FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 1) respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.—(Sir John Thompson.)

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER laid on the Table a copy of the Speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor-General to both Houses of Parliament in the Senate Chamber this day, which is as follows:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In meeting you at the commencement of another session of Parliament, it affords me pleasure to congratulate you on the continued progress which the history of the past year unfolds with regard to Canada.

The increase in trade, as illustrated by the exports and imports during the period for which the official returns have been prepared, has been most gratifying and that increase has continued down to the present time, with promise that the volume of trade during the current year will exceed that of any year in the history of the Dominion.

The revenues of the country have likewise provided for all the services for which Parliament has made appropriation, and the operation of the Government railways has been less burdensome, as regards the difference between income and expenditure than has been the case for a long term of years previously.

In Manitoba and the North-west Territories, the increase in immigration has been decidedly encouraging, both as regards the number of persons who have come from other countries, and as regards the number of homestead entries made by settlers of all nationalities.

Measures have been taken to carry into effect the agreements arrived at with the United States on the subjects of the boundary of Alaska, boundary line in Passamaquoddy Bay, and the prevention of destructive methods of fishing and the preservation and increase of fish life. With regard to reciprocity in wrecking and towing, a correspondence has taken place which indicates that privileges are demanded for United States vessels in Canadian canals, which were not anticipated, but it is not impossible that a satisfactory conclusion of the discussion may yet be reached.

During the recess a friendly conference took place between delegates from my Government and from the Government of Newfoundland, on the questions which were pending between the two countries. It is hoped and expected that the interchange of views which then took place will be productive of beneficial results and lead to an amicable adjustment of those questions.

The Statutes of 1887 relative to a Department of Trade and Commerce and to the office of Solicitor-General having been brought into force, the appointments were made which were contemplated by these Acts.

It is to be regretted that the Government of the United States were unable to accept the suggestions made by my Government on the subject of canal tolls, and that the President should have thought it necessary to impose exceptional tolls on Canadians using the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, which has so long been free to the people of both countries. My Government, while ready to consider in a friendly spirit any proposals which may be made by the Government of the United States, have caused efforts to be made to hasten the completion of the Canadian canal works, which will soon afford to the commerce of the Dominion a highway within our own country.

Measures will be laid before you for the improvement of the Franchise Act, for the amendment of the laws relating to the civil service and the superannuation of civil servants, for regulating the admission of evidence in causes and matters under the control of the Parliament of Canada, for extending the system of voting by ballot to the North-west Territories, and for simplifying the laws relating to lands and land transfers in the Territories.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The Public Accounts of the past year and the Estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before you without delay, and I trust it will be seen that ample provision may be made for the public service without increasing taxation.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have every confidence that all these matters will receive your best attention, and that your deliberations will keep in view, above all other considerations, the welfare and stability of the country.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In consequence of the illness of the hon. leader of the Opposition, which I very much regret, but which I am glad to hear is not of a serious nature, I will move :

That the Address with which His Excellency has been pleased to open the session, be taken into consideration on Monday next, instead of to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

On Agriculture and Colonization, which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

ADJOURNMENT—DEATH OF MR. ARMSTRONG.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, before the House adjourns, it is my painful duty to announce the death of one of our colleagues, my esteemed friend Mr. Armstrong, member for the South Riding of Middlesex. This painful event occurred, I believe, yesterday afternoon. For myself, I can only say that I deeply regret the circumstance. Mr. Armstrong was one of those men who added to a long experience in municipal affairs, a very thorough practical knowledge of the affairs of this country, and, as every hon. gentleman here knows, not only was he very constant and faithful in his attendance on his duties in the House, but he was a man from whom we often received very valuable suggestions. He was one of those men of sterling worth and independence who do honour to any body to which they belong. I can only say with regard to Mr. Armstrong, that I believe, in him this House has lost a very valuable member, the people of Canada have lost a very valuable public servant, and the Reform party, of which he was a supporter, have lost a staunch and faithful friend. It is impossible for me to allow this occasion to pass without bearing my testimony to the faithful and diligent manner in which on all occasions Mr. Armstrong responded to his duties here. I trust that the condolence of our friends will be sent to his bereaved family at the earliest possible moment. This is, I think, the third or fourth death which has occurred amongst members from the province of Ontario on our side of the House. I believe hon. gentlemen on the other side have not been called upon to mourn the loss of any of their friends. It is a very painful circumstance that the opening of our session should be marked by an event of this kind, and I am quite certain that all hon. gentlemen opposite will join with me in the regret which I have expressed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am very glad indeed that the hon. gentleman has expressed in the terms he has his sense of the loss which the House and the country have sustained in the death of Mr. Armstrong, and I beg to say in addition that nothing which the political associates of that deceased member can say out of respect to his memory will fail to be cordially acquiesced in by the members on this side of the House. Ever since I have had the honour of a seat here I have regarded Mr. Armstrong with the highest esteem, and I have never heard any other sentiment expressed by any of the gentlemen with whom I act politically. We respected him exceedingly as a private gentleman, and even when he differed from us, as he almost always did strongly, we credited him with the greatest sincerity. We believe him to have been a patriotic and honourable public man, whose death has been a loss to the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 3.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 30th January, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech delivered at the opening of the session.

Mr. McINERNEY. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to move the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I may say that the novelty of the situation is somewhat embarrassing to me. That, I apprehend, is the orthodox, customary and proper thing to say on an occasion of this kind—orthodox, because I hold that you, Sir, and every other member of this House who has spoken under the same circumstances must have an unalterable belief in its truth; customary, because I know that, for over a quarter of a century, at least once a year, something very similar to this has been said here; and proper, because I deem it meet that a young member rising for the first time to address you, Sir, and this honourable body, representing as it is supposed to represent, the power and the intelligence of this broad Dominion, should wrap himself round with the mantle of modesty—

Let him not boast who puts his armour on,
Like him who takes it off, the battle done.

It is, therefore, Sir, with the greatest diffidence that I rise to endeavour to perform the task with which I have been overloaded. I would have shrunk from an attempt to perform it had it not been that I considered it would reflect some honour on the constituency which I represent—a constituency which on six different occasions I attempted to obtain the favour of and failed, succeeding only on the seventh attempt. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I have not arrived here at an earlier day—not on my own account or because I have any particular personal ambition; but, Sir, I regret that I lose, to a limited extent perhaps, the intellectual association with that great man who more than any other shaped the destiny and the legislation of this country for a number of years; I name the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. But, Mr. Speaker, his words still pulsate throughout this chamber, his memory is still rich throughout this country, and his works still speak loudly to the enemy in the gates. I regret also, and I think I may be permitted to express the regret, that I lose the association of that other great man, the ex-leader of the great Liberal party, Edward Blake. While we cannot say that he has gone to the same peaceful scenes, to which it may be hoped the spirit of his opponent has gone, we can say that he is carrying out a laudable ambition and a great design in taking back his high intellectual gifts to the solution of a great problem in the land of the Blakes and the O'Donnells. But, Sir, the regret which I have expressed is tempered with the reflection that the mantles of both of these great men have fallen upon worthy shoulders. It cannot be doubted that our friends—the enemy—have, in their present leader, a man of high character, chivalrous nature, and great eloquence, and that any position which they may take before the country will lose nothing from having it represented by him. As for the leader of the party to which I have the honour to belong, his great qualities require no comment and no praise from me. I may simply say to our friends, the Opposition, that, while in their last attempt to defeat the Government of Sir John Macdonald they imitated the example of Napoleon at Wagram and struck a tremendous blow at the centre, I hold that to defeat Sir John Thompson they will have to imitate Napoleon at Borodino and rout the whole line. Now, Sir, with these few preliminary remarks, I come to the matter of the Speech which was delivered from the Throne last Thursday. It tells us of the progress of the country; and, Sir, I think it is a gratifying fact that this chamber is able to answer that the country during the last year has certainly progressed. The progress of the country, it may be admitted, has not been marked by great leaps and bounds; but, Sir, it is a healthy progress. The quick-growing is the short-lived, Mr. Speaker; and the royal oak which from year to year lays its thin layers one upon the other is a thing of beauty and a joy for centuries. Now, Sir, is it true that the country has progressed? I claim that it is, and I claim that an examination of the trade returns of this country for the last year will show that it has progressed in a marked degree. I will refer, in the first place to the number of people employed in the manufacturing establishments of this country. In 1891 the number was 367,496, whereas in 1881, at the time of the previous census, we employed 112,561 less than that number. I think, Mr. Speaker, that that is a marked increase. In 1891 the railways of Canada carried the products of the country to the value of $21,753,021, while ten years before they only carried $12,065,323 worth. Coming to the exports and imports of the country, we find that in 1891 the exports amounted to $113,963,375 and the imports to $127,406,068; whereas ten years before the exports amounted to only $102,137,203 and the imports to $119,419,500. So that the total of the imports and exports for the last year was $241,369,445, a very large increase over the year immediately preceding, and exceeding the largest record made in this Dominion in any previous year, that of 1883, by $11,029,619. But that is not the whole truth, Mr. Speaker. If the policy of protection carries out the design of its framers, it must, other things being equal, cause the imports and the exports of the country passing through the custom-house to gradually decrease. By encouraging the manufacture in this country of a large number of products which previously we purchased abroad, it must necessarily decrease the imports; and by promoting the manufacture in this country of our own raw material, and having it expended among the wage earners and the increased population in the land, this policy must naturally decrease the exports. Then we have to take into account the decline in the value of goods during the past ten years, which has been something remarkable. Statisticians, and all the best authorities, tell us that this decline amounts to at least one-third, which will give some idea of the tremendous gain this country has made in the last ten years, both with respect to its exports and imports. There is one other point to which I desire to call your attention, Sir, in this connection, and it is that our farmers are putting the natural products of the country into manufactured products, and some members of this House may be surprised to learn that, in the year 1892, the dairy products of this country exported to England amounted to $12,708,407, while the dairy exports of the United States to England only amounted to $11,038,884, or $1,750,000 less from a country of 65,000,000 people than from a country of 5,000,000 people. With regard to the province from which I come, the province of New Brunswick, there are a few figures which I would like to submit to the House. We have been told that our industries are waning and that dry rot has settled down upon our province. The census figures, to which we are often invited to make reference, do not prove anything of the kind. What do these figures show with regard to the number of manufacturing establishments? In 1881 we had in New Brunswick only 3,117 manufacturing establishments; in 1891 we had 5,419, or nearly double the number. The amount of capital invested in these factories in 1881 was $8,425,282, and in 1891, $16,608,755, or nearly double. The number of employees in those manufactories in 1881 was 19,922, whereas in 1891 it reached 26,609. In 1881, the wages paid to those wage earners in those factories amounted to $3,866,011, and in 1891 they had risen to $5,936,021, while the value of the products increased from $18,512,058 in 1881 to $23,685,636 in 1891. With regard to the revenue and expenditure, which is the next point to which our attention is called in the Speech from the Throne, in 1891-92, the receipts on account of the consolidated fund amounted to $36,921,871, and the expenditure to $36,765,894, leaving a surplus of $155,977. The amount of that surplus, Mr. Speaker, shows that the finances of the country have been carefully looked after; it shows that the expenditure has been met and that no more has been taken out of the pockets of the people than was necessary for the carrying on of our public works. But the figures that I have submitted for the past year will be more than met satisfactorily by those for the year 1892, because I am informed that for the six months ending 31st December, 1892, the receipts on account of the consolidated fund amounted to $18,559,024, as against an expenditure of $13,842,497. I think that the financial standing of this country during the past year shows, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that this country has progressed, and progressed in a remarkable way. The next thing to which our attention is called is the admirable management of the Government railways. Instead of showing, as usual, a deficit of nearly half a million dollars, I am told the deficit will only be something like $7,000; but, although that deficit has been so decreased, I hope the decrease has not been effected at the expense of the efficiency of the service. I trust that an eye single will continue to be had to this great principle, that the bond of confederation between the Maritime Provinces and the western provinces is the Intercolonial Railway. The building and maintenance of that railway was one of the main conditions upon which we entered Confederation, and it would be a sad day when we would see the efficiency of that service destroyed or diminished in any degree. But I claim that no diminution has taken place, and that the efficiency of the service is not impaired; and the Railway Department deserves the greatest credit from the House and the country for the manner in which that service has been carried out during the past year. The next subject referred to is the immigration in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. We are told that has increased. We are told that there has been a strong movement of population into that country of late. It cannot be denied that the North-west rebellion had a very deterrent effect upon the settlement of that country, but we can now look for a larger immigration, and I am informed that the homestead entries last year were 50 per cent more than during the preceding year, and in advance of any year in the history of the country. There is another point in that connection to which I will refer. The statisticians of the United States inform us that the surplus of wheat grown in the United States is now about 150,000,000 bushels per year, but that the home consumption is catching up to that surplus to the extent of about 12,000,000 bushels a year, so that in fifteen years at the furthest the home consumption of American wheat will be equal to the amount produced. When that day arrives a bright era will have dawned for the great Canadian North-west, which will then become the great wheat-producing country of the world. Now, the next point referred to in the Speech is :

Measures have been taken to carry into effect the agreements arrived at with the United States, on the subjects of the boundary of Alaska, the boundary line in Passamaquoddy Bay, and the prevention of destructive methods of fishing, and the preservation and increase of fish life.

As was suggested last year by the hon. gentleman who moved the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the Government should be given credit for having tackled this question in its infancy, before important interests had gathered around it and made it more difficult to settle, and that we should be pleased and should express our gratification that an agreement of this kind has been arrived at. We are also told that the conference with Newfoundland has been satisfactory, and I hope that, as good sometimes comes out of evil, the differences that arose out of the Bond Treaty and the disputes in reference to the admission of bait that took place between Newfoundland and this Dominion may be the means of bringing about the confederation of that colony with this Dominion. We shall then all over British North America have Edmund Burke's great dream of empire carried out, of provinces separated by the material bounds and barriers of nature united by the bond of a social and moral community. We are also told in the matter of the canal tolls that a disagreement has arisen between the United States authorities and the Government of this country. By the Treaty of Washington, the treaty of 1871, there was no mention made by England that the American tonnage should be free of tolls in our canals. England simply said that she would endeavour to obtain Canada's consent to that at some future time, but neither Canada nor the mother country was bound to anything of the kind by the treaty. But the Americans, in 1885, took away from us the bonded privileges that had been given, and that long before the concessions which were enjoyed by them on our canals were taken away. We say: "Let them restore to us those privileges which they first took from us before they ask us to restore to them privileges which we afterwards took away from them." We have no desire to quarrel with that great country to the south of us; we are sprung from the same stock, and I desire to express the wish that "Love between us, like the rose, may flourish, and peace should still her wheaten garland wear." The measures prefigured by the Government appear to be of considerable importance. In the first place, there is an improvement to be made to the Franchise Act in the direction of cheapening its cost, and I may express the hope, as the trend of public opinion is in that direction, as the general tendency is in that direction, that the day is not far distant when we shall have residential manhood suffrage in this country. I express my individual view in this, but I think that, as the men of this country over twenty-one years of age are called upon to provide the means to keep up the institutions of the country in time of peace, and, as in time of war, should any enemy appear on our borders or internecine strife arise amongst us, they would have to take their lives in their hands to defend them, they should have some voice in saying how the institutions of the country should be regulated and how their government should be carried on. Among the other measures mentioned is the admission of evidence in criminal cases. I desire to call attention to the broad principle of allowing persons criminally accused to give evidence in their own behalf. I think that is an important principle, and one that will meet with the approval of this House. It may be said that it has not obtained in the mother country; but the mother country is prone to humanitarianism in her criminal law, and the question with us should be not only the safety of the individual who is accused but also the safety of the country, the common weal, and the ends of justice, as well as the individual safety of the individual require that he should be permitted to give evidence. In the United States of America that principle has been adopted in a great number of states. In Maine, California, Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts and New Jersey a person indicted may, if such person desires it, testify in his own behalf. In Illinois, Connecticut, Massachusetts and New Jersey, if accused does not offer himself as a witness, no presumption against him is to be deduced. In Massachusetts the husband and wife cannot testify as to private conversation with each other. In Massachusetts and New Jersey husband or wife is a competent but not compellable witness against the other. In Illinois husband and wife are not competent witnesses for or against one another. In Connecticut the constitution of 1874 gives accused person the right to be heard by himself and his counsel, but by statute he is not to be compelled to give evidence against himself. Now, one of the last paragraphs in the Speech from the Throne asks that our deliberations may keep in view, above all other considerations, the welfare and stability of the country; and that brings me to what I conceive to be the point of prime importance suggested by this occasion that we shall have sojourned here in vain, that we shall have been taught by wisdom, guided by example, schooled by experience, to no purpose; we shall have grasped the shadow and missed the substance; we shall have been captivated by the form and shall have ignored the principle, unless we shall have learned to dedicate our highest thought and our noblest effort to the benefit of our common country. I believe—and let him who will call it the vague phantasm of a dream—that on this northern half of North America lies the material for the building of a great nation. The prime elements of success in any work of nation-building are permanence and progress. We should also recognize and claim that we are citizens of no mean country. Let me call your attention for a moment to some of the traits of the physical greatness of Canada. We have inland seas of vast extent, easy means of transit and of carrying our produce between countries which lie around them; we have mineral wealth beyond the power of fancy even to compute; we have rivers down which the navies of the world might move in columns; we have plains upon which the sacrilegious tramp of war has left no footprint, and which are yet to be the home of contented and prosperous millions. These are the jewels of our country. With how much proud remembrance, with what reverential awe, do we view the battlefields of our young country and walk above the graves of those who fell at Queenston Heights and Carillon. There is more in a nation's hills and vales than mineral quartz and bottom grass. Associated with the deeds of patriots, the good and true, they are standing philippics against invasion, homilies on heroic perseverance, sermons illustrating the grandest virtues of mankind. What, then, you ask me, is the patriot's task in Canada? The fusing and moulding of the descendants of the greatest races the world has ever seen. In many a smiling valley dwell side by side the peasant who sacredly treasures the legends of Normandy and Bretagne and the yeoman who stores his mind with the rich remembrances of Runnymede. Beneath the crumbling walls of Annapolis and Beausejour dwell in peace and comfort and security the sons of the loyalists and the descendants of the exiles of Grand Pre. On the banks of the St. Lawrence, the Ottawa and the St. John, within sound of the misty Atlantic, on our western prairies and the Pacific slopes, the rose, the lily, the shamrock and the thistle spring from the same sod, draw their sustenance from the same soil. The races they represent have more than once united to beat back the tide of war. Waterloo, Bannockburn and Aghrim were forgotten when the spirits of Alma, Inkerman and Balaklava joined in fight for the same cause on the wooded slopes of the colony. Not French enthusiasm, English discipline, Celtic ardour or highland daring alone smote and humbled the mistaken valour of Montgomery. The united strength of all fired the same spirit, pulsed in the same heart, nerved the one arm, struck the one blow. In peace, as well as in war, we should appreciate the saving truth of the maxim that union is strength. But, as there are various races, there are also various creeds in Canada, and one of our greatest social dangers is bigotry—"the common cry of curs, whose breath I hate like reek of the rotten fen." It is the duty of every sensible man to manacle class contentions and to put gyves on the spirit of intolerance. Men of strong convictions will no doubt continue to differ, religiously, on principle, but there are others who deem themselves embassies from the Almighty, sent to rally in opposing lines the worst passions of men. Their letters patent, however, bear not the sign-manual of Him who bade the angry apostle put up his sword on that night of sorrow when the sacrifice was accepted in Gethsemane. Let us then, Sir, beyond that, inculcate a national sentiment, so that when the time comes for the change from the colonial to the national situation, the transition may be as noiseless and natural as the rich blossoming in spring. Purge politics of corruption, so that when parties in the struggle for or the maintenance of power, endanger the public weal, purity, bearing aloft the destiny of the country, may roll like a mighty wave across the land, followed by the brave and true, as the victorious forces at Ivry followed the white plume of Navarre. Finally, build the edifice of the country's laws in wisdom—

Build that these walls, to coming generations,

Your skill, your strength, your faithfulness shall tell,

That all may say, as storms and centuries test them,
The men of old built well.

Mr. LECLAIR (Translation). Mr. Speaker, prior to entering into the fulfilment of the honourable task which I have accepted, that of seconding the resolutions of the Address in answer to His Excellency's speech, I beg that I may be allowed to inform you with the circumstances which have led to my occupying a seat in this House. During twenty-five years, the county of Terrebonne, which I have now the honour to represent here, had for its member a man with whom I have been closely connected, a man whom I have known to esteem, and who, I trust, knew how to command the esteem of the members of this House: I refer to the Hon. Mr. Chapleau. The battles which that man fought for his party, the work he taxed himself with in order to defend the interests of his county and those of his country, almost ruined his health, and he had to renounce political life after surrendering to his electors the mandate he had so well filled during the quarter of a century. The electors of Terrebonne asked me to accept his succession. I long hesitated before doing so. I then appreciated, as I appreciate more fully at this time of speaking, the great responsibility I was assuming by coming in this House and succeeding to the man who was one of the most distinguished statesmen of this country. If these electors selected me as their representative, it is because they knew that while I had neither the eloquence nor the talents of my predecessor, I had, nevertheless, enough patriotism and devotedness to come here and work for my country and my county. I now see, Mr. Speaker, that His Excellency congratulates, in the course of his speech, the government and the country at large upon the progress which characterized the history of the Dominion during last year. These congratulations, Mr. Speaker, are indeed well due to the men who governed the destinies of our country during the last 15 years. As stated by the hon. member who moved the resolutions of the Address, that policy which has entitled the present Government to the congratulations of His Excellency has made our country a prosperous country. It is that policy that has caused our country to grow and progress, during that period of the last fifteen years, more than any country in the world. We have but to throw a glance around us to see what progress has been made. We have but to look into the statistics of last year to be convinced of it. Thus, our external trade which, in 1891, was valued at $218,000,000 reached, in 1892, the enormous figure of $230,000,000. And that external trade was not wholly carried on with the United States, for we exported to Great Britain upwards of $64,000,000. Well, Mr. Speaker, we were right, therefore, when we claimed and when we still claim that we have for our trade other outlets than the market of the great neighbouring republic. Our exports to the English markets were chiefly agricultural produce. Farming benefited by it, and it is shown by statistical records that the exports of butter, cheese, wood and agricultural implements to the English markets were larger than to the United States and every other country. Well then, Mr. Speaker, I say that through the policy of the Conservative Government, the farming interest made great strides in the way to progress. I represent here a largely agricultural country, and I must say to this Honourable House that if I was returned unopposed, I did not quite owe it to my personal merit, but to the fact that that county so much benefited by the National Policy that the farmers of that county, Liberal as well as Conservative, did not wish me to have any opposition, they were everyone of them in favour of the Government's candidate. Now the Conservative policy again contributed to the development of the country by the building of railways. If we look into the statistics, we find that in 1875 we had but some 4,800 miles of railway, whilst in 1891, that figure reached 14,000 miles. And that encouragement to the development of railways, these subsidies to railways were voted in no partial way; in fact, we find that in every county where roads were needed so as to help to the colonization, railways were built. I can quote as an instance my own county, which is now run through by a very extended railway. The Conservative policy not only promoted the growth of the country by the building of railways, but it is also owing to the National Policy that Canada became an industrial country, that the industrial establishments have increased in number, grown up and rose to the extent of solidity and wealth which they now enjoy. They were put up and have thus grown up through the National Policy. In 1881, we had but 49,000 industrial establishments in the country; these industrial establishments only paid at that time the sum of $59,000,000 in wages. Now we have 75,000 establishments of that kind, and these establishments have come to pay the sum of $99,000,000 in wages. Thus it can be seen that this policy is beneficial to all classes, that the working classes like the rest profit by it and are favoured by the results of that truly national policy. I have no doubt but that, with as wise an administration as the one we have, the country will continue its forward course in the way to progress in which it has entered. Mr. Speaker, this honourable House will be much gratified to learn, I am sure, that the Government have worked with earnestness and that they have given a great deal of attention to the immigration question in the interest of the North-west Territories. This immigration policy had the effect of causing a large number of families to come from Europe, and these families have settled on lands in the North-west. These properties have become so many homesteads, that is to say, these properties will be transmitted from father to son, from family to family and will become truly patrimonial estates. We ought to be gratified by this. But this immigration policy not only had this beneficial result, it also brought into these Territories quite a number of our compatriots, who, through want of means of support, were compelled to go away from their native land. Quite a number, I say, of our compatriots have come back and settled amongst us with the fixed determination never to leave again. For this the Government are entitled to our congratulations, and the House ought to feel gratified that they have worked upon that line. Now, Mr. Speaker, reference is made in the Speech from the Throne to the existing relations between our country and the American republic. We are bound by the geographical position of our country to have, as far as possible, but friendly relations with our neighbours. I have no doubt but that these relations are and will remain friendly; however, as regards the disputes which might exist between the two Governments, I think, and this House will share in my statement, that our Government will be equal to the task of protecting our rights. I rely with full confidence in the ability of the present Government. We also find that the Government have established a Department of Trade. In so doing, the Government rendered a real service to the country. With trade rests the prosperity of a country; with trade rests the happiness and the growth of a country. A country with a prosperous trade is never taken unawares. Therefore, this House, I feel satisfied, will be pleased to find that a special department was established with the object of looking into the trade interests. Some speakers and some newspapers are found who have stated in words and in print that there cannot be but disunion between the various races and the various denominations.

These fears are ungrounded, and when one knows the men who compose the ministry, one may be sure that harmony will continue to exist between the elements that make up our people. The various nationalities which inhabit this country are united under one government and make up but one nation. In concluding these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I thank this honourable House for the attention it was kind enough to grant to me, and I beg to be allowed to express a wish, which I hope will be realized. Let us all unite for the purpose of endeavouring to make secure the progress and happiness of the Canadian people, so glorious with respect to its past and so great with respect to its future.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, since we separated in the month of July last, events of some importance have taken place, chief of which, perhaps, is the fact that there has been a change of Government. When we separated in July, the country was ruled by the Government of Sir John Abbott; it is now ruled by the Government of Sir John Thompson. The country at large, I am sure, as well as this House, will regret the cause which compelled Sir John Abbott to withdraw from the high position which he has filled since the death of Sir John A. Macdonald. Though, in my humble estimation, the career of Sir John Abbott was not as conducive to the public welfare as it might have been, yet it is only the simple truth to say, that in his withdrawal, Canada loses the services of one of the ablest men of his generation. Perhaps the one dominant trait of the character of Sir John Abbott was his apparent want of ambition. He never seemed to care what post was assigned to him, whether he was in the front rank or in the rear; but whatever he undertook to do, he always reached the first rank in that line. He seemed to be endowed with the happy faculty of doing everything that had to be done, and doing it well, while apparently touching nothing. With regard to the change of Government which has taken place, this side of the House is not particularly concerned. It was altogether a family affair. But I am glad to offer the congratulations of this side of the House to the hon. gentleman who has been called to fill the place vacated by Sir John Abbott. There has been no public man in Canada at any time whose advancement was so rapid as the advancement of the hon. gentleman. He came into this House at a comparatively recent date, preceded by a high reputation for ability, which he had earned in his own province, which led everybody, friends and opponents, to expect a great deal from him, and that expectation has been realized by his career since he entered this House. Nay more, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that since the hon. gentleman has been called to the position he now fills, he has developed qualities of which we were not aware. We who were associated with him all knew that the cast of his mind was positive and practical, but if I correctly read his speech delivered in Toronto, and I think I did, not only is the cast of his mind positive and practical, but he is endowed as well with a pretty large share of imagination, an imagination which not only leads him into the realms of fancy, but also has led him, I think, to take existing facts and turn them upside down. The hon. gentleman, in the speech which he recently delivered before the Young Men's Conservative Association, at Toronto, spoke of the National Policy, and he attributed to it what he called "the prosperity of the country." I may say at once that this is not the flight of the imagination to which I referred. Speaking of the National Policy, he said that it had been travestied by its opponents in a hundred different ways, one of which was that they held it applicable exclusively on the rigid line of a customs tariff; whereas he avowed it had a much broader scope and included much more, even the acquisition of the North-west Territories. This is the language which the hon. gentleman made use of:

You may remember what was the great measure which guided the party in the time of Sir John A. Macdonald; it was the National Policy, a name which has been travestied in a hundred ways, a name which has been held applicable on the rigid lines of a customs tariff, but in the mind of the statesmen of Canada meant far more than a tariff arrangement to Canada. It meant the purchase of the great North-west Territories as a home for the farmers of Canada, thus enabling them to live in their own country instead of going to the fertile fields of the United States of America; thus to have homes of their own under the British flag, and where they can enjoy Canadian institutions.

I was not surprised to see the British flag here, because the British flag is always cast as a gloss over the National Policy; nor do I wonder that those who once pinned their faith to the National Policy, and who still stick to it, notwithstanding the experience of the last thirteen years, should endeavour to find for it as a basis something else than the rigid lines of a customs tariff. I do not wonder that they should try to find for the National Policy a more meritorious basis than a customs tariff, and a great deal may be allowed, I am sure, in that respect for the anxiety of the hon. gentleman. But it is altogether too wide a flight of fancy to bring in the acquisition of the North-west Territories as a part and parcel of the National Policy. Why, Sir, the National Policy was never heard of before the year 1877, when Sir John A. Macdonald was in Opposition; and the North-west Territories were acquired as far back as 1869, and if the merit of the acquisition of the North-west Territories is due to any one man more than to another, that merit belongs altogether to the Hon. George Brown. It was he who, by his powerful advocacy, who with pen and tongue, calling the attention of the country to the vast prairies of the west and their immense possibilities, induced the Government of that day to acquire the right of the Hudson's Bay Company over those territories. As is well known, the Hon. George Brown never was a supporter or an upholder of, or a believer in, the National Policy. So the acquisition of the North-west Territories was not at all a part of the National Policy, which was then a thing unknown, but it was accomplished in pursuance of the policy of completing the edifice of Confederation. Now, Sir, we have a new Government. At last we have that strong Government which was heralded some months ago by the hon. First Minister himself as the strongest which Canada ever had since Confederation. Whether this was another flight of imagination I will not inquire. I will not inquire whether the present Government is stronger than any of its predecessors—stronger than the Government of Sir John Macdonald at Confederation, stronger than the Government of Mr. Mackenzie in 1873, or stronger than the second Administration of Sir John Macdonald, or even stronger than the Administration of Sir John Abbott. Comparisons are odious. I shall not inquire into that subject; but one thing is certain, one thing is indisputable, leaving aside quality, and looked at quantity, the present Government is by all means the strongest that Canada ever possessed. The Dominion has now no less than fifteen Ministers to advise the Crown, and three more to advise the advisers; and if, with so much advice, the Crown is not properly advised, it is simply because the advice is radically bad, which I am rather inclined to believe. But even if the advice were tinged good it may turn out to be with Government as it is with cookery, "too many cooks spoil the broth." The hon. gentleman has taken upon himself to advise the Government to bring into force two still-born statutes, passed six years ago, and allowed from the day of their birth to moulder under the dust of useless legislation; passed, though there never was a demand for such legislation, passed, though they were never put into force, yet no inconvenience resulting. One of the hon. gentlemen who proposed the Address, the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Leclair), said that legislation was necessary. These measures may have been necessary in one sense, not certainly for the welfare of the country, but for party exigencies, in order to harmonize colours and shades, so that the Orange and the Green may not offend the eye of one section, but please everybody. I take exception in this respect, and not only in this respect, but in some other respects also, to what has been said by my hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Leclair), though I offered him, as well as the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney), my very sincere congratulations on the manner in which they have discharged the duty they have undertaken. They have discharged that duty with credit to themselves, and so as to earn the congratulations of both sides of the House. The hon. member for Kent, I may say, has caught at once the true ministerial spirit. The true ministerial spirit, in these days, is to proclaim in season and out of season, on every occasion, whether fitting or not fitting, "The country is prosperous." You remember, Mr. Speaker, the scene in Othello, when Cassius has been at last persuaded by the wiles of Iago to taste of the baneful cup. He imbibes enough for his companions to notice the condition into which he has fallen, and in order to dissipate their impression he declares, "Gentlemen, I am not drunk." I am reminded of this scene when I hear hon. gentlemen opposite, members and ministers, upon every occasion, repeating, "The country is prosperous." They seem to believe that, judging from the state of things which exist all around, the people might come to a different conclusion, and so, in order to bring them back to a more orthodox mood, they keep on repeating, "The country is prosperous." They seem to believe that by making the assertion "The country is prosperous," they will convince the people, as perhaps they have succeeded in convincing themselves. Strange prosperity this, from which the people are fleeing, thousands and hundreds of thousands every year! Strange prosperity which the people will not remain in the country to enjoy! What would be the difference if, instead of prosperity, there was adversity? Would there be any different state of things at the present time? I am aware that the leader of the Government attempted, some weeks ago, to minimize the evils of the exodus. The hon. gentleman attempts to show that the state of things is not so bad as it appears, that though there has been an exodus during the last decade, the exodus is not in the same proportion as in the previous decade. Sir, all the hon. gentleman has to do is to consult his own blue book and that will tell him a very different story. The hon. gentleman is doubtless aware that his own blue book shows that during the previous decade, that is during the decade from 1871 to 1881, the population increased by 19 per cent, whereas, in the following decade, the decade from 1881 to 1891, the percentage of increase declined under the National Policy, the increase of population falling from 19 to 12 per cent. I am aware the hon. gentleman says that the figures are not perfectly accurate, that there is a discrepancy in the manner of taking the census. I do not at all accept that explanation; but there can be a stronger arraignment of the manner in which the census has been taken than the explanation now volunteered by the Government. We on this side of the House again and again protested against a census de jure, we wanted a census de facto. The hon. gentleman now acknowledges that the census is not so correct as it might be; but even if there are discrepancies, which I am not prepared to admit, those discrepancies will not at all justify or explain the terrible falling off that has taken place in the population of the country. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to quote some figures from the census, and I invite the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to them. I will take the five eastern provinces. In Ontario, during the decade, 1871 to 1881, the increase of population was 16.06 per cent. in the following decade it fell to nine per cent and a fraction. In Quebec, the increase during the first decade was 14 per cent, and during the second decade it fell to 9 per cent and a fraction. In Nova Scotia, the increase in the first decade was 13 per cent, and in the second decade it fell to 2 per cent and a fraction. In Prince Edward Island it was 15 per cent during the first decade, but in the second decade it fell to 1.01 per cent. In New Brunswick, the province from which the hon. member from Kent (Mr. McInerney) comes, there was no increase whatever during the second decade. These figures are appalling; these figures cannot be explained away by any quibbling as to the manner in which the census was taken. These figures show that the whole natural increase of population was swept away. Swept away! How swept away?—by what? There has been witnessed no such calamity as occurred in the days of old, when the Angel of Death was sent to the land to smite the first-born; and yet the result is the same as if every child born during the said years had been smitten in the arms of its mother. But I know that hon. gentlemen opposite say that the National Policy is not responsible for that condition, that there was an exodus before the National Policy, and the exodus has continued under that policy as well. Sir, this apology which is offered for the National Policy is the strongest arraignment and the most severe arraignment that ever was presented against it. There was an exodus, it is true, before the National Policy was adopted. But have hon. gentlemen opposite forgotten their own history? What was the object of the National Policy? Was not the object of the National Policy to put a stop to the exodus? Do not hon. gentlemen opposite remember their own speeches of thirteen or fourteen years ago? Have they forgotten the gospels of their own policy, if I can apply such term as “gospel” to their policy. However, in order that there should be no misunderstanding on this point, let me again bring back to the attention and defective memory of gentlemen on the other side, the resolution which is the very basis of the National Policy, a resolution moved by Sir John Macdonald, while he was in Opposition, and which was to this effect:

That this House is of opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy which by a judicious readjustment of the tariff will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion.

That such a policy will retain in Canada, thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment now denied them at home.

This was the foundation of the National Policy, and at a later date, Sir John Macdonald, in a speech delivered at Parkdale, justified the principle which had been laid down in this resolution. Thus he spoke:

Here we are not only suffering depression in every trade and industry, but our people are leaving the country to seek employment in the mills and manufacturing of the United States. Was it not a crying shame that though this country had a fertile soil, a healthy climate, a strong and well educated people, and good laws, 500,000 of our own people should have crossed our borders in those years and taken up their abode in the United States, because they could not find employment here for their skill and energy and enterprise, in consequence of the false policy of our rulers.

That was the object of the National Policy, and now we have the result. The object was to stop the exodus, and the result of the National Policy has been the increase of the exodus by hundreds of thousands. In the face of this state of things, what is the conclusion? The conclusion must be for every thinking man, that we have been following a wrong course; that we must retrace our steps, and that we must reform a tariff which has produced such sad results as this. But, Sir, according to gentlemen on the other side, everything is at its best in the country, and they are pleased to portray the present state of affairs in glowing terms. Trade has increased during the last year, it appears, and there is no limit to the exultation which this fact has caused to hon. gentlemen opposite. Yes, during the last year our importations actually reached the figure of $127,000,000; that is to say that in the year 1892 the importations into Canada have not quite reached, but are very close to, the figures at which they were in 1873 and 1874. We are now coming back to the position which Canada occupied in the matter of imports twenty years ago, and this is a cause of rejoicing for gentlemen on the other side. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) rejoiced a moment ago over this fact, but he should have known that this is against the National Policy. The National Policy has not done its duty, because if it had done its duty, as it was promised it would, there would be no importations into this country. We would manufacture everything in Canada; we would not be dependent upon the United States nor upon Great Britain; but Canada should live in itself, like an oyster within its shell. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the National Policy has not done its duty. On the other hand, we are told that the National Policy has developed to an enormous degree the manufactures of this country. Well, if we take the figures of the census, we will see that it has done a great deal; but, for my part, I make a great difference between certain census returns and certain others. Taking the enumeration of population is not a very difficult operation, for everybody can do that; but to measure the capital invested and the manufactories in existence requires a great deal of imagination, and a great deal of imagination is to be found in the census bulletins which have been published. Of all the towns, villages and cities which have progressed the most, according to the census bulletin, I think the palm is to be given to the village of Caughnawaga. The village of Caughnawaga as everybody knows, is inhabited by the remnants of the Five Nations Indians, a once powerful tribe, not particularly distinguished for their manufacturing or trade qualities, but rather for their warlike propensities. According to the census bulletin which I have here, the National Policy has done wonders in the village of Caughnawaga. In the year 1881, there were eight manufactories in that village, and there are now forty-one. The traveller who comes down the St. Lawrence from the great lakes has occasion to see and admire the village of Caughnawaga, but will search in vain for the tall chimneys which were to be the characteristic of the National Policy. He would certainly be deceived if he were simply to look and judge by appearances, but if he turns back to the census returns, he will find that there are no less than forty-one manufactories in that village. Now, what are these manufactures? Are they woollen? I am not aware of that. Are they cotton? I am not aware of that. Are they iron? I am not aware of that. But, although the census does not say so, I presume, in the innocence of my heart, that the articles manufactured there are fancy baskets, miniature snowshoes, artistic fans and the rest. Yes, loo, at the wonderful progress of the National Policy. It is responsible for having increased the manufactures of Caughnawaga from eight in 1881 to forty-one in 1891. Perhaps, after all, there may be another side of this question. It may be that the aborigines of Caughnawaga have not been interfered with by the National Policy, as there is no protection granted to them upon their productions, and as they have the whole continent for a market, that their industries have been developed to this enormous extent. Sir, in the Speech which has been delivered from the Throne, there are one or two items which are, in my estimation, of very great interest. One of these is the paragraph with regard to reciprocity in wrecking. It says:

A correspondence has taken place which indicates that privileges are demanded for United States vessels in Canadian canals, which were not anticipated, but it is not impossible that a satisfactory conclusion of the discussion may yet be reached.

I imagine, although the Speech is rather too vague upon this point, that this correspondence has taken place in consequence of the decision of the Canadian Government with regard to American wrecking vessels, that the use of our canals would not be extended to them. If that is the object of the correspondence, and I can see no other, then, for my part, I must deeply regret the policy which was adopted by the Canadian Government in that respect. If the object of the correspondence was simply to vindicate on the part of the American authorities the privilege of the use of our canals for American wrecking vessels which privilege was denied to them by the Canadian Government, it seems to me that this Government would have been more within the line of their duty if they had taken a broad view of the question and constricted the Act so as to give it its full operation. The Government must be aware that when the Canadian Parliament passed the Wrecking Bill the intention of Parliament was to give to American wrecking vessels the full range of our waters, as was to be given on the other side to our wrecking vessels. What I say now applies also to the unfortunate difficulty which has taken place with regard to canal tolls. The Speech regrets, and very properly regrets, the fact that the American Government has to a certain extent shut the Sault Ste. Marie canal to our vessels by levying an additional duty upon their cargo. This is also a regrettable circumstance which might have been avoided if the Canadian Government had been more generous in dealing with the matter of rebate tolls, and if they had done at first, what I understand they have decided to do at last, we would have avoided these difficulties with the American Government. The great trouble we have always had in our dealings with the American republic has been simply this, that the Canadian Government have never been generous in their treatment of American citizens and the American republic. They always commence by refusing what at last they grant. A favour grudgingly given or a debt grudgingly paid has only one-half the merit that it would otherwise have; and if our Government in their dealings with the American Government had remembered that, the result would have been different. If we have favours to give, if we have concessions to make, we should give them and make them gracefully; then they would evoke the gratitude and the good-will of the Americans; whereas if we make them grudgingly, the conclusion on the other side will be that we yielded simply because we could not help it. It seems to me that there is only one proper mode of proceeding in all our relations with the other side: we should take a broad, manly and generous course; that is to say, we should meet our neighbours not grudgingly, but wherever it is possible to do a favour, we should do it willingly and with some grace. Under such circumstances our relations would be far more satisfactory than they have been in the past. With regard to the legislation promised us, it is, I am sure, of a very light character, except in one particular, that is, the Franchise Act, of which we are promised an amendment. If I remember rightly what was stated last year, my hon. friend, the late Secretary of State, is intrusted with the management of that measure. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he does not believe that the best way to improve the Franchise Act would be to improve it out of existence? I put the question to him in all earnestness. For twenty years, from the year 1867 to the year 1887, the elections of this House were carried on under the provincial lists, and so far as my memory goes, there never was a single complaint as to the working of that system. But, Sir, ever since we have had the Franchise Act not an election has passed but injustices of the most aggravated character have been complained of in some part of the country. Even at this very moment the member-elect for L'Islet, Mr. Tarte, is deprived of his seat by reason of the cumbersome working of that Act. Now, Sir, I submit to the hon. gentleman whether, after all, the best system practically, the best system theoretically, the best system according to our representative institutions, is not a return to the provincial lists. But, Sir, the Speech which we have before us is not a remarkable document for what is in it; it is more remarkable for what is not in it. For instance, I see no reference this year, any more than last year, to the famous commission which was appointed, now very near two years ago, to inquire into the liquor trade—a subject as to which at one time my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, had clear ideas, but as to which he is now at sea. It is not charitable to the hon. gentleman to leave him so many years in doubt. It is not charitable to him that the commission has not yet reported. It took six months to prepare the instructions, it has taken a year to obtain the evidence, and Heaven knows how long it will take to prepare the report. I fear we may not see it this session, but the Government will in the meantime have some respite from a troublesome question. Neither do I see any reference in the Speech to another commission which was appointed by Parliament last year, one to investigate the conduct of a minister of the Crown. This was a most unusual proceeding, but I thought we would be informed in the Speech from the Throne whether we are to have the report of that commission or not. There is another matter to which no reference is made, and as to which I expected there would be some explanation; I mean the Manitoba school question. The hon. Minister of Justice made a report to Council some time ago on that question. That report was communicated to the press. I will not discuss at this time whether it was in conformity with the dignity of Parliament that a State paper should be communicated to the press before it was laid before Parliament. I will not stand on the question of dignity; but I will say that it would be a breach of the law of Parliament if that report were not immediately laid on the Table of the House, and all the more so because of the extraordinary doctrine maintained in that report. The hon. gentleman there assumed that he and his colleagues were sitting as a court of justice dealing with this question. I will not say anything as to the manner in which they dealt with it; I say honestly that I do not wish to embarrass them. But I wish to express my dissent from the doctrine that in this matter the Government act, not as a Government, but as a court of justice. It is a doctrine to which for my part I cannot be reconciled. But of all the omissions to be found in the Speech from the Throne the greatest is, that it holds out no hope for changes in the tariff. This omission, I am sure, will spread disappointment all over the land. The ministers have been speaking recently on that subject, and in different parts of the country they have held out the hope that they would at least, to use their own language, lop off some of the mouldering branches. It looks as if they had changed their minds, and that the mouldering branches had been suddenly converted into green boughs. But, Sir, the country expected some declaration upon this question; and now that the Government have failed to speak, it becomes the duty of the House to speak, and to speak in no uncertain sound. Therefore, I will conclude by proposing, in amendment:

That the following words be added to the address:—
“We feel bound to represent to Your Excellency that in the present condition of the people of Canada substantial reduction should be made in taxation, which presses so heavily upon the great mass of the community, and we regret that in the Speech graciously delivered from the Throne, Your Excellency was not advised to hold out promises of reductions in the oppressive duties now imposed.”

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am sure there can be but one opinion in the House in regard to the manner in which the new members have spoken to-day and have discharged their duty. It is a matter of great gratification to us all that that duty should have been so gracefully done—in a manner which did credit to the gentlemen themselves and added to the dignity of the House. We welcome the new members, whom these gentlemen represent, as by no means a small acquisition to the talent of this assembly. I am grateful to the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition for the terms in which he has alluded to my predecessor in office. It is a matter of most profound regret to the members on this side, and to none more than to myself, that the career of Sir John Abbott, at a time it gave promise of the greatest usefulness to his country, was cut short by the hand of disease. Sir John Abbott carries with him, as the hon. gentleman has said, the regret of the whole country, but he carries with him also the profoundest sympathy of the party with which he has co-operated so long and which sits on this side of this assembly. I am grateful to the hon. gentleman also for the graceful, although somewhat sarcastic, compliments which he has bestowed upon me. The hon. gentleman gave me credit for flights of fancy and gifts of imagination which he had hitherto apparently regarded as a monopoly of his own, but in the possession of which he has been good enough to credit me with a share of this afternoon. He took away, however, my laurels completely by occupying three-quarters of an hour of our time in proving how much more imaginative he is than I could possibly be. The hon. gentleman, in calling attention to the reorganization of the Government, and in the criticisms which he made upon it, naturally saw, as the only subject of admiration in connection with it, that characteristic which he and his party lack above all others. He saw that we were strong in numbers, and he apparently viewed the reorganization of the Government entirely from that reflective mood into which the observation of the condition of his own party would naturally lead him. Now, in commenting on the observations which have been made on this side of the House as to the condition of the country, the hon. gentleman described us as going about the country endeavouring to preach the contrary of what we know to be the facts as to the condition of the country. Well, we have taken advantage of every opportunity to state to the country what the facts, the records of the day, prove to be its condition. We have never, so far as I am aware, discussed this question without showing what the public records prove in that regard; and while the hon. gentleman has replied to us in several places, I have never seen that in any place he has cited the public records to refute a single statement we made, if I except alone the fanciful theories which he builds upon the census. But if we take the volume of trade of the country, if we take the increased industries of the country, if we take the mileage of railways or their business, if we take the business done in the banks and other institutions of the country, as pointed out by my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) this afternoon,—if we take the record of these and simply unfold them to the people of the country, we are accused of making a hue and cry about a false and fancied prosperity. Gentlemen addressing public audiences immediately afterwards declare that this is all delusive, but do not venture to wrestle with the figures any more than did the hon. gentleman this afternoon. I have referred to the hon. gentleman as having built fanciful theories upon the census, and I think he has. He is entirely mistaken, however, in supposing that I had apologised for the results of the census figures on the ground of the inaccuracy of the census. What I did say was precisely the answer which the hon. gentleman's argument invites this afternoon, and that is that a comparison between the two sets of figures exhibited by the recent census and by that of ten years ago is a most unfair one. It is unfair because the basis of the census was practically changed in 1891, and the conditions and regulations under which it was taken, though they tended to greater accuracy, are deceptive for the purposes of comparison because they left uncounted in the population tens of thousands of people who would have been counted under the regulations of the previous census. Yet the hon. gentleman insists upon a severe comparison between the census of 1891 and that of 1881, and supposes we are apologising for the discrepancy on the ground of inaccuracy of the census of 1891. I do not assert that the census of 1891 was more inaccurate than that of 1881, or that the census of 1881 was more inaccurate than that of 1891. I say they were taken under different conditions, which reduced, apparently, the numerical population of the country, very greatly to the disadvantage of the subsequent decade. The hon. gentleman himself was mistaken for a moment in stating what the ratio of increase had been during the previous decade. He stated it was something about 19 per cent, whereas, as a matter of fact, it was 17½. That is merely by the way, however, and was no doubt a slip of memory. There is greater fault to be found with the hon. gentleman, when he makes the assertion that from the so-called and fancied prosperity of this country hundreds of thousands of persons are fleeing year by year. If that had been the fact, the census of the last decade would have shown an exodus of two millions of people for the ten years, at least. The hon. gentleman, not satisfied with the facts contained in the census, although his friends have been quoting them everywhere in condemnation of the Government's policy, multiplies the actual exodus tenfold in order to make an effective speech to the House. I think that if the hon. gentleman is in a position to compliment me this afternoon on the acquisition of a new gift, I am in a position to credit him with enhanced power of slighting facts and slurring over arguments in order to make an address which will be effective and brilliant, but not based on sound reason or justified by the public records of the country. The hon. gentleman made a facetious allusion to the National Policy and myself, in connection with some observations which I made upon it. I must take leave to except altogether from the assumed right of the hon. gentleman to define what the National Policy was and is. He called it a gospel. I would not like that the apostle of that doctrine should be a gentleman who does not believe in the gospel at all; and therefore I dissent entirely both from the hon. gentleman's definition of what the National Policy was and his right to define it. When I addressed the audience in Toronto at the meeting to which he refers, I was alluding to the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party as having been national in a far wider sense than the sense of any mere customs tariff arrangement; and, whether I am right or wrong, I claim that we are justified in putting before the country that it was the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party from its formation, as it is its policy still, to unite and build up this country; and when the union of the provinces was accomplished the first step in that great task was taken and the task has been carried on ever since by the policy of that party, which has put on the face of this country every structure worth preserving, and which has put on the statute-book almost every enactment worth continuing. But I do not think that I ought to object too much to the hon. gentleman's right to criticize and to be facetious at the expense of the National Policy when the hon. gentleman treated as he did his favourite theory of unrestricted reciprocity. He made but a momentary allusion to that subject, and he had to go to the Indian village of Caughnawaga to find an illustration in favour of it. After years of consideration, the hon. gentleman is able to tell us that the Indians of Caughnawaga, under free trade with the United States, obtain more for their baskets and their moccasins than they otherwise could. Now, if the hon. gentleman had been a little more impartial in the quotation he made from the debates of this House when the National Policy customs arrangement was discussed in 1877 and 1878, he would have found a much better answer to his arguments from members of his own side than he has found from our friends. He accuses us for not having legislated so as to keep the population of this country within its borders, so as to find employment for our people and prevent their going to the United States. If he had read a little more from "Hansard" of fifteen years ago he would have found that the answer which his friends and his party gave day by day was that legislation could not change that state of affairs, that it could not create prosperity, and that it was hopeless to expect such a result. If then, as they said, the task was hopeless, it is not fair to charge us with not doing what it was hopeless to expect us to do. But the hon. gentleman knows that the legislation which was then introduced has found employment for thousands and tens of thousands in this country who would otherwise have swollen the exodus, and for classes of people who had been swelling it previous to 1879. The hon. gentleman knows it, for I read it in his countenance, as well as heard it with my ears, when he proclaimed this doctrine, that there were figures and figures, that he makes a difference between some figures and others. Yes, he will take the account of the population in this country now, and compare it with the statistics made in 1881 under different circumstances and different conditions, and will decline to take any figures which tend against his own argument and in favour of the National Policy, and which show the increase of employment which has been given to mechanics from one end of Canada to the other. The hon. gentleman does make a difference between some figures and others, and that is where we condemn his reference to the statistics of 1891, in which he holds us distinctly responsible for the want of an increase in population, but declares that we are not entitled to any credit for the increased employment given to our people, by which tens of thousands have obtained employment here, of the classes which had to seek employment in the United States when the friends of the hon. gentleman were in office. I was not surprised at the remarks of the hon. gentleman in reference to wrecking and towing and in reference to the rebate on the canal tolls. He is somewhat mistaken in his criticism of our action in reference to wrecking and towing. The Government of Canada are and have been willing that kind should be given to vessels of any States the same privileges as those which other vessels have at present in our canals. We have never disputed that the wrecking vessels owned in that country should pass as freely through the canals as any other vessels, but the point of difference was as to the carrying on of wrecking operations in the canals, and we regarded it as serious that privileges of that kind should be given to vessels of any other country. In one point of view it may seem immaterial. One could hardly fancy wrecking operations being carried on in a canal under ordinary circumstances, or that owners of wrecking vessels in the United States should seriously desire that privilege in our canals, and it may be that the privilege which was so earnestly pressed upon us was not of very great consequence to them. It is, however, open to considerable doubt and demands considerable caution, because the traffic in a canal lock might be completely blocked if, by international agreement, the wrecking vessels of another country were enabled to come and go at their own option in order to remove a wrecked vessel from our canals. If there is, as I assume there is, good faith on the other side, a very few words ought to be sufficient to make it clear that, if tugs are engaged in towing vessels through a canal and a slight accident should happen to one of the vessels towed, assistance could be given, and as far as I am aware that has never been prevented. But on the other hand it should be understood that operations of a protracted character in our canals should be in any case under the control of the Canadian authorities owning the canals. Let me point out that this was not contemplated in the original arrangement which was made. The principle of that arrangement was that there should be wrecking and towing reciprocally in the waters contiguous to the two countries, and the canals can hardly be said to come under that definition; but we would not stand too strictly upon that, if facilities in those canals are essential to the fair working of the agreement. We have only desired to restrict United States' wrecking companies by regulations which apply to our own vessels. The United States have felt themselves unable to agree to that on account of the bald statement in the Act of Congress that the President of the United States can only extend reciprocal privileges to us if they are extended on our side to the canals in Canada, as well as to the contiguous waters. The hon. gentleman was also mistaken in regard to the rebate on the canal tolls in Canada. That rebate has been in effect for years, and it was not made the subject of criticism by our opponents in this House or serious remonstrance on the part of the United States until a considerable time had elapsed. Last year when we were required to deal with the matter we had to consider vested interests, because many contracts had been made in view of the tariff and rebate complained of. The proposition which we made is before the public. We proposed that at the close of navigation the alleged grievance should be removed if the concession which we considered as its counterpoise in the treaty of Washington were made on the other side. That, unfortunately, was not acceded to. The hon. gentleman says that we should immediately have withdrawn. I think that good faith to our own people, at least, justified us in asking that any action towards a change in the tolls and rebate should be postponed until the season of navigation which had then commenced had closed, and I think the hon. gentleman will not find, when the correspondence comes down, that the attitude of Canada upon that subject has been unreasonable, or such as the hon. gentleman suspected it was, unfriendly towards the neighbouring Government. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman will remember that this subject of the canal tolls and the mutual privileges accorded to the citizens of either country in the canals in the other country, is not by any means a new thing. It was as fully discussed when the hon. gentleman's friends were in power as it has been by us, and the expressions which appear on the public records then are no more favourable to the United States' contention than our own have been. The hon. gentleman's own Government felt called upon, time after time, to remonstrate with the United States Government upon the ground that American citizens were getting privileges in the Canadian canals, while the use of the United States and the state canals was practically refused them, or extended to them under restrictions which absolutely prevented their being of any benefit whatever to the Canadian people. While it was professed that a Canadian had the right to enter a state canal, he was met immediately by a customs regulation which declared that he should debark his cargo before he entered that canal. The treatment of Canada by the United States with regard to the canal question was felt to be just as unreasonable then as it has been since, and was just as strongly remonstrated against by the associates of hon. gentlemen who condemn us now for not giving way as soon as the concession was asked for. The hon. gentleman made a number of allusions to subjects which are not in the Speech from the Throne. I am exceedingly sorry that we could not afford the hon. gentleman ample room for criticism, ample room, even, for the enlarged gift of imagination which the hon. gentleman has exhibited this afternoon. But I am glad the hon. gentleman has made the allusion he did to subjects which are not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I really cannot believe it possible that the hon. gentleman, coming from the province of Quebec, passed through the city of Montreal and saw with his eyes the Prohibition Commission at work there, and came to Ottawa to look for its existence in the Speech from the Throne. Sir, I doubt very much indeed that the hon. gentleman was at all surprised to see that another commission, which he mentioned, was not referred to in the Speech from the Throne, when he knew that the labours of that commission had been concluded, that the commissioners had discharged the duty assigned to them under an order of this House, and when he knew that as a matter of law and ordinary practice, the report of the commission would be immediately brought down. I fancy the hon. gentleman was aware that the report simply awaited the meeting of the House in order to be laid upon the Table of the House. I shall not follow the hon. gentleman in his allusion to the report upon the question which has arisen in Manitoba, because at a very early date, I am sure, we shall have an opportunity to discuss that question more at length and with more satisfaction than we can, in the absence of the papers, and when it is not directly before the House. Therefore, I will not, at the present moment venture to express at length my dissent from the hon. gentleman's views as regards the treatment of that question by a sub-committee of the Privy Council. I am not at all in sympathy with his view that any want of courtesy was shown to the House of Commons by giving the report of the sub-committee to the press. We shall be prepared to defend that report and the principles on which it is founded when it is brought here, or when it forms the subject of discussion here, whether that discussion shall arise before it is brought down or afterwards. But I think the House must have been surprised at the unusual criticism and the unusual policy adopted by the hon. gentleman as leader of the Opposition, when he referred to the fact that there was no mention of tariff changes in the Speech from the Throne. My recollection may be very much at fault indeed, but I shall be surprised if the hon. gentleman is able to point to more than one, or two, or three occasions, in which tariff changes have been announced in the Speech from the Throne, during the twenty-six years of the existence of this Parliament. I think it would be singularly unfortunate that the Government, two months before tariff changes could possibly be made in the ordinary course of the business of Parliament, two months before they could go into effect, should indicate to the people of this country that they were going to make important changes in this or that item of the tariff. At any rate, I think that the hon. gentleman will find no precedent in this country for the motion which he has made, and I doubt very much if he will find any precedent for it in any other country. While tariff changes were announced at the time when the present fiscal policy was established in 1879, they were announced in a manner which only indicated generally the establishment of a fiscal policy which had been forshadowed in general terms by a resolution moved in this House in a previous session. I think, therefore, that the House will not approve of the hon. gentleman's course in proposing that this House shall address His Excellency upon this subject, as if it were a most unusual thing to omit mention of tariff changes from the Speech, as if it were a most unusual thing for His Excellency not to announce what tariff changes would be made, and to demonstrate to His Excellency the unsoundness of the advice which has withheld that announcement from Parliament, and for which, as I say, no precedent can really be found. I think the House will see that a mistake has been made on this subject, and the House will be prepared to wait until the fiscal policy of the Government upon this subject is announced, and then if it pleases, to address His Excellency upon this subject in approbation or disapprobation of the changes which the Government may propose, but will not censure the Government for not having announced these tariff changes in the Speech in a manner which, as I have said, unless my memory is entirely at fault, has actually no precedent in this country. The hon. gentleman seemed to infer from the omission of any allusion to this subject in the Speech that it was our purpose to make no tariff changes, and that the policy which we intimated elsewhere of remodelling, to some extent, the tariff would not be pursued. The hon. gentleman, I repeat, has no right to draw such an inference as that from the omission of the subject in the Speech. Mr. Speaker, I heartily repeat my gratification at the manner in which the Address has been moved and seconded, and I am sure that, notwithstanding the amendment which the hon. gentleman has moved, a large majority of the House will concur in waiting until the usual time arrives for the announcement of this Government with regard to its tariff policy, before undertaking to make any declaration upon the subject.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the hon. the Minister of Justice makes it a complaint against my hon. friend and against other hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House, that they only look to one particular set of statistics which favours their own views, and that they are entirely unprepared to wrestle with the so-called facts which he and his friends are prepared to bring forward in evidence of the increasing prosperity of the people of this country. I, for my part, am not conscious that I have ever refused to meet any statements, any statistics, any figures which those hon. gentlemen opposite have to bring forward. What I have said, what my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has said, what my hon. friends on this side of the House have said is this: We are prepared to deal, not with part, but with all the statistics that can possibly affect the prosperity of the people of Canada. What we object to is, not that hon. gentlemen opposite quote certain statistics which appear to their mind to confirm the view they hold, but that they will omit, suppress, garble and distort other statistics of far greater importance in the direction of showing the prosperity of the country. That is our complaint, a complaint which I think, before I sit down, I shall be able to show to be a reasonably well established one. Sir, I, for my part, standing in my place in Parliament, and addressing my fellow-countrymen in various parts of this Dominion, have always stated that there were certain ways in which this country has progressed, that it was impossible that a people well nigh 5,000,000 strong, having well nigh half a continent at their disposal, should not increase and prosper in certain directions; but what I have stated, and what I now repeat, is this: that that progress has been wholly one-sided, that that progress has been uneven, and, to an enormous extent, it has been a mere displacement of wealth and not a creation of wealth. If you take our own older provinces, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec, despite all statistics which go to show that a certain section of the people have grown rich at the expense of the rest, and that a few men have become millionaires, thousands and tens of thousands are on the verge of pauperism, and while there has been progress, partial, uncertain and irregular in certain parts of the country, that, nevertheless, taking those five old provinces together and striking a fair and honest debit and credit account, and balancing the increase of the so-called evidences of prosperity he refers to, I am prepared to prove that, during the last twelve years, under this so-called prosperous system, the collective wealth of the people of the five old provinces has not increased one cent. That is my declaration, a declaration which I am prepared to prove in detail. I am perfectly willing to admit that half a dozen cities and towns throughout those five great provinces have increased in population and wealth, but a hundred towns and villages, equally deserving of the consideration and protection of the Government, and equally deserving of the consideration and protection of this House, having collectively quite as large a population, and being collectively, quite as important to the well-being of this country, are stationary, or retrograding; and if you put together the depreciation of property in all those towns and villages to which I have alluded, you will find that the absolute, actual depreciation of property in those places equalizes the augmentation of property in the few favoured localities to which I have referred. We contend that is the tendency of the policy of this Government. There are to-day, I grant you, a dozen times as many very wealthy men in Canada as there were under the Mackenzie regime, and there are also a thousand times as many men in different parts of Canada who are on the very verge of destitution, thanks to that same policy. That is our position with respect to these matters. Let me tell the Minister of Justice that it is a very great mistake to confound evidences of increasing debt with evidences of increased wealth. A great many of those facts on which he rests, a great many of those facts to which he has appealed, are simply evidences, not that the wealth of the community has increased, but that there has been a displacement of wealth, that certain sections of the community, perhaps, are richer and certain other sections are poorer. It is not the best possible proof of the increased wealth of the community to tell us there are in Canada to-day a large number of persons who hold deposits in private banks and in the Government savings banks, or, in other words, that there are an unusual number of persons in a country like Canada, a young country with unlimited quantities of fertile land, which should afford unlimited opportunities for profitable investment, who are obliged or choose to be content with receiving three or four per cent interest for money, held at command, in place of seeking permanent investments. Sir, there are two sides to this question. It is well to have money in the bank, or in the Government savings banks, but it goes to show this, and the experience of every hon. gentleman beside me, and hon. gentlemen opposite will confirm it, that there are an immense number of people in Canada who have very little confidence, indeed in the future of the country. Go to any town of any importance in the country to-day. Put up farm property to auction, put up town or village property to auction, and although you will find hundreds of thousands of dollars lying in the banks established in the town, you will scarcely find one man ready to come forward and buy property for fifty, forty or even thirty per cent of its value a few years ago. Sir, the hon. gentleman might as well tell this House that it is a wonderful proof of the increasing prosperity of the people of this country that there should be an immense number of mortgages recorded over and above the number on record ten years ago. In support of that proof of increasing prosperity and increasing wealth, the hon. gentleman could, if he desired, obtain statistics enough; and had the challenge I flung some years ago across the House been accepted, had the information I asked for been obtained, had a small sum been used for the purpose of obtaining the statistics desired, a record would have been procured that would have opened the eyes of a large number of the agriculturists at least, and gone a long way to prove the true extent of the prosperity which they were enjoying under the benign reign of hon. gentlemen opposite. I should be pleased if it were possible—because I am deeply interested in the welfare of Canada, quite as deeply interested as any hon. gentleman I see on the opposite benches—to confirm the declaration made by the Minister of Justice and his colleagues that Canada is now one of the most prosperous countries in the world; but I cannot do it, simply for the reason that my daily and hourly personal experience contradicts every statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite, as does the daily and hourly personal experience of a large number of hon. gentlemen, if they would condescend on their honour to state the facts as they know them to exist. I am not on the present occasion disposed to enter into minute details in regard to all those points, or to explain why it is, for instance, that I doubt extremely the wisdom of a policy which in a country like Canada borrows at call, at three or four per cent, a large amount of the money of the people, in place of obtaining money for a fixed term of years at a similar or lower rate elsewhere. That is a question which may be more appropriately discussed when we have to deal with the statements of the Finance Minister, but it has a good deal to do with the wisdom of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. I place our grounds for moving the amendment which we have just moved on broad facts which are known to every man who knows anything of the position of Canada. The appeal which we now make through you, Mr. Speaker, and through this House to the people of Canada, we base on the broad fact that our census statistics disclose an enormous loss of the most valuable asset that any country could possess, an enormous loss of the youthful population of Canada. We base it on the fact known to me, known to my friends beside me, known, I say, to hon. gentlemen opposite, capable of proof if they will give us the means of obtaining legal proof; the fact that from one end of the older provinces to the other there has been an enormous and utterly unprecedented depreciation of the value of not merely town and village property, but of the value of farm lands held by the agricultural community of Canada, on whose prosperity the prosperity of this whole country depends. We base it, in the third place, on the fact that there has been, as these same records show, a most enormous increase in the taxation on the people, which is but feebly and faintly represented by the sums which come into the public treasury. To the $30,000,000 which was paid into the public treasury, and which in some sort of way may be said to have been appropriated to the benefit of the people of Canada, there are to be added another $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 which have been wrung from the tolling masses of Canada, and have not been applied to the public welfare, but which have been applied to enrich the few at the expense of the many, on condition that these few would tithe their plunder to keep hon. gentlemen opposite in power.

Mr. FOSTER. The same old story.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Aye, which you have never yet answered and never can. The Minister of Justice was good enough to treat, I won't say with levity, but apparently with some indignation, the allusions which were made by my hon. friend beside me to these same census returns. I have observed that the use of the census statistics has upon hon. gentlemen opposite very much the same effect that the application of holy water is said to have upon a certain personage. It is a test they cannot escape and therefore it is a test they hate and abominate. I will candidly admit that up to the present time I have felt that the conduct of the hon. gentlemen in dealing with these same statistics has been such as I cannot altogether approve, and it is possible that I have been somewhat too warm at times in expressing what I thought of their conduct in this respect. Sir, I have altered my mind. I am inclined to think that in dealing with the method in which these hon. gentlemen have treated the census statistics I may have been too exigent, and it is to the Minister of Justice that my conversion is due. I have recently had an opportunity of perusing the statement made by that hon. gentleman to the people of Toronto with respect to the census. It is a statement of very great importance, a statement which was very recently made, a statement which was made under very peculiar circumstances, a statement which is undoubtedly entitled to very great weight, and I will, therefore, Mr. Speaker, take the liberty of placing it on your records. This was no ordinary deliverance. This was the first official statement made by the Premier of Canada. It was, I may say, his first official manifesto to the people over whom he was to rule. It was made in a very public way and in a very public place; it was made with all his colleagues surrounding him, and it was made in the chief city of the chief province of Canada. The subject was one which was not new to the hon. gentleman. Not merely was it one of first-class importance in itself, but it was a subject which had been often discussed in this House, and it was a subject which, for certain reasons that I will presently allude to, was one which ought to have especially attracted the attention of any hon. gentleman hailing from the Maritime Provinces, and particularly of an hon. gentleman who came from a county, which showed such a record as the county of Antigonish. Now, Sir, we will see what the hon. gentleman did say:

I admit the exodus still. There are various kinds of exodus, ladies and gentlemen. There is the Cartwright exodus, which reaches the tall figures of 1,500,000, and he soared above that even and claimed that a good many more men were lost from the Canadian population until somebody turned his own calculation about and applied it to the United States, and showed him that according to his mode of calculating the exodus, there had been an exodus from the United States of 6,500,000. There is the kind of exodus which the leader of the Opposition described a few evenings ago as an exodus so great that we were unable to keep the beggarly 5,000,000 of people that we have in it. Ladies and gentlemen, while the population has grown in the last decade 17 per cent, and has reached nearly 5,000,000 of people, it has never quite reached that mark yet, and to talk about being unable to keep in this country the beggarly 5,000,000 we have is to talk what that great leader described a few seconds afterwards as mere trash and buncombe. What is the exodus? The facts have been ascertained within the last few weeks from the United States records. They show that the whole population of the United States, Canadian born, is 980,000.

I think the figures here are 980,000.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. 930,000, I think.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is for the States alone, not for the United States. There is a distinction. I think the hon. gentleman will find it is 980,000.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I believe 930,000 to be correct.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. However, it is a matter of little difference at the present time. It goes on to say:

How many of these have we lost in the last decade, and how many in the decade before? We have lost in the last ten years 265,000. That is a thing deeply to be regretted; but, ladies and gentlemen, the loss in the decade before was far greater, not in numbers, but in percentage. While in the decade before we had increased our exodus by 50 per cent, during the last decade it has been pulled down to a little over 36 per cent. But the assurance with which our opponents declare that the National Policy is to be blamed for having an exodus at all is something appalling to the intellect of Canadians.

As I say, Sir, the hon. gentleman has converted me. I will admit candidly that when I first read that statement, it appeared to me that it was an exceedingly dishonest statement, but when I read it a second time more carefully I discerned a saving stupidity about it which inclined me to take a greatly more charitable view of the situation. I perceived that this was one of the cases which, all divines agree offer great excuses. Here there was the "crassa ignorantia," which largely diminished the culpability of the party making the statement—I am not quite sure that I might not say the "crassissima ignorantia," and I am prepared to give to the hon. Minister of Justice all that freedom from responsibility which properly attaches, or can attach, to any gentleman who talks on a subject in perfect ignorance of the facts. Nevertheless, it is my duty on the present occasion to call the hon. gentleman's attention—not at all in the way of alleging that he willfully misstated anything, but in the way, if I may venture to say, of correction—to certain very extraordinary mistakes and errors which the hon. gentleman has fallen into in this remarkable statement. For the satisfaction of the House I may say that I have not the slightest intention of reviewing all the minor mistakes in the hon. gentleman's speech. I am afraid it would take from morning until dewy eve to go through them all, and I will confine myself strictly on the present occasion to four capital errors which that gentleman has made. First of all, I would ask the hon. gentleman, if there is anything in the statement which he wishes to correct. I am using the statement made by the "Empire," which also appears verbatim et literatim, in the columns of the "Globe" and "Mail," and when "Empire" "Mail" and "Globe" all unite in representing that the hon. gentleman made a particular set of statements, I think we may assume that these are approximately correct. Nevertheless, if on consideration there is anything the hon. gentleman wants to explain or to withdraw, heaven forbid that I should deny him the opportunity of doing it now and here. But, Sir, if the hon. gentleman does not want to qualify, if he adheres to his statements, allow me to point out what appears to me to be very extraordinary mistakes to be made on the part of a gentleman in his position. Now, Sir, I assure the hon. gentleman that on this side of the House, at any rate, we are not disposed to be very exacting; we do not expect a Premier or a Minister of Justice to be an expert in statistics. That, I think, would be unreasonable. But, Sir, I humbly submit—as Sir Charles Tupper was wont to say, I am in the judgment of the House—is it too much to expect that a Minister of the Crown, ay, the First Minister of the Crown, should, before addressing an audience on a question of first-rate importance, condescend to make himself acquainted with the rules of subtraction, multiplication and division? I do not expect too much. Now, being, as I have said, disposed on this occasion not to censure, but rather to instruct, I would like, did the rules of the House permit, to have asked for a blackboard and chalk, but I have been withheld by a fear lest my motives should be misconstrued; for as you can understand I have always been nervously anxious not to be misconstrued by hon. gentlemen opposite. But I will endeavour, without these mechanical aids, to explain wherein I think the hon. gentleman has grievously misconstrued the statistics which his own department has placed in his hands. In the first place, I find that the hon. gentleman states that the population has grown in the last decade some seventeen per cent. Now, I want to call his attention to these facts. Our population in 1881 was 4,324,000. If he will divide that number by ten, he will find that ten per cent represents 432,000 people; if he will pursue the same method with respect to the seven per cent, he will find that it represents about 302,000 people; and if he will add these two numbers together, he will find that they will make 734,000 at least. Sir, his own Canada increased 504,000; where does he get census returns tell us that the population of the odd 230,000? Sir, I would be obliged to know that the census returns are all a blunder, and the hon. gentleman is correct in saying that there are seventeen per cent additional population, being 230,000 more than his own

census returns show; but, until some explanation is offered, all I have to say is, that there is apparently a trifling error of 230,000, which, taken in the percentage fashion which the hon. gentleman is so fond of, means a trifling error of forty-six per cent. This, you will observe, was a patriotic error, no doubt committed with the desire of preventing people from supposing that the exodus had been as great as it really is, and it is very likely many people throughout the country who read the hon. gentleman's statement that there had been an increase of 17 per cent in the last decade, whereas, his own census returns showed an increase of about 11½ per cent, would go home feeling comforted that some wonderful discovery had been made which showed the census returns to be entirely erroneous. The hon. gentleman also talks about the exodus, which he puts down at 265,500. But let me tell the hon. gentleman that we on this side always considered the exodus to consist of two parts—one composed of the native-born population who had left Canada, and the other composed of people who had, according to the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, come from abroad and settled here, brought at our expense, and who afterwards left our shores. As to these what has the hon. gentleman to say? Not one word, not one syllable. The trifling fact that 886,000 people were alleged by the returns of the Government of which he was a member, and for which he is responsible to have settled in Canada in the last decade, and to have subsequently disappeared, appears to the hon. gentleman to be unworthy of the slightest notice. Now, I will make the hon. gentleman an offer, a fair and reasonable offer. If in his place as Prime Minister he will rise here now and state that, having examined into the question, he has become convinced that all the statements made by the Government from 1881 to 1891 with respect to the settlement of immigrants in Canada are a sham and a delusion and a fraud, and that the money paid for those people was practically obtained from us by false pretenses, and was never used to bring immigrants at all, then I will say that possibly he was right to omit all reference to the 886,000 emigrants that the hon. gentleman's Government went on declaring, in spite of my protests, year in and year out, had been added by their exertions to the population of Canada. Now, Sir, what are the broad facts? You have an increase of population, all told, of 504,000; you have an immigration alleged to have been brought to Canada of 886,000. Does the hon. gentleman understand what these facts mean? They mean that we have absolutely lost 382,000, plus the entire natural increase. Does the hon. gentleman want to know, or do his friends or their subsidized press want to know, what was the result of our expenditure of three or four millions of dollars for the alleged purpose of bringing these settlers here? Sir, I can tell them. These same census returns show that in 1881 there were 608,000 foreign-born people in Canada, and that in 1891 we had—what? 1,400,000 or 1,000,000? Not a bit of it. We had in Canada 645,000, a total absolute increase in the foreign-born population of exactly 37,000. To that number must in all fairness be added the number required to replace the foreign-born inhabitants who died between 1881 and 1891. That, according to my calculation, would amount to something like two per cent a year, and would represent for the ten years 122,000. But giving the hon. gentleman the benefit of all that, this result is arrived at: that we imported at our own cost and charges 886,000 people, and when the census returns are made, all that can possibly be accounted for are 159,000. Of those brought to Canada at our expense five depart and one remains. Does the hon. gentleman want to know what he must add to the exodus, if there be one word of truth in the statements made by his Government? Sir, let him deduct 159,000 from 886,000, and he will find that this item, which, in his mind, was not of sufficient importance to warrant one word of reference, represents, if these figures be correct—they are his, not mine—a loss of 727,000 emigrants who were brought here at our cost for the benefit of the people of the United States, always supposing they ever came at all, and that the whole thing was not a fraud and a sham. Now, here we have, as I told you, first of all, an over-estimate of the actual increase by 230,000. We have, in the second place, a loss of 727,000 of the foreign-born immigration, which I can see no possibility of contradicting, because, if it be alleged that a number of them replaced the existing foreign Dominion population of 1881, that only swells the exodus in another direction, and you have very nearly three-quarters of a million people brought to this country in the last decade and who have since left it. But it is when I come to the statement which, after all, concerns us most, the statement of the exodus of native-born Canadians, that the hon. gentleman has surpassed himself. I will deal with the question of the exodus of native-born population. I, for one, am willing to welcome to Canada every honest and industrious man of every nationality, always provided he comes here at his own cost and is not brought here at the public expense to take the place of better men and exclude Canadians from their occupations. On that condition I welcome everyone, but I have always contended that, in the interests of the people of this country, it is a thousand times more important to keep our own people in our own country than to promote any foreign immigration from any country in the world. Now, I will call attention to a very remarkable statement which the Minister of Justice has made on that subject. He takes the number of Canadians born in the United States in the year 1880 and in the year 1890, and he sub-tracts the one from the other and finds that the difference is 265,000, and he tells us that that represents the total exodus. I would have hoped that a man so patriotic as the hon. gentleman would have kept that information most carefully from the public. If he has discovered that that is a correct statement, I am very sorry indeed to find the hon. gentleman giving it publicity. What is our position? It is this: We are constantly losing the flower of our youth and population. We know that these people prosper and succeed in the United States in a remarkable degree; but if, on the authority of the Minister of Justice, we are likewise to add to all the other inducements, this fact, which he seems to have discovered, that if you have 707,000 in 1880 and 980,000, or whatever the figure is, in 1890, the total loss then is just 265,000, why it follows that all Canadians who go to the United States become practically immortal. They have no death rate, or so inappreciable a death rate, he did not think it worth while to take it into account in all the ten years from 1880 to 1890. If that be so, I should say that for the safety of Canada, I hope he will keep the information to himself. We have lost all the youth, but if it becomes known that besides prospering in the United States, Canadians going there become practically immortal, I am very much afraid we will lose all the old men too. Is this a trifling, insignificant error? Why, had the population remained exactly as it was, had there not been one soul more than the 707,000 who were there in 1880, it would have represented, for the mere purpose of balancing the death rate, for the mere purpose of keeping up the number, a loss to Canada of at least 140,000 souls. A very large proportion of these 707,000, who were found in the United States in 1880, were people who had been there over ten, or twenty, or thirty years. There is no doubt whatever that the very lowest addition that can be made for the purpose of maintaining the number would have fully equalled 140,000, and when you have an emigration of 40,000 to 50,000 a year from Canada, they also have a certain death rate, which must be taken into account, not so heavy as the death rate of those who were there in 1880, but still a considerable number. I am not putting it by any means as high, but I believe all statisticians looking at the question will say that I am not taking an exaggerated view of the case, when I say that about 33,000 would be a fair number to add to the exodus, which would therefore amount in those ten years to at least 440,000 souls. If he will add together the death rate necessary to maintain the population which existed in 1880, and the number necessary to replace the inevitable deaths among those who went there during this decade, he will find he must add 175,000 souls to the 265,000, which are all he admitted to be the total loss of native-born population in Canada. We have found the hon. gentleman overestimating the census increase by 230,000, we have found him ignoring the loss of immigrants who came and did not stay here by 727,000, and we have found him diminishing the number of Canadian-born, the most important item of all, who have left this country by 175,000. It occurs to me that these are important matters, which the press and the people would do extremely well to consider a little more deeply than the First Minister has done, and it has occurred to me they put a somewhat new face on all the theories and calculations which the hon. gentleman submitted later as to the percentage with respect to these years. I will just say this: Apply the same scale of calculation to the exodus which existed between 1871 and 1880 that I have applied to the exodus which I have proved to exist between 1881 and 1891, and you will get this result: The exodus from 1871 to 1881 on a population in 1871 of 3,685,000 amounted to about 337,000 or thereabouts. On the same scale in proportion, that is about nine per cent, while the exodus which has now taken place, making allowance for the death rate, amounts to 440,000 on a population of 4,324,000. It is a little more than ten per cent, so that the fact is that the exodus has materially increased in spite of all the hon. gentleman has alleged, and that without taking into the slightest account, without making any allowance for the 727,000 emigrants who were brought to Canada at the cost of our people and afterwards left us.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When the House rose, I had just concluded pointing out three somewhat serious errors into which I conceived the hon. the Minister of Justice had fallen in dealing with the extremely important question as to the amount of the exodus from Canada during the last ten years. I had pointed out in the first place that he had made a very grave error indeed in supposing that the total increase in our population from 1881 to 1891 was 17 per cent, whereas his own census statistics, if he had taken the trouble to refer to them, would have shown him that the increase was barely 11.66 per cent, in other words that he had overestimated the increase by about 230,000 souls. I had further pointed out that he had entirely and completely omitted all reference to that very important portion of the exodus which was composed of the foreign-born people, who, according to the hon. gentleman's own Government statistics—statistics published by a Government of which he was a member—had come into this country, largely at the expense of the people of this country, to the number of 886,000, of which 886,000 it now appears that only 159,000 at the very outside had remained in Canada, and therefore 727,000 immigrants had come to Canada, had settled here, according to the hon. gentleman's reports, had looked about them, and had gone away again. I further pointed out that he had committed a grievous mistake in underestimating the ascertained facts as to the movement of population from Canada to the United States; that, whereas, he estimated it as 265,000, the proper amount—making due allowance for the death rate during those years—was 440,000 or thereabouts, a number 175,000 in excess of the number which he gave; and also that that circumstance proved conclusively that the immigration from Canada of the native-born population from 1881 to 1891 had been considerably in excess (on the same system of calculation) of the emigration of the native-born population of Canada between 1871 and 1881—a fact of which I could have afforded him ample additional evidence from the municipal statistics of our different provinces. The hon. gentleman and his friends will observe that, if you lose of the foreign-born population 727,000 for whom you cannot account, and if you lose besides 440,000 of the native population, the total number of the absolutely ascertained loss is made up of these two figures, and amounts to 1,167,000 in round numbers. And now I come to another portion of the hon. gentleman's speech. And here I will say frankly that, although the hon. gentleman has very seriously misstated what I stated, although he has quite misunderstood and misconceived my remarks, I entirely acquit him of any wilful misconception or misrepresentation. He has evidently read the reports of what I said very cursorily, when he said that I estimated the loss of our native-born population at a million and a half. I never thought or said that a million and a half of native-born Canadians had removed from Canada to the United States in those ten years, as the hon. gentleman in his speech distinctly infers that I stated. No such statement was ever made by me, or, as far as I know, by any one on this side of the House. On the contrary, over and over again I had expressed my opinion that, when the figures of the United States census were in my hands, they would probably show a total population of native-born Canadians in the United States in 1890 of about one million. It appears that I slightly overestimated the number. I was informed from the Bureau of Statistics at Washington—though I doubt if the last report has reached the Library—that the number was 989,000, of whom a certain number were natives of Newfoundland. I may have been misinformed. The hon. gentleman states the number to be 930,000, and I should be very glad indeed to find that the information furnished to me was incorrect, and that we were not quite as badly off as I supposed. But it was stated in the same communication that, making allowance for the natives of Newfoundland, who, of course, are included in the enumeration of the natives of British North America, the increased number of Canadians born amounted to 265,000, which I see is exactly the number the hon. gentleman stated, and I fancy that, when the full figures are in our hands, it will be found that he is correct in saying that the apparent increase was 265,000, and that I am correct in stating the same figure. There is another quotation which the hon. gentleman has evidently not understood. One part of the charge, advanced by myself, and advanced from this side of the House, has always been that the policy or impolicy of the Government has been such that it has driven away a very large part of the younger portion and flower of our population, and that by so doing this, further and heavy loss has been inflicted upon our people, that the actual rate of increase has been reduced far below the natural rate of increase. I have observed in the comments of the hon. gentleman's press, and the hon. gentleman's supporters, that there appears to be an absolute incapacity to understand what I thought would be an absolute truism, that the actual increase in any country does not necessarily agree with the natural increase. It may be largely in excess of the natural increase under certain conditions, and it may also be largely below the natural increase under certain conditions. I turn to a country which, unfortunately, in many respects, affords too close a parallel to our own. I turn to the condition of Ireland, as shown by the late census. I suppose there is no one here who knows anything of the habits of the Irish peasantry, in regard to early marriages, but would suppose that the natural increase in that country would be largely in excess of the number of deaths. We find, however, that, whereas the population in 1881 was 5,174,000, the population in 1891 had sunk to 4,700,000 souls. It would sound almost like an Irish bull to say that the rate of natural increase in Ireland showed a decrease of 400,000 souls. Sir, one part—and I want to emphasize this—one part of our charge against the hon. gentlemen is this: that the impolicy of their system, one direct result of this most vicious system of taxation, is greatly to impair the natural rate of increase. You drive out of our country a very large percentage of the younger portion of the population, and you thereby considerably reduce and diminish the natural rate of increase. I should think that is a proposition which every hon. gentleman could verify from his own experience with the greatest ease. Some years ago a number of newspapers throughout the country took occasion to treat this question, giving the fullest possible particulars, with the names and addresses of the young men who had left from a very large number of towns and villages, and, Sir, the result was perfectly appalling. Out of a male population of two or three hundred, we would find a loss of one hundred within the space of six or seven years. In towns with a male population of two thousand, or two thousand and two or three hundred at most, the newspapers were able to print, I am sorry to say, lists showing a loss of young men from those regions, of six or seven hundred; and so on in proportion. Now, Sir, it is a fair question, I admit, whether, in taking two and a quarter per cent as the natural rate of increase of population in a young country with an unlimited amount of fertile land at our disposal, I put it at too high a figure. All I can say is that in naming two and a quarter per cent, I have not merely followed the opinion heretofore expressed by pretty nearly every writer of authority who has dealt with the question as applied to young countries in our condition, with a sparse population and lots of land available, but we find that statement is confirmed in a most striking fashion, first of all, by the experience of the United States, taken when they had no immigration, and when the numbers of their population closely resembled ours, and next, by our own experience in the decades from 1851 to 1861, 1861 to 1871, and from 1871 to 1881. Sir, under the circumstances I am perfectly justified in stating that the effect of this policy is that the natural increase of Canada is largely in excess of the present actual rate of increase, and the cause of it is the loss of so very large a portion of our younger population. Now, there is no man on the floor of this Parliament who ought to know that fact better than the hon. gentleman himself. What is the state of affairs in his own province? Why, the state in his own province is that the population is all but stationary. While in the decade from 1871 to 1881 the population of Nova Scotia increased about 50,000 souls, in the decade from 1881 to 1891 the population hardly increased 10,000 souls: and, Sir, to come home to the hon. gentleman—thee represents the county of Antigonish—I turned up the records of the county of Antigonish, and I found that in 1881 the population was 18,060, whereas in 1891 the population was only 16,112; there was an absolute loss, by the census, of 1,948, and the whole natural increase besides. But that at my figures, at 2½ per cent per annum, which are equivalent to 25 per cent for the ten years, would amount to 4,512, and that county which the hon. gentleman represents shows a loss of close on 6,500 people during the decade. Sir, I have some right to say to the hon. gentleman that, representing such a county, coming from the province of Nova Scotia, representing, as he does, the Maritime Provinces, which show the very worst record which it is possible to imagine, which show absolutely stationary conditions—I say I have some right to say to the hon. gentleman that this state of things requires the most serious and earnest consideration of the Government. Now, let me ask, under what conditions is it that the natural rate of increase is far in excess of the actual rate of increase, or, to put it in another way, that the actual rate of increase in a country like ours falls far below the natural average rate? In old times, as my hon. friend remarks, there were three causes—bloody war, desolating pestilence and devastating famine. When these three causes, singly or conjointly, afflicted a country, no doubt the actual rate fell below the natural rate of increase. There was also, if I remember rightly, another plague which the apocalyptic writers predicted would afflict the world in future years; over and above these three plagues there would be a plague of a noisome beast, which noisome beast. I am inclined to think the theologians who studied the question carefully, would be disposed to say, was a protective system. Anyhow, here in Canada we have neither had a desolating war, nor a devastating pestilence, nor, thank Heaven, have we had a famine, but we have had a National Policy, and you see what it has done for us. Sir, I take the case of those seven or eight states of the Union which were subjected to a terrible civil war between 1860 and 1870. I take the states of Virginia, Florida, Georgia, Texas, Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Missouri, North and South Carolina and Tennessee. In 1860 their population was just about 11,000,000. They had four years of terrible civil war, and in 1870 their population was 12,487,387 souls. In those ten years those southern states, which had been subjected to the worst horrors of war, in which it is known that an enormous portion of the youthful population had perished, where their wealth was almost annihilated, had increased in population very nearly 14 per cent. Sir, in old Canada and the maritime provinces the increase from 1881 to 1891 was just 325,000 on their population of 4,156,000. In those ten years, under the National Policy, they increased 7 per cent, as against the 14 per cent increase in those southern states that I have enumerated. Sir, I think one such fact as that ought to satisfy hon. gentlemen, not, perhaps, that their policy is incorrect, but most assuredly it ought to satisfy them that there is a most urgent need for considering how this enormous loss of population occurs, and how it can be stopped. To my mind, for many years back we in Canada have been exchanging gold for brass, we in Canada have been parting with the very best of our population, the choice and pick and flower of our population, and we have been receiving in return and in part—not altogether—a very miserable equivalent in the shape of some of the scum of Europe. Now, Sir, that kind of thing should not be. I have no objection in the world, I repeat, to anything being done that will bring an honest and good immigrant population here, but, to my mind, that is a matter entirely insignificant compared with the importance of keeping our own people in Canada. One true Canadian is worth any half a dozen imported European immigrants. I would ten times rather see what money we have to spend, for the matter of that, used to keep our own people in this country rather than allow it to be expended for the purpose of bringing, say, 900,000 immigrants into this country, of whom we can only keep 150,000. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman, in the statement he made of my position, intended willfully to misrepresent me, but I am bound to say that when an hon. gentleman in his position has the opportunity of reading and examining a statement which took the shape of a motion made in the House and in his presence, and on which he voted, it would be the part of wisdom on his side to read and examine it, and when he had read and examined it, he then would be entirely welcome to contravene or contradict it. It so happens that, shortly after we obtained those details of the census, I made a motion in this House on the subject, and I do not apologize for taking this opportunity of reading that motion again, for the simple reason that I am prepared to stand by every word of it, and I invite the sharpest criticism of the hon. gentleman, his colleagues and his followers, and his press, on every word put on record, although I was not then in possession of anything like the quantity of facts I now have in support of it. My motion was as follows:—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

That it appears from the official returns recently laid on the Table of this House, that the total population of the Dominion of Canada on or about the 1st day of April, 1891, was 4,829,344.

That it further appears from the report of the Department of Agriculture for the year 1890 that the total number of immigrants stated by the said department to have settled in Canada from the 1st day of January, 1881, to the 31st December, 1890, was in all 866,171.

The House will remember that the statement is "settled in Canada."

That according to the last census the population of the Dominion on or about the 1st April, 1891, was about 4,324,816.

That the total increase of the population of Canada in the ten years now past was 504,534.

That at the rate of 2½ per cent per annum, the natural increase of the population of Canada during the last ten years would amount to 1,077,531 without any immigration.

It will be observed that I never stated, and I never intended to state, that such a natural increase had taken place. My point, I repeat, was that under ordinary and natural conditions, if the population was not violently interfered with, if an abnormal number of people had not been driven out of the country, the natural increase would have been 1,077,000, and that point I maintain.—

That at the same rate of 2½ per cent per annum, the natural increase of the said 866,171 immigrants officially reported to have settled in Canada between the years 1880 and 1890, would have amounted to 110,432.

That, had the said natural rate of increase been maintained and the said immigrants remained in Canada, the total population of Canada would now amount to 6,404,944.

Then I proceeded to refer to certain statements, which it is not necessary now to read, pointing out the huge amount of fertile land available for immigrants ; and I continued :-

That it appears from the above-recited facts that the difference between the actual increase of the population of Canada and the natural increase, together with the immigrants officially reported to have settled in Canada, is 1,568,000.

That during the last ten years the actual taxation of the people of Canada has been enormously increased under the operation of the existing tariff.

That the deplorable state of things disclosed by the above-mentioned returns, imperatively commands a radical change in the policy and methods of government followed by the Administration.

That was my statement. It was not in the slightest degree a statement that there had been an emigration from Canada to the United States of 1,500,000 native-born Canadians, as the hon. gentleman states, but that, if you put together the loss of immigrants who come here, the ascertained loss of native-born Canadians, and make a reasonable allowance for the extent to which we have diminished our natural increase by this exportation of the best part of our population, then the loss would amount to the figures I have stated, which I conceive to be a totally different thing from the statement made by the hon. gentleman. The question very naturally arises in the minds of those of us who have taken pains to study and consider what these things mean, what reasonable or possible remedy can be suggested for this condition ? Sir, we do not contend, we never contended on this side of the House that the huge depreciation in the value of property in farms, in towns and villages to which I have referred, was wholly and entirely due to the protective system or enormous taxation ; but we did contend, and we do contend, that it is one important factor, that it is one cause, and a very important cause, of the loss of population, the depreciation of property and the general distressed condition of a very large and important segment of the people of this country. My hon. friend, in his place as leader of the Opposition, demands as his right that the Government, in the face of these facts, shall state what they are prepared to do, and will apply, if they can, a remedy to this state of things ; and in applying a remedy, that which lies handiest and readiest is a large reduction of those duties which press most heavily on the agricultural community. What can be more reasonable, more fair or more righteous than to adopt that course ? The hon. Minister of Justice alluded to the fact that my friend the leader of the Opposition did not introduce the question of reciprocity. For what purpose ? Have not hon. gentlemen opposite told us, did not the Minister of Justice tell us, when he made his speech in Toronto, that the remedy we had suggested, the remedy of continental free trade, the remedy of throwing down the barriers between ourselves and the United States, which, in my judgment, is the only means which can give great and durable prosperity to Canada is impossible. I do not mean to say that we cannot exist without it, that is another question. I do not mean to say we may not have a moderate amount of prosperity ; but under no circumstances or conditions can the resources of Canada be developed as they should be developed, under no circumstances or conditions can this frightful exodus be stopped, under no circumstances or conditions can we make anything like a full use of the great resources we possess until in one form or another. I am not particular as to what form, the markets of the rest of this continent are thrown open to us, and we are able to trade on even terms with our friends and neighbours of the United States. But why suggest this to hon. gentlemen opposite ? A year or two ago they said it was no use to talk about reciprocity, because we could not get it. What is the statement now ? It is that hon. gentlemen opposite could get reciprocity, but they would not have it. They could have obtained it easily on the lines I have laid down, but those ultra-loyal gentlemen were so afraid of discriminating against British goods they would not dream of having it. If there ever was a practical discrimination against British goods, it is made by their own tariff ; if there ever was a tariff framed in servile imitation of the United States tariff, it is the tariff under which we now live. The hon. gentleman will not give us any information in regard to the policy of his party, or explain that policy, or give us the least hint as to the mouldering branches which it is proposed to lop off. I cannot tell the House, I need not tell hon. gentlemen, for they know it already, what the policy of the leader of the Government is. If ever there was a policy of looking to Washington, it is the present policy ; if a party ever followed a policy of looking to Washington, hon. gentlemen opposite are doing it. When the American Government repealed their sugar duties, straightway our Minister of Finance did so. When the Government at Washington shook their finger and told them to repeal the export duty on logs, the duty was removed. No sooner do our friends impose tolls in favour of the port of Montreal and the Americans object, than steps are taken to remove them. Like my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier), I complain of no reasonable concession, of no fair concession being made to the people of the United States. I am prepared to endorse every word he said as to the policy and expediency of dealing in the broadest and most generous fashion with that great people ; but, like him, I condemn hon. gentlemen opposite because they yield to threats what they refuse to a fair request. That is not the way for a small state to deal with a large one, or with any state, nor is it the way to make Canada respected or to obtain favourable treatment at the hands of the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite, I well know are afraid to declare what they will do until they know what the party which is coming into power in the republic is going to do. Their hope is, and in one sense it is my hope, that now when that great people have shaken off the shackles of the protective system, the American market will be free to us and free to all the world to a very large extent. That is their hope, but until they see what they can do, these worthy gentlemen who resent American dictation so bitterly do not dare so much as to tell us what they propose. I say again, that if ever there was a policy of looking to Washington, it is the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite have followed. The only thing I regret is that from first to last, during the last seven years, they have exhibited such a marvellous want of tact, dignity and prudence in dealing with the United States that they have most seriously prejudiced the case of the country whose destinies are intrusted to them. What were almost the last words of Mr. Cleveland before he went out of office on the expiration of his first term. Why, Sir, they were a threat to suspend commercial intercourse with Canada. Has this House forgotten the very remarkable declaration rung in our ears time and again by Sir Charles Tupper when he told us, in 1886 or 1887, that his colleagues had brought this country to the verge of commercial war with the United States, a thing which he said, and said justly, he regarded as one of the greatest calamities that could befall the human race. As he correctly stated, from commercial war to actual war is but a step, and a war between the two great divisions of the English race, I entirely agree with Sir Charles Tupper, would be one of the greatest misfortunes that could befall humanity. Sir, I have pointed out the relations on which this Government stood towards Mr. Cleveland when he left office, and what are the relations in which they stand towards President Harrison now? Cleveland may differ from Harrison and Harrison from Cleveland, but, alas, for us, Cleveland and Harrison are apparently one in their appreciation of the character and conduct of the gentlemen who now govern Canada. I say that these hon. gentlemen opposite by their conduct ever since 1886, have gravely prejudiced our case. While I, for my part, hope that the people of Canada will imitate the wise example of the people of the United States and shake themselves free from protective shackles, and while we may reap some benefit from the return to common sense on the part of the United States, I cannot but feel that if there are any men who have worked diligently and assiduously to prevent the establishment of such a good understanding between these two countries, they are these very hon. gentlemen who sit opposite to us.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, at the risk of taking up even a little time in answering arguments and replying to a speech which has not at least the element of novelty to us who have been years in this House, my only excuse is, that as such matter has been brought to substantiate the amendment to the Address and placed upon the records of the House it might be well for a few thoughts to be added as a qualification, if not as a refutation, of some of the statements which have been made. Without attempting to traverse all the ground that my hon. friend has gone over this time, as he has gone over often before, I wish to direct the attention of the House for a very few moments to three points upon which he has specially laboured. The first is as to the exodus. It has been his endeavour to prove to-night, that not only does the exodus exist from Canada towards the United States, a fact which is not doubted on either side of the House, but to prove also that that exodus is due to the impolicy of the course pursued by the present Government. He laments the fact that there is this exodus, he deprecates it and to the bottom of his heart he is moved at the sad fact. He declares in round terms, that it is the duty of statesmanship to inquire as to why there is this exodus, and as to how it can be prevented. But the hon. gentleman forgets to-night, as he has always forgotten in this House, to go beyond declamatory statements and to attempt to work out why this takes place, and how it may be prevented. The hon. gentleman may have attended college, he may have sat in the university, he may have taken a course at the schools, but if in his school class he had committed the stupid syllogism that he has been guilty of here to-night, he would have been plucked out of the first form or rusticated for six months at least. He declares and quotes figures to show, that there has been an exodus from this country, and he also declares that it is due to the impolicy of this Government, but he has not attempted to give one single fact or figure to show that the policy pursued by this Government has caused the exodus or accelerated it, nor has he told us what other policy would keep the exodus from acceleration, or prevent people going from this country to the United States. It is a coincidence possibly that between 1875 and 1878 when there was a Liberal Administration there was a large exodus; it is a coincidence possibly that from 1878 to the present time while there has been a decreased exodus there was a Liberal-Conservative Government in power; but no man with a sane mind would contend that these coincidences stand to each as cause and effect. You have got to go deeper than that, and you have to show reasonable cause why, under a certain form of policy, a certain effect should take place. It is not sufficient to say that because two things exist side by side, therefore, one was the effect or the cause of the other. Now, Sir, it does not take a gentleman of the mind and of the reading of my hon. friend one single moment to arrive at the fact that there has been an exodus from Canada for a great number of years, an exodus which commenced before even the Liberal Government attained power in 1873, an exodus which continued throughout that Administration and which was accelerated year by year from causes which are known, an exodus which has gone on from 1878, but in a diminishing degree, as the figures prove and as people well know.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Give the figures.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will please allow me to make my own speech in my own way. It may not be so good a way as my hon. friend's, but it is the only way in which I can do it. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend's intelligence immediately apprises him of these facts which I have stated, but will he go on to say that there is any reason why the exodus should be so great under the circumstances which have existed since 1878 as they were under the circumstances which existed between 1875 and 1878? Let us ask a few questions. Why do people leave this country and go to another? Let us go one step further, and ask the question: why do people leave the eastern states of the United States and go to the west? There has been this displacement of population; he knows it as well as any one on this side, and he knows the cause of it as well as any one on this side. Why has there been this constant outgoing of people from the north Atlantic states towards the western states for a period of ten or fifteen years to such an extent that the north Atlantic states, nine in number, as shown by the very census which my hon. friend has been quoting, have been completely stationary in the last decade, so far as the rural population is concerned, and have made but small comparative gains in the population of the cities and towns? Is it because they have been cursed by a National policy? Is it because they have had large duties on their imports and have been burdened by taxes? Is it because they have had the added burden of a war? Are these ample reasons, or is there another? If the reason is that they have had this policy of protection and this burden of taxation, is the hon. gentleman fair or reasonable in asking us to cure the exodus from this country by adopting a tariff which, according to his own reasoning, has caused the exodus from the other country? But is there not a wider and a deeper reason than all these for the displacement of population from east to west, from the country to the city and town, in this country as well as in the United States, to be found in the general evolution of society, the change in industrial pursuits, different social circumstances and different modes of living? I can tell my hon. friend what he knows, as many men do, that that displacement of population from east to west in the United States has been due to the opening up of new, wide and productive lands in the western country, and the consequent competition that took place under unequal conditions, aided by the extraordinary facilities for transporting traffic which have been developed during these last ten or twenty years, and which have made the burden of freight but a feather's weight in the competition; so that men who wished to farm left the eastern states, where competition was starving them out, and went on the wide and fertile farm lands of the west, where they could compete under better conditions in the pursuits of agricultural life. That is one reason, and my hon. friend knows it. There is another reason. Whether it is right or wrong, whether it is to be approved of or disapproved of, it is a fact, nevertheless, a fact which you find in England, in the United States, in Canada, and in many other countries in the world—a fact which is patent to everybody who reads—that there is a disposition in these latter days to go from the country to the town, to leave agricultural work for industrial and professional pursuits. This is one other reason for the depopulation of the rural parts of the eastern states, and for increases in the population of the towns. Are these causes confined to the United States of America, or do they also obtain here? I do not go into these matters any more fully; I do not talk about the different modes of farming, the great advantages that have resulted from the use of labour-saving machinery, and all that. These questions have been discussed by thinkers and writers these last ten years, and are familiar to every gentleman in this House. But there are these two causes which I have spoken of which are at the bottom of this depopulation of the rural districts—the influx into the cities and towns, and the migration from the less favoured parts of the country for agricultural purposes to the broader and wider areas, in this country, in the United States, and in other countries as well. Now, these are reasons which are well known, which are reasonable, which any one can assent to. But to say that there has been this exodus from Canada, and that it has been entirely due to the impolicy of the present Government in imposing a protective tariff on the country is a "non sequitur"; it is something which remains to be proved, a mere coincidence, and not something that comes in the relation of cause to effect. It must always be remembered that up to a few years ago Canada had no wide areas of land to which that part of her population which was leaving eastern farms and looking for larger farming facilities could go; so that they went where others were going from the eastern states, to the broad lands in the western states; and once a nucleus is formed everybody knows how quickly it draws to it, and what a far-reaching power it has in attractiveness. One member of a family went out years ago to the United States north-west and settled there; others members of his family follow him; kindred that have ties with them become acquainted with their doings and their progress there; they are also attracted to the same country, and the stream which at first is small grows larger and larger. It was during that time when we had no open North-west lands to which our people could be directed that the stream of population from this country seeking wider agricultural areas set towards the wider lands of the United States of America—set there in the increasing ratio I have spoken of, the stream constantly growing larger. The United States had some offset to this; we had comparatively little for another reason why people go from country districts into cities and towns is that they intend to engage in industrial pursuits and they go where the industries are. In the earlier periods that I have spoken of, the United States had this advantage for keeping a certain part of their population in the country. They had their large manufacturing works in great and abundant development ten or twenty years ago, and a large proportion of the people who were on the move from the country places were directed towards those industrial centres. They were not lost to that portion of the country, but engaged in a different kind of life. In Canada we did not have that advantage. The number of industrial institutions we had was small, their scope was not extended, and people who wished to change their mode of life from farming to industrial pursuits were directed to the great centres of industry in the eastern states; and every one who has studied the figures of population knows that the larger exodus from this country has been that of persons who went from our eastern provinces to the manufacturing towns of the eastern states. Well, Sir, I wish to put this point, and to put it strongly, that if we in Canada had had our great west opened up twenty years ago, and if we had had that industrial and manufacturing interest and power and scope twenty years ago that we have to-day, this exodus from our country would not have commenced, and we would not be in the position we are in to-day. Well, Sir, what did hon. gentlemen opposite do towards stopping the exodus during the years they were in power? Was theirs a wide, a bold, a strong policy of opening up the North-west and making those fertile lands capable of being used by our people? Sir, they trembled and stood still during the whole time that they had the administration of the affairs of this country, and at the end of it they had not even commenced to open up the fertile lands of the North-west to the streams of population who were looking for land, and who, actuated by that hunger, went in ever-increasing numbers to the great land areas of the United States of America. Sir, what did they do in planting industrial operations, manufactures and centres of industry in this country, or encouraging them, whereby that proportion of the population which makes a change from the rural districts to the cities, from agricultural to industrial life, would be kept in this country? Nothing. They allowed the manufactories of the United States, in their own words, to slaughter our manufactures in this country and thus ruin our industries; and they encouraged consequently the people of Canada to go over in ever-increasing numbers to work in the mills of that country. They never took one step, by public policy or governmental action, towards promoting the establishment of any industries in this country, where our people could obtain work and thus be kept at home to add to our wealth and progress. Neither in the shape of opening up our North-west and its broad lands, nor in encouraging manufacturers, did these gentlemen ever take a single step, and by their inaction and lack of vigorous policy they made the stream strong and broad which was taking our people continually over to the broad lands and the industrial centres of the United States. Yet these men now come to us, who have been in power and who have had a policy of development for ten or twelve years, and complain that we have not entirely stopped the exodus. Sir, a great stream is much more easily started and sent on its course than stayed once it has gained volume, breadth and force. These are some of the obvious reasons why Canada has been at a disadvantage. Will the strongest partisan on the other side of the House, and I hope there are not many partisans sitting there, contradict me when I say that it was in spite of the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite that we opened up the great North-west? Yes, Mr. Speaker, I say in spite of their efforts. Every step that the Liberal-Conservative Government took, from the time Sir Charles Tupper brought in his resolution in 1880 to open up that great North-west by building its only channel of communication, the Canadian Pacific Railway, was opposed. Every step we took was fought in the House and in the country and ridiculed at every opportunity; and these gentlemen, after having failed to scotch that enterprise at its beginning, when, at a certain time, the fate of that road and the fate of Canada hung in the balance, and when the road was saved and our country was saved by the grant of additional aid, these men opposed that grant, and, if they had had the power, they would not have hesitated to destroy the Canadian Pacific Railway and inflict immeasurable disaster upon our country. These gentlemen now taunt us because there has been an exodus from this country to the United States. Sir, in this matter of population are we so badly off as these gentlemen state? Or if it be true that all truth is in part comparative, has my hon. friend done his duty as a thinker, has he done his duty as a statesman or as an honest man and a politician, in giving to this Parliament only one side of the case and steadily avoiding the other? Are there not other countries in which the population has been partly stationary or has declined? We have had one gain to-night. We have had now from the front rank a certain declaration which my hon. friend has made, and which his party behind stands at his back in supporting, and that is that there is no salvation for Canada except by continental union with the United States, get it on what terms we may. That is the hon. gentleman's declaration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not.

Mr. FOSTER. He said that when the delegation went to Washington, they could have had reciprocity under certain conditions of discrimination, and he taunted my hon. friend with not getting it, and he stated in the next breath that continental free trade was the only thing to give great and durable prosperity to Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. They see no other way possible by which we could get out of the state of depression in which they say we are and obtain prosperity that would be durable and permanent. My hon. friend has made that declaration to-night, after the wars in the outside constituencies are over, after his shattered forces have come together, after they have reformed themselves in line of battle. As the chosen financial and trade exponent of the party, he waves the old flag of continental free trade as the absolute necessity for Canada in the way of permanent progress. Well, on the other side of the line, the affiliation of which in trade matters with Canada is so absolutely necessary to our very existence, as gentlemen opposite maintain, have they had a stationary condition of population? Let me call my hon. friend's attention to the North Atlantic states, nine in number, and when he is going over census statistics, let me ask him to thoroughly consider that portion of it, the New England states and the North Atlantic states, nine in number, running from Maine down to Pennsylvania, taking in, of course, the great state of New York and all between, and he will find that Vermont had in the last decade a gain of 136 souls, a gain in the city population of about 12,000, and a loss in the rural population of about 12,500. He will find that the state of Maine had a gain of only 12,000 in its population, 1.75 per cent, being a gain in the cities of 31,000 and a loss in its rural portion of 20,000. Taking in all these North Atlantic states, Vermont, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, he will find in that whole length and breadth a gain of 2,894,000 souls, of which all but a few thousands was in the cities, and consequently we may state that in those nine states the city population has gained slightly while the rural population has absolutely remained stationary from 1880 to 1890. If you come to Canada, you will find that the urban population has increased by 38 per cent, and that the rural population shows a slight gain, so that in the urban population our country has increased more rapidly and in rural population has lost less, and it is more fair to take those two great stretches of country and compared the two. He went on to give certain reasons why this exodus should take place. He said an exodus should take place in the case of bloody war, of devastating pestilence or of consuming famine. Well, I am glad the hon. gentleman gave me this hint and I will say that in a certain way we have had these three evils in Canada for the last ten years. We have had a bloody war, political, partisan, carried on by my hon. friend as generalissimo. The seat of that war has been in several places—always in Canada, on every hustings where it was possible to set up a cannon, sometimes on the other side of the line, drawing up its platoons at Washington, at Boston, at New York, at Philadelphia, even in the western states, always fed and encouraged by my hon. friend the generalissimo who, two or three years ago, went up and down this country arm in arm with a gentleman who, two or three years ago, fed the United States, fed those who were hostile to us in the United States, with secret information, and who, to-day, is carrying on a stupendous propaganda with the "Sun" newspaper at its head in order to annex this country to the United States. So we have had bloody war in a certain sense. We have had also devastating pestilence. Devastating pestilence in the line of what? Constant depreciation of the country emitted from one whom, if it be parliamentary, I must call my pestilential friend the generalissimo of this army who has been carrying on the war. In this country, wherever he could find an opportunity to make a speech, wherever he could find a newspaper to voice his utterances, this pestilential emission was taken place, and not only that, but sometimes he has actually employed his pen and sent these pestilential writings of his to be emitted in the very heart of the British Empire, in London and in the provinces of England itself. And this pestilence has had its effect. If my hon. friend has any influence—and he has—if hon. gentlemen who fight with him and voice his sentiments have any influence—and they have—they have certainly persuaded those who would listen to them to believe that Canada is the last place in the world to live in, and that they had better get out of it as soon as possible; and, in the causes of the exodus to which the hon. gentleman refers, the effect of these pestilential statements of Canada's disadvantages, this constant display of Canada's deficiencies should be included as leading to the result of which he has spoken, of leading people to go to other countries from Canada in order to seek their fortunes, and, in too many cases, to their own bitter disappointment, many of whom are now turning their faces back to this country and seeking the better land and leaving that which they have found to be the worse. So we have had these different causes at work in the line of causing this exodus. Now, my hon. friend has stated in explicit terms that the reason for the exodus has been the impolicy of the course pursued by the present Government and party, and has stated that if that were reversed the exodus would cease. That is simply blank assertion. He has given no proof in support of it, and I do not think he can give any reasonable reasons to prove it. What is the inevitable argument that comes from the condition of the North Atlantic states? That the reason why their population is not more depleted than it has been, is that they have large manufacturing industries which keep and which attract a large portion of their people. Not only there but throughout a much larger portion of the United States the condition of the rural population is about the same. Draw a line north of Virginia and east of the Mississippi, and you will find that in all that great tract of country you can hardly discover a rural section which has largely increased in population; in large sections the rural population has greatly decreased, and in many others it has remained stationary, the increase in the whole being extremely small. Leaving the matter of the exodus with these few remarks, but not exhausting the subject by any means, because it would take much longer to do that, I now go to another point made by the hon. gentleman, and that is the alleged pauperism and utter destitution of our farmers. He speaks of the load of mortgages upon Canadian farmers, of the destitution and pauperism of Canadian farmers, of the depreciation of farm lands. There, again, is the unfairness of stating but one side of the question. Would it not have been better if my hon. friend, looking to a fair discussion of this subject, had stated that there has been a depreciation in farm lands, I was almost going to say, all over the world, and that there are certain good causes for it, it does not need my going into that at any length. Hon. gentlemen read and they know the reasons to which I refer. Canada is not the only country in which this is found. In the United States it is found, where they have a high protective tariff. In Great Britain it is found, where they have free trade. My hon. friend, whom I have within my eye, has gone over a considerable portion of Great Britain in the last year. I have had the pleasure of seeing a great portion of it myself and I have kept myself informed, and I am here to-night to state that there is nothing in this country or in the United States of America that can compare to the depreciation of farm lands found in Great Britain itself and the depreciation of farming values and farming interests which to-day has taken place in that country. So there must be some cause wider than the National Policy, wider than the system pursued by the Government and party in power in this country, to account for the depreciation in farm lands, and, as my hon. friend has been good enough to read the census of the United States and to give us some of its facts, perhaps some day he may give us some information as to the mortgages which exist in that country, and to tell us whether, man by man, according to population, the mortgages in the United States do or do not over-top the mortgages in the Dominion of Canada. There is no doubt about it. The census facts are patent and open to any one who may read, and within the last few years so great and so marked has that been, that in two states commissions have been appointed to investigate the matter and try to propose a remedy. In the great state of New York, Governors' messages and assessors' reports have, year after year, gone to their legislatures deploring this depreciation, and declaring that in that state there has been a depreciation of one-third in value during the last ten years. The hon. gentleman has no doubt followed with interest the meanderings of a couple of correspondents of the Toronto "Globe," who are going through the country and reporting the state of affairs amongst the farmers. By mishap or by direction they wandered across into the state of New York, and they had the manliness and the honesty to state that the tale which they had from the farmers there as to the mortgages upon their lands surpasses anything that can be told as to any corresponding portion of the Dominion of Canada. So we must take these facts as a whole, and we must see whether there are not wide-spreading causes for this, or whether it is the effect of a policy carried out here at the time. I do not believe the farmers are, to hundreds of thousands, paupers in this country or on the verge of destitution or beggary. I believe the Canadian farmer's lot is better to-day than it has been at any time within the last twenty years, and by comparison I believe it is better than it is in any of these countries with which we have been comparing Canada to-day. Then I wish to mention just one more point. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, in a smart way, if not in a very profound way, had a little fun with my hon. friend beside me, and gentlemen who belong to this party, because we have a habit of preaching up the fact that Canada is prosperous. Well, Sir, I do not think it is a thing for which we may consider ourselves blamable. We say that Canada is prosperous, and what is more, we prove it. But there is one very good reason outside of all others why we are forced to do it if we wish to keep the Canadian people at their proper advantage, and that reason is that hon. gentlemen opposite always forget to do it, but never forget to do the opposite; that is, to put the disadvantages of Canada before every audience and every reader that they can possibly reach. And so it is necessary for us to bring proof, to adduce figures, to appeal to people's observation and experience in order to give them heart, because all do not investigate these things for themselves, and all do not have the wide view which takes the whole country in. So it is necessary for this party to say, and it is our duty and privilege to say to the people of Canada on every occasion: here is a country of great resources, here is a country of great progress, here is a country of great prosperity and happiness, and here are the figures which prove it, figures with which my hon. friends opposite never wrestle. Well, my hon. friends opposite say that the country is not prosperous, and find fault with us because we say that it is, and prove by figures that it is. But they give an altogether different idea of Canada; they ignore certain facts; they ignore the fact that there has been a large increase in the deposits of the people in the savings banks, or when they mention it they depreciate it as my hon. friend did to-night. But my hon. friend was once of a very different opinion, and stood up in this House, and I suppose in this very seat, and declared that one of the very best proofs of a country's prosperity was the amount of the savings of its people in the savings banks and other money depositories of the country. To-day when it suits him he thinks it is not at all a ground for arguing prosperity, but quite the opposite. I think, however, the people generally, and politicians and statesmen generally, are of the opinion that it is, amongst other things, proof of prosperity and good feeling amongst a people. They ignore the very great increase that has taken place in the trade of Canada, not only an increase during the past year of so many millions, as has been stated already, but an increase beyond any preceding period in this country. And when you take into account, as my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) has done, the fall in values during the last twenty years, there has been an increase of wonderful proportions in the external trade of this country. They also ignore the fact that this country's population is increasing, and the home market has immeasurably developed within the last ten or fifteen years. They forget that the farmers' products are being raised in greater proportion per head of the farming population than ever before, that they are being exported and consumed in a much larger proportion, and that the average price the farmer gets for them is greater than it was before. They forget another fact, that the average price of what the farmer has to buy is less by far than it has been at any time during the last ten, or fifteen, or twenty years. But, notwithstanding all these things, these hon. gentlemen go before the people and upon an ex parte case, leaving out of sight those things that make to the advantage and good heart of the country, they simply bring up those things which have a tendency to discourage the people, and to take hope and ambition away from them.

They talk about piling up the taxation. They forget several things. My hon. friend who sits opposite held the post of Finance Minister for five years in this House, and he did nothing towards decreasing the taxation of the people. The last Budget speech he made in this House was one of the most doleful and disheartening productions that ever came from a Finance Minister of any country as a portrayal of the condition of the country; yet with all that depression, the hon. gentleman's only resource was to add to the taxation instead of diminishing it. He forgets that during that time he increased the expenditure from year to year, he increased the debt, he increased the deficits; the trade fell off in a wonderful percentage. Yet this is the gentleman who, to-day, states that we must go back to that old policy of theirs, and that our policy, progressive and beneficial as it has proved itself in the past, and, as I hope, it will prove itself under amended conditions in the future, is the cause of the exodus, and the cause of the depression, and the lowering of farm values and so on. He talks about the great increase of taxation. Why, Sir, there is just one fact I would like to give the House. The poor man's tea is as much to him as the poor man's flour; one is as much a necessity to him as the other so far as habits of life go. When my hon. friend stood here as Finance Minister he taxed the people's tea five cents and six cents per pound. On the amount of the tea which was consumed in this country in 1892 at that rate of taxation, the people would have paid a round million and a quarter into the treasury of this country. Coffee he taxed; sugar was taxed at the rate of 2½ cents a pound or thereabouts. We have taken the duty off raw sugar, and I have this other fact to state to the House to-night that if we had kept the duty on raw sugar that we had two years ago, and applied it to this year's consumption, the people of this country would have paid over $4,000,000 taxation more than they have paid. Yet these gentlemen say that we have taken off none of the burdens of the people. They talk about the great burden of taxation, and yet if we take the population, and take the amount of duty that is paid upon the imports, you will find, that according to the per capita of the population in one year in which my hon. friend was Finance Minister, compared with this last year of 1892, the amount per head of duties is only 30 cents higher than it was during that year of the hon. gentleman's regime; and that during this last year of 1892, the amount of percentage of tax which is paid is about 17½ per cent upon the total imports of this country. I say these things should be taken into account as well, and it is not fair to say that we have not reduced the taxation of the country. It is not fair to say that we have not taken off burdens from the people. I will tell my hon. friend more, that although, he in his practical working of the Government for five years, did nothing of that kind, he has had the satisfaction already of seeing the burden of taxation reduced with reference to these articles that I mention, to the tune of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000, which sum has been taken permanently off the shoulders of the people: and he will have the satisfaction, if he lives long enough and stays where he is on that side of the House, of seeing even more done by this Government in pursuance of its policy of diminishing the burdens and increasing the happiness of the people of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I ask the indulgence of hon. members while I address to the House a few observations upon the conduct of the Administration which is now in power, and upon the policy which the hon. gentleman, who has just taken his seat, has defined on the floor of this House. I have no doubt whatever that His Excellency acted wisely, in the present constitution of Parliament, in selecting the hon. gentleman, who is Minister of Justice, to take charge of the Administration. I have no doubt whatever that he is better qualified for that position, than any other hon. gentleman whom His Excellency has called to his council, and so I have no fault to find with the course which His Excellency has taken in asking the hon. gentleman to constitute an Administration. I was somewhat surprised to find, that the hon. gentleman had advised His Excellency to bring into operation a statute which, although enacted in a former parliament, remained for a number of years, in abeyance on the Statute-book. It seemed to me at the time that statute was carried through this House, that it was not a wise measure, not one in the public interest, not one suited to the circumstances of a democratic country, such as Canada is. I can well understand how, in a country like England, where society is segregated into orders, and where a large number of men of great fortune are anxious that their sons, who are disposed to take part in public life, should have an opportunity of serving a species of apprenticeship in subordinate offices of Government, such a system may prevail; but in a country like this, where we are, so to speak, on a footing of equality, where the differences are differences of intellectual endowment and of opportunity, it does seem to me that it is some reflection either upon the capacity of the party, or upon the capacity of the individuals selected for those subordinate offices which have been created. It is a declaration that those parties who are selected to fill those offices are parties not qualified to assume the higher degree of responsibility that attaches to a seat in the Cabinet, and that they are properly and fairly dealt with in being assigned positions of a subordinate character. In England there are subordinate offices of Government; and when we remember that, although there are not more at any time than fifteen Cabinet Ministers, there are more than fifty members of the Administration, we can well understand how it is that positions of an inferior character and of inferior responsibility, should be created in the Administration. We understand also how it is that a Minister there, has an opportunity of selecting an assistant, a parliamentary subordinate, who usually represents the department to which the chief belongs in the House of which his chief is not a member. That rule has not been followed here. I observe, further, in the arrangement made, and in the report which you, Mr. Speaker, have laid on the Table of the House, that certain members of the Administration have not upon the acceptance of office vacated their seats. It was stated, Sir, by you, that the two subordinate Ministers of the Crown, in this House had resigned their seats. Whether that resignation took place before their appointment, or whether that resignation accompanied their appointment, I do not know. Your report, Mr. Speaker, does not inform the House. But this much is perfectly clear: under the provisions of the law if they had not previously resigned their seats, their seats became vacant by acceptance of office under the Crown; and so becoming vacant by operation of the law, they were not in a position to tender their resignations. I think we should not allow a report of this sort to pass unnoticed, because if the Minister of Justice and his colleagues are to regard this as a voluntary act on the part of those two hon. gentlemen, then the same offices might be filled at any subsequent time without any resignations. It is perfectly clear to my mind, as I think it will to any hon. gentleman who will carefully read the statute, that those are offices of emolument under the Crown, which, when accepted, like any other office, vacates the seat of any member accepting the same. What the statute does, is to take those two offices out of the class the holders of which are absolutely disqualified and rendered ineligible for election, and to make the parties accepting them, once more eligible for election, and in this respect putting them on the footing of Cabinet Ministers. This will be evident to any one who will look at sections 6 and 7 of the statute. Section 6 says:

Nothing in section 9 and of the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, or in this or any other Act shall render the Controller of Customs or the Controller of Inland Revenue ineligible as a member of the House of Commons, or shall disqualify him from sitting or voting therein.

It does not say he shall not vacate his seat. It is clear that is the effect of the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons. What that section says is, notwithstanding the fact that the seat shall be vacant, the party is not ineligible, but is qualified to offer himself as a candidate to be returned to Parliament, and to sit and vote when so returned if a member of the House of Commons. That is rendered more clear by the section which follows, which says:

Whenever any person who holds the office of Controller of Customs or Controller of Inland Revenue and is at the same time a member of the House of Commons, resigns his office and within one month after his resignation accepts any of the offices mentioned in subsection 3 of section 9 of the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons and becomes a Minister of the Crown and a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, or having so resigned accepts any office created by this Act or by the Act of the present session intituled an Act to make provision for the appointment of a Solicitor-General other than that then held by him, he shall not thereby vacate his seat.

Here the same provisions that apply to a Cabinet Minister, apply also to the Controller of Inland Revenue and the Controller of Customs. If his seat were not vacated by his acceptance of office in the first place, how can it be supposed that it would be rendered vacant by his acceptance of office other than the one he held within one month. It is plain, therefore, that the intention was to take the two officers out of the class of the eligible for election to the House of Commons, and put them in a class of officers which are eligible, not to put them in a position superior to that held by members of the Cabinet, so as not to render the vacating of their seats unnecessary, because that was the necessary effect of the operation of the statute relating to the Senate and House of Commons. Whether they accepted office in the Government or not, if it was an appointment to an office of emolument by the Crown, then the seat became vacant, and the seat becoming vacant they would have been ineligible for election, if this special provision of section six had not been made applicable to them. I make this statement on account of the report which was laid on the Table of the House, a report which I think requires some explanation, because if there is or could be any doubt as to the effect of the acceptance of office, then I think that that doubt ought to be removed. It seems to me from an examination of the two statutes, that there is not any room for doubt, but if there is, then that doubt ought to be made impossible for the future, and an amendment to the law should be made so as to make it clear that the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue do not stand in a position superior to that occupied by an ordinary minister of the Crown. There is, let me say, this difference between assistant ministers in England—members of the administration, although not members of the Cabinet—and the controllers here. The assistant minister in England is an appointee of his chief, and not an appointee of the Crown. He is not a minister of the Crown in that sense. Being appointed by his chief his seat is not vacated; but that rule does not apply to either of these gentlemen, because the law provides in both cases that the appointment shall be made by the Governor in Council, and being made by the Governor in Council, they hold offices under the Crown to which salaries and emoluments are attached, and by operation of the law, their seats, upon the agreement to accept office, become vacant. I have said all I propose to say with regard to that matter, and I wish now to make an observation or two in reference to the statement of the Prime Minister, that the amendment proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) is not a constitutional or a proper amendment, inasmuch as it related to the finances of the country, and ought not to be proposed in advance of the actual proposal to alter the tariff. That would indeed be a very extraordinary principle to lay down. Let us suppose for one instance that this resolution were to become an issue in the elections. Let me suppose that we went to the country upon this, and that this side of the House, upon that motion, were to succeed, as I think they would. Is not that a declaration, even before the meeting of Parliament, of what the views of the party are upon an important question of financial policy? Then again let me refer to the case when Mr. Gladstone in 1874, went to the country upon a proposal to make certain alterations in the inland revenue tax. He did not state specifically the character of these alterations, except to say that there was to be a diminution in the rate of taxation, a declaration precisely the same as we are making now. It is true, Mr. Gladstone lost the election, but, if he had succeeded, does not everyone see that the whole country would have known what the policy of the Administration upon that question was? If the objection of the First Minister had any force, it would be as applicable in the case to which I refer as to the motion made by my hon. friend beside me. I felt quite sure that there would be no difficulty in finding a number of instances in which paragraphs similar to that proposed in this amendment would be found in speeches made from the Throne at the opening of Parliament, and I obtained from the Library Mr. Ensor's collection of speeches from 1837 to 1882. I will read extracts from two or three of these speeches to show the Prime Minister that the objection which he takes is one which has not been recognized by the Imperial Parliament, and certainly the principles of Parliamentary Government, are quite as well understood, and quite as carefully observed there, as they are likely to be on this side of the Atlantic. In the Speech in 1844, Her Majesty, in opening Parliament, says:

I feel assured that in considering all matters connected with the financial concerns of the country you will bear in mind the evil consequences of accumulating debt during the time of peace, and that you will firmly resolve to uphold the public credit, the maintenance of which concerns equally the permanent interests and the honour and reputation of a great country.

Here was a proposal to adopt a particular policy with regard to a matter of financial importance. In 1846, Her Majesty says:

I recommend you to take into your early consideration, whether the principles on which you have acted [that is, the principles of reducing the taxes] may not with advantage be yet more extensively applied, and whether it may not be in your power, after a careful review of the existing duties on many articles the produce or manufactures of other countries, to make such further reductions and remissions as may tend to ensure the continuance of the great benefit to which I have adverted, and by enlarging our commercial intercourse to strengthen the bonds of amity with foreign powers.

Here is a direct recommendation by Her Majesty, in the Speech from the Throne, asking Parliament to consider the propriety of extending further that policy upon which they had entered, to further reduce the taxation on foreign articles, and by that reduction to extend the commerce of the country, and to increase the bond of amity existing between foreign countries and the United Kingdom. This is a declaration in Her Majesty's speech exactly on all fours with the amendment moved by my hon. friend. In the Speech of 1847 Her Majesty says :

It will be your duty to consider what further measures are required to alleviate the existing distress. I recommend to you to take into your serious consideration, whether by increasing for a limited period, the facilities for importing corn from foreign countries, and by the admission of sugar more freely into breweries and distilleries, the supply of food may be beneficially augmented.

Now, this is a specific declaration with regard to two articles, and it is clear from the paragraphs which I have read, and I need not read any others, that what the hon. gentleman says is an objection on principle, is one which is not well founded. I would like to know, if my hon. friend's motion were to carry, or if the Government had accepted it, what would be its effects upon the commerce of this country? In what way could it injuriously affect any particular class of the community? My hon. friend has not specified any articles. He has simply declared that the burdens of taxation ought to be lightened and that they ought to be lightened in the public interest. That is a clear and specific declaration as to a general course of public policy. But, as I have pointed out, in 1847, in the United Kingdom, the Government there went much further than that, declaring in favour of reducing the taxation upon certain articles which were specified. That being so, it is, I think, plain to the House, that the objection which the hon. gentleman has made, has no foundation on any constitutional ground. Now, Sir, having said this much with regard to the propriety of the motion, I wish to say a few words in reply to the observations which have been addressed to the House by the hon. First Minister and by the hon. Minister of Finance. These hon. gentlemen tell us that it is true that the National Policy has not prevented the exodus; it is true that the exodus continues, but it is unreasonable to expect that it would stop as a result of the National Policy. Why, they say, you yourselves admitted, in defending your policy in 1877, that this would not be the effect, and so you are asking us to accomplish, by this line of policy, what you predicted in advance would not flow from its adoption. Well, Sir, the objection would be well founded if the hon. gentlemen had taken the same view. But how came they on the Treasury Benches? How did they succeed in getting there in 1878? It was by a declaration that this would be the effect. They said in 1877 and 1878, that the people were leaving Canada by tens of thousands; that you, sitting on the ministerial benches and drawing your salaries, are flies on the wheel; you are utterly incapable of coping with the situation; give us the opportunity of taking your places, and we will make such alterations in the fiscal policy of this country as will put an end to this state of things. That was the position hon. gentlemen took. Why, Sir, we were told by one hon. member in the House on that occasion, Sir Charles Tupper, that it was not to secure prosperity during the general period of the world's prosperity that was required of the Government, but what was required of them, was to secure prosperity to the country when every other country was anything but prosperous; and he declared that if they were permitted to take charge of the affairs of this country, they would accomplish that result. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Finance has made a statement which, I think, is not borne out by facts. The hon. gentleman this evening has talked a great deal about facts; but what fact has he produced to show this House or the country that the exodus from Canada was greater in the period from 1874 to 1878 than it has been since? Why, Sir, both the returns of the United States bureau of statistics and those of Canada, prove the contrary. The United States returns show that from 1868 to 1874 the emigration from Canada to the United States was equal to 43,000 a year, while from 1874 to 1878 it averaged 23,000 a year—but little more than one-half of what it was during the previous six years. How has it been since? In 1879 it was 35,000, in 1880 56,000, in 1881 85,000, and so on; you have an accelerated increase in the exodus from Canada, out of all proportion greater than it was during the period a revenue tariff was in operation. The hon. gentleman says that the relation of cause and effect does not exist between the high tariff and the exodus; but, Sir, I think it does exist. It is quite possible that two things may exist together in point of time, and one may not be the cause of the other; but I think there will be no difficulty in proving that the increased exodus is due to the increased burdens imposed on the population of this country. So long as the people of Canada were more lightly taxed than the people of the United States, the emigration was proportionally small. When the people of Canada became more heavily burdened than the people of the United States, as they are to-day, then the effect of the higher taxation was to drive the people from the country that was less prosperous to the country that was more prosperous. It is true, the rate of customs taxation in the United States is higher than it is in Canada; but the customs duties there relate to articles that form but a very small fraction of the entire consumption of the population, and, in consequence of greater wealth and a more extended market existing in the United States—because you have practically free trade between forty nations—you have greater competition and a lower rate of taxation on the home-produced articles, than you have in Canada. We have here a rate of taxation on the home-produced articles, but little inferior to what is imposed on the articles brought in from abroad. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman said that there was a tendency on the part of the people, both in Canada and the United States, to go from the rural districts into the towns. That is true; but why is it true? Why should the people exhibit a disposition to do this during the past fifteen or twenty years which they did not exhibit during an earlier period? Because, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada, and the people of the United States alike, have adopted a policy which has tended to drive the rural population into the towns and cities. You have made labour less productive; you have, by the policy you have adopted, made the compensation for labour in the rural districts less than it is in the towns and cities. The result is that you have driven a very large percentage of the rural population into the towns, and these, being unable to find employment in the towns of Canada, have gone across the border into the towns of the United States. That is a necessary consequence of what you have done, and it is because that is the operation of your policy that you will find emigration from Canada into the neighbouring republic to have been larger, since your adoption of that policy, than it was in the previous period. Then the hon. Minister of Finance told us that the people in the New England states were not increasing in numbers any more than they were in Canada. Take that group of states called the North Atlantic Division, and I find that, according to the census of 1880, there were 14,500,000 in round numbers in those states, and according to the census of 1890 there were 17,401,000; and whether these are urban or rural people, the hon. gentleman will see that the percentage of increase is very much greater than in Canada during the same period. Another thing which the hon. gentleman altogether overlooks is the fact that the people who leave the states and go to the west are not lost to the United States, but the people who leave the provinces are, in a great measure, lost to Canada, for they do not go to our western territories, as the people of the United States do to theirs, but by far the greater portion cross the border, and become settlers in the neighbouring republic.

The hon. gentleman overlooks the fact that the fiscal policy which the Government have adopted has tended to bring about that state of things. They have diminished the rural population, they have diminished the profits on labour in the rural districts, they have diminished the cash value of labour, and consequently have driven out of the rural districts a very considerable portion of the population that were otherwise profitably employed. Now, the hon. gentleman has told us that they have failed in part to retain their population because the North-west Territories were not opened earlier. Why, Mr. Speaker, in the most densely populated portion of the province of Ontario, the western counties, there is not one that could not sustain double the rural population it has to-day. The hon. gentleman did not need the North-west to give room for our population. The room exists. There is not a county in the province of Ontario where there is not room for double the rural population it has at this moment, and it is not because the North-west Territories were not open ten years earlier, but because hon. gentlemen opposite have increased the burdens of taxation to such an extent, that people have found it more to their interest to go elsewhere, than to remain within our own borders. I say that the hon. gentleman, instead of undertaking to blindly defend a policy which has proved, after thirteen years' trial, a great failure, ought to admit in all candour that the policy has failed, that it has not produced the results its friends anticipated, and that the Government are prepared to enter upon a more healthy and fairer course in the interests of the people. The hon. gentleman says that we are responsible for the North-west not having been opened sooner. What were the impediments we put in the way of the settlement of the North-west? Does the hon. gentleman mean our opposing the surveying of ten times as much land as was settled, and which surveys have had to be made over again. Is it because we condemned the Government for quarrelling with the half-breed population and producing a civil war? Are the Opposition responsible for that war, the result of the negligence and the incapacity of those who were the former colleagues and associates of the hon. gentleman? Does the hon. gentleman not know that the effect of that rebellion was to seriously retard the settlement of the North-west? Then the hon. gentleman called into existence a large number of colonization societies, and he put into the hands of speculators greedy of gain the settlement of the North-west lands, and those speculators undertook to make fortunes out of the settlers, the strangers whom they desired to take in. They did not succeed, the settlements failed, the speculators made no money, and the lands remained vacant in the hands of the Government. That was the policy of the hon. gentleman. That was his bold, free, liberal, wide, and all other linear and superficial kinds of policy which he has described to-night. It did not succeed. The hon. gentleman will remember that when his friends first proposed to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, to which he has alluded this evening, among the declarations of policy which accompanied the resolution to build the road, was the declaration that its construction should not add anything to the burdens of the people. That was the policy with which the friends of the hon. gentleman set out. When they adopted that view, they thought that increased taxation was a burden, and they acted upon that assumption; but the hon. gentleman and his friends soon changed their minds, and looked upon increased taxation as a blessing. They said the tax would prove a benefit, wholly regardless of the use made of the money collected. The mere fact that you took the money out of the pockets of the people would contribute to the general prosperity of those who were thus depleted of a certain portion of their wealth. That was the policy which the hon. gentleman declares was a most wise and liberal policy. The hon. gentleman had control of the Northwest, and has had a majority of this House which enabled him to do just what he pleased with regard to that territory, and he has to-day there, within easy access, hundreds of miles of railway lands, which are still without occupants. The hon. gentleman told us also, what he has told us over and over again, that the manufacturers of Canada were rendered bankrupt by the slaughter of American goods in Canada. Well, that is the old argument, the old fiction, and although the people were for a time deluded by it, I think the hon. gentleman will find it very difficult to impress any portion of them to-day, by a statement of that sort. I can understand how the men who sacrifice their goods may be rendered bankrupt by the sacrifice. I can understand that if an American comes into Canada, and sells his goods for one-half their cost, and persists in the operation, he may lose very seriously by it; but how is the purchaser to be hurt? Will he not be benefited? But the hon. gentleman says that the Canadian manufacturer was hurt. No; I say that is not so. In the first place, the goods were not sacrificed, and in the second place, there was no failure of Canadian manufactures. I took the trouble here in 1876 to make a collection, because we had the means at our disposal at the time, of all the failures for twelve months. It was a year of very serious failures. The bankruptcies amounted to over $20,000,000. How much of that was represented by manufacturers' capital. Not three quarters of a million. I do not think there was half a million; and those who suffered were the mercantile classes, the classes whose goods had depreciated in value in the market. The men who were unable to sell at the prices they had been in the habit of obtaining before, and the result was that they failed; and they were to be subjected to higher taxes to restore property to the country. But there was no class of people of this country that weathered the storm arising from the straitened circumstances of trade throughout the world, better than the manufacturing classes of Canada. You may compare them with the manufacturing classes of the United States, at the same time, and you will find that the percentage of failures of those engaged in manufactures as compared with the failures of those engaged in every other trade was, out of all proportion, less in Canada than in the United States. And so it may be proved to demonstration, that the revenue tariff of Canada did not operate disastrously as far as the manufacturers were concerned. In 1873 there were less than two million pounds of cotton manufactured into cotton goods in Canada, and in 1878 there were nine million pounds. There was an increase of fivefold in the production of cotton goods alone, and I would like to know if the manufacturers would have increased their productions fivefold in five years, if the business was an unprofitable one. Why, the stock on the market in Montreal in 1878 was worth more than it is now or than it has been worth at any period within the last five years. So the hon. gentleman is stating what is altogether beside the fact when he states that the Americans had made Canada a slaughter market, and that the result of that was to bankrupt the manufacturers of Canada. The hon. gentleman cannot point out any class that were driven into bankruptcy in consequence of the competition from abroad. Every one knows, or ought to know, that is not the case. You consume in Canada the tweeds from Scotland and those manufactured here. The same causes that will restrict the market of the one will restrict the market of the other. When you find there is a diminution in the consumption of the one, you will find there is a diminution in the consumption of the other, because there is a diminution in the income of the population which consumes both classes of goods. It is not the case that one class of goods is driving the other out of the market, but it is the case that the same causes which diminish the consumption of the one, operate to diminish the consumption of the other. The hon. gentleman also said that my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) spoke of the farmers of Canada as being paupers. My hon. friend did not use any such expression. He said the farmers of Canada were in more straitened circumstances now than they were fifteen years ago. I say so too, and that is shown by the diminished value of real estate. The hon. gentleman says farming lands have diminished in value in England. That is true; but how came it about? It came about by the increased facilities for transportation, which put the products of the farm from almost all christendom on the English market at very little cost ; so that the farmer in the United Kingdom has his products put in competition with the products of cheap lands, with the cost of transportation and the difference of wages and yield as his only advantages. That, however, has not operated to produce the mischievous effect that we find in the value of real estate in Canada. During the last twelve years we have found gentlemen on the treasury benches denying that real estate had depreciated in value. The Minister of Agriculture over and over again, when we pointed out that it was the testimony of every loan company that the value of farm lands had declined in Ontario quoted from the reports of the Bureau of Statistics of Ontario for the purpose of showing—though they did not show—that farm lands had not fallen in value. Now, the Minister of Finance says they have fallen in value in Canada, but that we are no worse off than they are in the United States or in the United Kingdom, because the value of real estate has fallen off in those countries. The hon. gentleman has made progress. He has come to see as a fact what he called a fiction not so long ago. So far I congratulate him on the progress he has made. So far he has a more accurate view of the situation, but he has no more accurate view of the causes which have brought about the state of things in this country, than he had two years ago. When the hon. gentleman tells us that the tariff has not produced these results, he also tells us of the burdens that my hon. friend put on the people by a tax on tea and a tax on coffee. The hon. gentleman argued for years that a tax on an article did not increase the price to the consumer, but was a loss to the producer. I think that was argued as to the sugar duties, but now that the sugar duties have been taken off in part, he tells the people that he has relieved them of a portion of the burden under which they suffered.

Mr. FOSTER. You are quite out.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, I am not.

Mr. FOSTER. It all depends on the article.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose then a tax on sugar would be borne by the consumer. That is the hon. gentleman's contention now, though a few years ago he was of a different opinion.

Mr. FOSTER. I am of the same opinion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has had new light. I congratulate him on being able to see where before he was blind. The hon. gentleman has told us of the increased commerce of the country. I dare say you remember when we were told we were not to look to increased commerce for increased prosperity. We were to be a self-contained people. We were to have a policy which would bring here the produce of the whole of christendom. Canada was to become a distributing point for the commerce of all the world. In 1882 we went to the country for what purpose? What was His Excellency the Governor-General advised to tell the House he prematurely dissolved it for? In order that capitalists might know that the people endorsed the policy under which the millions of money awaiting investment in Canada might be safely invested here. As a consequence of that investment, there were to be tens of thousands of skilled labourers come here to engage in the factories thus to be fostered, and then there were to be tens of thousands of farm labourers engaged on the farms which were to supply those people with food, and the prices the farmers now get in Liverpool were to be the prices at which their produce would be sold to these people in the towns and villages. The people were told they were losing so much by the transportation of their produce on the railways and across the Atlantic; that the money ought to be in their own pockets, and would be if the people who consumed their products in Manchester and Birmingham were living here. The hon. gentleman does not say that now. He does not now point to these large factories, and to the numerous employees in these factories. Why, the hon. gentleman and his friends secured a report, giving an account of those who were engaged in manufacturing pursuits in the different provinces, and among those was mentioned the production of saws in the city of St. John. But we were told by a member from that province who knew the city of St. John, that the manufacturing there consisted of what was done by an old man who lived in a small place, and did a little travelling about sharpening buck-saws for wood sawyers. Now, the hon. gentleman has, no doubt, in his census given us a large increase in the number of manufacturers and in the capital of men just of that sort. Then the hon. gentleman told us that we were importing too much and exporting too little. We were to equalize imports and exports; that the balance of trade was against us; and that the country was being ruined thereby. That is not the hon. gentleman's opinion to-day. The hon. gentleman to-day points to the very large imports into this country, and he does not give the slightest indication that he holds the old views that were so persistently proclaimed to the people of this country, that the importations indicated the amount of our indebtedness, and that the difference between imports and exports showed whether we had gained or lost by the transaction. Now, one thing the hon. gentleman said which indicated some distrust in the line of argument he has hitherto adopted in the House, was this: Well, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that the amount of taxation at the present time is not very large, it will only average 17½ per cent on the imports. The hon. gentleman, then, does not think that very high taxation is a very great benefit, or he would not have been inclined to tell us that it was only 17½ per cent. Well, Sir, when we consider the number of articles that are imported in the interest of those for whom this high tax is imposed, and which are admitted free from duty, we will see how very burdensome this tax is on a very large proportion of the people of this country. The statement made by the Minister of Finance and the statement made by the Prime Minister on this subject, do not lead us to suppose that they are disposed to give the people any degree of relief in the direction in which the resolution of my hon. friend points. What we ask is that the burdens of the people of this country shall be lightened. We say that the whole system of taxation requires revision: that the policy pursued in the imposition of that tax is a pernicious policy; that taxes should be imposed solely with reference to the public interest, and these taxes have not been so imposed; that a very large amount of taxation, equal to several millions, is taken every year out of the pockets of the people of this country that never reaches the public treasury at all. We say that ought to be discontinued; that there ought to be a change in that particular. I do not say that it should be made all at once, but there should be a change in that particular, looking to the total abolition at an early day of every dollar of tax imposed upon the people of this country that does not ultimately find its way into the public treasury. Now, the hon. gentleman has referred to a tax on certain articles, and he says that the people are relieved of a certain amount of taxation. Well, Sir, the relief that they get is shown by the amount of taxation that reaches the public treasury. To-day, beside the enormous sum that does not reach the treasury at all, you have a very large amount of taxation collected. The burden of taxation is a serious one. It is falling upon the population unequally. They are not bearing their burden in proportion to their ability to pay. Those that are least able to pay, many of whom are in straitened circumstances, have to pay upon what they consume out of all proportion, a larger rate of taxation, than other portions of the population more favourably circumstanced. I say that ought not to be, that we should follow the policy of taxation laid down by Adam Smith a century ago; that care should be had to impose taxes in such a way that they will fall upon the population in proportion to their ability to pay; that they shall be imposed in such a way that the taxes shall reach the public treasury and not go elsewhere; and that they shall be imposed only to the extent that the interests of the State require. Now, we say that these principles of taxation, under the present tariff, are violated in all these respects, that the taxes are unequal; that they fall unjustly upon the population, that a large portion of them are wasted and never reach the public treasury; and that they are taken in a larger degree from the people of this country than the public interest requires. The Government and the Parliament of this country should inaugurate a system of economy. That has not been done. The hon. gentleman has over and over again boasted, as if it were a matter for congratulation, that he had taken out of the pockets of the people of this country a larger sum than was required for the public necessities. He boasted of his surplus. I say that a Government is not entitled to have a surplus. There is no stimulus to economy where a large surplus remains in the hands of the Government. A large surplus invites extravagance, and has invited extravagance in this country. Everything points in that direction. Why, Sir, look at the necessities of the Government fifteen years ago, when $23,500,000 were considered a large and unnecessary amount of taxation, and to-day that hon. gentleman expends over $40,000,000, and there is no indication that there will be any diminution in the burden of taxation. I know the hon. gentleman comes down here with a budget every year, and tells us that the taxation amounts to about $36,000,000. But, Sir, everybody knows that is an illusory statement; everybody knows that that does not explain all the facts. Every one knows that in connection with the Intercolonial Railway large sums have been charged to capital account that ought to have been charged annually against the ordinary expenditure of the country. And what is true of that, is true, in a hundred other cases, where sums ought to be charged against annual expenditure that are charged to capital account. If there was a prospect of capital account being closed then there might be some foundation for such a distinction, but there is to-day just the same demand for expenditure that there was a quarter of a century ago when this federation was first inaugurated. Sir, the Minister of Railways a few days ago said at a public meeting that it would be time enough to consider a policy of economy when some gentleman on the opposite side would point out in what direction economy might be practised. Well, let me say to the hon. gentleman that I think a very large amount of economy might be practised in connection with the railway he has under his charge. I think that the expenditure might be brought within the income of the road. I think that the Indians of the North-west can be paid $5 without an expenditure of $7 to make the payment. I think the Indians of British Columbia can be paid $1 without an expenditure of $4.50 for the purpose of making the payment. I think that people in a number of towns and villages, in closely contested counties, can do without some of the public buildings that this Government erects in order to secure constituencies, thereby entailing a permanent increased charge upon the public expenditure. I think I could point out a number of instances in which economy might be practised to a very large extent, and so I think we may safely ask the representatives of the people in Parliament to force the Government to consider a policy of economy, and to adopt that policy in the public interest. I therefore feel that I can, without any injustice to the administration, without any injury to the public interest, but with great advantage to that interest, support the motion which my hon. friend has moved in amendment to the Address.

PRAYERS.

DISFRANCHISEMENT FOR BRIBE TAKING.

Mr. DICKEY (for Mr. Weldon) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 2) to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes. He said : This Bill provides that, on the petition of twenty-five electors in any constituency, the Government shall be obliged to appoint a commission composed of one member of the Bench of the Superior Court of the province, and that this commissioner shall proceed to the constituency, take evidence with regard to the prevalence of improper practices, and report the persons guilty of such, and these people shall be disfranchised for a period of eight years. That is the general scope of this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 3) to amend the Wrecks and Salvage Act.—(Mr. Costigan.)

AMENDMENT TO THE FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation) moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Franchise Act, chap. 5., R.S.C. He said : The Bill I now introduce is very simple ; it provides that a clause be added after clause 35 of this Act, with respect to appeals from the decisions of the revising officer, so as to fix a time during which these appeals should be decided. I propose by this Bill that these appeals shall be decided within three months, or that they be declared null and that the names remain on the electoral list. That will effectively prevent the recurrence of what occurs now in L'Islet.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of Militia and Defence for the half year ended 30th June, 1892.—(Mr. Patterson, Huron.)

SUPPLY—LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the close of the last session of the House, the First Minister, in reply to a question put to him by an hon. gentleman on this side of the House, stated that the question of appointing a Governor of the province of New Brunswick would be taken up immediately after the prorogation. Since that time several months have elapsed, and I understand that no such appointment has yet been made. I would ask the First Minister to now take the House into his confidence and to state what was the cause of the delay, and whether it is the policy of the Government to give third terms to the Provincial Governors or not? During the recess the press has very naturally discussed this matter, and many names have been referred to. The name of the respected Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of that province has been mentioned, and at one time it was thought, and generally believed, that the present Secretary of State had accepted the position, but I suppose we may understand by his accepting his present duties that he is not looking for it, at any rate for the time. We have also heard the name of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns) mentioned, and we have heard that his appointment was pressed on the Government, and also, we have understood, that his fitness for that appointment was challenged by others very severely. Then the name of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Adams) has been mentioned, and favourably mentioned. Other names have also been referred to, one of a gentleman who was formerly a member of this House, who is looked upon as one of the Fathers of Confederation, and who would no doubt make a very popular Governor. No doubt these names are under the consideration of the Government of the day, but I think it is only fair, looking at the promise of the First Minister at the close of the last session, that he should state what reasons there are for the extraordinary delay in making the appointment. The present incumbent of the office has had two terms, and is now two years and some odd months on the third term. It is not right that such a state of things should continue. It would inaugurate a very bad system if it were understood that a third term might be given, and if the hon. gentleman cannot arrange the differences amongst those who support him as to who should be appointed, he might go outside and appoint either the Chief Justice or our old and esteemed fellow-member, Mr. Mitchell. However, whomsoever the Government may appoint is another matter, but the appointment of somebody is, I think, a necessity, and I think the cause of the delay should be explained.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I presume the hon. gentleman does not expect me to discuss the claims of the different gentlemen whose names have been put forward. The subject was brought to the notice of the House by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) towards the close of last session somewhat unexpectedly, and the line which the hon. gentleman's observations took, as I remember, was somewhat thus. The hon. gentleman challenged the constitutional propriety of allowing any time to elapse after the expiration of the term of a Lieutenant-Governor without the appointment of his successor. He seemed to think that it was a constitutional obligation on the Government to fill the office at once. The position then taken by the hon. member struck me at the time as being somewhat new, and, having been mentioned on the spur of the moment, I promised the hon. gentleman and the House that the subject would be taken up immediately after the close of the session. It was, and the conclusion which I arrived at was altogether different from the conclusion which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) seemed to have arrived at. I humbly submit to the House, notwithstanding the opinion which he has expressed, that the constitutional position is this, that the Lieutenant-Governors hold office during the pleasure of the Crown, but are irremovable except for cause within the five year period, and that there is no such exigency as the hon. gentleman seemed to suppose in regard to filling the office. It was chiefly for that reason that the office was not filled by another incumbent, it being already occupied by a gentleman who was well able to fulfil the functions of the office. I may state that no decision has been come to in regard to conferring a third term, and I agree with the hon. member that in most cases that should be avoided. The office has remained without a new appointment for the reason that it is well filled now and that no reason for a new appointment has been shown.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The opinion I expressed last year I entertain still, that it is an irregular and unconstitutional proceeding to permit a Lieutenant-Governor to continue in the position which the Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick occupies at the present time. The hon. gentleman has said that these appointments are made during the pleasure of the Crown. That is true of every Governor appointed in any part of the British Empire, but as a matter of fact they do not hold office longer than five years except for cause. The rule pursued by the Colonial Office is precisely that laid down in the British North America Act as to the Lieutenant-Governors of the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman says that after five years have expired, the Government are under no obligation to immediately appoint a successor. Now, the hon. gentleman should see that the position of Lieutenant-Governor, after five years have expired, is altogether different from what his position was before that period expired. The hon. gentleman knows that after five years have expired, the Lieutenant-Governor can be removed without assigning any cause. Sir Leonard Tilley might be removed at the end of two years, he might be removed at the end of three, at the end of four, at the end of five, at the end of six. After the first period of five years have expired, then he holds office simply as a tenant at will. That is his position. Now, I say that that position is altogether out of harmony with the constitutional principle which is intended to make the Governor independent of the control or interference of the Government here. The hon. gentleman will see that after the five years has expired the position of the Lieutenant-Governor is not at all the position of Lieutenant-Governor during the period of those five years; and the intention of the law is that Lieutenant-Governors should not be removable in any one of the provinces, although appointed during pleasure, except for cause. Now, that being so, the hon. gentleman will see that the position I took last year is a sound position, is a constitutional position, and every day that he permits Sir Leonard Tilley to remain as Lieutenant-Governor of the province is, in effect, violating the spirit and principle that was intended to govern the office of the Lieutenant-Governor under the British North America Act. It does seem to me that the Government are derelict in duty in allowing Sir Leonard Tilley to continue in the position that he now occupies, instead of appointing, under the great seal of the province, another party to take his place. It is true, as my hon. friend suggests, that the Government might have issued a new commission to Sir Leonard Tilley, and he would have been again holding office during the pleasure of the Crown for a period of five years, subject to removal only for cause; but that commission not having been issued, that is not his position. I do not say that Sir Leonard Tilley is not a proper party to have occupied that position. I admit that his long training in Parliament qualified him well for the office which he held as Lieutenant-Governor; but I do not suppose that the Government intend to introduce the principle of making Lieutenant-Governors for life. That is not the theory or principle that governs appointments by the Colonial Office. The intention was that the same rule should prevail here. What is a matter of simple regulation in the Colonial Office, is a regulation made by law in this country, and when the five years expired, a successor to Sir Leonard Tilley ought to have been appointed. Now, I think it is very desirable that the party who holds the office of Lieutenant-Governor, just as the party who holds the office of Governor-General of Canada, should be a gentleman of parliamentary experience, of parliamentary training, who knows the rules and principles of our system of parliamentary government, and knowing them, he would be qualified to discharge his duties, and would know what were his constitutional relations to his advisers and to the legislature. It does seem to me that the position taken by the Minister of Justice has not been well considered, and that the principle I stated last year is a sound principle, that is to say, that within a reasonable time after the period has expired, a successor should be appointed under the great seal, and holding his office independent of the Government except where he has abused the trust that has been reposed in him.

Mr. LAURIER. The principle which has been laid down by the Minister of Justice is one of great consequence. The hon. gentleman says that Sir Leonard Tilley has been appointed Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick during the pleasure of the Crown. Well, that means simply that he is appointed for life and can remain there as long as the pleasure of the Crown will leave him there. But, Sir, the pleasure of the Crown never meant, in constitutional government, the caprice of the Crown. The pleasure of the Crown means some reasons whereby things should be done that need to be done. Although Sir Leonard Tilley has been appointed during the pleasure of the Crown, still at the end of five years there is one cause why it should be the pleasure of the Crown that he should be no longer Lieutenant-Governor, and that cause is that he has been holding his office for five years. Now, the hon. gentleman is aware that every day after the expiration of five years that a Lieutenant-Governor remains in office, there is a violation of constitutional government in this country as we have always understood it. If Sir Leonard Tilley is to be continued in office, let him be appointed by a new commission, and then there will be no difficulty. Sir Leonard Tilley is quite competent to fill the office. Personally he is quite acceptable to all parties and to all people. There could be no objection to reappointing him, but there is an objection in allowing him to remain there on sufferance day after day, or during the pleasure of the Crown, as the Minister terms it. Does the hon. gentleman contend, for instance, that the pleasure of the Crown is to be merely the caprice of the Crown? That if the Crown chooses to let Sir Leonard Tilley remain in his position for one year, or ten years, or twenty years, or all his life, they may do so? If that is the interpretation of the law, it should certainly be modified. But that is not the interpretation of the law, and the only conclusion we can come to, after the explanation of the hon. gentleman, is that for reasons better known to themselves, the Government are not prepared to make the appointment in New Brunswick. It may be that they find a difficulty in making an appointment among so many aspirants, but that is not a constitutional reason; and surely the hon. gentleman, if he will discharge the duties which he owes, not only to the people of New Brunswick, but to the people of Canada and to the Crown, he should advise His Excellency at once to make an appointment, whether it is Sir Leonard Tilley or some one else.

MILITIA SUPPLIES.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the House resolves itself into Committee of Supply, I would call attention to a matter in connection with the Department of Militia and Defence. These estimates contemplate the House being invited to vote $1,250,000 for the Department of Militia and Defence. Some years ago complaints were made to the House and to a committee of this House, against the character of the supplies, the uniforms and materials generally dealt out to the militia. I took the responsibility of bringing that matter before a committee of inquiry. A large amount of evidence was taken, and the committee made a report. That report was submitted to this House, and was the subject of discussion. I contended at that time that the evidence showed a most unsound system in the purchase of militia supplies, the result of which was bad material, bad workmanship and consequent loss to the Government. However, the argument and the evidence fell upon deaf ears, the House declaring itself perfectly satisfied with the administration, with the system in force, and the way it was being worked out. Not an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House was found prepared openly and publicly to express his disapproval of that condition of affairs, although some military men among them who recorded their votes in approval of the administration, had been almost in open insurrection against the department by reason of the existence of these very grievances. Nevertheless the House told the country that everything was being done that the public interest demanded, that the system in force was all that was needed. What was the system? A member of Parliament through the guise of a corporation contractor for the sale of supplies to the department: no system whereby public competition was invited; but the whole arrangement appeared to be either the result of corruption or negligence, certainly a violation of the true spirit of Parliament in allowing a member of Parliament to be a contractor to these enormous sums each year. There being those relations between the contractors and the Government of which I have spoken, it followed that there was not that proper supervision over the actions of the contractor that otherwise would have obtained, and the result was, whether through political influence or whatever it might be, there were sold to this Government thousands of dollars worth of material and supplies for the use of our militia that were in no sense in compliance with the conditions of the contract, and in no sense were fit supplies. But as I have said, it was idle to talk to the House. The evidence was conclusive, we had the testimony of veterans in the service, whose testimony was certainly not likely to be adverse to the Government, if the facts would not warrant it, everything was ready for a reformation, except sound public opinion in this House and in the Government. Matters went on as before, and last November the officer commanding Her Majesty's forces, I suppose, from a sense of duty, was obliged to put himself on record in regard to this state of affairs; and before this House resolves itself into Committee of Supply to vote another million and a-quarter to maintain the Department of Militia and Defence it is due that assurances should be given that there has been a change of method in regard to the management of the militia force. Permit me to read to the House from the report to which I have referred, which is dated 30th June last. Under the head of equipment, I find this paragraph in the report of the officer commanding the Department of Militia:

The condition of a large proportion of the equipment in use in the militia, is even worse than I have already represented. Not only is a great part of it worn out with age, but much of that which is issued as new is of the worst possible quality. I have seen saddlery and other equipment, when issued fresh from store, which failed to endure the ordinary usage of a twelve days' camp. I have seen boots that had been issued to soldiers, the leather of which had no more consistency than paper.

Speaking of stores, the commanding officer goes on, in a later paragraph, to say:

The system under which clothing, arms, equipment and military stores are now procured and issued to the militia, appears to me open to very serious objections.

The responsibility for purchasing stores, making contracts, viewing the stores furnished by contractors, as well as for their custody and final issue, is all vested in one office, regardless of the conflict of opposing interests, affected by the performance of duties of such widely different character. It would seem more in accordance with business principles to vest the responsibility for purchase and contracts in the financial or civil branch of the department, and give to the military executive the duties of custody, inspection and issue. This would be more easy since the amount of stores (exclusive of obsolete and condemned articles) in possession of the department amounts to little more than an "expense store" calculated to meet the current requirements of the militia, but not providing for any reserve.

I submit that the House is entitled to guarantees on these certain points. We are entitled to be told, first, is the manufacture of the clothing of the militia of Canada directly or indirectly under the same management as before? In the second place, are those contracts filled by the same contractors? I do not mean by a new deal, because I understand that, in order to get over the criticisms that were very properly directed against the system some years ago, the then contractor with the Government has become a sub-contractor and another person appears as direct contractor, while, I understand, the work of manufacturing the clothing goes on in the same establishment as before. I submit that it is due to the House that it should be informed whether the clothing is manufactured at the same establishments as heretofore. If so, with the record supplied to the Committee on Public Accounts, which this House said was wholly valueless evidence, and with the testimony of the officer commanding, I think the time has come when we should treat those contractors as all persons treat unworthy contractors, men who will not live up honestly to their contracts, and give them the go by. The fact that this corporation possesses political influence is not sufficient reason that public money should be squandered with them, and that that great public service, the militia should be made to suffer by it. I hold, therefore, that we are entitled to ascertain the facts from the Minister, and in order that he may not misunderstand my points, I ask, first, is or is not the militia clothing now supplied to the Government being manufactured in the same establishments in which it was being made when this report was prepared; second, are any steps being taken by the department to invite tenders by public competition for the manufacture and supply of clothing on business principles? Until the House obtains assurances on these points, it will not be reasonable to ask it to go into Committee of Supply on any item connected with Militia and Defence.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The best answer I can give to my hon. friend is that, with the consent of the Minister in charge of the department and of the Governor in Council, the report of the Major-General commanding has been incorporated in the departmental report of this year. The fact that the report is thus printed will be a sufficient assurance to my hon. friend and this House as to the intentions of the Government in connection with the Department of Militia. As regards the specific questions put by my hon. friend, if he will place them on the Notice Paper, I shall have much pleasure in giving them that attention which their importance demands.

Mr. HAZEN. Referring for one instant to the question raised by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) with respect to the New Brunswick governorship, I desire to say a word. As there seemed to be a difference of opinion as to what was the proper constitutional course to adopt between the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), I sent for a copy of the British North America Act, and it certainly seems to me that under any fair interpretation of section 59 of that Act, the course pursued in regard to the governorship of New Brunswick cannot with any degree of fairness be called unconstitutional or improper. The Act distinctly states that the Lieutenant-Governor shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor-General, and in the same paragraph there is a condition that no Lieutenant-Governor can be removed from office during a period of five years from his appointment, except for cause. I take that paragraph to mean, as was stated by the Minister of Justice, that the Lieutenant-Governor cannot be removed from office, except for cause, during a period of five years from his appointment; but that it is not incumbent on the Government after those five years have expired to continue him in office by a new commission or remove him from office by appointing a successor. It, therefore, seems to me beyond question that the Government acted strictly within the statute in regard to the Lieutenant-Governorship of New Brunswick. It is true, undoubtedly, that the course adopted has been an unusual one in this country; but it is also true that the circumstances have been exceptional, for I doubt if there has ever been in any province of Canada a Lieutenant-Governor who has filled the position with such general acceptance, irrespective of party, as has Sir Leonard Tilley in the province of New Brunswick.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I apprehend there is no doubt as to the technical legal right of the Government to act as they have done on this question, and it is not necessary therefore to press the argument as to whether they are a little to the windward of the law. The broad question raised by my hon. friend is, whether, having reference to the position that the Lieutenant-Governor plays in our political economy, it is or is not a proper thing that our Lieutenant-Governors should be mere tenants at will, removable at the pleasure or caprice of the Government without any cause assigned. That is the position Sir Leonard Tilley is in to-day. He may be turned out to-morrow, or he may be left in office for one year or two years or the rest of his natural life. Now, whether Sir Leonard Tilley is or is not a good Governor is not the question. I agree with my hon. friends here that he is a man of very considerable experience and may therefore be fairly supposed to be qualified to discharge his duties, but I also agree with them that it is in the highest degree inexpedient that, except for a short period for matters of temporary convenience, any man should be allowed to remain there as a mere temporary Governor. Why, Sir, we know, and I think my hon. friends from Quebec know that cases may arise in which the position of Lieutenant-Governor may be used or abused in a way that the constitution never contemplated. We have had experience enough that the Lieutenant-Governors of provinces take upon themselves rights and functions which the Governors-General of Canada have never dared to hint at. I think we have proof enough of that, and I say it is in the highest degree inexpedient that for any considerable period a Lieutenant-Governor—I do not care who he may be, I do not care in what province he may be—should be allowed to remain in office as the occupant of the place on sufferance. As I have said, we do not object at all—although there is a good deal to be said against the expediency of giving any man a third term—we do not object at all if the Government in their wisdom see fit to issue a commission to Sir Leonard Tilley and put him in the position in which a Lieutenant-Governor should be, of holding his office as a judge holds it; that is, by holding it removable only for cause. I take it that is the position of a Lieutenant-Governor during the five years' period. It is nominally at pleasure, but it is really removable only for cause. He holds his office during good behaviour practically as a judge holds his. What would be thought if we went back to the old and evil system under which judges held office at the pleasure of the Crown and could be removed at pleasure? To a very considerable extent the Lieutenant-Governor of a province should be an independent man. He occupies in some respects, between the two parties very much of a judicial position, and I believe, Sir, that the Constitution never contemplated—although there may be, and I suppose is, a loop-hole for this kind of thing to be done—the Constitution, I say, never contemplated that Lieutenant-Governors should be allowed to hold office simply at caprice and pleasure, on the understanding that if they pleased their friends at Ottawa they may keep a comfortable situation, and that if they do not please their masters they shall be bundled out without any formality of assigning a reason or without informing the House that their usefulness was gone, as was the case in a certain well remembered instance here. I wholly agree with the contention of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the contention of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier), that it is in the last degree inexpedient that except for a very short period, and for purposes of very temporary convenience, that this important office, an office which we have seen and known, may be used for the purpose of interfering very materially with the expressed will of the people, should be held by anybody, I do not care who he may be, on such a tenure as that by which Sir Leonard Tilley now holds the Lieutenant-Governorship of New Brunswick. With respect to the domestic quarrels of hon. gentlemen opposite we have very little to do. We do not care whether the party of the Minister of Inland Revenue, or whether the party of the Minister of Finance get the uppermost. We do not care much whether the new member comes from the east or the west or the south or the middle of New Brunswick. Let them settle these matters as they please. All I contend for is that in the interest of the public service, and for the purpose of discharging the duties of Lieutenant-Governor, it is of very great importance indeed that whoever may be chosen can hold his office during good behaviour, removable only for cause.

Mr. OUIMET. I am glad to see that we agree pretty well on the legal aspect of the question, that Lieutenant-Governors ought to hold office during pleasure, but not for a less period than five years. It is within the pleasure and prerogative of His Excellency the Governor in Council to continue beyond the five years his confidence in a gentleman who has been appointed to the position of Lieutenant-Governor, and this exercise of prerogative comes under the supervision of the House and the country, and for that, in this instance as well as in any other, the advisers of His Excellency are ready to answer for any abuse that can be made of the exercise of His Excellency's prerogative. However, I must candidly say that this case must be looked at as an exceptional case. It is a comfort to see the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition admit that this exception is on behalf of an exceptionally good man. I agree with the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) that it is very important that the Lieutenant-Governors should enjoy the fullest independence possible while they hold that high office. There is one point, however, on which we have differed in the past from hon. gentlemen, and that is as to the degree of independence with which Lieutenant-Governors should exercise their high powers. As to the late instance to which the hon. gentleman has referred, every one was much surprised that this question was not brought before the House last session, and we have remained under the impression that if the question of the independence with which the prerogative of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had been exercised recently had not been brought before Parliament, it was because hon. gentlemen opposite did not expect to gain much credit for themselves in doing so.

Mr. FRASER. There is one point in this question which I think hon. gentlemen have forgotten. If the Lieutenant-Governor can be continued for one month after his term expires why not continue him for a year or five years or ten years? But there is another side to the question which I think this House should take some notice of. I hold that of all the unseemly things we can have in this young country, it is for a man to get up a petition for himself and hawk it around asking that he should be made Lieutenant-Governor. I think it is desirable in the extreme that a man holding such a high office should be of such character and position that he would be pointed out at once without any effort on his part as the person who should be selected. But for a member of Parliament, or for anybody else to get up a petition, and to attach his own letter to it making application for the office after the petition was signed by certain members, is derogatory to this Parliament and infamous in this new country. I conceive, Sir, that the Governors-General and the Lieutenant-Governors ought to be men of the highest character and men who should not find it necessary to try and get up a petition for themselves in favour of their appointment. Has it come to such a pass that the man who is to represent Her Majesty in a province, is to be a man who seeks the office like a common scavenger, moving among the members and asking them if they will not sign a petition that he should be Lieutenant-Governor? What a manly thing that is? With what dignity a man like that can fill the position? What honour he would confer upon the province and how well he would represent Her Gracious Majesty? I take it that in this country we should at once stamp out such a thing as that. I trust that hon. gentlemen opposite; I trust that the First Minister, who I believe understands these matters and who has some conscience and some idea of the dignity of the position, will so treat any man who comes to him with a petition of that kind as to make it ever afterwards impossible for any of his servile followers to carry around a petition for signature asking that he should be appointed to an office for which neither honour, nor nature, nor dignity ever designed him to occupy.

