Many of those to whom I have talked about unification have expressed grave doubts or have failed to understand what is meant by it. I do not think the officials of the department understand it. The Prime Minister said he was surprised by Air Chief Marshal Miller's testimony. I will not repeat his evidence except to say that the man who was chief of the defence staff for two years, the man closest to the minister and undoubtedly one of his advisers said as found on page 2300 of the committee testimony:

> We never had tentative unification plans submitted and agreed to.

The Prime Minister was surprised and the reporters felt that he would not go ahead with this measure and that it would be postponed. That did not happen.

I have known the minister for many years. We have been friends, we belong to the same church. I do not know whether that makes us any better but it should. I say to him in conclusion that there is enough sound criticism to justify him in withdrawing this bill. If he does so he will be a bigger man in the eyes of the people, in the eyes of this parliament and of the armed forces. If the minister retreats from a position that is unsafe and intolerable, so far as his political ambitions are concerned the Canadian people will laud him for it and he will live to fight again another day.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question. Does he not agree that because some insisted in the early years of world wars I and II on proceeding with the established way of doing things, many lives were lost needlessly? Did the hon. member not hear one of his colleagues the other night, in commemorating the events at Vimy, describe how soldiers had fought uphill in kilts with mustard gas flowing up their legs? That veteran came down hard on the side of change, hard on the side of an intelligent application of the rules of today to the problems of today and tomorrow. We should do that rather than looking back to the way things were done in the years gone by. Would the hon. member, as a friend, really want me to withdraw or retreat from a position which I believe sincerely and with all my being to be right, to a position which I believe to be wrong? I am sure he would not want me to do that.

Mr. Rynard: I thank the minister very sincerely for what he has said regarding his conscience on this subject. I have advised him as my conscience has prompted me.

Regarding the minister's contention that many lives could have been saved, I agree. I think he will agree that hindsight is always better than foresight and I remind him that changes did take place. We began with trench warfare and then as the war progressed it became a scientific war. Winston Churchill, that great prime minister and war hero, was the man who introduced tanks in the first world war. It was simply a question of progress. Because we did not have any better we could not do other than we did.

Mr. Hellyer: But he did that against tremendous resistance by the military conservatives of the time.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Churchill was a Conservative.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Rynard: I would say we would be very foolish if we did not adopt scientific equipment as it came along. I also feel that the public does not understand the unification bill enough and I do not believe—I say this in all sincerity to the minister, holding him in the respect I do—that he or his staff have the answers for the people.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, my intervention in this debate is made partly to continue some remarks I had not finished the other day. But to begin with I have an apology to make and I hope the committee will bear with me if it is in lighter vein than the serious and important discussion which has just been going on.

When I last spoke I said I believed there were more economic ways in which the minister could be spectacular than by deciding to scrap the navy, obliterate the air force and do away with the army. I made a couple of suggestions as to how he could get headlines. Since then I have been subjected to a good deal of good-natured criticism by some of my associates, chiefly veterans of the air force, because I limited my suggestions to land and sea and made none as to how the minister could get some headlines in the air environment. This was especially unfortunate, they said, since the minister of defence of Rhodesia had only recently gotten himself worldwide notice by making a parachute jump at the age of 56. It has been reported that he was interviewed by the press afterwards. They asked him what it was like. He is reported to have said, "It was perfectly simple. I just counted 16, pulled the ripcord and floated down." Someone who had been in the air force asked him why he had counted 16, adding "When I was in the air force we were told to count to 10 before pulling the ripcord." The minister replied: "Well, I thought I would just be different and count to 16 because that is the latitude of Salisbury."

All this opens up tremendous possibilities for the Minister of National Defence because in this country he has a choice of latitudes to use as numbers to count from about 43 to 90. Taking his pick from any number in that range I am sure he would make headlines one way or the other. In addition, he would have the advantage of being different, of getting away from what is customary and old-fashioned in the air forces of the world.

Now I wish to turn to a more serious matter. A great deal of publicity—"propaganda" would perhaps be a better word—has been given to the myth that if we pass the bill before us we shall have the most modern concept of defence anywhere in the world. If whether or not a thing is modern is judged by how new it is, I can made a suggestion to the minister. He could be even more modern, and could have an even more modern defence policy by withdrawing Bill C-243 and taking the advice which has been almost unanimously given him by the men who are most knowledgeable on the subject of defence.

But the word "modern" has a deeper meaning. It does not mean just what happened last. In its best sense it means a concept which has developed as a result of maximum use of the accumulated knowledge of a field up to the present. In my judgment the actions of the minister do not accord with this definition. He has rejected out of hand advice given by conscientious, loyal Canadians who believe sincerely that the road on which we are embarked will not be the best for this country. That is putting it mildly. Most people think that if we continue on this course it will be disastrous for the military security of Canada.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

The minister dismisses this sort of thing. For example, he said the other day that at one time, when integration was in process, Britain was ahead of us but that now we were ahead of Britain.

This is a myth. We are not ahead of anybody if nobody is following in the direction we are taking. This proposal for unification has been rejected by every country in the world which has examined it. In this connection, for some weeks Lord Mountbatten was quoted with approval by the supporters of unification. Mountbatten is recognized almost throughout the world as being the high priest of combined operations. He was in charge of combined operations in the second world war, in command of a special force made up of units of the army, the air force and the navy to carry out special tasks.

I should like to quote from what he has said. I know this has been quoted in part already during this debate but I believe it is worthy of repetition. He is speaking of the system of defence in Great Britain.

> In the operational commands, such as the Far East, the three separate service commanders-in-chief of four-star rank have been replaced by fleet, army and air force commanders of three-star rank under a unified commander-in-chief of four-star rank.

> He is in complete operational command but his administrative responsibilities are still very limited. We have had an admiral, then an air chief marshal and now a general filling this post.
> Few people still oppose the integration of arrangements for pay, food, clothing, furniture, equipment, etc., since this must be a more economical way of providing them.

I may interject that I commend the minister for what he has done on integration and I agree almost entirely with that program, but I do not agree with unification. Lord Mountbatten goes on:

> In fact I believe the British reorganization, although much disliked and opposed by many senior officers at the beginning is now accepted as reasonable and more efficient and economical.
> In the British reorganization care has been taken to preserve esprit de corps and morale and those traditions which help to maintain this in the services and fighting units.
> It has been accepted that to achieve this the three services must retain their uniforms and ranks with an identifiable professional head of their service. The idea of a single uniform and rank structure was also rejected as undesirable and unnecessary.
> There was some talk of taking the uniform and ranks of one service and imposing this on the others, but the idea of a man in say army uniform with an army title arriving at a foreign port in command of a warship was generally felt to be so ludicrous that it was not pursued.

The general cut and colour of naval uniforms are internationally so well known that a sailor from any one country can readily be recognized as a sailor in any other country.

Sailors the world over take great pride in this and so in their own services do soldiers and airmen. No compensating advantage could be seen in attempting to impose so unpopular a change.

At this point I would like to interject that the question goes deeper than just the cut of a uniform when a young man decides to join one of the services, whether in peace or wartime. In the part of the world from which I come there is a long, deep tradition of the sea, and men from that area who want to serve in the armed forces frequently join the navy, if they have this tradition of the sea in their families. They will not want to join a unified force if they do not know where they are going to end up.

It has been said that we have a jet age Minister of National Defence. That opinion was widespread a few months ago, but now the Canadian people are coming to realize we have a Minister of National Defence who is following a philosophy that went out of style over 100 years ago. The attitude of the minister so far as technically capable advisers are concerned, men who have given their whole lives to the study of military problems, is that their great wealth of knowledge is useless and no longer applicable to the present day. I disagree wholeheartedly with that point of view.

The minister's philosophy of the role of senior military officers is that theirs is not to reason why, theirs is but to do and die, that what is to be done will be imposed from the top without any valid consideration given to the experience of our senior officers in the military field, or to the experience of our allies, and of all other countries.

The minister has said, and rightly so, that there should be civilian control of the military. With this I agree wholeheartedly. I have yet to know of anyone who would question that proposition, either in or out of the services. I think that every responsible officer in our armed services has always known that in this country civilian control is not only essential but that it has always been recognized. However, that is not to say that we should embark on a course which will do irreparable damage to our defences and to our national security, just to show who is boss.

Certainly we can have civilian control. We have always had civilian control and I trust we always will; but this does not preclude the necessity of having technical military advice as to what policy should be with regard to our defence problems. But the minister has this magnificent obsession that he is going to make sure that the military are controlled by civilians, and appears to take the attitude that one should discard all military advice that does not coincide with one's own thinking.

This sort of thinking reminds me of the fellow who had an obsession about being superstitious. He wanted to impress everybody with the fact that he was not superstitious and ended up jumping out of a 13th storey window to prove he was not superstitious.

Mr. Hellyer: Explain the moral of that story?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): We are in the situation where we are cutting off our noses to spite our faces. We are going to take our navy out of blue because other countries, chiefly Britain and France from which most of our heritage stems, dress their sailors in blue. I cannot understand this sort of thinking. I think we are becoming a fairly mature nation—at least we should be on this our hundredth anniversary—and I think if we claim to be taking our place in the world as a mature nation, we should act like a mature nation and not discard some of our most worth-while traditions, customs and technical procedures because someone else thought of them first, or because we have inherited them from somewhere else.

Much of what we stand for has a long history. We are the beneficiaries chiefly of European culture, European language, European developments, and European education. We should not be ashamed of that fact. We should not embark on this narrow-minded or ingrown kind of nationalism upon which we seem to be proceeding now.

It is said that we have got to have a unified force so that none of our armed services will look like the armed services of any other country. I think that would be not only unnecessary but a great disadvantage. We are proceeding on a course which is contrary to the general trend in the world today. We are in a world which recognizes more and more that internationalism will be the means for us and our culture to survive, if we are to survive. If our western civilization is to survive there must be co-operation among all the various nations in that civilization in defence and security matters, as well as in many other fields. Yet, it seems to be our intention to put ourselves, as it were, in a ghetto so that we will not be contaminated by contact with the customs or methods that are imported from other countries.

• (5:30 p.m.)

I believe this is an unreasonable and juvenile attitude. I do not think, in order to be good Canadians, it is necessary to deny our past or deny what we have inherited from other cultures. I believe this is a time when our armed forces should be organized in such a manner that they are compatible with the armed services of our closest friends and allies, so that they can work smoothly together in the various alliances in which we are a member. I believe, as many of our senior military advisers have said, that only in that way can we benefit to the greatest extent from the experiences of our friends, and only in that way can we work most closely with them.

This is a poor time for us to take the narrow minded ingrown view that to be a good Canadian we must do everything different from everybody else.

Mr. Hellyer: Or vice-versa.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I consider myself to be a loyal Canadian. To my mind that does not preclude my recognition of my heritage; it does not make me feel ashamed that Canadian sailors may look like French sailors or United States sailors because they are dressed in navy blue. If we were to pursue this kind of narrow minded thinking to its logical conclusion, then all of us would have to change our names to something which could not be identifiable with an origin in some other country. That would be the result if one were to bring this kind of thinking to its absurd conclusion.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is a very important matter. It is a technical one, it is true, and one which perhaps does not fire the imagination of many Canadians because they do not feel they are technically qualified to form a judgment on the matter. As I said before, however, I think the question of national defence and national security, to which we as taxpayers have contributed roughly $1½ billion per year for many years, now is too big a question to be settled without the most serious consideration because, as time progresses and as more evidence is gathered, we find that more and more people feel sincerely and strongly that we are embarking on, and are locked into, a disastrous course.

I implore the minister to reconsider this matter. I ask him to rise to the occasion and show that he is a man, if he is. I suggest to him that he should take seriously some of the advice which has been given to him. If he would do this, we would have some confidence in this government and I am sure the Canadian people would regret less their having elected it. I am sure also that the government would have a better prospect of being a government again if its members would realize their responsibility and accept the fact that the minority position they hold which allows them to be the administrators of the trust of government for all Canadians for a very brief period does not give them the right to be dictators and to ignore completely what is the will of the majority.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, last night I was cut off in the full flood of my remarks because time ran out on me. I do not know whether you were in the chair at that time, but I am sure, had you been, that you must have been disappointed, because I was about to deal with the speech made last Wednesday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Of course, in the opinion of that minister there is nothing more important than a speech which he makes. I wish to pay my tribute to the exalted position he occupies. As I said, his speech dealt with the subject of external affairs. Unless we are very clear on that subject our defence policy will not make sense. Our understanding all along has been that foreign policy is declared and that our defence policy then is designed to meet that foreign policy, or is tailored to fit it.

Last Wednesday I was hoping that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would give us a very clear statement with regard to Canada's position concerning our external relations, and where we stand in the field of foreign affairs. The minister thought he had done that; but when one reads his speech he finds that there are some question marks. In the course of the speech the minister dealt with the subject of the proposed reorganization of our defence forces. He gave us no evidence in this regard, but he did give us what he considered to be a weighty opinion. After all, the speech that was given to us was that of none other than the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Normally one bows when his name is mentioned. He may have thought he was speaking to his friends in the ambassadorial circles around town instead of to those persons who know him well in this House of Commons.

I was not as interested as some persons might have been by this apparently weighty opinion expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He did not tell us that he had examined the evidence of the committee. Heretofore he has not exhibited any great interest in defence matters; yet apparently he felt competent to tell us what should be done.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs attempted to clear up the situation with regard to our alliances, yet he left a great escape route—a loophole. I should like to read these words of the minister which appear at page 14565 of Hansard:

> I do not exclude the possibility that in the future it may become feasible, and indeed I hope it will, to withdraw our forces from Europe and to make our entire contribution from bases in Canada.

This is diplomatic language. Every word is very carefully selected, because it will be read and interpreted around the word. Here we have the Secretary of State for External Affairs hoping that we will be able to withdraw our forces from Europe and make our entire contribution from bases in Canada.

At a meeting of the external affairs committee last spring I asked him whether it would be a feasible proposition to use our transport airplanes to rotate our troops in Europe more frequently, rather than leave them there for a year. I asked him whether or not it would be feasible to rotate the troops much more frequently, rather than at considerable expense leaving them over there with their dependants for a year. I suggested they could be rotated at intervals of perhaps three or six months. I do not remember his exact words but he indicated his assent to that proposition. He then received phone calls and communications from countries in Europe, and other countries with whom we are in alliance in this situation, and he became greatly disturbed because he thought I had trapped him into giving an answer. Actually I was just looking for information.

Periodically when I find that not enough attention is being paid to the minister for external affairs in the house I ask him a question on orders of the day. Frequently he does not answer my questions and we are deprived of information. Nevertheless I like to draw attention to him so his name gets in the papers, because I know he loves the publicity.

The minister has now enunciated his doctrine of withdrawing our forces from Europe and making our entire contribution from bases in Canada. He then went on to say this:

> But such a course of action is neither feasible nor desirable at this moment—

He had to have an escape hatch. What does he have in mind as to when this may take place?—next week, next month, later on this year or next year? The minister for external affairs failed in this regard to give the house the exact circumstances relating to our foreign policy. Why did he not make a statement which would not be subject to misinterpretation? He could have told us that we were going to maintain our forces in Europe under our alliances in NATO throughout 1967, 1968 and 1969 unless the NATO allies together in conference decided there should be a change. He did not do that. He left everything in mid-air. I suggest the statement indicates that there is nothing certain about the maintenance of our forces in Europe. In fact the minister hopes that they may be withdrawn.

Later on in the same paragraph he created another escape hatch which he would use if one queried him about this during orders of the day, when he said:

> Until we can be sure that we can make an appropriate and effective military contribution entirely from Canada, or until a Canadian contribution is no longer considered necessary, we should continue contributing forces in Europe as part of a collective defence.

