking charge of Government buildings when changes of governors take place is not such as we can be very proud of. There have been certain episodes in the history of Canada in relation to Rideau Hall which none of us care to dig up, and I hope that we shall not need to make any similar complaint with reference to Regina Government house. I suppose the hon. gentleman has a proper schedule in his department showing what we have got and what we have not got for this expenditure?

Mr. OUIMET. Inventories have been ordered of all the furniture there is in these buildings, and we have them in the department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand that the inventory as to the Regina building is complete, showing everything we have paid for, and that it can be obtained if moved for.

Mr. OUIMET. Yes.

Victoria, B.C., Drill Hall--locality furnishing site free..... $21,000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the cost?

Mr. OUIMET. $43,165.50.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What was paid for the site?

Mr. OUIMET. Nothing. The locality furnished it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But the deed is made out to the Government.

Mr. OUIMET. If the hon. gentleman desires the information I will give it when we come to the item in the main Estimates for this same building. This is to pay for the contract now going on, as the appropriation of last year was insufficient to carry on the work continuously during the present year, and it was thought better not to suspend the work, but to go on with it, and to ask the House for an additional amount for the present year.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not ask the question for the purpose of objecting to the expenditure. I have no doubt that Victoria is entitled to this building. But I ask it in order to call attention to the fact that we were given to understand that the rule that prevailed in regard to these buildings was that the Government would furnish an amount equal to that furnished by the municipality in which the building is erected; that this rule is not carried out by the department; that the department do not act by rule, but act in one way in one place and another way in another place. That being the case I think they ought to take the ground that they do so, instead of professing to be governed by a rule, when it is very evident that no rule guides them. Toronto has not given anything like half the cost of the building being constructed there. I presume that the site in Victoria does not cost as much as the building. In Halifax I do not know whether a site was given at all or not. While I say I do not take exception to the vote, I do take exception to the Government saying that they act by a rule in reference to this matter when that rule is not observed, in regard to the expenditure of public money on a force that is national in its character, and into which no local considerations should enter. I simply wish to emphasize these matters in order to convince this House that when I have spoken on several occasions under a sense of duty, I have not been speaking on a matter that was not worthy of the attention of the House or the Government.

Mr. OUIMET. I am not aware that the rule as laid down by the hon. gentleman has ever been laid down by me or any one else within my knowledge. The hon. gentleman will agree with me that all the different cities in the Dominion cannot stand on the same footing, from a military point of view. Take Halifax and Victoria, they cannot be looked at in the same light as an inland place like Brantford, which stands in no danger from invasion from the outside as do these places on the coast.

Minor Quarantine Stations—to provide for additional accommodation and to recoup appropriations, repairs, furniture, etc. $1,846 42

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not see anything to be expended in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. OUIMET. In that amount there is a vote of $1,000 for Charlottetown, P.E.I.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That will not go very far.

Repairs, Furniture, etc.—additional amount required $35,000

Mr. OUIMET. This is a general vote. Last year I said I thought we might be able to reduce the expenditure to $155,000, or $40,000 less than the previous vote. This is for repairs, furniture, everything necessary for the buildings in Ottawa and even outside. The report of the Auditor-General will show that we spent last year $152,000, and the year before $193,000, and this year we require $155,000.

Dredging, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick—additional amount required $5,000

Mr. YEO. Is there any dredging to be done in Prince Edward Island during the coming season? It is impossible for one dredge to do all the work. I had the opportunity of presenting a petition to the Minister of Public Works a few days ago, asking that a harbour in Prince County, Victoria west, should be dredged. There is a pier at this place, upon which some work was done two years ago, and at the present time the pier is in very good repair. But, in consequence of a bank which has formed quite near the pier it is useless for want of a little dredging. But it seems to me that if we are to wait until the dredge completes the work in King's County we shall have to wait a long time. I would call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to Malpeque Harbour. That is the most important harbour on the north side of Prince Edward Island, but a bank has formed near the entrance to that harbour. Last year a vessel grounded there and it was only with great difficulty she was got off. She had a narrow escape of being wrecked and the lives of her crew lost. I would like the Minister to inform the committee when the work will be done at Cape Traverse, whether it will be during the present session or not. I do not know, but it seems to me that one dredge cannot do all the work that is wanted to be done in Prince Edward Island. But Victoria West and Malpeque Harbour require immediate attention.

Mr. OUIMET. I could not exactly tell the hon. gentleman the programme laid out for the dredge. She is now in Montague, in King's County. I am told that the dredge has not been in that county since 1883. The other gentleman has just suggested one reason why the work of the dredge is not rapid enough to meet the expectations of the people. A good deal of time is occupied in travelling from one point to another, fitting up and so on. She is now in Montague Harbour and probably afterwards will go to Cape Traverse. I cannot say where she will go then.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am afraid the hon. gentleman has not given the real reason why these dredges do so little work. Has he got a return of the exact work done during the summer? This used to be placed in the report of the Department of Public Works, but I have not seen it lately. Under whose supervision are these dredges?

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. McCorduck.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He does not live there; he goes there once or twice in the summer.

Mr. OUIMET. Well, the captain is on board and is responsible for the work. I shall furnish the hon. gentleman a statement of the work that has been done, but I may say that we cannot superintend the dredging done in the lower provinces as well as we can that done up here. And if we had a proper engineer attached to these dredges it perhaps would be better. Here is a statement of the amount of dredging that appears to the credit of the dredge "Prince Edward" Summerside—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman would rather give it to me privately I think it will serve every purpose.

Mr. OUIMET. There is nothing to hide.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not mean to say there is anything to hide. But the point is not one of general interest, but still, as I had made a remark which he might think undeserved, he might find it desirable to occupy the time of the House in reading these figures. If he thinks so, very well; I do not want to reflect improperly upon the captain.

Mr. OUIMET. I will give you the work of the "Prince Edward" in 1882. Prince County, 13,541 cubic yards; Queen's County, 3,243; Georgetown (Queen's County), 1,002; Sturgeon (King's County), 13,596.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Can the hon. gentleman give the total of work done by other dredges?

Mr. OUIMET. I have the figures for the four dredges. The "New Dominion" moved a total of 54,000 cubic yards; the "Canada" 38,453; the "Prince Edward" 31,382; the "St. Lawrence" 24,763 and the "George Mackenzie" 39,165.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You would want to know if they were the same power and size?

Mr. FORBES. May I ask if the dredge was on the south shore of Nova Scotia?

Mr. OUIMET. No.

Mr. FORBES. Is there any likelihood of a dredge coming this year? The hon. gentleman speaks of no dredge having been in King's County since 1883. We have some very important harbours on the south side that have not had a dredge since 1873. Last year I presented a petition asking for dredging in the important harbour, or sub-harbour of Liverpool. This is exclusively used by fishermen, and at Liverpool, where it adjoins the harbour, is a bar which should be dredged out. There are places also in Shelburne County requiring attention.

Mr. OUIMET. It is not intended to send a dredge this year.

Mr. FORBES. Why?

Mr. OUIMET. We must do the work as well as we can. In order to dredge around the whole coast of Nova Scotia it would take a hundred dredges, I suppose.

Mr. FORBES. If we had 500 I think we would have enough, but in the meantime we could have much more satisfaction and the work I think could be fairly covered if we had two dredges. The dredge which properly belonged to the south shore of Nova Scotia, I was told last year, was lost; and there was a vote put in the Estimates for building a new dredge for the lake service. The Minister also told us that he intended to apply at the next session of Parliament for a vote to put on a new dredge for the south shore of Nova Scotia. Will he tell me what is his programme at present for the south shore of Nova Scotia?

Mr. OUIMET. This question would be better addressed to the Finance Minister, and I suppose he would answer that if the finances of the country could afford it, he would get another dredge.

New Dredging Plant—additional amount required..... $10,900

Mr. OUIMET. This is to pay the balance of the building of a dredge which was authorized last year for the use of the ship channel. It was to build a new hull and put in two new boilers, and this amount is necessary to pay the balance of the contract entered into by the department last year.

Mr. FORBES. Is that to supply a dredge that has been lost?

Mr. OUIMET. No, it is an old dredge, the hull of which was ruined in the St. Lawrence River.

Mr. FORBES. Is it the intention of the department to supply the loss of the dredge for the south shore of Nova Scotia?

Mr. OUIMET. As I said to the hon. gentleman, our good intentions have no limit, but the resources of this country do not always allow us to carry out our good intentions.

Mr. FORBES. In other words, other parts of Canada are to be supplied before the south shore of Nova Scotia.

Mr. OUIMET. We are threatened with a reduction in the revenue.

Repairs to Wascana Dam, Regina, on condition that what is required in addition to put the dam in a state of thorough repair be contributed by the other parties interested, and that hereafter it be taken over and maintained at the cost of the municipality—additional amount required.. $1,500

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the Government's liability in reference to this?

Mr. OUIMET. This dam was constructed originally by the Government of Canada to raise the water to be utilized by the town of Regina. The dam was in bad order, and in danger of being carried away to the damage of the surrounding country. The City Council of Regina entered into negotiations with the Government to have the dam placed in a proper state of repair. Last year the department offered to furnish $3,500 towards repairing the dam if the city of Regina would take the responsibility of building the dam, and of maintaining it in the future. A vote of $3,500 was given for that purpose. Negotiations were carried on with no success, the cost of repairs to the dam being much higher than we expected. A new agreement was entered into, that the Government should furnish $5,000 towards rebuilding the dam, and on that condition the municipality undertook to pay for the balance of the rebuilding and to maintain it for ever. Under that arrangement the Government will have nothing to do with it in the future. We now ask for an additional sum of $1,500 to complete the $5,000.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But what is our interest in it as a country?

Mr. FOSTER. It was our water supply for public buildings and Mounted Police, and it is necessary to maintain it in our interest.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 27th February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. (65) to amend the law respecting the Electoral Franchise. He said: Many months ago my predecessor issued a circular to such persons whose opinions would be of value, to ascertain what amendments they might suggest in the Act, and from all the information we have had from revising barristers and others, it seems to be the general opinion that the revision could be simplified and the number of lists posted and printed to-day reduced. The list shall be revised by striking off the names from the original list, by drawing a pen through them and then making an additional list in writing of the names to be added. The original list with the names struck off and the additional list of names added shall be posted. In that way, we save the first printing of the supplementary list and a very considerable expense. This is done by the revising officer himself of his own motion, as at present. Then any man not a voter, may make a declaration for himself which will be received, but he cannot make a declaration for other persons except in the case of their absence. There are no changes in the duties of the revising officer, except in the districts affected by the Act passed for the redistribution of seats. Some time ago the time for receiving claims for names to be added was extended from the 1st to the 15th of August. That has been found to cause great inconvenience, because it shortens the time allowed the officers for completing their work too much. These are the principal changes.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no remarks to offer upon the provisions of the Bill at its present stage, but I must say that the Bill must bring to the House a very deep sense of disappointment. The hon. gentleman who was Secretary of State last year, now the Minister of Militia (Mr. Patterson, Huron), promised the House that there should be a thorough revision of the Franchise Act, and now this thorough revision is found to be simply some amendment of the Act dealing with the matter of making the lists. That is not what was promised, for it leaves the Act in every important respect as it is to-day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to say one word with respect to the amendment that has been introduced, more in the way of suggestion than in the way of criticism, in the hope that something may be done before this Bill is passed. So far as the province from which I come is concerned, every hon. member knows the expense and loss of time which the candidates and the leading politicians on both sides are obliged to suffer in the preparation and revision of these lists. The intention of the law seems to me to be very plain that a large portion of the work shall be done by the revising officer, and done of his own mere motion, without throwing the onus and trouble upon the respective parties. Now, in my county, the revising officer does not put on any names at all of his own motion; he simply puts on the names, whether 100 or 1,000, which are set forth in declarations prepared in the proper form without any technical error. The language of the Act appears very plain to me, and if something could be done to compel the revising officers to carry out what seems to be the meaning of the law, it would be a great advantage. Take an ordinary city, such as I come from, one of 10,000 inhabitants. Hundreds and hundreds of the voters change from one ward to the other during the year. But if you do not apply to strike off every man from the ward he has left, and to put him on for the ward to which he has gone, the necessary changes are not made. The revising officer will not look over the city lists and put down the names, and thus a burden which is almost intolerable is thrown upon the candidates and their friends. Of course, the revising officer could not do it perfectly; some names would be left off. But these could be supplied by those who are watching the lists. The law seems plainly to declare that this is the duty of the revising officer, but the revising officer regards it differently, and consequently great labour is thrown upon the politicians on both sides, as well as great expense.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I confess I am disappointed with the synopsis which the Minister has given us of the Bill which he has introduced. I was in hopes that the Government would return to the condition of things that existed before the present Franchise Act was introduced and to the plan and policy which worked so satisfactorily during the first eighteen years of our Federal constitution. It seems to me that any preparation of the lists will fail to be satisfactory until that preparation is put into the hands of the people upon the ground. Both in England and in the United States, as well as in this country prior to the introduction of this Bill in 1885, the policy has been to allow the list to be prepared—I am speaking now not of the revision, but of the preparation of the list—by the people in the locality who know the various parties and who know who is and who is not qualified to be upon the list. Now, the persons naturally pointed to by the experience, the observation and the common sense of every member of the community for this work—I am speaking so far as the province of Ontario is concerned—are the municipal officers in each municipality. Why should the party named as the revising officer be the officer for the preparation of the lists?

Mr. OUMET.

In no other country is the revising officer the officer who prepares the list. The lists should be prepared by the officers of the municipality. There are the assessor, the reeve and the deputy-reeve of the different townships, towns and villages, who together know almost every individual who resides within that municipality and by whose knowledge the lists can be prepared without imposing any special duties in that respect upon the revising officers or upon the candidates on either side. Now I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is to the interests of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to see that the lists first prepared are full and accurate, and that can only be done by having these lists in the first instance prepared by persons in the various municipalities which go to make up the constituency. I do not intend further to discuss this matter on the first reading of the Bill, but I confess my disappointment at the principle and plan on which the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches have based the provisions of this Bill, because I certainly did expect, from the experience we have had during the past seven years, that they would have prepared a more satisfactory and a more inexpensive plan of preparing the lists than that which, during this period of time, has prevailed.

Mr. CASEY. I cannot help sharing the disappointment expressed by the hon. gentlemen who preceded me that we have not had a revision of the Franchise Act this year. The few changes in detail proposed by the Minister cannot be called in any sense a revision. Last session, undoubtedly, we were led to expect that the whole principle, as well as the machinery of the Act, would be looked into and something more easily workable and more economical laid before us this year. Hon. members on the Government side of the House must agree with those on this side that the Act as it stands, even with the trifling changes now proposed by the Secretary of State (Mr. Costigan), involves immense expense in any constituency that is anything like a fighting constituency, where there is any pressing need of preparing a correct list. But I hope that before the second reading of the Bill, or perhaps after the second reading in committee, the hon. Minister will be prepared to go somewhat more into the real revision of the Act. There is one point to which I wish to call the Minister's attention, and which has been discussed a good deal in the press. I do not ask him to pronounce upon it now, and I do not intend to pronounce upon it myself at the present time. It has been urged that owing to the fact that we only revise our lists every second year, as a rule, the list used is often a very old one, generally a year, and sometimes two years old. There ought to be some provision for putting on the list names of electors who have become qualified since the last revision. It has been urged by many newspapers and public men that after the issue of a writ for an election, there should be some means of registering those who have become qualified since the last revision of the list. I think this is a very serious matter for consideration; I think it is desirable this should be done if possible; and I would ask the Minister if he has already considered that proposal, and whether he has decided that nothing can be done in that line, or if he has not considered it, I would urge upon him to do so before the Bill comes up for discussion in the House. I have no doubt the Minister could contrive a way to have a supplemental registration within the last three weeks or so before the election, conducted with sufficient safe-guards against the registration of names who should not be put on the list. If this could be done, I think it would be a great advantage to the country, and would secure a more correct representation of the views of the people than can be secured upon a list one or two years old. The number of deaths that have occurred during that time, and the opportunities for personation thereby given, especially in cities, give force to what I am urging. When we remember what a large crop of young men become available as voters every year, and when we know that so many of these are left off and cannot exercise the franchise to which they have become entitled, as a matter of fact, and when we think of the feelings they must have, knowing that they are as well qualified to vote as many who are on the list, and better qualified than many who have lost their qualification in the meantime—we must admit this is a very serious question, and worthy the attention of the Minister in charge of the Bill, and of such other Ministers as he may choose to consult in the matter. I think it is quite within the ability of the Government to contrive a plan by which a supplemental list of this kind could be arranged between the issue of the writ and the date of holding the election.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX—VACANCY.

Mr. LAURIER. I would ask the hon. gentleman for information with regard to the matter to which I called attention the other day, that is to say, the vacancy in the representation of South Middlesex. May I ask if the returning officer has been appointed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The returning officer has been appointed and the writ has been issued. Nomination day is on the 13th March.

PRIVILEGE—CHIGNECTO SHIP RAILWAY.

Mr. WELSH. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to call the attention of the House to an article in the "Free Press" of the 4th February inst., and to put myself in order, I move the adjournment of the House.

On the 4th February, the "Free Press" contained the following:—

Some months ago the Dominion Government passed an Order in Council agreeing to extend the time for the completion of the Chignecto Ship Railway, without forfeiture of the subsidy voted by Parliament in aid of the scheme, provided work on the railway is actually in progress on the 1st of July next, 1893, and the company establishes to the satisfaction of the Governor-General in Council that it has secured all the capital necessary fully to finish and equip the railway, docks and other works of the company in all respects according to the requirements of the contract. The company must therefore raise the necessary funds to complete the project before the 1st July next, when the extension granted some years ago will expire. The directors have issued preference bonds upon the railway to the amount of $350,000, and hope to obtain the needed money by the sale of such bonds. They expect that the capitalists who have already invested money in the project will take up the new issue of bonds rather than see the work abandoned.

Well, if this is true, Mr. Speaker, I do not like it. Every extension of time, and every charter that has been granted to this railway, has been done with the sanction of Parliament; and on every occasion that this matter has been brought up there, has always been, from this side of the House at all events, and I think in the minds of a great many gentlemen on the other side of the House, an expression of dissatisfaction, seeing that this scheme had been approved of and supported by Parliament. This matter was brought up in 1888, when the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the time for the completion of the works of the Chignecto Marine Railway Company, shall, as respects their title to receive the subsidy heretofore authorized, be the 1st July, 1890, instead of the 1st July, 1889; also that the company may be accorded a further delay of twenty-four months for such completion, on the condition of the payment of a monthly penalty of $5,000 for each month during which the works remain uncompleted after the above-mentioned date, and also that the amount of capital mentioned in section 2 of the Act 49 Victoria, chapter 18, as that on which the payment of the subsidies limited so as to make up the net earnings to 7 per cent per annum, shall be $5,500,000 instead of $5,000,000.

There was considerable debate on that motion, and it was opposed by my hon. colleague and by many others, including Mr. Mitchell, the late Minister of Marine. I will not take up the time of the House by quoting the whole of the debate, but I will read an extract from the remarks of Sir Charles Tupper which, at this time, read like a theatrical performance. Among other things he said:

But I consider it the height of ingratitude on the part of the hon. member for Queen's to stand up here and oppose a measure which, if it is going to benefit one part of this Dominion more than another, will benefit the island on which he lives. Why, Sir, it will give to the great article of export of that island, potatoes, an increased value almost equal to the amount of duty that now meets them in the United States. It will enable the large fleets with which Captain Welsh is identified—if he will allow me to use his name—to make two or three voyages between Charlottetown and Boston and New York, for every one that it can make as matters stand to-day.

Mr. WELSH. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why, Sir, I am not attempting to offer to the House, on a question of this kind, my opinion in opposition to that of a gentleman who is perfectly familiar with navigation on the water; but that hon. gentleman has had no experience in navigating his ship on land.

Mr. WELSH. No, and I do not want to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He is no authority on the question of taking his ship over-land for twenty miles. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) objects to this work.

And then he goes on. When I read those speeches, and the remarks that were made to sanction this wild-cat scheme, it reminds me of one of Baron Munchausen's yarns. I see some very strong opinions were expressed by the Hon. Mr. Mitchell and others. This has been going on for eight or nine years. If the time is extended much longer, there will be no ships left to pass over the railway, even assuming that it will be possible to carry them over. I have opposed this scheme ever since it was introduced into this House, with all my power. If the Government have extended the company's time by Order in Council, their action is not fair and honest to foreign capitalists. This scheme has always been ventilated on the floor of Parliament, and hon. members have had an opportunity of expressing an opinion on it, and it is well this has been the case, because it has tended to inform foreign investors of the position in which the company stands before Parliament. I am within bounds in stating that the last discussion in this House was the means of saving foreign capitalists very large sums of money. I have denounced, and I denounce now this scheme and all such wild-cat schemes, such as the dead meat scheme, and the Chignecto Railway, as being the means of doing great injury to this Dominion, for, if foreign capitalists find such schemes have received the sanction of Parliament, and have been subsequently granted extensions of time and other privileges whereby to assist the companies in carrying out their schemes, the credit of Canada must severely suffer. I oppose this scheme now in order that my action throughout may be consistent. I repeat that I have always opposed it, that I oppose it still, and that this Parliament would do well to express its opinion on the matter, because if it does so, no doubt private foreign capital will save money as well as the tax-payers of the country, if the work should be completed, to the extent of $3,000,000. When this subject was brought before the House last year, with a view to grant the company an extension of time, the Minister of Finance delivered a long speech, in which he embodied many statistics connected with the railway, including the quantity of mud and rock removed, and grading done, statistics handed him, no doubt, by the engineer of the road. I have little faith in the engineers' reports. They remind me of an incident that used to happen in the old days when people crossed the line. It was always said that Neptune came on board and shaved the sailors. A man was laid over a long boat, filled with water, his eyes were bandaged and he was shaved. A man who stood by with a tar brush made him swear to this effect: "You will never eat black bread, if you can get white; you will never drink water, if you can get beer." An engineer has to pass through a somewhat similar experience before he receives his certificate, and he has to show that nothing is impossible to an engineer if money can be made thereby. My candid opinion is that the Government had better be careful how they extend the time to this company. I have already asked that a list of stockholders and shareholders be laid on the Table, and, although it was promised last year, it has not yet been brought down. I doubt very much if any man interested in shipping has a dollar invested in the railway. At all events I have done my duty, and I warn foreign capitalists, and I warn this Parliament, not to grant further favours to the company, and thus save the tax-payers of Canada $3,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is rather hard on the engineers, and I must put in a little plea for them at the beginning of my remarks. The hon. gentleman is misinformed if his information leads him to believe that the Government has granted an extension of time to this company. That can only be done by Parliament. It is not necessary to go over the history of the arrangements made from time to time with the company, but my hon. friend will remember that, last year, after the reverses had taken place and difficulties had been met with in the financial market in raising the money by the company, and after an expenditure of between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 had been made on the work, and the company were within an expenditure of $1,000,000 of completing it, gentlemen interested in the matter, as representing the stockholders, came from England, and, after a good deal of consultation, they came to Parliament, and Parliament made legal an arrangement whereby they should raise £350,000 on first preference mortgage bonds. That Bill passed through Parliament, and the representatives of the company took it with them, in order, if possible, to raise the amount necessary to complete the work. But in the making of that arrangement, a good deal of time was necessarily lost. The extension Parliament granted them runs to 1st July, 1893. They considered that, in consequence of those delays and difficulties, it would be impossible for them to make a fair market for their preference mortgage bonds, unless the Government could hold out to them the possibility of an extension for one year from the 1st July, 1893. Under all the circumstances, and bearing in mind the fact that between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 of private capital had been already expended, and that the further outlay necessary does not exceed $1,000,000, the Government agreed, by Order in Council, that if the company could satisfy the Government before the next session of Parliament that they had made satisfactory arrangements for raising the money, and if the works were then in progress, the Government would lay their case before Parliament and ask an extension of time of one year in which to complete the contract. These are the facts of the case, and I have stated all that has been done.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do the Government propose to ask Parliament for that extension?

Mr. FOSTER. Not on present information.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That being the case, I need not occupy the time of the House with any extended remarks on this important undertaking. There is no country in the world, I think, where Parliament should be so careful of lending its sanction to visionary and impracticable schemes as Canada should be at the present time. There is no country in the world possessing the vast undeveloped natural resources that this Dominion possesses to-day. We require, above all things, to attract foreign capital here. It would be foolish on the part of Parliament to lend its sanction to any scheme that is visionary and impracticable or wild-cat in character. There are large numbers of practical men in this House and of business men in the Maritime provinces who are acquainted with this scheme, and who consider it impracticable and visionary, and if Parliament, by repeating its sanction year after year to this scheme, by extending its charter, leads British capitalists to believe that, in the opinion of the great majority of the people who ought to know, the value of this scheme is valuable, and if as a consequence English capital is invested in it, Parliament is doing a great injury to Canada. We know very well that a few years ago the very fact that the Canadian High Commissioner, and a gentleman who was then a prominent Canadian statesman, allowed their names to be identified with the dead meat scheme, caused severe animadversion by members on both sides of the House. Why? It was because it was felt to be improper that the names of such gentlemen should be attached to schemes that were not prudent, practicable and reasonable. Now, I have never heard any man, other than the late Minister of Finance, who is now High Commissioner, rise in this House and state that he believed this scheme, to be a rational, a prudent or a reasonable scheme, or one from which those who invested their money in it, could ever hope for a fair return. Therefore, we stand in this position, that every time we, as a Parliament, lend our name to the sanction of this scheme by extending the time for its completion, we are telling the English capitalists in so many words that we believe it to be a reasonable and prudent scheme, and invite them to put their money into it. If through our action English capitalists put their money into a scheme of this kind, what will be the result when our people lay before them any proper schemes, for the development of the great resources of Canada? They will say, Oh no; we cannot take your word; we cannot even rely upon the fact that the Parliament of Canada has sanctioned your scheme, because it has sanctioned other schemes which have turned out to be failures. Therefore, we ought not to proceed in a hap-hazard way in regard to this matter. Neither Parliament nor any individual member of Parliament should give their sanction to this scheme unless they are satisfied, either from the opinion of those who can speak authoritatively or from personal investigation, that it is a fair and reasonable scheme which they could recommend capitalists to put their money into.