Mr. LANGELIER. The instance mentioned by the Minister of Public Works is the very best proof of the wisdom of our constitution in reference to the office of Lieutenant-Governor. The hon. gentleman did not seem to have understood the arguments of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and of the hon. leader of the Opposition. He says the Ministers are responsible to Parliament for the maintenance in power of the Lieutenant-Governor after his term has elapsed. We admit that; but it is exactly what the constitution does not want. The constitution has laid down the principle that the Ministers shall not have the Lieutenant-Governor in their hands or under their thumbs. While Lieutenant-Governor he is supposed to be independent of the Federal Ministry, only to be removed by Parliament for cause. There are great objections to his being maintained as Lieutenant-Governor after the five years are over. Then he is entirely in the power of the Government here instead of being independent of them. As to the instance mentioned by the hon. Minister of Public Works he could not have mentioned a worse instance. He says we did not bring up that question before. Well, we could bring it up this year. We have from the very mouth of the gentleman himself a statement of the way in which he acted as Lieutenant-Governor. We have him admitting that when the constitution was in his way he jumped over it; when his oath was in his way he jumped over his oath. He made that admission in the presence of the hon. Minister of Public Works in a speech which he delivered in Montreal.

Mr. OUMET. If the hon. gentleman will allow me; I was there present, and I never understood my hon. colleague to apply the allusion he made to his own conduct in Quebec.

Mr. LANGELIER. That is a new construction of his speech, because I have not seen a single ministerial paper which put any other construction upon it than the one I have given. He made the remark that when he found a wall in his way he jumped over it, and everybody understood that he referred to the wall of the constitution and the wall of his oath. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman complains that we did not bring that matter before this House. We had an opportunity lately to bring it before the people of Quebec. There was an election in L'Islet, and the hon. Minister of Public Works has a vivid recollection of that election. The gentleman to whom I am alluding has administered justice in the county of L'Islet and in two neighbouring counties. Yet he had not the courage to show himself in that election. It was claimed that he had saved the province of Quebec in those counties; and yet that saviour had not the courage to show himself in that county which it was claimed he had saved. The hon. Minister of Public Works, though a comparative stranger to that part of the country, went there, as did also the hon. Postmaster-General. Their own papers boasted that Mr. Angers, the gentleman alluded to, would go there also and carry the county before him; but he had not the courage to go there and boast of having jumped over the constitution. It was only in Montreal, at a meeting composed of the Tory party, that he made this great boast. He never ventured to appear anywhere else in the province of Quebec. Now, we are not afraid to discuss his conduct. It was outrageous, and it shows more than anything else the wisdom of our constitution, that it does not contemplate putting the Lieutenant-Governors under the thumb of the Ministers at Ottawa. His papers and his friends boasted that he had to come to Ottawa to sign official documents—that he refused to take the advice of those whom he was bound to follow, but, instead, took the advice of the Ottawa Ministers. In saying this I do not mention secrets revealed by the Ministers, but matters openly stated by his own political friends in the province of Quebec. We have had some most scandalous things in connection with the administration of justice in the province. There was an official magistrate in Rimouski whose administration was a disgrace to the province, and it was openly boasted that he would never be dismissed because he had assisted the hon. Postmaster-General in the election. It is an evidence of the wisdom of the constitution that it does not want to make the Lieutenant-Governors the mere tools of the party in power at Ottawa.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, I am not at all surprised at the warmth with which the hon. gentleman seems to resent the action of the late Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman has more than one good reason for feeling very much annoyed at the action taken by my hon. colleague who now has a seat in the Senate. But the hon. gentleman, to my surprise, taxes the Hon. Mr. Angers with having been afraid to submit to the people of Canada the question of the manner in which he dealt with an Administration which disgraced the province of Quebec; and that, according to the hon. gentleman, is the reason he did not make his appearance in the county of L'Islet. Sir, the question of the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor was submitted to the people of the province of Quebec in a constitutional way, and the answer came from the people of the province of Quebec when they dismissed the Administration of Mr. Mercier by the largest majority that has ever been known in the province of Quebec since Confederation. The Hon. Mr. Angers could well dispense with going before the people in the district of Quebec after the verdict had been rendered by the people of that district and by the people of the whole province. We know that in the largest centres like Montreal, every man who was returned was returned against the Administration of Mr. Mercier, and to support the action of the late Lieutenant-Governor; and Mr. Angers did not require again to go before the people of L'Islet or the people of the province of Quebec when his action had been endorsed in the manner in which it was in the general elections.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) I am astonished to hear the hon. Postmaster-General giving vent to feelings of indignation with respect to the Government who were the victims of the ex-Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec. We all know that should he, the Postmaster-General, have had to overcome half of the difficulties set up against the Hon. Mr. Mercier, he would have been long since out of this House. If the hon. Minister had had courage enough to allow the investigation which we asked for last year to be carried on, we all know, and he knows more than any one else, that he would have been shown out of it by his own friends. Should the hon. gentleman have allowed a committee of this House to enquire into his conduct, should he have had a petition composed of the most ardent supporters one could find on the bench, he would have disappeared from this House before the day would have been over, he would have taken shelter into a rich cheese. They say the Hon. Mr. Mercier was very faulty. If that is so, how is it that, after having been dragged before the courts, and after a lengthy trial, he was acquitted? How is it that, now that light has been thrown upon his conduct, he is so popular in the province of Quebec? It is because, Mr. Speaker, he was not guilty. Had all the Conservative forces been brought to bear to crush him, they never could have thrown him down. I again state I am surprised when hearing the hon. Postmaster-General talking about virtue. We shall have an opportunity, during the session, to inquire into his conduct, and to know if he ought or not to remain in this House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The continuance in this office of Sir Leonard Tilley, is, under the circumstances, very peculiar. We on this side may not be able to understand all the difficulties that lie in the way of appointing a successor to him, but those of us who have known Sir Leonard Tilley in this House are somewhat surprised that he should continue to occupy the position under present conditions. We who have always been loyal to the Crown and have always desired to preserve the Crown in its purity, do not like to see a high officer such as a Lieutenant-Governor placed in the position in which Sir Leonard Tilley is now placed. It does seem singular that since Confederation this same office has been held by that gentleman more than half that period. It certainly looks as if the province of New Brunswick does not grow Lieutenant-Governors in abundance. There may be difficulties, and we probably should not look too closely into those difficulties, because we know that the Government have members who have held high office in the province of New Brunswick, and have occupied seats in this House as long and longer than did Sir Leonard Tilley. We know of men who have the experience and qualifications for that position, but it does appear there are peculiar influences at work. Some of these hon. gentlemen are Irish, and we understand that no Irish need apply. Some are anti-Irish, and there difficulties arise again. We do not want to increase the difficulties. We know what the hon. gentlemen did last election in the province of New Brunswick. We know that the appointment was made there of an Irishman, and that a cry of horror arose among those gentlemen because Mr. Blair chose to appoint to office in the city of St. John, a gentleman of Irish origin. Where is the Solicitor-General? I want to draw his attention to these matters, and would like to hear him say whether a man is to be excluded from a position because of the accident of his birth. I would like to draw the attention of the First Minister to this. I believe there is a number of candidates willing to sacrifice themselves on the altar of their country, but that Sir Leonard Tilley has to be retained for political reasons, and political reasons alone. Imagine a Lieutenant-Governor being kept in office to satisfy the exigencies of party. Imagine a people who boast of their loyalty to Britain and to British institutions, perpetuating a system which is derogatory to British institutions, and which ought not to be tolerated for a day. Look at the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec, acting the part of a political partizan while he was exercising the functions of the Crown—bowing down to the shibboleth of a party, making himself a subservient tool of this Government, and receiving his reward for that subservience. It was disgraceful and should lead this House to consider how much longer this office of Lieutenant-Governor is to be retained, and whether men who disgrace the position by truckling to party interests are worthy of exercising the mandates of royalty any longer. We should teach those who take upon themselves the garb of Her Majesty that they will have to be loyal to the people of the country, that they must keep themselves above political partizanship, and not allow themselves to be made the tools of any party which chances to be in power. The gentleman I referred to has been rewarded by being appointed Minister of Agriculture. Is the Lieutenant-Governorship of the province of Quebec a training school for Ministers of Agriculture? We know that one Lieutenant-Governor there, a short time ago, established a piggery. Is this to be considered a training school for Ministers of Agriculture in the Dominion Government? Those who will tolerate and condone the state of things now existing in New Brunswick have little idea of British institutions and British fair-play. They are degrading both the office and the officer, and I, as a Canadian Briton, appeal to the Government to stop as soon as possible this crying shame against British institutions which they are allowing to be perpetrated there. It does not appear strange to some of us, who know Sir Leonard Tilley, that he should hang on to office for dear life. Just think of it. The highest office in the province of New Brunswick being peddled round for the purpose of obtaining political support. It is a shame and a scandal and should be stopped.

Mr. HEARN. It is with considerable hesitation that I rise to say a few words upon some of the matters which have been referred to within the last few moments. I feel that I can speak only with much unpleasantness to those who have to hear me, and with considerable inconvenience to myself. Yet, Sir, the occasion is one that satisfies me I would be very remiss in my duty, very remiss in what is due, from my humble point of view, to truth, were I to remain silent in the face of what has fallen from the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and of what has been said by my hon. friend, the member for Quebec East. Both gentlemen, if I understood them correctly, and I did my humble best to do so, have found it convenient, and seem to have deemed it manly and fitting, to attack an absent member of the Government—one who, though he cannot reply to them here, would readily do so in another place. Both gentlemen have deemed it becoming to attack the hon. Minister of Agriculture—with what? With cowardice! Sir, those who know that gentleman best have spoken upon the subject. Sir, the conduct of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, as has been well said by his colleague, the hon. Postmaster-General, has been submitted to the fairest tribunal upon earth. It has been submitted to that tribunal which of all others in the world knew most of the case and was the most competent to judge of it. The people of the province of Quebec heard all that could be said in denunciation of the conduct of the late Lieutenant-Governor of that province. The people of the province, from end to end, were told through the press, were told on the public hustings, were told at every street corner, were told at every church door, Sunday and week-day, that the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor was infamous. The reasons for pronouncing it infamous were given to the people, the people heard all that could be said against him, all that malice and party spirit could urge, and the people, having duly deliberated, having taking time to consider, and having heard the eloquence and the ability with which the charges were put forth, came to the conclusion, that, notwithstanding the eloquence and ability with which the charges were put before them, those charges were baseless, that they were not deserving of endorsement, and that had it not been for the wise and the courageous action of the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec, that province would have soon reached the abyss of ruin towards which she had been fast speeding, and from which it would have taken long years to retrieve her. Sir, if there be one thing that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture is, in his own province, considered entitled to, it is the character of a courageous, an able and an honest man. And, Sir, to show that that is the belief of the people of the province of Quebec, they, with a majority almost unparalleled, have given their verdict, and in vain will it be for the small number of his opponents in that province to persist in repeating, as I regret to find they are disposed to do, the charges they have made. Excuses may be found, and good excuses, for hon. members from other provinces who are deceived by a false press and by mistaken views which may be honestly entertained, and no doubt honestly spoken by many, but reflection and a fair holding of the scales would force those who desire to see truth prevail over falsehood, to admit that the province of Quebec had good reason to thank God that she had a Lieutenant-Governor with the courage, the integrity and the ability of her late Lieutenant-Governor Angers.

Mr. DEVLIN. I would not have thought it my duty to offer any observations to the House on the subject now under discussion, were it not for some remarks which have fallen from the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) as well as from the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Hearn). We have heard a good deal as to the part the constitution has to play in regard to filling the high office of the Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick. This is all nonsense, as the House and the members of the House well know. The constitution has nothing at all to do with it. The constitution does not require that the present Lieutenant-Governor should fill the office during two full terms and half of another term, but there is another point brought out in discussion by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) in regard to which, perhaps, some remarks may be offered. He said that "he was afraid it was a case of 'no Irish need apply.'" It is with feelings of gratification that I look upon the advent to the Ministry of the present Solicitor-General. I must say that, if it were true in the past that no Irish need apply in regard to the position of Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, we have now our champions in the ministry who will see that that barrier shall be thrown down, and that the fact of an Irishman being an Irishman shall be no reason why he should not occupy the position of Lieutenant-Governor. I am perfectly sure that the hon. the Solicitor-General, as well as the hon. gentleman who has long been recognized as a champion of Irish rights in this country, the present Secretary of State, will see that it shall not be because an Irishman is an Irishman that he shall not have his ambition satisfied if it be in the direction of the post of Lieutenant-Governor—of course, provided he has the other qualifications which are necessary. I hope this little domestic trouble, if it exists, will be soon removed, and that it will not be said in that province more than in any other that a man because he has the accident of Irish birth shall not have the office which his talents, his services to the country, and other qualities which I might enumerate, entitle him to occupy. Then my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Hearn) has shown a great deal of indignation, which no doubt was aroused by a remark of the Postmaster-General, when he said that an Administration existed in the province of Quebec a short time ago which disgraced that province. Assuredly there is not a member in this House who knows better than the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Hearn) the history of the different Administrations which have existed in that province. Did he express indignation in the past when it was established by fact proved, when it was established by the verdict of the people that Administrations composed of men of his own political creed had disgraced the province of Quebec? No. He crossed his arms and bowed his head in approval of all they did, because they were of his own political faith. To-day he is indignant, and says: Why attack this powerful Minister of Agriculture when he is not in this House? Whose is the fault that he is not in this House? I have not far to look to find an hon. member—I think the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette)—who threw out the challenge to the Minister of Agriculture, and said: I will resign my seat if he is willing to contest the seat with me, and to see if the people of that county will approve of his course as Governor of the province of Quebec. Did he accept that challenge? No, he refused to accept the challenge. Sir, the county of L'Islet was opened some time ago, and the Lieutenant-Governor had, as is well known the offer by his party to contest that county. Did he accept it? Sir, we did not keep the hon. Minister of Agriculture out of this House; it is not the hon. gentlemen on this side who closed these doors against him. It was his own knowledge of the feelings of the people of the province of Quebec. He knew that he could not face them, he dared not face them, with the knowledge of what he had done as Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec. That is the reason why the hon. gentleman is not here. Anyway, it was not necessary to bring under the knowledge of the House the facts which the hon. gentleman has mentioned. He says that the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec received the approbation of the people, that when his ministry went before the people they received the sanction of the province. Let me recall another little matter of history to that hon. gentleman. There was another Lieutenant-Governor who some years ago presided over the destinies of the province of Quebec. For an act somewhat similar in nature, his ministry went before the people in the province of Quebec, and by the verdict of the people the Lieutenant-Governor was sustained. What did hon. gentlemen opposite do with him? They dismissed him. But did they dismiss Lieutenant-Governor Angers? Not at all. Sir, the Minister of Public Works threw out the hint a moment ago, when he said: "Why did you not bring his conduct under the notice of the House?" As much as to say: You know what we would have done had you brought it under the notice of the House. We would have voted it down, as we vote down anything and everything that you may bring up in this House. He referred to the gentleman who was dismissed from office. Let me here say that it is not my duty, it is not a part of my office, the circumstances of the case do not require, that I should defend the Hon. Mr. Mercier. But, Sir, these gentlemen attacked him, they dragged him before the court, they constituted the court, they named their own judge, they named their own jurymen, they put the case in every way just as they pleased. But their victim had a warm place in the hearts and in the affections of his countrymen in the province of Quebec. They dragged him into a criminal court. What was the result? Why, Sir, the whole country and the world know that their own judge and jury proclaimed their victim innocent. I can say that there are two names to-day well known in the province of Quebec, Mercier and Angers, and the day will come when the man who to-day has his reward in the Senate will regret the act which he has committed, and the other will be taken up as he was before, the choice of the people, and placed in the position he formerly held.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to say to the Minister of Finance that while I am not going to raise any objection to the very unusual course which he has taken of proceeding into Supply within a few hours after the Estimates have been placed in our hands, I think he must remember in that case that we require a good deal more information than might otherwise be required. It is not at all convenient that the Estimates should be examined and proceeded with the day after they have been introduced. A reasonable time ought to be allowed for the purpose of examining them and the Auditor-General's Report, which has also been but a very short time in our hands. I am glad to see the Estimates down at an early day. I always thought they ought to be presented to Parliament almost immediately after Parliament meets, and I will be particularly glad if it proves in the result that these are the Estimates and not a mere instalment of them, because it has been too much the fashion to bring down a mere instalment of the Estimates, and, at a later date, to introduce three or four million dollars more. I think that plan is a very bad one. For two or three years, if I remember rightly, the hon. gentleman did not adopt it, but I fear he is falling from grace, I am afraid he is going back into the bad old plan of keeping back a large proportion of these items which ought to be discussed fully in the House, until a very late period in the session. I trust that he will be able to assure the House that such is not his intention on the present occasion.

Mr. FOSTER. I will be quite willing to give all information possible as these Estimates are going through. I think I have always shown a disposition to do so so far as I was able. I never supposed that I would be able to satisfy all the cravings for information of hon. gentlemen opposite. However, we will go on with the first Estimates with reference to Civil Government, which do not require so much looking over as the main Estimates, which will come later, and by that time, I have no doubt, that the hon. gentleman will have thoroughly perused the Auditor-General's Report. As to the Supplementary Estimates, my hon. friend must have forgotten the routine. Never, since I have been in Parliament, have we had a session when we had not a fairly large supplementary estimate brought down; and, certainly, if he will look over the records, he will find that that has been the practice at least ever since I have been a member of Parliament.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know it has.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend will find, also, if he goes over the last few years since I have had the honour of bringing the Estimates down, that the supplementaries have been smaller instead of larger. It is almost impossible to avoid bringing down some supplementary estimates. I agree with him entirely that the main body of the Estimates should be in the first lot that is submitted, but there are certain things which it is almost impossible to get into the main Estimates unless these are kept back for a longer time than would suit the convenience of Parliament. However, I will do my best to see that the supplementary estimate is a reasonable one when it is brought down, and is kept within the requirements of the revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am aware that it is sometimes not altogether within the power of a Finance Minister to keep his colleagues within bounds, and I will reserve criticism until we can see what he can do.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman that the Speaker is still in the Chair, and this is the third speech he has made since the motion for going into Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will only ask one question with reference to the business of the House. I understand that the hon. gentleman will pursue the plan he has heretofore pursued, and that he will take up these Estimates in regular rotation?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that will be the plan pursued. It may happen, through the absence of a minister or some other like cause, that we may have to make a little digression. In that case I will give my hon. friend notice so far as I can do so.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Interest on Public Debt, &c., Commission $30,350

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that this will be a convenient opportunity for him to inform us of the reasons which led him to make a change in the London agency, and to give us some details as to the arrangement which the public has been given to understand has been made with the Bank of Montreal to transact our London business.

Mr. FOSTER. As my hon. friend knows, the agreement which had been entered into in 1880 for the management of our financial affairs in London by the houses which have acted as our agents, since that time, was made consequent upon the long services by those same houses in assisting us in our financial work in London. At that time a considerable reduction was made in the charges which had been before them levied for the various services that they gave, and a period was set at which this was to be terminated upon notice by the Government. That period came to an end last year. The notice was given, and it became incumbent on the Government to see whether or not we could make a better financial arrangement, with equal safety to ourselves and with equal strength to ourselves, than the one which had preceded it. It had always been my opinion since I entered the department that it would be possible for us to make a better arrangement. In consequence of that, I thought it better to go over to London, and, without going into particulars, I may say that I was able, not to make a better arrangement than the preceding one to any large extent with the old agents, although in some respects they were willing to modify their charges, particularly upon the issue of loans, but while being willing to make the charges on the issue of loans less, they thought, and held a very strong opinion that they were not sufficiently paid for the management of the loan, for the payment of interest and sinking fund and all other business which they had to carry on for us. And so, while being willing, as I have said, to lessen their charges on the issue of loans, their offer contemplated a considerable increase upon the management of the loan, and their reason for that was, so far as they were concerned, a reasonable one, provided the payment as a whole had not been too great before. They were paid a commission on the interest. In 1880 the average interest payable on our loans in London was of course, much larger than it was in 1890 with a tendency to decrease, owing to our placing loans on the market at a less rate of interest, and payment by them of a commission on the interest left the aggregate that came into their hands for that service less in proportion as the rate of interest decreased. Consequently, in their offer they made a proposition by which, instead of one-half per cent, which had formerly been their rate, they would require for their services £250 per million, not a commission, but a rate per million for the loan managed. That would be considerably higher than the one-half per cent commission.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much?

Mr. FOSTER. One-half per cent commission would be in the neighbourhood of £200 per million. As the prospects were that the amount of loans required by the Dominion would be less than in preceding decades whilst we would not get as much advantage from the proposed lowering of their commission on the issue of loans, the management of the loan would go on at the higher rate of remuneration to them; and in the end, for a period of ten years, the cost of the charges under that proposition would have been, I think, about on an average with what it had been during the preceding ten years. I then turned my attention to the Bank of Montreal, which had before acquainted me with their desire to obtain the management of our business and take our accounts there, and the result was that I was able to make an arrangement with the Bank of Montreal which was far more favourable to us in all those respects. I cannot do better, possibly, than read the rates and contrast them with the old rates. Our old rate upon the issue of loans was 1 per cent. The Bank of Montreal will issue our loans at one-quarter of 1 per cent, a decrease from 1 to one-quarter per cent for new loans. We now paid one-half per cent commission on interest payments and sinking fund. The arrangement is that this is to be done for £150 per million of the debt, which is considerably lower than the preceding rate. In the case of redemption, there is to be no charge for retiring the loan redeemed, in case the bank has the issuing of the loan for the redemption of the expiring one; in case it has not, one-eighth per cent is to be paid to them. Our arrangements with our preceding agents was that there was to be no charge if they issued the loan for redemption; but if they did not issue the loan for redemption, then the charge was to be 1 per cent. The Government is to pay the cost of the inscription books, which are to be the property of the Government. That was not the case in the arrangement with our preceding agents, in fact, I think it was overlooked. They paid for the stock books themselves; but I think it is of great importance that they should be the property of the Government and not the property of the agents, and I made a proposition, which will be accepted, of course, that we would take from them the old inscription books so that we may have the records complete from the first, and allow them a reasonable sum to reimburse them the cost of printing. That, however, is not a large matter. The contract in this case will run for a period of ten years, the same as before, and terminate in the same way, by one year's previous notice. On the whole, we have made, I believe, a most excellent arrangement so far as cost to ourselves is concerned, and from a very careful inquiry into the matter, I think with perfect safety so far as the management of our business is concerned, and so far as the issue of new loans is concerned. We have made this arrangement with the Bank of Montreal in this way, and I may state generally that the conditions are better by far than those obtained in the case of any colony having its financial matters managed in London, as all of them have them managed. For instance, I may say that New South Wales pays from £500 to £600 per million for management, that the colony of Victoria pays from £400 to £500, South Australia £250, Queensland from £600 to £500, Cape of Good Hope from £500 to £450, and, as I have said, our rate is £150 per million for management. The higher amount I have read is the amount per million up to a certain amount for loan management, and the lesser sum for amounts above that sum. With respect to the issue of loans, we are lower than New South Wales, South Australia, Queensland and New Zealand. The only colony which secures as good terms for the issue of its loans is the Cape of Good Hope; but, on the other hand, it pays from £500 to £450 per million for the management of its loans. I may also state, a further saving will be effected. While we paid half per cent on the sinking fund to our old agents, the sinking funds are included in the management of loans; the charge is £150 per million for the management of the loans, including the sinking fund.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What amount does the hon. gentleman expect to save per annum, apart from the question of the issue of loans? How many hundreds or thousands of pounds does he expect to save ?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot expect to save many thousands of pounds in the management, because what we have paid altogether is a comparatively small amount. We paid 1 per cent before, and we shall pay one-quarter of 1 per cent now, on the issue of loans, so that the saving will depend on the amount issued in comparison with the preceding term. On the management, for payment of interest, I find that we paid in 1891-92 about $43,700, and, under the offer of the Bank of Montreal, we will pay about $30,000, a saving of $13,000 per year. I may say that the offer of the Barings and Glyn, Mills & Co., this year contemplated on that sum, $51,100, so that, as regards that offer, we will save about $21,000 per year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the Bank of Montreal agree to advance any definite sum in case of need ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. We have an understanding with the Bank of Montreal by which it will advance to us for temporary needs something in the neighbourhood of from two to three million dollars per year. Of course that must be on the understanding that we shall not, as it would not be to our interest to, run temporary loans for too long periods. But suppose we take the present instance, having gone for a loan last year, a loan which was simply to arrange for matters to the end of the year and put us on an equal footing, it would not be wise, of course, as my hon. friend knows, to go on the market within two or three, or possibly four years. During that period we have an arrangement with the Bank of Montreal, by which they will advance to us at reasonable and current rates, accommodation to the amount of two or three million dollars per year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you mean by that you can draw on them to the extent of two or three million dollars each year ?

Mr. FOSTER. I mean to say they will accommodate us to that amount each year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And you can get $2,000,000 out of them, if necessary, during the three years ?

Mr. FOSTER. That is the arrangement between us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did the other agents make any similar offer ?

Mr. FOSTER. They made an offer ; but it did not contemplate giving us so large an amount ? I do not remember exactly the limit, but it was not so large as that offered by our present agent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no doubt that the figures given by the Minister of Finance, particularly for floating loans, are very low indeed. Does that one-quarter per cent include brokerage ?

Mr. FOSTER. Brokerage is always extra.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The whole question is one which would bear a good deal of discussion pro and con. I cannot offer a positive opinion on the subject further than that I trust the Minister of Finance has very well considered the effect which the step he has taken might have upon our credit under certain very possible conditions of the London money market. I always knew myself that we could obtain from the Bank of Montreal, as well as from other Canadian banks, terms for negotiating loans and for managing our interest in London considerably below what was likely to be granted by firms like Glyn, Mills & Company, or the Barings, who are now recovering somewhat of their old standing I am happy to hear. But the ground which was taken by Finance Ministers in former days, and, I think, with a good deal of reason, was this : That it was worth the while of Canada to pay a fair market rate, not too much, for the purpose of obtaining the assistance and support in negotiating their loans in England of two or three London houses of the highest possible standing. There is no doubt that is worth something to us. I have no doubt whatever that the Bank of Montreal will do all the ordinary work connected with floating our loans excellently well, and I dare say that it will not be excessively profitable to them, although no doubt they will make both ends meet. But if a crisis were to arise in this country and it were necessary to borrow money temporarily, the hon. gentleman might find that the arrangements which he has made would be possibly inconvenient. The Bank of Montreal are our agents on this side of the Atlantic as well as on the other, and as a mere matter of ordinary prudence, I am not sure that we are doing a very wise thing in having the same persons as our bankers on both sides of the Atlantic. What was done in the case of Australasia, if I remember aright, was that the Australasian colonies entered into an agreement with a powerful corporation of banks, having their headquarters in London. I can easily see that the hon. gentleman, under certain contingencies, might find that the very small saving in proportion to the magnitude of our transactions was rather dearly purchased. The Bank of Montreal, no doubt, is a very excellent institution, and it has got large sums of money at command ; but I am doing no injustice whatever to it in saying that it is at least a questionable point whether in an emergency they would command the confidence of the London money market to the extent that the late agents of Canada did. Although it is a matter within the purview of the Government, I for my part have considerable doubts as to whether a wise discretion has been exercised in severing the connection which subsisted for at least fifty years between old Canada and the Dominion of Canada and the houses of Glyn, Mills & Co. and the Barings. The hon. gentleman may come to find, as other Finance Ministers have found, that dealing with a Canadian bank exclusively is a grave inconvenience, when that Canadian bank's resources, large as they are, may be strained by exigencies on this side of the Atlantic, and I am bound to say that, considering the comparatively small amount of the saving effected, I think he would have consulted the dictates of prudence better by abstaining from putting all his eggs into one basket, as he has done in the case of the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. FOSTER. I may say to my hon. friend that the contingency which he has especially brought to the attention of the House did not escape my own attention. I know it is a vital point, and I know that a failure to regard that point would be poorly compensated by a saving of even thousands of dollars on management. But I took especial pains to inform myself on that point by the best means open to me in London; and, without saying anything against the Barings and Glyn, Mills & Co., who have done our business well, and are reputable and strong concerns, I have no hesitation in saying that we can deal just as safely in these respects with the Bank of Montreal as we have done with the Barings and Glyn, Mills & Co. There are several things to be taken into consideration. Under ordinary circumstances, the amount of money we shall have to raise in England from this time out will be comparatively small until the years of redemption come around. But the redemption of old loans is a very different thing from making new loans for new services in the country. Ordinarily speaking, I do not think there is a shadow of a doubt that all the accommodation necessary and all the loans necessary can be just as well brought out under the auspices of our present agent as under the auspices of the old; I do not say better, but I think equally well. The position of Canada's credit, too, is better than it was ten or fifteen years ago, and naturally so, because we are an older country, and the management of our financial affairs and the regularity with which everything has been done, have raised our credit in London to a higher pitch than was the case ten or fifteen years ago, when our former arrangements were entered into; and, unless there should be something very extraordinary in the state of the market, it would not be difficult for us, even if an emergency on this side should make it necessary for us to raise more than we do in ordinary seasons, to go on the London market through the Bank of Montreal and its affiliations. I may say that we are not bound to negotiate through the Bank of Montreal, and I have taken the precaution, in case something extraordinary should happen, to have the power of associating with the Bank of Montreal other banks in London, if in the opinion of the Government it is better that that should be done, in bringing out extraordinary loans. So that, taking all these things into consideration, I think we are fairly certain, whilst contingencies must always be provided for, and whilst we make a saving in the ordinary expenses, that we are not abating anything of the safety and security and prestige which are necessary to have our money matters well cared for in the city of London.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would just recall to the hon. gentleman's mind one fact. He knows that the Australian colonies always stand in very good credit in London. Latterly their credit has not been so good, and it has been found that, powerfully associated as the Australian banks were, they were not able to render the same assistance to the Australian colonies, though favourite colonies for investment, that houses of the standing of our late agents could have done. That is a mere matter of fact, well known on the London market, and a fact which the hon. gentleman will do well to bear in mind. I have nothing to say against the Bank of Montreal. In its individual capacity it is likely to do as well as any bank I know, possibly as well as any London bank. But it will be liable, as the hon. gentleman knows, under certain contingencies, to have its resources drawn upon heavily in Canada. There might be some advantage in having the Bank of Montreal as our Canadian banker, and Glyn, Mills & Co. as our London bankers. However, I have discharged my conscience in the matter. I would have hesitated, however great the possible gain, to take the risk, but that is the hon. gentleman's affair. The transfer has actually taken place. I suppose?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, on the 1st of January.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before we leave this point, I would like to ask the Finance Minister whether the promise made by Sir John Macdonald, at the time Sir Charles Tupper was appointed High Commissioner, that a very large saving would be effected by utilizing him in the handling of our financial matters in the interest of the Dominion, is likely to be fulfilled? For several years this question has been put to the Finance Minister, and he has stated on several occasions that our contract with our financial agents in London would not expire until the first of the year, and that the Government would then possibly have an opportunity of utilizing Sir Charles Tupper and his staff for the purpose named by the late First Minister. I would like to know from the Finance Minister whether any effort was made by him to reduce the commissions or the expenses in London by using Sir Charles Tupper's staff in that way?

Mr. FOSTER. I may say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that I always had it in mind, when the ten years expired, to make an investigation into that subject, with the view of ascertaining if it were feasible to turn over the management of our financial affairs to the High Commissioner's office in London; and I was not long investigating the matter on the spot before coming to the conclusion that it was neither desirable nor feasible, either in the interest of economy or in the interest of that prestige, security and safety which my hon. friend the former Finance Minister has spoken of this afternoon. In the first place, as regards economy, I found, after going into the matter thoroughly, that we would make very little, if any, saving upon the terms we have made with the Bank of Montreal; and, in the second place, I found very quickly that we would lose that prestige which comes from having large monetary influences, such as banks and the associations of banks, back of us, particularly in the issuing of loans. It may have been thought possible, at the same time, for that to be done. I do not think that it is considered possible by any persons who have gone into the matter with the view of bringing it down to a practical issue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was promised by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member, and was made one of the grounds for establishing the High Commissionership.

Mr. FOSTER. There may have been something said with reference to that. The Commissioner has been of great advantage to us in London in financial matters, arranging for temporary loans at times and in other respects, but that is a different matter from handing over to him the financial management of our debt.

Mr. McMULLEN. I dare say the hon. gentleman would find very great inconvenience in using Sir Charles Tupper to the extent promised at the time of his appointment, but it is undoubtedly the fact that his appointment was consented to largely under the promise of the First Minister at that time, that we would save considerably by having a resident financial agent in London. In consequence of that promise, we consented to his being over there doing little or nothing, in the hope that the day would arrive at no distant time when we would be able to use him to better advantage. If you will look over the staff the High Commissioner keeps and the amount of work done by his office, you cannot fail to come to the conclusion that his office is one from which Canada receives very little in return for what it costs. I am sorry to find that many things which might be well and profitably performed by his staff are not done. We pay enormous amounts in London for duties performed by immigration agents, in the publishing of pamphlets and work of that kind, which could be done by the High Commissioner's staff or by his staff and our agents combined. When we come to the item in that connection, I will have something more to say upon it, and in the meantime must express my regret that the promise of the First Minister who was in office when Sir Charles Tupper was appointed, has not been carried out. No doubt, the hon. gentleman found it would be expensive to do so, but the House was led to understand that a considerable saving would be effected, when our contract with our financial agents expired. Now, however, we find him making a new contract at a reduced rate, the rate being reduced, not because of Sir Charles Tupper being in London, but for other reasons. We have still the High Commissioner over there at a very high salary and virtually doing nothing in the one matter to which he owes his appointment.

Mr. MULOCK. Have the Government debentures that form part of the sinking fund been all transferred?

Mr. FOSTER. They have been.

Mr. MULOCK. The redeemed debentures have been placed in the custody of the Bank of Montreal?

Mr. FOSTER. As I told my hon. friend last year, in the case of guaranteed loans the debentures have always been in the custody of the Bank of England. In the case of the unguaranteed loans, the trusteeship has been transferred to the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. MULOCK. Are they in the Bank of Montreal subject to the order of three trustees?

Mr. FOSTER. They are in the vaults at Ottawa and no transfer can be made without communication with the department at Ottawa, and the certificate which is here of the inscribed stock must be forwarded. When debentures, for instance, are bought and turned into inscribed stock, our cancelled debentures are sent here and burned according to the Audit Act, and the certificates of inscribed stock are kept here, and the Finance Minister is one of the trustees, so that everything is as safe as it can possibly be.

Mr. MULOCK. Then all these Government securities that are payable to bearer, when redeemed, are in due course forwarded to Ottawa?

Mr. FOSTER. All the debentures when cancelled are sent to Ottawa and burned here.

Mr. MULOCK. Still there is a form of sinking fund maintained by the issue of stock. So far as your books are concerned, it would appear that these debentures are kept in the hands of the creditors. I understand you keep your sinking fund the same as ordinary corporations?

Mr. FOSTER. The sinking fund is in the hands of trustees. The guaranteed loans fund is in the hands of certain trustees different from the unguaranteed loans. They hold both debentures and inscribed stock, and these are in the custody of the Bank of England. For our own sinking fund we buy through our trustees, of whom the Receiver-General is one, inscribed stock, and the trusteeship has been transferred from Barings and Glyn, Mills & Co. to the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. MULOCK. I think there is a question as to the wisdom of the destruction of the Government debentures. It is not considered, as a rule, the right way to treat redeemed debentures, to destroy them. On the surface it would seem the most convenient way to prevent their getting into circulation, but in the case of forgery the production of the original debenture in its cancelled form would be a complete answer to the claim. The moment you destroy the original, you destroy the strongest evidence against the forgery. It is not the custom, I think, to destroy debentures, but to so effectually cancel them that they can never be utilized again. Who are the trustees of the sinking fund in connection with the funds in the Bank of England, the guaranteed loan?

Mr. FOSTER. They are the two under secretaries, one of the Colonial Office and the other of the Treasury, and Lord Revelstoke, and the High Commissioner.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What do we pay those gentlemen?

Mr. FOSTER. Nothing.

Mr. MULOCK. Are these debentures subject to their order as trustees? Could they remove them from the Bank of England to another place if they so desired?

Mr. FOSTER. That I cannot say. I think, in the case of guaranteed loans, it is stipulated by the home Government that the debentures should be kept in the Bank of England.

Mr. MULOCK. Suppose the securities got astray, who would sustain the loss? They are the security to the Imperial Government for their obligations. Supposing they got astray who loses, the Government of England or Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not see how they can go astray. The trustees are responsible under, I suppose, general Acts which govern them in Great Britain. They deposit the securities in the Bank of England, and that, I should judge, should be a sufficient guarantee that they will be well and properly looked after. As to what are the legal relations governing the responsibility between the Bank of England and the trustees I cannot say.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it is rather a material question. It appears to me it would be well to have those debentures treated in the same way as the others. I am only alluding to such debentures as are payable to bearer. Of course inscribed stock being payable to order, no risk arises in respect to that class, but there is some risk in the case of debentures payable to bearer. It is, I think, important that the House should know the legal position of those debentures. They are growing in volume.

Mr. FOSTER. The debentures are not increasing in volume. The inscribed stock is increasing and the debentures have been largely transferred into inscribed stock.

Mr. MULOCK. If all the debentures were transferred into inscribed stock my remarks would have no force; but I understand it is the custom to leave in the Bank of England all the debentures which are not converted into inscribed stock, and I understand there is a large portion of that kind.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a considerable portion of debentures; but I cannot say how much.

Mr. MULOCK. Payable to bearer?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. That is, they are payable to the order of three officials, of course of unquestionable integrity; but why should not these securities have an additional security and be made payable to order so that no possible accident could happen? Could they be withdrawn on the order of the three gentlemen in question?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is raising a point which may appear of importance to him, though I doubt if any importance is to be attached to it. We have had this arrangement not only since Confederation but under the united provinces as well, and during all that period there has not been a single instance of a miss or a loss or any mismanagement of the funds. I do not think there is any just cause for alarm.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not say there is cause for alarm; but the pitcher went to the well a great many times and at last it got broken. If it is possible to have an additional safeguard it is our duty to have it, and if millions of dollars of securities of Canada are lying at the order of three persons, notwithstanding their undoubted integrity, if it is possible for us to add another check we should do so. I would ask the Minister at an early date to inform the committee whether these securities are payable to bearer, what is the amount now in the Bank of England, and are they withdrawable on the order of those three gentlemen.

Mr. FOSTER. I will get the information.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would ask what is the arrangement now made with respect to the transfer of inscribed stock. Is any duty now paid on the transfer from one name to another? That was a matter of some considerable discussion and correspondence between the Government of Canada and the home Government, who, I think, used to put a duty on those transfers.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there is a duty of 2s. 6d. on debenture stock, and I think 12s. 6d. per cent on inscribed stock. That is the stamp duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But not for the transfer from one man to another?

Mr. FOSTER. No, that is for the issue of the stock.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There was an attempt made in the English House some time ago to put a duty on all transfers of stock. I do not know if it was carried into effect, or whether it affects all stocks. Of course, if it does, we are in no worse position than any other proprietor. But I think there was a proposal to put a duty on colonial stocks.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not sure, but I think there is a small duty on the transfer of stocks, but if so it affects all stocks.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A great many of those stocks were used as what are technically called "floaters." If there is a duty on the transfer of inscribed stock, it would materially interfere with its free use.

Mr. FOSTER. It would if it were on ours and not on others, but I am sure that there is no discrimination as between colonial stocks and stocks in general.

Inspector. $1,700

Mr. McMULLEN. Who is the present inspector?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. George Crookshank.

Mr. McMULLEN. How long is it since he was appointed?

Mr. FOSTER. I think about two years. Mr. Tims, the former inspector, was superannuated, and the assistant inspector became inspector, so that we saved one officer.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the salary?

Mr. FOSTER. $1,700, with travelling expenses.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that Mr. Tims was superannuated at $1,820 a year, and the assistant now gets the same salary.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Tims received a high salary—$2,200, I think.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it was $2,600. How is it he receives over $1,800 superannuation?

Mr. FOSTER. He was superannuated in the ordinary way and received no additional time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose Mr. Crookshank is the son of the late inspector at St. John?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How long has he been in the service?

Mr. FOSTER. He was private secretary of Sir Leonard Tilley for some years before that.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister must be mistaken in the date. His name does not appear on the printed list laid before the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. It ought to be. We have not estimated for Mr. Tims for, I think, two years.

Mr. McMULLEN. Oh, yes, I now see his name on page B—215. He got it for six months last year. Then he cannot be superannuated two years.

Mr. FOSTER. It is nearly two years. That is for 1891-92.

Assistant Receiver-General's Office,

Halifax. $8,300

Mr. FOSTER. The decrease here arises from the fact that the Finance Department has, up to the present time, paid rent for the building in which this office is kept. The Public Works Department has now assumed the property, and so this decrease is apparent rather than real.

Assistant Receiver-General's Office,

St. John. $6,000

Mr. FOSTER. The reduction here is caused by a reduction in the official staff since last year. The Assistant Receiver-General in St. John has been superannuated. He was Mr. R. W. Crookshank, and his superannuation amounts to $1,540 per year. In his place, Mr. H. D. McLeod has been appointed, and the staff has been rearranged. The total amount of pay under the old staff was $7,150; the total amount of pay, including the superannuation allowance of Mr. Crookshank, under the new arrangement, is $7,170; so that there has been an increase in total salaries of $20. Mr. Crookshank was superannuated on the 21st January this year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was Mr. H. D. McLeod previously employed in the department, or was he brought in from the outside?

Mr. FOSTER. He was previously employed in the department, but that only partially answers the question. He has been previously employed in it for about a year. He was brought in from the outside and now takes charge.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is not that rather calculated to discourage officers in the department? It is customary to make promotions from among officers who do their duty well, and here you have brought a party in from the outside and put him over their heads.

Mr. FOSTER. No, I do not think it would have that effect in this case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to me that some of these officers were fit to be promoted, and here they are deprived of their promotion.

Mr. FOSTER. I may say that in arranging for who shall have charge of the Assistant Receiver-General's office, it is necessary, in the first place, to get a good capable man, to get a man more than ordinarily capable. In respect to this particular case, Mr. McLeod is a gentleman of whose capabilities I have not the least doubt. He has had long experience in the work of an accountant and in the management of concerns involving large expenditures, and in every way he is thoroughly capable and thoroughly honest. I may say further, as I have been driven to say it, and I am quite willing to say it, that I would not have recommended any other person at present in that office to take charge of the Assistant Receiver-General's office, although that is not saying that we have not faithful and honest and capable clerks in that department. I would be very sorry to have any other impression go abroad.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does pedigree count for anything in these matters?

Mr. FOSTER. It does sometimes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am inclined to think if Mr. McLeod's pedigree could be traced, that it might be found not among the least important of his qualification.

Mr. FOSTER. I think Mr. McLeod would not be at all ashamed if his pedigree were traced. He does happen to be related to the present Finance Minister. That is not detrimental to him, perhaps, nor to me.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the connection?

Mr. FOSTER. As my hon. friend is so anxious to know—his mother and my mother were sisters.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under these circumstances, no doubt, the promotion is to a large extent explained. Have you any more first cousins?

Mr. FOSTER. I have a few more. If my hon. friend will have proper patience, he remaining there and I remaining here, he may become acquainted with some more.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister is following out the course adopted by his predecessor. I made it my duty to ascertain the number of relations that the ex-Finance Minister, Sir Leonard Tilley, had in office a few years ago, and I think there were fifty-seven.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not lived as long as he has.

Salaries in Country Savings Banks:
New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. . . . $11,650

Mr. McMULLEN. Last year there was a reduction in the number of savings banks, and the Finance Minister explained that it was his intention to turn over their accounts to the Post Office Department. Now, I am sorry to notice that there is no reduction in number this year. Of course last year, I believe, one of the managers died, and in that case the account was transferred. I notice in looking over the places where those savings banks are located that they are in large trading centres in the Maritime Provinces, as in several large seaport towns; therefore, I cannot see why they are still to be kept in existence when we have got post office savings banks in those places. I do not see why these accounts should not be transferred to the Post Office Department, and thus save a large amount of money. I should like to know if the Minister of Finance has any hope that this can be done. I observe that there are no less than thirty-three of these institutions in existence. Does the Minister of Finance intend to keep them in existence until the incumbents of the office die?

Mr. FOSTER. I think I explained this matter to the House last year. The policy is to change those savings institutions into post office savings banks, and to let them drop, owing to the death of the officer in charge, or for other sufficient reasons. The fact that there has been no change last year is because no officer has died and no case of inefficiency has been reported. It never was proposed to make a wholesale change, but simply to change as opportunity arose from the two causes I have mentioned.

Mr. McMULLEN. I hope the number will not be reduced by placing the officers on the superannuation list.

Mr. FOSTER. They are not eligible for superannuation.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am glad if they do not contribute to that fund, which has been increasing rapidly. As the officers receive salaries of only $300 or $400 a year it is evident they are engaged in other business. This is only a sop that might be taken away.

Mr. FOSTER. When transferred to the Post Office Department, the work is still attended with expense, although there is a saving on the whole.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice there is a considerable reduction on the items for commission for payment of interest on public debt, purchase of sinking funds and transfer of stock. I hope we may expect still further reductions.

Dominion Notes, Issue and Redemption $5,000

Mr. FOSTER. The matter has been very fully explained. As the sum we pay for the management of the debt in London has been decreased, this saving is effected. In regard to the item of $5,000 for expenses in connection with the issue and redemption of Dominion notes, I desire to add the words "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How are you going to use this amount?

Mr. FOSTER. I will explain. This amount is for expenses in connection with the issue and redemption of Dominion notes; it is for counting, signing and cancellation of Dominion notes. The work is done by a staff of women, ten or eleven in number, who are constantly employed at so much per day. Most of them, I think, have not passed the Civil Service examination, and are not eligible for appointment from length of service. If the Civil Service Act was made to apply to them, as it otherwise would, the Auditor-General, having determined to apply it, in these cases, it would work an injustice to those women, who are thoroughly capable of doing the work and who do it well, by turning them out and replacing them by an equal number of other persons. So I think it is only fair, and the House will no doubt readily assent to the proposition, that we should protect them and continue to employ them at the work, as they have performed it for ten or eleven years.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Am I correct in stating that authorization was given for the issue of Dominion notes to the extreme limit, $20,000,000, which the law permits?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman contemplate asking Parliament for authority to increase that issue?

Mr. FOSTER. That is not altogether determined. At present I do not, but circumstances may arise before this session is over which will make it desirable to apply to Parliament in respect of this matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Can the hon. gentleman state what is the actual issue?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot state exactly, but it is very close on $20,000,000; but there are certain causes for that, which probably may not last long.

Dominion Notes, Printing. . . . $45,000

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice the item of $45,000 for printing Dominion notes. No less than $49,900 were expended last year, and almost $5,000 must have been overdrawn.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will observe that the sum of $45,000 is for 1892-93, the current year. The year before that is the year when $49,900 were expended, and that expenditure was under the old contract. It will be remembered that last year a new contract was brought down by which the work will be done for a reduced sum, and although $49,900 were spent under the old contract, $45,000 will prove sufficient to do the work under the new one.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is there any other firm besides the Burland Printing Company that prints bank notes for the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. No; our contract is solely with them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is there any other competing firm?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; there is a firm in Montreal.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is there any other firm capable of tendering for the work?

Mr. FOSTER. Tenders were called for.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Tenders were formally called for, I suppose?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. It was not a matter of simply going through the form, but bona fide tenders were put in. There is a company in Montreal that does good work, and it is stated they are capable of doing this work in question.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Did they tender?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was their tender above or below the tender of this company?

Mr. FOSTER. We went over the whole of this matter last year. Tenders were handed in by two parties, one being the Canada Bank Note Company, of Montreal, and the other the Burland Company. It will be recollected that I explained last year that the former contract was with the Burland Company, and it was one of the conditions of the contract that the firm should come to Ottawa and erect a satisfactory building in which to carry on the work. Under that former contract for five years the firm removed to Ottawa and erected a building on Wellington street, a very excellent building in every respect. When the tenders were received last year and examined, it was found that they were on the whole as nearly equal as they could be, and the Government decided to give the contract to the old firm because of the very large expenditure incurred by them in compliance with the request of the Government in erecting a building here, in order that the work might be more under the supervision of the Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. With respect to the issue of Dominion notes, are they printed and signed, and when ready for use stored in the vaults of the Finance Department?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are they issued through the several Receivers-General throughout the Dominion, and again issued by them to the banks?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who finally signs the notes?

Mr. FOSTER. These women, for whom this $5,000 is asked.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do they really sign them?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; for the Finance Minister.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is a stamp used?

Mr. FOSTER. No; it is a sign manual. They sign their own names.

Mr. McMULLEN. I observe a considerable increase in the item for printing and advertising and like charges.

Mr. FOSTER. There is an increase, because last year's estimate was insufficient.

Committee rose, and, it being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Militia and Defence Dept. . . . $45,462 50

Mr. FOSTER. There are eleven statutory increases of $50 and an additional second-class clerk to fill the place of one promoted.

Mr. McMULLEN. In connection with these several departments I notice that there are quite a number of clerks who draw their salary for the year, and who in addition get extra pay for extra services. I have drawn the attention of the House for several sessions to the fact that the system of allowing clerks who draw extra pay for extra work is an absurd one.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman say that any of the thirty-three clerks in this department are drawing extra pay?

Mr. McMULLEN. I speak of the system generally and I am not prepared to refer to particulars just now.

Mr. FOSTER. None of these are.

Mr. McMULLEN. That may be so, but I say that the custom is becoming more common in the several departments of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand the point my friend is aiming at, but I think we had better keep ourselves to the business-like rule of last year and the year before, which was to confine ourselves to the discussion of the item under consideration. There are none of these clerks drawing extra salary, and my hon. friend will have ample opportunity of discussing this matter when the particular item to which he refers comes up.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is utterly impossible for a member to keep track of all the payments of this kind for extra services, because there is an enormous list of these clerks who draw extra pay. The hon. gentleman is evidently anxious to get through supply as rapidly as possible and no one finds fault with him for proceeding with it so early in the session, but it is our duty to have a reasonable and intelligent discussion of the public expenditure. We cannot rush through these items, lest we might find that certain matters have escaped our attention which should be subject to the criticisms of hon. gentlemen. We have a duty to perform in criticising expenditures, and we wish to perform that duty with all courtesy to the hon. gentleman and his colleagues. This subject of extra pay to civil servants is one which deserves attention, because I have come to the conclusion that the first thing a clerk does when he is placed in a position is to look around to see if he can obtain extra pay. The Minister of Finance can find on the first pages of the Auditor-General's Report the names of hundreds of clerks who have drawn extra pay for extra work. Some of them have positions in which they draw a salary of $2,000 a year, and yet they are allowed extra pay for some trifling work which they may do in the very office in which they are engaged. This is a growing evil and should be put a stop to now and forever. It is a wrong system and it is one which should be drawn to the attention of the Government and the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must say that this Department of Militia and Defence appears to be very heavily manned. Thirty-two clerks and messengers ought, in all conscience, to be enough, and there ought to be a very distinct explanation of the reason for the appointment of another officer. You require thirty-three people, independent of the minister himself, to superintend the clerical part of the expenditure of about $1,250,000 all told. I have known businesses of vastly larger extent conducted by half a dozen people. All these men, too, are very highly paid. Deducting the messengers, there are twenty-nine gentlemen drawing $43,000, which represents an average salary of about $1,500 apiece. I think, under the circumstances, we should know who this extra gentleman is, and what is the reason of his employment.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the promotion from the third class to the second class of a gentleman who has been at the top of his class for some time. His place is filled by a third-class clerk coming in at the minimum salary.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. minister will look at page A-78 of the Auditor-General's Report, he will find several cases of the class I have mentioned. For instance, Lieut.-Col. Irwin, inspector of artillery, who gets a salary of $2,300, is paid in addition, as commandant of batteries, for 366 days at $1.25 per day, amounting to $457.50. On the same page the hon. gentleman will find several cases of the same kind. I do think this whole question of extra pay should receive some action at the hands of the Government. Every year it is getting worse. Every man, the moment he is installed in office, seems to try to get some hook whereon he can hang a claim for extra pay, and very generally he gets it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought the Government had expressly stated that they were going to put a complete stop to the system of extra pay.

Mr. FOSTER. That is quite true. My hon. friend is speaking of a class of officers entirely outside of the departments at Ottawa, and, in nearly every case I believe there is the best of reasons for the double pay, that is, the reason of economy. For instance, on a canal there is a man who acts as lockmaster, but you want some one to collect the tolls, and, instead of appointing another man for that purpose, you allow the lockmaster a slight addition for doing that work. In the same way, excisemen who have salaries, are engaged in the preventive work of the department, and for this they are allowed a small proportion of the seizures. Then, some of the collectors of customs do the work of arranging for fishery bounties, and receive a small commission for that work, which is more economical than it would be to appoint special officers. But, as regards the officers in Ottawa, my hon. friend's criticisms were not directed to them, because double payment does not occur here.

Mr. McMULLEN. In some cases, I admit it may be an advantage to allow a commission where officials are authorized to collect fees, but in many cases that argument will not apply. If the hon. Minister will look at the beginning of the Auditor-General's Report, he will find the names of a large number of men who are drawing double pay. For instance, I will call his attention to one. L. O. Bourget gets a salary of $1,170 as accountant of the North-west Government at Regina, and for keeping the books of the Board of Education he gets $100. Now, I would like to know why we should pay him that extra $100 when he is well paid for his services otherwise?

Secretary of State's Department.....$42,285

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here there is also an increase of one officer, as well as apparently several promotions. The hon. Minister will please inform us why this additional appointment was required, and also the names of the gentlemen promoted.

Mr. FOSTER. There are twenty statutory increases of $50, one of $37.50 and two of $30. Then, there is the promotion from the second class to the first class of two gentlemen who have been at the head of the second class for several years, and whom the minister thinks worthy of promotion. Their names are Irwin and Leroy. On the other hand, my hon. friend will see that there is a decrease in the second-class clerks of one. There were eleven last year, and there are ten this year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many statutory increases?

Mr. FOSTER. One at $37.50 and two at $30.

Mr. McMULLEN. Were there any superannuations during the year?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I think not. I find that Mr. Timms was superannuated on the 1st of January, 1892, at $1,820. Number of years of service, thirty-three.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He received almost the full amount?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; his salary was $2,600.

Printing and Stationery.....$25,574 50

Mr. FOSTER. There are ten statutory increases at $50, one at $37.50, and one at

Mr. FOSTER.

$22.50. Then there are two second-class clerks made. These were transferred from the temporary staff where they were getting $936 each, and the vacancies thus created in the temporary staff will not be filled up. These two men, the Queen's Printer has told me, are excellent men who have been a long time in the temporary service, and he thought it better they should be made permanent and not replaced in the temporary staff, so that although it seems an increase of two second-class clerks there is a decrease of $1,872 in the temporary staff. Then there is an increase to Mr. McMahon, Superintendent of Printing, of $300.

North-west Mounted Police—
Comptroller.....$9,742 50

Mr. FOSTER. In this there are two statutory increases at $50: one at $62.50, and one at $30, making in all $192.50.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is the chief comptroller?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. White.

Mr. McMULLEN. Could the hon. gentleman inform us whether there have been any additions to the force during the year?

Mr. FOSTER. On the contrary, there was a reduction. When the estimates for the main part of the service come on all the information will be here. There is a decrease of about $50. It is not intended to fill up their places.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am glad to hear that, because I think it is about time we should seriously consider the propriety of dispensing with the force altogether. I cannot see any necessity for its continuance, except to prevent smuggling on the border. It is an item of considerable expense. We have been for years drawing the attention of the Government to the enormous expense connected with the force, and were glad to hear last year that the Government intended to reduce it. There has not been a sufficient reduction as yet.

Mr. FOSTER. A reduction of $50,000 a year.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is not enough, and that reduction is not due simply to the decrease in the number of the force, but to the reduced cost of maintaining it compared with the days when the country was unsettled and we had to pay high charges for bringing in supplies. Except to prevent smuggling there is really no necessity for the force at all. The Indians have all settled down, and the Government surely do not anticipate another Indian war, and it is sincerely to be hoped that we will not have another half-breed rebellion, for, if we do, we might dispose of the country for the cost, if it should amount to what we paid for the last rebellion.

Indian Affairs Dept. $50,952 50

Mr. FOSTER. There were formerly two private secretaries, one for the Interior Department and one for Indian Affairs. The Minister proposes to do with one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the same officials remain who were here last year without any change or superannuation?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Finance and Treasury Board. . . . $50,500

Mr. FOSTER. There is an increase of $722.10, entirely a statutory increase. There are no changes.

Customs Department. $35,137 50

Mr. FOSTER. These are statutory increases. Difference between the salary of clerk, transferred from the Post Office Department and estimated salary, $475; difference in the salary of messenger, $140; less difference between the salary of second class clerk transferred to Montreal and salary estimates for his successor, $87.50, difference in commissioner's salary and assistant commissioner's salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you propose, in future, to dispense with the latter officer?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; under the statute creating the new officer and abolishing the old one.

Agriculture. $52,350

Mr. FOSTER. There is a decrease here, owing to the transfer of certain clerks to the Interior Department on account of immigration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see here an inspector of quarantine is put down at a salary, which certainly does not seem extravagant, of $300.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the accountant, Mr. J. B. Lynch, whose salary is voted just above. He was inspector of quarantines and of immigration offices and received a sum of money for that. He is now inspector of quarantines and receives $300 for that. He is a very efficient officer in his capacity of accountant, as well as in that of inspector of quarantines.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I might ask if the Minister has any information to give to the Committee as to the important question which is now agitating the minds of the people as to what steps can be taken for the more rigid enforcement of quarantine during the approaching season. It is hardly necessary to say that there is more than a suspicion abroad that there may be an outbreak of cholera in this country this year, as there was in Europe last year, and if the hon. gentleman has any information to give to the House as to the steps the Government propose to take, if they have made up their minds to take any, as I presume they have, I think he should give us the information. The question is of very great moment, and I believe that all the precautions we can take will not be too great to prevent the importation of cholera into this country during the approaching season.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government have taken all the steps they think necessary to enforce at the beginning of the season, and, in fact, almost immediately an efficient quarantine on all sides of our coasts. The station at Grosse Isle is being fitted up with the most improved and the most modern apparatus, so that there will be no lack as far as that is concerned. Buildings that will be necessary for the care of passengers while they are detained at the quarantine station, those who are not suffering from an attack of cholera, are being erected and will be ready for the opening of navigation and will be fitted up with all the appliances necessary for their comfort. Then there will be also ready for the opening of navigation sufficient houses for the care of those who may be infected with the disease—that, of course, to a certain extent. If a large outbreak of the disease were to take place and a large number of infected people were to be placed on the island, of course extra measures would have to be taken in regard to providing tents and so on in which to house them. However, every step is being taken to place that station in a proper shape. The same thing is being done at Halifax, where a quarantine station is being fitted up, and a building is being erected with all the appliances necessary, and that station will be perfectly equipped and in order in a month or two. In St. John the same preparations are being made, though on a less extensive scale, the number of passengers arriving there by steamer being smaller, but those preparations will be effective as far as that is concerned. On the Pacific coast the Government have purchased a new site for a quarantine station a little further out than the old one, which was found to be unsuitable. One great defect of the old station was that it was difficult to get in and out to and from it, and, when it was agitated that we should build a wharf there to accommodate the passengers landing, it was found that the cost of building a wharf would be very large, and it is rough there as well; so land for a new quarantine station has been purchased, and new quarantine quarters are being fitted up. That, also, with a wharf and proper accommodation, will be ready in a short time. These are the four principal organized points. Besides that, precautions will be taken at Sydney and whatever other exposed ports it is considered necessary to establish quarantine precautions at, so that, on the whole, I think nothing will be found to be complained of at the opening of navigation. The total amount of money to be expended upon these works, which will appear in the Estimates, is quite large.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has stated what he is going to do with respect to Canada proper. Can he inform us whether any communication has passed, or any concerted scheme of action has been arranged between the Canadian Government and the United States authorities? This is a subject upon which, I presume, they can act conjointly without any heart-burnings or differences, and, as our boundary is continuous with theirs for about 3,000 miles, I think the hon. gentleman will see that whatever we may do will be of very little use unless there is concerted action with the United States on both the Atlantic and the Pacific sea coasts.

Mr. FOSTER. There is every reason for believing that the quarantine regulations on the coasts of the United States will be very thorough and complete, and I know that our authorities and the quarantine authorities on the other side have been in constant communication, and I have no doubt that the unanimity of action which my hon. friend speaks of as so necessary will exist between the quarantine authorities on both sides.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly we are not disposed to impel the hon. gentleman to any unnecessary expenditure, but, speaking for myself, and, I believe, speaking for my hon. friend here, I may say that we are not going to put any obstacle in the way of any well-considered expenditure with the view to protect the people of Canada from such a visitation as cholera might be. On that point I think the House will agree that the Government is entitled to a free hand.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government are taking a pretty free hand in reference to that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have known of cholera visitations in Canada before now, and there is no doubt that a reasonable expenditure is a very wise thing, if in any shape or way it can prevent the spread of it.

Marine and Fisheries.....$50,005

Mr. FOSTER. There are twenty-eight statutory increases of $50, that is $1,400. There is a difference in the estimate for a messenger of $50, and there is a clerk at $900, making $2,350, the total increase. The clerk who is put in at $900 is a young man, a graduate of Kingston, who was employed upon Commander Boulton's Georgian Bay Staff. He is a young man of good parts, diligent and painstaking, and he has been on that survey up to the present time. Now, that a change is taking place, he is no longer necessary on the survey, and the Minister has taken him into the department, where he needs a clerk, at the same salary he was receiving on the survey.

Mr. MULOCK. You have only one deputy-head there now. Should there not be a greater decrease in the salaries?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. We do not estimate for the current year for the deputy who was dispensed with.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the House is entitled to some explanation as to what this new clerk in the Marine Department is required for. If I gathered correctly from the hon. gentleman's remarks, the Georgian Bay survey has been terminated.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then is Capt. Boulton proceeding with the Georgian Bay survey?

Mr. FOSTER. No. Capt. Boulton's services terminated at the end of the current year, this spring, but the Georgian Bay survey is not finished. It continues under the management of a gentleman who has been with Commander Boulton from the first inception of the work. He is a graduate of Kingston, and has served his time with Commander Boulton, and has become thoroughly proficient. Last year he made a survey of part of Burrard Inlet under his own management entirely, which survey was accepted by the Admiralty Department as in every way well done, and he was recommended by Commander Boulton as in every way fitted to carry on the survey work as satisfactorily as need be. This young man is now taking charge of the hydrographic survey, and will continue the operations of which Commander Boulton formerly had charge. Commander Boulton's time expires this spring. This young man was on the survey; but under the rearrangement that has been made he is no longer necessary there, and the Minister of Marine requiring his services, has transferred him to his department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not intend to discuss the Georgian Bay survey at the present time, as we will have another opportunity of doing so. Still, I think that concerning the introduction of a new clerk into the Marine Department at a salary of $900, we are entitled to some further information as to what branch he is to take charge of, and if he is necessary at all. It has been generally considered that that department was pretty well manned; it is almost conceded that it was over-manned, and the superannuation of the deputy head of the Fisheries Department was an acknowledgment of the contention that the place was over-manned. I have never heard any complaint that the Marine Department was shorthanded. I would like to know what are the duties of this new official who starts at a salary of $900.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot exactly say the duties which he has to perform. I may say, however, that the Department of Marine and Fisheries, which was formerly divided, is now united, and it takes in the whole of the marine interests of this country, and the whole of the fishery interests of this country. There is scarcely a nook or corner of Canada in which these two interests do not run and where they do not require supervision. Our large extent of sea coast and our large extent of fishing waters, which have to be protected and cared for, make an amount of detailed work as large, if not larger, than is to be found in any other branch of the Government. I know that from my own experience. If you look at the number of clerks, thirty-nine in all, I do not think, taking into account the work that has to be done and the immense amount of details, that the staff is extravagant. That a deputy head has been taken away is not proof that it was over-manned, but is a proof that it was considered better that the two departments should be merged into one, and that one deputy head should have charge of the whole—over-manned, possibly, in the deputy head's service; that must have been the opinion of the Minister. Not being the Minister of the department, I do not know exactly what work this new clerk is to take charge of; but I have no doubt that the work is there, and that he will do it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have no doubt that the department is important, and has its officers in every part of the Dominion of Canada; but these men are there discharging public duties, and are paid for it. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman sincerely believes that a new clerk is needed; but the question is, what grounds are there for making the appointment. It looks to me as if the place was being made for the man, and not the man appointed to a place where his services were required. It seems to me that if a young man was required there the hon. gentleman who has now charge of the department should be able to explain to the House what services he is going to perform. Otherwise such explanation as has been given would be a justification for the importation of half a dozen men or more into that or any other department. The House always expects when new men are introduced into the service that a reasonable explanation should be made as to increase of work or other cause justifying the appointment. This case looks very much as if it were one in which the place was made for the man.

Mr. FOSTER. I will ascertain from the department exactly the branch in which this work is required to be done and the character of the work, and I am willing to guarantee that the explanation will be satisfactory to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The House is entitled to an explanation. This committee sits for the purpose of checking extravagance, and while the hon. gentleman may be convinced that the vote is a proper one, the grounds on which it is asked should be stated to the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I will see that an explanation is given.

Mr. McMULLEN. I call the attention of the Minister to the system adopted in the preparation of bounty cheques.

Mr. FOSTER. We shall come to the bounty vote at a subsequent stage, when this question can be fully discussed.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the discussion is applicable to the present vote for salaries. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Auditor-General's Report, A-102, he will find a list of clerks to whom were paid $3,516, and in addition for the preparation of bounty cheques last year, $1,898. This is part of the system adopted by every department. Why is it considered necessary to employ clerks during extra hours to prepare bounty cheques? Twelve clerks were so employed, who, although they were receiving salaries ranging from $1,200 to $1,400 per annum, were paid an additional sum of $1,898.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will have patience he will get at the items for a similar vote to that taken last year. The Minister in charge will then be able to give him a satisfactory answer this year, as was given last year, or there would not have been a vote of Parliament for the amount.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That statement does not cover the question raised by my hon. friend as to the propriety or impropriety of paying clerks extra amounts when they are now receiving considerable salaries.

Mr. FOSTER. A discussion on this subject took place last year in regard to the change made from that of previous years when extra clerks entirely were employed to do this work, and the Minister showed that it could be done more economically by giving extra pay to clerks in the office. A special sum was voted for that purpose, and a special sum is asked this year for the same. When that vote comes under consideration, the principle can be fully discussed.

Public Works Department. $50,555

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe there are a large number of additional clerks employed, while, I admit, there is very little additional expense.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will recollect that for a number of years the Department of Public Works has had a comparatively small establishment at Ottawa as the civil service establishment. It has, however, had a very large number of temporary clerks so-called, but who have been permanent temporaries, such as architects, engineers, draftsmen and the like, who had formerly been paid out of the votes for the different public works. That system was abolished last year, and a vote was taken for the clerks at Ottawa who had formerly been paid out of the different public works for which appropriations were made. The minister last year dispensed with a number of those temporary clerks. This year he has dispensed with some more of them; but he proposes to fill up his permanent establishment to what he considers the complement from those who have been transferred from the permanent temporary staff to the civil service staff. So there is an addition of one first-class clerk, one second-class, four third-class clerks at small salaries, making up a total of forty instead of thirty-five.

Mr. McMULLEN. The minister says a number of the temporary clerks are permanent temporaries, and he proposes to remove them from that class and make them permanent. Under the superannuation system I presume that these clerks would be entitled on taking advantage of the superannuation, to claim for the entire time that they have been in the service as temporary clerks when they are put on the permanent list.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. In what relation do they stand to the superannuation law?

Mr. FOSTER. None. They are outside of it.

Mr. McMULLEN. When they are put on the permanent list they are not outside of it.

Mr. FOSTER. When they are put on the permanent list they pay superannuation abatement from the time they become on the permanent list, and get the advantage of the Superannuation Act in proportion to the time they have served on the permanent list, not on the temporary. Suppose a temporary clerk had been temporary for twenty years, and was, in this vote, made permanent as an engineer, say at a certain salary, his civil service, as far as superannuation goes, commences with the day he is appointed on the permanent list, and his abatement commences at the same time. His advantages for superannuation are in proportion to the time he serves on the permanent list, not upon the temporary list.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has there not been a suggestion that these temporary clerks, when they enter on the permanent list, by paying in the sum they would be required to pay had they been permanent clerks, would be allowed to participate in the superannuation from the date of their appointment?

Mr. FOSTER. That was done at the time of the passing of the Superannuation Act with reference to old servants who had been in the employ of the Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is asking here for practically the same amount as he asked for last year, but in the report of the Auditor-General for the expenditure of the department for the year before, I find that only $36,082 were expended out of a total of $50,107, leaving an unexpended balance of $14,000. Would the hon. gentleman explain that?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. That is because there were several vacancies which were not filled up; Those of Perley, Arnoldi and some others. These vacancies were not filled, and the work was done by the permanent temporary engineers. This year Mr. Coste is chief engineer at $3,200.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that all of that unexpended $14,000 is accounted for in that way? It is more than one-third of the whole expenditure.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; by these suspensions and other vacancies. The reason for the large number of clerks and the decrease in the total amount voted arises from the fact that several of the large salaried offices were vacant during the year preceding, because my hon. friend refers to the appropriation in the Auditor-General's Report for 1891-92. They have, however, been in part filled during the current year. Amongst those I remember there would be the position of chief engineer, formerly occupied by Mr. Perley, which has been filled by the appointment of Mr. Coste. The chief clerkship has been dropped, which accounts for $2,400 of the reduction. Mr. Arnoldi's place has also been filled. Then there were several vacancies among the second and third class clerks which have not been filled, but the higher class of clerkships have been divided into lower class clerkships, enabling a larger number of clerks to be taken on at a diminution of cost.

Mr. McMULLEN. When I raised the question whether the temporary clerks, when placed on the permanent list and allowed to participate in the superannuation fund, were credited with their entire period of service, my attention had been called to that point by correspondence that passed between the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Clerk of the Privy Council, to be found on page A-9 of the Auditor-General's Report. In an Order in Council there given, it is stated:

The Board, in compliance with the law, have recommended favourably on the cases submitted to them, but at the same time the Board have to direct the notice of Council to the fact that placing these officers on the permanent list has the effect of bringing them under the operation of the Superannuation Act, and that hitherto no provision has been made for payment of abatements on the pay of these officers while temporarily employed, although their temporary service counts on retirement.

The Board now recommend to Council that from and after the 1st inst., it shall be optional with temporary officers, on receiving permanent appointments, to place themselves, as far as regards their temporary services, under the operations of the Superannuation Act; but that in the cases where officers desire to avail themselves of this privilege, the Board are of opinion that abatements should be paid on their past temporary salaries since the Superannuation Act came into force, when the officers have served for so long back; otherwise, from the commencement of their temporary services.

This is dated the 7th of January, 1884. So that it looks as if the temporary clerks were entitled to participate in the superannuation fund from the date of their first service.

Mr. FOSTER. It looks as if it were contemplated by that order. I am speaking simply from experience. I know that the rule followed since I have been a member of the Treasury Board has been to count from the time they became permanent officers. The only condition on which their temporary time can be included is that they pay the superannuation abatement for that time. That is simply an Order in Council which may have been changed since, although if it were, I suppose it would not be here.

Railways and Canals $49,662 50

Mr. McMULLEN. Perhaps the Minister of Finance would inform us what position if any, Mr. Bradley, who was suspended, while secretary of this department, now occupies in the service.

Mr. FOSTER. He occupies no position in the Civil Service.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has he been superannuated?

Mr. FOSTER. He has not been superannuated. In this department there have been eight statutory increases of $50, one of 37.50, and one of $25. There is also $300 more for messengers, making $800 in all. The decreases include the chief engineer, $6,000, and the difference in salaries, $1,150, making a total decrease of $7,150, the net decrease being $6,350.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This is an opportune time, I think, for the Minister of Railways to explain to the House the different changes which have taken place in his department during the past year. From what we have seen in the press, we have understood that a change had been made in the position and powers and duties and salary of the late chief engineer. I do not know exactly what his title is now or what duties he discharges or what pay he receives or what power he possesses, and I would like a full explanation from the Minister on that point. It is understood that Mr. Pottinger's power as local manager has been changed. I do not know whether matters have to be referred by him to Ottawa, as before, or what are the relative positions which he and Mr. Schreiber hold. I would like to know also what salaries they are to receive and what increases have been made to each.

Mr. HAGGART. I was prepared to give a full explanation, but did not think this matter would come up on this item. The management of the Intercolonial Railway has been considerably changed. The duties of Mr. Pottinger are prescribed by a set of instructions which I will lay on the Table of the House when the item for the Intercolonial ial Railway comes up. The duties of Deputy Minister and chief engineer of railways are all those which were performed before by the Deputy who had charge of the Department of Railways and Canals. I will give a full explanation, when the item of the Intercolonial Railway comes up, of the duties imposed on Mr. Pottinger and the powers given him, and will lay on the Table of the House a copy of the instructions. They are very long, and I have not got a copy here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We will only have to wait, but I was in hopes the hon. gentleman would on this occasion have given the explanation, as it is anxiously looked for by a great many persons. Would the hon. gentleman tell us what salaries these gentlemen receive?

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Schreiber gets $6,000, as before. The increase of salary to Mr. Pottinger is $2,000 per year, if my memory serves me right.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would ask the hon. gentleman to lay the papers on the Table a day before the item comes up for discussion.

Mr. HAGGART. I will do so. I could give generally what powers are retained in the department here. One is that they are not to put on more trains than at present without consulting the department, and another is that two or three of the principal officers are to be appointed by the Governor in Council. I will lay the papers on the Table the day before the discussion.

Mr. DICKEY. With regard to the increase of a chief clerk in the office of the Chief Engineer of Railways and Canals and another in charge of the record staff, I would like to ask what the duties of the two chief clerks are and the changes made in the department in that regard?

Mr. HAGGART. If the hon. gentleman will look, he will see that one of them has been done away with. The office is divided into two branches. In one of them is the chief officer of Railways and Canals, and in the other is the chief clerk in charge of the record staff. It is the intention of the department to give those two appointments to two first-class clerks at present in the department. The name of one is Maynard and the other Jones.

Geological Survey Department . . . $50,732 50

Mr. FOSTER. There are nineteen technical officers who are not on the same basis as civil servants and are not eligible for statutory increases, and while I will leave the total of this item as it is, I propose to take $950, included in the item as statutory increases, from the item, and replace the amount in the shape of a bonus to these officers, which will make no difference in the aggregate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That practically means we will have to do that every year.

Mr. FOSTER. No, they did not get it last year.

Trade and Commerce Department. $6,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we should have a very full explanation indeed of this. It appears to me as if we were doing nothing but creating deputy-heads, for I must confess that providing a deputy-head to look after a second and a third-class clerk and a messenger does appear to me to be running the thing into the ground. Prima facie this official will have no department of any importance to attend to. Both the Inland Revenue and the Department of Customs have similar officers. In the Department of Customs you ask for a vote for a commissioner of $3,200.

Mr. FOSTER. The commissioner having been there before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is also a commissioner at $3,200 in the Inland Revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. He was there before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. True, but they are equivalent in all respects to deputy-heads. They have salaries equal to deputy-heads and they answer to deputy-heads. Now, I do not see on what possible ground the appointment of a Deputy-Minister at $3,200 can be defended for the Department of Trade and Commerce. Of course, we know very little of how that is going to be worked. Perhaps the member from Brockville, now the Controller of the department, has by this time got some insight into the working of it, and can tell us something about it. It does appear a very extraordinary step indeed to create a Deputy-Minister for the purpose of looking after a department with such a staff as this. The usual result of doing a thing of that kind is that the department grows up to the deputy-minister. The usual result is that so important an officer as the deputy-head is supplied with a staff proportionate to his dignity, and the general result is that the amount swells from $6,000 to $16,000, and then to $26,000 and even to $36,000, as we have seen examples of before this. I think if we must have fifteen gentlemen here to do the work which is done in other countries by half a dozen, and a much smaller proportion having reference to the numbers of the officials, we should not also be inflicted with fifteen deputy-heads, or whatever the number may be. This matter was discussed before as to the number of deputy-heads we were creating, and I think a strong case ought to be made out before adding another deputy-head as is now proposed.

Mr. FOSTER. It is hardly fair to say that we are adding another deputy-head. The Department of Customs had a deputy head, Mr. Parmalee, and an assistant commissioner, and the Inland Revenue Department had a commissioner and an assistant commissioner, the commissioner not being named as Deputy-Minister, but being to all intents and purposes a deputy.

Mr. DAVIES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And he is still.

Mr. FOSTER. And he is still. The new Department of Trade and Commerce has been created under the Act, and one of the deputies, Mr. Parmalee, has been transferred from the Department of Customs to the Department of Trade and Commerce, so that there is not a creation of a new deputy-minister. The Act contemplated that these gentlemen should continue to hold their offices during their life time if no other arrangements were made, so that when the Commissioner of Inland Revenue ceases to occupy his present position, there will be only one deputy-head and two commissioners instead of two deputy-heads and two assistant commissioners. That will be on the whole a saving, and at present there is no increase, because we have the same three men as before, Mr. Parmalee being transferred from one department to the other. I am sorry to find that my hon. friend has no higher opinion of a deputy-minister than to think he has simply to take charge of clerks. He is a very important officer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know he always considers himself so.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt Mr. Parmalee will have a great deal to do with organizing the new department. The hon. gentleman will observe by the foot note that it is provided "That in case of the transfer to the department of any officers or clerks whose salaries have been provided for in the estimates of any other department—whether inside or outside service—the amount so provided shall be available for the payment of their said salaries by this department." So that, if transfers are made of duties or otherwise, and clerks are transferred in consequence, they become a part of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but they diminish by so much the department from which they are transferred. Of course the Department of Trade and Commerce is at present in an embryonic state and is to be developed or not as circumstances require, but it cannot be stated that the staff is increased as the hon. gentleman said.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I want to know is what on earth is the Deputy-Minister to do. The hon. gentleman has not thrown much light on that branch of the subject. He has told us that the Deputy-Minister and the two commissioners replace one commissioner and two assistant commissioners, but what functions are you going to assign to the Deputy-Minister? This is a new experiment. It has involved the removal from this House of an hon. gentleman to another House, where I am told he is at present struggling with all the difficulties of engineering Government measures in a place where he has a majority of only ten or twelve to one.

Mr. FOSTER. That is all the more difficult.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt that is so. In fact, I am told that he already regrets his docile majority here. The hon. gentleman, however, has given no explanation of the duties of the new Deputy-Minister. I have heard that there was a venerable Dean who was summoned to give evidence before a committee of the House of Commons in England and he was asked what his duties were. He replied that his duties were the usual duties of a dean in a Cathedral establishment. Then they sent for a sub-dean and asked him what his duties were and he said they were the usual duties of a sub-dean in a Cathedral establishment. What I want to know is what are the duties of a Deputy-Minister of Trade and Commerce? Perhaps my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood) knows, as he is now actively concerned in the department. Really I do not see the object of retaining a Deputy-Minister of Trade and Commerce. I do not know what position Mr. Bowell is to assume to the two gentlemen we have here. Perhaps they do not know, and perhaps he does not know, but I took it for granted that the Department of Trade and Commerce, if it had any purpose except the duplication of the number of members of the Government in this House, had for its purpose that the Minister should exercise a wise supervision over the trade policy of the country apart from the administration of that policy; and while he might require two or three clerks, a stenographer, a private secretary, a messenger and so forth, I do not understand for what he can require a Deputy-Minister. Before we vote this amount for what is practically—with all respect to the Minister of Finance—a new office, we ought to know what duties the Deputy-Minister can have to perform. I cannot see what he can have to do, and I know enough to the habits of Deputy-Ministers to be aware that they will, if possible, live up to the dignity of their office, and the idea of dignity which they convey to the public is by means of having a numerous staff around them.

Mr. FOSTER. We have not provided for that numerous staff.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is to come. You have sown the seed and you will have the fruit.

Mr. FOSTER. That cannot be unless Parliament votes the money, and I do not suppose that my hon. friend would begrudge a larger vote if it were shown, in the development of the branch of Trade and Commerce, that good would result to the country from the work of that department. The story which my hon. friend has told about the dean and the sub-dean ought to be applied to himself. Any man in holy orders would be satisfied with the answers that were given. Now, a gentleman who has had charge of a department, who has had a deputy to help him to administer his department, knows what the duties of a Deputy-Minister are.

Consequently, no explanation is necessary for my hon. friend. I may say, as I said before, that the Department of Trade and Commerce is but commenced, the development and organization of it are largely to come, and the work will be taken up and the sphere of its duties increased in ways which will be, I have no doubt, beneficial to the country. For instance, at the present time, my hon. friend the Minister of Commerce has the administration of the steamship subsidies, these having heretofore belonged to my own department, but now, as appertaining more especially to trade and commerce, they have been transferred to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That of itself is a large and important field. I have been instituting, the last two or three years, a system of consular officers or commercial correspondents in different countries. These are now under the management of the Minister of Trade and Commerce; and as the main body of the Estimates will show, it is proposed to carry out that policy gradually towards a larger development of what my hon. friend from Brant thinks to be a wise and good policy for this country to adopt in the extension of trade. These are two important things. Then, the whole question of the development of trade between our country and foreign countries comes directly under the sphere of the Department of Trade and Commerce, which will also take advantage of whatever opportunities may present themselves for promoting that object, and the executive in all these matters will be the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If my hon. friend were to be made Minister of Trade and Commerce, the very first thing he would do would be to get one of the most efficient men he could find, as far as knowledge of trade and commerce go, to assist him in carrying out the work which pertained to his department. It would not do at all for him to be tied down to his work with a second-class clerk, a stenographer and a messenger; that would not at all fulfil the necessities for the working of his department. Not being myself the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I have not thought so deeply over this as my hon. friend in the other House has done. I am a little sorry that he is not here to explain his views and the methods by which he proposes to carry out those views. I do not know whether I have satisfied my hon. friend; if he requires more information I shall have to consult with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and then give the information to the House more in extenso.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman, before he took the responsibility of advising the establishment of this new department of Government, surely satisfied himself that it was a necessity, and he was asked to give to the House the grounds upon which he came to that conclusion. He has fairly explained the matter by telling us that to-day he is only giving the outlines of the arrangement, and that hereafter they will be filled up. It will be just as he says. You will have a complete staff. They will never be satisfied till their staff equals the staff of the other departments. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is to be at the head of two great branches, the Inland Revenue and Customs. Very well, the hon. gentleman retains the two deputy-heads of those departments, called Commissioners. He calls in two estimable gentlemen from this House and he calls them Controllers, new officers altogether, and we ask him to explain what their duties were, and what relative positions these gentlemen are to hold towards the new Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now, in the name of all that is holy, if the Controllers are necessary for the administration of the departments over which they are placed, in addition to the Deputy-Ministers, or Commissioners, what do you require another deputy for? Here we have a Minister of Trade and Commerce with a deputy, and a staff which is detailed here, with clerks, stenographers, messengers, etc. That is the outline to be filled up hereafter at an enormous cost, no doubt. Before very long we shall be called upon to vote money for extra clerks, etc. We know from experience that when the Marine and Fisheries Department was divided some time ago the same thing took place, and the same thing will take place now. It is just an excuse for a large expenditure of public money for providing places for new officers. We have a Minister of Trade and Commerce, we have a Controller of Inland Revenue, we have a Controller of Customs, we have two Deputy-Commissioners of Customs, and Deputy-Minister or Commissioner of Inland Revenue—these six gentlemen at the head of a department, practically one department. My hon. friend says he has a scheme on foot for the appointment of consular agencies in the different parts of the world, and that may develop a certain amount of work. Possibly it may, but I think he will hardly say that the present staff could not be utilized to discharge such duties as may arise in connection with these agencies. That surely will never justify the creation of a new department and the appointment of a Deputy Minister. The whole thing savours very much of what might be called, without offence, a political job. The fact of the matter is, some gentlemen had to be provided for, and they are provided for in this way, and I do not think the country will be satisfied with it. The hon. gentleman knows it will cost a large amount of public money extra, and he confessed himself to be unable, in the absence of the Minister, to explain to the House what the duties of these new officers are. I have no doubt we will have a full explanation from my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood), the Controller of Inland Revenue, and he will explain very lucidly, as he generally does when he makes an explanation to the House, what his relative duties are compared with the Commissioner, and as compared with the Minister who is over him. I think it will be satisfactory to this committee and the country to understand what the hon. gentleman's duties are.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I did not suppose when I came into the House to-night that I would be called upon to explain why it was that the late Minister of Customs, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, had seen fit to appoint a deputy minister to his department. If the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat had read the Act creating the portfolio of Trade and Commerce, and the Act relating to the Controller of Inland Revenue and Customs respectively, I think he would have gained a good deal of light on the subject which he seems to stand in need of. If he had read the debates which took place when the late Sir John A. Macdonald introduced those Acts he would have been further enlightened, much to his advantage. Now, I am glad of the opportunity of giving that hon. gentleman and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) all the information in my power. One of the objects in view in introducing this Act was to do away, in a good many cases, with the duplication of officers. There are some inspectors of Inland Revenue and some inspectors of Customs who can do work which both sets of officers are doing now, and economy was one of the objects upon which the late Sir John A. Macdonald based the Acts in question, as will be found on reading the discussion that took place when the Bills were introduced. So far as the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce is concerned, the portfolio, as the Minister of Finance has said, is necessarily a growing and expansive one. It must necessarily in the nature of things be such, especially in a country like this. It is quite true the Minister of Trade and Commerce exercises a general supervision over the work of the two departments, Inland Revenue and Customs. I do not wish to exaggerate for one moment the importance of the office I hold. I am Controller of Inland Revenue, and am under the general supervision of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If he exercise that jurisdiction, as no doubt he will, on matters of policy affecting the department itself, he will have his hands full and will need a deputy. For instance, I propose, with the sanction of my colleagues, to introduce this session an Act to bring the electric light under a system of inspection similar to the inspection system of gas. I would not undertake to introduce that measure without consulting the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I might mention some other matters by way of illustration. I allude to these points simply, in the best of good faith, to enlighten my hon. friend on one detail, and give him some little insight as to what the Minister has to do; but apart from all that, so far as departmental matters are concerned, the Minister himself I have no doubt, although I have no right to speak for him, possesses sufficient capacity, as we know from our experience of that gentleman, as the head of one of the most important revenue producing branches of the Government, and is broad-minded enough and had experience enough in connection with the its expansion can take place with profit to this Dominion, and I think we can safely leave with him the duty of selecting his own deputy and deciding the necessity of his appointment. In the discussion that took place in this House on the introduction of these measures, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)—I am not sure of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)—and several hon. gentlemen opposite took part, and it was then expressly stated that there would be a deputy of Trade and Commerce, and not one word was said against that proposition. Why should objection now be taken to filling a position provided for in the Act which passed this House, when, in the discussion which took place, not one word was said against it. I think we can very safely leave to the good judgment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce not only the question of deciding as to the necessity for the office, but the selection of the deputy himself.

Mr. FRASER. It would perhaps have been desirable if the Controller had left the task of explaining the duties of the office of deputy to the Minister of Finance. If the additional information as regards the duties of the new department cannot go further than that furnished by the Controller in regard to the preparation of a measure respecting the electric light, it was hardly worth while that he should offer it.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I only gave you that as an illustration,—and you know it.

Mr. FRASER. I suppose the hon. gentleman wanted to throw some light on the subject.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). If you will call over I will give you all the light you wish.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman does not inaugurate his position well by showing temper. The Controller should control himself; and I must notice that the Government have adopted the American method of spelling the word. My impression is that when the Act to which the hon. gentleman has referred was under discussion in this House, there was considerable objection offered to the creation of the office. I observe the hon. gentleman has been reading up the debate with the intention of having some little defence for himself. I have not done so. I suggest, however, that it appears somewhat strange that the Act should have remained in abeyance six years and should only now be brought into operation. Have we not been passing through such an experience in regard to the commerce of this country during those years as to require the able services of these Controllers? Is the Minister himself so old that he cannot perform the duties? Must we now, without evidence being adduced to show that our trade and commerce has increased, vote money for the salary of a deputy? That is the question before this Committee. It is not a matter of any personal experience. The hon. gentleman, moreover, has not shown that the commerce of the country is advancing and that such an appointment was necessary at this particular time. I fancy the difficulty experienced by the Minister of Finance, who is always ready to give an explanation of some kind, in explaining this item may be taken as evidence that no explanation can be given satisfactory to this House as to why, although this country is feeling the burdens of taxation, three new offices have been created. I do not for a moment say that the hon. gentleman who has addressed this Committee and who received the appointment of Controller is not as good a man as the Government could obtain on that side of the House. I think he will agree with me that he is—he will be the first man to do so. But that is not the question. The real issue is whether these appointments were necessary. I submit that neither the hon. Minister of Finance, nor the Controller of Inland Revenue has shown there was any necessity for this change. A good business man does not employ a clerk until he knows the work on which he will place him. He does not say: I will get a clerk, it is true my business is not sufficient to warrant his employment, but perhaps I may be able to find some work for him to do. True, the country supplies the salary in this case, for in a like case a business man could not afford to do so. All these salaries are paid out of the pockets of the people. I am glad to see an hon. gentleman in his seat who has raised his voice against the present taxation. I refer to the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn), who has declared that we were burdened with taxation, that the National Policy, while it might be all right up to a certain point, might be carried a little too far, and that something should be done. I am sure he will deem it imprudent to expend $15,000 more in appointing these new deputies. I never heard the Minister of Customs when in this House complain that he was overworked; on the contrary, no hon. gentleman showed more vigour. I am sorry we have lost him, and I must say he could rise at any time and show as much energy and endurance as any hon. gentleman. I regret that his deputy is learning a little of his acidity in speech, and is commencing his work in this House by copying somewhat the sharp methods that our good friend, of whom we all thought so much, displayed in this House. That, however, is not here or there; but the question is, were these changes necessary in the existing state of public affairs and in the best interests of the country. Now, it may have been, but I submit that that has not been shown, and, until that is shown, I say that the hon. gentleman should not ask that this should be voted until they make it appear to this Parliament and to the country that there was absolute necessity for the appointment. It seems to me that further explanations are necessary in order to justify this large increase in expenditure with reference to the appointment of my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood). I congratulate him and I congratulate the country upon any position which he may fill. I know no one in public life on that side of the House better qualified to receive preferment than the hon. gentleman. I have the utmost confidence in him personally, and, therefore, any allusion I make to the appointment is wholly in the public interest without regard to him personally. I say that the country is entitled to explanations as to why it is put to this greatly increased expenditure. Of all times you have selected the worst, probably, for increasing the burdens of the people. There is certainly nothing in the trade of the country to warrant this large addition to the Civil Service. Since I have been in public life I have observed that come what might, let there be deficits or not, there was always an increase going on in the staff of the Civil Service. The only thing which the National Policy has really developed in the country has been hard times and increased parasites on the country. In the end the whole of this expenditure comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the country, the tillers of the soil. You have now a Cabinet of seventeen members, three of whom have no portfolios, I believe, and fourteen of whom are under full pay, drawing about $100,000 a year from the public treasury, a cabinet three times as large as that of the United States, with a population thirteen times that of the Dominion of Canada. There is not the first shadow of an explanation offered to the public to justify what has taken place, and if we are left to our imagination—which is about the only thing which seems to be left us here, as you will not give us facts—I presume that we can only assume that the situation demanded the providing of offices. We know last year that there was lots of kicking. It was not the first time we heard of my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) having knocked at the door of the Cabinet and asked permission to enter. However, he has not gone in there yet, and has, so to speak, only attained the position of outside guard.

An hon. MEMBER. He got his shoulders in.

Mr. MULOCK. He has not got even that far yet. For some years we have heard that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) conceived himself a heaven-born statesman anxious in the country's good to sacrifice himself on the altar of his country, but for some reason or other his merits were unrecognized and Canada was without his services for all these years. The law had been there and he had been there always willing, but yet the country never availed itself of his vast services until lately. There is a general opinion that he was selected as a life preserver for the Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) A set-off.

Mr. MULOCK. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) says that he was put there as a set-off. The life preserver floated the Cabinet ship too high and it could not navigate, and so to even matters up they had to go to Montreal to get a Solicitor-General to weigh down and make it float properly. So in order to serve party exigencies the Government disregards the welfare of the people and increases their burdens. I am not the only person objecting to this work of the Government. There is dissatisfaction all through the land about it. On several occasions, Brother Wallace—I beg pardon the member for West York—has no doubt seen allusions to his appointment, and he must see there is some dissatisfaction in regard to it. It is becoming a very serious matter, because only this evening I see published a despatch from Halifax, which says:

Central Star, Loyal Orange Lodge, New Glasgow has passed a formal resolution denouncing the action of Mr. N. C. Wallace in the strongest terms for accepting an inferior position in the cabinet of Sir John Thompson, being convinced that Brother Wallace violated his obligation and sacrificed his Orangeism for political advancement.

I do not quite understand whether that resolution objected to the general proposition or simply to his having taken a position on the outside. However that may be, the job has not given satisfaction in certain quarters, and as regards the whole country it has produced the impression that offices have been created to serve political exigencies. Hon. gentlemen opposite have disregarded the interests of the country and have been merciless towards the taxpayers, and I trust that when the time arrives the taxpayers will have their innings and will call to account those unfaithful stewards who are now squandering the public money in the interests of the office holders, and have so long remained in office as to be out of touch with the people, and come to think there never will be a day of retribution.

Mr. WALLACE. I think we might fairly ask that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) would state his facts, or his supposed facts, a little more correctly. He has stated to the House that there are seventeen Cabinet Ministers, when, as a matter of fact, there are only fourteen.

Mr. MULOCK. I gave you credit in that.

Mr. WALLACE. He is only mistaken by three in that statement. He has also stated that three have no portfolios, whereas two is the correct number. The hon. gentleman alludes to the fact, or rather what he states to be a fact, that I have been looking after office. I can assure the hon. gentleman from North York (Mr. Mulock) that I have never looked for any office, except that when I was nominated for West York, I looked to the electors to return me to Parliament. More than that, I may say to the hon. gentleman that I did not require to spend thousands of dollars to be elected, as the hon. gentleman from North York (Mr. Mulock) required to do in his constituency. It is a well known fact, Mr. Chairman, that only for the hon. member for North York's money bags his talents would never have brought him into the House of Commons. He read a supposed resolution from some lodge down in New Brunswick—

An hon. MEMBER. Not New Brunswick.

Mr. MULOCK. New Glasgow—Central Star Loyal Orange Lodge, New Glasgow.

Mr. WALLACE.—In Nova Scotia. I presume that resolution was like another that was passed by a solitary lodge in the province of Ontario, and the fact remains that hon. gentlemen opposite, with all their efforts, have only been able to induce two lodges out of 2,000 to pass such a resolution.

Mr. LISTER. We have no influence over the lodges.

Mr. WALLACE. They are all good loyal men, loyal to the institutions of this country, and they are not looking to their friends across the border; they are not sending emissaries to the United States to stab Canada in her vital parts. They are members of a loyal and patriotic institution, and I wish we could say the same of the hon. members on the other side of the House and their colleagues, some of whom are in Washington to-day, working, not in the interests of Canada, but working to destroy Canadian nationality.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Chairman, I think it is due to the House that I should make ample restitution for the observations I directed to it a moment ago. I had no idea that the country had secured such a prize in the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I had no idea that he was possessed of such talent and such dignity, and that he would be so well qualified to discharge the official functions of the position he holds. I congratulate him on being "facile princeps" a master of decorum, a master of good taste, and a master of the French language.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is well that we should fully and freely criticize the increase that has taken place in the Cabinet. Under the present circumstances, when the people of this country are feeling the burden of taxation, when men on that side of the House are willing to admit on public platforms that the people of this country are overtaxed, and that the National Policy has gone to the extreme in extorting money unnecessarily from the people of this country, and when our population is virtually decreasing while the annual expenditure is increasing, I think an increase of three to the number of the Ministry, who were looked upon as amply sufficient in number if not in ability before, is a gross piece of injustice to the taxpayers of this country. I can easily understand that the Government had some little difficulty in dealing with their friends outside of the Cabinet. By the public prints we all know how frequently men who thought they were born statesmen were in Ottawa, no doubt seeking for positions. The hon. Controller of Customs says he did not seek a position in the Cabinet. He may not have done so, but he was very willing to grab at and take the humblest position of the whole. We were informed in the public press of one man who had been offered one of those positions and indignantly declined it. Although my hon. friend says he was not at all anxious to get a position, he has only a very humble one, and it is not in the Cabinet. He merely occupies the position of an outside tyler to the Cabinet; he has to stand outside and keep the door, and allow the deliberations to be carried on inside and whenever the Cabinet decides, he has to whistle the tune that he is told. He has nothing to say as to what is done inside; he has no advice to give, he is not supposed to give any advice, but he is supposed to fall into line and do his part to carry out the decisions of the Cabinet of which he is not a member, but merely an outside guard. It looks as if he was very anxious to get some position when he is willing to take such a humble one as that, although he has been for many years in this country the recognized chief of the order to which he belongs. I understand that there has been some trouble in finding places for men like the hon. member for West York. We know very well, if we can believe the public prints of the day, that a great many men were pressing their services on the Government, and I suppose, considering the ability of the old cabinet, that it was absolutely necessary to get into it better blood, for they could not get rid of what they had. The only one they did get rid of was the Minister of Agriculture; and after all the fight he passed through to hold the seat that was not his, it seems to be a cruel thing to thrust him out so ruthlessly, so that he does not now occupy a position at all.

Mr. LISTER. He sits on the front benches.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, he sits on the front benches, but so far as the Cabinet is concerned he has to take a back seat, for he is no longer a member of the Cabinet. We on this side of the House can only say that he has received his just deserts, and we do not sympathise with him in the least. With regard to the other members of the Cabinet, I have no doubt, and I honestly admit, that there was a necessity for new blood being taken in, because the ability that characterized the heads of several of the departments was so limited that it was absolutely necessary that some effort should be made to improve the Cabinet. Whether the additions made will be improvements or not I am not prepared to say. I am quite ready to endorse the statements made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) with regard to the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood). Ever since I have sat in this House I have respected the hon. gentleman as a man of ability, who endeavoured to discharge his duties in this House with credit to himself. With regard to the others I am not prepared to say much. I certainly cannot give them the certificate that I have given to the hon. member for Brockville. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) I recognize as a man of some ability. I know that he is a capital hand to sing "Old King Cole"; that is the only thing that I have known him to do efficiently in this House, and he has done that very well. The Controller of Inland Revenue I have never heard sing a song to the House; but I remember that he has been prepared to trip up in a very discourteous way some men on this side who differed from him on points that arose in our discussions. However, we shall see how these gentlemen develop, and I suppose that if they develop a sufficient amount of ability, the First Minister will let them have inside seats in his Cabinet coach. But, in the meantime, the hon. member for Montreal Centre will act as outside tyler at one end and the hon. member for West York as outside tyler at the other end, and they will have to show how they occupy those positions to enable the First Minister to judge whether they are entitled to inside seats.

Mr. FRASER. One or two remarks have been made which I think deserve a little notice. The hon. member who has just spoken is perhaps a little severe. I can very well understand how the Controllers are chafing under the feeling that they cannot be called honourable, and a considerable amount of leniency ought to be shown to them on that account. I regret that the hon. Premier is not here—we always like to have him here—for I would like to point out to him some incongruities about the Government as at present formed, that is as to the character of the elements of which it is composed. But I must congratulate the First Minister on so nicely balancing matters and on having, even down to the arrangement of the seats, perfected the appearance of that ministry in this House. I can very well understand the difficulty he had in forming a Cabinet. I think I see the Premier starting out on that great work of building that grand cabinet cathedral; and of course as the last one was strong in knaves, a change had to be made, and he had to start in with an eye to the moral sense of the country in order to avoid extravagance in that particular. I think I see him building the cathedral until at last the keystone alone was wanted; and then I can fancy him walking up and down the edifice, in the cold, frosty air, hearing the noise of contending elements outside, the wind and snow beating in upon him, not knowing what was to be done, and looking up and wondering how he was going to complete the structure. Outside were the contending elements. West York and several other counties were in full blast of contention. One of the Norfolks was lashing itself into fury and the noise outside was increasing. But West York howled more vigorously than all the rest and got the keystone, and I can fancy him the First Minister, after that feat was accomplished, saying in Shakespearian phrase: "Now is the winter of our discontent made glorious summer by this son of York." The Cabinet was completed, but he did not end there. He had to balance the different elements in this House. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) he placed just beside the Secretary of State (Mr. Costigan) in order that the one may keep close watch upon the other, and that they might cultivate each other's friendly feelings as they never did before, so that perhaps they may come to the conclusion that there may be some good in men differing ever so widely. Then the First Minister placed the deposed Minister (Mr. Carling) alongside the Postmaster-General (Sir Adolphe Caron). I looked over at the deposed Minister, as he sat there, and felt sorry. He reminded me of the epitaph placed by a wife over her husband who had died before he was expected to. His wife loved him very much, and she had this epitaph inscribed on his tombstone: "I expected it, but not so soon." Near the deposed Minister was the Minister of Militia. In ancient times a criminal who had taken life was compelled to walk around the whole country side attached to the man he had murdered, in order that he might ever be kept mindful of his crime. The First Minister must have had this custom in view when he thus placed beside the Postmaster-General, who has certain things to answer for before this country and this House, even before his own friends, this reminder of the desposed Minister: Just look beyond you; you may some day meet the same fate. All these arrangements are not without design, and they are well designed. But I submit that even the beautiful front they present, the nice arrangement of colours and shades, is not sufficient to satisfy this country and justify the expenditure. The lavish expenditure of more money on officials is a matter this country is not going to reap the benefit from that even this beautiful appearance indicates. I have nothing against those hon. gentlemen. I join the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) in his remarks concerning the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood), and I have no doubt that all these gentlemen will, to the best of their ability, perform their duties; but the question is, is the country going to receive any return for the amount expended—any work which will repay it?

It was well said that this is only the beginning of it. Everybody knows how men will surround themselves with messengers and clerks and all the rest of it. There is the Deputy and a second-class clerk and a stenographer and a messenger at $500. I venture to say that there will not be sufficient messages to enable this messenger to earn his salary, even if he get paid at the rate of a dollar each. Messages from whom? From the Deputy to the Controller, and from the Controller to the Minister. Are the Minister and the Controller to live together and the Deputy to be in a separate place? Every business man knows that the simpler the arrangements are for conducting an office, the more effective they are, and that as you increase positions unnecessarily, you impair the performance of the work. The responsibility will be shifted from one official to the other. As the work is to be done by the Deputy, the Minister will not look to it, and vice versa, whereas, when the whole responsibility is thrown on the one head, he will make it his business to attend to the work and see that it is performed. I am not making any personal objections to these gentlemen, but I object to this sacrifice of the country's interests for the sake of propitiating individual ones. The only interests the people care for are their own. What care they whether this body or this race wants a man in office? What they want is that the country shall be economically governed, and it has not been shown that the appointment of these parties is in the best interests of the country. This is the time of all others when we ought to be cutting off any rotten branches of the protective tree and the suckers that are gathered around the body politic; and in place of putting it in the power of any man to bleed this country to a greater extent, we should endeavour to make the lot of those whose toil is barely sufficient to earn them a livelihood easier by reducing our expenses. It has not been shown that these changes are in the best interests of the country, and for that reason I oppose them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I must confess that when I invited the Finance Minister a few moments ago to give an explanation of the reasons which prompted the Government to incur this very great expense in the creation of this new department and the appointment of two new Controllers, and the other officials to whom reference has been made, I did expect, if not from the hon. gentleman himself, at least from the two gentlemen to whom reference has frequently been made, such explanations as would satisfy the Opposition that the step had not been taken without cause, and could be justified by sound reasons. As far as the Minister is concerned, I congratulate him on his frankness. He plainly said that he did not know the reasons, but that if the Minister of Trade and Commerce were here we might obtain them from him. I addressed myself to the hon. member for Brockville, knowing that if he had a case at all, he would be able to present it in its best aspect to the House. After the explanation he has given, and knowing the position he has held in this House for many years, I can only exclaim: "How are the mighty fallen." According to him it is necessary that there should be a Minister of Trade and Commerce and a deputy-minister and a controller of Revenue and Customs and a deputy-minister of Customs—and a commissioner of Inland Revenue—all for the purpose of introducing a Bill to regulate the inspection of electric light. The hon. gentleman, after consideration, gave the reasons for his appointment, and, knowing his ability, I know he must have exhausted these reasons, and he exhausted them in the statement that he hopes to bring in a Bill for the inspection of electric light. Does he not see what a serious charge he brings against the Secretary of State, formerly Minister of Inland Revenue, when he intimates that the Secretary of State was not capable of introducing such a law? Does he not think he was capable of introducing an important measure of that kind and guiding it through this House? I think he was, and I think the House will come to the conclusion that, with all the hon. gentleman's ability, legal and parliamentary, he has failed to justify his existence as a controller. But what shall I say as to the other hon. gentleman who came forward and made his maiden speech as a controller? I expected that he would have made some attempt to justify his position. What are his duties? It appears that there are some emissaries, some enemies of this country who are going about in order to stab her vital parts, and the hon. gentleman has been elevated from the position of an ordinary member to that of a Controller in order that he may wrestle with these enemies of his country. Knowing his past history, and knowing how jealously he watched the machinations of the present members of the Cabinet, I would not have been surprised, if he had succeeded in getting himself placed inside the Cabinet, to hear him say that he occupied a position where he could countermine the machinations of those enemies of his country who were endeavouring to stab her in her vital parts, but he is not there. There are some people who go through the world imagining that their friends and neighbours are going to commit assaults upon their persons or upon their religion. But see how useless he is. He tells us the duty he has to perform, and yet he is not in a position which would enable him to countermine these machinations. I am afraid he will be as useless as a Controller as he has been as a member of this House.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 1st February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 5) to secure the better observance of the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Bill (No. 6) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act.—(Mr. Costigan.)

COPYRIGHT ACT.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether the Governor-General has issued his proclamation to bring into force the provisions of the "Copyright Amendment Act" of 1889? Whether the British Government has given notice of the withdrawal of Canada from the Berne Convention, as requested in the Address passed by the Parliament of Canada in 1891? If such proclamation has not been issued, and if such notice of withdrawal has not been given, is the Government prepared at once to lay before this House papers and correspondence to explain the delay or neglect that has taken place in these matters?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The proclamation has not been issued and the notice has not been given. The subject has caused some correspondence during the last few months, and a long despatch has been received from Her Majesty's Government which is to be answered in a few days. I propose to let the hon. gentleman know when the answer is given, so that he can move for the papers if he chooses, or can let us submit them, as he prefers.

CLAIM OF MESSRS. C. AND Z. ROY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether the Government have come to any decision in relation to the claim of Messrs. C. and Z. Roy, of Isle aux Grues in the county of Montmagny? If so, what is the decision? and if not, what do they propose doing in the matter?

Mr. OUIMET (Translation). The claim of the Messrs. Roy was referred to the Department of Justice, and the necessary information is being sought for so as to come to a decision in the matter.

MR. THOMAS F. X. BERLINGUET.

Mr. DESAULNIERS asked, On whose recommendation was Thomas F. X. Berlinguet, Esq., appointed resident engineer at Three Rivers? What work is he intrusted with? What are his instructions? What amount did he draw, whether as engineer or otherwise, out of the public chest, between 29th June, 1891, and 31st December, 1892?

Mr. OUIMET (Translation). Mr. Berlinguet was appointed on the recommendation of Mr. Baillairege, who was then Deputy Minister of Public Works. He is intrusted with the St. Maurice, from its mouth up to superintendence of the works on the La Tuque. He is also in charge of the public works in the district of Three Rivers, such as the wharf in Yamachiche, the Nicolet pier and the works on the river Yamaska. Instructions are sent occasionally to Mr. Berlinguet, when deemed necessary; but his general duties are to superintend all public works in his district, and to report to the department whenever there are repairs or improvements to make. He is also bound by his duties to see that all the public works that are given out, either by contract or by specification, be carried out as well as possible. The following sums were paid to Mr. Berlinguet, between the 29th June, 1891, and the 30th June, 1892: As salary, $1,875; for his maintenance, $769.25; for disbursements, $76.41; for travelling expenses, $370.93. From the 1st July to the 31st December, 1892, his salary was $1,012; maintenance, $373; disbursements, $10.91; travelling expenses, $145.

SLAUGHTERING SWINE IN BOND.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to amend or relax the quarantine regulations now in force governing the importation and slaughtering of swine in bond?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There has been a deputation upon the subject lately, and so lately that the subject has not yet been fully considered by the Government.

THE SAUGEEN INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Landerkin) asked, Was an investigation held during the past year in reference to ties and posts cut on the Saugeen Indian Reserve in the county of Bruce? If so, who conducted it? Was a seizure made of any ties and posts from said reserve, and if so, by whom made and from whom seized? What was the value of said ties and posts, and what was the total cost incurred in the seizure, and to whom was it paid?

Mr. DALY. No official investigation was held during the past year in reference to ties and posts cut on the Saugeen Indian Reserve in the county of Bruce, but inquiry into the matter was made by the Department of Indian Affairs through its agent, Mr. James Allen, of Chippewa Hill, Ontario. A seizure of ties and posts was made by Mr. James Allen, Indian agent, from Mr. J. J. Creighton. The value of said ties and posts was about $30; and the total cost incurred in the seizure was $101.75, of which $91.50 was paid to Thomas Shular, constable, and $10.25 to cover expenses of parties who were called upon by the agent to make statutory declarations in the matter.

HOUSEHOLD EFFECTS.

Mr. MULOCK asked, Whether the household effects referred to in the item intituled "Household Effects," which appears on page 458 of the Trade and Navigation Report for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1892, were any of these the household effects of persons removing from Canada? If so, what was the value of said portion?

Mr. WALLACE. Without communicating with all the ports, it is impossible to say definitely just what goods are classified under this heading. The effects of emigrants are included in the heading, and no doubt a large proportion of articles classified thereunder are made up of such goods, but what the proportion is it is impossible to say.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURE OF THE PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, What were the receipts and expenditure of the Prince Edward Island Railway for the six months ending 31st December, 1892? Was there any expenditure during that period on capital account? If so, what?

Mr. HAGGART. The receipts for six months on the Prince Edward Island Railway, to the 31st December, 1892, were $92,073.90; and the expenses, $130,391.43, or a loss of $38,317.53. There has been no expenditure on capital account during the above period.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURE ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, What were the receipts and expenditure of the Intercolonial Railway and its several branches for the six months ending 31st December, 1892? What, if any, was the expenditure during that period on capital account of such road and its branches?

Mr. HAGGART. The receipts for six months ending 31st December, 1892, were $1,595,047.13; and the expenditure, $1,597,757.72; leaving a loss of $2,710.59. The expenditure on capital account for the above period was $170,828.17.

WHARFINGER AT TIGNISH.

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether a wharfinger has been appointed at Tignish? If so, who is he, when was the appointment made, and what was the amount of wharfage paid during the year 1892?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes. Mr. George Conroy was, on 2nd October, 1891, appointed to succeed Mr. Benjamin Gaudet, superseded in February, 1892. Mr. Conroy remitted $8.30 wharfage collections for 1891, but nothing has as yet been received from him for 1892. He has been directed to forward his returns for the calendar year ending 31st ultimo, without delay.

DUTY ON BINDING TWINE.

Mr. MULOCK moved:

That it is expedient to place binding twine on the free list.

He said: This is not the first time that I have pressed this motion upon the attention of the House, and although unsuccessful up to this moment, I hope that in due time the Government will see the wisdom of yielding to the request. If they do not agree with the spirit of my motion, perhaps they will, like the unjust judge, at least yield to it on account of frequent importunities. However that may be, and whatever may be their motive for yielding, assuming that they will yield, I shall be content. I think that already, since this matter has been brought to the attention of the House, there is an accumulation of evidence that it is not one altogether without interest outside of this House. From all sources, from the agriculturist from one end of Canada to the other, the House has been invited by petition and otherwise to give relief to the agricultural classes in many ways; but up to this moment they appear to have found no friends at court in the Government circles. Whether at last they may, becomes a question for the Government to decide. Now, what are the merits of the question? The merits of the question are simply these: the agriculturists, in carrying on their calling, are obliged to supply themselves with this twine in order to be able to conduct their industry according to modern methods, and it is to their interest to acquire it at the cheapest possible price. I am sorry that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) sees nothing in my motion entitling it to his consideration, but perhaps when the discussion has continued some time, and when his own peculiar interests are brought more particularly into view, he, and the friends around him who now seek to disturb the discussion, may feel it incumbent upon them to give some little attention to the matter. Now, Sir, I say that the result of the tariff upon binding twine is to place the farmer at the present time at the mercy of a syndicate. In 1891 I brought to the attention of the House the condition of the manufacturing trade in connection with binding twine. I was able to show, and hon. gentlemen have only to refer to the records of Parliament at that time to find, that in 1891 an American company, known as the National Cordage Company, had, with the assistance of its enormous American capital, formed a syndicate and leased all the twine factories of Canada. That fact was established beyond controversy, and was admitted by the chairman of the Canadian combine, the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), who now sits in his place in this House. It was further established on that occasion that the combine was operating in Canada, supplying the Canadian manufacturer to the exclusion of all competition from without, and also engaging in an export trade; in other words, it was selling its product to the Canadian manufacturer at combination prices and was supplying the free trade market of the world at free trade prices, was using Canada as the basis of operations, taking advantage of the imprisoned farmer of Canada and making use of him as a machine wherewith to carry on this gigantic concern, the benefits of which accrued, in the first place, to the combine itself, and, perhaps, to some extent to the outside world, which thereby acquired twine at cheaper prices. On that occasion those who agreed with me on this measure addressed their arguments to deaf ears. I introduced my motion on 1st May, 1891. The Minister had not at that time announced what tariff changes he contemplated, and, at his request, I allowed the motion to stand without comment until he had decided as to his course. It was therefore a great disappointment to those hon. gentlemen who agreed with my view and to the agricultural section of Canada that on this, as on many other occasions, the interests of the farmer were entirely ignored by the Administration. The Government on that occasion said they proposed not to deal with the matter, they refused to deal with it, and allowed the years from then to now to pass by, the farmer being compelled to pay, as he has since been compelled to pay, on an average, 25 per cent more for twine than it was worth. The tariff is 25 per cent. There is but one manufactory in Canada, the manufactory presided over by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs). That is the only firm selling twine in Canada, and the farmers have been obliged to purchase at the price of the seller. Every purchaser is entitled to buy in the cheapest market, but owing to the restricted character of the tariff the purchaser of binding twine has been obliged to purchase at prices named by the seller, wholly uncontrolled by the purchaser or the question of supply and demand. On the occasion referred to we were told by the Minister of Finance, and we were appealed to almost with tears in his eyes by the junior member for Halifax, that if we reduced the duty on binding twine we would close one of Canada's infant industries. This Canadian infant industry has had a couple more years of existence, and if an advertisement which I find in the papers is authentic, it will give the House and the country to understand the kind of infant industry now receiving pap through the agency of the Government from a suffering public. Let us look at what the infant industry is, for it is typical of its class, which receives protection from the Government, a product of the National Policy, a sucking infant which has to be propped up by the mass of the people, or otherwise it would go to ruin, and the glory of Canada and the British flag would depart. As an infant industry it had to be protected by a tariff of 25 per cent at the expense of the toiling farmers of Canada, under the name of the Consumers' Cordage Co., and this company has given the Canadian world this much information, at all events, as regards their affairs. I read from an advertisement which appears to-day in the Montreal "Herald," and I think a similar advertisement has appeared in authentic papers from the Government standpoint, and we may assume that this advertisement comes from headquarters, from the company itself. If not, the president of the company, who is sitting in this House, will of course repudiate the advertisement at once, and thereupon I will abstain from making any comment. If, however, he admits, as I assume he now does, this advertisement, as issued by the company in question, I will proceed to analyse to some extent the feeble condition of this industry, and show how most necessary it is that it may still be allowed further to operate, or, to quote an expression, to stab Canada in her vital parts. This infant industry has been described by itself as follows—I read from the advertisement :

Capital $3,000,000.

Surely, an infant industry with a capital of $3,000,000 is entitled to its contribution of taxes from the suffering farmers, the average of whom may be described as not possessing $3,000,000. This company, it goes on to say, has the following gentlemen as directors :—

John F. Stairs, M.P., Halifax, president ; A. W. Morris, M.P.P., Montreal, vice-president ; Edward Fulton, Montreal, treasurer ; George Stairs, James M. Waterbury, New York ; Chauncey Marshall, New York ; Willard P. Whitlock, Elizabeth.

I presume the Elizabeth is Elizabeth, N.J. Thus we have in the directorate seven gentlemen, three of them admittedly American capitalists, two of them members of this House and the Quebec Legislature, and another a collateral relative of the president of the company. The advertisement goes on to say :

The directors who are now the owners of the entire capital stock have decided at the request of numerous friends of the company throughout Canada, to enlarge the proprietorship of its stock, and to offer for sale at par 10,000 shares of $100 each, fully paid and non-assessable.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that this infant industry with $3,000,000 of capital is not in that weak condition the Government suggest, but the stock is so valuable that numerous friends of the company throughout Canada are exceedingly anxious to get in on the ground floor and become joint proprietors ; and their pressure to secure some of the good things has been so great that those seven philanthropists have at last determined to make such sacrifice and to increase their capital by another million dollars, and thus further prop up this infant industry. It goes on to say as to whether this enterprise may or may not be profitable :

As the dividends of the company are payable quarterly, beginning with the first day of March next, allottees of stock will be entitled to receive a proportion of the quarterly dividend as declared, corresponding to the amount paid upon their subscription.

It would seem from this, inasmuch as they are sure they are going to be able to pay their quarterly dividends, that the infant industry is scarcely in that state which would entitle it to tax the farmers just now to contribute these dividends, because I extremely doubt if the farmers are able to rely upon quarterly dividends to themselves from their own special industry. I again quote from the advertisement :

The Consumers Cordage Company was organized in June, 1890, with a capital of $1,000,000, to operate several of the largest cordage and binder twine factories in Canada. It at first operated these under leases, but its operations having been successful, the capital stock was subsequently increased to $3,000,000, and the leased properties were purchased.

It might also have gone on to say that it was organized to take advantage of the National Policy and to buy up all the cordage factories of Canada, so as to get the farmers of Canada at their own mercy, and through the beautiful agency of the National Policy to extract from the pockets of the farmers and put into the pockets of this American combine a large sum of money. However, it does not give us the details of the operation, but it simply says that this company was organized in June, 1890, not three years ago, remember, for the purpose of operating several of the largest cordage factories in Canada. It goes on to tell us some of its history, and it states that :

It at first operated these under leases, but its operations having been successful, the capital stock was subsequently increased to $3,000,000, and the leased properties were purchased.

In June, 1890, this company only managed to lease the properties throughout Canada, but its operations were so successful that it purchased them out and in fee simple and now owns them. It was so successful in the course of less than three years that it increased its capital to $3,000,000, and yet it is held out as an infant industry. But somebody may say : It has accomplished all these things, but yet it is loaded down with encumbrances. That is not so. Lest there should be any doubt on that point, the advertisement proceeds to say :

The company has no mortgage indebtedness.

Here is an infant industry with $3,000,000 capital, owning every cordage mill in Canada, and yet propped up by the Government as an infant industry and still maintained in a position to exact tribute for its own advantage from every farmer in Canada. In order that no person may have any doubt about the accuracy of these statements, auditors have investigated the matter and lawyers have given their opinions, and I read further on in the advertisement the following document :—

MONTREAL, January 5, 1893.

Consumers Cordage Co., Ltd., Montreal.

GENTLEMEN,—We have examined the books and documents connected with the organization of the Consumers Cordage Company, Limited, and are of opinion that it has been properly incorporated, and that its capital stock of $3,000,000, as issued, is fully paid up and non-assessable, according to the provisions of the "Companies Act."

We are, yours truly,
(Signed) ABBOTTS, CAMPBELL & MEREDITH.

There we have it beyond all controversy that this company has $3,000,000 of paid-up capital. We have it on its own statement that it has not a mortgage against any of its property. It has purchased every cordage mill in Canada, and yet it is claiming to be a ward of the Government and demanding that the Government shall still allow it to roam through the land and tax the people of Canada. The advertisement proceeds :

The Consumers Cordage Company is probably the second largest manufacturer of cordage and binder twine in the world, and claims the following very material advantages over its competitors.

If the second largest manufactory in the world is not able to stand alone when it occupies that position, let me ask when will it be able to stand alone ? We are told that the National Policy is in force in order to maintain weaklings, and that, only for it, the weaklings would be crushed out by their more powerful rivals or competitors. Do you call this a weakling that proclaims to the world that it is the second largest manufacturer of the kind, not in Canada, but in the whole world ? Which is the largest ? Probably the parent institution—the National Cordage Company of the United States. I ask again : If the second largest manufacturing industry in the world is not able to stand alone in Canada under the National Policy, how long is it to continue to be entitled to draw upon the resources of the farmers of Canada in order to give it stability ? It proclaims the following advantages over competitors :

1st. Ample capital to conduct its business which enables it :—

(a.) To buy its raw material in larger quantities, and at lower prices.

(b.) To use only the latest and most improved machinery, thus keeping its mills in the highest state of efficiency.

2nd. Economy in selling and distributing its manufactured product.

3rd. The business covers so wide a territory (its manufactured goods go to almost every civilized country in the world) that it cannot be seriously injured by local troubles ; and its manufacturing establishments are so scattered that the danger of severe loss by fire is very slight.

Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House to the statement made in the paragraph which I have just read. It is here stated that its business covers so wide a territory that its manufactured goods go to almost every civilized country in the world. I ask why is it necessary to tax the farmers of Canada to maintain this twine combine, when it is obliged, as it necessarily must, to sell its stuff in the free trade markets of the world at lower prices than are exacted from the people of Canada ? How could it compete in the free trade markets of the world except at the expense of the Canadian farmer, and how comes it to be necessary, as a matter of maintenance and legitimate business, that it should have the right to exact an extra profit from the Canadian farmer? The paper goes on to say that another advantage is:

4th. Lower cost of production.

(a.) By maintaining the sharpest competition between its several mills, it is enabled to introduce in all the best methods found in each.

(b.) By spreading its commercial expenses over a larger output.

(c.) By placing in one hand the purchasing of the raw materials and manufacturing supplies for the several mills, thus securing lowest prices.

(d.) By manufacturing for themselves many of their supplies.

One would think that all these advantages which it claims for itself were quite sufficient to take it out of the category of infant industries, and to entitle the best friends of Canada to say to it: The time has arrive when you must cease to prey upon the public.

The company does not claim to have any monopoly or to earn monopoly profits.

It would be a most unwise thing for the company to make any such claim in the press, but it goes on to say:

Since its organization it has been able, owing to the advantages above referred to, to earn a net return on its present capital of not less than 10 per cent per annum (as statements in their bankers' hands will show), and the directors believe that these profits will be maintained in the future, as the cost of production and distribution shows each year a marked decrease.

This company says that it has been able up to the present time to earn a net profit of at least 10 per cent per annum, and it believes that it will be able to maintain that profit for the future. If we are going to put industry by industry I would like to ask how comes it that this great industry is able to earn such a profit, and out of whom does it earn that profit? Its industry is selling twine and rope. The twine goes into the hands of the agriculturists of Canada. Have the farmers of Canada made at least 10 per cent per annum? On what principle of justice do the Government insist on transferring from the pockets of the farmers of Canada to the coffers of a $3,000,000 infant industry this enormous sum of money, enriching a single corporation which has its ramifications extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and is levying taxes every year upon the farmers of Canada?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Blackmail.

Mr. MULOCK. Blackmail! It is legalized robbery, nothing else, and it is sanctioned by the Administration now sitting opposite to us. Two years ago hon. gentlemen promised that they would allow no such wrong as this to exist, yet for two years at least they have allowed this iniquitous system to remain. I say, and I say with regret, that it is a scandal to Canada that an institution like this should have the privilege, under the aegis of the Government of Canada, of taxing four-fifths of the people of Canada for its own enrichment; this institution, himself an estimable man, is in this House abusing the privileges of Parliament by managing, through the machinery of and I especially regret that the president of the Government he supports, to turn indirectly into his own pocket that share of the profits of this company which he, as one of its proprietors, has been able up to this moment to win. How long is this condition of affairs to last? I pointed out in this House two years ago, and nobody dared to contradict me, or has dared to contradict me up to this time, that the effect of this tariff was to levy upon the farmers of the county, a portion of which I represent, a charge of $10,500 in the single year 1889, in respect of the crop they gathered and bound that year. The price of the twine they used exceeded the legitimate price of that year by the amount of the duty, 25 per cent, or between 2 and 3 cents a pound; and, according to the computations I laid before the House, the farmers of my county contributed, in that year, to this illegitimate institution, $10,500, which they would not have had to pay if there had been free competition in the supply of this raw material to them. I ask, where is this thing to stop? The farmers of my county cannot afford to bear this burden. They toil hard and long for everything they earn; they find it hard enough to make ends meet, and some of them, I am sorry to say, are not able to reach even that point. On what principle, then, are we to take from him who has none and give to those who have much? There may have been some authority for that of old, but I do not want that authority extended to the practical affairs of to-day. We were told last year that it was a trifling tax, that it only amounted to a few cents an acre. I grant that. Suppose it only amounts to two or three dollars a year to each farmer, if you take even two or three dollars a year from each farmer and give it to the Cordage Company of Halifax, where can you fix a limit? If you once concede the principle that you can, by legislation, establish in Canada any institution which is permitted to levy taxes on one class of the people, for the special advantage of that corporation, where is the limit to be fixed? Compared with the other necessities of life, the item of binder twine is but a trifle; and this system unfortunately is not limited to that one item, but is found running through the whole gamut of articles which the farmer has to purchase. Take from him a few dollars illegitimately on his binder twine, a few more dollars on his agricultural implements, a few more on his household supplies, a few more on his iron goods, his cotton goods, and his groceries, and you have an explanation how it is that, by this iniquitous system of petty larceny, the farmers are being ground down under the tyranny of huge corporations. And yet we have the Administration telling the people of Canada, as they did a few weeks ago, and as they told this House three days ago, that this country is entirely prosperous, and that the great National Policy ought to be maintained in its integrity.

Mr. LISTER. Except the mouldering branches.

Mr. MULOCK. Mouldering branches! We have not heard that there were any mouldering branches. We were told that if any were discovered, they would be lopped off; and if any had been discovered, there was an opportunity to mention them in the Speech from the Throne; but they have not told us that there was even a diseased twig. I bring this matter up in advance of the Budget speech, and I tell the hon. Finance Minister that the people of Canada demand at his hands immediate redress. Let him not say, when he brings down his budget, that he has not heard from the country on this subject. No matter what deceiving voices may be heard from the back benches, no matter how any members from farming districts may try to persuade him that this is only a trifle—for the dogs have been known to howl with the wolves—I venture to say that I am voicing the sentiments of the agriculturists of Canada, regardless of party, when I say that they are determined that, come what may, party must go to the winds in defence of their own homes; they are bound to take their stand on this item, and demand a fair consideration of their interests, which means freedom, fair-play and equal rights to all, and nothing more.

Mr. SEMPLE. I desire to say a few words in favour of the motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and to voice the opinions of my constituents, both Liberals and Conservatives. The question before us is whether the interests of thousands of farmers, who have nearly a thousand millions of dollars invested in the country, are to be considered, or whether the Government are to consider alone the interests of a few manufacturers. It will shortly be seen which weighs the heaviest in the scale and which interest is most respected. This is a duty that taxes exclusively the farmers. Binder twine, though the finished product of the manufacturer, is the raw material of the farmer, because he cannot have his grain put in a position for the market until the binder twine is used; and in many sections of the country the cost has been so great that some have refrained from buying the most improved machinery on account of the cost of the twine. And, after all, but a small amount of the tax goes into the treasury. I took the trouble of consulting the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I find that from Great Britain we imported 30,649 lbs., value, $3,548, duty, $887. From China we imported 90 lbs., value, $1, duty, 25 cents, and from the United States, 2,195,793 lbs., value, $167,418, duty, $41,824.25, making in all $42,711. That is only a small amount to go into the treasury, but the tax is nevertheless a very serious tax on the farmers. Every farmer can tell at a glance how much he has to pay; 25 per cent just means to a man who pays $10, that without that tax he could purchase at $8, and that a man who has to pay $20 could purchase, were it not for the duty, at $16, and so on. The calculation is easily made. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that this cordage company sell at the lowest possible prices, that they are very generous and do not extort all they can, but just sell as low as the imported article is sold at. Well, I have been shown binder twine imported from Dundee, which was sold at 10 cents per pound. On that twine there was a duty of 25 per cent, and were it not for that duty the seller would have disposed of it at eight cents just as easily and made as much profit. The manufacturers generally manage to make a scale of their own, so that they will be just able to sell at the same price as the imported article sells at with the duty added. So that, when only $42,000 goes into the treasury, it is very evident, considering the large amount of binder twine used in Ontario, Manitoba and the North-west, a large amount must go into the pockets of the manufacturer. And this is taken from the farmers at a time when, above all others, the Government should seek to lighten, or, at any rate, not increase their burdens. Good farmers have told me that they could not realize more than $6 an acre from fields of wheat after taking it to market. When wheat is at 56 cents, oats at 25 cents, and peas at 50 cents per bushel, any tax unnecessarily imposed is a serious burden. This is not a question of politics. At a meeting of the county council of Wellington, which was held in Guelph recently, a motion was moved by Mr. McGowan that this Government be petitioned to take the duty off binder twine imported from Great Britain. Mr. McGowan is a life-long Conservative, and a farmer of wealth and influence, who formerly occupied a seat in the Local Legislature, and many thought he would be the nominee of the Conservative convention at the last general election. This is only one instance I have given to voice the opinions of the farmers of different shades of politics. All the farmers' organizations, such as the Farmer's Institute, the Grange Association, and the Patrons of Industry, are unanimous in holding that this iniquitous tax should be taken off, and the farmers be given fair-play. We give the Government credit for trying to help the farmers by means of the experimental farm, but, if you put all the good in that institution into one scale, and the amount taken from the farmers by the tax on binding twine in the other, the latter would more than balance the former, and the farmers would be losers, and the sooner the Government comes to the conclusion to act with justice in this particular, the better. This is a good opportunity to lop off one of the rotten branches by taking off the tax that exclusively falls on the farmer.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to enforce with whatever little weight remarks of mine may have, the contention of the hon. gentleman who has put this motion on the Paper, that the tax on binder twine should disappear. The hon. gentleman gave us an account of the cordage company, and the account he gave us puts us in a position which, in my opinion from the stand-point of scientific protection demands at once that a Government founded on protection should sweep away the tax. But the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), I hardly think, knows the history of this company. I think I know even a little more than he does. He read to us an advertisement, and he told us of the National Cordage Company coming over and buying up the mills in Canada, but he did not tell us of that $3,000,000 capital placed there, and supposed to be invested in this company, only $1,500,000 exists. What the National Cordage Company did, was to say to the Canadian companies: Here, let us go into a pool. We will take half interest in your company, and, having taken that half interest, we will allow you the whole Canadian field to yourselves. Now, that is exactly what they have done. And the National Cordage Company of the United States are to-day the masters of the Consumers Company here. We find that Mr. A. W. Morris, M.P.P., Montreal, vice-president, before he could run for the Local House had to go to New York to ask permission, and I do not know what inference we may draw from that as to whether anybody else connected with that company, before he entered the Dominion House, would have to go to New York to ask a similar permission. I say that a priori the bare fact that a combine exists is sufficient reason for the Conservative Government of Canada, that came into power on the cry of protection, to sweep the combine away. When the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper, and some others, and myself went about from platform to platform, of course, compared with the eloquent voices of my late leader and Sir Charles Tupper, and of Mr. Plumb, my voice was quite feeble, but, such as it was, it was the first in that campaign that uttered a word in favour of protection on a public platform. An hon. member says I ought to be ashamed of myself. I am not. I stand here now as strong a protectionist as ever and I speak from a protectionist stand-point. What was one of the arguments that we used in 1877 and 1878? We told the people that, instead of combines coming into existence, we would enlarge the sphere of competition, that we would put on a tariff which would be a just and fair protection but not an exclusive wall, and that we would have protection within the bounds of Canada and also competition in Canada, as we find that, even with the tariff of 25 per cent, you have still, as an hon. gentleman has stated, a feeble competition coming from Dundee, and from China, and a little, if it can be called compe-

tion, coming from below the line. What we said was that we did not intend to place a tariff which would be altogether a wall to exclude the goods from outside, but that what we wanted was to give a protection to enable young industries to come into existence and to foster them in their infancy. I think, if you look at the speeches of the right hon. gentleman who once led this House and the Conservative party with such distinction, you will find that he used the metaphor of rearing a child as long as it requires fostering care until it comes to adolescence, and then giving it less and less care until it comes to maturity, and when it comes to maturity allowing it to stand alone. I happen to have had the great honour of meeting in London, when I was a very young man, the late John Stuart Mill. As you know, he was an apostle of free trade, but he has stated in my presence, as I think he has stated in the eleventh edition of his Political Economy, that for a young country it was right to resort to protection; but he said, as he was opposed to exclusion, that the true way to inaugurate protection was by bonus, because, he said, the moment you protect by tariff there is great danger of large interests being created and intrenching themselves in such a way as to prevent a country from getting rid of them. We have the history of the United States before us, and we have also our knowledge of human nature, and we are aware that if we give anything to a man or a class he or they will get more if they can. That has been the result in the United States, and, instead of their system being a scientific protection, they have adopted a tariff which is unconsciously and unreasonably high, and which, instead of being protection, is frequently exclusion. Take this Consumers Company. In 1877 and 1878 we said: We will bring industries into existence here and there; you will have your tall chimneys rising up and vomiting their smoke to the sky. That is what I said in Haldimand, and it has been quoted over and over again by the Toronto "Globe." What we prophesied has been in the main fulfilled. I say the National Policy has justified itself, and it is because it has justified itself that I do not want the National Policy to stultify itself now. I do not want now, when gentlemen who have got rich and prosperous under the protection we gave them, have broken their implicit contract with Canada and have sold themselves and Canada to the foreigner, to come here and say: We have still the right to the shield and the shade you gave us in 1877 and 1878. I shrink from characterizing those gentlemen as I might. Like Scrub in the comedy, who commenced by denouncing the burglars as thieves and robbers, but under the influence of fear finished by referring to them as the honest gentlemen who were robbing the house; so, under the influence of politeness, I can only refer to these gentlemen of the cordage company as the honest and attractive gentlemen, as they are, who have been unconsciously led into a position of treason to Canada. The position they occupy is just as bad as that with which Charles II. has been branded by historians of being pensioners on a foreign power. Charles II. became a pensioner of Louis XIV. These gentlemen who had been crowned with wealth by the Government of Canada, have been false to their agreement, and have sold themselves to the foreigner.

Mr. LISTER. No Cassius about that.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not quite catch what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. LISTER. I said there was no Cassius about that.

An hon. MEMBER. Nothing lean and hungry.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman should know that I have been somewhat select in my society, and he should use the language of the class to which I belong. Mr. Speaker, I was about to point out to you that one of the things we promised in 1877-78, as any man can prove by going back to our picnic assemblies, was that in one part and another of the country, industries would crop up as a result of the National Policy. What do these gentlemen do? They crush down industry after industry all over this country. There was an industry at Lachute, to mention only one. "Ex uno disce omnes." There was a mill there in which some $15,000 was invested, and which employed sixty workingmen. Now, one of the things we promised the people of Canada as a result of the National Policy, was that we should have mills here and there, and the workman would afford a market for the farmer. Well, Sir, the National Cordage Company and the Consumers' Cordage Company shut up the mill at Lachute, and they gave the gentlemen who were interested in that mill $6,000 a year. For what? For dismissing these sixty men and taking the bread out of the mouths of their families. And, mind, Mr. Speaker, I can prove to you that they did not buy the mill. No hon. gentleman can get up here and say to me: Oh, well, a mill is a marketable commodity, and these men probably sold their mill, and men cannot always know to whom they sell. Now, that was not the case at all. On the contrary, their object was to shut down the manufacture of binder twine at Lachute. After they had agreed to pay the gentlemen who owned that mill $6,000 a year, some persons connected with the Consumers' Cordage Company thought they owned the mill, and they removed part of the machinery to Montreal for some purpose; but the men to whom they are paying the $6,000 made them take that back, and they took the machinery back, showing that this $6,000 was a rental for not working. And the same thing happened at Quebec, and is happening all over the country. Now, let me point out to the Minister of Finance—because I thought I convinced him last year on this subject—in fact I think I helped him to win two elections by false pretenses—

Mr. MULOCK. But you voted against us last year on this question.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, my hon. friend says I voted against him. I may vote with him now, but it will go against my grain, because, when he makes a proposal, he makes it in such a rough, aggressive and unwinning manner that it is a very difficult thing to vote with him. But I thought I had convinced my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, last year, in a private conversation I had with him, that it was necessary to take off the duty on this binder twine. He asked me: How can it help to take off the duty when it is the same company? I said to him just what I say here: first, my argument is that a priori, a combine has no right to protection. As a protectionist you have no right to give a combine protection. I said to him further: In the United States, with a market of 65,000,000, they are selling binder twine cheaper than they are in Canada. I took one large square and put a small square in the corner of it, and I showed him that as the size of the remainder of the large square exceeded the small square, and the wealth of what remained of the large square exceeded the wealth of the small square, so was the probability that if they raised the price of binder twine in the United States to anything like an exorbitant or irrational price, competition would come into existence to the probability of the same competition arising in Canada. Throw down the protection and the probability of competition is increased throughout the entire square. I thought that argument weighed with the Finance Minister. He did not say that he would do it, but I thought he would, and the consequence was that I went up to South Perth and I went into Northumberland and told the farmers, first, I disapproved altogether of this tax on binder twine, and in the next place, I said my own opinion is that you will find that the Government will take off the tax. Although they did not do it then, I hope they will do it next year; and in fact, although I have had no conversation whatever with any member of the Government on the subject, I am pretty well convinced that the tax will come off this year. Now, I want to speak for the North-west and Manitoba. We have had a good crop this year all over the country; in some parts we have had as large a crop as in 1891. And what has been the price of wheat? 43 and 46 cents a bushel; and yet in regard to this one item, a great company like this Consumers' Cordage Company are so protected that they can take a considerable sum above what they ought to take out of every large farmer's pocket in the North-west and in Manitoba. Why, Sir, our farmers are a struggling, and energetic, and on the whole, a prosperous race of men, but this year I may tell you that they feel the pressure of high prices for what they buy and low prices for what they sell. Hon. gentlemen around me and opposite me who are farmers, know what it must be for the farmers up there when they are only getting 43 and 46 cents a bushel for wheat. In regard to this and to many other things in which the farmer of the North-west is deeply interested what was once a protective tariff has become an oppressive tariff, and I say that from the point of view of scientific protection, these things will have to be lowered or swept away. This protection to the Consumers' Cordage Company must go, for this company deserves no mercy whatever. To begin with, the stock is watered. In order to see what the farmer has to pay, you have to take into account what the excessive protection enables the seller in Canada to charge; and you have to take into account the fact that he pays interest on $1,500,000 of stock watered to the foreigner. I will go further. I have been informed by a person who can speak by the book in regard to this company, that literally this National Cordage Company has not put a cent into the concern. All they did was to come over here and get hold of the Consumers' Company and tell them what they would do if they did not take such and such a course. But they said: We want our share of the dividend on a million and a half. That is what I have been told by a person who can speak by the book, and if it should be thought necessary to give us a committee on this or any other combine, or on combines collectively, I will put that gentleman into the witness box, because he is one of the first men in Canada in commerce, and I have no doubt that he will prove what he alleged to me. Anyway, in the interest of protection, in the interest of consistency on the part of a protective Government, in the interest of the constituency I represent, and the farmers of the North-west and Manitoba, and in the interest of the country at large, I hope that my hon. friends who sit on the Treasury benches will remove this onerous, and oppressive, and unjust impost.

Mr. McMILLAN. I was much pleased to hear the statement of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) on this subject, and also to hear from him that one of the reasons why he won two elections was because he promised the farmers of his constituency that the duty on binding twine would be removed. I was in North Perth with the hon. gentleman, but he neglected to make the statement there, and therefore the Government lost the election. This is one of the most oppressive taxes levied on the farmer, and this fact must have forced itself on the attention of the Government because last year they determined to establish a factory at Kingston Penitentiary for the manufacture of binding twine. I should like to ask the Government whether the vote taken last year is going to result in twine being manufactured there in time for next harvest. I hope the Government will not continue this protection of binding twine and compel the farmers to pay duty to the manufacturer. I repeat that this is one of the most grievous taxes that the farmer is called upon to bear. The returns show that Ontario imported 512,702 lbs. of binding twine. That was the whole quantity that came into the province; but from an advanced report of the Bureau of Industries I find that during last harvest there were 4,053,749 acres of fall and spring wheat, barley, oats and rye to be tied in that province. Taking two and a half pounds of twine per acre, there were required 10,134,372 lbs. The duty is 25 per cent, and admitting that the price of twine coming into the country was only 8 cents a pound, a rate which the Trade and Navigation Returns will bear me out as being correct, out of the duty on twine required in Ontario of $202,687, only the sum of $7,932 went into the public treasury, while $194,755 went into the pockets of the combine, or, in other words, only $1 went into the treasury for every $22 that passed into the pockets of the combine manufacturing twine in Canada. I desire to state to this House what effect this duty has on the people of the county I represent. In Huron there are 175,472 acres that required binding twine during last harvest. Take the rate of two and a half pounds per acre, there would be required 433,680 lbs., which at two cents per pound duty would give a tax of $8,673 as the sum which the farmers paid, while only $395, went into the Treasury. The time has certainly arrived when this grievous duty should be removed, and I had hoped that when the Government in their wisdom found that it was in the interests of the farmers of the Dominion and of the whole people to establish a factory at Kingston and to take a vote to that purpose last year, they would consider that as the first step in the direction of removing the binding twine duty. This duty imposes on each farmer in Ontario a tax of $2 for every forty acres of grain. It may be said that this is a small amount for each farmer to pay, but when we take that tax and the other taxes, such a large amount is taken out of their pockets that he has been reduced to a worse condition than he has occupied during the forty-nine years I have been in this country. I will not now enter fully into this question, but when the Budget is brought down, I shall be able to show that the reported increased exports, which to a large extent represent farm products, have been really the means of impoverishing the farmers, because if it cost more to raise the products exported than they realize, certainly they cannot prove profitable to the farmers and the country cannot be in a prosperous condition. I hope, therefore, the Government will take this question into their consideration, and as they took the first step last year, they will grant that relief which the farmers seek from the Government during the present session. I consider this is not a mouldering branch, but one rotten to the core, and it should therefore be lopped off without hesitation.

Mr. McMULLEN. It has been the duty of the Opposition to bring forward the question of this duty on binding twine for several sessions, and we have frequently drawn the attention of the Government and of the House to the injustice done the farmers of the Dominion by the imposition of this heavy duty. I think the evidence submitted to the House by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) clearly and distinctly proves that a gross injustice is done the farmers by continuing this tariff, and if there is one item of the National Policy which should be dispensed with, it is the duty on binding twine. I earnestly hope the representatives from the Maritime Provinces will not vote to-day for the continuation of this unjust duty. Halifax appears to be the principal point in Nova Scotia at which binding twine is produced. We know perfectly well there is not 5 per cent of the entire binding twine manufactured in the Dominion used in that province, in fact there is not 5 per cent of the quantity used in the Dominion consumed east of Montreal. The hon. gentleman who is most largely interested in the financial well-being, prosperity and future of that binding twine combination, and who has a seat in this House, knows perfectly well that his own province is not subjected seriously to the tax imposed upon binding twine, simply because the people there do not use it. The two provinces that suffer most from this unjust tax are Ontario and Manitoba. I was exceedingly pleased to hear the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) pronounce so distinctly and clearly his personal objections to the continuation of this tax. I look upon it as indicating the dawn of a better day for the people of this country when we find an hon. member of such pronounced Conservative views as the hon. member for West Assiniboia deeming it necessary in his own interests and in the interests of his constituents to cut himself loose from his party on this important question. He claims he is the father of the National Policy of protection. I was not aware of the fact before, although I have sat in this House during ten sessions.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not profess to be the father of that or anything else.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was not charging my hon. friend with being the father of that or anything else, for I never thought he was. As he claimed to be the father of the National Policy, I gave him credit for being its father, but if he thought that I attempted to insinuate that he was the father of anything else, I withdraw the insinuation. I believe that it was an evidence of a better day for this Dominion when we found a man of such pronounced views willing to stand up and boldly denounce the extortionate combine that has been formed in the matter of binder twine. I believe that there are other things in connection with the National Policy that are just as bad as this tax, and I dare say that when the hon. First Minister made the announcement before the Board of Trade in the city of Toronto, that he intended to lop off the mouldering branches, will find when he comes to examine the tree that the branches are not only mouldering, but that actually the entire tree is rotten from root to top. The proper way, therefore, to get rid of the whole trouble is to dig the tree up by the roots. Let me point out an important consideration in connection with this question, viz., that in the Maritime Provinces binding twine is hardly used at all, and that the provinces which suffer most severely from the result of this imposition are Ontario and Manitoba. What hope have we that relief will be granted to the farmers of these two provinces when we look at the composition of the present Cabinet. The First Minister comes from Nova Scotia, and no serious loss from this tax results to the farmers of that province. The Minister of Finance, under whose department this question comes more directly than that of any other member of the Cabinet, also comes from the Maritime Provinces. The Postmaster-General comes from the province of Quebec, and there is very little binder twine used there. We find that all the prominent and influential members of the Cabinet represent provinces which are not directly interested in the question of lowering this duty. To whose tender mercy and personal care is the interest of the farmers of Ontario committed in this matter? It is committed to the Controller of Inland Revenue and the Controller of Customs. These two gentlemen are not inside Cabinet members, but are supposed to remain on the outside. The hon. Controller of Customs, to whom more particularly, I presume, the people of Ontario should look for relief, occupies such a position that, while the Cabinet is deliberating on the question of removing the binder twine duty, he is allowed only to mount his goat and ride along the corridors of the Privy Council Chamber and wait for the decision. He is the man above all others whom the farmers of Ontario must expect to attend to their interests. The other Ontario member of the Cabinet who is supposed to exercise an influence is the hon. Minister of Railways, but his ideas and his actions are largely wrapped up in the Intercolonial Railway. He does not go west; we see very little of him west, and I do not know that he is very much wanted or that he has been much sought after. His interest brings him east, and there is no regret I believe in that fact. I may say that the province of Ontario stands very much in need of a master hand, of an eloquent and clever man of good influence amongst his confreres, and of a patriotic Canadian who will stand up before the Cabinet both in Council and out of Council to advocate the interest of that great province in the matter of binding twine and coal oil duty and all these other things. While the people of the province of Ontario are suffering from those severe and unjust duties on binding twine, the people of the Maritime Provinces, as I have said, are not feeling the serious drain upon their resources, because they do not use very much binder twine. Let us make a comparison. The great fishing industry of the Maritime Provinces has been considered in this matter, and twine for fishing tackle and for making and mending nets is allowed to be brought in free of duty. This is done to encourage the fishing industry of the Maritime Provinces. I appeal to every member of this House. I ask every honest man who will be called upon to record his vote upon this question to-day: is it not as honest and as just, that the farmers of Ontario and Manitoba who are obliged to use a very large quantity of twine as a raw material in their industry: is it not as just, I ask, that they should be relieved from the vexatious tax of 25 per cent on twine to encourage their industry as that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces should be relieved? If one is just is not the other just? Where is the principle of justice in allowing the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces to import their twine free of duty for fishing purposes, and at the same time in placing a tax of 25 per cent on the farmers of Ontario when they use twine in their industry? It is a gross injustice that such a law should be kept in force. If it should come to pass that we imposed a duty on twine brought in for fishing purposes, we would then see the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces standing up man for man and demanding that that duty should be taken off in the interest of their business; and if we had united the two influences, that of the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces and that of the farmers of the west, we should very soon find that the farmers of the west would get that relief which they are now claiming. I was surprised at the statement made by the Minister of Finance the other night when he declared that the farmers of this country were in a prosperous condition. That statement is not founded upon facts. I quite endorse the statement made just now by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) that the farmers are not in such a condition as described. I am personally acquainted with a very large circle of the farmers in the section of the country from which I come. I know their struggling efforts; I know their pinched condition financially; I know that they are suffering, and I declare that there has not been a period in the history of this Dominion when the farmers of western Ontario suffered so much, and are so pinched by low prices and hard times and mortgaged farms as at the present day. That has been largely brought about by the operation of the National Policy, which has been imposed upon them year after year. They have to pay heavy prices for these things that they have to buy and consume, and these high prices have prevented them, to some extent at least, from paying off the mortgages that they were obliged to contract in years gone by. My hon. friend opposite pointed to the condition of the farmers of the United States, and I am sorry to say that it is true, that in some cases the farmers of the United States are in a very deplorable condition. But why is that? It is because they have been ground down under the heel of monopoly, brought about by twenty-five years of protection and high tariff. We have had the same system in Canada for fifteen years, and if the farmers of this country are subjected to it for ten years more their condition will be worse than that of the farmers of the United States. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance what relief he is going to extend to the farmers of this country to enable them to dispose of the surplus stock of horses for which there is now no market? The market opened to us for horses is shut out by the McKinley Bill; the price of horses is seriously depreciated; they are not bringing within thirty per cent of the prices they brought a few years ago, and I would like to ask the Government what relief is going to be afforded to the farmers in this respect. I would suggest that the Government should grant a bounty for the export of horses, to try if we cannot relieve the farmers and enable them to get rid of the enormous stock of animals now in Canada. I dare say there are some hon. gentlemen on the other side of this House who uphold the proposition to grant a bounty on the export of horses. I would like to know if it is not a matter of as vital interest to the well-being and prosperity of this country that the farmers should be helped out of their difficulties and made more prosperous, as that we should develop our iron mines alone. We are paying every year to the producers of pig iron a bounty of $4 a ton. If it is thought wise and prudent to develop the production of pig iron by a bounty, I would ask would it not be equally desirable to relieve the farmers of this country from the embarrassed condition they are now in, by granting a bounty on the exportation of horses? I say it would be a wise and good thing; but I believe, from my past experience in this House, that it will take us on this side a very long time to induce hon. gentlemen opposite to meet the views of the people of this country. As long as they can fool and humbug the people, as they have done in the past, they will maintain the present condition of affairs. Every time they have appealed to the people, they have fooled and humbugged them. What was the case at the last election? They said to the people: Gentlemen, we want your mandate to authorize us to go to Washington to make a treaty; we have been invited to go to Washington on the 4th of March; we do not want to go there as the representatives of a Parliament in its dying hours; we want you to authorize us to go there to get such a treaty as you desire. The people of this country very foolishly took them at their word and voted in favour of giving them that mandate. What was the result? They said they could not get a treaty. The Minister of Finance came back and reported that unless we abnegated every independent right, unless we cut ourselves off from Great Britain and threw ourselves into the lap of the United States, we could get no treaty. Well, Sir, the hon. First Minister, at the meeting he addressed in Toronto a short time ago, stated that they were offered a treaty on the very lines on which they said they could not get one. He said they could have got it, if they had been willing to take it, but they would not take it. That is the position they occupy to-day. I remember the First Minister leaving this city to go to Washington in order to give birth to this expected bantling of reciprocity. Why, Sir, the whole front of the Conservative party was swollen, pregnant with the desire to get a reciprocity treaty, and the First Minister took Sir Charles Tupper with him to act, I presume, as his attendant physician, at the expected accouchement, and he also took with him the Finance Minister to discharge the duties of midwife on that particular occasion. They went to Washington, but the people were disappointed; they were amazed to find that the whole thing passed off in a hurricane of wind on the political stump. There was nothing accomplished. Everything was done for the purpose of deceiving the people of this country, and the whole thing collapsed. It had no existence in any shape or form: it was not even still-born: it had neither bone nor flesh; there was nothing in it; and they came back and said to us: We could not get a reciprocity treaty. They misled the people of this country, for they had told them that they could get a treaty and were going to get it. Well, I wonder if the farmers of this country are going to permit themselves to be fooled and humbugged another time. I do not know whether the Government intend next time to go to the country on the same line of humbug. It looks like it. They may go on the promise that they are going to lop off the mouldering branches, but they have not told us what these mouldering branches are. I say it is time that we should show some anxiety to secure to the people of this Dominion the best things we can get. We should come together, and unite in a struggle to relieve the people from the shackles and the restrictions which bind them, to set them free, and give them every opportunity to make the best of their earnings—to buy in the cheapest market what they have to buy, and to sell what they have to sell in the dearest market. The Finance Minister tells us that the farmers of Canada have increased their shipments to Great Britain during the last year. Why is it? Simply because the ports of a more desirable market are closed against them, and they are driven to the necessity of sending their products to Great Britain, which is known as the slaughter market of creation, the market in which in a great many cases you have to take the lowest price. It is time that we stop fighting in the interests of party alone. Let us lay party aside and look after the interests of the masses of the people of this country. Let us wipe out the duty on corn; let us wipe out the duty on binding twine so that the farmer can get it free as well as the fisherman; let us wipe out the duties on iron and on other articles. Everybody who sat in this House in 1887, heard Sir Charles Tupper depicting the advantages which this country would derive from the duties on iron. We were to have blast furnaces studding the whole country—at Kingston, at Fuller's Bay, at Toronto, at Hamilton, at Galt, at Fort William—a row of blast furnaces right across the country from Prince Edward Island to Vancouver. Yet there has not to this day been a single ton more of pig iron produced in Canada than there was before the duty was imposed. I ask, what is the use of imposing on the farmers of this country a tax of from $300,000 to $400,000 a year for the purpose of encouraging the production of pig iron, when for five years it has been a signal failure? There have been no blast furnaces built, or mines opened, as the result of that duty. That picture was just about on a par with many other pictures which we have had painted in this House for the purpose of leading men to support many things that turned out to be bogus afterwards. It is on a par with the picture we had painted to this House by Sir Charles Tupper with regard to the output of wheat in the North-west. He went into a calculation, and he calculated that if 640,000 farmers went in, as he thought they would in ten years, and if each man cultivated a hundred acres, and if each acre produced so many bushels, our receipts from lands in the North-west alone would more than pay, by the year 1891, every dollar spent in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. 640,000,000 bushels of wheat were to be produced in that country. Well, Sir Charles Tupper is away beyond the sound of my voice, and enjoying in the city of London all the gaities and the grandeur and the comforts of a lordly life at the expense of the people of this country, whose representatives he fooled and humbugged and mislead on the floor of this House for ten years. That is his reward. He is kept there virtually doing nothing at the expense of the people of this country. He is not here to listen to the wail of the people under the burdens imposed upon them chiefly by means of his false pretenses and deceptive pictures. After twenty years of Confederation, we find ourselves with a burden of debt unequalled by any portion of Her Majesty's empire, and unequalled by the people south of us, although they had to wage an internal war which cost them hundreds of millions. To-day we have a per capita debt quadruple of what they have across the border, and here we are struggling and agonizing under the burdens of indebtedness on which we are paying each year very nearly ten millions of dollars into the London money lenders' pockcts, one dollar of which never comes back to us except in the shape of a fresh loan. This is the result of fifteen years of extravagance. It is time we should begin to make a change. I should like to see the First Minister rise and announce to the House that the duty on binder twine is a mouldering branch which he intends to lop off. I am satisfied he may possibly call his supporters into line when this motion comes before the House in order to sustain the Government, but I believe the convictions of the people are so strong and pronounced that he will be compelled, before this Parliament rises, to give way and announce to the country that he will withdraw the duty on binder twine. In every farmers' institute, in every meeting of the patrons of industry, the people have declared most unanimously that the duty should be taken off this article. The Government cannot afford to close their ears to these utterances and appeals, and I venture to predict that if the Government persist in their present course, the measure of retribution will be meted out to them, when the proper time comes, which they justly deserve. That retribution may be a little delayed, but I have not the slightest doubt it will come like a torrent, as it did in the United States, and the political tornado which will pass over this country will sweep from their present position the men who persist in drawing from the resources of the people increased taxes and subjecting them to continued extortions. I felt it my duty to offer these few remarks to the House on this question, and I hope this is the last occasion in this Parliament when we will require to bring forward a motion to abolish the duty on binder twine. I hope that this discussion will make such an impression upon the Government that they will unanimously agree that binder twine is one of those things which should be placed on the free list, and thus give the farmers some instalment of the relief they are justly entitled to.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House comes to a vote upon this question, it is only right that I should say a word or two with reference to the subject under discussion. I may say, in the first place, that the Government is thankful for any fair discussion of a question pertinent to tariff matters as to other matters relating to the administration of affairs, and thankful for any information in the course of that discussion which the House may have at its command. The Government depends upon the information which it possesses, and which it acquires, and upon that information it draws its conclusions and bases its action. There may be many motives which have made themselves plain during the debate. Hon. gentlemen may have discussed this matter simply from the stand-point of a public good, and as discussing it from that stand-point, have laid aside partisan references or advantage and gone into a study of the question upon its merits, showing how and why this duty upon binder twine is particularly oppressive, and in what way matters would be made better if that duty were reduced or removed. That would be a line of argument which would be followed, I am sure, by gentlemen who undertook the discussion solely from the stand-point of public good. It may be also, that the discussion may have advanced somewhat upon the line of a desire to hit an individual or a party. That may have been a motive in some of the speeches which we have heard. I suppose hon. gentlemen have a perfect right—I am not finding fault with them—to take advantage, in this respect, of any line of discussion which is opened. Others have drawn the attention of the House chiefly to the manner in which the industry has been carried on, and have directed their animadversions in this respect to the combines and their effect upon the country, and given their view of the treatment which should be meted out to them by this Parliament or the Government in introducing its measures. I have, for my part, listened very carefully to the arguments and information, and hits as well, which have been made by the hon. gentlemen who took part in this debate, and I want to say, in the first place, speaking to hon. gentlemen who are in Opposition, that the Government does not take, in any respect, a backward position as regards their care and solicitude for the public good. Neither have they lost sight, nor do they intend to lose sight, of any subject of particular interest. It is one of their first duties to keep themselves in touch with the trend of events, with the circumstances and conditions of the country as a whole, and the particular interests of the country, and it is their duty, as it is their care and solicitude, to do everything, after having gathered such information as they may get, which shall tend towards the public good, and, so far as possible, in conjunction with that, towards the good and advantage of the particular interests which may, from time to time, be considered. Now, I am not at this time going to enter into a discussion of this question on its merits. Within a very few weeks the Government will be prepared to put before this House the exposition of their tariff and their commercial policy. They are considering it. They are not losing sight of this interest or of any other interests. Whatever may be done will be done and ought to be done on the broadest information and after the most careful consideration, and when the Government states its policy it will do so with confidence that it will be approved by the reasonable minds in this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). A new policy.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend says "a new policy." If it be so, it will be something which hon. gentlemen opposite have not been able to find for some years. They taunt us with sticking to the "old flag" and the "old policy." They have an old policy—and a mighty bad one it is—and with it only a foreign flag. At the present time I am sure it is not supposed that I should announce, as Finance Minister, what will be the Government's treatment of this matter. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), with that confidence in his own powers of persuasion which he rightly possesses, though he did not get a positive answer from me, thought he had converted me. Well, time is young yet, and in the course of time my hon. friend's prognostications may be found to be correct, or partially correct. There is something in standing up and saying we must let every industry stand on its own footing. One may state that and still may be arguing for something which will not allow an industry to stand on its own footing at all. We have to take into consideration the circumstances of countries with which we trade, and the tariffs that affect us as well, and see whether an industry which is heavily borne upon and has not a broad opening into all the markets of the world is standing on a fair footing and getting fair-play if we put it in a position of disadvantage. A position of fair advantage is what I consider properly allowing an industry to stand alone; but it is not fair if you take away all the ramparts and bulwarks from one army and ask them to fight against an army intrenched behind bulwarks and ramparts and well munitioned. I throw that out not so much in regard to this question but in reference to the general state of mind we must entertain in dealing with the position of our own industries. One other point. A member of our own party may get up and say: I am a strong protectionist, and believe in the policy and principle of protection, and yet I think in some particular details that policy and principle which is good may be amended. And here, and now, it may be well to state, not for those who possess information as to the progress of events in this House, but for others, that, whenever you hear a gentleman on the opposite side state that the Tory or Conservative party have declared that protection and their system of tariffs was a perfect one and needed no amendment, and that, as it came forth from its birth in 1879, it is what they have sworn to live and die by, he is misstating the proposition; he is making a proposition which hon. gentlemen on that side of the House have demolished time and time again, because, whenever changes have been proposed in the tariff—and they have often been proposed since 1879—they have taunted us with tinkering with the tariff. You may have an absolutely correct principle, but you may be called upon to vary the details from time to time as circumstances change. So much for the general question. Perhaps, now, after my hon. friend has argued this matter and has put his views before the country, he may be willing to postpone the vote until the Government has announced its intentions and its policy, which it will announce in a very little time. If not and if hon. gentlemen choose to do what is perfectly within their right to do, and to bring the matter to a vote, I have only to ask our own friends to wait until that time arrives before giving a decision on the question.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is very unfortunate, perhaps, that a subject of this kind cannot be fairly discussed without bringing in issues which do not properly belong to it. We cannot discuss this question of binder twine without bringing in the general principles of the National Policy. Now, I think that the principles of the National Policy were fully and fairly laid down by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). That hon. gentleman, I think, expressed them in terms with which I am, at any rate, in perfect accord. With regard to this particular subject I think he was right in saying that the moment any industry of this country which we have fostered by the National Policy, becomes the subject of combination, from that moment it ceases to deserve any consideration from this House in the shape of a protective duty. There are many other matters of a similar character which will probably be discussed when they come before this House at a later period. Now, with regard to this particular subject, I will simply say that I for one accept the declaration of the Finance Minister as far as it goes, that they are prepared to deal with the National Policy as a whole. I for one do not desire to attack it piecemeal, but I must say that if there is any doubt in the country, or any doubt in this House, the Government themselves are to blame for it, because in the Speech from the Throne, although nobody could have expected that they would have said they were going to reduce this or that particular duty, yet at any rate they might have given us some general declaration as to what their policy would be. Sir, their position is a very extraordinary one. They have read one hon. member out of the party because he was supposed to intend to say something against the National Policy; and here they have, from front and rear, from flank and centre, shot coming in from their own supporters, attacking this National Policy in terms which admit of no possible question or dispute. They remind me somewhat of the Spanish galleon at the great fight of the Armada. They are apparently unable to fight and they are unwilling to flee, and so they are submitting to attacks from various quarters in a manner which is certainly not very complimentary to the financial position of the Government. However, I do not propose to discuss the subject any further at the present moment, but in order to meet the views of the hon. Finance Minister, and while in the event of the failure of the Government to give us any distinct declaration of their policy I shall certainly vote for the motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). I now beg to propose that the debate be adjourned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the motion is put I will take the occasion to say a word or two. There would be a good deal, perhaps, to be said for the contention of the Minister of Finance that the Government should not be pressed on this occasion to make a declaration of their policy, were this a new question which was brought to their notice for the first time, were it a question on which there was any reasonable room for doubt. If it were a question as to which they had not had the most ample means for obtaining information in the fullest detail, if it were not a question which has been thrashed out time and again on the floor of this House, then I would say that there might be some reasons in asking my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) to abstain, until the Government policy was announced, from pressing his motion to a vote. But, as the matter stands, my hon. friend would be very ill-advised indeed if he refrained from taking the earliest opportunity in his power to test the sense of this House on the question of this most unjust and oppressive tax. Now, Sir, I doubt if, in the whole list of iniquities contained in the tariff of abominations which we now live under—I have no doubt the reading of the Finance Minister is sufficiently extensive to enable him to know that this is a classical and parliamentary phrase which has been applied to tariffs of this kind more than once, or twice, or twenty times, within the last fifty years, though rarely with as good a ground as I apply it on the present occasion. But I say that, of all the iniquities which this tariff contains, I can conceive of none that is so contrary—not alone to every canon of political economy, pretty nearly all the hon. gentleman's tariff resolutions are that—but against the plainest dictates of reason and common sense in a great agricultural country like Canada, which depends, to a great extent, on the prosperity of the agriculturists, on the prosperity of whom depends that of those identical classes whom the tariff is specially created to favour. Now, let us look at this duty. First of all, this gives almost no revenue. Here is a huge tax, computed by a very eminent agricultural authority at the rate of about $8,000 per county in Ontario and Manitoba at any rate, and this tax, I believe, puts scarcely one dollar in the public treasury for $20 which go into the pockets of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) and his American friends. My hon. friend beside me, I dare say, has got the exact figures of the revenue last year.

Mr. LAURIER. About $42,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then we have raised a little revenue out of it, more than I supposed, and the burthens of the people have been increased in proportion.

Mr. O'BRIEN.