He says we should continue, but he does not say that we are actually going to continue. He leaves the Canadian public in a state of uncertainty as to whether or not we are really going to maintain our NATO alliance and our contributions in Europe, or at what strength. He said nothing about our responsibility in antisubmarine warfare. We have a commitment to NATO to maintain an effective and large antisubmarine force. We heard evidence before the committee on defence that the antisubmarine force no longer is as large as it was, and that ships now available are undermanned, with some of them tied up for want of personnel.

The minister said nothing about NORAD; yet the whole purpose of getting him into this debate was to obtain from him a clear and definitive statement on foreign affairs. I was very disappointed in the minister, as I am almost every week, because in the course of my remarks I complimented him and referred to his lengthy career in the house. I outlined the highlights of that career and the many good things he has accomplished. I did not mention any of his failures. I was very complimentary to him. But when he rose to speak he did not return the compliment, in fact he was inclined to ridicule me. I was rather hurt because I had tried to be friendly and help the minister, under whose direction Canada's prestige abroad has fallen to an all time low. I tried to help him, so his spirits would be revived. Not only did he brush me aside but he misinterpreted what I had said. Perhaps he did so unconsciously or inadvertently, but he did refer to what I had said about peace restoring as peacekeeping.

The expression peace restoring has been used on many occasions by the Minister of National Defence and others. There is a vast difference between peace keeping and peace restoring. Let me read what the minister of defence said on December 7, 1966 as reported at page 10832 of Hansard:

> Even the success or failure of peace restoring or peace keeping operations can well depend on the speed with which decisions are reached and the force and its equipment delivered to the trouble zone.

The phrase peace restoring was used during the committee study of this bill. I had hoped that the minister for external affairs would tell us something about peace restoring. He did not do that, but rather referred to peacekeeping.

There are two distinct methods of operating, one is peace keeping, which we are doing at the present time in Cyprus and in the Gaza strip as well as other places where we have observers. Peace restoring involves sending a punitive expedition to a place where trouble has broken out. That force must be prepared to engage in warfare and put out the so-called brushfire or trouble that has occurred.

At page 10835 of Hansard for December 7 last year the minister is recorded as having said:

> It can be said with assurance that Canada's influence in the years ahead and its capacity to act in favour and settlement of disputes that endanger peace will grow with its own development.

Note that the minister referred to the settlement in disputes. There is a dispute taking place now in Aden. People are firing rifles at each other and throwing bombs. Last week there was a dispute between Israel and Syria when aircraft were attacking each other. Our Canadian forces, in order to perform in that capacity—settling disputes or restoring peace—must be prepared to enter into warfare to enforce peace. Let us have a statement from the minister for external affairs in this regard. He did not give us such a statement, but dodged the issue. He is very skilful at dodging issues. So when I hoped that he would talk about peace restoring, he talked about peace keeping.

My proposal for peacekeeping was that it should be separate and apart from our armed forces. The Secretary of State for External Affairs had to admit that what we are carrying on in Cyprus and the Gaza strip is a police operation. We do not require heavy tanks, close support aeroplanes or artillery for that job. Those things are not there with our people; they have light arms for self-protection. That is the way in which we are performing in our missions abroad. It is a police operation. I was suggesting that we continue that type of operation, within the limits of reasonable expense and with the co-operation of others in the United Nations, but that we do it, not by using our navy, army and air force, the forces that are equipped for war, but by using a special, elite force which is a peace keeping force.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs rejected the idea and thought we should continue to do what we are now doing. The weakness of the minister's position is just this: At the external affairs committee yesterday—and I am not reporting the committee hearings; I am reporting what appeared in the newspapers and on television last night—the minister made a lengthy statement with regard to Viet Nam and outlined a four-pronged program to be put into effect immediately, if possible, when that war comes to an end. This was his contribution to the situation in Viet Nam and part of the continuing process of keeping in the limelight with regard to matters concerning peace. The minister periodically has a press conference, an exposure on television, or makes a speech somewhere, and if all those things fail he can call together the committee on external affairs and get his publicity that way. In the course of that exercise he suggested that if and when peace does come in Viet Nam, Canada is prepared to make a contribution with regard to the maintenance of that peace, which means another peace keeping force when the war comes to an end.

How many people would be involved in that peace keeping force? Speculation in the press is that we might require as many as 30,000 men for that purpose. I do not know whether that figure is inflated. But if Canada participates, it cannot be just on a small scale; it would surely have to be on a battalion scale, two battalions, or something like that. You might find that you were providing for activities in Viet Nam 1,000 people from our armed forces over and above the 800 that are in Cyprus, as well as the others that are in the Gaza strip and elsewhere. We have about 2,000 people abroad right now on peace keeping missions.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has offered another group for another peace keeping mission. Where is he going to get the men? Our national defence figures indicate a serious depletion in the strength of our forces. They used to number about 120,000 or 125,000; now they are down to 104,000. All the 13 infantry battalions are, on the average, under strength and have been for some months. There is a deficiency of 4,000 infantrymen in those battalions. There is a deficiency of 4,000 men to man the ships in our antisubmarine role.

Where is the Secretary of State for External Affairs going to get these men? Is he going to reduce our commitments to NATO? I submit that we are not meeting our commitments to NATO at this very moment, because we have reduced the effectiveness of our air division overseas. The two infantry brigades in Canada that are earmarked under NATO for an emergency are not up to strength. The antisubmarine force which is earmarked for NATO purposes is under strength. So where is the Secretary of State for External Affairs going to get another 600 or 1,000 men for a peace keeping operation in Viet Nam, if peace is declared in that country? This shows the extent of the confusion in the government ranks with regard to these matters.

If the minister is going to make an offer—he has publicly made the offer now, and if peace is declared this summer Canada would be obligated to do something about it—we would have to provide a force, if parliament consented, reduce our commitments to NATO, and reduce our commitments for home defence. So it is quite clear that we have not had given to us by the Secretary of State for External Affairs a clear exposition of our obligations in foreign affairs and to our allies.

Why did he not tell us last Wednesday, when he was making his speech, what his proposition was with regard to Viet Nam? He did not disclose it in the House of Commons, and exposed his hand at the committee hearings on Tuesday, and to the press and the Canadian public over television. So we now have another commitment just around the corner, and we are already short of men in the forces and are failing to meet our present commitments. That, sir, constitutes part of what I intended to say last night with regard to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have not quite finished, but I think there will be another opportunity to deal with him and I hope he will be present to hear me.

I call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will carry on with this debate. If we should conclude it during the course of the day we will take the bill standing in the name of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and following that such other business as appears on the order paper.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 13, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—OMISSION OF REFERENCE TO SASKATCHEWAN IN TRAVEL BUREAU DOCUMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting almost a million people in this country, specifically in the province of Saskatchewan. I have before me a document entitled "Special Centennial Events" issued by the Canadian Government Travel Bureau, Ottawa, under the authority of the Department of Trade and Commerce. On the second page the following appears:

Abbreviations of Provinces and Territories
Alberta—Alta.
British Columbia—B.C.

The Northwest Territories is the last listed. Saskatchewan is entirely omitted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Saskatchewan is entirely omitted in the portion dealing with abbreviations. We know that in that province we may be in the bad books of the present government; we might indeed be described as canines, but I ask the Department of Trade and Commerce to rectify this very serious omission.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps I ought to deal with such an important question, and reassure the right hon. gentleman that I shall take the matter up at once with the premier of Saskatchewan to see if he cannot explain this omission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This involves the Department of Trade and Commerce, not the premier.

MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

Third and final report of special joint committee respecting Mr. Justice Landreville—Mr. Laflamme.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ISSUING OF WRITS FOR BY-ELECTIONS

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that by order in council PC 1967-737 of April 13, 1967, writs have been issued today for by-elections to be held on Monday, May 29, 1967, in the five federal electoral districts of Sudbury, in Ontario, and Hull, Outremont, Papineau and Richelieu-Vercheres in Quebec.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REFERENCE TO BUSINESS COMMITTEE OF TIME ALLOCATION RESPECTING DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I propose that the question of allocation of time on the committee of the whole stage and all remaining stages of procedure on Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof, as amended, being government order No. 107 on today's order paper, be referred to the business committee under the terms of standing order 15-A.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The old guillotine.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to provisional standing order 15A the question stands referred to the business committee.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

REPORTED SPEECH BY STATE SECRETARY RESPECTING METHOD OF OBTAINING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister the other day whether the government had given consideration to the suggestion put forward by the Secretary of State, as reported in the press, that native born Canadians should in future be required to apply for and qualify for citizenship papers.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have received the text of what the Secretary of State did say on that occasion, and the text indicates that the report was entirely inaccurate.

Inquires of the Ministry

Mr. Diefenbaker: I asked whether the government was giving any consideration to this outrageous proposal.

Mr. Pearson: There has been no such proposal, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBLE MARCH ON OTTAWA BY DAIRY PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Agriculture. The minister is doubtless aware that the Ontario and Quebec dairy producers are organizing a march on Ottawa. Does the minister intend to apply a preventive policy by increasing immediately to $5.10 per hundredweight the price of manufacturing milk, with a view to sparing the farmers the expense of coming to Ottawa?

[English]

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): The government's policy has been announced in the proper fashion in this house. Should there be any change in that policy, something which is not contemplated at the present time, it will be announced in the proper way in this house.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

INQUIRY AS TO FREE DISTRIBUTION OF DISPLAY MATERIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. F. Kennedy (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the heavy demand by organizations and institutions for centennial display material, especially flags, what is the policy regarding provision of such material on a complimentary basis?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Well, Mr. Speaker, I have used up all I had for distribution to members of the house on a complimentary basis. Unless and until there is a further supply for the House of Commons and the Senate it is unlikely that there will be a further supply made available to hon. members.

WATER RESOURCES

ONTARIO—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO UPPER THAMES VALLEY CONSERVATION AUTHORITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines, Energy and Resources, of which I have given him notice. Has the minister or any of his officials informed the government of the province of Ontario or the upper Thames river conservation authority that the federal government will no longer contribute its agreed share of 37½ per cent of the cost of conservation and recreational facilities being or to be constructed for the upper Thames river conservation authority, and in particular with respect to such facilities at the Gordon Pittock dam and reservoir at Woodstock, Ontario?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this type of question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Nesbitt: With great respect may I draw to Your Honour's attention that in the spring of the year, because of flooding and other things, this is a very urgent matter. If Your Honour insists I will have to put the question on the order paper, but I would hope Your Honour would accept the question as appropriate.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, things are not as stated by the hon. member. I might point out that the law says contributions by Canada are:

—for the conservation and control of water resources in that province.

They are not for recreational purposes. However, it is often very difficult to assess what is for recreation and what is for conservation, and we have had difficulties with respect to projects in Ontario. A provincial-federal task force has just been created which will inquire into the difficulties, and decisions will be made on the basis of its recommendations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—FORMULA FOR FINANCING POSSIBLE UN PEACE FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the announced readiness of Canada to contribute to the United Nations peace force in Viet Nam if and when an appropriate occasion arises, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs advise the house whether any progress has been made in establishing an adequate and acceptable formula for financing such an operation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As far as the United Nations is concerned this matter is under consideration. One would have to await the outcome of the discussions in the committee before one could give a satisfactory answer.

CONSIDERATION OF FRIENDSHIP AND PEACE AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Having in mind the British government's decision to take up with the U.S.S.R. a proposal for a friendship and peace agreement, would the minister be willing to give consideration to the wisdom of Canada following a similar approach?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take notice of this question.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BELL ISLAND, NFLD.—ASSISTANCE FOR UNEMPLOYED MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister based on newspaper reports from Newfoundland and on correspondence I have received concerning the pitiful and appalling conditions on Bell Island arising from the closing of the mine there. I want to ask the Prime Minister whether any negotiations are in progress between the government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland for a joint federal-provincial program to alleviate conditions on the island and do something about the unemployed miners and their families in that area.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): There have been discussions going on. I would be glad to take the question as notice and give a more complete answer tomorrow.

Mr. Douglas: Can the Prime Minister tell us what departments of the federal government are involved?

Mr. Pearson: More than one department, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO MEET UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): My question is directed to the Minister of Labour. I would ask him whether his attention has been drawn to the press release issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics under the authority of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, showing that as of March 18 unemployment in Canada had risen to 400,000 or some 59,000 higher than it was in March of last year. In view of this situation is the minister in a position to advise us what measures, other than the usual flamboyant and optimistic statements, the government intends to take to meet a problem which each month is recurring, as it has in the last several months?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Regardless of what may be said about flamboyant statements I would draw attention to the fact that more people were actually working in March of this year than last year. It may be that there was a slight increase in March, a regrettable increase, in unemployment, but it is a fact that there are certain adjustments that usually take place in the months of December to March, and that unemployment is at the peak in the month of March. I would think the improvement will set in, as is expected, in the present month of April.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister to explain why it is that in March this year unemployment is 59,000 higher than at the same time last year.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. These supplementaries are argumentative.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In order to check unemployment, is it the minister's intention to recommend to his colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) the implementation of the Chevrier-Martin program that was in operation between 1959-1962?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

QUEBEC—INTEGRATION OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MANPOWER CENTRES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. René Tremblay (Matapédia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

According to a report in a Montreal newspaper this morning, the federal manpower centres in Quebec are about to be integrated with the provincial employment offices.

Could the minister tell us whether he has any knowledge of this plan and whether he had anything to do with it?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that plan. On the contrary, we have increased and are still increasing our staff in manpower centres. So, I have not taken part in the development of this plan, to such extent as it may exist.

AGRICULTURE

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING DIFFICULTIES IN HIRING TRANSIENT LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. On Tuesday of this week I directed a question to the Minister of Agriculture asking if he would look into the excessive amount of bookkeeping and red tape which farmers have to go through when hiring transient or part time help. The minister said the matter was being referred to the commission, I presume the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I would now ask the Minister of Labour has it been referred to the commission, has the commission reported to him, and could the minister report to the house?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture did discuss the matter with me pursuant to the assurance he gave. Yesterday I met with the officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and was assured that the program had been in force for some 12 or 13 days only and that they had had no prior representations. However, in the light of what was said by my colleague the Minister of Agriculture they are studying the matter and have promised a report early next week.

TELEVISION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING FEDERAL EDUCATIONAL AGENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. In view of the minister's speech in Sherbrooke in which she said the C.B.C. is not the most appropriate agency to carry out the role envisaged for the federal educational television agency, will she take an early opportunity on motions to tell this parliament what the government has in mind concerning educational television?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have been anxiously awaiting the opportunity to make that statement, but not on motions because it would be too long. I would hope to make the statement when the supplementary item is called.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether she has given due consideration to the propriety of asking this house to vote supply in the amount set out under supplementary estimate item F in respect of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this question is not in order.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on the question of order, may I say that I am simply asking the minister for information concerning her views about proceeding with an application of this kind 14 days after the year has expired in respect of which the estimate is to be spent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking a very interesting question, but I suggest it should not be asked at this time.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question also is directed to the minister. In view of the fact that in its last report the broadcasting committee suggested an early reference on this question so it could give wide consideration to it, and in view of the meeting currently being held in Toronto, will the minister assure the house that very shortly this matter will come before the broadcasting committee for full consideration?

Miss LaMarsh: Well, Mr. Speaker, as I indicated before, the supplementary item is on the agenda. Presumably it will be one of the early items called at the conclusion of the business which is now before the house. I did say earlier, and on a number of occasions have said publicly, that notwithstanding the fact that it is unusual to use this means of introducing legislation it is neither illegal nor unheard of. In an attempt to meet the request of the provinces to get on with educational television, because of the fact that otherwise it could not be dealt with in the house until late in the centennial session and perhaps not even within the centennial year, the government has taken the position that the item will be called and a statement of purpose given. Only if there appears to be agreement in the chamber will the item be proceeded with. If there should be an apparent and consistent refusal by the house to go on with it, the item would be withdrawn and we would simply have to advise the provinces that the house would not accede to that idea of priority.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether representations in respect of this matter were received by the government from the C.B.C., and whether those representations have been considered.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether this is a proper question, but there have been no representations with regard to that item received by me from the C.B.C.