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that either of the hon. members for Queen's, P.E.I., have added anything to what they have already said in this House with reference to the Chignecto Ship Railway. But I think they would have done themselves more credit, if I may use the expression, if they had not taken this particular time to say what they have said. Both of these hon. gentlemen seem to have a great deal of care for the interests of foreign capitalists who put their money into Canadian enterprises.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. DICKEY. I understood the hon. member to express great fears that our endorsement of this work would result in a loss of credit, and would, therefore, render it difficult for us to raise capital again when we needed it. Well, Sir, if anything could render it impossible for Canadians to get money on the English markets, it would be that the great Dominion of Canada should undertake to plead the statute of limitations. The Dominion of Canada has made a grant in aid of this work; the time within which the work was to be completed was limited to a certain period; men go on and subscribe capital, and put three millions of dollars and a third in hard cash into the work; then comes an unexpected financial crisis, a crisis that has pulled down men of undoubted financial position in London, and paralyzed their enterprise; and because owing to their difficulties, they have allowed the time for the completion of the work to pass, this Government is invited to plead the statute of limitations, and refuse them the money it promised them. This is the means the hon. member for Queen's proposes for raising the credit of Canada in the English money market. I cannot understand what the other hon. member's (Mr. Welsh's) objection to this railway is, whether that it will not carry ships or that it will not pay. I think an old sailor is something like an old lawyer, very conservative, and finds it difficult to get out of the old ruts. The hon. gentleman has been sailing wooden vessels all over the world, and he has come to the conclusion that a steamer cannot do useful work over this railway. The hon. gentleman has been so long away from the practical work of the sea that I am afraid I must take the judgment of others in this matter. The people who put their money into the work were not as visionary or as foolish as the hon. member imagines. He will excuse me saying that I think his judgment in this matter is biased by his political feeling.

Mr. WELSH. No.

Mr. DICKEY. The people who invested their money in this work did so on the advice of thoroughly competent men, who investigated the scheme and satisfied themselves as to its feasibility; and if the hon. member for Queen's sets up his judgment against the engineers who pronounced this scheme to be feasible, I think the House must come to the conclusion that he is biased by political feeling or by something else.

Mr. WELSH. I do not doubt the feasibility of building this railroad, and I did not object to the statements of any of the engineers.

Mr. DICKEY. Then I understand the hon. gentleman's objection to this scheme is that it will be a failure financially, because there will not be enough business for it. Sir, the Dominion of Canada has seen plenty of men like the hon. member for Queen's. I am old enough to remember when the business between Amherst and Halifax was carried on by stage coach; and I remember men like the hon. member who did not believe that the Intercolonial Railway would pay the cost of the axle grease on the wheels; but those men have learned to their sorrow that they were unable to estimate accurately the possibilities of the future development of this country. Now, what is the truth of this matter? This scheme, if the Government pays the subsidy, will be self-supporting for twenty years, and the hon. member for Queen's gets up here, and with the spirit of prophecy upon him, tells you that twenty years from now the conditions of trade in this country will be such that that road will not even then pay interest on the investment. The hon. gentleman undertakes to look a long way into the future, and I think there will be some hesitation in accepting his judgment on that point. I do not pretend to know anything about the trade matter myself. There is this, however, to be said: A weekly line of steamers runs between Charlottetown and Boston and does a good business. That line of steamers would certainly cross that isthmus if it were prac-

and I would like to know from the Minister of Finance, whether the shareholders and the existing mortgage bondholders of that company have already met and, by the proper majorities, approved of the new issue of these bonds?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government has no information on that point.

Mr. EDGAR. The Government has no information on that point, and it has still passed an Order in Council.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government has not extended the time, and that is a piece of information which is antecedent to, and necessary to, any attempt to extend the time.

Mr. EDGAR. I, perhaps, did not understand what the Order in Council meant. I understood it pledged the Government that they would recommend Parliament to extend the time further.

Mr. FOSTER. Under certain conditions.

Mr. EDGAR. What were the conditions?

Mr. FOSTER. I have already stated them. Satisfactory assurances should be given to the Government that the money had been raised for the purpose of finishing the work and that the works were in progress.

Mr. EDGAR. There was no information in the hands of the Government as to whether the shareholders or prior mortgagees have consented, or are likely to consent, to the new issue of bonds.

Mr. FOSTER. That took place after the Order in Council, if it took place at all.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to draw the attention of the House to what seems to be an inconvenient practice, resorted to during this session, of moving the adjournment of the House for the purpose of precipitating a discussion which would more properly come up under our rules and standing orders. On this point Sir Erskine May says:

The adjournment of the House had often been moved in putting questions, but such a course was generally reserved for occasions of urgency, and if otherwise used was met by the House with impatience and disfavour, and by grave remonstrances from the Chair. And, at length, the inconvenience became so serious, that the following standing order was made on the 27th of November, 1882:—

“That no motion for the adjournment of the House shall be made until all the questions on the Notice Paper have been disposed of, and no such motion shall be made before the Orders of the Day or Notices of Motion have been entered upon, except by leave of the House, unless a member rising in his place shall propose to move the adjournment, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and not less than forty members shall thereupon rise in their places to support the motion, or unless if fewer than forty members and not less than ten shall thereupon rise in their places, the House shall, on a division, upon question put forthwith, determine whether such motion shall be made.”

Under our rules of course it is competent for any member to move the adjournment of the

Mr. EDGAR.

House; but I would like to draw the attention of the House to the inconvenience of that practice. Shall the hon. member have leave to withdraw the motion?

Motion withdrawn.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 20) to amend the Act to incorporate the Buffalo and Fort Erie Bridge Company.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Bill (No. 25) respecting the Grand Trunk, Georgian Bay and Lake Erie Railway Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 31) respecting the Central Counties Railway Company.—(Mr. Bain, Soulanges.)

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Western Counties Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to the Yarmouth and Annapolis Railway Company.—(Mr. Flint.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 62) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Equity Insurance Company, and to change the name of the company to the St. Lawrence Insurance Company.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 63) respecting the Canadian Power Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 64) to incorporate the Maritime Manufacturing Company, Limited.—(Mr. Kenny, for Mr. Stairs.)

TWO-ROWED BARLEY.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. Landerkin) asked, What did the Government pay per bushel for the two-rowed barley, and from whom was it purchased?

Mr. FOSTER. It was purchased from Messrs. James Carter & Co., Farmers' Seed Merchants, London. The price paid was £3 sterling per quarter.

DIGBY AND ANNAPOLIS BUOY SERVICE.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Whether it has come to the knowledge of the Government that all the buoys in the Annapolis River and Basin have been carried away by the drift ice this winter? Does the Government intend to take immediate steps towards replacing the same, so as to insure better protection for shipping in that vicinity? Was the last contract for keeping them in position done satisfactorily, and who was the contractor? What was the amount paid? Have any complaints been made about the absence of buoys in the winter months? Have there been any tenders by private parties belonging to Digby or Annapolis? Will the department advertise by public tender for replacing said buoys? Will the party tendering for lowest amount receive the contract; the Government being convinced that the sum is not too large and the contractor giving sufficient bonds for the fulfilment of contract?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The superintendent of lights, who was sent specially to Digby and Annapolis in connection with raising the buoys, has reported that they were placed in safety, and consequently were not carried away by drift ice. The answer to the second question is as follows:—The Government does not intend to place the buoys until next spring, as they would be carried away by drift ice. The answer to the third question is: A complaint was made showing that there was some dissatisfaction respecting the manner in which the buoy service was performed. The contractor was Mr. George E. Corbitt. The answer to the fourth question is: $150 per annum. The answer to the fifth question is: No complaints have been made about the absence of buoys during the winter months. The answer to the sixth question is: Tenders were invited by public notice. Only one was received, which was considered too high, and therefore not accepted. The buoy service was offered to the former contractor for $200, but he declined. He has since made two tenders which have not been accepted, as they were considered too high. The answer to the seventh question is: The department has been negotiating in order to have the buoy service done cheaply and efficiently as possible, and these negotiations are now pending. If the present negotiations are not completed, tenders will not be accepted unless the offer will be for a less amount than those already made. Sufficient bonds will be required in any case, if the contract is awarded.

STE. ANNE DE SOREL WHARF.

Mr. BRUNEAU (Translation) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to complete, this year, the unfinished wharf located opposite the church of the parish of Ste. Anne de Sorel?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) The department never attempted to build a wharf at the place mentioned; it is only an ice-guard, which is now complete by itself.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS.

Mr. DUGAS asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause fresh exploratory geological surveys to be made in the northern portions of the county of Montcalm, with a view to promote the more active development of the various mines and minerals, such as iron and lime?

Mr. DALY. On page 39A of the Summary Report of the Director for 1891, it is stated:

The geology of the whole district, which comprises an area of about 4,000 square miles, in the counties of Berthier, Joliette, Maskinongé, Montcalm, Argenteuil and L'Assomption, has now been worked out, and it is hoped that the map will be ready this spring. Speaking generally, it will extend from Berthier to the east to Trembling Mountain on the west, and from Cypress Lake on the north to Lachute on the south.

The map is being prepared, but it is not considered desirable at present to extend the examination further north in these counties. Neither iron ore nor limestone could be at present profitably worked there, especially as they are abundant in the southern and more accessible portions of these counties, and are already largely worked.

CANADIAN INTERESTS IN HAWAII.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN asked, Whether the Government of Canada has communicated with the Imperial Government calling their attention to the interest Canada has in Hawaii not being absorbed in a foreign power, and requesting the Imperial authorities to safe-guard that interest in so far, at least, as telegraphic and steam-ship communication between Canada and Australasia is concerned?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Government have made no communication on this subject, other than by representations which took place some years ago on the subject of the importance to the British Empire of having points at which telegraphic communication can be assured and facilitated.

I.C.R.—FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. COLTER asked, What rate of freight is charged on the Intercolonial Railway for the carriage of hay and grain between Point Levis and all intermediate points and St. John and Halifax? Is there any distinction made in the rate of freight in the articles between that for local consumption and that for shipment abroad? Has the rate of freight on these articles been increased during the past year?

Mr. HAGGART. In carload lots of 20,000 pounds from Levis and intermediate stations between there and Rivière du Loup to St. John and Halifax, 16 cents per 100 pounds, and from Metapedia to St. John and Halifax, 14 cents per 100 pounds. EXPORT DUTY ON LOGS.

Mr. SPROULE moved :

That it is expedient to reimpose the export duty on pine and spruce logs.

He said : I make this motion for the purpose of endeavouring to convince the Government and the House that it is important at the present time to have the export duty reimposed on pine and spruce logs. This is a question which last year was before the House for some time, and various arguments were adduced for and against placing an export duty on logs. Many hon. members who took part in the debate at that time have since, from information brought to their attention, materially changed their views, and I am glad to know to-day that we have in this House a number of members who opposed this proposition last year, and opposed it I believe conscientiously and honestly, but who since have become fully convinced that it is most important in the interest, at least, of our part of Ontario that the duty on these logs should be reimposed, I might fairly ask what is the reason that we require a reimposition of that duty? We require it in the first place, because, under the present system, one of the important and valuable assets of our country, provided for us by nature, the forests of the country, which have realized for us a very large amount of money from year to year, and which have given employment to tens of thousands of our people, is being destroyed to-day at a very rapid rate, at such a rapid rate that if this process is allowed to continue for many years, that asset will disappear altogether. Now, some hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this House, notably the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) contend that our forests are so extensive that there is no danger of their being destroyed, and, to strengthen that contention, he has presented us with a calculation to which I should like to direct attention for a short time. I regret that the hon. gentleman is not in his place, because I should like him to hear the references I make to his argument. I think that not only the figures he gave, but the deductions he drew from them were most unfair, misleading and incorrect. With regard to the province of Ontario, he told the House that we had, in that province, 197,000 square miles of territory, of which the area under cultivation or occupation was about 20,000 square miles, and less than 10,000 square miles of timber limits had been sold since Confederation, making 30,000 square miles taken up out of the 197,000, leaving a balance of 167,000 square miles remaining unleased and unsold. Now, if the hon. gentleman wished to draw any inference from that statement, so far as I can see, it was this: that, whereas we have been cutting and selling our timber for many years past, up to the present time we have sold the right to cut timber on only 10,000 square miles, and that added to the settled territory amounts to only 20,000 square miles, so that all the balance must represent standing timber to-day, and, therefore, if it is cut only at the rate he specified, it must be a far distant day in the future when there will be any scarcity of timber in the province of Ontario. If the hon. gentleman did not wish his argument to lead to that conclusion, I cannot understand what other conclusion he intended to draw from it. I asked the hon. gentleman at the time whether he made any allowance for the area of water included in the province of Ontario. His reply was: There is water included in the timber limits sold as well as in the rest of the province. I asked him also whether he took into account the very large area covered by rocky and barren lands, where there is no standing timber of any account; but these he left out of his calculations. Now, I have looked into the question of the area of the province for my own satisfaction. I have here Lovell's Gazetteer of British North America, and I find that Ontario has an area of 107,780 square miles, including an area of water of 27,000. There are, at the present time, about 25,000 square miles settled and largely under cultivation; but the thirty-two frontier counties of the province, which were settled many years ago, and which have, for years, been denuded of their timber, have an area of 46,608 square miles, which, added to the 27,000 square miles of water area, makes 73,608 square miles where no timber can be got. Then, taking the quantity of land under lease, I find, not as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said, that it amounts to less than 10,000 square miles, but that it amounts to within a small fraction of 20,000 square miles. Add that to the 73,608, and you get 93,608 square miles. Deduct this from 107,780 square miles, that Ontario contains, and you have 14,172 square miles left, a large proportion of which is water, and a large proportion of which is land on which timber does not grow, and which, therefore, cannot be taken into account when estimating how long our timber resources will last. Now, I find that my statement agrees in the main with information which was given on this subject last winter in the Provincial Legislature at Toronto. The question was raised there whether or not the timber was leaving the country too rapidly, and the Minister of Crown Lands gave some information on that subject which is of value to-day:

In one of the debates towards the closing of the session of the Ontario Legislature last month, in reply to a speech of Mr. Wood, member for Hastings, the Minister of Crown Lands made an important statement regarding the timber wealth of this province. The estimated mileage of unlicensed Crown timber lands be placed as follows: West of the Ottawa river and north-west of the limits sold in 1872, between 80° and 85° west, and extending north to 48th parallel of latitude, 24,000 square miles—

Now, you will see that this practically agrees with my calculation, and remember that he includes part of the disputed territory——between the Ottawa agency and berths sold in 1881, 540 square miles.

—640 square miles was sold only a few months ago, and, consequently, that must be left out of the calculation—

Averaging timber on this area at 1,000,000 feet to the mile, there were 24,000,000,000 feet. The late Col. Dennis estimated the timber in the disputed territory at 26,000,000,000, making a total of 50,000,000,000 feet. There were three years ago under license in Ontario about 19,000 square miles—

—although the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), to suit his purpose, made it less than 10,000——on which there was supposed to be 10,000,000,000 feet, which made a grand total of over 60,000,000,000 feet of timber still uncut in the possession of the province.

Now, I would like to draw attention to another subject of importance at the present time. What is the great source of drain upon our timber? It is the manufacture of lumber by the lumbermen of the western states in addition to the manufacture of our own lumbermen at home. According to his calculation, the Minister of Crown Lands contends that, including the disputed territory, where the timber resources seem to be largely mythical, there is only 60,000 million feet of timber remaining in the province, and of that the Ontario Government propose to reserve a portion which they will not allow to be cut. I find that, last year, lumbermen from the states of Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin cut not less than 8,934,000,000 feet at that rate. How long would it take those parties who are denuding our territories so rapidly and wasting and destroying our lumber to such an extent, to use up all our timber, in the event of their being allowed continued free access to our country? At the rate they have been going, it would only require a little over five years to clean out every stick of timber we have in that territory, according to the estimate of the Minister of Crown Lands in the province of Ontario. Yet we are told by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that we have timber there sufficient to last for generations to come, and that therefore the present generation need not concern itself about the depletion of forests in that country. So much for the contention of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). And I must say, on examining his contention critically, I have never seen an argument presented to this House, backed up with such unreliable figures as those given by the hon. gentleman. On the point as to whether our timber is not disappearing too rapidly, let me quote the "Canadian Lumberman" of the month of November last. Speaking with regard to the sales made by the Ontario Government, the "Lumberman" has the following article:—

In another column will be found a detailed account of the timber limits sold by the Ontario Government on the 13th ult. As in every former instance in which the Government have put stumpage up for auction, the amount of money realized exceeded the Government's expectations. Looked at from this point of view the sale was no doubt a great success, in the same way that each of the former sales was, at the time it was held, considered a success; but as each of the former sales has been so eclipsed in the matter of prices by the sale succeeding it as entirely to reverse this appearance, it is probable that the same will be the case again, and that the apparently large prices of to-day will look quite small in the near future.

Indeed, we look for this result with more certainty now than on former occasions for the reason that our pine timber resources, which a few years ago seemed so great that to attempt an accurate estimate of them was deemed too difficult an undertaking, have since then become reduced to such small proportions that the end of the whole supply in both Canada and the United States is now plainly within view.

Yet we are told by the hon. member for
Mr. SPROULE.

North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that we have a supply to last us for centuries.

While the United States Government has from time to time had estimates made of its total timber resources, nothing of the kind that we know of has ever been done on the part of the Dominion or Provincial Governments; at least, if any such statistics have been prepared their publication has been so limited, that we have never seen them. Now, however, as far as pine is concerned, there is scarcely any need of such action on the part of the Government, for the lumbermen have pierced so nearly through our pine forests with their operations that they have not only made short work of the estimating as far as they have gone, but have reached the point where daylight, so to speak, can be plainly seen showing through from the far side. In the province of Ontario, while the streams running into the Ottawa on the east have been operated up to their sources by the lumbermen of that district, these have been met at the summit by the western men following up the streams leading into the Georgian Bay. At the same time both Canadians and Americans have been busy on the north shore.

The Crown Lands Department has at this sale disposed of the last timber berths remaining to the Government in all this territory to a distance of some three or four miles north of Lake Nipissing. And not only is the whole of this section of country now in the hands of the operators, but it has been, with the exception of the last sold, very largely cut off: so much so that we do not believe there is now left 5 per cent of the pine timber which once stood upon it. To the north of this there is left nothing more than what may be termed the fringe of our once great pinery, and a very straggling fringe it is, containing little or no timber equal in size and quality to what has been cut, and only a small proportion of pine timber of any kind.

The pine is there nearing the northern limit of its growth, is decreasing in size, quality and quantity, and the greater part of the country is quite destitute of it. Of the once great Ontario pinery we feel safe in saying not 10 per cent remains.

The province of Quebec is still more depleted, and the great pine states of the Union, Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota with an annual output to date of some 7,000,000,000 feet, have, we understand, scarcely got twice that quantity left now.

At the sales which took place, which was referred to in this article, 637 square miles of limits were sold. Before that 19,000 square miles were under lease, a large portion of which was denuded of its forests. That sale realized $2,308,000, an amount which surprised many compared with the previous sales. What was the secret of this large amount being paid and what did it indicate? It indicated the growing scarcity of pine timber, not only in our country, but in the United States, and its increased value on that account. Pine timber has been going up so rapidly in value on the other side that men were able to pay to-day $550,000 for limits, which a few years ago sold for $73,000. This shows most plainly that our timber is being squandered far too rapidly. Then, again, the hon. member for North Norfolk holds that so plentiful is timber on the other side, that the Americans do not need ours. I have here some letters from the American trade written to the "Lumberman," which tell a different story. I take the last one, a letter to the "Canadian Lumberman" from Saginaw:

Your readers will be interested in various figures concerning American purchases of Canadian timber, that are passing current in different parts of the state. I give them as they come to me from a variety of sources without entering into a discussion of their import, if any special import or significance is to be attached to them.

The Bay City correspondent of a Chicago lumber journal, controverting the oft-repeated story that Michigan mills would soon come to a standstill for the want of logs to saw, has told us quite recently that "within the past year arrangements have been perfected whereby a vast quantity of timber, not tributary to the Saginaw River, is to be brought here to be manufactured," and that this includes deals that will "transfer 3,000,000,000 feet of Canadian timber to this river to be manufactured, a supply equal to a cut of 500,000,000 feet annually for six years." McKeon & Glover, a Bay City firm, and who rank among the largest loggers in the country, say that they banked 33,000,000 feet of logs in Georgian Bay waters last winter, and 25,000,000 feet of these will come to Saginaw. Their estimate is that 130,000,000 feet of Canada logs will come to the Saginaw river this season.

The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), when it was stated that 200,000,000 of feet had crossed the waters of Lake Huron and Georgian Bay last year, said that it was a most exaggerated statement, and one not founded on fact. But here is one of their own men whose statement shows that the estimate of 130,000,000 of feet of logs will go to the Saginaw River alone. I may say that there are four or five places in the state of Michigan to which Canadian logs are being taken, Saginaw, Alpena, Sheboygan and Tawas. Each of these places draws its own quantity of logs, and this gentleman is speaking only of the quantity which goes to the Saginaw River—130,000,000 of feet—and we know that very large quantities were sent to the other places, and if you add to them what is known to have gone to Saginaw, I think it will be agreed that the estimate was below the mark instead of above it :

Isaac Bearinger, of Silby & Bearinger, another Michigan concern, says that his firm owns $200,000 worth of logs in the Georgian Bay region. Other interests are represented by William Peters, who owns a mill at Bay City, and is believed last year to have purchased over 300,000,000 feet of Canada pine ; C. K. Eddy & Son own 400,000,000 feet there ; the Spanish River Lumber Co., of which E. T. Carrington, of Bay City, is president, owns over 200,000,000 feet ; J. W. Howry & Son have been operating in your territories for some years ; the Saginaw Lumber and Salt Company and the Emery Lumber Company are extensive operators ; the Messrs. Bliss, McClure and others, individually and collectively, are said to control not less than 1,500,000,000 feet of Canadian timber. These cases are outside of the two important transfers of the Dodge estate and Pattee & Perley, to United States capitalists, and mentioned in the Lumberman last month, and which represented investments, respectively, of $750,000 and $800,000.

Now this will give an idea of the quantities of our timber being taken over to be manufactured in the United States. I have here a computation made by a lumberman in the Georgian Bay, who has been extensively engaged in the business for many years, and one who professes to be tolerably well posted as to what is going on in the lumber business. This is from the "Canada Lumberman :"

HURON.

James Moiles is one of the firm of Moiles Bros., lumbermen, whose mills are located at St. John's Island, in the north channel, Georgian Bay. Mr. Moiles has lumbered all over Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota and his opinions are worth listening to. He says : " Few people understand the extent to which the business of exporting logs from Canada has attained. While the export duties were in force Saginaw lumbermen were towing logs from the American side of Lake Superior as far west as Marquette and from Green Bay in Lake Michigan. These points are both further from Saginaw Bay than Georgian Bay is. The Menominee district on Green Bay is exhausted, and Saginaw dealers are consequently obliged to look to Lake Superior and Canada for their supplies.

The extent to which Canada is being drawn upon is shown by these figures : The Saginaw Lumber Company is putting in over 20,000,000 feet in the Spanish River ; Barringer, 15,000,000 ; Spanish River Lumber Company, for Folsom & Arnold, at Bay City, 17,000,000 ; Nelson, for his Cheboygan mill, 8,000,000 ; Park, Woods & Company, for AuSable, Mich., 15,000,000, and E. Hall, of Detroit, for his Bay City mill, 16,000,000. On the Mississauga River, Gilchrist, of Alpena, has let contracts for 80,000,000 to stock his mill, and Howry & Sons will take out 25,000,000. On the French River and Wahapite, there are heavy operators. The Emery Lumber Company are taking out over 50,000,000 for Tawas and Bay City ; Hart & Fisher are going to get out all the logs they can this winter, and next summer they will take out over 50,000,000 feet ; Captain Bliss will take from French River for his Saginaw mill 16,000,000, and the Moore Lumber Company, about 10,000,000. Further east, Wm. Peters will take out 17,000,000, and Merrill & Ring, about 12,000,000.

All these figures represent the quantity of logs being taken from Canadian limits to furnish work for American mills. But even this is not all, as I have not included the large quantity taken out by Canadian jobbers for American dealers. A prominent operator told a Saginaw audience not long ago that they would make the waves of Lake Huron smooth by the enormous rafts of Canadian pine towed over them, and the figures given justify the boast. A conservative estimate places the export of logs for the coming season at 400,000,000 feet, and the business has only fairly started.