But there is no doubt whatever that in this, as in many other cases, four and fivefold as much is taken out of the pockets of the people and put into the pockets of a few monopolists like the hon. member for Halifax and his friends, as go into the public treasury. Now, that alone is a thing which ought, in all cases, at once to challenge the attention and command the instant action of the Government. It requires an overwhelming case, in my judgment, to justify the Government of a country in using their power to take four or five times as much out of the pockets of the people as they put into the treasury. There is another consideration. This tax imposes a very heavy burthen, not on all the people at large, not on the whole community, but on one single class of the community, and on a single portion of that class. It was contended with great force and truth that this is not a tax that falls on the people of the Maritime Provinces at all, it is not a tax which falls on a great part of the people of Quebec at all, but it falls on the province of Ontario, and chiefly on the province of Manitoba and on the North-west Territories, that part of Canada which at this present moment it is the duty of a wise Government to foster and protect, that part of Canada where, more than any other, it is extremely desirable that no impediment should be thrown in the way of colonization, that no impediment should be put in the way of the farmers of that region obtaining a just reward for their labours. Now, what is their position? Why, their position, for the past seven or eight years, has been this: That in consequence of what I may call world-wide causes over which the Government, I admit, had no control, steadily from month to month and from year to year the prices of agricultural products have been falling to an extremely low point, so that to-day, unless I am misinformed, the prices of wheat and other products of the soil similar to wheat are lower in the markets of the world than they have been for forty years. If the hon. gentleman has any other information, let him give it; but that is the statement I have extracted from the "Mark Lane Express," which has been confirmed by the authority of many eminent agriculturists, and which I believe to be approximately correct. Now, this is the time, those are the conditions, that is the identical moment which the Government chose to refuse to mitigate in any degree the position of the farmers. If you had a real and honest desire to promote immigration into the North-west, I can conceive of no one thing which you could do that is more likely to retard immigration into that country than to allow it to be generally known that our farmers in that region are subject to special and oppressive taxes which do not exist on the other side of the border—at any rate, to anything like the same extent. Then there is another consideration. My objection, first to last, since the National Policy was hatched here, from the very moment when a number of mischievous charlatans undertook to persuade the people of Canada that they might get rich by doubling their taxes, my objection was, not merely that their policy was false on all possible grounds of sound economy, but the course of affairs in the United States had shown me what was the chief motive underlying the action of those men who were clamouring for protection in Canada. I was perfectly well aware then, as I am to-day, that the moment you introduce a protective system into any country under Heaven, that moment you provide a fund for organized political corruption; that moment you make it the interest of certain men to contribute for the purpose, not merely of obtaining a portion of the plunder of the people, but for the purpose of enslaving and debauching them. And here we have an admirable proof of how these things work. Now, I do not want to say anything personally offensive to the member for Halifax, but I ask the House and I ask the country under what possible conditions can that hon. gentleman, or any other hon. gentleman occupying a similar position, give an honest, unbiassed vote on a proposition to reduce the burdens of the people of the country? He is largely interested in maintaining this duty on binder twine—personally interested through himself and his friends, and it is utterly impossible to maintain that duty without maintaining that particular policy of oppressive and unjust taxation on other articles as well. He must, of necessity—it is human nature that it should be so—come to a decision of this important question with a biased mind. It is not possible for him to look at this question on its merits; he must look at it, not as the member for Halifax, but as president of the Binder Twine Association. Now, I will not say whether he, as a great many other gentlemen in the same position, has been assessed for the purpose of contributing to the corruption fund whereby the Government carried their elections. If he and his friends have not been assessed they form a very remarkable exception to the general rule of conduct which has actuated the Government and their friends in this matter. Lastly, as was pointed out with force by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), even on the doctrine that is commonly laid down by protectionists themselves, this thing is an outrage, it is outside the pale of scientific protection, this thing has no claim on the Government, for the very excellent reason that this is a combination which is another name for an absolute monopoly that has shut up a large number of manufactories in Canada, that has driven a large number of workmen out of Canada or out of employment for the benefit of half a dozen gentlemen, most of them, I am informed, capitalists and inhabitants of another state, capitalists who do not reside in Canada, who do not even spend in Canada the plunder wrung from the agriculturists in Manitoba, Ontario and the North-west Territories, who lay us under tribute, who have used a portion of their money to shut up Canadian factories and who are now drawing a revenue so large that those benevolent individuals are publicly advertising their willingness to share it for a consideration. That is the kind of infant industry which I think an honest Hercules like the Minister of Finance could feel an honest pride in strangling in its cradle. But possibly in this case the serpent is too strong for our Hercules. I know something of the way in which tariffs were framed, that is to say, the tariffs prepared under the guidance of the hon. gentleman's predecessors. I can recollect the time when the Manufacturers' Association sent down a paid agent to draw the tariff for the then Minister of Finance, and it is within my knowledge that while that gentleman was drawing pay from the Government for assisting in the preparation of the tariff, he was under the pay of the manufacturers too. But, Mr. Speaker, what it is most important to the people of Ontario and the North-west to mark is what I must call the stolid indifference to their situation displayed by the hon. gentleman and his colleagues. Unhappily the agriculturists of Ontario and the North-west do not seem to have very weighty influence in this Cabinet. Were they maritime fishermen they would have got their binding twine duty free, but, being only agriculturists of Ontario and of the North-west, their humblest petition is whistled down the wind. It is not the first time, nor the second time, nor the third time, nor the fourth time that their wrongs have been brought before this Parliament, and before this Government. It is not the first nor the second nor third time they have been put off with the assurance that it is under consideration. Why, Sir, it has been under consideration ever since 1888, and the hon. gentleman has got no further with it yet. I agree with some of my hon. friends in saying that the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, notably by the First Minister, notably by his Finance Minister and by most of his colleagues touching the present condition of the agricultural community, are, to say the least of them, statements which are wholly destitute of foundation in fact. I do not pretend to say there are not in Canada, there are not in Ontario, a large number of agriculturists who, in spite of all the acts those hon. gentlemen have done, are able to keep their heads above water, thanks to the industry and frugality which made them pretty wealthy men before the hon. gentlemen got into power; but I say this, there are very few indeed at this present moment who at the outside do more than make both ends meet. I affirm that an enormous number of agriculturists in Canada are daily and yearly sinking from the position of freeholders into that of mere tenants at will, or into a position which is worse still, who have no chance, humanly speaking, of extricating themselves from a position which makes them, although not tenants at will, in form tenants at will, in fact, and that is a most unfortunate condition for that large and important class to find themselves reduced to. The First Minister, either at a dinner at Sherbrooke or elsewhere, asserted, if my memory serves me, that the people of Canada were the most prosperous in the world, and I think he mentioned the farmers particularly. I should like to have that assertion placed in the hands of one of the unfortunate 10,000 Ontario farmers, who, according to the latest statistical returns supplied by the Ontario Government, were proved to be under chattel mortgage. The hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and a lawyer of repute. He knows what a chattel mortgage is; but perhaps he does not know what that means to the agriculturist. The giving of a chattel mortgage is the last sign of extreme distress, and if you find in Ontario that its farming population of perhaps 150,000 or 160,000 farmers, that is using the term as applicable to farmers who have a reasonable quantity of land, in the proportion of one man in fifteen or sixteen is hoisting that signal of uttermost distress, you may rest assured that a vastly greater proportion, an enormously greater proportion, are in very bad condition. I repeat that I know there are sections of Ontario where the original wealth of the farmers was so great they have not been reduced to anything like the extremity that has prevailed in other quarters; but I tell the hon. gentleman, if he disputes the assertion that he knows more about this than he does about the facts of the census; that if he dares to issue a commission and cause any inquiry to be made, first, into the depreciation in the actual selling value of land in the old provinces of this Dominion, at all events, he will find every statement made by me in this House is well within the mark, as well as every statement made by me in this House with respect to the exodus during the last ten years. Mr. Speaker, at this present moment there is no sort of doubt in the minds of those who have examined the question, as I have done, who have taken the means of ascertaining what the depreciation is, that, take the province of Ontario, for which alone I profess to speak—let the Maritime Provinces members speak for their own provinces—there is no doubt that from one end of Ontario to another there has been an average depreciation of at least $10 per acre. Does the Minister want to know what that means? That is an item of statistics I recommend to the attention of himself and his colleagues. In Ontario alone there has been a depreciation within the last ten or twelve years of not less, it may be very much more than $200,000,000 in the selling value of farm property alone. We have over 20,000,000 acres of land in Ontario, and taking it on an average I do not believe five per cent of that land could be sold within $10 per acre as much as was received for it, or could have been received for it ten or twelve years ago. If the hon. gentleman wants to ascertain these facts, the course is easily followed. Do not let him go to idle and vague reports, but let him make inquiry from those conversant with the actual selling value of those lands. Let the details as given in the various registries be examined; let the dates of sale made by the officers of justice, and there are only too many of them made at the present moment in Ontario, be noted, and these, I regret to say, will go to prove the absolute truth of all I have to say. Sir, I had an opportunity not long ago of examining confidential reports made by the agents of some very large loan societies doing business from one end of Ontario to the other, and I speak of my own personal knowledge, of course, of the province of Ontario alone. As to the other provinces, I repeat that hon. gentlemen who come from them can speak as to their experience. There was one fact which every one of these reports confirm, namely, that taking Ontario throughout, there had been during the last few years an enormous depreciation in the selling values of the land. In many places that was put at 40 per cent, in others at 30 per cent, in others at 25 per cent, but in none, that my memory recollects, was the average depreciation put at one penny less than 20 per cent of the former selling value. Does the hon. gentleman desire to ascertain how heavy our mortgage indebtedness is? They would not do it when they were taking the census returns, although it was suggested to them, but they can do it now, if they like, and a small expenditure of money would obtain all the information required. Some years ago I myself took samples from seven different counties, and the result of that investigation went to show that in these seven counties, covering fairly enough the various sections of the province of Ontario, you would not find a concession in a township in which, on an average, more than each alternate farm was free from mortgages, and I grieve to say that in a great many cases it was much more difficult to find a farm that had no mortgage on it than to find those that were so encumbered. Mr. Speaker, I have not alleged, as the hon. Finance Minister appeared to think, that the present condition of the farmers of Ontario was wholly due to this mischievous National Policy. I repeatedly and emphatically stated that while that was one important factor in destroying the value of property and causing the exodus, it was not the sole factor. But my complaint against hon. gentlemen opposite is this: That at a time in the history of our agriculturists when a variety of adverse circumstances had conspired together to reduce the value of their crops, when they conspired together to depreciate the value of their lands, at that time under the guise of the National Policy the Government of Canada saw fit to inflict enormous burdens upon the people, burdens which in the last resort rest more heavily upon the farmers than upon any other class of the community. It is a fact, whether the Finance Minister or the Minister of Justice knows it or not, that it is of the essence of the protective system that while almost every other class can to a greater or lesser degree shift the burden from themselves on the consumer, that burden in the last resort comes to rest upon the land, and upon those who derive their subsistence from it. More than that, Sir, there are circumstances which ought to have led the Government under existing conditions of things to have taken special care to relieve the farmer in every possible shape and way. Largely, I believe, due to the improvidence of the Government, largely due to the petulant and foolish manner in which they carried on relations with the neighbouring States, the farmer of Canada, in addition to the Foster tariff has been lately afflicted with the McKinley tariff. He has been ground between the upper and the nether millstone. Not merely has he had to pay many millions of duty into the treasury,—which he would not complain of so much,—but he has also been compelled to pay into the pockets of monopolists like the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), like the hon. Senator Drummond with his sugar tax, and a variety of other gentlemen whom I could name. Not only has he been compelled to pay these huge sums, partly to the revenue, and chiefly to the monopolists, but over and above all that he has been obliged to pay huge sums of money into the American treasury as well. There is no shadow of doubt, knowing the facts we know, that the imposition of the McKinley tariff was largely due to the unfortunate relations, which in consequence of the ill-considered conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite, had subsisted between them and the Government at Washington, and which had a reflex, and a very unfavourable action on the American people. Under those conditions, they being responsible to a great degree not merely for their own tax, but for the imposition of the United States duties, it was their bounden and special duty to have taken every possible opportunity that came in their way to relieve these burdens on the agriculturists. What have they done? They have not lightened those burdens by one single solitary cent—because I give them no credit for what the hon. Finance Minister took credit to himself not long ago—I give them no credit for their reduction of the sugar duty. They did not reduce the sugar duty until the Americans had set them the example, and then they simply reduced it because as they right well knew it was impossible for them to maintain it. When they did reduce it they did it in such a way as to cost the people of Canada as much revenue as possible and to leave as much plunder as possible to the monopolist. To-day they claim credit for taking off three millions of duty on sugar which they could not help taking off. But, Sir, they do not take credit—or rather, perhaps, they do in certain quarters but not in this House—for having left two millions of dollars of duty on for the benefit of some half score monopolists and sugar refiners. That is the reason, that is the ground on which I say that the Government of Canada, when a special case like this is made out, and when it is shown clearly and unmistakably that this tax has pressed most unfairly and unreasonably on a large section of the agricultural population of Canada, ought, tariff or no tariff, take steps at once to relieve it. Out of their own mouths, as was pointed out by the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), they stand condemned. Out of their own mouths they ought to be judged. I say that the Government are not justified by any argument that has as yet been advanced from the Treasury benches. Certainly they are not justified by the argument of the Minister of Finance for refusing to consider this proposition, and to consider it favourably. We will be glad if there are reasons—better reasons than the Minister of Finance has given—to hear these reasons, and I trust this debate will not close without some attempt at least being made by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to justify the conduct of which they have been guilty.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I need not say to the House that the reasons which would be sufficient in the mind of the hon. member who has just spoken (Sir Richard Cartwright) for asking the House to pursue the ordinary course of leaving this matter to be dealt with until the tariff policy is brought down, would be very extraordinary indeed. The hon. member did not need to address the House this afternoon for the purpose of convincing us as to what his position is upon this question, or upon any other question in relation to which he might hope the Government could be embarrassed for a single moment. We knew very well, that however reasonable and fair and proper in the judgment of ordinary members of the House, was the appeal of the Minister of Finance, that the House should not come to a vote upon this question until the tariff arrangements which are proposed to be made were brought before it; no reason of that kind would meet with a proper reception from the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). We knew that he would avail himself of any opportunity,—or of anything that he considered an opportunity, whether it might be really opportune or not,—of working into the debate the language with which he is accustomed to disfigure "Hansard" on every occasion. We knew he would have the old stock arguments, the old cry about the "Red Chamber," the old talk of assessment for the purposes of corruption, the old bogus theories about taxation for the benefit of the sugar refiners, and every stale adjective which he has been flashing backwards and forwards through the pages of "Hansard" for twenty years. We were prepared for that. We were prepared for the hon. gentleman's wild assertion that I stated somewhere—the hon. member was not bound by the ordinary rules of debate, nor one would suppose by the ordinary rules of propriety to state where—but at all events we were prepared for his assertion that I had said somewhere that the farmers of Canada were the most prosperous people in the world; an assertion which I need not say is wholly without saying. The hon. gentleman, there-without truth, because that almost goes fore, has not made any fresh contribution to the debate in stating that the Government ought to be forced to a vote upon this question, or in asserting even that we were not disposed to action with regard to this or any other feature of the tariff, that we were refusing to mitigate the burdens that were said to fall upon the farmers of this country; and that we were refusing to extend any relief at all to people labouring under the depressing circumstances which he was obliged to admit—although it falsified, to a great extent, his argument—existed with regard to the condition of the agricultural classes in every part of the world. But, Sir, irrespective of those vituperative expressions which the hon. gentleman has delighted himself with, although he delighted nobody else this evening, I desire to call the grave attention of the House to the position in which this question comes before us now. We are within the first week of the session; we are still a month at least distant from the period of the session when the tariff policy of the Government is usually announced. We do not by any means dispute the constitutional right of any member of this House to move a resolution with regard to the tariff; that is as much the right of any private member of the House as it is of the Finance Minister. But in ordinary cases—and I think the same rule will be followed in this case—the House does recognize that, the Finance Minister being charged with the duty of making presently a declaration to the House and the country of the changes which the Government desire the House to enact in the tariff, it is more seeming and more becoming that the whole policy of the Government on that subject should be laid before the House before it is asked to express an opinion by its vote. We admit, I say again, the right of a member to raise these questions and to discuss them; but I submit to the judgment of the House whether it will pass a resolution dictating a policy to us, or whether the course most convenient, according to parliamentary practice, is not that this and every other question relating to the tariff, shall be delayed for decision, if not for discussion, until the whole tariff is before the House. The reason for that is obvious to any man who considers the way in which trade would be affected if the House should come to the conclusion that the duty on binding twine or on any other article must be reduced. In what position would we find the business interests of this country if, two months in advance of the time when any such changes could come into effect, the business community should be notified that this or that duty would be taken off? Trade would be completely demoralized; and if this could be done in the case of binding twine, it could be done in the case of every business interest which our tariff affects. In times past every member has conceded the reasonableness of this practice. Every member has recognized that when the tariff policy of the Government is brought down to the House, the whole tariff is open to amendment at the instance even of a private member, and every member has recognized that that is the convenient time to discuss and consider every question relating to the tariff. I could not expect the hon. member for South Oxford to agree to this proposition. The hon. member said that if this were a new question, he would agree to this proposition. The hon. member would not agree to a proposition to postpone the consideration of the question even if it had not been brought up before. But we do expect, in regard to all matters of this character, that the House will reserve its judgment until Parliament comes to deal with the tariff as a whole, both in view of the ordinary convenience of Parliament and as a matter of prudence with regard to possible disturbance in the trade of the country. Notwithstanding the observations which the hon. gentleman has made, and which are very inviting indeed, as to the condition of the farmers of this country—inviting because they offer an opportunity of comparing the state of affairs in this country with that of the country to which he desires to annex us commercially if not politically, and because the hon. member has challenged an investigation into his arguments of the past, as regards the ridiculous samples he brought before the House of mortgages in certain counties, forgetting altogether in his calculations the amounts of money that had been paid on those mortgages, until reminded of his omission, presenting to this House an extraordinary spectacle for a man who had figured as the Finance Minister of this country for a number of years. And that hon. gentleman, I may mention parenthetically, is the gentleman who undertakes to pass a criticism of my figures of the census, which he observed evinced ignorance on my part—a remark, however, which only evinced ignorance on his own part.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a pity your own Finance Minister did not see that.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I can answer for myself, Mr. Speaker. But I would not have risen, notwithstanding the tempting opportunity which the hon. member for South Oxford afforded, had it not been for one observation which was made by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). Although the hon. member for Muskoka was critical in what he said as to the course pursued by the Government, he recognized with perfect fairness the impropriety of pressing this question to a vote just now. But that hon. member made the observation, that while the Motion Paper was bristling with demands for changes in the tariff, the Government had read a gentleman out of the party for no other reason than that he had criticised the tariff. I credit the hon. member with the utmost sincerity in making that observation; but whatever it was based upon, whether upon speeches made or articles written elsewhere, I have simply one remark to make with reference to it, that is, that this Government has read no man out of this party. If any man who has given us support in the past is unable to continue that support, either to the general policy of the Government or to its particular measures, we regret it; but it is reserved for such a gentleman alone to read himself out of the party. The Government has never done it in the past, nor will it do it in the future.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SUPPLY—THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Government to the state of affairs in the Sandwich Islands, and to take this opportunity of asking whether the Government have impressed on the home authorities the vital interest Canada has in the maintenance of the political independence of the Sandwich Islands. These islands are well situated for trade between Canada and Australia, and are also intended to be a resting place for the Pacific cable. Their annexation to the United States, which is now before the Senate of that country, is a matter, therefore, which deeply concerns us.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask my hon. friend to postpone that question until the leader of the Government comes in, when, no doubt, that hon. gentleman will reply.

Motion agreed to; and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Interior Department.... $101,146 50

Mr FOSTER. There are fifty-four statutory increases at $50, one at $37.50, one at $25, and one at $30. There are also some transfers, and there is a deduction of the salary of the chief clerk, $2,800.

Mr. McMULLEN. Amongst a number of the departments with which we have to deal in the matter of salaries, it appears to me that the Department of the Interior is one to which the pruning-knife should be most vigorously applied. That department has for years been costing this country more than it really ought. We have in it what might properly be called a double-headed institution, one head of which is here and the other in Winnipeg. I refer to the Land Board. We have a Land Board at Winnipeg to which it was supposed appeals could be made in disputed cases. No doubt appeals were made, and then after that board had deliberated and reached what they considered a just decision, the matters were referred to Ottawa and the work done over again. Having realized but a very little sum from the sales of land in the North-west, and from other sources, which were expected to yield large annual returns, it behooves this House and committee to vigorously investigate every item connected with the Interior Department. In the matter of civil servants, its expenditure has been growing more rapidly than any other department. In the North-west there is room to hide away a great number of virtually useless and unnecessary servants. They spend their time hunting around there generally, enjoying a never-ending holiday, a great many of them, and this country is called upon yearly to vote very large sums in order to defray the very liberal salaries allowed to these gentlemen. We have instances of this in the case of homestead inspectors, colonization inspectors, timber inspectors, and there is no end of officers which have been created, not because there was any necessity for them, but because there were persons pressing their services upon the country, wanting positions to fill, and the Interior Department has been utilized to furnish these people with appointments. I earnestly hope that the Minister now in charge will very vigorously apply the pruning-knife to all unnecessary officials employed in the North-west in connection with that department. I was through that country, and had some little ocular demonstration myself of the number of fellows who are virtually almost tramping on each other in Government offices. About Winnipeg they are as thick as bees around a sugar cask, dancing about in all directions, drawing large salaries, and doing next to nothing. I found I could trace the relations of a good many people who used to be prominent in this province, and to whom were given very lucrative positions in the North-west, or if not to them to their sons and grandsons. We have any number of Stephensons out there drawing Government pay—and that name has been before this House on several occasions in connection with the Department of Interior—as timber inspectors, colonization inspectors and homestead inspectors. I believe it is a wonderful country for rapid growth, but I do not know whether these people are the natural increase of that country or not. I dare say a good many have gone from here because they could not get very much to do here in a lucrative way, and so they transferred themselves to the North-west and were pitchforked on the country, for the purpose of drawing salary. This thing has gone too far. I would like to know how many homestead inspectors we have, and whether we are still to have this double-headed institution of the Land Board continued. What is the intention of the hon. minister with regard to that board? It has been a very costly institution. We have a man drawing the magnificent salary of $5,000 a year as head of that board at Winnipeg, and then we have any number of others dancing attendance for all purposes.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that of course we are not discussing the estimates relating to the office in Winnipeg, and when we reach that item I will give him the fullest explanation with reference to the salaries and duties of the commissioner and of the officers under him in Winnipeg. If the hon. gentleman will be content with that, I will give him the fullest information I possibly can and any other information in regard to the other officers under the commissioner, such as the land agents and inspectors and timber inspectors, when the matter comes up.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will willingly defer my request to the minister to grant the information which I asked, but I thought it necessary to prepare his mind for answering the questions which will be put to him at a future stage, and because it is well that he should prepare himself for a determined and vigorous investigation when the item is reached and should not be caught napping when it comes up. As he has been only recently installed in his office and no doubt has a very limited knowledge of the details of that important department, we will give him the space and the time to study up so as to be intelligently able to answer the questions when we reach that point. We have had some information from the Minister of Finance as to the increases in his department, but I would ask if any superannuations have taken place out of the department here?

Mr. DALY. No, there have not been any.

Office of the High Commissioner for Canada—Salaries.. $8,200

Mr. McMULLEN. I think we should have some explanation from the Minister with regard to the High Commissioner. I pointed out last night that the House and the country were disappointed that his services had not been utilized in matters of finance. The Finance Minister told us that he was in England and was entirely independent of him, that he was not able to implement the promise made by the First Minister years ago that he would be very valuable in handling our finances in England, but he has been unable to utilize Sir Charles Tupper and his staff in that direction. The House consented to the appointment very reluctantly, the First Minister then giving his positive assurance that Sir Charles Tupper would be a most valuable assistant in managing our finances in England, and he has been having what we are disposed to call, and very properly, a holiday, from his appointment to the present time, and has been drawing his salary all that time, and dancing around and enjoying all the gaieties and pleasures of London life. No doubt the Finance Minister was highly entertained by the High Commissioner when he was in London recently. No doubt that, with a view to keep his office, he endeavoured to entertain the Finance Minister and show him the dignity and the grandeur and the importance of the High Commissioner in London. After his investigation, no doubt the hon. gentleman will be able to say what particular duties that officer is supposed to perform. This is not a matter we can afford to jest upon. The High Commissioner and his family have been very expensive to this country. Last year I drew attention to the fact that they were drawing large sums of money from this country. In 1888 they received $33,783.26, in 1889 $31,623.11, in 1890 $42,044.83, and in 1891 the amounts the High Commissioner and his sons, sons-in-law and others have drawn will amount to about $44,000. If that is to go on, we must say it is God's blessing that we have only one Tupper family. I daresay we get some service for this, but as we are not to use the High Commissioner as a financial agent in London, I should like to know what use we are to make of him. We know that we pay $17,000 for immigration purposes in London. If he is to discharge the duties of immigration agent there, we had better abolish the other office, because the total amount is very large. I see that last year we paid out in London alone $17,721.73, apart from Sir Charles Tupper's office altogether. If any person will look over the items of charges made in connection with the High Commissioner, he will see that we have evidently in London another double-headed institution in the shape of immigration agents. We have the High Commissioner, who is supposed to perform some of these duties, and his office costs $27,526.38, and then we have the other office which costs $17,721.73, or, in all, $45,248.11 for immigration purposes. If Sir Charles Tupper is performing the duty of immigration agent, should we not abandon the other office, or if the other office is doing, as I believe it is, the most efficient work, should we not abandon the High Commissioner? I do not mean that we should turn him out on the streets in London. I would bring him back here, and he might be sent to the North-west and might implement his promise that we would export 640,000,000 bushels of wheat from that province. If, with his eloquent tongue, he could persuade the people there to do that it might be of some use, but it seems to me he is doing nothing in London. I think we ought seriously to consider the necessity of keeping the High Commissioner in London, and I would like to know from the Finance Minister what he and his staff are supposed to do.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. FOSTER. I will first give the hon. gentleman the information as to the item under consideration, leaving the North-west and former prophecies out of the question for the present. There have been three statutory increases at $50, amounting to $150. The promotion of Mr. Chase from second to first class, $100; and Mr. Howard from third class to second, $116, making $366 increase in all.

Mr. McMULLEN. Would the Minister tell us what that staff has to do?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman who particularly assumes the role of criticising the High Commissioner's expenses in this Parliament, and has done it for several years, in performance of his duty, of course, has always sought to give the impression to the House, and to the country, that this was an office which did nothing and which ought to be abolished in the interest of economy and the efficiency of Government. Hitherto he has had his way, and it was thought that the House was so well acquainted with the duties which would necessarily belong to a High Commissioner, representing a country having so many interests in London as Canada, that it did not need any lengthy explanation to set the matter right. But the hon. gentleman has to-night called for details, and he has challenged the wisdom of keeping an office there at all for a High Commissioner. He has mentioned that we have two offices there, one an immigration department and the other for the High Commissioner. My hon. friend is wrong in that. We have no emigration department proper in London. We have the High Commissioner's office, and a part of the duties of his staff are intimately connected with emigration, of course. The payments that are made on account of the High Commissioner's residence in London, and his work in London, and for his official residence, will come up on an item later. Now, my hon. friend says that he does not think the High Commissioner's staff does anything to justify its existence. I happen to have been there last autumn myself, and to have visited the High Commissioner's office many times, and to have seen something of the place itself, and of the work that was carried on. I came to know somewhat intimately the clerks who are there, and I made myself acquainted with the work which they are doing. In the first place, I may say that there is nothing to reproach Canada with as regards the palatial character and luxurious surroundings of the High Commissioner's office in London. It is a model of plainness, if not of neatness, and while it occupies, as it ought to occupy, a very good position amongst all the offices of the agents-general of the different colonies, there is not, in its appearance outside, or in its arrangement inside, anything that would lead one to the conclusion that the office of High Commissioner is unduly splendid or luxuriously furnished. It is a working office from top to bottom, and is designed to carry out, and does carry out, the purpose of its work. Now, as regards the staff, there are five clerks and two messengers, as my hon. friend can see, who are estimated for here, and who do the work. The five clerks and two messengers do a great deal more work than could otherwise be done from the fact that they have taken as messengers persons who are expert type-writers, and, although they do the work of messengers, they are also doing the work of expert type-writers in all the hours when they are not required for messengers' duty; so that they are in reality messenger clerks, and efficient clerks at that. I found that every clerk in the establishment was a type-writer, so that the staff is, besides being small, equipped to the very best advantage for work. Now, the point is as to what work they have to do, and I came to the conclusion from my investigations into the matter while I was there that the office clerks are not only worked but are hardly worked from the beginning to the end of the year. Before looking into it I had no idea of the amount of work that was forced upon them. In the first place the commissioner himself being a representative of Canada, has affiliations with all the other colonies and with the official world in London, and with the Government offices in London, which requires a great deal of his personal attention, and which he gives, of course, as any one who knows Sir Charles Tupper knows that he would give, and this requires a great deal of correspondence, official and semi-official in its nature, which requires a competent clerical force and diligent work as well. That, however, is a small portion of the work which is done in the High Commissioner's office. The work is divided amongst the staff in four divisions. The first is the accountant's division, and last year the amount of money which passed through the accountant's hands in the shape of cheques in the High Commissioner's office was over half a million dollars, 944 cheques having been issued. These take in the pay for the expenses for the High Commissioner's office, and also expenditures for almost every one of the departments in Ottawa, which order through the High Commissioner's office certain stores and things that are necessary, and which are paid for through the High Commissioner's office, the cheques being issued and the record of the transaction being kept and closed upon the spot. That of itself necessitates the keeping of books, and the accountant's time is very fully taken up with that matter and with the other items I have mentioned. Then, again, there is the correspondence on account of emigration, and the emigration officials in England are paid through the High Commissioner's office in London, where the accounts are checked and the vouchers are supervised, and the salaries and expenses are paid through the High Commissioner's office. That makes necessary the supervision of the expenditure in the emigration offices throughout the United Kingdom, both those that are stationary and the emigration agents who are travelling. Then, again, there are the bonuses which are paid to steamship companies for passengers who are booked through to Canada. All these payments are made through the High Commissioner's office, necessitating a complex and thorough system of checking accounts and keeping books, so that if I went into the accountant's office and asked for any single account of any steamship agent, the whole matter is laid before me in a practical and business-like shape, so that I can trace every payment that is made. Then, under the system of giving bonuses to persons who settle on lands in the North-west, the bonus cannot be given to a steamship agent who books the passenger, until the certificate has been forwarded that the passenger has taken out his land in the North-west. That certificate is given at the Land Office in Winnipeg, and is sent to the High Commissioner. The High Commissioner's office then traces out the agent and makes the payment, gets a receipt, and has the vouchers and all kinds of things. Then the coinage which we require for the Dominion each year, both silver and gold, is negotiated through the High Commissioner's office. If we had that done by means of an agent, we should have to pay for it. Supplies are ordered, as I have said, by almost every department in Ottawa, and these are more easily arranged for by some one who is upon the spot and can be in personal correspondence with the parties from whom the supplies are got. Then the accounts with regard to quarantine, and the archives branch in London and Paris are under the High Commissioner's office as well. There they are checked and paid. All this simply goes to show the multitude of duties and the large amount of work done by the accountant in the High Commissioner's office. Then, again, there is immigration work and library work. All the immigration correspondence of the United Kingdom, and of Europe, comes to the High Commissioner's office; 9,000 letters were received last year upon immigration alone. They have to be answered; all those contain inquiries, and information has to be given in answer to each one of the letters, requiring, in some cases, quite an amount of research in order to procure it and forward it to the person who asks for it. That itself is a great labour and involves a great deal of work. One and a half millions of pamphlets on immigration were distributed from the High Commissioner's office, and by the clerks last year alone. Those were not distributed helter-skelter or pell-mell, but were sent on an approved plan, so that they would actually get into the hands, as far as possible, of persons who were interested, and they were not distributed as waste paper. On request, a large number of those pamphlets were distributed. There are advertisements in the newspapers as to immigration to Canada. This year, in almost every principal paper in the United Kingdom, an advertisement appears in a few issues, drawing attention to this country as a field for immigrants, and asking all who have an interest in the subject, or who think of coming to this country, to correspond with the High Commissioner's office. That brings in a multitude of inquiries, and these, as I have said, have to be carefully answered. Besides this, the office took up last year a most important work. The tenant farmers' report on the North-west, made two years ago, which was so favourable, has actually been made a school book in the schools of Great Britain, and 50,000 copies of it are to-day being used as text books for reading in the schools, furnishing not only information to the children, but giving the teachers of those schools a text book out of which to teach the children growing up the advantages of Canada, our lands, our climate, our Government and institutions and everything of that kind. Besides, the department took up last year another very good work, which was the distribution of a large map of the Dominion to the schools, but only to those school teachers who applied for it. When I was in London, there were over 600 of these maps of Canada hanging on the walls of schools in Great Britain, from which the children were being taught the geography of Canada and from which they were instructed that there was such a country, and the advantages were pointed out. Personal inquiry was constant at the office, not only by means of letters, but by means of persons visiting there. Go to the High Commissioner's office any hour of the day and you will find in the library half a dozen or a dozen or more strangers who are there to get information. They are referred to the library, where all documents relating to Canada are kept and where they are able to obtain information from books placed at their disposal, these being supplemented by the clerks, who see that the people get the information they require. Then there is the division of official correspondence. Much correspondence between the departments in Ottawa and the Government in London passes through the office of the High Commissioner. The High Commissioner personally attends to these, so that when requests are preferred or matters have to be explained the High Commissioner can, if necessary, and as he so often does, make personal application after the official correspondence is sent and give personal explanation, and by hurrying the matter up secure urgency in having the demands complied with, and answers are thus obtained more quickly than otherwise would be the case. Nine hundred and thirty-six letters were received in this official correspondence alone, and 1,386 letters were forwarded. That work has to be very carefully done and it involves in many cases copying of inclosures which go backwards and forwards between Canada and the British Government. Then there is the division of general correspondence, which takes in all correspondence not coming under the heads I have mentioned. Under this head 2,810 letters were received and 3,613 were sent. The inquiries cover every conceivable subject with respect to Canada, some asking information regarding the Customs duties, others asking in regard to the internal revenue statistics, and others as to trade, and that is now claiming every day a much larger share of attention of the commissioner and his officers. One would be surprised to know the number and variety of the inquiries made as regards trade with this country. These inquiries have to be very carefully answered, for the information must be reliable, as it is required by responsible parties who must not be misled, but must receive correct information. I have gone over these matters merely to show my hon. friend that it is not fair to say that five clerks and two messengers in the High Commissioner's office are doing unproductive work or doing no work at all in comparison with the salaries they receive. No clerks in our offices here are so hard worked on the average as those in the High Commissioner's office, and to none are more responsible and discriminating duties given. They have to answer inquiries, see visitors, and in every way to be careful and prudent in their answers, because the information they give must be reliable. I think this is a satisfactory answer to the House, and I know it will be a satisfactory answer to the country as to the necessity for them. I am firmly convinced that Canada cannot do without the representation which she has in the United Kingdom, and every year that Canada becomes better known more inquiries will be made at some central point, and that central point is London, towards which all eyes turn and where information is sought. It would be a great disadvantage to this country if she did not have in London a well known representative officer and a well known office, where every kind of inquiry can be made and information sought by the large and increasing class of people who are turning their eyes towards Canada either for trade, immigration or other purposes. I have no hesitation in saying that no money we spend is better spent to-day for the general good of Canada than the money which is spent in the High Commissioner's office, and no work tells better for Canada as a whole than the work done by the High Commissioner and by his staff of conscientious, hard-working and able clerks, and I bear testimony to them and to their work from personal knowledge and investigation, and I am only too glad to do it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does it require the personal supervision of the High Commissioner?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and he is at his office every day when he is in London. He has office hours and is there; and when he is not in London at his office the High Commissioner is engaged on missions on which he is sent to one place or another. His life is not an easy one. He does not go dancing on the air with no responsibility and no work, as hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of representing him. His work is as hard there as his work was when in Ottawa at the head of a department, and every one who knows his work here will have an idea of what he does there by that comparison. I think we ought to be fair. For a party advantage, or any other advantage, what is the use of decrying an agency which is of the utmost benefit to us, and without which I believe Canada would be at a very great disadvantage. What is the use of decrying a man who gives his best time and energy to advance the interests of Canada in England, whether he be of one political persuasion or another, and what is the use of giving a wrong impression of hard-working, honest, painstaking clerks, who are doing as good service to the Dominion of Canada as any clerks in the service of the Government. Let us be fair and honest in this matter. If there are expenditures which are extravagant, let us prune them off. Let us come to the conclusion as a whole, and I believe we all ought to agree on that, that we must have representation there, that the representation there is sufficient, and that it should be the object and aim of this Parliament, and of every Government, whatever Government may be in power, to make that representation just as effective and as wide-reaching as possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then it is rather remarkable that the High Commissioner finds it possible to absent himself from London for months at a time. His personal inspection and presence, which are of so great value, were not found incompatible with appearances on this side of the Atlantic for protracted periods. Possibly it was not the High Commissioner, but it was his astral body that was doing duty at Windsor and elsewhere.

Mr. PERRY. I do not think that the services rendered by the High Commissioner are worth $30,000 a year to the people of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PERRY. Perhaps you gentlemen over there do not pay it, but the farmers of this country, who are the taxpayers, have to pay it. You should remember that the gentlemen on the Treasury benches get their money very easily, but that the farmers have to earn it by the sweat of their brow. I say the people of Canada have a right to know what value they are getting for their money, or if they are getting any value at all. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has, of course, tried to make it appear that the High Commissioner is worth his money, and has a big lot of work to do, and that he has eleven clerks around him. No wonder they can answer 900 letters a year. Why, I could answer that many myself and not be over-worked. The hon. gentleman says that over half a million dollars, yearly, passes through that department in London, but I can tell him that I, myself, have firms in Canada doing more business than that with less than half the clerical assistance. The hon. gentleman says that these officials are there from sunrise in the morning until sunset in the afternoon, but he did not tell us what they were doing all that time. It may be that they are warming their feet at the fire, or smoking cigars, or it may be that they are busy reading these periodicals which I find charged in the Public Accounts. Perhaps they are winding the clocks for Sir Charles Tupper, for which I also find a charge in the Estimates. The Minister of Finance was over in London lately, and I suppose he knows all about that department. If the office in London be of such importance as he thinks, why does Sir Charles not arrange about our loan, and why had the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to go to London three times to try and settle some dispute between England and the United States. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has gone over again lately, and I suppose Canada will have to pay his expenses, which would be saved if the High Commissioner looked after the work. When the Minister of Finance goes to London, it is no doubt very fine for him to walk into Victoria Chambers to see the High Commissioner, who no doubt squeezes his hand warmly and asks, "What is the news from Canada." It is also, no doubt, very pleasant for the Minister of Finance to be able to say: "Oh, things are all right, the Tory Government is in power, and we will not be put out for some time, but if we find that we are in danger we will telegraph to you to come across the Atlantic and help us." That may be very nice, but it is not worth $30,000 a year. I can tell my hon. friend that I never saw the High Commissioner in his department, and that there are a great many poor farmers in the country who never saw him there either, but nevertheless they have to pay him all the same. We were told a year or two ago that Sir Charles Tupper was wanted in England to open up an egg trade with Canada. When the United States shut their door against us, we were told by the Finance Minister: "Don't fret; the hens will lay all the same, we will find a market for the eggs, and the High Commissioner is there in London to open up an egg trade." I got a little message from a bird some time ago, which was to the effect that a gentleman from Montreal shipped a lot of eggs, which were reckoned to be stale when they got to London, and the High Commissioner took them off the hands of this exporter and said he would send them to his kitchen so as to open up an egg trade in England. I do not know whether he had to pay for them or not. Last fall our cattle were scheduled in England, and where was this Great Mogul High Commissioner then? Why did he not use his influence with the Board of Trade to get our cattle free entrance to the British markets? It is all very well for my hon. friend the Minister of Finance who gets $9,000 or $10,000 a year and who takes a couple of trips to London each year, to talk about the utility of the High Commissioner, but the people of Canada do not see it in the same light when they have to foot the bill. I repeat here that if the High Commissioner is in London for no other purpose than to encourage immigration to this country it is time we should do without him. I contend that he induces the Canadian Government to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars to encourage immigrants to come here, who as soon as they arrive go across the border to the United States. Can the Minister of Finance tell me how many hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of dollars, this country has paid to bring out immigrants from Europe who are now American citizens? I would like the hon. gentleman with all his ability at figures, to tell me how many millions of money have been spent in that direction; and the High Commissioner has been the means of squandering a great deal of money in this way. Let him come back here and fight his battles in this country, let him run an election here and take his chances; but we have no right to vote this large sum to keep him in luxury in London, and I for one protest against it.

Mr. MULOCK. Whilst I would not suggest that the minor clerks should be taken from this side of the water, I submit that in the appointment of clerks to this office some consideration should be given to Canadians. I would like to know whether these clerks come within the provisions of the Civil Service Act. Who makes the appointments?

Mr. FOSTER. The appointments are made here, and they come within the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MULOCK. Then, have these gentlemen passed the examinations required by the Act?

Mr. FOSTER. The staff formerly was not under the Civil Service Act. In 1888 it was brought under that Act, and the clerks who were at that time in the office became the clerks under the establishment that was made. From that time I do not think there have been any new appointments. There was one transfer, that of a young man named Reynolds, from the service in the North-west to the High Commissioner's office, where he is now the accountant.

Mr. MULOCK. Did the Act bringing the High Commissioner's office under the Civil Service Act expressly exempt those in the office from the provisions of that Act? If not, I presume those gentlemen would have to comply with those provisions.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt they did. They were established at that time as officers without the necessity of passing an examination.

Mr. MULOCK. I see there is a Mr. Just here in receipt of a salary of $1,250 a year. May I ask if he is a Canadian?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot tell you whether he is a Canadian or not. He has been in the office, I know, for a long time.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not believe in any extreme nativism, but I believe there are almost as many young men in Canada willing to take positions as there are vacancies. In fact, I think I saw a statement some time ago that there were 1,200 odd who had passed the Civil Service examinations, and who were waiting for something to turn up. If so, it is strange that you should appoint people in England when there are so many people waiting in Canada to be employed. Surely the Canadian-born have the first claim upon whatever good things are going at the hands of the Government of Canada. Is Mr. C. J. Taylor a Canadian?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say whether he is or not. This is a criticism which has not been offered before. It is quite new, and we are not prepared for it.

Mr. MULOCK. Then it is a matter to which the attention of the Government should be called. We know that they have appointed new arrivals here to positions for which many Canadians have been waiting. I have been written to on that subject, and have been asked if it was the custom of the Government to appoint people here who were not Canadians. I have replied that I did not believe it was a custom, but that I had known it to have been done in isolated cases. Now, the High Commissioner's office is becoming practically a department. He is practically a Minister of the Crown, with none of the responsibilities of a Minister, and probably every year we shall be called upon to increase his staff. The Finance Minister says he has not had time to think out the matter, and apparently thinks it unworthy of consideration; but, subject to his views, I put in a claim, on behalf of the Canadian people, to places in the gift of the Government of Canada.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister states that this is a new criticism, and I am sorry that he seems to think it an unworthy one. I was about to rise when my hon. friend did, in order to ask the same question that he asked. I do not think he asked the question, as I do not ask it, from any sectional stand-point, or to make a complaint against the Government for not employing our own people; but it is obvious that a great many inquiries are made at the High Commissioner's office with regard to Canada as a desirable place for emigrants to come to. The minister informs us that dozens of people may be found there at one time asking for information, consulting books in the library, and asking clerks to explain the information given in those books. The matter has weight in my mind, not from the fact alone that I think it desirable that our people should receive consideration at the hands of the Government when there are places open which they are competent to fill; but every hon. gentleman knows that it must be a very great advantage to anyone in that office who is called upon to give information to have a knowledge of the country, derived from actual experience in it. Anyone knows that you may be very conversant with a country through the medium of books; but even if you have no more than seen it, what an addition that makes to all the knowledge of the country which you may have derived from books; and to have lived in the country and known it is a much greater advantage to any one called upon to impart information about it. And so, not knowing the gentleman who is transferred from the North-west, as one of those gentlemen had been apparently, from what the Minister of Interior says, I should think that that was a wise regulation. That gentleman having lived in the North-west and being transferred to London, if inquiries are made with reference to Manitoba and the North-west, must inevitably be in a better position to give the information required. And so with the older provinces. Anyone having lived in any of our provinces must be in a better position to give intelligent information to those seeking it than can others, no matter how attentive they may be to their duties in the way of storing their minds with information through studying the literature that may be provided for them. I think this is a matter of importance. I do not urge it with any view to race, or on the ground that our own people are not sufficiently cared for by the Government in the filling of appointments; but it does seem to me that if the Minister gives the matter a moment's consideration, he will see that in the discharge of the duties which he himself has told us devolve upon these gentlemen, it must be a very great advantage to them indeed if they have had a practical experience of the country by having lived in different portions of it and thus know its capabilities and what is required of those who come out to settle. I think the Minister, if he ponders on this for a moment, will not be disposed to dismiss the subject, as I thought, by the rather vexed look on his countenance, he was prepared to do a short time ago. Of course there are other duties besides imparting information, but it is not to be supposed that our own people, who have experience of this country, have not also the other qualifications of keeping accounts, passing cheques, and doing the other duties pertaining to the office.

Mr. FOSTER. The Act was passed in 1888, and it expressly states that such officers and clerks shall not be subject to examination under the Civil Service Act. The other provisions of the Civil Service Act and the Superannuation Act apply to them.

Mr. MULOCK. Do the words "such clerks" mean those then in the office?

Mr. FOSTER. No; the Governor in Council may appoint such officers and clerks in the office of the High Commissioner as he may deem necessary. The said officers and clerks shall not be subject to examination. And then the provisions of the Civil Service Act, the Superannuation Act, apply. They were, I suppose, not subject to the Civil Service examination here, because if a clerk is needed there,—and some might be taken with very great advantage over there—it would be inconvenient to send him here to Ottawa, or to have him examined or to conduct an examination over there. With regard to the other question, I would have been taken just as much aback if the hon. gentleman had asked me the birthplace or the religion of the officers in my own department. We give neither the birthplace nor religion, and the only point in the criticism is that made by my hon. friend who has just sat down, that if gentlemen are there to give information of Canada, they would have a warmer interest in Canada and probably be in some respects better fitted to give a sympathetic description or information, if they had lived in this country, than they would otherwise. That view has been followed, but all clerks are not there to give information. Some are simply clerks to do the work of the office, and they do it efficiently. In the first place, we have the High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper, and it will not be said that he has not that intimate knowledge of Canada, which is required. He is the person who supervises the whole, and any inquiries which could not be answered by the others would be referred to him, so that information on all those points beyond the ken of the other clerks would be fully given by the High Commissioner. Then, the first officer under him is Mr. Colmer, who has spent the greater part of his life in Canada and was taken over to the High Commissioner's office by Sir Alexander Galt. He knows Canada thoroughly and is thoroughly in sympathy with it. Mr. Reynolds was transferred from the North-west to the office there, particularly under the idea that my hon. friend has mentioned, that the office might have a man who not only had a knowledge of Canada, but was specially versed in matters concerning the North-west and Manitoba, where Mr. Reynolds had passed his time of service. He is an excellent officer and has those advantages in point of knowledge that my hon. friend requires. With reference to Mr. Just, I cannot say certainly, but I think I understood from him that he is a French Canadian. He speaks French and English equally well, and from what experience I had of him when there, and I saw a good deal of him in London and Paris, I consider him a very able young man indeed and thoroughly fitted for his work. Mr. Taylor, if I mistake not, is also a Canadian, but I would not speak positively. However, we have the High Commissioner, Mr. Colmer, Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Just, all of whom are Canadians.

Mr. FOSTER:

Mr. AMYOT. I saw by the newspapers recently that the High Commissioner had gone to Paris to obtain a commercial treaty with France. Has he succeeded in so doing?

Mr. FOSTER. The High Commissioner has, under instructions from the Government here, been in communication with the French authorities for some time. These negotiations were being carried on when the late Prime Minister and myself were in London, and we were both with Sir Charles Tupper for a while in Paris, while he was conducting this matter. The negotiations had been brought nearly to a termination, and I should judge, from the present situation, that there is a probable prospect of some arrangement being come to. As those negotiations are not completely ended, we cannot bring down full information.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will not press for further information, but would ask if there is any prospect of our getting better liquor in consequence.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not much of importance to myself, but as my hon. friend seems to be so much interested in it, I will make inquiries.

Mr. AMYOT. I am very happy to hear what has been said by the Minister of Finance. We have been desiring to extend our commercial relations not only with France, but with all countries possible, and I am glad to hear that there is a possibility of succeeding with France. I believe that if we had a commerce of light wines with that country, unhampered, we might exchange many products; and this is one of the instances where our being represented in England by an intelligent, devoted man, such as Sir Charles Tupper, is a great advantage, and I do not believe that anyone should have the courage to stand up here and carp at the few dollars expense which the High Commissioner may cost the country. Surely, Canada is able to pay her representative and give him sufficient means to represent us with dignity. I knew Sir Charles Tupper was desirous for a long time to open that new market to Canada, and I know he has been powerfully aided by Mr. Fabre in Paris; and I believe the more Canada will be represented, not only in England and France, but in all commercial countries, the greater advantage we will derive. For my part, therefore, I will not grudge this expense, and if it were found necessary to add to that expense in order to make the service more efficient, I would not begrudge the addition. I believe we are interested in every possible way, commercially and financially, in being well represented, and may be more interested, too, at any moment. When there was some difficulty about our cattle, we were very glad to have a man there so active and well informed as Sir Charles Tupper. And who knows that at any moment we will not be in great want of having representation next the throne in England, who knows what circumstance will offer itself in that sense? For my part, I am thankful to the Government for having given these instructions to Sir Charles Tupper, and I hope they will result in complete success.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For my part I hope that Sir Charles Tupper's statements may be always characterized by the painstaking accuracy that distinguished those which he made from his place in this House. We have some painful recollections of the statements he made here and it is possible that they may be equalled by those which he has made now. I rose, however, to ask if a report has been presented from the High Commissioner's office, and, if so, where is it?

Mr. FOSTER. Sir Charles Tupper's report, as far as regards trade matters, is now on its way. I had a cablegram from Sir Charles Tupper a couple of days ago, stating that he had despatched it, and when it arrives it will be submitted to the House. His report on immigration will go to the Immigration Department, and he also makes a general report which goes to the Secretary of State.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To what date is his report brought?

Mr. FOSTER. To the 31st December.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course it would be more convenient that these items should be discussed with the report in hand, which would give a better opportunity of judging of the value, be it much or be it little, of this particular establishment, but if the report goes to so late a period, of course at this early stage we could hardly expect to have it here and printed, but I trust it will be put on the Table and put in type as soon as possible. I should also like to see the report of Mr. Fabre.

Mr. FOSTER. The report of Mr. Fabre accompanies it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Last year when we were taking the vote of $10,000 for commercial agencies, I think the hon. gentleman stated that there were to be consular agencies and that the different agents would be utilised in such a way as to obtain information and give facilities to those who were desirous of opening up foreign trade. Is this correspondence carried on through Sir Charles Tupper's office and are the reports made through him to some department of the Government here, or is the correspondence direct with one of the departments here, if it has been inaugurated at all, and, if so, with what department?

Mr. FOSTER. That has been under the charge of the Minister of Finance up to the end of the year, when it was transferred to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who will have it under his charge in future. However, having had it for the first year, and having appointed a number of these agents, I propose to bring down the first report of the commercial agents myself. It is now being printed, and will be laid before the House as soon as I get Sir Charles Tupper's report from England and can bring that down.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then this correspondence comes directly to your department?

Mr. FOSTER. The correspondence from the agents outside of Great Britain has come direct to my department; but I have directed those in Great Britain to report to the High Commissioner, who reports to me.

Mr. FRASER. I did not hear the answer to a question by an hon. gentleman in front of me as to whether the Finance Minister has assented to any terms with France in regard to the importation of light wines.

Mr. FOSTER. I have assented to nothing. I said that negotiations were going on and were not finished.

Mr. FRASER. I asked the question, because I thought it would be an important piece of testimony to send before the Prohibition Commission.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is quite welcome to make anything he likes out of it. If I can make arrangements which are in favour of Canada as a whole, I am quite willing to sacrifice myself to that extent, and to afford my hon. friend any gratification he can draw from the circumstance.

Mr. FRASER. I had no personal reference whatever, and the hon. gentleman need not be so thin-skinned. I never thought of the hon. gentleman; but I said it was an important statement to go before that commission if it were correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to state why I was led to suppose that there were two offices in London carrying on this immigration business. At page B-9 of the Auditor-General's report, under the expense of the High Commissioner's Office, I find an amount of $1,157 paid for postage. Then, on page B-184, I find $2,083.89 paid for postage. I would like to know how a separate and distinct postage account is kept, first for Sir Charles Tupper's office and then in connection with the item on page 184. I think it would appear to anybody who examined the report that there must be two separate and distinct offices. We find on page B-184 an expense on immigration in London, amounting to $18,022.39, and then under the High Commissioner's office we find the amount I have referred to before. Consequently, I was led to suppose that there were two distinct offices. I am sure that we are all glad to get the extended explanation we have had from the Finance Minister. We have been worrying at him for the last four years in order to get some distinct idea of the duties performed by the High Commissioner in London; but we have never been able to get it. The Minister of Finance had to go to London and to the High Commissioner's office and examine for himself before he could give the House an idea of the duties which are performed there. Of course, when the report of the High Commissioner comes before the House we will have some idea of the duties he performs. Last year we carefully investigated the High Commissioner's report, and after that investigation we could not see that there was enough service rendered for the money which was expended. My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) seems to think that we should feel proud of the High Commissioner in London, and the services he renders to the country. Well, my hon. friend has got new light with regard to the High Commissioner. He has changed his views with regard to him as well as with regard to other things. However, we are glad to receive the information which has been given, and from time to time we will seek further information with regard to the duties the High Commissioner performs. The whole thing costs this country from $43,000 to $45,000 a year. That is a very important item and justifies us in devoting some considerable time to its discussion.

Contingencies, rent and insurance on office, income tax, fuel, light, stationery, &c., and amount -- $2,000 -- required towards the contingent expenses (water, light, fuel, carriage-hire, cabs and railway fare) of the High Commissioner, and $1,200, for contingencies, rates, taxes, insurance, ground rent, &c., of the official residence, including income tax. $10,700 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. FOSTER. The increase of $500 is due to some little improvements which have to be made in the High Commissioner's office. It requires new matting and some additional furniture. One of the rooms that is used is a sort of annex to the library, and needs some fitting up.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know if this is the first season we have had to pay an income tax upon the official's salaries?

Mr. FOSTER. No, it has always been paid.

Mr. LAURIER. I would call again the attention of the House to a matter which we discussed last year, and that is, that in reality that amount for contingencies is put down under a false pretense. If we look at the Auditor-General's Report, we find that out of the amount voted for contingencies there is an allowance to Sir Charles Tupper of $2,000. This is simply given to him in addition to his salary to make it $12,000 instead of $10,000. Now, if it be convenient—and I do not say it is not—to pay to Sir Charles Tupper $12,000 instead of $10,000, let the money be so voted. But it is an absolute dereliction of duty to vote money for one purpose and appropriate it for another. I do not complain for my part of the office of Sir Charles Tupper; I think in his capacity as High Commissioner he can render very efficient service to the country, and I do not grudge the money we pay him. The only fault I find with Sir Charles Tupper is, that on certain occasions he assumes duties which are altogether at variance and incompatible with his office as High Commissioner. He is paid as Commissioner a salary of $10,000. We vote in all for his office about $18,000. Out of that the only amount which he spends for his office proper is $15,000, and $2,000 more is paid him directly under the name of an allowance, that is to say, it is an increase of his salary. I do not object to it if it is to be an addition to his salary, but it is a false pretense to have this money voted for contingencies when in reality it is a part of his salary.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no doubt something in what the hon. gentleman says. The $2,000 allowance is paid to Sir Charles Tupper quarterly, just the same as his salary. It was, however, given at first in the nature of an allowance. There are numerous expenses which the Commissioner must necessarily incur outside his personal expenses, by the very fact that he is High Commissioner, and has to mingle with his confreres in various ways, which necessitates extraordinary expenses to a man in his position. There is no doubt about that, and so it was at first voted as an allowance to cover all these things, without particularizing. But it is entirely immaterial whether it is voted as salary or voted as an allowance so far as the expenditure of the money is concerned, and I have no objection at all after this to have it put on the ground of salary and taken out from the list of contingencies, if my hon. friend will be better pleased with it.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not satisfied to increase the salary of the High Commissioner by $2,000, with all respect to the views of others. I think $10,000 a year, considering that we pay all the running expenses of the establishment, is a good deal. Remember that this $10,000 a year is free of rent and of taxes, and a great many services which a man has to pay out of his salary under ordinary circumstances. If it is proposed to increase the salary to $12,000, then you should make him pay all these expenses. We are continually appointing men to office here at remunerative rates and afterwards supplementing their salaries in these indirect ways. For example we appointed a commandant at Kingston at the head of the school at a reasonable salary to begin with, and then we purchased a house for him, just as we did for the High Commissioner, and at a cost wholly incompatible with the salary ; and, just as in the High Commissioner's case, this house is a standing bill of expense to us every year. I think it is a mistake to proceed in this way. The High Commissioner is not likely to be changing his office very often. I was opposed to the investment of nearly $50,000 for a leasehold for the High Commissioner. Now that we have purchased a property, we are called upon to bear an annual expense in maintaining it. Although originally Parliament was informed by the High Commissioner himself when his office was created that $3,500 annually would pay the rent, taxes and maintenance of the house, yet no sooner was the office created than an enormous outlay was entered upon on capital account, and still a larger annual sum is required to maintain these services. I think the proper way for dealing with this matter is to strike out the item of $2,000. I entirely agree with the leader of the Opposition that we have no right to vote $2,000 for any part of the public service and not be able to give a voucher to the public explaining the manner in which it was expended. When the Public Accounts Committee asked a voucher for that sum, and that a statement should be made as to how it was expended, because it was not supposed to be given as an increase of salary, but it was to be expended as any person in the service would expend petty cash, the High Commissioner sent one to this effect: "Received from the Government $2,000." This shows that the money has not been paid out in the proper way, or at all events that the original intention was being departed from, by the manner in which the High Commissioner has treated Parliament. I maintain that if that money is paid to the High Commissioner for services, the details should be furnished; if it was paid for salary, it should be so stated; at the same time I cannot give my assent to an increase of salary to that extent. All evidence goes to show that the High Commissioner in London has, to use a common expression, a very soft thing. There is no supervision over him. The description that he is sacrificing himself, that he spends long hours daily in his office, is a very good statement to make on the floor of Parliament, but the High Commissioner appears to be able to take his jaunt all over the continent when he likes. Every little while we have a cable message that Sir Charles Tupper has just gone to Spain to conclude an important commercial treaty between that country and Canada. But we do not hear any more about it until attention is called to the fact that his expenses are increasing. Then we have a cablegram stating that Sir Charles Tupper has just left for Germany, that he has gone with some great iron men to lay the foundation for a commercial treaty between Germany and Canada ; and so we have cables telling us constantly that Sir Charles Tupper is earnestly devoting himself to the interests of Canada in those many pleasant ways. But nothing has come from those labours for several years. Those jaunts over Europe and occasional trips to see this Government about election times are all said to be made in order to promote Canadian commerce ; yet I should like to know what the High Commissioner has done for Canadian commerce from the time of his appointment until this moment. I have been told, and I will give him credit for it, assuming it to be correct, that he rendered important service in preventing Canadian cattle being scheduled. I will set against that service the fact that on another important occasion he did not prevent our cattle being scheduled and at this particular moment our cattle are scheduled. The danger which he is said to have averted on one occasion has at last overtaken us ; but that may not have been his fault. I should like to know in what way the High Commissioner has enlarged the commerce of Canada with other nations. It has simply been a march up and down the country. I should like to know who discharges his duties when he comes here on election trips, and whether he draws his salary during the week, or month, he remains in this country. Has he been paid at the rate of $10,000 per annum to stump this country on behalf of the Government ? I ask the Minister of Finance whether the High Commissioner's salary was paid during the time he stumped in Canada, fighting the cause of the Government in the election of 1887.

Mr. FOSTER. I never saw him on the stump.

Mr. MULOCK. The papers told us that such was the case, and there was evidence that he was here. It was highly improper for an officer in his position to take the course he adopted. He is not entitled to any special consideration until he recognizes the proper position he should occupy. There must be due discipline in all branches of the service, and it is indecent on the part of the High Commissioner of Canada to engage in party warfare so long as he occupies his present position. The theory is that whoever enters the Civil Service should keep aloof from party politics. They are not compelled to serve any party and are not compelled to abandon their party allegiance ; but they have no right to abandon their duties in order to take part in the elections. The Minister of Finance very properly feels that this is an indefensible transaction, and he has nothing to say about it ; at the same time I think it is due to the House and the country that it should be made known whether the High Commissioner was paid for the time he absented himself from his duties to take part in elections for the benefit of a political party in Canada.

Mr. AMYOT. I altogether differ from my hon. friend. I do not consider the High Commissioner as belonging to the Civil Service. If the Liberal party should come into power, would it not feel at liberty to depose Sir Charles Tupper and replace him by some gentleman of their own political allegiance ?

What guarantee would Sir Charles Tupper or any High Commissioner possess that a change of Government would not involve a change of person as High Commissioner. The High Commissioner does not belong to the Civil Service. It is true he visited Canada during the last election. He came to Quebec, and when there he stated that there would be a splendid hotel erected which would attract strangers of the travelling public. He further stated that there would be elevators provided, and deep navigation. These statements have turned out to be true. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are now building a splendid hotel in Quebec. If Sir Charles Tupper came to Canada to induce the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to undertake these works he has rendered great service to Quebec, because that city is now getting out of the state of poverty in which it has been kept for many years, and if Sir Charles Tupper left England and came here in order to secure those results, I am grateful to him. But I understand it is charged that he occupies a political position. It is true he belongs to a certain party, and I am not surprised that at election times he works for that party. I look upon him as one of the Ministers of the Crown, one who is not responsible directly to Parliament, but to the Government, and the Government are responsible directly to Parliament; but to assign him to the position of a humble public servant, attached to the Civil Service, is not stating correctly his position.

Mr. LAURIER. Sir Charles Tupper is certainly not to be mistaken for a civil servant. He is more than that: he is the Ambassador of Canada in London, if he is anything at all. Are we to be told that our Ambassador has the right to leave his office, come to this country and take part in the elections? It is a most indecent act. Sir Charles Tupper has done so, and in doing so has simply prostituted the dignity of his office, there is no other term for it. As Ambassador of Canada, he does not represent any party, but all parties. He is paid with the money of the whole people of Canada, and it is simply lowering the dignity of his office for Sir Charles to come here in such a capacity. I repeat, it lowers the dignity of the office when we are told that he has a right to step from the position which he occupies, to come here to take part in election meetings, and to do the business of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the city of Quebec. The city of Quebec is entitled to justice, and it wants no favour from the hands of anybody. It wants justice and nothing else. With regard to the question immediately before us, I may say that the answer of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was not satisfactory. The hon. gentleman says the point is well taken, that the money is voted for one object, and it is not applied to that object at all. The money is voted for contingencies but a part of it is taken from that object and paid as salary. I again repeat, that if it is to be paid as a salary, let it be paid as a salary, but it seems to me that the hon. gentleman is altogether wrong when he says that it is immaterial to the people of Canada when money is voted for one purpose that it should be applied to another. I cannot agree to that.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say so.

Mr. LAURIER. Then, what did the hon. gentleman say? Was it not the purport of his answer? The sum we vote as contingencies for the office of Sir Charles Tupper, the Minister of Finance himself admits, is really paid to Sir Charles Tupper as a part of his salary. As I understood the hon. gentleman, he gave as a reason for that: that the salary of Sir Charles Tupper would be insufficient without it, because Sir Charles Tupper paid the cost of receptions and so on. I do not dispute anything of that kind, but, Sir, I altogether repudiate the doctrine that money which is voted for one purpose should be applied to another. That is what I object to, and I trust the Minister of Finance will pardon me for saying that I am surprised at the looseness of his morals in matters of finance. The hon. gentleman said it was immaterial that we should vote money for one purpose and that it should be applied to another.

Mr. FOSTER. I never said so. The hon. gentleman is misrepresenting what I said, and misrepresenting it after I stated to him twice that I did not say so.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman state what he said?

Mr. FOSTER. I will. I interrupted the hon. gentleman when he misrepresented me at the time he was on his feet, and I asked him if he would be kind enough to allow me to finish my sentence before he interrupted me, as he seemed to consider I was doing wrong in offering the explanation. What I stated was: It was immaterial whether the $2,000 a year, paid as a matter of salary, is voted for salary or voted for allowance, so far as the expenditure itself was concerned. The hon. gentleman interrupted me before I got the latter part of my sentence out. I did not say it was immaterial in the sense which he attributed to me, and neither did I advocate the doctrine that it was proper to vote money for one purpose and apply it to another.

Mr. LAURIER. Is that all the explanation?

Mr. FOSTER. That is sufficient, I think.

Mr. LAURIER. Then it amounts to this, that it is immaterial whether money is voted to be paid to Sir Charles Tupper as salary or allowance?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is misrepresenting me again.

Mr. LAURIER. Then the hon. gentleman is not happy in the manner of expressing himself.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I was both happy and plain in the manner of my expression. I think the fault is not with me but with the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. LAURIER. The fault is with the hon. gentleman. I do not understand what he means, and I do not think he has explained it to the House. What I complain of is that the money is voted to be paid as contingencies for the office of Sir Charles Tupper, and here is the explanation of it given in the item :

$2,000 required towards contingencies, expenses-water, light, fuel, carriage-hire, cabs and railway fares.

That is what the money is voted for, and $2,000 of that money goes, not for light, not for fuel, not for cab-hire, not for railway fares, but simply into the pocket of Sir Charles Tupper for his own personal expenses. That is voting money under false pretences, and that is what I object to. I say that the hon. gentleman has not given us any explanation as to that. The only explanation he gives is, that he shall not do it any more in the future, but, Sir, I object to it at this moment. I repeat what I said a moment ago : if it be proper to give Sir Charles Tupper an extra $2,000 a year, let it be given to him, but let not the money be voted for cab-hire and fuel and so on, and then be given to Sir Charles Tupper himself personally. That is what I object to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, after what the hon. Minister has admitted, he must see that this vote ought, in all conscience, be reduced by $2,000, and a vote taken elsewhere. If he and the Government choose to take the responsibility of raising Sir Charles Tupper's salary to $12,000 a year, then, on their shoulders be it. We on our side of the House may have our own opinion of the matter. We may divide or we may not, but we certainly have the right to object, and the House ought not to sanction a proposal to smuggle an additional salary of $2,000 a year through in this way. The hon. gentleman had ample warning. Last year the thing was allowed to go through after an expression of penitence on his part, as well as I recollect, but his penitence is not of a fruitful kind. We have now repeated precisely the same offence against the customs and rules which ought to govern the expenditure of public money. I think the hon. gentleman, in his position of Minister of Finance, after what he has stated, owes it to himself to reduce this vote by $2,000. It is a very bad example to set.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It should be understood that when this House votes money for a certain purpose, that money should be applied to the purpose for which it is voted, and it does not come well from the Government to say that it does not make much difference after it is voted whether it is expended for its special purpose or not. It is desirable that we should not have that sort of financial morality introduced into any estimates passed by this House. It is a course which should be studiously avoided by the Government, and reprobated by every member of Parliament. It is well known that Sir Charles Tupper left his duties in England during the time of an election, and remained here for a considerable time. The Minister of Finance indicates that he is a hard-working man in London, that he has not a moment to be away from his duties, except when he is making treaties or doing something of that kind. Well, if the business, and the duties, and if the honours of the office demand his whole attention, how is it possible for him to come to Canada and remain a month or two months and to take part in elections. I understand, if my memory serves me correctly, that Sir Charles Tupper was paid something in the neighbourhood of $4,000 on the occasion of that remarkable trip. He gave up his functions as ambassador in London, he came out here as an election agent, he did nothing except what was in the interest of the political party with which he was allied, and he left his high office to advocate party ends, and party interest. He had forgotten his duties, he had forgotten the dignity that appertains to that office as ambassador of Canada, living in the city of London, and when he did that, he was guilty of conduct which an ambassador should not be guilty of. My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) stated that Sir Charles Tupper rendered some services, because through his influence at the time he got an hotel built at Quebec, and the hon. member seems to regard that as a satisfactory excuse for his absenting himself from the duties of his office. If hotels are an indication of prosperity, you generally find that there are enough of them throughout the country, and if an ambassador has to come all the way from London for the purpose of endeavouring to get the Canadian Pacific Railway to build an hotel at Quebec, what becomes of the influence and the power of the Government here? If it is desirable in the interest of the trade and commerce of the city of Quebec that an hotel should be erected there, why have the Government to send for their ambassador to London to urge upon the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the propriety of building that hotel? Have the Government not the power themselves to do it? Have the Government not as much power as Sir Charles Tupper, or does he run the Government, and does he run the Canadian Pacific Railway, and does he run the whole Dominion from his office in London? Is it possible that they make that admission? Is it possible that that is the justification for his coming here at that time? Now, Sir Charles Tupper did other things on that occasion which were not judicious in one occupying his position. He attacked the Grand Trunk Railway and did everything he possibly could to destroy its credit at home and abroad. That was foreign to the duty of an ambassador of this Government to England. It is well known that this office is a very extravagant one; but all the time we are told that Sir Charles Tupper is about to make a treaty with Spain or with some other country, and we have heard in this House again and again that, through the powerful influence he wielded in the British Empire, he was enabled to prevent the Board of Trade scheduling our cattle at a very important time. Sir Charles Tupper has been in England ever since, and our cattle are now scheduled there. If he had the power and the influence to prevent the Government doing it before, his influence must be waning, if he is not able to do it now. His usefulness must be gone, and he should be recalled.

Some hon. MEMBERS. There is a Grit Government.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is a great pity for this country that there is not a Grit Government here now. If there were, it would not be necessary to have such a man there in that capacity. We remember how the ambassador appointed by Mr. Mackenzie, when he was in power, was criticised. The Minister of Finance asks us not to criticise now. He says we should have some regard to the position and to the services that Sir Charles Tupper has rendered, and should forbear to say a word against him. He does not remember, because he was not in the House at the time—and very few members of the Government were in the House, because most of them are young men in statesmanship—how fault was found with everything done in the High Commissioner's office in Mr. Mackenzie's time. I remember how Senator Bowell, one of the rats that has left the sinking ship and has got a comfortable seat for himself in the Senate, almost fell down with paralysis because one of the attendants at the door of the High Commissioner's office had brass buttons on his coat. Yet the Minister of Finance now asks us not to say anything in the way of criticism of Sir Charles Tupper. We are going to vote the money to him, not in the way of salary, but as an allowance. It makes no difference in which way it is voted they say. When I consider the composition of the Government I am not surprised at the position they take. I am not surprised, because matters of commerce and matters of state are very new to the gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches to-day. Most of them have not been in the House for more than a few years, and have not had a due training in statesmanship. That is why they think that to vote money for one purpose and devote it to another is a high form of statesmanship. I say it is trifling, not only with the House, but with their own supporters and with the country, and I hope we shall not have any more of this kind of financial morality from the Finance Minister.

Mr. AMYOT. I am not ashamed of my opinion, and it does not bind any body but myself. I believe Sir Charles Tupper, while acting as the ambassador of Canada in England, should be well paid, so that he will be able to maintain the position due to his rank. Nor do I see any prostitution or anything improper in his crossing the Atlantic to take part in an election in his own country. When he did that, he was no longer ambassador, but was simply Sir Charles Tupper, doing what any other Canadian could do. And to the city of Quebec and that part of the country Sir Charles Tupper was of great service, because he inaugurated a new state of activity and prosperity there. For over thirty years the city of Quebec had been going backwards instead of keeping pace with the prosperity of the other cities of the Dominion; but to-day we are glad that Sir Charles Tupper left his high functions in London for a few weeks to come to Quebec on that occasion. That is my humble opinion, and I protest against the word prostitution being used with regard to that visit. My hon. friend does not admit the propriety of Sir Charles Tupper leaving his office in England to come here and take part in the election; but his argument would have been stronger if he could have told us what interest of Canada had suffered during Sir Charles Tupper's absence. If I am shown that Sir Charles Tupper abandoned some actual interest that required his presence in London, I would be ready to blame him; but so long as that has not been shown, I contend that not only Sir Charles Tupper, but any other High Commissioner, Liberal or Conservative, may leave England and come back to Canada during an election to help the party that sustains him there, and that represents the policy which he supports. I claim that Sir Charles Tupper came and did a good service for Quebec, not only for the hotel, but for the good of Canada. He inaugurated a new era of prosperity for Quebec, and personally I am thankful to him for having done that.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) is entirely mistaken as to what Sir Charles Tupper did when he came to Quebec. He never thought of building the hotel, but spoke of building quite another thing, and that is the bridge across the St. Lawrence. At a meeting Sir Charles Tupper held in Quebec, he told the citizens they might consider the bridge as almost an accomplished fact. He stated that with as much emphasis and confidence as some years before he stated that there would be 740,000,000 bushels of wheat produce before this in the North-west. The new hotel however never entered into his calculations.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. This item has been under discussion yearly for a number of years, and I think I am correct in saying that two years ago the Finance Minister promised to take into serious consideration the advisability of taking this vote out of contingencies and adding it to Sir Charles Tupper's salary, making his salary $12,000, which is really what he obtains. Last year he again made the same promise, on the same arguments being brought forward, that every expenditure should be made in accordance with its vote. I do not think it would be any great condescension on his part to supplement the promise he made some two or three years ago by performance. If Sir Charles Tupper is to receive a salary of $12,000, and that is the salary he really receives, it ought to appear at that figure in the estimates, and I cannot see that we are doing any injustice to him, or that we are asking the Government to do anything they ought not to do, when we ask them simply as a matter of business to vote Sir Charles Tupper a salary of $12,000, when that is what he really receives. With regard to the statement of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), that the city of Quebec has been drawn out of the mud and the mire, in which he describes it as having been for so many years, by the building of a tavern, it is something new for the members of this House to learn that the oldest city in the Dominion of Canada is to be elevated to a point which it never attained before, because Sir Charles Tupper came out to this country and got an additional hotel or tavern built in that city, so that the citizens there might have the opportunity of getting a good meal and a glass of French wine when they required them. If I am correctly informed by gentlemen conversant with the course pursued by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), during the time Sir Charles Tupper was out in this country, the hon. member opposed him through thick and thin, and denounced him not only on the stump but in the newspaper he was publishing at the time. We ought to have some explanation with regard to this change of sentiment. Was it because there is another hotel being built in Quebec that the hon. gentleman has come to the conclusion that Sir Charles Tupper has done so much for this country? Is it because Sir Charles Tupper exercised his influence as Ambassador in England to induce the Canadian Pacific Railway to build an additional tavern or hotel in Quebec that the hon. member for Bellechasse now lauds him to the skies as a benefactor of his country? As I understand it, Quebec has heretofore been furnished with very good hotels. I visited that city and stopped at some of the hotels, and I think they can be said to be very good ones; but they were evidently not up to the standard of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), and he therefore has come to the conclusion that Sir Charles Tupper did a great thing for the people when he used his influence to get this addition made. The hon. gentleman, however, is not consistent, for when Sir Charles was here arranging for the erection of that hotel the hon. gentleman kept continually fighting him, and declared that, being our ambassador in the mother country, he had no right to come out to this country and exercise his influence in favour of the Government. The hon. gentleman ought to rise and explain this sudden change of sentiment.

Mr. AMYOT. I am ready to oblige the hon. gentleman by standing up and telling him all about my humble self. He accuses me of having spoken and written against Sir Charles Tupper because of his trip to Canada. The hon. gentleman had better be prudent. Where are his witnesses? He says he has been so informed. Let him take care lest he might have been informed by some heads very light, who do not know what they are about and cannot prove what they say. I will tell him this: that I have never written one word against Sir Charles Tupper in my life, and have never uttered one word against him, and I will recall to the hon. gentleman some six or seven years ago, when I was in Opposition, I made a speech in this House praising Sir Charles Tupper for his efforts to obtain a commercial treaty with France. Now, the hon. gentleman tries to sneer at me because of the new hotel in the city of Quebec, which he compares to a tavern. I am sorry that at his age he is not able to distinguish between what will be one of the finest hotels in the world and a poor tavern. The Canadian Pacific Railway is building an hotel which is to be one of the finest structures and which will be advertised all over the world, and we expect that many thousands of strangers from the old country will come every year to Canada to visit that hotel and the splendid places around it. We see in the future a great amelioration. We see not only a hotel but an elevator that will bring the people of the lower town to the hotel. We see the elevator for grain which the Canadian Pacific Railway is now building, and we see commerce coming back to Quebec, and then when we will have people and commerce we will have a bridge, because it will be a necessity. To-day we cannot have it, because there would be nobody to cross on it. Bring manufactures to Quebec, bring people there from all over the world; and when there will be activity and people, the bridge will come. The hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) has generally a very good memory, but he has forgotten Sir Charles Tupper's pledges, for in speaking of the bridge, Sir Charles Tupper said it would be one of the consequences. He spoke also of the hotel and the elevator and the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and for my part, I said that I not only admitted the implicit right of the High Commissioner to come to Canada and take part in the political fight, but I felt thankful to him, personally, for having inaugurated a new era for the city of Quebec. I would beg my hon. friend to be more prudent when receiving information second-hand about me. He is badly surrounded. He wants to know not the reasons of my changing in reference to Sir Charles Tupper but in reference to my going back to the Conservative party. If he presses me too much I will let him know, but I will not bring that in on the question of Sir Charles Tupper and his status, but if it is for his happiness to know all about it he shall have the information at the proper time.

Mr. DEVLIN. I merely wish to say one word in regard to what has fallen from the hon. member from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). I certainly will not charge him with attacking Sir Charles Tupper directly in this House or out of it, but I find in "Hansard" that, if he did not make a direct charge against him, he watched Sir Charles Tupper pretty closely when in 1891 he asked the Government "Whether the High Commissioner for Canada in London is authorized by the Government to support Imperial Federation and to afford to that scheme his active, officious and official concurrence." I suppose he wanted to know if Sir Charles Tupper could actively take part in a question "belonging to party politics." He referred in his speech to the prosperous condition of the city of Quebec, due largely, he said, to the efforts of Sir Charles Tupper. I was reading a Conservative newspaper the other day in which I saw that a petition from the labourers of Quebec was to be presented to the Government, signed, I think, by 400 labourers, who state that they are without employment in this prosperous city of Quebec, and they ask the Government to attend to work which they claim is now neglected, public buildings belonging to the Government which are neglected in the city of Quebec. I only desire to bring this to the attention of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot).

Mr. LAURIER. I hoped that the Minister of Finance would have reduced this item by $2,000. If he does not, I will move that it be reduced by $2,000.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the Minister intend to reduce the item as we understood?

Mr. FOSTER. The leader of the Opposition has made a motion.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not know whether it was acquiesced in or not. I think the committee has received one important piece of information in this discussion which the country will be glad to know. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), who, I suppose, is most familiar with the needs, the possibilities and the requirements of the city of Quebec, has relieved me of much anxiety, because he has now stated that there is no necessity for this bridge being built in Quebec, that there is no one to walk over it now, though, when this hotel is built, there may be somebody to walk over it. It is gratifying to have that statement on record, because on other occasions the hon. gentleman was one of a number who pressed this matter on the attention of the public.

Mr. AMYOT. No. I only required a ferry service as an introduction to it.

Mr. MULOCK. Now the hon. gentleman takes the hotel service as an introduction to the bridge service. At all events, we have it from him that we need not give ourselves any further anxiety about that $7,000,000 bridge.

Mr. AMYOT. You never had any anxiety about it.

Mr. MULOCK. I think No. 8 was historic in regard to it and in regard to another matter which passed into the history of Quebec at that time. It is satisfactory to learn that the hon. gentleman was mistaken when he was inveigled into No. 8 some nine years ago and was induced to support the construction of that bridge.

Amendment (Mr. Laurier) negatived on division.

Post Office Department, to pay officers of the Savings Bank Branch engaged in the balancing of and computing interest on depositors' accounts, to 30th June, 1893. . . . $2,600

Mr. FLINT. I rise, not to make any objection to the item under discussion, but it seems to me that this is a very good opportunity to put in a plea for a more careful statement of statistics with reference to savings banks. In my efforts as a member of this House to look into the statistics as to the Government savings banks and the Post Office savings banks I have found considerable difficulty in ascertaining what I required. Turning to the Statistical Abstract furnished to members, and which in the main is of considerable utility, I find that, while the compiler has given a very careful statement as to the number of officers, the number of depositors, the amount on deposit, the average amount per head of the population and so on, in the Post Office savings banks those items were not given in regard to the Government savings banks. It is possible that those items may be given in some other blue book, but I have not been able to lay my hand upon it, and I would ask the Minister to make a note of it and to see whether we cannot have all the statistics as to the savings bank deposits of the people tabulated in one place so that we may have an idea of our progress. We are aware that scarcely a speech is made by any Minister that does not touch upon the deposits in the savings banks, and it is important to know the changes that take place from time to time in regard to these particulars. I am astonished to find that the compiler of the Statistical Abstract, while giving a great many of these figures as to the Post Office savings banks, has omitted them in regard to the Government savings banks. This a subject I have had in my mind for some time, and as the estimates under consideration deals indirectly with it. I would ask the minister's attention to it in order that these matters may be laid more completely before those who are interested in their study.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to draw the attention of the House to a point that I have already raised on several occasions, that is, paying clerks for extra time in connection with this item. This is a repetition of the evil that is creeping into every department. Here, it appears, that quarterly, or half yearly, it is necessary to make up the books in the Post Office Department, so as to permit those who wish to draw their accumulated interest, or have it added to the principal, may do so, so that the returns can be made up to a certain date, and a little extra work has got to be done. The clerks in the department are supposed to be there from half-past nine in the morning to four o'clock in the afternoon, with an hour for recess, and they are asked to put in a few extra hours for the purpose of calculating interest and getting the pass-books of the depositors in such a position that the sums can be added to their accounts. I understand that this is what this charge is for. Now, take wholesale firms in this country; when they take stock and their clerks are asked to work for two, or three, or four weeks in the evening, perhaps till ten or twelve o'clock at night, do they get extra pay? I think not. I do not know a single institution, either incorporated, or a joint stock company, or an individual, that pay extra to their clerks when it becomes necessary, owing to the pressure of work, that they should do a little extra service. I know the Postmaster-General last year explained that these men were in a better position to do this kind of work, and that it could be done better by them than by securing extra clerks. I contend it should be done even if they have to put in extra time, but without extra pay. There is a staff in the several departments whose salaries are equal to, if not in excess of, the salaries of any other class in this Dominion. School teachers, ministers, bank clerks, wholesale clerks, all these classes are not paid on an average as much per head as we pay to our civil servants, and not in one single case is an allowance made for extra services. Now, I ask why it is that this system of paying civil servants for extra work has been inaugurated, and enlarged, and extended in connection with every department of the Government? I say it is wrong, it is unjust to the people of this country, it is a great evil, and it is increasing every year. If you look in the Auditor-General's Report from page A-15 to A-16 you will find a whole list of people that are drawing extra pay for extra hours. Now, I contend that the present Postmaster should immediately make a rule in his department that these people shall be required, when it becomes necessary in the case of adding interest, to do a few hours of extra work without getting extra pay. Why, Sir, it seems that in every department now, as soon as a man gets a position in the service, he begins to look around and see how he can possibly make a charge for extra services. I have been in the Post Office Department and some others, and I do not think these people are worked very hard, and they could well afford to do a little extra work when necessary. I say that when work accumulates on their hands and it is necessary to do a little extra work, it is not right that they should ask or be permitted to draw extra pay for it. Civil servants in this country are paid on an average very nearly $1,000 a head, and I would like you to point out any other class in this Dominion that is as well paid. Bank clerks are not as well paid, school teachers are not as well paid, ministers are not as well paid; there is no other class that draw an average allowance of a thousand dollars a year. They are subject to no tax on income, they are not subject to many charges that others have to meet. I see that some of them by charging for an hour, an hour and a-half, each day, go as high as 540 hours of extra work, for which they charge 50 cents an hour, and they are allowed to draw pay for it. I would like to know from the Postmaster-General whether it is his intention to keep on encouraging clerks in the direction of drawing extra pay. The first time that this item of counting interest in the savings banks of the post office was brought before the House, the sum was only about $75, but now we are asked to pay $2,500 for that purpose. It is increasing every year. I suppose the Postmaster-General will say that the deposits are increasing, and consequently this work will increase. That may be true, but the system should never have been initiated. A mistake was made in the beginning, and now it ought to be corrected.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman has criticised the practice that is followed not only in Canada but in almost every country, so far as my limited experience goes, and I admit that my experience is limited in the department over which I preside at present. The hon. gentleman knows that in England and in the United States this practice has been adopted and successfully followed, for the reason that the permanent employees of the department in that special branch are more capable, and in fact are the only men who can successfully handle the books of the department. Now, I can tell my hon. friend that it is really in the interest of the public that this extra pay is granted for extra work. The hon. gentleman, with his practical mind, has already answered his objection by stating that the reason of the increase is the increasing wealth of the country and the increasing number and amount of the deposits in the savings banks of the Post Office Department; and the men who have the supervision of the books are the only men who, at a given date, are able rapidly to bring down the accounts to the dates when they should be brought down. Now, Sir, I wish to say that I have given more than ordinary attention to the department since I took charge of it, and I can say that the work of the Post Office Department is every day increasing in accordance with the requirements of the country, because it is well known that post offices are being constantly opened up in new sections which are being populated by our own people or those from other countries. I have no doubt that my predecessor in the department will bear testimony to the fact that we have a staff which, with very few exceptions, would be a credit to any department in any country. When my hon. friend considers the reason why that expenditure of $2,500 was made, he will arrive at the conclusion to which I have arrived, that it is an indication of the prosperity of Canada and is the cheapest way of doing the work, and at the same time the most successful way.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, is stating what he conceives to be a fact, that granting the services have to be performed, they can be more cheaply performed by allowing the clerks to work extra hours rather than by employing outside men. I am not, however, prepared to accept the example of the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not generally willing to take the United States as an example in any way, and in this case I do not think they should adopt it. I am not prepared to adopt the system followed in England. The salaries there for civil servants are not so high as are paid here. The hon. gentleman refers to the fact that increased deposits in the savings bank furnish evidence of increased wealth. That is the contention tenaciously held by hon. gentlemen opposite. If that principle is correct it is a reasonable conclusion that when the deposits decrease the people are getting poor. Is it not a fact that the deposits have decreased for some years past, and will the hon. gentleman admit that the country is getting poor? I do not approve of the system adopted and that is being carried out from year to year, of granting payment for extra hours to employees. There is no bank where the clerks have not to put in extra hours to get out their monthly and quarterly returns, and yet they receive no extra pay. There is not a wholesale house in Montreal or Toronto where the clerks do not work until 10 or 12 at night in the spring and at stock taking, without receiving extra pay. When this practice is followed by bankers and wholesale merchants, it should be adopted in the Civil Service.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

ADJOURNMENT—THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Before the House adjourns I desire to repeat the question I asked the Government earlier in the day.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has given me an intimation of what the question was which he brought to the notice of the House on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply; and I regret I was not here at the moment. I beg to say in reply to the hon. gentleman, that communication has been had with Her Majesty's Government in recent years past with respect to the importance of the Hawaiian Islands as a possible station in connection with telegraphy, and in connection with other Canadian interests which are involved in the independence of that country. As regards recent movements, no communication has passed between the Canadian Government and Her Majesty's Government, partly on account of our being aware from what transpired before, that Her Majesty's Government was well aware of the interests involved, and partly because we had other reasons to believe that Her Majesty's Government was fully alive to the importance, as regards Canadian interests and other interests of the Empire as to those islands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to ask the Minister of Finance one question. The First Minister intimated that the Budget was not likely to be brought down for some weeks. I take it for granted that the Minister of Finance is not in a position to bring it down next week.

Mr. FOSTER. Not next week.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 2nd February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 7) to provide for the repeal of the Electoral Franchise Act; and making certain provisions in place of the same.—(Mr. Charlton.)

COMPULSORY VOTING.

Mr. AMYOT moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) to make voting compulsory. He said: This is the Bill as reported last year by the select committee, after many sittings. The committee reported the Bill unanimously, but it was then too late in the session to proceed with it. This year, however, I intend to ask the House to pass the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 9) to amend the Act respecting the Civil Service of Canada, being chapter 17, R.S.C. He said: The amendment proposes that no person shall be appointed to the Civil Service of Canada unless he can read, write and speak both the English and French languages, and unless he has been a resident in the Dominion of Canada during the three previous years.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. COATSWORTH moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 10) to make further provisions as to the prevention of cruelty to animals, and to amend chapter 172 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: There need not be much said at this stage in explanation of the Bill. Chapter 172 of the Revised Statutes of Canada makes provision for offences relating to cruelty to animals, and the Bill which I introduce is to extend the scope of that Act. It has been found in the practical operation of the Act that there are omissions from it which render it, to a certain extent, inoperative. I might mention a great many cases. For instance, I have before me some statements as to the carriage of animals in the cars. I propose a new section to the Act providing that the cars shall be properly fitted for the carriage of animals. To show the necessity for that, I will mention one or two cases that have occurred for which there is no remedy, and for which no person could be punished. On 3rd October, 1892, there was a cargo shipped in the cars from Pontypool to Toronto, of sixty sheep and forty hogs, in car No. 60982. When they arrived at the cattle market in the city of Toronto, twenty-three lambs and two hogs had been trampled to death; and at the same time and place a car of larger cattle came in and two of the cattle had each a leg broken. Prosecutions were instituted, and it was found that no person was responsible for the injury and death of these animals. In another case, just a few days ago, on 25th of January, the police constable, whose duty it is to enforce this Act in Toronto, reports that there were nineteen cattle, twelve hogs and nine lambs shipped in a Grand Trunk car from Listowel, and two of the lambs were trampled to death by the breaking down of the deck or partition, and no person could be held responsible for it. That is one of the amendments introduced in this Bill. Another amendment is this: It has been found, in many cases, that the owners of animals which become disabled and unfit for use, have turned them adrift, and there is no proper provision in the present Act for the punishment of persons who commit that offence. That is particularly the case where animals are found on private property, and there is no provision in the law to allow the police to enter private property or destroy the animals. This Bill provides that under the authority of two justices of the peace, a police officer may enter such premises and take and destroy such animals. There is one other clause to which I desire to refer as it was contained in the Bill previously before the House, but it is now brought before the House modified in its provisions, and that is the clause regarding pigeon shooting matches. Most of the members will recollect that the object of the former Bill was to prevent pigeon shooting matches. Evidence was read at that time showing there was cruelty practised both before and after the shooting at the pigeons; before the shooting by maiming the birds and in other ways treating them so as to excite them to fly in an erratic manner, making it more difficult to shoot them, and after the shooting by allowing maimed birds to escape and die a lingering death. The object of the Bill is not to prevent shooting matches, but to provide that birds shall not be maimed before the shooting takes place, and that after they must be retrieved and put to death after being wounded and not allowed to escape. These are, in general terms, the provisions of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BREAKWATER AT WEST POINT, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether a survey has been made at West Point, P.E.I. during the season of 1892, for a breakwater at that place?

Mr. OUMET. A survey was made at West Point or West Cape in 1892, not for a breakwater, but to ascertain what would be the cost of reconstructing the pier at this point. Under date 20th June, 1892, a report thereon was received, estimating the cost of rebuilding the destroyed work in a substantial manner at $8,000.

MIMINIGASH BREAKWATER.

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether the contract for a breakwater at Miminigash, P.E.I., has been let? If so, to whom, for what sum, when is the work to be completed, and who is the inspector?

Mr. OUMET. A contract has been given to J. Barclay for the sum of $2,447, the work to be completed on or before 18th July, 1893. The inspector is J. Blanchard.

CASCUMPEQUE HARBOUR.

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether Mr. Davy, C.E., has made a report of his survey of Cascumpeque Harbour, during the year 1892?

Mr. OUMET. An examination has been made of Cascumpeque, and the report will, it is expected, be in the possession of the department next week.

BRITISH CATTLE REGULATIONS.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN asked, Whether the Government has reason to believe that the order of the British Board of Agriculture, requiring the slaughtering of cattle at the point of debarkation in the United Kingdom, will be shortly rescinded?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That has been the subject of very strong communications between the two Governments, which will be presented to the House if desired. I think we are unable to give any assurance on the subject at present.

BRIDGING THE LACHINE CANAL.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN asked, Whether a contract has been given for building an iron bridge over the Lachine Canal within the limits of the city of Montreal? If so, who is the contractor? What is the amount of his tender? How many tenders were received? Was his tender the lowest, and when is the work to be completed?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes; a contract has been given for building an iron swing highway bridge over the Lachine Canal at Wellington street, Montreal. The Dominion Bridge Company, at Montreal, are the contractors. The amount of their tender is $34,400. There were two tenders received. The Dominion Bridge Company's tender was not the lowest. The tenderers were, Dominion Bridge Company, $34,000. Hamilton Bridge Company, $32,000. The plans of the Hamilton Bridge Company did not give a structure of the strength called for by the specification, the bridge engineer of the department reporting that it would take an addition of 80,000 lbs. of steel to bring it up to the required standard of strength. His calculations were verified by Mr. Douglas, the hydraulic engineer of the department. The tender was accepted by an Order in Council dated 16th December, 1892. Hamilton Bridge Company's tender, $32,000. 80,000 lbs. of steel on bridge, $3,200, total $35,200. To be completed on or before 1st May, 1893.

VOLUNTEER RIFLE PRACTICE.

Mr. HUGHES asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant Canadian volunteers and rifle associations organized under Militia Regulations and Orders, Snider ammunition at 5 cents or less per package, and Martini at 10 cents or less per package of ten rounds, such sums being a fair representation of the cost thereof, in order to encourage bona fide rifle practice by reducing the present almost prohibitive personal cost, thus enabling many now debarred on account of the great expense, to practice rifle shooting?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The Government are anxious to encourage bona fide rifle practice on the part of our volunteers, and rifle associations in general. The subject-matter of the hon. gentleman's question is now under serious consideration.

MACKEREL NETS.

Mr. FRASER asked, Do the Government propose to repeal the Order in Council passed on the 21st day of March, 1892, relating to "mackerel nets"?

Mr. COSTIGAN. An officer of the Marine and Fisheries Department is now examining the reports of the several inspectors on the regulations in connection with mackerel fishing, and is to report fully on the subject.

Mr. FRASER. How soon will the report be brought down?

Mr. COSTIGAN. As soon as possible.

GOVERNMENT LOANS.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) (for Sir Richard Cartwright), asked, What is the total amount now borrowed by the Government for periods of less than three years? And from whom have the said amounts been borrowed, for what time and upon what terms?

Mr. FOSTER. $1,460,000, or £300,000, from the Bank of Montreal; six months from 1st January, 1893; 4 per cent, paid quarterly.

MILITIA—CONTRACTS FOR SUPPLIES.

Mr. MULOCK asked, 1. Who are the present contractors for furnishing the Government with militia clothing and boots? 2. Have any steps been taken to recover damages or other compensation from the contractors for loss sustained by reason of the inferior quality of the militia clothing and boots supplied the Government, as mentioned in the report of the officer commanding, dated 30th November, 1892? 3. Is there any contract now in force between said contractors and the Government for the supply of militia clothing or boots? 4. Is any portion of such supply now being manufactured at any of the establishments where the said defective clothing and boots were manufactured?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The contractors for clothing are James O'Brien & Company, of Montreal; Doull & Gibson, Halifax; H. Shorey & Company, Montreal, and the Almonte Woollen Manufacturing Company, of Almonte, Ont. Boots are not contracted for. An allowance is made to the officer in command of the several military schools of so much for boots, $4.87 for winter boots and $2.10 for summer boots, and they are purchased in the several localities where required, with the exception of the boots for the cavalry school at Winnipeg, which are supplied from the stores of the North-west Mounted Police at $3.50 for winter boots and $1.99 for summer boots. No other boots are issued to the militia corps. All contracts for clothing will expire on the 30th June next. As regards complaints in reference to clothing, formal complaints have not been sent in to the civil branch of the Militia Department with very slight exceptions, and when complaints are sent in it is difficult to trace to which contractor the defective article can be assigned, so that up to to-day no action has been taken for damages against any of the contractors who have been supplying the clothing for the militia and volunteer forces. The complaints as to boots were remedied by the local contractors supplying to the local commandant a new issue of boots in lieu of those condemned.

DUTY ON BINDING TWINE.

The House proceeded to further consider the proposed motion of Mr. Mulock: "That it is expedient to place binding twine on the free list;" and the motion of Mr. O'Brien: "That the debate be adjourned."

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps under ordinary circumstances the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) might be considered a reasonable one. Were this question coming up before Parliament for the first time I would not complain if the Government, or some one on behalf of the Government, had asked for a postponement of the motion. But I think there are special circumstances connected with this matter now that would not warrant the House in accepting the amendment of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). Permit me to mention some of these special circumstances. The grievance is not a new one; neither new to the country nor to this House. I had the honour of bringing it to the attention of Parliament in the month of May, 1891. On that occasion I moved a motion similar to that which is now before the House, and at the request of the Government I allowed that motion to stand—acting upon the line of the amendment of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien)—until the month of July. I allowed it to stand at the request of the Government. The request of the Government then advanced was the same as that proposed by the Minister of Finance yesterday, in order to enable the Government to come to a conclusion as to its action upon the proposition. Nevertheless, although two months elapsed between the adjournment of the motion in 1891 and its coming up again, and although the Government tariff policy had been announced in the meantime, it turned out that the postponement of the question simply resulted in this: that we did not get the relief, that the Government having had two months in which to consider the proposition, came to an adverse decision, and as the farmers then in the middle of their harvest, were compelled to buy their supplies of this necessary appliance in connection with their industry. I may say that, after the House had voted down the motion—which it manfully did on the part of the Government supporters in 1891—the matter came before the attention of the farmers of the country, and there was a strong feeling manifested by them that this motion had been unwisely disposed of, and petitions came into Parliament last session asking Parliament to reverse the decision of 1891, and to place binding twine on the free list. A motion similar in effect was made in 1892, and in the month of April of that year, the motion was voted down. The Government, in July, 1891, brought in their tariff changes, and the House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means, and I supposed that from the attention which had been directed towards this matter in the country, we might have expected relief last session. It was not granted, but on the contrary, the Minister of Finance wholly ignored the matter, not even, I think, venturing to refer to it in the course of his tariff speech. Now, we have tried the Government in various ways. In 1891 the House did exactly what my friend from Muskoka asked to-day and postponed coming to a conclusion on the question until the Government had an opportunity of considering it. In 1892 they adopted another course and came to a decision, and thereafter the Government came to a decision as well, both of which were adverse to the farmers in this matter. The Government now evidently desire to be told what is the opinion of the House upon this question. The decision given by the House in 1892, prior to the Government announcing its decision, was adverse to the granting of the relief, and the House having decided in this way, the Government simply followed that decision a couple of months later and refused to interfere with the high duty levied on binding twine. It therefore appears to me, that if there is to be any relief granted, it will only be given on the mandate of the House, and that that mandate must precede the announcement of tariff changes, if there are to be any. I believe, therefore, that it is unreasonable that the Government should now ask that the matter be postponed. It is idle for the First Minister to say that a resolution such as is here formulated would, if adopted, disturb trade. The Government themselves have disturbed trade because they have announced that the mouldering branches of the National Policy would be lopped off. Is this high duty on binding twine a mouldering branch, or is it not? I believe that it is a mouldering branch, and I am not alone in this opinion, because on the other side of the House as well as on this, the opinion is very general that this is a rotten branch which should have been long ago lopped off. I therefore submit that it is of vital importance that this House should now pass a resolution instructing the Government as to the wish of the House upon this matter. Under these circumstances, I think it reasonable that the House should come to a conclusion to-day, and if it comes to a favourable conclusion, you may be sure that the Government will give effect to the voice of this House, which in that case will, I think, be the voice of the country. Therefore, whilst desirous of meeting any Government request with all courtesy, I think the public interest demands that the House should now give an expression of its opinion upon this matter, declaring whether it is in favour of or against the proposition. The motion of adjournment appears to be a dilatory one to defeat it in the long run. That was the effect of the postponement of the question in 1891, and we have no evidence of any repentance on the part of the Minister of Finance since. If I had seen the slightest indication of such, I might have been willing to yield to his request; but I fear that the only way in which we can influence the Minister of Finance on this question is by the strong arm of the House. We must manifest to him the will of the House on the matter; in that way only shall we secure relief to the country from this burdensome tax. It is a question between the farmers on the one side and the combine on the other—it is a question whether the Government are going to fall in with the farmers or aid the combine against the farmers; and, with such an issue before the House, the hon. gentleman should consent to dispose of it at once. There is another circumstance to be considered. It is important that a question of this kind should be determined at an early stage, so that the farmers may know where they are. It should not be adjourned from time to time until the season is far advanced. From now on the farmers will be preparing for their summer's operations, and they ought to know as soon as possible whether they are going to get relief, or whether they are going to have to pay the old-fashioned prices. It is idle for hon. gentlemen to say that the abolition or reduction of the import duty will not reduce the price. We were told the same thing with regard to sugar; but the moment the duty on sugar was reduced, the price of sugar fell by the amount of the duty, and the minister himself loudly boasting in the House, how by the reduction of that duty he had relieved the people of burdens amounting to $3,000,000. By what process of reasoning, then, can he claim that the abolition of the duty on binder twine would not have a similar result? I think the country is becoming convinced that the tariff is a tax and nothing else, and this item in it being a tax resting on the great farming industry of Canada, I think the House cannot too soon relieve that struggling industry of such a burdensome and unjust imposition. I hope, therefore, that the minister will agree to this question being decided on its merits now, and that he will not attempt to escape from a fair issue by a dilatory motion in the shape of one to postpone the decision to a later day.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not want to add anything to the arguments which have been addressed to the House upon both sides in favour of the abolition of this tax—because we have not yet heard anything on the other side of the question. But I would like to say one or two words against the postponement of the consideration of the question as it has been brought before the House by my hon. friend who has just spoken. Now, it occurs to me that this is not in any sense, a want of confidence motion. Therefore, I and ought not to be considered in any sense, cannot understand why the Government should oppose a vote of the House being freely taken upon it. In fact, it is not even a censure upon the past conduct of the Government, though perhaps there was room for such a course being taken. It is simply a proposal to express the opinion of the House as a whole upon a certain tax imposed upon the people, and surely on such a subject the House is entitled to give an expression of its opinion for the guidance of the Government. The Government can only be considered to be, after all, a committee of this House, bound to try to carry out the wishes of the House. Is not the House, outside the Cabinet, entitled to advise upon the reduction or abolition of an important tax? I surely think it can do so; in fact, it is its duty to do so. We are not here, on either side, simply to register the decrees of the Cabinet, who may come to a conclusion in secret conclave as to whether a tax shall be reduced or not. I wonder whether it is the only function of the members who usually support the Government to follow their lead, or to give them independent advice upon questions of that kind. While of course it has been settled as the practice of Parliament that private members of the House cannot create a tax, they have the absolute right to propose a reduction in the tariff; and when the Government intervene between the action of the members of the House in making such a proposition, I think they are going a little beyond their constitutional right. Now, if the Government again disappoint the House, as they did last session, and if, when they come to propose their changes in the tariff, if they have any, they omit to propose a reduction or the abolition of this duty, what sort of position will they place their supporters in? At that stage of the proceedings it will be impossible for their supporters to vote, as we know many of them believe, in favour of the abolition of this tax, without voting a direct censure upon the Government. Now, I think that would be a very awkward position in which to place even those members of this House who support the Government; and it would place the members upon this side of the House in a rather awkward position also, because if we should condemn the neglect of the Government to abolish this tax after they had decided that as their policy, then we would be accused of simply acting from factious and partizan motives. Now, surely it is a mistake for the Government or for the House to propose the postponement of a vote upon this question. If the Government have decided, either in their own conclave or the larger conclave of their supporters which was held this morning, to abolish this tax, I think we should be informed of it; and at any rate I think it will be a great mistake if this House is not allowed free and untrammelled opportunity of expressing its opinion by voting on this question

Mr. CAMPBELL. So far as the main motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is concerned, there does not appear to be any direct objection on the part of the Government to its passage. At least we have not heard anything from that side to that effect. It has been shown clearly that the tax levied upon the farmers in the shape of a duty upon binder twine is very oppressive. That has not been denied by anybody. It can be clearly proven that the tax on the farmers alone would amount to $225,000 a year. If this duty were a source of large revenue to the Government, we might not wonder at their hesitancy; but when it is shown that the amount derived by the Government last year from it only amounted to a little over $40,000, there can be no reason why this tax should not be removed, especially when it bears so heavily on the farming interests. As has been said, the farmers of this country are almost unanimous in favour of the removal of this duty. There is not a single farmer's institute in Ontario or Manitoba, there is not a branch of the Patrons of Industry, which has not over and over again petitioned the Government to remove the duty. Two years ago, I think it was, the hon. member for West Lambton submitted the largest petition ever presented to this House, containing the signature of over thirty thousand farmers of Ontario, asking the Government to remove this oppressive tax. In the face of the petitions presented over and over again, there ought to be some good reason advanced before the Government should call on us to reject this motion. I have failed yet to hear one reason assigned why this vote should not be taken and the duty removed. It is true, both the Minister of Finance and the First Minister have appealed to the House to postpone action. I do not think they should have taken such a course. I do not think it is the duty of the Government to ask this House to postpone action on any question we may wish to bring forward. If this question were now being brought forward for the first time, the Government might reasonably ask the House to postpone the vote until they had considered the matter and made up their minds, but for the last three years this question has been brought forward over and over again, the iniquities of the tax have been pointed out, and the Government asked to remove it. Their invariable reply is that they will consider the matter; but we find, after they have considered it, and made up their minds, they always fail to remove the duty. It seems to me that the Government ought to consult the wishes of the House. We are sent here, as independent members, to decide what course we think is best for the country, and the Government ought to act on our advice. I do not take it that they are masters of the whole situation. They are simply intrusted with the control of the affairs of the country in order that they may carry out the wishes of Parliament; and therefore I think it is begging the question for the Minister of Finance, or any member of the Government, to ask the House to postpone action upon this or any other question. It seems to me the question is simply this, that, in the opinion of this House, the duty should be removed; and if that be our opinion, it is the bounden duty of the House to give expression to it in supporting this motion. For my part, I am quite satisfied that this tax is, of all those levied on our imports, one of the first that should go, and for that reason I shall vote against any postponement of the question.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). In so far as I am personally concerned, I am decidedly in accord with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) in his desire to have binder twine placed on the free list, and, when the opportunity occurs, I shall be found recording my vote in support of that view, as I have done already. Yesterday afternoon the Minister of Finance invited members of the House to give their views upon the general effect the remission of this duty might have on our tariff, and I want to bring under the notice of the head of the Government, for a few moments, one of the relative circumstances involved in the establishment and continuance of this and similar combines. In the discourse of this discussion, it came out that one of the results of the operation of this combine was to close a number of establishments that heretofore had manufactured binder twine in various districts, notably the establishments at Lachute, Quebec, and St. John's. Of these, the machinery is standing idle and the operatives were turned adrift to secure for themselves a livelihood as best they could. It seems to me, from the standpoint of the friends of the National Policy, this is entirely an undesirable result. In common with other towns in my early election campaigns, we had, in discussing this question, presented to our attention as one of the reasons why the electorate should support the National Policy, the predictions as the hon. member for Assiniboia West (Mr. Davin) remarked, were, that tall chimneys would spring up in these various districts, that employment would be secured for the resident population, and a great market for the agricultural population adjoining. These were the promises openly and freely made. I think the present results of the National Policy are not just such as justify those promises. Let me give an example of the position of matters in my own town. When the cotton combine was established, a couple of years ago, the cotton mill in my town, although it had paid dividends in the old days of moderate tariff, found itself, under the operation of the National Policy, unable to pay any dividends, and the directors had to carry a heavy burden of liability on their personal responsibility. Naturally, they became tired of doing so, and the mill was closed and threw a large number of operators out of employment. It was put up at auction to satisfy the floating debt, and was sold for some $27,000, more than sufficient to pay those debts. The whole of the original capital, as I was informed—for I was not one of the victims—was over $400,000, and that was swept at one operation out of existence. The operatives accepted the statement in good faith that with the varied development of machinery in other parts of the country there was not sufficient demand for the combination to keep their mill open. They went to one or two other mills operated by the combination, leaving their families in town, and they came back saying that the combination controlled all the sources of employment in the class of labour they were accustomed to, and they had no alternative but to accept the reduced scale of wages which left them nothing to support their families, after paying their board away from home, and after trying that for a few months, many of them drifted away to the United States to find employment which was denied them at home. These had invested their little savings, more or less as the case might be, in their homes in the town. Some of them had been fortunate enough to realize a little more than sufficient for that purpose, and, having faith in the statements of the friends of the National Policy, they had invested money in other properties in the town. To-day, almost in sight of this town, they see that this combination has watered their capital so as to almost double the amount invested and they see the machinery taken out of their mill and the capacity of another mill only a few miles distant doubled while they are left with their homesteads and their investments which they made on the faith of the statements of the friends of the National Policy with their value reduced and themselves placed in a position of embarrassment. In speaking of these parties, I am not speaking of political friends of my own, for these men honestly fought me through every campaign since the advent of the National Policy, and they stuck honestly to that National Policy and to that political party, but I call the attention of the Government to the position that these working people are in to-day. These men are not members of a combination, they are not—shall I use the phrase—interested in the Red Parlour, they are not in a position to enforce their views on the Government because they are only ordinary citizens and mechanics, but it is a cruel hardship that the Government should maintain heavy duties on cotton goods or binder twine for the benefit of a monopoly and that these people should be left in this position. What has been the result of the operation of the National Policy in the smaller towns and districts? I venture to say that neither the operatives nor the capital nor the output which are credited to the various towns can be found to exist except in the last census taken in the Dominion. In all my wanderings I have never seen a man who has been able to find anything like a decent proportion of the industries and the operatives and the capital in western Ontario that are said in these returns to be in existence in these towns. But these parties find themselves with their small capital invested where they are not able to get anything from it, and they see themselves helpless in the face of these combinations. If the pressure of these combinations is kept up much longer, these parties who have stood honestly by the National Policy, will have to leave the province, as hundreds in my town have been compelled to do when they finished their apprenticeship and came out finished mechanics, and had to go away to better their condition, and to advance the interest of the country to the south of us; and there is this further difficulty, that, when one or two boys do well there, they draw their acquaintances after them, but those who are left with their little property have either to sacrifice or to be content with obtaining a little work in other occupations. I say, in good faith, without regard to political relations, whether these parties are right or wrong, they say it is not fair for the Government to allow these combinations thus to treat them, and that they should be treated at least as fairly as the parties who have inaugurated these combinations. I say, without prejudice, in looking over the field of manufactures in our Dominion to-day, that, the trend is in the direction of combination and centralization, and it behoves the Government to ascertain, when they are readjusting the tariff, whether they cannot in some way, extend some meed of justice to the parties who are now suffering. They ask why the Government should allow these combinations to act as they do, and I should be false to my duties if I failed to draw the attention of the Government to the difficulties in which their own friends are placed, because I am not now speaking on behalf of my own political friends at all.

Mr. STAIRS. I think it but fair, though I am interested in this question, and what I may say will be taken with some grain of allowance, that I should make some observations before this comes to a vote. I feel sure that hon. gentlemen who are supporting this motion have no desire to misrepresent the facts as they exist, and, as it happens that a great deal of the question seems in the minds of hon. gentlemen who have spoken to turn upon the point of monopoly, I desire briefly to state the history of the manufacture of this article in Canada. It was started about ten or twelve years ago, about the same time as it was in the United States. I think the duty at that time was 20 per cent. the article coming in under unenumerated articles. For some years down to the present time, the manufacture has been continued. Those engaged in the manufacture, so far as I am aware, have not at any time asked for an increase of duty upon this article. I believe the duty was increased to 25 per cent some years ago, though I was not in the House at the time, and I know that those who are associated with me at the present time had nothing whatever to do with asking for that increase. Now the present position of the manufacture of this article in Canada is simply the outcome of business arrangements into which, I feel sure, I need not go. It is a little unfortunate for me that sometimes I have to speak upon items in the tariff in which I am to some extent directly interested, and on that account I feel very diffident in speaking at all; but still, feeling that I am better acquainted with the facts than hon. gentlemen opposite, it is but fair that I should make them known. Upon the question of monopoly, I desire to say that at the present time there are less grounds for attacking the duty upon binder twine than have existed for some years past. There is at present in Canada no monopoly in the manufacture of binder twine, if by monopoly we are to understand one concern controlling the whole manufacture. There is another concern starting in Canada to-day to manufacture binder twine, and I think if they are not already in operation, they will be very soon. The Government of Ontario have gone into the manufacture of binder twine, and I presume they will prove very severe competitors; so that the members of this House will see that there is at the present time competition in binder twine, a competition which, I believe, will be amply sufficient to keep down the price. In regard to the price of binder twine, while I am upon my feet, it is, perhaps, only right that I should point out that there has always been in this House some measures of unfairness in the way this question has been treated by those who mention prices. It has been the custom for hon. gentlemen opposite, in comparing the price of this article in Canada with the price in the United States, to quote the wholesale price in the United States and compare it with the retail price in Canada, manifestly to the prejudice of the Canadian industry. I feel confident, Mr. Speaker, that it has been established in the debates for the last two years, that the prices of twine in Canada, to the farmers, have been as low on an average, during the past five years, as they have been in the United States. Last year the hon. gentleman who then represented Marquette in this House quoted prices at which English binder twine was offered in the United States, which were so high that it would not have been any lower if sold in Canada without any duty upon it whatever. Now, as to the position of the company which was very largely dealt with by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) yesterday, I do not want to say anything on that point further than that the arrangement to which that hon. gentleman referred was simply the outcome of a wish on the part of some of the owners to put the stock upon the Canadian market and make it a public company. There was no increased issue of stock at all; it was only an offer of stock by the present shareholders. It is also the case that the old proprietors of the company in Canada are buying stock, and it is the intention of the controllers of the company that a majority of the stock shall be held in Canada. That will be the case as soon as the arrangements are completed. Upon the general question of this attack upon the binder twine duty, if it is treated as a part of the National Policy, and is considered by the Government and by the members of the House in the same way as the duty upon any other article, those who are interested in the manufacture will just have to put up with any action that may be taken by the Government. They are quite prepared to let the whole matter rest in the hands of this House, and whatever the decision may be we will have to put up with it. I feel sure, however, that the House will agree with me that the grounds upon which the House arrives at a decision should be clearly made known, and that the decision should be based upon the facts of the case, and I am confident that when these facts are known the question will be fairly treated, and that the decision will be in the interest of the whole country.

BOUNDARIES OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, memorials, departmental orders and Orders in Council, not already laid before the House, respecting the north-western, northern and eastern boundaries of the province of Quebec, together with all reports of surveys or explorations ordered thereon or in connection therewith, by the Government of Canada, since last session of Parliament, including the instructions for said surveys or explorations.

He said : Last year I made a motion to the same effect as that which I am now making, to have all the papers up to that time connected with the proposed boundaries of the province of Quebec on its north-west, northern and eastern sides laid before the House. Those papers were brought down, and, so far as they went, they were satisfactory. However, the late Minister of the Interior, Hon. Mr. Dewdney, in the course of his speech, stated that the whole work had not been completed, and he told me afterwards that, during the recess, the engineer, Mr. Ogilvie, who was going to visit James Bay, would be instructed to continue the survey, or, in fact, to make the examination that he was not able to make when he visited the district previously. Mr. Ogilvie could not reach that point on account of the bad weather, and he was only able, of course, to submit information regarding the country as far as he travelled. At page 23 of his report laid before the House, he says :

East Main River, called by the natives as this Indian informed me, Kis-ta-ciwan Sipi, or chief river, is, at the post 76.50 chains or 1,683 yards wide. The tide runs up it to the first rapids about 15 miles above the post, and the white porpoises which come into the river go up as far as that, showing that there is a good depth of water all the way up. It appears this river was ascended in 1824 by a Mr. Clouston, under orders from the Hudson's Bay Co. He made a map of it, a copy of which Mr. A. P. Low, of the Geological Survey, obtained at Little Whale River. This is now in the office of the Geological Survey, but I have not yet seen it.

That map will certainly be very interesting, and might be brought down with the papers in connection with this motion. He further says :

The journals of this post were removed many years ago to Whale River, and the greater portion of them burned, so that source of information (a very valuable one) was not available. It appears that this was quite an important place at once time, and the ships from England called there.

Continuing, Mr. Ogilvie states what he knows about the survey, and continues :

Of the other rivers north of this I got a little information from the gentleman in charge of East Main (Mr. Corston), who has been in the country since 1836, and has travelled much around the Bay since that time; but as Mr. A. P. Low, of the Geological Survey, has examined several of these rivers, and his account is already published in the report of that survey for the years 1887-88, I will not further refer to them.

Then he adds the following information :

While at East Main I was told that the Rev. Mr. Peck, a missionary at Fort George, had ascended Fort George River, as it is called by the people there, but which Mr. Low calls Big River, and crossed from it to the head of the Ungava, which he descended to Ungava Bay. My informants were not very well acquainted with his account of these journeys, but gave me the following items : The journey from James Bay to Ungava Bay occupied only 26 days. There was nothing specially difficult about it, the portage from one water system to the other being estimated to be about 10 miles, partly over a rough rocky ridge. The descent of the Ungava River was easy, requiring no portaging at all. The country around the head of the Ungava is treeless, and covered with furze and moss, over which numberless cariboo wander apparently heedless of the presence of man. I tried to get from Mr. Peck himself a few notes of his journey, but failed to communicate with him in time to get them before I left East Main. I hope to get his reply by the next mail from that district.

The House will remember that the reason why I moved for the papers last year, and why I now ask for further information, which no doubt the Government have at hand, is this : From the papers brought down last year it appears that the difficulty, if difficulty there is, existing between the Government and the province of Quebec, is that the province would prefer to have as its northern boundary the river called East Main. The contention is that East Main River is hardly more than sixteen or eighteen miles north of the 52nd parallel of latitude. If so, it may be very important for the province of Quebec and for the Dominion that the boundary should be a river instead of being a purely imaginary line over that portion of the country. The river is wide enough, at all events for the first fifteen or sixteen miles, and, therefore, if the boundary of the province were limited to East Main River the boundary would be a fixed one, always easy to be discovered, and this would prevent the difficulty that must occur if we have a line that is purely imaginary, on which monuments are placed. That boundary would always be a costly one and not be a satisfactory one. The boundary selected for the province of Ontario is Albany River. When the matter was brought before the Government, we thought at the time that the river was the proper boundary for Ontario.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No. The hon. gentleman said the proper boundary was the height of land.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course, the hon. gentleman has his own views on this subject, and I remember what he said last year ; indeed, I read his remarks ever since that time in order to refresh my memory in regard to them. The contention at the time was that the boundary of those provinces should be the height of land ; but when the matter came finally before us, it was settled that the boundary should be the Albany River. Albany River is the boundary that has been settled by Parliament, and is the boundary of Ontario to-day ; and I am glad that boundary was selected, because it is one that is easily pointed out and is the proper one for all time to come. The same principle should apply to the province of Quebec. It was very important that the northern boundary of that province should be East Main River, so far as we can have it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What about Rupert River ?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is very much below the 52nd degree. By adopting that as a boundary, you would be curtailing the limits of the province of Quebec in that direction, while the 52nd degree was supposed to mark the boundary of the province. After looking over the matter, we thought—when I say we, I do not speak of the Government—we thought, in the province of Quebec, that the boundary should be the East Main River. The objection that some made to that boundary was, that if the East Main River were followed from one end to the other, it would be going too far north and would give to the province of Quebec a larger territory than it was thought that province should have. The answer to that is : Let us follow the East Main River as far as it is reasonable to do so, and then follow other rivers and lakes that are in the interior, to this 52nd degree ; and then follow the 52nd degree, if there are no rivers or lakes to form the boundary, towards the parallel of Blanc-Sablon, which is now the eastern boundary of the province of Quebec. The hon. Mr. Dewdney told me that he would give instructions to Mr. Ogilvie, who was going to James' Bay, to follow that river, so as to give us an idea of its course and to obtain information as to whether it really goes far north, or as to whether, after going fifteen or twenty or fifty miles, we could not deflect it towards the 52nd degree of latitude and bring it down there in a direct line, as far as possible, to the line of Blanc-Sablon extended. I understand that Mr. Ogilvie went up there, and I therefore wish to have the papers that were not laid before the House last session. This matter, I think, should be settled as soon as possible. The boundary of the province of Quebec would have been fixed at the time I refer to, if there had not been this difficulty or contention in reference to the boundary by the East Main River. Under these circumstances, I hope the Government will be in a position to grant the motion.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am sure hon. members will agree with me that the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has given us very interesting information with regard to a question which is certainly of great importance to the province of Quebec. The papers, of course, will be brought down. I am disposed to agree with the hon. gentleman, in so far as the East Main River frontier is concerned. I think it is a very convenient one, and for a long portion of the extent of that river there can be no trouble, because, as far as my recollection goes, the East Main for a considerable portion of its course runs across country from east to west. It is supposed from the fact of this river deflecting from its course, that it would be giving too much territory to the province of Quebec, and if that be the case, it occurs to me that it would be easy, as the hon. gentleman has suggested, to draw a line that would meet the 52nd degree, which would be the delimitation upon which most people agree. I think that when the papers have been brought down it will be seen that the commission appointed by the Dominion Government, which commission is now defunct, studied the question very thoroughly and made a report ; but the Government of the province of Quebec has not acted upon that report, and until the Local Government take the matter up I do not see what more we can do. However, it is a very interesting question, and I have no doubt that the present Government of the province of Quebec, as soon as they find it convenient, will give the matter attention, and then the question can be gone into and the frontier decided.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) can be congratulated on the perfect accuracy of his statement of the facts connected with the establishment of the northern boundary of the province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman will remember that that boundary was the subject of arbitration, in consequence of the contention of the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a prominent member, that the boundary of Ontario was the height of land on the north; and that it was bounded on the west by a line drawn due north from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. If the contention of the hon. gentleman had been carried out, Ontario would have had just about one-half the area that she has received under the determination of the Queen in Council. The hon. gentleman refers to the establishment of the Albany River as the boundary for Ontario on the north, and he says that Parliament agreed to the boundary so established. The hon. gentleman, and those associated with him, agreed to that, after the determination of Her Majesty in Council. It was a legal decision or an Act of the State which determined the boundary on the north to be the Albany River. That the boundary of Ontario extended further to the westward, I have no doubt, but the Lords of the Council refused to entertain a proposition that would embrace territory that had for a long period been under a government organized by the Hudson Bay Company, and in which the province of Ontario had, by its neglect to assert the right to dominion over that western territory, lost by acquiescence. The hon. gentleman referred to the boundary on the north of Quebec as if that were a matter of doubt, as if it depended altogether upon convention as to where the boundary of Quebec was determined to be. I think Quebec has a legal boundary on the north, and the question this House has to consider is whether it will disturb that boundary: whether it will, by mutual legislation here and in the province of Quebec, undertake to establish another boundary for reasons which may be justified in the public interest, both in the province of Quebec and in the Dominion at large. Those who have looked into the history of this question, as to the northern boundary of the province of Quebec, know that it was a matter of dispute between the Government of England and the Government of France before the cession of the province of Quebec to British dominion—that it was settled by the treaty of Ryswick that the territories of the province of New France should extend to Hudson's Bay—whether to the Rupert River or to the Main River was an unsettled question; because the two Governments could not agree where that boundary should be located, either on the west or on the east of Hudson's Bay, and no settlement of that question took place. War broke out very soon afterwards—a war which was terminated by the Treaty of Utrecht—and under that treaty the French were excluded from Hudson's Bay altogether, it being agreed that the boundary between the English possessions on Hudson's Bay and the French possessions to the south should be determined by commissioners. These commissioners were not appointed until 1750 or 1751, and it was not until 1755 that the commissioners met at Paris. Col. Bladen was sent over from England with instructions; but those instructions were disregarded by the English commissioners. They submitted to the commissioners who represented France a different boundary, as the northern boundary of Quebec, from what had been suggested in their instructions. The House will bear in mind that during the negotiations upon the Treaty of Utrecht the Government of England applied to the Hudson's Bay Company to state where they desired the boundary to be established, and the Hudson's Bay Company proposed to begin at a point on the Labrador coast near the Straits of Hudson, in latitude, I think, 58 1-2, at a place called Grimington or Partridge Island; and they proposed that a line should be drawn also south-west to Lake Mistassin, which was also called in the same paper Miskosinke, and that line extended the boundary to the south-west shore of that lake. It does not extend the boundary any further, but it is assumed that the parallel of the south-western shore of that lake would be a parallel midway between the English posts on the Hudson's Bay and the French posts farther up the rivers emptying into that bay. The French had a post at Lake Abbittibi, as well as Lake Mistassin; and it was proposed that a line midway between those lakes should be drawn. Now, in the correspondence which took place between the English ambassadors at Utrecht and at Paris and the English ministers, it is pointed out that a map was prepared, and that lines were drawn upon that map, both by the English and the French, and that the difference between those two lines was not very great, and there would be no difficulty in settling the matter by means of commissioners. The terms of the treaty, the correspondence which took place, and the map upon which those lines were drawn, show that the commissioners were to find a boundary not nearer to Hudson's Bay than the line drawn by the French, and not farther away from the bay than the line drawn by the English. The commissioners' discretion in finding a boundary was to be exercised between the lines so drawn on this map. Now, the French proposition was to commence at the entrance to Hudson's Straits, at a point which is at latitude 61, and to go in a south-westerly direction midway between the English post on Rupert River, near the mouth of that river, to the French post on Lake Mistassin. There they drew the line. They extended it south of the river, and they carried it midway between the bay and Lake Abbitibi. There is not much difference, as to the line south of the bay, between the line drawn by the English and the line drawn by the French. There is a considerable difference as to the line to the east of the bay. There is a difference of a degree and a half at the starting point between the lines drawn by the two parties, and those lines approach very little in their extension until they reach what may be regarded as a common line extending westward on the south. Now, under an act passed early in this century a considerable proportion of the territory lying east of either of those dividing lines is taken from the province of Quebec and attached to the province of Newfoundland. With that, therefore, we have nothing to do. That was a part of the Imperial policy, and you have but to draw those lines that were drawn by the English and the French in the discussion of the terms of the Treaty of Utrecht, and you will see precisely what territories the province of Quebec has on the north of Rupert River. She does not touch Hudson's Bay at any point under that legal boundary, and the northern boundary would be midway between Lake Abbitibi and Hudson's Bay. The Government of the Hudson's Bay Company, under the Treaty of Utrecht and before the commissioners met at Paris, were asked again to state where the boundary was, and they followed the very lines on the east from Grimington Island, and ran south of the shore of Lake Mistassin to the southerly shore of that lake; but they extended it on to the 49th parallel, and they proposed that the boundary should follow the 49th parallel westward. Well, I do not think any importance can be attached to that document in a legal point of view, because the terms of the treaty and the boundaries contended for by the two sovereignties were marked upon the map, and it would not be possible for the commissioners to concede to either party a larger area of territory than it claimed. The most the commissioners could do in favour of either would be to adopt the boundary so marked out. Now, the question which the Government have to consider, and which Parliament ultimately must consider, is that, if that boundary—which, I admit, is not a convenient boundary, looking at the extent of territory taken off the eastern portion of Quebec and attached to Newfoundland—if that boundary is to be abandoned and a conventional boundary established, where should that conventional boundary be drawn? If a line is drawn upon the map, it seems to me that the territories lying south of Rupert River, which undoubtedly belong to Canada, and can be transferred to the province of Quebec, would be equal in extent, it may be presumed, superior in value and importance to the territory which the province of Quebec would yield to Canada north of that river. If the House is desirous of exercising that supervision which is necessary over an act of this sort, I think it is important that a map of that section of the country should be laid on the Table, and with the lines which were drawn by the Marquis de Torcy, the representative of France, and Mr. Prior, the English poet, who represented England. The correspondence that took place was between the Marquis de Torcy and Mr. Prior, and it was sent by Mr. Prior to Lord Bolingbroke, who was the Prime Minister, practically, of England at that time. It does not at all follow that because the province of Ontario extended to Hudson's Bay, the province of Quebec did extend to that bay also. On the contrary, it is impossible to read all the papers relating to this subject without seeing that the province of Ontario was extended to Hudson's Bay by proclamation and by Order in Council in 1791. Before that, the middle distance between Lake Abbitibi and Hudson's Bay was the northern boundary, in that vicinity at all events, of both the north-eastern portion of what is now the province of Ontario, and the north-western portion of what was then the province of Quebec. There were two papers which the Government of England caused to be laid before Parliament when the Act of 1791 was submitted for enactment. The one divided the province of Quebec by a line extending northward to the northern extremity of that province. The other followed exactly the same line, but extended to the shores or coast of Hudson's Bay, and declared that all the territory to the westward and southward of that line, to the utmost extent of what had been known or commonly called, not Quebec, but Canada, should be embraced in the province of Upper Canada. But the boundaries of the province of Quebec on the north, as they existed prior to the surrender of Quebec to Great Britain, remain just as they were. I said last year, and I repeat it now, that it seems to me a conventional boundary could be established which would be to the advantage of the province of Quebec, and not to the disadvantage of Canada. I would not propose to follow the illiberal and unfair course which the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), and those associated with him, followed in dealing with the province of Ontario, but I say that it is important to determine, and it ought to be determined with care, if a natural boundary is selected, whether the Rupert River—which would give Quebec access to Hudson's Bay, and would give her all the territories belonging to Canada that are clearly without the boundaries of the province of Quebec up to that river—whether that would not be an adequate exchange for the territories that she would surrender north of that river. The hon. gentleman has referred to Slave River. I do not think any man living knows where Slave River rises. I do not believe that river has ever been marked out by any party. It is a mere conjecture as to whether it runs westward or south-westward. Where the river empties is known, the direction from which it flows for some miles away from the bay is known; but what is the source of that river, whether it is in the 55th or 56th parallel, north latitude, or whether it is in the 52nd, no one knows, and it seems to me that if the Government were to propose to agree to the Slave River as a boundary, they would simply be taking a leap in the dark, and might be transferring a very large extent of territory to the province of Quebec that, on no ground of exchange, and no ground of mutual convenience, could be upheld.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Mr. DALY. In answer to the query of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), I may say that the Government are not in possession of very much more information than they had when this subject was under discussion last year. The hon. gentleman labours under a misapprehension if he understands that Mr. Ogilvie was in that neighbourhood this year. It was Mr. Low, of the Geological Survey, who was in the neighbourhood, and all the information I can give on the subject is contained in the report of Mr. Low. I understand that we are as much in the dark as ever, from the information I get from my department as to the true sources of the Main and Hamilton rivers. Mr. Ogilvie, it appears, carried his traverse survey from the point at which he reached James Bay to the mouth of the East Main River; and during this past season, Mr. Low, of the Geological Survey, has connected by a micrometer survey, Ogilvie's station, at the mouth of the East Main River, with Lake Mistassini, which took him 308 miles up the East Main River. Mr. Low informs me that about twenty miles from the Hudson's Bay coast, the East Main separates into two branches, one running about due east, and the other about north-east. The most careful examination he was able to give to these two branches did not permit of his deciding which was the main branch. He further informs me:

You will observe that at a point much nearer the Hudson Bay coast than I had supposed, the difficulty as to which is the main branch arises.

Again, he says that 300 miles from the coast it divides again, and the two divisions are so nearly alike that it was impossible for him to form any opinion as to which was the larger. He says the probabilities are that the east branch is the larger, because the Indians say so. So that leaves the whole question open, and from the information so far obtained, it would be impossible either for the Dominion or Provincial Government to arrive at any conclusion as to whether the East Main River would be the true line or not. I will bring down, for the information of the hon. gentleman, a full report of Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

what Mr. Low is able to give us upon the subject. I may state for his information that it is the intention of the survey to send Mr. Low back to the region again next year, and possibly we may have further information on the subject.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am satisfied with the statement made by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, as far as it goes. At all events, we have this information, that the river at a certain point separates into two, and one branch goes east and the other goes north-east. In that case the contention that that river might be the boundary of the province of Quebec is strengthened. If the river goes east, that is the direction in which the boundary should be determined in order to reach the extended line of Blanc-Sablon at the eastern end of the province of Quebec. I am sorry that the information that Mr. Low—I understood at the time it would be Mr. Ogilvie, but that may have been changed afterwards—can give is not fuller and that another year has to pass away before we can come to any settled boundary. I hope, however, that as this is a difficult line to determine, being so far north and being so far away from civilization that the difficulties in the way of the settlement of that question are great, the Minister of the Interior will be able, in his instructions to Mr. Low or anyone else he sends there, to obtain as full a statement about the direction of the two branches of that river as can be obtained, because, after all, we must come to some determination about it; and when the boundary of Ontario was fixed, the boundary of Quebec might have been fixed, but it was understood that we could not settle it until we had the information for which I am now asking. Perhaps also the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to bring the map mentioned in the report of last year, but which was not sent down. Then, as suggested by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), we might also have a map, giving as far as possible the direction of those rivers. Of course, we do not require, and I am sure it is not the intention of the hon. gentleman to ask, all the details, but we might be given the direction of these rivers and the parallels and the eastern boundary of the province of Quebec, and also the western boundary as settled in the Act by which the boundary of Ontario was settled, that is, the line which starts from the northern end of Lake Temiscamingue and goes due north to James Bay. If we could have these things before us for next session, it would be important, and in the meantime, perhaps, we might have the papers asked for and the map I have mentioned.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF LARD.

Mr. TAYLOR moved:

That in the opinion of the House, it is expedient that legislation be enacted during the present session of Parliament to prohibit the importation into Canada, or the manufacture therein, of lard adulterated with cotton-seed oil or other injurious ingredients.

He said: During the session of 1888, I moved a resolution somewhat similar to the one I have now placed in your hands. It read:

That the House resolve itself into committee to consider a resolution declaring it expedient to introduce a Bill providing for the regulation of the manufacture and sale of rendered lard.

After some debate, that was carried, but a Bill was not introduced, because the Trade and Navigation Returns then showed that we had to import lard into the country largely to supply the consumption; but now things have changed to a great extent, because our farmers are going a great deal into the raising of pork, and the lard manufactured at home and that imported from the United States, as I shall show by the Trade and Navigation Returns, is so adulterated that it is almost unfit for food. In speaking to the resolution that I moved in 1888, I quoted the following statistics and made the following remarks:—

I wish now to draw the attention of the House and the country to the effect of the legislation then passed on this article of oleomargarine. In 1884-85 we imported 1,162,337 lbs. butter; in 1885-86 we imported 1,249,000, while this year, 1886-87, we have imported but a total of 264,272 lbs. We imported into Ontario 6,155 lbs., Quebec 542 lbs., Nova Scotia 189 lbs., New Brunswick 1,881 lbs., Manitoba 9 lbs., and in British Columbia the large quantity of 237,496 lbs., or within 9,000 lbs. of the total import. Nearly 1,000,000 lbs. less have been imported into Canada since legislation was passed affecting the article, compared with what was imported in the ten months of the preceding year, the legislation having been passed two months previous to the end of the fiscal year. We exported in 1886 5,455,809 lbs. of butter. I am of the impression that the 237,000 lbs. imported into British Columbia, and paying 4 cents a pound duty might profitably have been exported from Ontario. I am strongly of opinion that a large quantity of this 237,000 lbs. was a spurious article of butter. It think it would be well if the Customs authorities would instruct their officers to place in bond any butter imported into this country, so that it might be properly analysed, for I am strongly of opinion that there is yet spurious butter brought into the country.

The remarks I made at that time are applicable to the state of affairs to-day, for I see by the Trade and Navigation Returns that last year we imported into Canada of butter for home consumption, only 246,000 lbs. less than a quarter of a million, where previous to the passing of the oleomargarine prohibition Act, we imported a million and a half. I find that of this total amount, 236,000 lbs. went to British Columbia, and I wish to call the attention of the Controller of Customs to the statement I made at that time, that I think the importation of butter into British Columbia is an importation of that spurious article of oleomargarine. While we exported 7,000,000 lbs. of butter from Ontario last year, we should be able to supply British Columbia with that article, instead of their importing and paying 4 cents a pound upon it. I would like the Customs authorities to instruct their officials to collect samples and send them down here and have them analysed, and if the article of oleomargarine is found, that it should be prohibited, because it interferes just that much with the consumption of our home product. Before I take up the larger question, I want to refer to a gentleman who has done great service in England to the farmers of Canada—I refer to Professor Robertson. I have before me copies of two papers which he was kind enough to send me from England, one, the "Grocers' Gazette," and another the "Canadian Gazette." Speaking in reference to Canada, he makes use of these words:

Canada was ambitious to have a good name in this respect. They were not an old people. Was there ever a boy of twenty (men they were called now)—(laughter)—who had not pretty high ideals and would keep trying every Monday morning to act up to them, but by the time he was 40 he would be quite willing to relinquish his ideals in deference to other people, and to do things he would have scorned to do when young. So Canada, which was still young, had its ideals like the young man, and the Government had prohibited the making of anything that was adulterated."

He is laying down the fact over in England that we in Canada have prohibited this article. He made the statement in one of his speeches that the Government of Canada had prohibited the manufacture or importation into Canada of oleomargarine, and he recommended the English people to adopt the same course. He sent me a copy of the "Grocers' Gazette and Provision Trade Review" in which I find that at one session of the police court seven grocers were summoned and fined for having sold adulterated butter or oleomargarine. Professor Robertson, in all his speeches, has referred to this fact, and advised the English people to do as we have done here in Canada. These seven cases were tried under the Margarine Act, as they have one in force in England, not prohibiting the importation, but preventing retailers from selling oleomargarine unless they have it labelled and called by its proper name. But in each of these cases they were all selling it for butter, and it took the place of butter. I will read one or two of these cases:

At the Greenwich Police Court on Tuesday, before Mr. Kennedy, Elou Smith, trading as E. & E. H. Smith, provision merchants, of 165, Brockley-road, Brockley, was summoned by the Greenwich District Board of Works for selling butter admixed with about 70 per cent of foreign fat (margarine).—Mr. Kennedy fined the defendant 40s. and 2s. costs.—Daniel Edwin Walden, grocer, of 77, Foxberry-road, Brockley, was summoned for selling butter admixed with about 80 per cent. of foreign fat (margarine).—Mr. Kennedy said he would give the defendant the benefit of a possible mistake and fine him only 20s. and 2s. costs.

That is how they deal with this margarine in England. They allow merchants to sell it, but on each package there must be a label showing that it is oleomargarine, but these seven grocers simply had it on their counters, and did not have the sign on it, and they were fined for so doing. Now, we imported last year from Great Britain and entered for home consumption, 2,000 lbs., and from the United States 690,766 lbs. of lard for home consumption, besides what has been manufactured of the adulterated article in Canada. Now, I am of the opinion that we can produce, and are producing, a sufficient quantity of lard in this country to supply our home demand; if we have not been doing so in the past, I am satisfied we will do so in the future, from the fact that farmers are learning throughout this country that hog growing in connection with dairying is one of the most profitable investments that the farmer can go into. I might refer to one case in my own county. A gentleman there had held over from the year before last a large quantity of barley that he would not sell at the then going prices; he held it over until spring. He then purchased a number of pigs and he charged the pig account with the cost of the pig, and with the barley fed to the pig, with his whey from the factory. He had in his pen one pig for each cow in his dairy; so that he gave the product of that cow, the whey from the factory, to the pig, with an admixture of barley meal, pea meal, and oat meal; and he told me that his coarse grains, barley, peas and oats that he fed to those pigs, realized 75 cents per bushel. Now, farmers throughout the country, instead of selling their grain and raising three or four pigs, as they have been doing, on the product of the whey from twenty or thirty cows, they are raising a pig for each cow and feeding the coarse grains with whey, thereby producing a large amount of pork; and they will find in this way that their coarse grains will bring them much larger returns than they will if sold at the low prices that have been prevailing this last year or two. Let me refer to the fact that I see on the Notice Paper one or two motions asking that corn be admitted into this country free of duty. Representing, as I do, one of the largest agricultural constituencies in the province of Ontario, one of the largest dairying districts in that province, where cattle feeding and pork feeding is largely carried on, and representing, as I do, the agricultural classes, I wish to say to the Government that I would be strongly opposed to any reduction in the duty of corn. If they reduce that duty, it will materially reduce the price of our own coarse grains. I will read an extract from a speech which Prof. Robertson delivered, as reported in the "Canadian Gazette" of London, England, of December 15th, I think it well worth going to the country:

In all markets a threefold competition exists—a competition between buyers which tends to raise prices, a competition between sellers which tends to lower prices, and a third competition, which is too often forgotten, between products for preference in the markets. It should not be hard for an excellent quality of anything to displace a poor quality of the same kind of goods; but the producer in Canada has to meet in the markets of England with a most unfair competition, which has wrought also the greatest injury to the live-stock interests of Great Britain. The vital organs of these corn-fed animals are also much smaller and their health less robust. Can the flesh from their carcasses be as nutritious or wholesome? Would it not be a wise measure, in the interests of the health of the toiling masses of Great Britain, to insist upon a clear and unmistakable means of designating to the ultimate consumer the source whence all the animal products which are offered for sale have originally come? Any legislation looking towards the regulation of diet is called offensive to the English-speaking people; but that class of legislation which would protect the poor man from buying a pound of lardy bacon, a pound of oleomargarine, or a pound of "filled cheese," under the supposition that he was getting in these things real value and food which was adequate for the nourishment of his muscles, nerves, and bones, would be a boon to him which he would not long suspect or complain of as being arbitrary. The effect of the quality of the foods which are produced in these northern climes upon the constitution, vitality, and vigour of the race is one which should not be ignored in any fiscal policy which has in it the elements of directing, modifying, or regulating the source of a nation's supply of food.

This is another argument in favour of keeping American corn out of this country for the purpose of fattening pork, for, as Prof. Robertson says further on, it makes an inferior grade of pork, and, as our pork stands high in the English and German market today, we do not want to bring our pork down to the level of American pork. Prof. Robertson goes on to say:

The English, the Irish, the Scottish, and the Canadian farmer have all had to meet the unfair competition of counterfeits, in substance and in name, which by their low price per pound have turned the consumption from more wholesome, more nourishing, and, on the whole, cheaper, honest animal products. Many instances might be given. The most familiar are, perhaps, the subterfuges by which tallow, lard and cotton-seed oil are sold in enormous quantities in England in the place of English, Irish, Canadian, or Australian butter. Of course, the imitation is sold wholesale, and probably sold retail, under a distinctive name; but the distinction extends only to the label of the package, the shop-window ticket, or the wrapper of the piece of coloured fat. Neither the Imperial nor the Colonial Parliaments can, by their fiat, legislate good times; but it seems to me that both can and should legislate in the direction of good times by prohibiting further competition with imitations and counterfeits which prevent the remuneration of honest British toil, applied to the production of honest British products, for the nourishment of honest British men. A simple remedy for this might be indicated, and it points to a method which may be applied with advantage to several other lines of farm products. Let the colouring of any fatty substance into an imitation of butter be prohibited.

Experiments conducted at the Government experiment station in the United States of America have shown that the bones from swine which are fed upon corn, exclusively or mainly, will break with the application of less than half of the pressure which is required to break the bones of animals of similar breeding which have been fed upon grains or dairy by-products.

Prof. Robertson proves conclusively that the meat of corn-fed swine is not so healthy as that fed on the products of the dairy and our coarse grains. It is not nearly so valuable in the English market, and Canadian bacon brings from 2 to 3 cents per pound more than American bacon, owing to the fact that the hogs are fed largely on our coarse grains, and very little on corn. In regard to the statements of Prof. Robertson respecting "filled cheese," I desire to draw the attention of the Controller of Customs to this fact: A regulation is now in force—I having moved in the matter some two or three years ago—in regard to American cheese passing through our country in bond and being shipped to England. A regulation was put into force that any American cheese shipped from Montreal should be branded as the product of the United States. I am credibly informed by a large cheese dealer in Ontario, a seller, not a buyer, that he visited Montreal this year and while spending two or three days at that port of shipment examining the cheese which was being shipped, he found that, notwithstanding the instructions of the Customs authorities here to their officers in Montreal, cheese coming in bond from the United States was shipped on board vessels without being branded. How this is brought about, whether it is negligence on the part of the officer of the department or not I do not know, but I was assured such was the fact and that my informant saw cheese received from the United States shipped without being branded. Every day American cheese is being brought over. Last year it was brought over to Gananoque, boat load after boat load, and placed on the Grand Trunk Railway cars, shipped to Montreal and exported to England. I do not know why it should be brought through by this route, except for the possibility that on arriving in England, it should be known as a Canadian product; but I trust the Controller of Customs, in the interests of the dairying industry, which is one of the largest in this country, will see to it that next season not a pound of American cheese passing through Canada in bond is shipped without being branded both on the package and on the cheese itself as the product of the United States. In England we have the reputation of making the best cheese that goes there, and we desire to retain that reputation, and do not desire the name of our cheese to be injured by being mixed up with the American product that is adulterated with cotton-seed oil and other substances. Coming back to the lard question, I may say that I have visited grocery stores at home and have seen the lard they offered for sale. They call it lard, it is branded lard; there are no marks of adulteration discoverable on the package, but if you take a few pounds home and melt it, you will very soon discover there is very little lard in it. It is so all along the line. We are paying high prices for goods, and they are being adulterated. I am aware that we have on the Statute-book a law to punish persons for selling adulterated food, and my hon. friend the member for Colchester (Mr. Patterson) informs me that within a short time three merchants in his constituency have been summoned and fined for having sold adulterated lard. I stated to him, when he mentioned the matter to me, that I did not think action should have been brought against the retail merchant who perhaps purchased the article from the manufacturer, either in Montreal or Toronto, as a pure article. The party who should be dealt with is the manufacturer. We have on the Statute-book to-day an Act to prevent the adulteration of food, but the fact is patent to any hon. gentleman who will visit a retail store in town and purchase a pound of lard and have it analysed, that it will contain from 50 to 75 per cent of cotton-seed oil. As I stated at the outset, our farmers can produce sufficient quantity of pure lard from home-grown hogs to supply the demand of this country, and they should not be called upon to place their products in competition with an inferior and spurious article. I hope, therefore, that this motion will meet with the approval of the House, and that the Government will this session act as they acted in the case of oleomargarine—bring in a Bill to prevent the importation into Canada of American lard which has been adulterated. I think it is due to the farmers of this country to grant them the protection this resolution calls for, and I hope it will meet the approval of a majority of the members of this House.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add but few words to what has been already said upon this subject, because the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has gone over the matter very thoroughly and very fairly. It is a fact which cannot be denied, that last year we imported into Canada 692,789 lbs. of lard. It is also a fact patent to those who have taken the trouble to investigate it, that a great deal of the lard which is sold here is spurious and impure, and when we know that to be the case, it is time that Parliament should interfere and by the enactment of a law, or such other means as are possible, prevent the sale of this adulterated article. It is universally acknowledged that it is injurious to take into the human system that which is not wholesome, and not only is this lard not what it is represented to be, but it is also composed of deleterious substances. Not only do we believe that the lard which is imported into the country is spurious, but it is also known that some lard manufactured in Canada is equally bad. I have been told by a person who I have reason to believe is an excellent authority on the subject, that some of the lard manufactured in Ontario to-day is adulterated with the same ingredients as have been found in the imported article. This should not be permitted. This lard is used by our own people, believing that, as it is the product of the country, it is wholesome, but in this they are deceived. The lard which is adulterated with cotton-seed oil and other fats of less value than the lard itself, may not be wholesome, and I regret to say that it is extensively used. Whether or not the department is doing its duty in regard to the investigation which should be held, or the analysis that should be made of the product that is sold in the country, I am not prepared to say. Perhaps it has not been brought to the attention of the Government, but it is a fact which cannot be denied, that you can find this spurious lard for sale in grocers' stores in every village in the province of Ontario. When we know this to be the case, it is high time that we should interfere and pass a law to prevent this abuse.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the debate be adjourned, in order that the House may not be required to meet this evening. I make that suggestion because I see that some of the members desire to speak on the question. If the debate is now adjourned, we can easily reach the subject again.

Mr. WALLACE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

That the time for receiving petitions for private Bills be extended until Tuesday, 14th instant, and for presenting private Bills until Friday, 17th instant.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT CIVIL SERVICE INSURANCE.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 11) respecting Government Civil Service insurance. He said : This Bill is introduced and is to be considered in connection with another Bill of which I gave notice, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, the design being to secure for civil servants the advantages of superannuation, that is, an allowance to servants who have spent their term of service in the employment of the Government and who have reached an age when it is proper they should be retired for the remainder of the term they may have to live ; and, in conjunction with that, the Civil Service Insurance Bill, which I am now introducing, is to make provision, for which there has always been felt a lack, for the surviving members of the family of a civil servant. A civil servant comes into the department, pays his superannuation for a term of twenty, thirty, forty or fifty years, and it may happen that about the time he is to be retired, or very shortly after he has retired, he is taken away by death. His family receives nothing. This is, as I have said, to prevent that hardship, and to provide for civil servants an inexpensive method by which they may have, under Government auspices, a provision, not very large, it is true, but yet something substantial, for the members of the family when they are taken away by death. The existing Superannuation Act, under which we are now governed, has proved itself to be an expensive one, due largely to two circumstances ; one, the overloading of the Civil Service superannuation list—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon gentleman will wait a moment he will find he was a little too previous. One circumstance, as I have said, was the overloading of the superannuation list by old servants in the employ of the Government at the time the Civil Service Superannuation Bill was enacted into law, numbers of whom having served for long periods of years, were by that Act placed upon the Civil Service superannuation list, entitled to all the benefits of superannuation, although they had paid in all cases not very much, in some cases actually nothing, into the Civil Service superannuation fund. It was overloaded, therefore, by its own provisions at its very start and commencement. Another reason why it has proved burdensome arose from the fact that the abatement made at the time the Act went into force, none too high and probably not high enough to carry the system, was afterwards lowered, so that the rate of abatement at the present time, and since that lowering, has been altogether inadequate to any fair support of the Act. The amendment to the Civil Service Superannuation Bill, which will be introduced directly, provides that for civil servants entering the service after the date of the passing of the Act, a larger rate of abatement shall be made for superannuation purposes, and in connection with those servants the provisions of this Civil Service Insurance Bill are to be applied. One objection which has been felt very strongly by the House to the present system of providing for civil servants is, that we never knew the end of it ; that there seemed to be no definiteness as to what would be the working out, and as year after year has passed we have found that the receipts and expenditures on superannuation have been growing wider and wider apart, until to-day it has become burdensome on the Consolidated Revenue fund. The two Acts which are to be introduced, one of which I am introducing now, will have this advantage: that from the very start Parliament will be able to see just about the limit of its liabilities. The two put together will not be quite self-sustaining; but the limit in each, of what will be the Government's contribution towards its sustenance, will be a very moderate limit, and one the maximum of which can be fairly estimated, and may be known from the beginning.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you increase the abatement payment on those who are paying to the superannuation fund now?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you extend to them the benefits under this?

Mr. FOSTER. No; except that there is this provision that any person who belongs to the Civil Service at present, and who contributes to the present abatement, may take advantage of the Government Civil Service insurance, provided he pays an increased abatement. That is merely to leave it open for present members, if they choose, to avail themselves of it in that respect.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What class would be required to pay the higher abatement from this date?

Mr. FOSTER. All who enter the Civil Service from this date. The benefit of the insurance will, of course, be felt in this way: it is given on a very much reduced rate to that the standard companies can offer, and for two reasons; one is that the Government proposes to pay all of the expenses of the administration, and the other reason is that the Government proposes to give a small contribution towards the fund in the way of interest upon the investment of the moneys that come in as premiums upon the policies. It is calculated that when under this Act the new Civil Service, as far as superannuation is concerned, shall have reached the maximum of the present Civil Service in number of employees and salaries given; the amount of insurance will probably run at the maximum of about $4,000,000. When that time is reached the contribution by the Government each year will attain its maximum amount of about $13,000 per year. Of course for a number of years, that amount will not be reached, and consequently the contribution of the Government will commence at a minimum sum and will go gradually up until in about 20 or 25 years, it will reach the maximum contribution of $13,000 a year. I may say that when the new superannuation scheme has got fully into force in about 20 or 25 years, and comes up to the maximum of the service as it at present exists; the contribution from the Government towards its sustenance will be in the vicinity of about $8,000. If I remember right, making for both systems a maximum contribution by the Government each year of not more than $20,000 or $21,000.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—COUNTY OF PONTIAC'S BONDED INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair I would like to inquire of the Government what action they have taken with reference to the bonded indebtedness of the county of Pontiac. I understand that the present member for that county, during the election which occurred when the House was in session last year, gave to his constituents the assurance that if a supporter of the Administration were returned to Parliament, the Government would be prepared to seriously consider, and to relieve in part, if not altogether, the county from the indebtedness which it had incurred for railway construction, or for other purposes, within the limits of the county. I understand that that indebtedness amounts to a very large sum at the present time, and that it is a considerable burden upon the people of the constituency; a burden, however, that the constituency, in the exercise of its undoubted legal right, voluntarily incurred. I think, Sir, that this is a suitable opportunity to inquire how far the revenues of this country are pledged to the relief of that county from the indebtedness which the inhabitants of the county have incurred in the interests of the county; and whether it is the intention of the Government, from time to time, to hold out inducements to constituencies that the burdens which they have assumed, and over the assumption of which the country at large had no control whatever, can be thus lightly assumed, because the country at large, if a county finds it inconvenient to meet its obligations, may be saddled with the liabilities that they themselves have incurred. I think, Sir, if the Government held out to the present member for the constituency, any such hope, or gave him any assurance that they would be prepared to favourably consider that proposition, it is important that the House should know it, because I would regard in the first place any such statement as that, and I think the country would regard it as a very gross interference with the freedom of the election in any constituency, if such statement was made with the authority of any member of the Government, or the authority of the Government collectively. Before you leave the Chair, Sir, I think that it is important that we should know precisely whether any such assurance was given or any such promise made, or whether the hon. member who represents the constituency had any authority from the Government to give such an assurance to his constituents with a view of influencing the election.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has not given the House a statement of what the assurance was.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was to this effect : that the county is indebted to the amount of about $200,000, that debentures of the county are outstanding to that amount, and that the assurance was that the Government would relieve the constituency of that burden if a supporter of the Government were returned to this House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Speaking for myself, and for my colleagues as well, I may say that I have heard to-day, for the first time of such an assurance having been given, and that the Government has not taken any action in the matter or authorized any such assurance to be made.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the memory of my hon. friend is at fault when he says that he has heard this statement for the first time, for I recollect distinctly that during last session, on the evening of the election, when the news was brought to this House that the hon. gentleman who now represents the county of Pontiac had been elected, I myself alluded to this fact. I am bound to say that at that time the then Minister of Militia, the present Senator Bowell, distinctly denied that any such promise had been made by the Government. I have nothing more than that to say at present. But, at all events, I am credibly informed, and I have every reason to believe, that the present member for Pontiac, on more than one occasion, especially on one occasion, I think on nomination day, distinctly stated that he had the promise of the Government that if he were returned relief would be given to the people of Pontiac from the debentures, amounting, I think, to over $200,000, given in aid, I think, of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway. I do not know the fact personally, but I have heard it on good authority, and I have not yet heard any denial of it on the part of the hon. gentleman who represents the county of Pontiac.

Mr. BRYSON. The hon. leader of the Opposition is quite correct when he states that on the evening of the election on the 28th of June last, there was a discussion in this House on this subject. On that occasion he made a statement which hardly bears out what he says now. He stated, if I remember rightly, that I had in my possession a letter from the Government containing such a promise. The hon. leader of the Government denied the statement, and I am here to-day to say that I never stated on any platform in the presence of the Liberal candidate that I had such a letter from the Government, or that any promise had been made to relieve the county from the railway bonus.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

The Liberal candidate on every occasion, however, endeavoured to make that the issue, while we on our side were ready to discuss the political issues before the electors, and he assured me on the 3rd of June, that if I would state that I had a letter, or got an assurance or promise, from the Government of relief for the county, he would withdraw from the contest. I stated on that occasion, before the electors, that I had no such letter promising that the county would be relieved of the bonus, even if I were returned. In making this statement, I state as nearly as I recollect what passed, and whatever may be said by hon. gentlemen opposite, I can assure the House and the country that no promise was made by me to the electors that the Government would come to the relief of the county with regard to the bonus, neither did I state on any platform that I had any such letter from the Government.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am glad to have this opportunity of answering the hon. gentleman, especially the statement he has just made, in which he claims that he never held out any promise to the electors of the county of Pontiac of relief from the bonus. This question, it is true, came before the House last session, and was discussed at considerable length. I will not now go into the details which were then brought out, but I will try to establish that the hon. member for Pontiac did hold out to the electors of the county that such relief would be given. I will try to show it by his address to the electors of the county of Pontiac, by literature appearing in the form of editorial articles in a paper published in the county and called the "Equity," which was the hon. gentleman's organ during that campaign—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DEVLIN. Hon. gentlemen will not dispute that that newspaper was the hon. gentleman's organ,—and from speeches delivered in the county by the hon. member for the county of Pontiac. The hon. gentleman, during the course of the campaign, which was held in the month of June last, addressed a card to the electors of the county of Pontiac, in which he said :

Mr. Thomas Murray has kept Pontiac without its proper representation since March, 1891, a fact which I believe every candid man in the county will readily admit. He cannot do anything to advance your interests or increase your prosperity, or benefit you in any way.

I am a supporter of the present Government, because the policy of that Government is such as cannot fail to recommend itself to any unbiassed Canadian as a policy that increases the prosperity of the people and hastens the development of the almost inexhaustible resources of this Dominion. I am in sympathy with the Canadian Government because that Government, by its wisdom, has built up on the northern half of this continent, a young nation whose giant areas stretch from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and whose future, under judicious administration, is full of brightness and hope. I ask your support as one who honestly desires to serve you faithfully, and guard your interests with every faculty of heart and head.

I realize that as sensible men you must know that the interests of Pontiac can be better advanced by giving a loyal support to the present Government than by a factious and senseless opposition such as Mr. Murray has given since March, 1891, and which course he purposes to pursue should he again be returned to Parliament.

The county of Pontiac cannot reasonably expect favours from a Government if it arrays itself in opposition.

What were those favours if not the very relief which has just been mentioned? The hon. gentleman made a speech on the day of nomination in the town of Bryson, in the course of which he said:

He then referred to the futility of Mr. Murray's efforts to do anything for the county's benefit. He challenged anyone to show in the public accounts where he had procured for the county one dollar in addition to his sessional indemnity.

During the course of the same afternoon Mr. Hector McLean, who was one of the candidates in the election in 1891, who during the last election actively supported Mr. Bryson, and who is a gentleman very much esteemed in the county, and one whose word counts for a great deal there, said in the course of his speech:

He would confine himself to the local question which he considered of much greater importance to the people than any other question. In 1890 he had felt it his duty to oppose Mr. Bryson, because that gentleman had failed to carry out certain promises that he had made regarding the bonus. At that time he (Mr. McLean) held certain letters from Mr. Ross, the holder of the bonds, offering a settlement of the matter to him, which would not be given to either the other candidates. It was a question which should have been left to himself and Mr. Bryson to settle at the polls, but Mr. Murray had to come over and interfere, and taking advantage of the situation had succeeded in being elected. And after he was elected he went to Quebec to try to induce Mr. Ross to treat with him regarding bonds, but Mr. Ross would have nothing to do with Mr. Murray, and subsequently in Ottawa Mr. Murray had the cheek to approach him (McLean) and try to get him to assist in making an arrangement with Ross. Mr. Murray had accused him of canvassing for the bonus by-law, but he could say that Mr. Murray had canvassed as much and more than he had in favour of the by-law.

Passing on to the present contest, he said he had declined to give his support to Mr. Bryson until Mr. Bryson had satisfied him that he was in a position to do something towards getting relief for the county. His whole ambition was to see that relief obtained, and up to the 8th of June he had declined to take any interest in this contest.

You know, Mr. Speaker, perfectly well that, in the county of Pontiac, Mr. McLean is a gentleman who possesses the confidence, very largely, of the Conservative party. You know, Sir, that he supported Mr. Bryson, and that the reason he did so was because he believed, from his conversations with this hon. gentleman, that the promised relief would be obtained by him. Mr. McLean, in the course of that same speech, said:

He had then met Mr. Bryson in Ottawa on the return of that gentleman from interviewing the ministers at Quebec, and after an arrangement had been arrived at, which he considered satisfactory, Mr. Bryson had very generously offered to retire in his favour and allow him to take the field. But he (McLean) concluded he could not very well do this; and he believed, too, that Mr. Bryson was in the best position to do the most in the county's interest. He (McLean) was quite satisfied that if Mr. Bryson was returned at this election we had a good chance of a fair measure of relief for the county. And it was his intention to do all in his power to assist Mr. Bryson in his efforts to secure the county relief, and to work to secure his election which he felt sure of.

I think there was a promise anyway. We are told here to-day there was no promise held out. However, if we take up the same paper—

But the bonus is not yet wiped out, and the people of the upper end realize that Mr. Murray cannot do any wiping out. Their confidence in his powers for good is not of the enthusiastic kind. They know that the Government only grant favours to those that support the Government, not to people who support Thomas Murray.

Further on:

No real friend of the county who calmly views the situation can help but come to the conclusion that the right thing for the people of Pontiac to do in the present crisis—

And bear in mind the crisis was the bonus crisis—is to give a loyal support to the present Government. That is the wise and safe course to pursue. Is there a man in the county of Pontiac to-day who would not consider it a favour to be relieved of the bonus? If taking the bonus off relieved a man from paying a bonus tax on his farm of, say $50, would not that be a favour?

I could go on quoting this kind of literature which is to be found in the editorial articles.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. DEVLIN. I would go on to give you one point more, taken from Mr. Bryson's speech on the day he was selected to be the candidate. He closed that speech by stating he would not just then announce his decision, but would wire that decision to the telegraph offices in the county, and, in the meantime, would ascertain what assurances he could obtain from the Federal and Provincial Governments in behalf of the county's interests. I do not think it is at all necessary to read further from those speeches, but I can tell this House that I was present at a meeting at which he spoke, I think it was at Black River, and there he dwelt at great length upon this same question, the bonus question, and he gave it out in insinuations, if not in direct words, that he was in a position to do something for the county. Now he comes here to-day, and he says that nothing has been done, and, despite the articles which I have read, despite his own speeches, he says he never held out that promise. The promise was held out, it was not only held out, but it was the main battle cry during the whole campaign.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DEVLIN. On every platform, in every village and township, it was stated that Mr. Bryson would secure from the Government of Canada the desired relief. The cry was: Do not elect an opponent who will not secure this relief. Yet to-day, after the people have placed their confidence in this hon. gentleman, mainly in the hope that he would obtain this relief, he now stands up in Parliament and says he never gave that promise. It is for the House to decide whether that promise was held out. No doubt it was. The hon. gentleman thought the end would justify the means, and he did not care what means he took to secure a seat in Parliament.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). I would point out, for the information of the hon. member for Ottawa, that he has laid down a very false doctrine with regard to the relation between politicians and the public press. Within the last few days, we have had that erroneous doctrine illustrated in the case of the hon. member for North Simcoe, who undertook to show that the Conservative party is responsible for the utterances of the Toronto "Empire." The position of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is entirely erroneous, because if the politicians are to be occupied all their time in repudiating the press, they would have a great deal to do, and I take it the true doctrine is that which was laid down by the "Globe" of Toronto just a few days ago:

The same remark may be made regarding Mr. McCarthy's complaint that he was not consulted in the formation of the new Ministry, but what we chiefly regret is that Mr. McCarthy, by his utterances in regard to the "Empire," seemed to give countenance to a very unsound idea of the relations between public journals and party men. Those relations ought not to be so close as to require one to repudiate the other in case of a disagreement. The general support given by public men and journals to a party ought to be such as to admit of the free expression of the opinion of all, even where that free expression shows divergence.

That is the true policy. Members of Parliament ought not to be held answerable for what the newspapers say, and it is, thank God, a still better thing for the newspapers that they are not responsible for the politicians.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I had the honour of attending a few meetings in Pontiac during the last contest, and I must confess I was a little surprised to hear the statement of the hon. member for Pontiac to-day. The great question of all others then before the county was the question of relief from that bonus. It was originally $100,000, and with accrued interest and legal expenses it amounted to $190,000, and the burning question in that county was to get rid of that incubus. It is useless for the hon. member for Pontiac to say that he did not make any promise. I myself was present at Shawville and Campbell's Bay and heard him state distinctly to the electors: If I am elected, you do not pay the bonus. If Murray is elected, you pay the bonus. If that is not as straight a promise as any man could make, I do not know what a promise is. It is only right, having heard the hon. gentleman make this promise and now hearing him deny it, that I should state that I remember distinctly his making it in those two places, and, I think, in another place, the name of which I forget just now. Those were the only three occasions I had the honour of attending meetings addressed by the hon. member for Pontiac. In each the same statement was made. The question put before the electors of Pontiac was: Elect Mr. Bryson and do not pay the bonus, or elect Mr. Murray and pay the bonus.

Mr. BRYSON. Does the hon. gentleman wish to convey to the House that I made that statement? If he does, I wish to say that the statement is fully unfair, and it never was made by me. That statement was made on a public platform; but it was not made by me.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It was made by you at Campbell's Bay.

Mr. COCHRANE. I had the honour to be up in that riding at some of the meetings. The first meeting that was held in that riding was at Shawville, and the Liberal candidate, Mr. Murray, told me going up there that it was no use for me to go into that county to talk politics; that the railroad question was the burning question. I listened to Mr. Murray speaking for about half an hour, and he never spoke of any other question than the railroad bonus. His whole effort was to prove to the electors that if he was sent to Ottawa he would be in a better position to do something for that bonus than Mr. Bryson. In reply to that I told Mr. Murray that I did not go up there to discuss that question. Mr. Bryson opened the meeting, and he said just what he has informed the House that he said; he told the electors that I was not there to discuss the railroad bonus, but that I was there to discuss a more important matter—the financial policies of the two parties. I drew their attention to the fact that although Mr. Murray was seeking for their support he had failed to mention the policy of the two parties, the facts that the Liberals had introduced; and to allow him a chance I sat down and asked him to explain, but he was not man enough to get up. He found before I got through with the meeting that the electors of that riding took very kindly to the National Policy and the fiscal policy of this Government, and therefore Mr. Bryson was returned by about 800 of a majority.

Mr. FRASER. As there is evidently an issue of fact raised in that matter I think it should be set at rest by my testimony. I was there too, and if there was any evidence required to prove that the bonus was the all-absorbing question the evidence comes from the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane). He says that Mr. Murray spoke of nothing else. That is very true. I want to say here and now that the whole question discussed was on the question of the bonus. The whole burden of the speeches was: "If you expect anything, support the Government." They were after that and nothing else. We are in the unfortunate position to not have our hands on the public treasury, and so, Sir, we are not able to show, as any person would wish to show, who had the best interests of the country at heart, that the public treasury is for the public good, not for the county of Pontiac. The whole cry was simply this: Vote for Bryson, and get clear of the bonus. I, myself, was there on nomination day, when the proceedings took place that were mentioned in the report—not the editorial, as the hon. member for West York would seem to imply. I want to call attention to another fact. Why was it that the hon. member for Pontiac wanted time to consult with both Governments before he would agree to run? I am perfectly satisfied that there was no promise made, but I do know that when the hon. member spoke, he went so far as to lead the electors to believe that he had the power to secure them relief; and then, to use the vulgar expression, "he winked the other eye." Now, the statement made was simply this: that there was no relief for the county unless Mr. Bryson was returned; and I remember distinctly saying to the electors that that was dishonest politics, and I distinctly told them: You are not going to get any relief. I called their attention to the fact that there were other counties besides Pontiac in this country, that millions of dollars had been voted by municipalities, and I pointed out the dishonest character of the canvass on behalf of the Government candidate, that he should attempt to lead these people astray by saying that $150,000 was to be paid on behalf of Pontiac. I instanced the cases of a number of members of Parliament; I instanced the case of the hon. Premier and the railway in his county; and I mentioned the county I have the honour to represent myself, and I said it would be impossible for Pontiac to get relief unless the amount paid for railways in that province was refunded, because the Government in the two cases, namely, in the case of the road that passes through the county of Antigonish, and the road that passes through my county, the amounts paid by the counties in those cases went into the railways which the Government themselves had taken over for the general advantage of the country, and now own it. I tried to point out to the electors of Pontiac that that was not the kind of politics that would commend itself to them, or else I misunderstood their disposition; I believed they were not of the character to be bribed in platoons. Now, I think the hon. member for Pontiac himself will remember that I made the statement that they were not going to get clear of the bonus, even if they did return Mr. Bryson. I said it was dishonest, and the cheers that went up after I made that statement were cheers of derision, and the shouts of the crowd were: "Vote for Bryson, and get clear of the bonus." They believed the under-current talk that Mr. Bryson would get them relieved of the bonus, because they had heard the assurance from the hon. gentleman himself, and knew he had declined the nomination until he had seen what was going to be done, and surely after he went down, and returned, and accepted the nomination, they had a right to expect that the Government had made the promise. Now, I do not say at all that that promise was made; that is not the point at issue just now, but I think it is only right that we should call attention to this scandalous method of politics. Just fancy an English statesman going before the country and appealing to the electors for support, because he was supporting the Government, and they would be more likely to get something. One man tried it some time ago, a supporter of Lord Salisbury's Government, and quickly came a telegram from Lord Salisbury that unless the candidate took back that promise at once and stood upon his own merits in running for that election, he would have no place amongst his friends. It is time that we treated politics on issues broader than those which decided the election in Pontiac. I regret the degradation of our politics, and I regretted very much to hear the cheers that went up at that meeting as indicating the considerations which appeal most strongly to the electors. So far as my observation went upon that occasion, the question of the railway bonus was the sole question that decided the election. I know Mr. Murray spoke about it, and his speech was in this direction, that so far as matters relating to the bonus were concerned, he would be in just as good a position to get relief for the county as Mr. Bryson would be, because he said: If it is a right thing that the county of Pontiac should receive relief from the Government in this matter, you will get it if I am your member just as well as if Mr. Bryson is elected. I trust, therefore, that whatever may be said, on the other side, at least we will agree on this point, that it was the under-current. With the exception I have mentioned, I did not on any occasion meet the hon. gentleman myself. The statement in question was made, however, on nomination day, for I personally heard it. The address by Mr. McLean was even stronger than it was reported, and I had a very pleasant chat with the hon. gentleman himself while it was going on. The statement was made by Mr. McLean in the hon. gentleman's presence, and as the hon. gentleman did not then and there repudiate it, it must be taken as having been made with his approval.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I wish to ask the First Minister when the House may expect to have laid on the Table the report of the commission to inquire into the charges made last session against the present Postmaster-General. I do this on this ground, that certain charges were brought against an important and influential member of the Government and those charges were considered by his colleagues of sufficient importance to warrant an investigation by a Royal Commission. The House has been in session for some little time. The Government are asking the House to vote confidence in them by granting the supplies and proceeding with the business of the country. It seems to me to be the true constitutional doctrine that where a charge exists against a member of the Government, be that charge well founded or otherwise, the House has a right at least to have the earliest information as to the result of the inquiry that the hon. gentleman's own colleagues set on foot. I ask the First Minister, therefore, when this House may expect to have the report laid before it, because I think it would be perfectly justifiable for any member of the House to object to proceeding with the business of the country so long as a matter of that kind remains in abeyance. Of course, there may be some very good reason why the report has not yet been laid before the House, but I say that on sound constitutional doctrine, I as one of those who voted for referring the matter to a commission, have the right to ask that the report of the commission may be laid on the Table of the House at the earliest moment in order that the House may know what ground there is for those charges, how far they have been sustained, or how far not sustained. I, therefore, ask the First Minister this question.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right in asking the question, and it did not need, I am sure, that he should give reason for it connected with Supply. The matter was referred to in the debate on the Address, and I then observed that the commission was simply waiting the meeting of the House in order that the report might be laid on the Table. I supposed then that next day or the day after the Address was disposed of, I would be in a position to bring it down. The copying of the report, I am told by the officer in charge, has taken longer than was expected, but on Monday or Tuesday the report will be laid on the Table. The officer states the report will be ready on Monday, but I may say Monday or Tuesday. This, of course, is only the fourth day after the passage of the Address.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Contingencies—Governor-General's Secretary's Office..... $13,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This item shows a considerable increase, more than 10 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. The increase is on account of the large correspondence, a great deal of it being telegraphic, between the Governor-General's secretary's office and the Home Government in connection with the Behring

Mr. O'BRIEN.

Sea arbitration and other matters. Many communications have taken place, and they will continue probably during the greater part of this year. The increased expenditure is chiefly for telegrams.

Mr. McMULLEN. A grant is made of $5,000 to the Governor-General for travelling expenses. Is not that sum supposed to include the travelling expenses of his staff and servants?

Mr. FOSTER. Five thousand dollars have been paid for a number of years to the Governor-General for travelling expenses. That covers his own travelling expenses and those of his suite.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to know the statute or Order in Council under which that grant is made. It must have been intended to cover the travelling expenses of the Governor-General and his staff. The additional amount paid is increasing every year, and it should not be permitted. We pay the Governor-General $50,000 salary, $8,000 for fire and light, and $5,000 for travelling expenses, and that sum should include the travelling expenses of his private secretary and other officers or servants accompanying him. If the country is going to pay the travelling expenses of all the officials whom he chooses to take with him on his tours, it will amount to a large item. I desire to learn the wording of the statute or the Order in Council under which this $5,000 is set apart.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the Order in Council—if the arrangement was made by Order in Council, as it probably was—but I know it has been the usual vote for a number of years. I find this sum does virtually cover all travelling expenses incurred by the Governor-General and his suite. The amount was intended to cover the travelling expenses of the Governor-General and his suite, and it does so. There are a number of officers connected with the Governor-General's office, and the small sum of $500 has been incurred by them in travelling on public business.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that last year the amount was $473.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very little. The $5,000 are granted to the Governor-General for his travelling expenses, and the sum of $500 is not much to cover the travelling of the officers of the department, consisting of quite a number of employees, who have their work to do, and incur expenses when travelling on public business.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman will look up the details he will find that these officers accompanied the Governor-General on his tour, and that the expense is for that. It is not altogether the amount that is to be complained of, but there is a principle involved. If we continue the principle that the officers in attendance on the Governor-General are to be paid their expenses in addition to the $5,000, the sum will run up to $6,000 or $7,000 or more, and if these people find that the Parliament of Canada is willing to pass over these items, we will have a continued increase in expenditure every year. That is the reason why I should like to know what is the wording of the statute or the Order in Council making a provision of $5,000 for travelling expenses; or if it is for personal expenses of the Governor-General himself?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman can easily settle that. If he will turn to page A-109 of the Auditor-General's report he will find what is in the Order in Council, not in extenso, but the effect of it. "Travelling expenses for self and suite, by Order in Council of March 3rd, 1879, $5,000." The other travelling expenses are for the orderly, and for the Governor-General's secretary, and for the clerks of the Governor-General's office—all of them small amounts. For instance, there are the expenses of Mr. Clarke, sergeant orderly, from Ottawa to Quebec and return; the Governor-General's secretary from Ottawa to Richmond, while the Governor was there in the summer of 1891, and the expenses for Orderly-Sergeant Rogers, a trip in the same way; so that the Order in Council covers that for which the money is issued; that is the travelling allowance for himself and suite.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman. I do not want to criticise minutely His Excellency's expenditure, and it was for that reason that no great objection was raised to taking a lump sum. I do not remember what the terms of the Order in Council were, and the hon. gentleman had better bring them down and lay them on the Table.