Mr. Knowles: Were they received with respect to the policy of turning this matter over to another corporation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): My question is supplementary, Mr. Speaker, and is on the same subject. I wonder whether the minister has asked the officials of her department whether, pending the hearings of the broadcasting committee on educational television, this problem could be solved simply by having the C.B.C. construct the facilities in the province of Alberta for this year pending a final decision concerning who is to have this authority.

Miss LaMarsh: Well, someone must obtain approval from parliament for the money. The C.B.C. does not have approval from anyone to spend funds on that particular service.

OTTAWA—INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACTS FOR DEMOLITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Justice or to the Solicitor General of Canada.

In view of the fact that so many people in the area are taking an interest in the wrecking of the Roxborough apartment building and the old printing bureau, does the government intend to set up a commission of inquiry to get to the bottom of that matter and find out if there was anything improper in the way contracts were awarded to the people who wrecked those buildings?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that the question is urgent and should be answered immediately, and the hon. member might want to put it on the order paper. If he disagrees with my ruling, he could raise the matter on the adjournment motion.

Mr. Caouette: At ten o'clock tonight, Mr. Speaker.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO SUPPLY OF BUFFALO MEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. D. McLelland (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Will the minister inform the house whether there is still a considerable amount of buffalo meat available at the present price of 42 cents per pound, which can be obtained for special events for centennial year? If that is so, does this mean the meat is in storage or that the animals will be slaughtered at a later date?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While there seems to be some urgency to the matter raised by the hon. member, I doubt that this type of question should be asked at this time.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF MEETING ECONOMIC COUNCIL TARGET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Labour in his capacity as the minister responsible for housing. Have his officials made an estimate as to how close we will come this year to meeting the target of 170,000 homes which the economic council has suggested will be required for this year?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it has been estimated that housing starts will reach the production level of 170,000 per annum during the current year.

In view of the relatively few starts during the first three months of this year, it may be that we may not reach that level during 1967, but that annual level or rate of starts should be reached within a matter of months.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Does the minister have any figure as to the number of completions estimated for 1967?

Mr. Nicholson: I should perhaps take that question as notice, but if I recall correctly the estimated level is between 150,000 and 155,000.

AIR CANADA

REPORTED DELAY IN OBTAINING REPLACEMENT ENGINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport, but in his absence I shall address it to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement by the sales manager of Air Canada in Timmins, Ontario, that several DC-8's and DC-9's cannot be put into service because it is impossible to obtain the necessary engines which are normally acquired from the United States, would it be possible to renegotiate this contract in order to obtain engines from the British Rolls Royce Company and in this way put these aircraft into service during centennial year?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question should be placed on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED PROTESTS RESPECTING TRADES TRAINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the minister received a letter from the Sydney unemployed workers' association expressing dissatisfaction with the manpower office methods of selecting applicants for trades training? If so, what reply has he made?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember receiving such a letter, but I will make inquiries and give an answer tomorrow.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether in his reply he will indicate whether adequate publicity will be given to the trades training program in order that the public may be well-informed. At the same time, since there is some confusion as a result of the transfer of this program from the federal government to the provincial government, will he elaborate on this program?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I must be a little bit prudent in this regard because as yet this proposed measure has only been given first reading. As soon as it is passed I will be in a position to give it sufficient publicity.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have a supplementary question. Will the minister indicate why the files have been transferred to the Canadian manpower offices, since the legislation is not as yet in existence?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is argumentative.

RETRAINING OF WORKERS LAID OFF BECAUSE OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question asked last Tuesday by the hon. member for Ontario. He asked me whether my department had been in touch with the government of Ontario for the purpose of providing additional facilities for the training of laid off workers in Oshawa. I should like to inform the hon. member that the officials of my department are reviewing the training situation in Oshawa just about every day with the provincial and local training authorities. As a result the training facilities in Oshawa enroll some 850 workers as of today, which is more than four times as many as a year ago.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that only about 800 are now receiving training while many hundreds are not being trained because of the lack of facilities, will the minister consider providing additional facilities?

Mr. Marchand: The facts I have on hand are as follows. As of yesterday there were in the Oshawa manpower centre 180 candidates registered for training. It is expected that most of these candidates will be in our training courses within two weeks. Only 17 of them are laid off auto workers. I would like to add that only a relatively small proportion of the laid off auto workers show any interest in training.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact they have been told there are no facilities in which to receive training, many of them have been discouraged from applying for training.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You want to encourage them by your speeches.

EXPO '67

INQUIRY AS TO C.B.C. BROADCAST OF OPENING CEREMONIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Following the protests of the big American and European television networks against their inability to rebroadcast the special program of the World Fair formal opening next April 27, due to its overly restricted character, would the minister consider getting in touch with C.B.C. authorities and the General Commissioner, Mr. Dupuy, so as to give that formal opening all the pomp and prestige of a spectacular show and to advertise more widely our World Fair throughout Canada?

POTATOES—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN SURPLUS DIVERSION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister any information to give the house concerning the negotiations, if that is the right word, being carried on at the present time with the government of New Brunswick with regard to surplus potatoes? I ask this question in light of the discussion which took place yesterday in the New Brunswick legislature.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with our program announced some time ago, provincial programs in the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have now been agreed upon which I think are satisfactory to the governments and officials of those provinces.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HALIFAX—REQUEST OF DOCKYARD COUNCIL RESPECTING PAY RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I wonder whether he has had an opportunity to review the telegram from the 700 or 800 members of local 273 of the Canadian Labour Congress. Perhaps I may redirect my question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the telegram has been answered very briefly. A longer answer in letter form is being prepared at the present time and will probably be mailed this afternoon or tomorrow morning.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether at least the most important request in that telegram will be met, that is whether some interim consideration will be given these employees?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now submitting a representation.

C.F.B. SHEARWATER—ASSISTANCE TO CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, although in his absence the Minister of Labour took it as notice. I wonder whether the minister has the answer to that question, and if in considering this matter he will also discuss it with his colleague the Minister of Industry to see whether any change could be made in the policy so these lay-offs at Halifax will not be necessary?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I take it that this question concerns the workers at Shearwater.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Marchand: I would like first to make it clear that these workers were not on the payroll of the Department of National Defence but were employees of Fairey (Canada) Limited, a private firm engaged in repair and overhaul of aircraft. The officials of the Canada manpower centre in Halifax are at this very moment at the naval base interviewing them in order to assess their needs and the kind of assistance which would be most effective. We have already received a request for some 20 workers from a firm in western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. May I ask the minister, as I suggested earlier, if he will discuss with the Minister of Defence Production the possibility of reconsidering the policy pertaining to this work in the hope that the workers in Halifax will be kept at work there.

Mr. Marchand: I am ready to discuss this matter with the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Knowles: You mean the Minister of Defence Production.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VIMY RIDGE SERVICE—INVITATION TO PRESIDENT DE GAULLE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has read the observations made by the ambassador of the Republic of France regarding the absence of General de Gaulle from the Vimy service, and whether any communication has been received from France explaining the reason for the absence of the president and a guard of honour.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, preparations for this year's special fiftieth anniversary ceremony at Vimy Ridge were undertaken by the Department of Veterans Affairs, as has been the case for the annual ceremony in previous years.

The French authorities were informed through diplomatic channels of the Canadian government's wish to hold this special ceremony, of the proposed program and of the intended representation on the Canadian side. The concurrence and assistance of the French authorities for this special Canadian ceremony were sought and obtained. There were continuing consultations on the arrangements, and the French authorities extended all the material assistance and facilities required. The fullest French participation was also sought, and the possibility of inviting General de Gaulle was discussed through diplomatic channels. Had it been possible for him to attend we would have been honoured and delighted.

The French government appointed official representatives both for the ceremony and for the reception of His Royal Highness Prince Philip on his arrival. The level of this representation and the fact that no French troops participated were reflections of the view taken by the French government that this was an essentially Canadian occasion, and should not be interpreted as indicating any lack of French recognition or co-operation. In fact the French authorities have themselves assured us of this.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now I ask the minister the question that was asked yesterday. Was an invitation extended to President de Gaulle; because my reading of what the ambassador said was that no such invitation was extended at any time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I saw the French ambassador in Ottawa yesterday. I know of no basis for this observation by the right hon. gentleman, which I suspect is the result of his own intuitive and original thinking. The French ambassador in London yesterday reportedly explained that the status of the head of state in France was not comparable to that of His Royal Highness Prince Philip, the prince consort. I have made it clear, as the Prime Minister did yesterday, that an invitation was discussed through diplomatic channels, which is the only way in which it could have been discussed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was it extended?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In my opinion nothing would have been a greater effrontery, if the head of state did not propose to attend, than nevertheless to force an invitation. Nothing would have been greater evidence of lack of courtesy to a friendly country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Certainly my powers of intuition have been proven correct. Is it a fact, then, that it was made clear by President de Gaulle or his representatives that he would not attend because the representation of Prince Philip was not on a co-equal basis with him?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that there is no basis in fact for that supposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what you just said.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. When the minister says "through diplomatic channels", was that through our ambassador to France, and is the atmosphere between General de Gaulle and our ambassador to France rather chilly at the present time?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Naturally "through diplomatic channels" in the case of France means it would be undertaken by the Canadian ambassador, Mr. Jules Leger, one of Canada's outstanding ambassadors who enjoys the highest reputation in France.

COAL

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR VICTIMS OF MINE DISASTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, over a week ago the Prime Minister said the government was giving consideration to making a contribution to a fund for the families of the miners at Natal, B.C. who had been killed in the unfortunate mine disaster. I wonder whether any conclusion has been reached with respect to that matter.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO CANCELLATION OF PARLIAMENT HILL PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Will a program be substituted for the "Son et Lumière" program which has been recently cancelled on parliament hill, and if so will it involve the young people who were originally scheduled to participate?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the "Son et Lumière" program has not been cancelled. It is to be run from Nepean Point and will go ahead exactly as scheduled. The program which was cancelled was called "Spectacle on Parliament Hill" which was to have taken place for some two weeks during August only.

Mr. Dinsdale: Can the minister inform the house whether the young people involved will be employed in the "Son et Lumière" program?

Miss LaMarsh: No, what will be involved is only one official language, that of sound and light.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO CONTROL OVER HOCKEY BROADCASTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, may I answer a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Saskatoon with respect to the control of the Stanley Cup hockey telecasts by the C.B.C. As I suggested yesterday, and as has been subsequently confirmed, television rights to the Stanley Cup hockey games are not owned by the C.B.C. but are owned by the MacLaren advertising agency in Toronto. The C.B.C. only sells time to the agency for the broadcast and telecasts. MacLaren Advertising is the owner and has the responsibility for determining which games are to be shown on which networks. We are not in a position to do more than lease the time and the facilities to the agency, and nothing could be done if the MacLaren firm decided to buy the necessary time on CTV only and not use the C.B.C. at all.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Prime Minister?

I would like to know from the Prime Minister, now that by-elections have been announced in Canada, and more particularly in the province of Quebec, whether he will allow the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Sauvé) to run as Liberal candidate in Outremont?

Mr. Speaker: The question is out of order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose last evening clause 2 was under consideration.

National Defence Act Amendment

On clause 2—Canadian forces, Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, it had not been my purpose to take part in this discussion, but in spite of the fact that I do not pretend to be a defence expert, and as a matter of fact have little experience with regard to matters connected with the defence department, I am impelled to take part in the discussion because I believe the emphasis in this debate as outlined by the Minister of National Defence, by his cabinet colleagues and by his supporters has not been constructive but rather destructive. All these gentlemen appear determined to pursue a course which I am convinced is in most respects detrimental to the defence of Canada in present day conditions, either when carried out in co-operation with our allies or by ourselves, and in the fulfilment of our world wide commitments.

First of all I should like to remind the house of the importance of what we are doing here. The fact that we have before us a bill which drastically amends the National Defence Act seems to me to justify very careful examination of this point. Before we even contemplate such a drastic change should we not satisfy ourselves that it is needed?

Before we consider whether the bill before us constitutes an improvement I think we should look over the record of the last half century. We will find, of course, that from a defence point of view we have participated in two world wars. It is my opinion, it has always been my opinion and I believe it will continue to be my opinion, that the world wide prestige of Canada and the glorious reputation which our country has earned for itself is mostly due to our participation in two world wars and to the fact that our servicemen have risen to every occasion and have covered themselves and Canada with glory. Surely I do not need to remind the house that within the last few days our Associate Minister of National Defence made a pilgrimage to the scene of the battle at Vimy, where history was made and a glorious tradition established for us, for our country and for our children to view with pride, a tradition which has gone down in the annuals of our nation.

This is part of the record I am asking members of the house to examine. I ask also that the price paid be remembered. Many Canadian lives were lost, many Canadian bodies were broken and many Canadians were crippled for life. So let us not tamper lightly with the National Defence Act under which these men fought our country's battles.

I will proceed to an examination of the record. Now I come to world war II. I remind the house of the six year period during which the Canadian forces were engaged in many areas of conflict. I remind them of the battle of Britain, of the campaigns in Italy and North Africa, the Dieppe raid and the invasion of France. I pay full tribute to the many people within sound of my voice this afternoon who fought in these battles. Men from all sides and all quarters of this house participated.

It seems to me that before any drastic change—and I emphasize "drastic change" once more—is made in the act this house should carefully examine the record and preserve all that has stood the test of time for more than half a century, during which two world wars were fought and the freedom of the world was at stake. I ask the house, is it not sensible and logical to preserve everything in the present act which has stood the test not only of time but of wartime? Then, Mr. Chairman, having done this, we can strengthen the act in the light of the changed conditions of today.

I agree that we must keep our National Defence Act up to date in the light of the changed conditions of 1967 compared with those of 20 years ago. Having examined the record and decided that we need to reassess and improve the act, let us see what the minister and the government are recommending to the representatives of the people, who after all have the final decision to make. At this point let us keep in mind one fact, and I ask the minister to particularly take note of it. Changes should be made only in the best interest of the defence of Canada and the people of Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: That will be done.

Mr. Flemming: I for one am not satisfied that every clause in this bill presently under discussion does fall within that qualification. Let us examine the title of this act, Mr. Chairman. Bill No. C-243 is an act to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof. The short title is the Canadian Forces Reorganization Act. Sections 15 to 18 of the National Defence Act are repealed, and I should like at this point to refer to what section 15 of the old act says. It reads as follows:

> The Canadian forces are the naval, army and air forces of Her Majesty raised by Canada and consist of three services, namely, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force.

The new act substitutes the following:

> The Canadian forces are the armed forces of Her Majesty raised by Canada and consist of one service called the Canadian Armed Forces.

What does this new provision do, Mr. Chairman? Chiefly it drops the word "royal." I would ask why that word is dropped? Does dropping the word improve the forces or the ability of the forces to defend Canada? This is one point on which I should like the minister to make a statement and explain that omission.

I should like the members of the committee to examine the meaning of the word "royal." Webster's dictionary states that it means magnificent, majestic, excellent. It also says it pertains to a king. In simple language, Mr. Chairman, it implies that this is the superlative of excellence. Why do we drop the word if it denotes the superlative of excellence? If I had my way I would leave it in. If the government's supporters would vote for it I would propose an amendment that the new force be called the "royal Canadian armed forces."