And yet the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that the estimate that 400,000,000 feet will be taken across is an exaggeration that cannot be justified by any figures or by any knowledge we have at this time. I see, in addition to this, that the Saginaw Salt and Lumber Company has purchased 40,000,000 feet of selected logs from the Merrill-Ring Company to be cut on the Georgian Bay limits of this company. This shows the extent to which our forests in the Georgian Bay district are being depleted, and yet we are told that we should remain idle and allow this thing to go on, allow the Americans to come, almost as pirates, and take the timber from our country, timber that not only gives employment to our people and also brings back money to our people and spreads it abroad among workers in many other lines, a very important matter at this time. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) referred, in his own peculiar style of criticism, to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) because he dared to say anything that disagrees with the interests of the hon. gentleman on this subject. I have here a few extracts from what he said and they show to what extent the hon. gentleman will go when his own interest is at stake or when some interest is at stake out of which he can possibly make some money. Speaking of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), he says :

The doctor knows more about pills than he does about that matter.

He goes on to repeat that two or three times, only in different language. I would like to tell the hon. member (Mr. Charlton), if he was here, that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) was sent here, not for the purpose of making up or administering pills, but for the purpose of looking after the interests of his own constituency as well as the wants of the people at large. And if the member for East Grey had the opportunity to administer pills to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that hon. member would think that the hon. member for East Grey knows more than he thinks he does about pills and about lumber, too. Then he says :

I will give him credit for sincerity, but I do not know how much common sense I would consider he possessed in this matter.

He goes on :

The lumber interests is a dangerous thing for medical men to trifle with. They had better confine themselves to their own business. The lumbermen who have hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in their business, prefer to attend to it themselves.

I agree with my hon. friend. The lumbermen do like to attend to their own business, but it happens that the interests of the lumbermen is sometimes also the interest of the Canadian farmer, sometimes the interest of the Canadian commercial men, and sometimes the interest of men in various lines who are practically outside the pale of lumbering operations. I would like to tell the hon. gentleman that if a comparison was drawn between the weight that should be attached to arguments of hon. gentlemen in this House who have no connection with the lumbering business, but are only interested in looking after the interests of their own constituents, or the interests of the people of Canada, and the arguments on the other side advanced by men who are engaged in lumbering business, as the hon. member for North Norfolk has been for the last quarter of a century, nearly, engaged in it not only to the detriment of Canada, but coming here almost like pirates and swooping down upon the forests of Ontario, and taking off the logs to be manufactured over in Tonawanda, in the State of New York, where he is employing not only his own capital, but the capital of Americans who are engaged in the business with his brother there—as between these two classes of men, I would like to ask the people of Ontario to whose arguments they would attach the most weight. I would like to ask them whose arguments ought to have the most effect, those of men who are making money directly out of lumbering operations like the hon. gentleman that would be affected if the export duty was put on, or the arguments of men who have no connection with the business whatever, but are speaking from personal knowledge with regard to the injurious effects of the present system upon the people of their section of the country. I think the people of Ontario will agree that the men who have no interest in it are more likely to give an unprejudiced opinion, and they should give more weight to the arguments of such men than to those of men who are engaged in the industry in the United States, as the hon. member for North Norfolk has been for nearly twenty-five years. I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman advances the argument he does, because he has his mill over in Tonawanda, and the laws of the United States will not allow Canadians to go over and work in that mill, nor will allow Canadian lumbermen to send their lumber to that market, if it is cut in Canada, and enjoy the advantages of the American market without the payment of $1 a thousand duty upon lumber when it goes into that country, when he takes the logs there, and he has the advantages of coming into our Canadian forests and taking away our pine, the manufacture of which would give employment to Canadians at home, instead of which he takes it over there and gives employment to Americans in the state of New York. He has all these advantages, and therefore I do not wonder that he invariably argues in favour of keeping off that export duty put upon pine a few years ago. That is the position the hon. gentleman occupies, and the country should know it, and knowing it people will be able to estimate how much importance should be attached to his arguments when he speaks upon this question. Unfortunately he has a habit of speaking very strongly upon questions where his own self-interests are involved. We found him upon the same line with regard to reciprocal wrecking and towing. Where he had towing plant in Canadian waters he was very much against it, because competition from the American side would do him an injury. Now he is much against imposing an export duty, because if it was imposed, he would not have the freedom of our forests to supply his mills on the other side, and to give employment to men over there. Now, let us see how much timber is being cut in our country year by year. I find at the present time, according to an estimate made by a gentleman who was in the lumbering business, and who is a good authority, that there will be cut this season in the Ottawa valley and its tributaries about 428,000,000 feet of lumber. Now, there are in the woods to-day, engaged in the operation of getting out these logs, about 7,000 men; the getting out of these logs and running them down the streams will employ the 7,000 men for a period of six months. I find, according to this estimate, that there has been taken out of the western part of our province about 450,000,000 feet, or a little more than is being taken out in the eastern part, along the tributaries of the Ottawa. Now, if 7,000 men are employed to get logs out of the woods and prepare them for the mills, it is estimated that it will take about the same number of men to handle the lumber when it is being cut in the mills, to pile it, and afterwards take it to market. If that is correct, and I am giving the estimate of a lumberman who has been in the business for many years, you can readily understand how important it is to Ontario that we should obtain employment for 7,000 men in the Georgian Bay district during the six months of the summer season, instead of allowing our logs to go over into Michigan to give employment to men at Alpena, at Bay City, at Green Bay, in Michigan, and at Tonawanda, in New York. It is said that they will pay out for the labour of these men about $1,000,000 for the six months. Now, if they pay out $1,000,000, and the same number of men are employed, they will pay out about the same rate for the second six months; so I say it is taking away $1,000,000 from Canada to be spent in the United States, which would otherwise be spent in Ontario if this lumber was worked up here and not in the state of Michigan. I give this as an evidence of how fast our territory has been depleted of its valuable lumber assets, taking out over 800,000,000 feet of lumber and timber from the east and the west of the province of Ontario alone. Then you will readily understand how far we are justified in interfering with a business that ought to be kept for our own people; one can readily see what it means to the Georgian Bay district, when it is considered that there is as much lumber going out in the shape of logs from that district as is being cut into lumber in the Ottawa valley and its tributaries. I have here a list of the lumbermen who are engaged in the Ottawa valley cutting lumber, and the estimate that is given for their output for the coming year, is as follows:—

J. R. Booth	75,000,000
Bronson and Weston	45,000,000
Perley and Pattee	40,000,000
Buell, Orr and Hurdman	35,000,000
McClymont	13,500,000
W. Mason and Son	10,000,000
McLachlin Bros., Arnprior	45,000,000
Gilmour and Hughson, Ironsides	30,000,000
W. C. Edwards, Rockland	40,000,000
Gillies and Co., Braeside	16,000,000
J. McLaren, Buckingham	15,000,000
Pembroke Lumber Co.	12,000,000
Canada Lumber Co., Carleton Place	25,000,000

R. & W. Conroy, Deschene ..	10,000,000
McCool Bros., Mattawa	8,000,000
McCracken and Co., Templeton	6,000,000
McLellan, Casselman	2,500,000

Total number feet of lumber 428,000,000

Now, these men, it is said, are taking out about 428,000,000 feet, and, as I have said already, it is estimated that there would be from 400,000,000 to 450,000,000 feet taken out around the Georgian Bay, in the shape of saw-logs, nearly all of which will be taken over to the United States to be sawn into lumber. Now, if we employ 7,000 men in these mills for six months of the summer season, to manufacture this lumber and to freight it to market. So you can imagine what injustice is done to the province of Ontario around Georgian Bay, where that number of men are deprived of the employment that they have in the Ottawa valley by virtue of the fact that the lumber is manufactured in our midst. I would like to ask the people of Ottawa and the people of Hull, if they stopped the operation of these mills to-day and stopped cutting this 428,000,000 feet of lumber, and suppose every one of these men either went idle or were sent down to Burlington, in the state of Vermont, where the lumber is shipped, and got employment there—I ask them to realize to what extent it would paralyze trade and commerce here in the city of Ottawa and in Hull and in the surrounding towns and villages, if these men were taken away. Yet that is what has been done in the province of Ontario around the Georgian Bay, by virtue of the policy that allows this lumber to be taken out in saw-logs, instead of being manufactured in our own country. Any hon. gentleman who understands the situation, must see for himself how it would paralyze trade in every line, if we took away employment that is being given to the labourers in these mills to-day in and around Ottawa. Yet that is exactly what is done up in the Georgian Bay district. We would have 7,000 men who might be employed during the summer season in these mills, who at present will not get a day's work, on account of allowing the Americans to take out our timber, because we do not put an export duty upon logs going out of the country. Now, the hon. member said we had no reason to complain, because they bring in as many logs from the United States into Canada as we send out. The hon. gentleman, as I said a moment ago, is unreliable in his figures. The hon. gentleman professed to get his figures from the Trade and Navigation Returns. I have taken the trouble to look up those returns, and I have the statistics before me, and I find they are entirely different from the figures given from the hon. gentleman. He said:

In the period extending from 1884 to 1890, the value of our export of logs was $3,289,000, and the value of our imports of logs was $8,468,000, and the balance of our imports in excess of our export of logs during that period was $5,179,000.

He proceeded to say :

If we have imported over $5,000,000 worth more than we have exported, why should these hon. gentlemen make a row about it? If we imported last year $150,000 worth more than we exported, what reason was there for that statement made by the Finance Minister, which is unsettling one of the most important industries of the country?

He said further :

According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, down to the 30th June, 1892, our export of logs was to the value of $798,000.

I find that instead of the figures being $798,000 they are $1,044,134. The hon. gentleman further said :

And our imports, including an estimate based upon the average of several years past, into New Brunswick, added to the imports given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, amounted to the value of $951,000, or, in other words, we imported last year $150,000 worth of logs in excess of the amount we exported.

Instead of the imports being $951,000, they only amounted to the value of $232,723. There is the difference between the correct figures from the Trade and Navigation Returns and those given by the hon. gentleman said to be from those returns from which he professed to quote. I will now institute a comparison. I take 1889. - We exported logs to the value of $444,805, and we imported logs to the value of $358,805. In 1890 we exported logs to the value of $615,194, while we brought in logs to the value of $256,100. Then the export duty was removed. What is the result? Next year we imported the value of $615,320, of which $412,224 worth came to Manitoba, and we exported the value of $859,898. In 1892 we exported the value of $1,044,134, and brought in only the value of $232,723. These are the figures contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns. But the hon. gentleman says: If we make a calculation based on what is taken out of New Brunswick, the result is what I have given. What is the history of the logs taken out of New Brunswick? It must be remembered that the hon. gentleman used these figures last year and again this year. They were intended to mislead the House and the country into the belief that we brought as many logs from the United States free of export duty as we sent to the United States. The history of the New Brunswick matter was simply this: According to the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1846, the timber in the state of Maine, along the tributaries of the St. John River, was allowed to be brought into Canada, because it must be floated down the river to reach the markets of the world; and it is brought down by the Americans and manufactured at the mouth of the river and shipped to other countries. That is the privilege they enjoy. The third article of the treaty refers to this privilege :

That all the produce of the forest in logs, lumber, timber, boards, staves or shingles, or of agriculture, not being manufactured, grown on any of these parts of the state of Maine watered by the River St. John or its tributaries, shall have free access into and through the said river and its said tributaries, having their source within the state of Maine, to and from the seaport at the mouth of the said River St. John, and to and around the falls of said river, either by boats, rafts or other conveyance; that when within the province of New Brunswick the said produce shall be dealt with as if it were the produce of the said province.

The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) wished to lead to this inference, that because the timber is brought into the province of New Brunswick the people of Canada receive the advantage of the employment given in manufacturing the lumber, and, therefore, it is equivalent to their giving employment to Americans in connection with the manufacture of a similar quantity of lumber brought in logs from this side. What I claim to be unfair is this: that the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that the American regulations do not allow a single Canadian labourer to be employed in connection with the manufacture of this lumber in New Brunswick. Why? Because if it were manufactured by Canadians, it would be subject to the United States duty, and the United States make their Customs regulations such that no Canadian can be employed at that work. It is cut by Americans, towed by Americans and brought down the river by them, and the only advantage I can see that Canada enjoys is the sawdust left in the country after the lumber has been taken away. Why is it that the Americans will not allow the Canadians to cut it? The United States Government require that none but American citizens shall be employed, even when the logs are sawn in Canada, to entitle the lumber to free entry into the United States. The clause in the United States' Customs regulations reads as follows :—

The products of the forests of the state of Maine, upon the St. John River and its tributaries, owned by American citizens, and sawed or hewn in the province of New Brunswick by American citizens, the same being unmanufactured, in whole or in part, which is now admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty, shall continue to be so admitted under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time prescribe.

Under that regulation we as Canadians obtained no advantage from the importation and manufacture of logs in Canada, and the hon. gentleman, using that argument and including those figures in the quantity of lumber brought into this country, desired the inference to be drawn that I have indicated. His statement was calculated to mislead the people of this country, and I believe it was intended to mislead hon. members of this House, and I regret that an hon. gentleman of his standing and of his great parliamentary experience should have used such an unfair argument for the purpose of misleading the people in regard to this particular subject. We must, therefore, leave these figures relating to New Brunswick out of the consideration of the question, and we have the result I have already given, that the Americans took over $1,000,000 worth of Canadian logs last year, while we imported logs to the value of only $232,000. The trade is increasing very rapidly each year. What is the evil done by reason of allowing these logs to be taken from Canada? It is the means of giving the Americans employment, which should be furnished to our people at home. The timber taken out of the Georgian Bay district has been the means of throwing thousands of people out of employment and furnishing employment to the people of Michigan, Wisconsin and New York, thus leaving our mills idle, instead of being fully employed as was the case formerly. Some people may say that our mills are employed to-day to their fullest capacity. That is not the case. The depletion of our forests prevents the settlement of the country. Our settlements are largely attributable to mills springing up in the lumber districts, in the Parry Sound and McKellar districts and around Georgian Bay, where mills were established and settlement rapidly followed, the farmers supplying the lumbermen with food products, the farmers, on the other hand, obtaining employment in lumbering operations during a portion of the year. When the timber has been cut down and rafted away in the log, there is no occasion for settlement taking place, because so soon as the logs are thrown into the water the labour is done, for they are towed over to Michigan, to the mills there. This system further destroys our market for flour, beef, pork, eggs, oats, hay, sleighs, harness, axes and other articles. Heretofore, when lumber was manufactured in the country, one of the best markets in the fall and summer was the Georgian Bay lumbering district. Our commercial men gathered beef and pork, butter, eggs, flour, hay and oats, and sent them up to the lumbering camps. They were kept supplied there not only during the winter, but during the summer, and their consumption afforded us a valuable market every year. Now, that market is largely destroyed in consequence of the Americans coming in and bringing their provisions with them. Some may say that they do not bring their provisions with them. To show that they do, I will read some clippings from American papers contained in a letter from Michigan to the "Canada Lumberman," and the instances here given may be added to from month to month, because in almost every issue of the "Lumberman" you will find similar cases cited:

The statement is made that 300 Alpena woodsmen will put in work in the Georgian Bay district this winter for Albert Pack, who, as you know, was one of the largest purchasers at the Ontario Government sale of 13th inst.

Culler & Savage, of Spring Lake, are owners of about 200,000,000 of pine stumpage along the Spanish River in Ontario, and will begin operating this season with one camp and will tow the logs to Cheboygan to be manufactured.

The labour market has seldom been in a better condition. The demand for experienced labour of all kinds for work in the woods is brisk, and an insufficient number of men are offering their services. Wages are ranging from $18 to $28.

Merrill, Ring & Co. have shipped a large cargo of lumber utensils to be used in their logging operations in your country. Among the stuff are forty logging sleighs made by a local manufacturer, on which the duty of course will be a considerable item.

Mr. W. C. Simonson, land-looker for A. Pack, who had been over in Canada, and who spent some time in the camps in the Spanish River country, arrived home Saturday night. He reports everything in that vicinity as moving along nicely, and says that in the three camps there for Alpena parties there are about 120 Alpena men, all enjoying the best of health. They will put in there this season about twenty millions, which will be rafted to this city for sawing.

This shows that the Americans are giving to their own people employment which should be given to our people. I do not object to these men coming here and getting employment, so long as there is a demand for their labour; but I do object to Americans being allowed to cut down that timber and making employment to cease as soon as that timber is thrown into the water, so that our Canadians are not employed during the summer, and if they go to Michigan to help cut the timber taken away from their own country, they are sent back by the Alien Labour law. The result is that any of our people who wish to go there to find employment must become citizens of that country before they can get the employment that they ought to have at home. I believe the Ontario Government should make it a condition of sale of timber limits, that every stick of timber cut upon them should be manufactured in Ontario. If they did that, they would prevent these logs being taken out of Canada. Another way in which this injures us is that it cuts off the supply of lumber and lath for building purposes to the people of the Georgian Bay district. A few years ago, being engaged in building operations, I got most of my pine lumber from the Parry Sound district, and was able to lay down cull lumber at $4 a thousand. A few years ago large quantities of this lumber were used by people in the northern district of the province. At the same time I could get pine laths at $1.35 a thousand. What is the difference to-day? The worst cull lumber cannot be got in that district for less than $9.25 a thousand, and laths cost $2.50 per thousand. You can understand what this means to the people of that section, who are building largely from year to year, and who are obliged to depend on the Georgian Bay district largely for a supply of their pine lumber and lath. Mr. Foster, of Owen Sound, who had, a few years ago, several tugs, employing from forty to seventy-five men engaged in freighting lumber, does not tug a pound of this freight to-day, and he has been obliged to turn his attention to buying hardwood lumber for the United States market. I say that the farmers and the people of the villages of that district are suffering seriously on account of the logs being taken to the United States instead of being cut in the country. If it were cut in Canada the suitable lumber for United States markets would still be sent to the United States and used there, but there would be a balance left for the use of the people living in the district. Then, it destroys the towns and villages of our country. The hon. member for North Norfolk says that the mills on the Georgian Bay are fully employed. I wonder if he thought of Midland, where there are four large mills lying idle which have not cut a board of lumber in the last two or three years, since the export duty was removed. Hon. gentlemen say that it is not on that account, but the gentlemen who own the mills say that it is. Not only are these mills lying idle, but over 300 men are thrown out of employment, and every hon. gentleman can understand what that means to the town. And all this is the result of taking the export duty off logs, which, but for that, would have been manufactured into lumber in Canada instead of in the United States. Then, it takes freight away from Canadians. We have our railways, our highways of commerce, and the men who own vessels, and it has taken employment from them and given it to Americans, because they bring over their own small tugs to tow away the rafts of logs, and take them to Alpena, Saginaw, Bay City, Cheboygan, and Tonawanda, where the hon. member for North Norfolk is engaged in business. You give the freighting to foreigners instead of keeping it for our own people. Last, but not least, it is destroying the fisheries of our country. It is a fact that the fishermen have recognized for a length of time, that the fisheries of the Georgian Bay are being destroyed, largely by the hauling of these great rafts of pine through the water. In stormy weather the agitation caused by the undulation of the waves causes the logs to rub together, and so the bark is rubbed off and settles down in large quantities to the bottom of the lake. Then the wash of the waters carries that towards the shore and it comes in contact with the nets of the fishermen and covers the ground where the fish are in the habit of spawning, compelling the fish to leave, and, according to fishermen, it is thus doing an immense injury, which they cannot estimate, to the fisheries of Lakes Huron and Superior and Georgian Bay. All this damage results from taking across the logs that ought to be cut in Canada. These are some of the reasons for putting on an extra duty and encouraging the sawing of these logs at home. The cardinal principle of the National Policy is the using in our own country of the raw material at our hands, so as to give employment to Canadian labour; but in this instance we are doing the very reverse. We are sending away the raw material, and thus providing labour for Americans instead of for Canadians. It may be said that the trees being cut down in Canada, the money in getting the logs out is spent here. That however, is only a portion of the expense, and apart from that, we sustain great loss from the operations as carried on now. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said that none but those who had selfish interests at stake are in favour of the export duty. Does the hon. gentleman place in that category the Hon. Mr. Joly, of Quebec? I have here a speech of his on this question, and he owns, I am told, 100 square miles of limits in Canada. Mr. Joly says:

I cannot understand why there should be any doubt as to the wisdom of imposing an export duty on our logs. Many of those, who, with the hope of promoting their personal interest, advocated at one time its removal, are now in favour of its reimposition. But let us look at the question as it affects our country at large. In giving us our forest, Providence has given us a source of wealth which it is our duty to husband carefully and to turn to the best account. Is it possible that we Canadians should have so little manliness left as to tell our neighbours: "Come, cut down our trees, take them away, manufacture them at home and reap the golden harvest. We don't want it. We have got work enough to occupy us here." What would have become of England if she had invited the world to come and take away her coals and iron to manufacture them abroad? We ought to treasure our forests, but how much more ought we to treasure the youth of our country, leaving us every year by thousands to seek work in the United States. Shall we force those who still remain with us to leave us too by sending to our neighbours the raw material, the logs, in the manufacturing of which we can procure work for so many? Send away our logs to the States and our mill-hands must follow them.

That is exactly what is taking place in Ontario and other parts of the Dominion to-day. A great change of opinion has taken place on this question since last year. I found last year that nearly all the representatives of the Georgian Bay district were against the reimposition of the duty. Is that the case to-day? I am sorry that our debate is so arranged to-day that many will be prevented from speaking on this motion, who, I understand, intended to support it. I find that, not only have county councils unanimously passed resolutions advising the Government to reimpose the duty, but town and municipal councils have moved in the same direction, and the representatives from the district chiefly interested are almost unanimous to-day in favour of my motion. I regretted last year that the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) could not see his way clear to support the reimposition of the duty, but I am satisfied that to-day he is thoroughly convinced of its necessity, judging by the speech the hon. gentleman made the other night. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) is, I believe, also in favour of it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. No.

Mr. SPROULE. I regret very much that he is not, and I know that the hon. gentleman's own friends in the constituency he represents, regret it. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is, I think, with us, and if he were here, would say so. My hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Mason) is, I believe, also with us, and so is my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), as well as many other hon. gentlemen from different parts of the province. When such a rapid change has taken place in the sentiments of the representatives of the people, it must be clear to the Minister of Finance and his colleagues that there must be some substantial reason behind this change, and the facts and figures I have given show how injurious the free export is to the people of Ontario. We are told that if we impose a duty, the Americans will raise their tariff on lumber. Well, whether they do so or not, they must have our lumber, as the figures I have given indicate. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said that the Americans are substituting other woods for our pine timber; he said that they can buy white wood to-day at $32 per thousand feet, when they have to pay $45 per thousand feet for pine, and that consequently they are using white wood instead. Is not that the best evidence that our pine is getting scarce; and, as Canada is the nearest point available to the Americans for their supply of pine, they must get it from us, whether in the shape of sawn lumber or logs. When a Bill was brought before the American Congress asking that the duty be taken off lumber, the American lumbermen asked Mr. Bryan, of Nebraska, the introducer of the Bill, what it was he wanted. He said: I want free Canadian lumber. And they replied: Well, Mr. Bryan, if that is what you are after, we can soon give you all the free Canadian lumber you want, because we own the timber in Canada and there is no duty on saw-logs. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said that if we put a duty on the logs, we will prevent the Americans getting their logs from our side, and they will raise the duty on our lumber. The very reverse is the case. While the general drift of the McKinley Bill was to raise the duty on everything from Canada, there was one notable exception, and that was lumber, which was reduced from $2 to $1. They must have our lumber, and are in favour of admitting it free. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) then said that if we allow the export of logs to continue free, Americans will come across and put up their mills in Canada. I think the very reverse will be the case, because as long as they can get logs over free they will keep their mills where they are. Their only object in raising the duty on our lumber, if we imposed an export duty on logs, would be to protect their own mills, and prevent their own people from putting up mills and sawing the logs on the Canadian side. To contend, as does the hon. member for North Norfolk, that if we allow the Americans the privilege of taking logs across free, and give that privilege stability, they will likely build their mills in Canada, is ridiculous. What do the American people say? Mr. Weston, of Michigan, is reported to have said:

The Saginaw mills are running out of stock and they are looking to Georgian Bay for Canadian logs to cross the Huron Lake and keep their mills and men at work.

But he has answered: Oh, you cannot get the logs from over there free. Another prominent lumberman says: Do you think the Canadians would be fools enough to let you take their logs out of the country free? That would be robbing them of their raw material, and they would not let you rob them of their logs any more than we would, and no American would venture to propose such a thing. Yet we are letting them do it. They are robbing us of one of the assets of our country and taking the material over there to give employment to their own men, to keep their mills operating with this material which should be used to keep our own mills working. I hope the Government will, at the earliest possible date, reimpose the duty upon pine and spruce logs. The Americans give us little or no consideration. They charge us a dollar a thousand duty on pine lumber and yet have the privilege of coming in and taking logs from us free. If we take elm or other kinds of lumber over they charge us a heavy duty; they have reduced the duty only on one or two lines in return for the privilege which we are giving them. We had better save our own assets, we had better give employment to our own people, we had better keep the money spent in giving employment to the people on the other side of the line. Reimpose the export duty and make it high enough to compel the manufacture of the logs in Canada instead of in the state of Michigan and the state of New York, as is the case to-day.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is almost about six o'clock and it is hardly worth while to continue the discussion now, but I hope on another occasion to have an opportunity to state the reasons why I shall vote against the motion. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I must confess, Sir, that I approach this question with a good deal of diffidence, if not embarrassment. The question has been discussed for the past fifteen years, and I regret to see that there is so great a divergence of opinion between parties on both sides of the House with respect to it. My hon. friend, the member for Gleggarry (Mr. McLennan) ably discussed this question a few nights ago. He proved conclusively that there was a tidal wave of population in all parts of this Dominion moving from the rural districts into the cities. He also proved conclusively that the same movement of population was to be seen in the United States. He proved also that the movement of population from the rural districts into the cities in the United States was larger in proportion to population than it was in Canada. I might go further and say that the movement of population from the rural districts does not respect the line which separates Canada from the United States. The movement is general. Sir, all over British North America. The youth in the agricultural districts who, by training and education qualify themselves to prosecute their vocation in cities, refuse to remain any longer in agricultural sections. The sons of farmers find that the farms are not sufficiently large to enable them all to remain upon those farms, and, as a general thing, when there are a number of sons living on a farm of say one or two hundred acres, all, possibly excepting one, decide at an early age that they will pursue some other business for a living. There is no man with any ordinary common sense who will come to the conclusion that because three or four sons leave the farm, the one who remains at home is worse off than if the others had remained with him. So that a decrease in the population in the rural districts is not by any means a sign that the people are not well off, that the people who remain at home are not better off than they would be if the rest of the family had remained with them. The tidal wave which moves from the rural districts into these cities generally moves in the direction of the larger cities and, before they decide on their departure from their homes, those who decide to go generally ascertain those cities in which they are most likely to find employment. In this way a large number of the emigrants from Canada to the United States may be accounted for, and it is idle to say that because such an exodus exists from the rural districts into the cities, therefore the agricultural districts are being ruined. The attention of the House has been already called to the fact that a large number of native-born British Americans live on the other side of the line. It is a fact which must be seriously considered. There is no one on either side of the House who can deny but an extraordinary number of native-born Canadians live on the other side of the line; but it is not fair to attribute that fact to the National Policy which has been pursued in this Dominion during the past decade. The native-born British North Americans resident in the United States in 1830 were only 2,227; in

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness).