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I remember distinctly we were told at the time that a lump sum would be given in order to avoid any petty minute examination into the items for the Governor-General's attendants and refreshments, which probably are just as well not discussed too minutely. I think my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) has been perfectly well advised in calling attention to the fact that this $5,000 ought to cover all expenses. We know quite well there are a good many years in which the Governor-General does not require $5,000 for his expenditure in travelling, and the whole allowances that are made here—although I think that the Governor-General is not at all to blame for a great deal of the expenditure that goes on at Rideau Hall, as I think various Governments have been careless in regard to that, and that it should not be properly charged against His Excellency—the whole expenditure is on much too large a scale for the resources of this country. What is more than that, before his present Excellency came here, attention was called to the expediency, in the public interest, of making an arrangement whereby some moderate fixed sum should be placed at his disposal, so that these exorbitant charges should not appear. The then Premier, Sir John Macdonald, agreed, I believe, to make that arrangement, but never did so, and the consequence has been that there occurs in the press and in the House a certain amount of reflection on these charges, which, I think, is very inexpedient. I believe, however, that this allowance of $5,000 was intended to cover the expenses and should have done so.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Chairman. I think that the allowance of $5,000 a year to His Excellency the Governor-General for travelling expenses is entirely too large, and is, I believe, unreasonable. Everybody knows perfectly well that His Excellency the Governor-General—in my remarks I do not refer to any particular Governor-General, nor do I intend that my observations should be personal at all—I say everybody knows that the Governor-General of Canada is necessarily obliged to spend a large portion of the year at the capital. I am not now in a position, nor do I believe is anybody in a position, to form an estimate as to what the expenses are when he does travel; but just think for a moment what $5,000 will buy in the way of railway traffic. At the ordinary railway rates of 3 cents per mile—I do not know what the rate is from one end of the continent to the other—with the ordinary railway rates at 3 cents a mile, $5,000 would buy railway tickets covering 166,000 miles, and a man could cross this continent fifty times a year and more on that allowance. Even though the Governor were accompanied by two of his staff, travelling every day for 100 days in the year, $5,000 would cover the expenses at the rate of 3 cents a mile, not including Pullman fare. This $5,000 is given simply in addition to what I consider an unnecessarily high salary. It is my intention, before Parliament prorogues, to invite the attention of the House to the salary paid to the Governor-General. We are now, in all probability, about to lose the services of the present Governor-General, and it is a very proper time, I think, before we have a new Governor in office, that the whole of the expenses of the management of this branch of the service should be looked into. The expenditure has grown, so that, since Confederation, this one office alone has cost us. I venture to say, some millions of dollars. It is in excess of the resources of Canada, and in this and other respects there is a degree of extravagance wholly beyond the means of the people. I intend, before Parliament is prorogued, to submit to the consideration of the House a proposition in favour of the modification of the Imperial Act, so that we shall not be saddled with the enormous salary of $48,000 a year for the Governor-General of Canada. If there were no extras in addition to the salary, perhaps it would not be so bad; but, as my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) reminded us, in addition to that, we pay annually some $8,000 to heat and light the Governor-General's establishment, a sum which would be enough to heat and light the entire houses of a good country town. I warrant you, that there is many a town of a couple of thousand inhabitants in this country which will not spend more than $8,000 in supplying heat and light for the whole population. That these people should be compelled to contribute $8,000 a year for the heating and lighting of one establishment for an officer who is paid $50,000 a year, is simply a piece of cruelty towards the taxpayers of the country. Then, in addition to that, this $5,000 is allowed for travelling expenses, when everybody must know that a large portion of it cannot be required for that service. I say that we are unfaithful stewards if we allow such items to appear in the Estimates any longer.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that this vote is somewhat similar to the vote made the other night to Sir Charles Tupper, and that it is in reality an addition to the salary of the Governor-General. It is generally supposed, and I believe correctly, that when the Governor-General travels he travels in his private car, which is conveyed over any of the railway tracks in the Dominion free of expense, so that in reality he pays no railway fare. That being the case, it is fair to presume that this $5,000 is not expended in railway fare at all. Looking back a few years, we find that the Governor-General of Canada has not been addicted to a great amount of travelling. It is true, the present incumbent of the office has seen fit, during the last month or six weeks, to take a trip into the western part of Ontario, but nearly all the travelling done by him has been from here to his sporting place in the lower provinces, where he fishes. We may as well speak plainly on this question. I have no reflection to cast upon this Governor-General any more than upon any other; but we are here to discharge a public duty, and I say that this vote of $5,000, like the sum of $2,000 voted the other night to Sir Charles Tupper, is simply an addition to the salary of the Governor-General, which is sufficiently large already.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The committee is somewhat helpless in this matter, from the fact that individuals are not in a position to form a fair judgment as to what ought to be a reasonable allowance. I remember that in 1879, when this matter was brought to the notice of the House on two or three occasions consecutively, it was felt on both sides that, being such a question as could not be discussed with the same freedom as other questions, some understanding should be come to as to a fixed sum for His Excellency's travelling expenses. The Government came down with a vote of $5,000, and the same sum has been taken since. Whether that sum ought to be revised at present, whether it is too large or too small, we are not in a position to judge; but whether too large or too small, by adding to it a number of items you are reversing the system which was established in 1879. There are two questions before the House. One is whether the $5,000 is a reasonable sum to allow for this purpose. As to that, the House has not the information necessary to enable it to judge. But neither the House nor the Governor-General want to have another sum smuggled in in addition. If we determine that $5,000 is sufficient, let us vote it, and let it suffice. But what I object to is, that after a fixed sum has been determined upon, we should be asked to condemn the system which was agreed to by both sides in 1879 by voting $473.74 extra. This is a small sum, I admit, but it is likely to grow larger from year to year. With respect to extravagant expenditure at Rideau Hall, there are two sides to that question. I was on the Committee of Public Accounts for some years when this matter was inquired into, and it was thoroughly demonstrated to me, and, I think, to every other member of the committee, that the extravagance which took place, which was published and known to all parties, was caused by the Department of Public Works for political purposes, and that neither the Governor-General nor any of his aides or servants were in any degree responsible for it. It was proved in that committee that carpenters, painters and others were sent down to Rideau Hall against the wish of the Governor-General and his aides, and odium was unjustly and dishonestly attempted to be cast upon the occupants of Rideau Hall for this extravagance, when it was indulged in wholly for political purposes. That was proved, and I think it ought to be stated.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call my hon. friend's attention to this fact. He spoke as if a charge of $473 extra was smuggled in—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I spoke from the Public Accounts of 1891-92.

Mr. FOSTER. He spoke of that sum as having been smuggled in over and above what was usual. It is over and above the $5,000, but if he looks at the Auditor-General's Reports of the previous years, he will find that it was never supposed that the $5,000 was to cover more than the Order in Council contemplated, namely, the expenses of the Governor-General and his suite, and that the travelling expenses, which were not large, of officials in the Governor-General's secretary's office were not included in that amount and were not meant to be included.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was it not understood that it would cover the travelling expenses of the Governor-General and all his officers?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. These expenses are really those of officers who are occasionally sent by the Government to His Excellency on important public business, when His Excellency is absent from Ottawa. The vote of $5,000 is clearly intended to cover only the personal travelling expenses of His Excellency and those who accompany him.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. On page A—109 of the Auditor-General's Report the hon. gentleman will find some items which do not bear out his statement that the expenses were incurred in connection with public business. For instance, Major Colville, the Governor-General's secretary, charges for travelling from Ottawa to New Richmond, which, I understand, is a fishing place.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is one of the summer residences of the Governor-General for the time being. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in supposing that these journeys are not upon important public duties. While His Excellency is at Richmond or anywhere else, these officers are in attendance. Not only the Governor-General's secretary, but orderlies and others have sometimes to be despatched to him, bearing with them important papers on public business.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. First Minister informs us that these expenses, amounting to $473.74, are incurred by the Government sending officials to consult with His Excellency on public business. If that is the case, how would you explain the last item :

Walker, W. H., clerk, Gov.-Gen.'s office—balance of $342.79 for trip to New Richmond and Quebec, 2nd July to 22nd September, 1891, $242.79.

That makes nearly three months, rather a long trip for the purpose of transacting business between the Government at Ottawa and His Excellency, and it hardly bears out the supposition that these expenses were incurred for the purpose of sending down a messenger.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not say that was the only cause, but I did state that these expenses were all incurred by officers who were sent on public business. That gentleman is not one of His Excellency's suite, and did not incur that expense in attendance on His Excellency, but as a clerk in the Governor-General's office, and these are the expenses between the two places on public business. There is also clerical work, at the instance of the Government in connection with Government business.

Mr. FOSTER. I find, in 1889, the travelling expenses, besides Lord Stanley's allowances, amounted to about $800, and similar travelling expenses were voted during Lord Lansdowne's term, so that every year I find, and it is borne out by the substance of the Order in Council, that this takes in simply the travelling expenses of the Governor-General and his suite. It arose in this way : Previous to the Order in Council, each year the travelling expenses of the Governor-General, in making these trips through Canada, trips which we all understand are in the interests of the country, were not met by any stated allowance, and you have only to look back over those preceding years to find out that the amount generally far exceeded the sum of $5,000, running away above that amount in certain years ; and, as the result of those years' experience, it was thought better to fix a certain amount, and then we would get rid, each year, of criticising the varying items of travelling expenses of the Governor-General and his suite. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) expressed his belief strongly that this $5,000 was not spent in travelling, but was really an addition to the salary of the Governor-General. He did not give any evidence to support that belief, and said he has not certain information on which to base it. My own expression of opinion will perhaps be worth about as much as that of the hon. gentleman, when neither of us has positive evidence, but I think I have some things to go upon which make me believe exactly the contrary. During Lord Lansdowne's incumbency of office, I am certain that the $5,000 per year did not pay the expenses of the public travel of the Governor-General, nor do I believe it does in this case ; but before my hon. friend states with so much certainty that Lord Stanley's car is carried everywhere free, he had better inform himself as to the facts lest he may be doing great injustice to the Governor-General in making that statement.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Can you tell us ?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not his secretary and do not pay the bills, but I would not make an assertion of that kind unless I had proof positive.

Mr. MULOCK. How are the facts ? Does the hon. gentleman know ?

Mr. FOSTER. As regards the $8,000 which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) seems under the impression is too large an amount to have been really spent in fuel and heating of the Governor-General's house, I know positively that in Lord Lansdowne's time the allowance for that was exceeded by hundreds of dollars every year. I happen to have been on a committee which went into that matter rather thoroughly, a committee of the Executive Council, and I became aware of those facts at that time. The building is disconnected, it has many ramifications, and everybody connected with it knows that the heating and lighting of it is a very expensive matter, and that $8,000 is spent and more every year in that respect.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. This is rather a delicate matter to discuss, but we owe a duty to the public, and ought to get at the facts if possible. As I have stated, I do not know of my own knowledge that the Governor-General's car is drawn free of charge over the railways, but I not only think so, but it is the general opinion of the public and the members of this House as well. If it is a fact that His Excellency's car is drawn free of expense all over the Dominion, there ought to be some means of ascertaining it by the committee, and I think I am right in saying that possibly we ought to appeal to the Government to tell us the truth in the matter.

Mr. FOSTER. How does the hon. gentleman suppose the Government could inquire into a matter of that kind, after an Order in Council has settled it once and so long as the Order remained unrepealed. That Order in Council was passed in order that this vote should not be canvassed from year to year, as it was not a pleasant matter either for the Governor-General or the House itself. In order to get rid of that unpleasant matter, we agreed that $5,000 a year should be given, and that having been settled, there ought to be no further discussion except as to whether or not it is wise to continue the Order in Council longer. But to go into the other details I do not think is our right, and the Governor-General, if he were so disposed, might very well say to us: You have made a compact and I have carried it out, and I do not think you ought to inquire into these details.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. This House is not responsible for the Orders passed in Council but the Government are to this House and the country, and I think this is a very proper time and place to discuss the matter. If it were wise and judicious that an Order in Council should be rescinded and that we should make some new arrangement, then it is for this committee to say so, and we ought to discuss the question fairly in order to arrive at a proper conclusion. If the $5,375.74 is too much to pay for these travelling expenses, we, as a committee, looking after the financial interests of the country, have a right to ascertain whether it is really the fact that the Governor-General spends this $5,374 in travelling. If he does not, then I say the item should not be voted. I have as much respect for the Governor-General as any other man, but I believe in the business of the country being conducted on business principles, and if we are to vote $5,374 for the travelling of the Governor-General and his staff we ought to know that the money has been expended for that purpose, and we ought not to vote a sum like this and trust to the honesty of public officials to see that it is expended. If we are going to vote public money we ought to have the vouchers to show that it has been judiciously expended. It is very proper that we should inquire into this, because, as I have said before, although I have not positive evidence of the statement I make, that the Governor-General's car is drawn all over the country by the railway companies free of expense, I believe that to be the case, and if it is, then this vote of $5,000 is not a vote for travelling expenses but a vote in addition to his salary of $50,000 or thereabouts, just as the vote we passed the other day in contingencies was an addition of $2,000 to Sir Charles Tupper's salary. If the Finance Minister or any other member of the Government has information on this point it is due to the committee and the country we should have that information, and I do not think that we should be afraid to discuss this question because it pertains to the Governor-General's department. We are here as business men to look after the finances of Canada, and we ought to have no delicate feelings in dealing with the Governor-General or any other man. We are spending public money, and we are responsible to the people for its proper expenditure; and I say that whether it be the Governor-General or the door-keeper of the House of Commons, we have a right to inquire into all such expenses and ascertain that they are in the interest of the public at large.

Mr. DENISON. We must not forget that in travelling the railway fare is sometimes a very small proportion of the expenses. It might be very easy for a Governor-General, in going to Montreal or Toronto, to spend a thousand dollars a week in hotel bills. They generally have to pay pretty freely. It is my own experience, and doubtless the experience of others, that the amount paid in railway fares is but a small proportion of the total expenses.

Mr. M'LOCK. I have handed in a motion to the Chair to reduce this item by $5,000. I think the proper way to deal with the matter is this: Let the Government ask for an appropriation, a contingent account—call it $5,000 if you like—to cover the Governor-General's travelling expenses. The Minister of Finance says that sometimes they cost the country more than $5,000 for travelling expenses. Now, the effect of giving a fixed sum of $5,000 to the Governor-General for travelling expenses is simply this, that all he saves out of it is so much money found; therefore, if it is an advantage to have a Governor-General travel over the country, he will be induced to deny Canada that advantage in order to save money. If it is to the interest of the country that he should travel over Canada, let him do so and let his bills be presented and audited—not too nicely, but in a proper spirit; and if it is not in the interest of Canada that he should travel, let us save the money instead of paying $5,000 a year for that purpose. It must be manifest to any person that no Governor-General has spent $5,000 a year of late in travelling expenses. Even if there has been that much spent, it is to be borne in mind that the $50,000 a year we pay the Governor-General is running on all the time, and whether he is in a car or in bed, whether he is at Ottawa or Toronto, whether he is awake or asleep, his $50,000 is going on all the time, and it helps him defray his expenses wherever he is. If you distribute $50,000 over 365 days, you will find he has a very handsome allowance for hotel expenses every day. I do not know when the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) was travelling as a Governor-General and incurred these large expenses of a thousand dollars a week. We are now dealing with the public funds, and I submit that there is only one way to proceed. It is extremely important that every change in connection with the office of Governor-General should be so conducted that the office itself will be a popular one in the eyes of the people of Canada. I desire to see it popular; I desire to see the people of Canada appreciate and be anxious to maintain the office of Governor-General, and for that reason, I would lop off any mouldering branch in connection with that office; and if any abuses creep into the expenditure, let us destroy them whenever and wherever discovered. I think we would be doing wisely to look to the future, as we are now about to have a new Governor-General, and to see that we start well. It would be embarrassing to the Government of the day to change an existing Order in Council when a new Governor comes; the best plan is to have everything in order before he comes, and before there can be any such embarrassment. Therefore, I think the proper plan would be to reduce this vote by the amount of $5,000 for the future, as it will not apply to the present incumbent.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am sure we must have been greatly pleased with the zeal manifested by the last two speakers to secure public economy in all the departments of this Dominion, but I think the zeal of the last speaker has led him beyond discretion. He has proposed to limit the amount of travelling expenses to the sum of $473.74, to be strictly accurate.

Mr. MULLOCK. No; I do not.

Mr. COCKBURN. The proposal is to reduce the present amount by $5,000. The amount, as made up by the gentleman who preceded, was $5,473.74, so that the proposal of the last speaker is to vote the Governor-General the sum of $473.74, a munificent sum. I am sure the Governor-General is not a person who is accustomed to sit up all night to save the fare of a sleeper, but, when he travels he does so in a manner befitting the dignity of the great country which he represents. It is perfectly absurd for us, in this catch-penny manner, to try to appeal to the country, as if the country was so poor and destitute that it was unable to afford the sum of $5,000 to the Governor-General and suite for travelling expenses, to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the wants of the country he is called upon to rule. The gentleman who has preceded him has taken high grounds; he tells us that he thoroughly believes that the car, the carriage on which the Governor-General travels, is carried free over the road. Well, I think, in the interest of the country and the interest of this House, it is his duty now to explain the grounds on which he bases that belief.

An hon. MEMBER. Do you know his car is not carried free?

Mr. COCKBURN. I know nothing whatever of the matter, but here is an hon. member who has publicly told us that he strongly believes the car in which the Governor-General travels is carried over every railway in the Dominion free of charge.

Mr. LISTER. Move for a committee.

Mr. COCKBURN. I think, under the circumstances, possessed as he is, of this valuable information, he ought to make the facts known to us; and I call upon him to get up and enlighten us, and tell us by what means he has arrived at this knowledge, putting us in the same position as he is himself, and then, perhaps, we will be able to dispense even with this sum of $473.74. That hon. gentleman is in a peculiar position, he is in the possession of information which no one else has; and as he is a man of great experience, and does not form his opinion without sufficient grounds, let us know also the grounds on which this firm belief of his is founded. We will then be in a position to know whether the sum of $5,000 is too little or too much, or whether the sum recommended by the last speaker of $473.74, is sufficient to carry the Governor-General from Gaspé to Vancouver and back, and enable him to become acquainted with the resources of the country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I will give the hon. gentleman the information he asks for. I gave the information before, when I had the honour of addressing the committee on this subject. I said I believed that that was the case. My belief was founded, not on evidence, because, as I said before, I was not positively sure. We remember the discussions that have taken place in this House with regard to conveyance of Government cars. We remember the history of the car "Jamaica," which was burnt, and which was at the disposal of the Government, not only for official business, but for election purposes, which car travelled all over the Dominion of Canada. I remember the celebrated car, the pay car "Jamaica" travelled from one end of the country to the other during the elections, containing Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues and friends. No hon. member on the Treasury benches will deny that that car was drawn over the railways free of expense.

Mr. McNEILL. Order.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not want to hear about this matter.

Mr. McNEILL. We want to hear about the Governor-General's car.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The car "Jamaica" was drawn over the roads free of charge, and when it was burned the Government built another. I venture to say that the special car containing the First Minister or any of his colleagues is taken over the roads free of expense, either to Toronto, Chatham or elsewhere. When Sir Charles Tupper came out to this country and took part in the elections, at the solicitation of Sir John Macdonald, he was toted over the railways in a Government car free of expense. I have good reason to know this to be the case, and therefore I believe that in the case of the Governor-General he is treated with the same courtesy by the railway companies as Ministers of the Crown are treated. I desire to ask hon. gentlemen opposite if it is not the fact that the Government car is drawn over the railways free of expense?

Mr. HAGGART. When this debate commenced I had the idea that the Governor-General had refused free transportation, and insisted on the payment of his travelling expenses over the country. I telephoned over to the office, asking whether any arrangement was made for the transportation of any Governor-General or not. The reply I received was that the only arrangement for transportation ever made was when Lord Lorne and Lord Lansdowne came to the country. No arrangement for transportation had been made for the present Governor-General, and my impression is, and that impression will be confirmed in a short time, that the Governor-General pays his own transportation.

Mr. LAURIER. Then he has given the Ministers an example which his Ministers have not followed hitherto.

Mr. COCKBURN. I thank the hon. gentleman for the lucid argument and proof he has given of the sincerity of his statement. It is a peculiar syllogism: Government car "Jamaica"; car burnt; Sir John Macdonald once travelled in it, and therefore the Governor-General has transportation free.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member for Centre Toronto stated that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) had proposed a resolution reducing the Governor-General's allowance for travelling expenses to $473.

Mr. COCKBURN. And 74 cents.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman was as conversant with the public accounts and with the Auditor-General's report, and the manner in which items are voted by this House, he would not have risked his reputation by making that statement. He knows perfectly well that the item of $5,000 is fixed by statute, and that the amount of $473 and odd cents is paid under Supply voted each year. If it was not voted this year, the Governor-General would not have a claim to it, so the hon. gentleman is quite mistaken in saying that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) desires to reduce the Governor-General's travelling allowance to $473. I hope the hon. gentleman will have the manliness to rise and acknowledge his error, because the hon. member for

Mr. SOMERVILLE.

North York made no such proposal. It is an unpleasant duty for the Opposition to criticise items of this kind, particularly items connected with the Governor-General. But we have a duty to perform. We are here to criticise public expenditure, and, if we fail to do so, the country undoubtedly will find fault with us, and will deem that we are failing in our duty if we neglect to criticise, no matter whether the expenditures are connected with the Governor-General's department or not. With respect to the statement made by the First Minister, I wish to draw his attention to this point. He has stated that officials belonging to the Governor-General's office went down to Richmond to do business with the Governor-General. The Governor-General is sent here as the representative of Her Majesty in Canada. His residence is supposed to be in Ottawa. If he chooses to live at Victoria during the hot months of the year, will the First Minister be prepared to say that the country should be called upon to pay the travelling expenses and living allowance of each official who would have to travel backwards and forwards on business connected with the Government? Suppose the Governor-General chooses to live at Halifax or at the most eastern point of the Dominion, or at some fishing resort, would the country be expected to pay the expenses necessary of officials travelling between there and Ottawa? I quite admit that if the Governor-General goes to Halifax or Victoria, on an official tour, in the interests of the country, the Government should bear any little incidental expenses connected with the necessary staff. But in the case of the Governor visiting a fishing resort, the Government should not be expected to pay the additional expenses involved. The items to which we have drawn attention cover expenses of this kind, and the country cannot be expected to meet them, because, if it gave permission to the Governor-General to live at an extreme point in this Dominion an enormous expense would be incurred. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has truly said that we are not now trying in any way to hurt the feelings of or deal ungenerously with the incumbent of the office at this moment; but the time of his service is drawing near a close, and we should have it distinctly understood for the future, whoever the Governor-General may be, that incidental expenses of this kind should be a fixed amount, and Parliament should not be called every year to enter into these unpleasant controversies. It is the duty of the Opposition to discuss these matters however unpleasant they may be, and it is our duty to bring irregularities of this kind to public notice. This matter should be settled either by statutory enactment or by Order in Council fixing a certain sum which would include the Governor-General's travelling expenses and those of his suite, particularly when His Excellency is on a pleasure tour in which the country is not directly interested.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has asked one or two questions which I am bound to answer. The hon. gentleman has asked whether we do not consider it would be proper that a fixed arrangement should be come to on this subject, and a fixed amount given for the travelling expenses of His Excellency and suite. I reply to the hon. gentleman that I am of that opinion, that I think both parties were of that opinion in 1879, that what he advises we should do now was done then, and that the discussion which has taken place this afternoon in the House ignores that arrangement to a very great extent. Previous to that time, as my colleague has mentioned, the expenses of the travel of His Excellency and suite—I shall not discuss whether on official business or not—very much exceeded that sum. It was considered desirable that a fixed sum should be voted from year to year for that purpose, and that any excess over that sum should be borne by His Excellency himself. That has been exceeded in no case that I am aware of, and I repeat the explanation to the hon. gentleman which I gave to the committee before: that these casual expenses of the Governor-General's office for the travel of officials, are not for the service and attendance on His Excellency, and that, therefore, the hon. gentleman need not expect me to answer his question as to whether we should pay the expenses of His Excellency's servants and attendants if His Excellency should be living in a remote part of the country. I repeat that the sums which have been paid out during the year, and for which a return is before us, are for civil servants; the employees of the Government doing the work of the Government in the Governor-General's office, and that when they went and came on these trips, they went and came on the business of the Government. It is immaterial for that purpose whether they are charged to the Governor-General's office or charged to any particular department from which the request that they should go was made. I venture to say that in almost every case the request came from the Privy Council office, and that the expenses might have been charged to that office.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does that apply to Walker?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I find from the Auditor-General's Report that not only did Walker, a clerk in the Governor-General's office, travel in the way referred to, but that Sergeant Rogers, orderly, travelled from Ottawa to Richmond and return, between the dates of July 8th and 30th. He could not have been carrying despatches all that time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Although he is described there as an orderly, he is a messenger in the office of the Governor-General.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. As the First Minister will see he was away from 8th July to the 30th, from the 8th August to the 13th, from the 19th of August to the 27th, and from 10th of June to the 29th of June; rather long periods for the carrying of despatches.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps he had to go by canoe.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) was hardly fair to me after I had given him credit for that amount of intelligence which he really possesses. I am sure that no one in the House understood my remarks as he did. My suggestion was simply to depart from the old system, which the Minister of Justice seems to think has become sanctified with age, and to do away with the vote of $5,000 as a fixed sum. I suggested that the House should be asked meanwhile to vote to the Government a sum to cover travelling expenses—such sum as they deem proper—and that they should duly and properly account for it the same as any other sum placed at their disposal. It would not, I presume, be in order for me to add that suggestion to the resolution, and, therefore, all I can do here, as a private member, is to move to reduce or strike out the item. I accompanied my proposition with another one which, I think, was understood by everybody, perhaps including the member from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). I may say that I yield to no person in my respect for men in office faithfully discharging the duties of their position, whether of high or low degree, but when it comes to dealing with the public funds, I maintain that there is no man in the service, no matter how exalted his position, who is so hedged in as a divinity, that his public administration should not be subject to proper and respectful inquiry.

Motion negatived.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to inquire about the item of $3,000 for telegrams. It seems rather a large sum.

Mr. FOSTER. The affairs which have been going on for the last year or more have necessitated a great deal of cable work between the Governor-General and the home authorities.

Contingencies — Queen's Privy Council of Canada..... $10,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe that there is a charge of $8,148 for extra clerks, which really does seem very heavy, for the Privy Council office. We know that what is expended one year is generally expended another, no matter how much is asked for in the Estimates, and the hon. gentleman does not, I fear, consider himself bound by the fact that he is only demanding $2,500. What guarantee is there that the sum spent on extra clerks will not reach $8,000 next year?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will see that a change has taken place in the way in which details are put down. Heretofore we have simply had one sum for the whole contingencies, and out of that sum the extra servants were paid. Under that arrangement it was quite possible for the department to have expended the whole of it, if they pleased, on extra clerks, or upon printing if necessary. As my hon. friend will see, I have divided the expenditure into four heads so as to have the effect of restricting the departments to at least this classification in their expenditure. For clerical assistance, or for printing, or stationery, only the maximum of certain sums can be expended. The stationery and printing vary somewhat from year to year, but not very much, and they can be fairly well estimated for as I have estimated them in this estimate. The expenditure of so much money in the Privy Council office is explained by the fact that quite a large number of the regular staff were not replaced, the work being done by temporary clerks. I think there were about five vacancies in the second class that were not filled up last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The arrangement for sub-dividing in this way is an excellent one, but I have some doubts as to whether the Auditor-General can govern himself by the estimates.

Mr. FOSTER. He holds that he is governed by the details as given in the sub-items.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Treasury Board, I know, often override his little objections. Are we to understand that the hon. gentleman means to be bound by his own subdivisions?

Mr. FOSTER. We do sometimes override his decisions, because the Auditor-General occasionally shows himself to be human like others. If you look at the items, you will find that for two years he has been guided by the sub-items, and during that time his decisions have never been overridden.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As the Supply Bill makes no reference to these subdivisions, it is a question how far the Government are legally bound to regard them. What does the hon. Minister of Justice say as to that?

Mr. FOSTER. The contention is that these subdivisions show the express wish of Parliament, and that it is reasonable that the amounts there voted should not be exceeded.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. Finance Minister will recollect that during the last two or three sessions we have had discussions with regard to the expenditure incurred for newspapers in the several departments of the Government, and I think he made a kind of half promise last year that he would look into this matter with the view of reducing that expenditure. I think there has been some reduction.

Mr. FOSTER. A very considerable reduction.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I think the suggestion then made to do away with all these different reading-rooms in the departments, ought to be carried into effect. We have, in this building, a reading-room in which all the newspapers of the Dominion can be found. It is supposed that the clerks of the various departments, when they enter on their duties in the morning, go to their offices for the purpose of discharging their duties, not for the purpose of reading the newspapers. If the hon. Finance Minister will turn to pages B-10 and 11 of the Auditor-General's Report, he will see that the sum of $6,215.47 was expended last year for newspaper subscriptions. That sum was divided among the various departments as follows:—Governor-General's Office, $583.83; Privy Council, $402.29; Justice Department, $379.10; Militia Department, $317.01; Secretary of State, $734.65; Public Printing and Stationery, $25; Interior Department, $255.89; Indian Affairs, $120.77; Audit Office, $6.50; Finance Department, $386.71; Customs Department, $443.45; Inland Revenue Department, $356.28; Post Office Department, $594.12; Agricultural Department, $437.52; Marine Department, $297.90; Fisheries Department, $107.80; Public Works Department, $355.85; and Railways and Canals, $410.80. Now, I contend that nearly all of this money might be saved to the country if the Government would do away with these reading rooms in the different departments. It will do the clerks of the departments, and the Ministers themselves, good to take a walk up to the House of Commons and read the news of the day in the reading-room here if they wish to do so. Besides, I am satisfied if these departmental reading-room were abolished, the clerks would give more attention than they do to the public business. I say this is a useless expenditure, as the Finance Minister seems to admit himself, for he says that he went a certain distance in reducing this expenditure. That shows that he could abolish it altogether, and I would urge upon him this view of the matter. It was the opinion generally expressed last year, and there was no opposition to it. Not a single man contended that these reading-rooms should be kept in existence, and I trust that the minister will do something further towards abolishing them.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend must not be too voracious. He may recollect that two or three years ago the expenditure for these newspapers and books was very, very much larger than it is now. The average expenditure for each department then ran from about $500 to $1,100. It has been reduced until to-day the average for each of the departments named is about $340, and the Order in Council which was passed on the subject limits each department to a certain maxinum, which is very nearly half what it was some years ago. There are not separate reading-rooms in the different departments. A great many of these newspapers are necessary, however, and, considering the progress that has been made, the hon. gentleman ought to have hopes for the future, without too much criticism.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like to inquire of the Finance Minister what necessity exists for a long list of newspapers in a department, costing $500 or $600, which is sufficient to pay the subscriptions of 100 or 125 daily newspapers. What reason is there for a department having a supply of papers beyond the leading daily newspapers of the day—one or two Toronto papers, one or two Montreal papers, and the Ottawa papers. What is the necessity even for them? But if the departments are allowed to have papers at all, I do not see that more than $30 or $40 to each is necessary. There is a great deal of waste and extravagance in this matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I can understand that it may be absolutely essential for the Finance Department and some other departments to have a few papers; but the hon. Minister has not stated that, in his judgment, he has reached low-water mark or even approached it. It is impossible for anyone not in a department to fix any figure; but it does seem absurd that so many newspapers should be taken in the various departments. So far as the departments require information, I can understand it to be necessary and desirable that they should take the newspapers; but apart from that the deputy heads, who have grown to think that they own the departments and are not the servants of the departments, and the other clerks who want to read the news of the day, ought to pay for them out of their own pockets. It does seem to me that $6,000 is an extravagant sum for that purpose. I would not object to any reasonable sum the Minister would say is necessary for his department.

Mr. IVES. The hon. gentleman will agree with me that it is desirable the head of a department should be familiar with the expressions of opinion on public matters to be found in the country newspapers. I do not know of any better way to watch the trend of public sentiment than by reading the country newspapers. If you go into one of the departments and examine the files you will find that three-fourths, and probably more, consist of country newspapers published all over Canada. I do not know how it is with the heads of the other departments; possibly they may not read them to the same extent that I do because they may not have time; but I make it a point to scan all the papers which come to the department, and I find it exceedingly useful. It is a mistake to suppose that the papers are only for the accommodation of the clerks or even the deputy heads. We may become too economical altogether if we discontinue the country newspapers. Of course, the duties of the heads of departments to a great extent confine them to the capital, and they have not the opportunities of keeping in touch with the people which members of Parliament have, and it would not be wise to prevent their seeing country weeklies and learning from them the feeling of the country. Another class of newspaper I find to be very useful—I refer to the commercial papers. They are almost an absolute necessity, if the head of a department is to keep himself informed of the trend of opinion on matters of finance and general interest.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is desirable that members of the Government should be posted on the opinion of newspapers all over the country; but they can do that by coming up to the public reading-room here or by sending their officials here, much more thoroughly than by scanning through the papers taken in the departments. I venture to say, and the hon. Finance Minister will not contradict me, that the mass of papers taken in the departments are Conservative. You will not find many Liberal papers on the file. In the reading-room of this House and the Senate, of course, you will find them, and if the President of the Privy Council wants to keep in touch with public sentiment he will have to read newspapers on the Liberal as well as on the Conservative side.

Mr. IVES. I have nearly all the leading Liberal papers.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. But the President of the Council spoke of keeping in touch with the country press. No doubt the departments take the leading Liberal papers, the Toronto "Globe," the Ottawa "Free Press," the London "Advertiser" and the Hamilton "Times," but they do not take any of the Liberal papers published in the country. So that the hon. gentleman is wide of the mark altogether. He may scan over the Conservative country papers, and learn from them that this is the best Government on the face of the earth, and these papers have good reason for saying so, because they live on Government pap. In the Auditor-General's Report you will see thousands of dollars expended on these Government papers, and it is these papers which the President of the Council will find on file in the departments. Where the public service requires that a department should be in possession of certain newspapers, the public should pay for them; but if the members of the Government and the public servants in the department wish to read the papers for their own benefit they should pay for them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. President of the Council seems to forget the excellent source of information with reference to the state of the country and its requirements which he has in the gentlemen on this side, who, during three or four months every year, impart that information to him without charge. If he would be guided more by them, he would find himself acting more in the interests of the country than he can by spending money unnecessarily on these newspapers, the sole object of many of which is to support themselves and the Government at the expense of the country.

Mr. DICKEY. The Finance Minister deserves some credit for the care he has given to this subject of newspaper subscriptions. This item should be kept as low as possible, and hon. gentlemen opposite should be a little more generous to the Minister than they are. I think they will admit, at any rate, that the finances of the country were managed most economically under the direction of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and if they will look at his record, they will find that during the last year he was in office, instead of spending less than $7,000 in newspapers and advertising, the various departments of this country spent $13,588. I think if this Finance Minister, during the time he has been in office, has reduced that expenditure to one-half what it was under the economical management of the hon. member for South Oxford, we ought to allow him to go on in the same line. I agree with hon. gentlemen opposite that reductions should be made as fast as the real needs of the department will allow, but I think they should give the present incumbent in office the credit to which he is entitled.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. the President of the Privy Council informs us that it is necessary for the heads of departments to take the country newspapers, in order to keep in touch with public sentiment in the rural districts. Now, I find that the office of Secretary of State has the sum of $734.65 for newspapers. That should pay the subscription price of a good many more than all the weekly newspapers published in Canada. It would cover a list of over 500 weekly newspapers. I find that the total expenses of the reading-room of the House of Commons, in which all the newspapers published in this Dominion are taken, with many others published in the United States and Great Britain, are $1,800, while these various departments of the Government expend $6,215. This, I hold, is a useless expenditure of public money. It is not necessary to have a list of papers so extensive in the various departments of the Government. If it is necessary to have the newspapers accessible to those departments, why not have a reading-room in each one of the blocks, a reading-room in the Eastern Block, one in the Western Block and one in the Langevin Block, and by that means we could reduce the expenditure to nearly one-quarter of the present sum, and we would be affording the same facilities to the officials to consult the newspapers that they have now? I agree with the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Somerville) that the expenditure is entirely unnecessary. It is unnecessary to provide these clerks with a reading-room. If they have not anything else to do than to read newspapers, there had better be discharges made. I have always contended that the hours for working in the Civil Service were altogether too short—going to their offices at ten and leaving at four o'clock; and I do not think that it is necessary to spend $6,000 or $7,000 a year to furnish them with the means of passing away their idle time pleasantly. If they go there to work during office hours, they do not require those newspapers, and we are not only guilty of spending money uselessly for newspapers, but employing the men and paying them for the purpose of reading these newspapers. Of course, I would not say that the heads of the departments should have no expense of this kind at all; it might be necessary to take a few newspapers if the suggestion I made with regard to reading-rooms in each one of the blocks is not adopted; but surely it is not necessary to expend over $700 for the Department of Secretary of State, nor $402 for the office of the Privy Council. If the reading-room for the House of Commons is run for $1,800 a year, it is an absurdity to spend the sums we are now asked to furnish newspapers for the various scattered departments of this Government. It is a thing I commend to the attention of my hon. friend the Finance Minister; it is one of those directions in which he can use the pruning-knife, and exercise his well-known spirit of economy very effectively.

Mr. FOSTER. It is scarcely fair to take that exposition of the account as the actual state of matters in 1891-92. For instance, he has read in some cases where the expenses were $600 or $700. When we commenced to get this thing into a little better shape we found arrearages, and a large proportion of the amounts there are not for actual uses of that year, but are for arrearages which had accumulated and that were paid off in that year. Next year's report will show a much more favourable exposition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to call the attention of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) to the fact that I have before me the Public Accounts for 1878. In the Customs, I think he said the subscriptions were $13,000.

Mr. DICKEY. And advertisements.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, that makes a material difference. In 1878, the subscriptions and advertising in newspapers amounted to $7,269. Your advertising account, I see, is $46,000, according to the Auditor-General's Report.

Mr. FOSTER. The advertising is $525.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You will find that the Auditor-General reports an item of $46,000 for advertising, and these subscriptions to boot. I want to call attention to the fact that although there are some cases in which it is for subscriptions alone, in the great majority of cases I notice that it is subscriptions to, and advertising in, newspapers, which is totally a different thing, as he knows, from mere subscriptions alone. For instance, in the Governor-General's secretary's office for that year, subscriptions to, and advertising in, were $1,299. So in the case of the Department of Interior, subscriptions to, and advertising in, $444. Then, subscriptions to, and advertising in for the Department of Finance, over which I presided, $771. In the Department of Public Works, subscriptions to, and advertising in, $1,337, and, as I said, in Customs, subscriptions to, and advertising in newspapers, amounted to $7,269. The comparison does not hold. The comparison, as he had made it, is certainly not correct as compared with this, because then we had no Auditor-General. Now the items are separated by the Auditor-General, and then they were put together.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not wish to take from the member for South Oxford the claim which he has to fame of being an economical Finance Minister, but I have simply quoted from the Public Accounts of 1878, the Contingencies Account for advertising and subscriptions to newspapers. As compared with that, I quoted from the Auditor-General's Report of the present Contingencies Account of the various departments for subscriptions to newspapers and advertising. I made a comparison of these two items, and I found that the hon. member for South Oxford spent twice as much for these two purposes as the present Finance Minister during the last year. I think the year 1878 is the most favourable for the hon. member for South Oxford; the other years will show a worse record. I am sorry if I misrepresented him, I am sorry if any change in keeping accounts makes the comparison unfair to him, but I do not think the hon. gentleman has shown it yet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If he will look at the Auditor-General's Report, page A-23, he will find the item of $46,226.19 put down under the head of advertising for the year 1892.

Mr. McMULLEN. This question has been before the House every session for the last ten years. I am glad to notice there has been a reduction made in the Finance Department, and I earnestly hope reductions will take place in other departments, until the expenditure is entirely wiped out. I endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville). If any information is required with respect to any particular matter, the general reading-rooms are quite convenient and any Minister or clerk can visit them. The President of the Council has referred to the desirability of the Government being in touch with public feeling, and that this can be acquired by perusing the newspapers. I frankly admit that the Government stand in need of such information. The Opposition have endeavoured to impress on them the necessity of obtaining accurate knowledge as to the general condition of the country, but although we have pointed this out clearly and distinctly, they have declined to listen to it. If they would consult the independent journals they would find from day to day similar sentiments expressed to those uttered by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and they would obtain evidence as to the unfortunate financial position of the farming community. If these newspapers were the means of educating the Government on this important question, including the President of the Council, who stands as much in need of education on this point as any member of the House, I would be willing to continue the expenditure of $6,000. Great advantage would be gained by the country if we could educate the Government in this direction. But they have had the use of these newspapers during eight or ten years, and they do not appear to benefit by them, and under all the circumstances and in the light of past experience, it is necessary to cut down the items of expense, and the expenditure on newspapers for the several departments should be dropped. I hope next year that the Minister of Finance, with that courage which he has displayed in making reduction in the Finance Department, will reduce the expenditure in every department until there is not a paper left except in the reading-rooms.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I understood the Minister of Finance last year said he would take the matter into his consideration and endeavour to make some arrangement by which the reading-rooms of the House and the Senate would be utilized for the departments. The member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) went a little too far in attempting to insinuate that we were finding fault with the Minister of Finance. Every hon. member has given credit to the Minister of Finance for having reduced the expenditure, and he does not require any assistance from the member from Cumberland to keep up his end of the stick. The Minister of Finance should adopt the course of discontinuing the expenditure under this head entirely and have the officials of the departments visit the reading-rooms of the House of Commons and Senate to get the news of the day. I understand the Minister of Finance last session undertook to work out some scheme of this kind by which the expenditure would not only be reduced but wiped out.

Mr. FOSTER. I gave no such undertaking, because the scheme is not feasible to have two or three different reading-rooms to which officers should come who wanted information. Every hon. gentleman knows how the expense has grown and how difficult it is to bring matters to a normal condition. Every department must take a certain number of newspapers. So long as I am in charge of the Finance Department I intend to take what newspapers are necessary and not to go to the reading-rooms for them. I take those that are necessary for my information and for the work of the office, not for my personal use but for use in connection with my official position. Take the Marine and Fisheries Department, of which I have some knowledge. That department must necessarily take a large number of papers. There is a record kept of wrecks and casualties, and also a record of fishing matters, so far as they are reported in the different local papers, as regards the coast and inland waters. The newspapers are useful and are necessary for the working of the department, and of course they entail considerable expense. In that department I think the expense has been brought down to a normal position. I think in my department the same result has been brought about, and all the departments are working on the same line. In regard to the expense for the Secretary of State's Department some newspapers did not send in accounts for three years. Now the rule is to pay for newspapers in advance, and if newspapers are sent to the departments without being paid for the publishers do so at their own risk.

Contingencies—Department of Militia and Defence..... $8,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice an expense for extra clerks. With thirty-three gentlemen in the department extra clerks should not have been required. There was no war imminent, so far as I remember, in 1892, and there was merely the routine work to do.

Mr. FOSTER. The expense was the small amount of $560.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As the work of 1891-92 was the normal work of the department the regular staff should have been able to do it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I notice an item for postage in connection with the department. Is that for foreign postage?

Mr. FOSTER. Each department pays its own foreign postage. This expense is for foreign postage.

Mr. McMULLEN. In looking over the report of expense connected with the Department of the Secretary of State I find item for expenses of private secretary and messenger to New York. It appears that the late Secretary of State made two trips to New York in December and January, and there is a charge for travelling expenses of $87.50. What was the Secretary of State doing in New York at that time?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have no means of giving the information at present, but I will get it as soon as possible.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the explanation is, that the Secretary of State at that time went away from this country very ill indeed on his way to the south, and he took his secretary with him for the purpose of completing unfinished business.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a very ingenious explanation, I must say.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is ingenious.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no doubt that what the First Minister stated is true, and perhaps it was necessary that the Secretary of State should bring his private secretary along with him to transact his business, but I do not believe that the country should have to pay for the expenses of a messenger whom the Secretary of State brings along to take care of him. I want the present Secretary of State to tell us why the country should be called upon to pay $87.50 for the trips of John Courtman to New York. I think that is saddling too much expense altogether on the country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Before this item is passed, we should be informed why the Secretary of State has to carry a man around with him in addition to his private secretary at the expense of the country. If the chief men in the Government are permitted to pursue such extravagant habits as this, we may very soon find that the Controllers and the Solicitor-General will be doing the same thing. It would be nothing but equal rights that they should have the same privilege, and that is what the members of the Government are contending for all the time. I do not think we should sanction this expenditure so as to make it a precedent, because precedents are very often brought before the House as excuses for a good deal of wrong-doing. I, therefore, contend that this item should be allowed to stand over until we can get an explanation from the present Secretary of State after dinner.

Mr. FOSTER. It is impossible for the Secretary of State to give this information after dinner.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. FOSTER. I mean to say that, as his office is closed, it would be impossible for him to get the information in such short time. Besides, the expenditure occurred under the preceding Secretary of State, and it was on account of Mr. Chapleau's serious illness. I do not think my hon. friend is so cruel-hearted as to make a very strong criticism on that point.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Chapleau must be sick very often, because I find there are two trips to New York and three to Montreal charged here.

Mr. FOSTER. It is quite within the memory of us all that he was very ill at that time.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I suppose he strained himself when he was kicking.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is understood that if this vote passes now, it will not be considered as a precedent.

Mr. FOSTER. It cannot be considered as a precedent, it is now a year behind.

Mr. MULOCK. I think we should hear from the Minister of Militia on this subject, who, on a recent occasion, accused his colleague of petty larceny. If I remember aright, he accused the Minister of Finance of having been a party to stealing some of his notes, not promissory notes, but notes of an address.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am perfectly satisfied, when a minister gets sick and has to go to a warmer climate for the benefit of his health, that his pay should go on, if this House determines it. However, I think it is a very serious proposition to ask the country to pay the travelling expenses of a private secretary and a messenger when their salary is going on all the time. I do not think we can justify this expenditure on any ground. If the hon. gentleman says that it was some little extravagance on the part of the late Secretary of State, the House will have to accept that explanation, but I do not think the House should accept it. It is an outrage that the country should have to pay the expenses of a private secretary and a messenger on a trip of this kind. It is not a proposition that I can endorse.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not make that proposition. What I said was: That the minister at that time went away for the purpose of remaining for a considerable period, and he took his secretary and messenger with him for a part of the journey. The hon. gentleman will remember that the inquiry at that time was principally about Mr. Tache, and while the Secretary of State was absent for a considerable time, his secretary was also absent eight days altogether.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I had reference more to the explanation of the Minister of Finance, in justification of the charge, namely, that the Secretary of State was ill and went away, and that, therefore, we should be satisfied with that explanation. I suppose a few hundred dollars more or less does not amount to a great deal, but to have such an expenditure justified on that ground gives a very bad precedent, and ought not to be sanctioned or approved of by the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I merely stated the circumstance as a means of disarming the severe criticism of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville). That is all.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It appears that the Secretary of State went down to the Wet Basin at Quebec and got cold, and that is the cause of the outlay. He had to take a messenger with him at the time he was down there.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not think this estimate should be allowed to pass in its present shape. I do not see why the country should be saddled with the expenses of a messenger and a private secretary, travelling around with gentlemen who get very large salaries outside their expenses altogether. Unless the Government give a promise that it will not occur again, the item should be struck out.

It being six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Contingencies - Post Office Department..... $45,500

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the minister explain the cause of the increase of $8,300 in this item?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The contingencies of the department are explained in detail on page B-5 of the Auditor-General's Report.

Mr. CHARLTON. I see that the Postmaster-General expends $471.82 for Canadian, $55.75 for American and $66.55 for European newspapers. Are these papers found to be necessary in that department?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, they are.

Mr. CHARLTON. Who requires them, and for what purpose are they required?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. These papers come to the department just as they come to the other departments, and they are necessary for the purpose of the department. It is necessary for the department to have foreign exchanges, so as to keep informed as to what is going on in regard to postal affairs.

Mr. CHARLTON. Has the department no more authoritative source of information respecting postal matters? I am unable to see why the Post Office Department requires papers unless to furnish reading matter to the clerks. How many does the Postmaster-General himself read?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Personally I get very few of these papers. But I think the hon. gentleman will find, on referring to the Public Accounts of former years, that the number has been very considerably reduced. They would not be taken unless they were considered to be necessary.

Mr. CHARLTON. Could the number not be reduced still further without crippling the department or depriving it of information?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It may be possible to cut down the number. The matter will be looked into, and next year I hope the hon. gentleman will be able to congratulate me on a further saving.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have not been able to appreciate the explanation given by the hon. minister. The vote which the hon. gentleman asks for this year is $8,300 in excess of last year. The expenditure for last year was $36,000, which was slightly below the estimates, so that his explanation was really no explanation at all.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The estimates are made up by Colonel White, who is, I think, every hon. gentleman will admit, very economical in his views. The vote for contingencies is increased by $8,300, because that amount was expended over the amount of the previous year, and it was considered better to put in the estimates what would be required than to allow the appropriation to be overdrawn as it was last year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The mere statement that the expense exceeded that of the previous year does not explain the reason for the increase. Has it been for extra clerks, or for cab-hire, or for what? We have ten or twelve departments. In five there have been decreases; four show an increase; but in none does the increase come near that of the Post Office Department contingencies, in which there is the abnormally large increase of $8,300. It may be perfectly justifiable; but we ought to have some reasonable explanation.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman knows that the Post Office Department is every year increasing with the development of the country. This involves the continual opening of new offices and money branches and additional clerks, and I have already stated that the increase upon the expenditure of last year is caused by the increase in the number of clerks who had to be added to the ordinary staff, because as the work in the department was increasing abnormally, additional clerks were required to carry it on.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman cannot really mean that, because he will see that the total amount expended in the year 1892 for extra clerks in the department was only $16,800, and here is an increase of $8,300, which would be 50 per cent. The hon. gentleman does not desire the House to understand that he has increased the number of extra clerks by 50 per cent. If the hon. gentleman will look at page B-5, he will see that the expenditure for the year in the four large items was: telegrams, $1,242, the increase in which must have been nominal; extra clerks and messengers, $16,711; stationery office, $2,311; printing, binding and paper, $10,743. On which of these has the increase taken place? If there has been an increase of 50 per cent in the extra clerks, it is time this committee took the matter into very serious consideration.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman will find, when I bring down the information, that I am quite correct, and that the increase was caused by the fact that we have had to open new post offices all through the country, owing to the building of new railways, and this necessitated additional help. I will bring down in detail all the items; but I still hold to what I have said, and the hon. gentleman will find that I am quite correct.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman's report is not before the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It will be placed on the Table to-night.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not going to prejudge the matter; but I do not think the hon. gentleman should ask the House to vote a sum for contingencies so largely in excess of what has been voted for years, especially at a time when the pruning-knife is being applied to other departments, without giving us some better explanation than he has. He knows that although there may be an increase in the number of post offices from year to year it does not follow that the contingencies of the department at Ottawa should be increased except to a very inappreciable extent. Has the hon. gentleman appointed any new extra clerks, and how many?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have not got the information here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The increase of half a dozen post offices in Manitoba, or a dozen in Ontario and a couple of dozen in Quebec, as the case may be, does not add to the increase in the contingencies of the department.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, to a great extent, because we have to employ additional hands. In the Post Office Department additional help is required, who are taken on for a certain period of time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I cannot congratulate the head of any department when he asks an increase of 50 per cent on one item, while the other departments are decreasing, and gives such an explanation as the hon. gentleman has given to-night. With all due respect to him, I do not think it is proper that he should ask the House to pass the vote in the face of the explanation he has given.

Mr. HAGGART. As the business of the department increases, so does the expenditure, and among the large expenditures many would be stationery. The employment of extra clerks also requires to be increased. The hon. gentleman seems to think there was 50 per cent increased expenditure on extra clerks. The extra clerks made but a very small proportion of the total amount. When the details come down, it will be shown that necessity required this expenditure.

Mr. CHARLTON. The explanation is not satisfactory. Here is an increase in the total of contingencies for last year of almost 23 per cent.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will allow this item to stand until I bring down the details.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman that this increase of 23 per cent cannot bear any proportion to the increase in the business of the department or the increase of the population or wealth of the country. While the population of Canada was increasing less than 12 per cent in ten years, here is an increase of 23 per cent in one year in the amount of contingencies. Now, I hold that some explanation more satisfactory should be given by the Postmaster-General before we pass this item. It may be susceptible of satisfactory explanation, but an increase upon the total list of contingencies of almost 25 per cent is certainly a rather startling increase. There can be no increase in the business of the Post Office Department and in the amount of railway mileage open, or anything in connection with the business of the department, commensurate with this increase of 25 per cent.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am quite prepared to let the item stand.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Minister of Railways throws the Postmaster-General over, and intimates that the explanation he made to the House may not be the correct one. But I made my statement with reference to the explanation made by the Postmaster-General, and that was that the increase occurred in the extra clerks of $16,741 last year, and the increase of $8,300 would be about 50 per cent. I therefore assumed that the Postmaster-General knew what he was talking about, and my observation was strictly correct.

Contingencies—Department of Agriculture, including $912.50 to Messrs. Skead and Dew-hurst..... $21,725

Mr. FOSTER. Make that sum $21,100. This decrease arises from the fact that a clerk who was last year paid out of the contingencies, has been appointed to the regular staff to fill a vacancy.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understand the Department of Immigration has been taken over to the Department of Interior. How is it that the same amount of contingencies are asked for under these circumstances as before that time?

Mr. FOSTER. I have a list of extra clerks from the Agriculture Department who are employed in the Patent Branch, the Archives and in the main branch, the most being in the Patent Branch, the salaries amounting to $8,766. In the Archives Branch are two that I have struck out, one at $730, leaving $456. In the Main Branch there are six extra clerks at $4,158, making up the total sum asked for. The Patent Branch, of course, is increasing every year, and these clerks are mainly in the Patent Branch. I suppose an addition is necessary there each year.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not understand the explanation very clearly. The Immigration Branch is removed from this department, the contingencies of the Immigration Branch is increased this year, and this remains almost the same. The Patent Branch was in force in this department last year. How is it that you have almost the same as you had before the removal of this branch to the Department of Interior?

Mr. FOSTER. The Immigration Branch was removed, as my hon. friend states, but I think not more than three extra clerks were transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Interior Department.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That would reduce it, would it not?

Mr. FOSTER. That would reduce it by three, yet the increased work in the Patent Branch has overbalanced that.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Will the Minister explain the note on page 17, which reads: "Including $912.50 to Messrs. Skead and Dewhurst, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act." Why were these payments made to these two clerks?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Dewhurst and Mr. Skead were extra clerks in the main branch. That foot-note was put in because they have not passed the Civil Service examination, and they have not been in the office continuously since 1882, and so are not eligible to continuous temporary employment unless this is put in. Mr. Dewhurst and Mr. Skead are both of them excellent clerks, and have a special work to do, and, consequently, ought to be kept on in the interest of the department.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Then, that is intended to override the rule laid down by the Auditor-General that these extra clerks, unless they pass the Civil Service examination—

Mr. FOSTER. Or had been on before 1882.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You will perceive that possibly an injustice is done to a number of clerks who were discharged here a year ago from the Department of Interior, who had been long in the service of that department, and were dismissed summarily because they were not able to comply with the Civil Service Act. Now, why should that rule apply to the Department of Interior and not apply to all the other departments? If we pass an Act of Parliament for the guidance of the Government in these matters, I think that rule ought to be applied to all the departments alike.

Mr. FOSTER. That is quite true, and the rule has been applied, but there have been exceptions made as required by the exceptional ability or utility of the clerks themselves. If I mistake not, there was an exception made in one or two instances in the Interior, in the same way as in the case of these clerks. Of course it is immaterial in one way whether those two clerks are retained or two others brought in to do the work, but the two clerks who are there possess a knowledge of the work and are reported as being experienced and efficient clerks, and it is against the best interests of the department that they should be removed simply on this technicality and two others put in who would not understand the work. It comes to this, whether in special instances we should make special exceptions, not, however, so many exceptions as to avoid the rule. The rule is that the clerks must pass the Civil Service examination or have been continuously employed since 1882.

Mr. FLINT. What compensation do these clerks receive?

Mr. FOSTER. $912 per annum.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The rule generally has been to explain the retention of clerks in violation of the Civil Service Act, that is, men not entitled to be in the service because they have not passed the examination, on the ground that they possessed some special technical qualification which induced the department to retain them. I do not understand that any special qualification is possessed by these two gentlemen, but simply the department wishes to retain them because generally they are good men. If that rule is adopted, you strike a blow at the Civil Service. There is no benefit in passing the examination. There are lots of good men in the service, but the law has laid down the rule that the clerks must pass the Civil Service examination or they cannot be retained. I understand that occasionally, where very special qualifications are possessed by clerks, the House is asked to override the rule by voting a special grant. I do not understand, however, that special qualifications are claimed in these cases.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say whether the claim is made on the ground of special technical knowledge or not. They have not been kept on during preceding years in violation of the law, because the same provision was made two years ago, and this will make the third year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Unless these clerks possess special qualifications, why did they not, during those years, qualify themselves to pass the examination.

Mr. FOSTER. I imagine they are beyond the age.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the minister state the amount of receipts last year?

Mr. FOSTER. About $80,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. What were the receipts for the previous year?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say from memory, but if the hon. gentleman will send out for the Public Accounts for any year, he will find the receipts in the revenue returns.

Mr. McMULLEN. The committee must regret the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. If he, with his intimate knowledge of the department, was present, he would be able to give us information. Unfortunately the hon. gentleman who occupies that position is not even here, and his successor is placed in a position beyond the hearing of our voices. He has not allowed himself to be tortured by being questioned across the floor of this House. In regard to the most important department, the Department of Agriculture, hon. members will be called upon to look across the floor for some one to answer questions in the interest of that department, and I suppose the Government will refer us to the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. What is our loss is gain for the other party. The hon. gentleman will find plenty of ministers to torture.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It appears there are no farmers in this country who understand agriculture, and they have to be taught by a lawyer who has not devoted very much attention to this subject. The hon. gentleman who occupied the position of minister before had an idea regarding some products. He understood two-rowed barley, but I do not believe that the present incumbent understands the nature of that product. It does appear singular that among the farmers in the House who sit behind the Treasury benches, the Government were unable to find any gentleman in the House who was able to fill the position, and were obliged to go out of the House and obtain the services of a gentleman who has no special claim, no technical knowledge, to preside over the most important department of Government. Every hon. member must understand that the welfare and prosperity of this country largely depend on agriculture, and yet the Government have placed a lawyer in charge of that important department, one who has had no special training even on any of the experimental farms, who has not even been a disciple of the late Minister of Agriculture, who does not possess special training, and then in order to prevent troublesome questions being asked in this House and discussed by those who have practical knowledge in regard to the solution of agricultural problems, he is placed in the Senate. It is strange indeed that in the formation of the new Government no consideration was given to that large and important class of the community. I would not object to the hon. gentleman because he is a lawyer. The Government are very partial to lawyers, and all the new ministers and all the accessories to the Government, those who are only allowed to peep into their deliberations, who are like Peri peering into Paradise, are all lawyers. There is an hon. gentleman, who has no technical knowledge of farming, except that he is connected with a colonization company, who sits there and waits at the door of the Privy Council for the results of the deliberations of the Privy Council, and then has a voice outside, in the outside service. Another hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and still another of these hon. gentlemen is a lawyer, and the Minister of Agriculture is a lawyer, and he is put in the Senate. I presume if the farmers in this House were to investigate the claims and ascertain the knowledge possessed by that minister it might embarrass the Government, so they put him in the mausoleum of departed political souls, the Senate. The great agricultural interests of this country are intrusted to a minister who has no practical knowledge of farming, who understands it not, and the Government have hidden him away in that retreat, that charnel-house, the Senate. That is where the people of this country have to go for information on agricultural questions. It is singular indeed to notice the way in which the Government has been formed as regards the Department of Agriculture. The Government seem to have been unable to get what were formerly called brains, except by bringing them in from outside. Even when they went outside this House they brought in a minister who did not possess any special knowledge of the subject. The greatest interest in the country, the agricultural interest, has been entirely neglected, and there is not much wonder that we find the country in its present depressed condition when it is governed by men who, it is true, possess some qualifications, who are able to split hairs, who are able to show that wrong is right, and who are able to give excuses, and they are good at giving excuses, although they are not very efficient or willing to give information in regard to estimates presented to the House. I do protest on behalf of the agriculturists of this country that their interests should be passed over, and that the gentleman who presides over them should be shelved away in the Senate.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not know that this debate is pertinent to the subject of "Contingencies, Department of Agriculture," but I really do not think the case is quite so hopeless as my hon. friend seems to regard it. Considering how much he knows upon every subject that comes before the House. It must be remembered that the hon. gentleman is not a farmer at all, and is not even a lawyer. He is a physician. If the hon. gentleman will turn his memory back to the time when he thinks this country was governed under better conditions than it is now, he will find that the Department of Agriculture had two heads at various times and that they were both lawyers and both Senators.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I may say for the information of the First Minister that I had the advantage of being a farmer, and was trained and brought up on the farm, so that I do not think the hon. gentleman should misrepresent me.

Contingencies—Department of Marine and Fisheries..... $10,000

Mr. FLINT. There are some inquiries which I should like to make in regard to this item. It seems to me that there is altogether a disproportionate amount of money expended by the Department of Marine and Fisheries in the matter of distributing the fishing bounty annually. It is difficult, in the short time I have at my disposal, to separate the accounts and to ascertain what it does cost to distribute this $150,000 a year. When you look at some of these charges you will find that either they require some explanation or that there ought to be some reform in the department in the matter of the cost of distributing this comparatively small amount of money. If I have made the additions correctly I find that it cost the Government last year $12,500 simply to make out the bounty cheques. A large number of extra clerks were employed; but I am not quite certain whether that comes under this item or not.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not come under this item.

Mr. FLINT. As I broached the subject I will conclude my remarks now; but I will probably dwell more at length on this point at some future time. In the meantime the minister might look over the subject and make such explanations as he considers necessary. It does seem to me that a large amount of money must be—I will not say unnecessarily expended—and there ought to be some change in the system which costs from $12,000 to $13,000 a year for simply making out and signing these cheques. There are in addition the cost of inspectors and wardens, the expenses in connection with magistrates taking informations, the expenses for gathering information, and the necessary expense of verifying all these charges. I call the attention of the acting minister to the matter now, as it appears to me that this charge is excessive, and I trust that he will be able to give an explanation later on.

Mr. LISTER. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Flint) has referred briefly to the fact that the fishermen of the lower provinces receive from this Government yearly a very large sum of money in the shape of bounty. I do not know but perhaps this would be a proper time in which to call the attention of the House to the grievances of the fishermen of Ontario.

Mr. FOSTER. It is scarcely the time. This vote is for contingencies here at Ottawa.

Mr. LISTER. Of course I suppose I would have the right to bring up the subject, but I do not propose just now to go at length into the grievances of the fishermen of Ontario. I will call the attention of the gentleman in charge of that department to the fact that before the close of the session I shall take occasion to bring to the attention of the House the grievances of the fishermen of the province of Ontario, grievances which they complain they suffer from the large number of inspectors who are constantly interfering with them. I will also draw the attention of the minister to the very large expenditure involved in the so-called protection of fisheries in Ontario, the very large amount of money received from these fisheries as compared with the fisheries of the lower provinces, and to the fact that they receive no attention and no support from the Government, in the way of bounties or otherwise. I believe that I am correct in saying that petitions have been forwarded to the department setting forth a number of the grievances which these men complain of, and that if these complaints are at all well founded, the Government should investigate them and if possible offer redress.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that he is, perhaps, improperly stopping a discussion which my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) intended taking up.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not wish to do it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We are in reality, now voting money to pay clerks for this fishery bounty work. If he turns to the Auditor-General's Report, he will find that of this $5,000, over $3,000 are charged to expenses in paying the fishing bounty, so that if any hon. gentleman wishes to discuss this matter now is the proper time, lest he might be told later that he had missed his opportunity.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not do that.

Mr. FLINT. I may say that for the present I am satisfied with calling the attention of the minister to the matter.

Contingencies, Department of Trade and Commerce $5,000

Mr. FLINT. I would ask the minister if there has been laid before the House, or if there is accessible to members, any statement as to the constitution of the new departments and the distribution of duties among the new ministers and assistant ministers? I think it would be of great advantage to the members of the House to have either the Order in Council or any regulation that has been made by the Privy Council in regard to this subject.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There has been no information such as the hon. gentleman asks for laid on the Table of the House. The only Order in Council on the subject is the Order in Council which places these departments under the supervision of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The distribution of the work between the Department of Trade and Commerce itself and the two Departments of Inland Revenue and Customs, will need to be worked out by a little experience: we found it impossible to outline their respective duties in advance of that experience. At the same time, we think it very likely that some legislation will be necessary to transfer to the Department of Trade and Commerce some subjects which are now in charge of other departments.

Mr. CHARLTON. Was it considered that there was any real necessity for this change, which gives us practically fifteen ministers, when a country to the south of us, with a population of 65,000,000, manages to get along with seven? I have never heard any statement showing any necessity for the creation of these new offices. It strikes me, in fact, that it is likely to complicate matters and increase the difficulty of managing the affairs of the country. If the hon. gentleman had consolidated the two Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue, instead of dividing them and putting the business under three heads, it is my opinion that he would have done better.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the principle was pretty well recognized in the debate that took place in the House in 1887, on the Acts respecting these departments, that the establishment of a Department of Trade and Commerce might be attended with great benefit, and we are of that opinion. As regards the placing of the other two departments under controllers, we think that will be attended with great benefit, inasmuch as it will enable the gentlemen at the head of these branches to attend exclusively to matters of administration. I think everybody who has had any acquaintance at all with those departments will, on the whole, realize that their work has grown to vast proportions, that of the Department of Customs especially being more than a Minister could attend to while having Cabinet and political duties to discharge. As regards the Solicitor-Generalship, hon. gentlemen will remember that in 1877 a Bill was introduced into this House for the purpose of creating the office of Attorney-General, with the view of sharing between two persons the work of the Department of Justice, and I am sure that since that time, with the growth of public business, the work of that department was doubled. The hon. gentleman has referred to the disparity in the number of Ministers in this country and in the United States, where population is so very much greater. But while the hon. gentleman's observation was verbally correct, he must remember that the work of departments there is divided into branches of great importance, each of which is presided over by an officer of high salary and of high rank, although not of Cabinet rank; and, besides, everyone must remember that in this country we have still the system of provincial representation in the Cabinet. That system was founded in 1867, at the time of the Union, and it is an outgrowth of the provincial system, which is almost as strong to-day as it was then. I doubt very much, indeed, if any of the provinces will be willing to give up the share of representation which it had at the time of the union. While that provincialism exists as regards the Federal Government, we must necessarily have a larger number of ministers than we would have if the country were more compactly united, as it is on the other side of the border, and as we hope it may be some time here.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. While I doubted extremely at the time the hon. gentleman alludes to, the expediency of adding to the number of ministers, I did think years ago that we should aim to reduce the number of ministers in the Cabinet to seven, adding to them a moderate number, some four or five, of junior officers. I must say that the idea that it is requisite, in a country of four or five million people, to have twelve paid, and, I think, two unpaid ministers, and three gentlemen in a sort of incipient or probationary stage, is very like running this thing into the ground. We have fifteen paid officials at least, besides the Speaker and Deputy Speaker, making, practically, seventeen members of the Government. For a country of our population and resources, I must say it strikes me as pretty extravagant. The plain fact of the matter is we possessed a legislative and civil service machinery adequate to a population of twenty or thirty millions of people instead of four or five millions. The pattern of our Government was cut a little large at Confederation, because the men who founded Confederation did not dream that at the end of a quarter of a century the population of Canada would be only four or five millions. They thought we would by this time have at least eight or nine millions, and that we would be on the high road to acquiring fourteen or fifteen millions, which was their excuse for starting with a greater number of ministers than was really required. Now, I believe that the services of this country would be infinitely better conducted if we had seven Cabinet ministers and a moderate number of junior officials to assist them. That is the theory I always advocated. I may tell the hon. gentleman that is the theory I advocated then. I never approved of the creation in this country of such an enormous number of ministers, and I believe that, to a very great extent, the present system results in this, that you have two Cabinets. You have the anomaly of thirteen or fourteen officers to do the work which only requires four or five. That is about the practical result of this arrangement. I know of no other country similarly encumbered. Certainly not Great Britain, for there the members of the Cabinet hardly exceed eleven, besides a number of gentlemen who are sometimes admitted into the Cabinet and sometimes not—officers of what are called Cabinet rank, that is, who have a right to a seat in the Cabinet. In Great Britain, with a population of nearly forty millions and without, at present at least, the assistance of any subsidiary assemblies, they can get along with eleven ministers; and it does appear to me to be a monstrous piece of folly and extravagance that we should find it necessary to augment our number to seventeen, for whether it be twelve or fourteen who are in the Cabinet, the total number amounts to seventeen. That is far too many, and has the evil effect of filling this House with placemen or expected placemen to a very injurious degree. The average number of supporters of the Government in this House may be any number from 115 to 125; and you find now, supposing we count Mr. Speaker and his deputy and allow a couple for the service of the Upper House, that one man in seven or eight is practically provided for by a seat in the Cabinet, either inside or outside the door. The number is far too many, and causes dissatisfaction in the country. We have about ten or twelve million dollars of revenue to spend every year. We take, I see by these returns, about $1,400,000 to pay for our civil government and some $700,000 or $800,000 for our legislative proceedings, and there are extras besides; so that it costs us roughly for the mere machinery of spending this $10,000,000 revenue a sum of about $2,000,000 a year, which is out of all proportion to the real wants of the country. The whole thing is an unfortunate business and a great mistake, and had the calmer judgment of the First Minister been consulted, he would hardly have ventured to do it, even under the necessity of meeting political exigencies and supplying his political menagery, even with the temptation, which I admit to be great, of seeing the Protestant lion munch his provender contentedly as the very last joint in the tail of the Catholic lamb.

Mr. LISTER. The First Minister, down to the last few words of his explanation, made what appeared to be a very satisfactory explanation indeed for adding to the number of the Cabinet, but when he told this House that it was necessary to add to the number in order that the different provinces of the Dominion might be there represented, he at once admitted that the addition was not at all necessary. If we look at the Cabinet for a few minutes, we find in it what is called the President of the Council. That gentleman has absolutely nothing to do except preside at the Council Board—which the First Minister himself could do—and draws his salary of $7,000 or $8,000 a year. We find that gentleman's office is to be paid the same as the other departments of the Government, and we find three other gentlemen appointed. Now, there is no doubt at all that the First Minister discharged all the duties of Minister of Justice with satisfaction to the country at large, and if he found that the duties of that office were too much, it would have been competent for him to have taken some other office instead. But instead of that, he adds to the expenditure of this country $15,000 a year by taking in three additional gentlemen, and he promotes one gentleman, who presides over the Customs Department, to the office bearing the high-sounding name of Minister of Trade and Commerce. What the hon. gentleman will have to do it is difficult to understand, except to direct the deliberations of the Senate. We find that that hon. gentleman draws his salary. He is long in the public service, and if the Superannuation Act applied to him, I submit that he would be a fit subject to retire, instead of bringing in two other gentlemen at $10,000 a year into the public service. I have no word of complaint to make against the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) or the others. No doubt, they will fill whatever office they may be appointed to with satisfaction to the country and credit to themselves, but what I do complain of is, that situated as we are in the country to-day, barded as the people are, we should impose a Cabinet of seventeen members on a population of four or five millions. That times are hard throughout the country, notwithstanding the speeches of the First Minister and the Finance Minister at Toronto, there can be no question; and in the face of this, the Government have thought, at this particular juncture, to bring in without necessity three other members into the Cabinet at an expense of $15,000. It is all very well for the Minister of Justice to say that the duties of the office have increased. I can name Cabinet ministers who can do all their work in half an hour per day. As a matter of fact, the work of the departments is done by the deputy ministers and the other clerks in these departments, and the chiefs, many of them, do not even supervise or attempt to supervise the work. We have here a Minister of Trade and Commerce, we have a new deputy created for that office, we have a Controller of Inland Revenue, and we have a deputy under him and an army of civil servants; we have a Controller of Customs and a Deputy Controller and all the officers in that department; we have a Secretary of State, and I ask the hon. gentleman what work there is to be done by him except to sign his name occasionally to a patent or proclamation issued by the Governor-General, which work could be well done by some other member of the Government? The President of the Council is a supernumerary, other officers in the department are mere figure-heads, and the consequence is that hon. members of this House are looking for positions in the Cabinet and places of emolument. This thing, which is going on from session to session, is destructive of the interests of parliamentary government. In England there are but eleven Cabinet ministers. In Mexico, with a population of 10,000,000, there are only seven with deputies; in the United States, with a population of 64,000,000, notwithstanding what the Prime Minister says, there are seven Cabinet ministers with deputies in the different departments, to discharge the same duties as the deputies in the departments here called Controllers. Sir, it cannot be justified by any process of reasoning. Instead of increasing the number of Cabinet officers, in the interest of the country and in the interest of economy, the number of those officers ought to be decreased.

Departmental Buildings, including $100 required to pay for firing the noon gun. $29,000

Mr. LISTER. What is the object of firing the noon gun?

Mr. COCHRANE. To make it sound like your speech.

Mr. LISTER. I ask the hon. gentleman why the country should be put to that expense, notwithstanding the interruption of the hon. gentleman who has been charged with the skim milk business.

Contingencies in connection with the Department of Interior. . . $18,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the House and the country at large are entitled to a very full explanation of the reasons which induced the Minister of Interior to reappoint to office the gentleman who was suspended last year. His suspension took place for causes which seemed at the time prima facie to justify it—at any rate, the Government took the responsibility and the House did not complain of it. After a time, while he was discharging temporarily, I believe, under suspension, the duties of the office, he has been reappointed. I would ask the hon. gentleman to take the House into his confidence and explain what reasons induced him to make that reappointment?

Mr. DALY. I can only say that my reasons for reappointing Mr. Burgess are, briefly, that I have known him as former deputy head of that department for a number of years, having had a great deal of business to do with the department. I always found him to be a very courteous and obliging officer, and one who seemed to have the work of the department, so to speak, at his fingers' ends. Since I became the head of the department I have had better reasons to judge of his qualifications for the position he fills, and I am satisfied, from my own experience, that no better officer, or no better head of a department, exists in the service. Mr. Burgess has been connected with the department for some sixteen years, and during a part of that time he has been at the head of that department. He has a peculiar knowledge of all affairs pertaining to the Department of the Interior, which, as the hon. gentleman knows, is one of the largest departments in the service; and I think it would have been a great misfortune to the department and to the Government to have lost the services of an officer who had the requirements that I speak of. Now, as to what the hon. gentleman said in reference to the suspension of Mr. Burgess, of course, he is aware of the debate that took place in the House last year, and I do not know that I could add much information to that which was given by my predecessor then. Mr. Burgess was reappointed entirely upon his merits, from the fact that he was a good officer, that he had the qualifications of which I have spoken, and that he would make, in my opinion, one of the most efficient deputy heads in the service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very sorry to hear a minister of the Crown state that Mr. Burgess, after what has happened, is as good as any deputy minister in the service of the Crown. That is not a compliment to the other deputy ministers. The House will recollect that Mr. Burgess appeared before the Public Accounts Committee, and that very grave irregularities were found to have occurred in his department; many grave improprieties were discovered in that department; they were so grave that he had to be suspended, and the head of the department, although very anxious to protect Mr. Burgess, was utterly unable last year, in my judgment, to give any justification or any reasonable ground for his practical reinstatement. The Government, bearing in mind the results to Canada of the exposures which then took place, ought to have been excessively careful before they restored any man who had been implicated in them. What they are now doing is to make public proclamation to the other heads of departments, that conduct like that of Mr. Burgess, which involved, to say the least of it, the disapprobation of his chief, and which involved a very grave irregularity, is not to be considered a bar to his advancement to the very highest post in the service, and perhaps the most responsible post. It is impossible to suppose that it was not in the power of the department to obtain other gentlemen with as much information and as much knowledge of the affairs of the Interior as that gentleman possessed. I must say that if they wished to demoralize the Civil Service worse than the evidence laid before us showed that it was demoralized, the reinstatement of Mr. Burgess, in my opinion, is the best way to do it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is one other remark to make, and that is the reinstatement of Mr. Burgess in his place in the department would seem to be an act of injustice towards those who were dismissed for similar irregularities. Now, I have personally no word to say against Mr. Burgess. I never had any work in the Interior Department; but I have always heard him spoken of as an obliging deputy and thoroughly well acquainted with his duties. But you must remember the relation in which he stood to the public and to the department. He had been guilty in conniving at irregularities, or committing irregularities. He was the deputy head of the department, to whom the staff looked up; and it is well known that if in an army officers find their chief guilty of want of discipline that will spread to the rank and file. So in his case, that which might have been a venial offence on the part of a subordinate, becomes a much more serious offence when committed by a gentleman occupying his position. I am not going to discuss now, as we discussed at great length last year, the character of that offence. The House is sufficiently well aware of it. It was sufficiently grave, in the opinion of the Government, to cause them to suspend Mr. Burgess from his duties for many months, and it is well known, as remarked by my hon. friend, that although the then Minister of the Interior was anxious, nay, determined—and he evinced his determination on more than one occasion in this House—to reinstate his deputy, the other ministers of the Crown would not consent to any such reinstatement taking place last year. May I ask upon what grounds, if there is to be an act of oblivion passed for these offences, that gentleman is to be restored and others are to be ruined? Why, there was a gentleman in the Department of Railways, a Mr. Bradley, who was suspended from his office because he permitted one person to do work for which another person drew the salary. That was a departmental offence; I understand that the work which a son of his was paid for doing was done by that son's aunt or some other relation; and Mr. Bradley was suspended from his duties, properly enough, I dare say. He had broken the departmental rules; he had set a very bad example; he was guilty of drawing public money improperly and contrary to law, and therefore he was suspended, and has been out in the cold ever since; he has been disgraced and lost his office. His name comes to me as one. There seems to be fish made of one and flesh of another. The gentleman who is just as guilty of breach of departmental rules, of an offence which can only demoralize the whole department, is reinstated at the head of it, while the other gentleman remains in disgrace to-day. I say that is not fair-play. I say if there is to be an act of oblivion passed, that these gentlemen who stand upon the same footing, ought to be treated alike. It can only demoralize the whole public service if they find that a deputy minister, having been suspended for a serious breach of the departmental regulations and rules, is afterwards reinstated because he is sufficiently powerful, apparently, to force his reinstatement upon the minister. What does the hon. gentleman say with regard to this distinction? At first blush it appears to be unjust and unfair. I repeat, if one is to be restored, let them all be placed in the same position. Canada gained an unenviable notoriety from the disclosures made with reference to the Interior Department, and the Railway Department and others, owing to the irregularities and looseness with which the public business, to say the least of it, was conducted. The Government were applauded, they claimed to be applauded for their prompt and energetic measures to oust those from the Civil Service who had done these things. Here we are to-day calmly endorsing the action of the Government in reversing their action last year, and reinstating a gentleman who was suspended for these departmental offences. Much as I would desire to see this gentleman, whose matter is before the House, reinstated, I cannot see that sufficient reasons have been given to justify the House in assenting to it.

Administration of Justice—Miscellaneous Expenditure, including N.W.T.	$37,000
Circuit Allowances, B.C.	$7,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) On what principle are these circuit allowances made up? They seem to be much larger than formerly.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They depend on the distances travelled.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are the distances in British Columbia very much greater than in the North-west?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. In the North-west there are districts, and while there is some travelling in the districts, it is not very much compared with British Columbia. In British Columbia the actual expenditure on a circuit will sometimes go up to $1,000. The distances are very long and travelling very expensive.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought this had been provided for by giving county judges to a large extent to the province.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have some county judges there, but their jurisdiction is limited, and the Queen's Bench judges have to go on circuit.

Official Arbitrators	$2,000
----------------------------	---------

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are official arbitrators still retained?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Only those in office. The salaries are paid during their lives, and vacancies are not to be filled. Two have dropped off.

Travelling Expenses of Official Arbitrators	$500
---	-------

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) While I can understand the salaries of the official arbitrators being continued as a sort of pension, I cannot understand why travelling expenses should be paid them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The arbitrators are used as referees in connection with the Exchequer Court, and they make reports to the departments on claims made. According to the Act, as they drop out, the court will appoint its own referees, without salary, and as required from time to time.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. How many of the arbitrators are now living?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Only Messrs. Muma and Compton.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I notice that Mr. Cowan is still drawing a salary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He was superannuated last year at his regular salary of $1,000.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I saw that $1,000 was paid to him.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That very likely was up to 30th June.

Expenditure under Cap. 181 R.S.C.	$700
-----------------------------------	-------

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the purpose of this expenditure?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is an allowance made to an executioner.

Printing and Distributing Supreme Court Reports	$2,750
---	---------

Mr. LISTER. On what system are the reports distributed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a small list for distribution, but the reports are sold, and the revenue is devoted to the purchase of books for the library.

Exchequer Court—To pay increased salary to A. A. Audette	$100
--	-------

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When was that increase of salary given to the registrar?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Last year, Mr. Audette was appointed under the Statute, practically at the rank of chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000. I proposed last year to Parliament that he should be paid the regular salary of a chief clerk and allowed the statutory increase until his salary reached $2,400. He received $300 as editor of the reports, and he at present receives $2,400.

Salary of Registrar in Admiralty, Quebec	$666

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I cannot understand why salaries should be paid to the registrar and marshal of the Admiralty Court in Quebec, when this is not done to the officers of any other Admiralty Court in the Dominion. I thought when the new Act was introduced and the new code established, all the officials would be placed on the same footing. Although the registrar at Halifax does three or four times as much work as the Quebec registrar, he is paid no salary, but only fees.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The explanation which I gave last year I must repeat now. The judge, registrar and marshal at Quebec were appointed at their present salaries, which differ from those paid to similar officers in the Maritime provinces. For my part, I would not think of proposing to Parliament, if the offices were vacant, to reappoint officers at rates different from those that prevail in the Maritime provinces; but we cannot make reductions while the incumbents hold their positions, more especially as the Imperial Act provided that, in assuming jurisdiction and power to legislate on the subject, we should not interfere with the salaries of the incumbents.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That applied to the judges. I do not think that it extended to the subordinate officials.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think so, but I would not be positive on that point. At all events, it would hardly be fair to interfere with them.

Mr. HAZEN. In New Brunswick, as in other provinces, except Quebec, the registrar has been paid by fees. The system is a very unsatisfactory one and, I think, a very unfair one to the registrar of the court, because there is always difficulty in a practitioner collecting fees which go simply to himself. Any man who has been in a position of that sort knows that there is that difficulty. The consequence is that the registrars of these courts are placed at a very considerable disadvantage, as compared with a registrar who has a fixed salary. The position of the registrar in Quebec is, for that reason, a better one than the position of the Admiralty Court in the other provinces. It seems to me that a system should be adopted by which stamps should be attached to documents, as is done on the law side of the court in nearly all the provinces of the Dominion. If it were required that the fees should be paid by stamping the documents, then these fees could go to the Government, and a salary equivalent to the amount of the stamps paid to the registrar. That would be a more satisfactory system all round than the present one. I would ask the Minister of Justice to give his consideration to this matter before the next session of Parliament.

Mr. LISTER. I would take the opportunity of calling the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that the Admiralty Act as passed last session is not at all workable in Ontario, outside the city of Toronto. The judge in admiralty is appointed in Toronto, while under the Maritime Act, before it was repealed, there were surrogate judges at the different points throughout the province, such as Windsor and Goderich and other places. There was no difficulty at that time in getting a warrant for the seizure of a vessel for debt, but as the law now stands an affidavit has to be made and forwarded to Toronto, and a writ issued in Toronto and sent back again to the sheriff of the place where a vessel may be. During the time these proceedings are being taken the vessel gets away. The First Minister will understand how important it is in making an arrest of a vessel, that no time should be lost. As I have said, the Act is of no use to-day outside the city of Toronto. I do not see that there could be any difficulty in appointing surrogate or associate judges, or whatever you may please to call them, in the different seaport towns, and empowering them to issue warrants upon a proper affidavit being presented.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will take up that subject and see what can be done about it. I may say that under the Act we have passed, we have power to deal with the subject.

Mr. LISTER. I think you have. I may say that in one case in which I was interested, I wrote to the registrar of the court at Toronto, and he told me that if I telegraphed to him he would send authority to the sheriff, by telegraph, to arrest the boat; but of course he had no right to do that without an affidavit showing grounds to justify the arrest.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Can the hon. gentleman state how many cases were tried in Quebec during the last year?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot just now, but I have looked into the matter, and I found that the volume of business is about the same in Quebec as in Halifax, and about the same as in St. John.

Mr. FRASER. I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that a very large amount of extra work is given by the Speedy Trials Act to the county court judges in Nova Scotia, and that the amount allowed them for travelling expenses is insufficient. I know, for example, that the judge of county court No. 5 comes over once a month—it is a great saving, of course, to the county to have criminals tried speedily under this excellent law—but the amount allowed him for travelling expenses is not at all sufficient to cover the outlay.

Mr. LISTER. How much do they get?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. $200 a year.

Mr. FRASER. The county court judges in my province have a great deal of travelling to do, and it is only fair that a reasonable amount should be allowed them for expenses. I would suggest that they should be allowed $20 or $30 a trip, and then, of course, if he does not travel the amount would be saved. At all events, the judges should not be at a loss, out of pocket, by having to travel to discharge that duty.

Mr. LISTER. My hon. friend speaks about judges in Nova Scotia having to travel to hold two or three courts during the year in certain towns; but in the province of Ontario the judges have to hold fourteen, or fifteen, or sixteen courts every two months, and the amount allowed them is $200 a year. They have to travel all over the county by rail, or by hiring horses, or whatever way it may be necessary for them to get to where the court is held. I do not know that I have heard any complaints from the judges so far as that allowance is concerned; but I will take this opportunity of calling the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that in the province of Ontario there are twelve or fourteen junior judges who were appointed on a salary of $2,000 a year, with $200 a year travelling expenses. They have all the duties to perform that the senior judges have ; they have to hold the division courts in nearly all cases, they hold the county judges' criminal courts, and they take their share of county court work twice a year. I think myself as a member of the bar, and as one knowing something about what some of these gentlemen have to do, that they ought to be placed on a footing of equality with county court judges. I cannot see upon what principle a junior judge who has the same responsibility as a senior judge, should have his salary fixed at $2,000, and without any chance of getting any increased pay, while the salary of the senior judges increases up to $2,600 besides the fees of the surrogate court, which I venture to say make their income on an average of $3,000. The junior judges have equal duties to perform with the senior judges and I cannot see why there should be a distinction made between them. At all events I think the Government should allow these judges sufficient to enable them to live respectably. Any person who has lived in the country and understands what the cost of living there is, must know that a judge cannot live on a salary of $2,000 a year in a way compatible with the position he is expected to occupy.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am aware that the Speedy Trials Act has very much increased the travel and labour. Still, I do not remember having been shown that the allowance of $200 did not cover the actual travelling expenses of any of the judges. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell me.

Mr. FRASER. I was speaking particularly in reference to the county court judge of the District of Cumberland and Pictou, and I think the same will be found true of the judge of the District of Antigonish, Inverness and Guysborough, who has a very great distance to travel. Instead of establishing a fixed sum, I think it would be preferable to allow the judges a certain amount for each visit. I believe that it would be more satisfactory to the judges themselves, and that $200 would be found sufficient to cover the average expenses. It would be more equitable than allowing to each judge $200, which in one case may be more than the actual outlay, and in another case less.

Kingston Penitentiary. . . . $190,443 66

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, I have no doubt the hon. Minister of Justice will deem this a fitting time to make a full explanation to the House as to certain disagreeable statements which have appeared in the public prints from time to time touching irregularities in this penitentiary. I may also call the attention of the House to a passage in the report of the Inspector of Penitentiaries in regard to a matter which requires considerable attention at the hands of this House, and from the Department of Agriculture and Immigration in particular. That gentleman says :

Of late years, our penitentiaries have had a most undesirable, because a most hardened and irreclaimable class of criminals added to their numbers. This is particularly the case at Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul, where those cockney sneak thieves and pickpockets, referred to, are numerous. These pests, gathered from the slums of St. Giles and East London, after short terms of so-called probation, in a certain notoriously mismanaged refuge, are periodically shipped out to Canada, as immigrants deserving of encouragement and support. With very few exceptions—as the police of our cities and towns know—these street Arabs from Whitechapel and Rotherhithe and Ratchiff and other like haunts of vice, speedily return to their old habits, on arriving in Canada, and, as a consequence, become a burden and an expense upon the taxpayers of the Dominion, in our reformatories, jails and penitentiaries. Steeped as they have been in crime, from infancy, because inherited, they are found to be the most troublesome and worst conducted convicts that reach our penitentiaries. Their evil influence in corrupting others is potent and pernicious. The general verdict of the chaplains and the other prison officers, regarding those youthful imitators of Fagin and Bill Sykes, is most unfavourable. They consider them dead to all good influences and that their reformation is hopeless. In order to protect the community, against the depredations of such thoroughly trained malefactors, and our youth, especially, against the evil effects of their example and influence, it were advisable that effectual means be adopted to prevent mistaken philanthropists, abroad and at home, aiding and encouraging the transplanting to Canada of exotics so upas-like and so unsuited to the soil and moral atmosphere of the country.

Now, that is a somewhat grave indictment of a certain percentage of the immigrants who have come to this country of late years, and if the Inspector of Penitentiaries finds the number of this class sufficiently large to call for so very formidable a notice, there is no doubt that the Government will be well advised to take energetic steps to prevent the scum of London being dumped upon us. We have, in my judgment, quite enough to do in looking after Canadian criminals, convicted and unconvicted, and I think the greatest care must be taken not to augment the number of that description of importation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The inspector has not been accessible to me since this report was laid on the Table a few days ago ; but the information in my hands did not justify me in asking him to moderate or withhold the opinions he desired to express on that subject. Very careful inquiry will be made, however, as to whether the inspector's views are correct, or whether the contentions of the managers of the institutions from which these immigrants come are correct. As regards affairs at Kingston Penitentiary, I will speak in general terms, and if my explanation does not meet the hon. gentleman's wish, and he calls my attention to any particulars, I will answer further. An investigation took place into the management of the affairs of that institution during last summer. The attention of the department was called to what were claimed to be irregularities connected with the stores, the supplies and the farm there, and a set of questions were suggested to the department as likely to elicit information if pressed upon the officers of the penitentiary. I felt bound to press those questions in the way in which they were suggested to me. The result was that the answers were not clear and satisfactory, and an investigation extending over some weeks was held by the inspector, with officers to assist him. As a result of that inquiry, I had to call upon the accountant to resign his position. I came to the conclusion likewise that the farmer was not so efficient a farmer as we required for the institution. I did not come to the conclusion that he had been guilty of dishonesty, but I came to the conclusion that supplies were lost to the prison in consequence of his want of skill, and that his general conduct of the business of the farm was not satisfactory. I, therefore, instructed the warden to make inquiry as to where he could get a thoroughly skilled, and, if possible, scientific farmer, so that the work of the farm could be properly carried on, and loss, if possible, prevented. I have left the investigation as to the fitness of any of the applicants to the warden himself, and I expect in a few days to receive his report as to the person whom he thinks should be selected to fill the position.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I presume that a detailed report has been placed in the hands of the hon. gentleman in reference to all these matters to which he has referred.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. An immense mass of evidence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But no general report?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think not. I think the evidence was just laid before me by the inspector.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Without any comments?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think so; I may be mistaken as to that, and if so I will bring it down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If there is a report it should be placed on the Table.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What officers did the hon. gentleman dismiss?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I dispensed with the services of the accountant and filled his place by the appointment of young Mr. Creighton, who has been a great many years the warden's clerk there. I also dispensed with the farmer.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There was $137,000 spent in 1891-92 on Kingston Penitentiary; the grant this year is $190,000. How is that accounted for?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A considerable sum was voted last year for the equipment and organization of a new prison, but the staff has not yet been appointed because the prison is not completed, and that accounts for the discrepancy between the actual and the estimated expenditure.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does that account for the whole $50,000 difference?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not for the whole, there is also $30,000 for the machinery, which has not yet been bought because the prison is not yet ready, but that and the additional staff will about account for the whole. The cost of supplies is only conjectural.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are many large increases of working expenses, nearly $10,000, although the number of convicts is less.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The expenses of maintenance, as I have just explained, is altogether based on conjecture. We have to conjecture the number we will require, and the price of supplies is estimated for twenty more.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to submit any comparative statement of the cost of keeping the inmates of this and other penitentiaries, say in the United States? The cost of clothing and rations alone is $245 per head, which seems a very large sum. Of course, if the supplies are tendered for, it must be supposed that the competition would secure the lowest prices, but I notice some articles charged at very high rates. For instance, 90 cents a bushel for peas is a very high price. Could the hon. gentleman give any information with regard to the cost of similar establishments in the state of New York?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am very confident that from what I know of the penitentiaries in the state of New York that the cost per capita must be greatly over ours. They manage their prisons on different principles, and on principles, which compared with ours, are very much advanced as regards methods. I do not think that the cost of maintenance has been materially increased, though it may have been slightly. It has been increased if we take into consideration the organization of the staff and salaries of the staff, because we have provided for the organization of a new prison, for the purpose of separating those classes of convicts which the House consider ought to be separated, and the organization of the staff for a separate system of that kind will increase the expense as compared with the old system of simply working them together in a gang. I do not think that as regards the actual maintenance of the convicts there can be much increase. The regulations as to clothing have been changed somewhat, a better class of clothing has been provided, but there is no increase otherwise. Instead of the old system of clothing the prisoners in two colours, we have provided three grades of tweed clothing. The system of red and white legs, or red and grey, has been abolished, and now when the prisoner comes in we put him into a suit of checked tweed of one colour; and accordingly, as he serves his time well and merits promotion, we change the clothing and give him a higher grade; so that any person going through the prison can see who are the better behaved, who are the worse behaved, and those who have just come in. We have found that a good thing, and in fact our old system of parti-coloured clothing has been abolished as morally degrading to the self-respect of the convicts themselves. We find this new system has a very good tendency in promoting good behaviour.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has the Minister had any estimate as to the probable revenue to be derived from the manufacture of twine, and as to the cost of the machinery they are putting in? I see the revenue from the penitentiary is only $3,600 altogether. It is very desirable that these convicts should be made to serve the country in some way when they are consuming such a large amount annually. It is to be hoped that when this machinery is put in and they are set to work to make that article, the revenue of the penitentiary may be considerably increased. It is really too bad that we have to support 532 convicts and the entire revenue is only $3,600 a year.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would not like to give an estimate of the probable prices at which we can sell this twine, but it is the intention to put in machinery that will turn out about 500 tons a year.

Mr. FRASER. How soon do you expect that work will begin?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think by the 1st of July we will have everything ready.

Mr. FRASER. I would like to know what investigation has been made before the Government committed themselves to the manufacture of binding twine, and as to that being the best method of employing convict labour.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We are almost puzzled to find employment for those who will be in the prison of isolation. It is not easy at all times to find out-door work for them. We have had a great deal to do within the last two years in completing prison structures, and there are yet prison institutions that I want to erect by convict labour, a separate prison for women, another for the insane, who now occupy one large ward, yet having no out-door exercise and employment such as persons of this class should have. The industries that can be availed of for prisoners separated, are but few. We have had reports made by the warden, and investigations made in other prisons in various parts of the country, to ascertain what industries could be made available for them in that way, and at the same time fairly profitable. There are very few, as I have said, and we have thought that binding twine could be manufactured there with advantage without interfering very seriously with other industries of the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman explain exactly to us what he proposes to do with these prisons of isolation? Is it the intention to introduce long periods of absolutely solitary confinement?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, not long periods of solitary confinement; but we desire to separate the incorrigible persons for one class, and the youthful prisoners for another, but we do not desire to prevent association among these themselves. The absolute separate system is one that we have never adopted in this country, and of which I have not sufficient knowledge to recommend. We desire to separate them and put first offenders at industries of that kind, so that they may not be obliged to associate with a worse class of convicts. They may be a class by themselves and profitably employed. Eventually, I am going to ask Parliament to consider a scheme for a separate prison for first offenders, especially first offenders under the age of 30 should undergo methods of treatment entirely different from that to which others are subjected. But in the meantime we propose to use prison isolation for them as well as for the worst class.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like to ask the Minister at what season of the year these contracts are called for by advertisement?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. 1st of July.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I notice in looking over the Auditor-General's Report that a large quantity of wheat was bought at a price as high as $1.17 a bushel, and a large quantity at $1.12. I notice, also, that flour has been bought at $2.50 and $2.60 a bag. I think it would be in the interest of economy to buy flour instead of buying wheat at that price.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have dispensed with the mill altogether; and we intend to buy flour. The mill required very extensive repairs, and we thought it was better to abolish it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the object of putting that in?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was a theory of the late Mr. Creighton that he could grind flour for all the penitentiaries and reduce the cost. But the mill became old-fashioned and altogether unsuitable. One of the disadvantages was that it did not employ convict labour. We had to employ a miller to run the mill, and in that way we were interfering with other industries and still not finding work for the convicts.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Would the Minister give me the price at which the contracts for flour are given out?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have not taken any contracts for flour for Kingston, because we have been using the mill all along down to the present time. I have asked tenders for the purchase of the mill, but I have not had any offer yet for it.

Mr. CHARLTON. In examining into the question of finding employment for convict labour, which I presume is one that has given the Minister a good deal of thought, has he ever examined into the question of employing such labour by contract upon public works outside the prison, of course. The system is pursued, I understand, in a number of American states, with what success I am not aware.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We were cut off from that source of finding employment, because a statute was passed before I came into office, forbidding it being done—I suppose in deference to the wishes of the labour population.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose the repeal of that statute could have been secured if the minister had desired it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No doubt. I have no inclination to ask Parliament to reverse that policy. Down to four years ago about eighty convicts were employed at lock-making, but when that contract expired it was not renewed in consequence of the Act I have mentioned.

Mr. FRASER. Does the statute prevent those convicts being employed on Government works? An excellent opportunity has been offered to employ them on the Kingston works. That appears to me to be the best method of employing convicts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have had no great quantity of surplus labour as yet, but when we find it necessary to shut up the men we furnish inside work for them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This question of employing prison labour is a very difficult one, because every hundred men employed displaces so much labour outside.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A vote of $20,000 was taken for machinery in 1892-93, and none of this has been spent.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Nothing has been spent yet, because the prison in which we propose to place the machinery is not yet ready for occupation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For what purpose will the machinery be used?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The whole sum will be required for machinery for binding twine.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Judging from the facts brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), there might be a profit derived from that industry.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I hope it will turn out to be the case.

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary $102,331 29

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no substantial increase in this item, except an item for an instructor, called a "carriage-maker instructor," who is to be employed for the purpose of instructing convicts in carriage-making and repairing. A good deal of repairing work is done outside, and the department is going to try the experiment of employing an instructor in this trade.

Mr. McMULLEN. I observe by the report of the Minister of Justice that the average number of inmates of this institution is 353, the average cost per capita is $248, and the revenue per capita $3.48. Is it the intention to utilize convict labour in that institution, as at Kingston?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No. A great deal of work is required for the completion of the penitentiary. We are now constructing a boundary wall, and there will be abundance of work for some years on the institution itself. Moreover, guards are required. Kingston is a much more complete institution, its boundary walls have been finished, and it is almost perfect, excepting that it is old-fashioned; but St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary is an old reformatory, and not suitable for a penitentiary without extensive changes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I take it that no work is done inside the institution.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no inside work done, and the products of the farm are not credited; only cash received is credited.

Mr. FRASER. The staff includes one surgeon, one schoolmaster and two chaplains. $2,400 is a somewhat large amount to pay for chaplains.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They give their whole time.

Mr. FRASER. I doubt whether that is necessary.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is one Protestant and another Catholic?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We cannot get along without two chaplains. $1,200 is not too much to pay a clergyman who gives his whole time to the work. One chaplain is Protestant and the other is Catholic.

Mr. FRASER. There are 200 convicts at Dorchester and two chaplains are employed, but they only receive half as much salary as the chaplains at St. Vincent de Paul.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They are not required to give their whole time to the work.

Mr. FRASER. I can scarcely see how 100 more convicts can make much difference, and that the whole time of two chaplains is needed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think there are about 60 Protestants at St. Vincent de Paul, and the balance are Roman Catholics, who form a very considerable congregation. I cannot give the Protestant chaplain less salary than the other, especially as he has a family to support.

British Columbia Penitentiary $49,449 15

Mr. FRASER. I notice that in Dorchester Penitentiary there are 200 convicts, and that the total sum asked is $46,000; whereas in British Columbia Penitentiary, with 100 convicts, the amount asked is $49,000. It requires more to keep 100 in British Columbia than 200 in Dorchester.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. You have to keep the same staff for 600 convicts as you have for 500. Of course you require more guards, but the staff is just the same.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1892.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

That the report of the Special Committee appointed to report Lists of Members of this House be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 12) to determine the hours of the daily labour of workmen and others in the employ of the Government or of Government contractors.—(Mr. Lepine.)

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—ROYAL COMMISSION ON CHARGES AGAINST SIR ADOLPHE CARON.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows :—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons a copy of the report of the Commissioners appointed by Royal Commission to take evidence as to the truth or falsity of certain charges made against Sir Adolphe P. Caron, member of the House of Commons and of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, with copies of the evidence and exhibits thereto pertaining.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE.

OTTAWA, 6th February, 1893.

POSTMASTER AT GUILDS, ONT.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked, Whether the postmaster at Guilds, in the county of Kent, Ont., has resigned his position as postmaster? If so, when? Has any person been appointed in his place as postmaster at that place, and is it the intention of the Government to fill the vacancy at an early date?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The postmaster at this place resigned in August last. His son was appointed in his place.

MANITOBA SEPARATE SCHOOLS—LEGAL EXPENSES.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, How much has been paid by the Government as costs in the legal contestation over the question of the right of the Manitoba Legislature to abolish the system of Separate or Denominational Schools formerly in existence in that province? Is any amount still due or payable by Government as costs in connection with the matter in question? If so, how much? Is it the intention of the Government to bear the expenses connected with the hearing of the appeal of the Manitoba minority by the Governor-General in Council?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The sum paid is about $13,000. Something is still due; but the amount is not yet determined. To the third part of the question the answer is, No.

COMMISSION ON THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. SCRIVER asked, At or about what date does the Government expect that the report of the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic will be made?

Mr. FOSTER. Before the next session of Parliament.

Mr. SCRIVER asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates a sum of money to provide for the printing of the evidence taken by the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic?

Mr. FOSTER. It is.

Mr. DICKEY asked, If the report of the Royal Commission on Liquor Traffic is received at date sufficiently early for that purpose, is it the intention of the Government to cause the evidence taken by that commission to be printed and distributed to the members of Parliament before the next session?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

RUSTICO BREAKWATER.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, Was any survey made during the year 1892, by any engineer of the Public Works Department, of the breakwater at Rustico? Has the department any report of the condition of that work during the summer and autumn of 1892? What is the latest official report in the possession of the department on this breakwater?

Mr. OUMET. During the year 1892 a careful survey was made by an engineer of the Public Works Department of the breakwater at Rustico. The latest report in the department was received on the 24th of November last.

SANDFORD, N.S., BREAKWATER.

Mr. FLINT asked, Does the Government propose to ask for an appropriation, at the present session of Parliament, for the purpose of repairing the breakwater at Sandford, in the county of Yarmouth, N.S.?

Mr. OUMET. I cannot say until the Supplementary Estimates are before the House.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS FOR COAL.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, Who has the contract or contracts for supplying the Government buildings at Ottawa with coal? How many tons do the contracts provide for, and what are the prices for bituminous and anthracite coal? Is it stated in the contracts for bituminous coal that Canadian coal should be supplied? Has the Government any knowledge that Nova Scotia coal was used at any time in the buildings; and if so, why was its use not continued?

Mr. OUMET. The contract was awarded last summer to the lowest tenderer, Messrs. C. C. Ray & Company, for anthracite coal, the number of tons and price per ton being: smith's size, five tons of 2,220 lbs. each, $7 per ton; furnace size, 2,400 tons, at $5.73 per ton; stove size, fifty tons, $5.73 per ton; egg size, twenty-five tons, $5.73 per ton. No tenders were called for bituminous coal, our supply being drawn by our means of transport from our shipyard at Sorel during the past summer. Some years previous, when tenders were called for, Nova Scotia coal was specified and obtained. Nova Scotia coal is now used when soft coal is required.

MONTREAL MEDICAL INSPECTOR.

Mr. LEPINE asked, Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a medical inspector for the port of Montreal?

Mr. FOSTER. The duties pertaining to maritime sanitation belong to the Dominion Government, those pertaining to public health are matters belonging to the Provincial Governments. The maintenance of a medical inspector at Montreal belongs to the latter category. The whole subject is under consideration, on a report made at a recent conference, by representatives of the provinces.

SALARIES OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

Mr. MULLOCK asked, 1. What is the total number of persons employed in the Civil Service of Canada? What is the total annual amount of their salaries? 2. If members of the North-west Police are not included in such number, then what is the total number of persons in such last-mentioned service, and what is the total amount of their salaries, and allowances and payments on account of the police.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should make a motion for a return on this subject. The question will require some examination from the different departments and some reports from the outside service. I take it for granted, from the lower portion of the question, that the object of the hon. gentleman is to ascertain the salaries of the outside Civil Service as well as the inside, and I understand this question to be confined to the members of the service who come under the Civil Service Act.

RICHMOND AND WOLFE REVISING OFFICER.

Mr. RINFRET asked, 1. Who is the revising officer for the electoral division of Richmond and Wolfe, in the province of Quebec? 2. Has there been a revision of the lists made by the returning officer in 1891?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The electoral district of Richmond and Wolfe is, for the purposes of the revision, divided into two parts, and there are two revising officers, namely: F. A. Brien, notary, of Danville, is the revising officer for Wolfe, and has completed his work for the last revision. G. H. A. Brooke, advocate, of Richmond, is the reviser for Richmond, and has not yet reported any work done for 1891, though the department has called his attention to the fact.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON CHARGES AGAINST SIR ADOLPHE CARON.

Mr. LAURIER. I would call the attention of the hon. First Minister to the report of the Royal Commission intrusted with the investigation of charges against Sir Adolphe Caron. Is it the intention of the hon. gentleman to have those papers printed at once?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is. I beg to move:

Mr. LEPINE.

That the Message, Report, evidence, etc., be printed forthwith, and that Rule 94 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. LAURIER. I would now ask whether the correspondence with Newfoundland will be brought down at an early day?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In a day or two.

MANITOBA SCHOOL CASE.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the report of the sub-committee of the Privy Council on this question be brought down?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will.

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved for:

Copy of all petitions, memorials, appeals and of any other documents addressed to His Excellency in Council, since the 15th March, 1892, relating to the Manitoba School Acts of 1890 and to section 22 of the "Manitoba Act" and section 93 of the "British North America Act." Also, copy of all reports to and of all Orders in Council in reference to the same. Also, copies of all correspondence in connection therewith.

He said: In making this motion, I wish to explain to the House that my intention is not to discuss the merits of the question to which it refers. I consider that question as now sub judice, the appeal from the position in which the minority have been placed in Manitoba being now before His Excellency in Council, and, until a decision is arrived at, I do not believe it rests with either the minority or their representatives, or even with this House, to express any opinion on the merits of the case. But, at the same time, while we might not perhaps be in a position to discuss this with proper convenience, it is my duty to take all the necessary steps to have all the papers and documents, in fact, the whole history of that question, put before the members of this House, so that if at a later stage this question comes before us, we shall be in a position to master its details. We shall then have all the documents necessary to the study of its history, and shall be in a better position to make up our minds as to what we shall do in the matter. If I were to consult my own feelings and convictions, I might tell you what they are, but I believe it would be inopportune for me to express my views in the matter before the other members of the House have made themselves fully acquainted with it by perusing all the documents.

Motion agreed to.

MANITOBA SCHOOL CASE.

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved for:

Copy of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council in the appealed case of Barrett vs. the City of Winnipeg, commonly known as the "Manitoba School Case." Also, copy of factums, reports and other documents in connection therewith.

He said: This, the second notice of motion on the Order Paper, should have been made first, and it was my intention to make it first, because the facts to which it relates are anterior to those mentioned in the former notice. However, I hope the whole will be put together in bringing down the papers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would suggest that the motion include the arguments of counsel before the Judicial Committee.

Motion agreed to.

THE TELEGRAPH SYSTEM OF THE EMPIRE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved for:

Correspondence, documents, reports and Orders in Council about a special commission to inquire into the most feasible means of completing the telegraphic system of the Empire.

He said: Some time ago I saw a statement outside of the House, that a special commission had been, or was to be, appointed to inquire into the most feasible means of completing the telegraphic system of the Empire, and that Canada was to have a voice on that commission by some one being appointed to represent her. As this country and Government are very much interested by reason of the telegraph lines belonging to the state, and as our railway companies are also much interested in that system, it is very important that we should have a voice on that commission. A large scheme has been propounded for extending our telegraphic system from the Pacific coast of Canada to Australasia, and some information has been obtained on that subject. When that scheme was first proposed there was no question of the islands of Hawaii being annexed to the United States; but just now that question is before the world, and if reports are to be credited, it is now under the consideration of the Government of the United States. I hope that the representatives of Canada on that commission may have sufficient authority to induce the commission to bring this matter specially before the British Government, in order that our interests in the line or lines of telegraph between the Pacific coast of Canada and the Australian colonies may be properly looked after. It would probably be very difficult for us and for the Empire to have a line of telegraph between Canada and the Australian colonies, if we had not a footing on the island of Hawaii. When this subject was broached I understood that the government of those islands was well disposed towards a line of that kind, but at that time certain persons in the United States were promoting a bill before Congress providing for the construction of a line of telegraph between San Francisco and those islands. We thought, some of us, that we should try to have our line run from Victoria, or from some other point on our coast, and that we should first construct that portion of the line between our own coast and the islands, leaving the second and longest portion between the islands and Australasia, to be constructed afterwards. However, it was an enterprise of such magnitude that it was not to be expected that Canada should complete it alone. Our interest in the line at present is purely and simply a Canadian interest, although in some respects there may be an Imperial interest as well. The British Government now sees a great advantage in having a railway across the continent on Canadian soil, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, in having a fast line of steamers between Great Britain and Canada, which line, I hope, will be in operation before very long; therefore, that line of telegraph should be added from the Pacific coast in order that we may communicate more readily with our co-subjects in the Australian colonies—we for trade purposes, and Great Britain both for purposes of trade and purposes of defence, and for Imperial interests generally. Under these circumstances, I thought I might be allowed to make a motion of this kind, and, perhaps, a little later on, the Government may give us information as to how our interests can be safe-guarded in connection with this question that has arisen in Hawaii.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman no doubt has a recollection of the measures which were taken during some years past in this connection, because the hon. gentleman himself took a leading part in preparing those measures and in causing the public officers to make the investigations which were necessary to lay before both the Dominion Government and the Government of Her Majesty the fullest information on those subjects, and to bring likewise to the attention of Her Majesty's Government the views we held as to the great importance of completing the telegraphic communication of the Empire in the way in which the hon. gentleman has described. Of late there has been correspondence on the same subject, initiated by the Board of Trade of this city and looking towards the appointment of a commission, as stated in the motion, for the purpose of investigating this whole subject and ascertaining what steps should be taken in order to complete the system. I may say that the object contemplated by the resolutions of the Board of Trade was the appointment of a commission by Her Majesty's Government, and that Canada should have a representative on that commission. The papers will be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

SCHEDULING CANADIAN CATTLE.

Mr. SPROULE moved for:

Return of all letters, correspondence, reports and all other matter on record, passed between the Department of Agriculture and the High Commissioner of Canada in London, the Imperial Board of Trade or any other officials of an authoritative body in reference to the scheduling of Canadian cattle in the ports of Great Britain and Ireland, on and after 20th October last.

He said: I move for this return for the purpose of placing in the possession of members of this House all information that is on record regarding this important subject. The privilege we enjoyed in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, up to last October, with respect to sending our cattle to that country was one that was of great importance to the Canadian farmer. It enabled him to send away a class of animals that was scarcely fit for the market, if it was intended for beef, and he could send it at a time when it realized the largest return with the least possible outlay and with the least possible trouble. In order to understand the importance of this question to the Canadian farmer, today, I will give, with the permission of the House, a few figures to show its development during past years. In 1864 we only exported to Great Britain 64 head of cattle. In 1879 the number had increased to 20,588; but those, I believe, were all beef cattle, fully finished for the market. In 1884 the number had reached 53,962; in 1888 it was 60,000; in 1890 it had reached the large total of 123,136. Last year, I believe, there were 117,000 sent, in round numbers. Hon. members will notice in those figures that up to the time the English and Scotch farmers began to take our stockers, or half-fattened cattle, and finish them as beef for the English market, the development was not nearly so rapid; but when it became known by those farmers that they could make use of our grass-fed cattle and finish them with profit to themselves, they took them in very large numbers and the trade with Canada very rapidly developed. As a result, we have been sending over from 117,000 to 123,000 each year. In order to enable the House to see how much profit was realized from that cattle exportation, owing to the privilege we enjoy of sending our cattle to the British market without being scheduled, we must know about how many were prime beef cattle and how many were stockers or cattle taken from the grass. I find that of the large number sent in 1890, 123,136, about 90,000 were grass-fed cattle or stockers, cattle that were not fit to be slaughtered on landing, but which were suitable for feeding and being finished by English and Scotch farmers. In supplying that large number of cattle, the Canadian farmer benefited very materially, because up to that time the cost of raising the cattle was comparatively trifling, for they were fed on straw, coarse grains and pasturage around the farm, that cost very little, and if not fed to those cattle, would have been largely wasted, and so up to that time there was comparatively little expense in fattening them. If the farmer intended to prepare cattle as prime beef for the English market, he is compelled to go further and provide suitable buildings for housing the cattle and prepare fodder for them. All our farmers were not able to do this, but owing to the regulations by which Canadian cattle were admitted into England, while American cattle were scheduled, they were able to send over stockers and sell them at good prices. It is held by some persons that it is unprofitable for Canadian farmers to send over cattle at that stage; but it cannot be denied by those who have paid any attention to agriculture in Canada, that a large number of our farmers are not prepared to expend a large sum to finish cattle for the English market. So long as they are stockers, a very small cost is involved, but if the farmer is obliged to fatten the cattle, he is compelled to erect suitable buildings and house them and provide suitable food for them, and then have to wait for his return. I believe that not more than two out of every ten farmers in the Dominion are to-day prepared to feed cattle and put them in proper condition for shipment to the English market. At the time these cattle were scheduled we enjoyed the important advantage of being able to send them into the old country, where they could be retained until they were prepared for the market. It unfortunately happened that a report was made by the veterinary surgeon of the London Board of Agriculture that some cattle coming from Canada were infected by what is known as pleuropneumonia, or some other contagious disease. I think the cattle on three vessels were reported to be so infected, two of these being the "Monkseton" and the "Huronian." The result was that this report having been made by an expert veterinarian to the British Agricultural Department, it seems that there was no other option but to bring into operation a law which provided that when the cattle from any foreign country were found to be affected with contagious disease, they should be scheduled, and that cattle coming from that country should be killed at the port of landing. Now, so far as our knowledge goes, the people of Canada have never been aware of any contagious disease here. In no part of Canada, as far as the people of the country know, has the disease ever had a footing. In addition to that, the quarantine regulations are such that it would be practically impossible for the disease to get a foothold in this country, because cattle coming from the portions of the United States where disease has been prevalent in the past, as well as cattle coming from the old country, are quarantined for ninety days, and during that time, if disease existed, it would have developed to such an extent that it would be apparent to the veterinary surgeon, whose duty it is to look after the quarantine station. I say again that up to the present we have never known pleuro-pneumonia to exist in this country. I understand that every effort was immediately made by the Minister of Agriculture, and by the Government, through him, to induce the British Government to raise that schedule, but up to the present it has not been successful. I am also reliably informed that every effort is being made at the present time to satisfy, not only the London Board of Agriculture, but the Imperial Government as well, that there is no just reason for continuing that schedule and that it ought to be raised. It is for the purpose of getting all these papers and this information that I make this motion. The question is a very important one to the farmers of this country; so important that we should at once endeavour to provide such information as will, if possible, convince the English people that there was no just ground for the scheduling of our cattle. The sooner we can do that the better it will be for the prosperity of the Dominion of Canada. I may say, Mr. Speaker, in order to outline what I have in view, in moving for these papers, that I propose that when they are brought down they should be forwarded by order of this House to the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, so as to enable that committee to make a more extended inquiry regarding the condition of the cattle in various parts of the Dominion. If it is thought advisable, there can then be brought before that committee veterinarians from different parts of the country to show by their evidence that pleuro-pneumonia has never been known to exist here. In addition to that, our cattle exporters could also be brought before the committee to show that pleuro-pneumonia had never existed in Canada, or in any cattle that had been exported. If found necessary, the committee could go further and bring those in charge of the quarantine stations to prove that the regulations are such regarding imported cattle at quarantine, as to show that it is impossible that disease can be introduced into Canada. After this evidence is obtained by the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, a special report on the matter could be made to this House. If, as we anticipate, it will be found that there was no just ground for scheduling our cattle in the British market, then the House could proceed to express its opinion on the matter in the form of the resolution which I have lower down on the Order Paper, and which is to the effect:

That, in the opinion of this House, the recent scheduling of Canadian cattle in the ports of Great Britain and Ireland was not justified by the facts, so far as they have been elicited by the evidence of competent authority, that neither pleuro-pneumonia nor other contagious diseases of similar character has heretofore existed, or does now exist in the Dominion of Canada.

These were my objects in making the motion, and I trust that the Government will see the importance of bringing down this information at the earliest possible date, so that Parliament may be able to deal with the matter in such a way as will convince the English Government that the scheduling of Canadian cattle was not justified.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, there is no necessity for discussing the matter at the present time, as my hon. friend states that his object in having this correspondence brought down, is to obtain information upon which his second resolution is to be based. All these papers will be brought down in a very short while, as I think they are in reality prepared, and my hon. friend will see when they are laid before the House that the Government, and all concerned in the matter, have been as careful, and as prompt, and as thorough as possible in putting the information with reference to Canadian cattle before the British Government, and in urging what we all believe to be the fact: the entire freedom of Canadian cattle from pleuro-pneumonia.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved for:

Statement showing the revenue of the Intercolonial Railway for the years 1890-91 and 1891-92, and from the 1st July, 1892, to the 31st December, inclusive, under the following headings, viz.:—Passengers, freight, mails and sundries, giving also the number of passengers and the number of tons of freight carried in each of the above named years.

Statement of the working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for the year 1890-91, and also for the year 1891-92, and from the 1st July, 1892, to the 31st December, inclusive, under the following headings, viz.:—Locomotive power, car expenses, maintenance of way and works, station expenses, general charges, car mileage.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I know that this statement in so far as the previous year is concerned, is in the report of the department, and that the other will be in the departmental reports this year, but it is more convenient to have them together so that we may see the difference between the two years. I ask in the second, as well as in this motion, with the consent of the Minister of Railways, a similar statement to the 31st December last so that we may have the full statement of the facts.

Motion agreed to.

EXPENSES OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL AND RIDEAU HALL.

Mr. MULOCK moved for:

Statement showing total amount of money paid since Confederation on each of the following accounts:—(a.) Salary of Governor-General. (b.) Travelling expenses of Governor-General. (c.) Expenditure on Rideau Hall on capital account. Expenditure on Rideau Hall maintenance. Expenditure on Rideau Hall grounds on capital account. Expenditure on Rideau Hall grounds maintenance. (d.) Expenditure on furnishings of all kinds for Rideau Hall. (e.) Allowance to Governor-General for coal and light. (f.) Expenditure on any other account in connection with the office of Governor-General. (g.) Expenditure on any other account in connection with Rideau Hall and grounds. (h.) Total expenditure of every kind since Confederation in connection with the office of Governor-General. (i.) Total expenditure of every kind in connection with Rideau Hall and grounds.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask that this motion be amended in one particular. Make it read "the total amount of money paid each year since Confederation."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE QUEBEC EASTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. VAILLANCOURT (Translation) moved for :

Copies of all petitions, correspondence and documents, whatsoever, respecting the granting of a subsidy to the Quebec Eastern Railway.

He said : Mr. Speaker, in 1891 I moved a motion similar to this, and was told by the then Minister of Railways that he had but a single document in his department respecting the road. The ex-Minister of Public Works then congratulated me and encouraged me to ventilate the question, by saying to me that London was not built in a day. The hon. gentleman can now see that I benefited by his advice, and that I bring the matter up again. If I am well informed, the documents relating to that railway must now be more numerous. An extended correspondence must have taken place between the company and the Government. I need not show once more the advantages of the Quebec Eastern. The company, which was formed in 1888 with the object in view of building this railway which is intended to run from a certain point in the parish of St. Anselme, along the Quebec Central, will run through the counties of Dorchester, Bellechasse, L'Islet and Montmagny and will overtake the lower provinces ; that is to say, a country rich in splendid woods and fertile lands which, should they be opened to settlement, would form from 60 to 75 parishes. The country also includes numerous mineral lands, amongst others asbestos mines, hardly worked now, but the results of which will be very important later on. Should, as the thing seems very likely, the Quebec bridge be built, this Quebec Eastern Railway which will join the Canadian Pacific, will in fact be the actual short line to the Atlantic, running wholly on Canadian soil, without running through American territory. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as I was stating a moment ago, if I am well informed, large correspondence relating to this railway must now be in the hands of the Government, and I think the Government will admit that what I ask for is in the right course, and that they will grant to this railway the same subsidy that they grant to other railways of the Dominion. That railway, when built, will be useful not only to the province of Quebec, but to the whole Dominion, and I cannot see how the Government could decline to grant to it the same subsidies they grant to other railways. I trust, therefore, that the Government will earnestly entertain my claim, and that I will be later on in a position to congratulate them on their fair-play.

Mr. MURLOCK.

Mr. HAGGART. There are two petitions from parishes in the county of Bellechasse and a petition from Mr. Faucher de St. Maurice, the vice-president of the Oriental Railway. These parishes ask assistance to the railway, and one of the grounds was that it would be a means of repatriating Canadians gone to the United States, and would also be the means of opening up a fertile section of country. It was also urged in favour of this railway that it would open up a short route from New Brunswick to Quebec. If any subsidies are to be brought down, I will, when the question of subsidies is to be considered, bring this road to the notice of my colleagues, and will have the petitions the hon. gentleman mentions brought down to the House.

Motion agreed to.

WOOD ISLAND (P.E.I.) BREAKWATER.

Mr. WELSH asked for :

Copy of the report of Government surveys on Wood Island breakwater, Prince Edward Island.

He said : This matter has been brought up almost annually since I have had a seat in this House. This breakwater has been for some years past a disgrace to any civilized Government. I brought forward, during the rule of the late Minister of Public Works, the necessity of doing something there, but without effect. I have some hopes, however, now, as since the present hon. minister has taken charge of the department, he has done everything possible to meet my views, by sending and ascertaining for himself the condition of this work. The more the necessary expenditure to improve its present wretched state is delayed, the greater will be the cost in the end. The hon. minister will see, by looking over the report and surveys, that it is absolutely necessary this matter should be attended to. One of the causes of the exodus from Prince Edward Island is the neglect of our public works. This work was commenced by the Local Government twenty years ago. Before we entered Confederation, it was attended to and improved every year. After that the Dominion Government laid out during one year something and put it in pretty good repair, but never completed the harbour by dredging or levelling. The effect is now that all the young men are going away to the States and send home money to support their parents. I am not exaggerating and call upon the Minister of Public Works, who, I know, is inclined to do it, to see that this matter is properly attended to.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to add to what my hon. colleague has said my own testimony of the necessity that exists for the expenditure of money to put that work in proper order. The people who would use that breakwater for the purpose of shipping their produce are peculiarly situated. They are at a distance of twenty or thirty miles from a railway, and have no other harbour than this artificial one whence to ship their produce, and that is of no use to them. I only speak upon this subject because I want to ask the hon. gentleman not to throw away any more money in that place. For the last eight or ten years there has been a practice introduced by the Department of Public Works to spend from a thousand to fifteen hundred dollars on that work. I told him last year that it was useless, that he might just as well throw the money into the sea; it does no good to anybody at all; it is a reckless waste of public money. If the hon. gentleman, having had a report of the surveyor of his department, can see his way clear to appropriate sufficient money to make the work efficient, to reconstruct it so that it will be useful for the purpose of shipping produce from it, well and good. If he cannot see his way clear to do that, let it go down and disappear; but do not, for Heaven's sake, let us have the spectacle we have witnessed for the last ten or twelve years, of throwing away a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars every year. From what I can gather from the report of those who are acquainted with the cost of constructing similar works, I think that it will cost from five to six thousand dollars.

Mr. WELSH. At least.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). If it is to be touched at all, it ought to be taken in hand and thoroughly done. Now, that work never was at any one time in thorough repair or condition to do what was expected it would do. I hope the hon. gentleman will do one thing or the other—either let the work go down and the enormous amount of money that has been spent there, be wasted; or put enough money in the estimates to reconstruct it and put it in good repair. But do not potter with it and pretend to repair it, as has been done in the past, when the money spent upon it is utterly wasted.

Mr. OUMET. At the request of the hon. gentleman a careful survey was made of this work during the summer, and an elaborate report has been received by the department, which will be brought down in a very few days. This report shows that in order to put the work in that thorough condition the hon. gentleman has mentioned, will cost $12,500 for repairs to the eastern part of the breakwater itself. The western part will cost $850, and in order to make the breakwater useful as a harbour, we shall have to do dredging which will cost $9,000, or altogether, $22,350. That is the statement of our engineer.

Mr. WELSH. A correct report, too.

Mr. OUMET. This report will be laid before the Government, and if we can spare the money I will be very glad to meet the hon. gentleman's wishes.

Motion agreed to.

THE BRISTOL BOARD OF TRADE AND THE FRENCH CHEESE.

Mr. RINFRET (Translation) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between Mr. Robertson, Dairy Commissioner for Canada, and the Department of Agriculture, in relation to a certain Resolution adopted by a Committee of the Board of Trade of Bristol, England, against accepting as Canadian cheese, cheese designated by the said Committee under the name of "French Cheese" and manufactured in the province of Québec;

Copies of all speeches, letters and reports made by the said Dairy Commissioner, Mr. Robertson, on the value of cheese manufactured in the provinces of Québec and Ontario.

He said: Mr. Speaker, by moving in this matter, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to the resolution passed by the Board of Trade of Bristol, England, with respect to the Canadian cheese. At the meeting held in Ste. Therese in November last, a resolution was moved and passed in order to protest against this resolution of the Board of Trade of Bristol. These resolutions were sent to England, where they answered that the discrimination made as to cheese imported from the Dominion was due to the Montreal exports. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Department of Agriculture would do well to inquire into this matter, and through their commissioner, Mr. Robertson, to have this discrimination abolished. The cheese manufactured in the province of Québec is worth that made in the province of Ontario, except in certain places where this industry is just in its infancy. I went to the trouble of inquiring into this matter and I am in a position to state without the least doubt that nine-tenths at least of the cheese made in the province of Québec is worth that of the province of Ontario. I hope that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture will give his earnest consideration to this matter and that with all his might he will protect the interests of the manufacturers from the province of Québec who suffer by this unfair discrimination.

Motion agreed to.

SLAUGHTERING SWINE FOR EXPORTATION.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario) moved for :

Copies of all Orders in Council now in force regulating the slaughtering of swine for exportation in bond, passed under authority of an Act respecting Customs, cap. 32, Revised Statutes, sec. 93; and for a copy of the quarantine regulations governing the importation of such swine into Canada for the purpose of slaughtering in bond.

He said: In 1890, in this House, I pointed out that the duty which had been placed upon hogs had been of great benefit to the farmers of Canada. I also expressed the belief that the changes the Government proposed to make in the way of increased duties would be of still greater benefit to the farmers. It is true that, perhaps, we have not gained as much by that increased duty as we hoped, but it may be that the farmers have themselves to blame for that, from their own want of knowledge and their inexperience. But we have improved upon that, and I notice that the other day a deputation waited upon certain members of the Government, asking that swine might be imported into Canada free in bond, to be slaughtered, with the view of sending a certain quantity of the pork out of the country. Now, it appears to me that, looking at it from the farmers' stand-point, that might be very dangerous to their interests. If Canadians were not in a position to place their hogs upon the market large numbers might be purchased from the other side and brought into Canada in bond and slaughtered. The result would be that when we were able to place our hogs upon the market our packers might be quite indifferent. We would then be in the position that whilst we were forced to place our hogs upon the market, the packers would be so indifferent that they would have them at their own prices. This might happen late as well as early in the season; so that I think it would be to our interest if the Government could see their way clear to refuse the application of the pork packers of Canada. We have a great deal of sympathy for them, and for their employees who ought to be occupied at all seasons of the year; but on the other hand, we have also to look after the interests of the farmers of Canada, which I think would be better served by refusing the application of the packers.

Motion agreed to.

RECIPROcity IN CANAL TOLLS— CANADA AND UNITED STATES.

Mr. SPROULE (for Mr. Tisdale) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, papers and documents, not already laid before the House, in reference to negotiations and communications between the Government and the United States, in reference to reciprocity, canal tolls, and wrecking and towing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask whether the papers here moved for will include a report of the interview or conference that took place between the hon. gentleman and his colleagues on the one side, and the American commissioners on the other?

Mr. FOSTER. There were two conferences. At the first conference the subject of reciprocity was mentioned. Subsequently, Hon. Mr. Bowell and myself went to Washington on the subject of canal tolls.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There was a reference to the subject of reciprocity, which was under discussion, and if the ordinary rules observed in all countries were followed there would be a memorandum of that conference, and I ask the hon. gentleman whether that memorandum or report of the interviews that took place between the ministers on both sides will be included in the correspondence asked to be brought down?

Mr. SMITH (Ontario).

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will recollect that we had some conversation on two other occasions about that matter. I simply ask whether that was the one he meant or whether he referred to the last conference alone? If he referred to the last conference alone, I would say that it would be included; but if he referred to the first conference, I would postpone answering the question until the Premier was in his seat. If it can be brought down it will be brought down.

Mr. LAURIER. Is there no document in the department with respect to that interview, or is it simply a question as to whether the Government are prepared to bring down the document or not?

Mr. FOSTER. All documents will be brought down.

Mr. LAURIER. I cannot see, if all documents are to be brought down, why the hon. gentleman should desire to wait until the First Minister is in his seat.

Mr. FOSTER. It is quite clear. A protocol might be called a document; and yet I would not call it a document under the general term applied to documents. If the hon. gentleman thinks a protocol is included in such a designation I will make the same reservation as I did to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Mr. LAURIER. Then you say everything will be brought down except a statement of that which actually took place.

Mr. TISDALE. My intention in making the motion is to have everything brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. That will be done.

Mr. LAURIER. But I am afraid as to that being done.

Mr. CHARLTON. There is a great deal of curiosity to know what took place between the Canadian commissioners and the Secretary of State of the United States at that time, and his successor General Foster. There are a great many stories in circulation with respect to those interviews, and it is felt that the ministers have not taken the country into their confidence in regard to this matter. There were charges made at the time that the course of the Canadian commissioners was not as open and truthful as it might have been, that there was an under-current, and that their purpose in going to Washington was not that which appeared ostensibly to be their purpose. If there were communications and discussions between the Canadian commissioners and the Secretary of State of the United States, I think the people are entitled under this order of the House to know what they were, to know what position was taken by the Canadian commissioners with respect to reciprocity, what propositions were made, what overtures were made, what they asked for, what the United States Government were willing to grant, what the commissioners were ready to concede. The Government should take the country into their confidence and let the people know full particulars in regard to all conferences, not regarding any special or particular conference, but in regard to all the communications that have taken place from time to time during the different visits of the Canadian commissioners to Washington. That is what the country wants, and what it is entitled to know. If the ministers find it necessary to withhold, in answering this motion made by one of their supporters, any material information from the country bearing on the question as to whether they used their utmost efforts to obtain reciprocity, as to whether any proposition made by the American Government naturally led them to suppose that reciprocity could be obtained, whether they placed themselves in the position which they must have known made it impossible for them to obtain reciprocity, we are entitled to know these matters and to secure all information the Government can furnish, including notes of stenographers with respect to conversations and propositions made by the Canadian commissioners and the discussions that took place respecting this important question of reciprocity, which is one of the greatest interest to this country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is another reason why I think the hon. the Minister of Finance should not hesitate to lay these papers before the House, and that is because he has already to a great extent taken the press into his confidence, and given the press a report, from his stand-point, of what he understood took place. The people who are desirous of forming a judgment on this matter stand in this position: They have, in the first place, a report made by Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, to the Senate, transmitted by the President in his Message to the Senate, in which the Secretary gave his version of what took place. We have the formal statement made by General Foster to the newspapers, in which he gave his understanding of what occurred. Then we have the statement made in this House by the Minister of Finance last year, in which he gave his understanding of what took place at the time, and that statement has been supplemented by a statement, which the hon. gentleman is reported to have authorized the press to make, which is in direct contradiction to General Foster's statement. It is impossible, in view of these conflicting statements, for outsiders to know which statement is right and accurate, and it is of vital importance to the country at large, to the electors and to everyone who desires to form a true and honest judgment in the matter, that Parliament should be furnished with an exact report of what took place, so that the people will be able to judge for themselves whether our ministers or the ministers of the United States are misrepresenting what took place at the conferences. There is no doubt, a most extraordinary misunderstanding between them. They give versions diametrically opposite as to what was said and what was understood. It is said, and I believe it to be true, that the hon. gentleman is in possession of a stenographic report of the conversation which took place on that occasion. That report is accessible to the hon. gentleman and it can be laid before the House. If the House is placed in possession of that document, then everybody will be able to read and judge for himself as to whether Mr. Blaine or General Foster, on the one side, or the Minister of Finance of Canada on the other, is to be relied upon. There is no question at present more generally talked about and discussed by the people of Canada than this one as to the possibility of obtaining better trade relations with the United States. We want to know exactly on what grounds we may reasonably hope a treaty will be negotiated. We have our views in regard to it, and the Minister of Finance has stated his views very strongly. It is essential in the public interest, especially as the press has had information given to it in a semi-official way, that this House should be taken into the confidence of the Government to that extent, and the stenographic report of the conversation, the different propositions made and the objections raised should be placed in the hands of hon. members, so that they may be able to form a true judgment in regard to the matter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Upon this subject I do not wish to be bound by the hon. gentleman's statement, that there is a stenographic report. There is a full report on the subject.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman does not deny that there is a stenographic report.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will neither affirm nor deny it; but a very full and explicit report was sent to Her Majesty's Government, as no doubt the hon. gentleman surmised from some other documents in which reference was made to it. We have already applied for permission to lay this before the House during the present session, and we expect an answer in a day or two.

Mr. LAURIER. But, if the hon. gentleman will pardon me, we understood a moment ago, from a statement made by the Minister of Finance, that there were what he called protocols.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. These were laid before the House last year.

Mr. LAURIER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Propositions.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, propositions; but protocols are the proces-verbal, the journal of what takes place. In this matter I would quarrel to some extent with the expression, "protocols." I do not think it would apply. But, at all events, I refer to the offers and counter-offers and negotiations. I understand that there is a stenographic report, and that is what we particularly want to have, and that is what, so far, has not been promised. I would like the hon. gentleman to tell us the day on which he could lay that process-verbal before the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think I may say that, so far as that is concerned, and so far as any interchange of protocols, properly so-called, is concerned, the conference was to be informal, and unofficial, and it was only at the conclusion of the conference that we obtained the consent of the other side to have any communication made as to what had transpired. Down to that moment, there could be no interchange of the usual protocols. Proposals were interchanged; first discussed, but then, when there was a prospect of their being agreed upon, they were interchanged in writing, and a record was kept of the conversation from day to day. That is what I refer to, and probably what the hon. gentleman refers to as a stenographic report. I cannot say that it is a stenographic report at all, but such as it is, we regard it as a full and faithful record of what transpired. That is the record I refer to as having asked leave to bring down.

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand that this will be brought down?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is what I refer to as to having asked for leave to bring down.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the other side object to the proceedings being made public?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At the conclusion of the conference, as I stated, it was agreed, as far as the delegates were concerned, and as far as their respective Governments were concerned, that there was no objection to what had transpired being communicated by either side. We have not, therefore, to ask permission from the United States authorities.

Mr. MULOCK. The Government have been in that position ever since the close of the conference, so far as the United States Government is concerned?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. So that the privilege is the result of, perhaps, the imagination of the Government, as regards its duty towards the Imperial Government.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not in any sense.

Mr. MULOCK. Then, if the Government of Canada were willing to take the people into their confidence; if the Imperial Government had no objection, and if the United States Government gave consent at the close of the conference, why was not Parliament informed of it last session?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Why, indeed? Why should the hon. gentleman assume that there was no objection on the part of the Imperial Government?

Mr. LAURIER

Mr. MULOCK. I thought there was consent from the other side.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has utterly misunderstood me, if he thought I said that there was consent on the part of the Imperial authorities, that we should produce the record down to this time.

Mr. MULOCK. I must have misunderstood you, then.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps I did not express myself plainly. What I did say was: that matters have been in that state since the close of last session. That is, in the state of not having yet obtained permission that they should be brought down.

Mr. LAURIER. Are not the ministers rapping the Imperial Government on the head, because they have referred more than once, in their speeches, to what took place there?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not at all. We have perfect free speech on any such question as that dealt with in the record which we were obliged, by our duty, to communicate to Her Majesty's Government. That record is now their property, and that is another matter. We are not bound, in any sense, to refrain from speaking in the House as to what has transpired, and we have spoken. We have not violated any obligation to Her Majesty's Government in that. The record is there.

Mr. MULOCK. This was not a commission sent by the Imperial Government to the United States.

Mr. SPEAKER. Has not the hon. gentleman spoken before?

Mr. MULOCK. I only put an interlocutory question, Mr. Speaker. I would remind the minister how this commission was formed. As far as Parliament and the public know, when Parliament was dissolved in 1891, the Government announced to the people through, I think, the Speech of the Governor-General at the dissolution of Parliament—at all events, I know that the First Minister in his address to the people stated it—that as soon as the Government received a mandate from the people, they intended, on the 6th of March, 1891, to send three commissioners to Washington to see if they could not arrange a reciprocity basis. It was never stated on that occasion, nor up to this moment, so far as I know, that the declaration by the First Minister of that day was made on the authority of the Imperial Government. So far as was made manifest then, it was a decision arrived at by the Canadian Prime Minister of that date, and so far as Parliament up to this moment knows, it was carried out by this Government of its own motion. It is the first time I have ever heard of the Government taking shelter behind the Imperial Government and saying that the Parliament of Canada and the people of Canada can only be advised of the proceedings on the consent of the Imperial Government. It is a new doctrine, that anything affecting the trade of Canada, the very existence of Canada, is not to be made known to the people of Canada and that they are to know nothing of matters deeply concerning themselves. It is now the second year since this commission visited the United States, and the trade of Canada has been suffering in the meantime. Does the First Minister say that the people of Canada have been kept in the dark for two years by order of the Imperial Government? Last session the Minister of Finance, in addressing Parliament, stated what? If I remember rightly, the impression which he or some of his colleagues gave to Parliament was, that efforts to promote a reciprocity treaty with the United States had absolutely failed. That was the impression made to Parliament, and I am satisfied that an examination of "Hansard" will show that in one of his leading speeches the Minister of Finance made that declaration to Parliament and to the country, and announced it further through the press, that it was idle to look to the United States people for freer trade relations with them. The country has been under that impression, until the Minister addressed the public at the Auditorium in the city of Toronto, just before the present meeting of Parliament. It was with amazement that I then read the utterance of the First Minister, that he could have procured a market in the United States for the product of the forests of Canada, had he been willing to give certain considerations in return. Whether the consideration was or was not a proper one, it seems to me that if there was that basis of negotiation, it was due to the people of Canada that it should have been made known to them at the earliest possible moment. The Minister told the public the other day that he could offer certain considerations for procuring a market for the farmers of Canada, which they certainly are most desirous of procuring. Perhaps he made that declaration in a loose way, and perhaps it is not fair to bind him to it altogether, but it did seem an official declaration in a loose way. He said that for two or three years he had the knowledge of a proposition like that in his breast and, in fact, had not made it public. I am willing to concede to the Imperial Government the fullest control over our fiscal policy that is compatible with our dignity and our interests, but I appeal to everyone who has a sense of right, whether it is fair that the Government should proceed, as they seem to have done on this occasion, and to have retained in their own breasts for two years important information such as they now admit they have, without for one moment taking the people of Canada into their confidence? I say it is not fair for them now to say that they had assumed this position in consequence of the attitude of the Imperial Government. It may be that it was decided wise to defer to the Imperial Government at a certain time, and I would not blame them for showing that proper respect to the Imperial Government. But it is most important now, I think, for the Government to show that they have been making active efforts during these two years to get that permission; they cannot otherwise. I think, shelter themselves behind the mere inaction of the Imperial Government to give them an answer. I am amazed to find that it is now charged for the first time that the Imperial Government have been refusing to take the people of Canada into their confidence. Surely the people of Canada can be trusted in matters affecting the Empire as well as in matters affecting the colony of Canada. Do you mean to say that the Imperial Government for two years have refused to let the people of Canada know that there was a possible bargain which they might have obtained? The people of Canada are loyal to the Empire, and I am satisfied that they could be trusted. I withhold any further observations on the matter until it is shown whether or not the delay is attributable to the Government of Canada. Unless the Government of Canada can show that they have been actively pressing for permission to place this information before the people of Canada, they will stand guilty of gross deception towards the people of Canada and responsible for all the delay that has taken place.

Mr. TISDALE. It will be observed that in the motion I not only ask for documents, but for all communications. Now, I do not know exactly what the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is getting excited about. I understand the Prime Minister to promise that everything shall be brought down; but, owing to the manner in which a certain portion of these negotiations were conducted, he feels it his duty to ask the permission of the Imperial Government to bring down a certain portion of the papers. That is quite proper; and when the papers come down, if it is then found, in the opinion of the House, that the minister did not require to get that permission, it will be quite time enough, I think, to lecture him. We are all, I think, very anxious on both sides of the House, whatever party may be in control of the affairs of this country, that no breaches of diplomatic usage should occur in connection with our international relations. The Prime Minister has said that he hopes, in a day or two, at all events within a week, to have the permission which he expects to get. That is quite satisfactory to me. If he does not bring down the papers, if for any reason the Imperial Government should object, nobody will be more anxious or more willing than myself to discuss the question, and to put the blame, if there is any, where it should rest. I have no doubt that under the circumstances the Imperial Government will consent.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not see what the Imperial Government has to do with this matter. Since a part of the negotiations have been already placed before this House, I do not know why we should not have the whole of them.

Mr. TISDALE. I think parliamentary usage is to accept the statements of those in control of the affairs of the country, when they stand in their places and state, on their responsibility, what they have done, as I understand the Prime Minister does. When the papers are brought down, or when the Government state that the permission of the Imperial Government has been refused, then, I think, would be the proper time to discuss the matter. But I think it is not adding to the dignity of this House, and it is rather uncalled-for and unfair, to condemn what was done until we know whether or not it was justified by all the circumstances. So far as I am concerned, if reasonable despatch is exercised in obtaining the permission of the Imperial Government, my purpose in making the motion will be served. This is the first request that the House has made for this information, and notice of the motion was given in the first week of the session.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Allow me to make an observation. Although I spoke before in answer to a question, the hon. gentleman who has made an attack has spoken three times.

Mr. MULOCK. No, I asked a question.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, the hon. gentleman made a long statement, and wound up with a note of interrogation. I shall be very brief, and I will simply say at the outset that the use of these expressions in regard to taking shelter behind the Imperial Government and keeping the people of Canada in the dark, and all that kind of thing, may add vigour to the debate, but they certainly can have only one other effect, that is, to mislead the House and the public as to what the true aspect of the case is. I am sure that when the hon. gentleman made these observations, especially when he made the observation that the Imperial Government had nothing to do with this matter, that they did not initiate it, and that the conference was entirely one sought for and obtained at the instance of the Canadian Government, he forgot what the actual proceedings were. He forgot that it was by conference between the British Minister at Washington and the Secretary of State for the United States that the conference was initiated, and that it grew out of the negotiations which had taken place with reference to the Newfoundland Convention, and that before it was agreed by the Secretary of State of the United States that a conference should take place, and that a date should be appointed on which commissioners from Canada should be invited to attend, the programme of subjects was communicated by the British Minister at Washington and accepted by the Secretary of State of the United States, and was then published.

Mr. LAURIER.

to give it authenticity and prominence, in the "Canada Gazette." So that the conference was initiated in the way I have said, through the diplomatic officer of Her Majesty's Government, and, like all negotiations between the two countries, was conducted in his presence and by his authority. Therefore, Her Majesty's Government certainly had something to say as to the proceedings. Now, the hon. gentleman thinks it an unheard-of proceeding that any part of the transactions of that conference should fail to be made public. The hon. gentleman will remember, when I remind him of it, that in any conference of a diplomatic character, not one word transpires until the consent of both parties is obtained at the conclusion of the conference, when it is agreed what shall be made public and what shall not be made public. The protocols, properly so called, that is, the propositions which were interchanged at that conference and which resulted in an agreement, after having been made public, were laid on the Table of this House;—everything that was agreed upon, everything upon which the action of this Parliament was required, was submitted here. But the hon. gentleman's request is that conferences, consultations and conversations which took place, as to which no agreement was arrived at, shall be laid before this Parliament. As to that, not only had the United States Government something to say—and that Government gave their consent—but Her Majesty's Government were certainly interested and had something to say. As regards the obligations we are under to press the Imperial authorities for permission to lay this information before the House, I do not agree with the hon. gentleman that any such obligation lies upon us. The statement I made in Toronto was substantially the same as the statement made by the Finance Minister last session, which was debated on every platform in this country where a discussion of the subject took place, and will not strike the House as being in any degree novel. But when the hon. gentleman desires us to explain that we were persistent in our efforts to get permission from the Imperial Government to bring down the portions of the record which was not brought down, the hon. gentleman must remember that down to this moment no address or order of the House was made with regard to it. The only application from hon. gentlemen of the Opposition which was made upon the subject—I am speaking from memory, but I think my memory is accurate—was this: There was first of all, an interruption to the speech of the Finance Minister when he was undertaking to inform the House of the only grounds upon which reciprocity arrangements with regard to trade could be made with the United States. The objection was taken that the hon. gentleman was not at liberty to speak to the House upon that subject because the record was not here. At a subsequent stage a vote of censure was moved by the hon.

member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) upon the Government for not having laid the papers upon the Table of the House. We made our defence to that motion as best we could, and we were sustained by the House. But down to this time there has been no formal request by the House to lay those papers upon the Table. I desire to add that I am not making this statement as a reason why the papers should not be brought down, or why permission from the Imperial authorities should not be sought; but I am giving it in answer to the hon. gentleman who seems to think that we are under obligation to the House to excuse ourselves for not making a persistent effort to induce consent that these papers should be brought down. When we are fortunate enough to get them here, I think it will be quite apparent why the Imperial authorities had a right to be consulted, and should be consulted, on the subject of giving the record publicity.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I may say in reply to the hon. gentleman that that statement is accurate so far as my objection to the speech of the Finance Minister was concerned. I did object to the hon. gentleman going on and making his statement as to what transpired at Washington with reference to these negotiations, and at the same time refraining from communicating to the House any of the correspondence or proposals that had been made by the one Government or the other. Subsequently, when I formally brought the matter before the House, after you, Mr. Speaker, had ruled that the hon. gentleman was at liberty to proceed, I called the attention of the House to the practice that had prevailed in England for a long period of years with reference to matters of this sort; and I asked the hon. gentleman to lay upon the Table of the House the notes or memoranda of the interview that had taken place between the representatives of the Government at Washington and the representatives of this Government. The then Minister of Justice, the present Prime Minister, told me, I think, that those papers would be laid on the Table of the House, if there were any; the hon. gentleman informed the House that he could not say whether there was any such memoranda or not. I think the hon. gentleman will find that report in the Debates. Now, Sir, I do not at all withdraw from the position I took last year. I think it is a most unusual proceeding in Great Britain, and ought to be an unusual proceeding here, to undertake to discuss the policy of the Government with reference to any negotiations that may have taken place with a foreign country, while the papers which were necessary to enable Parliament to form an opinion upon the subject, are withheld from the House. The rule has been laid down over and over again by one of the most distinguished parliamentarians that ever sat in the British House of Commons, Lord Palmerston, that it was highly inexpedient for the House of Commons to enter upon the discussion of negotiations that had passed between the Imperial Government and any foreign Government, so long as proceedings had not reached that stage when it was possible to lay the communications that had taken place before Parliament. Sir, what is the object of bringing these matters before the attention of Parliament? Why, it is to enable Parliament to discharge its duties. The superintending control over every department of Government is with this House, is with this Parliament, and in order that this House may be in a position to discharge that duty, all the papers necessary to enable it to form a judgment upon any matter, ought to be before it. Now, when the hon. gentleman asked us last year to form a judgment upon the conduct of the members of the Government who undertook to negotiate with parties at Washington, he withheld from us those communications which were necessary to enable us to decide, not whether his statement was accurate, but to decide that the decision to which they had come was a wise one in the public interest. Now, those papers were withheld by the Government. Subsequently, on a formal discussion of the principle that I thought was involved, I made further inquiry of the leader of the House, the present Prime Minister, whether such information would be communicated to the House; under the circumstances, if the hon. gentleman has not, up to this time, communicated with Her Majesty's Government, it seems to me there has been a dereliction of duty on the part of members of the Administration. The Government are subordinate to Parliament, they are responsible to Parliament as well as to the Crown, and it was their bounden duty to take immediate steps to lay those papers before Parliament; and until they were prepared to do that, they ought to have refrained from discussing the subject and asking any action from Parliament with regard to their conduct. I think, Sir, that my hon. friend, the First Minister, if he has not communicated with the Imperial Government to have those papers laid before Parliament, has certainly failed in his duty. He has forgotten what transpired last session upon the subject. It does seem to me that where the subject has reached a conclusion as this one has—because the Government refusing to accept the proposition of the United States the negotiations came to an end—there was no further communication to be had, and there was no motive, public or official, which should have prevented the ministers from laying those papers on the Table of the House. That being the case, I think the hon. gentleman ought to have been prepared at the very opening of this session to communicate the refusal of the Imperial Government—if they were disposed to refuse—to consent to their being made public. I say that the Government ought not to have made that discussion on the floor of Parliament without the consent of the other party to lay the papers on the Table, and having that consent, the whole papers ought to have been laid at that time before us.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). While I have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who sits alongside the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), in his desire to get all these papers brought down, I would also like to say that it is the desire of this House, and of the people of the country, to have a copy of the protocols, and the proces-verbal, and the stenographic reports, that passed between the delegations and missions from this country and the officials at Washington with regard to this question. This country would also like to know to-day, and members of this House would like to know, who commissioned the present delegate academic, who is now wandering through the United States, to try to settle this great question.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg to say that I will make to this House, on the first occasion when it goes into Supply, a personal statement regarding the charges made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean).

Motion agreed to.

DEPUTY ADJUTANT-GENERAL VILLIERS.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved for :

Return of all correspondence, telegrams and documents in reference to the suspension of Deputy Adjutant-General Villiers, and also as to his restoration to office.

He said : In moving for these papers in connection with the suspension of Deputy Adjutant-General Villiers, I may say that when, some time last October, it became known that this distinguished militia officer had been suspended, the news created some considerable surprise wherever he was known. I understand he has been in the service since before Confederation, and has rendered good service to the militia. I understand further that he was suspended by telegram, and a junior officer was appointed in his stead. I think the offence was absence from the district. It turned out, upon inquiry afterwards, that he was not absent. He was afterwards reinstated, and another and totally different excuse was given why he had been suspended ; and it is in order to see just the position which was taken at the time as to the causes of the suspension and the reasons for reinstating him, so that we may arrive at a satisfactory conclusion, that I think it my duty, in the public interest, to move for those papers.

Motion agreed to.

SANDFORD BREAKWATER, N. S.

Mr. FLINT moved for :

Copies of all letters, petitions, surveys and reports in the possession of the Government, relating to the threatened destruction of, and claims for, repairs on the breakwater at Sandford, in the county of Yarmouth, N. S.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

He said : My object is to impress upon the Minister of Public Works the great local importance of this work which, I fear, must, in the press of business, have escaped his attention. I have had numerous letters and petitions from my constituents drawing attention to this matter, and I desire to see what the Government officers say with regard to the present position of the work and the probable expenses which the repairs that may be required will cost. As far as the constituency I have the honour to represent is concerned, we have not pressed on the minister any very large expenditure, and the expenditures we have urged were absolutely necessary. This work, when I first had the honour of a seat in Parliament, was threatened with destruction. I called the attention of the then acting minister to the danger, and he kindly promised to make official inquiries. Since that time I have frequently, and some of my constituents also have frequently, placed upon record the urgency of repairing this important public work. Shortly before I came to Ottawa I personally visited the scene, and was surprised to find what great inroads the storms of autumn and the early part of spring had made upon the work. I fear now we will have to urge a larger appropriation than would have been necessary had the repairs been made in the first instance. However, I will have the opportunity of seeing what the Government surveyors and others have said on this matter, and I hope the minister will kindly read over their reports again for his own information. In the face of the fact, which is repeated to us very frequently, of the buoyancy of the public revenue, I would urge upon the attention of the minister the very great importance and desirability of having this work repaired. Unless it is I may say that a large industry and the interests and progress of a large number of most honest, industrious and loyal people of this Dominion will be imperilled. Their industry will be destroyed ; the value of property will be decreased, and the industry will have to be removed to some other portion of the county, where a breakwater still remains in existence. I do sincerely trust the hon. minister will give us some assurance, before the close of the session, that this work will be reconstructed in as substantial a manner as before the storms of 1890 began to undermine it.

Motion agreed to.

PICKETS PIER, N. S.

Mr. BORDEN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, reports of engineers and commissions authorizing the expenditure of money since the year 1890, relating to Pickets Pier, N. S., together with a statement of the wharfage collected thereat, during said period.

He said : Before this motion is moved, I desire to say a few words in reference to this matter. As I live quite near this public work I am acquainted with almost everything that has been going on in connection with it. Still I think there are probably some surveyors' reports which I have not seen. That is the reason more particularly of my moving this motion; but I also move it in this public manner for the purpose of calling the attention of the Government to the condition of this work. It is an important work, one upon which the Dominion has spent considerable sums of money during the last twelve or fifteen years, and which was taken over some years ago by the Public Works Department. It is in charge of a Dominion official known as a wharfinger and harbour master, and considerable sums of money are collected annually, which go to swell the annual revenue. About a year ago this work was discovered to be in great danger of being carried away. At that time there happened to be a by-election in my county, and just before it took place, the Government sent down an engineer from the Public Works Department to examine that wharf, no doubt with a view to assist me in winning that election. That gentleman, Mr. Dodwell, visited this public work in the latter part of January, and he found it was in a very bad condition indeed, so bad that on returning to his office he immediately sent out a commission, which I have in my possession, in which he authorized a party living near the breakwater to expend a certain sum of money out of the contingencies fund, several hundred dollars—I do not remember the exact amount, as I did not expect this motion to be reached to-day. That officer discovered that the work was liable to be carried away at any moment. He, no doubt, advised his superior that an expenditure was necessary, and he wrote a commission authorizing an expenditure of several hundred dollars and sent it to the commissioner I have named, informing him that he was appointed at the suggestion of Mr. C. B. Bill, a gentleman who happened to be contesting the county against me. But for some reason or other, this sum of money was not expended. The election came off early in February. We heard nothing about the expenditure then, and we have not heard a word about it since. When I came here to attend to my parliamentary duties last session, I spoke to the Minister of Public Works in regard to the matter, and I asked him to place a sum in the Estimates for the repair of that breakwater. He said he would consider the matter. Finding there was no sum in the Estimates, I wrote to the Minister of Justice, the present Premier, and also the Minister of Public Works, setting out the facts I have stated, that several months before a public officer of the Department of Public Works had considered the work in such danger that immediate steps must be taken to ensure its safety, and asking the Government to be good enough to provide for the expenditure out of the grant for ordinary repairs. I received very polite answers to my letters. I also received a letter from the Minister of Public Works later, informing me that his chief engineer would be in Halifax, I think, in August, and he would certainly visit the work. I have not heard whether he did so or not. If this motion is agreed to, I presume his report, if he made one, will be laid on the Table of the House. I am not going to animadvert on the circumstances I have related, but I think the Government and the House will agree with me, that if repairs on this work were so urgent in January, in the middle of winter, and yet in some unaccountable way the money was never expended, surely it is reasonable to suppose that one year after that date the necessity of repairs is still greater. I am sure the minister will agree that unless there is some expenditure made on the work during the present season, the wharf will be entirely destroyed, and all the money expended on it hitherto will be wasted. When the returns are brought down showing the annual amount collected for wharfage dues, it will appear that the collections from this wharf were in excess of many other wharfs of the same character in Nova Scotia, and that, therefore, this work is a valuable asset to the Government. It affords an outlet for the agricultural produce of a large farming community occupying the best part of King's county, who desire to ship their products. This wharf could be placed in an efficient state of repair for a sum, probably not exceeding $1,000, and I, therefore, hope the Minister of Public Works will place that amount in the Supplementary Estimates in order that the work may be saved from utter destruction.

Motion agreed to.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for :

Return showing the birthplace, national origin, creed or church to which belonging, and the date of appointment of each person employed in the Civil Service of Canada, both in the inside and outside service, also the salary paid the last year and the department under which they are serving.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I ask the hon. gentleman to reconsider his motion. Part of the information requested is already given in the Civil Service list, namely, the date of the appointment of each person employed, the salary paid last year and the department under which the officer is serving. As regards some of the other particulars, I think the Government, some time ago, with the approval of the House, decided not to inquire into and record those particulars, and during last session a motion of like character was amended in that respect. The hon. gentleman asks for a statement of the birthplace, national origin, creed or church, to which each civil servant belongs. I have no objection to the birthplace or national origin being given, but I do not think it is proper to inquire as to the creed or church to which our civil servants belong, or to ask those gentlemen, who number many hundreds, to reveal that fact in order to put it on record. It does not seem to be material, in any respect, to the Civil Service. Perhaps the hon.

gentleman will reconsider the propriety of pressing his inquiry on that point.

Mr. LAURIER. I certainly do not see that any inconvenience would arise from these particulars being given. If they are accessible to the Government, I certainly see no objection to furnishing them to the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not understand why the information is refused, unless there is some purpose in refusing it, something which the Government do not desire to reveal. There is some curiosity in the public mind in regard to this matter, and a great many people desire to know how favours are distributed; how appointments are made; whether there is any ground for suspicion that the religion of the individual has anything to do with his chances for success; and I do not think that it is a proper request for the First Minister to ask my hon. friend to drop that portion of his inquiry. It is perfectly proper that we should know what the nationality, origin, and religion of the various incumbents of the Civil Service in this country are.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite willing to drop the latter part of the motion which is objected to by the First Minister, but as to the first three clauses, I think the House should grant all of them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I may say with regard to the first requests, that I think that under the circumstances they are not unreasonable. I know there is a great deal to be said for the view expressed by the First Minister, that we have nothing to do with a man's creed, and that his creed or nationality ought not to help or hurt him with regard to official appointments. But, when the notion gets abroad that they do influence the Government in giving the appointment, I think that there is an advantage in having correct information, for the very purpose of correcting any misapprehension in the public mind in that particular. It would be upon that ground that I think the information might be of importance.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps I might be allowed to ask the hon. gentleman whether his motion is confined to any particular period; at present it relates to the whole 27 years since Confederation?

Mr. LAURIER. It refers to all those engaged in the existing service without reference to the time of their appointment.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Persons now holding office?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). Now employed.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes.

Motion amended and agreed to.

FISHING BOUNTIES—VICTORIA, N.S.

Mr. FRASER moved for:

Correspondence, telegrams or other papers relating to irregularities and frauds in payment of fishing bounties in the county of Victoria, N.S., with the report of the commissioner or commissioners appointed to make the investigation.

He said: I do not propose to address myself to the House on this question, but simply to ask that this correspondence and all papers relating to it should be brought down at the very earliest moment. I do so in the interest of the bounty so far as the fishermen of Nova Scotia are concerned, in order that this House may have such information before it as will strengthen the Government in ensuring that such a state of things cannot occur in the future, as has existed in the past in that county and other places. I trust the Government will bring down all these papers at once, so that the House shall have an opportunity of seeing them, and remedying the defects. I do not by any means make this motion for the purpose of insinuating that this matter took place under circumstances which were peculiarly understood by the Government, but I do so in the interest of the bounty, and in the interest of the honest fishermen, from whom every dollar taken from them wrongfully, as was done in this case, is so much reduction on what they were entitled to.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 7th February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

NATHANIEL BOYD, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Marquette, introduced by Sir John Thompson and Mr. Macdonald (Winnipeg).

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 13) to give effect to an agreement between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the Corporation of the city of Toronto.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 14) to wind up the Montreal Mining Company.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 15) to incorporate the Dominion Burglary Guarantee Company, Limited.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 16) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Mount Forest, Markdale and Meaford Railway Company.—(Mr. Sproule.)

Bill (No. 17) respecting the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

GRINDING WHEAT IN BOND.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 18) to amend the Customs Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to do away with the privilege that the millers of Ontario at present have of importing wheat and grinding it in bond and paying no duty thereon. That privilege was given originally something over eleven years ago, in consequence of a representation made by the millers to the then Prime Minister. They represented that we did not produce a sufficient quantity of hard wheat in Canada to enable them to supply the flour which was necessary for the English market. They therefore urged that they should be allowed to import wheat No. 1 hard, or something like it, from the western states. There is no longer any reason of that kind. We produce in the North-west all the No. 1 hard that the millers can use, and it will be consonant with the National Policy that we should do our best to keep the home market for the farmer. I therefore move for leave to introduce this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT.

Mr. FOSTER moved:

That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to-morrow, to consider the following proposed resolution:—

12½

“That it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and to provide that the deduction or contribution, to the superannuation fund, from the salary of every person who enters the Civil Service after the date of the coming into force of such amendment, shall be at the rate of three and one-half per cent per annum on such salary if it is six hundred dollars or upwards, and of three per cent per annum if it is less than six hundred dollars.”

SUPPLY—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make some explanations, of which I gave notice last night, relating to my visit to Washington, and the strictures with reference to that visit made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). The reference was not in complimentary terms, and implied that the object of my mission was a disloyal one. The same insinuation or assertion has been made upon the floor of this House, but not in my hearing, by ministers of the Crown and by others, and I take the opportunity to meet and refute it. The policy of the Government press and of Government speakers, both in and outside this Chamber, seems to be one of detraction, calumny and misrepresentation, as regards the members of the Liberal party and their policy. I might read, in proof of this assertion, extracts from the leading journals of the party—from the “Empire,” the Hamilton “Spectator,” and various others—but I do not deem it necessary to take up the time of the House or disfigure the pages of “Hansard” with these quotations. I presume that there is not a member of this House who is ignorant of the fact that misrepresentations and charges and assertions, more or less malignant in their character, regarding leading members of the Liberal party, have been made in the public press. It seems to be the settled policy of the Government party, from the First Minister down, to misrepresent the motives and distort the position of the Liberal party. The loyalty cry is made to do service in place of argument, no doubt, by this means, by the Government and their followers, expecting to withdraw attention from their own misdeeds and divert public attention from the issues placed before the country. The application of these epithets and charges to my hon. friend at my right (Sir Richard Cartwright), to the leader of the party (Hon. Mr. Laurier) and to all the prominent men in the party, is a matter of daily occurrence, and I, for one, believe that in making these charges, gross injustice and prevarication of truth is indulged in by those who make them. The effect of this in the United States, we can readily see, is to induce the American people to believe that this country is ripe for annexation. Of course, when Government members, leaders and organs, all charge the Liberal party with being annexationists, the impression is circulated that one-half the people are committed to that policy. And in fact, Mr. Cummings introduced a Bill a few days ago to facilitate our coming into the American union, under the impression, industrially circulated by Tory leaders and orators, that one-half the population are in favour of that movement. The result naturally is to strengthen the hands of those who desire to see retaliatory measures applied to Canada in order to force her into the Union; and the First Minister, the Finance Minister and every other minister in the Government are acting in concert with Mr. Farrer and other advocates of annexation in inducing the American Government to apply the screws, under the belief that this country is ready to drop like a ripe pear from the tree, and all that is necessary is to strengthen the hands of the disloyalists, who are said, by Government supporters, to swarm on every side.

It is true a certain degree of dissatisfaction exists in the country, and a certain degree of unrest among the people. But the party now in power are responsible for that state of things. If there does exist annexation sentiments, in nine cases out of ten it is due to a sense of the injustice of the Government course and its impolitic character. If such a feeling does exist, it is due, not to the attractions presented by the movement itself, but to the policy of the Government in placing undue burdens on the shoulders of the people. It is this which makes people look around in various directions for some source of relief. If there is an annexation sentiment, upon the hon. gentlemen opposite rests the responsibility for its existence. As the chairman of the Young Liberal Club in Toronto very truthfully said, the policy of the Government was to annex the population of Canada to the United States in job lots. It has annexed over a million of them, and it does not lie in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite, to talk about annexation sentiments and proclivities and tendencies. Whatever sentiments of that kind exist are due, in a very large measure, to their own misdeeds. What has been the attitude of the Liberal party? Has the Liberal party advocated annexation to the United States? Is there a Liberal in the House of Commons who has given utterance to sentiments of this kind? No; the attitude of the Liberal party is to advocate the adoption of a policy which will secure better trade relations with the United States, which will remedy the evils under which we labour, which will give us tariff reform, which will give us reform in various matters, such as the franchise, which will give this country a Government that we can appreciate and respect. It is not a policy revolutionary in its tendency; it is not a disloyal policy. It is a policy, Sir, calculated to remedy the evils that now exist with reference to the public affairs of this country. Such is the policy of the Liberal party; and these allegations, these assertions, these charges made with reference to the Liberal party, are malignant, are untruthful, are slanderous in every case and in every respect.

Now, I should not, of course, have stood upon my feet with reference to this matter but for the attacks made upon myself. I repudiate those attacks. It is asserted that I am a Yankee. Well, Sir, if I happen to have been born in the United States, and if there is anything criminal about that, I do not know that I had very much to do with the circumstances. I think my personal responsibility with reference to that matter is small indeed. It is true, I was born in the United States. My parentage is Scotch-English. The name of my family is an old Northumberland name, whose records go back for many centuries. I have very much pride in the history of that family; I have pride in my origin. I have lived in Canada since my boyhood. I have spent forty-four years in this Dominion; but in the estimation of my Tory friends opposite that hardly seems a sufficient length of time to have naturalized me. Sir, I repudiate the charge that the fact that I am an American by birth prevents me from being a loyal and true British subject. I am, in fact, a British subject by birth, a British subject under the law of the realm, a law which provides that every person born of British parents, born in a foreign country, not, at the time of his birth, at war with England, is by birth a British subject; and I have a right to all the privileges of a natural-born British subject to as full an extent as any other British subject born in any part of Her Majesty's wide Dominion. Now, with regard to my being a raitor. What evidence exists of that? What right has any rib-stabber in any Tory newspaper to-day to make that assertion with regard to myself, or with regard to any Liberal on this side of the House? Sir, I repudiate the charge. I have never in any way used my influence, by word or act, to do anything that was not, in my opinion, conducive to the best interests of Canada—of Canada, not as a portion of some foreign power, but to benefit this country under its present condition and under its present Government—I do not mean the Government sitting opposite, but a Government that would rule here constitutionally in the interests of the people.