In addition to changing the name, Mr. Chairman, what does the bill presently under consideration contemplate? As I recall the minister's speech, he advanced the idea that when he assumed his responsibilities as minister of defence some four years ago he decided that three things had to be undertaken. The first was to bring the past up to the present, by which he meant we should acquire nuclear warheads for the weapons systems. The second task was to review the equipment programs outstanding; the third was to determine a long range defence policy for Canada.

This was all in progress long before he became minister; there is no question of that. In the result, Mr. Chairman, we acquired nuclear weapons. The minister stated that it was the unanimous opinion of the chiefs of staff and the staff members—and I hope and pray, as I am sure we all do, that this assumption is correct—that a nuclear war was the least likely. The minister has informed us that we are protected, to the extent that we can be protected, against a surprise nuclear attack. Therefore this disposes of that particular requirement.

The minister mentioned the need for flexibility and mobility. As a layman I find no fault with this. I suggest this would mean we should acquire more planes and ships. We are all faced with the need for more flexibility in our respective businesses.

The minister also mentioned the absence of an over-all strategic plan applied to the three services. He deplored lack of co-ordination of equipment programs for the determination of priorities from a national point of view. I do not believe there is very much difference of opinion on this question. The question of national priorities is pretty well understood and agreed with, I suggest. The minister then stressed the need for co-operation to fulfil objectives. There seems nothing wrong with this. He emphasized the need for equipment purchase priorities with national defence in mind.

The conclusion to all these proposals, Mr. Chairman, was of course integration and integrated action; and the minister has outlined the steps which were taken. I emphasize here that there has been little if any objection to the broad principle of integration, though I am sure all of us in this house will agree that it is quite a gigantic task to undertake.

The minister has mentioned the formation of one intelligence agency to replace five. He has mentioned a 30 per cent reduction in personnel in this branch, which he suggests means a financial saving. He has referred to construction engineering and to the advantage of applying common knowledge and experience, again suggesting there will be a saving. There is no objection to this; it is one facet of integration. The minister has also given some information relative to recruitment, and there is no objection to this. He also mentioned information services which have reduced expenditures.

The minister made specific reference to NORAD and air defence command. He forecast a saving of 30 per cent. He mentioned communications, and stated that a long line system for the Canadian armed forces will result in a saving of 18 per cent. The minister stated that the new system is working very satisfactorily. Most of all, he said, it is enabling the defence department to have studies made.

The minister referred to the new combined cataloguing system and the saving in personnel which would result in a 26 per cent financial saving. The minister suggested that all these savings will mean great financial advantage so far as defence spending is concerned.

Adding all these percentages together, Mr. Chairman, it would appear that the minister expects large savings in defence expenditures. Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts? The facts simply are these, that in the estimates tabled in this house a few weeks ago the sums allocated to defence have increased over last year by $115 million, and this after the minister has told us of percentage savings on this item, that item and the other item.

The minister's remarks relative to equipment are to be remembered, Mr. Chairman. I do not propose to repeat them, but he did bring together integration and unification in this regard, and this is what I take objection to. I cannot agree with the unification principle, the doing away with branches of the armed forces and with famous regiments. Integration has been under way for some years and generally speaking it is not unacceptable, but I suggest to the minister unification is an altogether different question.

It is for the minister to show that the bill we are presently studying will improve the ability of the people of Canada to provide for their own defence. I suggest that the minister has not done so. This is not only my opinion but the opinion of many senior officials in his own department, or at least they were members of his department. The minister glibly implies that they are fuddy-duddies who do not care to lose their privileges. I prefer to take the opinion of the career people who have served the country in war and in peace with great distinction rather than the opinion of the minister who seems to wish to disregard his closest and most able advisers if their advice conflicts with the preconceived notions he has acquired through his limited experience in the performance of his duties.

The question on which we are to vote is: Are the suggested changes good for Canada? Will they effect an improvement in the light of modern advancement? I submit the answer is no and I propose to prove that.

Before the minister concluded his remarks on Monday, April 3, he said he would deal with some of the myths which had been raised. This is where he and I part company so far as agreement is concerned. He delves into the world of the theoretical in his reference to so-called myths. He goes up into the clouds. He says the uniforms of the servicemen make little difference, and that the question has been effectively answered. I say, I do not know when, or by whom. He says that uniforms are not unimportant. I say they are very important.

I now digress for a moment. I wish to make my position perfectly clear. The minister simply has not proven his case for unification. That is what he should do. It is not our responsibility to prove he is wrong; it is his responsibility to prove he is right.

No minister of any government should tamper with the defence of the country and make forays into the unknown, all in one big jump. Governments should be satisfied to make necessary changes step by step, one at a time, creeping before they walk, experimenting slowly and bewaring of blundering. We cannot afford to blunder when the defence of our country is at stake. This government has an unenviable record for blundering.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming: That is the question for the Prime Minister to answer. Will the suggested changes improve the ability of our defence department to defend the people of Canada properly? The judgment of many senior officers, generals, admirals, air vice-marshals, distinguished in war and peace is no, they will not. The Minister of National Defence, with practically no experience, says yes, they will. The Prime Minister must decide. I appeal to him to make the good, the well-being of the people of Canada the paramount consideration and to let nothing else matter because the good of Canada should override every other consideration.

I return to my comments regarding Bill No. C-243. The members of this committee have a solemn responsibility when they vote. They must be satisfied that what they vote for is in the best interest of Canada and the defence of Canada. Defence has been referred to by Webster as meaning "resistance to and protection from attack". I repeat those words, "resistance to and protection from attack".

The question we all ask ourselves is whether the changes contemplated will strengthen the ability of our defence forces to resist and protect the country from attack. Many opinions have been expressed. Let us submit them to critical examination and then record our opinion by voting. The government have submitted Bill C-243 which does not stand up under critical examination on the basis that it will effect an improvement over the existing act. It appears to me that they are again guilty of a tampering which will prove to be blundering. I do not believe that the armed forces can be organized for unification in a hurry. I believe it is possible to effect the improvements of integration and still retain the distinguishing and distinguished units, of which there are many, in which many hon. members within sound of my voice have served.

While we acknowledge that equipment and machines play an ever-increasing part in defence, I do not think we can ignore the individual and the part he plays in defence operations. Those advocating changes in the National Defence Act should have in mind the general desirability of appealing to the young men of our country to make a career of the defence of our country. To appeal to young people and to keep recruiting and enlistment on a proper basis it is necessary that young men be able to select the service of their choice and wear a uniform indicating the particular service in which they choose to serve. It is an elementary part of freedom that people select their vocations in life. In the free world we emphasize the right of young men and women to select their lifetime occupations. The record of productivity in the United States and Canada illustrates the wisdom of this feature of our social and economic life.

Where the uniforms of sailors, airmen and soldiers are of the same colour, material and design it is difficult to distinguish one branch of the forces from another, and this will discourage recruiting. Some young men will lose interest in joining. Most young people have natural aptitudes and work best at what they like to do. This bill makes little appeal to our young people to use their talents in the service of their choice and may prevent them from making the maximum contribution toward their own happiness. The bill should make a career in the armed services attractive and it does not do so. It should provide for the saving of money on certain things and it has not done so. It has been said that a certain percentage of money will be saved but according to documents tabled expenditures on defence show an increase of over $100 million over last year's figure.

This bill ought to be so drafted that it will improve the efficiency of the defence forces. The minister says it will do that but many senior officials say it will not. Many senior officers appeared before the standing committee during its 50-odd meetings. Many, with long experience and knowledge respecting military matters, said that this measure will not increase efficiency and will not effect an improvement. That was the opinion of distinguished soldiers, sailors and airmen who fought in the war, who have served their country in peace and war. They deserve better than to have reflections cast on them by anyone. I have more confidence in the judgment of these experienced senior officers than I have in that of the minister at the present time.

To summarize, I have made the point I wished to make. I have said I do not feel that the National Defence Act should be tampered with unless an improvement will result. This bill will not have that effect. Remember, we in this committee are tampering with the defence of Canada, something which does not deserve to be treated lightly. I submit that many portions of the bill are premature, ill-conceived and ill-considered. The measure should not be supported in its entirety. It will not improve the ability of the defence department to perform its proper function, the defence of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Chairman, new ideas are not easily come by nor do they develop overnight. New ideas are not put into practice easily because invariably they conflict with traditions and with customs. In the circumstances surrounding the issue before us there is ample opportunity to discuss the theory of change, social and political conflict, and the moulding of new practice.

For some time now we have been in the thick of this debate on the unification of the armed forces of Canada. It is gratifying to me to travel around my riding and hear people express their opinions on the unification issue. There is a great desire to see us get on with the passage of the bill because, as many people have stated to me, there has been enough discussion, enough repetition. It is now time for a final decision to be made and for consequent action to follow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hopkins: I do not profess to be a military expert, nor do I pretend to be a pessimist about change. As I am not a military expert it is not my intention to discuss all the technicalities that are more familiar to military minds. I feel, however, that there are many things beyond and surrounding this issue which should be brought out at this time.

First, I want to say something concerning the young people of Canada. In his speech in the house last Monday the hon. member for Kamloops indicated that we should get on with the job of building the kind of forces which, when it is necessary to call upon them, will repeat, with the same morale, the same splendid tradition, feats such as those at Vimy Ridge to which we have just paid tribute. Regardless of the way in which the hon. member for Kamloops intended these remarks, I would like to say that we of my generation and those of the younger generation following us, regard the veterans of Vimy Ridge and all veterans of both world wars with pride and with the greatest respect. Many of the young people of Canada today are the sons, daughters or grandchildren of those world war veterans who served with distinction in Canada's armed forces.

There is a point here which must be made and must be clearly understood if we are to be fair to those young people of our country who were under age and were not able to serve in the second world war. I know I can say without reservation that if the young people of Canada were today called upon in an emergency to defend their country, to defend their freedom and the freedom of others, they would rise to the challenge in the same manner as did their predecessors in the second world war and in the first world war. They would do so without hesitation because they have pride in their country and because they would be anxious to uphold the outstanding record of the servicemen who are serving Canada today and the veterans who have served Canada at some time in the past.

A very broad look should be taken at the bill as a whole in the light of many other military decisions which have been taken at the political level. A case in point close to home was the great debate which occurred as a result of the Laurier government's introduction and subsequent passage of the naval bill in 1909 and 1910. As we are all aware, it was Laurier's intention to construct a Canadian navy for the protection of Canadian coastal waters. This would have released ships of the British navy for full time service in that navy, and in the event of a large scale war the Canadian navy could have been placed under the command of the British navy.

Premier Roblin of Manitoba called the proposed Canadian navy a "tin-pot navy". The Conservative opposition took up this cry in many areas of Canada. The naval issue, combined with the reciprocity issue and the controversy surrounding them, resulted in Laurier going down to defeat in 1911. The Borden government decided not to proceed with the building of a Canada navy but instead, to make an outright $35 million donation to Britain for the purpose of building dreadnoughts. The bill for that purpose was passed by this house but was defeated in the Senate by the Liberal senators who still favoured the building of a Canadian navy. Possibly the one really gratifying aspect of this debate is that hon. members opposite are standing up in this house and recognizing the Canadian navy which was really the brainchild of Sir Wilfrid Laurier shortly after the turn of this century.

The passing of certain traditions is a difficult thing for some people to face. It is not my intention to rub salt in any wounds. I am, however, going to point out that many great decisions have been made in the past and that society is still in operation in spite of all the controversy and the gloomy predictions which have surrounded issues, such as the one before us at this time. Time changes many things. The hon. member for Chicoutimi cited some very good examples in his speech the other day. The predecessors of members opposite spoke against a Canadian navy 50 years ago. Today we hear statements from members opposite defending the status quo in respect of the navy. At the same time, several members opposite are determined to defeat this bill dealing with unification of Canada's armed forces just as their predecessors were determined to defeat the naval bill. I submit that at some time in the future this house may well hear some of their successors speak favourably in regard to the legislation now before us providing for the unification of the armed forces of Canada just as hon. members opposite are now supporting the status quo in the Canadian navy to which their predecessors in the Conservative party refused to give birth some 50 years ago.

I would like to submit some other examples to show how difficult it has been to overcome opposition to military change in the past. All of us are quite aware of the mud, mire and wire conditions of the battlefields in France in world war I. In 1916 top military personnel were demanding more men to throw into the slaughter. Many others recognized that only some new technique of combat could break the stalemate of trench warfare. A small group in Britain was promoting the idea of a new weapon called the tank. In order to make the construction of tanks possible Churchill allocated naval funds to the project. In this connection I would like to quote the following from page 748 of the Encyclopedia Britannica:

> In July 1917 despite Tory protests Lloyd George appointed Churchill minister of munitions. In that post he was able to stimulate production of the tank, the decisive weapon of world war I, the development of which he had largely inspired at the Admiralty.

Churchill's success in getting the tank into operation on the battlefields of France saved the lives of thousands of soldiers and was instrumental in bringing the war to a close at a much earlier date. Yet he had to overcome vehement personal criticism and strong opposition.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, new ideas are not easy to come by nor do they develop overnight. If we take a look at France between the two world wars we find that in 1926 de Gaulle was given the task of re-examining the whole military position along France's northeastern frontiers over which had flowed in past centuries so many tides of invasion.

I quote from a book written by Duncan Grinnell-Milne, "The Triumph Of Integrity":

> Throughout 1926, applying his now profound knowledge of military history and science—

The author is speaking of de Gaulle.

> —he studied to devise a fortified line that should not only protect France, but would also provide, should ever the eastern enemy attack again, suitable bases for a spearhead thrust into Germany. By French military authorities the first part of the plan was readily accepted. A "line of fortifications" —did it not embody the lessons of recent war?

His seniors were convinced that the fortified line must be built but they were also convinced that suitable bases for a spearhead thrust should not be built because they failed to recognize the importance of it. In vain de Gaulle protested subsequently that this was only half the plan, that to the shield must be added a sword. The defence minister, one named Maginot, saw to it that de Gaulle was overruled.

Throughout the years 1932 and 1933, even though trouble was brewing in Germany, France's prestige and prosperity were riding high and the military chiefs were complacent because of their pride in their army which consisted of a possible five million men. To exemplify the attitude of leading French military men of the time, I quote an appropriate paragraph from the same book, "The Triumph Of Integrity":

> It was not that they slept, those military chiefs, at least not then. Dazzled by too much sunshine, they might blink myopically at progress, but they were wide awake to the supposed requirements of their beloved army. Against it Germany could do nothing. Everything was ready. Fifteen years after the war they had absorbed all its lessons, so that now they were well prepared to achieve victory in the pattern of 1914, as in 1914 they had been ready to achieve it in the pattern of 1870. No one could teach them anything new; adulation had made them dangerously over-confident. Looking proudly to their defences, they forgot to look to the future.

There are a couple of other paragraphs I would like to refer to showing that among the first with de Gaulle who had this concept were General Fuller and Captain Liddell Hart in England. As the book says, they were among the first:

> —to grasp the idea of using a large force of tanks (and other arms) independently of the infantry which hitherto they had been employed only to support; a force of armour to be regarded not so much as cavalry, but rather as it might be a squadron of warships with auxiliaries, compact, self-supporting, under its own commander. He—> —was certainly the first in France to develop the idea in detail, to lay down the composition of the unit, the "armoured division", to describe its organization, and then to examine its purpose and vast strategic possibilities in modern war. In this examination, and in the logical conclusions he drew from it, he led the world.

At that time de Gaulle wrote a book recommending the formation of six mobile divisions to go along with the Maginot line as the sword. He was turned down by his superiors. He wrote an excellent book outlining his whole program, but so great was the confidence in the senior military personnel of France in that day in the establishment, in military circles, that the book sold only 750 copies. But three of those copies found their way into Germany and into the hands of a very intelligent German colonel. Receiving this information first hand and studying de Gaulle's plans this German colonel, after receiving consent from his superiors, went ahead and organized the very Panzer division that was the first one to set foot on French soil in 1940. Yet de Gaulle was not listened to because his ideas were new and strange.