1840, 31,627; in 1850, 147,711; in 1860, 240,970; in 1870, 493,463; in 1880, 717,153. Now, any person who will look upon the census of the United States from an ordinary, common-sense stand-point, must admit that the enumeration of foreign-born citizens is as nearly accurate as it can practically be. There is no reason why an enumerator would count any citizen of the United States as of any other nativity than that which the citizen would himself give. In 1880 we find that not less than 717,153 Canadians were resident in the United States; in other words, before the National Policy was adopted, three-quarters of a million of Canadians crossed the line. It is not, therefore, fair nor reasonable to attribute this exodus to the National Policy. In 1890, I am sorry to say, that number had increased to 980,000. These are facts which every statesman in Canada must look in the face. It is a serious fact that so large a number of native-born citizens have crossed the line; and it is unfortunate that Canadian statesmen should attempt to mislead the people to believe that the movement from the rural districts in Canada to the cities of North America has been owing to the National Policy pursued in the Dominion of Canada. The population of Ontario, in 1891, was 2,112,989; of Quebec, 1,488,586; of New Brunswick, 321,274; of Nova Scotia, 450,523; of Manitoba, 154,443; of Alberta, Assiniboia and Saskatchewan, 67,554; of British Columbia, 92,765; of the unorganized territories, 32,168; or, a total of 4,829,411. I regret that the census taken in 1890 failed to enumerate the citizens of the United States by nativity. If that had been done, I could show exactly the proportion from each province who are now resident in the United States; therefore, I must go back to the census of 1881, when the enumeration was taken in the United States by nativity, and the residents in the United States from the several provinces were given in the census of that year. In 1891 the total population of old Canada, including Ontario and Quebec, was 3,285,954; New Brunswick, 321,233; Nova Scotia, 440,572; Prince Edward Island, 108,891. By the United States census, which I assume to be as nearly correct as possible in this respect, there were, from old Canada, 610,000 resident in the United States; from New Brunswick, 41,788; from Nova Scotia, 51,160; from Prince Edward Island, 7,537. So that hon. gentlemen will see that, of all the provinces, the largest exodus, up to 1880, when the National Policy was adopted, was from Ontario; next to it was the exodus from New Brunswick, being one-eighth; Nova Scotia next, being nearly one-ninth; Prince Edward Island, nearly one-fifteenth. There were, in round numbers, then, at least, 700,000 Canadians resident in the United States before the adoption of the National Policy. So that it is futile to attempt to mislead the public to believe that the exodus from Canada has been owing to the National Policy. It is true that this large number left the country, and it is also true that out of the total population of Canada in 1891, which was 4,829,411, there were living in the United States, 980,000, which is one-fifth of the total population in round numbers. I submit, in all earnestness, therefore, that it becomes Canadian statesmen seriously to investigate the cause of this exodus from Canada, which largely existed before the adoption of the National Policy; and but for the National Policy. I claim, and firmly believe, that the exodus would have been at least a quarter of a million more during the last decade. We have in Canada serious difficulties to contend with to arrest the exodus. Those who left Canada years ago, it can not be denied, were, to a large extent, successful. It is true that many of them failed in the United States, as they would have failed in Canada; at the same time no reasonable person can deny but that a large proportion of those who left the British North American provinces were successful in the United States, and at least one-quarter of them, that is, in the neighbourhood of a quarter of a million, made for themselves comfortable homes there, before the adoption of the National Policy, and they act for the United States as immigration agents, who are attracting their friends from every province of old Canada. If there be any way to arrest the tidal wave which moves from the rural districts all over North America to the cities, and from which Canada suffers largely in a loss of population, it must be done by adopting a policy which will retain as many as possible at home, in the face of the attractions which they find on the other side of the line. There can be no doubt, and no one who has travelled both countries over can fail to be satisfied, that in Canada the population of the rural districts from Cape Breton to Vancouver are more comfortably settled and in better circumstances than the average on the other side of the line, and it is futile to say that because they leave the agricultural districts, which are now pretty well settled, at least in the eastern provinces, therefore those who remain at home are any the worse off. I will allow the exodus to rest at this point. I now desire to call the attention of the House to some observations which were made by the senior member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies.) I intend to deal very lightly with the hon. gentleman, because, I frankly admit, that notwithstanding the delivery of that speech with a deal of force, I might say vehemence, if the language be carefully considered, he has made the most moderate speech on that side of the House against the National Policy; but I must call his attention to a statement he made, and which requires contradiction at my hands. He said:

Those who are now most strenuous in their support of the National Policy are those who have been punished most severely by it. Of all places in the Dominion, Cape Breton has suffered perhaps the most. From that island there has been a greater percentage of exodus than from any other part of the Dominion.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It cannot be denied, and to-day the commercial atrophy which is prevalent all over the Maritime provinces is more prevalent in Cape Breton than anywhere else.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When I have finished, the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity to refute what I have said, not only by saying no, but by producing some evidence in support of his statement.

The contradiction at that time was very properly made by the senior member for Cape Breton, and I shall now produce evidence to convince the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) that the statement he then made was not strictly accurate. The population of Cape Breton was, in 1881, 84,490; in 1891, 86,854, an increase of 2,346. The population of Prince Edward Island was, in 1881, 108,891; in 1891, 109,078, an increase of only 187. The increase in Cape Breton Island, therefore, exceeded that of Prince Edward Island by 2,269, notwithstanding the fact that the population of Prince Edward Island is somewhat larger than that of Cape Breton. I have already shown that the exodus from Prince Edward Island up to the present time has been less than from any other portion of this Dominion, and I now show that the exodus from Cape Breton has been less than that from Prince Edward Island, and therefore the exodus from Cape Breton has been less than from any other portion of this Dominion since the adoption of the National Policy. My hon. friend, I hope, will be satisfied with that explanation and proof. He made a further statement, and I am glad that to a certain extent he concurs with myself. On a former occasion I stated in a fanciful manner that if on brick was taken out of the National Policy edifice, the whole structure would fall. By that expression I meant, as my hon. friend from Queen's exactly knew, that if any of the principles underlying the National Policy should be violated, the whole policy would have to be abandoned. What occurred once may occur again. Some of the principles in the policy of 1871 were violated, and the whole policy fell to the ground, and the same result would follow. I have no doubt whatever, under similar circumstances. I do not mean to say that it is absolutely necessary to retain the existing tariff just where it is, but I still hold that all the principles underlying the National Policy, which had been fairly, fully and seriously considered before its adoption, must be maintained in their integrity. The hon. gentleman said:

I have a great deal of sympathy with those hon. members who object to the tariff being interfered with in detail. I think it as a whole ought to be sustained as a whole, or put down as a whole. I do not think it fair, to take for instance, coal oil and remove the duty from that, and to leave other duties equally as bad and equally indefensible alone. I do not think it is fair to single out cottons, and remove the duty from that article, while equally indefensible duties are allowed to remain on other articles.

Mr. CAMERON. Nor to single out pork?

Mr. DAVIES. Nor pork, as the hon. gentleman says.

This shows clearly that any great industry in this Dominion must not be allowed to suffer under the National Policy, and if it be allowed to suffer, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) evidently will be with me when any such attempt is made. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) also, to a large extent, agrees with me. He said:

I presume, Sir, they will find the task a difficult one. It is like taking stones out of an arch, with the danger of bringing down the whole structure about their ears. The National Policy interests are so interwoven with one another, and so mutually dependent on one another, that one duty can scarcely be removed without affecting a great many industries, and when the Government proceed to the consideration of this question and attempt tariff reforms, we upon this side shall watch with a great deal of interest and curiosity the result of the experiment they may be disposed to make with reference to the reduction of duties.

Another authority on political questions, the Rev. Principal Grant, in the last number of the "Canadian Magazine," referring to the Premier's promise to lop the mouldering branch away, if any existed, says:

He will soon find that there are resolute men who consider it (the National Policy) the very ark of the covenant or keystone of the arch, and who are prepared to threaten anything and everything rather than consent to its being touched, much less lopped.

So that on the question of violating any of the principles of the National Policy I have three distinguished Canadians to agree with me. Having disposed of that branch of the subject, I shall now take into consideration what the National Policy itself really is, and what are the principles that underlie it. The first essential of a National Policy tariff, in my opinion, is that it shall produce a sufficient revenue to efficiently maintain the services for which the Dominion Government is held responsible. I think that every reasonable person in this Dominion will concede that an indirect tax on the people is preferable to direct taxation, and that a tariff policy should be adopted that will enable the Finance Minister to maintain all the services of this Dominion efficiently and well. The railways of this Dominion should be prosecuted and extended, and a revenue for that purpose must be raised in the manner which will press the most lightly upon the tax-payers. The canals of this Dominion must be maintained and, if necessary, extended. The public works of this Dominion must also be maintained, and facilities must be given north and south, east and west, for the distribution of the products of our various industries from the Atlantic to the Pacific. This cannot be efficiently done without a revenue, and I do seriously hope that the Government will not go back on that part of the National Policy which has been promoting railway extension, enlargement of the canals, increase of the public works and other facilities for the distribution of the various products of this Dominion. It would be a mistaken policy to do that; and instead of urging upon them to curtail the expenditures, I would have no hesitation in urging them on to greater efforts to provide facilities for our surplus population to induce them to stay at home instead of going across the line. The tariff should, in my opinion, be so adjusted as to bear as lightly as possible on the poorer classes of this Dominion—the farmers, the fishermen, the miners, the mechanics and the labouring classes generally; and I have no hesitation in saying that, while the National Policy tariff, which produces a revenue as well, should be so adjusted as to bear lightly on the poorer classes, it should at the same time be so adjusted as to foster the various industries of this Dominion—the agricultural industries, the fishing industries, the mining industries and the manufacturing industries. It should be so adjusted as to encourage the building up of large cities within the Dominion itself, and the cities within the Dominion cannot be very materially enlarged, unless manufacturing industries are encouraged in these cities, and unless the cities are enlarged, the surplus population in the rural districts will move to the large cities on the other side of the line. It should be so adjusted as to create a healthy competition in the production of all articles which are useful and necessary to the poorer classes of this Dominion. By stimulating manufacturing industries in this Dominion, and thus creating a large supply of what is useful or necessary for our poorer classes, we shall bring the prices of all those articles down to the lowest possible figure consistent with a living profit to the manufacturers. It may be said, and it has been said, that the manufacturers are making millions; but on investigation, that will not be found to be true. When the National Policy was first adopted, those opposed to it lost no opportunity of trying to show that it would be injurious to the people of this country, by enumerating the large number of manufacturers who were bankrupt; but if the manufacturers were bankrupt in various industries, was it not because they were supplying the consumers of this Dominion with their wares at prices below the cost of production? It is true, when the National Policy was first adopted, a very large number of manufacturers more than were necessary were encouraged to supply the public wants in certain lines; but that will in a short time cure itself, and those only who can make a reasonable profit will survive. In this way the wares which are required for the use and comfort of our people will be placed in the hands of the consumers at a lower figure than would otherwise be possible. As a matter of fact, every person who will inquire into the prices prevailing now all over the Dominion, from one end to the other, will find that all goods which are consumed by the poorer classes, are sold at from 15 to 25 per cent below the prices that prevailed before the adoption of the National Policy, and 15 to 25 per cent lower than they could possibly have been sold for, if the National Policy had not been adopted. The National Policy should be so adjusted as to prevent combines to enhance the prices of the necessaries of life, and it should also be so adjusted as to foster interprovincial trade; and unless a policy is adopted by the Parliament of this Dominion to foster interprovincial trade, in my humble opinion, it will be useless to expect Confederation to be a success. The National Policy, it must be admitted, has to a large extent encouraged interprovincial trade, and its continuance will undoubtedly largely increase that interprovincial trade. There is a special appeal made at present to the prejudices of the farmer. After the National Policy had got under way, an appeal was first made to the sympathies of the unfortunate manufacturers, who were becoming bankrupt. Then, when hon. gentlemen opposite found that the manufacturers who survived the keen competition, were doing fairly well, they shifted their position and endeavoured to enlist the sympathies of the fishermen. From the fishermen they went on to appeal to the sympathies of the miners; and all these appeals having failed, they now appeal most industriously, during this session and the last, to the prejudices of the farmer. I am the son of a farmer, and a farmer myself—an amateur farmer, I may say—and I say again that the poorer classes of farmers have been fairly well protected by the National Policy. It must not be forgotten that there are several classes of farmers in this Dominion. There are specialists who are anxious to secure cheap food for the lines of farming in which they themselves operate, and I must call the attention of this House to the fact that that class is only a very small class of the farmers of this Dominion. Those who go in for cattle-raising, horse-raising and hog-feeding, are specialists, who are most anxious that cheap food should be secured from abroad, to the prejudice and great injury of the far poorer classes of farmers, who are in the large majority. To a large extent, as I said in a former discussion, these specialists to whom I refer are manufacturers, in the same sense as the millers are manufacturers of the product of wheat. Now, I desire, Sir, to call your attention to the injury which the reduction of the tariff on the farm products of this Dominion would be to the farmers generally. I regret that my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is not present, because, during the discussion on this question, he maintained that the farmers are not protected; he pretended that, notwithstanding the duty of 75 cents per barrel on flour, that did not create any market for the farmers of this

Dominion. The duty on flour must be taken in connection with the protection to manufacturers. The best market for the wheat raised in this country is the home market, and if our farmers fail to secure the home market for their products, their business will be a precarious one. If my hon. friend is under the impression that taking off the duty of 75 cents per barrel and placing wheat on the free list, as hon. gentlemen opposite propose to do, is not injurious to the farmers of the North-west Territories and Ontario, I must tell him that he and I very materially differ in that respect. Let the duty be taken off wheat and flour, and the result would immediately follow, that the markets of the Maritime provinces would be supplied to the extent of at least 1,500,000 barrels of flour from the United States. In this manner, the producer of Manitoba and Ontario would lose the markets of the lower provinces. I do not mean to say that it would reduce the price of flour to any appreciable extent in the Maritime provinces; but I do mean to say that the immediate effect of putting flour and wheat on the free list would be the taking of at least $6,000,000 out of the Maritime provinces into the United States, to pay for flour imported from that country. All that money would be put in circulation on the other side of the line, and it could hardly be expected to be returned under the existing tariff, to circulate in this Dominion within a reasonable period. It is, therefore, essential that the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west should have the markets of the Maritime provinces. The simple reason why flour from the United States would be largely imported into the Maritime provinces lies in this fact, that the freight would be lower, and to that extent the price of flour would be reduced in the Maritime provinces; but the difference would be so small, that silly indeed would be the Maritime province man who, with a head of common sense on his shoulders, would advocate a reduction of duty on flour, as long as the industries and interests in the Maritime provinces, such as those of the fisherman and the miner, are reasonably protected under the National Policy? They must be taken together. There is no reasonable man in this Dominion, who will view the question from an impartial point of view, but must admit that carrying the great products of the west to the east and those of the east as far as practicable west, and keeping the money in circulation within the Dominion, must be for the general advantage of the Dominion. And this is one of the great objects of the National Policy. I hear it often said, and my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has said in this House, that we have the markets of Great Britain free; but he must not forget that the farmers of Great Britain are protected nearly to as great an extent against outside products as are the farmers of Canada. The protection of the farmers of Canada against the imports of agricultural products of the United States, does not alone consist in the tariff on flour and wheat. It consists as well in the cost of transportation, so that, if my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) will take into consideration the cost of carriage, of wheat and flour to Liverpool, he will find that the English farmer is as well protected, to say the least, against the products of the United States and Canada in flour and wheat as the farmer in Canada is against the rest of the world. The wheat products consumed in Great Britain are largely supplied by the North-west Territories of this Dominion, the United States and Russia, and the rate of transportation from all these points will equal, or nearly equal, the protection which is given to the Canadian farmer by the tariff under the National Policy. The best customers that the farmers of this Dominion can possibly have, as I have already intimated, are the labouring classes, the mechanics, the fishermen, the miners, and the artisans of this Dominion. It is, therefore, in the interest of the farming classes to have these various industries protected and fostered, and it is in the interest of the fishermen, the miners, the mechanics and the labourers generally to have the farmers protected. It is the only hope for this Dominion to have the various industries so protected as to foster them. It must not be forgotten that the National Policy tariff is not essentially a protective tariff. The necessities of the revenue of this Dominion prevent us from having a purely protective tariff. If you impose a high duty on any product which is manufactured in this Dominion, it will prevent the importation of that article altogether, and therefore no revenue would accrue for that duty. There are several lines of goods manufactured in this country which are thus protected with a view to altogether preventing similar products coming from other countries. It is a wise policy which prevents, for instance, the shoddy made on the other side of the line, and, I might say, in Great Britain as well, from coming into competition with far superior articles manufactured in this Dominion; and when tweeds and cottons and other lines of goods are abundantly manufactured in this Dominion it is the duty of the Government to so protect them as to prevent the competition of any inferior class of goods which it would not be to the advantage of our people to have in the market at all. Now, Sir, having said so much on that branch of the National Policy I desire to investigate for a short time—and I hope the House will bear patiently with me—into another phase of the question, and that is as to who pays the tariff. There is great diversity of opinion as to who pays the tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite, if I am to believe their utterances in the House, have nearly unanimously come to the conclusion that the consumer pays the duty. Now, I differ from them on that point, and I believe I can prove that they themselves generally and severally differ from themselves. There is one hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who goes so far as to say that Canadians occupy such a deplorable position in this world of ours that they pay the duty on all articles imported from foreign countries, and not only that, but they occupy the very humiliating position also of being obliged to pay the duty on every article which is exported from this Dominion. Now I do not think it necessary to say anything more than merely to state the views expressed by that hon. gentleman to show what a silly position he occupies in the minds of the intelligent people of this Dominion. Flour is produced in Canada in abundance, largely in excess of the requirements of the consumers of this country, and flour is imported to a small extent into Canada. I would ask any reasonable man if the imposition of 75 cents a barrel makes the flour 75 cents a barrel dearer to the consumer of the Dominion? That position was taken by hon. gentlemen in this House in the presence of many who are here now; but it was so ridiculous that their constituencies elected them to remain at home. If flour is imported into this Dominion in the face of the fact that we produce a large quantity, more than is required for home consumption, the producers on the other side of the line and the carriers and the middlemen must lose the duty and divide that loss among themselves as best they can. The consumer does not contribute one cent, nor is one cent added to the cost of the flour. On the other hand, I may take an article which is not produced in the Dominion of Canada at all—tea. There is not a reasonable person on either side of the House but must admit that the duty on tea, which is not produced in Canada and does not therefore come in competition with a similar product in Canada where it is imported, is paid by the consumer. There may be some circumstances in which even that may not be true; but it must be admitted on all hands that as a general thing on articles which are not produced in Canada, and on which a duty is imposed, the consumer pays all the duty. I may take another line of goods, selecting one which is produced in Canada to one-half the extent necessary for the consumption of the people of the Dominion. On any such line of goods imported, I take it, the consumer would not be called upon to pay more than half the duty. My reason for coming to this conclusion is simply that such a line of goods imported from abroad would come in competition with the same line of goods produced or manufactured in Canada, so that the competition in Canada would so reduce the price that the manufacturer abroad and the carriers and the middlemen would have to divide the other half between them. So I am myself convinced that these are, to a large extent, the principles which may govern any intelligent person in deciding as to how much of the duty the consumers of Canada pay on goods which are imported into the Dominion. A good deal has been said on the duty on coal oil. It is known to every intelligent person in this Dominion that two-thirds of the coal oil used in Canada is manufactured within the Dominion itself, and the other third is imported from the United States. There are some enthusiasts who are in favour of reducing the tariff on coal oil, who maintain that no person in Canada would use any Canadian oil, because it is of such inferior quality that it should be driven out of the market altogether. But those of us who use Canadian oil and American oil know that Canadian oil is produced in quality as good as the American oil, and that it will last even longer than the American oil. But the test on American oil prevents the importation into Canada of an inferior quality of oil, for the simple reason that it is more explosive. It would be a great misfortune to reduce that test so as to endanger those who use it on this side of the line and expose them to accidents which frequently occur in the United States from the explosive character of the oil manufactured there. But the discussion which occurred in the press, and the discussion which occurred in this Parliament, particularly, I am happy to say, has already had a very salutary effect upon the trade of oil from British Columbia, I believe, to Cape Breton. The cost of oil should not be so great as it was in various sections of this Dominion. It is a singular fact that in the country in which I reside we can purchase coal oil, Canadian and American, at a much lower figure than it is retailed in Ottawa, Montreal, or any other of the central cities of Canada. This is certainly not owing to the National Policy; it is owing, to some extent, I admit, to the keener competition between both oils in the Maritime provinces, and to a large extent it is due to the fact that in cities the grocers and retailers charge a larger profit on the oil than they do in the Maritime provinces. An excellent quality of Canadian oil and of American oil can be purchased in the Maritime provinces from 20 to 25 cents per gallon, equally as good as the oil which is retailed in the city of Ottawa for 30 and 35 cents. But the agitation which has existed in the country and the discussion which occurred in this House, have called public attention to the enormous profit charged by retailers in central Canada, particularly, and now the prices have largely come down. I hope that with oil, as with other articles which are imported from foreign countries, the production in Canada will largely regulate the price, and that the producers on the other side of the line and the middlemen will in that way be compelled to contribute towards the revenue in proportion to the quantity imported into the country, as they are doing in regard to other lines of goods. I wish now to call attention to the view which is generally entertained on the other side of the House in reference to the effect of the tariff. The hon. member for the south riding of Huron (Mr. Macdonald) says:

Now, just let me go over a few articles that we sent to the United States in 1892, giving in each case the number or quality, and the amount of duty that we had to pay to obtain access to that market for them:

Article.	Number or Quantity.	Duty Paid.
Horses	9,261	$276,830
Eggs, doz	3,918,015	195,900
Sheep	290,074	217,611
Barley, bush	2,721,168	$16,350
Wheat, bush	1,489,881	247,976
Hay, tons	67,068	268,268
Potatoes, bush	135,324	33,831
Pease, bush	527,912	211,164
Oats, bush	155,947	16,594
Apples, brls	16,995	12,746

Total duty paid $2,296,771

Yet the hon. gentlemen tell us that the American market is not the best market for the Canadian farmer for these classes of products.

Now, if we pay tribute for the export of horses, eggs, sheep, barley, wheat, hay, potatoes, pease, oats and apples to the United States to the extent of $2,296,771, on account of their tariff, would it not be very silly on the part of the Dominion Government, or of any Government, to admit the products of that country free of duty while they imposed such high duty on these products going from this country into the United States? The consumers do not always pay the duty. If the argument of my hon. friend from Huron be valid, the producers of horses, eggs, sheep, barley, wheat, hay, potatoes, pease, oats and apples in Canada paid the whole duty. If that argument be sound, then all the products imported from the United States into Canada pay a tribute to the Dominion treasury in the same manner. But I dissent from this view of it, as well as from the view that the consumer pays all the duty. If hon. gentlemen will only examine the lines of goods upon which duty is collected, they will find that the poorer classes in this Dominion contribute but a very small portion indeed of the revenue of this Dominion. I wish now to present a statement of the quantity and value of articles entered for consumption in the Dominion of Canada, showing, also, the duties collected thereon during the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1892:

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness).

If the argument of my hon. friend from Huron be valid, those who are obliged to find a market in Canada for all their lines of goods, pay all the duty. But that argument is not sound. Although I admit to a certain extent that the consumer pays the duty on goods such as are imported into the Dominion, I deny that they pay any duty imposed on flour, because flour is produced in Canada to a greater extent than the home market requires, and there are other articles similarly situated. And I hold that a very large proportion of the duty imposed on lines of goods imported into Canada is paid by the producers on the other side of the line, or in other countries, and by the carriers and middlemen, and that it reaches the hands of the consumers here at a lower figure, particularly when it comes into competition with similar products in our own country, than they could possibly be placed in our hands, even if manufactured within the Dominion itself. Our receipts from customs in 1891-92 were $20,501,057; from excise, $7,945,197; miscellaneous, $8,475,715; or a total of $36,921,871. It is admitted by hon. gentlemen opposite that under commercial union, or under any other tariff policy suggested by them, the revenue of Canada would suffer to a very large extent; and voicing, I presume, the policy of the Opposition, the hon. member for North Norfolk says, in a speech delivered on this question a few nights ago:

But if we entered into an arrangement admitting every article from the United States free of duty and sacrificed the whole of the duties derived from American importations, we would be sacrificing $8,000,000 annually of revenue. The question is, can that sum be made good without resort being had to direct taxation? I assert that it can. We would of course have to readjust our fiscal system. We would have to resort to certain lines of taxation that are purely revenue taxes. We might put a duty on tea and coffee. Those duties are less objectionable than duties on the classes of goods produced in the country, because you thereby escape incidental taxation. The consumer pays for what is imported, and if there is nothing of the kind produced in the country, the article is not enhanced in price.