It is said that I have been in Washington betraying Canada. My hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) can go to Washington with his family, and there is no notice taken of it. If anything is said about it it is rather complimentary to the hon. gentleman, and to his advantage. Any gentleman from the opposite side of this Chamber can go to Washington, and there is nothing wrong in it at all. Any member of the British Parliament can go to Washington. Mr. Bryce went there, and spent a length of time in accumulating the information that was available for his book, The American Commonwealth. Hundreds of prominent Englishmen go to Washington; but I cannot go there. Canadian commissioners can go there. They go there once, twice and three times. They go there for the purpose of exhibiting to the country a magnificent spectacle of how not to do it—go there for the purpose of playing the game of political deception, and they did so, and it is all right. But if a Liberal goes to Washington, there is something criminal about it. Now, if it is wrong for me to go to Washington, if it is wrong for any Liberal to go to Washington, let the Government put a law upon the Statute-book prohibiting Liberals from going to Washington, enacting that, in order to be permitted to go to Washington, it will be necessary for a man to be a Tory; then we should have the thing in a proper position, I presume. Now, Mr. Speaker, I was in Washington. I was in Washington on Sunday, the 15th January; on Monday, the 16th January; and on Tuesday, the 17th January, in the year of our Lord, 1893. I had business in Washington, not of a public character but of a private character, business of a not very agreeable character. I suppose, perhaps, it may be necessary for me to disclose that private business fully in order to answer the charge that I was there with a felonious intent and purpose. If hon. gentlemen think so, I can do so. I was unfortunate enough to have a vessel that had got into difficulty in connection with the American navigation laws. She was under fine, and the case was appealed to the Secretary of the Treasury, and I went to Washington to attend to the presentation of that case, and to secure, if possible, a mitigation or an abrogation of that fine. That was my business at Washington, the business that has procured for me the title of a traitor, going to that city to sell the rights and interests of Canada. Yes, I went there on business. I have been there before on business, on two occasions. I shall go there again on business; and I now inform hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that I shall go there as often as I please, business or no business. I have a perfect right to go there, and I shall exercise that right at all times that I choose to do so, which probably will not be very often, for it is something of a journey, and entails a little expense, and I have nothing in particular to draw me there. I will say, further, Mr. Speaker, that when I have been in Washington I have used every effort in my power, and sought to the best of my ability, to promote the interests of Canada. I have thought it my duty to do so, it has been a pleasure to do so. I have not gone down there for the purpose of misleading the American people. I have not gone down there for the purpose of palming off a sham and a fraud upon the Canadian people. I have been there in due course of my business, and whenever I have come into contact with American public men, I have urged upon them, as far as my feeble abilities would permit, the propriety and the desirability of having broad, fraternal and liberal relations between these two countries, of having an end of this bickering and jealousy, and friction that are disadvantageous to the people of both countries. I have been actuated, in my humble efforts, by a patriotic desire to promote a better state of feeling and better relations between the two peoples than now exist.

Now, Sir, about my last visit. It differs in character from the visit of hon. gentlemen opposite, for I have nothing to conceal. They had something to conceal, and they concealed it. We have not even yet learned all about the true inwardness of their visit. They have kept the country in ignorance of it for two years. As to my visit, I am ready to disclose to this House now, anything and everything that transpired. After despatching my business, as a very natural thing, I imagine, I decided to go up to the Capitol and see Congress in session. I presume almost anybody in this House would have done so. There may possibly be some Tory here so loyal that he would not have done so. There may be some person here of the character of an old Tory gentleman in South Norfolk some years ago, who started to go up to Detroit on an excursion, but when he got to Windsor he would not cross the river and set his feet upon the accursed American soil. He was thoroughly loyal. He has had a son since then representing that riding in this House. I imagine there is scarcely a member of this House who would not have gone up to see the House of Congress in session. I went up there, and when there I fell in with a number of members, by whom I was treated very courteously. Any member of this House will be treated courteously if he goes to Washington. He will find the utmost desire evinced by members of Congress to make his stay a pleasant one. I was introduced to a number of congressmen. I should not like to undertake to recall the names of one-half of them. But I got into the papers. I did not ask to be put in the papers, but I found myself there; and the reports as to the object of my visit to Washington were more or less wide of the truth, and I could not vouch for the accuracy of any of them. Well, Sir, I had a talk with members, I had a talk with quite a number of members about various matters. They wanted to talk, in fact, and I will frankly confess so did I. They wanted to know about us. I felt complimented by this, for in the United States there is generally manifested ignorance by the people of that country about Canadian matters, and an utter indifference as to what we are, who we are and where we are. I venture to say that in the United States not one person in a dozen knows anything substantial about Canada, or cares as much as he knows about it. I felt glad to see in Washington among public men a desire to know about Canada, and that they were quite willing to talk about it. They inquire about our political issues. As well as I could, I told what the leading issues between the two parties were, and the Democrats were kind enough to say that the Liberals were all right, that they were bone of their bone as regards the fiscal policy. Then they wanted to know about something they had heard about us. They wanted to know, for instance, about the gerrymander, about the Franchise Act, if it was possible that we had a franchise law in Canada which permitted the Government to appoint during its pleasure officers who made the lists, and which permitted the Government, after their own creatures had made the lists, to print them in their own office, where they had power, if they chose to exercise it, to carry on any game of manipulating lists they pleased. I said, that, unfortunately, it was true. Then they wanted to know about boodling. They wanted to know if we had really reached that stage of perfection in that line which they had attained in the United States. I said I hardly knew, but I thought in some respects perhaps we had; but the Government had discovered a way of getting rid of the taint by vicarious sacrifice, by selecting a scapegoat (Sir Hector Langevin) and laying on him the sins of the Government and banishing him over to the wilderness and anchoring him beside two of the most rabid and bloodthirsty Grits in the House (Mulock and Charlton). They wanted to know something with respect to the question of annexation, of course. They wanted to know if really there was that feeling in favour of annexation in Canada that was represented, and I informed them there was not, that there might be a few localities along the frontier where the annexation sentiment was a pronounced and prevalent one, but in the interior we scarcely heard of the question, and it was not a political force in Canada at all. Then they gave their views about annexation, and I found a great divergence of opinion among members of Congress as to its desirability. Some thought it would be a good thing, some thought it would not, a great many feared the result. They thought the United States already possessed incongruous elements in the body politic of sufficient extent, and that it would be better to go slow; and they by no means endorsed the desirability of effecting a change, even if it were practicable to effect it. I thought that would be a good time to come down to a point which I conceive to be of great importance, and so I urged on almost every member I met, certainly on every member when I obtained an opportunity to do so, the impropriety of attempting to force Canada into annexation by adopting a policy of restriction. I assured them that to continue a policy of retaliation and restriction would fail to accomplish the purpose for which it was intended, that such a policy would beget resentment, and that it would serve no good purpose, but that it would in itself be detrimental and prejudicial to the interests of both countries, and if any person favouring annexation thought it would contribute to securing that result, he was utterly and entirely mistaken. I urged this view of the case for the reason that I did not desire to see that policy adopted, that I deprecated the consequences of that policy, and I sought, so far as my influence might go, to convince the members of Congress that it was a fallacious policy to adopt, and one they had better abandon. It may be asked, what did I urge? In talking with members of Congress I urged my views. I urged forbearance. I urged generous treatment on the part of the strong towards the weak. I urged peaceful relations. I urged a policy of refraining from adopting retaliation. I urged favourable consideration of a fair proposal for reciprocity. I deprecated unfriendly legislation, and as I have said before, I argued especially, and with all the force I could command, that they should not think of adopting a retaliatory policy for the special purpose of playing into the hands of the annexation party and hastening the consummation of that event. I ask, was this treason? I have outlined fully and fairly the course I took. Was it treason? Was it even stabbing Canada, à la Wallace, in a vital part? I submit the case to my peers in this House.

I have something further to say about what I learned in Washington. There were a great many things I wanted to learn, and although my stay was brief, I learned what I could while I was there. I learned something about the feeling that exists among public men in Washington towards Canada. I learned that it was in the great majority of cases a friendly feeling, that the feeling was all that could be desired, that we have nothing to fear from that kind of Jingo feeling in Washington that exists in this House, that we may look to them when the proper time comes and feel satisfied that when we approach them in a fair spirit we will be treated with the essence of fair-play, that they will meet us in the middle of the stream in any offer we may make for friendly relations and wider commercial relations between the two peoples. What I learned about reciprocity was that under the Cleveland Administration we can get reciprocity. I affirm unhesitatingly and without reservation that we can get reciprocity from that Administration, and get it on fair and equitable terms. In connection with this, I will read a resolution introduced into the Senate by a gentleman who, it is reported, will be Secretary of the Treasury in the Cleveland Administration, by a gentleman who is next to the President of the United States, the foremost figure in the political life of that country at the present time. I refer to the Hon. J. G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, who is in direct line of succession to the next nomination for the presidency, and who is one of the most broad, liberal-minded and patriotic men in that country. Mr. Carlisle introduced this resolution some two years ago. I read it as indicative of the feeling Mr. Carlisle will entertain with respect to this matter. It is as follows:—

Whereas there are existing between the Government of the United States and the Government of the Dominion of Canada certain controversies with respect to their trade and commerce and concerning the interpretations of treaty stipulations; and whereas it is desirable that the most friendly relations should obtain between the peoples of the two countries, and that more extended trade and commerce be established, promoted by such friendly legislation by both countries as will remove all causes of irritation and every obstacle to healthy growth and development of such trade and commerce between them: now therefore, be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that, for the purpose of carrying out the spirit and intent embodied in the foregoing preamble, the President of the United States be and is hereby authorized and directed to invite the Government of the Dominion of Canada to appoint three commissioners to meet a like number of commissioners to be appointed by him on behalf of the United States.

Such joint commission shall consider all questions relating to the commercial relations of the two countries under existing treaties, concurrent legislation or otherwise, and agree upon and recommend to their respective Governments such legislation as will settle all disputes and controversies between the two countries, and which will, in the judgment of the said commission, best tend to promote the growth of trade and commerce between the United States and the said Dominion of Canada.

That was the resolution introduced in the Senate by the Hon. J. G. Carlisle, and that resolution is the key-note of the policy of the Democratic party, which assumes power in the United States on the fourth day of next March. I may, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, without violating confidence, say that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means at Washington, a man whose voice with regard to tariff changes is more potent than that of any other man in America, the Hon. Wm. M. Springer, of Illinois: one of the most thorough men in the United States in the grasp of his knowledge of economic questions, one of the greatest minds in the United States.—I may say that Wm. M. Springer is understood, on what I believe to be good authority, to favour a policy of making a statutory offer of reciprocity by the United States to all contiguous states; reciprocity in all the natural products of all these states, reciprocity in all things manufactured from the raw material produced by every one of these states, reciprocity in all goods produced from raw material admitted free of duty by both of the contracting countries. In all probability that offer, briefly outlined in these words, will be made a statutory offer, and the overture held out Canada, to Mexico, and to the states of Central America. The assertion that we cannot get reciprocity, the assertion that such a treaty is unattainable has no foundation in fact, because such a treaty can be obtained. No such treaty as the Canadian commissioners went to Washington to obtain, a treaty with the advantages entirely on the side of Canada, a treaty admitting raw materials free of duty only, a treaty giving us the privilege of selling all we want to sell, and debarring the Americans from the privilege of selling to us what they want to sell—no such treaty as that can be negotiated. But a fair reciprocity treaty that gives to us the privilege to sell in the markets of the United States, everything we produce in mines, in fisheries, in forests and on the farm, and everything that we produce in our workshops, in return for privileges granted to the Americans of selling to us the production of their own labour,—such a treaty, I affirm, can be negotiated with the utmost facility and without any obstacles standing in the way. I have said that the feeling in Washington with regard to Canada was all that could be desired.

I found out something, also, with regard to the feeling towards the present Government in political circles in Washington, and I found that it was not so favourable or so friendly as the feeling towards the country at large. I was sorry to see it, but the fact remains that there is not so cordial a feeling towards the Canadian Government as there is towards the people which this Government presides over. That arises from various causes. The canal toll question has had something to do with it, the refusal of the privilege of bonding fish from the Maritime Provinces to be shipped by rail to American cities, has had something to do with it; but more than anything else, there is the alleged breach of confidence and chicanery practised by the Canadian commission, and by which the United States Government was made a catspaw to pull Tory chestnuts out of the fire in an election contest in this country. The deep feeling of resentment in reference to this matter has, it is stated, been such as to lead the President of the United States to provide that we shall have reciprocity in refusing the bonding privilege, and reciprocity in quarantining cattle, a policy which we have adhered to for many years, and which I fear is to be now introduced by the United States. Now, Sir, this is a brief statement of what I saw, and what I did, and what I learned in Washington. I obtrude it upon the House—if I may use the term obtrude—because I feel forced to do so. I have been charged in the newspapers of the Conservative party in the grossest manner, with malignity and untruthfulness and treason and selling my country, and with every degree of baseness that Judas Iscariot could be guilty of. I repudiate and deny these charges, and so far as they relate to my visit to Washington I have met them fully, minutely, fairly and truthfully, and I have placed the whole state of the case before this House and before the country. I repeat, Sir, that we can get reciprocity with the United States, and that the allegation that we cannot get it has no foundation in fact. I would not say that we will have, under the democratic policy, a mitigation of the tariff restrictions that exist in that country, before we apply for reciprocity. I think it is doubtful if we have, I think the American Government will leave that question to be settled, and these mitigations to be secured through treaty arrangements which they are ready and anxious to make; but whether they do or not, I reiterate that we can get reciprocity. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the United States cannot coerce us. I took the utmost pains to impress that view of the case upon public men at Washington; but neither can we coerce the United States, and both parties have been engaged in that unprofitable and foolish business long enough. I have here words spoken by Lord Salisbury—

Mr. WELDON. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman; but a number of members on this side of the House did not quite understand his statement with reference to the hon. gentleman's interview with Mr. Springer, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in Washington. We would like to ask the hon. gentleman, before he leaves that part of his subject, whether, seeing he had so full a discussion with that distinguished American statesman, he had brought things to any other conclusion than this: that there was to be a common tariff, a perfect free trade between the two countries, and a common tariff against all the outside world—the McKinley tariff, if you will—but at all events, a high tariff against goods from the British islands?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has interrupted me and asked for a fuller and more explicit statement in regard to the point he has raised. What I stated with regard to Chairman Springer was this: That I had reason to believe that he, as Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, was in favour of a reciprocity arrangement, not only with Canada, but with all states contiguous to the United States; an arrangement that will permit the free interchange of all the natural productions of the soil, the forest and the mines; an arrangement that will also permit the free interchange of all the finished products of the raw materials of either countries, and that will also permit the free interchange of all the products of raw materials imported into both countries entering into the arrangement, free of duty. I may also state, as the hon. gentleman's question suggests, that Mr. Springer is understood to be opposed to any arrangement such as a Zollverein or customs union; that he does not think it practicable, that he does not think it in the interests of the United States, and he believes that each party should control its own tariff, except so far as such control is surrendered by the common arrangement rendered necessary, by the negotiations that will be required to secure a reciprocity treaty between each. Have I made myself sufficiently clear upon the point? I was about to quote, Sir, the language used by Lord Salisbury a few days ago bearing upon this question of tariff reprisals, tariff war, and tariff retaliation.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Lord Salisbury, in his speech to the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, which is reported on the fourth day of this month, says:

He questioned both the morality and expediency of the use of tariffs as a weapon against other nations, and he mentioned as an instance and illustration of his argument the fiscal wars between France and Italy, and France and Switzerland, as producing disaster to all concerned.

Lord Salisbury, with equal propriety, might have instanced the fiscal war between Canada and the United States as furnishing an illustration of the same kind, and as producing disaster, and nothing but disaster to all concerned.

In the year 1886, on the expiration of the reciprocity treaty, we had as large an export trade with the United States in the natural products of our soil as we had last year; under the influences of repression, the trade of the two countries has been dwarfed, and while the population of the United States has doubled, while their wealth is three times greater than it was then, while their demand for productions has increased, we in Canada have remained almost stationary in our exports during the whole of this period. In no year since 1866 have our exports to the United States equalled the exports of 1866, taking the United States statistics of the trade of that year as the basis of calculation, and the result of this war of discrimination and retaliation has been entirely and wholly disastrous to both countries, producing mutual disadvantages, mutual difficulties and mutual losses.

Now Sir, I may conclude my remarks by saying, as I said before, that the charge of treason, the charge of disloyalty, as applied to the Liberal party of Canada, is false—utterly false—that party is the truly loyal party that strives to promote the interests and the prosperity of the people of this country, the party that will stand by the interests of this country, the party that has no object in view beyond making Canada a prosperous country, a growing country, a wealthy country, a better country to live in, and a more successful experiment as a colony under the British flag, pending the settlement of its ultimate position. We go Sir, for free trade with the United States, because we believe it would be mutually advantageous. We go for tariff reform—for tariff reform all along the line. We go for economy; we go for honesty; we go for the prosperity of Canada. In all these things, Sir, we are the antipodes of the party opposite; and if these things constitute disloyalty, if they constitute treason, then we are disloyal, we are traitors, and there sits the party that is loyal to the destinies and the interests of the country. And what I say with regard to the party, I repeat with regard to myself. I say that the same charge applied to me is malignant and utterly false; it has not a scintilla of truth in it. I have battled here, Mr. Speaker, on the opposite side of this House for nearly fifteen years.

It has not been a very lucrative or satisfactory occupation; but I may say to-day what I have never before said in this House, that I might have had a position on the other side of the House in 1878—that I might have had a position since then; but I have declined anything in the shape of the flesh-pots of Egypt, and have held to the trust which I believed properly rested upon me, to fight for what I thought to be right, and what we on this side of the House think to be right. Political life has been to me, as to many others, one of pecuniary sacrifice. I have never been very anxious for popularity. My wish has been rather to leave a good name behind me. I do not want to leave behind me the name of traitor or the name of one guilty of chicanery or fraud. If, when I die, I can leave it to be said by some poor woman that my efforts as a promoter of legislation have protected her against the wiles of those who lure to ruin, if I can leave it to be said that the truth of the intimate connection which exists between the laws of God and the welfare of the state, has been illustrated by anything that I have accomplished in this country, I shall be rewarded for all these years of battle and strife. I have not been governed in my course here by any desire to do anything that would not meet with the approval of my own conscience and with the approbation of my disinterested fellow-countrymen. Canada, Sir, is my home; it has been my home for forty-four years; it commands my services, and I will do anything that lies in my power to promote the interest and welfare of this land which has been mine since my boyhood. I will labour for its peace and prosperity. I will do that here and elsewhere. I will do that when I address my fellow-countrymen; I will do it when I address, as I have too seldom the opportunity of doing, meetings in the United States, and when I meet public men in the United States, whether at Washington or elsewhere. In all this I shall be governed by the single desire to promote the interests of Canada. That is what I have sought to do; that is the motive that has governed my actions, and I feel stung by these unjust reproaches and these lying epithets that have been applied to me by the base party press of this country. I believe, honestly, Mr. Speaker, that admission to the markets of this continent is essential to the prosperity of Canada. I act on that belief; I advocate that policy; I do it without asking any man's permission, and without apologising to any man for what he believes may be the ultimate result of that policy. I labour for this, and, at the same time, I am in favour of internal reforms. I look, of course, to the future, and I realize that the day is coming when the process of evolution, as it is applied to nations and colonies, will require us to face the momentous question as to what the next step in our national progress shall be. I realize that the condition of colonial dependence is not a permanen-one, and that we must expect to meet the question as to what action—momentous in its consequences and likely to settle permanently our political status, we shall take when the proper time comes—whether it shall be the blending of our institutions with those of the Empire, on the one hand, independence on the other, or a consolidation of the Anglo-Saxon commonwealths on this continent, as the best of the three plans, cannot with absolute certainty be predicted. These will be the questions for the people of Canada to consider and to decide at the proper time. But they are not questions of the hour. They are not to be settled now; they are not to be passed upon now; and if we can adopt the policy that will secure the prosperity of this country, the development of its resources, the increase of its population, the promotion of its well-being, the happiness of its people, and peaceful relations among all the Anglo-Saxon commonwealths of this continent we can leave these questions of the future to be settled when the fulness of time has come, trusting and believing that He who governs nations will direct the course of this country aright.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I must congratulate the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) upon his intimate acquaintance with the secrets of politics on the other side. He is able to tell us who is to be the Secretary of the Treasury in the incoming Administration.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I did not say he was to be so; I said he was reported to be slated for that position, and the hon. gentleman, if he is familiar with the American newspapers, has the same sources of information that I have.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). The hon. gentleman left the impression on my mind that he was thoroughly familiar with the political parties of the United States, and knew nearly all their secrets, and was able to tell this House that this country could get reciprocity, if it so desired. To show that the hon. gentleman is generally believed to be intimate with American politics, let me read what was said by a gentleman at a meeting of the Ministerial Association of Toronto yesterday:

Rev. Mr. Blackstock dissented. He objected to lending any influence whatever, either directly or indirectly, to politicians. In a matter like this they should act in their individual capacities. Mr. Charlton had been in Washington doing what he could to promote annexation, and the association should remember him.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is that the "World?"

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). It is the Ottawa "Citizen"—a press despatch from Toronto. The hon. gentleman's acquaintance with American politics is such that this reverend gentleman considered it improper that he should address a meeting in Toronto. Now, the hon. member for North Norfolk, without any special instigation on my part, has seen fit to explain his relation, or rather his want of relation, to those various missions which have been sent to Washington by certain politicians in this country. I myself happened three years ago to be in Washington—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN—in the pursuit of health. I was stopping at the Willard Hotel—a very good hotel, though a very old one. I was sitting at a table in the dining-room, enjoying a meal, on the opposite side of which was sitting a gentleman whom I did not know. I went to the head waiter and asked him if Guy Fawkes was in town? He replied no and I then asked him who that gentleman might be? He said that was Mr. Charlton, from Canada.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Anything further in that line?

Mr. MACLEAN. The other day when addressing the House, I referred to the responsibility of politicians for what newspapers said and the responsibility of newspapers for what the politicians said, but did not say anything to preclude me from holding the Liberal party responsible for the acts of certain men who are identified with that party. The Liberal party is responsible for men like Mr. Bunting, who is associated with them in their efforts to get reciprocity. They are responsible for men like Farrer, who has been in Washington time and again, and Goldwin Smith who upholds them in their policy.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It was Goldwin Smith who put the other party in power.

Mr. MACLEAN. They are responsible for the utterances of Mr. Farrer and his articles, and we know what those are; they are responsible for the articles in "La Patrie," of Montreal, and we know what those articles favour; they are responsible for Mr. Longley, of Nova Scotia, who is an annexationist—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MACLEAN—and who is responsible for the sale of a mine in this country to an American combine; and they are responsible for all those recriminations against Canada and instigations to coercion and the like. Can they deny that? They must answer to the country and the people for the action they have taken in these various missions to Washington; and it is their duty now, if they are honourable men, when calling for all the papers in connection with the efforts of the Government regarding reciprocity, to tell us all they did and said in connection with that matter. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said he was at Washington and told the politicians a great deal, but I take it he did not tell them, for instance, that in Canada the Liberal party had a French Canadian Catholic as its leader and was manipulated by a machine politician, J. D. Edgar. He told them nothing of that. I just wish to point out the difference between the two parties in this country with regard to this question. The Conservative party has, as its fundamental principle, that we are a Canadian people, that we are on this continent as Canadians, and intend to realize our destiny as such, and the second article in our creed is that we are British subjects; and in the light of these two facts, namely, that we are Canadians bound to establish a Canadian nationality on this continent and are British subjects, we purpose to regulate all our trade relations and tariff reform measures and diplomatic relations with other countries. But hon. gentlemen opposite, first of all, lay down a trade policy, and then they let our future as a nation and our relations to the mother country sink or swim, as they may be affected by that trade policy. I have nothing further to say on the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. MACLEAN. Well, I will oblige hon. gentlemen. Let them just remember this, that they have taken an unpatriotic stand, that they are fast going to the political graveyard, where they will be interred; and the man who drives the annexation hearse containing the corpse is Mr. Goldwin Smith, and the undertaker is Erastus Wiman, and the chief gravedigger, Farrer, and over one grave will be a little board bearing the inscription: "Here lies the man who tried to sell his country," and over another "Here lies the man who tried to sell his adopted country."

Mr. FRASER. I think that perhaps the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), if he took into consideration the character of the attempted little bit of wit on the part of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) last night, would not have paid so much attention to it. We really, by paying any attention to that hon. gentleman's remarks, appear to give them some value, but as he said something relating to the province of Nova Scotia, and as the hon. member for Cape Breton right behind him, who is hand in glove with Mr. Longley, did not rise to refute the statement, I felt bound to answer it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He had good reasons probably.

Mr. FRASER. Yes, and substantial reasons. But so far as Mr. Longley, the Attorney-General, is concerned, he is not an annexationist, and the statement of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) is not true. It is an easy matter to make a little capital by saying this man and the other is an annexationist. Does any man in Canada believe there is any more loyalty to the British Crown in the breast of the man who spoke than in the hearts of the men on this side. Look at him. Loyalty to what? Fancy him posing as the sole custodian of the loyalty of Canada. What a manly man to stand by Her Majesty in peril. There are a number of people in this country who go around talking as if they possessed the whole loyalty of Canada, men who in their hearts do not believe a word of what they profess, and who show they do not by their actions. What is loyalty? Does it consist of the loud-mouthed utterances of men who say they are the only loyal people in the world? Does any man believe that if the hon. gentleman came in here and went about boasting how loyal he was to his wife we would believe he was any more loyal than he should be? Not a bit of it. If he is loyal to his wife he will say nothing about it; but down in the depths of his heart he will cherish that sentiment and do the best he can to make her happy. That is true loyalty. Whenever I hear a man talking loyalty I suspect that if you look deep down into him you will find a selfish disposition which he wants to cover with the cloak of loyalty. What is loyalty? It is the desire to make this country the best heritage in which to live. If an hon. gentleman who thinks that free trade is a better principle than protection, stands by it and strikes hard at the party opposite, is he disloyal? These gentlemen think that if a word is said against the Government, that is disloyal. Surely Governments are constituted for the well-being of the country, and surely a fair criticism of their policy is consonant with the highest degree of loyalty to the best interests of the country. I agree with the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that these men going up and down the country, speaking as if they only were loyal, are doing more to make outsiders believe there are disloyal people here than anything else; and I have no doubt that if it came to an issue the men who shout loyalty would be the first to show their backs and their heels. Here is our country to live in and die in, and to make as good as or better than any other country. Shall we do this by diverse methods or by all thinking alike? Shall we not think our thoughts and speak our thoughts as to the best methods of governing the country, and if we do so shall we be called disloyal? So far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned there are no annexationists there. The thing is never heard of, and why? Because our Conservative friends know that the country is equally divided between both parties, and they see the farmer and the fisherman on both sides; the one as ready to imperil his life for the safety of the country as the other, and they know a cry of disloyalty would be ridiculed. But there has grown up a set of men who think they are doing nothing for their country unless they shout their loyalty. Wherever there is liberty, that is my country, and my country is best when there is liberty, not only in thought but in action. Let us join together, without thinking that this man is disloyal or that man is disloyal in this House because he belongs to the opposite party. Why, look at Mr. Sol. White, who, I notice, is in the Ontario Legislature, and against him not a single Conservative paper has raised its voice. He went down the other day to one of the Norfolks; I am not well acquainted with the geography of Ontario, and I do not know whether it was the constituency of the hon. gentleman for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) or of my hon. friend who has just spoken; but this man is going up and down the country talking disloyalty. Why not strike at him?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I ask the hon. gentleman to whom he refers?

Mr. FRASER. I refer to Mr. White.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong with regard to the facts.

Mr. FRASER. Does the hon. gentleman say he is not a pronounced annexationist?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the hon. gentleman says that Mr. White is going up and down the country preaching annexation, he is saying what is not true.

Mr. MCGREGOR. It is true; I have heard Mr. White several times myself.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As the hon. gentleman from Essex (Mr. McGregor) has denied what I have said with regard to Mr. White, I wish to say this: although I am not the special keeper of Mr. White's conscience, I wish to say with regard to the meeting in Norfolk—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot make a speech.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I only wish to say that I understand Mr. White was not in the county of Norfolk. Mr. White held no meetings in the county of Norfolk; and more than that, Mr. White has recently declared that he never was an annexationist.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the hon. gentlemen will wait a moment: Mr. White has said that he has preferred annexation to the miserable policy of hon. gentlemen opposite; and further, the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) ought to know that the Continental Union Association has expelled Mr. White recently because of his expression of those views.

Mr. FRASER. I may have been mistaken about the county. As I say, I am not very well up in the geography of the numerous counties in Ontario; but I do know that Mr. White attended a meeting somewhere in that section—it may have been at Woodstock. The hon. gentleman says that he preferred annexation to the "miserable policy of gentlemen opposite," and, therefore, he became an annexationist. What was the glorious policy of hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House that he could not stick to it? Was not that a bright idea of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague)? He had not resting place among the Conservatives, and so he detached himself completely from the policy of his whilom friends, for he was rather more of an annexationist than they were. All I do know is that Mr. White has again and again held meetings, and I have read in the newspapers that he said he was in favour of annexation, but by methods that are thoroughly constitutional, namely, with the consent of the mother country. Now, why should not he be spoken against? I suppose if he has recanted and gone back, there will be a great deal of joy in the camp. He will find a resting place there among others who have heretofore declared for annexation, and now find a congenial place in the party of hon. gentlemen opposite. He will, no doubt, be taken back as a man entitled to more than usual honour, because he had given utterance to those views at one time. But I only rose to say that so far as the statement is concerned with regard to Nova Scotia, that the coal deal was the outgrowth of the annexation views of Mr. Longley, the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) might have got more correct information if he had consulted the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen) and some other Conservative members. Why, the chief man in that deal is Mr. White, of Halifax, one of the best Conservatives in Nova Scotia; and my hon. friend Mr. McKeen was a willing party. Now, is it to be said that if American capital comes into this country, the men who accepted it are disloyal? I thought that we invited capital from all parts of the world. How disloyal the Englishmen must be who are buying up millions of property in the United States. Is it disloyal for a man to further his fortunes by making investments in another country? If so, I suspect that there are a number of gentlemen opposite who, I understand, are largely interested in the United States, who are more disloyal than many other parties. That is not disloyalty, it is the widening of commerce, it is the breadth of commerce, that leads men to make investments where they can do so at the best advantage. Let us stop this kind of talk. I thought it was small work when the hon. member rose last night to make the statement he did. Let us in this House take a broader view. Let us acknowledge that, whatever our political differences may be, we are true to Canada, that we have no other interests than the interests of Canada, which have been confided to us by our constituents. We are here to better her condition, to give her freer institutions, to make her people happier than they have been in the past, by trusting her, honouring her institutions, make her better by trusting her sons, although we differ from them. Let us acknowledge that, although their views are in opposition to ours, they are as honest as ourselves. Let us make this Canada better, in fine, by putting out of position those men who cloak themselves round with a miserable loyal cry to cover up their shams and their frauds. Then, alone, will Canada feel that we have men who are loyal because they love Canada, not because they pronounce the shibboleths of party, and who think thereby that they have a peculiar claim to call themselves the only loyal men in the country.

Mr. HAZEN. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) commenced his remarks by asking this House to look upon the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean). This was evidently regarded by the other side of the House as a very refined piece of wit, judging by the applause with which the remark was treated. I looked at the hon. member from York and was unable to see anything ridiculous or amusing in his appearance. Sir, following the example of the hon. member for Guysborough, let me ask this House to look upon that hon. gentleman himself. Whenever he rises to address this House, I look upon him with feelings of pride. In his portly form and manly bearing I see something that the Maritime Provinces should be proud of. Sir, as I gaze upon him, another thought always occurs to my mind, and as I observe the impressive manner in which he addresses this House, and the way in which he looks upon the members about him, whom he seems to regard as pigmies, not only physically, but mentally, I cannot help thinking of the language of Shakespeare, in Julius Caesar:

Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world
Like a Colossus; and we petty men
Walk under his huge legs, and peep about
To find ourselves dishonourable graves.

From his exalted physical and intellectual position, the hon. member for Guysborough should have compassion upon those who surround him, and who do not possess the same advantages that he does. The hon. gentleman, at the outset of his speech, referring to the hon. member for York, said that he always suspected a man who boasted loudly of his loyalty. He does not believe in the loyalty of any man who makes too many professions. I suppose the same thing might be said of a man who boasted too much of his virtue, and of his honesty. I think it was a harsh thing, it was indeed a cruel thing for the hon. member for Guysborough so deeply to wound the feelings of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the greater part of whose speech was taken up with an assertion of his honesty of purpose, of his own goodness, and of the sincerity of the motives that actuated him. So if it is open for the hon. member for Guysborough to say that he suspects my hon. friend from York, that he doubts his loyalty because of his profession of it, although I did not hear him make any very loud profession of loyalty, it is equally open to us to suspect the honesty and sincerity and general goodness of the hon. member for North Norfolk, after having made such loud professions of the same in this House. I thought it was very unfair for the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) who sits behind the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and is supposed to regard him as one of his leaders, to stab him in the back, as it were, in this matter. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is aiming to secure the hon. gentleman's position in the front rank, and he is, therefore, posing as the embodiment of all that is good, pure and virtuous in this country, a position which, up to the present time, has been contended for by the hon. member for North Norfolk, although that hon. gentleman, as was shown by the short extract from a letter which the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) read, is not that broad-minded man he would have this House to believe he was, because he himself took exception to having, as the leader of his party, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), and he told the country he had little hope for the future of the party so long as that hon. gentleman continued to be its leader. That, certainly, was not a broad-minded and elevated position for a liberal-minded and honest statesman to take. It seems to me that the members on this side of the House would resent a charge of that kind brought against the leader of the Opposition as quickly as his followers on the Opposition side of the House. No such narrow feeling should have a place in his breast, and it ill-becomes a man who would put forward that idea and also put forward the idea respecting the machinations of the poetical gentleman, or, as he calls him, the machine politician from Ontario, to stand before this House, and before the country, and flaunt his superior honesty and virtue in the face of the House and the country. Coming down, for a few moments, to the question more especially before this House, I desire to say that I do not now charge, and never have charged, the Liberal party of this country with being a party that were disloyal to British connection. I desire to say, as one who is loyal to British connection, that I cannot bring myself to believe that such a large body of men in this country as are to be found in the ranks of the Liberal party are disloyal to British connection, because I firmly believe that the people of this country are loyal to the core, and any man who openly advocated annexation would take his political life in his hands and virtually sign his political death-roll. But while that is the case, while I am willing to state, and have always stated on every platform, that I believe the great bulk of the Liberal party and of Liberals in this country are loyal to British connection, and that if the party openly urged annexation the people would resent that policy and not support it, yet, at the same time, it seems to me that the party itself are to blame, to a great extent, for having nursed on their breast many men who openly advocate annexation between this country and the United States.

Mr. GILLMOR. Name them.

Mr. HAZEN. I will name one, as the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) asks me to name one. I will name a hon. gentleman who, during the last election campaign in this country, was the leading writer on the principal Liberal paper, a man who, during that campaign, edited the great party organ of the Liberals, a man who furnished the campaign ammunition and the material which the Liberals relied on in order to win the election. I refer to Edward Farrer. The hon. member for Charlotte nods his head. The hon. gentleman may possibly say that Mr. Farrer at one time was a writer on Conservative papers. That is true. But the moment Mr. Farrer put forward views of that sort, he was unable to express them in Conservative papers, but he got his opportunity as editor of the leading Liberal organ, the Toronto "Globe." And so I name that one man, in response to the request of the hon. member for Charlotte. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), who addressed the House, stood up in defence of the Attorney-General of Nova Scotia, Mr. Longley. The hon. gentleman repudiated the idea that Mr. Longley is an annexationist. Well, if Mr. Longley is not an annexationist, then all I have to say is, that I never before so forcibly felt the truth of the remark that language was given to conceal our thoughts as I do at present, because I have read speeches made by that gentleman which seem to bear very closely indeed on the question of annexation to the United States. But further than that, I say that hon. gentlemen opposite, at the last election, unwittingly it may be, advocated a line of policy which to my mind could have had but one result if carried into effect, and that would have been to hand over the control of our tariff to Washington, which in the end must have resulted in political union between Canada and the United States. I do not make this statement in consequence of what any Conservative has said. In support of that contention I will quote, for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite, an authority which I do not think they will dispute, and that is the gentleman who for years was the standard-bearer, the pride, the ornament of the Liberal party of this country, a gentleman who sat year after year in this House, who was a member of the Government of Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who was leader of the Liberal party in Opposition,—I mean Edward Blake. In that letter which Mr. Blake published to his constituents of West Durham declining renomination, and which was not published until after the elections, he took the same view concerning the question of reciprocity as was put forward by the most ultra-Conservative in the land. Surely that is an authority which hon. gentlemen opposite will not dispute. Then we have Goldwin Smith. I do not wish to hold the Liberal party responsible for the utterances of Mr. Smith; but in Toronto he was the intimate friend of Mr. Farrer while editor of the "Globe," and he is the intimate personal friend of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Therefore, while I do not think it is the intention of the Conservative party to charge the hon. gentlemen opposite with being disloyal, yet it seems to me they should be careful of their associates and careful of the policy they put before this country. I do not wish that a charge of dishonesty should be made against them. A great deal has been said by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) concerning what Mr. Springer, the American Democratic statesman, has said. But we have before this House the plain statement made by the Minister of Finance last session, in which he told us plainly that in the conference which took place at Washington between the representatives of this Government and Secretary Blaine and General Foster, now Secretary of State for the United States. Mr. Blaine laid it down as a positive fact, that we need not hope to have reciprocity with the United States, unless we were prepared to give the manufacturers of the United States an advantage in the markets of Canada over the manufacturers of Great Britain, who were their principal competitors there. That was a sine qua non, that was essential to an agreement of that sort, as stated by Mr. Blaine to our delegates to Washington. Further, he told our delegates that the people of the United States were committed to the policy of high protection, and if a joint tariff was adopted, it must be the tariff of the United States. I, therefore, say it is utterly impossible in that position of affairs to obtain reciprocity with the United States. It is the hope of every Canadian, I care not to what party he belongs, that, in view of the change that has taken place in the United States since last election, that with the tidal wave which has swept the Democrats into power, the Democrats running on a platform of freer trade and a tariff for revenue only, when the Democrats come into power, a treaty may be arranged with that country that will give us freer intercourse with them, than we now enjoy, and yet be framed on terms fair and honourable to Canada and that will not endanger her British connection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think it is somewhat lowering the dignity of this House to be compelled to listen to the discussion that has taken place on this subject, and I regret very much the occasion which has caused the subject to be brought up in the House. Had it not been for the remarks of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), I, for my part, would not have joined in this debate. I have never been accused on the floor of Parliament, nor in the press, nor by any person, so far as I know, of being an annexationist, but owing to the many references made in some of the ultra-loyal papers of the Conservative party, in regard to the riding which I have the honour to represent, I desire to take this occasion to explain, for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite, if they are not aware of it already, the serious trend that their action in regard to this matter is taking in the country. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) undertook to deny that a leading and prominent Conservative member of Parliament had announced himself as an annexationist. In answer to that, I have this to say: Mr. Sol. White, a member of Parliament and a prominent member of the Conservative party, called a meeting in the town of Woodstock, in the county of Oxford, and he there delivered a speech of over an hour's duration in favour of the annexation of Canada to the United States. It is dishonest for the Conservative press and the Conservative members of this House to try to slander and misrepresent the leaders of the Liberal party by calling them annexationists because there may be some members of that party who expressed such views, and it would be just as dishonest for me, if I were to say for one moment that the Conservatives of the town of Woodstock, and of the riding which I represent, are annexationists, because Mr. Sol. White, a Conservative annexationist, preached his doctrine amongst them. However, I can say that it was this Conservative member of Parliament, this prominent member of the Conservative party, who called a meeting in Woodstock, delivered a speech in favour of annexation, and tried to initiate, and to raise money to support, an organization to propagate these views in that county. I will say further, that although there was a large number of Conservatives present at that meeting, not one of them got up on that platform and attempted to answer Mr. White, but it was left for the Liberals of that county to speak in opposition of the views of the leading Conservative annexationist. I do not for one moment say that because the Conservatives present did not undertake to refute the opinions of Mr. White, that they were in favour of annexation. I do not believe it to be so, but I do say, that if he did not carry a resolution in favour of annexation, it was owing to the number of Liberals who were present, and I myself took the platform there in opposition to Mr. White. I regret to find, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian politics have degraded so low, that we find men getting up in this House, endeavouring to slander the Liberal members and the leaders of the Liberal party, by saying that because Goldwin Smith advocates annexation, that we, as a party, are responsible for it. I remember the first time that I ever saw or heard that gentleman, and it was on an occasion when he was on a public platform, in company with the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald and many prominent Conservatives. It is to his pen and voice, more, perhaps, than to any other man in Canada, that we owe to-day the fact that we have the National Policy in this country. Will any person deny that? I am informed that that was long after he had given his opinions as a pronounced annexationist. Be that as it may, I say that it would be dishonest for me to insinuate that the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, and his colleagues, and his friends at that time, were disloyal to the country, because they had Goldwin Smith associated with them on the platform. I may say further, that within the last few weeks I met, in the town of Woodstock, a well-known prominent Conservative, a gentleman who, I believe, contested at the convention the nomination from the riding of the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean), who has just spoken; I met that gentleman in the town going around amongst all classes of the people, trying to raise money to maintain an annexation organ in the city of Toronto. Would it be honest for me to state here that, because that gentleman supported the hon. member for East York so strongly in his last election, that the hon. member for York is, therefore, an annexationist, and in favour of these views? I regret, Sir, exceedingly, the occasion for this discussion, and, as a Canadian, and one who desires the best interests of his country, I do hope that one result of this discussion will be to stop this slandering of the Liberal party. I do hope that we shall no more hear such remarks as those used by a member of the Government the other day, with regard to the leaders of our party. If gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House supporting the Government, are honest in their desires for the interests of the country, and wish that we should maintain the position we now hold, they will cease their speeches in the House and on the platform, and stop the articles which are being continually printed in the Toronto papers, accusing the Liberal party of favouring annexation. I trust that they will also realize that, if there is a growing sentiment, and a growing party in this country in favour of annexation, it is they who are creating that party. I speak now for my own riding, and I repudiate altogether, on the part of any prominent Liberal, the action that has been taken in forming a political union club there. I have shown to the House beyond question that the Liberal party has nothing to do with the spreading of these sentiments in the House or out of it, and no man dare contradict a word I say. I wait for an answer. I want to know if every word I have stated is not known to every one of the gentlemen opposite as being actually true. I want to know if it is not a fact that the men who came to my county and formed this organization, and who are trying at the present time to support this annexation party, are not all prominent Conservatives? As a Canadian I regret this state of affairs. It would be dishonest on my part, or on the part of any Liberal in this House or out of it, to accuse the Government or their followers of being annexationists because their political friends hold those opinions. It is equally dishonest for members of the Conservative party to accuse the Liberal party of annexationist tendencies because some individual follower of the Liberal party undertakes to express such views. I do trust that in future we will hear gentlemen opposite discussing public questions on their merits, giving people the right to express their views honestly and sincerely, and fairly, and without accusing them or the Liberal party of disloyalty, or of being traitors.

Mr. TISDALE. Mr. Speaker, I have a very few words to say in reference to this matter, and they will be largely of a local nature. I quite agree with a great deal that has been said by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), but I think that he misunderstood largely the discussion here, or that he hardly put it fairly before the House, if he understood it as I did. I do not understand that a single member on this side of the House has charged the Liberal party with being disloyal. It is true that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) and some hon. gentlemen criticised the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and when I come to deal with him, I will give some reasons why I think that he himself may have in the past afforded good grounds for criticism in this respect. I wish to say here, as I have had occasion to say in my own riding, and as I have always said, that I believe the Liberals in this country as a body are as loyal in every respect as the Conservatives. My experience as a volunteer has extended over many years, and it is but justice to state, that I have found the Liberals on all occasions ready to do military duty for the country in times of peace and ready to take their share in the defence of our country when serious danger threatened us. I say further, that lately, in my own county, I have taken the responsibility on myself in meetings which I have held throughout the riding, to repudiate on behalf of the Liberal party there, certain transactions which have occurred, and in connection with which I have proposed to give an explanation which will afford my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), an opportunity of showing whether he is as sincere, as he states he is, in the professions which he has made to-day. In my riding an attempt was made to make it appear that the Liberal association was in favour of annexation. I have explained it in my riding and I wish to explain it here. In my opinion it was a deliberate fraud on the Liberal association of the south riding of Norfolk. What happened was this. We have in Ontario, as you know, both Conservative associations and Liberal associations for party purposes, largely for the purposes of organization. In the town of Simcoe for some months past, the Reform organ, called the Norfolk "Reformer," has been openly advocating annexation, or what it calls continental union, which is the same thing. It means the destruction of this country as a separate entity, whatever else it may mean. The editor of this paper and his sympathizers packed a local meeting of the Reform association in Simcoe, and got a resolution passed there in favour of annexation. A few days later the Liberal association of the riding was called to meet, and without notifying the association that such a resolution was to be brought up at the meeting, they got it passed there also; and immediately afterwards it was telegraphed all over this country and all over the United States that a Liberal association of this Dominion had pledged itself as a party association in favour of annexation. It was a fraud, because it would have been voted down ten to one if the Liberals of that riding had known that the question was going to come before the meeting and had an opportunity to vote upon it. Now, I make that explanation, and I accept the statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk to-day in reference to his loyalty. It is the first time he has made such an affirmation. I agree with the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) that this is not a matter to be trifled with at all. It is becoming a serious question, and I am glad to proclaim, unless I see greater evidences to the contrary than at present exist, that the Liberal party of this country are loyal; and I am prepared to maintain it. The hon. member for North Norfolk, however, has allowed himself to be left open to suspicion, because of the speeches he has made in Buffalo, in Chicago and in Washington, as reported in the American press—I will not say whether correctly reported or not. But he has left himself open to suspicion and to criticism by those reports, and until to-day has never taken the opportunity of proclaiming his devotion to this country and to the British Crown; and I am very glad to have heard him say what he has. Now, the Norfolk "Reformer," the organ of the hon. gentleman's party in his county, notwithstanding the protest of Mr. Mowat—probably the greatest Liberal local prime minister we ever had—has been for a year past not only promulgating annexation, but the other day the editor of this paper was foremost in forming what they called a continental association there, and also had Mr. Meyers, whom Mr. Mowat very properly dismissed, and Mr. Jury, from Toronto, brought over to Simcoe, to address a public meeting in favour of annexation; and they telegraphed, as they always do, false statements of what occurred in that town on that occasion. And who do you think the editor of this paper is—the prime mover who has been publishing articles week after week in favour of annexation? I will tell you who he is, and then I will call upon the hon. member for North Norfolk to disavow him and his sentiments. I will read from the paper:

NORTH NORFOLK REFORMERS.—The annual meeting of the North Norfolk Reform Association will be held in the Opera House, Simcoe, on Monday, 13th February, commencing at 2 o'clock. A full attendance is requested. John Kitchen, President; Hal. B. Donly, Secretary.

Mr. Hal. B. Donly is the gentleman who runs the paper, and is the right-hand man of the hon. member for North Norfolk, and as yet we have not heard one word of protest against him from that hon. gentleman. I do not know as much about newspaper etiquette as my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean); but I do know this: that if the organ of my party in my riding, in the town where I live, came out in advocacy of annexation—and I, the same as the hon. gentleman for North Norfolk avowed to-day, claim to be loyal and proud of my ancestors and my connection with the past history of this country and of Great Britain—I would not for one day let his articles go unanswered over my own signature in his paper. Until to-day I did not know whether I had a right to call on the hon. member for North Norfolk or not to repudiate the articles in this paper and the man who writes them; but now, after his statements of loyalty made here to-day, in his place in Parliament, I call upon him, in his duty to his county and to his party, to show his sincerity by repudiating this man and his articles, and turning him out of the position he holds as secretary of the Reform association. I have heard that some of the best Reformers in that county say that no longer should this man disgrace the Reform association of Norfolk by being its secretary. I hope it is so; and I call upon the hon. gentleman to now give voice to his own sentiments on this subject. I do not wish to make any further remarks. This is a practical test of sincerity. I maintain, and I shall be always happy to bear my testimony, that the great Liberal party of this country, with the exception of certain disaffected elements, is thoroughly loyal. But I call upon the members of that party in this House to help us on this side of the House in maintaining the integrity of Canada by disclaiming and repudiating proceedings of this sort wherever they have the power or opportunity.

MR. LANDERKIN. It is very nice to hear the declarations of loyalty that are made on the other side of the House. I highly approve of those sentiments. I am very glad to see that we are bringing these hon. gentlemen into line. I do not hear any of them say anything about their colleague Solomon White, nor have I seen any of their papers say anything about him. He is the father of this movement. I do not know whether he was secretly aided and abetted by the Government of Canada; but I have never heard them nor their organs find fault with Solomon White. I like the loyalist party; I like those who have faith in their country and are prepared to stand up in defence of it. I like that kind of loyalty; but I must say that I do not like the boiler-plate kind of loyalty or the thirty-five per cent loyalists—I have not much admiration for them. I like the loyalty that gives to every man in Canada a fair chance and fair-play; any other kind I regard as boiler-plate loyalty, which is one of the industries that this House should not encourage. Now, in reference to Mr. Farrer and Goldwin Smith, every hon. gentleman on that side of the House knows very well that Goldwin Smith, Mr. Farrer, Sir John Macdonald and Nicholas Flood Davin were the fathers of the National Policy. That is no new thing—it is known throughout the land. I will not say that they were all branded with annexation sentiments at that time; but if my hon. friend from St. John, who quotes Mr. Blake, will only read Mr. Blake's letter, he will find that they must have been, because Mr. Blake's view was that the high protective tariff was one of the means of driving this country into annexation. He certainly only read that portion of Mr. Blake's letter which suited his purpose.

An hon. MEMBER. He read all of it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He only quoted a very small portion. The most vital part he omitted to quote. It is well known that the late Sir John Macdonald thought it an honour to have this distinguished Oxford professor, Mr. Goldwin Smith, on the same platform with him, advocating a protective policy.

An hon. MEMBER. A National Policy.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Who calls it a National Policy? It is a destructive policy and a policy that leads to annexation. Let any hon. gentleman quote Mr. Blake on this point. His views are that it is a policy leading to disintegration and annexation. Mr. Farrer was the leading writer on the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite. He prepared their campaign sheet for them, and he prepared it in 1882. He is now writing for American journals, and, the hon. gentleman thinks that, as a journalist, Mr. Farrer has no right to do that. I did not think the hon. gentleman would stab the Prime Minister in the back in that way. Our First Minister argued on the American side in a very important suit. Did any one bring against him the charge that he was disloyal because he did so? Why, then, did the hon. gentleman try to stab his leader, as it were, in his vital parts, on this occasion? His leader is not a traitor nor an annexationist because he pleaded the American side; and if Mr. Farrer is writing for American newspapers, we do not know but that he may be only doing so in the discharge of his duty as a journalist. We do not know whether the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), if he got the chance, would not do the same thing, provided he was paid for it. That hon. gentleman does not rise any higher than his leader, who was, on one occasion, in the employ of the American Government. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) thought he was making a great point when he spoke of something which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had said of our leader, with reference to his being a French Catholic leader; and the hon. gentleman wondered the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) would follow our leader. Sir, we are proud of our leader. We honour our leader, we allow our leader to worship at the shrine he desires. We find no fault with him for that, nor do we find fault with him because he is of French origin. How is it with the hon. gentlemen on the other side? I met one of them when coming down to Toronto, and what did he say? He said they liked their leader very well, but they did object to a Methodist Catholic as a leader. That is what he said, and my hon. friend, before he tells his story again, should not forget the observation made by one of his party to me on that occasion.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Name the gentleman.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am not here to be catechised by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen), a short time ago, it is reported, was so sure of Mr. Costigan being appointed Lieutenant-Governor that he announced to the people of his county that he would soon be in the field again. That may be one reason why now, seeing he did not get that appointment, he seeks to stab the Premier in the back. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) says that we are as loyal as they. I wish I could say in return that they are as loyal as we. But I cannot say that, for nobody who keeps up a policy which does so much injury to the country can be as loyal as we are, who desire to get rid of that policy. And until the party opposite shake themselves free of that policy, which is driving the people into annexation, as Mr. Blake said it would—and he is the authority which the hon. member for St. John now follows—they cannot be called loyal. If they will come and assist us to build up the great industries of the country, for this is a great country with great possibilities, I could then say that they are as loyal as we. How unseemly it does appear to bring up discussions of this character in the House and have these recriminations. Possibly there may be some who think that annexation might be the best thing for Canada. But this is a free country and they should be allowed to discuss the question. At all events, what are we going to do with them? Does the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) propose to shoot them in their tracks if they speak of it? Does the Minister of War propose to shoot his colleague down in his tracks when he advocates annexation? How are they going to prevent it?

An hon. MEMBER. Expel them from the country.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then you would have to get the Minister of War to expel his late colleague, Mr. White. Mr. White has been advocating annexation for many years, and the Minister of War, who has a few valiant warriors in the service, might get them to expel him; but that gentleman has been taken into the councils of the Government, and when Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper went to Windsor, Solomon White was one of the first men on the platform who shook them by the hand. That is the way they expel annexationists. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) is a broad-minded, liberal man. He spoke of his liberality to-day, but when Mr. Blair appointed an Irishman to an office in St. John, I believe he opposed the appointment.

Mr. HAZEN. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understand that not only the hon. gentleman but all his party did that.

Mr. HAZEN. If the hon. gentleman understood so, I simply have to say that he understood what was not true and what is not the case.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Will you state what was the case, then ?

Mr. HAZEN. A few moments ago the hon. gentleman said that he was not going to be catechised by the hon. member for East York. I can equally say that I am not here to be catechised by the hon. gentleman. But I desire to tell him that his statement that I opposed Mr. Blair or his Government because Mr. Blair appointed R. G. Ritchie police magistrate of the city of St. John, is entirely unfounded. Whoever informed him of that informed him of what is contrary to the facts. It is not true, and does not contain a single element of truth.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did you oppose Mr. Blair ? I will just read, for the benefit of the hon. member for St. John, what Mr. Blake said in his letter with reference to the National Policy :

The Canadian Conservative policy has failed to accomplish the predictions of its promoters.

Its real tendency has been, as foretold twelve years ago, towards disintegration and annexation, instead of consolidation and the maintenance of that British connection of which they claim to be the special guardians.

It has left us with a small population, a scanty immigration and a North-west empty still ; with enormous additions to our public debt and yearly charge, an extravagant system of expenditure, and an unjust and oppressive tariff ; with restricted markets for our needs, whether to buy or to sell, and all the host of evils (greatly intensified by our special condition) thence arising ; with trade diverted from its natural into forced and therefore less profitable channels, and with unfriendly relations and frowning tariff walls, ever more and more estranging us from the mighty English-speaking nation to the south, our neighbours and relations, with whom we ought to be, as it was promised that we should be, living in generous amity and liberal intercourse.

Worse ; far worse ! It has left us with lowered standards of public virtue and a deathlike apathy in public opinion ; with racial, religious and provincial animosities rather inflamed than soothed ; with a subservient Parliament, an autocratic Executive, debauched constituencies and corrupted and corrupting classes ; with lessened self-reliance and increased dependence on the public chest and on legislative aids, and possessed withal by a boastful jingo spirit far enough removed from true manliness, loudly proclaiming unreal conditions and exaggerated sentiments, while actual facts and genuine opinions are suppressed.

That is as true history as was ever written of the National Policy. I allow my hon. friend opposite to extract all the comfort he can from the letter written by Mr. Blake on that occasion. I hope that he will get his friends to unite with us in standing up loyally for our country, and in securing a policy which will give this country an opportunity in the race of life, and in the great future which is before it, and which we have a right to expect from the great resources we possess in Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON. I was asked by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) to define my position. I merely wish to say that I have done so at considerable length, and I have nothing to add to it.

Motion agreed to ; and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Penitentiaries—Kingston . . . $190,443.36

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to inquire of the First Minister whether the evidence in that penitentiary case has yet been laid on the Table ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman asked me to lay the report on the Table if I had one, but he did not express any wish to have the evidence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I sent for the report to-day when I came to the House, and was told there was none ; but the evidence has been brought to me.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course, it would be impossible to go over it at our desks.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I went over it myself and extracted certain particulars, as to which I called for further investigation and observations of the inspector. But I can have the evidence here this evening. I was going to explain the causes of the increased cost of maintenance. My attention was called to the fact that we were estimating for, I think, twenty prisoners fewer than we had last year, and that we are asking a larger sum for them. I find the explanation to be this : The clothing for all the convicts is provided at one time, and three years afterwards a complete refit of clothing is called for, repairs being made in the meantime to keep the supply going, and the coming year happens to be the year when the new outfit of clothing will be required. In addition to that, the bedding is replenished, generally speaking, once in two years, and a large supply of that is called for. For clothing and bedding, the additional amount required is $3,580.65.

This includes gray and black cloth, flannel, bedding, blankets, rugs, sheets, night-shirts and towelling. Then, there was a question as to the increased cost of working expenses. The memorandum of the warden explains that in salaries there is a decrease of $1,220, due to the absence of the miller, and changes in the office of accountant and clerk. In the officials' uniforms there is a slight decrease; rations, a decrease of $230; discharge clothing, an increase of $63.25. Convict clothing, much of which was new two or three years ago, is worn out and will require to be renewed. There is a slight increase in the officers' mess. In heating there is a decrease of $820; repairs to building, an increase of $1,106.65. This amount varies from year to year, and is due this year to contemplated roofing and pointing. In maintenance of machinery there is an increase of $9,959.85, being the engineer's estimate for purchasing new pumping-engine and pipe for new water-works system.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice that a different description of clothing is now used for the convicts than heretofore. Formerly they were clothed in a parti-coloured garb, but now in a more uniform garb. What quantity of clothing is required in this vote?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. 13,500 yards. It is procured at the Oxford Mills, in Cumberland county, N.S. It was advertised for, and the lowest tender was accepted and the samples certified to be the best by those who were appointed to examine them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you remember the cost per yard?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. 45 to 50 cents a yard, according to the quality.

Mr. McMULLEN. Were any tenders given in?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Some five or six, I think.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has not an alteration been made in the rations at Kingston Penitentiary, in the shape of giving an additional meal?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There has been no change in the rations of convicts. About a year ago the Government adopted a system of giving the officers on duty a mid-day meal. That is the only change in respect to rations.

Mr. McMULLEN. The minister stated the last time this item was before the committee that the Government had adopted the system of buying flour and had abandoned the mill. What is the value of the mill, when was it built, and how long was it operated?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The mill was in operation about ten years. I cannot state its present value. Considerable repairs and alteration would be required to place it in working order. We invited tenders for the mill, but we have received no offers. The mill is one worked by the old process.

Mr. McMULLEN. What was its capacity when first built?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot tell.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can you state its cost?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is highly desirable we should ascertain the amount the mill cost. It has been built ten years. It unquestionably cost a great deal of money, and I should like to know who was responsible for it, and the amount of service the country received while it was in operation. This should prove a lesson to ministers not to launch into expenditure on works that, in the course of a few years, may prove totally worthless. Probably the mill was built with a good intention, but I should like to know the amount of money the country will lose. In view of the very low rate at which flour can now be secured, it is questionable whether the Government should expend money to renovate the structure in order to meet the necessities of the penitentiary.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The mill was not a very costly one, but rather a small affair, and it was put up in the second story of one of the workshops. It was a project of the late warden, who was very zealous, efficient and ingenious in regard to industries carried on in the penitentiary. I will not venture to say that, at the time it was constructed, it was not a wise course to pursue. For the last ten years it has ground all the flour for the penitentiary, and has occasionally supplied flour to some of the other penitentiaries. During one season, when we were under pressure from a combination of persons tendering, we sent some of the flour to St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. It did good work in its time, but it was a question of expending $1,000 or $2,000 to place the mill in order. Considering the old-fashioned nature of the mill, and the fact that it did not give any employment to convict labour, I thought it was better to abandon it and purchase the flour.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the minister has adopted a wise course. As it is an old-class mill, $1,000 or $2,000 would not go far in repairs. If the minister is aware of the expensive machinery placed in roller mills, he will be satisfied that it is a very questionable expenditure to make over an old mill in order to renovate it, so as to turn out good flour.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does the minister propose to employ the convicts? I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has definitely arranged to relieve the farmer by establishing the binding twine industry.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have ascertained from the warden that there is plenty of work in the way of building and quarrying for the men for some time to come. I still contemplate establishing the binding twine industry there. I find from a letter received since I last spoke in committee on this subject, that the machinery will cost about $20,000. It is expected to give an output of about 5,000 lbs. of binding twine per day of ten hours, and give employment to about forty men. The warden tells me that, excepting among the more feeble class, he cannot spare that much labour at present, because the buildings are not completed. If I go on with the other two structures I mentioned in committee the other night, in all probability we shall have all the employment we need for convicts able to work out of doors.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many men does the farm employ ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. About sixty men. Then we have the quarries, the stone cutting, tailoring, shoemaking and carpentering industries, and then a large staff is required to do prison duty, cooking, and attending to the wants of the prison.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the minister state what material he expects to use in twine making ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not know. If the machinery is put up, I must obtain a skilled foreman to superintend it.

Mr. MULOCK. During the last year or two I have received communications from a convict in one of the penitentiaries. He does not happen to be a personal friend of mine, nor even an acquaintance, but he writes me in my capacity as a member of this House. I understand the Penitentiary Act grants any member of the House free access to a penitentiary at all reasonable hours for inspection purposes. I presume the theory of that is to furnish a check on the warden and officers in charge. I judge from the letter I received from this convict, though he did not say so exactly, that he was under restraint in his communications even with members of this House. During last summer I received a second letter from him, saying he had asked permission to write a series of grievances and that he hoped to be able to send that communication in order that I might bring them to the knowledge of the Government. I never received any subsequent communication from him, and I have thought whether he was under any restraint at the hands of the warden. I think every convict ought to be free to communicate with the representatives of the people respecting any alleged grievance. Whilst they are under restraint, they are entitled to consideration, especially those who are almost without hope, being condemned to the penitentiary for a long term of years. If there are restrictions that prevent a convict communicating unrestrained with a member of the House, I think such restrictions should be removed. Has the minister any opinion on the subject ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They have perfect freedom, and they ought to have, not only as to members of the House, but as to any person in authority, or any person to whom they apply for redress. Of course their communications are read before they leave the prison.

Mr. MULOCK. That is what I object to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have always thought that should be done, but they are not hindered in any way.

Mr. MULOCK. I agree with the minister that communications from prisoners to the ordinary public ought to be the subject of supervision at the hands of the authorities, but I think that this rule ought not to apply to communications addressed to the representatives of the people. The members of this House are indirectly bound to see that justice is done to every person in the country, and the fact that the warden has a right to look at the letter of a convict directed to a member of Parliament must have the effect, as a rule, of preventing a complaint being made. We know that those who guard prisoners are inclined to be autocratic and tyrannical at times, and surely a convict ought to have an opportunity of making unjust treatment known without having to submit it to the knowledge of the warden. Fancy the helpless condition of a prisoner making complaint against a warden when the warden knows of it. Let me ask the minister this : Suppose a prisoner had a charge to make against the warden, would he have to show that charge to the warden before he can forward it to the Minister of Justice ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not know how that is. I know that I insist on the convicts having perfect freedom of communication with me ; and, besides that, every year, unless it is an exceptional year, I visit each of the prisons myself, and have notice given that I will see any person in private who wishes to see me. They avail themselves very fully of that privilege, and the same rule prevails as to the visit of the inspector. Notices are also posted up in the corridors of the prison that no officer is to put the slightest obstruction in the way of the prisoners communicating freely anything they have to say to the officials who visit the prison, from time to time, to inspect.

Mr. MULOCK. So far so good ; but so long as the accused has the right to read the letter of the accuser, so long will these regulations for the protection of the prisoner be valueless. Surely a prisoner should have the right to communicate directly with the Government without the warden inspecting the letter. Any one who has read the history of those who stand guard over prisoners knows that it is the constant tendency of frail human nature to oppress the unfortunates under their control, and in the interest of humanity I raise the point that the minister ought to see that under safeguards prisoners ought to be allowed to communicate with the authorities without inspection. Of course I would not sanction prisoners having the right to communicate freely with the outside world, because that privilege might be abused for the purpose of defeating the ends of justice. I bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice, as I believe that one of the communications from a prisoner, who brought this to my notice, was not forwarded to me. I would ask the minister if that communication could be intercepted?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They had no right to intercept any letter whatever.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the Minister of Justice if there is any reason why the warden should examine letters sent to him, or to his department?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no particular reason. I think, as a general rule, the warden should read the letters that go out. Sometimes these letters contain very offensive matter. For instance, prisoners think that they are at liberty to write letters to the judges and the members of the jury who tried them, addressed in very offensive terms. A prisoner ought in that case be remonstrated with, and not permitted to send the communication. Every prison officer knows that it would be a serious breach of his duty to put the slightest restriction on a prisoner making any complaint.

Mr. MULOCK. The fact that the communication has to be submitted to the warden is a restriction.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The warden knows that the prisoner could have abundant opportunities to complain on the visit of the authorities to the prison, and also when a convict has served his term he can complain to the authorities, if his communications were in any way interfered with, so far as complaints to the minister are concerned. It would be treated as a very serious complaint indeed against the officers.

Mr. MULOCK. When there is a contest between the officers and a prisoner, the leaning is towards accepting the version of those in authority, and perhaps rightly so. There are many grievances that prisoners are subjected to, and many cruelties inflicted by guards, which should be put an end to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have had communication of such from the prisoners themselves.

Mr. MULOCK. The minister will see the risk a prisoner has to undergo in order to do that.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think he had to undergo any risk.

Mr. MULOCK. He would incur the active hostility of those over him.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot see that he would. He would, of course, if the warden were a very unjust man, a man who is willing to take the risk of his office, by tyrannizing, in the first place, and preventing a complaint being made known in the second place. In the case I refer to, the warden forwarded the communication making complaint against his own treatment, or that of one of the guards, and redress was given the prisoner.

Mr. MULOCK. That shows that while one man may have had courage enough to make this charge, sending it through the warden, perhaps a hundred or more hesitated to do so, knowing that it would simply be making their life less endurable than it had been up to that time. At all events, I suggest to the minister that there should be a regulation enabling prisoners to write to some person in authority outside of the prison, without their letters being inspected by the warden.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the point raised by my hon. friend is one of some importance. I can appreciate the objection made by the minister that convicts have been accustomed to write to the judges and jurymen by whom they were tried, very offensive letters which should not be allowed to issue from the penitentiary; but the point raised by my hon. friend strikes me as being a very good one. It also strikes me that senators and members of the House of Commons should have the right to receive letters from convicts without those letters being subject to any revision whatever. I think the indiscriminate enjoyment of such a right might give rise to a good deal of trouble; but I know of no other body to whom a letter could be sent except to the Minister of Justice himself, or his department; and the argument seems to point in this direction, that a man who is labouring, or imagines he is labouring under a serious grievance, should have a right to send a letter to an outside, independent party, who could communicate with a member of the House or otherwise, as his duty prompted.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am glad that the minister has adopted the principle of manufacturing binding twine in the penitentiary. I find that we only receive some $9,000 of revenue, all told, from the penitentiaries. In the case of the Kingston Penitentiary, we have only received $6.67 per capita. We must have something between 1,200 and 1,300 convicts in this Dominion, and I think their labour might be utilized to produce a larger revenue. I know that they do a great deal of labour for which they receive no credit; but I think some value should be placed on such labour, so as to give the committee some idea of the amount of labour they perform, compared with the amount of revenue that we receive as a result of their labour.

It being six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Salaries and Contingent Expenses of the Senate $61,488

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that there is an increase in this item. Will the hon. Finance Minister explain what it is ?

Mr. FOSTER. The increase consists of additions of $50 each to the salaries of five clerks, making $250. These additions are made in accordance with a resolution passed by the Senate.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think any person who reads the items of expenditure in connection with the Senate, as detailed on page B-78 of the Auditor-General's Report, will come to the conclusion that there are great extravagances connected with the management of that department. I think some effort should be made to place its expenditures under the control of some committee, either of this House or of the Senate, so that they will be limited to a certain amount. For instance, last year there is a charge of $169.24 for 1,662 boxes of pens. Now, I do not think any person will say that it was necessary to get such an enormous quantity of pens for the use of the Senate. We have some eighty or eighty-two senators, all told, and, in the name of common sense, what was done with 1,662 boxes of pens ? I would like to ask the minister, under whose supervision all these supplies are bought ? Who is responsible for them ?

Mr. FOSTER. The supplies and expenditures of the Senate are under the control of the Senate Contingent Committee, which, about two years ago, when the late Prime Minister was in charge there, was considerably revised, reduced in number and put into a more workable condition.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do think that if this House is to continue criticising the expenditure of the Senate, some of our members ought to be associated with members of that body in the matter of contingencies, so that we may have some thorough explanation of the different items. What particular necessity is there for 1,662 boxes of pens for the use of Senators ?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say from personal knowledge. My hon. friend will have an opportunity by and by of criticising similar items for this House, and he will find that there is not exactly the same careful use of these items of stationery which there would be in a man's private house or business establishment. These 1,662 boxes of pens were not only for the Senators but for the use of the officers of the Senate, so that you have to add quite a number of officials to the list besides the Senators. Pens are like pens, very easily destroyed, and whether it be due to the bad quality of the ink or of the pens, I know that I cannot use one here more than half an hour.

Mr. McMULLEN. If it is really the fault of the ink, I would recommend the Finance Minister advising where better ink should be procured. With regard to our contingencies, I intend dealing with them when the item comes up. But we are dealing now with the Senate, and I think there should be some effort to cut down the expenses of that Chamber. We all know that it is not overtly popular in the country, and I would like to do it justice. The answer of the hon. Minister of Finance is that these pens are not only for the use of Senators but of officials. In that case, it is unjust to charge them all to the Senate contingencies, because any one reading through the list must come to the conclusion that the Senators are very extravagant. It is not right to throw the responsibility on them when the officials are treating themselves very generously with items charged to the Senate. Some arrangement should be made to adjust matters between the Senate and its officials. I notice that the committee of the restaurant in the Senate get $100. Why is this ?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say. I suppose it must be for some expenditure the committee were under with reference to the restaurant. No doubt the Auditor-General finds it difficult, in these short clauses, to dominate entirely the character of the expenditure. I have found instances of that often. This may not at all mean, and I do not think it does, an allowance paid to the committee, but some expenditure in connection with the restaurant which is thus charged.

Mr. LANDERKIN. There are forty-eight bottles of champagne only costing $17.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think they would use such cheap champagne as that. Probably it means glasses.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are the pages in the Senate paid $50 a session more than the pages in the Commons ? It was so a year ago, and I would like to know if it were so still.

Mr. FOSTER. I will find out for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is there any right on the part of the Senate Contingent Committee to expend more than the amount we vote ? I find in 1891-92 a total paid of $66,586. I do not think we voted that amount. If they can spend $5,000 or $6,000 more than we have voted, they can spend $10,000 or $12,000 more. The main thing is to know if we have an absolute guarantee that the amount we vote will not be exceeded.

Mr. FOSTER. We have not altogether an absolute check in that, as you have not in any department. By our system, the departments are given credit and they draw against those credits, and pay the different items of expenditure; but you cannot find a department, if you search back all the history of the Public Accounts, which does not, in some item or other, overexpend. That will be for various reasons, because in the multiplicity of accounts it may be difficult for the accountant, or the issuer of the cheque, at any moment to say whether his credit is sufficient to pay all the items. He ought to know that, and he thinks that he does, but in some cases there will be some over expenditures. That over-expenditure three years ago amounted to a very large sum. The hon. the Speaker tells me that the amount voted in that year was more than was expended. It happens very often that the expenditure will in some items overrun the amount voted. That will be done under the most careful management, to a limited extent. The extent to which that is done in the different departments, is diminishing every year, because very careful attention is given to it. Looking over the accounts for the last four years it will be found that the overexpenditure has decreased very materially indeed, so that this last year it has been drawn pretty closely down to a minimum. But in this case it appears that the amount voted was greater than the amount expended.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think myself that we vote the amount in a very improper way, because we put salaries and contingent expenses of the Senate in one lump sum; and if half a dozen officials were from any cause not acting, and their salaries were saved, they would be allowed to expend the money in contingencies, because you do not divide it. The Minister of Finance intimates that in almost every department the votes are exceeded from time to time. I was not aware that was the case, because I thought the Auditor exercised such a controlling supervision over the expenditure that he would not permit moneys to be spent which had not been voted for the particular object by the House. I thought he had absolute and arbitrary control, which the House relied upon as being perfectly sufficient to prevent any departmental head or deputy from spending more money on any branch of the public service than the House of Commons had voted. In this particular vote under discussion, the Contingencies of the Senate, I was not aware that the Auditor has the same power with regard to expenditure that he has with regard to the expenditure in the different departments.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Audit Act has been made applicable both to the Senate and the House of Commons, for the purpose of auditing the accounts and keeping the expenditure within the appropriation. It applies just in the same way as it does with regard to other departments of the service.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That being the case, we have some guarantee that the Auditor's supervision will extend over the Senate contingencies as it will here; therefore, I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the form in which he asks the vote. I think the form of the vote is such as to remove any proper control over this expenditure which the House should have. Now, my hon. friend behind me, in the exercise of his rights, and, I think, with the general approval, at any rate, of those who sit near him, subjects the expenditure, not only of the Senate, but of the House of Commons and other departments, to his criticism. He is not only within his right, but I am perfectly satisfied he is discharging a public duty, and he is discharging it satisfactorily and doing good work. But I would submit to the hon. gentleman that if he wants to retain that proper control which the people's representatives should have over such a matter as the contingencies of the Senate, the vote should be divided and the salaries should go for that purpose, and the contingencies by themselves. Then we would be able to see, at the end of the year, whether they kept within the amount or not. I think the great principle should always be kept in view that this House should determine, absolutely and arbitrarily, the maximum limit of the amount spent in any one service; and, when they have so determined, no official or body, whether a Senate committee or a House of Commons committee, should be permitted to exceed that arbitrary sum. But, where you vote a sum in a lump, partly for salaries and partly for contingencies, you remove practically from the supervision and control of the House the very subject-matter on which they are voting.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will see that what he contends for is practically done of late years. We consider ourselves bound, and the Auditor-General considers himself bound, by the expression of the House, as it is given upon the details of an estimate. There may be just one line which takes in the whole of a vote. For instance, as to the Senate, it may be that the details of that vote are given under different items, as in this case. He will see, on page 29 of the Estimates, that this total vote of $61,000 odd is detailed at length, and that is recognized by the Auditor-General, and is recognized by the Government and also by the spending department. So that, under A, you will find the salaries and contingencies for these officers generally, and the amount that is paid for each. That takes the whole of that first part down to the messengers. Then there is the miscellaneous, which takes in what more properly belongs to contingencies. You have the pages, the number is designated; you have sessional messengers, the number is designated; you have a lump sum for charwomen, who may be employed up to the amount of $1,600, the number is not given.

Stationery is limited ; newspapers are limited. Then sundry tradesmen's accounts. Sometimes the amount may come up to that ; sometimes it may not. Senate Debates, also limited. There is an item of $3,000 to meet unforeseen charges ; so that really the only contingencies there which are not named are found in the last line—$3,000 to meet unforeseen charges. That prevents the necessity of detailing the whole in the amount voted, and at the same time binds the expenditure.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The explanation of the hon. gentleman may be all right ; but I want to call attention to the fact that in the Auditor-General's Report, where the expenditure is published, the items are not grouped in this way at all. The expenditure is put under one total column, and it is impossible for any member of the House to see whether the Senate, in its expenditure, has kept within the limit of the several items we voted, or whether it has not.

Mr. FOSTER. That is in the arrangement of the Auditor-General's account.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly. What I want to point out is this : that if the Auditor-General takes care to see that no excess is allowed in the expenditure of the several items, beyond that which we have voted, well and good.

Mr. FOSTER. He most certainly does.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I fear that as long as it is kept within the $61,000, voted generally, he does not trouble his head about the manner in which it is subdivided.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why should not the amount be divided so as to show salaries and contingent expenses ?

Mr. FOSTER. This could easily be done, but of course the question might arise as to what were contingent expenses.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman adopts different modes with respect to the Senate and the House of Commons. He does not vote a lump sum for the Commons as for the Senate. Moreover, there are, in addition to the 215 or 220 members of this House, a large number of gentlemen connected with the press, who practically share in the expenditure for contingencies. In the Senate there are 83 gentlemen, a very small staff of officials and no press representatives.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is there a stationery office in the Senate ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Could not the stationery offices of the Houses be combined ?

Mr. FOSTER. We had a conference some years ago in regard to combining some of these offices, and we did not succeed.

House of Commons—Salaries... $70,666

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How has the decrease been brought about ?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will remember there have been several changes in the staff. Some of the old servants have died, and they have been replaced by other officers at lower rates of salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope it does not mean the superannuation of half a dozen officials.

Mr. SPEAKER. No, we have not superannuated any of the officials, but they have died in the service of the House. There is the case of Mr. Hartney, but that may not have a bearing on the question. Mr. Rivet was an old servant of the House, and reached the maximum—a clerk of French Journals of the first class. He died during the last session of Parliament. In his place Mr. Ouimet was appointed at a salary of $1,450, almost at the minimum of the first class, while Mr. Rivet had been receiving $1,800. Then Mr. Ouimet was replaced by an officer who was in the service of the House, Mr. Tasse, who had a salary of $600, and whom we promoted to the position of assistant clerk of French Journals at $1,000, instead of $1,400 salary, to which Mr. Ouimet had attained prior to his promotion to the position of clerk of French Journals. I may say, however, with regard to this matter, that I cannot promise the House that the whole of this amount will prove a saving. I think it is quite possible we may have to ask the House at a future time to grant a sum for a clerk in the Stationery office, so that the whole of this reduction that appears in the Estimates, nearly $2,000, will not be effected. But we have secured considerable reductions by the changes made in the staff. We have not filled Mr. Tasse's place, to which a salary of $600 was attached, and who was promoted to the position of assistant clerk of French Journals at a salary of $1,000. So in two cases, in the case of the French Journals office, there has been a saving of $350 in the salary of the clerk of Journals, and a further saving of the difference between $600 and $1,400 in another branch of the service ; that is to say, we have promoted Mr. Tasse to the position of assistant clerk of Journals and have not filled his place. There are several statutory increments in the salaries of the different officers. The whole of the statutory increases amount to $1,012.50. Then, there was an addition made to the salary of the deputy-serjeant-at-arms. He was appointed a permanent clerk at $800, instead of $300, as before. Mr. Tasse received an increase of $400, Mr. Clarke, an increase of $150, he occupying the position rendered vacant by the death of Mr. Romaine. The whole of the increases amounted to $2,062.50. The reductions are : Mr. Rivet, $1,800, a reduction in the salary of the accountant of $200, the new officer having been appointed at $1,800, instead of $2,000, and Mr. Romaine's salary of $1,800, giving a total of $3,800, the net reduction being

$1,757.50. But, as I have already said, I am afraid we shall have to ask the House to provide for a third class clerk to place in the Stationery office.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many officers are in the Stationery office now ?

Mr. SPEAKER. There were three, prior to Mr. Romaine's death.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) While Mr. Romaine was not pensioned, it was well known that he did not work for some time.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to point out, in regard to the Stationery office, that the duties of the superintendent of stationery and his assistant are not confined simply to the care of the stationery. They have proof-reading to do, which is a very important part of their work, and the information I have received with respect to that office is, that it would be wise to strengthen the staff, which at present consists of Mr. Clarke and an assistant, who is practically a packer.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Since last session, the accountant and assistant-accountant of the House have apparently been discharged. Will Mr. Speaker kindly state to the committee the reasons why they were discharged ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not the slightest objection to give the committee the reasons why they were discharged. When the accounts of the accountant's office went to the Auditor-General he informed me at once that there was a shortage of over $2,000. I came here immediately. On making an investigation I found that the accountant and the assistant accountant had both taken moneys belonging to the public. I suspended them at once. On further investigation I found that in the public interest they ought to be discharged, and they were discharged, the shortage in their accounts amounting, as the Auditor-General shows in his report, to $2,256.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It was stated in the newspapers that they had overdrawn their account by accommodating members of the House. Is there any truth in that statement ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The statement I saw in a newspaper was that the shortage in the accountant's office had arisen from the fact that members had overdrawn their indemnity; that they had been paid larger sums than the amounts to which they were entitled, and the implication was that they had exercised influence over the accountant for the purpose of obtaining from him money to which they were not entitled. I think the hon. member will recollect that immediately thereafter a contradiction, authorized by me, appeared in the newspaper in which I first saw that statement. So far as the investigation goes, I have no reason to believe that members of Parliament are implicated in any way in the shortage that has occurred in the accountant's office. There is only one case where there is any possible chance of any such allegation as that to which the hon. gentleman has made reference, being true, and in that case the investigation we made led us to believe that the hon. gentleman whose case I refer to was not implicated in any way, and did not receive any more money than that he was entitled to receive.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Has the amount been made good ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The amount has been made good. These gentlemen in the accountant's office gave guarantee bonds for the amount of $5,000 each, and the Guarantee Company has paid the full amount of the loss, $2,256, which has been placed to the credit of the Receiver-General.

Expenses of Committees, Sessional and Extra Clerks $13,600

Mr. HAZEN. I would like to ask while this matter is under consideration, who has the appointment of the officials of the House, such as clerks, accountants, and officers of that sort. The reason why I make the inquiry is, that in the part of the country from which I come, there is an impression that no persons are appointed to the offices in the House of Commons except those who live, as it were, right beneath the shadow of the Parliament Buildings; and that there is not a fair distribution of these offices among the people of the rest of the Dominion. I know there are few officials of the House at the present time who come from the Maritime Provinces; at least there are very few who come from the province of New Brunswick. I would like to know who takes the responsibility of these appointments, and I would like to urge that in the distribution of these favours, other parts of the country ought to be considered as well as the immediate vicinity of the Parliament Buildings.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not quite understand whether the question of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) relates simply to sessional appointments, or to the whole of the appointments. In regard to the sessional appointments, I would state for the information of the House, that I understand the rule to be, that sessional employees are divided among the different provinces in proportion to population. The Maritime Provinces are entitled to a certain number and each of the other provinces similarly. The appointments of sessional clerks were all made when I took the office of Speaker. The impression which is very general, or at least prevails to some extent, that those employees are changed at each session, is a mistaken one. Although they are nominally sessional, they are practically permanent. That is to say, if they have behaved themselves and performed their work properly, they are allowed to resume their duties at the beginning of each session. As a matter of fact, the patronage in connection with sessional clerks, and sessional messengers has been exceedingly limited; there has been none practically since I have become Speaker. I think the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) will find, if he examines the record in reference to sessional appointments, that they have been fairly distributed among the provinces.

Mr. HAZEN. I do not intend any reflection upon the hon. Speaker in connection with this matter, as I feel sure he is disposed to do what is fair. I think the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken when he says these appointments are made in proportion to the population of the different provinces, because with regard to the sessional appointments about this House, I only know of one that is occupied by a gentleman from my province; and that is the office of door-keeper. I know of no higher position, in connection with the sessional appointments, occupied by a New Brunswicker at the present time. I trust that in the future the rule which the hon. gentleman refers to will be observed, because at the present time I do not think it is observed at all.

Mr. SPEAKER. The list I hold in my hand shows that three of the sessional clerks come from New Brunswick, three from Nova Scotia, and one from Prince Edward Island. That makes seven out of twenty-five who come from the Maritime Provinces. I venture to say that is a fair distribution.

Mr. HAZEN. Mr. Speaker is simply referring to sessional clerks, while I am referring to the employees of this House generally. I think if he looks over the list, he will find that in addition to the three sessional clerks, there is one door-keeper and nobody else from the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentleman will see that the Speaker is governed by the last census.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am informed that there are two of the permanent clerks from New Brunswick, and one night watchman in addition to the gentleman already referred to.

Contingencies.....$23,100

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice some items in connection with this vote which require explanation. The cab-hire, in 1887, for Mr. Speaker Kirkpatrick was $173.25. I see that in 1888, Mr. Ouimet drew $65.10, in 1889 $56.02, and in 1890 $208. I see that in 1891, Mr. White drew $199.70 and in 1892 $524. I think we ought to have an explanation with regard to the increased amount.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am quite free to confess that the amount for cab-hire does seem somewhat high. The committee will remember, however, that the item of $524 which the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has just referred to, practically covers two sessions; that is, the session of three months from the 1st of July, 1891.

to the 30th September, 1891, and four and a-half months for the session of 1892. That makes seven and a-half months, which is really nearly as long as three sessions of some of the previous Parliaments.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice in the session of 1890, which was a very long session, Mr. Ouimet's cab-hire was divided in the same way, and amounted only to $208. It is singular that the amount has run so high as it did last year. I believe it to be quite right that we should draw attention to these items. It is not very pleasant, but we have a duty to perform in this matter and we shall not shrink from it. I do not care whether it is a minister, or a speaker, or anybody else, these are items which we have a right to criticise. I dare say the speaker can offer a proper explanation, and we are entitled to it. There is another matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the House. During last session, it was intimated by the Government that twelve days' absence would be allowed a member who was obliged, by necessity, to leave the city of Ottawa, and that no deduction would be made from his sessional indemnity for that period. In looking over the list I am surprised to find some names of members who have drawn a considerable amount of money more than, in my belief, they were justly entitled to. I see, for instance, that Mr. Bryson, who was elected within three days of the close of Parliament, and who sat three days in the House, drew $120 sessional allowance. I would like to understand how that happened. I notice, also, that Mr. Guillet drew his full sessional indemnity. I notice by the Votes and Proceedings that it was not until the House was in session twenty days that the Speaker announced his election, and yet he draws his whole sessional allowance. There were other members who, in my opinion, also drew more than was right.

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose the hon. member does not contend, for a moment, that it is any part of my duty to examine each of the declarations and compare them with the accounts. I am afraid that if the House expects me to do that, it will be somewhat disappointed. The hon. member will recollect that the Act of last session provided for an allowance of twelve days' absence without any deduction being made. The Act reads as follows:—

For the present session of Parliament the deduction of $8 per day mentioned in section 26 of the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, being chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes, shall not be made for 12 days in the case of a member who has been absent from a sitting of the House of which he is a member, or of some committee thereof, during such number of days; but this provision shall not operate to extend the maximum amount mentioned in section 25 of the said Act, nor in the case of a member elected since the commencement of the present session, or shall it apply to days prior to his election.

My first impression of this provision was that, inasmuch as it provides that the deduc-tion shall not be made for twelve days in the case of a member who has been absent from the sitting of the House of which he is a member, those members who were elected during the session of Parliament only became members when they took their seats. As to that, the lawyers of the House and the gentlemen in control of the legislation differed from me, and the decision arrived at was that the allowance should be made for the period from the time the member was elected to the time he took his seat, and I presumed that that rule, which I communicated to the accountant, had been applied to all cases of members elected during the session of Parliament. That was the instruction given to the accountant.

Estimate of Serjeant-at-Arms...$33,732 50

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to see that there is a reduction. How is it effected, and is it likely to be permanent?

Mr. SPEAKER. I can hardly say that it will be permanent. The larger sum was provided to meet the expenses of the longer session of last year. The reduction will be permanent, of course, if the sessions do not extend beyond the limit which has been taken as the basis for these estimates, that is, 100 days. When the session extends beyond that time, we have to ask for an additional sum.

Salaries of the Officers of the Library $17,042 50

Mr. FOSTER. The increases are statutory.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many officers are in the library at present?

Mr. FOSTER. Fourteen.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think there are more officers there than are required. Have the Library Committee recommended that this number should be kept there permanently?

Mr. SPEAKER. The Library Committee have nothing to do with the appointments. Under the statute they are made by the Governor in Council. From my own observation I think all the officers in the library at present are necessary, and in addition we have to provide for two messengers to supplement the regular staff during the session.

Printing, Binding and Distributing the Laws.....$ 12,000

Mr. LAURIER. I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that the distribution of parliamentary documents is very, very slow. This year we did not get the printed sessional papers until the month of January, six months after the close of the session.

Mr. SPEAKER. The distribution began in November. They were distributed direct from the Printing Bureau. I presume no great inconvenience arose from the two or three months' delay in their getting through the bureau without employing extra labour, because we all have our sessional papers with us, although not bound.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Who has the contract now for supplying the paper?

Mr. SPEAKER. The Printing Bureau provides all the paper. The accounts are sent to the accountant here at regular intervals and certified. We have no contract. The House makes no contract for the paper.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is the contract let by the Printing Bureau without tender?

Mr. FOSTER. No; tenders are always called.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Can the hon. gentleman inform the House who holds the contract now?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot.

Printing, Printing Paper and Binding.....$70,000

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What became of the suit entered by the Barber Company for paper supplied outside their contract? They had a suit against the Government for damages.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The matter is under appeal to the Supreme Court from the Exchequer Court.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Last year this vote was utterly insufficient, and we appear to have spent $102,000. What has the Finance Minister to say on the subject of that large excess? Is it likely to recur?

Mr. FOSTER. The session was no longer than usual, and the paper required for "Hansard" for printing generally was, of course, more. B-84 of the Auditor-General's Report gives the various items. The item Queen's Printer, printing, paper and binding, amounts alone to $91,529.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are those chiefly for expenses in this House?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN. I would like to ask, in connection with this item of $7,000 for printing, whether it covers the printing and publishing of agricultural reports?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; part of them. The reports proper are covered by this. The bulletins which are issued monthly are printed out of the sums voted for the farm itself; but the agricultural report comes under the reports of the House and the department.

Mr. DEVLIN. Reports coming under this head are both French and English. I understood the English reports have already been distributed several months, but the French reports have not yet appeared.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not know that until the hon. gentleman mentioned it.

Mr. DEVLIN. Last session I called the attention of the Government to this point. Considerable inconvenience arises from this delay in the issue of the French report, and the literature does not reach the end it should. The French and English reports should be printed and distributed at the same time, as the French-speaking people are certainly entitled to receive their reports as soon as the English.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. There must have been some mistake this year in the distribution, because I have not received a single report, either of the dairy or of the experimental farm. The hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), who lives in the same town as I do, received quite a number of bags of reports and kindly gave me some. I have never received a report, so that, so far as the English and French are concerned, we are about equal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are two or three items here which might bear a little explanation. I notice, among other things, "Engraving map, Manchester Ship Canal, four colours, $195. Printing 14,500 copies for the same, $80." If that be correct, I should like to know what, in the name of wonder, we want with 14,500 copies of the Manchester Ship Canal? It appears to me we might find a better use for our money than spending $300, or thereabouts, for copies of the map of the Manchester Ship Canal.

Mr. FOSTER. If there were 14,500 copies, they seem to have cost but a very small amount, only $80, for printing. There may be some mistake in the number of copies mentioned here.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What did we want of the thing at all?

Mr. FOSTER. You will have to ask some members of the Printing Committee. The member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) is on the Printing Committee, and will probably know why it was ordered.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I think I attended every meeting of the Printing Committee last session, but I do not remember anything being brought up about making an engraving of the Manchester Ship Canal. It is new to me.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has been absent.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. No, I have not been absent. I think it will be found that I have attended every meeting of every committee of which I have been a member in this House, for the last ten years.

Mr. FOSTER. They could not have been printed unless they had passed through the ordinary channel, coming from the Printing Committee and ordered by the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not altogether a satisfactory explanation. If the minister does not know, probably somebody else can enlighten us. I do not myself see that there is much excuse for this business at all. I can understand that the Minister of Railways and Canals might require to have obtained certain copies of that great work, as a part of the contingencies of his department, and I do not suppose that anybody would raise objections to it. But what do we want, in our capacity as a House of Commons, with copies of an engraving of the Manchester Ship Canal? I hope some hon. gentleman who is on that Printing Committee will be good enough to explain what he wanted with the 14,500 copies of that engraving.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is on that committee.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no recollection whatever of this matter coming before the Printing Committee. It may have come in when I was not there: I cannot say that I was at every meeting. While the Minister of Finance is hunting up that matter, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. There was a number of actions commenced against parties, after the investigation before the Public Accounts Committee last year, with regard to irregularities in the Printing Bureau. I think it might be well to find out what became of those actions. They were brought for the purpose of recovering the percentages of which the country was improperly deprived.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The evidence is being taken in them, preparatory to a hearing before the Exchequer Court. Several witnesses have been examined, two of them a few weeks ago. The cases will be ready for hearing, I fancy, within a few weeks.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know if all possible speed has been made to bring to justice those people that were supposed to be guilty of improprieties. It seems to me that a long time has elapsed since those irregularities occurred. It is singular they should be retarded and carried on so very slowly. I do not insinuate that the Department of Justice is responsible, but I would like to know how it is that they have not come to a head before now.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have not done anything whatever to retard them; on the contrary, I am very anxious they should be concluded. I will ascertain at once when they will be ready for hearing.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no information that I can give my hon. friend about the Manchester Ship Canal. I will take means to find out how this item came about. The Clerk now is diligently searching the pages of the Journal to see if he can get trace of it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. In addition to the suit brought by Barber & Co., for indemnity for paper bought from other parties than the contractors, there was a suit entered by MacLean, Roger & Co., who were the Government printers here, for work given out to other printers which should have been given to them under their contract. I would like to know if that matter has been settled yet. I think it was before the Exchequer Court, too.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are three cases, the MacLean & Roger case, the Barber case, and another which stands in the same position. We propose to test the liability of the Crown in those cases, and to test the soundness of the decision of the Supreme Court in the old case of MacLean & Roger and the Queen. In order to do that it will be necessary to carry one of them, at least, to the Privy Council. They must, in the meantime, go through the Supreme Court, and they stand on the docket for hearing next month.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The Exchequer Court, I understand, made an award in both cases.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of course, the Exchequer Judge was bound, by the outstanding judgment in the case of MacLean, Roger & Co., and his decision is in favour of the plaintiffs in accordance with the judging of the Supreme Court. The judgment must necessarily be the same, because they are bound by their own decision. We want to review that before the Privy Council.

Mr. SPEAKER. In the matter of the Manchester Ship Canal, I find that, on the 1st July, 1891, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) obtained an Order of the House for a copy of the report of Thomas Munro, engineer of the Manchester Ship Canal. The Printing Committee, I presume reported in favour of printing the number of copies that were charged for in the Auditor-General's Report.

Archives $ 6,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see a considerable amount of money was spent in the Record Office, London. Does any hon. gentleman know what work was done, how that money was expended, and what particular branch of the English Archives we are getting?

Mr. FOSTER. Historical documents are being copied in London and in Paris.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To what particular section of our history is attention being given?

Mr. FOSTER. That will be found in the report of the Archivist. Mr. Brymner is now in London, and is directing the work personally.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not object to a reasonable sum being expended in securing copies of valuable documents either at Paris or London; but at the same time I should like to know how it is being used. There is a huge mass of documents of all sorts in London and Paris, and much discretion is needed in using the money to obtain the valuable portions.

Mr. FOSTER. The documents copied so far are connected with the history of Upper and Lower Canada. The Archivist is at present making investigations in London into documents respecting the history of the Maritime Provinces, of which he will make a selection.

Mr. FRASER. I suggest the investigation be carried to Boston, where valuable documents relating particularly to the earlier history of Nova Scotia may be found. There is a large collection of original documents relating to the early history of Nova Scotia to be found there. I know there is quite a number in England and in France, but I understand there is a good collection in Boston.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. How many employees are engaged in the Archivist's office in Ottawa?

Mr. FOSTER. There are four employed at the present time.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It appears there is a reading-room in that branch of the service, as well as in the department itself, for the Auditor-General's Report show an expenditure of $88 for subscriptions to newspapers.

Mr. FOSTER. These papers are, no doubt, necessary to the work, and are not common newspapers.

Mr. SCRIVER. Has any better provision been made for the custody of the documents under the charge of the Archivist than was made a year or two ago? The rooms devoted to the purpose at that time were very inadequate; they were too small, not well lighted and in every respect wanting in the advantages which such rooms should possess. Mr. Brymner spoke to me on the subject, and said he made frequent representations, but as yet without result.

Mr. FOSTER. The Archives are kept in the same place as formerly, but consideration is now being given to the matter with a view to having them housed more appropriately, and therefore better kept. In the Archivist's Report of 1891, he details very fully the documents that were being copied, which were documents of the 17th and part of the 18th century.

Mr. McMULLEN. A large amount of money has been spent for copying in London. Was this done under the High Commissioner?

Mr. FOSTER. Clerks are paid so much per folio, and their work is checked at the High Commissioner's office.

"Patent Record" $8,000

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it still considered advisable to continue the "Patent Record?" It may be useful to some persons, but I do not think it is necessary in the public interest.

Mr. FOSTER. The "Patent Record" must be published. It contains the cuts of all devices that are patented, and it is necessary to have those published.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What is the revenue from the "Record?"

Mr. FOSTER. The revenue of the Patent office is $77,000 annually.

Statistics $ 2,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does that take in the Year-book?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is no census expenditure this year?

Mr. FOSTER. The statistics are collected and very nearly all compiled, but there is some little trimming to be done yet.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Lately I have seen some severe criticisms in the newspapers of the country in regard to this Year-book. I have not had an opportunity of examining it yet, but I see that in some of the Toronto papers it was asserted that this book was published now, more as a justification of the policy of the Government than as a simple record of facts and figures. If that is the kind of publication it is degenerating into, I do not think it would be advisable for the House to vote the item. It was generally supposed heretofore, that this book was an authority that could be relied upon by both parties, and by the public at large; but if it is hereafter to be made a campaign sheet for the benefit of the Government to justify their National Policy, and their general policy, I do not think we ought to be asked to publish a book of that character. I do not say of my own knowledge that this is a fact, but I have seen several lengthy and severe criticisms in the Toronto journals with regard to this publication.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice that there have been some criticisms in one or two journals about it. What I know of the book, I only know from my looking at it each year. I consider it a very valuable book, and I do not think it has a political bias at all. It is a compilation of statistics, and any of the figures which I have had reason to verify I have found to be very correct. The only political bias that there could possibly be, would be in the reading matter, in explanation of the statistics, but I never noticed that. My hon. friend has no doubt read it and will be able to base his own judgment upon it. I do not think the criticism is fair.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It only requires a cursory examination of the book to see that it is written by a man whose object it is to uphold one particular system of Government at the expense of the other, I examined the book with some little care on one branch of statistics I was engaged in collecting, and as the hon. gentleman says, so far as the figures were calculated in the columns, they were correct; but where they told against the policy of the Government, which the compiler of the book was endeavouring to support, he took care to give what he thought to be an explanation of that. The shipping statistics in that book are lamentably short. There are a great many figures, which are right enough so far as they go, but almost always, in the few subjects I had occasion to examine, when the figures told against the policy which the compiler evidently wanted to support, he put in a paragraph trying to explain it away. The other day, while in the library, I called the attention of an hon. friend to the matter, and I do not think that such a proceeding is proper or right on the part of a public official. He ought to be satisfied with giving the figures and letting us draw our own conclusion. In a matter of a controversial nature, which affects the two great parties in the state, where he publishes the figures which tell against his party, he ought not to add a postscript or explanation for the purpose of doing away, as far as possible, with the effect of these figures. People outside take this book to be a strictly official compilation and something that they can rely upon. I say that it is not. He does not give all the figures which, on many occasions, are moved for in this House year after year, and in cases where, he ought to know, the figures are necessary for public men. Take the sample question of pig iron, which is being discussed throughout the length and breadth of this land. You cannot find out from that book how much pig iron was manufactured in Canada since we commenced to give a bounty, nor can you find how much bounty is paid year by year on pig iron. You will find one year given, and its figures do not correspond, in the year he gave, to the annual estimate. He does not give any figures at all, which can be used by those who are opposed to what is called the National Policy, in order to show that it is not beneficial but detrimental to the country. I consider it, in many respects, a useful book. There is no doubt whatever that it collects a large amount of valuable information, but I consider it an exceedingly partial book. It is an excellent book, if it is compiled as a party book, but as an official publication in which the public ought to feel satisfied they would get all the facts, it is a failure.

Mr. FLINT. I think there is considerable justification for the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Davies). It has been a matter clear to those who wish to study up the history of the Dominion, that the book is partial and biased. I beg to say, with all deference to the greater experience of those who are at work on this book, that a great deal which they have published in it might very well be omitted, and a great deal they have omitted might be inserted in the book with advantage to the public.

I think many of the interjected remarks might very well be omitted. For instance, I notice throughout the book, after a page or two of very excellent statistics, carefully gathered and well stated, the compiler proceeds to draw comparisons and to make statements which simply fill so much space, and are not necessary to make the statistics any plainer or more obvious than they are, such remarks as this: It will be observed that in such and such a year a large number of certain transactions were recorded, and that a certain other year represents the smallest value," and so on—a mere rehash of the facts which were accurately stated on the previous pages. Now, in attempting from this book to study the records of the Dominion and to compare them with the records of other countries, the very fact you are searching for is apt to be omitted. As an illustration of the want of care apparent in various portions of the book, I will refer again to the statements regarding the savings banks. If there is any one subject of more wide and general interest than another in the Dominion, it is to trace the growth and progress of our savings institutions and to note, if possible, the savings of our labouring people in connection with our fiscal and economical legislation. I do not, of course, hold to the view which is sometimes urged that the savings bank deposits are always an index of the progress and prosperity of the labouring people of the country; at the same time, they may be found useful in connection with other information. Now, we cannot find from this book what the proportional savings of our people are. The compiler gives us the number of offices, the number of depositors, the amount on deposit, the average amount to each depositor, and the average amount per head of the population in the post office savings banks; but in the case of the Government savings banks, which represent about the same amount of money, these very important particulars are omitted, and consequently the inquirer is completely at sea, and I do not know where he could lay his hands on such information. There is no information given as to the amounts of the various deposits or the difference between the smaller and the larger deposits. This is an instance that I cite by way of illustration, because it came more forcibly to my own mind than other cases, and I hope that in future issues the compiler will devote a page or two more to that very broad and important subject, so that the student of our progress may see in this financial barometer how the country is moving in that regard.

Mr. HAGGART. Where would the compiler get the information you speak of?

Mr. FLINT. I do not know. I think he should apply to the proper department of the Government. I think we are entitled to that information.

Mr. HAGGART. He can get the information as to the post office savings bank, but the other is not published.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is brought down to the House time and again.

Mr. HAGGART. Not the details which the hon. gentleman asks for.

Mr. FLINT. This may be, to a certain extent, the reason it is not included, so far as the compiler is concerned, but it is no reason to give to this House. I think those figures should be given. I think the Government should place them in the hands of the representatives of the people. There is not a gentleman on that side of the House who would not gladly have that information to throw light on the questions which are discussed before the country. Take another item as an illustration of the point I make. The compiler, having referred to these savings, in this inadequate and partial way, proceeds to refer to the savings of other countries, and to draw comparisons between them and the Dominion. So far as he goes he is probably correct; but with the vast mass of information at his hands, and with the staff of officials cognizant with this subject under his control to codify the information, I very much regret that he has not given us the information on this subject from other countries. The only countries whose savings he gives are the United Kingdom, New South Wales, Tasmania and Victoria. This is very inadequate information to give to the public on this important subject, when he has at his disposal the fiscal returns of all the states of the Union, the British Islands and the various countries of Europe; and this information could have been tabulated on one or two pages of this book, and it would have been of great value, importance and interest. I call attention to these particulars because they impressed themselves on my mind more than others. I think the book could be greatly improved by making more attractive and complete and elaborate the statements which it professes to give as to the Dominion of Canada, and by making the statistics with reference to other countries as full and complete as the information at the disposal of the compilers would enable them to make them. Then, we should have a book of almost inestimable value—one which every member of Parliament would prize, every journalist would have at his elbow, and those students throughout the country who are endeavouring to qualify themselves to follow public affairs intelligently, would appreciate and admire, and one which members on this side of the House would have no occasion to condemn in the slightest degree as being partisan or partial in its complexion, which I fear is too much the case with the volume which I hold in my hands. I fear that, to a large extent, its remarks have been, not so much designedly as accidentally, of a partisan character. Whenever figures present a view apparently hostile to the position of the present Administration, there are explanations made which we on this side do not admit, and which have been combatted, and successfully combatted on this side of the House as being unfair explanations of these various phenomena. I hope that in a year or two, this book will be improved, as I think it can be, in a way to make it one of the most useful works that can be placed in the hands of the people of the country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Let me quote one sentence to show that the compiler was blassed in the preparation of this book. As the last speaker has said, this is a work which not only should be made valuable for reference here but for information abroad, and ought to be a work reliable in every sense. I will read just one paragraph, on page 415, with reference to savings banks deposits :

The decrease in the number of depositors, together with a decrease in the average amount to the credit of each account, would seem to imply that the withdrawals have been made by the wealthier depositors, leaving the savings more particularly of the working classes, for whose benefit these banks were specially intended. In that case it is fair to assume that the condition of the working classes has been materially improved of late years.

I contend that the compiler had no right to make any such statement. A large proportion of the people of this country are convinced that the condition of the working classes has not been improved of late years, and that is the question which divides the two political parties in this House and the country. The compiler of this work had therefore no right to abuse his position in order to display his political bias in a work which ought to be free from political discussion, either on the one side or the other. There are many other paragraphs in the book of a similar character, and evidently the compiler thought that one of the main objects of the work was to sustain the Government in its policy. It is not a purely statistical record at all, and I am astonished that an official, with these duties to discharge, should indulge in such remarks.

Mr. McMULLEN. On page 134, the gentleman who compiled this work undertakes to prove that the condition of the people of Canada is very much better than what it was years ago. He endeavours to do this by stating that the quantity of sugar now used per head is in excess of what it was in former years, and likewise the quantity of tea. He says :

The consumption of tea and sugar per inhabitant has been generally considered one of the best standards by which to judge the condition of the people, it having been found that the consumption of these two articles indicates more clearly than almost anything else their well-being or otherwise ; and judging the condition of the inhabitants of Canada by this test, it will be found that there has been a steady and satisfactory improvement. In 1868 the consumption of sugar was 15 lbs. per head.

That was when sugar was at its highest.

Mr. FLINT.

In 1877, it was 23 lbs. per head, and it is now no less than 45 lbs., an increase of 22 lbs. per head in the last fourteen years and more than double the quantity consumed in 1877.

We know that sugar has decreased in value very considerably in those years, more than one-half.

As far as information is available it would appear that the per capita consumption of sugar in Canada is larger than that of almost any other country with the exception of the United Kingdom and the United States, a fact that speaks well for the condition of the working classes in this country. In the United Kingdom the amount averages about 75 lbs. per head, having increased from 15 lbs. per head in 1840; in the United States the consumption is about the same as in this country. The consumption of tea in Canada has also very largely increased, in 1868 it was 2 lbs. per head, in 1877 it was 3½ lbs. per head, and is now something over 4 lbs. per head. In England the consumption averages 5 lbs. per head.

This is not at all a fair conclusion, because four pounds of tea in use now would not cost anything like what two pounds would cost in 1878. The compiler is therefore leading his readers astray, by trying to prove by the increased consumption of tea, that the people are better off. Tea is now selling at 20 cents to 30 cents per pound, and in 1866 it sold at $1.05 to $1.10 per pound, so that two pounds then cost a great deal more than four pounds would now. This shows the one-sided character of the production, and, as has already been stated, this jug-handled production for the purpose of bolstering up the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is unworthy to be called a statistical report. If we desire to prepare something similar to the publications in England and the United States and the Australian colonies, we had better get up something that cannot be assailed, as this one has been by the public press, and is now on the floor of this House. It is a record of no credit to the gentleman who undertook to get it up as an accurate statistical record of facts and figures connected with the business of the country. It has been compiled with the one-sided view of bolstering up the policy now in existence. I have read over very carefully like charges made in the newspapers in the city of Toronto with regard to the irregularities and imperfections and political bias of this work, and I have noticed that the journals favouring the Government have not at all attempted to deal with those criticisms, as they would have done had it been possible to refute them. In a work of this nature, every single item published should be literally true and be able to stand the severest criticism, and every item which cannot stand such criticism ought to be carefully eliminated before the work is put in the hands of the printer. Such a work would be a credit to us, but a one-sided production, such as this, got up with the evident purpose of vindicating the policy of the Government, is simply disgraceful.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In order to justify a remark I made a moment ago, that from a very cursory examination of the book, I thought the compilation was one-sided, I would call attention to paragraph 544 :

Iron and steel have so completely superseded the use of wood in the construction of ships that the demand for wooden ships is reduced to an extreme limit, in consequence of which the ship building industry in the Maritime Provinces, which used to be a flourishing one, has almost died away, and it does not seem probable that it can ever be revived, the decline having been caused by a cessation of demand owing to a change of material, and not through depression of trade or any causes consequent upon the policy of the Government of the day or within their control.

Why, the idea of an official compiler going into an argument to show that an industry which was once flourishing and has now become nearly extinct, has declined, and then going on to show, that although it has declined, it is not owing to the policy of the Government or to any cause over which they have control. A stronger speech could not be made by the most violent partisan in the House. That is a paragraph which struck me, as I glanced over the book. Then, hon. gentlemen here are alwas anxious to know what bounty we pay, for instance, on beet-root sugar. There are no statistics accessible, that I am aware of, which will enable you to find out what bounty we pay. Of course, you can go to the Public Accounts, and if you are pretty well conversant with them, you will find the sum deducted from the amount of customs returns, a lump sum. In the same way, you will find that the bounty on pig iron is $30,000. In that way a man can figure it out, I suppose, how many tons of pig iron were produced. One would imagine that in a matter of that kind, the compiler, in order to give the country information, would have put down from year to year a comparative statement since this pig-iron duty and this beet-sugar bounty had been paid, showing how much was paid in each year, in order that we may know whether the bounty paid for the production of beet-root sugar has had the desired effect, and in order that we may know whether the bounty paid on pig iron has been productive of the results predicted when that bounty was first voted. Nothing of the kind is done here, and the reason, in my humble judgment, is because the payment of that bounty had lamentably failed to produce any of the results that were predicted, because, as a matter of fact, instead of increasing the product, that product has gradually but surely declined from year to year. And that is the gentleman who pretends that he is giving an outside and fair statistical abstract of the condition of Canada. I say that in these regards, at least, and in others that I have not studied closely, he fails to give any fair or square statement at all.

Mr. FOSTER. It is more easy, I suppose, to criticise a book than it is to make one. I have no doubt that in taking up a statistical record of any country under the sun, we would find some points in which we might think it could have been improved, and we might find some statements with which we would not agree. I do not agree, for instance, with the hon. gentleman in the view that all we should have in that would be simple statistics. I think it is important that besides having simply the dull columns of statistics, there ought to be a fair explanation of those statistics, because they help one to understand them, and make the book more readable, as otherwise, not one person in fifty would ever take it up at all. I agree with my hon. friend, too, that it ought not to have a political bias. I am fair enough to say that that one item which he read looks to me as if the compiler went just a shade too far. But I cannot find any fault with the other items which have been read. Now, as regards the pig-iron duty, I noticed myself that it was not in. In going over it, I had actually been looking for the returns of the pig-iron production, and I remember thinking at the time that I wished it had been in. I will take care that the matter is mentioned to the Minister of Agriculture and see that it does get it in. With reference to the bounty on beet-root sugar, I imagine that is one of the things that the statistician has not caught up to, because it has only been two years in operation. But I am quite sure that in neither of these cases were these figures kept out of the book because it was supposed they would militate against the policy which had been adopted by the Government. I think it is impossible for a statistician to get everything in the book, and every individual reader will find some omission that he may wish had not been made. I will call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to these two points: I think they ought to be included. Mr. Roper, who compiles that book, is a very diligent and painstaking man, and, I am sure, only wishes to procure the most reliable statistics and to have the book generally made so that it will carry its own warrant on its face. The discussion which has been had to-night will, no doubt, be read by the minister. I will call his attention to it personally, and, if any improvements can be made in the book, it will be done. For myself, I have found it very valuable. Whereas one would otherwise have to go over dozens of documents, and go to a great trouble and expense to get the information he wants, he finds it here in a compact and readable form.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Just to emphasise this matter, I will read another extract, which will be found on page 297. Now, if the Finance Minister will just follow me, he will see that this page would make very good campaign literature for his party :

As regards exports, the United States took $10,917,357 worth, of which $6,616,630, or 61 per cent, comprised exports of horses, eggs, barley and potatoes. The trade in horses with that country is falling off very much, owing to an increase in the home supply as well as to the great reduction in the demand. It is very probable that this will result greatly to the advantage of the Canadian breeder, for while buyers in the States will always give a good price for a good animal, there was a ready market, principally for horse-car service, for all kinds of animals, without reference to soundness or quality, which has induced a large amount of careless breeding among farmers, in Canada, and the country is now filled with a lot of unsound animals that are practically unsaleable.

This man ought to be appointed Minister of Agriculture. I think if we had him in this House probably he could make some speeches that would tell in favour of the Conservative party. Then he goes on to say :

The trade with Great Britain has increased rapidly during the last 18 months, and if farmers will only pay more attention to quality, and breed only from sound stock, they will soon find in England an infinitely more profitable market than the United States could ever offer them.

That is just what the Conservative party have been contending for, and the Liberal party have been contending that the English market is not as good a market for horses, barley and eggs as the United States market, which is contiguous. He goes on to say :

The total number of horses that have been exported from this country since Confederation, is 328,122 ; 315,463 have gone to the United States, 6,700 to Great Britain, and 5,986 to other countries. The total number imported during the same period, principally for the improvement of stock, is 42,255. Horse-breeding prevails more or less generally in Canada, but it is made a special industry in Alberta, Northwest Territories, where it is rapidly becoming of importance, and it is expected that in a few years a large number of serviceable horses will be available. Though, owing to the jealousy of British agriculturists, the Imperial Government has discontinued, for the present, the purchase of horses in Canada for the army, there is not much doubt that the demand will be ultimately revived, and it is to be hoped that Canadian farmers will enjoy the interval in profiting by the advice and remarks of the officers sent out to purchase, with reference to the style of animal required, so that when the time does come again, as it inevitably will, a far larger supply will be found available than was the case in the first instance : and even if the animals thus produced are not required for the army, they will be found greatly improved for general purposes. The market is sure to come, and there is likely to be much money made out of the trade.

That is campaign literature in the true sense of the term. Then he goes on :

The export of eggs and barley to the States are falling off, and, as already mentioned, the trade in these articles is being gradually transferred to Great Britain. The export of potatoes during 1890-91 were very large, owing to the failure of the crop on the other side, but there is no permanent demand for this vegetable, the imports of potatoes into the States having ranged during the last five years from 8,200,000 bushels to 880,000 bushels. The duty would appear to have checked the export of hay, which is a matter for congratulation, as the export of hay is as injudicious and harmful as the export of store cattle. There was an increase of $3,988,343 in the value of exports of farm produce to Great Britain.

Now, I think any unprejudiced man will conclude, after reading these extracts, that as a statistical record of Canada, the book has not been confined to the proper limits. I trust that the minister will put a curb upon the compiler of this book in future, and that he will turn out a statistical record in reality, and not a campaign sheet in favour of the policy of the Government.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). We have been told that it is more profitable to ship horses to the old country than to the United States. At the present time, however, there is a larger number of horses exported to the United States from Canada than to Great Britain. I was told by a gentleman who has exported a large number of horses from Canada, and who has been here during three summers, that he will not ship any to England the coming summer as the market was low. Let me say that from my experience the United States offers the best market for our good horses. American buyers purchase our best horses in Huron county and are at the present time sending them to Chicago. We obtain better prices for our horses when purchased for that market. It is all nonsense to tell a Canadian farmer that it is not injurious to impose high duties on horses entering the United States. Let any one go through the country and hear the complaints of the farmers with regard to the fraud perpetrated on them in respect to two-rowed barley and they will learn something of the condition of our agriculture. Many of our farmers have been utterly ruined by the advice they received to grow as much two-rowed barley as possible for shipment to the English market. I asked the Government to complete the experiment and secure one or two buyers to take this barley and place it on the market. I knew it would prove a failure, for this was not the first time it had been attempted. Let me say, as a farmer, that while the English market is a good market, one we cannot afford to do without, yet for barley, horses, eggs and sheep, the United States is our best market, it is the market we have used in the past, and if we could return to the old conditions, it would pay well. I hope the statistician will not attempt to guide the people, for he will in all likelihood lead them astray, but I trust the Government will exercise control over that officer, and instruct him to publish the facts and allow the people to draw their conclusions for themselves.

Mr. SPROULE. I am surprised at the statement of the hon. gentleman, that the United States is the best market for the eggs and cheese of Canada.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I did not say cheese ; I said sheep.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Does not the hon. gentleman know the difference between cheese and sheep ?

Mr. SPROULE. The witticism of the hon. gentleman is only equalled by his logic—neither is very acute. I understood the hon.

gentleman to mention cheese. I think the information we have received of late affords very strong evidence to the contrary with respect to eggs, because we are sending a large quantity of eggs to the old country and finding a valuable market there. No longer ago than the past season I was told by one of the largest exporters of Canadian eggs that the prices realized during the past year and the year before in the old country, made it profitable to buy eggs here and ship them.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am surprised to hear the hon. gentleman's statements, in view of the fact that men in Ontario have lost fortunes in shipping eggs to England. While there is abundant evidence of the failure of these shipments, hon. gentlemen opposite persist that the exporters are making money out of the shipments. A number of men made honest experiments in that direction, being anxious, if possible, to evade the 5 cents per dozen duty charged on Canadian eggs entering the American market, and every one, not even the most pronounced Tory, will dare to say that it has been profitable to ship eggs to England.

Mr. SPROULE. Name the party referred to.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will name Mr. Wilson, of Seaforth.

Mr. SPROULE. Is he not still shipping?

Mr. McMULLEN. That gentleman will tell the hon. member that it has been a most unfortunate speculation on his part. Then there is a man at Orangeville who has shipped to the old country, and he has pretty much lost all he ever owned. Hon. gentlemen opposite, like the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), will persist in speaking of the advantages which these men possess in being able to ship to England. It is a pity that the hon. gentleman had not invested himself, for now he would have nothing.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman is not well informed. I have it from Mr. Richardson, brother-in-law of Mr. Wilson, that the eggs he shipped to England realized a fair profit, that he was satisfied with the shipment, and he intended to continue the trade in the future.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I had a letter not long ago from Mr. Wilson, whose transactions in this line of business amount annually to nearly $300,000. At that time his views were not those expressed by the hon. gentleman opposite. Up to that time he had not made a profit. If any shipper deserves to make a profit, he does, as he has shown great enterprise and energy in trying the experiment.

Mr. SPROULE. He has not been bankrupt as the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He had not made any money until within a very recent date. There are strong reasons why under no conceivable circumstances can we ship eggs 3,000 miles as profitably as we can to a neighbouring country. That fact the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) may see for himself. It may be possible. I hope it will prove possible, to be able to sell a specially selected quality of eggs, sent under very special conditions, but I do not believe it will ever be possible to replace the trade we formerly enjoyed with the United States to any extent and to any advantage.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) thought I said that Mr. Wilson was bankrupt, he is utterly in error, for I said nothing of the kind. He is a decent, respectable and responsible man. He has, however, lost by the speculation of shipping eggs to England.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I desire to refer to a fact or two with respect to the exportation of eggs from my county. Mr. Wilson is the largest exporter of eggs in the country, a man who ships one and a half million dozen eggs every year. He told me during the last few weeks that he could afford to pay the duty to New York, Boston or Buffalo, sell his eggs there, and realize as much as he receives on the English market. Some time ago he shipped a car load of eggs to New York, and also one to Great Britain. The eggs he sent to the British market were specially collected and packed. Those sent to New York were gathered from the farmers, and yet he realized in the American market four cents a dozen more than in the English market, although for that market the eggs were chosen. He told me, and he is a man who knows what he is talking about when he is speaking about eggs, that although the English market is an unlimited one for Canadian eggs, it is not the market that pays the highest price, because the Canadian eggs are not fresh when they arrive there. They are sold to sell again, and any person will understand that from the time they are laid to their arrival on the English market no less than five weeks elapse, and therefore, when they come into competition with eggs from the continent they are regarded as stale eggs, and realize a price accordingly. We send Canadian eggs to the United States market, and they get there in a few days and realized the highest price as fresh eggs. Any person who understands the egg trade knows that you cannot send eggs three or four thousand miles and realize upon them as much as you could by sending them within a few days after they are laid, to the large cities of the United States, where there is a large demand for fresh eggs. It is just as well for hon. gentlemen opposite to understand and acknowledge this at once, instead of trying to thrust it down our throats that you will get as profitable a market in England as in the United States. Mr. Wilson says that if the McKinley tariff were removed, he could pay the farmers at least 3 cents a dozen more for their eggs, which on one and a-half million, the collection of which only covers two or three counties, would mean $45,000 more than he could under the operation of the McKinley Tariff. That would be so much benefit to them if he had the freedom of the United States market, rather than being compelled to send to the English market.

Mr. SPROULE. I would ask the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) one question: What induced Mr. Wilson and his partner to put cold storage in three vessels, and to engage space for the whole shipping season if they did not find the English market profitable? The hon. gentleman has told us that it is not a profitable market, and that Mr. Wilson admitted he could pay 3 cents a dozen more for eggs if it were not for the McKinley tariff. Why did not Mr. Wilson pay that much more for the eggs when the McKinley Bill was not in existence, when we see that the prices are, comparatively speaking, the same in the two markets? If you compare the prices in England and New York and here, you will find that they are very much the same as they were here before the McKinley Bill was put on.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). My hon. friend evidently does not understand the first principles of political economy. When he states that we are getting as much this year as last year, he is simply begging the question, because the conditions of the market this year and last year are not the same, and, therefore, you cannot compare two incomparable things. If the hon. gentleman wishes to know whether we are getting as much under the McKinley Bill as before, let him take this rule, which is the only one by which he can judge whether the duty affects the Canadian prices or not. If the hon. gentleman turns up the market reports previous to the passage of the McKinley Bill, he will find that the margin of difference between the price of eggs, in the cities of Toronto and Buffalo, was two or two and a half cents a dozen. That two and a-half cents a dozen covers freight, commission or insurance; but if the hon. gentleman now looks at the margin of difference between the price of eggs in the cities of Toronto and Buffalo, he will find it to be from four and a-half to six cents per dozen. The same elements are in to-day as before, namely, freight, commission and insurance, and what makes the difference of 3 cents a dozen more of a margin than previous to the passage of the McKinley Bill? No person can answer that question, only in one way, and that is the other element which comes in, namely, the duty which we pay to enter the United States market. To compare the prices in one year, with the prices in the other, is only begging the question because many circumstances arise which alter the price on either side of the line. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) asked why did Mr. Wilson put in refrigerators at his own expense in the steam-boats? It was because he was shut out from the American market by the McKinley Bill and was forced to find another market, even if that other market was not so lucrative to him. He, therefore, went to the expense of getting refrigerators to send the eggs to England, in order to overcome the duty. You must bear in mind also, that nearly all the small eggs have to be taken out from consignments to the English market, or you cannot sell them; but you can sell the mixed eggs in the United States market for as much, if not for more, than you can sell the large eggs in the English market. These are facts which should be patent to every man who professes to understand the question.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to make a remark in answer to what was said by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald), who stated that the eggs sent from Canada to the English market cannot compare favourably with eggs imported into England from the continent. I may say that when I was in London a short time ago, I happened to go into one of the very largest and best known retail establishments in the West End, where they are very particular as to the quality of the goods which they sell. I had some conversation with reference to cheese, as I found that while I was in Belfast, there was a curious ignorance as to the difference between Canadian and Yankee cheese, and I had some conversation in this establishment in London in reference to the difference between Canadian and Yankee cheese.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman means what is called American cheese. I presume?

Mr. McNEILL. I had made use of that word to avoid confusion. We will say American cheese. I found confusion over there, when we used the word American cheese, because Canadian is American cheese also. I had some conversation with regard to Canadian and American cheese, and I found that this establishment recognized distinctly the difference between the Canadian and American product, and I was told that they only purchased Canadian cheese, which was vastly superior to the other, and that they did not purchase the American cheese at all. In fact, he said: it had only a nominal value on the London market. As I was coming away the gentleman with whom I was speaking, said: As you seem to be interested in Canada, I dare say you would like to know that we have been handling Canadian eggs. I said I would like to know very much about that, and he said that they had given very great satisfaction, and that they were of the very best quality. I asked him if Canadian eggs compared favourably with the continental eggs, and he said: very favourably indeed. I think that disposes of the theory of my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald), in so far as his contention is concerned in reference to the inferior quality of Canadian eggs in the English market. As to the duty, I was rather surprised to hear him demonstrate in the most positive way that we did not pay the duty of three cents of which he spoke, because, he said, the difference between the price in Toronto and Buffalo had been, before the passing of the McKinley Bill, three cents, which was the cost of freight and commission, and he also stated that the difference now was six cents, and that this difference of three cents was the duty. That is to say, that the people of the United States now pay three cents more per dozen than before the McKinley Bill, and he went on to say that this additional three cents was the duty paid by the Canadian farmer. But if that is the case, then the people of the United States are paying the duty. If the people of Canada were paying the duty on the eggs they sell, there would not be that difference in price, because the duty would be taken off the price paid to the person who sold the eggs here. The hon. gentleman has proven that the duty, to the extent of three cents, is added to the price of the eggs to the consumer in the United States.

World's Columbian Exhibition. $25,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I presume the hon. gentleman is in a position to give us some reasonable amount of information as to what he has done with the vote of $100,000 last year, and also what he proposes to do with the present sum?

Mr. FOSTER. I find that there was a vote of $5,000 or thereabouts for 1891-92, and that the amount was expended in that year. For 1892-93, from the 1st of July to the 31st of January, $42,963.40 were expended, making a total expenditure up to the 31st of January of $47,972.54. The amount voted in the main estimates for the current year was $100,000; the amount asked for here is $25,000, making the total $125,000. But I think the exhibition as a whole, will cost something more than that; how much I do not know.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I would like to ask if a commissioner has been appointed in place of Professor Saunders, who, I understood, had resigned on account of ill health.

Mr. FOSTER. There has been no one appointed commissioner in place of Professor Saunders.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to say to the Government, that, along with a number of other Canadians, at the invitation of the Columbia commissioners, I visited the inauguration of the World's Fair. Naturally we made inquiries as to where our Canadian commissioner was and where his office was, and I then learned for the first time, with very much regret, that Mr. Saunders had no office in Chicago, and that if Canadians wanted to meet that gentleman they might meet him at some of the corners of the streets. I was given to understand that instead of stopping at a hotel he was living at some boarding-house, and it was impossible to find him. I very much regretted that while all other nationalities were represented in the procession and had a place in the programme, Canada was not represented at all. It would have been an excellent thing for our Canadian Government, even if the visitors had paid the cost themselves, to have had some carriages placed at their disposal, so that they could have taken part in that procession. I think that the Government, in making an appointment of this kind, should appoint a gentleman who would have the power and position of a Minister, because this is an exhibition at which Canada will be competing, not merely with the United States, but with the world. At the Philadelphia exhibition the exhibit of the educational system of the Province of Ontario was the finest in the world, and I have no doubt it will occupy the same position at the forthcoming exhibition. Therefore, I hope and trust, for the sake of Canada, that a gentleman will be sent there as commissioner who will have power and ability to meet not only Canadian visitors, but people from all parts of the world, and give them all the information they require regarding Canada. We are proposing to spend $125,000, and I do not begrudge that amount. I think, not only as to our educational system, but as to our minerals, fruits and other products, that our Canadian exhibition will on the whole be as good, if not better, than that of any other country in the world, and I hope that for the sake of this Canada of ours, a gentleman will be appointed commissioner who will do credit to Canada as well as to the exhibition.

Mr. FRASER. I would like to ask if Prof. Saunders is there now?

Mr. FOSTER. He is not. Mr. Larke is acting and doing the work of supervising at present.

Mr. FRASER. But Mr. Larke is here.

Mr. FOSTER. He is here and there, backwards and forwards. He is doing whatever work is necessary to be done.

Mr. FRASER. I think I can congratulate the Government that, on matters that will not be on exhibition at any rate, they will have in Mr. Larke, a man who will be able to talk against the best Yankee. This is a large vote, but if it is not enough, I, for one, would be willing to vote any sum consistent with our ability that would be necessary to enable us to show our neighbours just what we can do. If there is work there to be done, Mr. Larke ought to be there so that Canadians visiting the exhibition would know where they might go, and where information about Canada would be disseminated. This exhibition will afford an excellent opportunity for Canadians in the United States to learn, after a few years' absence from Canada, just where we are. Our nearness to that country should put us in the first place, I believe in a place superior to that of any nation in Europe except Great Britain. So I hope the Government will see that the man appointed as commissioner shall be a suitable man, that he shall be there all the time, and that no expense shall be spared that we can afford to make the best possible show.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is it not a fact that Mr. Larke found great difficulty in many places in inducing the manufacturers of Canada to send exhibits to the Chicago World's Fair? Some of the manufacturers with whom I am acquainted signified to me, and to Mr. Larke also, that they did not care to send their exhibits there at all. In fact, I think some of them refused altogether. Judging from what I have heard, I think there are great doubts as to whether Canada will make a good exhibit in that line.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there is something in what the hon. gentleman has said. That feeling was encountered in the initial stages of the work of procuring exhibits: but there is no doubt now that there will be a good exhibit made by the manufacturing industries of Canada. We have had more applications for space than we have had space to give. So that, although naturally arising and existing to a certain extent, I think that feeling has passed away, and nothing now stands in the way of an excellent exhibit of our manufacturing industries. The same is true as regards the general exhibit. I am sure, from conversations with Mr. Saunders and afterwards with Mr. Larke, that Canada will not be ashamed of her exhibit. Every care will be taken by the minister in charge and by the Government that a suitable commissioner shall be appointed. A building is being erected commensurate with our position—not a very expensive one, but still a very good building—as the headquarters of the Canadian delegation, the Canadian officers and the Canadian exhibitors, although not a house in which to exhibit our products, which will be divided amongst the exhibition buildings and will take their places with exhibits of like kinds from other countries. Every care will be taken that proper officers are there, and everything will be done to make the exhibition a success. I am glad to hear from my hon. friend opposite that he would not object to a vote of almost any amount. I think we ought to make a good exhibit, but not an extravagant one, one which would be representative both in quality and size, and I am sure that is what the Minister of Agriculture is aiming at.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the Government will be held responsible by the people and the House for the exhibit which Canada will make. The people expect that the display shall be as creditable a one as a reasonable expenditure of public money can make it. It is desirable from all points of view that Canada should put her best foot forward. I would like to know whether an office is open at the grounds now, where Canadians can obtain official information with regard to the exhibits and the exhibition?

Mr. FOSTER. It is just about finished.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is no office where any intending exhibitor, or other person, can apply for information at present.

Mr. FOSTER. They will apply to the department here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think there ought to be one there. It is a matter of serious regret on both sides that Mr. Saunders' health should have broken down. He was generally appreciated as a man fit for the position. I quite agree with my hon. friend behind me, that a suitable man should be appointed in his place, but I do not wish to see that place filled by a mere political nominee, as a reward for past political services. It is an office which should be filled by just such a man as Mr. Saunders, a thoroughly practical man, who can do thoroughly practical work. The people are prepared to approve of the expenditure of any reasonable sum to make our exhibit a thorough success, but they desire certainly the appointment of the head of the department and his subordinates to be, as far as possible, free from political favouritism and that only practical men should be named. Unless that be done, we run the serious risk of not having our exhibit properly attended to and of, perhaps, being made a laughing-stock.

Mr. EDGAR. Does the chief burden of the commissionership now rest on Mr. Larke's shoulders?

Mr. FOSTER. He is acting.

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose his time is paid for and it is all occupied?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. EDGAR. I am a little surprised at that, because I rather think Mr. Larke is engaged in stumping the country.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so.

Mr. EDGAR. It is only a short time ago when I met him on the platform myself in North Hastings at the nomination. He was there with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the member for North Hastings. He made a very strong speech on the platform, to which I replied, and he was a most strenuous partisan, as it was very proper a stump speaker should be. It surprises me a little to hear that his whole time is paid for, and that the whole responsibility of this important matter of the exhibition is resting upon his shoulders while he is going around stumping the country. I suppose, with the precedent of Sir Charles Tupper before him, who came out here on the stump while he was in the employ of the Government, Mr. Larke felt he could neglect his duties in connection with the fair.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is quite in error in supposing that Mr. Larke was stumping the country since his appointment as acting commissioner. He has not been, I am sure.

Mr. EDGAR. When was he appointed?

Mr. FOSTER. I think he was appointed to act in Mr. Saunders's place probably three or four weeks ago.

Mr. EDGAR. The nomination I refer to was probably three or four weeks ago. Was not Mr. Larke engaged on that commission before that?

Mr. FOSTER. No; he was engaged on no commission; but he had been engaged visiting the manufactories and different industries and soliciting exhibits. He had been employed in the early part of the year at that work.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At his own cost and charges?

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So that the result is, he was to all intents and purposes a paid agent of the Government, stumping North Hastings. We all know something of Mr. Larke, at least all of us who have taken any share in political contests. He is an ordinary political heeler, and a very unscrupulous one, and his appointment is about as unfit a one as could be made for this important position. I have no desire to grudge any reasonable amount the Government may require to make our exhibit a success. It is emphatically one of those things, which, if done at all, ought to be done well; but I must say there is no man on this side of the House and no person we represent who has any confidence whatever in the fitness of Mr. Larke for this important appointment. It is to be regretted that the Government could find nobody but an unscrupulous political hack to discharge a duty, the proper discharge of which will involve a great deal to the people. Most undoubtedly if our exhibit is not in all respects what it should be, the Government will decidedly have to bear the blame of having put this very important work in the hands of such a person.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to impress on the Government the necessity of having a proper individual to see that our stock is properly handled at the fair. Stockmen in Canada labour under great disadvantages at present. For instance, the Americans will not accept a single animal from Canada from any of our registers, but require them all to be registered in the books of the United States, and I am not aware it is yet settled whether they will accept cattle from our registers in Canada. It is most important that we should have an individual, well posted with respect to the registration and bringing out of the best class of animals. On the effect that the stock of Canada will make at this exhibition, the position of our farmers will depend in a great measure, as regards their making as good sales in the future for breeding purposes as they have in the past. I hope the Government will employ an individual thoroughly posted with respect to stock of all descriptions.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Canada having decided to take part in this exhibition, it is of the greatest importance that our display should reflect credit on us, and with this object it will be necessary to spend a considerable sum of money. The House is willing to vote a generous amount but would like to have the assurance that the expenditure of that money will be so managed that Canada will receive the credit she is entitled to. We are not exhibiting there with the view of magnifying any other country but our own. We look upon it as an advertisement of what Canada is able to do; we are voting this sum of money in the expectation that it will come back in an indirect way to Canada, and that it will promote its trade and commerce. I think it is absolutely necessary that, having gone into it, we should lose no legitimate means within reasonable bounds, of making an exhibit that will be a credit to us, a credit to us as a people engaged in different lines of manufacture, as a people possessed of a rich agricultural country, and as a nation possessed of great, and I may say, almost inexhaustible fisheries. While I wish to make no charges against any one because of their political views—because I do not hold that the Government shall not employ any one who has been known in political life at all—but that they should base an appointment upon the fact of a person taking part in political matters upon their side, viewing his merits from that standpoint alone, would be a very serious mistake, and I trust they will do nothing of that kind at all. It would be a very great mistake indeed in a matter of such supreme moment to Canada, if politics had anything to do with the appointment. Mr. Larke, who has some knowledge of manufactures, I believe, who is a fair speaker—if it be a fact that he is occupying that position, as a member has pointed out, and is engaged in doing political work, it does seem to me that it is something that ought not to be countenanced by the Minister. It has been likened to Sir Charles Tupper taking part in the campaign here. It does seem to me that the whole time and attention of the individual should be given to that matter, that he should be supported by an efficient staff, and that the money that Parliament is ready and willing to vote should be expended to the best advantage. For my own part I believe that Canadians, if they are led to take an interest in it, as I believe they are, if they bring out, as I trust they will bring out, their full strength, we will have an exhibition there that we may well feel proud of as Canadians. But it will be a thing to be deprecated, a thing to be deplored, if anything should happen to mar that in any way at all. I have ventured these remarks in order to impress upon the Ministry the importance of the point that is brought under their observation. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if himself or any of his colleagues found it convenient for them to accept the invitation to be present at the opening, and to manifest by their presence their interest in this exhibition.

Mr. FOSTER. I was absent myself.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Was any of the hon. gentleman's colleagues present at the opening?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think any members of the Government were there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has any interim report been brought down of the expenditure of money, or of the steps taken?

Mr. FOSTER. There was a small report; I received a copy of it two or three days ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is important that an interim report should be made to the department and communicated to the House, because I agree with my hon. friend behind me in thinking that it is a matter of first rate importance to us, and that it will be an extremely deplorable thing if our exhibition on this occasion is not a good one.

Mr. FOSTER. A report has been made; I do not know whether it has been distributed to the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was it laid on the Table?

Mr. FOSTER. I think so.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is a matter of regret to many Canadians who visited the opening of the exposition at Chicago, that Canada received no official recognition there. In the procession, in which representatives of all nations were present, Canada had no place.

An hon. MEMBER. Were you there?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I was there, but I was not in the procession. I was not an official. It was a matter of surprise and a matter of pain to those of us who believe that Canada is the best country in the universe, to find that Canada did not occupy her proper status, the status to which she was entitled by reason of her wealth, and her population, and her intelligence, alongside the other nations of the earth. Her commissioners were not to be found. There was no member of the Government, and no official there to represent them. But I understand that Mr. Saunders was not well. I have nothing to say against Mr. Saunders. I believe him to be a splendid man for the position, and would give more satisfaction than, perhaps, any political supporter or active politician is likely to do. I think that if we are going to make this exhibition worthy of Canada, if we are going to appear there to compete in the eyes of the world, we ought to make Canada show to a good advantage. If we do not, if it is the intention of the Government to minimize the exhibits, if it is the intention of the Government to belittle Canada in the eyes of the world, if they do not want her to take any place or to occupy any status among the people of the earth, why, then, let them act on that position; but if they intend that Canada shall occupy her proper place, they should have a gentleman there who will command the respect of our people, irrespective of party, and who will secure the support of the business men of Canada. If we are going to do it, let us do it right, and not pack the office there with political heelers. Let it be packed and managed by business men. Let our Government follow the example of Mr. Cleveland, who has said that, in the formation of his cabinet he was going to appoint business men. So in reference to the management of our exhibition, let business men go to Chicago, let business men represent us at Chicago, and then our exhibit will be a success. But if it is to be entrusted to heelers, to those who support the Government, and who are paid electioneering agents, you are going to dis-affect the largest manufacturers and the largest producers, probably, that we have in this country. It was expected that Canada would have some place where Canadians could rally, that some office would be opened by the Canadian commissioners where Canadians could go and make enquiries and receive directions in reference to the opening. Nothing of that kind was done. I am not complaining for the sake of complaining. I was kindly treated while there, receiving an invitation, though not through the Commissioner, receiving a ticket to go to the opening though not through the Commissioner. I was unable to find, during the time I was there, where the commissioner's headquarters were, and of the Canadians who went with me, and a large number went with me, not one of them, I believe, had an interview with the commissioner. One of them, a gentleman from Toronto in connection with the Industrial Exhibition, told me he had written for an appointment with Mr. Saunders. I think it was, and he said he had received a reply that Mr. Saunders would meet him at the corner of 14th Street and Michigan Avenue. Now that is a position that I, as a Canadian, did not like—that the representatives of the Industrial Exhibition in Toronto should be accorded an interview with the commissioner on a corner of a street. I did not think that Canada had got so poor as that. Has the National Policy brought us to this? If so, we had better withdraw this $100,000 and not appear there at all. If we are not going to make it worthy of Canada, let us drop the item altogether. But if we intend to make it an exhibit worthy of Canada, so that our products will compete with those of the whole world, in the various industrial branches, let us make it a success; otherwise strike out the item and let it go. Do not have our commissioner making an appointment with gentlemen engaged in the Industrial Exhibition, on the corner of an avenue and another street, when we should have an office and a place where they can go. I do not know but that the Controller of Customs had this in his mind the other night when he was speaking about giving a vital blow to Canada in the back, because I do not think it is anything else. I won't say a word about Mr. Saunders, because he was ill, but the management of our affairs in Chicago, at the time of the opening, was something that struck Canadians as humiliating. I say this with more pain than pleasure. I declare that it was to many Canadians a source of deep regret to see the way the thing was managed at the opening.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will the Minister state what the various provinces are doing? Are they all working harmoniously? Are they working separately, or are they working in conjunction with the Dominion commissioner in this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. They are working in conjunction with the Dominion.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). All the provinces?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does the hon. gentleman know how the expense is divided, or what particular share of work is assumed by each province?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot quite state the modus operandi. The expense of the exhibition so far as collecting and selecting exhibits by the Dominion authorities are concerned, will be borne by the Dominion Government. Some of the provinces, however, have resolved to make special exhibits of their own, and the expense of collecting and selecting those exhibits will be borne by the province itself. I was not quite accurate in saying that all the provinces are working in unison. Manitoba is making a special exhibit of its own. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia,—New Brunswick at least, are not doing very much in the way of making distinct displays, although exhibits from those provinces will form part of the general exhibit of the Dominion at Chicago.

Mr. GIBSON. Is it the intention of the Government to retain Mr. Larke in the position of commissioner?

Mr. FOSTER. He is not commissioner. There is no commissioner at present. Mr. Larke is doing the work that is necessary for the time being.

Mr. GIBSON. Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a commissioner?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. What salary is Mr. Larke receiving at present?

Mr. FOSTER. He is paid so much a day, $5 a day, I think.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I find in the Auditor-General's report that he is acting as assistant commissioner, at a salary of $5 a day, and $3 a day living allowance.

Mr. FOSTER. That is correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. It will not be safe to appoint Mr. Larke except by the day, for we will, no doubt, expect to get through the work in time to take an active part in the elections.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it only fair to tell hon. gentlemen opposite, that I expect to deliver the Budget speech next week, and I shall be able to state the time definitely in the latter part of the week.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 8th February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. LARIVIERE, from the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present session, presented the second report of the said committee, which is as follows:—

The committee have had under consideration a communication from the Chief Reporter of the Official Report of the Debates requesting the temporary appointment of a stenographer to replace Mr. Thos. J. Richardson, one of the members of the reporting staff, who, owing to injuries received, has become incapacitated for the present from performing his official duties.

The committee, with a view of keeping up the efficiency of the staff, recommend that Mr. A. C. Campbell be appointed to perform the work until such time as Mr. Richardson is able to resume his duties.

The amount of the remuneration to be paid Mr. Campbell for his services to be subsequently determined by the committee and reported for the approval of the House.

Report concurred in.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 19) intituled an Act respecting the Hamilton Provident and Loan Society.—(Mr. McKay.)

Bill (No. 20) to amend the Act to incorporate the Buffalo and Fort Erie Bridge Company.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Bill (No. 21) to confer certain powers on the corporation of the municipality of the town of Calgary.—(Mr. Davis, N.W.T.)

SEDITIONOUS AND UNLAWFUL ASSOCIATIONS AND OATHS.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 22) further to amend the 10th chapter of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada respecting seditious and unlawful associations and oaths. He said: This Bill is one which was introduced last session by the former member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). In the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada there is a general Act respecting seditious and unlawful associations and oaths, the last clause of which provides that the said Act shall not extend to the meetings of any society or lodge held in conformity with the rules prevailing among the societies of Freemasons, "provided such society or lodge has been constituted by or under the authority of warrants in that behalf, granted by or derived from any Grand Master or Grand Lodge in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland." The masonic lodges in the province of Quebec were, therefore, exempt from any penalty under the Act. Subsequently, however, the Grand Lodge of Masons of Canada was formed, and in 1865 the Legislature of the old province of Lower Canada enacted as follows:—

The words "or Grand Master or Grand Lodge of Canada" are hereby added to, and shall follow the words "Great Britain and Ireland" in the 9th section of the 10th chapter of the Consolidated Statutes for Lower Canada, intituled: An Act respecting Seditious and Unlawful Associations and Oaths.

That is to say, the Legislature of the old province of Canada exempted not only the masonic lodges acting under the jurisdiction of Great Britain and Ireland, but also the masonic lodges under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Canada. Then after Confederation the Grand Lodge of Quebec was formed, and the intent of the present Bill is to extend the same exemption to the lodges in the province of Quebec, which are now acting under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Quebec.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WITNESSES AND EVIDENCE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 23) respecting witnesses and evidence. He said: This is the Bill which was under the consideration of a joint committee of both Houses at the last session of Parliament. The report of the committee was in favour of the Bill somewhat modified from the present Bill. I have thought proper to introduce the Bill this session in a larger form, in order that the whole subject may be submitted to investigation and consideration of members.

Mr. LARIVIERE.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

TYPE-SETTING MACHINES.

Mr. LEPINE asked, 1. What has been the cost of the type-setting machines in use in the Government printing office? 2. What has been the quantity and price of the lead and antimony used during the year 1892? 3. What has been the amount of wages paid to operators of the said machines, engineers and others employed, in 1892? 4. What has been the cost of repairs, and the outlay for oil and other articles needed in the operating of the said machines, in 1892? 5. What work has been done and what has been the approximate value of such work, in 1892?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. The cost of the type-setting machines has been $27,036.26. 2. The quantity of lead used was 1,700 lbs. at 3 cents, $51. The quantity of antimony was 205 lbs. at 14½ cents, $29.73. 3. Wages paid to operators, engineers and others, $3,039.21. 4. Cost of repairs, &c., $140. 5. Work done up to 31st December, 1892: Members' speeches, Civil Service examination papers, several lots of mail lists, library catalogues for Kingston Penitentiary, Mohawk Hymn Book, promotion examination papers, Military College examination papers, three emigration pamphlets, meteorological report, World's Fair pamphlet, Senate "Hansard," book of tables of wages, collection of Orders in Council. Value, $2,331.07.

CANADIAN SHIPPING.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, What was the total registered shipping on the 31st December, 1892?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Complete returns are not yet in. I expect to have the answer in a week or ten days.

EMPLOYEES IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. MULOCK asked, 1. What is the total number of persons employed in the permanent Civil Service of Canada? What is the total annual amount of their salaries? 2. If members of the North-west Police are not included in such number, then what is the total number of persons in such last-mentioned service, and what is the total annual amount of their salaries, and allowances and payments on account of the police.

Mr. COSTIGAN. With regard to the number of employees and salaries, that will be found in the list now being made by the Queen's Printer, which I hope to lay on the Table in the course of a day or two.

Mr. IVES. With regard to the second clause of the question, the total number of persons, of all ranks, in the North-west Mounted Police service, is 923. The annual amount of their salaries, including scouts, guides and interpreters, is, approximately, $310,000. The total expenditure for Mounted Police service for the current fiscal year will be, approximately, $675,000.

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN CAMPBELLTON AND GASPE BASIN.

Mr. JONCAS asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates this session a sum sufficient to improve the mail service between Campbellton and Gaspé Basin?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think we must give the usual reply, that we cannot anticipate anything in regard to the Estimates until they are prepared.

FISHERY OFFICER FOR BONNE ESPERANCE DIVISION.

Mr. JONCAS asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint another person in the place of Mr. W. H. Whitely, as fishery officer for Bonne Esperance division, from Checatica to Blanc Sablons?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The question is now under consideration of the Government, who are awaiting a further report from our officer on that subject.

LIGHTHOUSE AT POINTE AUX ANGLAIS.

Mr. GIROUARD (Two Mountains) asked, To whom has been awarded the contract for the building of the lighthouse at Pointe aux Anglais? What was the amount of the tender? What are the names of the sureties furnished by the contractors? When must the work be completed? How many visits were made to the works by the inspector of the Department of Marine? What was the date of his last visit? In what condition did he find the works?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The contract for the building of the lighthouse at Pointe aux Anglais was awarded to Richard Abbott, of Ottawa. 2. The amount of his tender was $1,775. 3. His sureties were Mr. Edward VanCourtland Wright, mine owner, of the city of Ottawa, and Mr. William Henry Maguire, farmer and contractor, of Stittsville. 4. The work, according to contract, should be completed on the 15th March, 1893. 5. Inspector made four visits, but he remained a fortnight at one time at the works, and at other times two or three days. 6. The date of his last visit was the 4th November, 1892, and he returned to Ottawa on the 8th. 7. After the inspector's arrival at Pointe aux Anglais, on the 4th of November, he found that the contractor had stopped work. Seven complete courses on the pier were down, and the eighth was down on the nose. The height of the sides of the pier is 10 feet 7½ inches, and of the nose, 11 feet 5 inches. The ballast floor had not been put in at the height specified. The stone had not been placed in the pier. The inspector had the timber piled and made arrangements to have any stone left by the contractor placed in the pier before the water should rise. The contractor was notified that steps would be taken to insure completion of work in a reasonable time.

SALARIES OF COUNTRY POSTMASTERS.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in view of the small salaries now paid to country postmasters, for the duties performed by them, to take into consideration the advisability of adopting a different system from that by which these salaries are at present determined?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not the intention of the Government to adopt a different system from that at present in force for the payment of salaries to the various postmasters.

SCHEDULING OF CANADIAN CATTLE BY UNITED STATES.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Whether the Government has any official information as to the action taken by the United States Government in providing that Canadian cattle imported into the United States shall be subject to quarantine for ninety days; and if so, at what time the regulation will go into effect, and at what points on the American frontier quarantine stations will be established?

Mr. FOSTER. The Canadian Government have not been officially informed respecting the action of the Washington Government in relation to quarantining Canadian cattle on entering the United States. It appears, from the terms of the public proclamation, that the embargo has been imposed on account of the fact that Canadian cattle have been scheduled in England. Buffalo is the only point named where Canadian cattle can enter the United States.

CAPE TRAVERSE HARBOUR.

Mr. YEO asked, Has a petition been received by the Department of Public Works from the inhabitants of Cape Traverse and vicinity, Prince Edward Island, asking for improvement of the harbour at that place?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. On 4th January last, a petition was received at the Department of Public Works from the inhabitants of Cape Traverse and vicinity, praying for a grant to make as good harbour accommodation at Cape Traverse, Prince Edward Island, as now exists at Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick.

DUTY ON CORN.

Mr. POPE moved :

That it is expedient to place corn on the free list.

He said: This subject has been so often discussed in this House that there is little to add to the remarks that have been made on former occasions. But since the time it was last discussed, those who are interested more particularly in securing free corn in Canada have been placed in a much worse and more difficult position than they occupied when the subject was before the House in 1890. Since that time an embargo has been placed on our cattle by Great Britain, and also at a more recent date a quarantine has been placed on our cattle by the United States. I do not think that it is a matter of so much consequence as the English embargo, in view of the fact that our shipments to the United States are small, compared with those to the British market. I do not make this motion as a vote of want of confidence in the Government. I move it simply because I believe it is in the interests of the farmers of Canada, especially those of the eastern provinces. Possibly, from having spoken on the question on the other side in 1890, some hon. members may fancy that I should offer some apology for my present position. If such an idea prevails in any quarter, I am not going to satisfy any hon. gentleman's curiosity in that regard. All practical men agree that if we intend to hold our own as farmers in the old sections of Canada, where the land is becoming exhausted by continuous cropping, we must adopt a higher system of agriculture and become, not only producers of raw material, but producers of manufactured articles, beef and mutton, and leave behind the manureal value of the crop, in order to maintain the fertility of the soil. This fact should impress itself favourably on our minds, when we remember that we are developing in the North-west a vast country with a fertile soil, where it is possible to produce grain crops at a very cheap rate compared with the old sections of the Dominion. If we are going to continue to raise grain to any extent in the eastern provinces in competition with the western country, it can only be done by maintaining the fertility of the soil, and that fertility can only be maintained by feeding on the farm all the products, and if the market warrants it, by bringing in other food from other sections of the country and keeping a larger number of cattle, if possible, on the same number of acres. By adopting these measures, we anticipate that it is possible for us to farm and still compete with those western farmers who are raising grain, for the simple reason that it will be some time before they are able to perfect cheese, pigs and beef, while we are able to perfect them in a very short time in this section. Consequently, if we have the cheapest possible food, we can produce beef, butter and cheese, all meats and products of the cow.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

more cheaply and advantageously than in the west, and possibly be able to make our farms pay in the eastern sections. Before the embargo was placed on our stock entering England, it was possible for us to send there cattle of any character we saw fit. Not that I believe it was wise in the agricultural interest that we should send very small and exceedingly lean cattle to that country, but I think it was advisable that our farmers should feed our coars- grains to their cattle for export, and send them over to be finished off as beef, as the English market might require. But now every animal exported to that country must be killed at the port of landing, and our shippers must come into competition with the exporters of the corn-fed cattle from Iowa and Illinois. Taking the eastern townships, we have for a long time exported stockers and to a certain extent beef cattle, but a large proportion of the cattle from the townships were sold on the other side to be finished off there into a better article than it was when it left here. In the townships we purchase a large portion of the food with which our cattle are fed. We find that we must now change our position, and I may say here that the embargo was placed on our cattle at a time when it would do our farmers the greatest possible injury. Our cattle were all in the barns, and our lean cattle were being prepared for shipment next season. By this embargo the position was entirely changed, and we now find that we shall be obliged to feed our cattle and fatten them to be killed on landing in competition with the cattle I mentioned a few moments ago. Hon. gentlemen must bear in mind that these are young, growing cattle, and in my opinion the only food that will really fatten them for the British market is corn, at whatever price we may have to purchase it. Corn and a mixture of barley will properly fatten those cattle for that market. Knowing that our cattle will have to be fattened for that market and that our farmers will be obliged to purchase corn, I submit this motion to the House, in order that our farmers may know what to do, and whether they will have to continue to pay 7½ cents per bushel duty. In 1878 the conditions were entirely different, when the Government of that day thought it was necessary to protect our coarse grains by imposing a duty on corn. In the first place, Ontario and Quebec were practically the only grain-growing sections of the Dominion, with the exception of Prince Edward Island. They were selling that grain very largely in this country to city corporations, such as street railway companies, and to lumbermen and that sort of consumers who could purchase and use wesa corn as well as they could use either barley or oats. Hence, at that date, when our export trade to Great Britain was a small one and when it was not anticipated that it would ever reach its present importance, it was considered necessary that we should protect the grain-growing sections of this country, and the farmers of the section of the country from which I come, readily admitted that fact, and were prepared, for the sake of the farmers in Ontario and the lower valley of the St. Lawrence, to bear their portion of that burden. I find that in 1878 the export of horned cattle to England amounted only to 29,925 head, valued at $1,152,234, but in 1892 the number of horned cattle exported to England reached 107,179 head, valued at $7,748,949. Surely this return proves that there is a changed condition with respect to the articles produced by the Canadian farmers. I also find that in 1878, the total exports of cheese, butter, meats, swine and sheep, under the head of animals and their products, amounted to $9,249,257, while in the year 1892, we find that the total amount of that export has increased to $23,673,700. These figures show the tendency of our farming, although, I have no doubt, that there was a greater profit accruing, possibly, in the earlier days of this export trade than the profit realized at present. However, the general tendency of the farmer has been to feed more cattle and to sell less grain. While we have increased our exports of animals and their products from $9,000,000 to $23,000,000, during these years, we find that in the grain exports of this country, we have only exported $8,495,658 in 1892, as against $7,511,494 in 1878; only a million dollars increase during that long period of time. This proves conclusively that the farmers are giving their attention to producing animals and their products, rather than grain. The cattle question is of vital importance to this country, and especially in the face of the embargo now placed upon us in this matter, we feel that we should be at liberty to buy corn wherever we see fit at the lowest possible price. It has been said to me by the barley growers of Ontario that they would be able to furnish us barley at as cheap a price as it would be necessary for us to secure feed. There is some good reason for that statement, especially at the present time, because we are to-day undoubtedly getting barley from Ontario and the west at a very low price. There is no question about that; but whether we get it at a low price or not, the class of cattle which we have to furnish in our section of the country cannot be finished on barley alone. They are lean, thin cattle and require corn in order to fatten them.

An hon. MEMBER. You can fatten them on barley.

Mr. POPE. An hon. member says that we can fatten our cattle on barley alone. I recognize the voice, and, no doubt, owing to the gentleman's seniority as a farmer and as a member of this House, I ought, perhaps, to give way to him, but I have experience whereof I speak, and I am bound to stand by my own judgment all the same. The grain growers in Ontario never would think of continuing the production of barley at the price they are selling it for to-day, because, when we consider the exhaustion of the soil in growing barley, we must see that the Ontario farmer cannot afford to raise it for 33 cents a bushel, which is about its present price. Again, the Ontario farmer ought not to sell his barley for 30 odd cents, because, if he feeds it to swine, he will be able to obtain a return of nearly 90 cents a bushel. Therefore, by selling to us at 33 cents, he is not only exhausting the soil, but he is losing 100 per cent more profit, which he might obtain by disposing of it in the way I have indicated. There is another view of the question, and that is: Can the cattle-raiser and the cheese-maker, and the producer of swine, etc., afford, in the future, to pay a much greater price for his barley than he is now paying to the Ontario farmer? I say that he cannot afford it. Our barley costs us in Quebec about 50 cents a bushel, which is a little over a cent a pound. Let us take the price for which cattle have been selling for the last two or three years, and especially during the last twelve months. There have been, and there probably will be in the future, a few sales of choice cattle at 5 cents a pound, but the large bulk of cattle which have left our section of the country during the last year and a half, have been sold at 3½ cents a pound, to be exported to the old country. I claim that cattle at 3½ cents per pound must be fattened on cheaper barley than that purchased at 50 cents per bushel, to make the business pay. A man will find it difficult to get his money back if he pays 50 cents a bushel for barley, and sells his cattle at 3½ cents a pound. Under these circumstances, the farmer of Ontario must feel that if he wishes to get a higher price for his barley than he is getting to-day, he can only get it by taxing the farmers in the other sections of the country. It must be remembered that the Ontario farmer exports his choice barley, and that he has the same opportunity of exporting his choice meats, the same opportunity of exporting his cheese, the same opportunity of exporting his butter, and by what rule of common sense he can expect that because he wishes to get a high price for his inferior barley, he should have the privilege of taxing other farmers in other sections of the country? If this barley was largely consumed by others than farmers, there might possibly be some argument in favour of the duty; but, Sir, I am asking that this duty be removed in order that the feeders in our section and other sections of the country may be enabled to get feeding stuffs at as cheap a price as it is possible on this continent, and pay freight. I ask it in the interest of an export trade of $23,000,000, which was the cattle export trade of last year, as against an export trade in grains and pease of only $8,000,000. I ask it because our cattle have been scheduled in England and because we are forced, whether we like it or not, or whether we reside in a grain-growing section or not, to sell our cattle in such a finished condition that they can enter into competition with the fattest cattle exported to Great Britain, which come from Illinois and Iowa. I ask it, Sir, because the removal of that duty on corn tends in the direction of better farming. The grain-growing farmers may say: You are forcing us to feed. Well, if we do force them to feed, we are forcing them into a line of farming which is pointed out by the most practical and scientific men in the old and the new world as the best system. We are forcing them to maintain the fertility of their soil, and according to the present prices of pork, we are forcing them to feed barley which they now sell for 33 cents, so as to utilize it and get 90 cents a bushel. I think that such a forcing would be for their benefit all round and would be of great advantage to them. There is one reason in favour of the motion which I make, which I might have mentioned, but which is, perhaps, not quite pertinent to this question. It is a reason which was very satisfactory to me when I spoke upon the other side of this question two or three years ago. On that occasion I had the pleasure of replying to a gentleman whom it gives me extreme pleasure, inside or outside of this House, to always oppose, and I find that that gentleman has not altogether forgotten the occasion. He is now one of the editors of the Montreal "Herald," and in a recent article he singles out my remarks in the debate in this House in 1890. I find that, behind the editor's chair, he says, with reference to this debate:

In the last Parliament Mr. Sidney Fisher, then member for Bromes, moved, session after session, a resolution of this tenor: That in the opinion of the House, corn should be put on the free list. The arguments by which [according to Mr. Fisher's authority] Mr. Fisher supported this motion, as they appear in the official report in "Hansard," were conclusive in their character [so Mr. Fisher says], and were couched in moderate and courteous phrases.

So Mr. Fisher says himself of the speech he made on that occasion. Going further down, I find that Mr. Fisher must have a good knowledge of some of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, having been an old member, and having had an acquaintance with those gentlemen extending over many years, for he says:

Therefore Mr. Pope assumes a disguise as a tariff reformer, in order that he may delay and temporize, and finally prevent the passage of this measure of relief to the stock-growers of Canada. But a straight motion by an honest Liberal will, ere the session is half over, drive him from his ambush.

Now I am crawling from the ambush on my own account. But there must be two classes of Liberals in this House. I had supposed that after the purging the party received in the courts, those left in this House were pure, honest and upright; but it seems that this gentleman, who has a more intimate knowledge of them than I have, still feels doubtful of them, for he believes that some of the hon. gentlemen opposite are perhaps not politically honest. But he thinks that the resolution that will be moved by an honest Liberal will be a straight motion, and not a crooked one. Now, I have not yet found the honest Liberal who is to drive me from my ambush, as this man has stated in the Montreal "Herald," and I beg to move this motion.

Mr. SPROULE. I regret to be obliged to disagree with the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) in the conclusion at which he has arrived on this important subject. His motion deals with one of the old questions as to the effect of the National Policy which was adopted by this country in 1878 by such an overwhelming majority, and which from that time to the present the people have believed, at least in our section of the country, has been of special benefit to the farmers. The hon. gentleman has given some reasons why corn should be placed on the free list, and I will refer very briefly to a few of them before making the remarks I wish to make on the general subject. Almost the last argument he used was this, that he asked for this change in the interest of $23,000,000 worth of exports of the products of the farm at the present time against $10,000,000 worth in the year 1878. I presume that by that statement he means to lead the House to believe that because the development of the agricultural industry of the country in the lines which we export, such as cheese, butter and beef, has reached such a high pitch to-day, that is an argument in favour of placing corn on the free list. I would like to ask that hon. gentleman if he has even thought for a moment that our small exportation in the year 1878 was at a time when we enjoyed the very privilege which he now asks the House to grant, of free corn. If that advantage had brought about a development of those lines to the extent to which they are developed to-day, then his argument would be a strong one; but we find that in spite of free corn the development of the export trade in cattle, butter and cheese up to 1878 was not very rapid. At that time, in the judgment of the men who are now endeavouring to control the destinies of this country, it was desirable for us to adopt a National Policy, in other words, to impose a duty on those classes of grains that were coming into Canada from the western States, largely to the detriment of our farmers. The country saw fit to stand by the principles on which that policy was propounded, and returned to power the men who were advocating it; and then Canada commenced the development of that large industry which has attained to such large proportions to-day as the hon. gentleman has told us, and which has attained this position notwithstanding the duty on corn which has existed from that day to this, and notwithstanding that the imports of corn into this country have been steadily decreasing year after year. The hon. gentleman thinks it will do us no harm to remove the duty on corn; but if he turns his attention back to 1878, he will find that the unfortunate condition of the farmers of Canada at that time was such that we imported 7,387,000 bushels of corn for the use of Canadians. Some may say that it was for the purpose of being used in the distilleries; but I find that only about 1,000,000 bushels were used in the distilleries, and that the balance was used for feeding purposes, either for man or beast. We also imported at that time 2,162,000 bushels of oats and 5,635,000 bushels of wheat; and all these imports were coming directly into competition with the products of the Canadian farmer, and reducing the value of those lines of grain in this country. I may give one illustration of the effects of these importations on our farmers in the district where I reside. I remember one year, I think 1877, when the price of oats was very high in that part of the country, and the farmers were reaping the advantage of that enhanced price. As soon as navigation opened in the spring, two boat-loads of oats came from Chicago, one of which landed at Collingwood, and the other at Owen Sound, and, inside of twenty-four hours, the price of oats had fallen 20 cents a bushel. Will any one tell me that it was not injurious to the farmers that prices should be so liable to reduction at any moment, through the unfavourable competition of American farmers? Corn was also imported in large quantities. It was brought into the village in which I lived, and used for food for animals; and, in proportion as it was brought in, it became a competitor in these lines of coarse grains out of which our farmers make their money. If our farmers were not raising grain to feed our cattle, it might be an argument in favour of the importation of corn; but so long as the present condition of things exist, under which eight or ten out of every twelve farmers have to rely on making their greatest profits out of the sale of these coarse grains, and so long as the importation of free corn would create competition with our coarse grains and reduce their value, so long will that importation be a detriment to the Canadian farmer. The National Policy imposed a duty on corn of 10 cents and on oats of 7 cents a bushel. What were the results? We find that the very next year the large quantities of oats and corn, which had hitherto been imported, were shut out, and the Canadian farmers reaped the profit. Take the returns of last year, and see to what extent the western farmers have been competitors with the Canadian farmers. In 1891, instead of bringing in 7,250,000 bushels of corn as we did in 1878, we only brought in 2,788,000, and nearly every bushel imported was used by the distillers, and not used in feeding cattle at all. Last year only 79,000 bushels of oats were imported, whereas, in 1878, we imported 2,162,000 bushels. Instead of bringing in 5,635,000 bushels of wheat, we only brought in 147,000 bushels.

Take these three lines of grain, corn, oats and wheat—without saying anything as to the advantages or the enhanced value of pease, raised in our country, because that is one of the prime crops we raise—in those three grains, the Canadian farmer benefits to the extent of a market of 12,067,000 bushels, by virtue of that very policy which put a duty upon the corn, oats and wheat of the American farmer. Now, the hon. gentleman wishes us to go back to the condition of things which was so injurious in the past, and allow corn in free. In my section of the country the feeling of the farmers is as strong against free corn, oats and wheat into our country as it was in 1878. Now, there is another reason which the hon. gentleman has given here in favour of the free admission of corn, and that is that we require it for feeding purposes. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) endeavoured, two years ago, to convince this House it was for the purpose of feeding cattle that we required free corn, because the object was to get the feed at the lowest possible price, so as to provide beef at the smallest cost to export to England. I said then, and I repeat to-day, that if every man were a cattle-feeder, it would be to his advantage to bring in free corn to feed his cattle, because, if he could not raise the quantity of food requisite for the purpose of fattening cattle, it would be very important he should get it at the lowest possible price. But it is unfortunately the fact that a very small percentage of our farmers are cattle-feeders to-day. In the first place, a large percentage of them have not the money to build suitable barns and stables in which to keep their cattle during the winter, and feed them so to make them prime beef. In the second place, they cannot afford to be out of their money the length of time involved if they raise cattle. Not only through the summer would they have to wait, but through the fall and winter, some six months, and, in the meantime, feed their cattle a very large amount of what means money before they could get a return. I believe that eighteen out of every twenty farmers to-day are obliged to depend upon the sale of their coarse grains, and anything coming into competition with these coarse grains in our market must be detrimental to the Canadian farmers. Just in proportion as a man becomes a feeder of cattle, like the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), who feeds a hundred head of cattle per year, he becomes antagonistic to the interests of the great majority of Canadian farmers. This is a fact which cannot be denied. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) said that our cattle trade had developed to such an extent that we sent, the year before last, 123,000 head to Great Britain, and that free corn was required to help that development. He said our object is to make the prime product ready to be sent to the English market to be slaughtered, because our cattle are scheduled to-day. It is not on account of the beef we send to Great Britain that that trade became so much developed, but on account of the advantages we previously enjoyed of sending stockers, or half-fed cattle, to that market. The year we sent the largest number, 123,000, 90,000 were stockers, or cattle not fit for prime beef. They were fattened on the class of food which the Canadian farmer raised on his farm, straw, turnips, ordinary coarse grains and grasses, so that the cattle which brought back such high profits were raised on comparatively small outlay up to the time they were ready for the market. There is another point in connection with this, that if there is any argument which can be used in favour of fostering the trade, we know that the trade has been fostered and developed under the conditions existing to-day in Canada. Our farmers are able to raise the classes of grain and foods they require, not only for developing the dairy products of the country, but also for fattening their cattle. It will not be denied by any farmer here that we are able to raise corn for ensilage in any part of the Dominion. We are able to make ensilage, which is one of the cheapest foods that can be fed to cattle to-day. We want the attention of the farmers directed in that line, and the work done by the experimental farm, the lectures given by the dairy commissioners and other gentlemen from the farm, teaching the farmers to turn attention to other lines in which they can raise cheap food for the feeding of cattle, and developing the trade in that line, must have good effect. We have a climate and soil suitable for raising feed and developing our present lines, so that there is no good reason why we should change the National Policy and bring corn into the country free. I will oppose this motion, not only here but in every other part of the country where the opinion prevails that free admission of corn should be granted. I believe that would be a great disadvantage to the country. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) said last year it would be better for us to sell our coarse grains, and buy corn, because we can buy a class of feed more valuable than what we sell. Well, when our farmers sell grain, they will not buy other grains. They have always urgent demand for their money, and will not buy grains, and if they did, I believe it would be against their interests. They would not change the one for the other, but if they did, I believe it would be against their interests. There is another argument the hon. gentleman used which, I think, is a rather fallacious one. He said we have been cultivating a market in England that has been a valuable one to us, for pork, cured hams and bacon which have been sent to that country in large quantities. He says we want to increase that trade, and therefore want free corn. I wonder if the hon. gentleman noticed that during the past season very eminent men on the other side of the line, as well as in Canada, have been investigating the difference between pork fed upon pease, oats, barley and a certain grade of wheat, and that fed upon corn. Now, corn is thought to be the cheapest feed we have for pigs. I notice that Prof. Robertson has made an investigation into this question, and has come to the conclusion that pork which is fed upon corn is of an inferior quality. In the first place, it rather deteriorates the vital powers of the animal; it makes the bones more brittle, it makes the meat less valuable than pork fed upon pease, oats and barley, or the lines of wheat we use here. Now, the Americans, who have been turning their attention to the same subject, I notice by the agricultural papers of late, have come to the same conclusion. There is but one opinion with regard to that question amongst those who have given attention to it, and that is, that the class of grains that we feed here gives a better and a more valuable kind of pork, one that will realize more in the British market than that which is fed upon corn. If that is the case I wish to know the reason why we should endeavour to bring corn in free. We know that the most valuable feed we can use for fattening hogs is the ordinary coarse grains. Pease, oats and barley make very good feed and are very largely used. These grains are said to be so cheap that they are sent down to the locality of my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope). He says barley may be bought for 23 cents a bushel, although I never heard of its being sold so low. There are farmers in my section of the country to-day who would not sell barley at such a figure, because they prefer to mix and grind it with a small portion of pease and oats for hog feed. They find that the pork raised from that class of feed is of a better quality than that raised from other lines of feed upon which pigs are fed in the United States, such as corn. Now, why is it to-day that we enjoy a reputation in the English market for sending very good pork there? I noticed, in looking up the question this summer from some of the papers that were sent by Prof. Robertson from the old country, that the Canadian cured pork realized from one to two cents a pound more, for the best quality, than the United States pork. The reason was simply, as I have said, and as those who have studied the question also say, that the feed we use for our pork produces a better quality than that produced by feeding corn to pigs. Therefore, if we enjoy that reputation now, are we going to jeopardize it by importing into this country a class of feed that would deteriorate the quality of our pork and put us upon the same level as the Americans, allowing them to become strong competitors with us? We have endeavoured to make a distinction between our products and theirs, in order to secure for us an advantage in the British market, and now if this motion is carried it will put us on a parallel with them, and we shall be exporting to the old country a class of pork similar to the American pork. Now, with regard to making the concessions that were asked by the pork packers of Canada a few days ago, that is, the privilege of importing American hogs to be slaughtered in bond and the pork to be exported again, I oppose that strongly upon the very same ground, because I say that corn-fed pork is not as good as the pork raised upon the class of grains that we feed and therefore such pork so imported and then exported becomes doubly a competitor, because it is sent over from Canadian ports and will be recognized as pork raised in Canada, and in this way we destroy the reputation we have to-day in the British market of turning out a better pork than the United States. For these reasons I shall always oppose the importation of feed corn into Canada. We can raise all the feed we want for our cattle; we can raise pork as cheaply as they can, provided we turn our attention to raising those lines of feed best adapted to our soil and climate. We can feed our cattle and hogs quite as cheaply, and more profitably, upon the lines of grain we raise here, and when the product is sold it brings a better price. We now have the distinction of turning out a better class of product in cheese and pork than they do in the United States, and therefore we get a much larger profit on those lines than they do on the other side. I think it would be an unfortunate thing for the farmers of Canada if this motion carries, and if we again allow western corn to be brought into Canada free of duty.