This is why I rise today to speak of these things that have happened in military history in the past because sometimes we get tied up in the middle of these debates. We become highstrung. We make insinuations and remarks that are anything but kind, but when we are in the middle of dealing with a piece of legislation like this we must look at it with a sense of perspective. Who is to say today what is going to happen 20, 30 or 40 years from now?

Mr. Churchill: Paul Hellyer.

Mr. Hopkins: We cannot, but on the basis of what we know in the present and the things that point to trends in the future surely this is where our judgment must lie. I want to make the point very clear that in bringing in a new piece of legislation like this it is very easy for certain individuals to insinuate that those who are in favour of the legislation do not look with favour on those who fought for their country in the past. I should like to say that such insinuations are absolute nonsense and should not enter into this debate. I do not think there is a member in this House of Commons who does not have the greatest respect and regard for anyone who has ever fought for this country or for world freedom in general.

• (4:00 p.m.)

An hon. Member: It did not sound like that in the committee.

Mr. Hopkins: Certain remarks are being made across the way which are typical. They do not bother me.

Mr. Danforth: They are factual.

Mr. Hopkins: I should like to refer to the speech I delivered in the house a few weeks ago in which I paid tribute to the veterans in this House of Commons with whom I deem it an honour to sit as a member. When the second world war ended I was 15 years old. During the hearings of the defence committee reference was made to members of the committee who did not have any military service. This is the type of remark which I think is uncalled for.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hopkins: I might ask at this stage whether anyone who would make a statement of that kind is insinuating that there should have been another world war since the last one so that those of us who were too young for the last war could have had an opportunity to have military service. We must remember that there are a large number of young people across this country today who have never had military service. But that does not mean to say that they do not have the opportunity to run for parliament and take part in the proceedings of any committee of this house as they choose. Surely this is what our Canadian veterans fought for, so that the young people of Canada could have that privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hopkins: Great issues in the history of any nation have been debated in the past on the merits of the proposals. When we are in the middle of debate a great many doubts are stated. On the other hand, many statements are made in defence of proposals. There is one thing we must remember when we are so engaged. Time heals, but the passing of time does not produce progress unless there is planning for the future. This bill plans for the future on the basis of what we know today. Members of this house in the future will have to bring about changes on the basis of their experience in the house. This bill does not throw disdain on anyone who has walked the military paths before.

I should like to leave these thoughts with the committee. We must look at this bill in perspective. Out of this debate must come a sense of mutual respect for the views of various members of the house. I do not think there is very much ground for some of the personal attacks we have heard on the floor of the house. I hope that as we continue with the debate on this bill all hon. members will address their remarks to the merits of the bill as a whole or to the clauses in the clause by clause discussion. The Canadian people today are saying; Get on with the business of the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: This is the business.

Mr. Hopkins: Let us discuss the matter—

An hon. Member: You have not been home lately.

Another hon. Member: Thank you, teacher.

Mr. Hopkins: Let us discuss the matter, keep personal conflict out of it, and consider the merits. Someone on the other side just made the remark, "Thank you, teacher". I hope I have taught my lesson well, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I believe all of us were interested to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Renfrew North when he said that it is the view of those on the government side that we should get on with the business of the house and that the people of this country are saying: Get on with the business of the house. I happened to be a member of this house 11 years ago when another famous debate, the pipe line debate, took place. At that time the matter being debated was not whether or not Canada should build a pipe line. Every member of the house agreed that it should be built and that it should be a Canadian pipe line. The question under discussion at that time was whether or not the government had the right to deny essential information to the representatives of the people. That was the issue and the only issue.

At that time Mr. Howe and all hon. members on the Liberal side of the house kept telling opposition members that it was their duty to stop the debate, back down, and agree with what the Liberal government was trying to cram down the throats of opposition members. They said we should get on with the business of the house. It turned out that they had completely misread the feelings of the people of Canada. As was demonstrated in the election of 1957, the people deeply resented the fact that the then government would not provide information which the opposition had a right to require it to give. For that reason that government was thrown out of office unceremoniously.

Now we hear the same old Liberal call—get on with the business of the house; do not interfere with what we want to do. We know what is best for you; we know what is best for the armed services. Do not interfere with us. We have all the answers, and if anybody in the armed services dares to disagree with us and tell you anything different from what we say, they will get their marching orders very quickly indeed.

Three years ago when the minister presented his white paper we were told that this measure of unification would give us a more effective and more efficient defence at less cost. Let us take a look at the results that are becoming apparent today because of the proposed or actual introduction of this measure in respect of the armed services. In this regard it is impossible for us to obtain any answers from the minister, the government or the minister's officials. I have made a point of speaking to a great many members of the armed services. I did not speak to them on the parade ground or anywhere where they could be overheard by agents of the minister and his officials. I spoke to officers, non-commissioned officers and men of our armed services in very large numbers in their own homes where they could talk, say what they think about this whole measure and state whether they think it is good or bad. I have had an almost unanimous expression of opinion by a great number of these men in all ranks in the various services along the following lines.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, they do not like losing their identity as a service. They join a particular branch of the services because they like its history and traditions. These are proud men and they want to continue to serve in that branch with its ranks and uniform. Some of these men have served for many years and they do not like the way the unification program is being put into effect. This is a very sore point so far as members of the armed forces are concerned. They cannot find anyone of any rank who can tell them what will happen to their particular branch of the service in the future. Very often when they make inquiries they are told that no one knows the answers and if they do not like the situation they should get out on civvy street and look for something else. Very often they make these inquiries of politicians and are told the same thing.

Because I have an admiration for the men in our armed services and feel that they must be protected I advise them to carry on and remain in the services while we try to convince this stupid and perverse cabinet to change its mind. I have told these people that I cannot believe the government could persist in this kind of stupidity. Surely in some way we can push some sense into the heads of those stubborn government members who, for reasons known only to themselves, are trying to shove a measure through which obviously cannot and will not work. It is nothing more than an exercise in futility.

When the minister presented his white paper in 1964 he said that as a result of his program we would have a more efficient and effective force at less cost. It is apparent today that the cost of maintaining our armed forces has increased by $161 million per year. I suggest that this is only the beginning of the increase in the cost of maintaining our armed forces. What will happen when the minister has really had a chance to implement his program? I suggest that the cost will soar and that our forces will become less efficient and effective.

The minister, as I said, suggested that his program would result in a more effective and efficient service at less cost. Let me ask the minister, who considers he is among the world's greatest military thinkers, why all of the great powers of the world who have considered the idea of unification have turned it down as cold as a mackerel. I suggest these great powers are aware of two things. They know that unification will not work and will not increase the efficiency and effectiveness of an armed service. They realize that a uniform and an identity have great meaning to fighting men.

If we persist in unifying our three services, there could be only one possible advantage. That would be that it we are a few thousand men short in the navy we could bring in replacements from the army or the air force. Obviously that is the only advantage which unification could bring. The minister has not referred to any other advantage and no one else claims there is another advantage. Obviously this idea of easy transfer of personnel is not practical.

In this day and age each member of the armed forces, regardless of the branch to which he belongs, has been trained in a specialty. The tasks performed by our service personnel are complex and specialized. If we move a man or woman who has been trained in one specialty in one branch of our services to another branch we will lose the advantage gained by that specialized training as well as the many thousands of dollars required to retrain that individual. The day of the man-at-arms is past.

It must be obvious to the members of the government that one sure result of unification will be the loss of morale, which in turn will lessen the effectiveness and efficiency of our armed forces. Morale is built up as a result of historical tradition and uniform identification. These things mean a great deal to people who have been in combat, although perhaps little to those who have not.

Let me elaborate on that point. Any man who has been in combat, whether in the navy, army or air force, knows fear. No matter how many times a man has been under fire he knows fear, and anyone who suggest differently does not know the facts. It would be unnatural for a member of our armed services to go into battle without knowing fear. It would be unnatural for anyone to charge out of a trench, fly a bomber through burning flak or man a ship during a bombardment without some degree of fear. In order for our service personnel to serve efficiently they must have high morale, made up of a love for family, for their country, and for the tradition of their units. These men need a lot going for them in order to be efficient during a combat.

The minister can well afford to sit there and laugh because he does not and cannot know about these things. Let me assure him that these things are true. He can doubt my word about other matters but in this regard what I am saying is accurate. The minister laughs because he does not think our fighting forces need morale in order to carry out their functions efficiently and obtain their objectives. He laughs because he does not think those men who were wounded and those who died in battles required these things. He thinks these things are unnecessary and that our forces can be effective even though we put them all in Coca-Cola uniforms and make them as alike as peas in a pod. How does the minister know? Of course it makes a lot of difference.

If we ever get into another combat the men under the minister's command will have to have a great deal going for them. They will have to have pride of self, pride of country, pride of unit and pride of service in order to push themselves forward. If you take away some of these things, as the minister is proposing, you take away their ability to perform well. If you take these things away from our armed forces personnel you will destroy the armed forces' objectives and their whole ability to do the job. We as Canadians, like everybody else in the free world, are in favour of preserving peace. There is only one good, sure way to preserve peace and that is to make it known to possible aggressors that we and our allies are so strong, have so much will to resist, so much power to resist, that our services are so well trained and their morale is so high, that if they try to gain their objectives through force we can hurt them far more than they can hurt us.

Everybody knows why there is not an atomic war today and will not be an atomic war. It is not that people have no desire to drop atomic bombs; it is simply because those who might be tempted to do so know perfectly well that they will be hit many times harder than they could possibly hit us. Logic tells them not to start an atomic war. That is why germ warfare, which we were told would be the deciding factor in the last world war, was never started. Both sides knew they would be hurt at least as much as they could hurt the enemy. If those who started the first two world wars had realized the will, power and ability to resist of the allied forces in 1914 and 1939 we would not have had those world wars. That is why those of us who have had something to do with the services seriously urge the minister, not for political motives but because we as Canadians want our armed forces to be as efficient as possible, not to weaken the ability of the services. We should show possible aggressors that we are a strong, able link in the allied chain. Possible aggressors should never be tempted to try to go through a weak spot. They must realize that we have the morale, the weapons and the men to stop them and that we will fulfil our task as we have so ably in two world wars.

The people in our armed services today are the finest you will find anywhere. They want to be able to resist an aggressor and do just as good a job as their brothers, fathers and grandfathers did in the first two world wars. The reducing of their morale, which is what the minister is doing with this proposal, is greatly resented by them. They resent the fact that their future ability will be weakened, because if they ever have to do this terrible job again they want to do it well.

If morale in our forces is not what it should be we might be considered a weak enough link that a potential aggressor might take a chance and start a war, as was done in 1914 and 1939 when, I am told, 16 million members of the allied forces were killed. These are the serious matters we put before the minister. We put them before him seriously because we love our country. Those of us who have had some connection with the armed forces know that they want to continue to do the job that should be done. We do not appreciate it when the minister sits over there so smugly and smiles and laughs when we tell him what we must do to ensure that our forces are able to do their job well. The minister sits back when we tell him these things and snickers and laughs because he does not care. The fact is that he does not know, he does not understand and he tries to cover it up by laughing, smirking and smiling. The minister is insulting the men in his armed services who want to do a job for Canada.

An hon. Member: Don't go too far, gorgeous.

Mr. Hees: I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that those of us who have served in the armed forces, who have members of the forces as constituents and have talked to them in their own homes and know them well, know that these people are as fine Canadians as one can find. We know that the men in the forces want to make a real career of the service. They want to stay in the armed services to do the job. If they join the navy they want to be in the navy, if they join the air force they want to be in the air force, if they join the army they want to be in the army.

These men want to know that there is a future for them in the services. If they ask a sergeant, lieutenant, flight lieutenant or naval lieutenant, "what is the future for me in our service, where are we going", I tell you, Mr. Minister, that their officers are not able to tell them because they do not know. It has not come down from the top. Nobody seems to know where the armed services are headed. They want to know. They do not want to waste their time in a career that is going to collapse. They want to know where their particular service is going. The minister has not told them because I do not think he knows.

I would like the minister to answer this question before the debate ends. Lieutenant General Moncel said when giving testimony before the defence committee that if we continue our present commitments in NATO, NORAD and the United Nations we will require an additional force of some 50,000 men and an additional expenditure of $500 million a year. I do not know anybody in this country better able to give these facts than General Moncel, a brilliant soldier, an honest soldier and a man who I say is telling the truth. If he is not telling the truth, I want the minister to say in what way he is not telling the truth. If the minister says General Moncel is wrong, I want him to tell us whether he is completely wrong and that the figure is 10,000 men, 15,000, or whatever it is. If General Moncel is wrong about the additional expenditure that he says will be required, I want the minister to show us just how wrong he is. I believe that General Moncel is right, because I know him and can state that he is one of the most brilliant soldiers this country has had. I think the minister would agree with that. General Moncel would not make such a statement if he did not mean it.

I ask the minister: Where are we going in this area? Are we going to fulfil our present commitments, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said we were in his speech the other day? If we are going to do our job in NATO, NORAD and the United Nations, are we going to do it on the same scale as in the past or are we going to do it in a smaller way? Do we intend to let the United States come in and take over on Canadian soil? Do we intend to fulfil the commitments that we undertook in the NORAD operation? The Canadian people want answers to these questions. They want to know whether this government intends to humiliate them by having nationals of another country come in here and giving them the right to operate on our soil and do our defence job for us. I want to hear from the minister whether there is any inclination to do this. Are we going to continue our operations in NATO, NORAD and the United Nations on the same scale and not withdraw from these organizations in any way, shape or form? The public have a right to know these things. These are the things that this minister, like Mr. C. D. Howe exactly 11 years ago today, refuses to tell the Canadian people.

The minister sits and smirks, laughs and smiles. Mr. C. D. Howe used to do quite a bit of the same thing. I had a great respect and liking for Mr. C. D. Howe. He made only one mistake. He believed he had the right to run parliament and tell parliament what it should do, ignoring the wishes of the Canadian people. That was his mistake and it was the reason for his personal defeat exactly one year later. It defeated his government one year later. I tell this minister that if he persists in this kind of thing he and his party will suffer a great defeat when we go to the country. This is what happened one year later in the case of Mr. C. D. Howe.

The pipe line issue did not come before the electorate in 1956 but in 1957, and the minister knows very well what happened at that time because it happened to him personally and to a great many of his colleagues. I can tell him that if he is going to continue to kick the armed services around as if they were his own private football because he believes that this is the thing to do, it will not be long before his government will receive exactly the same treatment as did the great St. Laurent government in 1957 when on the night of June 10 they suddenly found themselves ousted.

I suggest to the minister and the government that they should now give an answer to the questions which have been put by me, by all of my colleagues in the house, and by the people of Canada. This is nothing new. We have demanded answers on behalf of the people of Canada and of the service personnel. We ask the government to give us the answers. The sooner it gives them the better. If they are not satisfactory answers, if the government cannot produce proof of a good purpose in upsetting the whole armed service personnel, if it cannot prove that it will improve our armed service operations, and thereby bring about savings, as the minister said, then there is only one honourable course and that is to withdraw the bill immediately.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Chairman, it had not been my intention to take part in this debate until I heard the Minister of National Defence make the following remark the other night just before the closing of the house at ten o'clock; "Tomorrow we will carry on with this fascinating debate". I decided then and there that I should take part in this fascinating debate. May I also remind hon. members of what was said by the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) when he concluded his remarks on Tuesday, April 11, as recorded at page 14778 of Hansard. He said:

> The opposition undoubtedly has a duty to perform and as everyone knows I have never questioned that. But I am questioning it now. There is considerable, though as I have said perhaps unintentional, danger if we persist with this debate much longer. I think it can rightly be claimed that the opposition has played the game and has put up a fair fight with tangible and valuable results.