This is a most extraordinary position for any financier to take. The hon. gentleman says the consumers pays for what is imported, and if nothing of the kind is produced in the country, the article is not enhanced in price; therefore, if a duty of 10 cents per pound be imposed on tea, because it is not produced in the country, it will not be enhanced in price. There is no hon. member on either side of the House, there is no ten-year-old school-boy in any rural district in this Dominion, who would not contradict any such statement as that. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) proceeded to say :

We might impose a small duty on sugar, say one cent per pound, and I venture the assertion that sugar would be sold at only one-fifth of a cent per pound in advance of present prices, because there is now a duty of eight-tenths of a cent per pound for the purpose of enabling the refiner to meet some competition without protection. A duty of one cent per pound would amount to $3,000,000, and the consumer would get the advantage by the amount of the duty going into the treasury of the country, instead of into the pockets of the refiner. Then we might impose an income tax. That tax is resorted to in England.

This, then, is the counter-policy proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite to the National Policy. Every hon. member from the Maritime provinces, who knows the effect such a tariff would have on tea, sugar, coffee, rice and molasses and other articles which are required by the poorer classes, by miners, fishermen and mechanics, and by the poorer classes of farmers, as well, must be aware that this would amount to the imposition of heavy duties, of which they would have to pay every cent. This view of the question was so completely answered by the Finance Minister in his Budget speech that for the purpose of shortening my remarks, I quote it from his own lips. The Minister said :

While on that point it may be just as well to make a statement in order to contrast the two policies, in order to meet to a certain extent, a statement which is often heard, that the system of taxation and the quantity of taxation as it bore upon certain classes, was less under the administration of our predecessors than under our own. Let me add this further statement : that we gained on coffee in 1892, $7,177 ; but if the same duties had been paid upon the coffee consumed in this country last year as was placed upon coffee under the preceding Administration, instead of the people having paid $7,177 they would have paid $66,746. Duty on tea was last year paid to the amount of $8,265. If the same rates of duty had been paid last year as was paid under the preceding Administration the country would have paid on the same consumption of tea $1,266,233 instead of $8,265. In the matter of rice, which is also the poor man's food, we paid last year $80,762 ; but if the duties in vogue under the preceding Administration upon the article of rice had been paid last year, instead of that amount the people would have paid $229,820. In sugar, as I have stated, the duty of 1893 was about $77,000, whereas under the rate of taxation existing under the preceding Administration, the duty paid would have been $4,438,109. That is to say, on these four articles alone, coffee, tea, rice and sugar, the country paid last year $172,462 ; under the rate of taxation, upon a similar consumption, of the preceding Administration, they would have paid $6,905,000. Under the two rates of taxation the savings to the people in these articles alone was $5,928,442. There is no dispute that in the case of every one of these articles every dollar of that taxation would have come out of the pockets of the consumer, because it is upon materials which are not grown in this country.

So that the policy suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite, followed on those lines, would amount to $6,900,000, or $1.20 per head on the population of the Dominion. I now desire to refer to the amendment which is under the consideration of the House, which has been moved by the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) from Oxford :

That it be resolved that the present customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly on the great consuming classes of the Dominion and should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of freer trade, and that the amount of taxes collected be limited to the sums required to meet the necessities of the Government, efficiently and economically administered.

The first statement in this resolution is not true. The National Policy does not bear heavily and unjustly on the consuming classes of this Dominion. It does not bear heavily and unjustly on the fishermen of this Dominion. It does not bear heavily or unjustly on the poorer class of farmers of this Dominion ; nor does it bear heavily or unjustly on the mechanics or artisans or labourers of this Dominion. When I see farmers' institutes and mechanics' institutes and other associations pretending to represent the poorer classes of farmers, or as a matter of fact the farmers of the Dominion, advocating the abolition or reduction of certain duties on certain lines of goods they consume, their action reflects seriously on their own position, and on the manner in which they represent the most important industry in this Dominion. They advocate the importation of free corn. Do they not know that free corn as food for animals comes into actual competition with the coarse grain produced in this Dominion ? There is no part of this Dominion which could more seriously suffer by the importation of such food for cattle than the Maritime provinces, say Quebec, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, and it would be disastrous to the best interests of the large majority of the farmers, of at least nine-tenths of the farmers of this Dominion, if the duty were abolished on corn, for the purpose of giving to manufacturers of beef and to hog-raisers generally, cheaper food for their own special line of products. The object of the National Policy is to develop our natural resources, to enlarge our manufacturing industries, and to keep as many of our people at home as possible. It is a regrettable fact that our people are leaving the country. It should not be heralded in this House so loudly, so longly and so frequently as it is. Our people, every sensible person knows, have difficulties enough to contend with, without calling their attention to miseries which exist only in the prolific imagination of those who appeal to the prejudices of the people with the view of affecting the electorate at the next general election. But they will find hereafter, as they have found heretofore, that the rural classes of this Dominion are intelligent thinkers, and that they know that the mere fact of a large exodus from the rural districts does not prove that they are not in a better condition under the National Policy than they were under the policy pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite, and than they would be under the policy foreshadowed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I may say frankly, from my own knowledge and experience in contact with people on the other side of the line, and it has been considerable, that the level-headed people there have no desire to annex Canada to the United States. They feel that they have already a sufficiently large territory to govern. They indeed begin to fear socialists and labour societies and similar institutions; the negro question is also unsettled, and they seriously fear that the time may come when they will be called upon to see to it that their territory is not curtailed. It would be silly nonsense to mislead the people on this side of the line to believe that the people of the United States are anxious to have Canada annexed. This may be the opinion of a few malcontents who left Canada, and who live on the other side of the line; it may be the opinion of those who have gone there and made places for themselves which reflect credit on the great country to the north whose nativity they claim. There is not an institution in the United States of any consequence in which a Canadian is unrepresented, and the prosperity which attended them before Canada adopted the National Policy has had the effect of attracting others to follow them. I might recount innumerable instances of the prosperity which attended people who left the eastern portions of Canada; the same might be said of those who left the western portion; and some of them may be under the impression that the fiscal policy of this country is detrimental to the best interests of the labouring classes and the poorer classes generally. They are a misguided people if they think so. I have no hesitation in saying, from my experience on both sides of the line, that, with a judicious National Policy adopted on this side, such as they have adopted, Canada will prosper in spite of any policy that our neighbours may adopt to the contrary; but if a policy similar to that which existed in this country between 1874 and 1878 be adopted, and a duty be reimposed on tea, sugar, molasses, rice and other articles which are essential, to some extent, to the poorer classes, there will be serious danger of more of our people crossing the line. The object of the National Policy, therefore, should be to develop the manufacturing industries, the mining industries and all the other industries of this country, and to increase, as far as lies in our power, the consuming population of this Dominion so as to secure a market for the products of the soil within the Dominion itself. In my opinion, the only hope for this Dominion lies in the continuance of the National Policy on the lines on which it has been conducted since 1879, for the purpose of assuring our national industries that they will be permanently maintained; otherwise our people will flow in larger numbers to the other side of the line, and, while we are glad to see them prosper there, there is no Canadian but will be glad to pursue a policy which will retain, if not all, at least as many as possible, of them within the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CHRISTIE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to occupy the time of the House at any length; but I cannot permit myself to give a silent vote on this question. It is a duty I owe to my constituents to rise in my place, and, in a word or two, to record my protest against this National Policy which has pressed so heavily upon them, and which has done so much to foster and build up combines and monopolies to prey upon and impoverish our country. I am, therefore, strongly in favour of tariff reform, not simply one or two insignificant and trifling changes such as have been proposed by the hon. the Minister of Finance, but a substantial reduction of duties along the whole line on our cottons, woollens, agricultural implements, coal oil, iron, and everything required for daily use on the farm. If we want to see this country as prosperous as it should be, we should adopt the policy of freer trade, as far as we can, consistent with a tariff for revenue purposes. We should also adopt a policy of economy and retrenchment, cutting down expenditure all along the line, to as great an extent as would be compatible with the efficient carrying on of the public service of the country. The pruning-knife should be applied unsparingly to every unnecessary expenditure. We all know that the National Policy has signally failed to benefit the farmers. Not one of the many promises made to them under that iniquitous policy has ever been or ever can be fulfilled. They were told that it would give them a home market, better prices for their products, enhance the value of their property, check the exodus of our people, and make us prosperous and happy; but the result has been exactly the reverse in every particular. We know that we have to pay more for every article we require to purchase than we would have to pay under a revenue tariff, and the farmers do not get a single cent more for anything they have to sell. Their surplus products are all sold in foreign markets. They have to depend on the foreign markets of Great Britain and the United States as before, and the prices there rule the market here. The farmers property has depreciated in value, in my own county at least 25 or 30 per cent. I do not say that is all due to the National Policy; but I do think the National Policy has contributed very largely to that result, because the farmer is getting less for his products under the present policy, the value of the land having depreciated. The exodus of our people goes on unchecked, not only unchecked, but increasing. Now, I do not wish to say that our farmers have not enjoyed a certain amount of prosperity, because that would not be strictly correct; but I do say that they are not so prosperous as they ought to be, considering their industry and frugality and the immense natural resources of the Dominion of Canada. They are not so prosperous as they would have been if less money had been wrung from their pockets by this policy. They are not even so prosperous as they were under the much-abused Mackenzie Administration, and the reason is obvious. We know that there has been a very large increase in the expenditure of this country. Under the Mackenzie Government the annual expenditure was only $23,000,000 or $24,000,000, that has been increased to $36,000,000 or $37,000,000, and $100,000,000 has been added to the net debt of the Dominion; but that is not all. Who can tell the untold millions which have gone into the pockets of the manufacturers, combinesters and monopolists? A very good authority, one of our leading papers, put it at $20,000,000 annually. Whether it be more or less I cannot say, but that is sufficient to account for the depression and hard times, and for the feeling of unrest and dissatisfaction which prevails throughout the Dominion. The way in which these combines operate upon the people was very clearly pointed out a few evenings ago on the occasion of the debate on the binder twine. Now, that was only one combine, and we have a great many others that are preying upon the people, notably the cotton, iron, steel, agricultural implement, coal oil, woollen, stove and sugar combines. It will be remembered that, on that occasion, hon. gentlemen on both sides, notably the hon. member for Assiniboia West (Mr. Davin), pointed out how that combine had closed a number of factories at Lachute, St. John and Quebec, driven away their operators, crushed out all competition, and fleeced the farmers unmercifully for the benefit of the combines, not only in Canada but even in the United States. These are grave charges, very serious charges, and so far as I know they have not been denied; nay, more, I believe they cannot be denied. I know that at Lachute we had a large and prosperous cordage factory, which was doing a good business, giving employment to a very considerable number of men, and of great benefit to the town and neighbourhood; but a little more than two years ago that factory was leased by the combines for the purpose of being closed. The rental, if I recollect right, $7,500 per annum, was to be paid for twenty-one years, and a guardian was to be paid to take care of the factory. The factory was closed; the employees were forced to seek employment wherever they could get it—probably some of them have gone to swell the exodus—and the farmers were left to the tender mercies of the combine, and forced to pay such prices as the combine thought proper to demand. That was not all. The prosperity of the town was blighted by the act of the combine. It must have cost at least $150,000, probably $200,000, to close that factory and kill off competition. It is true, we still have the tall chimneys; but the fires are put out, the doors are closed, and the hum of industry is hushed and silenced for twenty-one years; and yet, strange to say, the Government still protects that combine to the extent of 12½ per cent. Now, I believe that is the natural result of protection. Some tell us it is a decayed and rotten branch. I do not think so. I think it is the ripe fruit of that upas-tree, and I believe the only remedy is free trade. The axe should be laid to the root of the tree, and the tree should be cut down, root and branch, without mercy. I think the present time is opportune to do this. We all know there is a strong public sentiment at present in favour of tariff reform. The press have been advocating it for months. The very atmosphere is laden with tariff reform. The people are expecting substantial relief and a lightening of the burdens which are oppressing them; but I fear they are doomed to disappointment. They are told that they must wait until to-morrow. If we look to the United States—and I think there is no treason in that—we see that there the farmers have risen in their might and cast their votes in favour of tariff reform. They, too, have suffered from protection perhaps quite as much as we; but they have determined to emancipate themselves from the tyranny and oppression of the monopolists. What has taken place there, I believe, will take place here. Our farmers have suffered long; but there is a limit to their forbearance. I believe there are indications even now that there is a storm of righteous indignation rising against the perpetrators of the iniquitous tax laws now imposed on the people which will sweep away the whole fabric of protection.

Mr. GILLIES. I, too, in common with my friends on this side of the House, ardently join in the congratulations extended to the Finance Minister on the masterful manner in which he has managed the financial affairs of this country since the time he assumed office, and also on the masterly exposition of the policy he has pursued in the course of that management. I was considerably surprised a few evenings ago listening to the speech which the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) addressed to this House. He arrogated to himself the right to speak for the whole of the Maritime provinces, and he particularly addressed himself to that portion of these provinces to which I belong. In the course of his remarks, he ventured to say that of all parts of the Dominion that which has suffered most from the effects of the National Policy is the Island of Cape Breton. Well, Sir, I was born and brought up in the Island of Cape Breton. All my life I have lived there, and I assume to be in a better position to say what is the condition of the people there than the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), who, I doubt ever set foot on that Island. Now, I might almost dismiss him, Mr. Speaker, by saying that if all the parts of this wide Dominion are as well off as the Island of Cape Breton, then, indeed, there is no pity need be extended to them. I was amused at the violent tone in which he spoke while dwelling upon this point, the declamatory style he adopted, the volcanic character of his statements, the indignation he simulated, the white heat he worked himself into, when he denounced the National Policy, and said: Behold its effects upon Cape Breton! There was a time when matters were in a sadly depressed state upon that Island. Yes, there was a time when trade was paralyzed, when operatives and labourers were idle, unable to obtain employment, when destitution among the labouring classes was widespread, and when the cry of commercial war and financial embarrassment was heard throughout that land. But that was from 1874 to 1879, and during the period that hon. gentlemen opposite hold the helm of state. I may be pardoned if, for a few brief moments, I cast a retrospective glance over the National Policy since its introduction in 1878 and its effects upon the two great industries that we pursue most actively in Cape Breton, the mining and fishery industries. Now, if we look over the history of the National Policy since its introduction in 1878 and compare the two periods of time, first from the Confederation to 1878 and, second, from 1878 to the present time, we must admire the marked development and marked progress that have attended the operation of the National Policy since its inauguration by the party now in power. Before we do that it is necessary to refer to figures, and I am quite aware how dry and uninteresting figures must be to the House at this juncture of the debate, continuing as it has since the 14th of the present month. In 1878 the total railway mileage of this Dominion was only 6,143 miles. In 1891 we had 14,000 miles in operation. In 1878 the whole railway system of the Dominion of Canada earned only $20,520,000; in 1890 the whole earnings of the railway system amounted to $48,192,000, or considerably over one hundred per cent increase. In 1868, the year after the completion of the Confederacy of these provinces, the whole railway capital of the Dominion of Canada amounted to $160,000,000. In the year 1891, the last year for which the statistics of the Dominion are available, the total railway capital had increased to the enormous sum of $817,000,000, or an increase of over 500 per cent in twenty-three years. These figures are in themselves sufficient to show the healthy and wonderful progress of the Dominion as the earnings of the roads keep pace with the increased mileage and capital. Now, there is another test of the commercial advancement of a country, and that is the number of money orders that are issued within the country. In 1878, the last year of the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, we had a total sum of money orders issued of $7,130,000. But, in 1891, the sum of $12,478,000 were issued, or an increase of something like 80 per cent. There is another test equally valuable and that is the position of the banks in 1878, as contrasted—not compared, but contrasted—with the position they occupied in 1891. In 1878, the year these gentlemen left the Treasury benches and were sent to the other side of the House, we find the total amount of bank notes in circulation to be $19,351,000, but in 1891 the amount was swollen to the enormous sum of $31,379,000. Hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will understand what this means. It means that business had become so greatly extended and so enormously developed that the sum of $31,000,000 was required for business in 1891, when only $19,000,000 was required to do that business thirteen years before. There is another test which is of equal authority with the one I have submitted to the House as showing the prosperity of the country, and that is the deposits made by the people, chiefly people of the working classes and artisans, in the banking institutions of the country, and, if we take that as a test, we shall see that the advance made was indeed of a marvellous character. In 1878 the total deposits in the commercial banks of the Dominion were $71,400,000; in 1891 this had increased to $149,431,000, or in other words, in 1878, for every man, woman and child in the Dominion there was an average deposit to the credit of the people in the banks of $18; in the year 1891 the sum per head in the commercial banks of the country had increased to $30. Another test, which is equally strong with this, and which I will give to the House as an additional reason that warrants me in saying that the prosperity of the country has gone on by leaps and bounds, is the deposits in the savings banks. In 1879 the total deposits in the savings banks were $3,552,000; in 1891 these had increased $21,738,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think these facts show us how striking the progress of the country has been since the inauguration of the National Policy. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), when cent increase. In 1868, the year after the completion of the Confederacy of these provinces, the whole railway capital of the Dominion of Canada amounted to $160,000,000. In the year 1891, the last year for which the statistics of the Dominion are available, the total railway capital had increased to the enormous sum of $817,000,000, or an increase of over 500 per cent in twenty-three years. In 1879 the total deposits in the savings banks were $3,552,000; in 1891 these had increased $21,738,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think these facts show us how striking the progress of the country has been since the inauguration of the National Policy. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), when addressing the House a few days ago, said the only test of the progress of the country was the increase of its population. At that time I differed with his views and said that was only one of the tests. If we search into the history of some of the countries of the world, some of which are semi-barbaric, while some others can hardly be said to have advanced even to a semi-civilized state, we shall find how wide from accuracy the hon. gentleman's standard of progress was of accuracy. If increase of population was the only sure test of development and growth and progress in a country, then China must be a great country, because we find that from 1736 to 1812, a period of seventy-six years, the population of China increased from 125,000,000 to 360,000,000, or almost 300 per cent. Her commerce was at a standstill, in fact it was nothing; her imports and exports were practically nil, but still her population had gone on to the extent I have shown. If my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) was correct in the statement that increase of the population of the country was the true and only basis to estimate its progress, then China would be a marvellously progressive country. But we all know that the contrary is the fact. Let us take another instance of that kind, and I think it goes even further to demolish the accuracy of the standard he sets up. Take Tartary. From 1858 to 1885, we find the population of Tartary had increased from 1,295,000 to 5,327,000, or an increase of about, in 17 years, 350 per cent, showing that the increase in population of a country is not at all the true standard by which to judge of its advancement. Yet no one possessed of sanity—I will not say intelligence—will allege that Tartary is an ideal progressive country. It may suit the hon. member for Guysborough's views of progress, and is possibly his beau-ideal of a commercially great, civilized and refined community; if so, then his test standard of the progress of a country is a correct one. Take Russia, one of the most, financially and commercially, backward countries in the world, and we find that from 1858 to 1885 the population had increased from 59,000,000 to 81,000,000, or an increase of 37 per cent; yet no man with a knowledge of current history will say that Russia is a progressive country. Take Siberia. Probably our hon. friends opposite, who have been so long in Opposition, and in political exile, may have some knowledge, figuratively speaking, of that country. During the same period, Siberia increased from 2,936,000 to 4,314,000, or an increase of over 90 per cent. I quote these figures simply to show how far astray the hon. member for Guysborough was when he stated that the increase in population was the one true test of the advancement and development of a country, and that the country that does not show a large increase in its population is going headlong to ruin. But my hon. friend from Guysborough is accustomed to sing out in this sort of a way. He went down to Cape Breton about a year ago with this tale of woe, with blood in his eye, and stale jokes in his mouth, and I leave it to himself to tell what the result of his mission was on that memorable occasion. For my part, I felt very grateful to that hon. gentleman for his campaign on that occasion. He was like the Arcadian of old, ready either to sing or to pray. He was ready to play a game of cards, or to preside over a prayer meeting; in fact, a many-sided sort of mock hero, but the intelligent people of Richmond taught him the lesson he deserved; his developed humptiousness was too transparent, and they would have none of himself, his silly jokes and meaningless political propagandism of woe and black despair. All he did in my county was to increase my majority from 101 to over 300. He hied himself hurriedly out of my county, and made an incursion into the county of my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. McDonald), and what was the result there? The presence in this House of my hon. and stalwart friend from Victoria sufficiently answers the question. But we were in the unfortunate position that we could not get at him; the election courts dealt more generously by him than by us; if we had only had that opportunity, I do not think that we would be troubled this session by the stale jokes of the hon. member for Guysborough. But, Sir, no doubt we will meet him again, and the result will be reversed, and this House will be relieved of his dead weight and our province of a great humiliation. Now, Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) I wish to give a few reasons why I think it would be wrong and inexpedient for any member in this House coming from the Maritime provinces, to vote for that amendment. I do not pretend to say that the National Policy is a sacred edifice, upon which we should not lay our hands in the way of amendments; and in this respect I differ from my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron). In fact, he sticks to it so very closely that he is open to the charge of political heresy; because the Minister of Justice has openly declared that the mouldering branches will be lopped away. Now, the National Policy has been touched more than once since its introduction in 1878, and every time it was touched, I think it was improved. The National Policy was introduced at a time when the commerce of this country was at a frightfully low ebb. Conditions having changed, it has been found necessary to change the National Policy with them. For instance, the duty upon anthracite coal was abolished; still the National Policy stood. The duty upon sugar was abolished; still the National Policy stood. The duty upon binder twine and coal oil this year has been reduced by the Government; still the National Policy stands. We have amended the tariff, as brought down in 1878, as the exigencies of commerce demanded from time to time, and if we continue to do so, in obedience to the requirements of the country, will we not be doing well? Will we not be acting upon the lines that inspired the Government when they inaugurated that policy? I cannot at all agree with the idea that has been expressed by one hon. gentleman, that if one brick is taken out of the National Policy, the whole edifice will crumble and fall. I think that is a mistaken idea, and it arises from a clinging desire to hold on to the National Policy in all its parts and details. This is not my idea. We must move with the country, the times and their ever varying changes, no matter how much the conditions of the country may have changed. Sir, I was very much pleased indeed to hear the announcement from the Finance Minister, that strict attention would be given, during the coming recess, to the necessary changes that may require to be made in the tariff. I hope these changes will not be made in an inconsiderate manner, nor without due regard to all existing interests, and in this respect it is well to make haste slowly. I am satisfied that after the Government have given the question that consideration it merits, during the recess, the changes which may be found necessary, will be proposed in the Budget next year. Now, Mr. Speaker, I contend that the National Policy, as it now exists, through the modifications that have been made, is a policy favourable to our fishermen and to our miners. If it were not so, I would not for a moment support that policy. I am here to do what is right by my constituents, and I am here to-night to support that policy, and it is because it has done well by them that I support it. Take, for instance, our fishing classes. There is not a single article used by them, if you except coal oil, that really pays a duty, and the duty upon this article has been lowered this year, to be followed by another decrease, I hope, next year. Their tea is free, their coffee is free, their sugar and salt are free. Their nets, their twines, their hooks and lines, their anchors and chains are as free as the air they breathe or the water they drink. Is not, therefore, the National Policy favourable to them as a class? Every article they consume, except coal oil, is free; and mind you, the strongest men on the other side of the House are for the retention of the duty on coal oil. My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) will agree with that. I defy any hon. gentleman opposite to show any articles used by our fishermen which our hon. friends opposite would exempt from duty, if, unfortunately for the country, they should attain to power. I challenge them now to name any list of articles, or any article whatever. Hon. gentlemen may not be familiar with the importance and extent of the fishing industry in the Maritime provinces. In 1891 there were 678 vessels employed in that industry, with a tonnage of 25,623 tons and manned by

Mr. GILLIES.

5,184 men. That fleet was composed of vessels belonging to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. There were also 12,836 boats employed, manned by 24,105 men, all belonging to those three provinces I have named; or a total of 29,280 men employed in our fisheries. Every pair of boots and shoes, every hat and cap they wear, as well as many other articles are all manufactured in the Upper provinces. Take again our mines. In 1873, the last year of the Conservative Administration, the output of our coal mines was 811,000 tons; in 1879, the last year under administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, and to which their tariff applied, the output decreased to 688,000 tons. The National Policy then came into operation, and from that date until now the output has been steadily increasing, until in 1891 it had increased to 1,786,111 tons, or an increase, as compared with 1879, of over 250 per cent. Only hon. gentlemen who are fully familiar with the ramifications of that trade can understand what such a large output of coal really means. It means that it employs 5,324 skilled men and labourers, and supports 4,641 families, or a total population of 23,205. I quote from the return for the past year of the Nova Scotia Mines Office. Hon. gentlemen will observe from these figures that our fisheries support something like 30,000 people, a race of men whose—

March is on the ocean wave,
Whose home is on the deep.