Mr. McMILLAN (South Huron). I am very pleased indeed to have the opportunity of standing on the floor of this House and advocating the same cause as my hon. friend who moved this motion, and I hope he is exercising that agricultural honesty to-day which he refused to do when he threw his influence against the Liberal candidate in the county of Brome during the last election. I hope he is honest in his intention, and knowing that he is a farmer and largely interested in the feeding of stock, I am very happy to-day to stand upon the same platform and advocate the same cause. I have no fear of Canada's suffering from American corn being allowed to come into this country duty free. We are placed in a very peculiar position at the present time. Our cattle are scheduled in the British market, thus preventing the shipment of stockers, as has been already shown; our cattle are quarantined in the United States to prevent any of our cattle going into that country, as they have been accustomed to do in the past, as stockers. Is it a fact that the American cattle are inferior to ours fed upon corn? Is it a fact that they do not take a lower stand in the British market? Let me read from the report I find in the Toronto "Evening News" of what was said by one of the biggest cattle importers in the province of Ontario:

"The abolition of the duty on corn would be one of the greatest blessings to farmers I know of," said A. J. Thompson, the cattle exporter, yesterday. "The duty was imposed to protect Canadian oats, but if a farmer here was able to get feeding corn at, say 40 cents a bushel, there would be no better grain for fattening purposes. The corn-fed American bullock from the west will dress 100 pounds of beef and upwards more than an Ontario bullock of the live weight. Because of that, Canadian exporters are greatly handicapped in the English market, since the American exporter practically lands 100 pounds of beef free by the difference in the cattle. He has a start of $6 or $7 per head on us to commence with."

Now, we have been told that the Canadian farmer would be ruined if these grains were allowed to come into Canada duty free. We have heard that every time this discussion has come up with respect to free corn. While I am on my feet, I wish to advise the hon. gentlemen who take that position, to avail themselves of the reports that were laid before the House of Commons in 1882, to show the effect that the National Policy has had upon the agricultural industry of Canada in respect to coarse grains, and the report which was taken from the Chicago Board of Trade and the Montreal Board of Trade for the years 1877, 1878, 1880 and 1881, two years before the National Policy was imposed, when we had corn coming into Canada duty free, and two years after the National Policy was imposed, when corn was prevented from coming into Canada by the imposition of a duty of 7 cents. Now, what does this show? It shows that in 1877 we imported, for consumption in Canada, 8,260,039 bushels of corn. What was the difference between the price of oats in Chicago at that time and the price of oats in the city of Toronto? That report I mentioned, shows that the price of oats in Chicago was 31.77 cents per bushel, while in Toronto it was 43 cents, or nearly one-quarter higher in Toronto than in Chicago, while at the same time 8,000,000 bushels of corn were coming in to be consumed in Canada. When we come to 1878 we find that oats in Chicago were 22.66 cents, in Toronto 31.33, and 7,000,000 bushels of corn came into Canada during that year. Yet we find oats were a little over 8½ cents higher in Toronto than in Chicago. That was before the National Policy, while corn was coming in duty free. Take 1880, the year after the duty on corn was imposed, and we find that in Chicago oats realized 29.584 cents, in Toronto 36 cents, or only 6½ cents higher in Toronto than in Chicago, while only 1,600,000 bushels of corn came into Canada, against 8,000,000 in 1888. When we come to 1881, the second year of the National Policy, we find oats in Chicago brought 37.83 cents, in Toronto only 39½ cents, or 1.92 cents higher in Toronto. That was two years after a duty was imposed on corn of 7½ cents per bushel, while, when corn came in free, in 1877, oats were 11 cents higher in Toronto than in Chicago. Does not that prove conclusively that the Canadian farmer has not been injured as regards the price of oats, because let me say that these statistics are quoted from a report prepared to show the influence the National Policy had upon the agricultural interests of the Dominion, and most certainly, if this report was to be taken as a sample, it had a most injurious effect on the farmers as regards their coarse grains. The same result is found to apply to rye and other coarse grains. In 1877, rye in Chicago sold at 62½ cents per bushel, in Toronto 70 cents, 7½ cents higher in Toronto than in Chicago. In 1878 it was still higher, the price in Toronto being 8½ cents higher than in Chicago. This was at the time there was no duty on corn. When we come to 1880, after the duty had been put on corn, we find the price of rye in Toronto only 1½ cents higher than in Chicago, while during the second year the duty was put on corn, rye was 1½ cents higher in Chicago than in Toronto, showing most conclusively that the admission of corn free in Canada had not injured the farmer in the sale of rye. We cannot compare peas, but we can make a comparison with respect to barley. In 1877 barley in Chicago sold for 58.04 cents, and in Toronto at 73 cents, a difference of 15½ cents in favour of Toronto. In 1881 barley in Chicago advanced to $1.09, while in Toronto it was only 91 cents, showing a difference of 18½ cents in favour of Chicago, two years after the duty was imposed, while when corn came in free the price was 15 cents higher in Toronto. With respect to the statement that our corn does not produce as good pork as peas or barley, let me refer hon. gentlemen to Professor Robertson, a gentleman quoted in this House time and time again. In the sessional papers of the province of Ontario, 1890, page 186, there is a report of the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph, and tables appear showing the result of tests made there by Prof. Robertson with corn meal, pea meal, barley meal and middlings for fattening hogs. The result was as follows: 4.74 lbs. of corn meal were required to make one pound of pork, 1.85 of pea meal, 4.57 of barley meal and middlings. When the hogs were slaughtered, it was found they had shrunk as follows: 14 per cent corn-fed, 17 per cent barley meal and middlings, and 13 per cent pea meal, so the corn-fed animals were the most solid meat. I may mention that there were 16 hogs taken for the test, five being placed on corn meal, five on pea meal and six on barley meal and middlings. Then another test was the colour of the meat, and every one who knows anything about the market, especially as regards beef and pork, is aware that the colour of the meat is a very strong point with butchers. The test showed that the corn meal fed pork was a little brighter in colour, the pea meal fed standing next. Firmness of flesh was another point tested. We are all aware that in England they like nice solid meat, and the result showed that the corn and pea meal fed pork were equal in that respect, but the barley meal and middlings fed was a softer pork, and it was stated that the fat of the corn-fed pork was a little more chalky and not so greasy as that fed with the other grains. Objection has been taken to greasy meat and greasy lard, and it will be noticed that the corn-fed pork had not those characteristics. This experiment was made to prove the value of the different varieties of grain for feeding pork. Professor Robertson was at the head of the dairying interest of Ontario at the time this bulletin was issued by him over his own name. From my own experience as a farmer, who feeds yearly 100 head of cattle for shipment to England, I may say that I have almost ceased feeding barley to any extent to animals for the old country market, because when the old country butcher receives a lot of beef fed on barley he declares they are soft and flabby; but if the meat is corn-fed, as Mr. Thompson, the cattle dealer of Toronto has said, it does not shrink, but handles well. I have thus shown that the Canadian farmers have not been injured by free importation of corn, as the hon. member for East Grey has attempted to show. In 1881, although a large quantity of corn came in, our farmers were receiving a higher price for their oats than in 1891. Take 1893 and see what the prices are to-day. There is no danger of injuring the sale of our coarse grains by allowing corn to come in duty free for the simple reason that oats are from 7 to 8 cents per bushel higher in Buffalo than in Toronto. That is the state of the market at the present time. Let me add that the Dominion Dairy Commissioner, Prof. Robertson, has stated in every place where I have heard him speak, that the time had come when the farmers of Ontario should cease to export their coarse grains, and not only consume all coarse grains raised on their own farms but also import grain for feeding purposes. There was no grain we could import to-day with the same benefit as we can Indian corn, if the duty were removed. The other day an hon. gentleman stated that if the farmers would feed all their coarse grains they would realize 75 cents a bushel by putting them into pork and beef. We can now bring in corn for 44 or 45 cents a bushel, and we can raise more meat to the bushel of corn than to the bushel of barley. If we can bring that to 75 cents it is clear profit made from the American farmer who raises that corn, and that profit goes into the pocket of the Canadian farmer. The time has come when the farmers of the province of Ontario must change their system of farming. We have been tied down on every hand. Our markets have been circumscribed in every respect, and we must produce in the very cheapest manner. Prof. Robertson and all others who speak on the manufacture of beef at the present time show us that we can produce the very best beef from corn ensilage, and if that be the case is it not quite clear that the fruit of the corn stalk will produce better beef and better pork than the ensilage itself? I hope the Government will take this question into their very serious consideration. I may state that we are finding new foreign markets for some of our store cattle. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns of last year, I find that Newfoundland took 2,312 head, and that is a fresh market for the Canadian farmer, while the Island of St. Pierre took 1,088 head of store cattle, which is also a new market. I hold, however, that the policy of this Government, as far as lies in their power, ought to be to encourage the farmers of the province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada not to allow a single animal to leave our shores, except what is fit to go on the block. Prof. Robertson pointed out the correct road when he stated that the farmers of Canada should not only consume all their coarse grains but that they should be purchasers of coarse grains as well. If there is one mode more than another by which the Government can carry out the decision of their dairy commissioner, it is to allow corn to come in duty free. Last year we imported 1,685,527 bushels of corn, and of this 1,000,000 bushels were used by the distillers and the small remainder for fattening purposes. While we bring in that amount of corn, we also imported last year some 75,000 barrels of corn meal, and if you allowed corn to come in free the Canadian miller would get the benefit of our own home trade by manufacturing the corn meal in this country. We are told that there are certain counties in the province of Ontario which would be injured if corn were allowed to be imported free of duty. Both last year and this year I have examined the records with respect to the production of corn in the counties of Essex and Kent. I find from the Essex "Free Press" of the present month, that corn was selling at 43 cents a bushel in Windsor, while it was 44 cents a bushel in the city of Chicago, which is proof positive that the admission of corn free, cannot, to any extent, injure the Canadian farmer. I, myself, have visited the corn-growing localities in Canada, and have conversed with the farmers, and, while there is no doubt that there are men who would rather not see the duty removed, yet there are a large number who would like to see it removed. I hold that there is no grain that will produce better beef and better pork than corn, if the corn is fed along with the slops from the cheese factories and creameries. I admit that there is no food which we know of, when fed with grains, that will give such excellent meat or give the young animals such a start, as milk will, but I hold that it is in the interests of the farmer of this country, that we should get in corn free of duty. Even if the Government should not decide to remove the duty upon corn, I would strongly impress upon them that they should make a rebate of duty to the farmer when he feeds the corn to cattle for export purposes. This will encourage farmers who do not fatten cattle at the present time, to go into the business. There is, no doubt, a certain amount of truth in the statement that the farmers are not all prepared to go into the beef and cattle business, yet I hold that it is the duty of the Government, in the interest of the whole Dominion, to educate the farmers to turn their attention to the raising of coarse grains and the consuming of them on the farm. I believe that if this duty is removed it will help the farmers in that respect. I may state that Alderman Franklin, of Toronto, a gentleman who, last election, took the stump, and was dead against removing the duty on corn, is, I am informed, now an advocate of free corn, because he is largely interested in the shipping of cattle to the old country, and he believes that to successfully continue that trade we must have free corn. There is hardly an individual who has studied this question closely, and who is personally acquainted with the result of feeding corn and other grains, who will not favour the proposal that the Government should abolish the duty, or, if they do not go that far, that they shall allow the farmer to get a rebate when he proves that the corn has been used for fattening purposes, and that the beef has been sent out of the country. There are many strong reasons at the present time why the Government should decide on this policy. In the first place, it is only a chance whether the scheduling of our cattle in England will ever be removed, and it is also only a chance whether we can get our cattle across to the United States. However, that is not of so much importance at the present time, as we only shipped 550 head to the United States last year. It is the duty of the Government to give the farmers the assistance that they can, and they can give them no greater assistance in fattening hogs and cattle than to allow corn to come into Canada duty free.

Mr. CAMERON. It is not my intention to occupy the time of the House at any great length, but as this question has been repeatedly discussed, I desire to make some observations on it. It is a question which interests the farmers of the Dominion, particularly the poorer farmers, to a very great degree. In order to place the matter before the House, as I desire in a reasonable manner, I think it is due to myself and to the House to advert to the past history of the question in Parliament. It is frequently asserted in this House that the National Policy was adopted by Parliament in 1879, but the older members of this House recollect well that the National Policy was adopted previous to that time. It was adopted in 1870, but owing to a motion very similar to the one at present made, the National Policy collapsed. The peculiarity of the National Policy seems to me to be this: that if you take one brick out of the fabric the whole structure falls; I would, therefore, advise those who are interested in the National Policy in all sections of the Dominion to consider seriously the effect of removing one item from the protection afforded by that policy. As my hon. friends may know, in the first session of this Parliament parties were very much mixed; in fact it was difficult to say to what party any individual member belonged. In the Government itself Conservatives and Liberals of the old school in Canada sat side by side, and in the House parties were mixed in such a manner that it was almost impossible for the leader of a party to say what would become of any question that might be discussed before the House. Many compromises had to be made before that time, and among other questions that of the tariff was simply a compromise between the tariffs that existed in the several provinces previous to Confederation. The customs duty in the province of Nova Scotia was, I think, 10 per cent, in New Brunswick 15 per cent and in old Canada 20 per cent; so that the tariff adopted during 1867-68 was simply a compromise between the highest and the lowest of the provincial tariffs, and was placed at 15 per cent. It was found, however, owing to the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty of 1866, that it was necessary for the Parliament of Canada to adopt a National Policy, and in 1869 members of Parliament, the press of the country, and people of common sense generally throughout the Dominion, strongly agitated for such a policy for this Dominion; and the Minister of Finance at that time, the Hon. John Rose, in his Budget speech in 1869, foreshadowed what afterwards became the National Policy. He was, in my opinion, the first Canadian statesman who suggested that the Liberal-Conservative party should adopt a National Policy. This is what he said on that occasion:

Before finally quitting this subject of our trade relations internally and with the United States, I hope I may be permitted to state that I think that our course since the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty has been a correct one. We may now fairly say to our neighbours: "We do not complain of the abrogation of that treaty. We have no fault to find with you for your action. We know what your financial difficulties were when that action was taken. We know that the state of public opinion in your land, which, very unfairly to us, arose against us in consequence of events for which the Government and people of this country were not to blame. We know how much this directed public attention at the time to the trade and commercial relations between Canada and the United States; and we know how much it had to do with the repeal of the treaty. We know, however, that since that period, your internal taxation on your own people has been lessened; we believe that you have now juster impressions of our conduct during the war, and that the acrimony of feelings which once existed has long since passed away, while the natural loss arising from restricted commercial intercourse continues to be felt. We have hitherto refrained from retaliation; we have continued to accord you freely all the advantages you possessed during the operation of the treaty, and have made every allowance for the exceptional circumstances under which you abolished it. We have waited patiently and quietly, giving you meanwhile every advantage you enjoyed before. We have allowed your vessels the free navigation of our canals and rivers, though you do not allow similar privileges to us. We have allowed you to fish in our waters at a mere nominal license, though our fish is heavily taxed on entering your markets. We have not sought to interfere with the transit of your goods in bond across the peninsula of Ontario, though you have coupled with onerous conditions a similar privilege to us. For it may not be generally known that though the right to pass goods in transit through the American territory is not denied, it is accompanied by conditions of a vexatious and costly character. We have allowed your coal to come in free, though you charge a heavy duty on ours. We allow your flour, hops and salt and other articles to be imported free, while you not only do not reciprocate, but you specially discriminate against our millers by charging more on flour than on grain. This state of things, we might fairly add, has gone on for three or four years, but you must understand it cannot continue. The time may soon come when we may require to have a national policy of our own, no matter whether that national policy may sin against this or that theory of political economy. For we must be guided chiefly, if not solely, by circumstances affecting ourselves, and we may have to consult our self-interest without consideration for others. Should the United States show any disposition to negotiate, we are bound to receive them cordially and meet them half way; the republic is the greater power, and it becomes us to respond cordially to her invitation. But it must be distinctly and unmistakably understood as the opinion of this country that, no matter how much the United States may hamper our commercial intercourse with them, we are not disposed to barter our constitutional rights, to give up our associations or our hopes of a national existence for mere commercial considerations. It must be chiefly understood that we are not, and never will be, disposed to give up our connection with and allegiance to the British Crown as the price of our admission to the markets of the republic. Let them not commit the mistake of deferring the negotiations in this hope.

These were the sentiments first officially announced by a member of the Government in the Dominion of Canada in favour of a National Policy, and this intimation gave an impulse in its favour throughout the country. During that year public men urged the incorporation of all British North America under one central Government. This was the first plank in the great National Policy platform which was inaugurated during that year. It was also urged by some of the statesmen of that time that the whole country from sea to sea should be bound together by rail, and that such a policy as would create an inter-provincial trade should be adopted. It was urged, further, that the products of the soil, the sea, the mine and the forest should be protected under the system of a National Policy, and that the different provinces should go hand in hand in such a way as would ensure the prosperity of the whole Dominion. I may refer briefly to a discussion which occurred in this House in 1870 as the result of this agitation. As I have already intimated, the parties were not well defined in this House during the first Parliament. Each individual spoke from the stand-point of his own constituency. Owing to the feeling which existed in favour of a National Policy, and particularly in favour of protection of the natural resources of this Dominion, an independent member of this House, a Liberal in politics, was the first who made motion in the direction of such a policy. On the 7th March, 1870, Mr. Oliver, who then represented the county of Oxford, Ont., moved for an address to His Excellency, praying for the imposition of an import duty on wheat, flour, Indian corn, hops, coarse and fine salt and coal. He said :

The Government had sent a deputation to the West Indies and South America, with a view of opening up a trade with those countries, but since its return nothing had seemingly been done by the Government to open up these fields to our commerce.

And he went on to advocate the adoption of a policy of protection to the natural products of the country. Among the first who spoke in favour of that policy was another Liberal, Mr. M. C. Cameron, well known to the older members of this House, and he said :

If he for a moment believed that the motion of the member for Oxford would have the effect of retarding or preventing the renewal of the reciprocity treaty, he would sooner allow his constituents to suffer for a time longer, rather than jeopardize its renewal. In his humble judgment, the Government could take no better step than to protect Canadian products. Why should the Americans want the renewal of the reciprocity treaty? Are not all the Canadian markets open to them, while their markets are closed up against us in almost every commodity? They reap all the benefits of free trade, and we have all the evils of protection without any of its benefits.

He concluded by saying :

He hoped that the Finance Minister would see that the country was no longer left in the humiliating position of waiting patiently on another nation to legislate for the benefit of Canada.

Mr. Gibb, who also represented an Ontario constituency, advocated the same policy. So did Mr. Wood, and among the others who supported it was the Hon. Joseph Howe, then a Liberal in politics. On the 7th of March he said :

That for the last twenty years, a large majority of the people of the Maritime Provinces had been in favour of free trade in its widest sense. But the policy indicated by the gentlemen in this discussion was becoming popular there, not because they were less free traders than before, but because the United States were making use of their fiscal relations with us to attempt to coerce us into political union with them. We do not, said he, want such a policy, because we have ceased to be free traders, but because we wish to make it patent to all the world, that we are prepared to depart from sound principles of fiscal policy, rather than be coerced into political union with the United States.

Mr. Pope, of Compton, and Mr. Magill, who then represented Hamilton, Mr. Scatcherd, Mr. Colby and others, advocated the same policy, and Sir John Macdonald, after listening to the discussion, desired to postpone it. He said :

When the Government policy was propounded, he believed that it would meet the acceptance of the majority in the House, which, he believed, fairly represented the wishes and the feelings of the people of Canada.

The motion was then withdrawn. But during the year the Hon. John Rose, who had been Minister of Finance, was called to occupy a position in England, and was succeeded by Sir Francis Hincks. In delivering his Budget speech, Sir Francis Hincks spoke as follows :

I cannot do better than state the views of my predecessor on this point. He said, in the course of his financial statement last year, speaking to the Americans :

"We have allowed your coal to come in free, though you charge a heavy duty on ours. We allow your flour, grain, hops and salt, and other articles to be imported free, while you not only do not reciprocate, but you specially discriminate against our millers by charging more on flour than on grain. This state of things, we might fairly add, has gone on for three or four years, but you must understand that it cannot continue. (Hear, hear.) The time may soon come when we may require to have a national policy of our own, no matter whether that national policy may sin against this or that theory of political economy. (Hear, hear.) For we must be guided chiefly, if not solely, by considerations affecting ourselves, and we may have to consult our self-interest without consideration for others."

Mr. Holton, who was then one of the leaders of the Opposition, spoke as follows :—

He did not intend to follow the Finance Minister through his speech, beyond stating broadly that, instead of a surplus of $300,000 on the transactions of the last financial year, there would be found to be a deficit of $1,000,000. At last the great National Policy had been born, and it meant, as far as it went, protection—an abnegation of the policy of the Empire.

I have thus proven conclusively that the National Policy was born in 1870, and that the natural products of our soil were protected by the fiscal policy during that year. Strange to say, even at its inception, the National Policy found itself in difficulties. Even before the close of the debate, the leader of the Government himself faltered and feared he would fail in carrying the National Policy, because it was moved by Mr. Holton that flour and coal should be placed on the free list. This created such a panic as only those who can realize what would occur if every person on both sides would speak from the particular interest of his own constituency, can imagine. If they would do so at present, we would not see the line so closely drawn in a question of this kind. I want to draw the attention of the House particularly to this fact. If there is an attempt to disconnect the protection of products of the soil from those of the sea, the mines and the factory, that will jeopardize the whole policy, and the interests, especially of the poorer classes of farmers, will suffer. When I hear the hon. members for Compton and Huron talking about the necessity of their obtaining large quantities of corn for the purpose of fattening their cattle, I am reminded that their line is not farming at all. It is no more farming, in the proper sense, than is the milling business. The farmers produce the wheat and the miller manufactures it, and so the farmer produces the coarse grain, and the monopolist farmers, if I may so call them, are those who use those grains and convert them into beef. They are not farmers, but manufacturers in the same sense as millers are. What I call attention to particularly is the short life which the National Policy existed after its first inception in the Dominion, and to give the reasons why it failed. On the 22nd March, 1871, after the Act relating to customs duties had been read the second time and passed through committee, it was moved by Mr. Holton, in amendment to the motion for third reading :

That the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of so amending the same as to repeal the duties on coal, coke, flour and wheat.

The excitement during the discussion ran very high, and those who were interested in the success of the National Policy felt that the motion, from the temper of the House, would unquestionably carry, and it was proposed, at the direction of the members who supported the Government, that all articles connected with products of the soil and the mines, which had been protected by the policy of the previous year, should be included as well. Mr. Blanchet, I believe, who then represented a constituency in Quebec, moved in amendment that all the other articles which were protected under the National Policy, the products of the soil and of the mine particularly, should also be dropped and placed on the free list. So that in a House composed of a large number in favour of the National Policy, it was found that 103 members decided that the whole fabric should fall if any of it fell, and that only 28 sustained the amendment of Mr. Holton on its merits. But I rose at the present time chiefly for the purpose of urging upon those who are advocates of the interests of the poorer classes, particularly the poor farmers, the poor miners, the poor fishermen and the poor mechanics of the Dominion, that any course calculated to destroy the National Policy, piecemeal or as a whole, will be detrimental to their interests. I would urge upon those who are interested in coarse grains, as nearly all the farmers in this Dominion are, to see to it that American corn is not allowed to come in free of duty. On principle and in self-defence, I would urge upon the farmers to see that their interests are protected. I regret exceedingly to find that strong appeals have been made all over the Dominion to the poor farmers; but I think I am in a position to say that there is no class in this Dominion who are so well protected under the National Policy, and who pay so little taxation, as the poorer farmers in this country. It is almost unfortunate that persons who pretend to advocate the interests of the farmers should advocate a policy which they ought to know is very detrimental to the interests of the poorer classes of farmers in this Dominion. Now, I voted among the majority in 1871 in favour of taking the duty off all these articles, and I would do the same thing if a similar resolution were offered now. While I am in favour of the National Policy as a whole, I deprecate the idea of taking the duty off, even binder twine, if you will, coal oil, if you will, or any other article that is protected under the National Policy. I should give reasons why this policy should be pursued, even with regard to those articles. It was in existence in 1870 on coal oil, it has been continued from that time down to the present, and it would be a disaster to a very important natural industry in this country if the duty were taken off coal oil. The same might be said in reference to binder twine. While the farmers are protected heavily, I think they have no reason to complain if they are compelled to pay a light duty on binder twine. I tell those who advocate the interests of the farmers, clearly and distinctly, that if they disturb the National Policy, the first article that will be placed on the free list in this House, will be wheat and flour, as well as corn, and they make a grave mistake indeed by making motions which I admit to be made, in their opinion, in the interests of a large and important class of the people, but which after all are not in their interest, as will be made manifest to this House and the country. So far as I am personally concerned, I am bound to stand by the duty even on binder twine, although we are told it is under the control of a monopoly which is so far-reaching as to cover the United States and Canada. But if we take off the duty, the little competition which seems to arise now in certain localities in this Dominion on account of the protection which is afforded to that industry, would collapse, and that which now insures the cheapening of the article in the Dominion, would be sure to be taken away from the people. The cost of every commodity in this country depends altogether upon demand and supply, and if there is anything calculated to increase the supply of any commodity, it is to encourage its manufacture in the Dominion itself. It is vain to say that simply because an article is protected, the result necessarily increases the price of the commodity. I was amused to hear my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) point out how the price of oats was higher in Canada when corn was imported from the United States. If he reflects for a moment he would soon realize the reason. The price of every commodity in this Dominion is regulated by the supply. While corn was imported free from the United States, after the abrogation of the duty in 1871, until it was adopted again in 1879, the poorer classes of farmers in this Dominion were so discouraged at the small price for which they could sell their coarse grains, that to a large extent, they discontinued raising them; so that the supply of oats in this Dominion was largely curtailed. As every farmer knows, a large quantity of the coarser grains are necessary for their own consumption, and the quantity of the home product being largely reduced on account of the importation of cheaper products from abroad, they had to be purchased at a higher figure even by themselves when they were required. The same result would follow again, and I therefore ask those particularly who advocate the interest of the farmers, not to disturb the National Policy, because if there is one class in this Dominion, I repeat, who are benefited by the National Policy in its entirety, it is the poorer farmers, and next to them come the poorer classes in all the other lines of industry.

Mr. SPROULE. I just want to give quotations from the market price in answer to the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), who said that at the present time oats were 7 cents a bushel higher in Buffalo than in Toronto.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has no right to speak again.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not going to speak, I am only going to quote the market price.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. SPROULE. I find in the "Globe" that in Chicago they are 31½ cents, and in Toronto, 34 cents, 3 cents higher in Toronto, instead of 7 cents less.

Mr. ROWAND. I would like to say a few words on this question before the House comes to a vote. I am not going to ask the House to go back to the times when the National Policy was introduced, as the hon. gentleman has done. I think that life is too short and time too valuable to discuss the condition of things in this country twenty-five years ago. Now, with regard to the question of bringing corn in free, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) says that it would lower the price of coarse grains to the farmer, that the poor farmers cannot afford to feed cattle and consume their coarse grains on the farm, but that they would have to sell them to other men who would make a profit out of them instead of the farmers. Now, I would just say that if the Government wish to keep these poor farmers in that condition, the policy advocated by the hon. member for East Grey will have precisely that effect. There is no doubt that our farmers must raise something; they must, to a certain extent, consume their own products on the farm. They cannot sell the straw, they cannot sell the hay. They must raise and feed cattle to some extent, and they cannot finish cattle for beef if they sell their coarse grains. At the present time, they cannot send stockers to the British market, because they are scheduled; they cannot send them to the United States, because there is a duty of $10 per head; and there is to-day a further obstacle in the scheduling of cattle going into the United States. So that if these men are going to raise stock at all they must raise such stock as they can finish for the British market. Now, our condition to-day is very different from that of twenty years ago, it is very different from that of one year ago. One year ago we could send stockers into the British market, we cannot do that now. Our cattle are scheduled there, and we must finish our cattle here before we can send the products there at all. Now, I think it is the duty of the Government and of the leading men to encourage and assist those farmers who raise cattle, to finish their cattle at home in order that they may be able to send the product to the British market. There is no other course that they can take, and if they are not in a position to finish cattle for the British market, the sooner the Government put them in that position the better, and the more assistance the Government can give them, the better will the Government fulfil its duty. We have experimental farms established, and we are paying large salaries to professors to educate the people with respect to the best modes of farming. During last year the Minister of Agriculture issued a circular, to which I desire to call the attention of the House. It was issued by the late Minister of Agriculture (Hon. John Carling), and contains the following:—

I am deeply impressed with the importance of the advantages which would accrue to the farming interests of Canada, from a more extensive and general feeding of the coarse grains to live stock on the farms on which they are grown, that I desire to call your attention to the subject-matter of two bulletins which have been issued recently from the Central Experimental Farm, Ottawa, and of which I inclose copies.

I must say that that is the best piece of advice ever issued by the Department of Agriculture. It clearly proves that by raising stock we can keep our farms in good condition. Our farm lands have been exhausted to a very large extent, and it is necessary to adopt some plan by which to return to the soil the fertilizing material which has been taken from it in the shape of grain shipped abroad, or in the shape of coarse grains utilized at home. Our professors have demonstrated that we can profitably consume our own coarse grains and have a margin of profit left, but the profit is really not confined to the margin realized. The bulk of the profit consists of returning to the soil a large portion of the fertility that was taken from it. Everyone knows that in feeding grain it is only partially used by the animal, that the residue is the large portion, and this can be returned to the soil. If we can consume our own grains, it is the best course to adopt, according to Prof. Robertson. He has shown that a bushel of frozen wheat can produce fourteen pounds of pork. If a bushel of frozen wheat can produce such a result, no doubt a bushel of sound grain would do even much better. I do not suppose that a bushel of wheat would produce much more than a bushel of peas. At all events, if we can feed our grain, and it appears we can, and realize 60 cents per bushel even from frozen wheat, which is as much as we realize from our best wheat, great benefit must accrue to the farmers. If we can turn this wheat into pork, a large profit must result. I wish to enforce this point: If we can feed our own grains at a profit, we can buy grain from the United States and feed our cattle with it and secure a margin of profit; so, not only profitable returns will be secured to our farmers, but fertility will be restored to our farm lands. I do not see why, if the door is open to us, our farmers cannot lay under tribute the corn producers of the United States. If the Government will educate our farmers, as the late Minister of Agriculture has endeavoured to do, to consume their own coarse grains on their own farms, and encourage them to do so, and if they will admit corn duty free, because we must finish our cattle and cannot send them to the United States or Great Britain except as fat cattle, hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches will be rendering valuable assistance to the agricultural community. There is another point, which perhaps does not strike everybody, and it is this, that cattle are not raised in one year, but they are generally two or three years old before they are considered fit for market. If a man enters the cattle business and obtains a large number of young stock, and a scarcity of feed should occur, and the importation of American corn should be practically prohibited on account of the duty, then a serious difficulty would occur. We desire that our farmers shall have the opportunity of sending to the United States for corn, and if the Government will allow them to bring in corn free, great benefit will be conferred on agricultural interests.

Mr. CHRISTIE. I desire to say a word in support of the motion now before the House. This is a question in which my constituents are very deeply interested. In my county we do not grow corn very largely, and our farmers depend mainly on stock, finding it more profitable to make butter and cheese, raise stock and sell milk. Many of them have gone into the milk business, selling their milk in Montreal. All of them require corn for feeding purposes. I am fully convinced that the duty on corn has been very injurious and has proved a great hindrance to the prosperity of my county. Some time ago a public meeting of farmers was held in my county, called for the special purpose of considering this question. The meeting was held in the parish of St. Andrew's and was largely attended by Liberals and Conservatives, and the question was fully discussed in all its bearings. It was moved and carried unanimously, that, in the interest of the farmers, corn should be placed on the free list. I say unanimously, but there was one dissenting voice, that of a mechanic, but our farmers, without a single exception, voted in favour of placing corn on the free list. I am sure they know their business perfectly, and they are satisfied that free corn is absolutely necessary for their prosperity. I am requested to cast my vote and use my influence in favour of free corn. I am satisfied it would be a great benefit to my constituents if not only corn, but wheat and flour and all the prime necessaries of life, were placed upon the free list. I shall have much pleasure, therefore, in casting my vote in favour of the motion before the House.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not rise to discuss the specific question raised by the motion, but the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) laid down a proposition which I do not think I, as a protectionist, should allow to go unchallenged. He laid down the proposition, that if we touch any part of the National Policy, the whole will disappear. The hon. gentleman seems to be under the impression that this is a scientific structure, conceived scientifically and completed scientifically. Instead of that being the case, we know very well that the tariff was constituted and carried out as best it could in 1879, and that, since that time, it has been changed, and everyone who understands political economy and looks over the tariff at present will see that, from the point of view of a protectionist, it contains anomalies, and that in the interest of the National Policy, of which the hon. gentleman gave a very interesting history, and of the country, for which the National Policy was made—because the National Policy, I suppose, was made for the country and not the country for the National Policy—in both those interests it is desirable there should be a revision of that policy. The hon. gentleman laid down the proposition, that if you touch any part of this sacred edifice the whole will crumble to pieces, and he urges us to beware how we laid a hand on the ark of the National Policy as it presents itself to him. I take no such view of the tariff. The hon. gentleman travelled somewhat beyond the record and discussed binding twine and coal oil, although the House at the present time is dealing with the question of corn. As having a bearing on the proposal before the House I may give an illustration. There is at the present time $4 per ton duty on pig iron. Anyone, I should think, would say that from the protectionist standpoint it is an anomaly in a protectionist tariff. There is hardly a manufacturer—outside of chemistry and agricultural products—who does not need iron, and here is the raw material of factory after factory taxed to the extent of $4 per ton. That is an anomaly under a protective tariff, if you want to protect the manufacture of pig iron, the proper way to have done it was by a bonus, pure and simple, at so much a ton for the production of pig iron; but the pig iron itself should have been admitted into the country free of duty. It would be more justifiable to have $4 a ton on pig iron under a revenue tariff than to have it under a protective tariff. But, Mr. Speaker, to return to the motion, of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope), I will not follow my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) or my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) in regard to the relative fattening qualities of peas and Indian corn, but I do say that when the proposition was made by the hon. member for Inverness that the farmer is, of all men, most interested in the maintenance of every detail of the tariff as it exists; I, as coming from a farming constituency, should have been very much interested if the hon. gentleman had pointed out, how the farmer is more interested in this matter than anybody else. On the contrary, Sir, I have to say, on behalf of the great farming country whence I come, that it is very difficult, indeed, to show that we gain by the National Policy. In fact, the proposition that you can protect the farmer is a proposition that it would seem to me a very difficult one to prove. Above all others, it is difficult to protect the farmer if he is a producer of wheat, and for the reason that he produces a surplus, and the moment that he produces a large surplus, and has to export it, how are you going to protect him?

Mr. MACDONALD (East Huron). You must have been reading my speech.

Mr. DAVIN. I never read a speech of yours in my life, and I might tell the hon. member that whenever he speaks in this House, I try to divert my attention in order that his dulcet tones may not reach me. I may tell him a fact, which, as a physician, may be interesting to him, namely, that on one or two occasions, when I did give him some attention, the result of his speaking was as detrimental to me as a fortnight's low fever.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Three speeches would have been death to you.

Mr. DAVIN. I suppose they would. It would be a difficult thing to show how you can protect the great wheat-growers at all, because, whenever you produce a surplus you have your chief market outside of the country you live in, and the price is regulated by conditions over which the legislature under which you live has no control at all. When my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) laid down the theory that the farmers would suffer so much if we interfered in the slightest degree with the National Policy, he should have shown us how you can protect the farmer. He should have gone further than that, and he should have got over this fact, that where the farmer, as is the case with us in the Northwest, is exporting large quantities of wheat, when he is in a country highly protected, in proportion as that protection acts successfully, in the same proportion the purchasing power for his wheat in his ultimate market declines. The farmers in the west would have considerable difficulty in understanding the proposition of my hon. friend, that they would suffer if any part of the National Policy is interfered with. I maintain that the only way that you can protect the farmer is, not by putting duties on wheat or duties on other things of which he produces a surplus—that may in some instances give him what he may call a home market—but the way to protect him is to give him those things that he has to use on the farm at the lowest rate. That is the only way that you can protect the farmer. I hold that the National Policy, properly carried out, will benefit the farmer, because I believe that the National Policy, in its proper character, will lead to competition, which will cheapen prices, and if it does that, it gives him the implements which are necessary for his industry, at a lower rate. I have here some speeches made by United States senators in support of the McKinley tariff. They are out-and-out protectionists, they are supporters of a tariff that I suppose not a single National Policy man in Canada would attempt to advocate. What does the ablest of them, Senator Aldrich, say? He says:

As the senator from Vermont (Mr. Edmunds) very truly suggests, all of our previous experience shows that when American production and competition have been added to foreign production, the result has been a diminution in price.

Another senator, Mr. Elkins, speaks as follows:—

The Republican party also claims that home competition, under protection, is the surest means not only of establishing our manufacturing industries, but in the long run the safest to reduce the price of manufactured articles. In the United States there are now 300,000 manufacturing establishments, all in competition.

You see how he dwells on the competition, and, of course, the implication is, that if there is a combine, these high protectionists—higher, I suppose, than any protectionists we have here—would strike with a ruthless hand at it.

They employ more than five million of people, who receive in wages two billions annually. The result is now, and has been, under this competition that prices have been greatly reduced.

Now, I say that if those who advocate the interests of the farmer, can show that the duty on any given article is of such a character as to raise prices, that minute they have made out a case for interfering with the duty in that particular instance. Mr. Elkins goes on:

This is all the competition we want or can stand. If there were no protection we could not stand foreign competition. Home competition and home consumption tend to a general but healthful reduction of prices of products, while foreign competition is destructive of both the prices of labour and the American products. Free trade would destroy or greatly impair our manufacturing interests and home markets, while the prices of articles admitted free would remain the same or increase. Protection, instead of being a tax or a burden, as claimed by the Democratic party, not only enables us to build up our home manufactures, increase home consumption and thereby home markets, but in the long run, through home competition, the prices of manufactured products are reduced. Free trade never could accomplish this result.

Now, in what he goes on to say he echoes an opinion expressed by Mr. Garfield, who stated that he believed in protection leading to free trade; and here is what this supporter of the McKinley Bill says:

With proper protection and home competition, we can so firmly establish our manufacturing industries, and reduce the price of manufactured articles, that we can in time compete successfully with Europe in the markets of the world. When this time arrives we may declare for free trade, as England did, and it may be to our interest to do so. We want no free trade that does not come logically through protection, and we surely do not want it until we can compete successfully in the markets of the world with other countries; and if that time never comes, the United States will never want free trade.

Now, you see that these gentlemen, who are hide-bound protectionists, look to such a state of evolution in the industrial energies of the nation, that, in consequence of the protection of infant industries, the industrial forces of the nation shall be so developed that we shall be able to compete with all comers and will therefore be prepared for free trade. So that when my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) contends that whether or not we can show that in some cases there are combines and that in some cases the farmer has to pay more than he had previously to pay, nevertheless we must not touch a single item in the tariff, my hon. friend takes a position which is itself a 'reductio ad absurdum,' the fallacy of which does not need to be exposed. I do not want to go into the various questions that were raised in his speech, because they are not involved in the motion before us; but I do say that when the proper time comes, I think, I shall be able to show such reasons for the reduction or abolition of certain duties that at present affect the farmer, that it will be very difficult for some hon. gentlemen to go back to their constituencies unless they support me in my attempt to give that protection to the farmer which we alone can give him, namely, the protection of getting his goods at a fair rate in a fair market.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken, I suppose it is necessary for me to say a word or two in reference to the motion which has been discussed this afternoon. Naturally, I cannot help dealing with this question in much the same way as I dealt with the question of binder twine which was discussed in this House two or three days ago, that is, to express my satisfaction with the debate that has taken place and the information which has been brought out, and to say that the arguments on both sides, and the points of view which have been so ably represented, will be, of course, very carefully considered; but at the same time to say that, in view of the fact that within a very little time the Government proposes to make a statement in this House of its policy as regards the tariff generally, at a time when above all others it is opportune that that should be done, the Government does not wish in advance of that time to make its views known with regard to this special item of the tariff. While freely acknowledging the force, I mean the local force, of the views that have been brought out by the different speakers, I would like as well to leave this thought with the House—that the question as presented this afternoon appears to me to be one that is debatable, as to which there are strong arguments to be adduced on both sides, and one which affects different localities and different interests in different ways; and even if we were willing to take up this single question and settle it apart from all others at the present time, I think sufficient arguments have been adduced in this debate and a sufficient number of points of view have been represented, to make it necessary that the fullest consideration should be given to the subject before a decision is come to on one side or the other. There are some questions which may have the weight of argument almost entirely on one side. I do not think that can be said of this question. The argument, for instance, that there is a pressing necessity that the duty should be taken off corn at this time in view of the embargo which has been placed on our stockers in the old country, is an argument which may have force at this moment, but which may not two months hence. It is an argument which rests wholly on the assumption that the embargo on our cattle will be kept on. We are in hope, however, and I think we have good grounds for hoping, that the British Government, which is taking into consideration, at this very moment, our completed case, may come to the conclusion that pleuro-pneumonia does not exist in Canada, and that the embargo which has been placed upon our stockers should be removed. In that case, the argument based upon the existence of the embargo will fall to the ground. I merely state this in order to show that although that argument may appear strong, and would gain a great deal more strength if the embargo were a settled thing, it does not count for so much, seeing that there is a contingency, and, I hope, a probability, that the embargo will be removed. With reference to the general question of the quality of meat which is made by using one kind of feed or another, that is a question for those who are more particularly skilled or experienced in these matters than myself; it is a matter for research in what you might call a scientific way; and, with regard to that, I am disposed, very strongly disposed, to have, to thoroughly digest and to give great weight to the opinions of men like Professor Robertson, who have studied that question, not merely as actual farmers, but from a scientific point of view, by feeding experimentally, and who have come to conclusions which, arrived at in that way, would have more weight than the ideas even of farmers who have not been feeding with that nicety of calculation and that accuracy of record with which these experiments have been conducted, and as regards the results of which there ought to be as much certainty and surety as it is possible to obtain. I do not think it would be prudent at this time to come to a vote on this matter, in advance of the declaration of the Government as to its general tariff policy, which, as I informed my hon. friend last evening, I hope will be announced next week. That is not a long time to wait; and when the Government policy is put before the House, there will be plenty of opportunity for hon. gentlemen to express their views. Always premising this: That the Government is as anxious as it can be to serve the general interests of the country, that it is wedded to no policy other than the policy which is for the best interests of the country. It has never stood up for, and does not now stand up for, any absolute principle underlying tariffs, other than the principle that the circumstances and condition of the country must be the guide in determining what is for the best advantage of the country. In other words, there is a striking similarity, which just occurs to me now, between the practice of the Liberal-Conservative Government in this matter and the theory of the leader of the Opposition, who, in his speeches in Hamilton and Toronto—whether he had quite thought out the phrase or not—stated, as a matter of fundamental belief, what he crystallized in words something like these: The Liberal policy is the outgrowth of the circumstances and conditions of the country.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, when the hon. gentleman came to elaborate his policy, he proved to a demonstration that he did not care anything about the naturalness, the growth, the evolution from the circumstances and the conditions of the country, because he declared, if I remember aright, that he was like the Whig, he never changed, and that consequently he was eternally wedded to the principle of free trade. Whether the circumstances of the country were in one condition or another, it mattered not to him—there was a theory he and the Liberal party had adopted many years ago, and they did not propose to change it. Whether the skies be dark or bright, through whatever devious paths their policy may lead them, whether it may lead through Washington or Britain, or however long it may take to gain the open beyond, they were bound to go on to free trade. It might come possibly in fifteen years, and before they could get it they might have to make a treaty of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and then climb over the uniform tariff thus created encircling both countries, but they would venture anything for the sake of free trade. Now, the Liberal-Conservative policy does not develop on that principle. It is a policy which grows out of the conditions of the country; it is an evolution from the outgrowth and conditions of the country as at any time they are. In 1878 and 1879, it was necessary that we should have a certain degree of protection in the best interests of this country. In the establishment of new industries and the development of our resources, the Government looked to the condition of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not. And the Liberal-Conservative Government framed a policy which was to meet the growth, the condition, and the circumstances of the country at that time. They have kept these in view ever since, and are disposed to keep them in view to-day; and if, after a very careful consideration of the circumstances existing to-day, it becomes patent to the Government that the tariff will have to be somewhat revised, the Government is prepared to do what the country, in its circumstances and its growth, requires that it should do. That has always been the position of the Liberal-Conservative Government, and in that respect I am quite sure that we shall meet with the cordial approval of the Liberal-Conservative party, and that we will have the loyal support of the country as well.

Mr. LAURIER. If the House will bear with me for two or three minutes, I would say that the hon. gentleman himself is sadly in need of the words of pity which he wasted upon me; and I would add: Do not weep on me, you daughter of Jerusalem, but weep on yourself and your moments of weakness. He has given us an exhibition of another moment of weakness. The Government, who has just spoken by the mouth of the hon. gentleman on this question, and which has been spoken simply to tell us it cannot say now what it will do in the matter, is suffering from another moment of weakness, because, not long ago, it had another policy on this subject, when it declared, by the mouth of the President of the Council, that it was ready to reduce the duty on corn. There was then an election in the city of Sherbrooke, at which the hon. gentleman, who is now the President of the Council, and who represents the Protestant minority of the province of Quebec in the Cabinet, was elected by acclamation. He spoke on divers questions, one of which was this identical question of corn, and he announced that it was the policy of the Government to-day to remove that duty. Here are his words, taken from the Montreal "Gazette," an authority which will not be denied:

But while believing in the National Policy, we do not believe that the protection given in any particular case should be unnecessary or unduly large, or that in the case of articles used universally by the people they should be made dearer to protect interests of comparatively small importance. I believe also that you desire to see such changes made from time to time as may be necessary to meet the changing conditions, and that, for example, if the Canadian farmer is shut out from the British market for store-cattle and can only export heavy beef, you want the raw material for the maturing of that beef as cheap as possible.

That was diplomatic language. What did it mean? Simply that the raw material necessary to make beef should be made as cheap as possible. That is, that the Government should make it as cheap as possible by taking off the duty on corn. The Government had one policy. Six weeks have elapsed, and they are suffering from another moment of weakness. The Liberal-Conservative party may be prepared to follow the hon. gentleman, but I am sure the country at large is not prepared to follow the Government in this departure from their declared policy of six weeks ago. The country was satisfied at that time that the Government had promised to remove the duty on corn.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Extra allowance to W. Wallace, ex-postmaster at Victoria, B.C. $240

Mr. McMULLEN. This is an item which has been criticised every time it has been brought before the House. It is an iniquitous system, under which not only a superannuation allowance can be paid to a retired officer, but an extra grant annually made to him. If there was one iniquitous transaction worse than another in connection with the Superannuation Act, it was the removal of Mr. Wallace in order to make a place for Mr. Shakespeare as postmaster of Victoria. The salary of $2,000 a year is given to Mr. Shakespeare, and about $1,200 is paid to Mr. Wallace, and this additional sum of $240, in order to keep him quiet or satisfy him for being removed from his position. The system has undoubtedly been objectionable in many ways, but this particular feature of remunerating officers, not only by granting them the superannuation allowance to which they are entitled, but an additional allowance by adding years to their years of service, is a glaring abuse. No doubt Mr. Shakespeare is a very respectable man, and he was formerly a member of this House. I am casting no reflection on the appointment, but I am taking objection to the mode adopted to place him in the position of postmaster. I hope the Bill about to be introduced by the Minister of Finance will remedy abuses of this kind. I observe, by returns submitted recently, that the system of adding years of service in cases of superannuation still prevails, and in two cases mentioned in the return presented the other day, ten years were added to the time of service. This clearly indicates a gross abuse of the system, and the case of Mr. Wallace is an instance where the Superannuation Act was abused in order to make a place for the gentleman who now fills the position of postmaster at Victoria.

Experimental Farm. $75,000

Mr. McMILLAN (South Huron). I desire to obtain some information with respect to the experimental farm. Last year's report contains a statement respecting the number of stock kept there, and in the accounts there appears a large expenditure under the several heads. Perhaps the minister will state the number of head of stock kept on the farm during last year.

Mr. FOSTER. On the Central Farm there were 10 Holsteins, 5 Ayrshires, 5 Shorthorns, 6 Devons, 10 Quebec Jerseys, 8 Jerseys, 30 grades, making a total of 66. On Brandon Farm there were 23, including Devons, Holsteins, Ayrshires, Galloways and Jerseys.

At Indian Head, N.W.T., Farm, there were 27, including Holsteins, Durhams, Polled Angus and grades. At Agassiz, B.C., Farm there are 18 head, including Herefords, Durhams and Ayrshires. At Nappan, N.S., there were 28 head, including Durhams, Ayrshires, Holsteins and some grades. The horses at the Central Farm number 15, at Brandon 10, at Agassiz 6, at Nappan 7, at Indian Head 8.

Mr. McMILLAN (South Huron). I am astonished, after learning that there are only sixty-six head of cattle at the Central Farm, to find that a large expenditure has been incurred in connection with feeding cattle. No less than thirty-three tons of straw have been bought for the farm. We were told on a previous occasion that an experiment was in progress to show that it was possible to keep forty head of cattle on forty acres. We have since been told, however, that the experiment did not realize the expectations, and it was found to be possible to keep only twenty-five head on that acreage. If forty acres will maintain twenty-five head, how does it occur that $1,600 are required to be expended for feed in order to keep sixty head on 460 acres?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is correct in stating that some fodder was bought last year, and that on the 460 acres, constituting the Central Experimental Farm, there are sixty head of cattle, or one to about every seven acres. It must, however, be borne in mind that a large portion of this Experimental Farm is occupied in experimenting work, such as testing different kinds of grain, roots, seeds and trees, and it would be quite unfair to treat it as a simple grain-raising and stock-feeding farm.

Mr. McMILLAN (South Huron). In regard to the experimental portion of the farm, I admit that a large quantity of grain is raised and distributed among farmers, of which strict account should be kept, and it would be correct to purchase grain to replace that so distributed. One of the great necessities of the day is to show the farmers how large a number of cattle can be kept upon a small quantity of land; but on the forty acres on the Experimental Farm they have failed in doing this. They have four stablemen to take care of sixty-six head of cattle, when those cattle should be cared for in the most economical way. I cannot see why they should have to purchase straw and hay, when they can raise so much straw and corn fodder on the farm. I want an explanation of that.

Mr. CHRISTIE. I wish to inquire, on what principle the report of the Experimental Farm was distributed last year? About one-third of my constituents are French, and I applied for a number of French copies but received only a few. This year, I got very few English copies and no French at all. I would like to get a fair proportion for distribution among the French constituents in my county.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Saunders has charge of the distribution of the reports, and I have no doubt he distributed them fairly. A certain number of copies are printed and are divided up amongst the members of the House pro rata. The French copies are fewer in the number than the English, and are not distributed in the purely English provinces. I think a number of these were ordered to be printed at the request of the Committee on Agriculture, and the members were invited to send applications for copies which were distributed through the regular channels of the House, in proportion to the applications and the quantity on hand. These copies are not for a particular party, but for the whole House, and I am sure if my hon. friend will make his application he will get his proper share.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I have the same complaint to make as the hon. member for Argen-teuil (Mr. Christie). I did not receive a single copy of the Experimental Farm Report or the Dairy Report of last year, although the Printing Committee ordered that they should be distributed equally amongst the members. I would like to know why some members received a full quantity, and other members none at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Has my hon. friend made application for them?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The understanding at the Printing Committee was, that there should be made an equal distribution, but as far as I am concerned I have been left out altogether. When application was made to the members to state the number they required for their constituents some of them requested as many as 11,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt that the more keen witted member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), who sits alongside of my hon. friend, and who represents a farming constituency, got his proportion. Perhaps the two supplies went to him through mistake.

Mr. GRIEVE. I am something in the same fix as the member for South Brant (Mr. Somerville). I did not receive any of the reports, and I would like to know if that hon. gentleman has got the proportion due to my constituency?

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). An old politician said that a full confession was good for the soul, and I want to say that I was treated very liberally by the distribution department. I made a modest application, for I think, somewhere about five or six hundred copies of each report for my constituents. I thought that this number would enable me to reach all classes, who are interested in these questions in the riding, without regard to political complexion. I received that number quite bountifully and considerably more. In fact, I received so many that I said to my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Somerville), when a considerable time had elapsed and none reached him, that it looked to me as though the distribution was one-sided, and I think I passed four or five hundred copies from my collection over to him, with the understanding that if he got his distribution afterwards he would make a readjustment. I have, therefore, nothing to complain of.

Mr. FOSTER. Neither has the member for Brant (Mr. Somerville).

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Certainly I have, because I think the officers of the House should attend to a business matter of that kind in a business way, and I think the distribution ought to be equal amongst the members. Unfortunately, we have not the Minister of Agriculture in this House or he would be able to tell us about the matter.

Mr. FOSTER. They are distributed through the House and not through the department.

Mr. GRIEVE. Would it be possible to have a number of these reports printed in German? In the county I represent, and in the adjoining county of Waterloo, there are a large number of German people who are among the best farmers and the best citizens we have in Canada, and there is no doubt that these reports would be of great advantage if some copies in the German language were distributed amongst the German farmers, as is done in the case of the English and French-speaking farmers. A large number of the German farmers in my constituency have asked me if it would be possible to get some of these Experimental Farm Reports printed in German, and I trust that the Minister of Finance will see his way to having that done.

Mr. FOSTER. Those reports are printed by order of the Printing Committee and the Committee on Agriculture, and that is a matter for those committees to decide. My hon. friend will probably not deny that the German farmers read and understand English, and can get the substance of these reports quite well in that language. If we undertake to print in all the languages of all the people who come to Canada, it will be rather an expensive operation. If it is a fact that there is a large body of our people who cannot read English, and who are interested in these reports, that would put a different complexion upon the matter, but I imagine that the Germans in that section of the country speak and read English and understand the reports.

Mr. GRIEVE. No doubt a majority of the German people can speak English, but there are a great many of them who cannot read English, and I think when any report of that kind is printed in their own language they can understand it much better. I have had frequent requests from many of my German friends asking that if possible these reports should be printed in their own language.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth).

Mr. SPEAKER. There are in my county a very large number of Germans, I think between 2,000 and 3,000, all of whom can read and write in their own language, but, unfortunately, many of them, being old-country Germans, who have come to this country within a comparatively recent period, are unable to read in the English language, and in many cases their children, who have been educated in this country, have been educated entirely in German. If it could be arranged to print a comparatively small number of these reports in German, I, for one, should be very much pleased.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Finance Minister says that we have not been in the habit of printing these reports in German. I believe that, during his time, we have not, but at the time I first came here we did print German pamphlets for immigration purposes.

Mr. FOSTER. But not the reports of the departments.

Mr. McMULLEN. Those pamphlets were very interesting to the Germans. I sent a number of them away myself, and the German people who received them appreciated them very much. I fully endorse what the hon. the Speaker has said. Although the Germans in Canada are generally able to speak and read the English language, many of them are not, and I would like very much, out of respect to the large number of Germans that we have in the country, to have a number of the Experimental Farm Reports printed for them in their own language. As the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Grieve) has said, they are a very desirable class of settlers, and I think we can afford to show some little interest in them by educating them in the best methods of agriculture through the medium of these reports.

Mr. CARGILL. I fully endorse the suggestion made by the hon. members who have preceded me with respect to the advisability of printing some of these reports in German. There are a very large number of Germans in my constituency, and they are a very progressive class of people; in fact, they are as fine a class of farmers as we have in that section of the country. I am, therefore, very strongly in favour of the next issue of these agricultural reports in connection with the Experimental Farm being printed in the German language.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to say, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, that I had an application from a gentleman in the west to have the report of the Experimental Farm, and also the report of the committee, printed in German. He complained that a considerable number of his people could not read the English language very well. I think I submitted the application to the Minister of Agriculture. I had also an application from a gentleman in the west to have a number printed in Gaelic, and one from a gentleman in Manitoba, who said that there were a number of Scandinavians, Icelanders and Norwegians in that part of the country, who could only read in their native tongue, and he wanted a number translated and printed for them. But at that time the excitement ran so high over the dual languages that we were afraid we should multiply it, if we added two or three more; and when we considered the expense of translating and printing these reports in those different languages, I think the Minister of Agriculture came to the conclusion that it would be unwise to have it done, even though, as I believe, they would have done a great deal of good.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have repeatedly brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, and he has agreed with me that it would be desirable to do everything that was possible to encourage German settlers; but he has not yet done anything in that direction. Requisitions have been made to me on many occasions by influential Germans to endeavour to obtain these reports in the German language. As has been said, all the old country Germans who have settled in Canada, are able to read and write in their own tongue, and they acquire a knowledge of the English language very rapidly; but some of those who have recently come in, and who wish to learn the modes and habits of the people of this country, would be very much benefited if they could get the reports which have been referred to printed in the German language. I have not had any applications from the Norwegians or Scandinavians in the Northwest for pamphlets in their language; but at the time the hon. gentleman speaks of there was a vacancy in the Department of Agriculture, and it was thought that the hon. gentleman was the prospective Minister; hence he got so many applications. I do not know that the expense of printing these reports would be so very great, and I think it would be a good thing for the Government to endeavour to popularize themselves by granting this favour to that large class of settlers. All those who are aware of the progressive and thrifty character of the German population, will bear me out in saying that we have no better class of settlers in the country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Believing that the speeches which have just been delivered in favour of printing the reports of the Experimental Farm in the German language may have some effect on the Government, I desire to say a few words with regard to the printing of those reports. I can remember well when the Government had a number of immigration pamphlets printed in German—and I suppose circulated in Germany in order to encourage German immigration to this country—that they made a contract with a certain Mr. Bennett, of Prescott, to print these publications, although he was not a German and had no German type in his office. But they wanted to give him a contract, and they paid him, I believe, between $7,000 and $8,000 for the work. He fitted up his office with German type and filled the order. In making the investigation as to the amount which ought to have been paid for the printing of those pamphlets, I discovered, not only from my own knowledge of the printing business, but by obtaining the facts from a German printer in the town of Berlin, that the Government had paid Mr. Bennett enough, above what they ought to have paid him, to stock his office with steam printing presses and a complete outfit of type and furniture. Now, if the Government intend to get these pamphlets printed in German, I hope that, instead of getting them done at an English printing office at an exorbitant price, they will send them to an office carried on by a German.

Mr. SPROULE. I may say that the German who applied intimated that so far as he was aware there was not a German printer in the country who could do the work with the stock of type he had, but that he would have to go to the expense of getting a supply of type, and that the Government for that reason would require to pay a larger figure for the work.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Does the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) say there was no German printer in the country who could print those pamphlets?

Mr. SPROULE. There was no printer, so the writer informed me, who had sufficient type to print them without getting in an additional supply.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That is just sheer nonsense. There is not a word of truth in the statement. There are German printing offices in the town of Berlin and Walkerton, capable of printing books fifty times as large and which have the type in their offices. It was just a sheer job on the part of the Government to benefit Mr. Bennett, and give him out of the pockets of the people some $4,000 or $5,000 unjustly.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman has waxed indignant over nothing, because it was not for Mr. Bennett at all. The information was given to me by the gentleman I refer to, and the Government are not responsible.

Mr. BOWMAN. In the constituency I have the honour to represent, a large portion of the population speak German. It is quite true that the young generation growing up both speak and read the English language about as well as a native, but a large proportion of our farming community, who are Germans, do not speak English very well, and cannot read it readily. Consequently it is of considerable importance that these agricultural reports should be printed in their own tongue. There are at least a dozen constituencies in western Ontario where a large proportion of the population are German, and the older people of that nationality do not read the English language so as to understand it clearly. I do hope that the chairman of the Agricultural Committee will take the necessary steps to secure the printing of a considerable number of these reports in German. I will just call attention to another very important fact in connection with these pamphlets, and that is, that the chairman, if these pamphlets are to be printed in German, should have them translated by some one who understands the language. There was great complaint among the Germans over the immigration pamphlets printed in their language some years ago. Some of the critics in the county of Waterloo said the translation was the most wretched they had ever seen, and I can vouch for the correctness of their criticism from my own knowledge of the German tongue. As regards the statement of the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, that there are no German printing offices with sufficient type to do this work, there are five offices in the county of Waterloo where one of these pamphlets could be printed without taking down the type. I hope when he does get them printed, he will get some German to do the translating who understands the language, and send the job to the county of Waterloo.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say there were no printing offices, but the gentleman who wrote me said there were none. I was not aware of it myself.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The reports are now all in the hands of the Queen's Printer. He has informed me that they will be ready in a few days.

Mr. McMILLAN (South Huron). If that be the case, we could discuss this question much more intelligently with the report of last year in our hands. Will the Minister be kind enough to allow this to lie over? It is one of the most important votes in the interest of the agricultural community, and we ought to be in full possession of all that has taken place during the last year on the farms before passing this vote.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt these reports are hurried through as rapidly as they can be. They have to be compiled after the end of the year. The Agricultural Report is brought to the 31st of December, and this is only the 5th of February, so that I do not think the time elapsed is very unreasonable. The financial reports are only brought down to the 1st of July, and not to the end of the year.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for Huron is not unreasonable in the request he has made. It is proposed to discuss the operations of the department for the past year without any official communication as to what the department are doing. Is that reasonable? Is the great subject of agriculture itself receiving fair treatment to-day? You have removed from the Department of Agriculture a gentleman who had great experience and devoted a great deal of attention to it. He thought it was worthy of the department that he should leave his seat in the Senate and come down to the House of Commons in order to answer for that department. But you have removed him from the department and appointed to the office a gentleman who may be perfectly familiar with the subject of his profession, but who certainly has not, to this moment, given the country any evidence that he has the faintest knowledge of the agricultural interests of this country. You have, therefore, very wisely, under the circumstances, put him beyond the range of criticism by removing him to the quiet of the Senate. The subject of agriculture is practically ignored by the Government. The Government have told the House that the whole country is prosperous. The Minister himself the other night told the House and the country that never within twenty years have agricultural interests been on a better basis than they are to-day. That is the opinion of the financial head of the Government, who to-night is representing the Department of Agriculture. Whilst we must not expect too much from him, yet when he undertakes to fill the office of Minister of Agriculture for the purpose of passing the Estimates, we have a right to expect him or some one here to assist him in order to answer all proper questions. Now, I maintain that this department can never be satisfactorily dealt with whilst the presiding officer of it is not more intimately acquainted with the subject itself, and who also does not occupy a seat in this House. You may adjourn the discussion to-night, but the same difficulty will come up another night. The minister will come here with some cut-and-dried answers. He cannot give the information that the presiding officer is expected to give, and the adjournment, after all, whilst it will be of great service, I trust, cannot meet the whole requirements of the situation, until you get a proper and competent officer as head of the department. I think the agriculturists of Canada have every reason to complain at the way their interests are slighted on all occasions, great and small, by the Government of the day.

Mr. McMULLEN. Last year, when the Experimental Farm was under discussion in the Estimates, we reached just such a dilemma as we have reached to-night. The hon. gentleman will remember that we were proceeding with the consideration of these very items, when it turned out that the report was in the hands of the printer, that the then Minister of Agriculture had sent it to the Printing Department, and was not able to answer questions with regard to that report. The hon. gentlemen opposite were so determined to press it through, that we sat all night, and on the return of the Premier he admitted at once that the contention of the Opposition was just and reasonable, namely, that we should ask an adjournment until that report was in the hands of members of the House. Now, I think the Minister of Finance is over-stretching himself to-night in pressing upon the House these items, when the report of last year's expenditure is not in the hands of members. I really think that the demand of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) is a very reasonable one, that we should leave this matter over until the report is in our hands. I endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). I do not see how we are going to get along in this House with the Minister of Agriculture in the Senate. The agricultural interests of this country are undergoing a change at the present moment, and while we are here for the purpose of discussing the many important questions relating to that interest the Minister of Agriculture is in the Senate, unable to answer a single word or to give us any information. The Minister of Finance may consider himself a Solomon upon all points, but I think he will find that if he undertakes to answer everything connected with the Department of Agriculture, every question that is put, particularly those very important and pointed questions by the hon. member for South Huron, he will find that notwithstanding his extended knowledge he will hardly be able to satisfy the committee that he is so sufficiently well posted on all questions of agriculture as to take the place of the Minister of Agriculture, as well as fill the position of Minister of Finance. My impression is that if the Government wish to meet the general feeling of the farmers of this country they had better bring their Minister of Agriculture down from his retired and exalted position in the Senate, removed from being questioned on the all-important matters of agriculture, and they had better bring him here where he can be reached, and we will make the best use of him we can in the interest of the agriculturists.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not pretend to be a Solomon on agricultural matters. I am here to do the best I can; to answer questions and give information on all the items as they come up, and to make a careful note of all questions that are put and to which I am not able to give an answer. Solomon or not, even if my hon. friend who is criticising the agricultural estimates were Minister of Agriculture, he would find it very difficult to carry in his brain all the various items and be able to answer all the questions that a number of gentlemen might put to him in reference to the details of the agricultural farms of the country. It is a very difficult thing to do. I do not think that my hon. friend before me believes or thinks, or expects that every minute question as to the details of the farm can be answered off-hand, even by the Minister of Agriculture. That, I think, is quite impossible. We should be reasonable in that matter. Now, as to slighting the interests of agriculture, that is very well to say; but the records of this Government for the last ten years on agricultural matters are before the country, and the country knows and appreciates what has been done by the Minister of Agriculture and the very large expenditure of money for the furtherance of agricultural interests. That is open and patent to everybody. Now, the Agricultural Report is not down. We have often gone through these Estimates when it was found that the reports were not laid upon the Table, because, after all, the amount of information that the members get from the reports brought down by the department, with the exception of two or three financial reports, is not availed of in the criticism of the Estimates, but are rather availed of for reading outside of that. The reports this year are further ahead than they have been for a series of years back. But if my hon. friend would rather that these items stand over until the report is before the House, I have no objection. I acknowledge that he has a right to all the information that is reasonable on the farm business, in which he takes so great an interest. If he thinks it better that this stand over I will be glad to let it stand until the report comes down.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think it is very desirable that we should have the report in our hands—not that I want to throw any impediment in the way of agriculture, because I do not believe there is any other member in this House who is more enthusiastic in his desire to benefit the agricultural interests than I am. But I want everything to be done in the very best possible manner in the interests of the farmers of Canada. I thank the Minister very much for allowing this item to stand over.

Mr. DEVLIN. Perhaps the Minister would answer the question I put a moment ago as to who has charge of the French correspondence of the Experimental Farm?

Mr. FOSTER. The French correspondence is in the hands of two gentlemen, a clerk and an assistant. I do not know the names of the gentlemen, but I am aware they are there.

Mr. DEVLIN. Looking at the Auditor-General's Report, pages 122 and 123, I find only one French name, that of a Mr. McMurray, on the list. In looking through the travelling expenses of officers on the farm we find almost all English names. I do not wish to cause annoyance by pressing this matter, but this may explain the trouble in regard to the distribution of the French reports. I complained that they had not yet appeared. Perhaps they have appeared, and I did not receive the share which I asked. However, probably the reports were sent in French to French counties and in English to English counties. I represent what may be called a dual language county, a county in which both languages are spoken and in which there is a very large French population, numbering at least 40,000, and also a considerable English-speaking population. Necessarily reports in both languages should be supplied and distributed in such a county, and that is the reason why I complain of the non-appearance of the French reports and their non-delivery. A short time ago I received a letter from a gentleman who is thoroughly posted in connection with matters on the Experimental Farm, in which he affirms that, although there are gentlemen employed on the farm, who deliver very interesting and instructive lectures in the country, and especially in Ontario, no French lecturers are sent to the province of Quebec. I do not bring up this subject for the pleasure of complaining, but I trust it will receive the consideration of the Government, and, if they think proper, they will appoint gentlemen whom it would be easy to find in the province as well qualified as the English-speaking gentlemen sent to Ontario, to go through the province of Quebec and deliver lectures on the same subjects.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) I fully agree with the statement of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin), with respect to the want of qualified French-speaking officers on the experimental farm. The Government must remember that last year we repeatedly called their attention to the fact that numerous letters written in French had been sent to the Experimental Farm and no answers given to them. Last year they promised that that would be remedied; but, as just stated by the hon. member for Ottawa, when he looked into the Auditor-General's Report for this year, he found no more French officers than last year. The fact is that one looking at page 123-B of the Report cannot find a single French name amongst the officers of the Experimental Farm, except some labourers. I call to that fact the attention of the French members of the Government from the province of Quebec, as the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Angers) is not here. I call upon the French ministers from the province of Quebec to see that that state of things be remedied. Last year I had the opportunity of bringing up numerous complaints in this House, from newspapers as well as clergymen and other influential gentlemen in the province of Quebec, stating that when they sent letters written in the French language they never received an answer. The reason is very plain: it is because there is no officer there who might answer French correspondence. The only officer there conversant with the French language is Mr. Murray, but his duties are very secondary—they consist in taking the French visitors over the farm, and to explain to them the work which is carried out there. He is a zealous and well qualified officer. I know that should he be put in charge of the French correspondence, he could do it perfectly well. I call to that the earnest consideration of the French ministers in this House, in order that they may convey these matters to the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, so that he may see to it that some French officers, by name and in fact, that is to say, men who should be conversant with that language, be put into that office. That would effectively remove the present evil. I am aware that in the province of Quebec, the newspapers complain that farmers are not so much interested in agricultural works and experimental farms as the farmers of other provinces; that may be true, and it is to be regretted. But I know that the farmers of the province of Quebec cannot receive any information. They send letters, and when reports are sent to them they are English reports. I myself had quite a number of these English reports, which are perfectly useless, for there is not a single English farmer in my county. As to the French reports, I received them lately. So that it should not be a matter of surprise that the province of Quebec should be, in point of farming interests, behind the other provinces; it is not treated like the others are. As a matter of fact, I know, however, that this charge of want of qualification is ungrounded. I know that our farmers are as intelligent men as those of the other provinces, if not more so, and I only wish that they be treated by the Government with the courtesy and consideration shown those of the other provinces. I again call the attention of the French ministers in this House to this state of things, which is to be regretted.

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) I can assure the hon. member that the attention of the new Minister of Agriculture was called to the matters referred to by him. I have no doubt, the fact is I was positively assured by him that these matters will soon be remedied.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) I will be very happy to hear of it. I do not often congratulate the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, but I will congratulate him should he change that state of things. I would now like to know the meaning of the following word in page 125-B of the Auditor-General's Report: "Canaille, 4,000 lbs., $36." I should like to know whether the Government grow that grain for the propagating of their friends.

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) The hon. member is mistaken; he ought to read the word in English.

Some hon. MEMBERS. (Translation.) What does it mean in English?

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) I am told that the English word is "bran."

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) I asked my English colleagues and was told by them that it meant nothing in English.

Aid to Agricultural Societies in the North-west Territories $7,000

Mr. CHARLTON. Have experiments been made in the North-west Territories in the cultivation of the tame grasses, timothy and clover, and, if so, with what results?

Mr. DALY. At both Indian Head and Brandon Experimental Farms very extensive experiments have been made in the cultivation of all native grasses and timothy and clover, with very favourable results.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am led to make this inquiry because, many years ago, on visiting the prairies of Illinois and Iowa, at the time those sections of the country were being first settled, it was a common report among the pioneers that timothy and clover would not grow on the prairie soil. I heard the same report in the North-west when I visited that country two or three years ago. The statement made by pioneers in the western states in that day with respect to their inability to raise tame grasses was entirely without foundation, and the truth is that one of the finest grass countries in the world for timothy may be found in the western states. It is a matter of great importance in the North-west as to whether tame grasses will succeed, and I am happy to hear that experiments have been made and the results have proved satisfactory.

The Haras National Co. $6,000

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I desire to inquire if it is necessary to go to London to find a gentleman to examine these animals in Montreal. It is a slight placed upon the judgment of gentlemen both in the province of Quebec and in eastern Ontario to say that the Government cannot find any one possessing sufficient knowledge of animals to decide as to their merits, without going to London, Ont., for a man to visit Montreal, whose expenses must be paid. Cannot a judge of animals be found near Montreal?

Mr. FOSTER. I dare say a judge might have been secured nearer Montreal. That gentleman, however, seems to have been employed by the Minister of Agriculture at the time and paid a small fee of $46.

Mr. LANGELIER. Is there a permanent contract with this company?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, for five years; it has run two years and has three years yet to run.

Mr. DEVLIN. To whom is the money paid?

Mr. FOSTER. To the company.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Why could not the services of Mr. McEachren, of Montreal, have been secured, instead of paying a man to come from London and examine the horses?

Mr. LAURIER. I do not know the nature of the contract entered into with this company, but if the hon. gentleman has paid any attention to what has been going on, he must have heard complaints from many sides that the horses supplied under this contract are very inferior animals, to say the least. I observe from the report that one of the horses was sent to the North-west, and this is what the report says:

In the latter part of May last the Percheron stallion "Clement" reached the farm from Montreal, for service in the neighbourhood. A Clyde or Shire stallion would prove much more acceptable to the farmers in the Territories than a Percheron, no matter how good the Percheron may be.

These animals are not giving satisfaction. The Percheron breed may not suit as well as the Clyde, but apart from the breed, complaints are coming to the Government that these are really inferior animals.

Mr. SCRIVER. Can the Minister of Finance inform the committee whether the same horses are kept on the Central Experimental Farm now as were there last year?

Mr. FOSTER. Two horses are kept on the Experimental Farm, and I think they are the same as last year. There have been complaints made as to the quality of some of the horses, but I think it is in the contract that if any of them become disabled, or anything of that kind, others shall be put in their place by the company.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman said this money was paid to the Haras National Company. Can he tell me who is the president of that company?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot.

Mr. DEVLIN. Can he say how many members form this company?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot. As my hon. friend will see this does not affect the contract.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think I can supply the information. The head of that company is the Hon. Louis Beaubien, Minister of Agriculture for the province of Quebec. He and his son-in-law are the whole company in fact. I may say from information which I have, that this payment of $6,000 a year is a huge job. Not one of these stallions is worth $1,000, and yet we are paying $1,000 a year for each. Those who know tell me that none of these stallions would cost $1,000 in France, where they were bought.

Mr. CHARLTON. $1,000 a year is a most outrageous price. There is a job there unquestionably.

Mr. FOSTER. That includes the keep of the horses.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I was on the farm last year and the year before, and I would not give the bonus that one horse gets for the two put together. They are utterly unsuitable and they are not the class of animals that can be used for the farms of this country. One of them is not fit to use for breeding. I say this not only on my own experience, but on the experience of a gentleman who probably knows more about it than I do. The only horses suitable in Canada are the coach horses, and the horses on the Experimental Farm are not at all the kind suitable for the English market.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is the present Minister of Agriculture a good judge of horses?

Mr. CHARLTON. The Percheron horses are going out of use altogether in the United States, and, as my hon. friend from Wellington says, what we want in this country is lighter driving horses. If the Government would provide for fine coach horses they would be conferring a benefit on the farmers of this country. The Percheron stock in the States is going out of use, and horses of that class can be bought for the price of ordinary farm horses at the present time.

Quarantine Salaries and contingencies for organized districts. $40,500

Mr. CHARLTON. What steps have the Government taken with regard to quarantining against the introduction of cholera into this country?

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry the hon. gentleman was not present when I explained that fully the other day. I may say, in brief, that steps are being taken to put the four quarantine stations on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts in a state of thorough efficiency. On the chief quarantine station at Grosse Isle, $50,000 or $75,000 will be expended there in furnishing the equipment, shelters, hospitals and everything, on the most approved plan which is necessary for quarantine purposes. At Halifax similar preparation is being made: the quarantine station on Lawlor's Island is being arranged, the most perfect machinery for fumigating is being put in, and generally everything is being done that is necessary to make of it a first-class quarantine station. In the city of St. John everything necessary is being done and will be ready for the summer navigation. In British Columbia the quarantine station is being removed to William's Head, a little farther down, where a site is being purchased, and where an equipment costing about $80,000 is being put in. These are the four principal quarantine stations, or what are called the organized districts. In addition, such precautions as are thought necessary will be taken at some of the more open ports, although it is not the purpose of the department to make a quarantine station of every port on the coast. That would be too expensive and would not be necessary.

Mr. CHARLTON. There is another point with regard to which I would like some information. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, is probably aware that a proposition has been made in the United States to suspend the permission to land steerage passengers during the coming season—practically to suspend the immigration of steerage passengers. If that is done, it will probably throw a very large increase of that class of immigration upon our shores, and it may possibly lead to some complications between our own Government and that of the United States in regard to the introduction by way of the St. Lawrence of steerage passengers going to the United States. Has a possible complication of that kind occurred to the Minister, and has it received any attention on the part of the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes: the Minister is keeping himself thoroughly in accord with that movement. At first, about a month ago, it would have seemed, from what knowledge we had through the press and otherwise, that there was a decided movement in the direction of stopping all that kind of immigration into the United States. I think the hon. gentleman himself will agree that later information rather inclines one to believe that that extreme step may not be taken. However, we do not know what will be done. The only thing for us to do is to watch the trend of events, and that, of course, the Minister of Agriculture is doing. I may say to the hon. gentleman who questioned me the other day that the authorities here are in accord with the authorities of the largest cities along the border and on the coasts to the south of us, and that measures are taken in accord, so that I think there will be no friction or disagreement.

Mr. WELSH. May I ask the hon. Minister what steps, if any, are being taken towards establishing a quarantine station at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island?

Mr. FOSTER. I think the Minister is looking after Charlottetown as well as other ports. Charlottetown, of course, does not occupy the same position as some other Atlantic ports in regard to immigration. The same may be said of the city of St. John, although a large number of coasting vessels call there. But I know that the Minister is looking after Charlottetown, and that whatever precautions are necessary will be taken.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). I would like to ask what steps are being taken towards erecting a quarantine station at Sydney? I know that requisitions have been made for one there, and an engineer was sent down to make inquiries.

Mr. FOSTER. I can state that the Minister is considering the case of Sydney also.

Mr. STAIRS. I would like to ask if tenders have yet been asked for the work to be done at Lawlor's Island?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not sure that tenders have been asked, but I believe the work is going on.

Mr. LANGELIER. I would like to know if it is the intention of the Government to carry out the recommendations of the Sanitary Commission as to the Grosse Isle quarantine station? It is in the recollection of all the members of this House that that station was visited last year by scientific gentlemen from this country as well as from the United States, and they all agreed that the station was in a most wretched condition. I am aware that some improvements have since been made, but one of the principal recommendations of that Sanitary Commission was that a deep-water wharf should be constructed at that point. It was considered that the steamships coming through the St. Lawrence could not stop anywhere near the present quarantine station in order to be disinfected. The disinfecting apparatus has to be worked at the wharf, and all the steamers cannot reach the present wharf. It was understood at the time that the Government intended to undertake the construction of a deep-water wharf; but what I have seen in the papers lately would seem to indicate that the Government have abandoned that idea because some extra dredging would be required. I can hardly think that that information is correct, because I do not believe that the Government would leave us in an unprotected condition on account of the extra expense that it would be necessary to incur. Some very expensive, and I hope effective apparatus has been obtained by the Government from the firm of Carrier, Laine & Co., of Levis, and has been sent to the quarantine station; but that apparatus will be perfectly useless, it will be impossible to use it, unless the deep-water wharf is built. I would like to know if the Government still adhere to their intention to build that wharf?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that the hon. gentleman is right in saying that the Government expressed its intention to build a deep-water wharf. The idea was broached and has been discussed very thoroughly between the Government and the steam-ship owners with the view of having everything done that was necessary, and with the view of not doing at a large expense what was not considered fairly necessary to provide ample protection. It is not true either that the Government decided not to build the wharf because some extra dredging is necessary. The dredging itself would be a small item in the whole expenditure. The wharf itself would be a very expensive work, and in no case would it be available for the season soon to open, when, if cholera comes at all, it will most probably come. A doubt has been expressed, and it has not, I believe, been solved up to the present time, whether in rough weather, with high winds blowing, it would be possible or safe for large steam-ships to come up to that wharf, even if it were built; and in rough weather alone a wharf would be necessary for the purpose of facilitating the proper fumigating of the ships. So that it has not yet been decided to build the wharf, and it is of the less importance that the decision has not been come to yet—for the question is not yet closed—because if it were decided now to build it, it would be impossible to have it available for the coming season. It is not true either that the apparatus which is being prepared for that station could not be used without the wharf. It can be used, and, as I said before, everything that is necessary towards the proper fumigating of the vessels, the proper cleansing and proper care of those who are sick with cholera, or who have to be detained at quarantine, has been done or is being done; so that when the season of navigation opens everything will be in readiness to meet the eventuality which we all hope will not occur.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sure that the country will learn with a very deep sense of disappointment of the words which have been just uttered by the hon. Finance Minister. The hon. gentleman is not in a position to say just now whether all the recommendations made by the Sanitary Commission will be carried out or not. It seems to me that the Government are taking that matter altogether too lightly. We know that last year the Minister visited the quarantine station and reported it to be in perfect order, whereas the Sanitary Commission who afterwards visited it reported it to be in a very imperfect condition and altogether unsuited for quarantine purposes. I think the report of these scientific men ought to be followed to the letter, no matter what the cost may be. That commission has recommended that a wharf should be built, and in my judgment it ought to be built. It may be that the wharf will not be ready for the coming season. Perhaps yes, and perhaps no; and even though it should not be, that is no reason why it should not be built, or why the work should not be commenced at the very earliest moment. In fact, the quarantine station ought to be always in such a state of repair that it would be ready to meet any emergency that might arise. We do not know when disease may come; it may come to-morrow or it may not come for ten years; but in the meantime, in this country, as in other countries, the quarantine regulations should be kept at the highest standard, and when the Sanitary Commission recommend that a wharf ought to be built at Grosse Isle station to make the quarantine what it ought to be, such a recommendation should be carried out to the letter. That is what was expected by the country at large. We are told that it is still under consideration whether a wharf is to be built or not. In such an important matter the time for consideration is past, and the time for action has come.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman can hardly make that out, because I suppose he will agree that if ten thousand sanitary commissioners recommended that a wharf should be built, at a cost of $150,000, it would be impossible to have it built in time for the approaching season. It is therefore, as I have said, an impossibility, so far as that goes. The Government have not come to a final decision in the matter, because, after having a conference with steamboat owners and the like, we have asked certain information which they are preparing for us. Suppose the Government comes to a decision a month or two later, this being the winter season, which interferes with the work, it would be impossible then, if it be decided to build the work, to have it ready for the coming season of navigation, so that my hon. friend is entirely out when he attempts to blame the Government in connection with this wharf. The Sanitary Commissioner is an excellent authority as regards fumigation and all other matters of sanitation, but I suppose that steam-ship men and this Government must be allowed to have some little choice as to the building of wharves and matters of that kind, which hardly come within the scope of the Sanitary Commission. In any case, it is perfectly impossible to build the wharf in time for next season's navigation.

Mr. LAURIER. The Government do not tell us whether they will build it at all. The hon. gentleman rather deprecates the authority of scientific men on the question. I think their authority ought to be paramount, because, as I understand, this fumigating apparatus cannot be used except at the wharf.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, it can. There is not a vessel that goes into the port of New York which is fumigated at the wharf.

Mr. LAURIER. Where are they fumigated?

Mr. FOSTER. Out in the harbour.

Mr. LAURIER. Why do the Sanitary Commission recommend so strongly the wharf?

Mr. FOSTER. That bears out what I have said, that this is a matter which may well be left to the judgment and consideration of those who are not scientists. If my hon. friend will look at the harbour at Liverpool and the sanitary arrangements there, he will find that vessels are not fumigated at the wharfs there, any more than they are in New York, but are fumigated from tugs alongside them. The Government cannot be charged with dereliction of duty through not having taken every proper and reasonable precaution. The building of wharfs is a matter which must be left to their judgment, as a matter of business. If a wharf could be built there at which steamers could call and be fumigated and land their passengers at all seasons, that would be a great convenience to the shipping interests, but as regards fumigation, that can be very effectively done without a wharf.

Mr. LANGELEIR. I would like to know whether Dr. Montizambert, the superintendent of the quarantine, recommends the construction of the wharf? He has been there many years, and no man in this country knows better than he what is required for the station. I understand that he, among others, recommends the construction of a deep-water wharf, if not for the convenience of ships, at least for the landing of passengers. I have been at that station several times, and I know it is a very difficult one to land passengers at, as there is no place where the wind blows stronger, and it is certainly very dangerous when passengers have to be landed, especially sick passengers to have to land them in small boats.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I wish to urge strongly on the Government the importance of being prepared for any emergency that may arise next spring in this connection. This country expects that everything the Government can possibly do will be done, and is willing to see that any amount of money is placed at the disposal of the Government to perfect arrangements for the prevention of cholera. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to assist the Government in every way in perfecting the sanitary arrangements at this station. The arrangements at that station were condemned last season, and this has a tendency to create great uneasiness in the minds of the people. I would like to know under whose supervision the sanitary arrangements have been provided?

Mr. FOSTER. Dr. Montizambert.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Who has supervised the mechanical arrangements?

Mr. FOSTER. A special officer of the Public Works Department.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then, as far as the Government is concerned, all the apparatus has been provided, and everything is ready in case of an outbreak in the early spring.

Mr. FOSTER. Everything will be ready.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The necessity of doing this cannot be too fully impressed upon the Government. Those of us who saw the epidemic of cholera in Canada some years ago know the importance and gravity of this subject, and the great responsibility thrown on this Government and the House in seeing that the latest and most improved scientific apparatus is provided to prevent the introduction of cholera. I would feel that I was remiss in my duty if I did not urge upon the Government as strongly as possible, the importance of their being alive in this matter. I do not know whether the changes made in this department, which has the care of the health of the country, will be in the best interests of the country. I do not want to find fault with the Government in that respect, I did not rise for that purpose. But I think it is desirable that some person who understands those questions should be in charge of that department during the present season. I think it is almost to be regretted that this matter is entrusted to a new officer who has not been in the public service for any length of time, who has not given his attention to those matters so vital to the well-being of the people of this country. I do not say this in a political sense, I speak from a national stand-point. The gentleman who fills that position will have control of the destinies of this country in that respect, to a great extent, and the power, perhaps, if he has given his attention to these questions, of staying that pestilence and preventing its introduction into this country. I hope, sincerely, that the Government will redouble their efforts, and I think they will meet the wishes of this country by seeing that the most scientific appliances and the most approved apparatus and the best skilled experts in connection with this work should be secured. It may be well for the Government to have a gentleman there who is well qualified; I do not say anything against his qualifications, but I would think it wisdom on the part of the Government if they had a consultation with those who have given great attention to sanitary matters, who have made them a life study, and who are even more competent, perhaps, than those who have been stationed at quarantine stations for many years. I think it would be expedient if the Government were to employ some of those gentlemen in this country who have devoted almost their entire lives to sanitary matters, and who would be able to make a report, confidential if necessary, to the Government on the important matter that is before us. I think it is not safe, it is not desirable or wise, on the part of the Government, to entrust the whole care and responsibility for these matters to any one officer, however good he may be; but I believe that the opinions of those who are competent to judge on such matters should be taken by the Government, and this House will not begrudge them all the supplies that are necessary in order to secure the assistance of the greatest skill and wisdom that are available, in order that, if possible, this terrible pestilence may be kept out of our country.

Mr. FLINT. I would ask the Minister if there have been any complaints made from the quarantine station at Halifax with regard to the disinfecting apparatus used there being injurious to the clothing of the passengers. Recently there was a rumour that such was the case, but I was not aware whether a complaint had been made to the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman will find out, if he inquires into the matter, that such a circumstance is apt to take place, and that in fact it does take place in all ports where disinfectants are used. Where fumigation takes place it may be difficult to keep certain classes of articles from being injured. There were at first reports that injury had been done at the first disinfection at Grosse Isle. I had not heard of a like complaint from Halifax. I think the apparatus used is of the most modern kind. The best that can be had will be used, and as well as it can be used. I think the department has taken every precaution it possibly can take in that respect. The main object is to destroy the germs of the disease, and if the clothes have to suffer, it is better they should, than the disease be brought in. At the same time, the latest and most scientific methods are taken for fumigation.

Mr. FLINT. As this subject has been discussed with considerable earnestness, and none too earnestly in view of its importance, I think we may conclude, from the attitude taken by the members of this side of the House who have spoken, that the Government should feel encouraged to go further in the matter of expenditure for all necessary purposes than they might otherwise do, if they feared a severe criticism for a lavish expenditure. I had the good fortune personally to inspect the Grosse Isle quarantine station at the close of last session, and I think I would only be doing justice to those through whose courtesy I had an opportunity of making the examination I did, as a duty in consequence of my position as a representative in this House—I would not be doing my duty, I say, if I did not express the great gratification which it afforded me to see the care and attention given by the various officials at that station. There must be, of course, a large number of representatives of the people, as well as an enormous number of the people themselves who are not aware of the great difficulties of the subject we have now under consideration. I am certain that I learned much which will be of great value in the consideration of matters of this kind coming before the House. I can congratulate the Government, conscientiously and sincerely, upon the character of the gentlemen who are in charge of that station at Grosse Isle. Their learning, their faithfulness, their enthusiasm in the cause of sanitary science, could scarcely be too highly praised. The people of the country are fortunate in having at that gateway to the Dominion, men of this character. I myself, perhaps, as well as others, might have underrated the amount of physical and mental worry which devotion to the duties of that office demands at the hands of these gentlemen. They have to visit vessels at all hours of the day and night, no matter what the weather may be, and their labour is none too highly compensated by the Government. I think that the representatives would support the Government in any measures that might be taken towards increasing and improving the accommodation afforded to the staff at Grosse Isle. I say frankly, that I was not pleased or gratified with the accommodation which the medical officers are now afforded at that place. I know that this matter has been repeatedly brought to the attention of the Government—although no complaint was made to me on that subject—in fact, I think there was a disposition to pass it by as of not very great importance. I do think that, in considering the difficulties those gentlemen have to overcome and the importance of the position they occupy, the Government could well expend several thousand dollars in improving the means they have of living comfortably and of establishing their families comfortably in that place during the quarantine season. I congratulate the Government, and I am very glad to notice that they are taking steps towards introducing the very best improvements that are known in connection with the fumigation of vessels and of clothing and of passengers, and of such things as may be a cause of danger if allowed to enter into the country unfumigated. The subject of the deep water pier, I think, has been pressed upon the Government for many years. I can appreciate the reasons which induce the administration to shrink from the very large expenditure unless they felt that such expenditure was absolutely necessary. It is quite evident that a pier cannot be constructed at Grosse Isle for less than a hundred thousand dollars, that will be at all satisfactory to navigation. But it also must be evident to any person studying this matter that within the next two years a pier at which vessels can land their passengers and discharge their cargo, if necessary, and be properly fumigated, will be one of the necessities at that point. It will take several years, I presume, to construct such a pier, but if he will bear in mind the difference in the size of the ships navigating the St. Lawrence now and in use at the time when the pier was constructed, we can see that although we expend $125,000, there would actually be no more accommodation for our vessels now than existed twenty-five or thirty years ago. Thirty years ago, a large majority of the ships and steamers could land their passengers at the present pier, but since that time the tonnage of vessels has enormously increased, so that they cannot come within many hundred yards of the present pier; and it will be a subject of great complaint if at any time during next season, or the season following, a large passenger steamer with 1,000 passengers should be detained in the river off Grosse Isle, unable to land passengers during a storm, with this dread disease rapidly increasing on board the vessel. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), probably the facilities for landing passengers are of more importance than those for fumigation. At present tug-boats and steamers can carry out fumigating apparatus, and more or less adequate disinfection can take place on the steamers; but in regard to the landing of passengers, we can conceive the desirability of landing 1,000 passengers in a storm and the difficulty under which the officers of the island would labour. I, therefore, join with hon. gentlemen in urging on the Government the desirability of taking into consideration as soon as possible the expenditure of the necessary sum to build a good and substantial pier at Grosse Isle, suitable for the largest class of vessels. Canada requires at least two of the most thorough steam disinfectors. One should be placed at Grosse Isle and the other probably on the Pacific coast. Grosse Isle stands at the gateway of the Dominion. If we are well equipped at Grosse Isle, then we shall secure the confidence of the sanitary authorities south of us, as well as the confidence of the people of the whole country. I desire to inquire if the threatened difficulties on the question of jurisdiction between the authorities of the province of Quebec and the Dominion authorities, has been settled and adjusted. It was unfortunate that such a difficulty should have arisen, and I trust before next season all conflict of authority between the health officers of Quebec and the health officers of the Dominion will be so thoroughly adjusted and harmonized that we shall not see collisions occur, or any of the terrible effects of threatened conflict of jurisdiction which rendered the port of New York almost a scandal during the latter months of last season. I desire to ask the Government if these difficulties have been settled and adjusted?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. With that object in view, a conference took place last week between representatives of the Provincial Governments and those of the Dominion Government. They have adopted certain recommendations, and they will be laid before the Government, but we have not yet heard them. We will probably hear them tomorrow.

Mr. HEARN. It must, I am sure, be very gratifying and assuring to hon. members on both sides of the House to hear what has been said by hon. members of the Government and by the leader of the Opposition and by his hon. colleague for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) on the important question which has occupied the House for the last half hour or more. On the part of the Government we have the assurance of the hon. Minister of Finance, as well as the hon. the Premier, that all that medical science could suggest for the protection of the country against the introduction of disease by the St. Lawrence, has been carefully attended to by the Government. On behalf of the Opposition, we have the leader of that body, as well as the hon. member for Quebec Centre, urging that the Government shall undertake something more, and provide, by the building of a deep-water wharf, better facilities for the landing of passengers at Grosse Isle. The Government, in reply, have declared that that intention has not been abandoned, and while, for the coming season, it is not possible to have the work commenced and completed, yet it by no means follows that the work will not be carried out. This information cannot be otherwise than gratifying and assuring to the people of the country. For my own part, as one of the representatives of Quebec, I feel it my duty to tender thanks to the Government for their assurances, and to state at the same time, that I sincerely and earnestly trust that the anxiety given expression to by the leader of the Opposition and his colleague, the hon. member for Quebec Centre and the hon. member for Yarmouth

(Mr. Flint), touching the necessity for building this wharf, will commend itself to the attention of the Government, and that the result will be the construction of the wharf, if not next season, early in the season following.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have no doubt the Government are fully impressed with the extent of the responsibility which rests on them in connection with this matter. It is a question far exceeding in importance any financial question or any questions affecting the mere material interests of the country. The introduction of cholera would be a national calamity of the most terrible character, and confronted with the possibility of the danger of the introduction of the disease, it behooves the Government to use every effort that lies in their power, to exhaust every means at their command to combat that disease. I am sure they do not need to be told that no criticism as to the expenditure they may deem it necessary to make in this connection will be indulged in on this side of the House. We do criticise the expenses of the Government rather sharply sometimes, and we consider some of them to be unnecessary, but, in this connection, whatever may be necessary to spend will be cheerfully voted by the House I am sure. It strikes me, from the discussion that has taken place, that the building of the deep water pier, although the Government may not be able to finish it in time for next summer, should be entered upon without delay, and pushed to completion as soon as possible, and I do not believe the expense incurred should deter the Government from undertaking the work. It seems to me, from what I heard and know in relation to the transfer of passengers from vessels lying in the stream at anchor, perhaps tossing and pitching in a heavy sea, that it will be a very difficult task, and involve great suffering to make such transfer, especially if this dread disease exists on the vessel. I hope the Government will see that consultation is had, that their officials keep in touch with the sanitary authorities of England and of the United States in this matter; that all the appliances that can be used will be used under the most enlightened medical supervision, and that all preventive methods that can be procured will be adopted. If the expenditure in connection with the deep water pier does not exceed $100,000 or $150,000, and if the work is necessary, the expenditure of that amount of money ought not to be considered an obstacle by them. I would ask the Minister of Finance what length of time will be necessary for the construction of this pier, what kind of material will be used, what amount of dredging has to be done, and the estimated cost to complete it with the utmost expedition?

Mr. FREMONT. I am most happy to see the great importance which the members of this House attach to the Grosse Isle quarantine station. I have had a good deal to do with sanitary measures during the course of last summer, and I have met quite a number of medical men and members of sanitary associations who have visited that quarantine station. In the conversations I have had with them, they have all been unanimous in stating the utmost necessity of a deep water pier at Grosse Isle. Moreover, I am under the impression, and I think I am right in saying, that Dr. Montizambert, the superintendent of the station, has recommended the building of such a pier, not only this year, but in several of his previous annual reports. The hon. Minister of Finance has stated that a number of steam-ship owners were of opinion that the construction of such a pier was not a necessity. I would be very anxious to know the names of these steam-ship owners.

Mr. FOSTER. In order to relieve my hon. friend I may say that he misunderstood me. I stated just the opposite, that the steam-ship owners were favourable to the project.

Mr. FREMONT. I am glad to see that both the steam-ship owners and the medical men are favourable to the building of the pier. It may be quite true that it would be impossible to have this pier built for the approaching season, but still I think that the Government will not be fulfilling its duty if it does not take immediate steps to have this pier constructed with the shortest delay possible. I have been at Grosse Isle station in the course of last season, and I have seen all the inconvenience that results from the present system, both in the transshipment of passengers and the handling of whatever freight has to be disembarked for fumigating purposes. It has to be transhipped by tenders, and brought to the present wharf to be fumigated. The handling of such an amount of cargo is a loss of considerable time, as well as a danger to the parties who are engaged in the work. I have been told by persons who have studied the question, that disinfecting under the present system will detain vessels for a long time, and if this was the only objection, I think it would be sufficient to warrant the Government in taking immediate action. If a deep water pier should be constructed, I am told that the fumigating of a vessel and its cargo will only detain her a few hours at the station, which would not be a very great inconvenience to the shipping interest. For all these reasons the Government ought to do their utmost possible to ensure the construction of this wharf in the shortest time possible.

Mr. JONCAS. I first understood the Minister of Finance to say that one of the objections to the building of a deep water pier at Grosse Isle, was, that the steam-ship owners, or the pilots of the large steam-ship companies, had reported that it would be dangerous for their steamers to go to the wharf. Now, however, in answer to my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Fremont), the hon.

Minister says that the companies are quite willing to go to the wharf. That being the case, I ask why is it that the Government has not already decided to build a pier? Dr. Montizambert who has charge of that quarantine station has reported time and again in favour of building a wharf there, and if I am not mistaken the sanitary convention at Chicago last year strongly recommended the same thing. I am, therefore, at a loss to know why the Government has not decided to commence the work. It may be said that this wharf will not be ready for the opening of navigation, but if tenders are invited now, the work will certainly be completed before the latter part of the season. It is of the utmost importance that this pier should be constructed in view of the reports we have had from Dr. Montizambert, and from the scientific bodies who have made inquiries into the matter. If it were shown that the disinfection of vessels could be done as well by means of tenders as if a wharf were built, I can quite understand that the Government would have some reason not to spend such a large sum of money—perhaps $200,000 or a quarter of a million of dollars—but it is clearly proven from the information which we have that the disinfection of vessels can be made more thoroughly and more rapidly if a deep water pier is built. So I think, under all the circumstances and for all these reasons, that the Government ought to decide to build the wharf, especially if the large steamship owners report that they have no objection to go to it, and that there is no danger in the vessels going there.

Mr. FOSTER. That is just a point I would like to make clear, so that there will be no misunderstanding about it. In the first place, I want to make it clear that the steamship owners are favourable to and recommend the building of a wharf, that Dr. Montizambert has also recommended it, and that the Sanitary Commission has done the same. But it is not clear, and has not been made clear—and this is the point on which we are getting information at present—that if the wharf were built it could be used in rough weather, the very time when it is most essential that the greatest facilities for fumigating the vessels should be afforded. Now, this is not a commercial wharf; it will not be used for commercial purposes. It will cost $150,000 at least. If it is absolutely necessary to protect the country from the ravages of disease it will be built, commerce or no commerce, no matter what it costs; but if the wharf is simply a convenience in fine weather when the fumigation can be done with equal security and thoroughness without a wharf, though with a little greater delay, and if it is believed that in rough weather these big steamships could not and would not go to the wharf, then the Government have good ground for delaying to make its decision until these points are cleared up, and all the more so, as no interest suffers while we are obtaining the necessary data; for it is perfectly impossible to get this wharf built this year. The Government is often called an extravagant Government. In this instance it will be just as extravagant as the case may require, and the Opposition will find no fault in the amount that will be expended for this service. Therefore, that consideration is not keeping the Government back more than is necessary. There is no use, however, in building that wharf, unless there is to be a corresponding benefit derived from it.

Mr. LAURIER. Could you not put a few post offices on that wharf?

Mr. FOSTER. Whatever is necessary to inform the germs we will put there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What the hon. gentleman has said is true enough, but I think he will be held responsible to the country, if it should appear that the construction of this wharf is necessary to ward off the ravages of cholera, for not having taken steps to obtain the necessary information before now. The hon. gentleman knows that this is the eleventh hour at which to take measures to find out whether this wharf will be suitable in stormy weather or not. I remember last summer, when the whole country was agitated about the cholera, a medical association held its meeting in one of the leading cities in Canada; I do not know but it was in Ottawa. I read a report of that meeting in one of the papers and, if my recollection serves me rightly, the Government was there represented by the late Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Carling, and the construction of this wharf was urged upon him as a necessity. The expense of construction was spoken of, and I think the very figures mentioned by the hon. Minister to the House were then and there referred to, and the answer the then Minister of Agriculture gave to the medical association was that the Government had considered the matter, that the expense would not stand in the way, and that the wharf would be constructed. Immense cheering was said by the paper to have followed this statement, and a number of newspapers in the Maritime Provinces commented very favourably upon the pluck with which the Government had grappled with this question, and upon the readiness with which their mouthpiece had met the views of that medical association and announced that the expenditure of a few dollars were not going to stand in the way when the health of the country was at stake. That was all very well, but after these doctors delivered their opinions and the Government had spoken through the mouth of the Minister of Agriculture promising to build this wharf, it is rather extraordinary that the Minister of Finance should inform us that the matter is still under consideration.

Mr. JONCAS. If I am not misinformed, the Government are in receipt of contradictory reports as to the feasibility of steamers landing at this wharf. I understand that the Government would be ready to build the wharf at Grosse Isle, if it were well understood that the large steamers would call and be fumigated there.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government is advised that the pilots do not agree as to the feasibility of touching at the wharf and of its being used by the steam-ship companies. As regards the cholera germs, they can be destroyed just as thoroughly without a wharf as with one.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would call attention to the fact that a couple of months ago the Government made the announcement that they were prepared to construct a wharf.

Mr. FOSTER. I never saw it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It was made by Mr. Carling. He said that the Government had ascertained not only the feasibility but the necessity. The hon. gentleman says that this Government is being continually charged with extravagance. When there is any political advantage to be gained they stick at no expense whatever, but when there is none they are economical to parsimony in the matter of public works. No one would accuse them of extravagance in this connection in the Maritime provinces. The only charge I make is that at the eleventh hour, the hon. gentleman is seeking for information which he should have acquired last year, and if the cholera strikes the country next spring, he will be called on to recklessly expend money which the exercise of prudence and diligence and the obtaining of information at the proper time would have saved.

Mr. BERGIN. I think the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) is a little mistaken as to what took place at the meeting of the Medical Association.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not mistaken as to what was reported.

Mr. BERGIN. I do not think the association was at all unanimous in the idea that there should be a deep water wharf built at Grosse Isle. From the information I had, I opposed the building of that wharf, for this among other reasons, that it could only be used in fine weather. Since then, I have made further inquiry, and I have reason to believe that a wharf cannot be built there for the amount of money the Minister thought it could be built for, nor can it be built in the time he expected. As it is evident, from what we see in the papers, that the intense cold has not by any means killed out cholera in Europe, I would suggest that the Government should make inquiries as to whether there is not a more fitting place for a quarantine station than Grosse Isle. I am told that at Bic Island, near Rimouski, there is plenty of shelter and deep water, and it is a safe port, which can be entered at all times.

Mr. CHARLTON. How much further down is it than Grosse Isle?

Mr. BERGIN. A good deal further, and therefore all the more safe.

Mr. CHARLTON. How much would be lost in the value of the buildings at Grosse Isle? What is the value of the buildings there?

Mr. FOSTER. There is not only that question, but also the expenditure for building up a new station, and while we are crossing the stream I do not think we need talk about swapping horses. We are at Grosse Isle for better or for worse during this period, but I may say to my hon. friend that the Government have made inquiries about several places, Bic and one or two others.

Mr. BERGIN. There would certainly be a large expenditure, but I do believe that unless the dead are cremated more mischief will be done than any saving in the cost of buildings would cover. The opinion of the Medical Association was that there should be another island purchased at Grosse Isle to which convalescents could be removed.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have asked twice what is the estimated cost of that wharf, what is the character of the work, and what amount of dredging has to be done? How soon, by the use of all possible diligence, could that work be probably made ready for the landing of passengers from ocean steamers?

Mr. OUIMET. The estimated cost of the wharf, built in crib-work and filled with stone, amounts to about $185,000. It could be built and completed, probably, by the end of August or the beginning of September.

Mr. CHARLTON. We might hope, perhaps, that if it could be done by the middle of August, it would be ready before we would likely have a visitation of cholera. Cases of cholera were not imported into New York harbour last year until the month of October. If the wharf is at all necessary, and it can be built by the end of summer, I think the Government ought to undertake the work without delay and prosecute it with all possible vigour—presuming, of course, that it is necessary.

To meet possible expenses in connection with public health, and with cholera, and other infectious diseases $31,000

Mr. CHARLTON. What expenses are contemplated?

Mr. FOSTER. For the very purposes that my hon. friend and his colleagues have been urging us to undertake with a free hand—to prepare for any possible emergencies in the unorganized districts.

Mr. FLINT. Is part of this money to be used to improve the hospital for convalescents?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is possible that this sum may prove to be quite inadequate.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will open both his eyes when he sees the Supplementary Estimates.

Tracadie Lazaretto. $4,600

Mr. CHARLTON. Has the Minister any information to give with regard to that lazaretto?

Mr. FOSTER. Nothing more than is usually given. The number of patients keeps about the same—about twenty-six.

Mr. SCRIVER. Is there an annual report made by those who are in charge of the institution, and if so, where does it appear?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and you will find it on page 21 of last year's Report of the Department of Agriculture.

For Winnipeg and St. Boniface Hospitals. $4,000

Mr. CHARLTON. How is this decrease secured?

Mr. FOSTER. That has been given for a number of years, and began, first, with the idea that immigrants passing through would become a burden on the city of Winnipeg for their care. A vote of $10,000 was given, and certain restrictions and rules were adopted to prevent imposition as far as possible. The cause for that now has largely passed away, but it was considered inadvisable to drop the vote all at once. We think that the vote will disappear gradually in three years' time.

Cattle Quarantine. $20,000

Mr. CHARLTON. How many cattle quarantine stations are maintained now on the frontier?

Mr. FOSTER. There is one at Metis, and one in the west at Point Edward, or Sarnia.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is there one on the frontier of Manitoba, or one in British Columbia?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a quarantine belt, I think, on the border between Canada and the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. How long has this quarantine regulation been in force on the frontier against cattle of the United States?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it has been in force for a number of years.

Mr. CHARLTON. Has the existence of this regulation probably anything to do with the order recently passed at Washington?

Mr. FOSTER. I think not.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Mr. FLINT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 9th February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— CANADA AND NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. COSTIGAN presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons, further papers respecting the enforcement by the Newfoundland authorities against Canadian vessels of the Newfoundland Act respecting the sale of bait to foreign fishing vessels.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

OTTAWA, June, 1892.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That the foregoing Message and accompanying papers be printed forthwith, and that Rule 19 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS.

Mr. LAVERGNE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 24) further to amend chapter 135 of the Revised Statutes, respecting the Supreme and Exchequer Courts. He said: The object of this Bill is to amend section 29 of the said Act, in order to extend the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and make it as nearly as possible similar to the jurisdiction of Her Majesty's Privy Council in cases of the province of Quebec. Strangely enough, there is a difference between these two jurisdictions. Cases which are deemed sufficiently important to be appealed to Her Majesty's Privy Council are not appealed to the Supreme Court, for instance, cases of servitude. The Bill is a very simple one. The change of a few words will make the clause in question nearly similar to the article of the Code of Civil Procedure which governs the appeal to Her Majesty's Privy Council.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DIGBY PIER CONTRACT.

Mr. BOWERS asked, In the case of the Digby pier to be finished, as per contract, in June, 1892, was there an amount deposited with the Government as surety for the due performance of the same? What was the amount? Was that amount forfeited by the estate of the late John Nicholson, for non-fulfilment of contract, and does the Government still retain possession of said money? If not, why not? Does the Government intend to repair the old pier; and if so, will solid abutments be built on the north side of the present one and adjoining sufficiently strong for the Western Counties Railroad Company to place tracks or rails upon? Is the Government aware that the timber for the erection of a pier at Digby has been on hand for a long time and is of a perishable nature? As the worms destroy soft wood under water very rapidly at Digby, why have the Connollys been permitted to carry the hard wood timber away to St. John where the worms are not so destructive? Has the Government engineer made any report on the subject and what was the purport of the same? While the work has been in abeyance for 1892 have any persons been receiving money from the Government for supposed services rendered? If so, what amounts, and what have been the duties performed? Will the Government call for tenders for erecting the new pier, for which money is asked for by the Public Works Department, and for repairing the old part as soon as spring opens?

Mr. OUMET. An amount was deposited with the Government as surety for the due performance of the contract, which amount was $2,378.90. The department is still in possession of the deposited security. The department intends repairing the old pier and making it sufficiently strong to permit of the railway placing tracks upon it. The greater part of the timber has been delivered by the contractor for about eighteen months. This timber is, with the exception of a small portion, the property of the contractors. None of the timber which was the property of the department has been taken by the Connollys or any one else. No report has been made. In January, 1892, John Welsh received, for measuring timber, $25. It is expected that tenders will be called for the reconstruction of the old pier in a few weeks, in order that work may begin early in the spring. It is not the intention of the department to erect a new pier.

LURCHER SHOAL, N.S.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Has the Government taken into consideration the very dangerous character of the Lurcher Shoal lying within the Bay of Fundy, and the great amount of shipping and life annually endangered by it? Has the Government ever estimated the cost of placing and keeping a light-ship in position near said ledge, and will it take measures in the near future to find out the same?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The dangerous character of this shoal has been recognized by the department, and since 1882 an automatic whistling buoy has been moored there. The question of marking the shoal by a light-ship has been under consideration for some time, but as no decision has been arrived at, no estimate of the cost has been made.

ST. MARY'S BAY BELL-BUOY, N.S.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Is the Government aware that the bell-buoy at present on the Trinity Rocks at the entrance of St. Mary's Bay, N.S., is entirely too small and does not answer the purpose designed, of warning mariners of their proximity to these dangerous breakers? Will the department take immediate steps to remedy the same?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No complaints have been made as to the size of the bell-buoy at this point, nor of its answering the purpose for which it is placed. It has on different occasions been carried away, or moved from its present position, by the violence of the sea, but otherwise no complaints have been received by the department.

VOTERS' LISTS—REVISION.

Mr. GRIEVE asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have the voters' lists revised during present year?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

MARINE FOOD FISHERIES—PROPAGATION.

Mr. BOWERS asked, In view of the distribution of the treatise read before the Royal Society of Canada by Rev. Moses Harvey, on the artificial propagation of marine food fishes and the methods adopted by the Governments of the United States, Norway, Newfoundland and other European countries towards building nurseries and hatcheries for systematically increasing the propagation and distribution of codfish to the bays and waters of their respective countries; is it the intention of the Government of Canada to take immediate steps, by building hatcheries, to restock our bays and shores which, in late years, have been so rapidly depleted?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That matter is under the serious consideration of the Government.

PICKLED GOODS—DUTY.

Mr. LANGEЛИER asked, 1. Whether the Government is aware that the duty now levied on pickled goods is about equal to the price of the said goods? 2. Whether there are any manufactories of pickled goods in the country? 3. Whether it is the intention of the Government to move in this House for the abolition or reduction of the aforesaid duty?

Mr. WALLACE. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that the Government is not aware that the duty now levied on pickled goods is about equal to the price of said goods, the fact being that the value of pickled goods imported last year was $67,436, and the duty levied on them, $24,830. There are many manufactories of pickled goods in the country. As to the intention of the Government with reference to the aforesaid duty, the hon. gentleman will get his information when the Finance Minister declares the policy of the Government.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS—EASTERN TOWNSHIPS.

Mr. FRECHETTE asked, Is it the intention of the Government to cause fresh geological surveys to be made in the counties of Megantic and Wolfe, in order to stimulate the development of the mining industries of every kind in that section of the country, such as the mining of asbestos, copper, slate and lime? Is it also the intention of the Government to grant a bonus for each ton of ore extracted from the said mines, during the first twelve months of working, with a view to induce capitalists to invest their money in the said counties?

Mr. DALY. The whole area referred to in the above notice of motion has been most carefully and repeatedly examined and reported on at intervals extending over fifty years. Every mine and mineral-bearing locality has been examined. The distribution of the formations has been described and carefully mapped on a scale of four miles to one inch, and further examination could not, I believe, result in finding additional facts having any bearing whatever on profitable mineral development. Therefore, and in view of the large and promising area, both in Quebec and Ontario, in which no such accurate examinations have yet been made, it would, I think, be unwise to devote more time to a re-examination in these counties—the last report and examination having been made as late as the Annual Reports, Volumes II., III. and IV., 1887-1889, in which latter is an exhaustive report "On the mineral resources of the province of Quebec," of course within the area already examined, embracing the whole of the Eastern Townships.

CANADA AND NEWFOUNDLAND—NEGOTIATIONS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I ask the indulgence of the House to make an observation on the subject of the Newfoundland papers, which were brought down with a Message from His Excellency, yesterday. I do so in deference to the wishes and views of our colleagues from St. John's, Nfld., who met with us at Halifax. Hon. members will see, I think, when the record is printed, that it is convenient that I should make a statement now in order that my explanation may be on record when the papers come into the hands of hon. members. They will see that in the proceedings of 14th November, 1892, I am reported as having made two sets of observations on the subject of proposals for the union of Newfoundland. The first of these sets of observations reads thus:

Sir John Thompson, reverting to the former discussion upon this subject, was still strongly of opinion that, although the question of union might not be finally disposed of at this conference, what had taken place should be made a part of the record. Though the subject of union was not specially mentioned in the Order of Council of Canada, it was understood that all matters affecting trade relations with Newfoundland might be discussed, and any proposition tending to a solution of the existing difficulties, not only might, but should, be considered. He must, therefore, insist that what had been said should be recorded in the proceedings of the conference; otherwise they would not be a correct record of what had taken place.

In the second set of observations, I am reported as saying:

Sir John Thompson, in reply to Mr. Harvey, said that the Canadian delegates could, of course, only discuss the questions which the Newfoundland delegates were willing to discuss, and must discuss them in the order desired by the Newfoundland delegates. He considered, however, that the question of union was one of the greatest pending between Canada and Newfoundland, and therefore within the authority of the delegates to discuss. In any case, he pressed that what had been said on this subject on Saturday and to-day should appear on the record, if any record of the discussion was intended to be preserved and made public. The expectation of the public in Canada was that the question of union would be brought forward, and if the delegates, on their return, should be asked whether that question was taken up, they could not be expected to deny the fact. If the record was silent on that subject, they would be obliged to contradict the record.

These minutes are signed by all the delegates. But two or three weeks ago I received from Sir William Whiteway, Premier of Newfoundland, and the gentleman who presided at the conference, a letter stating that at the last meeting of the conference it was agreed that the first set of those observations should be eliminated and the second should stand; and, in point of fact, the second does express about the same views as are expressed in the first. I could only reply at that time, and I can only say now, that I was not present when any arrangement was arrived at to eliminate any part of the observations here recorded. At the same time I do not deny that such an agreement may have been come to; I was absent for a short time from the last meeting. Mr. Bowell, who is the only other colleague with whom I could converse on the subject, was unable to recall any such arrangement, and therefore I communicated with Sir William Whiteway, stating that my recollection did not agree with his, and that therefore I could hardly alter the record then, more especially as copies of it had been transmitted to Her Majesty's Government, and perhaps to other quarters, and it was not in my power to recall them, and asking him if he attached much importance to the fact that the first set of observations, as well as the second, appeared on the record, as I thought they were delivered. I have received a telegram from Sir William to-day, reiterating the request that the first set of observations should be eliminated, and from the tenor of his message I gather that the objection which he entertains to the first set of observations is, that they appear to imply that the Newfoundland delegates were resisting the appearance in the record of the conversation which had taken place on the previous day on the subject of union. I beg to say, while my recollection is still that the record is correct as to the two sets of observations, I hope it will not be inferred by the House that they were made with any view to resistance by our Newfoundland friends and colleagues to the record containing a narrative of what had taken place on the subject of union. Sir William calls my attention especially to the word "insist" in the first set of observations as seeming to imply that some insistence on that point is necessary. When I did prefer a request that the record should contain a statement of the conversation on the subject of union, I can only say it was cheerfully acquiesced in by our colleagues from Newfoundland, and I hope the House will not gather from the appearance of the first set of observations that there was any resistance on their part to the record containing a true and full narrative of what had taken place on the subject of union. The papers having been brought down, this is the only way in which I can meet the views of Sir William Whiteway and his colleagues, and I am sure the House will accept this statement as qualifying any implication which might arise, such as Sir William suggests, from the appearance of the first set of observations.

Mr. LAURIER. I accept the explanation offered by the hon. Premier as to the difference of opinion between the Canadian delegates and those from Newfoundland as to what actually took place at the conference. It is to be regretted, however, that more strict attention was not paid at the time to the manner in which the negotiations were set down in writing. I must take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. Premier and his colleagues upon the improvement of their methods with respect to conducting negotiations, and I offer my sincere congratulations at this time. At Halifax they adopted very different methods from those they pursued at Washington, for in the former case they had the negotiations taken down in writing and have submitted them to the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In this case I do not want it to be supposed by the hon. gentleman that there was any want of diligence or accuracy. The record of each day is signed, as it appears here; but on reconsideration, however, my colleagues from Newfoundland thought some wrong implication might be drawn from these words, and we could correct such impression in this way. The difference to which the hon. gentleman has alluded is explained by the difference between the two conferences, one being official and formal and the other confidential and private.

TREATY BETWEEN FRANCE AND GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. LAURIER. I desire to inquire from the First Minister if he is in a position to impart to the House any information with respect to the welcome news cabled to the press that a treaty of commerce has been signed between Great Britain, France and Canada?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I may be able to do so to-morrow; but the letters from the High Commissioner have only just arrived, and have not been laid before Council.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.

Mr. WELDON moved second reading of Bill (No. 2) to disfranchise electors taking bribes. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, which was introduced by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) in my absence, I have not very many observations to offer. The very title of the Bill, "An Act to disfranchise electors who have taken bribes," distinctly indicates its cardinal principle. Hon. members who have read the Bill will observe that a very familiar piece of machinery has been called into play to accomplish a substantially new purpose in this matter of dealing with electors who have taken bribes. This has been held to be a great evil in this and, I think, in all British countries and colonies where institutions like our own are found to exist. It is instructive to study the statutes of different British possessions with a view to ascertain how the legislatures of the mother country, of this country and of the colonies and other parts of the Empire have dealt with this evil to which I am calling the attention of Parliament in this Bill, and at which I am aiming to strike a blow. The machinery of the Bill, let me say, is taken with very few changes, and those altogether in the way of simplification and quickness of working, from an Act now on the Canadian Statute-book, which is itself largely a transcript of an old English statute. A Bill introduced by Mr. Blake in 1876 and carried through Parliament in that year, contemplated an inquiry made very much in the way of the inquiry provided for in this Bill, but which came to an entirely different end and conclusion. In the Bill introduced by Mr. Blake, which appears in our Revised Statutes, and which Parliament has therefore twice pronounced upon and accepted, it is provided that a commission may be appointed, where corrupt practices are alleged to have extensively prevailed in any county, to root out the whole matter, to get the names of all persons who are found guilty of corrupt practices, and to report those to the Attorneys-General of the provinces with the idea that they would be dealt with under the ordinary criminal laws of Canada. The purpose of this Bill is entirely different. It does not purport to be a Bill for punishment. It is not in any sense of the word a penal measure; it is not in any sense of the word a punitive measure, and that is the special point I wish to emphasize in the few remarks I will make this afternoon. The aim of the Bill is very different from that. It proceeds from the principle, which I think is a good British principle, which is, I think, a good Canadian principle; namely, that the right of voting, the right of putting a ballot in the box, is a great power under our constitution, and one that cannot safely be left in the hands of a person who uses that right unworthily. The Bill proposes to deal with that unworthy class of persons, as we deal with our children in whose hands we find valuable things, and whom we know to be too young to take care of them. We take these valuable things away until they grow older and are able to take proper care of the precious things they handle. So, we say to the corrupt electors, if we find that they have sold their votes, that they have improvidently and improperly put into the control of another the power which the state placed in their own hands of expressing their own opinion, or if by accepting money they allow another to express his own opinions under the disguise of their ballot, we say, that the power of the franchise must be taken from them. That, Mr. Speaker, is the sum and substance of this Bill. The plan suggested in the Bill is that they should be disfranchised for a term of years which will cover two elections. The idea in that is, first of all, to give those people time to repent, to have their attention sharply called to the fact that they have behaved unworthily, and when they have grown wiser and better, that they can again recover their franchise. A larger and more important purpose of the Bill is, to protect the commonwealth, by disfranchising the briber, to protect ourselves. It is a common subject of complaint, and I think a fair subject of complaint, which we have all heard made in counties where notoriously large sums of money have been spent at an election; that honest men, who do not sell their votes and who vote as they feel, have their ballots swamped by the votes of men who have no opinion of their own, or who for money will express a different opinion from what they feel. The hope of this Bill is to say to the honest voters: If you feel strongly in the matter, if twenty-five of you in an electoral district take enough trouble to send a petition to the Governor-General, if you procure enough money to pay the travelling expenses, you will have it in your power to bring to the district an officer whose bounden duty it is to promote further inquiry in every way. The Bill says to those people: If there is enough feeling against this bribery to induce you to get evidence to place before the officer, you can then, after a trial, get a list of persons who have taken bribes, and that black-letter list shall be handed to the proper officers, and these names shall be struck off the list of the revising barrister, with the result that in the next election and the election following these men shall not vote. The practical politicians in both parties have for many years told us, that there are in some counties a number of persons who simply will not exercise their franchise in elections, unless they be bought. This class is a standing temptation to the party managers on both sides, who sometimes feel obliged to avail themselves of the votes of these persons, in many cases not through baseness, but through fear. They fear that if the one party does not get their share of these votes, the other party will get them. I know one county in my own province—I may say it is not my own county—in which in one election some years ago the party managers dealt with these people, made a black-list of them, and agreed that the men who were understood on both sides to be spending money, would not approach the corrupt voters. The arrangement was kept in good faith, and these misguided men went off at five o'clock, at the end of the polling, not having been able to sell their votes. What this Bill aims at is, to protect party managers on both sides, party organizers and politicians, from the avarice and rapacity of these people, who have the power of the franchise, which they are not fit to have. That is an important point, but it is not one which I press very strongly in favour of the Bill. The great point which I wish to urge upon the House is, that a free state cannot have a very long life where wholesale bribery occurs at the polls. We can base our authority for that upon what has happened to other civilizations in other times. We have abundant examples that a free state, founded upon the will of the great mass of the people cannot live very long, preserving its life, if the habit of wholesale bribery at the polls becomes thoroughly established. There is in this evil a constant danger to the life of the state. I have an idea that if this Bill becomes law, and that, if in a county where the public feeling has been shocked by the outrageousness of the corruption at an election the machinery of this Bill is set in motion, it will prove a wholesome lesson. I am reasonably clear, from consultation with a number of my legal friends who have a good deal of experience in Nova Scotia in trying election petitions, that the people who are in earnest about the thing, can get all the evidence they want, if they take proper care, to purge the list from corrupt voters, so that when the next election comes, persons who are willing to run without giving bribes will have a fair chance of success. I have an idea that this Bill will not be called into play often. If it falls like a thunderbolt in a single county in a province and purges the list of 100 of these black sheep, the example will go to neighbouring counties and the Bill will do its work silently like the loaded gun on the walls, of which you do not need to pull the trigger to enable it to give you protection. In the neighbouring districts the electors will learn that they will be liable to suffer if they take bribes, as the corrupt voters have suffered in another county. I believe that for the Bill to be of any use, it must be called into play in some of the first cases of corruption that happen in the next election, in order to teach a wholesome lesson to a particular county, and by the influence of that example to teach the same lesson to the constituencies generally. The first objection that will occur to any one who reads the Bill, as it occurred to me, when I first drafted it, is, that it is too limited in its scope. I may be told that the Bill is directed against people who take bribes, but that there is nothing said about those who give bribes. My answer is: that this criticism is based on an entire misunderstanding of my object. My object is a limited one. It is not to punish any one, but to take votes away from unworthy people, and the briber who is very often a much greater offender than the bribe-taker can be dealt with under the criminal law, which is now as stringent as a law can be. I believe that we need not add to the terrors of the law in that regard, for in my opinion the law is very drastic and very stringent now. If this were a Bill to punish, that criticism would be a good one, but as it is a Bill merely to take votes away from people who abuse the right of the franchise, that criticism does not seem to me to be a sound one. It is distinct from the object I had in view in submitting this measure to Parliament. A much graver objection, it seems to me, against the Bill, and one which deterred me for two or three years, I may frankly say, from introducing the principle—although I had it in my mind for two or three years to bring in such a Bill—is the objection that, in all conscience, there are now on the Statute-books sufficient and stringent laws dealing with the matter, and why come as a medicine-man with a new nostrum to try and cure that which the statutes have failed to remedy. I may be told that the most important cure for the evil is the use of moral agencies, a sounder pulpit, a sounder press, sounder universities, sounder common schools and sounder journals or magazines, to teach the people the meanness and immorality of this practice of selling votes, and that you must rely on these. To be sure you must rely largely on all these things; but if I am not wrong there is some hope of bringing this into practice, at least in the case of a county where there is a strong and earnest feeling against this whole wretched business, of giving and taking bribes. If you find that this Bill is faulty in detail, its provisions can be modified when we go into committee. But I believe that it will be found adequate, and that it will do good in a country where there is a feeling of public abhorrence at the shameful practice against which it is directed. I need say but little more on the subject. I do not think there is a single member of this House, whether he belongs to the Liberal party or to my own party, who will not acknowledge that this is and has been for twenty years a great evil in Canada, as it is in all self-governing communities. A few days ago the Governor of New York, in his message to the Legislature, directed the most pungent paragraph of that message against this evil, and his remedy was to introduce our Canadian Bill, as he called it, providing for election petitions. Now, we have had that system in this country for almost twenty years, and I appeal to the members of this House, to the Liberals as well as to my Conservative friends, to say whether, in so far as it was meant to be a means of cleansing the constituencies and preventing bribery, it has not been a miserable and colossal failure. It has been used for other purposes altogether. In most counties it has been turned into an instrument of revenge, to harass and worry candidates. In some cases it has afforded opportunities to unscrupulous men of my own profession to drum up a bill of costs. It has been used for the purpose of forcing a new contest, and making the candidates go a second time before the electors within a few months. It seems to me that it has been used in 1892 practically to bring on a general election throughout Canada. Our friends opposite, seeing that the parties were very nearly balanced in this Chamber, were enabled by that Bill to force new contests in many places. In these ways the original purpose of the measure has often been lost sight of, and it has been made to serve purposes entirely foreign to that for which it was introduced, while it has not served the purpose of cleansing the counties of bribery and corruption. We have another Act, that of Mr. Blake, which was prepared with great skill. I have copied closely as much as I could of the machinery of that Act, which was well drafted; but the purport of that Act seems to betray that gentleman's incapacity to understand average human nature. You can see in every clause of it that the man who drafted it did not know what the common, every-day ment upon persons quite beyond our control. One could easily see that such a Bill would not be of much value to the country. It is too complicated, and depends for enforcement upon persons quite beyond our control. This Bill proposes to disentangle the subject from political party interests, and to place the punishment of bribery in the hands of men who, without reference to either one party or the other, will try to cleanse the counties of the whole miserable business, and will be ready to smite down any and all men found guilty of it. Now, before I sit down, let me say that, in my judgment, the gravest present evil in Canadian and American politics, and in the colonies of England in other parts of the world, is this evil of bribery.

Some hon. members may have read a carefully prepared address which was delivered a little over a year ago by Mr. Balfour—and I need not remind this House that there is not in the House of Commons of England a more clear-headed, cool-headed, thoughtful and profound man than Mr. Balfour—a careful and profound student, and one who knows a good deal of men. In that address, which attained a great deal of celebrity, Mr. Balfour pointed out in gloomy language why he thought some of the political institutions of his own country were going to smash before a very long time. He drew a parallel between the history of England for the last fifty or sixty years and the history of Athens before she fell; and in what he said, though his ideas were very gloomy indeed, he appeared to me to describe the condition of affairs existing, not only in his own country, but in our country as well. He pointed out how, in Athens, where the affairs of the state were in the control of the free citizens of that beautiful city, the demagogues came, with lies in their mouths and masks on their faces, telling the people that they were wiser than their rulers, just as many of us are too fond of flattering the people and the press of this country, and too slow to tell the people that we know better than they do how to deal with many technical questions, too slow to tell the press also that we, who have acquired special knowledge on certain subjects, know more of these subjects than they do. We know that for many years the public men of this country have been too much coerced by the press. Members of Parliament have been hounded for giving a clear expression of their feeling and their thinking in matters on which they have laboured long into the night, toiling and racking their brains to study and master them; and yet for twenty years they have been lectured by the press as being timid, servile time-servers. This is one of the evils which Mr. Balfour has pointed out as existing in England. Is the same thing true of Canada? I leave you to answer. I make no allusion to the press of one side or the other. Mr. Balfour further pointed out that in Athens, after the demagogues, came the bribers with means in their hands of corrupting the electors, sometimes singly and sometimes in masses, sometimes with free land and sometimes with free corn, one party outbidding the other in the magnitude of their bribes. And after the Athenian people had been corrupted for fifty or sixty years in this way, we know what happened. The most beautiful and perfect civilization which the world had ever seen, which had budded just before the days of Pericles, was gradually destroyed; its wilted petals were struck from the stem by Philip of Macedon. It was then that the boodlers came and corrupted the wind-bag orators of Athens, and smote down in her strength that city, which was the pride of her time, because her people had been enfeebled by political corruption—Athens, with her art, her beautiful temples and statues, her great books, her beautiful women, her intellectual men, was cut off and destroyed. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has often reminded this House, in those eloquent and apposite allusions which enrich our debates so much, of how much Athens has done for us, of how often she has healed the wounded spirit of men and brought solace and succour to men who are maligned and misunderstood. In pointing to Athens, I simply follow the example suggested by Mr. Balfour's speech, and by reading an old edition of Aristotle on the constitution of Athens, and I do so to show how the wholesale bribery of people at the polls during two generations destroyed its civilization. We belong to a country whose laws go back for a thousand years. There is no parallel to it in modern or ancient history. We boast that we have free institutions; we boast that those institutions are the peculiar creation of the English race. But they cost something. The people who worked them out and struggled for them from generation to generation had to pay for the boon. I need not mention the price they paid; I need not quote names of men, the mention of which stirs the people two hundred years after these men are dead. We have paid for our liberties, and we would be a poor recreant crew if we should lose them through lack of courage in dealing with this colossal evil. I ask hon. members to forget that they are party men; and if they think that this Bill is capable of doing some good in some counties, if they think it will give honest men a chance to protect themselves against the boodlers, let them help this measure all they can now by allowing it to pass the second reading, and when it reaches the committee let them give it their helpful consideration in order to make it a useful law.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

LORD'S DAY OBSERVANCE.

On order for second reading of Bill (No. 5) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday,

Mr. CHARLTON said: My purpose is to proceed with this Bill on Wednesday of next week, if nothing unforeseen takes place. My reason is that the superintendent of one of the railways wishes to read the provisions of the Bill before it is proceeded with. It has only been printed and distributed within a day or two, and I will allow it to stand over, in any event, in order that the House may become acquainted with it. The same remarks apply to the succeeding order.

Mr. LAURIER. Next Wednesday is Ash Wednesday, and I do not know whether the House is going to sit on that day or not.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am under the impression Ash Wednesday is not one of the holidays, but in any case we will take up the Bill on Thursday.

COMPULSORY VOTING.

Mr. AMYOT moved second reading of Bill (No. 8) to make voting compulsory. He said: This Bill is the same as that which was reported by the sub-committee last year. It is in the same sense as the Bill presented a moment ago, to disfranchise electors who have taken a bribe. One of the great troubles we have to contend with during elections is to get the electors to the polls. A great many say: This year I am going if my day's work is paid, or I will go if they send for me. This is a mere pretext to be bribed. They know that if any one goes for them, that person will be provided with some money or something else to pay for their vote. I am of opinion that we should try every means possible to put down corruption. One of the great sources of expense and trouble to candidates is the refusal of the electors to come alone to the poll, and if, as has been done in some other countries, we make it obligatory on them to come without being sent for we will be taking a very good step in the right direction. I introduced my Bill two years ago. It has since been discussed by the press. It was discussed last year by the sub-committee and had the unanimous support of that committee. I will not trouble the House with the opinions of the press, as every hon. member has been in a position to read those comments. But I may mention that last year, a very important paper called "The Week" was distributed to every member containing some very good articles, amongst others an article written by one of our best officers, Mr. Wicksted, in support of this measure. I may also tell the House that many institutions, comprising a great many important citizens, after mature deliberation have adopted the principle of the Bill. I will quote amongst others the deliberations of the "Artisan and Workingman" of the 4th September, 1891. It was proposed by Mr. McDonald and seconded by Mr. O'Donoghue, that voting be made obligatory. The same decision was come to by the Knights of Labour on the 1st of July, 1891. I have here a copy of the resolution then passed:

Col. AMYOT, M.P.,

SIR,—At the last regular meeting of the above assembly—

That is, the noble order of the Knights of Labour—

—it was resolved that we endorse and approve of the Bill in favour of compulsory voting, introduced in the House of Commons by Col. Amyot, M.P., and that we ask the members of this city in Parliament to use their vote and influence in favour of its becoming the law.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Yours very truly,

G. WILKINS,

Sec.-Treas.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the French press. I hold in my hand an article from "Le Courrier du Canada" and "L'Evenement," of Quebec, approving generally the principle of the Bill. I shall speak presently of a paper that has not approved it. I have been asked: Is there any country where voting is compulsory? Well, Sir, we find that in Denmark the voting is compulsory and that everybody is bound to assist by appearing at the polls and recording his vote. I may quote from the constitution of the Kingdom of Denmark of 1849, revised and promulgated on the 28th January, 1866, the following sections:—

Sec. 64—The electors are bound under penalty to present themselves.

Sec. 74—Every person appointed an elector of the second degree is bound to accept the trust unless he can give legal excuse.

Sec. 75—Every elector of the second degree who makes default and abstains from voting is subject to a penalty of 20 rix-dollars.

That is about $12 of our money.

Sec. 80—The electors of the second degree and prime electors must be present at the place and hour of election.

Sec. 92—Any person neglecting the duties imposed by the present Act is subject to a fine of 10 to 200 rix-dollars, unless a severer penalty has been imposed.

And, Mr. Speaker, I am informed, and in fact our reading shows, that the law is operated and is working very well in Denmark. We know also that, in the United States, many states of the Union are trying to introduce this system, as one of the best means of preventing corruption. Let me, now, Mr. Speaker, give a synopsis of the Bill, after which I shall deal with the objections made to it. The first clause says:

Every elector whose name is registered on the list of voters unless he has a reasonable excuse, shall appear.

"Unless he has a reasonable excuse." We will be asked: "What is a reasonable excuse?" Let me quote a number of examples: illness and infirmity, old age, accident, fire, absence, violent and sudden storm, necessary attendance at court. All these will be reasonable excuses. But who shall determine whether the excuse given comes within the category of "reasonable" excuses? This matter is left to the decision of the judge. In every case before a court the judge is bound to judge the facts. Suppose we have a case of misdemeanour; you must have proof of the intention. Who gives the law on the point to the jury? It is the judge, and then the jury who say whether the facts of the case show the intention. Suppose I sue a man for damages; who says if there is a damage, an infringement upon the law? The judge does that. It is the same under the Bill which I propose. In a case of force majeure—superior force—if, in answer to the action taken against me, I plead that I had been acting under a superior force which I could not master, which no human force could master, who decides whether it is a superior force or not? The judge. In every case where there is a contract to be interpreted, the court, the judge has to give his interpretation. It would be exactly the same under this Act. The elector is told: On the day of polling you are bound to register your vote; you have not done so; had you a reasonable excuse? But, Mr. Speaker, you may be sure, when this Bill becomes law, there will not be many electors who will expose themselves, no matter who they are, not only to the cost, but also to the shame, of being sued for not having exercised their right of voting. In any case before the courts, where you have to prove the intention, to weigh questions of fact, in every case, in fact, the judge must interpret the law. This Bill should not be opposed merely because it is new. I do not see why Canada should have to wait for other countries to take a step in the right direction. Under the second clause the penalty has been fixed at $10—not exceeding $10. I may say that it is provided that religious scruples shall be deemed a reasonable excuse. This feature is incorporated in the Bill, because I had received letters from certain sects—and I happened to know that such existed—telling me that they had religious scruples to taking part in an election. Of course, if a Catholic should come before the court and say: I did not vote, because I have religious scruples, he would be laughed at, because there is no such thing in the Catholic religion. On the contrary, it is considered a sacred duty to take part in and do our share in the administration of the affairs. But those who have religious scruples are known beforehand. We know those who do not take part in war because of religious scruples. Nobody can invent or simulate these scruples. We say furthermore:

Any other reasonable excuse under this action shall be a matter of pleading and the burden of proof shall be on the defendant.

This is because the one who has not gone to vote knows why he has refrained. He has taken his precautions and is ready to state and prove why he has not voted. It would be neither fair nor practical to leave to the opposite party the burden of alleging and proving why the defendant had not gone to the polls. In other words, it would not be right to call upon the prosecutor to prove a negative. The third clause says:

Every voter who shall not wish to exercise his right of voting shall notify the revising officer.

This has been done to answer the objections about the liberty of the subject. Anybody who does not want to vote needs only write to the revising officer, asking that his name be struck off the list. Then, Mr. Speaker, he will not be a burden to the canvassers and to the candidates. His name will not be read every night in the committee. There will remain on the list only those electors who want to exercise their franchise. The fourth clause is to establish the limitation of actions and to put it at three months. These are the general features of the Bill. Mr. Speaker, there is a French paper in Quebec. I will not name it, it is not represented in this House, a kind of religious paper, edited by a man much above the ordinary in sanctity, the only man who is right in this world, who is more intelligent, more learned, than anybody in this world. He says that I deserve to be chased from the country, because I wanted to deprive the citizens of their liberty.

Mr. AMYOT.

Mr. GUAY. Give his name.

Mr. AMYOT. I will name him, if the hon. gentleman will defend him.

Mr. GUAY. No.

Mr. AMYOT. Then I will not name him, but the hon. gentleman knows who he is. Well, Mr. Speaker, my answer to that accusation is this: I do not think there is one law on our Statute-book, nor has there ever been, either religious, civil or criminal, which is not an infringement upon personal liberty. Take municipal law. You appoint a mayor and he is bound to act. You force citizens to keep their roads, you force them to pay taxes—this is an infringement upon liberty. Take the civil law. You force a man to act on a jury, to leave his occupation, his farm or his shop for that purpose—this is an infringement upon liberty. You force a man to come to court as a witness—this is an infringement upon liberty. In the religious order, also, what are its injunctions and prohibitions but infringements upon liberty? We are bound to worship God; we are bound to have respect for our father and mother; we are not allowed to kill, nor to rob, nor to perjure ourselves—all this is against liberty. The prohibition of selling liquor without a license is against liberty. Expropriations for the general good are against personal liberty. The necessity of registering titles of sales, etc., is an infringement upon personal liberty. In fact, what is human society itself, if not an abandonment of private rights for the general welfare of the partnership? I will translate a few words from a celebrated work entitled "Principles and Right of Nature":

Every citizen is bound to contribute, within the limit of his strength, to the general welfare of society, and to take its interests at heart.

Section 13. The public good is the principal object of each good citizen, and he must submit his own interest to the good of society.

Section 24. The liberty of each individual in the state is limited by the common interest of the state.

Mr. Speaker, I admit that the obligation of going to the polls is a restriction of liberty, but if it is for the benefit of society, everybody should be willing to subject himself to that restriction. It is for the general interest of society that every elector should be forced to go to the polls, so as to avoid the temptation of corruption, so that we may have pure elections; so that we may have representatives not elected by money, but elected by the convictions of the electors; so that we may have representatives who will feel themselves independent of parties, because they will know that the same political convictions by which they were elected, will support them in their course in Parliament. The word "compulsory" means necessary attendance at the polls; but it does not mean, necessarily, voting for one or other of the candidates, because when the elector enters the polling booth, although he will be bound to take his ballot, he may either vote or not, he may either spoil his ballot or not, he may either write his name or not—he will do what he pleases. If both candidates are opposed to his convictions he will vote for neither of them; but he will have fulfilled the obligation of taking his ballot and doing as if he were voting. The consequence will be that the candidates and their friends, knowing that that man's name is on the list and that he is bound to go to the polls, will not hire teams to take him there, and will not expend much time and money in sending canvassers to him. No one will know what kind of a vote he will give, and consequently the candidates and their friends will endeavour to persuade him by arguments to vote as they wish, and will have no temptation to exert undue pressure upon him by unlawful means. With these few explanations, I leave the Bill in the hands of this honourable House. I wish I had the eloquence of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), who preceded me; but I hope I shall have his support, because the principles he advocates are precisely those which guide me in this instance. I am in favour of every measure that will tend to diminish corruption. I want the electorate to act freely through conviction. I do not want elections to be carried by money or by corruption of any kind. I want the candidates to expose their case as a lawyer exposes his case before a court; and I want to make the electorate the tribunal, an honest, independent and fair tribunal, who, after having heard the pleadings on both sides, will give a verdict in the sense that they think will be best in their interest. Under those circumstances I think we will have a collective vote of all the intelligence and real intention of the country, and we will be sure always to have a Parliament representing the real sentiments of the people, on whichever side the majority may be for the time being.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of the fullest liberty that citizens may enjoy, which is tantamount to saying that I am unable to approve of the Bill brought up before this House. I do not intend making a long speech, I simply intend to offer a few remarks. The first section of this Bill reads as follows:

46a. Every elector whose name is registered on the list of voters, unless he has a reasonable excuse, shall appear at the polling station of the electoral district where he is entitled to vote, within the hours fixed by law for taking the poll, and shall exercise his franchise according to law; otherwise he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten dollars, with costs.

Now, I am a voter, but I have the right to have a reasonable excuse. I fail to appear at the polling station to vote. A penal suit for $10 is taken against me. I have not been able to offer any excuses and to whom should I have offered them? Is it to the returning officer? It is not stated in the law. I am dragged before a court; I offer my excuses to the court, and supposing they are deemed reasonable, who will pay the costs of these proceedings? Will it be me, who have a good excuse, or will it be the party who made the complaint? The latter can always say: You are bound to pay the costs, because you ought to have offered your excuses; had I known them I would not have made the complaint. And he would be justified in so saying, for he would have taken these proceedings under the law and he was not aware of the reasons or excuses I had to offer. Although not fined, I would be compelled to pay costs to the amount of $20 or $30. The second section states that religious scruples shall be deemed a reasonable excuse for every elector who did not vote. It reads as follows:

Religious scruples shall be deemed a reasonable excuse, and any other reasonable excuse under this section shall be a matter of pleading, and the burden of proof shall be upon the defendant.

The hon. member stated this section would only apply to a certain class of electors in the Dominion, because these electors belonged to a particular religious body. I say the hon. member is mistaken. A Roman Catholic and a Protestant may well have religious scruples that prevent them from voting. Will the Catholics and Protestants who, by reason of religious scruples fail to vote, be allowed to offer that as an excuse? I say there is not only the sect referred to by the hon. gentleman that will avail themselves of the excuse of religious scruples. Well might a Catholic decline to vote for a Protestant candidate and likewise a Protestant elector might think he has good reasons or scruples which in his mind warrant him not to vote for a Catholic candidate. In such a case, who, I ask, will have to decide whether the excuse based upon religious scruples holds good? Who will decide whether the reasons which prevented me from voting are acceptable in the spirit of this Bill? Should I have religious scruples, I might happen not to appear at the polling station, but then I am liable to an action under this section. Should I not go to the poll to record my vote, an action will be taken against me; I will be compelled to defend myself, and should the court be satisfied that my excuses are good, I will again be bound to pay the costs. As you see, Mr. Speaker, it is always a matter of costs. The third section states:

That every voter who shall not wish to exercise his right of voting shall notify the revising officer of his unwillingness to vote, on or before the day fixed for the final revision and certification of the lists of voters.

At the time of the preparation of the lists of voters, I might have a reason for notifying the revising officer that I do not intend availing myself of my right of voting; but how will that work practically? Will it be an easy thing to work this section into practice? The lists of voters being only revised every two, three or even four years, how will I know, such a long time beforehand, whether my reasons for not voting will still exist when an election occurs? It might happen, on the contrary; that I might have good reasons for leading me to vote, and should my name not be on the lists of voters, I would be unable to vote. These are matters that cannot be controlled, for after all a gentleman who shall have availed himself of this section at the time of revising the lists might regret it and wish to exercise his right of voting two or three years after the revision being made. For these reasons, I think the practical working of this Bill will be very difficult, if not an utter impossibility. I understand that the object the hon. gentleman had in view, as well as the hon. gentleman who, a moment ago, moved for leave to introduce a Bill of the same kind, is to prevent, as far as possible, corruption during elections. Every gentleman who had to go through electoral contests knows that it costs something, that it costs more or less, but I say that should both of the candidates be willing to come to an understanding, it would be a very easy thing not to spend a cent during elections. Should both candidates be willing not to go through a canvassing tour in the county, to simply go through a speech-making tour, things would be very different from what they are now. It is what I once proposed to my opponent. I said to him: If I am more popular than you, I shall evidently be returned; if, on the contrary, you are the more popular man, well, you shall be returned. It is the true way to prevent electoral corruption; let candidates hold as many meetings as they like, let them discuss before the electors the great and little matters which are likely to interest them, it is all very well, but at any cost prevent canvassing. It is not through public meetings that corrupt practices go on; it is through canvassing from door to door that weak voters are tempted. Should there exist a law stating that canvassing shall be deemed a corrupt practice, I think a great many things would thus be prevented which we very properly so much complain of now. So-called committees are not necessary no more than canvassing. There will always be a sufficient number of free and right-minded voters who will go to the polls without any recourse to such means. A law stating that canvassing is prohibited under penalty of having the election declared null and void, would be a good deal more productive of good results than all these Bills that are now introduced here, with good intents I confess, but which can have no practical results. It is also stated, Mr. Speaker, that electors are unwilling to record their votes, that they must be given money to be led to exercising their right. I say that things are all the other way—the elector likes to record his vote. He will, at all events, go to the polls without being called upon by a visitor willing to solicit and canvass him. Should we prevent canvassing, there would be no necessity for the making of laws to compel the electors to vote, at all events. The few who, during a contest would not vote because there was no canvassing, would be the first, at the next election to go to the polls. Why? Because they would know they could expect no money nor carriages. I repeat that not one of those electors would fail to go and vote at the next election. What do we now see? The polling stations are opened at nine o'clock in the morning, and there are hardly three or four electors ready to record their votes. Whose fault is it? I say it is the candidates' fault. If the elector remains at home, it is because he was told by the candidate or his canvassing agent: "There will be carriages to take you to the polling station, provisions given out to you—in a word, you will be treated like a gentleman." Is it then to be surprised at that the elector stays at home, waiting some one to come and take him. Generally it costs more to prevent an elector from voting than to have his vote—that I state generally speaking. It was also stated by the hon. member for Bellechasse that there are several laws restraining personal freedom, and he quoted, amongst others, the law of registration. I differ with the hon. gentleman. I cannot see that that law restrains the personal freedom. A person making a transaction on a property through a written agreement cannot find it wrong that that transaction be registered, so that it be made known. And why? The object in view is to make outsiders know the character of the transaction, in order to protect the parties concerned. Allowing a man to interfere with others is not protecting the personal freedom. Should that be allowed, it would be authorizing a thing likely to defraud and ruin interests worthy of protection. I think it would not be a well understood freedom, but rather an excess of liberty, for there ought to be lines drawn between liberty and exorbitant freedom. The license law was also quoted. Here again I am of a wholly different opinion. That law was passed to protect the personal freedom. Should every individual be allowed to sell liquor without a license, and to any one without being liable to be fined, it would be, indeed, a nice existing state of things. You could then see the father of a family spending in taverns his goods and those of his children. Notwithstanding the protective laws we have, that occurs, unhappily, even too often. Should that trade be free, the things we are now witnessing, and which are so much to be regretted, would become a general evil, and the acts we are now disapproving would, through an unchecked excess of liberty, become of a much more objectionable character. Therefore, the license law cannot be instanced as an argument in favour of the passing of this Bill. I am stating my views immediately, although I know the Bill can be amended, either in the Committee or by this House. I know that the general purpose looks to an end which we are endeavouring to reach—that is, the electoral purity; but I do not think that the promoters of these bills will realize their expectations. As concerns this particular Bill, I believe it to be unpracticable, notwithstanding all the amendments that might be brought to it. I am satisfied the object for which it was brought up in this House cannot be reached.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I desire to draw the attention of the House to the provisions of this Bill, in order that it may receive due consideration from hon. members. The principle embodied in the Bill, by which the hon. gentleman seeks to deprive the corrupt elector of the means he now possesses of forcing candidates into a species of corruption by insisting on being carried to the polls, is a sound one. So far, the hon. gentleman's object is a very worthy one, and in part, though probably not altogether, that object would be served by the Bill. I think the object would not be entirely served, for the reason that it is still in the power of the corrupt voter to stipulate that, unless he be carried to the poll, he will not vote for the candidate who has solicited his vote and with whom he pretends to concur, but will spoil his ballot when he gets there. It is absolutely impossible to frustrate the ingenuity of persons who are bent upon receiving money or aid corruptly at election times, except by punishing them and those who are willing to comply with their wishes, by penalties. I think as regards the measures we may adopt as to the right of voting and so forth, it is difficult indeed to strike at that abuse. But I think the Bill runs counter to some principles which are equally valuable with that which I have just mentioned. The Bill is based on the principle, for example, that there is a moral or political duty devolving on the electors to make a choice between two or three different candidates, or sets of candidates, who are running at the elections. I submit that that is not a sound principle, and is not one we should recognize. The Bill is founded on that principle. The hon. gentleman expresses dissent, but I insist on it. While it is made the primary duty of the voter to go to the poll; there is a subterfuge provided by which he may spoil his ballot, and defeat the principle of the Bill by not voting. There is no obligation, political or moral, on the voter to go to the poll for the purpose of spoiling his ballot. The Bill can only be justified as compelling voters to go to the polling places on the ground that there is some obligation resting on them to vote. I submit that that principle is not consistent with the procedure by which our elections are carried on. There should be as much freedom of choice on the part of a voter between voting and not voting as between voting for A or voting for B. We must remember that the voter is not a perfectly free agent as regards his choice when he goes to the poll. When the polling takes place the nominations have been closed. It is not in his power to exercise his free choice as to whom he thinks should represent his riding in Parliament. He is confined in his choice to the candidates who have been nominated by a certain number of electors some time before, with their choice he may not have concurred, but a certain number of electors are required to put a candidate in nomination, and when the particular voter goes to the poll he finds that his choice is absolutely restricted, and if he votes at all, he must cast his vote as between A and B, with both of whose politics he may entirely disagree, and as to whom he may be of the opinion that neither of them is a fit man to represent the riding; and yet the Bill obliges him to vote, or, on the principle that he ought to vote, go to the poll for the purpose of spoiling his ballot. It seems to me that, under these circumstances, the person who thinks that neither candidate is fit to represent the county should be left free to express that opinion by remaining at home, and he ought not, above all things, as the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) has pointed out, to be obliged to appear before a judicial tribunal and be placed at the discretion of mercy of a justice of the peace as to what are sufficient reasons to exonerate him from going to the poll. The attention of the House was called to a very important point when the Bill was last discussed, I think in the session of 1891, by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who recalled several historical incidents to the recollection of the House, for the purpose of showing that the free play of our constitutional system is best aided in many cases by abstention from voting, better even than by voting for one set of candidates or the other, and that, in many cases, elections are controlled by conscientious abstention of parties from voting where conscientious scruples exist against voting at all, or where the principles of the candidates are not, as regards either of them, in harmony with the opinion which the voter entertains. I must say, in justice to the hon. member, that the committee to whom the Bill was sent last year concurred in recommending it in the form in which it is now submitted to the House. Nevertheless, I have been unable to bring my own individual opinion to agree that the change would be a wise one, while, as I said before, it merits very great consideration on account of the purpose by which the hon. gentleman is actuated, and which he desires to impress on a statute. The hon. gentleman endeavours to meet one set of difficulties by the third subsection of the Bill, which enables a person desirous of abstaining from voting to have his name struck off the list by the revising officer before the list is finally made up. That, in all probability, would meet the cases of those who have religious scruples against casting any vote at all; but it would meet no other class, because any other voter must necessarily be in suspense as to his opinion between rival candidates at the time the election list is made up, from the fact that the election itself is not then on, nominations have not been made, and he has no opportunity of knowing who will be candidates or sets of candidates in the contest. As the hon. member for L'Assomption has pointed out, there is very serious difficulty. I think, in the House adopting the principle that a man, for some good reason, it may be from entertaining the feeling that neither candidate is a candidate whom he desires to represent him in Parliament, desires to abstain from voting, should be obliged to go before the magistrate and have the burden of proof cast on him to show reasons why he should not be subjected to penalties and costs. I do not think that the force of that view is met by the mere statement that a man should be put to expense and trouble, and loss of time and labour in travelling many miles, and then have the opportunity of defeating the policy of the Bill itself by going in and spoiling his ballot. It appears to me that that is a mere subterfuge, and if we are to recognize at all the right of a man to abstain from voting, we ought to recognize it to the full extent of permitting him to stay at home.

Motion for second reading negatived.

DUTY ON COAL OIL.

Mr. CLEVELAND moved :

That it is expedient to place coal oil on the free list.

He said : Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to the motion, I beg to ask the indulgence of the House, as this is the first occasion on which I have had the honour to address this House. I feel that in favour of the motion which I have now placed in your hands, Sir, I should have the support of both parties—the support of my hon. friends on this side of the House and of hon. gentlemen opposite as well. I claim the assistance of the Government supporters, as I believe that it is the intention of the Government to extend needed relief to those on whom some duties under our protective system bear most heavily. I may say that there is no question, in the province of Quebec at least, which is fraught with so much interest and which is so much discussed at present as the removal of the duty on coal oil. I claim the support of hon. gentlemen opposite because it was they who placed the present duty upon oil. At a time, I admit, when oil was worth very much more than it is to-day. At the same time I believe that they should now be willing to assist in giving relief, and in helping to remove the excessive duty at present placed upon oil. Perhaps one example of how this tax bears heavily upon our Canadian people may be sufficient to convince the House that there is need for tariff reform in this direction. American oil in Rock Island, on the American side, is now selling at 7½ cents per gallon, while in Stanstead, across the river, on the Canadian side, Canadian oil is as high as 26 cents per gallon. That is a difference in price which is entirely uncalled for, and which I believe to be unfair to Canadian consumers. I claim that no industry requires any such protection as that. Although a manufacturer myself and a protectionist, I only ask and expect a fair measure of protection, and I feel that no other industry in the country should wish or require more. I may also state that the quality of the lower grade of Canadian oil is very inferior. At all events, I know from experience, that the oil placed upon the market in the province of Quebec, at from 12 to 14 cents a gallon is both dirty and smoky, and not fit for use. This is the quality of oil that, as a rule, the poorer people are using. The Government, in my belief, should be perfectly willing to afford some relief to the people by removing the present exorbitant duty. Of course it will be advanced, in favour of continuing the duty, that the interests of Petrolea will suffer greatly; but is that small section of the country to weigh in the balance against the rest of this broad Dominion? This question is, of course, not of so much importance to the people of the cities and towns of Canada who largely use gas as an illuminant, but it is in the country parts, where the people use oil, that they suffer most, and I claim that it is these very people who are best entitled to any relief that can be extended to them. I trust that the Government will decide on taking some action in this matter, and I therefore move the resolution which I have placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope).

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In the absence of the Minister of Finance, I beg to make a statement which I am sure he would have made if he were here, and which he has made with reference to similar motions with regard to the tariff. That is the statement, that at the request of the Government these motions shall not be pressed to a vote until the course of next week, because it is expected that next week the statement of the Minister of Finance shall be made with regard to the policy of the Government in this respect. I am aware of the view which has been put forward in answer to that request on two or three questions, namely, that these questions are not new. I do not claim that any of these motions in regard to the tariff which appear upon the Order Paper are new, but I say now, as I said upon a former occasion, that the convenience of carrying on the business of this House, to say nothing of the convenience of business interests involved, requires that these matters shall not be dealt with by an affirmative decision of the House, until the tariff is brought down, and until the Government is in a position to control the interests involved by putting into force immediately that which may be declared then to be the will of the House and the will of Parliament on these matters. With that view, I beg to move that the debate on this question be adjourned.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wish to make a few remarks on this subject before the question is put to the House, because I believe that this is a very important issue, and that it should be thoroughly discussed, and perhaps the members of the Government themselves would be anxious to hear what is to be said on both sides, so that when it comes up for consideration in the Council they will be in a position to understand the arguments for and against. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no idea at all to approach this question in any way but a just and proper manner. I have no objection to the oil interests, and personally I would like to see that industry thrive, so that what I will say will be, I believe, in the public interest, and in the interest of the consumers of oil in this country. I am under the impression now, and have been for years, that the duty on coal oil was too high. I do not say that we should, under our present policy select separate industries and take away the protection from them, but I believe it would be but justice in the interests of the people of this country that the duty on coal oil should be reduced. When I spoke last year upon the question, I suggested a protective duty of 5 cents a gallon instead of the present duty of 7½ cents, and after studying the question, I am still firmly of the opinion that it would be to the interest of the country to reduce the duty at least to that extent. There are three aspects from which we can view this question. One aspect is in respect to the crude material, the other is in regard to the illuminating or refined oil, and the third in reference to the rule adopted by the Government prohibiting the importation of oil in tank-cars. Now, I want to point out first that this is a very important industry, in which there is invested a very large sum of money. The oil men themselves say that they have invested in it about $21,800,000. Now, in protecting an industry of that magnitude, we must be very careful not to do it an injustice. If the figures of the oil men are correct, it is a very large industry, and is entitled to the most careful consideration on the part of the Government. But I am afraid that the oil men, in placing these figures before the Canadian people, have not been as careful as they should be. I think I shall be able to show you satisfactorily that they have exaggerated the amount of capital invested and the number of men employed in this industry. I will first take their own figures as showing their own opinion of the industry in which they are engaged. From a statement made in the papers a few days ago, which no doubt the members of the Government have read,

I find that the amount invested in this industry is put down at $21,800,000, and the amount invested in territory at $12,000,000. It is said that there are 8,000 wells with drilling and equipment, which at $500 each are worth $4,000,000. Underground storage tanks are put down at $1,000,000; refineries, wax-works, sperm candle works, the manufacture of lubricating and other oils, etc., are put at $2,000,000; saw mills, barrel factories, drill tool factories, etc., are put at $1,000,000; pipe lines with piping stations, 250 pumping rigs, and plant complete, are put down at $1,000,000; delivery stations and plants located in different centres of the Dominion, tank-wagons, drilling tools, etc., are put down at $800,000; making a total capital invested of $21,800,000. This is a statement given by an oil producer in the "Globe" a few days ago. The same man says that there are employed 2,580 men in and around the works; in addition, there are travellers and office men, overseers and men attending the pipe lines and delivery stations, to the number say of 100; making the total number of men employed 2,680. The writer then says:

And it is important to note here that with the exception of choppers and teamsters they are all skilled workmen.

Now, that is the statement put forward by the oil men themselves, and I fear it is overdrawn. I do not think they have been fair in putting these figures before the country, and I will show you why. We are told that there are 610 teams and teamsters employed every day in the business. That number at \$3.50 a day would cost \$2,185 a day, or, in a year of 300 days, \$655,500. They tell us that there are 1,570 men who receive \$1.50 per day, or, in a year of 300 days, \$706,500; and they also tell us that there are 500 skilled men at work at \$2 per day, amounting in a year of 300 days to \$300,000. In other words, the total amount paid in wages in the year is \$1,662,000. Now, it is only fair to allow a certain percentage on the invested capital. In conversation with one of the principal oil men, I asked him if 4 per cent would be a high enough dividend to allow on the capital invested. He said it would be very low; yet that percentage would amount to \$872,000. Then allow 5 per cent for wear and tear, amounting to \$1,080,000; and allow 2 per cent for profit, which is surely not too high for those engaged in the business, amounting to \$436,000. On this calculation, the total amount paid in wages, in dividends on capital, on wear and tear, and on profit, would require \$4,050,000 a year. Now, I want to show that the figures given by the oil men are not correct, and are very misleading. I have here a statement which shows that the value of the whole output of the Petrolea oil refiners in illuminating oil, lubricating oil, paraffine oils, gas oil and paraffine wax, was \$1,638,000 all told in 1890. Now, if they have as many men employed as they say, how can they pay \$4,050,- 000 of expense and interest on their capital out of an output of \$1,638,000? For salaries alone they say that they pay \$1,662,000, or \$24,000 more than the amount of the output of the whole industry. Now, I mention this to show that the matter has not been placed honestly before us. These men have sought to lead the country to believe that their industry is larger than it really is, I fear to create an impression in the minds of the people that it should not be interfered with. The figures given in the public prints by them and sent to the members of this House, are deceptive and exaggerated to the extent I have shown. These men must either say that the figures given in the blue books are wrong in regard to their entire output, or they must admit that their own statements to the public are very greatly exaggerated. Now, the oil refiners tell us that they do not take advantage of the duty. Every hon. gentleman here knows very well, however, that every industry in the country takes advantage of the duty as far as it can do so. If they did not, they would not be here lobbying the members of this House in regard to the tariff. The oil men say that the oil they sell is only 2 to $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents a gallon higher than the American oil. I had a conversation to-day with a gentleman on this subject. I said to him: "You are not making true comparisons: you are comparing the price of No. 1 water-white American oil, having a specific gravity of 7.85, with the price of your common No. 2 Canadian oil, having a specific gravity of 8.02." I asked him: "What is the price to-day of your No. 1 Canadian oil, with a specific gravity of 7.95?" He said, "15 cents in bulk." Now, that is the oil that should be compared, if it is comparable with the American oil; and every one knows that it is not equal in illuminating power with the first-class American oil. He also told me that out of the 10,000,000 gallons manufactured by the oil refiners of Canada, they only manufactured 2,000,000 gallons of this refined oil; and that they take full advantage of the duty on this 2,000,000 gallons if they sell it at 15 cents. How much does that take out of the Canadian consumer? The increased price of the 2,000,000 gallons would be at least \$160,000 by reason of the duty. Now, take the imported oil. We imported from the United States last year 5,637,149 gallons, at a value of \$471,690. On that we paid a duty of \$405,873.62, the price being $8\frac{3}{4}$ cents per gallon, and the duty 7 cents. If you add to this amount paid in duty, the cost of inspection and the duty on the barrels, equalling 2 cents per gallon, and amounting to \$112,742, you have a total of \$518,619. Then, you must add the importers' profit of 20 per cent on this amount, for the importer must make a profit on the cost of duty as well as on the price of the article, which amounts to \$103,723. That, added to the former amount, makes \$622,338. Now, when the retailer gets possession of the article, he puts on his profit of 40 per cent, which makes \$248,935 more, so that there is a total of \$871,274 added to the original cost by reason of the duty, or $15\frac{3}{4}$ cents a gallon. If this duty were removed, the profits on the duty as well would be wholly wiped out, because as the duty is part of the original cost to the importer, he adds his profits upon it as well as upon the original cost, and as profit after profit is put on, by the time the oil gets to the consumer, the consumer, instead of paying the duty alone, pays \$465,401 more. On the other hand, suppose the oil came in free, the people of Canada would pay as the original cost \$471,690. Add one cent per gallon for inspection, or \$56,371, the importers' profit of 20 per cent, or \$105,612, and the retailers' profit of 40 per cent, which comes to \$253,469, and we have a cost of \$887,142, or only $15\frac{3}{4}$ per gallon to the consumer, if the duties were removed. But at present, taking this $15\frac{3}{4}$ cents and $15\frac{3}{4}$ cents caused by the duty, it costs 31 cents to the consumer in Canada. But it may be said that it does not cost 31 cents as a rule. I do not say that the importer or the retailer always puts on 40 and 20 per cent. They may put on a little less or a little more in different parts of the country, where they get American oil at 26, 28 and 30 cents, and I see by the Auditor-General's Report that the Government have paid 35 cents a gallon for oil used on the Experimental Farm. So that we pay twice as much for the oil as we would if it came in free, or, in other words, we could get oil at a little over 15 cents for which we now pay prices ranging from 25 to 35 cents. I wish to draw attention particularly to the hardship of the prohibition against bringing in oil in tank-cars. I have a statement here which I will give the Government, in order that they may look into it. It shows that the oil cost the consumer $3\frac{1}{10}$ cents more on account of this prohibition than if it were permitted to come in in tank-cars. The present price of oil in Oil City, Pa., 7.85 specific gravity, is $5\frac{3}{4}$ cents per wine gallon, in barrels. How much will it cost to bring it here? There are 3,207 wine gallons in a car load, which, at $5\frac{3}{4}$ cents per gallon, would be \$184.41; 3,207 wine gallons are equal to 2,673 imperial, on which there is $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents duty, amounting to \$192.45. The duty on sixty barrels, which constitutes a car load, at 40 cents each, amounts to \$24; the inspection of sixty barrels at 30 cents each, amounts to \$18, and the freight on sixty barrels from Oil City to Peterborough would be \$66, making a total of \$484.86, making the cost of oil laid down in Peterborough $18\frac{1}{2}$ cents per imperial gallon. Sometimes the retailer is the importer, and, therefore, the profit added to the price of the oil is not so high as the percentage charged, if the oil was imported by other than the retailer. But otherwise the importer adds his profit on selling to the retailer and the retailer adds his profit on selling to the consumer. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the price depends on whether the retailer is the importer or not. Now, let me give you the other side of the question. Taking the same oil in tanks, how much will it cost? As I said before, coal oil of 7.85 specific gravity sells to-day, in tank-cars in Oil City, Pennsylvania, at 30 cents per wine gallon, f.o.b. A tank-car contains 6,200 wine gallons. The cost of the oil, therefore, is \$201.50. The freight on a car of 28,300 lbs., at 27½ cents per 100 lbs. would be \$77.82. The cost of packages and barrelling in this country for 126 barrels would be \$126. Now, tank-cars contain, as I said, 6,200 wine gallons, or 5,267 imperial gallons. The duty on this, at 7½ cents per gallon, would be \$372.02. These items make a total of \$777.34, or 15½ cents per gallon, as against 18½ cents under the present system. Or, in other words, this method of importation would save to the consumer 3½ cents on every gallon imported. Last year there was imported into Canada 5,638,000 gallons, at which rate the yearly saving to the consumers of Canada, if this prohibition was removed, would be \$174,778. Further, the change would give employment to Canadian coopers in making 140,000 barrels, the number which would be required to contain this quantity of oil. This industry would give steady employment to 250 men. Labour would be given also to the workmen engaged in barrelling. I think, in view of these facts of which I challenge contradiction, the Government will clearly see it to be its duty to remove this prohibition, and at least to allow the American oil to come in in tank-cars. But there is another phase of this question to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. I hold that the Government should at least reduce the duty on crude oil. You well know, Mr. Speaker, that crude oil is becoming one of the most important articles in demand in the country for many purposes. There is now a prohibitory duty on crude oil. In the United States crude oil is sold at about 40 or 50 cents a barrel. The duty on that is 7½ cents, the same as on refined oil. Inspection and other charges bring this up to 9½ cents, or about 900 per cent on the value of the oil. The consequence of that high duty is, that crude oil is only to a very limited extent imported into Canada. The importation of crude oil would be advantageous to the refiners of Canada, because it would give them cheaper raw material and would give them the opportunity to supply the Canadian market. They could more easily compete with the American refiners, if they got their raw material cheaper. These men would not be confined to any particular section of the country; they could have their establishments anywhere, and they would thus be brought nearer to the consumers. Further, there would be a great advantage to the gas companies. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, coal-gas is now passing out of use, and they are now introducing a new gas called water-gas, manufactured from what is known as gas oil. Now, we find the manufacturers of gas oil throughout the country have been petitioning the Government to reduce the duty on gas oil, on the ground that they cannot produce gas as cheaply as otherwise they would do, and they go so far as to say that the Canadian industry does not produce a sufficient quantity of crude oil to supply the demand that is made upon them. Then again, Mr. Speaker, the introduction of crude oil free of duty, or at a much lower duty, would be advantageous in this way, that the lubricating oil which is manufactured from petroleum, would be considerably cheaper in this country and every industry using lubricating oil would get that oil at a lower price. This would benefit a very large number of people. Various paint oils which are manufactured from crude oil also, could be furnished at a lower price than at present. Again, it would be an advantage to a great many people in this country to get fuel oil. You know, Mr. Speaker, that fuel oil is used in many parts of the world to generate steam for the propulsion of machinery. On the Caspian Sea fuel oil is used to propel the steam-boats. But, to come nearer home, we find a large number of steamers on the coast of California using fuel oil. They find it more economical than to use wood or coal. Moreover, there are thousands of stationary engines in various parts of the United States using fuel oil instead of wood or coal. It is found that one dollar's worth of fuel oil is equal in steam-producing power to one-half ton of coal, it being regarded as cheaper for that purpose. Now, in this country we are prohibited from importing fuel oil, but if the price of this material could be reduced, it would be used very largely in our various manufacturing industries and for steam-boats and stationary engines. We are handicapped by the duty placed on this oil. Now, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the tariff would do the following things: First, It prevents us importing in tank-cars and therefore burdens the consumer more than he would otherwise be burdened. Second, It compels him to buy high-priced barrels from the United States instead of being made in this country. Third, It takes from the coopers work which properly belongs to the people of this country. Fourth, It causes loss by leakage and by deterioration in quality. Fifth, The tariff prevents the refiner from getting crude oil, that is, cheap raw material. Sixth, It increases the price of lubricating oil. Seventh, It prevents the people from obtaining a cheap supply of fuel oil, gas oil, paraffine wax and many other things manufactured from the raw material. Without detaining the House much longer, I may say that I think I have brought to the attention of the Government three aspects of this question: First, The high duties on imported refined oils which ought to be reduced. Second. The very high duty on the raw material, which, in my opinion, ought to be reduced. Third. The prohibition of the importation of oil in tank-cars which should be removed. If they would make the changes I have urged upon them they would confer a great benefit upon the consumers of coal oil in this country, and I am sure they would receive the blessings of the consumers, if not the blessings of the few oil men. I have shown you that the industry is an extensive one and requires the careful consideration of its interests. The Government should consider the interests of the consumers also, and I hope that next week, when the Government declare its policy on this question, it will be found that it has done something in the interest of the people of Canada by reducing the duty on coal oil.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Mr. Speaker, the motion in your hands is one for which I can certainly ask of this House its most careful consideration. Before this House is in a position to decide one way or the other it is most important that the members should be possessed of the facts concerning this business. It requires its most serious consideration, for fear that we may do an injury which we do not desire to do, to any particular trade or any large number of our fellow-citizens in this country. It is under these circumstances, representing, as I do, one of the ridings of Lambton, that I feel very deeply the responsibility that rests upon myself in endeavouring, in my humble way, to represent fairly before this House the industry which exists in that county. Sir, I refuse to treat this question in any other than in a broad and national spirit.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Yes; you may say "hear, hear," and I say "hear, hear." also—I refuse to deal with the question in any other way. True it is, that the industry is confined, at the present moment, so far as developed, to the county of Lambton; but surely for all that it is a Canadian industry; it is one of the most important of Canadian industries; it is an industry which is of so important a character that its destruction would prevent the development of the oil regions of Canada for a long time to come, if not for ever, and would remove from the minds of Canadians any idea of further developing the oil resources of Canada. The petroleum wealth of the county of Lambton is as much a part of the national wealth of the Dominion as the petroleum wealth of the United States is part of the wealth of that country. Do you think that they will not guard their petroleum industry because it is confined to the states of Ohio, Pennsylvania and one or two other places? Certainly they will. It is to-day one of the greatest industries of the United States, and has been developed there in a manner almost unprecedented in the history of the world.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Sir, I repudiate the statesman, and I would repudiate any man in this House, who would be so narrow and so contracted in his views as to refuse to look upon this question in a national light. The production of crude oil, as I stated, is alone being successfully carried on in the county of Lambton; but is it not well known to this House—is it not well known to Canadians—that the county of Lambton is by no means the only place in this country where oil is to be obtained? It is well known that in the Athabasca region we have to-day a very large section which by a report made to the Senate has shown to embrace an oil territory and which, when developed, will be larger than the Russian and the American fields put together. Then let us pass eastward. It is well known that there is oil in the Gaspé district. My hon. friend from that district (Mr. Joncas) tells me that an English company with a capital of £330,000 sterling, have already spent nearly $220,000 in operations in that district. He showed me a letter yesterday from one of his constituents in Gaspé, some one, I presume, connected with the company, saying that if any change of tariff was made which would affect that industry in this country, these men would have to cease their operations, because their prospects would be ruined, and they would have no object whatever in carrying on business, feeling, as they would, that the moment that they discovered oil the Americans would control the market, and they themselves would get no return for the capital they had invested. I think, considering the great importance of this industry, the House will permit me to read a short extract from a lecture delivered by Mr. Marvin before the Royal Engineers, at Chatham, England, about three years ago. He says:

The area of 40,000 miles recommended to be reserved by no means represents the total, which one witness estimated at 100,000 miles of oil-bearing territory. To avoid minute details of a region of which few maps in England give an accurate representation, I may say, in general terms, that if the reader find Calgary, a well-known station on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and strike about a couple of hundred miles due north to Edmonton, which is connected with the station by a coach road, he will reach a fringe of this great oil region. From the Edmonton district the oil belt stretches the whole distance in a north-westerly direction to the mouth of the Mackenzie River; a length of quite 2,000 miles as the crow flies. The Athabasca River runs through the middle of the oil district, which includes the whole of the Lesser Slave Lake on the one hand, and touches the shores of the Beaver Lake on the other. The Peace River is entirely included in the district, from the moment it quits the Rocky Mountains until, with the Athabasca, it flows into the Great Slave Lake, a course of over a thousand miles; and from Fort Smith, close to where they jointly flow into the lake, to the mouth of the Mackenzie River, a navigable run of 1,360 miles, there is oil the whole way. The general area is larger than that of all the petroleum districts of the present oil-producing countries put together, and the selection of the best southern section as a Crown domain is a measure that should be copied by the Indian Government without delay.