I believe that this debate has been worth while. I think that all the members of parliament who have been elected to the House of Commons feel very deeply about the unification bill, and I am sure that hon. members on our side of the house have opposed this issue in a most sincere and dedicated way. The members of the defence committee sat through 55 meetings of that committee over the course of the past two months. I am sure our members participated in those meetings in a very dedicated and sincere manner because they felt they were fighting in defence of a good cause.

I believe that the members of the armed services who were called before the defence committee were outstanding witnesses. I want to make it quite clear at the outset that I was not a member of the defence committee nor have I been a member of the armed services, apart from a short period of time. Owing to circumstances beyond my control I did not stay in the services. However, I wish to point out that if I had taken part in world war II, like all other members of the services, I would have wanted to join a particular group. By this I mean that I would have wanted to serve in the army, the navy or the air force. I believe the hon. member for Northumberland who has just finished speaking described the differences among the three services in a most striking way. I intend to refer to this a little later. I believe this is one of the basic reasons for opposing unification.

I should like to refer to an article which I came across in the last day or two. It is an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of Wednesday, April 4, 1967. I will not read all of it but I wish to quote one paragraph. It is entitled, "Destroying Defence". It sets out one of the main reasons I am taking part in this debate. Another reason is that I will have to stand up and be counted in the House of Commons when the vote on this issue is taken. The paragraph reads as follows:

> As members of parliament cast their votes in support or rejection of Mr. Hellyer's bill, they must surely recognize the grave responsibility they bear individually. It is a question that far transcends both politicking and party. Canadians will not lightly forgive or forget if our defence structure is thoughtlessly dismembered. This ill-advised step could, by a single act of parliament, sponsored by an inexperienced minister, tear down and destroy proven services which have been built with the sacrifice and efforts of Canadians in the past hundred years and more. The reputation, character, efficiency and traditions of Canada's regular and militia units have been won and tested in action in battlefields in Europe, Asia and Africa, in the sea lanes of the North Atlantic and in the bombing and fighter missions in the air. They have been carefully designed and organized to work in the closest possible harmony with our two major allies, Great Britain and the United States.

I think that this is the decision we as members have to take. We will have to make a decision on the change which will be brought about in regard to the service personnel on whom we have relied over the years to volunteer to fight for our country.

I believe that very few people, if any, oppose integration with regard to arrangements for the paying of personnel and the provision of food supplies, clothing and equipment. I am not in favour of a common uniform and I have very definite opinions about this. There is no argument that integration of the services would bring about greater economy in the provision of these essential services for the different sections of our armed forces.

As I said, I was not a member of the defence committee although I sat in on some of the meetings and I have read some of the evidence with great interest. I realize that many members of the house on both sides have served with distinction in different branches of the services. Many members on this side of the house who have served in the forces with distinction have put forward outstanding arguments for opposing unification. It is my belief that not too many people oppose the idea of integration in purchasing the essential products used by all branches of the services. I think this is only good, common sense.

I should like to refer to the history and background of one of the witnesses called by the defence committee to illustrate that the witnesses were dedicated men from the time they first joined the forces having gone through the officers' training school. I refer in particular to the evidence of Lieutenant General Fleury, to be found at page 1489 of minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 24. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, gentlemen, I took my first faltering step in the military service when I joined the Canadian Officers Training Corps in 1929. I stayed with the C.O.T.C. for some five years; then I returned to it a couple of years later, early 1937, and I was still an officer in C.O.T.C. when war broke out. At this point I held the rank of captain. I was adjutant of a training centre at Farnham, Quebec. I went overseas in 1941 where I took up the appointment of adjutant in a reinforcements unit. The following year I was posted to the Canadian military headquarters in London, where I stayed on the staff until November 1943, then I went on staff to Italy in the rank of major. I was returned to London as the military secretary of C.M.H.Q. in the spring of 1944. I returned from overseas after V.E. day in 1945 with the rank of colonel.

That discloses Lieutenant General Fleury's record and the positions he held during the last war. He continued:

> Since the war I have been director of personnel, director of organization and vice-quartermaster general at army headquarters Ottawa for various periods. I was also the chief of staff, prairie command, Winnipeg; commander Canadian military mission Far East, 1950-51; commander Eastern Quebec area 1951-56; general officer commanding Quebec command 1961-65.

As a result of his vast experience he was ordered to Ottawa, promoted to lieutenant general and appointed comptroller general of the newly integrated Canadian forces headquarters. He concluded:

> I retired a few months ago and my legal status at the moment is that of an officer on leave pending retirement.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the background of one of the witnesses and explains why he was finally promoted to the position of comptroller general of the defence forces in Ottawa.

Another point is that we should ask ourselves some of the basic questions of concern to the people of Canada, especially those on whom we rely to constitute our armed forces.

As I have already said, I do not think integration is a great issue but, as the hon. member for Northumberland said a few minutes ago, I believe there is one basic problem with integration. I have talked to many service personnel across Canada during the last year or two and I have come to the conclusion that these men are dedicated to the service of their country. They want to serve in the armed forces of Canada but they want to be free to make their choice. Many men are army-oriented. They love the army, want to serve in it and join that branch of the armed forces for that reason. On the other hand, there are many young men, particularly in this day and age, who have a flair for flying, just as was the case between 1914 and 1918 when the old R.F.C. was formed. There were many young men during the last war who wanted to fly and that was the basic reason they joined the air force. They desired to be in the air when they took part in the defence of their country. Personally I had two brothers who served in the air force.

I suggest, that the minute we take away from the men who volunteer to serve in this country's defence forces the privilege of joining the particular service they desire to serve, we destroy a basic principle. I believe that such action would lead to conscription sooner than any of us realize.

There has been a lot of publicity during the last few months given to young Americans who arrive in Toronto from the United States. I happen to know personally one man who came from the United States for no other reason than to avoid being conscripted into the American army. I suggest that this could very well happen in Canada; I think there is no argument about it. For example, some men have a genuine desire to serve on ships. But today, if this bill passes, they will join "Canada's armed services"—period.

As I say, some of our young men want to be pilots. Personally, if I had to join the services and I thought I would end up serving on water you would never get me into the services. I am sure this feeling is typical among young men today. If this bill goes through I am satisfied, as I said before, that we will destroy the fundamental freedom of choice on the part of the volunteers who join the services.

I confess I do not know the difference between integration and unification, though I have had it explained to me many times. I have talked with a military friend of mine from the west who said he really did not understand it either. I freely admit that I do not understand it. One hon. member said in this chamber the other night that integration and unification are like conception and childbirth, but I do not think that integration is nearly as simple as that.

I shall now put on record some of the reasons for the resignation of Lieutenant General Fleury a man of 52 who retired three years prematurely. As found on page 1490 of the proceedings of the committee, the hon. member for Vancouver East was questioning and in reply Lieutenant General Fleury said:

> I myself held an integrated position in headquarters for just under a year, from the fall of 1965 to the summer of 1966. There had been over the years a good deal of consideration—possibly more consideration than action—toward integration. I had always felt that the armed forces would benefit by a much greater degree of integration than was the situation in 1964. I think it would not be unfair to say that I was a supporter, maybe even an enthusiastic supporter, of the principle of integration. I have noticed, particularly in recent months, that the terms "integration" and "unification" seem to get confused and indeed, sometimes—have been treated as synonyms, which of course they are not, in my lexicon. Does that answer your question?
> Mr. Winch: It is a nice start, sir. To your latest knowledge, has integration been successful, with its faults, and should it be pursued per se?

Lieutenant General Fleury answered:

> I can speak from personal and more or less official knowledge only up until the 15th day of July last, when I relinquished my appointment as quartermaster general.

Farther on he said:

> I meant to say comptroller general. Up to a point shortly before the 15th of July, I thought we were on the right road. I thought that the integration of the three services headquarters in Ottawa was a good thing because it would increase the efficiency of the armed forces, because it should save money, and because it would bring the three services closer together.
> I began to have considerable misgivings about the direction and speed of integration some weeks at least, if not months ... I came to realize, or I thought I came to realize, that things were being done under the cloak of integration which really were not part of the integration process at all. I discovered to my surprise, because this was not my first tour in Ottawa—it was my fourth—that communications were very bad within the headquarters, and between the headquarters and the commanders in the field. I found that the tried and true channels of communication which had been the warp and woof of navy, army and air force procedures in chain of command for decades had largely been discarded. I found that officers working for me knew more, or said they knew more, or thought they knew more, about what was in the mind of the minister than I did. I found that security information as I knew it, was practically non-existent. The whole headquarters reminded me of a giant sieve. I saw evidence of disloyalty, and near disloyalty, in some people to the point literally that on one, two or three occasions a week, I would sit at my desk and feel like vomiting. I decided after all these years that this was an atmosphere, that these were conditions under which I could no longer conscientiously serve, and I asked for my retirement.

This sort of thing takes place not only at the top of the service rank structure but all through that structure. People become fed up, decide to leave and they go. We will have problems in securing the personnel for our forces.

The end result of this measure can only be more disunity, more confusion, than we have today. This bill will not bring about savings within the Department of National Defence. It has been said today that the money spent in that department has increased in amount year by year. I am sure that expenditures will continue to rise. It is interesting to note that the Minister of National Defence sent a gilt-edged book, which cost $5,398 to produce, to leading people in this country in an attempt to convey his message. The minister in so many words said: I believe this bill will do wonderful things. I do not share his view and I feel that I have no alternative except to vote against the principle of unification.

To return to a point I tried to make previously, young men join our forces voluntarily. When they join they join a particular branch of the services. They like to be known by their uniform. We see a similar attitude reflected among people joining service clubs. There must be some reason for people prefering to wear different blazers, pins and emblems to distinguish them from the members of other clubs. Similarly, personnel of the forces like to wear uniforms which distinguish them from others in the forces. If that privilege is taken from them they may not want to join.

I say we are going in the wrong direction. I urge the minister to delay this measure to see if we cannot arrive at an equitable solution acceptable to the men, to our people, to members of parliament and to all those Canadians who will have to carry this program through.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few comments on this important piece of legislation which creates an about-turn in an important department, for many years one of the prestige departments in the government of Canada. I had not intended to take part in this debate because I felt that after all the days of discussion, after all the committee meetings, after all the information obtained from representatives of the armed services, members of this house and others, the government would reconsider this legislation and withdraw it or amend it so as to make it more acceptable to the armed services and to the people of Canada.

I enter the debate today, however, for a couple of reasons. First, I feel that this legislation is similar in many ways to a great deal of the legislative program on which the government is priding itself these days. So much of it has a certain degree of finality attached to it. In other words, once this legislation is passed and the machinery is set in motion that will destroy the traditions, the insignia and the unity within each branch of the services which have made for the greatest effectiveness in the past, the process will become an accomplished fact. It is almost forever. Those things which have created such effective, friendly rivalry in the past will then have disappeared and our armed services, as one hon. member has said, will become just a grey mass of uninterested and uninteresting individuals.

Perhaps this is the ultimate goal in the eyes of the minister. Perhaps he hopes that nobody anywhere will raise objection to the things he is doing. He would like to see an army of puppets or robots who could be moved by remote control from one place to another. I believe this is what the minister would appreciate. Indeed, it would appear that this is their present role in view of the lack of respect he has paid to the opinions of distinguished officers who have come forward to offer their counsel on this legislation.

I referred earlier to legislative measures passed by the house in the last few years which have had a measure of finality attached to them, measures which have had a tremendous effect on the economy and on the social welfare of this nation. One of them is the Canada Pension Plan which also had a difficult time in the House of Commons. It was brought in and withdrawn time and time again through every phase of its consideration, and it made necessary the passing of two other important pieces of legislation, the Canada Assistance Act and the guaranteed income bill.

This was legislation which put a great strain on the economy. Indeed, the bill to supply a guaranteed income resulted in an increase in the sales tax. So we have every reason to be sceptical about the legislation now before us. One might mention the medicare legislation which had to be amended to take effect in 1968 instead of 1967 so that the economy would not be overheated. Not only have such measures as these overheated the economy but they have burdened the bookkeeping facilities of the small businessman, the farmer and the pensioner to the point of exasperation. The reason I mention these particular pieces of legislation in connection with the bill before us is that there has definitely grown up around the legislative program on which this government prides itself a great deal of public cynicism. In this connection I could refer to the fanfare which preceded the legislation creating the Canadian Dairy Commission, a commission which in the first year of its operation, whether on its own or by government direction, produced a dairy policy entirely unacceptable to all facets of the dairy industry.

I mention these things because much has been made in this house about the need to think in terms of constant dollars and the contention that in 1961 there was less money spent on defence than there was in the past year in terms of purchasing power. That may be true. But I am critical of the reluctance of the government to do anything to control the decline in value of our dollar. We have watched its purchasing power fall day by day until the people of Canada are wondering how to meet their bills and other commitments.

I speak in this debate in the knowledge that much of what I say will be repetitive. However, having listened to many of the contributions made so far I realize I will not be the first offender. I must say also that I was not a member of the defence committee, nor did I have the honour and privilege of being associated with any part of the armed services, though I do honour to all those in this house and outside who have given distinguished service in this field and to whom so many impassioned and important tributes have been paid in this chamber.

I had hoped that before long the minister would have realized that the opposition, not simply in this house but outside it, by those closely associated with the defence of this nation and even on the part of the general public, was serious in its intent, and that the minister would have taken a second look at this legislation with a view to removing the areas of controversy. Like the hon. member for Northumberland who spoke earlier this afternoon, I am reminded of a debate which took place some years ago in this house and in which I took part. I cannot say the same for the Minister of National Defence. I refer to the defence production debate in 1955.

This, we must recall, was in the era of the trained seals who were kept in subjection by a ministry which had been in power for so long that it did not believe it was necessary to consider the rights or opinions of the people of Canada. In fact things became so bad at one time that the late Hon. James Gardiner, then minister of agriculture, made the statement that as long as the Hon. C. D. Howe and the prime minister of the day, Mr. St. Laurent, remained, we would have exceedingly good government in Canada.

As I say, those were the days of the trained seals when, in practice, three men were acting as the executive. All the others followed along. Events then had a great similarity to those surrounding the present debate. Here we have a minister who in spite of all the criticism and advice given him by knowledgeable individuals and in spite of all the indifference and criticism which is apparent within his own party—most of the Liberal members who have taken part in this debate have done so through the medium of carefully drafted texts—continues stubbornly upon the course he has set himself.

I would say that today we have a new, modern type of trained seals who are allowed to speak in debates of this kind but not freely or openly as they would like. We have a minister who has decided that this bill must be passed in its entirety in spite of any opposition. There were times, Mr. Chairman, when members of the Liberal party spoke out against their own party and ministers, times when they considered they were not being fair or just in their treatment of the House of Commons and the nation. In this connection I refer to a statement made by the late Hon. P. J. A. Cardin, former Liberal minister, on February 9, 1943, after he had broken all ties with his party. I quote from page 282 of Hansard for that date:

> We are fighting for liberty, we are fighting for democracy and parliamentary institutions. Yet most of our activities are in the hands of little potentates, men of no experience, dictators in the field that has been given to them for administration.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, I believe that history is repeating itself in this debate. I might also refer to a statement made in the House of Commons by a very distinguished former member who is continuing to distinguish himself in the Senate and who was not afraid to speak out against legislation introduced by his own party. I refer to Hon. Charles Power who on March 21, 1946, had this to say as recorded at page 172 of Hansard for that date:

> We have fought a victorious war after four years. We have talked glibly of the new order which was to follow it, and it almost appears to me as though we the victors had taken on the manners and customs of the vanquished... If this is to be the funeral of Liberalism I do not desire to be even an honorary pall-bearer at the funeral—

These were men of dignity and integrity who were not afraid to speak out against their party when they felt in their own minds that the particular legislation before the house would not be in the interests of the particular area affected or of the nation at large. I am hoping, Mr. Chairman, that the character of the debates of that day will be duplicated.