Men who are engaged in a very precarious calling and entitled to the paternal protection of any Government. I do not care to which party we may belong, these are men who are entitled to the protection of the Government, and who have their nets and materials admitted free of duty, and thereby receive this protection from the Government, and for that reason they support candidates supporting this Government's paternal and protective policy. I am at a loss to know how hon. gentlemen opposite propose to run the business of this country under what they call free trade. As I take it, the business of this Dominion may be likened to that of a municipality, a certain amount of money is required to run the Government, just as in the same way a certain amount is needed to conduct the business of a municipality. Under the present system the Administration requires about $36,000,000 with which to conduct its business. That amount is collected by the present Government in two ways. First, by revenue raised by taxation through the tariff, and, second, from other sources, which are sales of public lands, public works, post office and so on. From this source $8,165,000 were received last year. If we adopt freer trade or unrestricted reciprocity we lose immediately the sum we obtain from the United States, which last year amounted to $7,814,000. I should ask hon. gentlemen opposite, especially the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), how they propose to make up that loss. The answer must be, by direct taxation. That would mean the imposition of a direct tax of $1.60 per head on every man, woman and child in this Dominion. Does the hon. gentleman wish direct taxation to that extent to be imposed on the people of his own county? If so, then let him upon those lines be an advocate of unrestricted reciprocity. Or will it be proposed to reduce the public service? I should like to ask hon. gentlemen what service they propose to lop off? They cannot get clear of the interest of the public debt; that is as immutable as the laws of the Medes and Persians. Not civil government, not surely the administration of justice, not mail subsidies and steamboat subventions, because hon. gentlemen opposite wish them to be increased. Certainly not subsidies to provinces, because $4,000,000 must be provided. Certainly not North-west Mounted Police, not the Department of Indian Affairs, because hon. gentlemen opposite were the parties who entered into the treaties with the Indians, entailing an expenditure of almost $1,000,000 a year, and indeed those treaties were framed by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) when he was Minister of the Interior. All those services must be kept up, that we must obtain $36,000,000 annually; and if this cannot be done by incidental taxation, it must be done by direct taxation. I prefer incidental taxation, as we have it now, as it bears lightly upon the poorer classes. But if reciprocity is the best thing for this country, how are we to secure it? Two parties are required to make a bargain. We have always been willing, as any person conversant with the history of our own times knows, to enter into reciprocity arrangements with our neighbours. The Treaty of 1854 was abrogated by the Americans, and they gave the necessary year's notice in 1865. That was the first step towards commercial unfriendliness on the part of the United States. In 1866 we sent three of our very best men in the Dominion of Canada down to Washington for the express purpose of attempting to negotiate a reciprocity treaty. These men were Sir Alexander Galt, Sir William P. Howland and the late Hon. Joseph Howe; and the United States refused every single overture made by them in favour of a reciprocity treaty.

Mr. FRASER. Is the hon. gentleman in favour of reciprocity?

Mr. GILLIES. I am certainly in favour of reciprocity upon fair terms, and will do all in my power to bring it about.

Mr. FRASER. Another question: where is he going to make up that revenue?

Mr. GILLIES. What revenue?

Mr. FRASER. The revenue that is lost when you get reciprocity.

Mr. GILLIES. Where is it lost? Our proposals for a treaty are specific, namely, in natural products. My hon. friend is not going to get clear in that way. My hon. friend shouts out for unrestricted reciprocity; but I have yet to learn, and I have not yet met the man in the Dominion of Canada who has learned, how this loss is to be made up by hon. gentlemen opposite. In fact, their own leader did not understand it, and he told them so very distinctly. I notice my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition smiles at this statement. When I mentioned their leader, I referred entirely to the late leader of the Opposition, Mr. Blake. But I think my hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition has his hands full now to explain how he will make up this deficiency. If he can do so, he will, I am sure, in a large measure, instruct and enlighten his followers, as he will certainly the country, for they know not nor has he ever explained how he can manage it. In 1869 there was a third attempt made to get reciprocity with the United States. At that time Sir John Rose, then Finance Minister of the Dominion of Canada, went down to Washington, and on behalf of Canada endeavoured to negotiate a reciprocity treaty, but the Americans would not hear of it. The failure in the negotiation of a treaty did not rest with the Canadians; it took two to make the bargain; the Canadians were willing, while the Americans were unwilling, and so the negotiations fell through. In 1874 our hon. friends opposite suddenly found themselves in power and they tried their prentice hand at treaty making. They sent down one of the ablest men in their ranks, the Hon. George Brown, and he failed to negotiate a treaty. The fault did not rest with our hon. friends on the other side of the House. They did their best to obtain a treaty, but it took two parties to make a bargain; they were willing, the Americans were unwilling, and the negotiations fell through. If it was so easy to complete a reciprocity treaty with the Americans, why was it that they failed on that occasion? They were five years in power, and though they made the attempt honestly and earnestly enough immediately after coming into power, they failed most ignominiously; and simply because the Americans would not enter into negotiations with them. Then, there was our statutory offer of reciprocity on the Statute-book from 1879 until it was repealed in 1888, but no advantage was taken of it. In 1885 the Americans abrogated the treaty that had been formed a few years before. That was the sixth time they signified their unwillingness to have anything to do with us commercially. In 1887 Sir Charles Tupper went down to Washington and made an unrestricted offer of reciprocity. Our hon. friends opposite often confound that with an offer of unrestricted reciprocity, but the two are very different. Again, in 1887,

It will be in the memory of gentlemen in this House, a treaty was drawn up by Mr. Chamberlin, the British plenipotentiary, Sir Charles Tupper representing Canada, and Mr. Bayard, representing the United States, and was submitted for ratification to the House of Commons of Great Britain, this House and the Senate of the United States. It was ratified here without a division; the same was done in the British Parliament; but the United States Senate threw it out, showing most conclusively that they did not want to have anything to do with us whatever. Surely this is abundant and conclusive evidence to show the willingness and desire of Canada to have fair and equitable commercial relations with our neighbours across the line. Since then there have been other instances of their unwillingness to have reciprocal relations with us; but I think these are sufficient to show that the fault has not been with either of the Governments in power on this side of the line. The Liberals did their best to obtain a treaty, and the Conservative Government have done their best; but it takes two to make a bargain, and, the Americans being unwilling, the negotiations upon every occasion fell through. Now, I do not wish to weary the House, because this debate has already grown to a wearisome length. In Canada we have a great country. Its vast extent, its inland seas, its great people, all conduce to make it a grand nation. We have boundless prairies, over 3,000,000 square miles in extent. We have towering forests of immense value, we have all the economic mineral wealth that a great northern country requires. We have a complete system of navigation from the head of Lake Superior to the sea, a distance of 2,500 miles. We have the country peopled by three of the greatest races on which the sun has ever shone, the Saxon, the Norman and the Celt, are girdled together in the great belt of this Dominion; and if we continue to develop the country on the lines we have pursued since the introduction of the National Policy, Canada will become the great nation she is destined by Providence to become, that is, one of the finest on this earth. To bring this about is our great mission here, and when we shall have passed to that great home to which we are all so fast hastening, let our children be able to point with pride to the record in this respect we have left behind.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. Speaker, many of the statistical portions of the speech which has just been addressed to the House seem very much like so many pages taken from the Statistical Year Book, compiled under the direction of the Government statistician. They are not particularly discriminating, nor do they at all go to prove that the National Policy or any particular portion of the National Policy is responsible for the apparent growth and prosperity indicated by them. They have become so familiar and have been repeated at such great length in this House and in the country that I am beginning to believe that the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House actually believe that they represent the growth and development of the country to be caused solely by the present tariff. Any person who carefully studies and considers economic questions must be aware that into all these particulars a large number and a great variety of elements must enter. Is it not the utmost absurdity to say that because the railway mileage, for instance, has largely increased during the last fifteen years, that increase is solely to be attributed to the tariff policy of the present Administration, which was inaugurated in 1879? We ought to be candid in matters of this kind. No matter how biassed the hon. gentlemen opposite may be in favour of the policy on which they base their political existence, they ought to be willing to admit that some other elements must enter into the progress of the country in all these directions. The railway mileage, it is true, has enormously increased, and some portion of it may have been affected favourably by the policy of the present administration; but any one who knows the history of the country must be fully aware that the elements which went to make the basis of railway extension existed long anterior to the introduction of the National Policy, and were largely developed under the Liberal régime, so that the way was fully prepared for the enormous development, in that particular at any rate, without any reference whatever to the taxation policy of the country. The principal increase in railway mileage has been that of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now that great work was strenuously urged and ardently supported by Parliament and the country during the whole Liberal régime. Just here allow me to remark that our friends take too much credit to themselves and the National Policy in the comprehensive scope which, when it suits their purposes, they see fit to give that policy. The Minister of Finance and those who follow him pretend that the National Policy is not merely a tariff policy but a railway policy; they pretend that it embraces the various movements which have been undertaken by this Government towards the extension of interprovincial trade. Well, we know that, with the exception of the protective features of the tariff, all the other features now boasted of existed before this Government came into power, and must necessarily exist under any authority which undertakes to govern the country. Railway extension, interprovincial communication, and the development of our various lines of external and internal commerce, is a common heritage, a necessity which must fall on both political parties, and which I challenge hon. gentlemen on the other side to show were not fully carried out and earnestly pressed forward in every direction by the Liberals, when they governed the country. Do we not find ourselves taunted with the fact that during the Liberal regime the national debt increased something like $8,000,000 per annum? Are we not charged with that increase because we were carrying out honestly and earnestly the policy, which was in a great degree the policy of both parties, that of extending our railway system and developing the Northwest, as well as carrying on public works for the benefit of the people of the Maritime provinces? Therefore, when our hon. friends opposite attribute all the elements of development and progress of the country to the National Policy they are trifling with the intelligence of the people, and are assuming that which they have no right to assume as their special prerogative and sole results of their policy. The only thing in which, in a large and general degree, the policy hon. gentlemen opposite differs from the policy of the Liberal party is the protective features of the tariff. I listened with a great deal of care and interest to the speeches of the two hon. gentlemen supporting the Administration who have just closed their arguments; and while I congratulate them upon the ability they have displayed, I must also congratulate them upon the careful manner in which they have avoided almost every reference to tariff reform. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) said it was a subject that required great delicacy of approach, and I noticed he approached it with such delicacy that he never came near it at all. He quoted statistics of many years back, showing, as I said before, a very pleasing indication of progress in various directions. Another distinction should, in fairness and candour, be made by those who aspire to secure the ear of the people. They ought to discriminate between the general progress made in any direction, and that portion which might be attributed to the tariff policy of the country. From the Finance Minister down, they have referred to the savings banks and the indications of progress made in that particular. Now, while there has been development in this branch, I think it is altogether going too far to assume that this indicates something so extraordinary, so abnormal, so generous in its proportions that it points to a complete and triumphant success of the tariff policy of the Administration. While the increased deposits in the Dominion savings banks and the Post Office savings banks represent the growth of a disposition on the part of large numbers of the people to deposit their savings there, it does not indicate any very enormous development of wealth among the working classes and among what we call the medium classes throughout the country. Those who are not conversant with statistics refer to the savings of the people. They say: "Look at $40,000,000 in the Government savings banks," which the people recognize as the most solid security they can have. They seem to imagine it is something very extraordinary and great; but it is not so. The savings of our people, while showing certain progress in this direction, are really small in proportion to their numbers and resources, and considering the security given by the Government guarantee. I notice that the Dominion statistician, whether through inadvertence or dishonesty, omitted to give that information which might be furnished as to the savings in other countries, so that we might be able to draw comparisons and measure our own progress by that of others. We have $40,000,000 in the Government savings banks. The little state of Maine, with a population something over 600,000, has $47,000,000 in the savings banks of that state—in banks which are private property and not guaranteed by the state. 600,000 people in the state of Maine have $47,000,000 deposited in their savings banks, and Maine is not the most prosperous state in the Union. Yet in this state there are more deposits in the savings banks than there are in the savings banks of the whole Dominion, with its population of 5,000,000. Yet our friends opposite, in and out of season, are always pointing to the enormous deposits in the savings banks, as indicating some great virtue in the taxation policy of the Government in making people rich. As this is an interesting subject, I will give a few statistics of the bank circulation, comparing our own with the neighbouring Republic, in order that we may somewhat diminish the proud and boastful spirit which is encouraged too much in this House, a spirit which is removed from the true spirit of progress, and which we ought to modify if we desire people to understand that while they have been fairly successful and have much to be thankful for, yet they can look abroad and see what other states, in their industry and economic progress, have accomplished. New Hampshire, with a population of 376,530, a smaller population than the province of Nova Scotia, has $69,531,024 in the savings banks, and the 5,000,000 of people in Canada have $40,000,000. Vermont has $21,620,303 in the savings banks. Massachusetts, with a population half that of the Dominion, and with its enormous banking system, which absorbs an immense proportion of the savings of the people, still has in the states savings banks, not guaranteed by the state, $353,592,937, and the Dominion of Canada, with twice its population, has 40,000,000 only. Rhode Island has $63,719,491; Connecticut has $116,406,675; New York, $574,669,972; New Jersey, $32,462,603; Pennsylvania, $62,150,893; Maryland, $38,916,597, and California, $114,164,523. I have selected those states which have the largest deposits. Now we come to bank deposits, and here let me say that I am aware that I lay myself open to the attack which is made upon us all from the other side of the House, when we venture to give comparative figures to show that our neighbours are not in the position constantly represented by hon. gentlemen opposite—they declare that we are puffing the United States of America, that we are unpatriotic in decrying our own country. Yet it seems very popular and very satisfactory to our friends on the other side, to select such portions of the statistical information which is given, as will show that the national prosperity of the United States is not advancing. The banking deposits of Canada are very large, and they are referred to here in almost every discussion with a great deal of satisfaction, and so far as these figures indicate happiness, business progress, industry, the hon. members on this side of the House most cordially join in the pride with which they are quoted. We are glad to notice evidences of growth and development in Canada, as indicated by the savings banks deposits, or in any other way. Yet at the same time, great as they may be, we may look across the line and see that, notwithstanding that we have a population which, I think it would be safe to say, possess a higher average of those qualities which go to make a wealthy nation, we find that in our banks, apart from savings banks, we have $153,625,426, while the United States has a total deposit in their banks of $2,410,196,739. Reducing this to the average per capita, we find that the people of the United States have on the average about 100 per cent more of ordinary bank deposits than we have in this country. What the real significance of that may be I am not competent, and I presume there are many others in this House not competent, from lack of financial knowledge, to judge accurately. But, at the same time, taking a superficial view of the picture, we shall be safe in saying that if the United States has $16 per capita on the average of ordinary bank deposits, and the Dominion of Canada has only $8 per capita, we have an example of prosperity which shows that we have not attained the highest attainable point, an example which we should emulate and strive to equal before we boast so inordinately of the position we have attained. The position of the Dominion is very fair compared with other portions of the world, but it has not yet reached the extraordinary stage of development which should lead us to believe there is nothing higher to be attained. I desire to state, while referring to the subject of savings banks deposits, that it is a question which has attracted great attention, and that I have some further data with regard to it. The savings banks deposits of the United States per head are $25; in the Dominion of Canada, $8. And you must bear in mind that in the United States there are enormous masses of the population that have no savings bank deposits to speak of at all, as, for instance, in the southern states, and some other parts of the country. The average per head in the state of Maine is $72.30; in Massachusetts, $113; in Maryland, $37.50. The

Mr. FLINT.

United Kingdom, of course, has a population differing very largely from our own, both in the higher and in the lower classes, the lines of cleavage between the rich and poor being much more distinctly marked than they are in this country. And yet the United Kingdom has in the savings banks an average of $8.72 per head, as against $8.15 per head in Canada. New South Wales has an average of $110.30; Victoria, $88.81; Tasmania, $74.60. Taking the aggregate of seven Australian colonies with a population of 3,463,535, we find that in their savings banks they have $75,400,000, while Canada, with a population of 1,000,000 more has deposits of but $40,000,000. The average per head in the Australian colonies is $21.75, and in Canada, $8.15. I think these figures may give us food for reflection, and may show that while the Dominion of Canada has a large amount of deposits, yet, in proportion to the natural resources of the country, in proportion to the population of the country and its character for industry, sobriety and economy, it has not yet attained that measure of prosperity, as indicated by the savings banks deposits that should be entirely satisfactory. I shall not occupy your time by running over a large number of matters which were referred to by the previous speakers which were a little out of the ordinary line of discussion, in connection with the Budget, but I must say I was somewhat amused by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) and his allusion to my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser). Of course it is an old political gag to refer to the counties in which the orators on the other side made speeches and to show the effect they had in increasing the majorities against their friends, but I think those who are acquainted with my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) must realize that he is a doughty opponent and is a very comfortable assistant to have at the time of an election. And, if there was any gain in the vote of my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies), we can attribute it not to the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) and his speeches, but to the boodle bag which was represented by some other members and which he had at his back in that campaign to assist him to overcome the efforts of my hon. friend from Guysborough. I will not here discourse upon the arguments which Government candidates in these degenerate times can employ to upset completely the most glowing periods and the most eloquent arguments of an Opposition orator. I regret it very much. It seems unfortunate and distressing to those who hope well for this country, but it is too true, that with the prerogatives of the Crown dragged in the dust by the candidates and by the Ministers of the Crown, with the promises of Government assistance which are placed before the constituencies in times of election, the Opposition candidate, no matter what his eloquence, or his integrity, or the strength of his position, logically or constitutionally, is very apt to be overborne by the pictures presented of immediate personal gain and profit held out by the Government candidates and by Ministers of the Crown. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), who preceded me upon the opposite side, took up the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and made some comments upon it. He read the resolution, taking up the first clause :

The present customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly upon the great consuming classes of the Dominion.

The hon. gentleman denies the correctness of that statement. Now, I think a careful perusal of the very thorough and exhaustive remarks which have been made upon this side of the House since the beginning of this discussion, would disprove the strong negative made by that hon. gentleman. But I need not repeat the observations made upon this side in order to refute the point taken by that speaker ; I need only refer to the admissions of the Finance Minister himself that there is unrest, there is dissatisfaction, there is complaint, in the various portions of the country. I need not allude to the attitude of at least three-quarters of a dozen of the ablest representatives of the people from that side of the House, who have moved resolutions in this House, or have placed them upon the Order Paper, looking to a change in the tariff, and to the removal of what they, at any rate, call burdens upon the people and upon the industries of the Dominion. I will go further than that, and refer to authorities which are superior, even, to the Finance Minister himself, speaking as Finance Minister, and superior to the members of this House, speaking from their places : I will refer to the protests of the people themselves, of those who know better than lawyers, and physicians, and even merchants, can know, exactly where the shoe pinches, the exact evils they are endeavouring to overcome, and the difficulties they meet with in their struggle with the conditions of life in this country. I think there is a line somewhere in one of the poems of Rudyard Kipling, in which he says :

The toad beneath the harrow knows Exactly where each tooth point goes ;
The butterfly upon the road
Preaches contentment to the toad.

And so our Cabinet Ministers preach to the people contentment and happiness ; they tell them they are prosperous and that they are getting rich so fast that they are discontented with the rapidity with which they are making money, and they call attention to these startling statistical statements. But the people themselves know better than those who thus endeavour to instruct them as to "where the tooth point goes." I need scarcely refer to the petitions which have been piled upon the Table of this House, presented by one or two of the most distinguished members of the Government party. I will read a few lines from some of them, signed by twenty or thirty thousand of the practical farmers, mechanics and representatives of industry in this country, attacking the position of affairs under the tariff so ardently supported by hon. gentlemen opposite. The other day there was a petition presented to the House signed by 13,577 people, who said, among other things :

The agricultural interests of this country are not in as prosperous a condition as we would desire ; that tariff legislation, for the purpose of assisting the manufacturing industries of the country, has been taken advantage of by such manufacturing industries as unduly to enhance the prices of many such articles as are indispensably necessary to the farmers in carrying on the business in which they are engaged.

This language has been penned and sent here by friends, or persons friendly, to the present Administration, and they have placed upon record in very guarded words that the present tariff presses unduly upon the farmers and enhances the prices of many articles necessary for them in carrying on their business. Another petition has been presented signed by over 14,000 of those classes of people who know what they are talking about, stating :

That the farmers and labourers are the great producers of wealth of this country ; that the farmers and labourers are not in as prosperous a condition as we would desire ; that they are materially affected by the prices of the manufactures and commercial commodities of this country.

And so they proceed to arraign the tariff policy of the present Administration. We also find in the press of the day reports of resolutions passed by the various farmers' institutes throughout Ontario, the boards of trade in our large cities, the city councils, particularly of Kingston, and the Conservative clubs in the various portions of the country, all confirming the arguments which have been placed before the House by gentlemen on this side during several years past, as to the manner in which this tariff presses unduly upon the farming classes, upon the labouring classes and upon the fishermen. The Conservative Club at Winnipeg has placed upon record, as reported in the Montreal "Witness" :

That while giving the Dominion Government our loyal and enthusiastic support, yet this association will hail with delight such a reduction in the tariff as would tend to lighten the burdens upon the farmers and the residents of the country, and also introduce stringent legislation to dissolve combines and trusts, declaring them illegal.

If time permitted, and it was at all necessary, I could quote an enormous mass of testimony from various classes as to the pressure of the tariff upon a great many of the people of this Dominion, and all this at the termination of a period of nearly fifteen years of the policy so loudly vaunted upon the other side. This is the fruition of the hopes that were held out to the people when this policy was placed upon the Statute-book. Now, we find that instead of prosperity, instead of abounding happiness, instead of general contentment, there is unrest and discontent, and protests from almost every portion of the country, with the manner in which this policy has crushed the people and prevented their natural and legitimate development. We all remember the promises which heralded the introduction of this policy, and the manner in which they have been fulfilled. We had promises that it would reduce importation, and it did appear, looking at the matter superficially, as if the imports might be reduced, and as if the balance of trade would be turned, as they call it, in favour of this country. Yet when we look at the Trade and Navigation Returns for the last five years we find that the balance of trade is heavier, to a very large degree, against the Dominion, than it was during the five years of which they bitterly complained when they were in Opposition. The average balance of trade against us was $20,000,000 for the five years subsequent to Confederation; but the average balance of trade against the Dominion during the last five years in the hey-day of the National Policy, has been still larger by one or two million dollars. They promised that taxation would not be increased; that promise has been signally falsified. Taxation has been enormously increased. They promised us, if we would permit them to increase still further the tariff upon iron manufactures, that a great impetus would be given to the iron industry. Well, we have added one or two million dollars per annum to the taxation of the people of the country, coming directly from the taxation of iron and iron goods, and the bonus given to this industry. Yet, the industry itself has actually declined. None of those glowing promises, which were held out, either as to the opening up of new markets, as to the introduction of a larger population, or as to a general improvement in the condition of the people, have been fulfilled, while in addition to the enormous taxation that has been paid into the Treasury directly every industry has been handicapped and burdened by the extra price of iron and iron materials which were necessary in carrying on those trades to advantage. The Minister of Finance made one or two statements, which although a little apart from the line I have been discussing, I think are of sufficient importance to refer to merely as an incident in this discussion and as a caution to his supporters not to rely too implicitly on his statement, at least in one particular. The hon. gentleman stated in regard to the total increase of expenditure last year, that we paid for a session of 219 days $1,262,000, while for the preceding year, although there was a longer session, we paid for 155 days $596,000, and in several instances in the later portions of his speech, he attributed, by inference, at least, to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, the responsibility for an increase in the expenditure for legislation.

Mr. FLINT.