Those remarks made by Mr. Marvin were made subsequently to the report of our own Senate, which I will not read in whole, as I suppose nearly every one in the House has read it. The report of the Senate says :

It is not, however, to the steady thriving oil industry of Ontario that I desire to call attention, but to the newly discovered deposits in the great Mackenzie Basin, respecting which the Select Committee of the Senate of Canada appointed to inquire into the resources of the region, reported last year that: "The evidence submitted to your committee, points to the existence in the Athabasca and Mackenzie valleys of the most extensive petroleum field in America, if not in the world. The use of petroleum, and consequently the demand for it, are increasing at such a rapid ratio that it is probable that this great petroleum field will assume an enormous value in the near future, and will rank among the chief assets comprised in the Crown domain of the Dominion. For this reason your committee would suggest that a tract of about 40,000 square miles (the area of the Russian deposits at Baku is only 1,600 square miles) be, for the present, reserved from sale, and that as soon as possible its value may be more accurately tested by exploration and practical tests."

This report gives the limits of the oil territory which was recommended to be reserved. It may be said, perhaps, that that is of little value to us at the present day, because there are no railways, and that is perfectly true. There are no railways, and, in one sense, the region is inaccessible; but before those oil fields in Russia were developed they were much further away from railway communication than is Athabasca from our Canadian Pacific Railway. At the time the Caspian district was discovered there was no railway in the district, but shortly afterwards railways were constructed. The Russians, at that time, were importing over 13,000,000 gallons annually, of American oil. The Russian Government imposed a duty of 14 cents per gallon, and within four years of the discovery of petroleum, American oils were practically excluded, because the quantity that entered the country was reduced to the nominal one of 50,000 gallons. The tariff encouraged the petroleum industry beyond question, and if that tariff had not been established there would have been no petroleum industry in Russia to-day. This is conceded on all hands. After I have explained the extent of capital and labour employed in our country in developing the coal oil industry, I shall show that it would be a dangerous course to pursue either to allow the importation of American refined oil free, or even to trifle with or tamper with the tariff which, at the present moment, gives us our protection. If my remarks in this debate are more extended than usual, I trust I will be pardoned by hon. members on account of the attacks made on the industry by numerous newspapers in the country. Some have gone the length of publishing caricatures. One paper in Montreal occupied half a page with a caricature of an American girl and a Canadian girl buying petroleum. A number of the articles have contained many misstatements, I will not say wilful misstatements, as to the quality and the price of oil, and as to the capital and labour employed in the industry. Those articles have shown to any one familiar with the business that the persons who wrote them were not well up in the subject, and it would have been well if, before they scattered these statements broadcast throughout the country, they had taken the trouble to ascertain the facts. The press, having done so much already, and having alarmed those engaged in the industry, I may be pardoned for trespassing longer on the time of the House than I otherwise would have thought of doing. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), a few days ago referred to the policy of the Government as stated in the Budget speech of 1882, and he said that speech was a guarantee to the people for the safety of capital they might invest in this country, and an assurance that the capital invested would be protected. Under the policy of a Conservative Government, under a policy that was inaugurated before the National Policy was ever thought of, under a policy decided upon thirty years ago, and under a tariff made by Hon. Alexander Mackenzie himself, and under assurances given in Parliament ever since 1877, capitalists have been invited to invest their money in developing the oil regions of Canada. A bargain was made to a certain extent—I speak figuratively—and capitalists were led to understand that their investments would be protected, and it is not difficult to understand that the people engaged in that industry in the county of Lambton feel alarmed at the agitation created by the newspapers. If Canada could not supply the home market with such petroleum as is required, if the Canadian producers were taxing the public to an extent that would make the buyers suffer in the least, if they were not giving a good article and did not possess an abundant supply, if they were using the tariff under a system of "combinations," thus raising the price of the article and taking extra profits from the consumer, then all assurances given by the Government would be cancelled as between them and the producers. But so long as the petroleum industry furnishes a good article and the quantity required in the country, and does not exact any money improperly from the public by reason of the tariff, so long as there are no combinations but free competition between producers and manufacturers, then the people are justified in looking to this House and the Government for a continuation of the protection under which this industry has grown and prospered. Since I have had the honour of holding a seat in this House there have been no combinations either among manufacturers or producers. I make this statement because it has been charged since I have been here that there were "rings" in the oil trade. There are no "rings" in the oil trade, nor have there been any "rings" since I have sat in Parliament. Another question worthy of consideration is the quality of the oil. I am free to admit that the quality of Canadian oil some years ago was not so good as it is to-day. But I am satisfied, and my opinion will be supported by many members of this House who have used Canadian oil, that Canada produces a first-class burning oil, and that those who use it are perfectly satisfied. Another important point is that our oil is, as a rule, a safer oil for burning purposes than the imported article, and the oil we supply to the public is an article that does not consume so quickly as the light grade of American oil that comes into this country. To the farmer and to all classes of the people who want a good reliable light, a safe and economical oil, I defy them to find any better on the continent of America than we can give them in the county of Lambton. I admit, Sir, that there are in this country and in the United States different grades of oil. We have a good, honest, economical, family oil in this country, and we have another grade called "extra" or "water-white." Did you ever find two qualities of oil in the United States? If you will ask any of your American neighbours you will find that there are two qualities there. The Standard Oil Co. are making a refined oil out of "Lima crude," which is bought at 17 or 18 cents a barrel, and forcing it over the country, but on the other hand they have first-class oil, a good water-white oil, and it is that quality that is mostly imported into this country. I may ask, why is that best quality mostly imported? Did you ever see any article imported into a foreign country of the poorest quality when the manufacturer wants to build up a trade in the foreign country? Are the worst qualities of Bass' ale and Guinness' Dublin stout sent to Canada to compete with the ales of local manufacture? No; they send their very best qualities. Is it not always understood that when the foreign manufacturer tries to secure a market he invariably sends the very best quality of the article which he produces.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Minister of Railways and Canals for the past fiscal year, from the 1st July, 1891, to 30th June, 1892.—(Mr. Haggart.)

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider proposed resolutions (p. 357) relative to the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not propose at this stage to offer any comment upon this measure, but I now inform the hon. gentleman that at some later stage, probably upon the second reading of this Bill, I shall take an opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the whole system of superannuation. The system of superannuation casts altogether too large a burden on the people of the country, and I venture to suggest at this moment to the hon. gentleman that we shall do our duty if we pass the whole system under review and substitute another, which will be more in accordance with the requirements of the service, as well as of the country.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Finance may as well inform the committee what the total amount of revenue will be, if the resolution should be adopted and embodied in the form of a Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. That somewhat depends on circumstances. This resolution is introduced upon which to found a bill which will be submitted to the House, if the House approves of this resolution, and the sole purpose of the Government in bringing this measure down is to obviate the burdens of the superannuation system. Hon. members on both sides of the House agree that the system which has been in vogue for a number of years has been a burdensome one. Each year its burdens are becoming more and more apparent. In speaking on this question the other day I gave some reasons as to why this system had become so burdensome, and it is not necessary to repeat them. Probably in the course of the discussion which will arise on the Bill, or on the motion which the hon. leader of the Opposition has announced he will make, these facts may be more fully brought out. If it had not been for that desire to meet what is the opinion of the Government, and I believe the opinion of the House, that the present system is too burdensome, and that it must be abolished or some other system introduced in its place which will bear less heavily on the revenues of the country, this proposal would not have been brought to the attention of the House. The abatement under the present Act is very small. Years ago it was made fairly large, and if it had been kept at that figure and the fund had been well administered the burden would have been comparatively light; but when it was made 2 and 1½ per cent it immediately took from the system all fair basis of support. So it has been burdensome, and is burdensome at the present time. However, that is the system which has grown up. Under it the Civil Service has come in and contributed to the fund, and expects to partake of its benefits, and to that extent an understanding in the nature of a contract exists between the present Civil Service and the Government. They pay their abatements and they expect the advantages which come from the fund. This proposes to break off at the time of the passage of the Act, and divide the old superannuation system entirely from the system established by this Bill. The fund that will be raised under this system will be kept and administered by itself. The first proposal is to make the abatements much larger. As the hon. gentleman will see, it is for the larger salaries 3½ per cent, and for the lower 3 per cent per annum. It is proposed that the Government's contribution to the fund shall be interest at the rate of 6 per cent upon the moneys in the fund. That is the sole contribution the Government makes and the system is based upon calculations on healthy male mortality tables and at the rate of 6 per cent. The amount of the fund will depend on the number of civil servants contributing; but whether the amount is larger or smaller, on that basis it pays its own way and is of no further burden to the Government. I cannot, therefore, answer definitely the question asked by the hon. gentleman as to what I consider will be the amount of the fund. That depends entirely, as I have said, on the number of civil servants who come in from this on. The service at the present time is fairly well supplied with employees. Hon. gentlemen opposite may think it is too well supplied, and of course, there may be a difference of opinion on that subject. However, I call the attention of the House to the fact that civil service additions hereafter will chiefly be to make up vacancies which may occur from deaths or resignations. So that the same number of contributors and the same fund will not be possible under this new arrangement as when, for instance, we were commencing the superannuation system and took in the large number of servants who were at that time in the employment of the Government. The contribution of the Government, of course, begins at the minimum and increases in accordance with the number who enter the service, and the amount of money which accrues to the fund from their contributions. It is difficult to say either the amount or the number, from the causes I have mentioned; but this point is certain, the system is self-sustaining on the 6 per cent basis. The contribution of the Government, then, is the amount of percentage between what the money is fairly worth to us, what we give for it in the savings bank and 6 per cent which we will pay on the moneys which are in the fund. It will commence at the minimum and gradually go up. If at any time under this arrangement Parliament comes to the conclusion that it will have no longer a superannuation system, the fund is able to sustain itself and carry those who have contributed to it. So that there will not hereafter be the argument, which there is now, that we have entered into contract with the civil service. If, say twenty years hence, Parliament comes to the conclusion that it will not longer have superannuation, there will be no argument against adopting that course drawn from the idea of a contract, and if we sweep away superannuation we will violate no agreement under which civil servants have paid in their money. We may at any time stop the system, and the basis on which this calculation has been computed will be sufficient, just as is the case in an insurance society, to carry those who at the time belonged to that system and contributed to the fund to the end.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, if I understand the measure aright, it will not apply to any civil servant now in the service of the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. To none.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So, practically speaking, it is rather in the far future when it will become an effective measure of relief. The hon. gentleman only proposed to apply this system to men appointed from and after the passage of this Act. We will leave that for future consideration. The point which strikes me about this Bill is that, if it is also, as I understand it, purely voluntary—

Mr. FOSTER. No, it is compulsory.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then if it is compulsory, the hon. gentleman should be able to form a good idea of what it will come to in the long run.

Mr. FOSTER. We could, if we knew the number that would come in.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You, no doubt, know pretty well. The hon. gentleman will, perhaps, give the committee a rough idea as to what is the total amount of the salaries of those civil servants who are at present time entitled to the benefits of the Superannuation Act. I take it that the number includes all the civil servants at Ottawa and a very considerable number of the outside service.

Mr. FOSTER. I am having that statement made up, and will be prepared to submit it when the Bill is before the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It appears that we are to have two concurrent systems existing after this Bill passes. The present superannuation system will continue, with all its existing defects, and with the annual balance which year after year is charged against the fund, and the hon. gentleman, I understand, does not propose to increase the payments made by those now under the system.

Mr. FOSTER. Not by this Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) So that the anomaly and injustice of which we are complaining with regard to the present superannuation system is not touched at all.

Mr. FOSTER. I may say also that the Bill I propose to introduce limits the recipient, or the contributor to the fund to the age of forty-five years. Under the present system, there is no limit of age, and a man may come to the service at seventy-five years old and contribute to the superannuation fund.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are all the civil servants bound to contribute under the present system?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; payment is taken perforce from their salaries.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is there any rule with reference to the age at which one may enter the Civil Service now?

Mr. FOSTER. In the inside service, yes; in the outside service, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I can tell my hon. friend that there are cases where men have been considered to be too old at sixty, and have been superannuated, and men put in their places at the age of sixty-eight.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not difficult to find such a precedent in the long history of the Civil Service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am speaking of recent cases.

Resolution reported.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 27) to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—COAL OIL DUTY.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to correct a misstatement of a matter of fact, which, I am informed, occurred in the debate which took place yesterday. I am told that an hon. gentleman stated that the Mackenzie Government had imposed a duty on coal oil. That is not only not the fact, but it is the exact reverse of the fact. The duty on coal oil was imposed in 1868—I think the double duty was then imposed, one duty of customs and one of excise. In 1874, when the Mackenzie Government first revised the tariff, they left coal oil alone, but in 1877, when that question came up for discussion we absolutely abolished the excise duty which amounted to 5 cents per wine gallon, and we reduced the customs duty from 15 cents to 6 cents per gallon. No duty whatever was imposed by the Mackenzie Government, but the duty was abolished altogether in the case of excise, and reduced from 15 cents to 6 cents in the matter of customs.

FLOODS IN QUEENSLAND.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, whether his attention has been called to the terrible calamity that has befallen our fellow-subjects in the colony of Queensland; where we see by recent reports, floods have devastated the colony causing a destruction of property to the amount of $15,000,000, almost destroying the capital city of Brisbane, and necessarily involving a large number of individuals in very great suffering and loss. It seems to me this would be a fitting opportunity for us to show our sympathy and willingness to assist our fellow-subjects in that portion of the Empire. We, in this country have been singularly free from any misfortune, either by flood, fire, or pestilence, and I think we cannot better show our gratitude for the mercies we have reason to be thankful for, than by extending sympathy and liberality to any one who may be in distress, especially those who are of our own household. I would suggest to the Government the propriety of communicating with the Commissioner in London, who could easily ascertain from the agent of the Colony of Queensland whether assistance from this Government would be acceptable, and in what way, if acceptable, it could be most properly applied. Hon. gentlemen will recollect how very much the people of Newfoundland were gratified at the interest taken by the people of this country, when they met with a somewhat similar misfortune, and how the political acerbities which had then arisen were smoothed away by the fact being made evident that there was on this continent a sympathetic feeling for our fellow-subjects, a feeling expressed by the large subscriptions made on their behalf. It does seem to me that this is a fitting opportunity for us to extend to our fellow-subjects in Australia a similar relief. If we are not as prosperous as some of us would wish, yet we are rich enough to afford liberal assistance. I throw out this suggestion, and I trust it will be acceptable not only to the Government, but to the hon. members of the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I beg to say that within a few days, in all probability, we shall have more in detail a statement as to the extent of the calamity to which the hon. gentleman alludes, and that we will give our best attention to his suggestion, and to the circumstances connected with the case.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. LAURIER. There is a matter as to which, I think, the attention of this House ought to be called and on which we should have some explanation from the Government. I refer to the vacancy which now exists on the bench of the Supreme Court. If my memory fails me not, on the 22nd September last the late lamented Sir Wm. Ritchie, Chief Justice of that court, died, and the vacancy on the bench has not been filled up yet. Within a reasonable time afterwards the Government took the initiative, and very properly so, to fill up the presidency of the court by promoting Mr. Justice Strong to the eminent position of Chief Justice; but though one, and two, and three, and four months have elapsed since that time, the vacancy on the bench has not been filled. The court is composed of six judges, and I believe that five form a quorum. The court is about to open within a week or ten days, and I understand that one of the judges has obtained leave of absence, so that under existing circumstances, there is not a quorum of the bench to transact business. The delay of the Government, it seems to me, is quite unjustifiable, because if there is no quorum when the court opens, the loss upon the public will be very great. Apart altogether from that consideration, it seems to me that the character of the court is lowered if prompt attention is not given by the Government to any vacancy that may occur. There can be no reason whatever why so long a period as four months should be allowed to elapse before an appointment is made. Certainly nothing has been wanting on the part either of the bar or the bench of the provincial courts to get the vacancy filled. Under such circumstances, it seems to me that one day more ought not to be allowed to pass before an appointment is made.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not able to acquiesce in the view of the hon. gentleman, that the delay which has taken place has been an undue delay; but the Government do not intend to allow the term to open without making provision for an additional judge.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In the face of what the hon. gentleman has said, I make no reference to the composition of the Supreme Court, as it now stands. I am glad to hear that it is the intention of the Government to make the appointment before the court meets. As it stands now, although I am no stickler for sectional appointments, the hon. gentleman knows that there are in the court three judges from Ontario, two from Quebec, and none at all from the maritime section; yet, assuming that there should be a proper determination of cases coming from the maritime part of the Dominion, it is, of course, desirable that some one acquainted with the law as it exists there, should be appointed. But I desire to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the present state of matters in Nova Scotia. In that province there are supposed to be seven judges. Up to the present time and, I think, for three years past, although we have been paying the salaries of seven judges, we have only had the services of six. Judge McDonald, I think I am correct in saying, applied three years ago for leave of absence for six months. The leave was granted and, I understand, was afterwards extended to twelve months. The twelve months expired, and Judge McDonald, I am credibly informed, has since made no pretense of attending to any judicial duties whatever. He does not live at the capital, and does not go there. He lives at his home in Antigonish county, and during all that time he has been drawing his full salary, although unable, owing to his physical infirmities, to discharge the duties of his office. This state of things ought not to continue. If Judge McDonald is unable to discharge the duties of his office, he ought to be superannuated. He is an old man and has been a long time on the bench, and is entitled to receive a superannuation allowance; but to permit a judge who, from physical or other infirmities, is unable to perform his duties, to remain in receipt of his full salary, while the court is weakened by the loss of one of its members, is, in my opinion, very little short of a judicial scandal. The hon. gentleman himself is, perhaps, the best judge whether or not seven judges are necessary in that province. I say nothing about that. I am not competent just now to give an opinion on that subject. But certainly the action taken by him for some time past indicates that, in his opinion, six judges are sufficient to discharge the duties. But whether they are or not, there is no reason why Judge McDonald, who does not make the slightest pretense of discharging his judicial duties, should continue to draw his full salary.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. One observation made by the hon. gentleman I am not aware whether he intended to apply to me or to the judge, that is, that the action some one had taken—I presume he means myself—indicated the belief that only six judges were necessary. I presume that is a fair inference from the conduct of the learned judge himself. But I wish to say that, so far as I am concerned, I have not taken any action in the matter whatever. It is true, three years ago, Judge McDonald obtained six months' leave of absence, which was afterwards extended to twelve months, and, I am sorry to say, that, owing to the state of his health, he has been unable to resume his duties. The learned judge has made no communication to me whatever, if I may except a note which I received two years ago, from which I expected his resignation in a short time. I have learned from the public press, however, that the learned judge is supposed to have tendered his resignation and that I have refused to accept it, and have expressed the hope that he should remain on the bench. That is an entire mistake; and I further wish to say that the strictures in the press reflecting on myself in connection with the matter, and intimating that complaints had been made to me which would justify me in calling upon the learned judge to resign, are entirely groundless. No complaint has been made to the department, either by the public or the profession, as to any inconvenience resulting from the absence of the learned judge from duty. Personally I am opposed to a judge remaining in office and failing to discharge his duties. I am told that representations have been made to the learned judge by his colleagues that, out of respect to him, they are willing to discharge the judicial business during his absence. But I have no personal or official knowledge of that; I only know it from rumour.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I may state that if the matter remains as it is at present, and no intimation is given that Judge McDonald will resume the duties of his office, I shall deem it my duty, before the session ends, to take the opinion of the House as to such a state of things being allowed to continue.

OFFICIAL DEBATES—TRANSLATION.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I wish to call your attention to what is now going on with respect to the printing and distribution of the Debates of this House. The House was opened on the 26th January; we are now on the 10th February; 565 pages of the English version of the Debates are now printed and distributed, and not a single line of the French version has been as yet distributed. It is to be presumed that the House intend that the members belonging to one nationality or to the other should receive an equal treatment, and that the "Hansard" is not published for the exclusive information of English-speaking members, but also for the information of French-speaking members. It is hard to say where the blame lies. We are informed by the Chief Translator that he has translated upwards of 150 pages of the English version and that it is the Queen's Printer, or rather the Superintendent of the Printing Bureau who, for one reason or another, neglects or declines to print the French version. It will be agreed that it is neither fair nor reasonable that at this sixteenth day of the session, the French members should not have received a single line of the Debates published in their language, while the English members receive them day by day. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that you will cause this condition to cease, so that both sections in this House be put on an equal footing as regards the printing and publication of the Debates.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Pay of the staff of Permanent Corps of the Active Militia, including allowances $575,782

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I suppose the hon. Minister who has just taken charge of that department—a department which has been subjected for years past to very severe and proper criticism—will take this opportunity of explaining whether or not the department is to be continued on the same lines as during the past eight or ten years, or what changes will be made. Would the hon. gentleman inform us how far he intends adopting the suggestions made by the General with regard to the different branches of the service?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). My hon. friend will see that a change is made in the manner of submitting the items, so that Parliament will be better able to understand what each expenditure is for and what increases with regard to staff or the service may be required. In the present year, it will be seen from the total estimates, there is a slight reduction, as compared with last year, in the headquarters and district staff. In the first item, the one we are on, there is a total decrease, owing to the rearrangement of the staff, of nearly $5,000.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Is the hon. Minister prepared to tell the House what is meant by this paragraph in the report of the Major-General commanding the forces. He says, speaking of the staff:

I have submitted details of a scheme for the re-organization of the staff, by which I propose to gain economy in administration, combined with a systematic instruction of staff officers in those important branches of their duty which have been hitherto ignored.

Will that scheme be laid before the House?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). There is a scheme, as suggested by the General, under consideration at present, and which will be submitted after it has been attended to by the Governor-General in Council.

Mr. AMYOT. I see in the Estimates a decrease of $10,000 in the estimate of the cartridge factory in Quebec. Is it intended to bring about gradually the disappearance of that factory, because $40,000 will not be sufficient to work it? This factory employs a hundred people and furnishes cartridges, at least as cheaply as they could be imported. If we do not manufacture our own cartridges, we will have to buy them from England, and thus be departing in that respect from the principle of the National Policy. We must not forget that we get the clothing of the militia made in this country. That clothing costs us more than we would have to pay if we brought it out from England, but we thus encourage home manufacture and give employment to our own people. The same principle should be applied in the matter of cartridges. I think there is a certain desire on the part of the General—for whom I have personally great respect, but he sometimes commits mistakes—to take away all those things from Quebec. He wanted to take away those old guns and sell them, too, for a few paltry dollars to the foundry. It would not be right to take away all our old souvenirs, which are among the charms of the oldest city on the continent. If we do not keep up this factory we will have to get our cartridges from England, which are not worth more than our own, and would cost just as much. As regards the quality, I see by the reports, and I happen myself to know by experiment, that the accuracy of shooting is certainly within the range of Imperial ammunition. I hope the hon. Minister will not adopt too quickly the ideas of any General sent out here. Of course England sends us her best and most devoted officers; but they do not understand this country, and want to apply to it the principles which rule in England. In England volunteer officers are generally rich, and the system there is not the same at all. English generals, who do not understand our militia, instead of helping it, work against it. I applied to the General to give us a special board of examiners in Quebec. I said: Your schools are all right; but it takes three months to go through, and our officers cannot afford that. Give us a special board to examine, at any rate, the officers who went through the North-west campaign. That was refused us, because our Generals do not understand the country. They do not know that, generally speaking, volunteer officers are not rich, and cannot give up their positions in the banks, shops or other commercial establishments to go and qualify themselves, though very often they are our best men. I hope the hon. Minister of Militia, who, we know, is devoted to the force, and who wishes to protect the force, before accepting all the suggestions of the General, will test the feeling of the officers of the service, and not accept too hastily the suggestions made. As to the cartridge factory, I beg him not to take any measure that would tend to diminish its usefulness.

Mr. LISTER. I think that if the hon. gentleman who has just spoken will take the trouble to read the report presented by the General in command of the militia force, he must be satisfied that the General is exactly the man for the position. For the first time since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, the General commanding has taken the bull by the horns, so to speak, and has fearlessly stated the exact condition of the militia of this country. If we are to draw any inference from the report upon the militia force made by the General, we cannot but admit that that force is in a very demoralized condition indeed. I would remind the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, that the question of the cartridge factory is not now immediately before us. The item to which we are now directing our attention is number 96: "Pay of staff, permanent corps and active militia, including allowances." I would ask the Minister of Militia why it is that there is an increase in that item?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). There is an increase of $950 drill pay of city corps, $450 drill pay of rural corps, an increase of $10,000 for the pay of active militia attending schools of instruction. Then there are sundry reductions, as, for instance, a decrease in the headquarters staff and district staff together of about $5,000; a decrease of about $2,500 in marching allowance. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the page he will see all these particulars given.

Mr. LISTER. In the report?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). No, in the Estimates, page 38. These details, as given, show that there is a total increase of only $4,050 in the whole item.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Before this resolution is adopted, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia if there has been any provision made to strengthen the 5th Princess Louise New Brunswick Hussars. That regiment has seven troops, and it requires, I understand, eight troops to constitute a full regiment. I have been urging upon the predecessors of the present Minister for some years, the necessity of completing this regiment. Last year I impressed it upon the Minister then in charge of the department, and he promised to refer the matter to the General for report. I afterwards communicated with him to learn the result of his communication with the General, and was informed that the General had reported as follows:—

I strongly recommend the addition of an eighth troop to the Princess Louise New Brunswick Hussars. The regiment is in a very efficient state, and its completion to the full number of troops required for a cavalry regiment, would strengthen materially the good spirit which already exists in all ranks.

I think this is a matter of very considerable importance, and I trust the Minister has made provision to have this regiment strengthened.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I may tell my hon. friend that it is my intention to give an additional company to the New Brunswick cavalry regiment he has mentioned; but I have not made provision for it this year. It is my purpose to have that company or corps organized some time this autumn, and provision for it will be made in next year's estimates.

Mr. CORBOULD. For the last two sessions I have been urging upon the Government the necessity of having a brigade of garrison artillery on the main land of British Columbia. At present the only militia corps is the company of garrison artillery in New Westminster. Vancouver being the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway I think it is certainly advisable to have a corps of garrison artillery in that city. Last year I was told that as soon as the then Minister of Militia and the General commanding had visited British Columbia, the Government would act upon the report which the General might make on that district. I would like to ask the Minister whether the amount mentioned in the Estimates includes any sum for the purpose of forming a new corps of artillery on the main land of British Columbia?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). This matter is under consideration, and everything possible will be done to meet the requirements of the people on the main land of British Columbia.

Mr. BERGIN. I would like to ask my hon. friend the Minister if he has under consideration the reorganization of the medical staff of the militia? I made a recommendation in 1885, after the difficulty in the North-west, on this matter. I suppose my hon. friend the Minister is aware that the medical men of the militia—the militia surgeons—have formed an association for the purpose of bringing before the Minister the needs of the medical service. If the hon. Minister is aware of these things, as I suppose he is, it having been brought under the notice of the General, I would like to know if it is his intention to do anything toward the reorganization of that service, which now is certainly not creditable to the country? The manner in which the medical stores and comforts are provided for the camps is also most discreditable. Of course, I do not forget that my hon. friend has been but a short time at the head of the department, but I hope he will see that something is done to put this department of the service in good shape.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I would like to ask the hon. Minister, in connection with this item, if he has taken into consideration the requirements of Annapolis for a battery? When I first entered Parliament in 1887, a large petition was presented to the department for this battery, and I understood at that time that there was not money for such a purpose. Now, I understand that it has been thought proper to disband a battery in Nova Scotia. That being the case, I think that the claims of Annapolis should have precedence in this matter. Annapolis Town is the oldest town in British North America, and the oldest in North America, with the exception of St. Augustine in Florida. A great deal has been said, both in the papers and in the Senate last session, with reference to this old town of Annapolis Royal. Nothing very special has been said but what has been referred to by myself during the sessions of Parliament since I first had the honour of representing the county. Annapolis garrison—the old fort of Annapolis—should be renovated and should not be neglected by the department, as it has been. The old block-house has been torn down, the ramparts are being destroyed, and no steps are being taken for their preservation. Nothing is done whatever for the preservation of the fort. I consider that this is a burning disgrace for the Dominion of Canada, composed, as it is, of two nations, French and English, who should take a deep and abiding interest in the old place. I urge upon the department that they should not only keep these old fortifications in a state of preservation, but they should also give what has been asked by the citizens of that vicinity, a battery for that place, particularly as one battery in Nova Scotia has, within the last year, been disbanded, by the recommendation of the General.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). If I find upon examination that the battery has been disbanded, as mentioned by my hon. friend, and funds are placed at our disposal for the creation of a battery at Annapolis, I shall be very happy to comply with the wishes of the hon. gentleman. As regards what my hon. friend from Stormont and Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) has said, any report or suggestion of his will be received with every respect, as coming from a gentleman well qualified to speak on these matters. I may say that special attention is being given this year to a proper supply of medical stores for the proposed camps of instruction.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Before the item passes, I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to pages 50, 51, 52 and 53—C of the Auditor-General's Report. He will find there enumerated a lot of irregularities in the payment of officers and men. I think it is well to call his attention to the fact that a great many irregularities have taken place in that respect in the militia service. I notice that in one case, out of forty-five men in one company, twenty-two signatures are in one hand-writing, and twenty men have not even signed the pay-list, and so on. In company No. 4, forty-one out of forty-three signatures are in the hand-writing of Captain H. Tetu; in company 5, forty-two out of forty-four signatures are in one hand-writing. So all through the list. A great many officers and men were paid more than they were entitled to. In many cases men were paid who were not on the list at all, and the Auditor-General says the signatures were irregular, because, according to the regulations, each man entitled to receive pay should sign his own name, or make his mark and have it properly witnessed. Now, I think the fact that these irregularities are continued from year to year—because this matter was under discussion last session—must make it plain that some better supervision should be given to the payment of these men. Of course, we have the Auditor-General to supervise these payments; at the same time I think those who have charge of the Militia Department ought to see that some system is brought into force which will put a stop to these irregularities, and prevent officers drawing pay when they are not entitled to do so, and prevent the payment of men for services which are never rendered. I think the Minister of Militia might give his attention to this matter, and if he can give any explanation of these irregularities I shall be happy to hear them.

Mr. DENISON. There is, no doubt, something in the remarks of the last speaker with respect to these irregularities; but we must not forget that a great many of the men are not able to sign their names, and therefore it is necessary for them to sign by their mark and have it witnessed by some one. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), a little while ago, spoke of the militia being in a very demoralized condition. I think that every officer of the force will agree with me when I say that the force is in as good a state now as it ever has been, and possibly better.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you speak of city or rural districts?

Mr. DENISON. I speak of the militia as a whole. I think that every year we are improving it by degrees, and getting nearer the ideal to which we are looking forward. Now, the rural militia have not had a proper opportunity, because they have only been allowed to drill every other year, and it is impossible for men who turn out once in two years to be as proficient and to do as well as those who turn out every year. I think the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton were probably caused by the report of the General. I have read that report over, and so far as I can gather from it, there are just two points to which he specially directs attention: one is stores and equipments, and the other is the staff. I do not think he says a word in his report against the men of the militia force, nor, for that matter, against the officers. But he does refer to the staff; he says it requires reorganization; and as he has given special attention to that point, I have no doubt that he is correct. I know that a great many members of the staff are now becoming old, and, although I would be sorry to see them disappear from our ranks, still, when the efficiency of the staff requires it, they should not stand in the way. As to the equipment, the other point specially dwelt upon, I think the criticism of the General is well founded. In our own corps we have no complaint about the clothing, although I think, the saddlery is not as good as it might be—whether that is the fault of the manufacturers or contractor, I am not prepared to say. But I entirely endorse what the General said with regard to saddlery. For my own part, I regret to see that many of the corps are being reduced in number; I regret it only in the sense of seeing the force as a whole reduced in number; but it may be a proper move, and I approve of it if other corps are being formed in other places. In fact when corps become obsolete, or useless through being incompetent I think it is time they should be disbanded. But I know, and many members of this House also know, that in almost every part of Canada there is a desire to form new corps, and wherever that can be done, they should be encouraged. For my own part, I would like to see the Government go even further in that direction than they have done in the past; I would like to see them pass a law that every young man between the ages of 18 and 21 should serve twelve days in the militia. Whether that would be a popular move, I do not know, and I do not care. That is my opinion, and I think that if every young man in the country between the ages of 18 and 21 had to serve twelve days, it would not hurt them at all, and they would always take an interest in the militia afterwards. It would be a good thing for the country if every man felt that he owed something to the state, and was ready to do his share.

Mr. LISTER. I am sure the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has not read the report of the General very carefully, or he would not contradict my statement that the militia force of the country was in a state of demoralization. I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to page 2 of the report, where the General uses these words:

In my previous report I attributed the lack of efficiency of a considerable part of the active militia, to deficient inspection.

Now, if the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to peruse the report made by the General previous to this one, I think he will find that the General says that the Canadian militia is not in an efficient condition. The hon. member for Stormont and Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), a few moments ago, asked whether it was the intention of the Government to reorganize the medical staff of the militia force. The hon. gentleman did not tell the committee wherein that staff is in a defective condition, or what he wished to have done.

Mr. DENISON. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the demoralized condition of the force. The General made use of the term, lack of efficiency.

Mr. LISTER. They are demoralized.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain the increase of $2,200 in the staff at headquarters, and decrease of $7,000 in the district staff.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That arises owing to a proposed readjustment of the district and headquarters staffs.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the proposed change?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I propose to do away with some Brigade Majors. There is one vacancy in Quebec, and I propose to do away with some Brigade Majors in other districts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No doubt the hon. gentleman's intention is good, and his proposal may be excellent, but the details should be submitted to the committee. Is the hon. gentleman going to fill the vacancy at Quebec, and what Brigade Majors are to be dispensed with?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). For 1892-93 the amount voted was $30,875 for the district staff. I intend readjusting that staff so as to effect a reduction of $7,000. Where a Deputy Adjutant-General commands a school of instruction, he will fill the place formerly occupied by a Brigade Major. In the case of Brigade Majors alone, I expect to effect a saving of the whole sum of $7,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will that involve a reduction from thirteen to six?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Vacancies have occurred from time to time. The opinion has been expressed by this House that it would be desirable to abolish the Brigade Majors, and I propose to adopt that suggestion and carry it out, a similar recommendation having been made by the General commanding.

Mr. LISTER. What is the total number of Brigade Majors?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). There have been eight.

Mr. LISTER. Are you going to abolish the office of Brigade Major altogether?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Yes.

Mr. LISTER. Is that how you will effect the saving?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Yes.

Mr. LISTER. Is it the intention of the Government to increase the active militia force of the country?

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). Have any steps been taken to raise two or more troops of mounted infantry or dragoons for Manitoba. A reduction in the number of troops has taken place during the past year through the disbandment of the 91st and 95th, and it is generally understood that their places will be taken by a similar number of mounted men. Has anything been done to that end?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That matter is under the consideration of the department. In reply to the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Semerville), as to the strictures that appear in the Auditor-General's Report respecting vouchers, I may say the money overpaid was refunded in the case mentioned. The matter having been brought to my attention, I will be careful that nothing of the kind occurs again. In reply to the remarks of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), I have only to say that I propose to conduct the department on a purely business basis. I have confidence in the General commanding, and I shall be influenced very much by his suggestions and his advice, having regard also to my knowledge of this country and the fact that ours is a citizen soldiery. I intend to endeavour to place the militia on a thoroughly efficient footing, and no corps will be kept in existence which does not maintain its efficiency and discipline. I recognize the fact that it is absurd to have a paper militia of considerable nominal strength, when in reality the force is not up to the mark. I propose, with the advice and co-operation of the General commanding and the officers of my department, to place the militia on such a footing as will be satisfactory to the House and the country.

Mr. CHARLTON. Have any steps been taken for the purpose of rendering the force more effective by supplying the men with the most modern improved small-arms? The Snider rifle is rather antiquated, and if our volunteers were brought into actual conflict, and were called upon to cope with troops armed with more modern weapons, they would be placed at a serious disadvantage. I suppose this matter has received the attention of the Government, and the committee will be glad to know whether any changes are to be made, and what course the Government contemplate adopting in this matter.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That matter is also under consideration. It is one that will involve a very large expense. So many changes and improvements are continually taking place in small-arms that, until something definite is established, it would be inadvisable to incur a very large expenditure. But the matter will receive the most careful attention, and when the time comes to ask Parliament to vote money to replace what I must admit is now an antiquated form of rifle with a more modern weapon, I trust the proposal will receive the hearty support of hon. members on both sides of the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. There will be no disposition manifested on the part of the Opposition to criticise or question any necessary expenditure the Government may adopt to make the force an effective one. I hope the Government will not hold this matter under consideration too long. If we need a volunteer force at all, we need an efficient one, and if we are ever called upon to face the enemy, the time may come unexpectedly and suddenly, and I think it is perhaps questionable whether the economical policy of refusing to incur necessary outlay for making a thoroughly efficient force is a good one. I would urge upon the Government to consider the propriety of placing that force upon an efficient footing by supplying them with the most modern and improved type of small-arms at an early date. In my opinion, it would be better to reduce the force, and to have the part which is kept in commission well armed than to have a much larger force with inferior arms. In this age of the world, if it is necessary to have a militia force at all, it should be well equipped and efficient. We see that from the example of the great military nations of Europe, who, even at great inconvenience and expense, are changing their small-arms and keeping up with the world's progress in that respect. We should have our force thoroughly efficient in this country, even if we have to reduce the number of men.

Mr. BERGIN. My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) and, I think, the member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) asked to know what recommendations had been made with regard to the medical and surgical departments of the militia. I have here the following in the report which I made in 1885 :

Recommendations.—Having thus briefly sketched the operations of the medical staff in the field, I may be permitted to direct attention to that which I consider to be the special weakness of the service—I mean the regimental system. During the late campaign it was found to be expensive, extravagant and almost unmanageable. With the exception, I think, of two or three corps, the Queen's Own, the Grenadiers, the Thirty-fifth and the Seventh Battalions, no regimental surgeon accompanied his regiment to the front. The Sixty-fifth, the Ninth, the Halifax Battalion, the Montreal Garrison Artillery, and others from the older provinces, all took with them volunteer surgeons, and, with the exception of the Halifax Battalion, not one of them—of the surgeons attached for the campaign—has made a satisfactory report of the cases treated by him or of the sanitary or unsanitary condition of his regiment that has reached me.

I think this goes to show that the medical service was in an extremely inefficient state at the time of the North-west rebellion, and I do not know that any attempt has been made to alter the condition of the service since.

Mr. LISTER. Have you made any representations to the Government?

Mr. BERGIN. Yes. The report goes on to say :

Surgeons recruited in an emergency—Regimental System.—Surgeons recruited in an emergency, without any previous military medical training, are apt to be, and as in some instances during the late campaign were found to be, very inefficient and, from their want of discipline and ignorance of military law, were very difficult of control, and gave no adequate service in return for the large amounts of money expended upon them for transport, pay and rations.

Medical Staff Corps.—I strongly recommend, therefore, that a Medical Staff Corps be formed, very much on the lines of the Medical Staff Corps of Her Majesty's service, due regard being had to the differences of conditions and nature of the two services. The British Medical Service, being a permanent one, ours, so to speak, being more of a temporary character its component parts often varying, frequently changing. The system which I propose includes an administrative and executive staff, field hospital corps, ambulance corps and a military cadet corps. From this latter, year by year, the staff surgeons to be drawn. In my opinion there should be a surgeon-general, the administrative head of the service, a deputy surgeon-general in each of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, a deputy surgeon-general for the Maritime provinces, a deputy surgeon-general for Manitoba, for the North-west Territories and British Columbia, one brigade-surgeon in each military district, one surgeon-major to each brigade division,—the present regimental-surgeons, whilst not severing their connection entirely with their regiments, to be considered as surgeons of the staff so long as they remain within their brigade divisions. To meet the future requirements of the service, both for surgeons of the staff, field hospitals and ambulance corps, I beg to recommend that medical cadet corps be established at the seats of our medical schools, say at Montreal, Toronto, Kingston, London, Halifax and Winnipeg; and thoroughly taught ambulance and field hospital work. After graduation, having passed a satisfactory examination, they would be eligible as surgeons of the staff. During their pupilage they can be made available, should the necessity arise, as quartermasters, assistant quartermasters, hospital sergeants, hospital orderlies, dressers, etc. From them could be obtained also, if necessary, some of the material for bearer companies. Before appointment as a surgeon, each candidate should be subjected to an examination, which should embrace the following subjects: a. Military surgery, including transport of sick and wounded. b. Military medicine and pathology and therapeutics. c. Military hygiene. d. Duties of executive medical officers during peace and war. He must also give evidence of having attended a complete course of operative surgery in some recognized Medical University; and, in the presence of the examiners, write a thesis upon some military medical or hygienic subject. All warrant officers should pass an examination such as is required by the medical regulations of Her Majesty's army. No staff surgeon should be promoted to the rank of surgeon-major until after ten years' service. No surgeon-major should be appointed to the rank of brigade-surgeon except on the grounds of ability and merit; and in accordance with the regulations laid down for the Medical Department of Her Majesty's Army.

There is a recommendation here that the medical officer of a battalion should take a course of military surgery. One of the difficulties in connection with the medical service is, that the surgeons of the different regiments are appointed, as the Minister knows, upon the recommendation of the officer commanding the battalion. Too often he recommends a surgeon for appointment on the ground of personal friendship, or that he is the brother, or the son, or the nephew of some personal friend, or because he thinks he will be politically serviceable to him. These are not the conditions upon which a man should be appointed. He should be an efficient military medical officer and have the necessary proof to show that he is efficient, or else he should not be appointed.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Chairman, I would call the attention of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) to the report of the General in command, dated on the 31st December, 1891, in reference to the statement made by that hon. gentleman as to the condition of the militia force up to a recent period and probably down to the present time. He says :

That the Militia Act has not fulfilled the expectations formed 25 years ago, is sufficiently evident to any one who carefully examines the present condition of the force, and compares that condition with the objects, held in view by the Commission, to which I have referred. This is due to many causes, not the least of which is indicated by the fact that many important sections of the Act have remained wholly in abeyance. They never could and never can be practically applied, and their existence is calculated to give a delusive character to the power of defence possessed by the Dominion.

The time seems to have arrived when a fresh inquiry should be made into the working of the Militia Act, in order to ascertain how far it has provided an organization capable of adapting itself to ever-changing conditions and increasing responsibilities. Such an inquiry would furnish a fresh starting point and firm ground for those who are called upon to guide the policy of the Dominion on the question of the defence of its territory.

I asked the Minister of Militia, a few moments ago, and I do not think I properly understood the answer he gave, whether it was the intention of the Government to increase the militia force in this country. I understood him to say that new companies would be formed only when other companies had been disbanded. Am I correct in that?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). As the hon. gentleman will see from the character of the Estimates, it is not the present intention to increase the militia force.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to ask the Minister of Militia, whether he will lend rifles to the volunteer rifle associations in the North-west Territories? We have no militia in the North-west Territories, but we may at any time be exposed to considerable danger. We have rifle associations at all the centres of population, and I need hardly tell you that these men who compose these associations, are not in a position to buy rifles themselves. These men band themselves together in these associations, go out regularly to practice, and have competed with rifle associations all over the Dominion, in some cases successfully, and it would be conducive to the cheap protection of the country that the Minister of Militia should supply them with arms. The hon. gentleman has in store large numbers of these rifles which are practically—I was going to say, but it would be too rhetorical—rotting away, and these arms should be utilized. My hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has suggested that an improved arm should be given to the militia force. If that be done, as the Minister of Militia seems to indicate, there will be no use for these rifles now in store, so that it would be in accordance with the spirit of the Act, and it would be only justice to the people of the North-west, that he should lend these rifles to the associations. There are associations at Regina, Moose Jaw, Medicine Hat, Prince Albert, Edmonton, Battleford, Calgary and Macleod, and the number of rifles required would not be many. They are not necessarily very bloated organizations; but I may say that the military spirit in the North-west is as active as in any part of Canada, if not more active. The exigencies of a pioneer life do not leave them that plethora of wealth that may belong to some of the volunteer associations in other parts of Canada, and I hope my hon. friend will do what he can in this direction.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). If I find that there is a surplus in store, and that the regulations will permit of my doing so, I shall be charmed to comply with the request of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia.

Mr. HUGHES. On the second page of the Major-General's Report, I notice the following statement:—

The Imperial Government has expressed its willingness to confer medals, for long service and good conduct, on non-commissioned officers and men of the permanent force, under conditions similar to those governing such rewards in the regular army.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia if he has taken any steps to have this honour conferred on the soldiers of the active militia who are not of the permanent force?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Yes. We are in communication with the Imperial authorities, through the High Commissioner, on that subject.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I would like to emphasize the question raised by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), with respect to supplying the militia force with a better class of arms for shooting purposes. The officers of the militia in my riding complain of the arms at present supplied to the force, and one of them has written to me, asking me to urge the Government to supply a better class of arms for shooting purposes than those at present supplied, which, I understand, are practically lying idle in store. If we are to have a militia service at all, I think it should be made as effective as possible.

Mr. LISTER. Is it the intention of the Government to continue the system of allowances to militia officers?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That may be necessary. Owing to the short time that I have been at the head of the department, it may be necessary to continue that system for the present year; but I intend to discontinue it, so that the exact amount of the salary of each officer shall be seen in the Estimates from year to year.

Mr. LISTER. What do you propose to substitute?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). A fixed salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. Minister refer to the $40 which is usually allowed to the captain of each company? Is it proposed to abolish that?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). No. I understood the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) to refer to the allowances to officers at headquarters.

Mr. LISTER. No. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to this statement in the Annual Report of the Department for the year ending 31st December, 1891:

The system, under which allowances are now granted to the Rural Militia, is open to very serious objections. Allowances are drawn annually for "drill instruction," and for "care of arms," for which the country receives no real value. They are paid to officers who are incapable of imparting instruction, and who are unable to give sufficient attention to the arms under their charge. In the majority of cases, these allowances are looked upon merely in the light of perquisites attaching to the command of a battalion or company. The fault does not rest with the officers, but with the system, which makes an impracticable demand upon them. Considering the sacrifices made by officers of the Rural Militia in the performance of their militia duty, it appears absolutely necessary that certain allowances, in addition to the pay of their rank, should be granted to those who exercise the most important functions. Such allowances should, however, be the payment for a distinct value received by the country.

These are the allowances I had reference to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that refers to the very allowances I mentioned.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). It is not intended to do away with them during the present year; but having heard the views of my hon. friends on the subject, I will give it special consideration.

Mr. LISTER. They are not our views.

Mr. HUGHES. If the hon. gentlemen will refer to sections 315 and 390 of the Militia Regulations, they will find that those allowances are fixed by statute. As I pointed out last year, the allowance for the care of arms is all right, but the allowance for drill instruction is wrong. The latter encourages old officers to remain on the force long after their usefulness has gone. The allowance for the care of arms should remain, and the allowance for drill instruction should be abolished.

Mr. LISTER. The allowance for the care of arms should, I think, be given to some one who will look after them. I understood from the Minister that it was to be abolished, but I did not understand what, if anything, was to be substituted.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I did not intend to convey the impression that the allowance to captains for drill instruction, referred to by the hon. member for South Oxford, would be abolished. It is not the present intention to do away with that system, but it is under consideration.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I asked the Minister a little while ago what explanation, in detail, he had to give the committee of the contemplated changes of the staff, because the Major-General, in his report, seems to place great stress upon the reorganization of the staff. He quotes from his published report of the previous year, the following paragraph:—

I am thoroughly convinced that if the country is to receive an adequate return for its militia expenditure, a reorganization of the staff is necessary. The first step in that reorganization should be the more strict definition of the duties and responsibilities of the Major-General commanding the Militia, on the principle contained in Her Majesty's Order in Council, appended to the Queen's Regulations for the Army.

This should be followed by the distribution of the staff, in such manner as to ensure the proper performance of the duties and the maintenance of an efficient chain of responsibility.

Then he goes on in his report of this year to say:

I have submitted details of a scheme for the reorganization of the staff by which I propose to gain economy in administration, combined with the systematic instruction of staff officers in those important branches of their duty which have been hitherto ignored. I venture to hope that this policy will be adopted by the Government as a basis of a policy of militia reorganization. Until some such solid foundation is laid the work of the military executive cannot produce any permanent effect, and it will continue to be seriously hampered.

Now, these are very serious words, and it is a very thorough change that the General suggests. He has given that scheme in detail to the department, and the department proposes to make a change by increasing the headquarters staff by $2,500, and decreasing the district staff by $7,000. I wish to know whether those increases in the headquarters staff and decrease in the district staff have made been made in pursuance of the plan suggested by the General? The hon. gentleman must know what changes the General proposed to make and the House is entitled to know them.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I may tell my hon. friend that the estimates were carefully gone over by the Major-General and the deputy head and myself, and that they met with the approval and are in pursuance of the Major-General's policy. The chief item is the abolition of the office of Brigade-Major.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The General says in his report that he has submitted the details of a scheme for the reorganization of the staff, and the hon. Minister informs us that his estimates are based on that scheme. We should like to know those details.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). They have met with my approval and are before His Excellency in Council. I am basing my estimates upon them, and possibly may be able at a later date to submit them, but at present I cannot do so as I have not the assent of the Governor in Council.

Mr. LISTER. Before the hon. gentleman can ask us to vote this amount, it is his duty to state what the scheme is on which he asks for this sum. He cannot avoid doing so under the pretense that the matter is before the Council. The Council have evidently acted upon the recommendation, because the hon. gentleman tells us that this vote is based on it, and we have the undoubted right to insist on knowing what this recommendation is. It may be a proper one or it may not, but it does not follow that because it has been recommended by the Major-General this committee should vote money based on it. The hon. gentleman should either submit the details of the scheme or suspend the item until he can do so.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have stated to my hon. friend that I approve of the proposition of the Major-General.

Mr. LISTER. What is the proposition?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That I have placed it before my colleagues for their assent, and will be very happy to bring it down to the House at a later period. I am asking a reduced amount from this House.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no desire to put any obstacle in the way of the hon. gentleman, but when he tells us that part of the money he is now asking will be expended in a manner which has not yet had the sanction of the Council and which he cannot explain, we should let the item stand. So long as the Council has not made up its mind and the hon. gentleman is in doubt, he is not in a position to ask for this money.

Mr. TYRWHITT. With regard to the item for care of arms, I am of opinion that the money is well expended and the country gets good value. Very often armouries have to be provided at the expense of the captains. In my regimental division, with eight companies, we have only two armouries provided by the Government, so that six armouries have to be rented or given by the towns in which the companies are located. The arms should be—and I am sorry to say that in many instances they are not—cleaned at least once a month, and this would occupy one man for the day. In addition, a trusty man should be employed who would be at the call of the Brigade-Major, when the latter sees fit to go and inspect the armouries at uncertain intervals. The officer in charge of a company is called upon at all times to make good any losses which may occur, and which do occur during annual drills. Despite the greatest care, losses of rifles or accoutrements will occur, and these are stopped from the $40 allowed each captain. Speaking from my own experience last camp my pay amounted to $72, out of which $31.50 was stopped for camp losses. I cheerfully paid this, as there was no fund to meet it, and I am of opinion that regimental officers receive very slight remuneration for the services given.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not propose to discuss a matter of administrative detail with the gallant colonel from Simcoe, but draw attention to the main point now before the committee. If I understand the General commanding rightly, he is of opinion that Canada is, to-day, in a state of military impotence, and that that will continue until certain suggestions he makes with regard to the entire reorganization of the staff are adopted. I will read the concluding paragraph of his report to show how very important his suggestions are, in his opinion:

I conclude this report by urging the adoption of this most necessary measure. Without it there will continue to exist in Canada, a condition of military impotence, for the defence of her territory, side by side with the outward semblance of a military body, devoid of the organization which constitutes the living spirit, and motive power, of such a body

Why, no words could be more serious or more grave. And, at this moment, when the General actually informs the Canadian taxpayer that we have a system which is "devoid of the organization which constitutes the living spirit," that it is merely "the outward semblance of a military body," and that our condition is one of "military impotence," we are asked to vote a million and a half of money to continue the system. I think that the situation bids us pause, and, if there is a remedy—and there is a remedy, and the General tells us that he has submitted the details of a scheme to the Government—then I submit that the hon. gentleman is not acting fairly by this committee in asking them to pass this estimate until they have had the details of this remedy submitted to them. The hon. gentleman tells us he has submitted it to his colleagues. Very well. But he says that he is not yet in a position to say whether he and his colleagues have adopted the General's suggestions or not. Then let him withdraw this vote in the meantime until the Government has had time to reach a conclusion. But he must not ask, and he surely cannot ask this House to pass this vote, not knowing whether the system is to be continued during the present year. I doubt if the House is justified in voting this large sum of money under the circumstances—if a condition of "military impotence" is to be continued. We are not voting this money for mere pleasure. I know the tax-payers of this country are not contributing it for mere pleasure. I know that the assumption is that this money is to be applied for practical military purposes, and that results will be achieved such as to justify the expenditure. We have the highest authority tell us: I have submitted a scheme to remedy this state of affairs. We ask the Minister to bring down that scheme. But he can only tell us that he has submitted it to his colleagues and is not prepared to say whether they regard it as an efficient remedy or not. I submit to the hon. Minister as a practical, sensible member of this House, if it is reasonable to ask for this vote without giving us an explanation.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Perhaps the hon. gentleman and others who have spoken in like strain somewhat misunderstand me. There is a recommendation for the appointment of an additional officer on the headquarters staff, as you will see by the Estimates. Until the Governor-General in Council has agreed to the appointment of this officer I do not feel at liberty to bring the matter before the House. As regards any general scheme to increase the efficiency of the militia, that rests with the General himself, and such a scheme involves greater efficiency at headquarters, provided for by the addition to the staff, and greater zeal and efficiency infused into the schools of instruction and into the militia generally throughout the country. That is the scheme. It is not a mystery which I wish to keep from my hon. friend. I am quite aware of the responsibilities of the position and what I owe to this House, and I have no wish whatever to keep any details from my hon. friends. The only item I have not explained was the appointment of this additional officer on the headquarters staff. This suggestion comes from General Herbert and it meets with my sympathy and approval. I have laid it before my colleagues and no doubt it will meet with their approval also.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is surely not serious in asking the House to believe that a single appointment covers the scheme for the reorganization of the staff by which the General proposes to "gain economy in administration combined with the systematic instruction of staff officers in those important branches of their duty which have been hitherto ignored." Why, Sir, there never was such an indictment brought against the militia of any country. We have been voting millions of money year after year for a department under the charge of the present Postmaster-General, and the public have supposed and believed that good results would follow. And now we are told that the whole thing is a farce and that the condition is one of "military impotence." The General is not a mere phrase-monger. Active men in his position are not given to using words they do not mean, they are practical men. When he uses serious and grave language of that kind I take it that he means what he says; and when he says that he has submitted a scheme which will alter this state of affairs entirely and make the militia efficient, I take it that he means what he says. The hon. gentleman surely would not ask us to believe that the single appointment of which he speaks is the whole scheme of reorganization which the General refers to. I hope the hon. gentleman will either take us into his confidence or withdraw the vote.

Mr. HUGHES. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman misunderstands the language of the report and the nature of this vote. The General's Report deals with the question of organization, and not with a question of efficiency on the part of the men. The report deals with the executive department, and not with the fighting qualities of the force. It is true these two things must go hand in hand in the upbuilding of a militia force, but I presume that the Minister of Militia, before he has been long in the harness, will have fully considered the scheme of the General. What that scheme is I do not know, but, judging by the ability he has displayed in those portions of the report with which I am familiar, I have no doubt that it is something thorough and radical. But the report of the General, as you will notice, speaks of "the outward semblance of a military body, devoid of the organization which constitutes the living spirit and motive power of such a body." We have on paper a force of about thirty or forty thousand men. There is no doubt that force is not what it ought to be. It cannot be on such a small vote as is given. I have a notice on the Paper to which I intend to speak when it is reached. I shall then endeavour to present to the Minister of Militia and to this House the plan under which I think the fighting qualities, if I may use the term—possibly it would have a tendency to run hand in hand with the organization of the staff—would be considerably improved as compared with the present condition. We have in Canada many of the necessary qualities for a first-class military force. But we have, unfortunately, a large amount of what is absolutely unnecessary and detrimental to the force.

Mr. LISTER. Mouldering branches.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, Sir, mouldering branches, planted under the old regime, mouldering branches which I have been for many years endeavouring to have lopped away. I hope that under efficient management of the present Minister of Militia necessary reforms will be effected.

Mr. LISTER. We are trying the present Minister. We shall see how he gets along.

Mr. McMULLEN. I don't want unnecessarily to worry the hon. Minister, but from the answers he has given to questions that have been asked regarding the Major-General's recommendation, I think it is highly desirable that he should inform the committee as to whether he intends to adopt the changes in the staff to which Major-General Herbert refers in the last clause of his report. The hon. Minister has asked the committee to vote a sum to provide for the staff officers. From the report of the Major-General it seems plainly apparent that the organization is not the best. If that is clear, then it is still more clear that a different organization is necessary. Then he goes on to say that he outlined that organization; he has made a recommendation with regard to what it should be, how it should be constituted, the shape and form, and everything connected with it; and he says that he has urged its adoption. Now, the hon. member from Prince Edward Island asks: Is the Minister prepared to say that he is going to organize on the basis recommended by the Major-General, and what is the recommendation? We want to know what it is, and if he is prepared to organize the entire militia force on the basis recommended. I think we ought to know what the Minister intends to do, when we look at the fact that we have been spending from a million and a quarter to a million and a half a year on our militia force, and when we have before us a report of the Major-General, declaring that it is inefficient, it is disorganized, and in a demoralized condition. The whole thing, from top to bottom, from garret to cellar, is rotten. Now, I think the Minister should be willing to tell the committee whether he is going to adopt the recommendation of the Major-General with regard to the alterations. We ought, by all means, to know what the scheme is with regard to the appointment. It is clear the Major-General does not refer to the appointment of that officer. Here he has outlined clearly, and laid before the Minister, a scheme, the acceptance of which he urges in the strongest terms, for the reorganization of the whole force, and we respectfully ask: What is that scheme, and does the Minister intend to adopt it?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The fact that I incorporated in my departmental report the report of the Major-General, which I might have treated as a confidential report, is sufficient guarantee to this House and the country that I intend to act on the Major-General's advice. I have gone over with him a scheme for the reorganization of the headquarters staff and the district staff. I will now give the outlines of the Major-General's scheme, which I have adopted: though, at the same time, I may say that I have not yet obtained the consent of Council to the adoption of the scheme, as it will require a vote of money. For this reason, I had some hesitation in laying it before the committee, but, with the permission of the Prime Minister, I will go on and explain the scheme of the Major-General, which I have adopted on his recommendation as a military man.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the Council interfere with departmental management?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). They interfere with money matters; they interfere with new appointments.

Mr. DALY. The hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has never been in the Council.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Up to the present, there have been five Deputy Adjutants-General, eight Brigade-Majors and seven Commandants of schools. I propose to have four Deputy Adjutant-Generals commanding schools of instruction, who will receive $1,825 each, as salary. There will be six not commanding schools of instruction, who will receive $1,700; there will be an Assistant Inspector of Artillery, commanding Military District No. 3 of Kingston; there will be an Assistant Inspector of Artillery, commanding the School of Artillery at Quebec. Two Brigade-Majors will be retained, and two will be temporarily retained, one at Montreal and one in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Temporarily retained?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Well, nothing will be done without the knowledge of this House in that regard. He will be maintained during the present year, until the end of June, 1894. It is considered necessary that two of these officers should be retained. The Adjutant-General in Montreal does not speak both languages; a large proportion of the force there speak only the French language, and on that account I am retaining the Brigade-Major at Montreal. Then, at headquarters, the only proposed change is the appointment of an Assistant Adjutant-General at headquarters. That is considered desirable in the opinion of the Major-General, who thinks it would facilitate the more frequent and better inspection of the military schools throughout the country, and the various camps of instruction when they are formed for annual drill; also, the inspection of the military stores throughout the country, and other details of that nature.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. LISTER. You are dismissing how many officers altogether, and you are appointing how many?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Dismissing six, and appointing one at headquarters.

Mr. LISTER. Is that the whole scheme?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Yes.

Mr. LISTER. Is it the intention of the Government to allow the military stores and supplies to be purchased by another department, or to continue the present pernicious system of the Militia Department purchasing and looking after the stores? I see the General recommends that another department should purchase.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That means that another branch of the Militia Department should look after the stores. The Quartermaster will look after that branch of the business. He will have that in charge, and the stores will not be purchased by the parties in charge of the stores.

Mr. LISTER. I do not understand that stores have ever been purchased by the parties in charge of the stores. Does the hon. gentleman give the committee to understand that stores have been purchased by the individuals in charge of the stores?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Never.

Mr. LISTER. I understood the Minister to say that stores had been purchased by the Militia Department, and have been stored and inspected.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. By the storekeepers. The storekeeper and the General made up the list of stores required, and that was submitted to the Minister, and the order was given by the department for the purchase of such stores.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Adjutant-General recommends that, by a committee of the staff officers, the militia stores should all be bought and inspected. Is it the Minister's intention to adopt that recommendation? We know that the duty of awarding tenders for contracts has rested with the Minister himself; but the Major-General recommends that a different system should be adopted, and that all contracts should be awarded under the supervision of a committee of staff officers. Parliament has paid $10 a day for the services of men to inspect militia clothing who possessed very little knowledge as to the standard of such clothing. Does the Minister intend to adopt that part of the General's Report recommending a change in the mode of purchasing supplies?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I do.

Mr. LISTER. The General's recommendation is this:

The system under which clothing, arms, equipment and military stores are now procured and issued to the militia, appears to me open to very serious objections.

The responsibility for purchasing stores, making contracts, viewing the stores furnished by contractors, as well as for their custody and final issue, is all vested in one office, regardless of the conflict of opposing interests, affected by the performance of duties of such widely different character. It would seem more in accordance with business principles to vest the responsibility for purchase and contracts in the financial or civil branch of the department, and give to the military executive the duties of custody, inspection and issue. This would be more easy since the amount of stores (exclusive of obsolete and condemned articles) in possession of the department amounts to little more than an "expense store" calculated to meet the current requirements of the militia, but not providing for any reserve.

Then the Minister, we understand, intends to follow the recommendation of the General, as I have read.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Yes.

Mr. LISTER. Immediately?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Yes; when the contracts have expired.

Mr. DENISON. From the statement made by the Minister, it appears that he proposes to do away with the Brigade-Major at Toronto, and, I suppose, the Adjutant-General there will do his work. I would suggest that a further saving might be effected by abolishing the Brigade-Major in Montreal and appointing a deputy Adjutant-General, who should be able to speak both English and French. The work there cannot be so difficult as in the Toronto district, which is the largest in the Dominion.

Salaries and wages of Civil Employees..... $50,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. Minister explain the decrease of $5,825?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). This decrease is secured by abolishing the services of a number of civil employees, in accordance with the recommendation of the Major-General, who considers that this can be done without interfering with the efficiency of the service. The Major-General has made a tour of inspection throughout the country, and it is on his recommendation that this reduction is made.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the reduction at headquarters or scattered throughout the Dominion?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). It is scattered over the Dominion.

Mr. BERGIN. In regard to the intention of the Government to remove the Brigade-Major at Toronto, of course his duties can be performed by the officer of the military school there, but in the Montreal district the military school is at St. John's.

Mr. HUGHES. I notice, in the Auditor-General's Report, that large sums of money are paid out every year for salaries of civil employees engaged in repairing certain works in connection with fortifications. Would it not be possible to have the work done, especially that of repairing fortifications, by the men of the permanent corps? If the men were on active service, the work would necessarily be done by them and not be given to outside men. I have seen, as I have visited different places from time to time, that civil employees are engaged doing work that men in the service should know how to perform. I think this is a matter worthy of consideration.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The suggestion is a valuable one, and I will keep it in mind.

Mr. LISTER. The Minister has not yet given any explanation of the reduction in the item for salaries and wages of civil employees. Perhaps he will explain in what class the reduction has taken place.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). It is proposed to reduce the expenses connected with military stores all over the country, by dismissing a certain number of men, in accordance with the suggestion of the General.

Mr. McMULLEN. What work have these men been engaged at?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). They are caretakers, labourers and others in connection with the care of the stores in the various military districts.

Mr. LISTER. How are the stores to be taken care of, if the caretakers are discharged?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). If we accept one branch of the Major-General's Report, we must accept the other portions, and throw the responsibility on the Major-General.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it proposed to reduce the salaries of the present employees, or to dispense with their services?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I am dispensing with the services of superfluous men.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the number of the men whose services will be dispensed with?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I cannot tell at the moment.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. gentleman state the provision that will be made for the care of stores under the new regulations?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). There will be fewer men, who will do more work, and they will be required to do it with greater efficiency.

Mr. BERGIN. What provision does the Minister intend to make for those officers who are to be dismissed, particularly the Brigade-Majors, some of whom have been a great many years in the service, and have not been very well paid during that time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Minister surely does not propose to superannuate them?

Mr. BERGIN. I do not believe in leaving them without anything.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have not made any proposal in connection with the matter, but I intend asking that a gratuity be given them in proportion to their length of service.

Mr. LISTER. Does the Minister propose to ask a vote in the Supplementary Estimates?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Yes.

Military Properties, Works and Buildings.....	$91,000

Mr. LISTER. Will the Minister explain this item?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). They are made up as follows:—Grants to rifle ranges, armouries, magazines, &c., $6,000; fuel, $5,500; gas, electric light, $6,000; clearing away snow, $1,500; materials for targets, rifle ranges, &c., $2,000; total, $21,000. Item 5, construction and repairs to military buildings, $70,000.

Mr. PATTERSON (Brant). I do not speak as a military man, for I do not belong to the force, but it does seem to me, that in the report we get from the department, it would be better if there was some idea given of the condition of the property the Government is possessed of in these different military buildings throughout the Dominion. I find in the report of the architect there is a reference to repairs that have been made to certain buildings, but we have no information at all as to the condition of the various other buildings. Before the House votes sums of money in this way, we should have some brief information as to the state and condition of all the military properties. I am quite disappointed to find in this report that there is no reference whatever as to the condition of military property in different cities. I may mention, for instance, and I have brought it before the attention of this House before, that there is a drill shed, so-called, in Brantford, which has been in a state of disrepair for months and for years, and yet we find no allusion made to that in this report. Comment has been made that the military force is not as effective as it ought to be, but I am only surprised, from what I know myself, that the military force is as effective as it is and possessed of so much spirit, under the treatment that some of the regiments, at any rate, have received from the Government. The report, referring to the Cayuga drill shed, mentions that there have been some repairs to the doors and windows, and a drain made around, and that the roof needs shingling very badly. What I am at a loss to understand is, how, if it is necessary to report that, we have no report from any of the officers of the department in reference to the drill shed of the Dufferin Rifles, than which, I believe, there is not a better battalion in the service of the country. It is true, that the roof of that drill shed does not require shingling badly, because there is no roof there at all, as it has partly been without a roof for months and for years. If the Minister will give the matter a little consideration, he will agree with me that, in wet weather especially, the proper place for a roof is on top of a building, and not on the ground. A roof does a great deal more harm than good when it is upon the ground, because it does positive injury in keeping the rain off the grass, which the battalion is anxious to keep in a nice condition. I want to know how you expect any efficiency, or how you expect to maintain a military spirit among your men when you force a battalion like that to put up for months and years with such a state of things. The Government had their architect up there, and they know about this matter; but there should be some reference in the report to it, so as to bring it before the attention of the House. I want to know whether there is a system to be used in reference to the militia of this country that will recognize it as a national force; that will free it from the control of outside agencies; that will have no regard as to the political complexion of the constituency in which the battalion may exist, and whether it will be treated on public and proper grounds. I say, Sir, that it is to the credit of the militia of Canada, and it is to the credit of the battalion in whose interest I speak now, that they have maintained their organization, and that they are as efficient as they are under the treatment they have received. I know that some steps are now being taken with reference to this matter, but the steps are being taken through the public and the martial spirit of the officers themselves, and I believe that now at last the Government has consented to pay the rent of a room where their arms can be stored. But for months and months, I might say for years the battalion that bears the honoured name of Dufferin, was located in a drill shed with a roof lying on the ground, a drill shed in which Ministers have addressed assembled thousands, and where you would think even respect for the multitude that assembled to hear them would have been sufficient to cause them to supply a remedy. I do not want to jest in reference to this matter; but I make the practical suggestion, that in the report of the department we should have in concise shape a statement as to the condition of the drill sheds, and other military buildings in the country. I humbly submit again: that if you wish to maintain the efficiency of the force some regard must be had to what is just and right, and regiments and battalions must be dealt with in a fair, honest and equitable manner. If in looking over the different estimates voted there is found a certain battalion in a certain place given, not only $10,000 or $20,000, but $50,000 without the municipality in which that battalion is located contributing one cent, and on the other hand, a rule made by the Government: that we will give you a certain amount if you supply the other certain amount, and if that cannot be done within your means, well, then, you can find your means as best you can.—I say, it must be disheartening to that battalion which is equal in efficiency and worth to any other battalion, to find such a state of things existing, and yet that is the condition that has existed with reference to the different battalions in this country. You find in the report, drill sheds on which money is expended for painting, and other little extra fixings,—which expenditure is right and proper, I do not doubt; but, I ask, how is it that you pay for painting and ornamenting the halls of certain battalions, and that another battalion is left for months and months with a drill shed, part of the roof of which is lying on the ground, has been lying on the ground, and which the Government and the Minister know has been lying on the ground. I do not make these remarks from any selfish stand-point, but I speak on the broad ground, that if you are going to discriminate as between battalions, and if you are going to deal with some battalions in this unfair way, that you will tend to deprive them of the patriotic spirit of which they are possessed. I speak particularly of the Dufferin Rifles, because I happen to know a little more in reference to them than to any others, and I say that nothing can more tend to dispirit them, than such a course of treatment, and nothing can speak more highly in reference to the spirit that prevails among the militia, and the militia officers of the country, than that under such discouraging circumstances, they have maintained the efficiency of their battalions. I say again, that it is a grave omission that there is no reference made in this report to the condition of our military buildings, and when the Minister asks a vote of $93,000, he ought to be in a position to be able to tell us what buildings he intends to repair, and what buildings are in a state of disrepair, so that we may know that the money is not for painting or adorning certain buildings, which however desirable, the building can do without, but that it shall be first applied to repairs that are absolutely necessary. Then we should be able to vote this money intelligently. I lay no charge against the Minister; he is new in his department; I believe he will discharge his duties fairly in that department; at the same time, it seems to me that the reform he must inaugurate is not simply to bring down a report of the architect as to a few buildings, but to give us a concise report of all the different properties that we may have, with their state of repair, so that when he is asking us for a grant of this kind, he will be able to tell us just where he intends to expend the money, and the House can form a judgment as to the fairness or desirability of his proposals.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have been delighted to listen to the eloquence of my hon. friend, and I regret to hear him confess that he does not himself belong to the force. Should he think proper to join it, I will advance him as rapidly as the rules of the force will permit, because I think he will be an ornament to it; but I would fear the disaster that must befall the drill shed if he were accustomed to speak in it very often. I can only promise my hon. friend that I will know no political distinctions in the management of the Militia Department. I think the greatest possible misfortune that could befall this country would be the introduction of political distinctions into the management of our militia force, and I will treat my hon. friend, so far as the interests of the riflemen are concerned, on the most-favoured-nation terms.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it is a matter of regret that the reasonable demand of my hon. friend has not been acceded to. The hon. Minister says that of the $91,000 which he asks for he proposes to expend $70,000 in construction and repairs. My hon. friend refers to a drill shed in his own town which he says is in a bad state of repair, and he asks what drill sheds the Minister intends to expend this money upon. My hon. friend paid a compliment to the head of the department itself; and I want the hon. Minister to take special note of the charge he makes against the department, that the petty huckstering that has distinguished and disgraced the Public Works Department of this country has been carried out in the Militia Department as well, though of all departments in the public service, the Militia Department is the one into which above all others party considerations should never enter. But if my hon. friend has given the facts, political exigencies and not the welfare of the force have been the controlling influence in that department in the past. And I am surprised that the ex-Minister of Militia should hear such a charge made against the department, and not have a word to say in reply. If he chooses to accept it in silence, the House will draw its own conclusions. But I think the present Minister should read the main details of this vote, so that if my hon. friend finds that no part of the money is to be spent upon the drill shed he has referred to, he may have something further to say.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I must deny absolutely and teetotally the charge which the hon. gentleman has brought against the department during the time I was looking after it. I deny that political considerations ever guided me in the conduct of that department. That charge has been made against me time and again, and has been answered; and I would remind the hon. gentleman that he has, in his own province, an instance of a person appointed on the permanent corps by myself who never belonged to the party with which I am connected.

Mr. LISTER. I am surprised at the ex-Minister of Militia getting up and making the remarks he has dared to make. Why, Sir, there is his condemnation in the report of the Major-General in command, who condemns the whole administration of the Militia Department for the last ten years. It is a notorious fact, known from one end of this country to the other, that that department became absolutely corrupt; its administration was rotten from the top to the bottom; every report presented to this House session after session proved it; and the hon. gentleman found that he could only satisfy public demands by leaving that department and getting another. But the Government must not imagine that that exculpates them from responsibility for the maladministration of that department. While the present Minister may administer it fairly and well, it is the duty of the representatives of the people to call the whole Government to account. We had this matter investigated by a committee of this House. We charged the head of that department with favouritism in the awarding of contracts; we charged him with clothing the militia with material that was not fit for the soldiery of this country, and these charges were proved. Nay, more, Sir; the evidence showed more than a suspicion that all was not square and above-board in the dealings of that department with contractors. Why, Sir, the department issued invitations to three favoured individuals to tender for the furnishing of supplies, and those individuals arranged among themselves that one should furnish the tunics, another the trousers, and another the overcoats, and they fixed their own prices; one contractor not tendering against another for a certain class of goods, so that they received, year after year, the prices they thought proper to demand. The report of the General shows that the clothing of the men was so rotten that the trousers supplied to them had worn out in less than twelve days. We charged the department with issuing to the soldiery of this country inferior articles of clothing, and the report of the General this year proves that the charges, which were made fruitlessly and vainly year after year, were well founded, and true to the very letter. No greater evidence of the scandalous administration of that office is it possible to place before Parliament and the country than the report of the General in command. The Government must answer for this, and we shall expect the hon. gentleman now at the head of the department to carry out his promise to reform its administration and prevent the corruption which has existed in the past. We shall expect him to purify it, in so far as he can; to make it non-political, and to make this force, which is discontented from one end of the country to the other, contented and efficient. We ask that, and any Minister who undertakes to administer the office and does not fulfil this expectation is not entitled to the confidence of this House or the people.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman, by his loud-mouthed declamation, to try and convince the House of facts which never existed. For three months, the hon. gentleman will remember, the administration of my department was under investigation by the Public Accounts Committee, and expert evidence taken, and it was proved that the clothing served out to the militia force was superior to any that had ever been imported. When the motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) was submitted to Parliament it was voted down by the largest majority ever given in this House. Those are facts, and those facts I can appeal to, as a justification of my administration of the department. The hon. gentleman says that the force was in such a state that its efficiency was interfered with. Is it not a fact, and is it not a bright page in our history, that when the force under my administration was called upon to do service in Canada it proved itself equal to any emergency? The hon. gentleman knows that well; but he is only carrying out the policy of his friends—running down everything Canadian and Canadian institutions, running down the militia force, not because his criticisms may be of any use in improving the force, but because it is one of the institutions of Canada, and because my administration of the department was sustained by a vote larger than ever given before. It comes with very bad grace from the hon. gentleman to stand up here and try to put in "Hansard" his loud expressions, and ask the Parliament of Canada to put faith in his statements.

Mr. LISTER. I am amazed at the boldness of the hon. gentleman. He knows there was a resolution passed by this House condemning the administration of the Militia Department, and a gentleman, who is one of his colleagues, the Comptroller of Customs, felt so convinced that the department over which the hon. gentleman presided was inefficiently conducted, that he felt himself called upon to vote in favour of that resolution. The boldness of the hon. gentleman is almost unspeakable. It is but recently he left the Militia Department, and look at the report of the General commanding, a report which condemns the hon. gentleman notwithstanding all his high-sounding disclaimers. The Major-General says, speaking of the militia stores :

They are filled with an accumulation of worn-out and worthless equipments, obsolete military stores, and condemned utensils, for the care of which an unnecessary number of men are employed. They are subject to no regular system of inspection and there is no personal responsibility established in respect to them. The condition of a large proportion of the equipment in use in the militia is even worse than I have already represented. Not only is a great part of it worn-out with age, but much of that which is issued as new is of the worst possible quality. I have seen saddlery and other equipment, when issued fresh from store, which failed to endure the ordinary usage of a twelve days' camp. I have seen boots that had been issued to soldiers, the leather of which had no more consistency than paper. The condition of the artillery material in possession of field batteries is likewise worse than I had been led to believe. I have now personally inspected nearly all these batteries, and I find that in many cases, the carriages, which are of an old pattern, could not be depended upon to bear the strain of heavy firing.

Could there be a clearer condemnation of the administration of the Militia Department, while the hon. gentleman had charge of it, than this report ?

It being six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

Military Properties, &c. $91,000

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. When the item you have just read, Mr. Chairman, came before the House, before recess, the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), with that delicacy of touch which distinguishes him, made a slight attack against me regarding the administration of the Militia Department when I had the honour of presiding over it. The hon. gentleman, in that style which is so well known and so peculiar to him, made use of very strong expressions, no doubt, to hide the weakness of his case, because strong expressions are generally used by gentlemen who are discussing a bad cause. I told the hon. gentleman, and I repeat, that I stand here prepared at any time to defend the department over which I preside and my administration of the department over which I presided at one of the critical periods in the history of our country. I stated, and I repeat, that the policy of the Government was, breaking away from that of the party with which the hon. gentleman is allied, to give out contracts in Canada and to keep for Canadians everything that would help Canada. I know that the policy which I advocated, when I became Minister of Militia, does not accord with the views of the hon. gentleman. I wanted to keep in Canada a couple of hundred thousand dollars of money which had been sent to England year after year to provide for the tunics and the uniforms used by our militia. I know well that the hon. gentleman would not approve of that policy, because that was a Canadian policy ; it was a policy to help Canada. The hon. gentleman might have preferred to send this two hundred thousand dollars across the line and to depute Mr. Farrer to go and meet the manufacturers of the United States and take that money away from Canadians. That was not the policy that I followed when I was Minister of Militia. It is not my statement alone that I submit to the House, but I submit also the verdict rendered by the House of Commons itself, after investigation held by a committee of the House. I do not appeal to the hon. gentleman's sense of fair-play, but I appeal to the sense of fair-play of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House, and I ask whether it is not a fact, that every book I had in my department and every official who could give evidence, was placed freely at the disposal of the committee ? I ask, also, if it is not the fact, that I facilitated by every means in my power the investigation of the charges which had been brought against me ? I did so because I considered then, as I do to-day, that the reputation of public men in Canada is important to Canada and because I desired, as head of the department, to do everything I could to make that investigation complete. Sir, a good many of our colleagues have left these benches since that investigation took place, but it is within the recollection of those who are still here, that that Committee on Public Accounts went into every question, they received expert evidence, they looked into the contracts which had been given and examined samples of the material furnished by contractors. And, as I have said before, Mr. Chairman, in this House, by the largest majority that ever was given on a similar question, the charges levelled against the administration of the Department of Militia were set aside and the administration of that department was declared to have been what it should be. Now, Sir, I have been told that my policy led to giving contracts to political friends and without tender. Like every other head of a department I was in duty bound to take the advice of men, not all political friends of mine, who, standing apart from political life and political battles, act as the paid servants of the public. It was my duty to look to my Deputy Minister and to the high officials in the department charged with important work of administration in the department. I was not the man who invented or inaugurated the policy of giving contracts for three years, but I trusted to the experience and ability of the officers in my department, not all political friends of mine, as already stated. I trusted to my deputy, Colonel Panet, who had been called to the Senate by the late lamented Mr. Mackenzie when he was Prime Minister of Canada, but who has been true to his department so far as I can ascertain. Why did I adopt the policy of three years contract? Sir, does not the reason appeal to the common sense of any business man? The fact that England and the continental powers employ only a few contractors to manufacture the uniforms for the army indicates that this work is a specialty. It was a specialty for Canada; it is a specialty that never would have developed if the hon. gentleman's principles had obtained in Canada. But the party governing Canada at that time was a party that wished to create a strong nationality in our country, and it is that party and its policy that has made of Canada what Canada is to-day. Mr. Chairman, if you will look into the contracts given by England and by the continental nations of Europe for military supplies, you will find that, even within these vast territories, these contracts are controlled by a few manufacturers. And when we gave out these contracts, determined to make as great a success as they have proved to be, it became evident that it would be necessary for the contractors to provide special appliances and to invest large amounts in machinery. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman may not know, but I know, from my past experience, that it became necessary for these contractors to import machinery which, under hydraulic pressure, could cut, at a given moment, hundreds of tunics, or whatever parts the tunics were composed of. There are dies which, under hydraulic pressure, cut these tunics and make them as perfect as machinery can make anything. The result of our experience was, that when we gave out contracts by tender, we lost, in Ottawa alone, by one contractor, thousands of dollars. He was the lowest tenderer, and believed that the policy of bidding below anybody else was a policy that might help him, but he knew well that it could not help the country. He put in a tender which we accepted as the lowest, but the coats which he manufactured could not be received, and we had to go out on the market, on the eve of the meeting of the camps, and purchase these very goods which the system now advocated by the hon. gentleman had prevented us from utilizing for the benefit of the militia force. Now, let me read the cause of my great mistake; let me read to you the reason of my attempt to give contracts to the detriment of Canada, and to the detriment of the Department of Militia, as alleged by the hon. gentleman. Every time that I was called upon to offer a contract to the public, I went, as I was in duty bound, to my colleagues in Council, and I got the authority of Orders in Council to give those contracts, because it was considered that the mode we were adopting was the best change.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

DEPARTMENT OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE.

OTTAWA, 5th August, 1887.

The undersigned has the honour to report that the military gray coats supplied in Canada for the past four years by the contractors, Messrs. James O'Brien & Co., Montreal, have been found most satisfactory to the department, both as regards quality of cloth and workmanship, the cost comparing most favourably with prices paid for similar articles formerly purchased in England. In view of the above facts, and as the present contractors have taken pains to meet the department's requirements in every respect, and have become fully acquainted with all the details connected with the manufacture of great coats, it is submitted that it would be advantageous to the service if, in future, a contract could be extended for three years, instead of calling for tenders annually; it being understood, of course, that payments to the contractors in each year should be subject to the votes of Parliament for the respective year.

Respectfully submitted,

EUGENE PANET.

Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence.

Not only that, but I can appeal to the long experience, extending over many years, of Col. Macpherson, regarding military stores, a practical man, understanding the interests of Canada better than the hon. gentleman, and at the same time looking after the interests of the Militia Force of Canada; not crying down the growing industries of Canada, not trying to advertise to the world that we had to go across the Atlantic Ocean to get a tunic to clothe our soldiers who were fighting the battles of Canada. He wrote me a letter, in which he said:

The undersigned has the honour to report that the military gray coats supplied in Canada for the past four years by the contractors, James O'Brien & Co., Montreal, have been found most satisfactory to the department, both as regards quality of cloth and workmanship, the cost comparing most favourably with the prices paid for similar articles formerly purchased in England. In view of the above facts, and as the present contractors have taken pains to meet the department's requirements in every respect, and have become fully acquainted with all the details connected with the manufacture of great coats, it is submitted that it would be advantageous to the service if, in future, a contract could be extended to three years, instead of calling for tenders annually.

You cannot say that this policy which I inaugurated was my doing alone. I consulted, as I have already stated, men who could advise me. I did not consult the hon. gentleman about the policy we were going to follow, and if I had, I would, perhaps, have adopted a policy not at all in the interest of Canada. I cannot understand how the hon. gentleman can find fault with the policy of keeping in Canada the money which we paid every year to English contractors. The point I wish to make is that that matter was investigated, the investigation lasted for weeks, I think a couple of months, if I remember rightly. Upon going into Supply the matter came to a vote, and, as I have already said, our policy was endorsed, not alone by the usual majority of the Government in the House of Commons, but by the largest majority that had ever been given for the Government; consequently that large majority must have been mistaken as well as myself as to the best policy which it was in the interest of Canada to adopt. On that occasion, Mr. Mulock's amendment was voted down by, yeas, 54, and nays, 95. Well, Sir, I fall back upon that division, I fall back upon that vote, as a justification of the conduct of the department; and I am always prepared to take the responsibility of my acts, whether in my old department or in the department over which I preside at the present time. Now, the hon. gentleman fancied that he was making a terrible thrust when he told me that the report of the General was a condemnation of my administration. I say it is not. The hon. gentleman said that my boldness astonished him when I attempted to discuss my acts as administrator of the Militia Department. Now, Sir, I appeal to the spirit of fair-play of any gentleman who will read that report, and who is conversant with the Department of Militia and Defence. Remember that I had an experience of nearly twelve years. When I came into the Department of Militia we had the accumulated stores which had been transferred to us by the Imperial authorities. We had in every city in the Dominion stores which had been left, which, of course, were obsolete and not of advantage to Canada, but which on withdrawing her garrisons, England left for the use of the Dominion. Would it have been better for me, instead of pursuing a policy of building up the country and constructing a network of railways, to have taken that money and imported into Canada stores which we would not require except in an emergency? The hon. gentleman knows that during the troubles in the North-west, when it became necessary, within a fortnight, to send troops to the front, we were able to send 5,000 men perfectly equipped for service.

Mr. LISTER. No.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman said, no. But when the fight was going on, the hon. gentleman never attacked the department, and whatever money I asked, it was granted by Parliament. The work done by the volunteer force in Canada was a credit to her sons and a credit to herself. When the news came of the rebellion, we sent men forward within a few days, when the Canadian Pacific Railway was still an unfinished road, and when it was necessary to send heavy ordnance, powder and stores to the front for 5,000 men, and by doing so, as Lord Wolseley himself told me, we astonished old England. Have you never heard complaints made in England against the stores which she, with her great wealth is incapable of finding or furnishing, as desired by those who criticise? I say the report of the General applies to the stores; but I ask, where did the hon. member find an attack against the clothing? It may be the policy of one or that of another to import tunics from England, or other countries, but let the expert evidence—I do not wish to take up the time of the House by reading it—taken on the charges made against my department in 1889, decide whether it was not proved beyond a doubt that the cloth was better and the make of the tunics was better than tunics imported from England. That report is not an attack on me. It is a report submitted by the General in his desire to improve the stores. It is for Parliament to decide whether it will vote the money necessary to make the suggested improvement or not. When Minister of Militia I appealed to Parliament to improve the armament. Year after year only a small amount was voted to improve the guns in the hands of the artillery. I tell this committee that if it is the desire of Parliament to follow in the wake of those who are experimenting with improved arms, the expense involved to secure improved rifles and ammunition will be so great that Parliament will hesitate before it decides on changing the present armament. The present gun did effective duty in the North-west and in Burmah, when selected by the Imperial authorities as being the most simple gun that could be placed in the hands of men who had received no mechanical training. All the improved magazine guns are very difficult to handle, and mechanical skill is required to repair them and fit them for actual use when they get out of order. When the General's report is read and examined it will be found that it is not an attack against the department of which he is a member to-day. The General is not a man who, forgetting the traditions of his profession, would attack the department when he himself was responsible for the advice given, nor would he turn his back on that department and attack, as the hon. gentleman has said, the head of that department at the time. But I am liberal-minded enough to understand that he may criticise matters respecting which he may entertain views different from those held by myself at that time. The amount voted by Parliament was an amount which permitted me to maintain the force in the condition in which it was maintained, and the force we had at that time was too large for the vote. It was sufficient to keep that force as it was kept, and no more, and it was impossible to launch into extravagances and adopt improvements which might have been desirable. The hon. gentleman read from the General's report that the clothing was deficient and the leather of the boots was not what leather ought to be. During my administration of the department every article was inspected by an inspector, who belongs to the hon. gentleman's party, who is not a political friend of this Administration and never has been; but I recognized that he is looked upon as an authority and as a good inspector, and I trusted him, as I would trust him to-day. It is not because his political views and political friends differ from my political views and political friends that I should doubt his capacity; I trusted him because I thought he did his work well, and, in fact, a more painstaking officer in inspecting stores I never met. I am sorry to have detained the committee so long; but I thought it desirable to offer a few remarks in answer to the observations made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), respecting the administration of the department during the time when I was Minister of Militia.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. the ex-Minister of Militia must have been touched upon the raw when he found it necessary to occupy so much time in explaining his position and his administration of the affairs of the Department of Militia. When the hon. gentleman is attacked, when any person says anything that affects him or the administration of his office, he always makes a counter-attack by commenting on the delicacy of the attack made against him. Let me say to you, Mr. Chairman, that no language, however strong it might be, could properly convey an idea of the gross maladministration which characterized the department which he has just left. Of all cowardly defences I ever heard made by any member of this honourable House, the speech which the hon. gentleman has just made excels them all. What is, in effect, the defence the hon. gentleman has made here to-day? He says if those things are wrong, then you must blame my deputy, Col. Paquet, or Colonel somebody else. Do we not know that the livelihood of these men depends on the smile of the Minister above him? Do we not know that those gentlemen, according to the letter which he has thought proper to read here to-day, refers only to the great coats supplied by James O'Brien & Company? Where are the letters which say the tunics and trousers are all right? We have not got them, because they are not in existence. Sir, these charges were made, not by men in this House, but by the officers of the different battalions throughout the country. Complaints were made year after year, upon the floor of this House, at the instance of these men, that the clothing served out by the department was rotten, and was unfit for the covering of men. I say that it is a great thing, in the interests of this country, that we have at last a man at the head of the military organization of Canada who is bold enough, and has courage enough to let the country know just how miserably this department has been conducted in the past. No man on this side of the House has impugned the courage, or the integrity, or the patriotism of the volunteers who went to the

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

North-west during those troublous times, but I cannot forget that the loss of life which took place was on account of the maladministration of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, who fomented the rebellion, who drove these men to desperation, and who now take credit to themselves for shooting them down like dogs. Rebellion had to be subdued, but we found that the military organization of Canada was not in a condition to send men immediately to the field. They were sent to the front under circumstances of great difficulty; they had to endure great hardships, and never, in the history of the world, did a small rebellion such as that, cost so much money to the public treasury. Millions of dollars were spent, when it is safe to say that half the money would have answered, and, as a result of subduing that rebellion, my hon. friend has the privilege of wearing a star upon his breast and being called Sir Adolphe. These were the great things obtained by that miserable rebellion, brought about by the hon. gentleman and his confreres in the Cabinet at that time. Who charges the soldiers of Canada with not being up to their duty? No man on this side of the House has done it, and when the hon. gentleman tries to make such an idea believed, he tries to establish what is not the fact. There is no man in this country who is not willing that our own people should have the benefit of contracts to be let by the Government, provided always that the Government sees that the material furnished by these contractors is equal to that which can be obtained elsewhere. We do not complain that James O'Brien in Montreal, or the company in Hamilton, or the company in Halifax should supply these articles, but what we complain of is, that the Government accepted from these contractors articles inferior to what they could have purchased at the same price in other places. That is what we complain of, and the evidence of that, beyond any question or peradventure, is contained in the report of the General, presented to Parliament. It is idle for my friend, after fourteen years in power, to get up here and make the paltry excuse that what the General finds, was a relic of what was there when these hon. gentlemen went into power. Dare he say, that amongst these useless goods are not to be found the goods of James O'Brien, the goods of the Sanford Manufacturing Company and the goods of the other contractors? The Minister of Militia at that time favoured these contractors. He invited them to tender for certain things wanted for the militia, and, strange to say, the tenderers were only three men, each tendering for a certain article—one for tunics, one for trousers and one for overcoats; so that, as a matter of fact, these contractors received contracts from the Government for which there was no competition. I charge, moreover, that there was no public advertisement asking for tenders, and that there were circular letters sent to favoured contractors of the Government and personal friends of the Minister. Sir, the hon. gentleman congratulates himself upon the House having approved of his conduct in the matter of letting these contracts; he congratulates himself upon having received the endorsement of this House by a large majority. Does it follow that that vote was right? Does the hon. gentleman believe that the people of this country are of the opinion that he did not collect more than $100,000 to corrupt the electors of Quebec; notwithstanding the fact that this House voted to whitewash him, and to refer the charge to judges appointed by himself? Does the hon. gentleman believe that the country accepts that as a final verdict on the charges then made against him? Does he mean to say that that vote of the House must be accepted as a final settlement of these charges, and an entire exculpation so far as he is concerned? No, there can be no doubt about that. My hon. friend can squirm as he likes, he may wriggle about in his seat, he may use high-sounding words and rounded periods, he may try to excite the national feeling, and he may refer to Mr. Farrer as being an annexationist. But, who is Mr. Farrer? For long years he supported the hon. gentleman by pen and tongue; and I may tell the Postmaster-General that we find the men throughout this country who are leading the annexationist movement, are not friends of the Liberal party, but they are the friends of the ex-Minister of Militia. We are dealing here tonight with facts, and the question we have to decide, and the question we are discussing is: Was the clothing furnished to the Government under these contracts such as it ought to be? Sir, the report of the General does not apply to clothing alone, but it applies to equipment, as well. It applies to every branch of the Militia Department in this country, and it shows that that department under the administration of the hon. gentleman had become utterly decayed. It is a fact that cannot be gainsaid that it was impossible to get the ex-Minister of Militia to carry out promises which he made while Minister presiding over that department. There was disorganization and demoralization existing and prevailing, and percolating every portion of the military service of this country, and it was time for the country that some gentleman was appointed to take the place which the hon. gentleman had held so long. It is to be hoped that the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Minister of Militia may see his way to make such reforms, and to carry on the affairs of this department in such a manner as will give satisfaction to the people, and that there shall not be the slightest suspicion that anything wrong is going on in the department. I repeat what I stated in the beginning: That the people of Canada owe a deep debt of gratitude to the General who now commands the forces of this country for having given proof of what we, on this side of the House, have charged for long years, that the Militia Department was mismanaged, if it was not actually corrupt.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Chairman. I just desire to say a word or two upon the point at issue, which has arisen since the debate began. It is not so much, I take it, a question whether certain contracts were let for military clothing, and whether, on investigation, that clothing was found to be fairly good. That is not the question before the House. The question that was started before dinner, and on the issue of which the ex-Minister of Militia challenged the opinion of the House, was whether the management of the Militia Department for the past few years has been at all satisfactory to this country, and whether that department is at present in a state which can give any satisfaction to any loyal son of Canada; and that question cannot be settled by reference to a political parliamentary majority. There are other votes which much more conclusively indicate the mind of the public of this country on that subject. The hon. gentleman boasted that, during the North-west rebellion, he had only to come down to this Parliament to ask for what money he wanted, and it was granted. Sir, that is true, and I am in the judgment of the House when I say that no Minister of Militia has ever asked this House for any money to promote the well-being of the militia of Canada but that money has been cheerfully granted. I have seen exception taken to almost every grant proposed by the Government during the twelve years that I have sat in this House; but I have never heard a proposal made for money to promote the militia service of the country that has not been cheerfully agreed to. What has been the result? After the North-west rebellion was crushed—and into that subject I do not want to enter, it has been settled long ago—he told this House that it was necessary for the well-being of the militia of Canada that the grant for that service should be largely increased—almost doubled. Was there a man refused to grant his demands? No. Sir; the hon. gentleman got whatever he asked from year to year; from the time of that rebellion the hon. gentleman says he received and spent for this service, $8,500,000. And does he tell this House that the question of the efficiency of the service or the question of the proper expenditure of that money can be determined by the numerical majority which he may have had on a motion as to whether the coats supplied by this firm or that firm were good or bad? Why, the hon. gentleman is insulting the intelligence of this House. I will not appeal to any party majority or to any political vote; I will not appeal even to the opinion of any member of this House; but I will take the impartial opinion of the Imperial General Officer who has been sent to command the militia of Canada, and I will ask hon. gentlemen in this House, and the public outside, in what position do we find the militia service of Canada at the end of ten years, during which the hon. gentleman has had it under his control, and during which, as he says himself, he got every dollar he asked for? What is the verdict? It is contained in the concluding paragraph of the Major-General commanding, who says that the country is in a condition of military impotence, the result of official incompetence. Lest it should be thought by any one listening to me that I am exaggerating the General's report, I will read what he says:

I conclude this report by urging the adoption of this most necessary measure. Without it there will continue to exist in Canada, a condition of military impotence, for the defence of her territory, side by side with the outward semblance of a military body, devoid of the organization which constitutes the living spirit, and motive power, of such a body.

Sir, I think the annals of English Parliaments can be challenged to produce a verdict so condemnatory and damnatory of the policy of any party as that given by the General commanding with regard to the policy which has governed the militia of Canada for the past twelve years. And this, Sir, after we have voted money like water. The $8,500,000 which has been spent since the rebellion closed has been absolutely wasted. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman talks about the manner in which he provided for the equipment of the force. It would be impertinent on my part to offer an opinion on the subject, but has the hon. gentleman read the report of the General commanding in regard to that? What does he say:

The condition of a large proportion of the equipment, in use in the militia, is even worse than I have already represented. Not only is a great part of it worn out with age, but much of that which is issued as new is of the worst possible quality. I have seen saddlery and other equipment, when issued fresh from store, which failed to endure the ordinary usage of a twelve days' camp. I have seen boots, that had been issued to soldiers, the leather of which had no more consistency than paper.

With such a damning verdict as that upon the results of his ten or twelve years of administration, the hon. gentleman comes into court and says: Although I cannot appeal to facts, I appeal to a political majority which was given on the occasion of a vote upon a motion condemning the letting of a contract for coats. Sir, the condition of the hon. gentleman is pitiable, and he stands here, to-day, condemned by the General commanding in burning words which, I was going to say, should bring an official blush of shame to the hon. gentleman's cheeks. We are not here to say whether matters of detail were carried out or not. That is not the point. The question is, what was the policy of the department; and any hon. gentleman who wishes to see what the result of its policy was, has but to turn to the General's report of last year, wherein he says:

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

The superiority of the artillery, and the marked inferiority of the infantry, are traceable to the same cause, viz., the manner in which the duty of inspection is carried out. In the artillery, the system instituted by General Strange, when inspector of artillery, and still efficiently carried out, makes the inspection at once a test of efficiency, a means of instruction and a source of emulation. The inspection of the other arms has degenerated into a mere parade or review, which is productive of no good result at all, but on the contrary, frequently directs the efforts of commanding officers into a wrong channel.

That is the policy the hon. gentleman inaugurated and carried out, and it is the fruits of that policy upon which the General gives his verdict. He says again:

Under the system hitherto followed no data are available on which to base a trustworthy estimate of the cost incidental to the training of the rural militia, but it is my belief that a considerably larger force could be trained than has hitherto been the case without any increase in the vote for drill and training. I am not prepared at present to recommend any such increase of expenditure. I am satisfied that in the past the results obtained in the militia training have not been commensurate with the expenditure, and I see only in improved organization a sufficient guarantee of such results.

The General, from beginning to end, complains that the hon. gentleman and his department had no efficient practical organization. What was the hon. gentleman there for? It was not to carry out details. The most junior member of this House knows that. He was there to inaugurate a policy; and, having inaugurated a policy and given his orders to his subordinates, if those orders were not properly carried out, he would probably have a right to condemn his subordinates and to quote their opinions in his defence, if attacked; but for the policy which animated and controlled the department of which he was the organizer and chief, he and he alone is responsible. I will repeat the statement of my hon. friend; it is cowardly, in the head of a department, when his policy is attacked, to throw the odium upon his subordinates, General this or Colonel that. I have no doubt that Colonel Panet and Colonel Powell did their duty; but the question is not whether they did or not, but what policy the hon. gentleman himself adopted. Again, as to the armament and equipment, what does the General say:

Under the system at present prevailing, it is idle to expect that rifles issued to the rural militia can be kept in good order.

Again, he says:

Moreover, the equipment does not exist in store, which it would be necessary to issue in event of grave emergency. I have not inspected a single battalion in which the men's boots would have stood one month's active service, or a regiment of cavalry or battery of artillery, in which the saddlery and harness could be expected to bear a similar strain.

Could there be any stronger condemnation of the policy which the hon. gentleman has carried out? One wonders almost that a General, in his position, could use such language, as they generally resort to more diplomatic language; but here, in plain words, General Herbert says that the whole department, from top to bottom, is rotten, that the equipment, arms and clothing are in a disgraceful condition, and that there is not a regiment which could turn out to-morrow in a grave emergency, and stand one month's tramp. The General goes on to say that the clothing is fairly good in quality. The hon. Minister, however, was not responsible for the quality of the clothing, but for the system under which it is issued, and regarding that the General says:

But the system of issue is open to very great objection. It is complicated, expensive, and satisfies nobody.

Could criticism go further?—

I am of opinion that economy and efficiency would be better served were annual allowances in money granted to city corps, to enable them to supply their own clothing, the responsibility for the strict inspection of such clothing and of clothing accounts being fixed on the inspecting officer.

Then, in his supplementary report, General Herbert tells us that we are in a condition of military impotence. It was no personal feeling which prompted his attack on that department, and, therefore, when the House is assured by the General commanding, who is in no way connected with political parties or governed by political prejudice, that after eight years of expenditure the result is nil, and that to-day we are in a condition of military impotence, the Opposition would be wanting in their duty if they did not press this fact on the attention of the House so that the administration of the department may be improved in the future.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is greatly to be regretted that so much money should have been wasted for so many years in buying supplies that are worthless. I was sorry to see that the Minister loaded the responsibility largely upon his officials, for I do not think that any Minister should be permitted to shield himself behind a number of officials who cannot defend themselves on the floor of this House. One thing has been overlooked in this discussion, and that is that the place in Ottawa for storing these supplies is badly situated and unfit for the purpose. It is right close to the canal. I do not think that any building in this city could have been selected in which military stores are more likely to suffer injury. At the time the Opposition objected strenuously to the location, and to the price paid for the site and building, something like $30,000. I do not know where you could get a building worse located, right close to the canal, a low, damp place, not at all suited for the purpose. That is one reason why a great deal of the military stores have been injured. In the first place, it is quite clear, from the report of the General, that the quality of the clothing was never what it should have been. The hon.

Minister says that he appointed a proper inspector, and this inspector is paid some $10 a day for inspecting clothing; and it is a most deplorable condition of things that, after taking those precautions and paying such an enormous sum for inspection, we have evidence that the whole thing is rotten and useless. It is a pity that this condition of things should exist, and now that a new Minister has taken hold I hope he will try to work the department up to a better condition, for if it is to continue as depicted by General Herbert it would be much better to abolish the whole thing and run the risk of doing without military stores and equipment. It is nothing but a farce, this spending of $1,250,000 to $1,500,000 per year, for a condition of things such as set out in the General's report. I notice in the report sent in by Colonel Macpherson, that he has recommended the building of magazines for use of the stores-branch at Halifax, N.S., and at Victoria, B.C. Is it the hon. gentleman's intention to build those with the vote now asked?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The $70,000 is made up of small items. In the Auditor-General's Report, 1891-92, page C-14, will be found some of the items. I may tell the committee that the Deputy Adjutants-General from the different districts send in estimates of what they will want for repairs, and I have only asked for one-half the amount they required. I felt I would not be justified, in one year, putting in the large amount they asked. The character of the items may be found in Appendix No. 3 to the Militia and Defence Report of this year, signed by the acting architect, and hon. gentlemen may trust to the Auditor-General's Report of last year for details of the expenditure. It does not include any new buildings, as such items would be brought down by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. McMULLEN. The paragraph to which I call the attention of the Minister he will find on page 30 of the Militia Report:

I have also to refer to the necessity of building magazines for the use of the stores branch at Halifax, N.S., and at Victoria, B.C. For the present the department has to depend upon the Imperial authorities at these stations for the temporary use of their magazines for the storage of powder and warlike stores. I wanted to know whether he intended to carry out that recommendation.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I am at present pressing the building of a magazine at Victoria under the Department of Public Works. I believe that ought to be built; that it is an absolute necessity, and I am pressing for the building of it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there any rent or charge for the magazine there belonging to Great Britain?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I understand that the magazine there is in a position which makes it a menace to the public safety, and the authorities at Victoria insisted upon its removal.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise just to make a point here which I think has been overlooked. I am well pleased to see the Militia Department investigated, and I am satisfied that in a very short time we shall find out that the true cause of this difficulty is not in the storage department; that it is not alone—I do not say that it is not at all—in the executive department, but that it lies rather in the management of the permanent corps, and the connection which exists between the permanent corps and the active force. However, that I shall speak about later on. A number of the speakers addressing the House this afternoon and evening, referred to the stores here across the canal basin. I think it will be found that the criticism in the report of the Major-General does not refer to the issue from the stores from the headquarters branch here. The boots referred to, I believe, were procured outside. One pair was found in Québec, which had not been supplied through the regular contracting quarter. The man had gone and purchased the boots from the contractor himself. The quality of the clothing that is supplied differs from that of a few years ago. At that time the trousers were often not what they ought to be, but the quality of the uniform supplied at the present time is superior, and I am satisfied that if any member of the House would take an hour or two to examine the stores, he would find that the uniforms are in every respect of very good quality. The saddlery and other material with which fault was found, was also, I believe, found at other points, some at Québec and some elsewhere. I would also point out another fact. Let the Government and the inspecting officers be as faithful and as careful as men can be, yet mistakes will arise. We all remember how a very few years ago—I do not remember whether the Major-General was in the force at that time or not—when the British troops were fighting in Egypt, they discovered that the bayonets—not merely the accoutrements, but the bayonets—given to the soldiers for active service, were made of pot metal. They discovered this when they came to the charge, when they found that the cuticle of the aborigines was so thick that the bayonets doubled up, leaving the British soldiers at the mercy of the negroes. We remember also, how in the Crimean war any number of mistakes were made and any number of swindles perpetrated in connection with the contracting. We remember also, that in Egypt the British soldiers found their Martini bullets and cartridges absolutely useless. They stuck in the rifles and could not be extracted, and thus the rifles were rendered useless, again placing the British soldier at the mercy of the enemy. I state this, not in defence of the department, for, as I say, I am pleased to have that department investigated, but merely to show that, however careful the officers may be, mistakes will arise.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron).

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not intend to trouble myself with the ancient history with which the late Minister of Militia has dealt. But I am pleased with the remarks of the present Minister, and if I say a few words, it is simply with the desire that the expressions made use of by the Minister shall not be regarded simply as empty words, only to be recorded in the "Hansard." He has stated that it would be a calamity to the Dominion of Canada if the Militia Department were conducted on a political basis. For my part, as a member of the force, I must say that I fear that to some extent in the past we have had that calamity in this country. However that may be, the new Minister has promised us that this shall not be the case in the future and that he will make many changes in relation to the force. I will say to my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Militia, who spoke so warmly on the question of the equipment to-night, that he must not forget, notwithstanding the strong protest he has made, that he has had representations made by the highest officers in the militia throughout the country with regard to the equipment and with regard to the quality of some of the stores furnished to the men. He has had it from the men and from the officers of almost every battalion throughout the country. He has heard it from members of this House, themselves members of the militia force. He seems to have a very short memory with regard to some of these things. The late hon. member for Frontenac, the Hon. Mr. Kirkpatrick, pointed out session after session to the hon. Minister the deficiency in the matter of equipment, and made suggestions which, to his mind, and, I think, to the mind of many other members of the militia force in this House, were in the direction of improvement. The hon. gentleman has told us that he has appealed to the House from time to time for an increased vote for the purpose of giving a more efficient equipment to the volunteers. I have been a member of this House for a good many years. I have stood in my place and urged for a great many sessions the desirability of improving the equipment, and from both sides the Minister has been urged, if his excuse was a good one that he had not money enough to make the small improvement desired, to ask for the necessary money and he would be supported. But, Sir, we have not been able to get the Minister at the head of the department to take enough interest in the representations made, not only by members of this House, but by the leading officers in the different divisions, in favour of better equipment. I desire, Sir, to impress this on the hon. Minister. If he will look at the reports he will see that but little importance has been attached to this matter. We find that, as a rule, the officers of the department here have been courteous and active and energetic, and have shown every desire to do their duty to the best of their ability. I have found, so far as my experience goes, that the militia officers throughout the country are enthusiastic and energetic, and desirous of doing the best they can to maintain the force in a state of efficiency; and if the hon. gentleman who has now taken the position of Minister of Militia will look at the reports, or attend to the recommendations of these men who are so faithful to the force, I think he will find the representations made now with regard to the force are correct, and that, with very little effort on his part, by merely seconding the efforts of his officers throughout the Dominion, he will be able to make many important changes that will be in the interest of the volunteer force. Sir, it is ridiculous for the late Minister—perhaps that is too strong language—but, to my mind, it is entirely out of place for him to say that the supplies furnished were of good quality. He knows very well, and we know, and I know of my own personal knowledge, and have told him so, and other members have told him so, that the stores supplied were not of a good quality, and they did not begin to give satisfaction, or to wear the time which it was intended by the department they should last. I would call the Minister's attention to the suggestion that was made by the then hon. member for Frontenac, and other officers of this House, that a change in the system of inspection, or rather the issuing of the clothing, etc., after they were inspected, might make a decided improvement in the efficiency of the equipment for the different companies and battalions, without costing any more money. It was pointed out at that time that according to the regulations of the department each company is allowed a certain supply for a given number of years. During the past few years we have not been getting a proper quality of goods furnished. Instead of giving a full supply at the end of a certain term, let the officers inspecting report exactly the state of the clothing and equipment at the time of inspection, and if necessary to put that company in a proper state, let him supply just what might be required. That always seemed to me to be the proper way. A company, for some reason or other, might have a certain portion of their clothing in bad order and not be able to get a fresh supply. In many instances that have come under my own notice, there might be a certain portion of the clothing, etc., in good condition and fit for use, but they were not able to make up the full supply. Hon. members who have had experience, know how difficult it is for a captain or commanding officer to get his company to turn out when they have nothing like a proper equipment. I wish the Minister would take into consideration this system of dealing with supplies, which, I think, he would find to be a great improvement, and more satisfactory to the men, without particularly increasing the cost. In many instances we find that at the end of the term allowed, for some reason or other, the equipment may not be in a very good condition; but when application is made and the company is entitled to a new issue, it is supplied to them irrespective of what state it may be in. Whether other difficulties might crop up in the working out of this system, which I do not foresee, I am not prepared to say. Of course, the officers in the department who will give the subject attention, will know with regard to that. I would ask the Minister to give the matter his consideration, and if possible to try and second the efforts of the officers of local battalions. The ex-Minister spoke about the efficiency of the equipment of the volunteers when they were called out during the rebellion. With regard to that, I must say that there is not a member of this House who will speak his mind freely, who does not know that if our men made a good showing on the field at that time, it was not in consequence of a good equipment, but in spite of a bad one. I would remind the committee of the position taken at the time by officers commanding battalions. My hon. friend, the present Minister of Public Works, if I remember rightly, protested so strongly that he actually refused to take the field unless something was done to improve the equipment of his men; and I think my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) also protested very strongly to the department. I remember distinctly that other members of the militia force, now members of this House, who were in active service at that time, but who are not now present in the House, made complaints about the inefficiency of the equipment when the men were called out, and made reports to the department with respect thereto. I say the Minister has no reason to take credit for the condition in which the men took the field at that time, and, I repeat, if they made a good showing it was owing to their pluck, energy and patriotism. We remember that their officers, and municipal councils, and private friends had to come to their assistance in almost every locality where they were called out before they were able to take the field at all. I think no person will pretend to dispute that. We remember that many of these questions came up in the House afterwards, when the House took an active interest in these matters. We were told by the Minister to-night that the reason for purchasing some of these supplies in Canada was his antipathy to buying goods in Great Britain. Well, I think that is rather strange. For my own part I would be in favour of buying goods in our own country if they were of the right quality and of a reasonable price; if not, I would not object to buying them in Great Britain. I did not suppose the Minister of Militia would have such an antipathy to Great Britain that he would consider it a crime to spend money in the old country. I have in my place during the last twelve years, at least, urged upon the Minister and the department the desirability of giving an improved equipment to the volunteer force. I think no one can dispute the desirability of doing this, in order to relieve the officers and men of some of the expense and annoyance that they are put to for the want of such an equipment. I trust that the new Minister will take this matter into his consideration, and, I think, by means of a reorganization and a better way of doing business, he will be able to give better satisfaction in the future.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The discussion has taken a somewhat wider range than the item we are considering, and I come back to the subject under consideration. I desire to speak in somewhat of a subdued tone this time, as it appears that the last time I addressed the Minister he seemed to be so afraid that I would bring down the House upon his head, that he was unable to answer the question I put to him. He has referred us to the particulars of the vote to be found in Appendix No. 3 in this report, a matter of some $75,000. He tells us that he has applications for more than double the amount, but he has cut it down one-half. Well, the question is whether it is wise, under these circumstances, to reduce the grant $5,000, as he asks us to do. I suppose he has given it consideration. But the point I suggest is this, if the Minister will bear with me in suggesting it, as it may be a new departure in his report. I understand that the different military officers send in requests with reference to the different sheds and stores, and I would suggest that in his next report these requests should be published in a concise form, detailing the repairs that were required to the different properties and works of the department throughout the Dominion. Then, next year, we will have an appendix to his report, like this report No. 3, of his architect, detailing the work that has been done in the way of repairing, &c. The House would then be able to examine this report in the light of the requests and the representations made by those reporting on various buildings throughout the Dominion, and to judge as to whether the Minister had, with the amount of money placed at his disposal, expended it at the different points and on the buildings that stood in the greatest need. We would then be able to determine whether the money had been expended on works which might have been deferred for a year or two, while more pressing claims had been passed over. I have pointed out cases where there was an absolute necessity for the care of arms and Government property that there should be an expenditure made, and I pointed out that this has not been done, but money has been expended on ornamenting and repairing other buildings, expenditures right and proper in themselves, but which should not have been made when there were buildings requiring repairs, absolutely unfit for use and in which Government property was not protected. The suggestion I make is a practical one. I am not finding fault; but I suggest that if the Minister would bring down these reports as to repairs that are necessary on the different buildings throughout the Dominion, then, on an examination of those reports, hon. members would be able to commend or criticise the Minister's action. Appendix No. 3 contains particulars of the drill sheds and other Government properties that have been repaired during the year, but we do not know what representations have been made with respect to other property on which nothing has been done. I desire to obtain this information, which I think will prove useful to the House, as enabling hon. members to form a proper conception as to the administration of the money voted to the department.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I think the suggestion is a very sensible and practical one. It may largely increase the volume of next year's report, but I will bring down the information to the House. I propose to furnish information respecting all the properties occupied by the Militia Department, the architect's report as to their condition and the Adjutant-General's report as to necessary repairs.

Warlike and other Stores. . . . $66,700

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) From this vote, I presume, saddlery and boots and shoes will have to be provided. Perhaps the Minister will explain how boots and saddlery are purchased; if by tender, who are the successful tenderers this year?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I cannot give the hon. gentleman the information he asks about saddlery. Boots and shoes are supplied in this manner: The matter is placed in the hands of the commandants of the several districts, and they obtain local tenders for boots and shoes, and where the articles have not been of a satisfactory character, such as has been referred to by the Major-General in his report, they have been returned and a new issue obtained from the contractor. All the contracts in connection with the Militia Department will be by public tender, duly advertised in the public press.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Does the present Minister possess the same antagonism to Great Britain as his predecessor has manifested to-night? Is that the policy adopted by the new Minister? The late Minister has deprecated having any dealings with England in connection with military stores; he spoke of it as being almost a disloyal and terrible offence. Is that the policy of the new Minister of the department?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In view of the statement made in the General's report as to the condition of the boots and shoes, it is obvious that in the public interest the present system should not be continued. The General has made a very serious indictment. He has stated that several of the boots and shoes were of the consistency of paper, a disgraceful condition of things.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). It is my intention that all contracts shall be let by public tender, and that the goods shall be thoroughly inspected. If inferior goods are passed the inspector will have to suffer, and he will be held responsible.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I suppose it is too much to ask that the same rule should be applied to the inspectors who have passed improper goods and proved faithless in the past. The hon. gentleman is really continuing the system that has proved ineffective in the past. The ex-Minister has expressed the opinion that these were minor matters, that he entrusted them to an inspector and other officials, and that he as Minister was not responsible. The new Minister must have observed from the tone of the remarks made by hon. members that such an excuse could be offered at a future day, and that he must adopt some effective measures to remedy this evil. This is not a matter of politics, but of the efficiency of a vital arm of the service. We all desire that this evil should be removed if possible, and some system should be adopted by which the department will not be imposed on in the future as it has been in the past.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). My information in regard to boots is exactly what I have stated to my hon. friend: that where unsuitable boots were supplied a new issue of boots were obtained in lieu thereof. It is my intention to recommend the appointment of a quartermaster-general, who will inspect the inspectors and supervise the stores and everything of that kind. I trust we shall be able to obtain the service of a man of standing and character, and that he will perform efficient service for the benefit of the militia.

Mr. McMULLEN. What disposal of the rubbish will be made—useless boots and clothing referred to in the report?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have not decided on that point. I intend to have every local inspector furnish a detailed statement of all stores belonging to the department in the different establishments. Articles that are useless will be sold by auction, for they occupy space and require the attention of caretakers.

Mr. McMULLEN. In the Auditor-General's Report, page F—167, I find that condemned stores were sold and realized $1,110, but the expenses were $114. That seems to be a considerable percentage to pay.

Mr. FOSTER. They were sold in different lots and in different parts of the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will all the rubbish be gathered at one place and there be all sold?

Mr. BERGIN. That is all nonsense. It would not pay the freight to remove rubbish from one part of the country to another.

Mr. LISTER. What amount was voted for this service last year?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The Estimates this year are submitted with such particular detail that I cannot fairly compare them with the Estimates of last year. They are framed on a different basis. We have made a new departure in the Militia Department, and every item is now placed under its proper heading and there is no grouping of items, a change that will prove of advantage to the House. The whole cost for stores, transportation and freight, as compared with last year, involves an increase of $1,857. I cannot give item for item compared with last year. One of the objects we have in view is to have every item under its proper heading, so that the House and the country may be informed as to the sums voted for particular purposes and the manner in which they are expended.

Mr. LISTER. What items does the hon. gentleman include under "warlike and other stores"?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). We propose, each year, for five years, to take a small amount to improve our field artillery. It is proposed to establish repairing depots at one or two places, possibly Quebec and Toronto, to repair the equipments after camp. It has been found that saddlery and such like have become comparatively useless after camp, and it is proposed that these articles shall be collected at one or two centres and properly repaired, so that possibly a considerable saving may be effected.

Mr. DENISON. I think that the new arrangement of the items is an improvement, but I would like to see it so arranged that we could discover exactly the amount the permanent corps cost, and what is spent on the militia. It could be easily done in the department, but it is difficult to make it out in its present shape.

Mr. LISTER. Are the saddles made under contract? What is the name of the contractor?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). It is by contract for a certain number of saddles, but I forget the name of the contractor.

Mr. LISTER. Why does the hon. gentleman ask $20,000 for field artillery and equipments?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). This is a new vote. It is intended to ask a similar sum for a period of five years in order to get us proper field artillery.

Mr. LISTER. Where do you get them? Have you made any contract?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). No; I believe we will have to get them from Great Britain.

Mr. BORDEN. I would like to ask the Minister who makes out the requisition for hospital stores? I suppose it is the Surgeon-General of Militia?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I understand the Surgeon-General makes out the requisition.

Mr. BERGIN. I fear the hon. Minister is mistaken. I have not been consulted since 1885.

Mr. BORDEN. I did not think it possible that any man acquainted with medicine or surgery could make out the requisition, judging from what I have seen of these supplies at the time of annual drills. The box of medicine sent to the camp I have been in for many years, contains things which are entirely out of date and are useless and worthless, and many of the requisite, simple remedies such as carbolic acid, are not to be found. I have represented over and over again in my reports, this condition of things but the same old box is sent back year after year. This is a matter which the Minister would do well to inquire into. If he would require the Surgeon-General to make out the requisition for the stores, he would probably get a more useful supply than he gets now. So far as the surgical department is concerned, nothing whatever is supplied. I do not know whether the department expects that the surgeons of this country are to be at the expense to supply all these things or not, but I can assure the Minister there is great need for reform in this branch of the service.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have noted what my hon. friend from Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) said this afternoon, and also what has been now stated by my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden), and I will pay special attention to the matter.

Mr. LISTER. The complaint my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden) has just made, is one I have brought before the attention of the ex-Minister of Militia three or four times. It is notorious that the medicines furnished to the different battalions are of such a kind as to call forth complaints and protests from the medical officers. Although the ex-Minister of Militia promised over and over again that this matter would be rectified, no steps were taken to remedy the things complained of by the medical gentlemen connected with the different regiments throughout the country. I ask the Minister now, whose duty it is to furnish this medicine, from whom it is procured, is it by contract, and on whose requisition? If there is a Surgeon-General, he ought to be the man to make the requisition, and upon him ought to rest the responsibility. If he is not consulted at all, and if some understrapper in the office undertakes to deal with it, I want to know it. We know that camp life does not agree with many of the volunteers until they become inured to it, and for the first few days of camp life, a great many of the soldiers take ill. It is exceedingly important that the medical men paid by the Government for the purpose of looking after the health of the volunteers should be properly provided with medicines suitable to the complaints for which the men are liable to suffer. I hope the Minister will be able to give me the information I desire to ask.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). There is a military hospital medical chest furnished from headquarters to each camp, and the surgeon in charge may supplement that with any articles he requires upon requisition.

Mr. LISTER. That is not correct. Surgeons have told me that they have had to pay for the medicines themselves. When the surgeon requires medicines, who makes out the requisition, and where does he get them?

Mr. BERGIN. When I was the commander of a battalion in camp, I found that nothing of any real use was furnished in those old, dirty, tin boxes, and I instructed the surgeon of the battalion to send prescriptions to the medical men in the town near the camp. I signed the requisition for these, and it was paid by the department, sometimes after a long kick.

Mr. LISTER. I know that the medical man who went out with the Lambton battalion paid for medicines out of his own pocket.

Mr. BERGIN. Then he was not as smart as a Lambton man ought to be.

Mr. LISTER. He had not been in Parliament. Can the Minister tell me anything about this? Where does that box of medicine come from?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). It is supplied from the military stores at Ottawa, I suppose, as a matter of course, to each camp.

Mr. LISTER. Are those supplies purchased by contract?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I believe not.

Mr. DENISON. The way it has been managed where I have been in camp is this: The department furnish a medicine pannier, which is supposed to contain everything that is requisite for the camp. If certain medicines, which it is desirable to have, are not there, the brigade medical officer sends a requisition to the department and gets them.

Mr. BORDEN. For something over twenty years I have been in the active militia of this country, and the difficulty which has been referred to has been experienced by me during all that time. A box of drugs, very correctly described by the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), is sent into camp. It is largely useless, containing things that are no good, and lacking things that are wanted. I have been asked by the Deputy Adjutant-General each year to make a report, complaining of that condition of things, and he promised to forward it to headquarters.

I have made half a dozen reports, but not the slightest attention has ever been paid to any requisition that I have made; and my brother surgeons in the force have informed me that their representations have met with the same fate. During camp I have sent for medicines which were urgently required, and I have had the greatest difficulty to get them paid for. In one case the Deputy Adjutant-General and myself divided the cost of getting medicines between us, because it was impossible to get it out of the department. This is a condition of things that certainly requires a remedy.

Mr. LISTER. Is it any part of the duty of the Surgeon-General to see that proper medicines are supplied to the military officers?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). No, unless he is on duty and under pay.

Clothing and necessaries..... $62,000

Mr. LISTER. Are these goods supplied under contract, and who are the contractors?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). They are supplied under contract. I gave the names of the contractors the other day in this House, in reply to a question to my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock).

Mr. LISTER. Are the contracts still in existence, and are there separate contracts for the several portions of clothing, that is, one for trousers, one for tunics, and one for overcoats?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The contracts are still in existence. They run to the 1st of June next, when they will expire. I understand that there are separate portions of clothing.

Mr. LISTER. Were tenders invited?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I understand that tenders were obtained from the leading clothiers in Canada; but I do not know any details on that subject.

Mr. LISTER. Were those tenders asked for by public advertisement or by circular?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). By circular.

Mr. LISTER. Is it the intention of the Minister to go on getting tenders in the same way when the present contracts expire, or will he invite tenders by public advertisement?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have told my hon. friend that invariably I intend, in the case of every article that can be tendered for, that tenders should be called for by public advertisement.

Mr. LISTER. And the contract given to the lowest tenderer?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I will not say that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) All these existing contracts expire next June?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). 30th of June, so I am informed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What quantity do the existing tenders authorize the contractors to supply? My recollection of the last Public Accounts Committee is that they found that there was an enormous amount, far in excess of what was required, in store.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That information is incorrect. My deputy informs me that we will require 2,000 overcoats, 5,000 tunics and 8,000 pairs of trousers. The contractors are limited to those amounts.

Transport and Freight of Militia. $68,500

Mr. PATTERSON (Brant). How does the hon. gentleman arrive at the exact amount of $40,000 for transport of active militia attending camps of instruction? Are the same camps held every year at the same places?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The figures have been carefully worked out by the Major-General and the deputy head and the Adjutant-General. I have decided that in future there will be a permanent camp. It is desirable, in the interests of the service and economy, that the system of migratory camps should be done away with. The points at which the camps will be held are mentioned in the reports.

Royal Military College of Canada $70,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the total number of cadets?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Sixty-four.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that an increase over last year?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Last year there were sixty-six.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think there ought to be some information in this Militia Report by way of comparison of the working of this military college, giving the cost, the attendance and the result each year. I have no desire to attack the college in any sense or way, but I would like to have data before me on which to form a judgment, and one has not that data in that report. I hope the hon. Minister will take steps to have some kind of comparative statement made up, so that we may see how many have attended college from the beginning, those who have taken their diplomas each year and those who have graduated with honours, and, if possible, a matter very interesting to the people and asked about every day, where the gentlemen who have taken the diplomas now are, how many of them are in the British army and how many employed otherwise? If we find that we are only spending money to educate young men who go to the United States it might be a matter for consideration how far we should continue that expenditure. If these gentlemen are graduating into the British army it is a different thing, or, if they are remaining in the Dominion in military positions or any other positions, I do not care whether military or civil, it is desirable to know it. But if the majority of them, as is charged in the press, pass over to the United States, it might be a matter for consideration whether the expenditure should be continued, or whether steps should not be taken to check the tendency, on the part of the graduates, to pass to a foreign nation. I trust the hon. gentleman will try to have a comparative statement for next year.

Dominion Cartridge Factory-- Pay of Staff, cost of material, machinery and all expenses except buildings..... $40,000

Mr. LISTER. You are asking for less this year than last. How is that?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). There is a considerable quantity of ammunition in store and I intend to reduce the expenses of that factory. The factory itself is on trial; to my mind it is an experiment. Whether I shall continue to ask Parliament for a grant for that factory is a question which I could not answer, and it will depend a good deal on the working of the factory during the present year. There is a store quite sufficient for the needs during the coming year of those using Snider rifles, and I am advised by experts that if the store is allowed to accumulate the quality of the ammunition deteriorates. We think it a good deal better to use the ammunition in store and economize for awhile until we see our way clear in reference to the utility of continuing the factory.

Mr. LISTER. Can the hon. gentleman inform us how much the factory has cost the country since its establishment? Can he give an approximate statement?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I would be delighted if I could furnish my hon. friend with that information, but he has asked me one question too much. I am sorry I cannot give him the information impromptu.

Mr. LISTER. I think this matter is important. Would the hon. gentleman object to the item being allowed to stand?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I will give the hon. gentleman information on concurrence. If the hon. gentleman sees this as I do, he will see we are approaching the same path by slow steps. I will either close that factory altogether or give a good account of it in the next twelve months.

Mr. LISTER. I should think the hon. Minister would not have much difficulty in coming to a conclusion in view of this statement of the General:

There is at present a considerable reserve of Snider ammunition, and the supply is maintained by the Dominion Cartridge Company, which turns out an antiquated form of cartridge.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

That seems a good deal like the rest of the Militia Department.

In order to manufacture the ammunition required for a modern small bore rifle, considerable changes of machinery would be necessary, while the smokeless compound, which has taken the place of gunpowder, in the modern fire-arm, could not be procured in Canada.

If we are to be up with the times I suppose it would be necessary to have smokeless powder, and, according to this report it is impossible to procure that in Canada. It seems to be almost a waste of public money to spend it in making an antiquated form of cartridge. But I understand the Minister to say that, unless the factory this year gives a good account of itself, it will be closed.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I may tell the hon. gentleman frankly, and I may take the committee into my confidence, also, that the superintendent of the factory is here at my special request. I have not been able to have an interview with him to-day. But I intend to go into all the details with the superintendent, the Deputy Minister, and other officers who are fully informed. Meantime, I take this reduced vote for this year. The reason I take the reduced vote is that we have enough to furnish the militia of Canada with ammunition for the Snider rifle. We have that ammunition in store, and it is suited to the arm with which the force is supplied. This year we will turn out the Martini-Henri cartridge for the use of the permanent corps. That is what we shall be working at this summer. I intend to place the factory and the whole department on a business footing.

Mr. LISTER. Can the hon. gentleman say how the cost of manufacturing these cartridges at Quebec compares with the cost of cartridges purchased in England?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Including freight and other items, there is no very great difference. I am looking into that, and I will have it thoroughly sifted, and will treat the matter on a business basis.

Mr. LISTER. This year, of course, the Minister is slipping through, but he must remember that he has made a good many promises.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). They will all be in "Hansard," and I will paste them up.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has doubts about the usefulness of this cartridge factory, and is not able to give the information which has been asked for. He has done very well to-night. This is almost the last item, and the others are not important. If he will allow the item to stand, it can be dealt with again without much trouble.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). If my hon. friend wishes the item to stand, why, of course, I can refuse him nothing.

Monuments for Battle-fields of Canada..... $2,000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What has been done in the way of erecting monuments?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). We have removed one of the monuments to the Senate, and I have not had an opportunity to consult with that monument up to this time, but I shall do so. I am endeavouring to carry out the wishes of the House in commemorating some of the battle-fields of Canada.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What monuments does the hon. gentleman contemplate erecting this year?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). It is contemplated erecting monuments, at moderate cost, at Chateauguay, Stoney Creek, and possibly at Lundy's Lane.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I thought you had the money last year for that.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). It was not spent. This is only a revote.

Mr. DENISON. I may mention to the Minister that this item of $100 for a military institute at Toronto, appeared last year in the Estimates, and the Ontario Government also gave $100. The item was dropped through some mistake, I imagine, and I would ask the Minister if he would insert it now.

Mr. FOSTER. It cannot be done now.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I will submit the vote to the Minister of Finance and my other colleagues, and if possible, we will have it in a later estimate.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 13th February, 1893.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADJOURNMENT—ASH WEDNESDAY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That when the House adjourns to-morrow, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next, at three o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 29) to further amend the Civil Service Act.—(Mr. Costigan.)

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

Mr. DENISON (for Mr. McCarthy) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 28) to amend the North-west Territories Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. DENISON. This Bill is the same as the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) last year.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the hon. gentleman state to the House the probable date on which this Bill will come up for second reading?

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

AMENDMENT TO THE DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. BELLEY (Translation) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 30) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to extend the time now fixed between the publishing of the proclamation and the nomination day, also the time between nomination and polling day, as regards the county of Chicoutimi and Saguenay. This county runs over several hundred leagues. Polls are scattered here and there in the county up to Natashquan, and it is, in fact, impossible now, within the time fixed, to take to each poll the documents required by law.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 25) respecting the Grand Trunk, Georgian Bay and Lake Erie Railway Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 26) relating to the Harbour of Thornbury, on the Georgian Bay.—(Mr. Sproutle.)

CASCUMPEQUE HARBOUR.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has the brush and stone work at Sandy Island, Cascumpeque Harbour, been let by tender? If so, to whom and for what amount?

Mr. OUMET. The brush and stone work were let by tender, on the 16th of January, 1893, to Mr. George R. Montgomery, Prince county, for $140, the work to be finished before the opening of navigation next year.

MR. TIMOTHY HARTNEDY.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, 1. When did Mr. Timothy Hartnedy enter the Civil Service? 2. Is he still a member of it? 3. If not, did he retire or was he dismissed? 4. Did he contribute to the superannuation fund? 5. If so, how long has he been superannuated? 6. If not, is it the intention of the Government to grant him a superannuation allowance?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Harnedy was employed as a messenger in the Post Office, Ottawa, from 28th December, 1870, to the 15th April, 1875, and as a temporary messenger in the inside service from the 4th September, 1876, to 20th November, 1879. He was appointed a packer in the inside service on 1st July, 1883. 2. No. 3. He was dismissed. 4. He has not been superannuated. 6. It is not the intention of the Government to grant him any superannuation allowance.

CRIMINAL CODE.

Mr. BELLEY (for Mr. Leclair) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to furnish members of the House with a copy of the Criminal Code, in addition to the statutes?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is the intention of the Government to do so.

U. S. CATTLE QUARANTINE.

Mr. ROWAND asked, What effect will the quarantine regulation lately adopted by the American Government against Canadian cattle have on sending cattle in bond to Boston or other American seaports for shipment to the British market?

Mr. FOSTER. The United States quarantine regulation, as published in the newspapers (the Government has not officially received any copy), would not admit of Canadian neat cattle crossing the frontier except for quarantine at the point of Buffalo. Canadian cattle, therefore, could not be sent in bond to Boston or other American seaports for shipment, unless a transit arrangement be made, similar to that under which American cattle pass from west to east through Ontario, from one United States port to another.

CATCHING OF SOFT FISH.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. Bruneau) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to prohibit, this year again, in the province of Quebec, the catching of fish commonly known as "soft fish," up to the 1st July inclusively, as was done last year?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The instructions given this year to fishery officers in the province of Quebec as regards fishing for soft fish (poisson mou) during the close season for other fish, are the same as those given last year, which is to prohibit the catching of "soft fish" this year until the close season is over.

Mr. LANDERKIN.

WHALE FISHERY IN THE GULF.

Mr. FAUVEL asked, Is it the intention of the Government to grant a bounty for the encouragement of the whale fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is not the intention of the Government to recommend to Parliament the granting of a bounty for the encouragement of the whale fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence at present.

MR. W. H. WHITELEY.

Mr. JONCAS asked, Whether the Government are aware that Mr. W. H. Whiteley, the officer intrusted with the protection of Canadian fishermen and Canadian fisheries, is the agent of a large Newfoundland house also engaged in the Labrador fisheries; and that Mr. W. H. Whiteley is himself at the head of a large fishery concern?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The department is aware of these facts, but as stated in a previous answer on this subject, no action is to be taken, pending a report from the proper officer.

CUSTOMS COLLECTOR AT CENTREVILLE, N.B.

Mr. COLTER asked, Is the Customs Department aware that the collector at Centreville, N.B., exacts a fee of 10 cents on every team load of goods or produce hauled across the International frontier and reported at Centreville for transit to Vanceboro', and is the collection of such fees made with the sanction of the department? If so, by what law or authority? 2. What is the amount of such fees collected by such collector the past financial year? 3. Are any such fees exacted at any other Customs port or place in Canada? 4. Has the form of report to be made to the collector at Centreville, by the persons in charge of the several teams or carriages hauling goods therefrom across the frontier for transit to Vanceboro', been approved of by the Department of Customs?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. The Customs Department is not aware of the exaction of any fee by the officer of Customs at Centreville, N.B., which is a sub-port of the port of Woodstock, N.B. No officer of Customs is authorized by the department to exact any fee, even for the preparation of Customs' entries for importers, if they ask him to do so,—as it is not the duty of an officer to prepare importers' papers. Whenever the exaction of any such fee has been brought before the attention of the department, the officer concerned has been promptly advised that he is forbidden to make such charge, and that the importers should be required to prepare their own papers, or pay some broker for such service. 2. The department has no return of any fees having been collected by the officer at Centreville, N.B. 3. The answer to this is covered by No. 1. 4. No special form of report has been authorized by this department to be used by the officer at Centreville, who has, so far as this department is aware, only been using the usual forms. If any special form of report is being used by the officer at Centreville, it has not been sanctioned by the department at Ottawa.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not catch the first part of the hon. gentleman's answer; whether he stated that the officer was justified in charging 10 cents per team, provided he made out the papers.

Mr. WALLACE. He is not authorized.

KILDARE STATION.

Mr. PERRY asked, On whose recommendation was the late postmaster at Kildare Station, P.E.I., dismissed? Who has been appointed to succeed him? At whose recommendation was he appointed? Who is the mail carrier from the station to the post office? How much per trip is he getting?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A daily mail to Kildare Station was asked for in May, 1892, and it was then understood that if the daily mail were granted, the postmaster, Mr. N. J. Perry, would remove the post office to the vicinity of the station? The daily mail was granted, but the postmaster declined to carry out the understanding. Mr. A. Poirier, who lives at the station, was therefore appointed in his stead. Mr. J. N. Perry is the mail carrier, and his remuneration is $13.60 a year.

WELLAND CANAL, NEW CULVERT—TENDERS.

Mr. EDGAR asked, 1. Were tenders called for the construction of the new culvert on the feeder of the Welland Canal, near Stromness? 2. If so, what were the names and addresses of each tenderer, and the respective amounts of each tender? 3. Which tender was accepted? 4. What is the name of the contractor or firm now doing the work?

Mr. HAGGART. Tenders were called for. The names of the tenderers and the amounts were: Messrs. James Lawson and Walton & Johnson, Thorold, $5,805; Messrs. John K. Bradley and A. McLean, Dunnville and Stromness, $8,265; Mr. Archie Macdonald, Stromness, $5,356; Messrs. William Hutchison & Lattimore, Port Dalhousie and Dunnville, $6,415. The tender of Archie Macdonald was accepted. The name of the contractor is Mr. Archie Macdonald.

I.C.R.—SALES OF NEWSPAPERS, &c.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, 1. Who has the contract for the sale of newspapers, fruit, &c., on the trains of the Intercolonial Railway, between Levis and Campbellton? 2.

Was the contract awarded on tender? 3. If so, who were the parties tendering, and what was the amount of each tender? 4. What amount is the contractor bound to pay for the Levis-Campbellton division? 5. For what term of years was the contract awarded? 6. Is the contract given for the whole length of the Intercolonial Railway, or only by divisions?

Mr. HAGGART. The Canadian Railway News Company have the contract. The contract was awarded on tender. The names of the parties tendering, and the amounts were: Eugene Michaud, Fraser-ville—Levis to Campbellton, $525 per annum; the Loby Station Indicator Company, Montreal—Levis to St. John, Halifax, &c., $500; the Canadian Railway News Company, Montreal—Levis to St. John, Halifax, &c., $2,500, and east of Campbellton, $1,750; A. Bremner, Halifax—Halifax to Mulgrave and St. John, $500; Joseph Fortier, South Quebec—Levis to Campbellton, $400; C. A. Dennis, Levis—Levis to Campbellton, $480. The term of the contract is for one year from the 1st of August, 1892. The contract is given for the whole length of the Intercolonial Railway.

ALLEGED SEIZURE OF TOBACCO.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, 1. Are the Government aware that tobacco, kept in violation of the law, was seized on the premises of Messrs. Napoleon Aubin and Aime Beaulieu, of Ste. Flavie, in the county of Rimouski; 2. That a still was also seized on the premises of Napoleon Aubin; 3. If so, have legal proceedings been taken against the said parties, and what stage have the said proceedings, if so taken, now reached?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The Government is not aware that tobacco, kept in violation of the law, was seized on the premises of Messrs. Napoleon Aubin and Aime Beaulieu, of Ste. Flavie, in the county of Rimouski. The Government has not been informed of the seizure of a still on the premises of Napoleon Aubin. It is needless to say, from the above statements, that no proceedings were instituted.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GUAY asked, For what reason have the supernumerary employees of the Department of Agriculture not been paid since the 1st January, 1893?

Mr. FOSTER. A number of supernumerary employees have been, I think, paid since the 1st of January. If there are any who have not been paid, they are awaiting a vote in the Supplementary Estimates.

EMPLOYMENT OF MR. C. S. CLARK.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Has Mr. C. S. Clark been employed in the Department of Justice at any time since 1891? If so, for what period and at what salary? Is he still employed in that department? If not, why not? Is he at present in the employ of the Government? If so, in what capacity and at what salary? Is this Mr. Clark the same Mr. Clark who, it is alleged, surreptitiously took Mr. Farrer's pamphlet from the office of Hunter, Rose & Co., Toronto, during the last general election? Was this pamphlet given to the Government directly or indirectly by Mr. Clark?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Clark was employed in the Department of Justice after 1891, and also for a portion of 1891. His employment in the Department of Justice terminated on the 31st of October, 1892. He had been in receipt of $2 per day. He is not at present in the employment of the department; his services were no longer required. He is for the present employed as a temporary clerk in the Department of Agriculture, I think, in work connected with the Columbian Exhibition. This is the person who, in order to defeat a conspiracy to injure the commercial and fishery interests of this country with the object of coercing Canada into annexation, gave to a police officer a copy of a pamphlet, supposed to be the production of Mr. Farrer, in the annexation interest.

LETTER POSTAL RATE.

Mr. RIDER asked. Are the Government aware that in consequence of the lower rate of postage prevailing in the United States, particularly on ordinary letters, large numbers of Canadian letters destined to Canadian and other points are mailed in United States post offices along the border, thereby causing a considerable loss to the postal revenue of Canada? If so, what remedy does the Government propose to apply? Have the Government any intention of reducing the present rate of postage on ordinary letters?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Government is aware that a number of letters are mailed at United States post offices where such post offices are in close proximity to Canadian towns or villages, as in the cases of St. Stephen and Calais, Derby Line and Stanstead, Windsor and Detroit. The postal convention between the United States and Canada provides that where mail matter is posted in either country in order to evade payment of the rate of postage payable in the other country, then the country to which such correspondence is mailed may charge an additional rate, and this regulation has been acted upon in cases where it has been deemed expedient to enforce it. The Government has no intention of reducing the rate of postage upon letters. The loss of revenue would be about $700,000.

Mr. LANDERKIN.

THE CUSTOMS TARIFF.

Mr. DAVIN moved:

That it is the opinion of this House that the duty on barbed wire, on agricultural implements, on coal oil and on cottons should be reduced so as to give no more than reasonable protection, and that the duty on binder twine should be abolished.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope), when introducing his motion in regard to corn, remarked that it was not a motion of want of confidence in the Government. Well, Sir, I need hardly tell you that this is not a motion of want of confidence in the Government; and there is no reason whatever why a motion placed on the Paper as we place our motions should 'prima facie' be so considered. It is the constitutional way of bringing before the House the views of a member of Parliament in regard to any subject that he wishes to press upon the attention of the Government. If a motion assails the policy of the Government, if it directly asserts no confidence in the Government, it is of course a want of confidence motion; or if a member, on a motion to go into Committee of Supply, moves an amendment thereto of any kind, which the Government resists, and his amendment is carried, it may properly be considered a vote of want of confidence, because it is in direct opposition to that of the Government; but even that is a matter of opinion with the Government. I crave the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, for a few moments while I press upon them certain views with regard to the tariff and especially with regard to that portion of the tariff to which my motion refers; and were my ability to place before the House the views I wish to express, equal to the importance of these views, I should have no fear about commanding the attention of the House. I wish first to refer to a remark which appeared in the newspapers, echoing a remark I heard here, to the effect that it was very strange that I should express views in opposition to those of the Government on the tariff, and yet that I should not vote with the Opposition. The reason is this, that I am a supporter of the Government, that I am a believer in the National Policy, and that it is from that stand-point I press upon the Government and this House the necessity of dealing with the subjects mentioned in my motion, in the way I suggest. There are, speaking broadly, three kinds of tariff. You can have a purely revenue tariff, or a moderately protective tariff, or a tariff that would be exclusive; and unless you have direct taxation, the latter would be a 'reductio ad absurdum,' because it would give you no revenue. But it is obvious that between a minimum protective tariff and a tariff excluding all foreign imports, there are many points where you could have tariffs, some of which would be moderate and some of which would be outrageously protective and oppressive. Of course, if you had a tariff excluding foreign imports, then, in proportion as competition was limited by that exclusion, the local manufacturer could raise prices. There must, therefore, if you have a protective policy, be an ideal tariff which you must seek. There must be a tariff, moving along the ridge of which you will give that protection to native industries which will foster them and keep them healthy, and at the same time protect the people from the grasping policy of the manufacturer, protect the people from being mulcted in the goods they buy by being made to pay more for them than they ought. Any man, looking over the existing tariff and carefully comparing it with the tariff of 1883 in the United States, or 1890, or with the tariffs in Europe, or comparing one part of our own tariff with another part, cannot fail to come to the conclusion, that if we are to have a fairly good protective tariff—because that is all, I suppose, in practical affairs we can have—an ideal, a perfect tariff being so difficult to frame as to be really an impossibility—our present tariff needs very thorough and careful revision. It is not my business at present to show in what cases it would be necessary to make that revision, other than the points which relate to my present motion; but I will say this generally, that whenever you have a commodity which enters largely into the manufacture of goods, and where you have that article taxed—where it is the raw material of many industries—if you want to foster the production and manufacture of that article in the country, the proper way to do it is by means of bonuses. The commodity itself should be admitted free in order to protect the manufacture of the great variety of articles into which it enters. I ventured on a previous occasion, to which I may without impropriety refer, to say ‘a priori’ a combine must be condemned, and that above all a Government which has adopted a protective policy and a House of Commons which has pledged its majority to that policy, must strike at that combine. The other day, the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Cleveland) proposed to abolish the duty on oil. That is further than I would go. I agree with the hon. member for the east riding of Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) that this oil industry is a most important one, and that it has been built up with extraordinary rapidity to its present state of prosperity. I agree that it is in some respects, although a local industry, a national concern. I admit all that, but, as I followed the reasoning of my hon. friend the other afternoon, I could not help thinking of one of the characters in Dryden’s comedy, a distressed and sentimental maiden, who says: “My wound is great because it is so small,” and of the Duke of Buckingham who, rising in his box, said: “Then ’twould be greater were it none at all.” Now the converse is the kind of reasoning the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) indulged in. He pointed out that because the protection of coal oil was so enormous, the industry had made such great progress, and the inference which he would appear to press is that no oil from the outside should be admitted at all, and then it would be still more prosperous. If there was complete protection and complete exclusion; in fact, if you could blot out the sun and destroy the manufacture of candles and shut down on the electric light factories, his industry would be still more prosperous, although I fear it would be unequal to the demand for light in Canada. As I followed my hon. friend and as I read a paper sent to me by those gentlemen engaged in the manufacture of oil, I could not but be struck by this, that they, on the very question of tariff, as good as give up their whole case. They admit that they have an enormous protection. The manufacturers, when interviewed by trustworthy persons, one of whom is a Conservative and one a Reformer, admitted—and I do not think there can be any doubt about it—that they cannot produce as fine a quality of oil as the United States manufacturers and they cannot produce a sufficient quantity of the oil they do manufacture. They admit that, but they make statements as to the cost of bringing in the oil which I do not think are borne out by the facts, because I went and made inquiry. I made inquiries of some of the merchants inside and outside Ottawa, and I found that not only have you the 7½ cents duty on coal oil, but you pay 40 cents for each barrel; and I will remind my hon. friend the Finance Minister, that at one time it was 20 per cent and then 40 cents was charged, but that the merchants waited on him and urged a return of 20 cents, as the barrel was worth only $1, and then an arrangement was made to charge 40 cents on the barrel to protect still further my hon. friend’s (Mr. Moncrieff’s) clients in Petrolea. Now, the way the importers of coal oil and the people of Canada want to have that imported is in tank-cars. If it is imported in tank-cars this charge of 40 cents for the barrel is saved. The tank-car can be run to a terminal point in Canada, and, in fact, the tanks can be taken about the streets, as in the United States, and coal oil measured out to the people. Now, Mr. Speaker, the calculation made by my hon. friend in regard to the cost of coal oil is hardly borne out by the fact. I have here a calculation of what it costs to bring in oil. The invoice cost of sixty barrels of refined oil is $159.86, less 1 per cent for cash, $158.26; freight to Ottawa, $64.70, so that 2,640 gallons cost, in bond, $222.96, or say, 84½ cents per Imperial gallon; duty on 2,640 gallons at 7½ cents per gallon, $190.08; sixty barrels at 40 cents each, $24; inspection fees, 30 cents per barrel, $18; cartage from station, $7.20; total, $239.28, which, added to the cost of the oil, makes $462.24, or say, 17.89 cents per Imperial gallon. Now, Mr. Speaker, when you add the freight to that, we can understand why it is that in Regina we pay 40 cents per gallon, for coal oil, and in Dunmore and Lethbridge they pay 50 cents per gallon. If this duty were reduced, they would pay less by the amount of the reduction in duty, and not only less for the American oil, which they must have, but less for the Canadian oil. The cost, laid down free of duty, is 8'45 cents per Imperial gallon; the cost, duty paid, is 17'89 cents, so that the Canadian duty adds 9'44 cents per imperial gallon, or 113 per cent. Now, this is sold in Ottawa in large lots as follows:—

	Barrel lots.
	1to2	5to7	10to12	15to18
Canadian water-white, 802.12½	12	11½	11½	11½
American do20	19½	19½	19½	19½
do white house21½	21½	21½	21	21

Well, Mr. Speaker, that seems to me to make it perfectly clear that it is not the retailer's action that accounts for the high price of oil. Instead of paying 40 cents in Regina, or 35 cents in Winnipeg, if we had not the present duty to pay, we would be able to buy for about 25 cents, 26 cents or 27 cents for American oil in Winnipeg, and some 28 cents or 29 cents in Regina. Now, Sir, I do not wish to labour that question of oil further; but I may, before passing on from it, say this, that we get a curious testimony from my hon. friend from Petrolea and from the manufacturer of coal oil who contributes an eloquent article to the Petrolea "Topic," of the 3rd of February, 1893, as to the great subject that I strike at in this motion. It affects the cotton, and it affects the binder twine; it affects the binders; that is the question of combines. My hon. friend, when speaking the other day, declared that one of the reasons why we should not touch the oil duty was that oil was not produced by a combine; that if it was a combine it should be struck at at once. He says:

if they were using the tariff—

And now mark, Mr. Speaker, the language my hon. friend from Petrolea uses; because of it I think I may say that I will have his support in pressing my views in regard to the binder twine and agricultural implements on the Government:

with a system of "combinations," thus raising the price of the article and taking extra profits from the consumer, then all assurances given by the Government would be cancelled as between them and the producers.

Now that, of course, I quite agree with. The writer in the Petrolea "Topic" said:

The oil industry of Canada has to contend against the most powerful, wealthy and unscrupulous combination and monopoly on this, or, so far as we know, on any other planet—a combination on which sways Legislatures, controls railways and subsidies, public newspapers, for the purpose of crushing out all competition and gratifying an insatiate and selfish greed. In order to mislead the Canadian people and thus induce them to destroy an important home industry, crush out competition and place themselves in a position where for the light which illuminates their homes they would be dependant on a soulless monopoly, beyond the natural boundary this combination quotes oil at a few points along our frontier at prices below the cost of production, while in other parts of the country where there is no competition and where Canadians are not supposed to know what is transpiring, the people are made to pay more for their light than the people in this country are paying. It is not possible for any person at all conversant with the position and circumstances of the oil trade, as now conducted in this country to believe that were the Government to commit an act of suicidal folly so criminal as to blot out the oil industry of Canada, as some people appear to desire, by which many other industries, dependent on this would be prostrated and hundreds of families here pauperized, the people of this country being thus made dependant for their light on a grinding foreign monopoly, beyond the possible reach of any effective competition, would get a better or cheaper article than they now obtain with an active home and foreign competition for their custom. Such a competition is not within the domain of intelligent supposition, much less is it believable.

Now, Sir, that sort of language, as applied to combines, is eloquent, it is true, and I hope, as my hon. friend endorses that article, that I will have his support in regard to the binder twine. Now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to binder twine. That industry, I believe, is also the subject of a still pending motion before the House. A circular has been issued, signed by the Consumers' Cordage Company, and countersigned by Mr. Morris, the vice-president. I do not know why it was that my hon. friend, the junior member for Halifax, did not sign that circular as president, unless it be that the circular is, as I think, one of the most uncandid documents that ever emanated from any mercantile institution. It is a document intended to deceive the members of this House, to whom it was sent, and if the House will give me its attention I will establish that. This document, as I have said, is signed by the vice-president of the Consumers' Cordage Co., Mr. Morris. In this circular, quotations are given at places in Canada, and in Illinois and Dakota, of what binder twine is sold at. I will take the quotations at Chadwick, Illinois, and Valley City, North Dakota, and compare them with the figures given for Lucan and a point in Manitoba, and out of Mr. Morris' own mouth I will ask this House to pass judgment on the Consumers' Cordage Co. One of the first communications he quotes is from Miller & Smith, of Chadwick, Illinois, dated 29th January, 1892. Replying to a note from the Consumers' Cordage Co. they say:

Manila mixed, 11 cents early, 13 cents later.
do pure, 14 do 15 do

These figures, of course, varied some, but were about the standard price of the different grades throughout the country.

Then, on 2nd February, W. E. & C. Stanley wrote to Mr. Morris from Lucan:

Red Cap, 11½ cents; Blue Ribbon, 12½ cents. The same to Patrons of Industry.

Now, this looks well for the Consumers' Cordage Co., but what are the facts, which were, certainly, with some want of candor, kept from those persons to whom that circular was sent? Pure manila runs 690 feet to the pound, and mixed, 570 to the pound; Blue Cap or Blue Ribbon, 550 feet to the pound; and Red Cap, 480 feet to the pound. Therefore, the farmers, and the Patrons of Industry, at and around Lucan, pay 15 cents for 690 feet of Blue Ribbon; and 16 cents for 690 of Red Cap, as compared with 14 cents and 13 cents for 690 feet of equally good twine sold at Chadwick, Illinois. Now, take quotations at Valley City, North Dakota, and at a point in Manitoba. Merrick, Anderson & Co., of Winnipeg, telegraphed Mr. Morris on the 9th instant:

Red Cap, 12 cents; Blue Cap, 13 cents, cost at Neepawa on the Manitoba and North-western Railway.

A. Gray writes from Valley City, North Dakota, 29th January, 1893:

Prices paid by consumers of binder twine for the year 1892, say—pure manila, 15 cents, standard, 13½.

Very well, at Neepawa, 17 cents was paid for 690 feet of Red Cap, and 16 cents for 690 feet of Blue Cap; or 2 cents and 2½ cents more, respectively, in Manitoba for a similar quality of twine, than was paid in North Dakota. Now, that difference on a pound of twine is a serious thing to the farmers. Hon. gentlemen need not be surprised if the farmers I represent are complaining; and I know that on this subject I represent the farmers of the west. From every part of the west I have received letters in regard to this matter since I put this motion on the Paper. Is it any wonder if the farmers of the west—I cannot speak for those of Ontario, because I have not heard from them—when they compare prices at Lucan and prices at Dakota, press for a reduction of the duty upon binder twine? I may say that I believe the figures given in this circular are quite correct. Now, my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) said he felt diffident when speaking on this question of binder twine. I do not wonder. I will say this for my hon. friend, that it goes against my grain to oppose him in any way. I cannot bear to do it. It is a difficult matter for me; but, as somebody has said, "Plato is my aunt, but truth is my sister." My hon. friend is a colleague in this House, and a respected colleague, but the interests of the farmers overtop my kindly feelings for him. My hon. friend told us that this was no monopoly, because, he said, the Ontario Government was going into the manufacture of binder twine; and he heard there was another company—I believe that is the Brantford Farmers' Company. I have heard of a Brantford company that was started, and it was swallowed up by this vast combine, as Aaron's serpents swallowed up the others. And, Mr. Speaker, although my hon. friend is the president of this company, he is, as I say, of all men I have known in this House, probably one of those who would most readily fix esteem; still, when dealing with him as the president of this cordage company, I am reminded of what my Lord Byron says of Lambro:

Now, Lambro was the mildest mannered man,
That ever scuttled ship or cut a throat.

And although my hon. friend is the mildest-mannered man in this House, still, he is at the head of a combine. Now, I do not want him to take my opinion about a combine; I will not ask him, even, to take the opinion of any member of this House about a combine; I do not ask him to take the opinion of any editor in his own part of the country, about a combine; but I will ask him to take the opinion of one of his own colleagues. And who is this colleague whose opinion I will ask him to take? None other than Mr. Morris, his own vice-president. In 1888, this gentleman was at the head of the J. A. Converse Cordage Company, which was then the largest in Canada. It had been in a pool with a smaller concern. On 23th March, 1888, an Associated Press despatch was sent broadcast throughout the country, signed by Mr. Morris, announcing that he had withdrawn from the pool, and giving reasons for the step he had taken. Among other things, he said—and I will ask my hon. friend's attention to this:

We have all lost faith in combinations and are convinced that sooner or later such organizations will not be allowed to exist.

"Will not be allowed to exist?" Well, Mr. Speaker, why should they not be allowed to exist? The only reason why they could not be allowed by Government to exist is that they must be immoral; and I say that they are commercially immoral, as well as detrimental to the interests of the people of this country. Now, Sir, I have also put barbed wire in this motion as one of the things from which, in my opinion, the duty ought to be taken off. I do not want to have any industry injured that has been fostered by the National Policy; but where any manufacturer has abused the privileges of the National Policy, has abused excessive privileges, in those cases I want the Government to interfere. Now, as regards the matter of barbed wire. In the North-west and all over Manitoba, with rare exceptions, you have a prairie country and little timber. Barbed wire is a necessity for fencing. Let me show the House the interest the farmers of the North-west has in having the duty on barbed wire reduced. The quantity of barbed wire introduced into the country last year, up to 30th of June, 1892, from Great Britain was 15,792 lbs., of the value of $589, on which a duty was charged of $236; from the United States 171,283 lbs., of the value of $5,363, on which a duty was charged of $2,569. If the tariff were not too high altogether, surely more than that quantity would have come in when you consider what are the rates in the United States for that article. I hold in my hand the "Iron Age and Hardware Bulletin," published in New York. It gives the prices of barbed wire all over the country. I will take barbed wire in Chicago, and compare the price with that at which it was sold at the same time in Montreal. The paper says :

During the past week the barbed wire market has been sluggish, with only a limited amount of business. Prices are without material change on a basis of $2.35 to $2.40 for carload lots of four-point galvanized at mill.

The duty on barbed wire is $1.50 per 100 lbs., and the price at the factory at Montreal is $4 per 100 lbs. Out west we have paid as much as 7 cents per lb., and during last year it was 6 cents. I need hardly point out to the Minister of Finance that this is a case where it is absolutely necessary in the interests of the farmer in the prairie country that the duty should be removed. But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to remind the House, before I pass away from binder twine, that the first thing Mr. McKinley did was to lower the duty on binder twine, and the result to-day is that whereas a Canadian farmer would pay $20 duty, under the McKinley Bill a United States farmer would only pay $7 duty. That is under the McKinley tariff. Not only so, but Mr. McKinley threw off the duty on everything that entered into the manufacture of binder twine so as to lead to competition, because Mr. McKinley, who is a protectionist, and his friends are, as some quotations I made the other day show, as much opposed to combinations as any men could well be. In regard to cottons : there, too, you have a combine, and all I have said about combines in such matters applies to them ; and in regard to agricultural implements, I may say this, that I am in a position to say that a man who could speak with absolute authority declared that the manufacturers of agricultural implements would not feel very badly if the duty was only reduced to 25 per cent from 35 per cent. Suppose it was reduced to 10 or 15 per cent. I believe the manufacturer would still prosper and thrive, that the farmer would get his agricultural implements cheaper, and while the manufacturer might not be as great a millionaire and be able to scatter hundreds and thousands of dollars in donations, the farmers throughout the country would be greatly benefited. This does not apply only to the larger implements ; but if you examine the tariff you will find the duty on the smaller implements is heavier than the duty on the larger implements, and I would, therefore, suggest to the Government that when they come to revise the tariff, they should reduce it considerably on the smaller implements, that the duty on binder twine should be removed, that the duty on coal oil should be lessened and the duty on cottons should be reduced.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. When I finished addressing this House last Thursday afternoon.
Mr. DAVIN.

being at that time almost at the commencement of my remarks. I was referring to the question of the quality of our petroleum oil. I had said then that the quality was good, that we furnished to the people of Canada an oil as good as was made in the United States, and that, on the whole, the people of Canada are served with a better quality of burning oil than are the people of the United States. I admit that in the United States they produce a magnificent and a beautiful oil, and some of that very fine oil is imported into this country. I question very much, if this motion were carried, and if there were no protection on our oil, and if the trade of Canada were placed in the hands of the American monopolists, we would be as well served either as regards price or quality as we are to-day. At the present moment we furnish to the people a good, safe burning oil, an oil of which I have a sample here, and which members can examine. I called over the telephone to one of the large warehouses here and asked the parties to send up a sample of oil such as is sold in Petrolca at 10 cents per gallon in barrel, and 7½ cents in bulk. The sample I received is here. There are hundreds of barrels of it lying in that warehouse for sale in Ottawa, with nothing but the cost of freight added, and no leakage whatever. There has been a good deal of talk about leakage ; but with the system adopted in this country there is practically no leakage, because oil that is transported to such places as Ottawa is barrelled on the spot, and the merchant or farmer or anyone who wants it can go to the warehouse and obtain the full quantity marked on the barrels. This is an oil that almost everyone would consider a water-white. To an expert, and it would take a good expert to determine the contrary, it would be considered to be a shade from being water-white ; but it is an oil which, besides being cheap, will last longer and prove safer than American oil, and it is sold for 7½ cents per gallon in Petrolca in bulk. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), I understand, stated to the House that I had made a misstatement in regard to the Government that placed the duty on coal oil. It would be a strange thing, indeed, if I would make a misstatement on that question, and if the hon. gentleman had taken the pains to read my remarks he would find that I had made no mistake. He said that I had stated that the Mackenzie Government was responsible for the duty on coal oil. I never said that, but I said the very reverse when I mentioned the facts, and allow me to read my remarks in "Hansard," to show that he was a little too fast in making the explanation to this House. What I said was :

Under the policy of the Conservative Government, under a policy that was inaugurated before the National Policy was ever thought of,—

That certainly was before the time of the Mackenzie Government.

—under the policy decided on thirty years ago, and under the tariff made by Hon. Alex. Mackenzie himself, under assurances given in Parliament ever since 1877, capitalists have been invited to invest their money in the coal oil regions of Canada.