Perhaps I should remind those who were in the house at that time, and those who were not, of the events that took place. After many days of debate in the house, gradually the press of that day began to realize that the Conservative party was in deadly earnest and that the cause for which it was fighting was a just one in that wartime emergency powers should not be continued forever. Because of these facts public opinion began to be felt and pressures were exerted that brought the prime minister into the act.

The press of that day did not always accuse the opposition of using delaying tactics, of opposing for purely political purposes, as part of it has been doing now. Instead, just as part of the press is doing today it gave us credit for acting as an opposition should act by examining and discussing all legislation with a view to its improvement or better acceptability to the public and, in cases such as this, by preventing the passage of unjust legislation.

I am hoping that the Prime Minister, who I am sure is deeply concerned about this legislation, will take some action. I feel that he has three choices in the action he may decide to take. I hope he will not be swayed by the antics of other ministers and of the Minister of National Defence who threatened to resign because of differences of opinion. There are times when such juvenile actions would place the participants in the class of cry-babies.

The first choice which the Prime Minister has is to amend this legislation and remove the clauses dealing with unification. I suggest that the same procedure could be followed as was followed in 1955 when the minister involved was conveniently sent on a special mission and during his absence the required amendments were approved and the legislation passed.

The second choice the Prime Minister could follow would be to have a free vote in the house. He could take the whips off in order that all members in all parts of the house would be free to express their opinions. Such a move would indicate a truly democratic action on the part of the government and remove the possibility of the overthrow of the government if the measure was defeated.

The final choice is closure. Today we had an indication that this course may be followed. I am sure that every member abhors it as it has the effect of interfering with the truly democratic rights and privileges of this institution.

Mr. Roxburgh: May I ask the hon. member a question? For closure to take place I think he will agree a government has to have a majority. This happens to be a minority government. Therefore how can closure take place with a minority government?

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): I think the hon. member has answered his own question. It can happen in the same way that most legislation is passed by this parliament. It is passed by reason of the fact that the minority government is joined by other groups in the house.

Mr. Roxburgh: Which means a majority of opinion.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Chairman, I would like to quote from the words of a very distinguished individual who was a member of the cabinet for many years. I refer to the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King. This quotation is from a time when he was in opposition in 1920, and it is to be found on page 4540 of Hansard:

> The government must be by parliament and through parliament. It must not be carried on by cabinet ministers in their secret chambers. The aim of Liberalism is to seek a wider freedom for the masses in social, political, religious and industrial life, to restore the control of the people over parliament and to restore the control of parliament over the executive.

As the hon. member for Northumberland indicated a few minutes ago, we have a government that wants to push things through the house, a government which went down to defeat in 1957 for that very same reason. We have a minister of the crown who, in spite of all the arguments advanced by the opposition and by interested and knowledgeable individuals outside this chamber, will not budge one iota or admit that this legislation has been conceived with too much haste. The government should take the sensible course of amending or withdrawing this legislation.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, Her Majesty's loyal opposition welcomes the present debate. It is the first real opportunity that has been afforded members of parliament to discuss external affairs since the government assumed office almost four years ago. All of us here and people all over Canada know that the government has shunned opportunity after opportunity to provide for a full discussion of Canada's external affairs policy and its demands on defence policy. Its reluctance has been the notable characteristic of the present administration.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has earned a reputation for evasiveness, a reputation for restriction of discussion, and this attitude has destroyed the unanimity that once characterized Canada's external affairs policy.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has tried to wrap the function of democracy in a cloak of secrecy so selective that only the government, and perhaps not all government members, could be taken into his confidence. He has made a mockery of the democratic process. He has been able to do this because of the carelessness of the splinter groups within this parliament which place tenure of office above a careful assessment of the situation based on a knowledge of the facts. This minister has harmed and damaged the image of our nation abroad and in the councils of the world wherever they meet.

I believe, sir, that history will record the results as the most glaring shortcoming of the present administration. The failure has been the result of the deliberate decisions taken by a most experienced minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. That is the atmosphere in which Canadians and members of parliament have been compelled to resort to speculation concerning the nature and posture of Canada in respect of external affairs and the demands of that policy on Canadian defence policy.

The desire of Canadians for peace and for the solution of international disputes within the rule of law remains unchanged. Our belief in and our dependence on co-operative action by the community of nations as an instrument to preserve peace remains unchanged. Any Canadian government, even the careless government opposite, can rest assured that parliament will never fail in its responsibility in that regard. Nor would any of us deny our support and prayers for the ideals embodied in the resolution presented at the United Nations which sought the establishment of an international force to implement the observance of the rule of law in respect of international disputes. However, it would be more than charity for any of us to commend the minister for his failure to discern and assess world opinion and his failure to rally that opinion to the objective which all of us applaud.

The failure to attract that support for the government's resolution draws into question the minister's judgment. It draws into question the government's judgment in respect of the matter of timing. I say to you, sir, there are serious students of world affairs who believe that the precipitous haste exhibited by Canada has set back the clock in that regard and even endangered the ultimate achievement of an objective with which Canadians and many other people throughout the world have little quarrel. There are those who have admired the evasiveness of the Secretary of State for External Affairs over the past many months. The minister himself almost appeared to be delighted with his own performance in the house. Parliament has been denied the knowledge upon which a good understanding and a spirit of good will could sprout and flourish. Thus we have before us this measure apparently predicated on the assumption of acceptance of Canada's resolution at the United Nations last fall. Parliament is being asked to commit the Canadian defence effort to a concept which failed to secure endorsation last fall at the United Nations.

The Minister of National Defence had some harsh words for the Leader of the Opposition indicating that he had not pointed out the avenues of information even though they were not readily available from the government opposite. What we attempted to do, without putting it too bluntly or too forthrightly, was to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence to spell out the basis and premise upon which the government now believes that the resolution it brought forward last fall at the United Nations now stands to gain favour in the councils of the world.

Why this pall of secrecy? Why this reluctance to confide in the Canadian people?

Mr. Macaluso: Did you lose your place?

Mr. Nasserden: Well, I can tell the hon. gentleman opposite that I did not have to have hired help in the gallery to write anything I have to say in this debate today. Why is there this reluctance by the government opposite to provide information to the Canadian people and to parliament? The only logical conclusion certainly is not a pleasant one for Canadians to contemplate. It is not pleasant to think that the decision to proceed with the resolution at the United Nations last fall was ill-fashioned and ill-timed. I ask you, sir, under the circumstances which now prevail and which prevailed at that time, is there any other conclusion that can be reached other than that the government and the minister opposite bungled the whole matter?

The government has placed before us a measure that will bring to an end the character of the Canadian armed forces as it has been known in the past. The government proposes a new concept. This is how it has been described by the Minister of National Defence. Yet the new demands envisioned by the resolution at the United Nations were defeated. That concept was set back by the precipitous haste of this government acting in the name of Canada. Now the parliament of Canada, without a definitive statement from the Prime Minister or from any other minister, is being asked to embark upon what appears to be an equally precipitous course, thereby establishing a new concept within which we will have to live in a world as we find it.

The carelessness for which this government has been famous at home seems to be the same kind of carelessness it has practised abroad. Time after time the government has displayed a lack of foresight and there has always followed a reluctance to take Canadians and parliament into its confidence. The Secretary of State for External Affairs just cannot admit that he could ever be wrong. Indeed, his attitude reminds one of a pyramid of pomposity. From that ineptness we are invited to accept another measure which is now before us. This measure is nothing more than a brazen attempt on the part of the government to bluff their way along, carelessly hoping that the future will take care of their problems.

Reference was made by the Minister of National Defence to the decision to scrap the Arrow aircraft. The minister tried to compare that loss to the losses sustained by Canada because of the respective elements of the defence effort under his proposed legislation. The significant fact of that argument is the admission by the minister that there has been a loss arising from his proposed legislation.

How can this government opposite, in its wildest, most desperate and degenerate dreams, imagine that the foremost bastion and fortress of democracy and freedom would be willing or ready to rest, in the custody of a nation ten times its junior in population, the supremacy of its air power? Does this nation think that it could at this time meet that challenge which must be faced, by the nation upon whom the mantle of final responsibility falls? Canadians are not that ignorant or that ungrateful. The minister brought in a red herring. But the carelessness remains, the carelessness of a minister and a government ready to throw away the heritage, the tradition and the sacrifice of its people in their most challenging hours when life itself was laid down for kin and country.

I cannot speak for those who have fought or died. Nor can I put into words the thoughts and vision that carried them on to victory. I have read some military history and it seems to me that the substance and history of victories throughout the ages has been elusive indeed. A lock of hair caught in a helmet, a patch of colour stitched to a sleeve, a snatch of verse from out of the past, a bar of music or a banner proudly clutched—throughout history the intangible something has been the difference between victory and defeat.

No one will quarrel with the idea of a unified command. That has been and is one of the requirements of modern military science. No one will quarrel with elimination of duplication of supply. Indeed, the standardization of numbers in supply between the services is a worth-while objective and one that should provide some small economies. But the greater benefit would be the elimination of one of the oldest frustrations that must have troubled men in all ranks in all services.

I suppose it is old-fashioned but I like to see the distinctiveness of the various services as indicated by their uniforms—the style and colour and decorations. I do not consider myself a military person but I must confess that recognition of the various units affords me a thrill when I see them. I believe it does something for the enlisted man as well. Why do they choose one service over another? I believe it is the spirit of the service that attracts men and women. It is a delicate quality. I do not think it can be coerced. I believe it may be cultivated, nourished, cherished, held close beyond the scrutiny of anyone outside that service, and in the final, desperate clinch it will remain an inspiration and command when that is all that makes the difference. That quality of Canadians should not be destroyed or lost or lessened. I do not know whether the minister understands this but it seems to me his duty cannot allow that to happen.

The government made certain presumptions which may have appeared valid at the time but with the passage of time they have proven to be unattainable. Moreover, this measure involves more than the physical substance and form of the armed forces. I would think that the minister has some greatness within him and that he recognizes these facts. Many of us see some desirable aspects in this bill but as its stands we are compelled, with regret, to oppose it and vote against it. I believe it destroys a great deal that is good in our military lore and tradition. I believe it destroys some of our nation's spirit and in its own way it denies some of the sacrifice that was dearly given. I am left cold by the claim of savings to be made with dye for uniforms. I believe that our airmen are distinctive. They have a role in our services not fully known by any other service. The role at sea cannot be compared with that of the other services, and it is a continuing one. When all others have completed their tasks, whom can you substitute for an infantryman? The minister can show his greatness in this matter or he can indicate his arrogance and add to the pinnacle of arrogance with which he has become associated.

Mr. Brand: Mr. Chairman, originally, like many others, I had no intention of entering the debate on Bill C-243. I felt justifiably that the members of the defence committee, at least those on this side of the house, were infinitely more qualified than I to discuss the intricacies of the evidence on this most important matter. I believe my confidence in my colleagues has been confirmed and strengthened by the excellent speeches they have made. As I perused the monumental work of the defence committee I was proud of the exemplary way in which they discharged their duties as Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

What has dismayed me, however, is the epidemic of intransigence that has afflicted the government side. Incidentally, I make no apology for medical references. Indeed, they seem to have become an integral part of this debate. I recall hearing some reference to obstetrical measures by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra who referred to cutting the umbilical cord after a baby is born. This is astounding because presumably the baby would still be in utero. The epidemic seems to have been spread by the minister to almost every member on the government side. One might well ask what the symptoms of this affliction are. I shall delineate them, but first may I hazard a guess that the epidemic started from a germ of an idea which was somehow fully incubated in the laboratory of perhaps an executive assistant. I think it started in that way and has been spread by the minister.

The symptoms of this affliction are, as will become obvious, all mental, and the first is confusion. In this regard one has only to read the words of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra to understand how confusion has become one of the symptoms. The second is vertigo, a medical term which perhaps I had better explain. It means dizziness, going around in circles. We can all recognize immediately that this has been epitomized by the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The third is incoherence. Who else but the Minister of Transport? Fourth, and above all, is intransigence.

What I simply cannot understand is how the government can be so uncompromising in face of the clarity and cogency of the arguments presented by the opposition. Why does the minister have to be contumacious instead of conciliatory? Why is he not sage instead of so stubborn? Surely the words of the military experts before the defence committee have meant something. Surely their years of experience count to a certain degree. Can we simply dismiss their views in a cavalier manner as being hopelessly out of date or are they just out of step with the minister, 'out of step with our Charlie?'

How in heaven's name can the expertise which has been exhibited by so many of the best brains of the armed forces of our country be completely ignored and tossed aside as completely unimportant? Yes, we have heard the evidence. On looking over the evidence one finds that there seems to be a preponderance in favour of delaying the bill, until integration is complete and working well, which from the evidence apparently it is not, until we have a chance to reassess what unification really means, and until we have a chance to plan a proper foreign policy and a proper utilization of the Canadian armed forces in the framework of such a proper foreign policy. It is inconceivable to me that the words of Canada's foremost experts can be dealt with so cavalierly. I believe their words bear repetition.

But first, what are the real issues before the house and the country today? Surely one of the issues is morale. Another is the savings that may be effected by the proposed unification. Increased efficiency is another. Another is the matter of conscription. Another is, exactly what do we mean by unification? Another is incompatibility with foreign armed services and, most important of all, our ability to meet our commitments with a unified force.

If we turn to the evidence we find that the question of morale was dealt with by the experts who appeared before the committee. I have heard many comments from hon. members on the other side of the house that morale in the forces is fine. As one reads the speeches one finds the minister saying that morale is at an all-time high. The minister is shaking his head. I happen to agree with that shake of the head. Then we listen to hon. members on this side of the house and hear that morale is seriously affected. But when it is discovered that morale is not as good as it was, hon. members on the other side of the house blame us and say we are responsible for it because we are doing our job as a loyal opposition in the House of Commons.

Air Marshal Annis made a comment on morale which is to be found on page 1435 of the proceedings of the committee on national defence. I will not read it all but in part it reads as follows:

> Therefore it is the worry about the morale and the difficulty of acquiring into the services and retaining the hard core people that I worry about. Unification, in my opinion, would have a very difficult psychological impact on them.

He goes on to say that we should have more time, which is a point that has been raised many times in the house. If I may paraphrase his remarks, he points out that unless we have time to see what this program is going to do and to plan properly, the detrimental effect on morale may be incalculable. The last part of his statement in this regard reads this way:

> It might even happen that the time would come when we could safely say, "We are going to unify", and a gasp of dismay through these trades would just not occur.

It might, but we must have time to look carefully at this matter and try to understand what the minister is proposing. General Foulkes, as found on page 1216 of the committee proceedings, said:

> Another issue which has come in for a lot of criticism has been the lack of authentic information. Information was replaced by rumour and conjecture, which no doubt disturbed the morale of the forces.

I will leave out a few sentences. Then he said:

> This, Mr. Chairman, in my view, is the surest way of breaking down the morale of any force.

In other words, lack of information. All that we on this side of the house have been trying to get is information from the minister. But he has built around himself an ivory tower in which he is unassailable and unavailable so far as clarification is concerned. The minister makes a great many comments. I have heard most of them. He made quite a speech the other day about what was going on in the United States. What this had to do with unification I did not quite understand.

General Foulkes in his testimony quoted General Montgomery, Monty, as he was known. At page 1217 of the committee proceedings, referring to Monty's memoirs he said:

> He can think, he can appreciate, and he is definitely prepared to criticize.

He was talking about the fighting soldier. The passage continues:

> He wants to know what is going on, and what you want him to do, and why and when. He wants to know, in doing it, that his best interests will be absolutely secure in your hands.