In the first place, I presume the Minister of Finance has on his mind so many important matters that he has relied on some one else to give him the figures, and the person who gave him the figures was misled in some way which I cannot account for. Last year, instead of 21½ days, there were only 137 days constituting the session; instead of the expenditure being greater than that of the previous session, it was actually less. Any person, by looking at the returns, can see how this occurred. The previous session lasted into the new financial year, and a large sum of the expenditure for the session of the previous year was charged, as a mere matter of book-keeping, to the succeeding year, which made it appear that the session of 1892 actually covered a longer period than 1891, although the time consumed was much shorter. If the account was carefully balanced for each session by itself, it would be found that last session cost less than the session before by $414,000 and that the session was much shorter. I think any candid gentleman will agree with me, that, while it is the duty of the Opposition to insist that every question before the House shall be fully debated, and it is not open to the Government to charge them with unduly lengthening the session if they choose to debate important subjects, yet, when the session is lengthened by the act of the Government, it is highly improper to charge the Opposition with being the cause of lengthening the session. The most important matter brought before the House last session was the Criminal Law Bill, a very lengthy and extensive measure. The House did not go into committee on the Bill until the eighty-fourth day of the session, and it was almost the only important Government measure that was brought down. The Redistribution of Seats Bill was introduced sixty-six days after the opening of the session, and the second reading took place on the ninety-eighth day, and the debate on that Bill was very brief. So I think it was unfair, as well as incorrect, to charge the Opposition with being the cause of any increase whatever in the length of the session, even supposing my hon. friend had not made the mistake as to the length. The progress of the country has been alluded to, and there has been progress made. We are gratified with the progress recorded. Why should there not be progress in a country having such vast resources? The fact that the country has made substantial progress in some directions, notwithstanding the burdens of the tariff, is a tribute to the wealth of the country, to the character, intelligence, sobriety, honesty and industry of its people, and it augurs well for its future, if more correct economic conditions can be brought about, to enable the people to develop their resources naturally and properly, without giving undue influence and opportunity for making money to the classes against the masses. It is a complaint, even among hon. gentlemen supporting the Administration, that millionaires and mortgages are increasing—millionaires, stimulated, strengthened and encouraged in their position by the false political economy of the Administration and its supporters, and mortgages which the people are compelled to place upon their properties and their goods, in order to keep themselves afloat, waiting for the coming of better days. Not only were we promised at the inauguration of the policy of this Administration, that our import trade would be decreased, and it was not decreased, but it was intimated that an enormous interprovincial trade would be brought about, which would do very much to promote the prosperity of the country. I regret that we have no means provided for measuring the amount of interprovincial trade. It must, however, be very large. But this country, with its resources, composed of its natural resources mainly, cannot build itself up to wealth and prosperity by any interprovincial trade, no matter how large it may be. We cannot get rich by swapping jackknives with each other. We may make the conditions of life more agreeable, we may build up a harmonious and brotherly feeling throughout the provinces, but the sources of wealth of this country are its great natural resources, and outside of this country we must carry our products and bring back the products of other countries in exchange to promote real progress. Our wealth does not consist in cash and bullion in bank vaults and in the hands of private individuals; our prosperity rests upon our trade and profitable enterprise with the peoples of other countries. What has sustained us through these years, notwithstanding the imposition of enormous taxes, but our export trade? Yet hon. gentlemen have the hardihood to say that the National Policy has greatly increased our export trade. I am willing to candidly admit that in some ways the Government may on some occasions smooth the way for this interchange, but, in a large and general sense, our export trade depends, first, on the resources of the country, and also on the blessings of Providence, by which those resources may be utilized, by which those resources may be made profitable, and upon circumstances entirely outside of this country, on prices abroad, and on the creation abroad of a large market for our people, thus affording them a profitable exchange. The export trade of a country like ours is as completely independent of the internal economy of the Government as anything can possibly be; and it is by the enormous exports with which we have been blessed that we are able to pay for our imports and to pay the heavy duties which the Government has laid upon them. For our splendid export trade, which has done so much for the prosperity of the country and so much to relieve it of its distresses, we are grateful, not to the policy of the Administration, but to these blessings of Providence which will yet enable the people of this country to survive all other disasters which this policy may bring upon them. The hon. Finance Minister, throughout the whole of his speech, claimed a great deal of credit for a reduction of taxation; and if a reduction of taxation is a thing to boast about, if it is, as he himself stated in other words, simply a lessening of the burdens on the people, then would it not have been an equally good thing for the people to have been saved from this enormous taxation by the adoption of a policy that would have accomplished that end. When the National Policy was inaugurated, it was stated on the hustings by leading statesmen of the day that the taxation would not be increased, but that it would be readjusted to bear more lightly on the consuming classes, and to foster to a larger extent than it has done the industries of the country. But the taxation was increased to an enormous extent, and the extent of taxation represents an enormous burden placed on the country in favour of the manufacturers. The hon. Minister congratulated the country on a reduction of the taxation by 76 cents a head, almost wholly by the removal of the taxes from sugar; and he was artful enough, in showing this advantage, to select certain years for purposes of comparison. He selected, to compare with 1892, the years 1882, 1883, 1887 and 1889. But I contend that that is not a scientific nor an accurate manner in which to make comparisons as to the rate of taxation or as to the real burden of taxation. Our resources vary so greatly from year to year that I think a series of years should always be taken, if we are to measure our progress upwards or downwards. If we take the five years, from 1869 to 1873, when we had a revenue tariff, we find that the average Customs taxation per head was $3.14, while for the five years, from 1883 to 1887, it was $4.60 per head. For the ten years, from 1869 to 1878, it was $3.29 per head, while for the ten years, from 1883 to 1892, it was $4.68 per head. For the five years of the Liberal Administration, from 1874 to 1878, the average was $3.44 per head, while during the last five years, from 1888 to 1892 it was $4.77 per head. The average for 1892 was larger than that of 1890, that of 1885, that of 1886 and about the same as that of 1881. Consequently there is not much to boast of, and next year may show an altogether different story. But taking the average, we find that the customs taxation per head for 1892 represents an increase of $1.12 over that of 1878. The percentage of duty on goods dutiable and free from 1869 to 1873, representing an era of revenue tariff, was $12.30, whereas from 1883 to 1892, the era of protective tariff, it was $19.88 per head. The amount of duty paid by the people between 1888 and 1892 was $22,808,144 per annum; from 1883 to 1887 it was $20,477,732, showing that during the last five years, notwithstanding the abolition of the duty on sugar, the yearly increase has been $2,231,000 in customs taxation alone. Look at the Liberal period of 1874 to 1878, which averaged in customs duties $13,592,104, less than the yearly average of the last five years by $9,216,040. The total customs duty collected during the five years of the Liberal Administration was $67,960,523, against $114,040,723 during the last five years, or an increase of $46,080,200. But taking customs and excise together, to tell the whole story of the enormous increase in the burdens of taxation on the people of the country, and we find the yearly average during the Liberal Administration to have been $18,997,668, while the yearly average from 1888 to 1892 was $29,827,662, an increase in these five years over those of the Mackenzie Administration of over $54,000,000, representing a total excess of taxation in the thirteen years of the protective tariff of $106,189,967; and yet we are informed that this tariff does not represent any increase of burden on the people of the country. I am very gratified, and I presume the people of the country are very gratified, at the reduction of taxation on sugar. Let us see the effect of that reduction, as showing how the removal of an enormous burden affects the comfort and the happiness and the welfare of the people. The quantity of sugar imported into the country in 1891 was 197,163,919 pounds, on which was paid a duty of $3,138,894. The duty was practically removed, and there was then imported 345,418,485 lbs. of sugar. If we had time to go over the whole period of the sugar duties, we should obtain some conception of the amount of which the people have been deprived by the enormous taxation on that article. It conduced to their comfort and happiness, and the cheapness and economy of living, to have this important article made free. How much more would it have contributed to their happiness and welfare if during the whole thirteen years of this high tariff policy the duty had been wholly removed or greatly reduced. The enormously increased consumption is due to the reduced price to consumers, caused partly by the reduction of the duty and partly by improvements in the methods of manufacture and development of the industry. This must have afforded the people a large amount of happiness and comfort growing out of these improved conditions. And in many particulars, even if the duties had been decreased, perhaps the revenue of the country might not have been so greatly affected. To give one illustration: We find that between 1874 and 1878 we introduced 536,886,314 pounds of sugar, which was valued at $26,427,930. During the years from 1887 to 1891 the amount consumed very largely increased, but the value was about the same, showing that the cost of sugar had largely decreased, owing to the circumstances to which I have referred. 997,256,703 pounds of sugar, valued at $26,045,635 were imported, but the duty upon practically the same value of sugar was, in the first period, $11,115,507; and, in the second period, $16,267,027, showing an increase of duty upon the same value of sugar of over $5,000,000 levied upon the consuming sections of the country. And yet we are taught, by inference at any rate, that somewhat the same results would not accrue to these classes, if the burdens on other articles of ordinary use and consumption were removed. If the burdens were reduced, the consumption would be greater, and the revenue, while not so much increased, would not bear so heavily on the people; and if the burdens were completely taken away, the people would consume larger quantities, because they could buy more cheaply. The whole question, however, resolves itself substantially into this: the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as contrasted with the policy of the Administration. The policy of the Government is substantially to continue the National Policy—to retain the features of our present tariff indefinitely—because no one supposes that our Finance Minister will not be controlled by the parties who are supporting him now, and whose support depends on his retention of a high tariff. The policy of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is supported not only by members on this side, but by some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side as well. We take the ground that the present tariff bears heavily and unjustly on the consuming classes, and ought to be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of freer trade and that the amount of taxes collected be limited to the sum required to meet the necessities of the Government efficiently and economically administered. I need not dwell upon the false line of argument so frequently taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, in charging that we are advocates of free trade for the Dominion. A large portion of the Liberal party believe in free trade, as a reasonable and natural condition of things, if we could possibly have it; but the term "free trade," as used in this discussion, ought always to be considered to mean simply that system of trade which does not tax any commodities for the benefit of any privileged classes or individuals, but taxes them solely for the benefit of the whole community, as represented by the public treasury. Free trade or the introduction of all commodities absolutely free from any tax would be impossible in any country; and to call attention to the difficulties of revenue, as if that has anything to do with the position taken by hon. gentlemen on this side, is entirely aside from any rational or practical discussion of financial matters. It is in the direction of freer trade that we are moving, and the whole history of the Liberal party, during its term of office, and when in opposition, shows that they have been always in favour of the freest possible trade that could be obtained by our people, having regard to the revenue requirements of the country. There never was a time when the Liberal party did not recognize the importance of preserving our revenue, and of having such a revenue as would meet all the needs and requirements of the country. But those needs and requirements alone should be the ground and basis on which taxation should be levied, and no portion of taxation should be taken from the people for the purpose of assisting any one class or individual to attain wealth at the expense of another. The causes of the discontent which exists today were faithfully pointed out when this National Policy was inaugurated, and afterwards on every opportunity given the Liberal party placed itself on record in the Journals of the House. In April, 1879, Mr. Mackenzie introduced a resolution setting forth :

That, while this House is prepared to make ample provision for the requirements of the public service and the maintenance of the public credit, it regards the scheme now under consideration as calculated to distribute unequally, and therefore unjustly, the burdens of taxation ; to desist capital from its natural and most profitable employment, to benefit special classes at the expense of the whole community—tend towards rendering futile the costly and persistent efforts of the country to secure a share of the immense and growing carrying trade of this continent, and to create an antagonism between the commercial policy of the Empire and that of Canada, that might lead to consequences deeply to be deplored.

That resolution is in the same spirit as the one now before the House. Throughout the whole history of these discussions, we find placed before us proposition after proposition of the Liberal party looking to revenue reform, looking to wider extension of trade with our neighbours to the south, looking to obtaining larger markets for the people. This leads us to consider the question of reciprocity. The records of the Liberal party and the Conservative party on that question have been before the people of Canada for a long time. I will not go over the whole history, but I think its concluding chapters are among the most melancholy which any loyal and high-spirited Canadian could possibly conceive. We were promised certainly, if anything ever was promised, that the National Policy would bring about reciprocity with the United States. Our interests commercially are intimately connected with the people of that country. We have an enormous amount of resources, which they require and will take from us at a profitable rate of exchange. We require many of their products, and an interchange mutually profitable would develop an enormous trade between the two countries to our benefit in almost every direction. There has consequently always been a desire on the part of the Liberal party for reciprocity with the United States, and a pretension on the part of the Government and their supporters of a desire equally strong. At any rate the first resolution moved in 1878 in favour of the National Policy directly, was by Sir John Macdonald, in which he stated that the tariff should be readjusted "in the direction of reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours that will greatly tend to procure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade." Now, the tariff policy of the Government was to produce reciprocity of trade. That tariff policy has been adhered to for fourteen years, and the door is closed more strongly against us than ever before by the action of this very Government. The door has been closed against all reciprocity of trade and the reasons are very few and very simple. In the first place the Government has not been sincere, has not been candid, has not been courteous to the neighbouring Republic in its treatment of this important question. Every election that has been held in this country since the accession to power of gentlemen opposite has been in a great degree run upon false pretenses. I shall not go over the ground of the first election or the promises held out to the people that reciprocity would be secured. But the second election was said to be held for the direct purpose of establishing the National Policy, as hundreds of millions of foreign capital were waiting for investment in this country as soon as a National Policy was known to be finally established. The Government came back with a substantial majority ; but the enormous influx of capital never took place, and was not expected by them to take place. The people were deceived on every hustings into believing that these millions were only awaiting a result favourable to the Government in the election in order to come in and build up the industries of this Dominion. But the last election, sprung upon the people, was certainly the climax of official dishonesty and humiliation to the people of this country, who hoped and expected of the Government at any rate such proper appreciation of their position as would prevent them from stooping to anything unfair or dishonourable. The reasons given for the appeal to the people were stated in the official organ of the party, and thus spread throughout the country by every Government official organ and by every Government speaker. They were that negotiations had been going on with the United States and that :

If the negotiations are to result in a treaty which must be ratified by the Parliament of Canada, it is expedient that the Government should be able to deal with a Parliament fresh from the people, rather than with a moribund House.

They were very anxious to deal with a new House in order to have the treaty which they were negotiating, or the legislation necessary to carry the treaty into effect, supported in the new legislature. The organ went on to say :

It is understood that Canada will send a delegation to Washington after March 4th, the date on which the life of the present government expires, for the purpose of discussing informally the question of the extension and development of trade between the United States and Canada, and the settlement of all questions of difference between the two countries. This delegation will visit the United States capital, it is said, as the result of a friendly suggestion from Washington.

Here we have a statement in the Government organ, the "Empire," taken as an inspired statement by the parties supporting the Administration, no person in the country being in a position to contradict it, that Canada had been invited to Washington to negotiate a reciprocity treaty. We knew nothing of the intrigues, the solicitation, or pressure brought to bear upon the United States to get them to give their acquiescence to authorize the Canadian commissioners to go to Washington. But it was sprung on the people that Canada had been invited to discuss reciprocity, because the Government knew that if there was one thing the people ardently desired it was closer trade relations with the United States, and so they placed themselves on record on that occasion as agreeing in their burning zeal for trade relations with the United States with the party that confronted them. They had the additional advantage, as it was supposed, taking the word of their organ and their speakers, of having an official position and of being invited to prepare a treaty upon such a basis as might be agreed upon. The High Commissioner hurried over from England and very improperly hurled himself with all his enormous energy and great ability into that campaign, and in that famous speech in Toronto which opened the campaign, with a great deal of dash and enthusiasm, he inspired his followers with the idea that they were about to secure a reciprocity treaty with the United States. After defining his position, the High Commissioner in that speech on the 18th of February, said it was monstrous for anybody to say that he had not been the ardent friend of reciprocal arrangements with the United States. He went on :

I say, Sir, that the means of obtaining fair reciprocal trade arrangements with the United States would be utterly defeated, if the party who were now professing to carry out a thing they knew to be an utter delusion, could obtain power. But, Sir, with my right hon. friend sustained, as he will be, when he goes down on the 4th March to Washington, in response to the invitation received from the United States, of which I am able to speak personally (applause), when he goes down there, strengthened by the electors of Canada, then, I say, the prospects are very good indeed.

Here was a cool, deliberate statement of a leading statesman of the country, a man of enormous strength of will representing the Government as fully as the Prime Minister represented the country, declaring that they would go to Washington in response to an invitation received from the United States. Mark the sequel. The elections were over and the same High Commissioner in a different tone now writes to his chief of the interview with Mr. Blaine, and says :

Mr. Blaine also said that he did not agree with the references which had been made by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper, during the elections, as to what had taken place concerning the initiation of the proposed informal discussion between the Dominion and the United States representatives. The invitation, Mr. Blaine contended, had come from Sir Julian.

He wrote further :

I told Mr. Blaine that I wished at the outset to recognize the accuracy of the statement contained in his letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote, which I had seen, in reference to the initiation of the negotiation regarding reciprocal trade arrangements between the two countries—that I believe it arose from the negotiations which had recently taken place between the United States and Newfoundland and the desire expressed by Canada to be included in any arrangement such as had been understood to have been contemplated by the United States and Newfoundland, and that upon that being communicated to him by Sir Julian Pauncefote, he had expressed his willingness to open negotiations for reciprocal trade relations between Canada and the United States.

I said that the fact that he had expressed his readiness to receive the representations that Canada wished to make would show that he was quite open to consider that question.

And so this humiliating episode passed over. The Government of Canada officially stated that which was not true. They had intrigued, caucused, begged and negotiated for an unofficial interview and that had been assented to by the United States in the person of Mr. Blaine. Yet the people of the country were made to believe the contrary, and did not know until after the election that they had received no invitation from the United States and that they had merely forced this matter in order that they might have some cry on which to go to the country. When the delegates, subsequently, after several postponements of the debate or conference upon the subject of reciprocity, were prepared again to meet the Government at Washington, the Secretary of State was obliged to beg in advance that the subject might not become public as it had before. This promise was given. But they had no great reason for publicity as no election was pending and no publicity was given further than that given in this House, and that has been very inadequate. It is much to be regretted that we have not yet seen an official statement of the interview between our Government and the Government of the United States in regard to reciprocity on the last occasion on which our commissioners went to Washington. When that report comes down we will be in a position to judge as to the correctness of the recollections of that episode as between our own Ministers and the Ministers of the United States. At present, suffice it to say, there is a discrepancy, there is an assertion from one side and a denial from the other, which, taken in connection with the false representations made by our Ministers at the time of the elections, leave us in a very doubtful position as to the correctness of any statement that may be made by our own Ministers. We find that the Minister of Finance, in his statement of the interview, gives Parliament an altogether different impression of the attitude of the Government of the United States from that given by the official statement from the other side of the line. The terms and conditions upon which a reciprocity treaty could be negotiated are stated in a different manner by each of these high contracting parties. Who are we to accept? Are we to accept an administration which has once before been obliged, through its mouth-piece, to admit that it had inaccurately represented the state of affairs previous to the elections; or are we to admit that statements directly opposite to those of our own Ministers are correct? Now, this point has been reached; all parties in this country profess to be eager for a reciprocity treaty with the United States. The Liberal party have placed upon record that they are willing to enter into negotiations for a treaty without restriction as to the articles which shall be admitted to and fro free of duty between that country and our own. It is a gross misrepresentation to state the attitude of the Liberal party as it has been frequently stated in this discussion, that because they favour the opening up of the whole question, unrestricted as to the articles which shall enter into the negotiations, in order that we may be perfectly free to discuss the whole question upon terms fair and honourable, having full regard to our tariff and revenue requirements—I say it is absurd to state that the Liberal party is in favour of so emasculating, of so destroying our opportunities for obtaining a revenue, that we must raise it by direct taxation. We contend that there are ample means left for raising a revenue after agreeing upon a treaty admitting natural products as well as manufactured goods to and fro between the two countries, that we are bound to preserve, and will preserve, ample verge and room for raising all the revenues required for carrying on the services of this country efficiently and economically. But an insuperable barrier has been raised by our own Ministry, by our own Government, against the formation of a reciprocity treaty with the United States, by their persistent assertion of a principle which I, at any rate, and a large number of the Liberal party, think to be unfounded as a matter of political economy, and to be unnecessary as a matter of patriotism, namely, that we shall not in any degree, or in the slightest extent, discriminate against Great Britain. I believe we are as free to discriminate against Great Britain as we are free to discriminate against any other country, and that it is to assert an uneconomic principle and a financial slavery to the mother country, to say that we are not to arrange our financial affairs, that we are not to regulate our tariffs in the interest of Canada instead of in the interest of the mother country. I believe the interests of Canada should be paramount to the interests of any other country. Is it reasonable to suppose that because we admit the principle that the interests of Canada must be paramount, and that we shall be perfectly free to arrange a treaty without reference, in the first place, to the interests of Great Britain, that we must necessarily ignore the interests of Great Britain, that we must necessarily arrange a tariff antagonistic to Great Britain? I say it is a libel upon the loyalty of the Liberal party, it is a libel upon the good sense of the Liberal party, it is a libel upon their desire for the welfare of this country, to suppose that they would enter into such a treaty as would endanger the interests of Great Britain with regard to its trade with Canada. We are as proud of the motherland and as satisfied with her care and protection over us, as regards her fleet and her army, and as regards her Imperial position, as gentlemen upon the opposite side of the House. We have as high a regard for the interest of the mother country as they have. But in doing so, we take the position that we should regulate the fiscal affairs of Canada primarily with reference to the interest of the consumers and of the manufacturers of this country. Our first duty is to the people of Canada; our second duty is to the people of the mother country, and having kept in view our close political, social and commercial relations, is it reasonable to suppose that when the Canadian commissioners sit down with the commissioners of the United States to arrange a treaty by which the natural products shall be admitted backwards and forwards between the two countries free of duty, and by which certain manufactured products shall also be admitted free of duty, that wherever it may be to our interests and not particularly antagonistic to the interests of Great Britain, we shall not, to a certain extent, discriminate against Great Britain? The policy of discrimination as regards the mother country has never been frowned upon as a principle; it is only when we came to apply it to details that there has been here and there an objection. The principle of discrimination has been assumed in our treaties with foreign countries, and the principle once admitted, it only requires patriotic men, sensible men, to arrange such a treaty as will meet the interests of the people of Canada and satisfy the strict demands of the people of the mother country. I desire, before closing, to refer to an episode which occurred in an earlier portion of the debate in which my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), was attacked by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). My hon. friend from Queen's had referred to the influence of the National Policy upon the Maritime provinces, and its failure to build up prosperity in those provinces. This failure is so conspicuous that I am surprised that an hon. gentleman from the centre of Ontario should have undertaken to contradict the position which he assumed. The hon. member for Centre Toronto made some extraordinary statements and misrepresentations of the position taken by my hon. friend. He said that my hon. friend had attributed the decline of the shipping interests of the Maritime provinces to the National Policy, and then he proceeded to argue that that depression was caused by other considerations entirely. Now, I will read from the remarks of my hon. friend from Queen's on this point:

The hon. gentleman stated that we ought to be proud, and that we ought to congratulate ourselves upon the marvellous increase in the shipping of this Dominion, that there had been such an enormous increase in the tonnage of the shipping to carry off the produce of this Dominion. So far, so good. There has, no doubt, been an increase; but is it an increase upon which we ought to congratulate ourselves? Let us examine the figures and see. In 1873 the registered shipping of this Dominion was 1,073,718 tons; in 1878 it had reached high-water mark, and was 1,333,015 tons, being an increase of 259,297 tons in those five years.

Then he proceeded to show the falling off in the tonnage of the shipping of the Dominion, and of the loss that accrued thereby to the people of the Dominion, more particularly to the people of the Maritime provinces, who were the principal owners of the tonnage, and he said, not that the tonnage had fallen off in consequence of the National Policy, but hon. gentlemen opposite had said that the National Policy had increased enormously the value of the shipping interest and increased the welfare of the people of the Maritime provinces in that direction, which was not correct. But the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) made the most amusing statement in contradiction of the position assumed by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and as it may mislead some of his bucolic friends in Ontario during future elections, I will correct it here, so that both he and those who read his speech may obtain the benefit of further information. The hon. gentleman said that the falling off in shipping was caused by circumstances over which the Government had no control. I am amused to notice that whenever there is a decrease in prices, or in commodities, or in any direction whatever, hon. gentlemen opposite denounce the idea that the Government could possibly have any control over such matter. If the export trade had fallen off, it would have been argued that it could not be laid to protection. When the export trade increased and the quantity of our grain shipped was large, and good prices were obtained, hon. gentlemen opposite congratulated themselves that they had done it all. So when shipping increased, they claimed it was a result of the National Policy; but if it fell off, or, in fact, if any other trade declined, then hon. gentlemen opposite shifted the burdens from themselves, and laid it on economic causes entirely beyond their control. In order to give an illustration of the alarming decline in shipping on account of the depression in which shipping interests of the Maritime provinces have been subjected to, the hon. member for Centre Toronto sent out to the reading-room for the Montreal "Witness," in order to call the attention of the House to some statistics that had caught his eagle eye. He invited the House to look at the great falling off in shipping. He said there are 80,000 steamships tied to the docks in different parts of the world. Then the hon. gentleman went on to enlarge in his own way on the subject, and offered amusing observations in regard to shipping. So soon as those figures caught my ear, I was satisfied that the hon. gentleman was labouring under a mistake, and that he had been led into error owing to his ignorance of the subject. When we know that instead of 80,000 steam vessels laid up, there are only 20,000 steam-ships in the world, we can see the absurdity of the hon. gentleman's position. I did not see the original article, but I presumed it mentioned 80,000 tons, which would represent about 40 vessels, which did not show so very great depression in the shipping interest. I conclude my remarks at the point at which the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Cameron) commenced, and that is the census and the exodus. That is a subject which hon. gentlemen opposite generally evade. It is a subject which hon. gentlemen opposite display a wonderful amount of ingenuity in explaining away. The hon. member for Richmond comforted himself for our small increase in population by the fact that China, Russia, Siberia and Tartary had had large increases in population, but they were very poor and distressed countries, suffering from a great many troubles which Canada, we trust, will never suffer from. It is true that China has increased enormously in population, and also that there is a great deal of poverty in that country. It is true that Siberia and Russia occupy the same position. But my hon. friend will recollect that all these countries are protectionist countries; that if China is suffering from poverty and all that goes with poverty, and if Russia is suffering from famine and poverty, it is not for want of a higher protectionist tariff policy. They are suffering to a large degree, I think, from the very fact that they had deliberately shut themselves out from communication with the world, and from those softening influences with which the freest possible trade would surround them, and introducing with it all the elements of civilization, and those other elements of education and culture which go to make a country happy and prosperous. But when we come to this Dominion, hon. gentlemen explain the decrease as shown in the census by intimating that the Government, as usual, had no control over the movement of population. The Government promised that they would stop the exodus. They pointed out that the exodus was one of the alarming features of the condition of affairs between 1874 and 1878, when the depression was general throughout the world, and Canada felt the effect of that depression to a very large extent. The exodus was to be stopped, and great benefit was to accrue to the country from the National Policy. But the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) has discussed the subject and endeavoured to show—I have not time to follow all his figures—that there was a great exodus between 1874 and 1878. Although he did not go so far as to minimize the exodus during the last ten years, yet he dwelt with special emphasis on the exodus from 1874 to 1878. I will quote to the hon. gentleman and to his friends the statements made by a gentleman who is as well acquainted as any one with the facts of the alleged exodus during that period. I refer to the evidence taken by a committee of the House in 1878 upon this subject, when Mr. John Lowe gave evidence. After giving the figures of the immigration into this country, and other particulars with respect to the growth and population in Canada during the previous five years, he made this statement :

It will be noticed from the percentage of decline that Canada has suffered far less from diminution in the number of emigrants than the United States, and also that the diminution of the emigration to Canada is much less than that of the emigration from Great Britain. This may be taken as a proof that we have obtained considerable numbers of emigrants from the United States.