Sir, before Mr. Mackenzie ever thought of being Premier of this country that tax was placed upon this commodity for the protection of a Canadian industry, which was being developed, and which this tax did develop. The hon. gentleman might have known that I could hardly have misstated the circumstances, because I have referred to the same thing over and over again in this House. I desire also to call your attention to a very slight error which would be very easily made by the reporters in taking my remarks of last Thursday. I am made to say that the Standard Oil Company are making a refined oil, "Lima crude light," which is sold at 17 cents or 18 cents a barrel, and forcing it over the country. That is not exactly what I said, nor does it convey my idea. What I said was this: The Standard Oil Company are making a refined oil out of Lima crude, which is being sold; that is, the crude oil is being sold at from 17 cents to 18 cents a barrel. Sufficient for the explanation. In addition to the development of the oil industries in Canada, which I referred to on Thursday, it slipped my memory to mention that other oil wells are being discovered in different parts of the Dominion. It is well known that in the Welland district, where they have been boring for gas, they discovered oil on the way down, and that oil is shut off by the casing, because it is gas they are after. In the Essex region, the district represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Allan), they have also discovered petroleum, but at the present moment the wells are shut off and only the gas is taken. I am not in a position to say what quantity of oil these wells would yield, but unquestionably there was oil discovered there, and the day is not far distant, if our industry is protected, when we shall produce petroleum in different places in Ontario, in different places in the west, and in different places in the east. When that day comes—and I wish it was right here now—if we had petroleum in the east and in the west, as we have it in the centre, why, Sir, there would be justification for this Government to-day to shut out every barrel of American oil that is brought into the country. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has referred to some remarks of mine, and I am glad to say that I do not retreat from anything that I stated before. He stated that when a combination was injuring the people of the country, that combination should be removed. There are two things to be considered in this respect; first, to decide if there is a combination, and the other to find out if that combination is charging exorbitant prices. As I stated, there is no combination in oil, nor has there been a combination in that trade for years, and so I am free from the imputation of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia, and I am also free to stand here, to ask protection for this industry from the Conservative Government, and as a part of the Conservative policy. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, stated that there was a duty of 40 cents upon oil casks. I may ask: Do you know of any cask that comes into the country free? Certainly not. They all have to pay duty, and what is the trouble about that? Now, with reference to the inspection. We have an inspection fee on the American oil of 30 cents a barrel. Canadian oil is subject only to an inspection of 10 cents per barrel. Why was this difference made? Was it made to please me, or was it made to please the people of Petrolea, as the hon. gentleman, perhaps, insinuated. Why, Sir, it was made for the very good reason that in the district where the oil is produced, it is inspected by thousands of barrels; but in the country at points where it is imported, it has frequently to be inspected by four or five barrel lots, and expensive instruments have to be sent out to test it. It costs more to inspect it in small quantities, and the small extra charge that is made on the barrel, at these outlying places, is made because the inspection is more expensive. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Cleveland) are divided in their opinion on this question, and I suppose it is the privilege of all intelligent people to exercise their own judgment. One hon. gentleman is in favour of abolishing the duty altogether. I know what that would do. That would deprive a great number of people of the livelihood they make in Canada to-day; and then you would see an exodus leaving this country by the wagon load and going to the oil regions on the American side the moment such a tariff resolution was passed by this House. The other proposition is to reduce the duty upon oil. I shall endeavour to show this House, before I am through, that to reduce the duty upon oil would not gain the object the hon. gentleman seeks. I do not know what reduction he wants, but I will suppose it to be a trifling reduction. That will not reduce the price of oil to the consumer, and it will only benefit our friends on the American side. The hon. member also stated that oil is quoted in Winnipeg at some enormous price—

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman excuse me—perhaps I forgot to mention what my ideas were on that point, and probably what I now state will help him. What I would suggest will be this: That the barrel should be done away with, and that the oil should come in in bulk, that the duty should be lowered, and that the inspection fee should be lowered.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I understood that the hon. gentleman objected to the tax on the barrel, and I referred to that. What I state is: that the motion of one hon. gentleman to abolish the duty would have the effect of killing the oil industry right off, and that the other motion to reduce the duty would have the effect of bleeding it slowly to death. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) posed in this House the other day as a very intelligent man, and as the instructor of capitalists, and in his nice, easy manner, he also instructed the Cabinet as to what he thought it was their duty to do in this case. That hon. gentleman commenced his attack upon the oil industry by reading what? by quoting from what? By quoting from an anonymous letter in the "Globe" newspaper. He never quoted a figure in this House, except some small tariff returns, in respect to the industry at Petrolia that was not taken from the anonymous letter to the "Globe," and having placed that letter before him, he commenced to knock it down piece by piece. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that it is fair for any member of this House to base his argument on such data. I should be very sorry, indeed, for his patients if they were treated in the same way. I should be very sorry if he diagnosed me in the same careless manner in which he has given his statistics to this House in reference to the oil trade. Why, Sir, the last thing any man of intelligence would do, would be to quote from an anonymous letter on which to base an argument, and then proceed to knock it down. In some respects, I agree with that letter; in some others, I think, perhaps, it is slightly overdrawn. But, Sir, I have nothing to do with the letter. Any person can write an anonymous letter, but it is not every member of Parliament who will take it as the basis of an argument. The hon. gentleman also complained of lobbyists in this House. I should like to ask what lobbyist he referred to. He is very particular about the dignity of Parliament. I will tell you who he referred to. He referred to gentlemen from the oil district of Canada, men of capital and men of position in this country, who were here in their own interests and in the interest of a Canadian industry, who came here to enlighten just such men as the hon. member; and he took advantage of their knowledge. He had an interview with one of them, and got certain information from him; but he certainly did not take that gentleman's remarks down correctly. He was very particular about the lobbyists who came to protect Canadian interests and industry, to give this Parliament information on the subject to be dealt with, and to meet any inquiry offered to them. Did the hon. gentleman tell us anything about the representative of the Standard Oil Co. who was here? Did he get his figures from that gentleman? I would like to ask him that question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I will tell you in a little while.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Representatives of the Standard Oil Co. were here last year, and the paid representative of that company has been here during this session lobbying members of this House. What do they want to lobby this House for? They want to do it in their own interest, in the hope of getting some reductions made in the tariff, some concessions in regard to the oil which they send into this country. Do they want these concessions for the benefit of the Canadian public? By no means; but for the benefit of the Standard Oil Co. and nobody else. While the hon. gentleman was very particular about the Canadian lobbyists who were here in the interest of the Canadian producers of oil, he was very careful to ignore the fact that the Standard Oil Co.'s representative was here lobbying members at the same time. Now, Sir, I am not going to quarrel with the hon. gentleman's figures regarding the price at which American oil can be laid down in this country. I think, however, I have the figures here in better shape than he has, because I have got them under the hand of the Standard Oil Co.'s agent in this very town, published in the "Citizen" newspaper last Saturday. Now, this gentleman who objected to the Canadian lobbyists, had a conversation with one of them, which he gives in his speech. He did not tell us who that gentleman was, but I will tell you. Why, Sir, the gentleman who gave the figures referred to was a gentleman who occupied a seat in this House until four or five years ago. In the conversation that took place between them the hon. member says he asked, "What is the price to-day of your No. 1 Canadian oil, with a specific gravity of 795?" Now, I do not know whether this is a mistake for 785. I am prepared to have it changed if it is wrong.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The gentleman to whom I was speaking said 795.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. The hon. gentleman said that the gentleman told him, "15 cents in bulk." Now, Sir, if I am right in saying that Mr. Fairbank was the gentleman referred to—and I presume he was or the hon. gentleman would have contradicted me—Mr. Fairbank could not have made that statement. The price of that oil has been from 10 to 12 cents in bulk for the last two years. The price of 785 oil, which is a much lighter oil, and a more expensive oil to make, has not averaged over 12 cents in bulk for the last two years. The hon. member for West Huron has ridiculed the amount of capital invested in this industry, basing his calculations upon the same anonymous letter. He says also the whole output is about $1,638,000. In that he is wrong to the amount of about $400,000. He has also taken from the anonymous letter a statement of the wages paid to those engaged in the industry, and he says that the whole capital supposed to be invested in the industry is $21,000,000. Then he takes 5 per cent interest on that amount and adds it to the amount of wages paid; and then he tells this House that the sum total is more than the whole value of the output. If he had had a good basis to go upon, it would be well enough; but as his basis is an anonymous letter, I think I have a right to question his authority. But, Sir, I do not care for the moment what the amount of wages is, or what amount ought to be charged to interest. If the hon. gentleman had come to the town of Petrolea for his information, instead of going to an anonymous letter for it, he would have been able to get at the real facts for himself. And I can tell him that whatever is chargeable to interest or ought to be collected by way of interest, is sunk back in the ground in Petrolea, into the oil wells, and there is not a dollar accumulated in any person's pocket. Let me take hold of another statement of the hon. gentleman. He says that it would be a grand thing for the country if American oil were allowed to come in free in bulk, because that would give steady employment to 250 coopers the whole year round. I will show you, from the hon. gentleman's own calculations, that he is going to give the men about 55 or 56 cents a day. He says there are 140,000 barrels to make and that the making of them would give steady employment to 250 men the whole year. He must know, if he knows anything else except medicine—and I hope he does, that barrels to-day are made mostly by machinery, and that the labour in making a barrel does not exceed 30 cents, and that is an over-estimate. If you would take 140,000 at 30 cents, it will give you $42,000, which, divided among 250 coopers, is equal to about $168 to each cooper during the year, or 56 cents per day. The hon. gentleman must know that coopers never work for less than $2.50 or $3 per day, and I do not think that the coopers in Canada will thank him very much for starting them on this new industry at 56 cents per day. His whole premises are wrong. He says 140,000 barrels would require to be made in this country. Well, you can put all the American oil that comes into the country into 120,000 barrels. Is not every barrel in the country now that the country requires, and at all those outlying places where oil is sold wholesale they gather in the barrels again and allow the consumer for the empty barrels at the rate of 1½ cents to 2 cents per gallon. Does the hon. gentleman not know perfectly well, that the whole barrel requirements of the country are in the country at present, and that only about 10 per cent, being the allowance for breakages, &c., is all we would require to manufacture. So that, instead of having 140,000 barrels to make, you would only have 14,000, and you can find one institution in the country which will turn those out at the rate of 500 per day. I do not think the hon. gentleman is to be congratulated much on his figures. Then again, he refers to the injustice done to the gas companies.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have allowed the hon. gentleman to go, I think, a little too far in referring to a previous debate.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Then I will not do so; but I suppose it will be in order to say that I understand some people claim it would be an advantage to the country if gas oil came in free. I suppose it will also be in order for me to say that the Gas Company of Toronto sent a circular inclosing a petition around amongst the members this year, and it will be in order for me to say that I was present with a deputation of the gas companies and manufacturers last year. The gas men urged their claims and said there would be no cause of complaint if gas oil would be sold at $1 per barrel. They have been getting it at about 3 cents per gallon ever since, and I am informed some of the gas companies have a contract for it at that rate for next year. As they are getting it at 3 cents a gallon, that amounts only to $1.05 per barrel. If the gas company had no reason to find fault the hon. gentleman need not take up the cudgels for them; but it was ascertained from that same deputation how much gas oil it took to make a thousand feet of gas. We ascertained that it just took 5 gallons, or 15 cents worth of that material to make a thousand feet of gas, and gas is sold in the city of Toronto at about $1 for fuel purposes, and $1.50 for light; and these prices are charged by the company that has sent in the petition to which I referred, and who are now complaining because gas oil is not admitted free. At that particular meeting we were very desirous of finding out what made the gas worth so much money, when the crude oil only cost 15 cents; but they were very delicate about giving the information, and we could not find out. But this little petition has given the whole thing away. Let me read the second paragraph:

That they were led to enter upon the manufacture of water gas.

So we find that the component properties of this gas are 15 cents worth of oil and the balance water. They seemed certainly very unreasonable indeed—getting water, I suppose free just now in Toronto, and yet complaining that the gas oil cost 15 cents. This puts me in mind of the story of a Texas legislator who was asked what he thought of the navy of the United States. "Well," he said, "I reckon we have got plenty of water, and all we want is a few ships." That is something like the claim of the Toronto gas people, supported by my hon. friend, who thinks they ought to have free oil. Why should they have free oil? Why should we pay a foreign nation for crude oil or gas oil, so long as we can furnish it ourselves in abundance at a reasonable price? We are doing that now; we are giving it at nearly the very price the gas companies said would be satisfactory to them. I wish to refer briefly to the reduction of the tariff that was made by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie in 1878. But before dealing with that question, I wish to call the attention of this House to the fact that the Mackenzie Government were asked to take this question into consideration in 1876. They took a year to consider the matter. They consulted with the trade as to what they should do. They kept in unison, so to speak, though acting independently from the trade. They got their ideas, and they reduced the tariff from 10 cents a wine gallon down to 6 cents or 7½ cents per imperial gallon, after they had thoroughly considered the whole question. Let me ask you what was the state of affairs at that time. When they reduced the tariff from 10 cents to 6 cents, refined oil in the United States was 15½ cents and crude oil in the United States was $2.38 a barrel? Why, Sir, we could stand a reduction of the tariff at that time, and the crude men and the refiners of this country to-day would be perfectly willing to stand a reduction of the tariff if they could do it without annihilation. Now, Sir, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in presenting his budget to the House, after he had carefully considered what the results would be, he had weighed whether it would injure the industry or not, placed his tariff at a figure that he thought would not injure the industry. He spoke as follows:—

The Government, therefore, have carefully considered this whole question with a desire to remove the burdens of the people as much as they could and yet not utterly to wipe out of existence a Canadian industry which had grown up under the protection of the law as enacted by hon. gentlemen opposite, the conclusion we arrive at is this: We propose to abolish the Excise duty altogether and to reduce the duty on imported petroleum from 15 cents per gallon, as it is at present, to 6 cents. It is necessary for us under existing circumstances to take back an equivalent for that amount. We think that we may fairly ask the country to recompense us by paying an additional duty of one penny sterling or 2 cents a pound on tea imported into the country.

Well, Sir, there are two very important things to be noted in that utterance; one is, that the hon. gentleman did not want to annihilate the industry, and the next, that he could not reduce the tariff without adding duties upon something else to make up the loss. Now, what was the result of that change? For the purpose of reducing the burdens of the people the then Finance Minister reduced the duty on petroleum which, figuratively speaking, collected $72,000 from the people by way of duty, but in the very same year there was 11,000,000 lbs. of tea imported, which, at 2 cents a pound additional, would be an added burden of $220,000. So that while taking off burdens with one hand and adding burdens with the other, he simply taxed the people that year $148,000 more than if he had left the tariff alone altogether. Now, Sir, this resolution of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) asks the Government to reduce the duty. What would be the effect of reducing the duty; for, of course, it can be reduced only for a purpose? It would have the effect of allowing more American oil to come into this country than is coming in now. We will say that he has taken off a couple of cents, does he pretend to say that in the city of Winnipeg, where they are charging 35 cents, the consumer would get the oil at 43 cents? Does he pretend to say that in the city of Ottawa, where they are charging 35 cents, the consumer would get the oil for 33 cents? I will tell the hon. gentleman what the results of that would be. The American importer would take the 2 cents and the consumer would pay exactly the same as to-day. I told you that in 1877, when the tariff was reduced, oil was high, both crude and refined. The very next year, 1878, it went down lower a great deal, and between the reduction of price in the United States, and the reduction of tariff in our own country, the Americans began to increase their importations into Canada, and, while we had any quantity of crude to supply the demand they forced into this country during the next six years 10,070,945 gallons. In the six years previous to the reduction they had only exported to Canada 3,048,596 gallons, so that the oil importation into Canada in these six years after the reduction was an average of 1,678,450 per year more than the average of the six years prior to the reduction. So that any reduction would now have no other effect than that I have stated. I think, Sir, as a matter of record it would not be amiss that I should file a copy of American importations since 1872, as follows:—

AMERICAN OILS IMPORTED FOR FISCAL YEARS 1872 TO 1892.

Year.	Gallons.	Year.	Gallons.
1872	150,361	1883	3,086,316
1873	397,914	1884	3,160,282
1874	636,806	1885	3,767,441
1875	691,100	1886	3,819,146
1876	632,287	1887	4,290,003
1877	570,128	1888	4,523,056
1878	801,412	1889	4,650,274
1879	1,050,399	1890	4,985,722
1880	617,641	1891	5,071,365
1881	1,437,475	1892	5,636,514
1882	3,007,702

Now, at the same time that the importations were thus increasing, I want the House to understand that Canada kept abreast with them, and that for the last twelve years she has filled the complement of two-thirds of the oil consumed in the country, while the Americans have furnished the other third. I have here, also, a record of Canadian oil inspected since 1880, as follows:—

Here, Sir, we have an answer to any assertion that may be made by any gentleman, wherever he may be, that Canada is falling short in her crude. She has increased every year in her production for the last twelve years, and she has produced nearly double the quantity of oil this year that she did in 1880, and the natural resources of Canada are, to-day, sufficient to supply, and would supply, the whole of the Canadian trade, if the Americans had not got control of some sections of the country and if a certain class of people had not their prejudice, not against Canadian articles as such, but a prejudice acquired in the old times, when Canadian oil was so bad. Any person who asks now for a gallon of Canadian oil, I do not care how strong his prejudices were, or how strong the smell of Canadian oil was some years ago, he will be satisfied with the price, the light, the odour and the colour. But, Sir, if you adopt a policy that will stop the drill working in Canada, then, for these fields that I have mentioned there is no future, and the wells we have to-day will unquestionably be things of the past. Now, let us see how the Americans used us in times of their prosperity. Gentlemen here may not know it, but let me assure you that, at the present moment, oil in America is at the lowest point it has ever touched in the history of the oil trade. It commenced at $20 a barrel and to-day it is only worth 55 cents. So that we are asked to make legislation now, when the oil business of Canada is in a worse position to compete with the foreign manufacturers than it has ever been in the history of the trade, and I am going to ask this House not to pass any such resolution as this at this critical moment, at this vulnerable point in the history of a trade. Now, Sir, under the tariff of the United States, when their oil was less plentiful, at a time when we were competing with the Americans in foreign markets, they would not allow a single gallon of Canadian oil to be taken into their country. I believe they were right; and I believe, also, it would, after reflection, be satisfactory to this country if every gallon of oil we use was supplied from our own wells. But what policy did they adopt? Talk in the newspapers, and the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Macdonald) talks about 100, 120 and 130 per cent protection. Did he ever look at the American tariff and find what they had against Canadian oil? If he looks, he will find that when they had their high tariff, they prohibited Canadian oil from going into their country, by a tariff which at times gave them a protection of 2,000 per cent. They had twenty cents a gallon against Canadian crude, and at times crude has been 1 cent a gallon. They always had 40 cents a gallon protection against the Canadian refined. Surely that was enough! That simply meant that not one gallon of Canadian oil should go into the United States. Forty cents specific per gallon on refined at the time they removed the duty, was at least 600 per cent. Sir, that hon. gentleman is very fond of referring to the other side, when he finds something there to suit his argument. Why don't he talk up this little thing I have shown him now? Why don't he say: Gentlemen, the Americans are a great people who know how to manage their affairs. They know how to encourage the industries of their country. Here they have put 600 per cent on refined; let us do the same and shut their oil out of this country. They put on 2,000 per cent on crude; why does he not say: "Let us do the same, and shut their crude out." No, he does not talk that way; he desires to have the motion of my hon. friend from West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) carried, whatever the results may be. Sir, the American Government never reduced the tariff that I have mentioned on Canadian oil, until they were in such a position, by the enormous quantities of oil they produced, by the plethora of oil that they got in gushing wells, until they were in a position, by over-production, to shut out every gallon of Canadian oil, whether refined or crude. Now, if there is one thing more than another that deserves our most careful consideration, it is the amount of capital invested in the oil regions. I do not pretend to be able to satisfy the hon. member for West Huron by counting up the wagons and horses that are employed; but I will give him two or three little figures, and he can work out the rest for himself. He can find out for himself, if he goes there, that there are about 25,000 acres of land embraced in that oil belt, putting the weakest land in along with the strongest; and he could not buy it—I will not say just at this moment, because they are all shaking in their boots at home—but he could not buy it a few weeks ago for less than $200 an acre. If he will multiply those figures together it will amount to about $5,000,000. Now, the hon. gentleman will probably say: I have been over the assessment rolls ; I have examined the rolls of the township of Enniskillen, where there is oil, the township of Sarnia, and the township of Moore, in the riding of my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Lister) ; and he will say that the assessments do not show that amount. Sir, the Legislature of Ontario passed an Act that mining lands should never be assessed at their mining value, but that they should only be assessed for farming purposes ; and you cannot find the mining value on the assessment roll. Now, I started with $5,000,000. I will show you where there is another $5,000,000. There are to-day, I believe, 6,500 wells pumping. Every one of these wells is furnished with a pump and casing, and cost between $400 and $500, to say nothing whatever of the machinery to run them. Up in our section we lump that in together, and call it about $800 to a well. Now, if you multiply 6,500 by $800, which is a fair estimate, you will find you have $5,200,000. Throw off the $200,000, under the circumstances to-day, and we will have $5,000,000. Now, on top of that, do you know that there are many refineries in the country ? Petrolea and London have refineries ; in all, 13 or 15 refineries, and the capital invested is not a dollar less than $3,000,000. Why, Sir, there are 800,000 barrels of underground tanks in Petrolea alone. There are at least 45 drilling rigs running. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not know what these are. They are the tools with which the workmen drill the well ; and drilling rigs are worth about $1,200 each. There are, on the average, six men to each well. They work night and day, but these operations have largely stopped during the last month or two. Do you know why ? Because there has been an agitation against their business, and capitalists are afraid of the consequences. You need not be surprised, if you visit the oil regions to-day, which are 20 miles long from one end to the other, if you find men standing there idle and waiting the results of these motions.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Will you be kind enough to tell me what is the average production of each well ?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I will tell you everything ; and whatever I tell you is not anonymous, either. Whatever statement I make to you I pledge my word for it. The average production is about half a barrel to each well per day. If you will multiply that by 6,500—

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I will do the rest.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I will do it for you now. If you multiply that by 6,500, and multiply the product by the number of days in the year, it will tally out, and give you the total Canadian production. Now, some people will say there are $20,000,000 in this business. I have already shown you over $13-

Mr. MONCRIEFF.

000,000. We will allow the balance to go to the boiler shops, the machine shops, the cooper shops, without which industries the oil business cannot be run, and which owe their existence to the oil business. But it is not very material whether it is $15,000,000 or $20,000,000. But I want you to understand that it amounts to a great deal to the people of the oil regions who are engaged in that business ; because whatever the figures may be, it is every cent in the world that they have got ; and every cent in the world these men have got stands—I will not say in jeopardy—but stands subject to the vote of this House, whether it shall be wiped out or whether it shall be protected. Now, there is another question that this House has a right to understand, and that is the labour that is employed. Now, surely I need not be very particular on this point, because I will take that just about the same way as I did the other. It is necessary to tell you that some of these men employed on the rigs, apprentices probably, get a dollar a day ; the next man gets about a dollar and a half ; and the driller about two dollars and a half, according to circumstances. Hon. members can easily figure up how many men are employed in the drilling business alone. From three to six hands may be considered as being attached to a rig. In addition to the men drilling there are those engaged in refining. Hon. gentlemen will find the number placed at 270. Let that number go for the moment as correct. It must not, however, be supposed that those are all the people employed in that branch of the business. I want the House to understand that you cannot take twenty-five miles of territory, with 6,500 wells, and not have a large number of men employed. I have not figured up the exact number, but it must be in the hundreds. I can give, however, a general statement, and I may say that I do not believe that in the petroleum district, including the townships of Inniskillen, Moore, Sarnia and Dawn, there are less than 2,000 people employed one way or another in developing and carrying on these industries. Then, there are the refineries in London. In the computation I have made, however, I do not include the population of the district, but I have simply taken the number of people engaged in the business in Petrolea and other places I have named. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that I am exaggerating. Here is a list, published fifteen months ago, of the names of operators in the oil regions. I will give the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Macdonald) a copy of this list, for he should have one. There is the name given and number of wells opposite each name, and the name of every well proprietor. This list includes the names of over 400 proprietors of wells which are being pumped. Since this list has been made out, from 50 to 100 names have been added, I can count myself, at a moment's notice, at least twenty-five new names. The total number given is 5,346 wells then being worked. Out of the list of 400 operators, it is very easy to extract 300 names of good, square honest working men who have every dollar they have earned since they came into the town and every dollar they brought with them, sunk in holes, many of them on the lots on which they are living. I cannot describe the Petrolea district in any other way than as a small British colony. It is a colony distinct from any other group of people gathered together and engaged in any other industry, because there is no industry like it in the country. If Parliament were to tamper materially with the tariff, it would have a terrible effect on that industry. If the drill should stop, production would stop. If you frightened capital, the drill would stop. Production having ceased, the result would be that American oil would come into the country in large quantities, and our wells would have to shut down, because our manufacturers could not get crude. That state of things would naturally follow. The wells and the whole property would be abandoned. I cannot describe the condition which our petroleum districts would present two years after it had been destroyed and the Standard Oil Co. allowed to control our trade, than by comparing it to a western prairie over which the grasshoppers had passed. It must also be remembered that every well in the district has contributed to the revenue of this country. There are 6,500 wells, without counting the abandoned ones, that number has practically paid each a poll-tax of not less than $25 in the shape of duties on imported tubing, which is not manufactured in this country. Referring to workmen, let me say that all the work connected with the petroleum industry involves labour from beginning to end. Labour is involved in bringing in the foundation timber, in drilling the wells, in pumping the oil, in bringing the logs to the cooper shops, in manufacturing barrels and the refined oil. In our district it is nothing from 1st January to 31st December but labour, labour, labour. I have here the opinions expressed in writing by two gentlemen who visited our town some time ago as commissioners, representing the Toronto "Globe." Mr. J. E. Atkinson wrote to the "Globe" as follows, regarding his personal observations there, and I hope the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Macdonald) will also visit the district some day, and he will ascertain that statements made by Mr. Atkinson are perfectly correct. Mr. Atkinson says:

The extent of the dependence of the whole community upon oil can scarcely be understood, except after a visit here. There is almost an entire absence of speculative operators, I am told, but every one is the owner of one or a group of wells, or else in saving until he can sink one. In front gardens and back yards, in close proximity to their dwellings, men have one or more oil wells, with pumps at work, their weather-stained poles and tar-smear'd walking-beams, less beautiful than flower beds, but more profitable.

When a man can afford to sink a well in his lot, he has it done, and rigged with a pump at an expense of about $400. If he has not a sufficient number of wells to afford to put in an engine of his own, he hitches on to the nearest power, pays its owner 20 cents a day rent, and, if his well gives a barrel a day, makes a profit which, if it holds out, will pay him back his investment in a year. But, as with the larger producers, so it is with the beginners, the money goes back into the ground again. This has been going on for a quarter of a century. There have been few fortunes made, it is said, or, if they have, they are in the ground.

I think the opinions expressed by Mr. Atkinson corroborates the remarks I have made to this House. Mr. Cockin, who accompanied Mr. Atkinson, wrote as follows:—

It does not take an outsider long to become saturated with the spirit of the place; one readily recognizes the wonderful fascination exercised by the native industry. An oil farm, or a single oil well if you prefer it, is a refined sort of gambling carried on amidst moral surroundings and the direct sanction of the elect. There is all the witching charm of uncertainty in it. There are such vast possibilities connected with it. The imagination is excited to a conception of what might be, and there is little wonder that the clergy and laity alike are carried away by it and worship side by side with indisputable fervour at the greasy altar of the local mammon. Elsewhere in Canada the workman fashions a few flower-beds or a lawn out of the little patch that stretches from his door to the fence. The Petrolean sinks a well and trusts to Providence for the rest. Nearly every house on the street has its oil well, with a melancholy-sounding pump at work. The latter is connected with and is worked by an engine which may possibly be a quarter of a mile away. As a matter of fact no Petrolean worthy of the name keeps any loose cash hanging around uninvested. All his saved earnings, every cent of his family's hard-earned cash that can be scraped together, is rapidly and without the slightest hesitation put into one of these holes from whose depths comes the rich product which ultimately, in its refined state, is destined to illuminate thousands of homes throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion. The large capitalists have what are called oil farms, ranging from one to twenty acres, in which many wells are sunk. These farms have underground pipes connecting their oil tanks with the refineries, which latter in some cases are miles away.

These two gentlemen visited Petrolea on behalf of the Toronto "Globe," and inspected the industry which is under discussion. I must say, on behalf of those two gentlemen, that their report is wonderfully correct. It is a tribute to the discerning powers of both gentlemen and well keeps up their reputation as able and trustworthy newspaper correspondents. Mr. Speaker, I come now to a part of my remarks which may be of some practical value, though after all I have told you, you will, I trust, feel possessed of the knowledge of how important an industry the oil trade is, and how dangerous it would be to pass any measure in this House which would turn these 2,000 men out on the street. The question of the price of oil troubles the Canadian consumers more than anything else, and I hope to give you a satisfactory account of what the prices are to-day in Canada. It must be taken into consideration that the oil industry of Canada is at present confined to one locality, and the nearer you are to that district the less the cost of freight. Unfortunately, when you reside 2,000 miles away it is necessary that you should have to add freight to the price of the article. That is a little unfortunate for those who live at a distance; but surely those people for the sake of the small extra cost of freight on the quantity they use would not be in favour of jeopardizing the oil interests of this country. It is a most extraordinary thing indeed that the prices of oils should vary in the different localities to the extent that I shall show, for I believe that the whole dissatisfaction is mainly due to the difference in the prices ranging in various places. The wholesale price of some oils has not varied more than about a cent in twenty-four months, but the retail price is a matter of curiosity. I never knew that there were such retail prices charged until I came here, and my friends from Petrolea are astonished to find that an article produced in our district at hard-pan rates should be retailed throughout the country at such extravagant prices in some places, as to cause a feeling of hostility to that great industry. Let me give you a few examples of this. In the town of Dunnville, oil is selling at 25 cents a gallon; at Brighton it is also retailed at 25 cents, while in Madoc it is retailed at 15 cents. Can any mortal man explain why it should be only 15 cents a gallon in Madoc, which is more difficult of access, and 25 cents a gallon at Brighton and Dunnville? I find that along the line of the Pontiac Railway oil was selling at 30 cents per gallon until a few weeks ago; but I was informed by the hon. member for that county (Mr. Bryson) only last Saturday that he was glad to be able to inform me that the retailers in his section had reduced the price of burning oil from 30 cents down to 16 cents. How much difference would that make in the profit on a barrel? They reduced the profit on the barrel over $6.50. Is not that enough to cause consternation to the people of Petrolea? I do not blame the people of this country for raising a row under such a condition of things as that. I sent this news home as to the enormous retail prices and I believe that the producers must take this matter in hand, and wherever there are too high prices for oil charged in any town, they must take action in the matter and arrange to give it cheaper to the consumer. That will be done, and must be done, because we cannot stand such an agitation as has been going on for some time past. I think that will, to a large extent, remedy the difficulty, because I have assurances from many hon. gentlemen here that, if it had not been for these enormous prices, there would have been none of this trouble whatever. I will ask this House to postpone action in the matter, and to watch attentively what the result of another year will be, before it sweeps out of existence this great industry, and accomplishing nothing but to favour one of the greatest monopolies on the continent of America at the present moment. My hon. friend from Soulanges (Mr. Bain), near Montreal, has informed me that he has only charged 14 cents a gallon for oil for the last year or two; the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Masson) has informed me that oil was 25 cents a gallon in Owen Sound some months ago, but now it is only 15. He was charged on the public platform that the combination in oil raised the prices, but he showed the people that the buyers only paid 7½ cents per gallon in bulk at Petrolea, or 10 cents by the barrel, and the result was, in a very short while that every oil store in town had a ticket in the window announcing that they were selling Canadian oil at 15 cents a gallon. There is no complaint as to the price of oil in Montreal and Quebec, but there are people complaining in other sections, and I do not blame them for it, because I would do the same if the retailers charged me such high prices. The hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) informed me the other day that oil was selling in Dundas at 12½ cents a gallon, which is lower than the other places I have mentioned. That is good for Dundas, and even at that price the retailer is making a reasonable profit. He must get his oil at about 11 cents, and he has a cent and a half per gallon on the oil, and 2 cents per gallon on the cost of the barrel, making 3½ cents per gallon profit, which, on 45 gallons in a barrel, amounts to over $1.57½ per barrel profit. My hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) tells me that the price of oil in his district is 22 cents per gallon. That is a good price. At Essex Centre, oil sells at 15 cents a gallon, but at Ottawa they have been charging 30 and 35 cents per gallon, while every gallon that was sold at that price helped to swell the cry against the oil interests at Petrolea. Oil is delivered in the town of Woodstock at 20 cents a gallon, while away down in Quebec it is retailed at from 15 to 17 cents per gallon, at which place it is delivered without freight charges or leakage for 12½ cents a gallon wholesale. At Winnipeg it is sold at 45 cents a gallon, and at Brandon at somewhere about the same price. At Trenton, ten miles from Brighton, it is sold at 15 cents a gallon, and I have no doubt that nobody complains of the prices there. I am told that if you buy 5 gallons you get it at 12½ cents. The retailers in the city of Toronto were taking a little too much profit out of the consumers, and following agitation, which is doing some good in the country, the prices have come down. I find from an advertisement which I took out of a Toronto paper this morning, and I was very glad indeed to see it, that G. & J. Murray, the largest oil dealers in the city of Toronto—a place which is not a small corner store, but where you can buy one barrel or one thousand if you want to—are selling their best Canadian No. 1 coal oil at 12½ cents per gallon; and they say, "a trial order solicited." That is what is coming out of this agitation. The trade are now fully alive to the state of affairs, and the producers and workmen of the oil district are determined that from this time forward the difficulty shall be remedied. If they were in any way to blame for these prices, I certainly should not be standing here to defend them; but they have been lying back, pumping the wells, supporting their families, and using their earnings for the development of the oil industry instead of putting it into the savings banks; and all the while the censure of the people of Canada has been directed to them because the retail price of oil has been so high. These articles in the "Globe," written by Messrs. Atkinson and Cockin, did a wonderful amount of good. I have been told by manufacturers that since those articles were published they have received a great many inquiries from people who were astonished to find that oil for which they had been paying 18 cents a gallon could be bought from the refiners at 11 or 12 cents per gallon by the single barrel. Here is a copy of a letter which was received by a large refiner in Petrolea:

LODGE No. 1171, PATRONS OF INDUSTRY, COUNTY OF OXFORD,
RATHO, 11th February, 1893.

Your last shipment of refined oil, two barrels, received, and we are well satisfied with the quality and price. We were formerly paying at the stores from 18 cents to 20 cents, and find out now that it was the middleman and retailer who was making the exorbitant profits out of us. So long as the oil men do not combine, but sell at such price, 10½ to 11½ cents by the car lot, and give us good oil when we sell the empty barrel at 70 cents, we have no reason to complain about the oil. If you wish, you are at liberty to use this letter publicly.

We are, yours respectfully,
J. A. HEWITT, President.
JOHN LITTLE, Secretary.

Now, I stated a little while ago that the people of Canada were, on the whole, better served than the people of the United States, so far as prices and quality are concerned. I will give some idea how the Standard Oil Company place their oil in that country, and my authority will not be an anonymous letter, but the "Oil and Drug Reporter" of the United States. In it oil is quoted at 5½ cents at New York for export. With regard to home-trade lots, it says: "They continue in active request and are easy on the basis of 7½ to 7¾ cents a gallon." Now, we are told that we buy American oil for less than these figures. If so, it is because there is a protective tariff in this country, and the Americans want to get hold of the Canadian market, and they sell their oil lower for export to Canada whether they can afford to do so or not. But if we had no protection, would the Canadian farmer get any discount from the American trade? I think the very opposite would be the case. I also wish to call your attention to the fact that in the United States the farmers receive a good deal of the same kind of treatment as our farmers have been receiving in this country, but from different hands. I have no doubt that the retailer there sometimes takes advantage of them, but I know what takes the advantage of them a good deal more. What price they have to pay depends on whether the Standard Oil Company have control of the market or not. I have here some information on that subject, which I obtained by sending a few weeks ago forms of affidavits to a number of people, with the request that they would send them to any of their friends in the States and get them to state therein the price they paid for oil. I am not going to read all the affidavits, but I will quote one so as to give the form:

That I have a correct knowledge of the price at which oil is sold by retail in the city of Minneapolis, and that it is 15 cents per wine gallon.

That is 18 cents per imperial gallon. And this affidavit is sworn to before a notary public. Now, I will give you the prices in some other places, stating in each case the equivalent price per imperial gallon. In the state of Dakota, the price at Watertown is 17 cents and at Auburn, 24 cents: there cannot be that difference in freights. In West Virginia, at Wheeling, it is 18 cents, and 15½ cents at Eureka. At Port Huron, Michigan, oil is selling at 7 cents, while at Bay City, only a few miles distant, in the same State, it is selling at 14½ cents. Now, I have some personal knowledge of this instance, because I was at Port Huron a short time ago, and there I saw a $300 team of horses attached to an oil wagon, on which was brilliantly painted with golden letters, Standard Oil Co. I asked the man in charge of it the price at which he was selling the oil, and he told me 6 cents a gallon. Now, do you suppose that that is a fair price for the oil? Why, no. The Standard Oil Company does this for a purpose. Now, let us go on to Ohio. At Bellaire, in that state, the price is 18 cents a gallon, and at Elmore 14 cents. In Minnesota, at Pipestone, a place of four railways, the price is 18 cents, whereas at St. Paul it is 12 cents. In Wisconsin, at Milwaukee, the price is 14 cents, at Berlin 15½ cents, and at Jefferson 21½ cents, a difference of 7 cents a gallon between Milwaukee and Jefferson. Now, I will come to Newark, New Jersey, which is a little nearer home. There the oil sells at 20½ cents a gallon. I am giving these figures to show that even if we had free trade in oil, we should be subject to just such variations in price as the Americans have to pay.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I find from inquiries that in Maryland, at a place called Cumberland, oil is sold at 18 cents; in the State of New Hampshire, one of the New England States, in which it was mentioned some time ago that no oil was sold over 10 cents. at Tilton in that state, it is sold at 18 cents, and in Springfield, Massachusetts, it is sold at 14½ cents. In Illinois, oil is taken by pipe line as far as Chicago, and at Danville, a city of 40,000 inhabitants, well situated on a line of railway, oil is sold at 24 cents. At Puebla, Colorado, it is sold at 6 cents. That is another of these instances which require explanation, and convinces us that we ought to be careful about letting ourselves fall into the hands of people who are creating these extraordinary prices. Puebla is an oil district not yet under the control of the Standard Oil Company, and that company are waging war against other oil proprietors in that district, and oil which used to sell at 25 cents a gallon a few months ago is now selling at 5 cents per wine gallon, the Standard Company having reduced it to that figure in order to destroy the oil industry in Colorado. As soon as that is accomplished they will be able to raise the price to the figures I have been quoting, from 18 to 24 cents. Coming to Washington Territory I find that in Helena, a large place, oil is selling at 30 cents per gallon. At Seattle it is selling at 30 cents per gallon, and very bad oil it is. I also find that in Alabama—and this is worthy of our most careful consideration—prior to 1888, the district was supplied by a refiner of the name of Rice. The Standard Oil Company made up their minds to control that district, and once they secured control, they raised the prices. I can give you a little interesting history of that, to show you what we may expect if we are going to surrender our industry into the hands of a foreign monopoly. I find that, prior to 1888, the selling price of oil—I give you this from sworn information, which any one will find in the records of the Congressional Committee—at a place called Selma, Alabama, oil was, at the time this war was commenced against the local companies, selling at 15 cents per gallon. That is only one of about twenty-five or thirty places where the Standard acted in that way, in almost every one of which they reduced the price, in order to crush their rivals. I could not be expected to send to every place mentioned in the evidence of Mr. Rice, but I sent to Selma a form of affidavit, asking that it be filled up with the current prices of oil there. Oil there was selling at 15 cents before the Standard began its war. They reduced it down to 8 cents, and now it is raised to 25 cents. That is sufficient proof to show you that the Standard Oil Company will take every means to secure trade and crush out opposition, and will then raise prices; and a fine field Canada would offer them, if they could come in here on the same terms and crush out competition. I have given you Selma; in addition let me give you prices at two or three other places. In Grove Hill, oil is selling at 24 to 30 cents per gallon. In Behman, it is selling at 24 cents per imperial gallon, and oil of the lowest grade at that. These are three places in the state of Alabama in the districts where oil was formerly sold at 16 cents and then reduced to 8 cents by the competition of the Standard Company, and where now it cannot be bought under 24 to 30 cents. If that is what we want, all we have to do is to give an opportunity, and a mighty small one it needs, to the Americans to come in here and take possession of our market. Now, I think I should take the opportunity of telling the House the prices of Canadian oil in Canada. I shall give the wholesale prices at every large point from the east to the west, and then hon. gentlemen themselves can form their own opinion as to what should be a fair price for the retailer to charge. If you find that the retailer along that line is charging more than a reasonable price, all that I ask you to do is not to make the producer, the farmer, so to speak, of oil, who is working at his mines, responsible. I have here a tabulated statement showing, first, the prices to-day, those at which oil is actually selling; and, as those have not been exceeded by more than about half a cent or a cent in the past year or two, the figures are fair ones to go by. At Petrolia to-day the imperial gallon in barrels sells at 10 to 10½; equivalent to wine gallon, in barrels, 8½; imperial gallons, in bulk, 7½; and the American wine gallon, in bulk, 6½. Now, we go along the line and find that in barrels at Hamilton it is 11½ cents; in Toronto, 11½. These prices are freight paid and no leakage. The following is a tabulated list of prices, as it may be convenient for reference:—

WHOLESALE PRICES CANADIAN REFINED OILS.

Now, if such are the prices, I would like to ask the House how much is the Canadian producer or manufacturer using of the duty? Oil in Petrolia is 7½ cents in bulk; the duty is 7½ cents. No person in the House would attempt to say that we are using the smallest fraction of a cent for our own protection. But I will show you shortly why we need the protection and why it would be ruinous to us if it were interfered with. I should inform the House that the prices I gave are for car load lots, but I understand it can be bought at all these points by the barrel, or in five-barrel lots, at from ½ cent to 1 cent in advance of these prices. I think these different figures that I have quoted will enable the House fairly to know whether the fault lies with the producer if the public is being overcharged for a single gallon. When you talk of paying 7½ cents in bulk at Petrolea, or 10½ cents with an allowance back for the barrel if you return it, you must naturally conclude that, with crude oil selling at $1.16 a barrel, the manufacturer has cut prices about as close as he can. Competition between the manufacturers has brought the prices of oil as low as any person can possibly expect, and, when you see that the price is practically the same as the duty itself, you must see that the facts fully confirm what I say and that the Canadian refiner, on these quotations, is not taking any protection whatever to himself. That quality of oil is what is called Prime White Oil, such as I showed you a few moments ago, such as I burn in my house, such as we all burn in our houses—good oil. There is another brand—and it would not be right if I did not explain this to the House—such a brand as is imported from the United States to-day, the very essence of the finest oil that can be made, this brand we make also and it can compete with any oil. I don't care how good it is, made in the United States, though we have to charge 3 cents or 4 cents a gallon more for it than for the prime white. So that you can add 3 cents or 4 cents to the quotations before given, and you have the prices for that oil. Now, I admit that, to a certain extent, the crude men, or the producer, and the oil refiner uses the protection which is given them on that quality. Of the oil that we make there is probably one-sixth of it turned out of that class. Now, who is it that uses that sixth? As a general rule it is used by people who have had a strong prejudice against the ordinary Canadian oil of the past, and who prefer this extra quality and are willing to pay for it. This oil costs the consumer 3 to 4 cents more than he could buy American if it came in free of duty. This extra price is not paid into the treasury, but the industry as I stated use the tariff to that extent—but it must be remembered it is paid by the wealthier portion of the community. But I mean to say, as I said before, that if that wall were down, you would not be able to get that quality of American oil at the price you get it to-day. Well, I am not here to legislate exclusively for the wealthy people of the country. I am here as well to look after the people that have not much—people like myself—poor. We have not many wealthy people up our way; and I have already told you where their capital is invested, but I don't know where it would be if such a resolution as that before the House should carry. There is another class who, to a certain extent, suffer—though I do not call it suffering, because there is a 'quid pro quo.' We do not, for one moment, think that it is possible for the people at the far end of the Dominion to get their oil at as low a price as those who are close by. That is impossible; the laws of nature will not permit it. In the lower province districts, when they buy American oil, they pay a portion of the duty. As the quotations that I have given you show, American oil that is sold for export to Europe or Canada is evidently at about 2 cents or 2½ cents less than the trade prices to the trade in the United States. And so the people in the Maritime provinces have 2 cents or 2½ cents a gallon to start with, and in that view of the case, these gentlemen will have to consider two things. They may be buying American oil to-day. Well, now, I do not say they are not to buy American oil; they are free subjects. But, when I show that we can lay down, in St. John, oil at 12 cents an imperial gallon, paying the freight on it for that distance, I do not really think that they can come to any other conclusion but that that is a fair and reasonable price. These men are, as I said, those who pay a portion of this duty. That duty, you will remember, only applies to a proportion of the Canadian oil—that of the quality I spoke of—and that a small proportion. Now, the imported article brings revenue, and revenues are serviceable—as the Finance Minister can tell you—to the country. And though the revenue raised on oil may not be absolutely equal, man for man, over 4,000 miles, still the difference is not such, I think, that any one need wish to jeopardize, for a moment, an immense industry that exists to-day in the Dominion. Another thing for our consideration is this: Are we not sometimes paying too much in Canada even for American oil? I am told that in town here it is 35 cents to 40 cents a gallon. Now, the letter from the agent of the Standard, Mr. Morris, here, very carefully makes up a statement of the price to bring American oil into this country. He says that, without counting the freight, it costs 15.48 cents to lay American oil down in the city of Ottawa. Now, that, you remember, includes the barrel. The value of the barrel, and half a cent more will pay the freight. The barrel itself is worth, I think, 75 or 80 cents, and adding half a cent on the gallon to that, will allow him $1.20 to pay the freight. Then that lays the oil down here for 16 cents, imperial gallon. Now, I will read an extract from this letter so that the House may be satisfied. It is signed by Mr. W. D. Morris, and he is complaining of the prices, just like the member for West Huron. He says:

The first cost of the oil per wine gallon in Buffalo is 5.50 cents.

I have shown you that is the export price in New York.

The duty is 6 cents, duty on barrel, 8; inspection fee, 6; total wine, 12.90. Add a fifth to make up cost of importation, 2.58.

So he adds his fifth on everything. Total addition, 15.48. Now, let me follow this out logically, if I can. Oil in Ottawa is 35 cents, the cost is 16. Now, you will tell me that 9 cents of that, I suppose, has been paid in duty, and inspection, and duty on the barrel. If you take 16 cents from 35, you have 19 cents left; and 19 cents a gallon profit on a barrel of oil, means $8.50. That is not bad business to go into. The conclusion I want this House to draw is this: I have shown that the price of oil is 35 cents. I will take the Doctor's figures of 9 cents as covering all the improper charges, so to speak, duty and inspection, and that deducted from 35 cents will leave 26. Now, what claim can you make that that oil, with no duty and no inspection, would be sold at less than 26 cents? Then I will ask how you expect to get it any less? Would not the retailer want the same profit, would not the freights be the same, would not every other circumstance be the same? Now, just follow that round. Go down to Montreal. Here is the Montreal "Star" with a picture: On one side is a Canadian woman getting a gallon of oil for 28 cents, and on the other side an American woman getting three gallons for 28 cents. I suppose it is three wine gallons, although the paper does not say so. The inference of the picture and the article in the Montreal "Star" is this, that if we had a reduction of the whole duty the woman in Canada would get her oil for 8 cents. That is the inference, and that is what they say. Now, how could she get it for 8 cents? If it is 28 cents in this country now for a single gallon in Montreal, and you give a bonus to the retailer of the whole duty, or 9 cents to more than cover the whole duty and inspection, he would still be getting 19 cents for the gallon of American oil, which the "Star" says the woman on the other side gets for 8 cents. Just reason it out for yourselves, and you can come to no other conclusion than that the "Star's" figures are misleading. There are places in the States, exceptional places, where you can get it for 8 cents, and I told you one at 5 cents, and I told you another at 6 cents. You cannot go to the States, as a rule, and get oil less than 15 cents in near-by places, and from that to 30 cents in far-off places. Now, I ask this House, before they destroy this industry, to take time and ascertain whether my statements are correct. This whole agitation is, as I said, largely brought about by the desire of a foreign corporation to secure the Canadian market. That foreign corporation has had lobbyists, as the member for West Huron describes them, in the House both sessions, advocating no other interest than the interest of the Standard Oil Company. Now, I do not know anything about the Standard Oil Company further than I have read; and sometimes we get a good deal of information in reading. I find from leading papers on the other side, I find from evidence taken in courts, I find from the decisions of judges of the highest courts in that country—from these sources I find their actions laid bare—and I think I may fairly ask this House, after I have read two or three extracts, whether they desire that our own Canadians should close their works and that the Standard Oil Company should take possession of the trade. If you want that, if you are willing that should be done, it never yet was the Conservative policy, and I do not believe it ever will be. But if you want that done, this motion is in the way to do it. Now, Mr. Rice, of whom I told you a while ago, was a competitor—and he had a right to be a competitor, had he not?—of this monopoly in the States. The monopoly made up their mind that they would close up Mr. Rice, though he was one of the largest manufacturers in that country. The way it is said they took to ruin Mr. Rice is this, and tricks they have played once you need not be at all alarmed but that they will play again. They took the plan of bulldozing the railways with their immense capital. The railways charged Mr. Rice more freight than they did the Standard and gave rebates; so that after Mr. Rice had paid his freights the railway hand back to the Standard Oil Company a large proportion of the freight rates that Mr. Rice had paid them. This was tried before Judge Baxter, a judge of one of the Federal courts, and just let me read you from his decision. He says:

That the Standard Oil Company and George Rice were competitors in the business of refining oil; that each obtained supplies in the neighbourhood of Macksburg, a station on said railroad (the Cleveland and Marietta Road,) from whence the same was carried to Marietta or Cleveland; and that for this service both were equally dependent upon the railroad, then in the hands of the receiver. It further appears that the Standard Oil Company desired to 'crush' Rice and his business, and that under a threat of building a pipe for the conveyance of its oil, and withdrawing its patronage from the receiver, O'Day, one of its agents, 'compelled Terry,' who was acting for and on behalf of the receiver, to carry its oil at 10 cents per barrel, and charge Rice 35 cents per barrel for a like service, and pay it 25 cents out of the 35 cents thus exacted from Rice, 'making,' in the judgment of the receiver, '$25 per day clear money' for it 'on Rice's oil alone.'

The judge dismissed the receiver, and in doing so delivered this judgment. The Standard Oil Co., as all hon. members know, is now a power that hardly any one can withstand; corporations, firms and individuals fall within its power when it makes a march onward. To such an extent does its power extend in the United States that it is able to control railways. I am told that the company holds a controlling interest in 30,000 miles of railway, and the capital of the company is practically unlimited, as will be judged when I say that it is placed at $300,000,000, according to the reports of reliable authorities. I will read to the House an extract from an article from the last number of the "Forum," which is one of the most able publications in the United States. It gives a short history of the manner in which the Standard Oil Co. undertakes to destroy and ruin its competitors. The article also confirms what I have said in regard to the action of the company in crushing competitors and then raising the price, and I do not think I can quote a more reliable authority to the House. The article is written by Mr. Roger Sherman. At page 614, I read as follows:—

In Mr. Dodd's article, as well as in this, the wholesale prices are given, and these are usually of export oil at the harbour of New York. But this is not the price to the consumer. During the period of the Trust, the American consumer of petroleum has paid a very much greater price than 8 cents per gallon, except when it became necessary for the Standard Oil Trust to destroy a competitor by temporarily selling at a low price, sometimes below cost; and when competition was thus eliminated the price was raised. The prices paid by the consumer within and during the past ten years have been as high as 30 cents per gallon at non-competitive points.

It must be remembered that the price mentioned, 30 cents per gallon, is for a wine gallon, which is equal to 36 cents for an imperial gallon, and this has been the price at many points where there has been no competition, or where competition has been killed off. I continue:

Prices have ranged from 23 cents per gallon to 10, and stood at many places at 16 and 18. To-day, at competitive points, the price is often 8, 10 and 12 cents. These facts and figures speak for themselves. In this matter, as in all others, the trust has demonstrated that the reduction of price to the consumer, even where it has been real, has been made "for the purpose of crushing competition, and as soon as the end was accomplished the consumer paid for this short-lived cheapness by an immediate increase of price.

Within the past three years the Standard Oil Trust has entered upon a new system by which it is attempting to seize the ownership of all or nearly all of the oil-producing territory of the country, and add to its gigantic monopoly the only remaining branch of the petroleum industry which it does not fully control. It has organized corporations for drilling wells, acquired by purchase mining rights in vast acreages of land in Indiana, Ohio, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania, paying prices before unknown to the operator and beyond his reach. It is pressing drilling operations with its enormous capital, under conditions of a crude-oil market, of its own making, of about 54 cents per barrel, a price far below the cost of production. I say of its own making, because it is practically the only buyer from the well-owner. It is applying the power of money, acquired by the methods I have indicated, in unlawful and ruinous competition, for the purpose of driving out of the producing department of the business the experienced men who have made wealth for the country during more than a quarter of a century of their active lives. Under the system of individual activity barren spots have been made productive, cities have been built, railways constructed, homes established, and intelligent and prosperous communities have grown up.

That is the exact position which the oil industry of Canada occupies at the present day. It has grown by individual activity. This article shows that the Standard Oil Co. is removing the individual element from the production of oil, and endeavours to control the whole oil region. I hope the House will agree with me that the article I have read fully bears out my statements. I have another article here from which I desire to read an extract, and it bears on the same line. The article I have read shows that the Standard Co. was killing off all competition, and it would matter little the means by which this result was brought about to the unfortunate man who gets squeezed so long as this great and gigantic monopoly gains its point. In March last one of the Standard Oil Trust gave a very handsome present to the Chicago University. It would be imagined that the oil community would be pleased to see a man who made his money honestly and fairly act liberally towards such an institution. But this man does not appear to stand with the Titusville press in the position of being entitled to the thanks of the community. An article in the Titusville "American Citizen," headed "American Standard," says:

Common decency, and the shame which sometimes comes to the most hardened, should have suppressed this publication by the Standard Trust, among the people where are found the victims of the insatiate greed of Rockefeller's Trust. Here are families left to struggle with poverty, because their heads have been driven to suicide by hopeless losses in their business of producing petroleum. Here are men who, by years of patient industry and attention to affairs, had accumulated property sufficient for their needs, and producing incomes ample for their comfort, who stand trembling and broken on the brink of insolvency, not knowing what will yet be the fate of themselves and their families. Here are properties which a few months since were worth in open market hundreds of thousands of dollars, now being sold by the sheriff, at from 10 to 25 cents on the dollar, of their real value. For these things the Standard Oil Trust, of which Rockefeller is the head, is directly responsible.

If we take steps in this House which will give an opportunity to that company to secure a foothold on Canadian soil, we may expect the same treatment as has been extended to communities on the other side of the line. I trust, Sir, and I feel, that this House has no intention of endorsing the resolution now under consideration. Let me tell you something in connection with the Standard Oil Company which is rather remarkable, and which substantiates the argument that I have adduced on this line. The price of refined oil to-day in New York in barrels on board ship, ready for transport to European countries, is cheaper than the price of the raw material. I want to repeat that again, because it is extraordinary, and you have got to look between the lines to understand it. The price of oil in barrels delivered in New York for export to Europe, is 5.30 cents per gallon for refined oil, and the price of the raw material delivered at the same spot is 5.35 cents. Therefore refined oil in bulk is sold at $1\frac{5}{16}$ of a cent less per gallon for export than crude oil at the same spot. How is that? I will tell you. It looks unreasonable, but it is very plain why it is. The Standard Oil Company are the masters of the situation, and you cannot drive them from that position. They own pipe lines to New York through which crude and refined pass. The Tide Water Company had another pipe line, but time and tide wait for no man, between the Standard Oil Company and anybody else, and they are now pooling their receipts. The railway companies between the same points charge identically the same prices to carry crude or refined oil to New York as do the pipe lines, and they all pool together, and the Standard Company has the control. The Standard Company say: We want to do all the manufacturing in this country from our crude oil. There was exported last year of refined oil, 578,414,104 gallons, and of crude oil 103,101,811 gallons. Now, the Standard Company say: If we do not make this into refined oil, whatever country wants crude oil, has got to pay us refined oil prices for it. There is some talk of our getting crude oil into Canada. You can get anything in there as long as you have protection, but the moment you take the duty off, the result would be, that we in Canada would be treated in this matter the same as others are treated. They control in their own country the railway and pipe lines, and as money is no object to them where their business is concerned, ten or twenty millions of dollars would make no difference to them, in order to control the trade; and you would have to pay for crude as much as the price of the refined oil. This is an extraordinary state of affairs, but it goes to show the danger the House would be putting the country in by allowing an American monopoly a foothold which at any time might crush out a Canadian industry and injure the consumers as well. These figures which I have given are unquestionable, and they can be found at page 25 of the "Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter," of the 6th February, 1893. I think it would be well for just a few moments, if we would consider about how heavy this burden is which is supposed to be bearing down this country, and which causes all this alarm. I am told, and I think correctly, that the farmer would not on an average use more than 10 gallons of oil in a year. Now, the farmer and I take the same kind of oil, and neither of us pay a fraction of a cent to the Government because of the protective duty. But suppose for argument's saks that the farmer did pay in one year 2 or 3 cents per gallon on ten gallons of oil it would only amount to 30 cents. I can hardly imagine from that why all this commotion is brought about, except that it is an article on which the specific duty makes the ad valorem look very high. A person looking at the specific duty naturally says, how enormous it is; but then it must be remembered that we do not use it but comparatively to a small extent. I have told you that it is not justice to charge against the oil industry anything that does not belong to it. I am sure if those farmers who are agitating so much against the duty on oil calmly consider the question carefully they would not seek to remove the duty when they found it would jeopardize the oil industry and injure their own interests to such an extent. My hon. friend from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) is here to protect the farmer. The farmer is his client, and, so to speak, he is the advocate for the farmer; but neither he nor any one else can deny that the farmers of this country get more for certain articles than they would if there was free trade with the States. The farmer knows that on the whole he gets more for his beef, more for his pork, and more for his oats, than if we had free trade. Even allowing to be correct the figures of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald), that on account of the duty the farmer pays 3 cents more, that would be 30 cents a year which the farmer would have to pay. But surely that would be balanced by the extra price that he sometimes gets on 10 lbs. of pork alone. The smallest part of a small pig would balance it for a year, and almost the head of a steer would pay for the whole duty, even admitting that the farmer had to pay it. He never saw any year, that he could not pay the duty, even if it were 30 cents, out of the increased price on the sale of ten or fifteen bushels of his oats. The farmer has no cause to complain about the coal oil duty. I never in my experience had an opportunity of explaining it to the farmers without satisfying them that my position was the correct one. Now, I think I have shown, I hope satisfactorily, that on almost two-thirds of the entire consumption in the country, the people of Canada do not pay one iota by reason of the tariff. I think I have shown that Canada has oil enough to supply our wants. At present there is a surplus, and as the demand increases Canada will have oil enough to meet it. When we cannot do that, then will be time enough to interfere with the industry. But until that time arrives the industry claims the protection of a quarter of a century. It requires to be protected from destruction. In our oil districts there are young lads working at the wells who were born on the ground, and whose fathers were born there. It is their heritage; it has grown with them; and so long as there is no combination, nothing but honest competition, I think the last thing that should be done is to take any step that would jeopardize that interest. I have shown you the prices of refined oil in different parts of the country, and I am sure that I have convinced this House that the refiners are not the exorbitant men they have been charged with being by some of the newspapers and by some public speakers. I have given you the prices so that you can make your own calculations; and any one who cannot obtain oil cheap enough from his retailer has only to communicate with headquarters, and the industry will be glad to give him relief. Where retailers ask a price out of all reason, the manufacturer himself will take the matter into his own charge. I have the assurance of many representatives of rural districts in this House, that if prices had been reasonable heretofore, there never would have been a word of complaint, and that if they were reduced to something like the figures which I have shown you exist in some places, there would never be another word of complaint. Now, I have endeavoured to show the House what would be the result of removing the protection from this industry. I think I have shown clearly that the result of the Americans getting control of this market would be that every gallon more of American oil brought into the country, at whatever price it might be sold, would displace a gallon of Canadian oil. In the meantime, while that slow process of extermination was going on, there would be no encouragement for men to continue drilling; the drill of the gentleman who was interviewed yesterday by the hon. member for East Huron would stop. The moment the drilling stopped, the production would stop, and the manufacturer would be unable to get the raw material, because experience shows that he cannot get it from the United States for export to foreign countries unless he pays a higher price for it than the price of the manufactured article. Therefore, to keep our own market we require this protection, not to enhance the price, or to take any advantage of the consumer, but to enable this trade to be carried on in our country, free from any American monopoly. Now, I would like to emphasize what I said in the early part of my remarks, because to my mind it is one of the greatest reasons why this House should not for a moment move in the direction asked for. The price of oil in the United States has never in its history been so low as it is at the present moment. At the time our tariff was reduced, the price in the States was \$2.38 a barrel for crude and 15½ cents a gallon for refined. At the present time the price of crude there is 55 cents a barrel. Under such circumstances the present protection is hardly enough. Oil matters on the other side are in an abnormal condition; oil is practically worth nothing, the price having been run down by the power of the Standard Oil Company. Things may turn, and the price of crude there may go up to a dollar or \$1.50; we cannot tell when it may suit the monopoly to put up the price. For all we know, we may yet strike bonanzas in this country. I myself in the sixties have seen a well flowing at the rate of 5,000 barrels a day. At present our wells are drilled to a depth of 500 feet. A deep test well is now being sunk. I do not pretend to be a prophet, to tell what the result will be; but we are looking to the deeper strata, and I am told by practical men that to grant the concession asked for the resolution would practically bleed the industry to death. Now, some one may say that this statement is exaggerated. Is it not a very strange thing that, selling oil, as we do, at no more than the duty itself, the Americans still hold one-third of the market; and they cannot help holding it just now, because their oil over there costs them next to nothing, and they sell it at a discount on that price. The injury to the people in our district would be something no person can realize, unless he were there. The workmen who have laboured there for a lifetime, many of them, would be thrown out of employment. They would have to leave their savings in a hole in the ground. Their savings bank would be a bankrupt institution; and they could not carry it away. They would have to do, as we say in the territories, take up the well, if possible, and cut it into post-holes. There would be nothing left for the well men or the refiners, if the Canadian market were transferred to a foreign monopoly. Under these circumstances, I would ask that this House, if they have any hesitation in believing what I say, should, at any rate, halt before deciding to make any tariff alterations with regard to this article or removing the restrictions to importation in bulk. I am sure I can ask every gentleman in the House to allow this industry its fullest protection and to await the advent of another Parliament before making any change. If low prices in the United States were to continue as they are for ever, the Canadian people might say: We want a change; but the present condition is only temporary, when we have only got to this point, one year in a thousand, and when this is the only year American oil has been so low, I ask the House to pause and not be in a hurry to do that which they can never remedy again. If you once start this tide in the wrong direction, it would be on your consciences that you had been the cause of ruining hundreds upon hundreds of people and destroying millions of dollars worth of property. I might, perhaps, leave this question now to the House without further argument, but let me say I am a protectionist from first to last. I came here to support a protection Government. Every man has stood by the party since I came, and the large majority on this side represent most unmistakably the sentiments of the Canadian people. This Parliament is strong in its might and it is strong in its right, and I am sure that on this, as on all other occasions, this subject will receive particularly the careful consideration of the House. It may be said that this reduction now asked for, or the removal of the duties on some articles is a small question, but it involves the maintenance of the underlying principle of protection to our native industries on which this Government have secured the continued confidence of the country. Are you to commence to destroy that policy by piecemeal, because a common enemy has accidentally a commodity and can drown us out? Surely this House will carry out the wishes of the people that sent us here, and do nothing in this matter. This House was elected by the people, with all these questions before them at the time; but if, in the opinion of hon. members, circumstances have so changed as to call for a reduction of the tariff on some industries, the House should be in possession of facts sufficient to warrant the carrying out of such changes. In this instance I simply ask the House to pause and wait for fuller information. The statement I have made I believe to be correct, but evidence under oath could be taken and render certain that of which we may now be in doubt; and if there is doubt in the minds of the House whether the oil industry could stand those alterations in the tariff asked for without absolute annihilation or serious loss, I ask the House to halt until next session, when it will be in a better position to say we have got facts now upon which we can deal with this matter. We are under no obligation to the United States, much less to the Standard Oil Company. The tariff across the line was built to protect their own industries, and well do they do it. Ours has been built for the purpose of protecting ours. Ours has accomplished the object the founders of the National Policy predicted, and I say the last thing that should be done would be to break that wall with which we have surrounded ourselves for our own protection. I say that wall should be maintained when it can be done fairly, in the interests of the public, for the purpose of protecting the industries of our country and keeping us in the successful and progressive line that Canada, under the policy of this Government, has followed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I would not take up the time of the House but that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has paid a good deal of attention to some parts of my speech, and, therefore, in justice to myself, I must seek to correct him and defend my statements. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no personal interest in taking the position I do in reference to the coal oil duty. I have no axes to grind, and, therefore, I speak wholly from a national stand-point. I speak as a representative of the consumers of this country. I am not influenced by any monopoly in the United States or Canada, and I think that is little more than my hon. friend can say. I am here to speak on behalf of those who consume the oil and who believe that the tariff rates are too high and therefore cause a higher expenditure to the people than is right and just. I shall not go over many of my figures. The hon. gentleman did not attack them, for they are unassailable. He did not even prove or attempt to prove that the figures in the anonymous article to which he referred were wrong; in fact the limited number of figures he gave went to prove that the man who wrote that article and signed himself "Oil Consumer" was a man of ample intelligence concerning the matter upon which he had written.

Mr. MONCRIEFF.

In order to follow the hon. gentleman I have taken a few notes and I shall deal with his remarks in reference to the statements I have made. He got very wrathful, Mr. Speaker, at one time. In fact I think he worked up his feelings, because I cannot believe he conscientiously thought that he was speaking in the interests of the country, and in order to get up the energy and vim necessary to make his speech, he did as a lawyer whom I once knew, who, when he could not make an impression on the jury, abused the counsel on the other side. And so the hon. gentleman tried to abuse me and to discredit the statements that I made, statements that are in accordance with facts. Now, he said: The hon. member for Huron bases his remarks upon an anonymous letter. Mr. Speaker, that letter was first published in the "Globe" and it was afterwards reproduced by a paper published in a town from which he came, called the Petrolia "Topic," the editor of which is considered a friend and advocate of the interests of the coal oil men. That article was taken from the "Globe" and republished in the paper of the industry's own friends. And not only that, but a copy of the paper was sent to members of the House with the article marked so as to draw attention to it. And would you suppose for one moment, Mr. Speaker, that if the men at the seat of the oil industry were under the impression that these figures were right and sufficiently representative of their case to be quoted in their own paper and distributed to members of this House, that I was not justified in assuming that these figures were put forth by the industry of which we are speaking. There is not an hon. gentleman in this House to-night but will come to the conclusion that I was perfectly justified in using these figures when placed in my hand in that way. But now, Sir, they endeavour to repudiate these figures, because I have shown you beyond a shadow of doubt that these figures were exaggerated. I would ask the hon. member who raised this objection if he sought during his speech of two or three hours to correct these figures or give the figures which, in the opinion of the oil men, were the proper ones to place before this country and before this House. I say it was their duty to place a statement of the industry before this House. It is stated these figures have not been authorized. But if you look at the interviews which took place between the oil men in Petrolia and the "Globe" commissioners, to whom the hon. gentleman who spoke last has paid a high compliment for their fairness and justice in putting the interviews exactly as they took place, you will find it stated that the industry gave employment to 15,000. Others said 20,000, and still others 25,000. The person whose communication appears in this paper said it was 5,680, and the hon. gentleman himself stated upon the floor of this House that it was 2,000. Surely these hon. gentlemen who bring their case before this Parliament should meet and decide upon one set of figures instead of coming before this Parliament and before this country with such diverse figures upon this question. The hon. gentleman tried to prove to this House that I insulted the hon. gentlemen who are here attending to the oil interests in their own behalf. There could be nothing false, and I say that advisedly, and he knew very well, from the words I used, that I made no reflection whatever upon any gentlemen who came here to consult the members upon this question. You can see from the words I used that I cast no reflections whatever upon these hon. gentlemen, for they are hon. gentlemen and have as much right to come here and lobby the members and speak to the members in regard to their interests as I have to stand here and speak in the interest of the consumers of this country. I said :

Every hon. gentleman here knows very well, however, that every industry in the country takes advantage of the duties as far as they can do so. If they did not they would never be here lobbying the members of this House in regard to the tariff.

Is that any reflection, directly or indirectly, upon these men? Are they not here lobbying; are they not here talking up their own interests? And have they not as much right to do so as I have to speak here to-night? The hon. gentleman would make it appear to the House that I was casting a reflection upon these men, and I thrust the accusation back in his face. And again, Sir, he cast a slur, as if I was under the influence of an oil company or any man belonging to it. He asked if I had any communications with the Standard Oil Company or its representatives, in speaking as I did. Would I not have more call to ask if he had any intercourse with an oil company in Canada? I was speaking in my place in this House as a representative of the people and in the interests of the consumers of the country. And if he said that my information came through the Standard Oil Company and that I spoke on their side, I can say that I stand here as a representative of the people, advocating the rights of the people as against the efforts to maintain a burdensome tax, and the hon. gentleman cannot say that he is here in the interests of the consumer. Again, he cast a reflection upon me by saying that I interviewed one of the oil men from Petrolea and got information from him and gave that information to the House. That was wrong. I interviewed no oil man; but an oil man interviewed me. He knew my opinion upon this matter, and we had a quiet conversation together. I said then, as I say now, that he did not compare No. 1 Water White American oil with the highest standard of Canadian oil, and it was not a fair comparison. I said to him: "What do you charge for your No. 1 Water White Canadian oil?" And he said: "For a specific gravity of 7.95 we charge 15 cents in bulk." These were the words made use of by that oil man. It was not a private conversation, for some other members, while we were conversing on this question, came up and took part in the conversation. So I have divulged no private conversation that took place between him and myself. The hon. gentleman reflected upon me to-day, saying that I gave public expression in the House of Commons to a private or confidential conversation. There was no such a thing as a confidential conversation; and I reiterate here now—and perhaps that gentleman is with-in hearing of my voice—that his statement to me was that the price of No. 1 Water White Canadian oil, specific gravity 7.95, was 15 cents in bulk. Now my hon. friend thought I was greatly astray, and he appeared to take some amusement out of it, as if I knew nothing of what I was talking about in regard to the 140,000 barrels that it would take to barrel up the 5,637,000 imperial gallons that we imported last year. Now, Sir, it only requires a school boy to divide 5,637,000 by 40, the number of imperial gallons in a barrel, and he will find it requires 140,000.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Forty-five gallons in a barrel.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Forty, as a rule; there are some larger and some smaller. Now he says that it would not take 250 men to manufacture these barrels. He says a barrel is only worth 30 cents, and shortly afterwards he said that the refiners paid 80 cents for each barrel that was returned by the parties who purchased the oil. If the barrel was only worth 30 cents, how could the refiners pay 80 cents to the man who had sent them back empty after selling the oil? Does he not know that we have cooperages in this country in which the barrel is put up, the hoops put on, the machinery in operation—

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I never said anything of the kind. You are going astray. I said the labour in the barrel was 30 cents; I did not say the whole cost was 30 cents.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Very well, where were the staves prepared? Was there not labour in preparing the staves? Was there not labour in preparing the machinery? Was there not labour in preparing the bolts? Was there not labour required for cutting the staves preparatory to handing them over to the coopers? Now, when we talk about a cooperage, we mean an industry that includes every man in the manufacture, not merely the men who put the barrels together and put in the heads. It appears to me that the man who is living in the very centre of these works does not know how these barrels are made. He says that probably I understand more about medicine than politics. I am glad to say that I do; but I know as much of cooperage matters at Petrolea as he does, because he merely counts as coopers the men who take the staves and put them together and put the hoops thereon, not counting the labour that is employed in getting out the timber and working the machinery. Now, you will find I was perfectly right, and I defy any gentleman to find a single fault in the figures I have used. Then he asks me a question: "Did the hon. member for East Huron look at the protection which the United States has placed upon oil?" That is not my duty. I suppose there are plenty of men in the United States who look after that interest. I am not here for the purpose of looking after the duties placed upon articles by the United States. I do not take my views from the United States; perhaps the hon. gentleman does. Sir, I stand here in the interest of the Canadian people; I stand here in the interest of the Canadian consumer; and, in my opinion, after giving thorough investigation into this question, I have come to the conclusion, yea, Mr. Speaker, and three-fourths of this House have come to the conclusion, that the duty on coal oil is far too high. Now, my hon. friend made a statement in regard to the size of the oil-producing territory. If I did not mistake his figures, he said it was twenty-five miles long and about ten miles wide.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I never used such figures. I said it extended twenty-five miles long, but I said nothing about the width. I said it included about 25,000 acres.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). He said that each acre was worth $200—not for farming purposes—oh, no. The farmers do not make so much out of their ground as to give that value to their land. They have to plod away year after year, but only make a small return, and, therefore, their property is depreciating in value; and, remember, the value of any investment is in proportion to the return therefrom. If the land throughout that territory is worth $200 an acre, the question naturally arises, what has given it such a high value? Because the profits made out of the oil industry with such high protection are such that they can afford to pay $200 an acre; but if it was used for farm purposes they could not pay $50 an acre. That is proof that the oil interest is very lucrative to those who are engaged in it. Therefore, the oil men can afford to pay $200 an acre, but the farmer can only pay $50, and the man who pays $50 not only receives a small return upon that $50, but he is burdened down by a high duty in order to pay over to these parties that are engaged in that industry, profits that will enable them to pay $200 per acre for the land which they use in that way. Now, my hon. friend has gone into some other figures. He says there are 6,500 wells. Now, it is a wonder to me that these men have not agreed upon a certain number of wells. One man, in his interview with these commissioners to which I have referred, said there were 7,000 wells. Another who has written that letter to which I have referred, says there are 8,000 producing wells. Now, comes another man, supposed to be an expert upon this question, and he says there are only 6,500. Now, which of these statements are we to take? Does it not show that none of them understand this matter, or know their own business? But let us take 6,500 wells. Some of these oil producers tell me each well produces one barrel a day on an average; others tell me each well produces three-quarters of a barrel, and a third gentleman tells me they only produce one-half a barrel. I think it is fair to take the medium, three-quarters of a barrel. Now, three-quarters of a barrel from each one of the 8,000 wells would be 600 barrels a day, and multiply that number by 300 working days in the year, and we have 1,800,000. Now, what are the facts? I can show you here from a return that there are only 795,000 barrels of crude oil produced altogether. Does that not show to every intelligent mind what divers representations are made in regard to this matter? And it shows, too, that their representations are probably two and a half times larger than the actual product from the petroleum wells in the county of Lambton. Let me give to the House some other figures. The hon. gentleman who spoke a short time ago paid a compliment to Mr. J. E. Atkinson for representing matters as they were in Petrolea. The hon. member said that every small holder of a lot, when he had accumulated $400 or $500, sank a well and then got it attached to a jerker for the purpose of pumping, and he got his own money back in one year. Does not this statement show the extraordinary profit derived from these wells? Does any member of this House who invests $500 or $600 obtain a return of his money within one year from any investment? If the well produces only one-half barrel daily, the investment is returned in full within two years, and during every subsequent year several hundred dollars are received from the investment of $500. The more hon. gentlemen speak on this question and the more figures they bring before the House, the more I am convinced that they have not been fair with Parliament or the country in submitting statistics. But that is not all. Some men have said that this industry gives employment to 15,000 people. That is the information given to the commissioners sent by the Toronto "Globe." Others have placed the number as high as 20,000 and even 25,000, and the persons from whose letters I quoted the other night gave the number as 2,689, and the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) has to-night declared that the industry gives employment to 2,000 men. Would it not be well if those gentlemen would meet and settle their figures, instead of my being compelled to lose time and breath in correcting their statistics for them? What is the whole burden of their complaint? It is the Standard Oil bogey. Every line of argument they have taken from the beginning to end of this discussion will equally apply to every other industry in the country. Each industry is afraid that outside manufacturers will flood the country with their products, and the coal oil industry is afraid that the country will be flooded with the American product, and, because they entertain this fear, they expect the general consumers should be willing to be burdened with duties amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars annually so as to give high protection to this industry. The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) stated that coal oil imported, without payment of duty, into Ottawa would cost from 24 to 26 cents per gallon. The hon. gentleman must have been astray in his calculations, in view of figures I will submit, and for which I challenge criticism. The cost of all the oil imported last year in bulk was $471,900. Cost of inspection gave $56,371. The profits paid to importers, at 20 cents, would be $105,612, and the profits of the retailer, $233,469, or a total cost, after having paid inspection and handling by importer and retailer, to the consumer, of $887,142. Dividing that sum by 5,637,149, the total quantity imported, the price will be 15 cents as the price at Ottawa, and if you add 1 cent for freight, the price will be 16 cents, instead of 24 or 26 cents as mentioned by the hon. gentleman. I have no desire to detain the House longer. I have answered the objections brought forward against the arguments and statistics I submitted, and I repudiate the reflections attempted to be cast on my figures. I have nothing to say against the oil interest or against the men employed in it, in fact I have nothing but good words to say for them. I am not here, however, to discuss their interests, but rather to watch and guard the interests of my constituents and of the consumers at large, irrespective of any influence of any party or body that may be brought to bear on me. The welfare of my constituents and of the people of this country are far more dear to me than any influence that may be brought to bear on me by other interests, and, therefore, what I have said has been said in the interests of the country at large and not influenced by the Standard Oil or any other oil combination, and I have spoken freely and honestly my own opinions.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Mr. EDGAR moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

PREFERENTIAL TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the First Minister, of which I have given private notice, whether it is the intention of the Government to endeavour to secure the co-operation of the other British colonies in urging upon the Imperial Government the adoption of a policy of preferential trade between the Empire. If so, how soon will the Government take steps to secure such co-operation, and what are the steps the Government have in contemplation?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is the intention to invite the co-operation of the other colonies and to call their attention to the movement in Canada in that direction as soon as possible.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. FOSTER moved:

That the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

He said: In rising to move that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means, it becomes my duty, in the first place, to make, as briefly as I possibly can, consistent with plainness, a statement of the operations of the preceding year, and of the current year, so far as we have overtaken it. In doing so, I desire, without further ceremony or prelude, to state that in March last, when I had the honour of making my financial statement in this House, I estimated that the revenue which would accrue during the year would be as follows:—

Mr. SPROULE.

Customs.....	$20,500,000
Excise.....	7,900,000
Miscellaneous.....	8,265,000
Total.....	$36,665,000

The actual receipts were as follows:—

Customs.....	$20,501,059
Excise.....	7,945,097
Miscellaneous.....	8,475,715
Total.....	$36,921,871

showing a very slight excess of $1,059 in Customs; an increase of $45,097 in Excise, and an excess of $210,715 in Miscellaneous. So that, whereas the total estimate for that period was $36,665,000 the total receipts were $36,921,871, being an excess of receipts over estimates of $256,871. The following were the receipts during the preceding year of 1890-91:—

Customs.....	$23,399,300
Excise.....	6,914,850
Miscellaneous.....	8,265,160
Total.....	$38,579,310

This shows a decrease in Customs receipts during 1891-92, as compared with 1890-91, of $2,898,241; an increase in Excise of $1,030,247, and an increase in Miscellaneous of $210,555, or a total of receipts in 1891-92 of $36,921,871, as compared with a total of $38,579,310 in 1890-91, showing a total decrease of $1,657,439. Coming to Excise, the changes are considerable, as shown by the following table:—

	1890-91. Quantity.	1891-92. Quantity.	1890-91. Duty Accrued.	1891-92. Duty Accrued.	Increase.
Spirits	2,708,841	2,578,973	$3,544,191	$3,873,801	$329,610
Malt	Lbs. 57,909,201	46,425,882	588,593	928,517	339,924

Tobacco and snuff	Lbs. 9,688,643	9,872,166	1,869,895	2,356,004	487,009
			6,662,433	7,846,107	1,183,674

The increased duty in spirits, as shown above, is due to the increased Excise placed upon them. The per capita consumption of Excise articles—the average of the whole country—has been always given, and I give it here as well:

	Spirits.	Beer.	Wine.	Tobacco
	Gals.	Gals.	Gals.	Lbs.
Average for 1867	1 134	2 739	139	2 130
do 1890-91	745	3 790	111	2 292
do 1891-92	701	3 516	101	2 291

Generally, with regard to these different items of the revenue, it may be interesting for the House to know that, comparing 1891-92 with 1889-90, taking the full years before and after the increase and reduction of duty respectively, the imports in 1891-92 were $116,978,943, against $112,765,584 in 1889-90. But the duty accruing last year was only $20,550,581, as compared with $24,014,908 in 1889-90. Thus, though the imports for home consumption last year as compared with the years 1889-90, were $4,213,359 greater, the duty collected was $3,464,327 less, or, in round figures, the Customs taxes were three and a half millions of dollars less than in 1889-90. The per capita Customs burden in 1889-90 was $5.01, and in 1891-92 $4.25, being a reduction per head in the burden of taxation of 76 cents. The duty per cent of dutiable and free goods in 1889-90 was 21.21; last year it was 17.56, a reduction of 3.65 in the rate of duty. It is as well to state here in carrying this a little further, that the total duty collected in 1891-92 from Customs was smaller than in the year 1882 by one and one-fifth millions, than in 1883 by two and one-half millions, than in 1887 by two millions, and than in 1889-90 by three and one-half millions of dollars, showing that the contention is true that the present Government, in the furtherance of its policy, is from year to year materially reducing the taxation of the country. In making the changes in the tariff in June, 1891, I estimated a loss upon the average consumption of sugar of $3,500,000 in our revenue. I estimated a gain from the Excise duties of $500,000 on malt, $600,000 on spirits and $400,000 on tobaccos. But the increase has not come up to the estimate. The increased gain in malt was $339,924, in spirits $329,- 610. In tobacco the estimate was exceeded. Whereas the estimate was $400,000, the increase has been $514,140. The total increase from these higher Excise duties was $1,183,674. In order to meet these higher Excise duties to some extent, the duties on imports of these articles were slightly increased. The result was not to increase the revenue, for, although we received an increase in ale and porter of $27,136, and in spirits and wines of $12,874, we had a decrease in imported tobaccos of $56,308, so that the total decrease in Customs amounts to $16,298 so far as these increases were concerned. Therefore, as regards the increases and losses which were estimated, the revenue has gained less from the impositions upon malt and spirits, and we have lost more than I have estimated by taking off the duties upon sugar, on account of the increased consumption as shown by the following table :

SUGAR CONSUMPTION.

Year.	Lbs.	Value.	Duty.
		$	$
1888-89.....	223,841,171	5,837,895	3,675,724
1889-90.....	174,045,720	5,186,158	2,851,547
1890-91.....	197,163,919	5,005,397	3,138,894
1891-92.....	345,418,485	9,082,523	77,828

The figures indicate a consumption as per customs returns for 1891-92 of an average of about 70 pounds for each man, woman and child in the Dominion. So that if we had kept the same taxation upon the sugar for 1891-92 which ruled in the preceding year, instead of $77,828, we should have got $5,418,918. That is to say, at the same rate of consumption, we have actually removed from the taxation of the country five and one-third millions of dollars.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why didn't you do that ten years ago ?

Mr. FOSTER. Don't be in too great a hurry ; always make haste slowly. Deducting one million dollars of Excise which we added and which accrued from the increased Excise duties, the net decrease in taxation was four and one-third millions of dollars, which amounted to 90 cents per head of the total population. Now, it is fair to say that if the remission had not been made it is not probable that the consumption would have been quite so high, for the cheaper the product the greater the consumption ; that is notable in the case of tea and sugar, and articles of that kind. It is, however, true that in taking off the duties upon raw sugar we have remitted to this country, upon an actual necessary consumption of sugar, an amount of money in the neighbourhood of $5,000,000 during the last year. While on that point it may be just as well to make a statement in order to contrast the two policies, in order to meet to a certain extent, an assertion which is often heard, that the system of taxation and the amount of taxation as it bore upon certain classes, was less under the administration of our predecessors than under our own. Let me add this further statement : that we collected on coffee in 1892, $7,177 ; but if the same duties had been paid upon the coffee consumed in this country last year as was placed upon coffee under the preceding administration, instead of the people having paid $7,177 they would have paid $66,746. Duty on tea was last year paid to the amount of $8,265. If the same rates of duty had been paid last year as were paid under the preceding administration the country would have paid on the same consumption of tea $1,266,233 instead of $8,265. In the matter of rice, which is also the poor man's food, we paid last year $80,762 ; but if the duties in force under the preceding administration upon the article of rice had been paid last year, instead of that amount the people would have paid $229,820. In sugar, as I have stated, the duty of 1892 was about $77,000, whereas under the rate of taxation existing under the preceding administration, the duty paid would have been $4,433,109. That is to say, on these four articles alone, coffee, tea, rice and sugar, the country paid last year $172,463 ; under the rate of taxation, upon a similar consumption, of the preceding administration, they would have paid $6,000,905. Under the two rates of taxation the savings to the people in these articles alone last year was $5,828,442. There is no dispute that in the case of every one of these articles every dollar of that taxation would have come out of the pockets of the consumer, because it is upon materials which are not grown in this country. With reference to receipts from Miscellaneous, I may say that last year they were the largest since Confederation, amounted to $8,475,714, as against $4,533,073 in 1878, $4,075,907 in 1873, and $1,978,247 in 1867 ; that is, the increase in earnings from 1867 to 1873 amounted to $2,088,660 ; in 1878 the earnings further increased by $457,166 ; in 1892 they had increased over 1878 by $3,942,641, an increase of 87 per cent. I come now to speak for a few moments of the expenditures for the last year. The estimated expenditure in March last was $36,650,000 ; the actual expenditure was $36,765,894, an increase over the preceding year of $422,327 on Consolidated Revenue Account alone. The increases, as will appear from the following table, took place in the following items of expenditure :—

The actual expenditure on Consolidated Fund Account last year, when taken from the total revenue of last year, left a small but convenient surplus on that account, of $155,977. The increase, as I have said, over and above the preceding year's expenditure on that account, was $422,327. But the total increase, and more nearly and entirely to the increased cost of legislation, owing to the abnormal length of last session. Last year we paid for a session of Parliament of 219 days, at a cost of $1,302,876. The preceding year, which was also a longer session than usual, we paid for 155 days, to the amount of $596,486. Taking the preceding year as an abnormally long session, and deducting its cost from the session of last year, we find, as I have said, that the increase was $706,390; that is, the increased expenditure and $300,000 in addition, were due entirely to the abnormal length of the session, over which, of course, the Government had no control, and for which we are bound to maintain that the Government gave no occasion. Taking the expenditure for a series of years, from 1887-88 down, we find the following facts: The total expenditure on Consolidated Fund in 1887-88, was $36,718,494. The average of the five years following that period was $36,547,964. Last year it was $36,765,894. So that it may be stated broadly that from 1887-88 up to the present time, there has been almost a dead level of expenditure on Consolidated Fund Account, and that this year, but for the abnormal length of the session, would have shown a decrease to about $36,000,000, or a decrease from 1887-88, of $700,000. Under this state of facts it cannot be contended, as it is often asserted, and it cannot be proved, as the statement is often made, that this Government is rolling up the yearly expenditures of the country. On the contrary, they have been kept at a dead level, and but for the abnormally long session of last year, would have shown a decided decrease over a period of six years. Leaving the expenditure on the Consolidated Fund Account, let us see what was the result of the expenditure on capital account for the last year. Taking it in brief, I find that on capital account, excluding railway subsidies, we spent last year $2,165,700, as against $3,115,859 in the preceding year, a saving in expenditure, or a lessening in expenditure for last year over the preceding year in that regard, of $950,159. Taking in the railway subsidies and treating that expenditure as on capital account, we spent last year $3,413,915 as against $4,381,564 in the preceding year, a saving in this expenditure of nearly $1,000,000 as compared with the preceding year. The course of the capital account since 1887-88 has been continuously downward, commencing in that year with an expenditure of $4,437,460; in the second year, 1888-89, $4,420,313; in the third year, 1889-90, $4,053,150; in 1890-91, $3,115,860; in 1891-92, $2,165,700, the average of these five years being $3,638,436, the expenditure for the last year coming beneath the average of the last five years by $1,472,796, and being less than the expenditure of 1887-88 by $2,271,760. Taking the expenditure on Consolidated Fund Account and the expenditure on capital account, we find this state of things: that whereas the over-expenditure on the first was $422,327, the under-expenditure on the second was $967,649, making the total expenditure on Consolidated Fund and capital account, last year, $545,322 less than the preceding year, thus again substantiating the fact that the expenditures of this country are year by year diminishing instead of growing larger. With respect to the debt of the country, it will be remembered that for two or three years I have been able to chronicle a very small addition to the debt. I am not able to do that this year. Having taken off the large revenue which accrued from sugars, and having offset that only by about one-third of its loss; we have had less surplus to draw from for our capital expenditure, and consequently had to meet a larger amount of capital expenditure out of borrowings. So, whereas in 1889 the net debt was $237,530,041, in 1890 $237,533,211, in 1891 $237,809,030, in 1892 it rose to $241,131,434, being an increase over the preceding year of $3,322,404. But this increase in the debt is more apparent than real, which will appear from these considerations. Of that increase, $970,000 arose from the cancelling of the North Shore Railway bonds, which before this year stood as assets for the country, although they produced no revenue, and although, under the peculiar arrangement which was made, they could have by no possibility produced revenue in years to come. They have been written off. That adds to the increase of debt the amount of $970,000, which, as I have said, is apparent and not real, so far as any benefit to the country as a producing asset is concerned. Then, again, we went last year on the market for a loan, and, as the hon. gentleman who sits opposite me knows, loans, if they are put on the English market at low rates of interest, sell at a discount. The loan that was put on the market last year was at 3 per cent, and, although under all the circumstances it realized more than we could have expected, and although, in comparison with all other countries seeking money last year we stood in the vantage ground, with the exception of Great Britain herself, which has, of course, great advantages, we yet sold that loan at a discount, and the amount of the discount became an addition to the capital account in the shape of an addition to our debt. It is, however, as I have said, more apparent than real. If it had been put on the market at the rate of 3 per cent, there would have been no discount, and there would then have been no debit to the capital account of the country. We would have paid the same in the end, but it would have been paid in the increased yearly interest, which would have come out of the Consolidated Fund and not have been charged to capital; but the discount on the loan, as the discount on all loans, has been charged to capital account, and so adds, as I have said, $1,122,541 to the apparent increase of debt on capital account. With these explanations, which are meant simply to explain and modify, but not at all to do away with the fact which appears in our accounts, and which will always appear in our accounts, we have added $3,322,404 to our debt during the past year. It is important that, in the interest of truth, the explanations should go along with the statement. They are meant to do just what they are meant to do and no more, to explain but not to palliate. It will be remembered that three or four years ago I made the statement that I thought we had reached the time when we should call a halt as regards the increase of the debt of the country, and that I thought I saw from that point of time the possibility of raising our revenues without increased taxation, and meeting therefrom the necessary services of the country, of laying up the yearly amount for the sinking fund, and of making a fair capital expenditure year by year, and of accomplishing that without adding to our debt. That promise or that prophecy was literally fulfilled up to the past year. It could not be fulfilled after that, because we took millions of dollars from our revenue in remitting the taxation upon raw sugar, which changed the aspect of affairs, and consequently we had to draw on loans for a certain amount of our capital expenditure. If, however, we had kept the duty on sugar, instead of having had this increase to the capital debt of the country of which I have just spoken, we would, from the revenue which would have accrued from sugar, not only have kept the debt from increasing, but we would have diminished the total net debt of the country by about $2,000,000. So that my promise made at that time, was upon the set of circumstances then existing, and that it has not been literally fulfilled this year is because the Government thought it better to remit this enormous amount of taxation to the people of to-day, and to make the people of future years pay their proportion of the amount that was necessary for the capital works of the country, over and above what we can spend and spare of current revenue. As to the receipts for the current year, I find that from July of last year to 31st January of this year, the income has been $21,772,600, as compared with an income last year of $20,716,451. That is an increase in receipts of about $1,000,000, as compared with the last year. Last year, we received in the second half of the year $16,205,420. If we receive that same sum this year, which is a little doubtful, the whole revenue of the country will amount in the present year to a little more than $38,000,000. The expenditure of the present year, up to 31st January, is $19,189,893. The expenditure for the same period last year was $19,817,325. The expenditure in the last five months of the last year was $16,948,562. If the same rate of expenditure is observed during the last half of this year, we shall have expended $36,500,000, or thereabouts; but I am not at all certain that the same rate of expenditure can be observed. We are, for instance, to pay additional interest upon our loans; we are to pay, I do not know how much, but a pretty round sum, for fitting up the quarantine facilities of the different ports of the country; and these two amounts, as will appear from the Supplementary Estimates, soon to be brought down, will swell by a very considerable amount the calculated expenditure of the current year in its last half beyond what was the expenditure during the last half of last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. These figures, I suppose, are up to the 31st January?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Then again, we are spending more heavily on capital account for the purpose of finishing our canals. The Sault Ste. Marie Canal, which was begun about a year and a half ago, is being pushed forward to completion with all possible speed, so that, during this year, the expenditure will far exceed the expenditure of last year. All these things make me cautious about giving a forecast as to the result of the year, at this early period in the year. However, I think I may say this: That we will, out of the current income of the present year, pay all expenditures on account of Consolidated Fund and have a good balance to apply to capital account; whether or not it will meet the whole of the capital expenditure upon canals I cannot at this period of time say. This much is gratifying, that for seven months of the year, however, the revenues so far, are nearly $1,000,000 greater than they were during the corresponding period of last year; while the expenditures up to the present time are considerably less than during the corresponding months of last year. It is not necessary for me to explain to the House—the House is well aware of it already—that in order to meet the extra expenditure upon capital account, and to take up the temporary loans which had been running, a loan had to be put upon the British market. That is fully explained in the Public Accounts, and it has also been explained to the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not very fully explained, in one point; you do not state the allowances that were made, what the loan actually netted.

Mr. FOSTER. That is stated in the accounts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not in detail.

Mr. FOSTER. The items may not be in detail, as the items very seldom are. However, suffice it to state that a loan was put on the market for £2,250,000; that the price fixed was £91, and that the realization was £92 0s. 10^d. The loan was subscribed three times over or more; but what was a more gratifying feature of the last loan was this: that the number of individual subscribers to the loan was very much greater than in any former experience of loans that we have put upon the British market. The applicants numbered about 420, as compared with 367 for the issue of the £4,000,000 loan in 1888, a loan which was nearly twice as large. That, I think, shows a widened public interest in the financial affairs of Canada, and an increased confidence in the securities that Canada puts upon the British market.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman had the particulars it would be a convenient time to state them. They were usually stated on such an occasion by his predecessors. If he has not he might lay them on the Table later.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the particulars at hand; but I can tell my hon. friend, in brief, what they are. We paid to those who negotiated the loan the exact commissions which were laid down in our contract. We paid to the brokers, as we had always done, one-quarter per cent. There were no charges outside of that, except slight amounts for printing and the like.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What were your allowances; when was the loan made payable?

Mr. FOSTER. Was that not detailed in the Public Accounts?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not see it.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not remember the discount terms just now, but I will bring it down. It was nothing more than the spreading of the loan and the usual discount. I desire for a moment to call the attention of the House to the improved condition of things, so far as indicated by the savings of the country, and the position of the Savings Banks. It will be within the memory of the House, that on the 1st October, 1889, the new Order in Council went into force which reduced the interest allowed on deposits in the Savings Banks from 4 per cent to 3¹/₂ per cent. That, and perhaps other causes, led to an increase in the amount of withdrawals from the Savings Banks, which will be shown when I read the balances in the different years. On the 30th June, 1889, there was a balance of $42,956,357. On the 30th June, 1890, that balance had decreased to $41,012,465; and in 1891 it had decreased to $39,400,026; being a total decrease during these two years, of $3,556,330 as regards the Savings Banks alone. In 1892 matters began to mend, and that year shows an increase in the total balances in the Savings Banks of $129,521; a small increase but upon the right side. However, the six months of the current year show an increase in the balance of $443,210, which at the same rate would be equivalent to pretty nearly $1,000,000 during the year, which shows that the tide has turned, so far as the deposits in the Savings Banks are concerned, that the drain upon them has ceased and has turned into an increasing surplus. As regards the total savings, as shown by the deposits in the different Government Savings Banks, in the chartered banks, in the City and District Savings Bank and in La Caisse d'Economie, they amounted on the various dates named to the following figures:—

	30th June, 1878.	30th June, 1888.	30th June, 1891.	30th June, 1892.	1st December, 1892.

These figures show that the normal increase in the general savings of the country, as denominated and defined in the deposits in these different banks, is maintained. I now come, for a moment, to speak of the commerce of the country during the past year. I am not going into the internal or domestic commerce or trade of the country, because, first, of the time that it would take, and, secondly, because, I am sorry to say, of the unfortunately defective statistics which we have with reference to our internal trade. That is found in every country. It is probably found in our country now more than it will be in the future, for I sincerely hope, and I believe it will be found to be the fact, that the new Minister of Trade and Commerce will devote himself particularly to the task of devising some method of obtaining statistical information, whereby the country shall be apprised of that most important of all the branches of its national life, its internal commerce and production. However, if we can judge from signs which come to the surface, the internal commerce of the country, during the past year, has kept in advance of that of the preceding year and maintained a fair percentage of increase. Taking our railway returns, which are a fair index, and our returns of shipping and tonnage, which are also a fair index, they both show a considerable increase in 1891-92 over the preceding year. The railways show an increase in the miles operated of 578, in the passengers carried of 364,697, in the tons of freight carried of 661,061, and in the freight earnings of $3,539,751. This shows that freight has been carried in increasing quantities, and that, therefore, there must have been an increased trade. As regards water-borne freight, we find a small, but, at the same time, satisfactory, percentage of increase. But it is when we come to the foreign trade of the country, where our statistics are fairly extensive and reliable, that we find the largest increase as indicated by the figures to which I shall ask the attention of the House. In view of the controversies which have been going on in regard to this subject, I have thought it well to present the figures of foreign trade for 1878, 1891 and 1892 :

It will be seen that while there was a loss of trade with the United States of about $2,000,000 in 1892, that was more than compensated—seven times compensated—by an increase of $15,000,000 in our trade with Great Britain. It is sometimes stated that our trade with other countries in the world is not satisfactory. It is true that with the United States and Great Britain we do the most of our business ; but a comparison of the above figures shows that we are gradually, and in some instances rapidly, increasing the area of our commerce with other countries. The record I have given is, I think, one which is encouraging to the House, and which will be encouraging to the country, as showing a gradually-widening, and, to a certain extent, although as yet small in its entire amount, a rapid development of trade with the other great countries of the world. The record of our trade for last year is one which you may search our returns through in vain to find equalled. This shows an increased trade with Great Britain in 1892, over 1891, of $15,000,000 ; with France, one-fifth of a million ; with Germany, two and a fifth millions ; with Holland, one-half a million ; with the West Indies, one and a third million ; with China and Japan, one and a tenth million, and with other countries, one and a half million, besides a small increase with Italy and Newfoundland, whilst the only large decrease we had was with the United States, of two and seven-tenths millions. Therefore, I state again, that the condition of our foreign trade shows strongly in 1891-92 in our favour, and I believe it will be received by this House and by the country as an answer to the oft-made and baseless assertion, that the trade of our country is stunted and retrograde. Coming to the home products, the exports of Canada of these during the last year, as compared with 1892, show the following results:—

	1892.	1891.
Produce of the Mine.....	$5,906,471	$5,784,143

Total.....	95,684,253	$5,757,744

Increase..... $9,926,509
do per cent..... 11½

That is a large increase in a single year. The increase in farm products alone goes to prove the assertion we make, that the farmers of this country are yearly producing more and finding larger and remunerative markets, and in this respect we can stand comparison with the producers of the rest of the world. More we cannot expect. We are in this world, in this age, united in a great commercial bond with the peoples of other countries, all of us governed by the common wants of the world, and kept in close and constant communication by means of the telegraph wire and rapid transit, so that the world's wants and the world's yield are at once known and the prices of great staples fixed accordingly. Taking that into consideration, the increase of $21,000,000 in the exports of farm products alone, during the past year, is a very gratifying extension in our trade. I wish to speak now for a moment about the diversion of trade, and there is one point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House and the country with regard to the tariff and our farmers. Everyone knows that about two or three years ago the duties upon farm products, bacon, ham, shoulders of beef, mutton, pork and lard were rearranged. At that time it became patent to the country that large supplies of these articles were coming in from the United States and displacing farmers' products in this country, and the Government came to the help of the farmers, at their request, and raised the duties upon these articles. What happened? Whereas in 1890 33,000,000 pounds of bacon, beef, mutton, pork and lard were brought in from the United States and distributed in this market, the importation fell, in 1891, to 17,000,000, and in 1892 it fell to 13,000,000; and whereas in 1890 the value of the importation was $1,734,000, in 1891 it fell to $973,000, and in 1892 to $723,000. The following table shows the particulars:—

IMPORTS into Canada from the United States for the following Years ended 30th June, 1890, 1891 and 1892, of the following Articles:—

	1890.	1891.	1892.	Decrease from 1890.
	Lbs.	Lbs.	Lbs.	Lbs.
Bacon, hams and shoulders.....	4,344,200	2,561,044	1,008,068	3,336,132

Value.....	$1,729,403	$968,568	$723,081	$1,006,322

That is, the decrease from 1890 made a market for our own farmers in this country by the exclusion of those products from the United States to the value of over $1,000,000. So that you have to take this into account: that not only did our farmers increase their exports by the amount I have named, but that they had in the home market an increased sale to the extent of over $1,000,000, required to supply the country in place of the American products, which were excluded from the United States, so that they obtained an enlarged market at home as well as an additional market abroad.

Mr. McNEILL. That shows the advantage of protection.

Mr. FOSTER. As to the diversion of trade, let me read to you the figures of 1891-92, with reference to some products of Canada exported to Great Britain, in order to make a comparison. Horned cattle fell off nearly $1,000,000, owing to circumstances well known. Leaving that out of account, we find some very encouraging items. Canadian cheese, apples, and bacon have made their place in the British market. Canadian butter had also made a place for itself, but not a very enviable one; but under the operations of the Dairy Commissioner and the dairy stations, which have been established by the Government to stimulate the production of a better quality, the quality of Canadian butter has been raised; it has been put upon the market in uniform quality, stamped as Canadian butter, making its own way, and comparing 1891 with 1892 we find that, whereas in 1891 only $440,060 worth of Canadian butter was exported to Great Britain, last year $877,455 worth found a place for itself in the British market, being an increase of 99 per cent. The following table speaks for itself:

By the way, if you look into the Trade Reports you will find that the price of eggs—that much abused article—exported to the British market is one cent and a fraction per dozen higher in value than those exported to the American market. It is well that these figures should be noted and should be spread before the public, in order that they may see the actual expansion and the possibilities of the market in Great Britain for the products which they raise; and I wish to give also this statement, showing the increase in three of the great articles of Canadian export which have had their reputation made for them, and which have been consecutively and skillfully placed on the British market—cheese, cattle and apples, and also the exports of the great division of our products:

This would keep up the train and trend of the thought I have been developing of the gradual and steady progress of the country in its external trade, and particularly in its exports. So much with reference to the commerce of Mr. FOSTER.

the country. I may not have succeeded in developing much interest with the hon. gentlemen opposite, or at least with some of them, in my figurative remarks; but now I come to the tariff; and, as I approach the tariff, I notice that my hon. friends' interest deepens. I wish to state a few things with reference to the tariff and the tariff policy. No man with his eyes open would think for a moment of denying the fact that there is more or less agitation in the country with reference to the tariff and to trade conditions. One person will notice it from one stand-point, another from another stand-point. We may not all take statesman-like views; but, whatever views we take, this much is true, and we admit it, that there is an agitation on this matter, and that people are alive to the discussions upon trade policies and to discussions upon tariffs, and to the question what is to be the guiding policy now and for the future. Several things have conspired to make the agitation upon the tariff in this country possibly deeper to-day than it has been for a number of years. Will the House permit me to mention a few of these? In the first place there is a difference in view on the question of principle which has existed ever since we have been a country, which came to a point of cleavage direct and sharp in 1878, between those who believe that a free trade policy out and out is the proper policy for this country, let the revenue take care of itself, or take care of the revenue in whatever way you can; those who believed that a tariff for revenue purposes with incidental protection was the thing for this country, making the revenue the prime consideration, and distributing it so as incidentally to protect the industries of the country, and the third class of people, who believed that for Canada, under the conditions then existing, and which have existed since the principle of a sufficient and reasonable protection to the nascent industries of the country was to be followed first, and that revenue was to take care of itself on that line. Those were the three great schools of thought. We do not expect that because in 1878 one school of thought triumphed and concentrated its opinion in the tariff, but that to a large extent they are nourished to-day, as in 1879. Changes there have been. Men who believed in free trade have come to believe in protection. Maybe it has happened that some who believed in protection have come to believe in free trade, or a revenue tariff with incidental protection, or something of that kind. But the differences which existed then are differences which exist now, and they contribute to the agitation and discussion of the question at the present time with a vivacity probably greater than at former periods, from circumstances which I shall mention afterwards. Then again, there is an agitation evoked by dissatisfaction in regard to changes in the tariff in respect to relative or absolute protection which arise from various circumstances, for instance, in the differences in value that have arisen from 1878 to the present time. Whether specific duties alone or specific and ad valorem duties are placed upon these goods, the differences in value through a series of years change the amount and incidence of protection. Dissatisfaction has arisen also from the fact of raw materials being in some cases cheapened, and in such cases the protection which was fair when raw materials were higher in price, becomes a little more than fair when raw materials lower in price. Out of all these reasons and others there might arise discussion and thought and, it may be, dissatisfaction, even among persons who believe in a protective policy, but who are not pleased with the changes in the relative or absolute scale of protection arising from the causes I have given. Then again, Sir, I am inclined to think that the McKinley Bill has done something towards sharpening this agitation in the country. Necessarily it did so. Hon. gentlemen opposite, before that Bill was passed, prophesied that it would do so; after it was passed, they declared that it did so, and I am not going to counter their declarations in that respect. For the McKinley Bill, whether it was so intended by its framers or not, did this and did it very effectually; it raised barriers against certain Canadian products, namely, farmers' products, and to that extent it interfered with trade and made necessary the diversion of trade, and every diversion of trade is followed necessarily by its train of dissatisfaction and loss. It may be, that after the diversion has been made, the people will be more prosperous, the markets will be more remunerative, but none the less every diversion of trade from one channel to another causes dissatisfaction and loss to individuals. So that I think the discussion has been sharpened in reference to this matter on account of the passage of the McKinley Bill. It certainly has been sharpened by the results of the elections which took place not long since in the United States of America, and which have been magnified without warrant, which have been unduly magnified by leaders of the party opposite, into a victory for free trade, pure and simple; and statements have been made throughout the length and breadth of the country that, owing to that change, a free-trade policy was to be inaugurated, and that great benefits would come in certain directions, and great changes would have to be made in this country. That has set people to thinking, that has set people to agitating and proposing, and that has added very materially to the discussions and the talk that is going on about this matter in the country to-day. For my own part, I differ with hon. gentlemen opposite, or on this side, who believe that the wings of free trade have been spread for a flight during all future ages in the United States of America, by the election of Mr. Cleveland. I cannot find it in the previous records of the party, I cannot find it in that latest concentration of the party doctrines upon tariff measures, the Mills Bill; I cannot find it in that latest utterance of President Cleveland in his acceptance of the candidature; I cannot find it in the thought, and feeling and breath of the American people today. I think the man who stands up in this country and contributes his quota to the unrest, and dissatisfaction and discontent with the present state of things in this country, by preaching to them that now this second daughter of Britain has entered into free trade, and the next to follow will be the third daughter of Britain, Canada—I cannot believe that these men are doing the best, from a statesman-like point of view, for this country and for the people of this country. However, the fact is, that this has lent point to the discussion and thought about the tariff and trade policies. Then there is another thing which must be taken into account at the present time, and that is the unprecedentedly low price of cereals in the markets of the world; and directly upon that supervenes the effort of the demagogue, the effort of the unscrupulous man, to make the people believe that in some occult way all this is due to the miserable Government and the miserable policy which, for the time being, prevailed in this country. Now, Sir, no sane man, standing up before a number of sane men, will venture that argument. Every one is open, in his calmer moods, to the opinion, to the conviction of the truth, that, if the prices of cereals in the country are low, they are low from certain abnormal causes, and that they are probably temporarily low. But, whatever may be the cause, the fact of these low prices of cereal products throughout the country at the present time, adds point and strength to the discussion, and is used to spread dissatisfaction and discontent. Of course, an Opposition always has open to itself to take advantage of all these things. All things are fair in politics, it is said; and I suppose any average party would take advantage of all the circumstances that arose, and as they arose, to make sentiment against their opponents and in favour of themselves. And, Sir, of late, and with greater vigour, supervening on these things, has come an active propaganda in this country and in the country alongside of us, the end and aim of which, no, I will not put it that way—the result of which, whether it is the aim or not, is to make people unduly discontented and unduly unrestful. In this country everybody acknowledges the geographical difficulties, its great extent, its sparse population, its different races and creeds, its different sections with their different distribution of the resources with which nature has endowed them. But I hope every man also recognizes—if he does not he ought to—that this country, if it is to remain a country, if it is to become a great country, and to have permanence and durability imprinted upon it, has to learn the lesson, and learn it now, and keep it learned, that you cannot afford to appeal to the prejudices, or the poverty, or the wants of one section against another; that you cannot afford to pander to the prejudices or the likes of one class to the detriment of the whole. I am here to-day to state that I misjudge the Canadian people, I do not read aright the spirit of the Canadian people, if, man for man, throughout this country, when they are fairly talked to and fairly reasoned with, they will not lay down, as a basis, that we must get along together in this country; we do not ask that any class shall go scot free of taxes and burdens, while others pay an undue proportion; we do not ask that any section shall be lightly burdened while other sections are heavily loaded; but that class or section, whatever it may be, must, proportionately to its strength, bear its just and equal portion of the burdens that are necessary in order to carry on the affairs of this country, and to give it permanence and durability. I think it is an unfortunate thing that in order to gain power, and in order to make a point against their opponents, advantage is being taken of the present state of things to preach a doctrine in this country which, if it is adhered to, means disruption, and is opposed to the only policy which can give us true permanence and true prosperity. Sir, I wish to notice in passing that these men preach certain doctrines, they go before the people with certain statements; they go before the people with inferences from those statements, some of which they draw, and some of which they do not draw, but all of which they allow, and others which they force to be drawn; and I believe that there are people who go out from the meetings addressed by hon. gentlemen opposite with the firm belief that there is some way by which we can carry on all our services in this country, by which we can have perfect free trade, and will not have to pay a dollar of taxation. Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite can define and point out any means or method by which that can be done, well and good; but, if not, the doctrine that ought to be preached in every school-house, on every platform, is that there is no way to build up a country in its public works, looking after its public services, giving it the improvements which the people need in the race of progress alongside of other countries to-day, no other way than by taxation; and that if the people will not bear reasonable burdens, they cannot expect to promote the building up and the improvement of the country. I think the Canadian people are sensible enough and strong enough to accept that doctrine, and to work under the impulse and in the spirit of that doctrine. So that I think, having stated these things, I have stated what leads to the unrest, the dissatisfaction, the agitation upon the tariff question; and I have tried to state them fully. We do not say that the policy we adopted in 1878, in the exact degree of protection that was placed upon the country at that time must be unvarying, must never be changed; but, out of all these causes I have mentioned, the feeling of unrest exists, and it reaches this House of Parliament, and that feeling will be met by the Government frankly, honestly and fairly. So that the Government, while it wishes to give due weight, and no more than due weight, to any one of these causes, and to any one of these complaints; while it acknowledges their varying force, varying in proportion to their merit and their strength; although the Government does not intend to be either frightened or forced into doing something which it does not believe to be right; the Government takes its stand to-day, and is willing to have it known everywhere. What it proposes to do will be done after the most careful, and earnest, and due consideration, not extended beyond a reasonable period—than will be that which, as a matter of trade and tariff policy, is best for this country as a whole. It proposes to do what is best for all classes counted together, whilst giving due weight to the importance of, and to the position of, each class, and varying the burdens accordingly. It proposes to adopt a policy and to carry out the particular lines of that policy, with due regard and consideration as well to the internal conditions of Canada as to her position amongst other countries of the world under the present conditions of trade and tariffs. These are lines, and to what end? It may be asked, what does the Government propose to do, for these are generalities? I grant that these are generalities. It has been a discussion of generalities, or of principles, if you like to denominate them as such. Then the first question comes from my hon. friend, Will the Government adopt free trade? My answer to that is, no. I know I disappoint my hon. friend in not taking up the pet idol and dream of his heart, the one idea which is the bright star of his existence, towards which he treads his devious way, sometimes in one country, and sometimes in another, from platform to platform, but always with that bright particular star in sight; now, I believe, only fifteen years distant is this bright particular star of free trade, the freest of free trade. There are some considerations why the Government does not propose to adopt free trade. The first is the requirements of the revenue. A stronger man than I am, a deeper thinker than my hon. friend, a man in mental power who towers among the best, has stated it, and from a less prejudiced stand-point, perhaps, because he put it from the stand-point of hon. gentlemen opposite, and he has challenged any man to show how, in this country, now, or for many years to come, any scheme of free trade could be adopted which could be worked, and he expressed his conviction that the circumstances of the country precluded its adoption, and precluded the direct taxation which must necessarily follow upon its adoption. The requirements of the revenue prevent it; $28,000,000, outside of earnings, have to be raised in this country for its current services. I invite hon. gentlemen to come down to particulars, and to show to this House and the country how they will effect savings in the different items of expenditure so as to reduce that amount by a very large sum. Small savings can be made, small savings are being made, but that the services of this country require much, and are so important they cannot be stopped, is a truth with which every man is conversant; and the point arises as to how $20,000,000 can be raised for the services of the country, $20,000,000 from Customs revenue with free trade with all countries, or with any great country in the world. But, Sir, outside of that point, which is in passing, there is another reason why this country cannot adopt free trade at the present time. It is on account of the industrial and general development of the resources of this country. Here we have under a system adopted earlier than 1878 so far as incidental protection is concerned, in 1878 so far as absolute and direct protection is concerned, developed in this country large and varied interests. Nobody denies that. A vested capital of $353,000,000, employing 368,000 hands, at a yearly wage of $100,000,000 and a development of the wealth of the country to the value of $90,000,000 annually—these are facts stated in cold figures of the census, taking 1891 and comparing it with 1881. This development of industries has gone on for years. It has reached a certain point, it cannot be sacrificed; neither has it reached that point where, unaided, it can yet stand the competition of countries like Great Britain or the United States, with their centuries of wealth behind them, with their great skill, with their enormous markets, with their great production which finds a market in the world in such large quantities. So that these have to be taken into account. Have not these industries grown since 1878? The figures I have given show that they have. They have kept population in this country—

Several hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad that hon. gentlemen opposite entertain that idea. These industries have kept population in this country which would otherwise have left it. They are keeping to-day in this country an increasing number of hands in employment, and the increased employment has its benefit in the way of wages, in the way of production, and so is felt throughout the whole country. We know from observation that these industries and this development of our industries has gone on rapidly since 1878. I do not need further to enlarge that idea. Let each hon. gentleman ask his own observation and experience, and let him contrast 1878 with to-day, and see the varieties of articles we manufacture to-day which were not manufactured by us then, that the proportion of articles in use in this country, now obtained from our manufacturers, is much larger; let him look over the whole field and take his own experience, and he will find, though in some cases there have been failures, in some cases there have been changes and vicissitudes, yet, on the whole, a great start has been made with respect to the manufacturing industries of the country, and a great start made in developing in that way the resources of the country. Do hon. gentlemen ask the history of the imports of raw material? It is contained in these figures :-

If hon. gentlemen want further information, let them go to the census returns for the figures of industries for 1881 and 1891, and learn from these that the number of establishments have gone up from 49,000 to 75,000, an increase of 51 per cent; the capital investments from $165,000,000 to $353,000,000, an increase of 114 per cent; the number of employees from 254,000 to 367,000, an increase of 44½ per cent; wages paid, from

That is an additional proof that industries have taken root, and have grown and developed, and in so doing, have developed also the strength, and the richness, and the reliability of this country upon itself. But, Sir, if more is required let him look a little further at the increased home supply in 1892, as compared with 1878, and the great difference in the consuming population of this country—not so great as my hon. friend would think well, but yet a large increase in the consuming population of the country. That large increase has all been supplied by the home manufactures of this country; I mean so far as ratio is concerned. Let him ask himself as to the increased exports of manufactured goods, being an advance of 70 per cent over 1878 and of 347 per cent over 1868, and let him ask himself as to the decreased imports of manufactured goods. Let him put all these things together, and he will gain a heightened and strengthened idea of what the industries of this country have attained in that time. Not only have the industries increased in themselves, but let us not forget their collateral advantages. Every ton of ore which is dug, every mill whose wheel revolves, every cotton spindle that turns, every branch of industry that works up raw material brought in, or raw material obtained in this country, adds to the employment which the country needs, adds to the earnings of the country, and adds to the wealth of the country, to be shared in by every sober, intelligent, and industrious class in the community from one end of the Dominion to the other. These things lead me to the conclusion, and I think they will lead this House and this country to the conclusion, that we cannot adopt free trade, and open up these industries—nurtured from 1878 to the present time, I grant you, by a reasonable and I hope a sufficient protection,—that we cannot open up these, to the unlimited competition of old manufacturing countries like Great Britain and the United States of America, without sweeping away the larger proportion of our industrial development, and reaping all the want, and loss, and misery that will accrue. And after all what better would we be off if we did this? We would not be so well off, because some time, sooner or later, if Canada is ever to be a great country, and it is, it would come to the conclusion again that we would have once more to reverse our policy, and that we would have to develop our own industries and resources. No country in this world at the present time can be great on one branch of work alone, and this country of ours, taking its resources and capabilities into account, would be guilty of the height of madness, if it left everything to the pursuit of agriculture and the natural products, so to speak, and did not strive to be a manufacturing country, giving employment to its own people, and working up its own resources as well. The position of the Government is clear upon that. Will my hon. friend make his position equally clear? I have read his Hamilton speech and his Toronto speech, and for the life of me I do not know where he stands to-day; and there are hundreds of thousands of people in this country as well who cannot put their finger upon the trade policy of my hon. friend opposite and tell what it means. At one time he is all free trade; let the taxes take care of themselves. At another time he says: We must go slowly, free trade is in the distance, and we will come to it gradually. While at another time he is in favour of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and discriminations against the rest of the world; the very antithesis of free trade. What are we to judge from all these statements? The hon. gentleman had some quiet fun the other day at the speeches of Ministers, and when this House is in a leisure moment, and when I get more time, I propose to take a few of my hon. friend's speeches and dissect them. But, Sir, what I invite him to do now, as I invited him to do two years ago, is: that he should come out of the bush and into the open and tell us just where he stands. Well, Sir, the Government has an equally straight and equally frank position to take upon the question of unrestricted reciprocity: but I am not going to take up the time of this House discussing that. Why? Because the country has discussed it and has given its verdict upon it in the general election with its eyes half open, and in the by-elections when it saw straight ahead on this question. Unrestricted reciprocity is a policy which, involving as it does discrimination against Great Britain, revolts the loyal feeling of the people; involving as it does free trade with the United States in manufactured articles, as well as in the products of the soil, strikes a blow at the manufacturing and industrial life of this country, and is repudiated by that class of the people. It is a policy which strikes a blow at the autonomy and self-respect of our people in that it inevitably hands over the autonomy and the tariff and fiscal legislation of this country to a foreign, a superior and a stronger power: and whether my hon. friend seasons it with independence or not I care not. Independence, or not, that policy adopted, and that policy carried out, means the extinction of Canada's separate, individual life, and the destruction of her aspirations after autonomy and nationality. I carry this further. The people have condemned it; they have thrown it out the back door, and they will throw every politician who stakes himself before the country on that policy, out of the same back door. Not in Canada to-day, nor in any year to come, will that kind of policy, pure and simple, when the people think it over and get to the bottom of it, command the support of a majority of the people of this country, or that flag ever be wafted to success: but, Sir, if there is anything like honourable reciprocity, anything like a reciprocity with mutual advantages, and which can be bought by not paying too dearly from the life blood and industrial blood of this country, if there is any reciprocity of that kind, this Government stands committed to take it, and to strive to get it. Sir, this Government does not stand to take that in which there is no honour, in which there is not a fair and mutual advantage, and in which it must pay for what it gets by the extinction of the country's name and independence. Well, Sir, there is another idea promulgated, and that is the pet idea. I was going to say, of my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill)—preferential trade; and the pet idea of many other gentlemen besides—an idea which, however much it may be laughed at by hon. gentlemen opposite, is an idea which, in its intrinsic worth and in the increasing favour and fervour of acceptance which it is meeting at the hands of thinkers and workers, ought not to be laughed at, which cannot be scouted, which has much to commend it. Even though it be not a present possibility, even though it be years in the future, it is an idea which has its groundwork in a thought wider than self or the selfish interest of any one country. It is an idea which in its scope lifts one, which gives one an idea of Imperial potency and durability and strength, which is a good heaven to throw into the lower political life of any country—an idea of continents and islands spanning the globe, with climate and productions and resources of infinite variety, with great mental capacity and endowment, with all the instrumentalities of a great trade ready to hand, and with a commercial fleet that fills every sea. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that that idea, if it could be realized, would be the finest, the highest and the noblest thing that has been concentrated into political or public action since the world had a beginning. I am not going to say that it is a present possibility, but I am going to say that it is so potent an idea that it is well for Canada and well for every British country to hold the strongest vantage position for its possible adoption; and we do not know how soon changes in public opinion may bring nearer to a reality that which to many seems to-day but a dream and a vision. This Parliament has pledged itself on preferential free trade. I believe other colonies of the Empire will view it favourably and will also pledge themselves upon it. I know that an increasing number of thinkers and workers in Great Britain are favourable to that idea in the abstract, and many of them in the concrete, as well; and I know, too, that it has to meet the prejudice of a half-century of economic teaching, especially among the masses of the people in the old country, who have been nurtured and grown up in that teaching. As I said before, if it is not a present possibility, it is yet well for us to keep ourselves in a vantage position, where we may do our part to adopt it, if it becomes feasible. So much with reference to that. Now, Sir, after all this, the question comes, What then? There is only one thing left. My course of reasoning has brought hon. gentlemen along that line; and the one thing that is left, in the opinion of the Government, is that which the Government proposes to do. It proposes, in the first place, then, to keep the old landmarks in sight. There has been much talk about the old flag and the old policy. I will, at this time, for the sake of variety, give the remark a different turn. I will say that I believe, and the Government believes, that it is in the interest of this country, that we should not lose sight of the old landmarks which we set up in 1878, and which have remained ever since. I am not going further to state what has been done by this policy in its principle and in its application, faulty though in some respects that application may have been—yes, must have been, because it was administered by human means. But I am going to say this, that that is the line by which we have marched up to our present prosperity, and that it is with the idea of keeping these landmarks in sight that we propose to take the next step in the interest of this country. But my hon. friend says to me: The United States is going to have free trade in a few months, possibly. Suppose that were so—I do not believe it—but suppose it were so. My hon. friend would have to ask and answer another question: How did the United States attain to that position where it could throw its ports open and defy the competition of the world? It came to that position by the road, not simply of a reasonable protection always, but a protection which was oftentimes more than reasonable, but which it would put on, and which it kept on until it developed its immense iron resources, its immense resources of every kind, and secured its accumulation of skill and capital and power, and its market of nearly 70,000,000 people. It marched up to that point along the pathway of a strong and safe protection; and the argument has not reached a conclusion when my hon. friend is able to say: "The United States is going to have free trade next year, and Canada must have free trade as well." We have yet more to do; we have yet further progress to make; we have yet further to toil along the same line along which, from 1878 to the present time, we have come to the degree of prosperity and of development which we have reached. My hon. friend had some criticism when the Premier, in a speech in Toronto, spoke of the National Policy as being wider than the tariff. It is wider than the tariff; we have always contended that it was. The tariff, giving a reasonable protection, was simply one part of the National Policy, which was adopted by this Government firmly and strongly and unitedly in 1878, but which was had in view, in part or in whole, long before 1878 by the chiefs and leaders of the party who put it in full operation in 1879. What was that National Policy to do for Canada? It was to amalgamate and weld together the different scattered territories of this country. That was one branch. It was to open these to settlement, and to transport on easy and quick terms. That was another branch of it. It was to build up the young industries of this country in order that the development of its resources might take place, in order that this country might become, to a certain extent, a manufacturing country, self-reliant, giving employment, in large part, to its own people. This was also a component part of the National Policy. And this National Policy, drawn on these lines, was what the Government of this country placed itself upon in 1878, and it is that which it stands on to-day, although in part what was to be done at that time has been very largely done, especially as to the amalgamation of our territories and the opening up of our means and facilities for transport. We believed, in 1878, that a reasonable protection upon industries which could fairly have a chance to plant and develop themselves in this country, was the only means by which to lift the country out of the condition it was in in 1878—and we ought never to forget that condition; and, on account of that policy, great strides have been made along the lines I have referred to. So that the Government proposes—and it takes the people into full confidence—not to abandon the principle of a fair and reasonable protection to the industries of this country. Now, as I said before, the Government takes its stand on the ground that all classes should bear proportionately equal burdens; and if, in the course of the investigation which is now taking place, and which will be continued for some further time, it is found that burdens press unduly on any class or section of the country, it will be the bounden duty of this Government to remedy that, and, if possible, equalize those burdens. If in the course of that investigation which is now going on, and which will be continued for some short time yet before a conclusion is reached, it be found that protection has been given to some industries which have no prospect at all of ever becoming fairly rooted in this country, it will become a question with this Government, whether or not it is not best to drop hot-house protection and give simply the reasonable and sufficient protection which is necessary in order to establish industries which, when established, will give some assurance of permanency and continued prosperity. These, then, are the present lines. To lighten the scale of taxation, in so far as possible, and in doing that, we must make up our minds to pare down, as far as we possibly can, all expenditures that are not absolutely necessary for the service of this country; to refuse expenditure on works which it would not be proper for a wise and economical Government to set on foot and continue in the country; to, as far as possible, adapt the scale of protection to legitimate industries and to what is reasonably necessary in order to establish and protect them; to use the raw material of the country, in so far as it can be used, and to extend the free list as far as possible, consistent with the revenue requirements of the country, in order to bring about this lessened taxation and this lessened scale of protection, which, lessened and equalized in that way, may be just as effective, and more effective, after the change has been made, than it was before. What I want to state is this, that information has been gathered by the Government, particularly by myself, during the past year, and that information will be gathered during the coming season; that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself, with the two level-headed business men who control the Customs and the Inland Revenue, propose during the coming year not only to listen to the complaints and the pleas of people who come to Ottawa to see us, but we propose to supplement that by a personal inspection and investigation of the various industries of the country. We propose to go further. We propose that it shall not be said that only one class has the ear of the Government, but that every class, the agricultural, the artisan, the manufacturing, the producing, or any class, shall have abundant opportunity to make out its case before the Government or some member of the Government and to have its plea and its grievances taken into consideration, and that the action of the Government shall be based upon the conclusions thus arrived at. During the next session of Parliament we propose to be ready, when Parliament opens or shortly thereafter, to bring down a tariff for this country revised on those lines, which shall not—and I want to make that plain, so that no feeling of panic may take place in the country—which shall not destroy and injure industries which are in this country to-day and which need reasonable protection in order to keep them up, but it will not assuredly, on the other side, give a measure of protection to any industry which will give it the opportunity of taking unduly from the pockets of the people by creating combines and monopolies, and thus making itself a burden instead of a benefit to the country. So much with reference to the future policy of the Government. We intend to be plainly and frankly understood. In that view, we ask our friends in the House to assist us in our investigation, by spreading the information broadcast, that every person can have access to the Government and can lay his plea before them, and that, having the benefit of their collective wisdom, we may arrive at a conclusion which shall embody the best for the country under its present circumstances and the best for the country in its immediate future. Certain things have been very strongly pressed upon us. Certain things have especially been urged with reference to their immediate remedy. Every person who undertakes the revision of the tariff, especially of a tariff framed on a protective principle, will very soon find out how, wherever he attempts to touch one single branch of industry in order to its relief and help, he immediately comes against the wires of other industries.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no doubt of it. We do not for a moment wish to leave that out of consideration. It is true, and it is a truth which prompts us to make haste slowly, and to thoroughly consider all industries before we venture a conclusion and adopt a policy with reference to particular industries. So that, therefore, careful revision is necessary, and many pleas, fair in themselves, have had to be shut out this year. We ask these people to wait the conclusion of the coming summer, and of the general revision which is to take place, when they will find their grievances, if they are just, remedied, and their complaints, if meritorious, as fully and fairly met as the Government can meet them. But there are two or three things of which I specially desire to speak, and which I would not wish to go over this session. A strong plea has been made with reference to the export duty on logs. Hon. gentlemen who live in the sections which, I may say, are most closely affected by that business, understand its acute nature, and all hon. gentlemen who have studied the course of the lumber resources and interests of our country, and who desire to see these lumber resources conserved, as far as they reasonably can be, have had their attention drawn to this matter as well. The facts of the case are to-day that a most wasteful, and, I believe, entirely unnecessary drain is being made on the timber resources of this country under present conditions. I know it is a most difficult matter to decide just how much of the drain should take place, and, when you have decided that, it is still more difficult to so regulate it that it will keep within those bounds; but, over and above those difficulties there comes the strong warning that Canadian lumber resources, which should last us for centuries, are in danger of being prematurely exhausted, and it is well that this matter should undergo most serious and calm consideration, utterly removed from partizanship and trade reprisals, or the like, upon its own broad and sufficient basis. And I wish to state here that, during the coming summer, the Government will take steps, the steps that are necessary and that are most fitting, to gather all the information with respect to these matters that it can, to submit to the House at its next session. And I desire also to state, so far as the Government is concerned, should this investigation lead it to take a certain course, it will not consider that it is debarred from taking the course that is shown to be imperatively necessary because any persons have, last year or this year, on the existing state of things, bought limits or invested in timber lands in our country. The supreme consideration must be our own forest resources, and how to preserve them. I am not saying what conclusion will be reached; I cannot say, because the full information is not before the Government or the House, but we merely wish to enter the plea that, if the revision should be deemed necessary it will not be considered by the Government to be debarred by the fact that limits have been bought or purchases have been made on conditions which now exist. A strong agitation has been brought to the notice of the Government with reference to oils. We have heard that debated in this House. Hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have taken divers positions with regard to this duty. No cool, reasonable man, on either side, having thoroughly looked into it, can come to any other conclusion than that it is a most difficult question. We have to do justice to an industry which has been, from 1868 particularly, the pet of Governments, so far as protection is concerned, which enjoyed the caressing care of the old Government before 1873, the kindly encouragement of the Government from 1874 to 1879, and the continued favour of the Government from 1879 up to the present time. This industry, though I grant you that it is very largely local, has a strength and power in its plea which appeals to every sentiment of a Canadian, and would move every Canadian to go just as far as he could in order to save the wealth and preserve the industry of the people, individually, who have carried on that business and are carrying it on to-day. On the other side, there is the claim of the consumers, who demand that the oil shall be reduced in price, and who ask that the protection which is now given shall be either entirely removed or reduced. I am not going to add to the discussion of that subject by going into the merits of the case. After hon. gentlemen who understand it have spoken as they have in this House, the merits of that question ought to be fairly well understood. I am simply going to say what position the Government take with regard to it. There is a straight protection on oil of $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents per imperial gallon, exactly equivalent to the 6 cents per wine gallon which was upon it before the present rate of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per imperial gallon was made. There is, outside of that, a condition imposed upon trade and transport which has the effect of protecting that industry to a large extent, possibly to the extent of 2 cents or 3 cents per gallon, arising from the fact that transport is limited to certain vessels and in certain directions, and that the oil is subject to inspection, of course. This is outside of the straight protection, and what the Government propose to do, and they have thought over this matter very carefully, is to propose to this House that the transport shall be freed and that the straight duty shall remain for the present as it is. In that way, the abnormal and hidden protection, so to speak, will be taken away and transport will be left free to modern methods, and at the same time a large, I acknowledge it, and, I hope, a sufficient protection will be left to the industry, enough to serve it for the present at least. One other question has been pressed upon the Government, and that is the duty on binder twine. This is complained of especially by certain sections of the country, by the farming class, almost as a unit. That question has been debated in this House, as well, and I am not going into its merits. The protection given to the industry in the United States is, I think, about $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per pound, with free raw material. In this country the material is free and the protection upon it at present is 25 per cent. A disadvantage from which the manufacturers suffer in this country is in our later harvest and the consequent fact that the surplus of the United States binder twine, known to be a surplus, being left over after their crop is gathered, is still in time to come into this country for use in binding our own crop. It is not, therefore, the intention of the Government to take away the duty on binding twine entirely. It is an industry in this country; it gives employment to several hundreds of people. I have examined into the question, and, so far as I can see, it is not a foreign monopoly, however strong and however close may have been, or to a certain extent is at the present time, the relation between the two. But I am bound to state this, that, as every one knows, a monopoly exists on the other side of the line. The industry is carried on in this country, notwithstanding the disadvantages I have referred to, and what the Government proposes to do is, while granting relief to the farmers and to those who use binder twine, at the same time to continue reasonable protection to the manufacturers. I shall propose to the committee that from and after the passage of the resolution, the duty on binder twine be reduced from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent. There is still one other question; that is the question of mining machinery. You will remember that three years ago we exempted from duty for three years mining machinery such as was not manufactured in Canada. The term expires in March of this year. I propose to ask the House to extend that privilege on mining machinery for three years longer. In the revision for next year we will take this matter up, and it may be that it will be placed upon a different, but, I hope, no more unfavourable basis. Mr. Speaker, I thank you and the House for having listened so patiently to these lengthened remarks.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At any time, and under any possible circumstances, the annual exposition, or even the annual reaffirmation of the financial policy of the Government, is a matter of considerable interest to all classes of Canada; and, on the present occasion, when, as the Minister correctly told us, there is an extraordinary feeling of unrest and disquiet pervading the masses of the community, there is no doubt that it is an occasion of more than usual interest. I am not quite sure that I can congratulate the hon. gentleman on having entirely risen to the level of the occasion; but to those who will take the trouble to read between the lines of his speech, the speech was undoubtedly significant enough. To us who have been in the habit of listening to that hon. gentleman and his compeers for a great many years, there was a rather remarkable absence of what I must call the braggadocio with respect to the National Policy, which has heretofore characterized utterances from that side of the House. There was also an almost complete absence of those taunts which used to be flung across the floor to gentlemen on this side, bidding them bow to the will of the people, and assuring them that the National Policy was so rooted in the innermost instincts of the people of Canada that our puny efforts to disturb it were in vain. Sir, a change has come over the spirit of the dream of my hon. friend. He has had a vision. Possibly he may have dreamed that he heard the president of the young Conservatives of Toronto declaring that they were being annexed in job lots. Possibly he may have heard a gentleman who was whilom designated as the brains of the party, blaspheming the holy tariff, and speaking evil words even against the sacred gerrymander itself. Possibly the hon. gentleman is aware that the farmers' institutes, from one end of the country to another, are kicking against the wise and merciful provisions of his tariff. Possibly he is also aware that there is hardly a subsidized newspaper, or, perhaps, I should say, an insufficiently subsidized newspaper, that is not helping to swell the chorus. Under these circumstances, I can well understand that our political Vicar of Bray might be a good deal puzzled as to what was the duty of a conscientious public man. Of course, the hon. gentleman knows that it is his duty to obey the powers that be, but, on the present occasion, the hon. gentleman is not quite sure who are the powers that be.

Mr. FOSTER. We know who are not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think the hon. gentleman does. Well, Sir, under these circumstances, I hope the hon. gentleman won't take it amiss if I suggest that if he has not looked to Washington exactly, he has certainly looked to that high-souled American statesman immortalized by Lowell, whose policy, very like the hon. gentleman's, was summed up in these beautiful lines:

There may be men of greater talents,
Who can't sit stidder on the fence.

Although, looking at the hon. gentleman's performances, I may remind him that while a fence may be a steady seat, a tight-rope performance of the rather acrobatic character we have seen to-night, is not apt to be so. Sir, there is a sort of resemblance, if I may say so, between the hon. gentleman and his policy. If I may make the remark without offence, I believe the hon. gentleman commenced his career as a professional philanthropist. Now, I understand that the business of a professional philanthropist is to make everybody else better, as it was the business of the National Policy to make everybody richer. Sir, I wonder if the hon. gentleman ever heard his late lamented leader give his opinion of what a professional philanthropist is? If he has not, I must gratify his curiosity on the present occasion. It is known to some hon. gentlemen in this House that in my green and salad days, ever so many years ago, I was in the habit myself, sometimes, of sitting at the feet of that estimable Gamaliel, and I am bound to say that I have been the recipient of not a little useful, and a great deal of very entertaining, knowledge from that hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, I recollect one occasion when a question came up for discussion touching professional philanthropists. I remember also that I spoke inadvertently and somewhat slightly of that valuable class of men. Sir John took me up at once. Professional philanthropists, he assured me, were an exceedingly useful set of people. He, himself, always liked to have one or two professional philanthropists in his cabinet. They were useful, he said, for the purpose of keeping up the average of respectability, which, he remarked—and I entirely agreed with him—was sometimes quite a desideratum; but he went on to observe, and I remember the words well—possibly the hon. gentleman may have heard them—that he had noticed that men who went in to get a living by making other people better were apt, in course of time, to require extensive moral repairs themselves. Now, far be it from me to say that the hon. Finance Minister is in need of extensive moral repairs. I deprecate any such inference being taken from my words. Since he has become Minister of Finance it may be that his views on moral questions have broadened and widened considerably; but I am free to say that I believe him to be quite as pure-minded now as when he entered Parliament. But, as Sir John observed, the reason of this little defect in professional philanthropists was that virtue had gone out of them; and it did appear to me, after listening to the hon. gentleman's speech, that he likewise had come to the conclusion that virtue had gone out of the National Policy, and that some other device must speedily be sought for the purpose of circumventing people for their own good—for their own good, you will understand, Mr. Speaker—or else his seat and the seats of his colleagues were imperilled. Now, Sir, one thing at any rate is clear from the declaration of the hon. gentleman. By his own express statement and admission, which I will allude to more at length later on—and let me say it was one of the most remarkable statements I ever remember to have heard or read of a Minister of Finance making on a similar subject—the whole fiscal policy of the Government is now up for review, the whole fiscal policy is to be examined from the bottom up, for the hon. gentleman's declaration meant that and nothing else. We have had fourteen years of the hopeful experiment of endeavouring to make ourselves rich by increasing our taxes. What has been the result of that experiment? Sir, there is, let me tell the hon. gentleman, a very widespread feeling that the whole National Policy has been from first to last an egregious fraud. There are men to-day in the street and in the market place, in the shop and on the farm, wherever men are gathered to-day, all Canada over, who are recalling the predictions and the promises by which they were induced fourteen years ago to adopt this same National Policy, and they are comparing those promises and those predictions with the ascertained facts which confront every one at this moment. It is not my purpose to enter minutely, at all events, into all the petty minutiae with which the Minister of Finance was obliged to fill a large part of his speech; but there is one rough and ready test which every man, learned or unlearned, can apply, which I have always felt and always said was a test worth a hundred thousand or a hundred thousand thousand of all those petty percentages and all those little quibbling details which have been presented to the House, if you want to ascertain whether the country is prosperous or not. If a country is prosperous, people all over the world will be glad to go there; they will be glad enough to stay in such a country, and they will be loth to leave it. That is a rough and ready test, I grant you, but it is one which every man can apply, and the truth of which no human being who knows anything of the position of the country will ever venture to dispute, and that test before I sit down I propose to apply to the hon. gentleman's arguments. We have to-night sundry fallacies to deal with, we have sundry, I will not call them falsehoods, but statements without foundation in fact to expose, and sundry conspiracies, I fear, to lay bare. Let us take up the long list of broken pledges by means of which hon. gentlemen opposite carried the country against Mr. Mackenzie and his Administration in 1878. Sir, I remember well, perhaps the Minister of Finance does not, because his parliamentary life is rather short compared with mine, how the people were told that give those hon. gentlemen the right to control the destinies of Canada and they would stop the exodus, they would provide a home market for everything our farmers could raise, they would restore the balance of trade—they laid great emphasis on restoring the balance of trade in those days—they would enrich our people, they would raise the value of land and raise the value of farm products (but the hon. gentleman has got new light on that question since that time) they would fill the Northwest from end to end with a teeming population, and, lastly, they would obtain reciprocity with the United States. The bare recital is enough. All those pledges and promises may well match with Sir Charles Tupper's famous declaration that in a few brief years, and ten years have elapsed since then, we would export 640,000,000 bushels of wheat from Manitoba, and on 31st December, 1890, \$58,300,000 would be paid into our treasury, as profits from the sale of our public lands, and the Canadian Pacific Railway would not cost the people a sou. I shall make a short review, and a very short one, of the way in which those promises have been fulfilled. I regret not to see the hon. First Minister in his place, because the First Minister's view and mine with respect to the exodus differs slightly, and there would be given an opportunity on this occasion for the hon. gentleman to redeem the pledge he partly gave that he would review and controvert the arguments I advanced on a recent occasion in opposition to some of his statements. With respect to the exodus, I want to call the attention of the House to this fact: I am prepared to prove that so far from stopping the exodus, the exodus during the last ten years was double, and more than double, the exodus between 1871 and 1881, and it was three times as much as the exodus which took place in Mr. Mackenzie's time. I have taken the trouble to examine not in rely our own statistics, but the United States' statistics, and I have ascertained from them that the total annual exodus in Mr. Mackenzie's time was probably not more than 32,000 all told, from 1874 to 1878, and that it certainly did not exceed 42,000, taking into account the entire foreign-born immigration which came to Canada during that period. In the five years beginning 1874 and ending 1878, 148,000 immigrants, according to our own official returns, are stated to have come to Canada. Of those, 12,000 a year were required to make up the death rate, to keep up the number of immigrants to Canada at its former strength, and even if we lost all the remainder they would merely aggregate 88,000 people. We have the American statistics for 1874-75-76-77 and 1878. For 1874 and 1875 they group all the Americans together, north and south. For 1876-77 and 1878 they give correct figures. In 1876 the total Canadian-born immigrants from Canada to the United States amounted to 22,471; in 1877, 22,116; 1878, 25,518. So far as it is possible to ascertain, the number was about 25,000 in 1874 and 1875, making a reasonable deduction for the number of immigrants from Mexico, the West Indies, South America and other countries included with the Canadians who went to the United States. I do not allege that that was due entirely to the policy of Canada at the time, for the simple fact that during those five years emigration to the United States had almost entirely ceased, as any hon. gentleman can see if he examines the United States' statistics. But how does that compare with the emigration under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite? As I have said, the maximum immigration in Mr. Mackenzie's time was very little over 40,000 souls, putting together the foreign-born immigrants who came to Canada and the native-born Canadians who left. What was the number under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite? Our own census returns prove to a demonstration that we have lost 440,000 of our own native-born population, and the hon. gentleman's own statistics prove, unless those statistics are a lie, a fraud and a sham, that we have lost of foreign immigrants 727,000 more. Put these two figures together and you will find the loss to Canada of native-born Canadians, by far the most valuable class, and of foreign immigrants, amounts to a total of 1,167,000, being at the rate of 116,000 per annum during the last ten years, as against, in Mr. Mackenzie's time, an extreme number, an over-estimated number, of 40,000 a year from both those classes. Those hon. gentlemen made every hustings ring in 1878 with their declamations as to how, if they were only permitted to enjoy the control of this country, a home market would be provided in every town and village for everything the farmer could raise. Our villages were to become towns and our towns were to become cities, and our cities were to become something hardly ever dreamed of in this country before. We were to have at our farmers' doors, markets which would consume every vegetable, every cereal, and every head of cattle and poultry that they could possibly raise. I do not think the hon. gentleman dare prate to the farmers of their home market to-day. They were to restore the balance of trade. Well, to my poor judgment, that was a silly proposal, but what is the fact? Do hon. gentlemen want to know the figures? Why, since 1878, the gross balance of trade is \$308,000,000 against us, an average of more than \$20,000,000 a year, and that was the way the hon. gentlemen fulfilled that promise. The hon. gentlemen were to enrich the people, they were to raise the value of farm products; but the present Finance Minister, having obtained a little more wisdom than his predecessors, tells us that no Government can raise the price of farm cereals. I appeal to all my hon. friends. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite themselves who took part in the election of 1878, if, from one end of Ontario to the other, and, I believe from one end of Canada to the other—although the price of farm products were double then what they are now—I appeal to them and ask if the cry of hon. gentlemen opposite was not that they could and would raise the price of everything that farmers had to sell. They were to fill the North-west with population. Well, Sir, if ever there was a miserable exhibit on the face of the earth, it is the exhibit which is made to-day in that fine country, under the policy of these hon. gentlemen. Why, at the present time, we have positively not got one family to the square league of the fertile lands of the North-west. We have spent \$100,000,000, more or less, in the last dozen years, and I doubt, Sir, if we can be shown to have added 10,000 families to the population of the North-west during the last dozen years, by reason of that enormous expenditure. But, above all, they told us that they would obtain reciprocity; as Sir John Macdonald put it: reciprocity of trade, or reciprocity of tariffs. That, also, I must deal with hereafter. It would take me altogether too long at this present moment to do justice to the strenuous efforts made by these hon. gentlemen, and by the Minister of Finance in particular, on two memorable occasions, to obtain reciprocity for the people of Canada. Now, I notice three fundamental errors in the speech of the Finance Minister, errors which affect his whole policy and the whole policy of his Government and his party. That hon. gentleman lays down, or did lay down, as a proposition, that it was possible to increase our collective wealth by increasing our taxes. I beg leave to tell the hon. gentleman that I regard such a proposition as about the ne plus ultra of folly in a country like Canada. When the hon. gentleman is able to pour water into a sieve and keep it there, when the hon. gentleman is able to leap from one of these buildings and sustain himself in mid-air, by grasping his waistband, when the hon. gentleman can take snow in his hand and hold it before the fire without its melting; then, and not until then, will the hon. gentleman increase the collective wealth of the community by increasing their taxes. Sir, we do not look for grapes from thorns and we do not look for figs from thistles, but we had better do that than look for prosperity to a policy, the very key-note of which is to enrich one or two special classes at the expense of the great bulk of the community. I tell the hon. gentleman that his Government and his policy may indeed displace wealth—that they have done to a large extent—but they are helpless and powerless to create it. Then, Sir, the friends of the hon. gentleman, and I think the hon. gentleman himself, although he alluded to it but lightly, gave us to understand that because protection had brought prosperity, as he thought, to the United States, therefore that protection would bring prosperity to Canada also. I never heard that argument used by anybody without putting down the man who used it either as a charlatan who does know better, but who desires to delude the people, or as a man who is utterly and hopelessly ignorant of the very primary geographical conditions in which this country is placed. I have said often, and I repeat it here—because the hon. gentleman has made it necessary for me to go into some details in dealing with these general propositions—I repeat, that if an economist were called upon to select two countries in one of which the protective system would do the maximum of mischief, and another in which it would do the minimum of mischief, he would select as the one which was best able to bear a protective system without injury, the United States of North America, and he would also select as the one in which a protective system would assuredly do the maximum of mischief to the whole inhabitants of the country, the federation of this Dominion. In the United States you have met together every condition which would counteract the evil effects of a high protective system. You have a huge country, containing a population equal to two first-rate European nations, producing every article, I believe, which any nation can require to produce, having every variety of climate, from the tropic to the pole, and enjoying in itself a vast and most perfect system of free trade among twenty-five or thirty nations called states. You have, on this side of the border, a group of countries separated from each other by physical obstacles of a very formidable kind separated from each other by large tracts of inhospitable country, producing almost identically the same articles; not a homogeneous people by any means, with a very small population, comparatively speaking; and, in one word, you have combined in Canada every possible combination of circumstances which can make a protective system a huge and vicious mistake. The hon. the Finance Minister and his friends are in the habit of telling us that we need not complain, forsooth, of the amount of the taxes they levy upon us for the benefit of the manufacturers, because, he told us, the manufacturers are now able to produce in Canada as cheaply as in any other country. I doubt if a more impudent claim was ever advanced. If they are able to produce as cheaply in Canada as anywhere else, what right or what need have they of protection at all? But the fact is, that as to many articles, it is impossible, 'in rerum natura,' that you can produce them in Canada at all as cheaply as you can in other countries. I take issue in the most distinct fashion with the hon. gentleman on that question. I may tell him that Canada at present is essentially an agricultural country, and next to that, it is a mining, fishing and lumbering country, and while I am not in any respect disposed to depreciate the great importance of the manufacturing industries that exist, neither can I for one moment allow the hon. gentleman to mislead this House or to mislead the people into supposing that Canada has any peculiar aptitudes for a great many manufactures. There are certain manufactures which may develop naturally and fairly here, and if so, Sir, they will need no coddling by a protective tariff or in any other way. If our manufactures need anything for the purpose of their full and free development, what they need, and what the best of our manufacturers know that they need, is a larger market than they at present possess. I am well aware, Sir, that it is the habit of hon. gentlemen opposite to support these false contentions by impudently claiming for themselves, in the first place, the benefit of all the natural improvement which must take place in a great country like this, and in the second place, of claiming the benefit of all these wonderful scientific discoveries which from day to day, I might also say from hour to hour, are cheapening the process of manufacturing. Sir, science, I grant you, has partly undone the enormous mischief that protection has caused; but, Sir, what protection does is this: it intercepts the compensation which is due to our farmers and the other classes I have named. The prices of all their manufactures, their wheat, their beef, every article that they produce, have been falling heavily, and still more heavily, from year to year, until this year, as the hon. Minister admitted in his speech, the prices of most of our cereals have touched the lowest figure known for nearly half a century. The Government may not be able to mitigate that; but what our Government does is at the same time to enable our protected manufacturers to deprive our farmers of the benefit which they ought to derive from the products of their industry. The Government cannot help the farmers to get one farthing more for their produce; but it does prevent them from buying as cheaply as they otherwise might. Meantime, the hon. gentleman, backed by his colleagues, continues to assert that all is well, and they give us proof, as the hon. gentleman to-night gave us proofs, of the truth of the assertion. He told us that the savings bank deposits had on the whole greatly increased, and that our bank deposits had likewise increased; he spoke of new railways, and I think he spoke of the growth of certain of our towns and cities. Now, I have no objection in the world to the hon. gentleman bringing forward those evidences, which are good as far as they go. I grant you that it is a good thing that the savings bank deposits have increased; I grant you that it is a good thing that our bank deposits have increased: I grant, if you like, that it is a good thing that certain cities have grown and prospered; but, after all, how far do all these things go? I repeat to the Minister of Finance what I said some nights ago to his chief: that evidences of debt are not necessarily evidences of increasing wealth; he tells us of the great increase in the savings bank deposits. Well, Sir, where is the money? The hon. gentleman has not got it. If a run were made on the savings bank, he knows, as he tells us in his own report which I hold in my hand, that he would have to go to England to borrow money to meet it. What does the increase in the deposits in the savings banks prove? It proves that the people of Canada owe the sum of money so deposited to a few individuals. Where is that money? A part of it, we know, is interred in the North-west rebellion; another part is interred in public works on the principle of paying \$3,000,000 for what is worth \$2,000,000; another part is going to pay railway subsidies for the purpose of keeping some hon. gentlemen behind the hon. Minister in good humour; and of the rest he can give as good an account of it as he pleases. With regard to the bank deposits, I wish to know if the hon. gentleman regards them as an unanswerable proof of increased prosperity in the country. It may or it may not be. It may go to show, and to a certain extent it does show, that under a protective system a much larger amount of money is required to carry on a given amount of trade than ever before. If you add enormously to the taxes on imported goods, there is no doubt that a larger amount of money will be required to carry on the same amount of trade as before. But, after all said and done, where are these same bank deposits, and by what are they represented? They are represented chiefly by discounts. The hon. gentleman knows that, although the banks of Canada have a good and honourable record, if there were a run on those deposits to-day, they could not pay them, nor for that matter could the banks of any country do so. To a large extent these discounts go to show that owing to the unhappy disposition of people to forsake the country for the town, there are great many more men engaged in trade than the interests of the country require, and I fear that they are using much less of their own capital and much more of borrowed capital than ever before. But we will let that pass. There is, however, one significant fact that I am not going to let pass. It is a fact that I have brought time and again to the attention of the members of this House, and it shows the utter hollowness and worthlessness of these alleged proofs of the country's prosperity. Sir, to-day, throughout the province of Ontario, I dare to say, there are a hundred towns and villages in each of which there are bank offices having hundreds of thousands and it may be millions of dollars on deposit. Go to any one of those towns and villages and put up a house or a farm for auction, and even if you are willing to take 50 per cent of its real value, I am sorry to say that in the vast majority of cases, although there are hundreds of thousands of dollars lying comparatively idle, and bearing but 3 or 4 per cent interest, you will not be able to get a single bid for your property. Sir, it is not a proof of great and increasing prosperity in a country like Canada, possessing a large unoccupied area of fertile land, that there are an unusually large number of people who prefer to put their money in savings banks and get 3 or 4 per cent interest for it rather than to put it in house or land property; and these things, in so far as they are a proof at all of genuine wealth, are often more accurately described as being a proof of the displacement of wealth. But, Sir, I will allow for argument's sake that the hon. gentleman is right in telling us that these things represent real growth and real wealth. Is there no 'per contra' to all this? Is the hon. gentleman sitting there as Finance Minister unaware of the fact, which I know, which scores of men in this House know, which thousands outside of this House know, that in the older parts of Canada, at any rate, in Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, there is to-day a most unusual and extraordinary decrease in the value, first of all, of town and village property, and in the next place of farm property? Does the hon. gentleman not know that in the past twelve years there has been an enormous increase of debt along with this decrease in the value of property? Does he not know that our federal debt has increased enormously? Does he not know that our provincial debts have also increased enormously? Does he not know that our municipal debt, and our railroad indebtedness—because the moneys borrowed for the construction of railways are a real debt upon the people of Canada—have enormously increased likewise; and that private indebtedness, as represented by moneys borrowed by our loan companies and invested in mortgages, has likewise increased enormously? I would like the hon. gentleman to tell us what his estimate is of the indebtedness of our people to outsiders on all these various scores. One of his colleagues, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), some years ago submitted a calculation to this House, according to which he estimated that we owed annually \$25,000,000 or \$30,000,000 of interest. I am not disposed to quarrel with that calculation. I am very much disposed to think that since that time our annual indebtedness for interest has considerably increased. But if it be correct, if we have to pay \$30,000,000 in the shape of interest to foreign creditors, and if you add to that the enormous amount of money we are likewise obliged to pay, not into our treasury, but in the shape of taxes to manufacturers, the hon. gentleman will see that we have very good ground for saying that the people of Canada at this moment are subjected to a burden far too heavy for them to bear. Now, Sir, in the meantime there are certain facts as to which there is no shadow of doubt. With the census returns now in our hands, there is no shadow of doubt that there has been in these ten years that I have alluded to, an enormous loss of the native-born population of Canada, of the very pink and flower of our population. There has been likewise, if there be one word of truth in the statement formally laid on the Table of the House by the Government of which the hon. gentleman is a member, a most enormous loss of the foreign imported immigration. And here I may pause for one moment to say that I, for my part, am willing enough to welcome any honest immigration, but I think, Sir, that the Government and the people of Canada will do well, looking at the enormous loss of their own people, to hesitate before they encourage much more foreign immigration. I have noticed, and noticed carefully, that the foreign immigration which has come to Canada of late years shows a most distinct deterioration, and I believe the same thing exists with respect to the immigration to the United States. In old times, no doubt, the immigration was composed of a very good class of people, as a whole. The difficulties that attended leaving their own country, and the expense of coming here, operated as a sort of natural selection, and a tolerably good class of immigrants came out. In fact, in the old days they would compare perhaps as favourably with the majority of the people from which they came as do the Canadians, I regret to say, who now go to the United States, compare with the majority they leave behind in Canada. But that is all altered. The improvements of transportation make it very easy to shunt upon us an inferior class of immigrants, and, no doubt, a very large number of those brought to Canada, under the auspices of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, have been of a very inferior class. There is danger here to the national life. We are suffering a double moral depreciation and degradation. First of all, these hon. gentlemen deprive us of the cream of our population, and then they water the skim-milk that remains. Some gentlemen on their side I dare say, could advise scientifically as to the proportion of water which should go into skim-milk. If you add to this the enormous increase in the real taxation of the people, and by that I mean not only what goes into the Treasury, but what goes out of the pockets of the people, can the hon. gentleman wonder that there is discontent and agitation from one end of the country to the other, more particularly when he and I know that all over Canada to-day a very large class of the very best of our population are daily and hourly being degraded from the position of free and independent landowners to that of mere tenants at will or hopelessly mortgaged men? Let us compare for a moment the progress we have made in this last decade with the progress we made in other decades. The hon. gentleman made a very great point of the enormous increase which the census shows in manufactures. Well, I have also taken the trouble to look through the census returns, and while I am glad to see there has been a considerable increase, I am sorry to be obliged to tell the hon. gentleman that he is utterly mistaken, and is misleading the House gravely when he declares that there is a greater proportionate increase in the most important respects between 1881 and 1891 than between 1871 and 1881. I take these census returns and look to two very important particulars. I look, in the first place, to the number of men employed. The increase in that respect amounted to 44 per cent; the increase between 1871 and 1881 amounted, I believe, to about 39 per cent. All the alleged gain that has been obtained has been a relative increase of some 4 or 5 per cent. And I turn to another item, to which the hon. gentleman directed special attention, the item of the amount of money employed. I do not consider that that is a very favourable showing. It requires to-day, \$353,000,000 of money to produce \$475,000,000 worth of goods, according to the hon. gentleman's census returns. Now, in 1881, it required \$165,000,000 to produce \$309,000,000 worth of goods. Consequently, whereas before we were able to produce by the employment of \$1 of capital nearly \$2 worth of goods, now it requires \$2 worth of capital to produce \$3 worth of goods—a very distinct alteration, and an alteration for the worse in that important respect. And so on for a very considerable number of other important matters. As I have told the hon. gentleman, I do not consider that, in a country like Canada, there is anything to boast of in the fact that there is a reasonable natural increase from year to year. Does the hon. gentleman pay so very bad a compliment to his own policy as to think there would be no natural increase at all? Let us look at the rate of increase and compare it with that in the mother country, and let us return to that test which I have always pointed to as offering the best possible guarantee for a nation's real progress. I pointed out the other evening that in old Canada, that is to say in the five old provinces, our total increase during the last ten years had been barely $7\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. I turn to the returns for England and Wales, and I find that while, with our almost unlimited amount of vacant land in Ontario and Quebec, at any rate, and also some of the Maritime provinces, all we increased in that decade was $7\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, in England from 1861 to 1871 the increase was $13\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and from 1871 to 1881 it was $14\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and for this last period the increase is as nearly as possible 12 per cent. So that, practically speaking, the increase in England and Wales—an old country, a country which loses a great many of its population by emigration—has been in some decades twice as much as that which took place in our old provinces from 1881 to 1891. I notice that when the hon. gentlemen opposite are confronted with the facts of the census, or with the facts of the enormous depreciation of property in town, village and farm lands, their course has one merit—it has always been perfectly consistent. I will recall to the minds of my hon. friends behind me the numerous occasions in which, during past years, I have challenged the accuracies of the hon. gentleman's statements as to the growth of this country, and I ask them if the course of the Government was not on all occasions precisely the same. First of all, there was an impudent denial of the fact. That was usually followed by frantic abuse on their part, and on the part of their supporters and their hireling press, of myself and the other gentlemen who brought those unpleasant facts to their notice, and when the facts became too clear to be gainsaid or denied, then the hon. gentleman took refuge—in what? In the assertion, and often the very incorrect assertion, that it was a matter of no consequence, because in some hole or corner of the United States, in some little state of the Union, a similar state of things prevailed. Sir, a physician who, when asked to cure a patient of a wasting disease, would tell the patient that he knew of no remedy, but was able to inform him that there was a number of other people similarly attacked, would not be the kind of man I would like to employ. The hon. gentleman devoted, if I recollect aright, about an hour, or maybe an hour and a quarter to enunciating the policy of the Government. The policy of the Government! Well, Sir, the policy of the Government might have been defined in much shorter metre. The policy of the Government, Sir, as enunciated by the hon. gentleman is, briefly, to fling a tub to the whale. The policy of the hon. gentleman reminds me very forcibly of an anecdote which I once heard of an American gentleman who, at an early period of this century, was sojourning at an English country house. This was at a time when the great American nation had not been educated on the subject of tips, and this frugal party was seriously exercised as to what he ought to do. So he took one acquaintance aside and asked him gravely, "What is the least sum I can give without appearing mean?" I think the hon. gentleman's Budget has been framed entirely on these lines. The spirit of this frugal Yankee has transmigrated into my hon. friend, and his one end and object at present is to ascertain: "What is the least I can do for the unfortunate farmer without appearing mean?" I cannot congratulate him, but it is the day of small things, and I suppose we must be grateful. And perhaps there may be something in the instalment plan on which the hon. gentleman intends to proceed. Sir, if ever there was a case in which the saying 'Parturiunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus' was verified it has been verified by the hon. gentleman this afternoon. Two and a half mortal hours the hon. gentleman consumed in telling us, first, that the Government did not know what to do about saw-logs; second, that the Government will allow us to import oil in tanks instead of in barrels; and, third, that the hon. gentleman will make the duty on binding twine 1 cent instead of 2 cents. But, Sir, that is not all, that is not all by any means. Over and above all this, Sir, the hon. gentleman has been good enough to say that a grand progress is about to be instituted. Is it to be by caravan or by Jamaica car, Mr. Speaker? Four Cabinet Ministers—no, two Cabinet Ministers and two apprentice boys will peddle old taxes for sale about the Dominion. Old taxes for sale! That positively is the policy of the hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, if the hon. gentleman really means it, he has been monstrously injudicious. I recollect perfectly well how the vials of wrath were poured out on my devoted head because, some eighteen years ago, in the course of a speech made by His Excellency, I ventured to hint in the mildest way that within a month or so there would be some tariff changes. Sir, it seemed to me that the heavens and the earth were coming together. What I had done was unconstitutional; I was destroying trade, paralysing manufactures. But the hon. gentleman proposes during the whole year, if he really means what he says, to unsettle all trade, to unsettle all manufactures. Nobody is to know where he stands until the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have completed their pilgrimage and until a sufficient number of the old taxes have been sold. But, Sir, if the hon. gentleman does not mean it, if all this is simply a device to gain time, if there has been a private arrangement with certain protected manufacturers that they need not disturb themselves, that this will all come out right, that it will be managed in such a way that their interests at any rate will not suffer, then, I venture to say, a greater farce was never played off on any country than the proposition of the hon. gentleman to take a whole year to carefully consider what he, as Finance Minister, ought to be able to advise this country on to-day. As I have said, Sir, there is one fact which, after fifteen long years, has dawned on the hon. gentleman (I wonder has it dawned on any of his friends around him), and that is, that the Government cannot raise the price of cereals. Sir, you will recollect, and the House will recollect, that we were told by the hon. gentleman time and again that only demagogues would dare to say that the Government could raise the price of cereals, and yet my memory goes back to the time when this country, in 1878, was flooded with demagogues preaching that identical doctrine. The hon. gentleman tells us that our trade in agricultural products with Great Britain has increased by fifteen millions. Well, Sir, I am glad that, bad as the markets are, our farmers have a market at all, but I can tell the hon. gentleman this, that, as regards a large part of that fifteen millions, it is simply the measure of our loss, it is simply the amount of unprofitable trade which we have transacted in place of a much more profitable trade with our natural market. Sir, he was good enough to tell us that the Government came to the help of the farmer in 1889, when they put on a lot of taxes on American products, and got for him, I believe, a million or so of additional markets. And, Sir, he might have added that by that ill-timed and injudicious act he stuck the farmers of Canada for the McKinley tariff and all the mischief it has done them. Had he and his friends pursued, as they were advised from this side of the House, a wise, conservative policy, had they, knowing what was in contemplation from the United States, abstained from putting weapons into the hands of our opponents, the chances are a thousand to one that the most obnoxious portions of the McKinley tariff would never have been enacted. But when he chose in April to defy the American people and to put on taxes which he knew must bring retaliation, he and his Government stand convicted before this country of having, more than any other men, contributed to saddle the McKinley tariff on the farmers of Ontario and the rest of the Dominion. Sir, the hon. gentleman says that the Government lowered the sugar taxes. No doubt the Government, at the dictation of the aforesaid Mr. McKinley, did lower the duties. Did we hear one word of the remission of the sugar taxes until the American Government had made it impossible to keep them on? And when they did reduce them, they did it so as to reduce the amount received by the community in revenue, but not so as to disturb the profits of their refining friends. The utmost amount that could be taken was taken out of the pockets of the people; but the smallest possible amount was taken out of the pocket of their friend, the chairman of the Conservative committee in Montreal. Sir, the hon. gentleman's ideas are excellent; but I am bound to say his practice is detestable. Now, I come to deal with what I must call the per capita fraud which the hon. gentleman has often referred to. If the hon. gentleman knew anything about what one of his followers calls "scientific protection" he would know that it is the absurdest nonsense to talk about a per capita reduction or a per capita anything else in connection with a protective tariff. Who does not know that the very essence, the very reason for imposing a protective tariff is to compel the bulk of the people to pay a very considerable sum to certain manufacturers, which sum does not go into the treasury? I am not arguing the point whether that is wise or foolish, but I say it is a necessity of the case, and, when that is so, what folly it is to talk of the per capita taxes levied on the people being measured by the sum which goes into the treasury. The tax is taken out of their pockets, and so far as the great mass of the consumers are concerned it does not matter to them whether it goes into the treasury or whether it goes into the pockets of the protected manufacturers. So, likewise, the hon. gentleman tells us that we cannot have free trade because we have \$30,000,000 of taxes to raise. The question suggests itself to my mind: Why have we \$30,000,000 of taxes to raise? Sir, I tell the hon. gentleman that had reasonable prudence and economy been used in the government of this country, had that Government been administered as the late Mr. Mackenzie would have administered it, we would not require to-day to raise \$30,000,000; I doubt if we would require to raise \$20,000,000; and they make their own vicious extravagance, their own folly, and worse than folly, the excuse for denying the people that relief which they have a right to claim. Sir, the hon. gentleman asked my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, for a policy. Well, this is not the first time the Minister of Finance has made that request. I recollect the hon. gentleman asked Mr. Blaine for a policy. Now he asks Mr. Laurier for a policy, and I have no doubt that Mr. Laurier will be quite prepared to prescribe a policy when he is called in, as I have intimated before.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to see his diploma.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What diploma has the hon. gentleman got to qualify him for the post of Finance Minister?

Mr. FOSTER. Good sense.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He has sense to sit steady on the fence, I grant, and I think that is the only claim he possesses. The hon. gentleman is good enough to bestow on my hon. friend whom I see at the other end of the Chamber, considerable encouragement in the matter of preferential trade. I will also tell the hon. gentleman that I have no doubt the Finance Minister regards preferential trade as an excellent red herring to draw across the track; and so far, he is sure of the sympathy of the Minister of Finance if he will aid and assist him in that benevolent purpose. Now, the hon. gentleman dwelt at length on the percentages of increase in the volume of trade, and with great discrimination he selected 1878, the worst of a prolonged period of depression, as the starting point. Well, Sir, I can do, if I like—though I do not often take the trouble—a little in the matter of percentages, and I will tell him how they come out. I will begin at 1868 and go to 1878. In 1868 the grand total of our imports and exports was 130 millions; in 1878 it was 172 millions. The grand total had increased in those ten years, 42 millions, being at the rate of a little over 3 per cent per annum, compounded. From 1878 to 1888 the sum total had increased from 172 millions to about 201 millions, being less than 2 per cent per annum during those ten years, and 50 per cent less than the increase from 1868 to 1878. If he chooses to add the other five years, it would only make, all told, an increase of about 2½ per cent during the whole fourteen years from 1878 to 1892, as against the increase from 1868 to 1878. Well, it is satisfactory to know there is some increase; but I am bound to say, it does not strike me as being such an overwhelming increase for a country in the position of Canada. If we come to the hon. gentleman's favourite per capita argument, and if we take the trade of twenty years ago, we find that in 1873 our grand total of exports and imports was $217,811,000. This year it is $241,000,000. Now, our population in 1873 was under four millions, and our trade amounted to $57 per head. In 1892, when our population is about five millions, our trade per head is $48. Our trade to-day is $9 per head less than it was nineteen years ago, and $45 a family less than it was at that time. As I have said, I do not depreciate the increase, I am very glad to see it, but, at the same time, let the hon. gentleman do his—what shall I call it?—his roaring with some discretion, and not select facts that any school boy who has access to the Trade and Navigation Returns can turn upside down with five minutes' attention. Sir, the plain fact of the matter is this—and the Minister of Finance ought to understand it, and if he does not understand it, it will be our more or less painful duty to make it plain to him—the position of the greater part of Canada to-day, the position, at any rate, of the older provinces of Canada, is that of a country which has unfortunately fallen to a stationary or retrograde condition. There has been an enormous shrinkage in values, a shrinkage which largely overbears all the increases which the hon. gentleman has enumerated. Canada, moreover.—and this is a serious consideration for a Minister of Finance, with or without a diploma—Canada, moreover, is largely a tribute-paying country. We are obliged every year, either on account of individual or general indebtedness, to pay a sum of about 25 to 30 millions to our English creditors. Further than that, Canada is an enormously taxed country. First of all, there is a tax of 30 millions which goes into the Federal treasury; next to that, there is a tax, as I believe, of an amount about or quite equal, which goes into the pockets of the protected manufacturers; and thirdly, there is a very heavy tax paid to the United States Government under the operation of the McKinley tariff. Now, although I do not want to depreciate the value of English markets, I must tell the hon. gentleman, I must tell his followers, that they are leaning on a broken reed if they hope to induce the people of this country to believe that the English markets are going to compensate us, as regards the great majority of farm products, in any shape or way for the American markets we have lost. We may send cheese, we may send wheat, we may send beef, we may send dairy products generally to the English market and do well there; but for almost all other articles, for almost all the vegetables we raise, for our horses, for our barley and for our eggs, I tell the hon. gentleman that it is an absurdity, 'in rerum natura,' to suppose that the English market, under any circumstances, will ever be one-half as favourable to us as the American market is known to be. Now, Sir, I spoke just now of the amount which we paid to the protected manufacturers. This is an important point, bearing largely on the whole argument of the hon. gentleman. Now, I think those in the House on either side who have paid any attention to economic questions, will agree that the measure of a tax is of necessity the difference between the cost of the article consumed under such a system, and the cost of the same article in open market. I will apply that test to a very few manufactures. First of all, we will take the article of cotton. Now, Sir, from cotton last year we obtained a revenue of $1,114,000. What was the tax that we paid on the article of cotton? There is a difficulty here, because there is some dispute as to the exact value of the cotton consumed in this country. Various figures have been given to me. Some persons put it at $4 per head, some put it at a little less; but having made a careful examination into the amount formerly imported and the amount of raw material now consumed, I believe that I am well within the mark in saying that the total value of the cotton goods now consumed in Canada, ranges somewhere between $17,000,000 and $20,000,000, including what is imported and what is produced in this country. Sir, it is known to all hon. gentlemen here that our taxes on cotton, especially on the coarser varieties go into high figures; but I