During that period our emigration had fallen off less than emigration to the United States, and the figures can only be explained by an emigration into Canada from the United States. Later on during the same examination we find this statement. The question is:

Have you any means of ascertaining the extent of the exodus of our people to the United States, or elsewhere?

Mr. Lowe answered :

We have no means of obtaining a record of emigration from the country. The Statistical Bureau of Washington give some figures, but I do not know how they obtain them. I do not think there is now any exodus of our people to the labour markets of the United States. It is clear, from the reports published in the newspapers, that there has been little demand for labour there since the depression commenced in 1873. I read in a newspaper only the other day a report of a meeting of unemployed labourers in Boston, in which statements were made giving a much worse account than anything we have had in Canada. There is besides the ascertained fact which I have already stated of a very large emigration from the United States to Canada.

Q. I suppose those are immigrants who have come into Canada by way of New York and the Suspension Bridge?—A. No; about 6,400 immigrants from Europe came by the Suspension Bridge. It is believed those from the United States are to a great extent returned Canadians.

And so we find that although there was then a strong depression prevailing through the country, the balance of emigration was in favour of Canada. This careful and competent statistician of that day was of the opinion that owing to the depression that existed in the United States the balance on the whole was in favour of Canada; and this coming from an expert in that department, with a full knowledge of the facts, certainly should be received as the best evidence that could be given. At any rate, there is one thing certain, that whatever may be the cause, the exodus to the United States has increased instead of diminishing during the whole period of the National Policy; and although there was for a time a certain amount of prosperity in the Dominion, yet it did not present sufficient attractions to retain our young people here, and the country lost an enormous number of its population and we have not had that growth and progress not only which we had during the previous ten years, but which we had a right to expect, even in the view we take of it on this side of the House, from the National Policy. The Maritime provinces have progressed less than the neighbouring states of New England, and if we follow the line of demarcation between Canada and the United States any where we find that in every instance where we institute a comparison the growth of population has been strongly in favour of the United States, and this in face of a policy which its advocates promised would stop the exodus. And so, after all these years, we are brought face to face with conditions which demand the immediate action of Parliament in reforming the tariff so as to lift the burdens from consumers, in extending and widening our trade and in affording the people better opportunities of exchanging their products with their neighbours. But we are confronted with the alternative of a roving commission, disturbing trade, coming to no definite conclusion, open to the suspicion of making improper bargains in secret with privileged classes who have so far been chartered to fatten on the welfare of the community. This is given us as an alternative to that immediate action which Parliament should take for the relief of the people. But if Parliament should take the action demanded, take prompt and vigorous action, in a very short time all the evils which are lamented and complained of from one end of the country to the other would be removed, and our people would start out on the career of unexampled prosperity which Providence has placed within our reach, but of which unfortunately man in his blind and foolish courses, has attempted and almost succeeded in depriving us.

Mr. CHESLEY. Mr. Speaker, on rising for the first time in this House to make a few observations on the subject under discussion, I know and feel that the liberal measure of indulgence so freely accorded to new members will be extended to me on this occasion. I shall not at this late hour of the night, and after the lengthened discussion which we have heard, attempt to make anything like a lengthy speech. No matter how much I might desire to say on this question, I feel that the whole subject has been so thoroughly gone over and has been so completely thrashed out by the various speakers, that there is really nothing new to be said upon it. Therefore I shall make but very few remarks touching the question that has been discussed here for the past two weeks. Before doing so, I feel, Mr. Speaker, as though I should congratulate the hon. the Minister of Finance upon the speech he made in this House on the 14th day of this month. I have had the pleasure on many occasions of listening to the hon. gentleman, not only in this House but outside of this House, and, if my judgment is correct and my memory serves me aright, I have no recollection of any occasion on which I have heard the hon. gentleman make as able an effort as he did here on the 14th day of this month. I was proud of the man, and proud of the province that produces such men, especially when I remember that of the eight men who have occupied the position of Finance Minister since Confederation the small provinces down by the sea have given this Dominion four, two from New Brunswick and two from Nova Scotia. I might go further at this moment, and say that the little province of Nova Scotia has given to Canada her Premier. It is a source of gratification and pride to me to be able to look back and remember the large element of not only moderately able men, but men of decided ability which those provinces have sent here, who have since Confederation occupied seats on the Treasury benches of this House. I feel in saying this that I am simply stating what is entirely true as a matter of history. Now, Sir, prior to the delivery of the Budget speech in this House, several motions were placed upon the Order Paper having for their object the reduction of the duties on several articles, such as binder twine, agricultural implements, barbed wire and coal oil. I listened to the discussions on these questions as attentively as I could. I listened to the various arguments that were advanced for the reduction of the duties on those articles and the arguments advanced in favour of retaining the duties; and as the discussion went on I felt, and the further it went the stronger I felt, that the province of Ontario was the whole of the Dominion of Canada, and that there was nobody in the Dominion of Canada but the Ontario farmers—no classes deserving of any consideration at the hands of this House or at the hands of the Government in dealing with the tariff, other than the poor, down-trodden and oppressed farmers of the province of Ontario. Now, Sir, while I felt that the conclusion I had reached at the time was entirely correct, as the debate went on I changed my mind, and I have almost come to the conclusion now that the province of Ontario is the whole earth, if not the whole, very nearly the whole, and that there are no people on this globe but the down-trodden farmers of Ontario. While travelling through that great and rich province, I have seen nothing but prosperity on every hand. I have seen well cultivated fields, splendid houses and buildings, and evidences of prosperity on every hand, and when I heard the discussion with reference to these people in this Parliament I was more than surprised. However, the question presents itself to me in another form, and that is this: While these people are anxious that the duties should be reduced on all articles which the Ontario farmer uses in the production of his crop, they are quite satisfied that the duties imposed on all articles which he produces and which enter into consumption in other industries should be retained. They are anxious that the Ontario farmer should be protected and given the entire market of Canada. Take this illustration. Take the great lumber industry of this country, which has to pay a heavy duty on flour, beef and pork, and which consumes large quantities of these articles in the production of lumber. These articles are supplied very largely by the Ontario farmer. Are the Ontario farmers willing to have the duties reduced on them, or do they wish these duties to remain so that they may continue to control the entire Canadian market? It is not fair to the people engaged in the great lumbering industry that they should be obliged to buy their supplies from the Ontario farmer, and then have to go out into the markets of the world, where the law of supply and demand obtains to sell their products. That is the condition which is to be imposed upon us at the will of the Ontario farmers. Are there any other industries deserving the support of Parliament? I say there are. There are the great toiling masses of this Dominion. We have them with us in the shape of the men who go into the lumber camps, and we have our artisans, and our sailors, and all these toiling classes, who consume the farmers' products. These all buy your flour. You feed us entirely in the Maritime provinces, and yet you insist on the duty remaining on these products of yours, in order that our markets may be monopolized by you, while at the same time you want all the duties on the articles which you have to use in order to produce your crop remitted, such as the duties on agricultural implements, barbed wire and binder twine. This discussion has led me to the conclusion that the wisdom of the Government in deciding that during recess they will get all the information they can, with a view of dealing with this question in a fair and equitable manner—not from the point of view of the farmers alone, but from that of every class of the community—and come to Parliament with a measure during next session, cannot be doubted. We have in the Maritime provinces an industry which I consider next in importance to agriculture, the greatest industry we have in the Dominion. I refer to the lumber industry. All the articles that enter into the lumberman's camp are heavily taxed. The food which the lumbermen consume is heavily taxed. I am not objecting to that at present, but only arguing that it would be inconsistent on the part of this Parliament to take one set of duties off and allow the others to remain. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen who argue the other way, what is the difference between the farmer and the lumberman, from the point of view of production? The lumberman, after he supplies home demand, has to go into the foreign market with his products, where he must enter into competition with the products of all other countries, and where the law of supply and demand regulates the prices. Why should the farmers not be subject to the same conditions? And any system of legislation that will place them in a different position from other people is not fair to all classes in the community. I was more than pleased the other night when I heard the Minister of Finance declare that his Government was committed to the policy of reciprocity if such a policy could be secured on fair and honourable terms. I have always been in favour of a policy of reciprocity. I believe it would be a great advantage to this country, and the great republic to the south, and if I have been a strong supporter of the National Policy ever since it was inaugurated, I have been so because we could not help ourselves. I never had any hope, so long as the Republican party remained in power, of our being able to negotiate a policy of reciprocity with the United States. These gentlemen, whether they were right or wrong, succeeded in keeping themselves in office for many years on the cry, at any rate, that the protective tariff protected the labouring men of the country; that their system of protection kept these men from being reduced to a condition of pauperism such as existed among the same classes on the other side of the Atlantic. The majority of the people accepted that statement and voted to keep that party in power; and so long as that party could get in power and carry the country on that condition of things, just so long would they stick to it. In addition to that, they saw the country prosperous, its railway system extended from one end to the other, its wealth increasing, and they attributed that to the protective policy, and, whether right or wrong, they were not going to make any change. But there must be an end to everything. At the last general election they went to the country more fairly and squarely on the trade policy in that election than they ever did before, and as a natural result they got badly beaten. I think that the success of the Democrats at that election, if it teaches anything, teaches that the people came to the conclusion, that when they are obliged to go to a foreign market with the products of the soil and the mines and everything they have to sell, and compete against the producers of other countries, they should be allowed to buy what they require for their own necessities under the same conditions. I may be entirely mistaken, but that is the way it strikes my mind, and I do hope that when the new administration in the United States comes into power, there will be a disposition on the part of the American Government to have a fair treaty of reciprocity with the Dominion. I believe such a treaty will be of immense advantage to both countries. We used in the Maritime provinces to have the markets of the New England States for our lumber, lime, potatoes, agricultural products and coal, and it would be an immense advantage to us and increase the output of these articles very materially, and give an impetus to the coasting trade of these provinces, if we had such a treaty, and I was pleased when the Finance Minister made the statement that the Government stood committed to a policy of that kind, provided that the treaty could be got on fair and honourable terms. If such a treaty can be had I am prepared to support the party in getting in. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House very much longer this evening. It is very late. I do not know what I can say in reference to the National Policy or the trade question that I have not already said that would be new or interesting to the House. The whole thing has been threshed out. On one side figures have been given showing that the National Policy has ruined the country, while on the other side figures have been given showing that it has been a boon. We know the value of the statements made by extremists on either side, and for my part I do not take a great deal of stock in them. It matters little how eloquently they are put. I have my own opinion of these matters. There has been much said on this question; it has been placed before us in every shape, form and fashion. I have wondered at the ingenuity with which the matter has been spoken about for the last two weeks; I have wondered at the ingenuity of men, and the way they have treated the tariff question and the exodus, and the National Policy, and the blue ruin, and the country going to the dogs, and we all getting poor, until I have sometimes wondered if there was anybody left in the country at all. I am sure I listened to the hon. gentleman from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), and I really do not know what he was talking about; I would be much surprised to know that the hon. gentleman himself understood what he was talking about. His figures were mixed up, without head or tail, top or bottom, and, to make the matter worse, they were presented in such a way that I could not make anything of them. Under these circumstances, it is little or no use for any man to stand up here to talk to empty benches, or to people who have no interest in him if he has nothing new to say. The question has been threshed out, and has been presented to the country in every shape. I thank you for the very kind hearing you have given me in this my first attempt at speech-making. Had I spoken at an earlier stage I might have said something of interest, but others have said these things ahead of me, and I feel that I am out of the race at this stage of the debate. On some other occasion I hope I may get into harness before the debate has been robbed of its glory.

Mr. PERRY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we must go on a little longer. The idea is to close this debate to-morrow night. That would be impossible unless we agree to stay a little longer to-night. I think the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Perry) had better make his speech.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to make a remark in regard to my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Chesley). I undertook to lay before the House some facts and figures, but I could not give my hon. friend from St. John the capacity to understand them.

Mr. LAURIER. We can close the debate to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. All right; you are the men to close it.

Mr. LAURIER. I should say so.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.15 o'clock a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 28th February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery for the Dominion of Canada, for year ending 30th June, 1892, with a partial report for services during six months ending 31st December, 1892.—(Mr. Costigan.)

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 66) to incorporate the Grand Council of the Catholic Mutual Benefit Association of Canada.—(Mr. Devlin.)

Bill (No. 67) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the North Canadian Atlantic Railway and Steamship Company.—(Mr. Frémont.)

Bill (No. 68) respecting the Columbia and Kootenay Railway and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Mara.)

Mr. CHESLEY.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS—PRECEDENCE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That Government business have precedence on Thursdays, after questions put by members, for the remainder of the session.

Mr. LAURIER. I submit to the hon. gentleman that it seems to me this motion is altogether premature. If he will look at the Order Paper he will see that there are a very large number of Notices of Motion and of Bills, and if hereafter private members will only have two days in the week at their disposal, it is manifest that a great many of these Orders will have to stand over until another session. If I may be permitted to refer to a rumour which is floating about, I understand that we are to be deprived at an early date of the presence of the hon. gentleman, who is to extend his services to another sphere. Under such circumstances, I would have no objection, and I am sure the House will readily agree, that the Government should have Thursday of this week, so as to allow the hon. gentleman further opportunity to dispose of those matters with which he may be more intimately connected.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would be very glad to make such an arrangement as the hon. gentleman proposes, if it looked to taking Thursday as a Government day within any definite period. We are accustomed to hear a remonstrance against the first attempt to take a day, always, and we generally yield where there is a strong expression of a desire to have it continued for another week. I should be willing, if the House preferred, that we should take Thursday of this week, and leave Thursday of next week open to private members as usual, provided we agreed that after that it should be taken as a Government day.

Mr. LAURIER. If the hon. gentleman will take Thursday of this week, there will be no objection. But even after that, it will be premature for the Government to take Thursdays for the remainder of the time. After we have seen what progress we have made next week, we will see whether the Government ought to take the day.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection to accept that suggestion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would suggest to the First Minister that it might be convenient to arrange that all those motions which are absolutely unopposed, and on which there will be no discussion, should be allowed to pass without questioning.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We can agree at any time to let the unopposed motions pass.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand the motion is amended so that Government business have precedence on Thursday, the 2nd March, after questions put by members.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MANITOBA SCHOOL CASE.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the attention of the hon. gentleman to a rumour which has spread through the public press, that an Order in Council has been passed referring the Manitoba school question to the Supreme Court. I would ask the hon. gentleman if that is the case, and if so, if he will lay this Order before the House at once?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. An Order has been passed referring the decision of the Governor in Council to me, with certain preliminary questions connected with the subject, so that a case may be stated for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada. The Order in Council will be laid on the Table to-morrow. However, I ought to mention that the Order itself does not state the case, but invites the Government of Manitoba and the counsel for the petitioners to confer with the Government as to the form of the case and the nature of the questions which ought to be included.

THE CENSUS ENUMERATORS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to inquire if the instructions given to the census commissioners have yet been laid on the Table?

Mr. FOSTER. They have not, but I have made a requisition to have them down soon.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. Minister referred the other day, as reasons for not disclosing the information, that certain parties were sworn to secrecy. Will the hon. Minister state on what authority that obligation of secrecy has been imposed upon certain officers connected with the census, and for what reasons?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. member refers to me, he is mistaken in attributing that argument to me.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; it was to the Minister of Finance.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose the form of the affidavits will accompany the instructions.

Mr. FOSTER. I will bring down the instructions and forms of affidavits, and all papers in connection with the matter that can be brought down, to-morrow, and the hon. gentleman will see what there is to be seen.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I asked the hon. gentleman to state on what authority this obligation of secrecy was imposed. Will that be communicated as well, or will the hon. gentleman state that now?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot state that now.

Mr. MULLOCK. Will the Minister of Finance say if the papers he will lay on the Table in connection with the census will show what authority the Government had for withholding information as to the details of the census?

Mr. FOSTER. I said I would lay on the Table the instructions under which the census enumerators did their work, which will give that information.

Mr. MULLOCK. I understand the Government to take the ground that the census enumerators are not at liberty, and that the Government is not at liberty, to disclose details, and that there is some oath of secrecy that prevents even the Government from making that information public. If so, I think the House ought to have that information. There does not appear to be anything in the law warranting such an attitude. I presume they have got a new law which is not on the Statute-book.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. LAURIER. I would ask the Government if they are ready to-day to give us any idea of the tenor of the treaty with France, or if they are prepared to lay that treaty upon the Table?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We expect to be able to lay that treaty on the Table at the end of the week.

CHARGES AGAINST SIR ADOLPHE CARON.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask the Government when we may expect to have the papers connected with the Caron Commission, the evidence in which was laid before the House some time ago, in order to be printed? When may we expect to have that printed for distribution among the members? It seems to me it has taken a very long time to get it ready.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not know, I am sure. That is not a matter we have under our control. I will make inquiry, and let the hon. gentleman know.

Mr. EDGAR. One of the Government departments has the printing under its control.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am under the impression that it is just about ready; but I will be able to speak more definitely to-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. PERRY. Allow me to congratulate the House that the end of the debate which has occupied two weeks is in sight. Let me also congratulate the Government on that fact, for if the debate was continued a few days longer the Minister of Finance would not have a majority to carry his motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means. Hon. members on this side of the House have made no attack on the tariff in detail; they have attacked the National Policy as a whole, and they are prepared to stand by the position they have taken in that regard. Some hon. gentlemen opposite are, however, willing to attack one article and another article of the tariff. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) is not, however, willing to attack the National Policy structure in any particular. The hon. gentleman declares that if one item is attacked, the whole structure may fall. I do not understand how he reconciles this view with the view adopted by his leader, who appears to be willing to take two bricks out of the structure. Let me tell the hon. member for Inverness that when those bricks are removed he had better be some distance away, otherwise the whole structure may fall on him. It will be interesting to know how hon. gentlemen opposite will make their speeches and votes harmonize; they must reconcile their votes and their acts with their constituents. The hon. member for Inverness stated that the farmers, including the poorer classes of farmers, are well protected under the National Policy. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by protection to the farmer. I am not very well acquainted with the hon. gentleman's county, although I travelled over it a few years ago, but I know how the farmers are protected in Prince Edward Island, and I suppose the farmers receive the same protection in Inverness as in Prince county. I find, on referring to the returns, that the farmers are protected on agricultural machinery to the extent of 35 per cent. The farmers of Inverness probably have not much farm machinery, including haycutters and binders, but in Prince Edward Island such is not the case. There we have more farming implements and machinery than any other portion of Canada with the same population, and this machinery is protected by a duty of 35 per cent. I find also that the ordinary stoneware used by the poorer classes is protected by 35 per cent. Forks and hay rakes, which are used by farmers, to which the hon. gentleman refers, are also protected by 35 per cent. I find also that the richer classes are better off than the poorer classes in this regard, for china and silver and gold plate, used by the rich, are only protected to the extent of 30 and 20 per cent respectively. That, I suppose, is the protection meted out for the benefit of the farmers, to which the hon. member for Inverness refers. Jewellery is only protected to the extent of 25 per cent, while spades and shovels, used by farmers and labourers, are protected by a duty of 46 per cent. Forks and hay rakes, which are used by the poorer classes, and are not used by lawyers, merchants or doctors, or even by the hon. member himself during many years, are protected by 33 per cent. Hay-knives that cost $3.15 each pay a duty of $2.59, which is equal to 79 per cent. That is the protection meted out to the farmers, and yet the hon. gentleman declares that under the National Policy the farmers are well protected. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman in this view. I do not intend to detain the House by entering into statistics, for in discussing hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars it is quite easy to go astray. The hon. member for Inverness, the Minister of Finance, and the supporters of the Government all declare that we must have a National Policy, and that the country cannot do without the large revenue. Let hon. members look for one moment at what is done with the revenue. I find that last year the advertising and printing in Conservative newspapers in Canada cost $236,975. The public have a right to know why this large amount was paid to those papers. The Montreal "Gazette," for example, received last year $17,376. I suppose there is a reason for that expenditure. I presume the owner of that paper is a supporter of the Government, and that it is necessary to subsidize that organ. The Monoton "Times" received $12,271. The Halifax "Herald," another good Tory paper, received $9,505. The St. John "Sun," another good Tory sheet, obtained $13,875. The Quebec "Chronicle" received $4,277, and at the bottom of the page I find, Regina "Leader," $4,512. The total payments amounted to $236,975, this sum being paid to these and other newspapers throughout Canada, all being Tory newspapers, no doubt. It is interesting to take the newspapers of Prince Edward Island, and inquire how the Tory press has been subsidized there. We find that the Charlottetown "Examiner" received last year for advertising $147. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a very small amount for a newspaper in Prince Edward Island which is the Government mouthpiece in that province. The "Examiner" also got for advertising, last year, $1,184.50, which is a little better. The Charlottetown "Herald," another Tory paper, got, for printing and advertising, $885; and the Summerside "Journal," another Tory paper, received $1,118.85; or the Tory papers of that province got altogether, last year, $4,035.65, which is 75 per cent of the amount that the Government is willing to spend in repairing, and, I may say, building the wharfs and piers around the whole coast of Prince Edward Island. The Tory press of the province got, for printing and publishing, last year. 75 per cent of the whole amount expended for repairing the wharfs and piers of the province. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech, told us that he saw the necessity for changing the tariff, that the National Policy, under the present tariff, was not a success, that it was sick, and that it was condemned by the tax-payers of Canada. We find that the feeling against the National Policy has spread among the supporters of the Government in this House. We find hon. gentlemen on the opposite side joining with members on this side of the House in urging strenuously the removal of the duty on binder twine. We find them willing to wipe off the duty on coal oil, and the duty on corn; but, Mr. Speaker, as I said awhile ago, to my mind that is an unfair way of attacking the National Policy piecemeal. Why not attack the whole National Policy? I believe the country is ripe to receive a sweeping change in the whole National Policy, but my friend the Minister of Finance says: We will follow a policy of procrastination, we will follow a policy of to-morrow; let the National Policy stand the sickness for another twelve months, and at the end of twelve months we will try to apply a remedy. I can tell the hon. gentleman, and he knows it himself, that the note of warning has already been sounded in the country, and that he will be obliged to reform the National Policy, perhaps more than he thinks he will. I find that the manager of the "Empire" has already sent out his circulars in reference to this matter. The manager of the "Empire," the mouthpiece of the Government, published in Toronto, why, a child of the Government, a paper that is nursed by the Government, a paper that feeds on the Government pap; I find that the manager of the "Empire" publishes—not in his own paper, because, I was going to say, he was too mean to do that; but he got some other paper to publish it, and what do we find in that circular? This circular, be it remembered, was not addressed to the tax-payers of Canada, but to the tax-gatherers of Canada, to the minority in Canada who live by becoming millionaires at the expense of the tax-payers. Mr. Creighton, the manager of the "Empire" says in his circular that it is not for publication, and he wants to keep the matter in the dark. That circular may have been promoted by the Minister of Finance, for all I know. However, I will not accuse him of having done so, but I have almost come to the conclusion that Mr. Creighton got his inspiration from high quarters. The circular is printed, I understand, and a blank is left for the name of the party to whom it is intended to be sent, as it is addressed generally to all the manufacturers in the country. It reads in this way:

TORONTO, Feb. 20, 1893.

DEAR SIR,—The recent defeat of the Republican party in the United States has precipitated a formidable agitation here for sweeping away the protection our native industries have enjoyed for the past fourteen years, and which has done so much to build them up.

He insinuates here, or rather he says in plain words, that the National Policy has actually built up these industries, and that the manufacturers have made a fortune out of them, and he points to the fact that the defeat of the Republican party in the United States is a blow at the vital parts of this National Policy. It goes on to say:

The announcement of the Finance Minister has postponed legislative action of tariff matters until next session of the House, but the free trade agitation will now be carried on with redoubled vigour, and the intervening time will be the most critical for the National Policy that it has ever had to encounter.

There is a warning contained in this, and that is the part of the circular on which I almost come to the conclusion that it has been advised or dictated by the Finance Minister himself:

As you are aware, the "Empire" has during the past five years been fighting the battle of our industries against those who would smash them, and in the impending struggle will continue to do so.

He intends here to fight for the National Policy in the future as he has done in the past, and that policy, propounded by the manager of the "Empire," is, I suppose, the sentiment of the present Government. It is a policy not in the interests of the tax-payers of the country, but altogether in the interest of the tax-gatherers.

But that we may do so with greatest effect, we desire to have as great a knowledge of the condition of our various industries as it is possible to obtain.

He only wants to have information as to the industries. He does not want to know how the fishermen, the artisans, or the labourers, or how the farmers get on, but he is altogether anxious about how the monopolists are doing. He goes on further and says:

Will you kindly let me know, not for publication, but for information, in connection with the line you represent, whether a reduction in duty might be made without prejudicially affecting your business, or are you in a position to stand alone, as it is claimed our "infant industries" ought now to do? If the protection now afforded ought to remain as high as it is, briefly state reasons, and oblige,

Yours faithfully,

D. CREIGHTON.

He asks them, are they able to go on without protection? He is very anxious about that, but he does not want to know how the great majority of the people of this country, the farmers, the labourers and the fishermen are getting along now without protection, as they have got along in the past without it, while, at the same time, they have had to bear more than their share of the taxes. Now, Sir, that is like the Government asking Caesar to give judgment against Caesar, or asking Caesar to give an opinion in favour of Caesar. He is not asking the artisan or the farmer; he is merely asking the manu-