General Foulkes went on to say:

> Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge that those responsible for implementing unification ponder over these remarks, especially over the last sentence—

Then he repeats it:

> He want to know, in doing it, that his best interests will be absolutely secure in your hands.

Unless he has the information and knows what is going to happen the inevitable result, as is already happening and as we have seen from the minister's acquiescence, is that morale will decline. Morale is beginning to suffer. General Moncel also commented on morale. At page 1308 of the minutes of the proceedings of the committee the hon. member for York-Sunbury asked this question:

> How much value, General Moncel, do you put on morale and esprit de corps in private units and private service in the matter of ability and willingness to do a job in this disturbed world?
> Mr. Moncel: It obviously is a very, very real factor. In a voluntary force such as ours it is of very real importance.

So there is no question that morale has suffered. There is no question either, if we had proceeded with integration with which we all agree and this red herring had not been brought in, this idea that was conceived for what purpose no one knows, although there have been many suggestions, to unify our forces and put them all into one basket, what would have happened to morale. Surely not what has happened. The minister has talked about the tremendous savings that unifying the forces will mean for the Canadian taxpayer. The hon. member for Northumberland has already pointed out that these "savings" have already amounted to an additional expense of $161 million to the Canadian taxpayer. If these are savings I would very much hate to see what would happen when we tried to increase expenses.

I go now to page 1452 of the proceedings and evidence of the committee where the following question and answer appear:

Mr. Harkness: Do you see any advantage in doing away with our present three forces and putting them into one force called just a defence force?

Mr. Hendrick: Not the slightest bit; it baffles me completely. I think the economies could be achieved by much more simple means and I do not understand the advantages of this proposal at all.

Again, at page 1476, in answer to a question put to him by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, Mr. Hendrick said:

No, I cannot. From the details, as they appear to me, now outside the service, I cannot see anything that would cause a saving. As I said earlier, I do not even believe the savings are substantial in eliminating waste. I believe the only way you can save money in substantial amount is to cut the manpower. That really is the only basic way you can save money in substantial quantities.

That was the answer given by an expert. The minister has done even better than that. He has cut the manpower and raised the expenses. I wonder what some economists would have to say about this new approach to saving?

On the matter of economies General Moncel pointed out at page 1335 of the committee evidence that it would cost much more money to operate with a unified force in conjunction with our allies. I quote the following excerpt from that page:

Mr. Harkness: In effect, in order to produce any reasonable defence effort commensurate with our population, our manufacturing ability and our general economic situation, we have to operate with allies.

Mr. Moncel: Yes, unless you want to spend a great deal more money.

[Mr. Brand.]

Yet the minister says we are going to save money. At page 1330 of the committee proceedings, when General Moncel said there was no economy in unification the following exchange took place:

Mr. Harkness: And I say it does not matter whether you call them by those names or not, in effect, you still have to have those three services.

Mr. Moncel: This is right, and there is no payoff for calling them anything else.

What about efficiency? We have heard how efficient the unified services are going to be. Let us say we unified parliament into one group under a prime minister. Would it not be tremendous? The government, which would be composed of everyone in the house, would bring in bills and they would be passed. The rights of the people of course and of those directly involved would be trampled upon. I ask hon. members to look at some of those countries where this has happened. It would be a very efficient parliament. We could even get home for very long summer vacations. We could get home for long Christmas and Easter vacations if we were still observing our religious traditions.

Let us turn now to page 1428 where Air Marshal Annis was giving evidence. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre asked the following question:

Mr. Churchill: Do you see an increase in the fighting efficiency of the armed forces through unification?

Air Marshal Annis answered:

No, I do not, sir.

How definite can one be? Then he went on to say:

I do not see a great deal provided one is successful with integrating fully the supporting services and the top command structure.

Earlier I mentioned conscription. Surely that is what unification is. Members who are now in the armed services may or may not want to go into the unified service proposed by the minister but they are in effect being conscripted into the new force. I do not understand how the splinter parties at the far end on this side of the house can support conscription when they have opposed it in the House of Commons for so many years. The government is conscripting these men into the new force against their will.

What is unification? The minister's definition of unification is a dandy one. He says that unification is the end objective of a logical and evolutionary progression. One could almost apply that to the evolution of the species. It would look pretty silly if every one of us looked like the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Forrestall: And what if we thought like him?

Mr. Brand: I do not even want to think of going that far. It is much more than my mind could possibly stand at this late hour.

I wonder whether the experts who appeared before the committee really understood unification. At page 1233 of the committee proceedings the following exchange took place:

Mr. McIntosh: Could you give us your definition or understanding of what you think unification means?

Mr. Foulkes: It is completely beyond me.

Yet I have heard suggestions from hon. members on the other side of the house, including the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, that we on this side also lacked understanding. He thought unification was very simple: it was just a matter of changing the uniform and changing the name. He said that is all this bill means. This shows how clear his understanding is of what is going on. It is very nice when one can make decisions without regard to what the experts say.

At page 1396 of the committee proceedings the same hon. member, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, asked Air Marshal Annis the same question. Air Marshal Annis did not really know what unification means. There does not seem to be great agreement on what unification actually is. That is certainly true of the expert witnesses who appeared before the committee. Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

The Chairman: It being six o'clock, in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private member's business I do now leave the chair.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), Immigration—reported presence in Canada of German war criminals; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), Health and Welfare—protection of nutrition standards following milk price increase; the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard), Postal Service—delay in the delivery of mail in the counties of Bonaventure and Gaspé, P.Q.

PRIVATE BILLS

QUEBEC NORTH SHORE AND LABRADOR RAILWAY COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. S-31, respecting Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company—Mr. Blouin—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—Extension of time for completion of line.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I was present in the standing committee when this bill was discussed and I am surprised to find that the evidence taken before the committee is not yet available to us. Therefore there is some reluctance in discussing the bill at this time. The discussions in which I participated led me to believe that the extension of time for the completion of this railway is not necessarily in the interest of the community it will serve in view of the fact that the company has failed to live up to its original obligation.

Originally the Labrador Mining Company, which was owned and operated mainly by Hollinger Gold Mines, was granted a charter to build a railway line to bring out iron ore from the area in which it intended to operate. Many people have been inclined to wonder why the company sought a federal rather than a provincial charter, but a perusal of the map which has been supplied indicates that the line crosses the boundary between Quebec and Labrador at least once. I believe there are other spurs which cross the border, and for this reason a federal charter was sought.

In granting a charter to a company engaged mainly in mining one must bear in mind two major considerations. One is the advantage which will flow to the country in general by the opening up of a particular mining development. The second consideration is the service which will be provided to the people who will move into the area and become permanent residents. Obviously colonization takes place when a primary industry is developed in a given area and a community is built around that industry.

This company originally thought it would be able to use one of the ports in the northern extremity of the province of Quebec, namely, Ungava Bay, as a terminal and loading point. I have been quite closely connected with the mining industry and I remember the discussions that took place about the deep sea transportation which would be available when this railway line was built to Ungava.

It seems to me that since May 14, 1947, when the charter was first granted, the situation has changed substantially. I think that the development contemplated at that time has been brought to pass. The communities of Schefferville, Labrador City, Wabush and other small settlements in the area have established themselves and mining activities have spread to the extent that several mining companies are now in operation. Throughout the whole area extensive developments are taking place and an immense number of strikes involving various minerals have been recorded. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion it is now doubtful that this company should be operating a railway at all as a directly and totally owned subsidiary. I wonder whether the time has now come when the major railway companies of Canada should establish connections to this area and provide the transportation facilities required.

Several years ago this company experienced considerable difficulty with Wabash iron mines. The company wished to start developing its own mine but found itself what the members of the transportation committee would call a captive shipper of the line in that it would have to meet the rates set by the line. As I say, a great deal of difficulty arose in providing the extension necessary to tap the ore bodies of the area. For this reason there was considerable consternation in the area which resulted in a number of hearings before the Board of Transport Commissioners. Eventually a second subsidiary railway not connected with the first was built, and this line is now tied into that development.

> The Company may, within five years after the passing of this Act, commence to construct the line of railway, and may within ten years after the passing of this Act complete the said line of railway, and if within the said periods respectively the said line of railway is not commenced or is not completed and put in operation, the power of construction conferred upon the Company by the Parliament of Canada shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said line of railway as then remains uncompleted.

In my opinion this is what should have happened, and it would have happened but for the extension granted by parliament in 1956 of an additional ten years, extending the charter to 1967. The company is now returning to parliament, having done no further work on the line and given no further consideration to the problem, and asking for another extension of ten years to construct the line which has already been approved by parliament. The plans for the construction of the line have been submitted to agencies of the government and have met with the approval of parliament. Yet the line is no closer to completion than it was ten years ago. In their evidence before the committee officials of the company indicated, I suggest, that they had no intention whatever in the foreseeable future of extending the line to its final destination at Ungava Bay.

For this reason, I think this company is being both unfair and unreasonable in expecting parliament to extend its charter, which also gives it the right to limit the activity of other companies. The Board of Transport Commissioners would have to examine, of course, any additional request for railway facilities in the area, whether for the purpose of transporting ore from the mine or for the general conveyance of passengers. The board would have to consider the fact that a charter covering this area had already been granted.

It seems to me that the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company has been given a grave responsibility by parliament. In turn it has received a very large concession. It has been given the benefits of the Railway Act which allow it to conduct the business of railway transportation in all its forms —passenger service, baggage, movement of iron ore and minerals and other goods. It has been given the right to build hotels, telegraph and telephone lines, to operate pipe lines, to engage in shipping and in the development of all facilities made possible under Canadian railway legislation. In the minds of members of parliament when granting the original charter was the idea that in return for benefits the company would incur liabilities or obligations.

The people living in the Ungava, Labrador and northern Quebec areas have the right to expect the railway company we are considering to provide a service so that agricultural, forest and other products may be shipped and the mining communities, as well as persons engaging in exploration, may have the benefit of rail transportation. It seems evident, however, that this company does not intend to continue the development desired. It asks permission to extend its line for another 60 miles to join another line servicing another property. Though this company has come to parliament asking for an extension of time there is no legitimate reason for parliament to give a blank cheque, a charter to develop something that the company has no intention of developing. It seems that the company will do only a small portion of what it originally committed itself to do. I should like to see the railway extended to Ungava Bay and the Atlantic ocean. I should like to see railway lines extended in the northern areas of James Bay and Hudson Bay. We have many resources there. Enough iron ore exists in the Belcher Islands area to justify a railway being built on the east shore of Hudson Bay to provide service for a big steel plant which could be erected there.

Living in the north I am aware of the resources there. Communities will spring up around these resources and in time the entire area will be developed. I say that the Canadian National should have been entrusted with building a line to this northern area in Quebec. It was foolish to entrust a private company with the building of a railway to transport an important part of our natural resources. What has happened disturbs me.

The Labrador Iron Company can transport what it needs to transport much more easily than others who have no ownership in this railway. Parliament gave this company an important asset to help it develop its properties in the north. Some development has taken place and transportation needs for the area will continue to grow. Quite obviously, however, difficulties will arise should this line be extended to the Ungava area. Those difficulties were originally mentioned when the charter was first sought.

The management of Hollinger Mines has never been completely stupid. It was aware that Hudson strait freezes over, and that Ungava Bay is closed for many months of the year. It was aware of the difficulties of building a line into that area. Nevertheless the management did agree when seeking a charter to undertake development beyond its needs at that time. In fact, 150 to 200 miles north of where the line was to end large bodies of ore were blocked out.

I repeat that much development will take place in these northern areas. The hon. member representing the area in question is optimistic about its future. Having connections with diamond drilling companies working in that area, I am familiar with the fact that there is a tremendous potential for mining minerals there. It is estimated that there are hundreds of millions of tons of various kinds of ore there. I maintain that companies wishing to develop that region will have to depend for another ten years, should this charter be granted, on a company that may not build the railway that is needed.

Is it the intention of parliament to let this entire northern area be at the mercy of a company that may not build a needed railway? Do we in this house not wish to provide transportation facilities for the northern mining areas? Do we not wish to see transportation needs and rates determined by the Board of Transport Commissioners rather than by a private company? The board could set rates based on the cost of operating that railway. I point out that this private company would not be responsible to the board. Users of the railway would not have the board's protection.

I represent an area serviced by a provincial railway which operates in a manner different from that of other railways. It is interesting to note, for instance, that the Ontario Northland Railway employs licensed engineers, though other similar companies do not insist on their engineers having licences. Department of Transport examinations are the only criteria required.

It is also interesting to note that iron pellets are transported to Pittsburgh via five lines at a cost of less than $100 per car. I am told that the clay necessary for making these pellets comes from Manitoba over two lines at a cost of $285 per car. As can be seen, there is a great difference if goods are coming into the area or are being taken from it. I cite this example to show that the people in northern Labrador will find themselves in a similar situation.

There is a great disparity between the needs of the people and those of industry in that area. You subsidize one and you soak the other and there are always more people getting soaked than there are people receiving benefits.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, realizing that Bill S-31 was to come before the house during this hour I looked for the evidence before the standing committee and, like my hon. friend from Timiskaming, I was unable to find it.

Apparently it is not in print yet. My hon. friend did have the opportunity of attending the hearing before the committee but I was not able to do so and I am therefore somewhat at a loss in considering the merits of the bill now before us in committee of the whole house.

However, as I examined the title of the bill I discovered it to be "An Act respecting the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company". This rang a bell in my mind and I recalled that I had been a member of the old committee of the house on railways, canals and telegraph lines some ten years ago when a similar measure was under consideration. So I looked at the statutes of 1956 and examined chapter 68 entitled "An Act respecting the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company". I found there were some interesting similarities between that bill and the bill now before us. Both bills contain only one clause, the clause now before us, and I believe the differences and similarities between them may be of interest to hon. members who were not present when chapter 68 was enacted in 1956.

Clause 1 of the bill now before us reads:

> Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company, hereinafter called "the Company", may within a period of ten years from the 14th day of May, 1967, complete that portion of its line of railway authorized by chapter 80 of the statutes of 1947 which is not now completed, namely, from the town of Schefferville, in the province of Quebec, to Ungava Bay, and, if within the said period the said line of railway is not completed and put in operation, the powers of construction conferred upon the Company by the Parliament of Canada shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said line of railway as then remains uncompleted.

This is what is set out in chapter 68 of the statutes of 1956:

> Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company, hereinafter called "the Company", may within a period of ten years from the 14th day of May, 1957, complete that portion of its line of railway authorized by chapter 80 of the statutes of 1947 which is not now completed, namely, from the town of Schefferville, in the province of Quebec, to Ungava Bay, and, if within the said period the said line of railway is not completed and put in operation, the powers of construction conferred upon the Company by the Parliament of Canada shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said line of railway as then remains uncompleted.

It will be obvious to hon. members that save for the fact that the date is changed from May 14, 1957 to May 14, 1967 the bill now before us is identical in its terms with that which was before us ten years ago. This leads me to wonder whether this is likely to be a hardy decennial bill which will come before parliament every ten years from now until we celebrate our second centenary. In view of the fact that ten years after its earlier application the company is apparently in the same position with respect to the extension of this railway as it was in 1956, one wonders whether there is really much point in renewing this charter in respect of the portion of the line which still remains to be constructed.

If my understanding is correct as to what was said before the committee by a spokesman for the railway company, the company has indicated that it has no present intention of completing the line of railway to Ungava Bay within the next ten years. This is what I have been told. It seems to me that when the company comes before parliament with a request of this kind it should have serious intentions because undoubtedly the terms of this bill do confer rights and privileges and its passage may have an impact on other concerns and interests and what they may wish to do or be able to do within this large area of Canada. Having renewed the company's privileges for one period of ten years during which they apparently were not exercised, it seems to me the house should do nothing more now than extend the company's rights in respect of projects it has every intention of fulfilling.

When I realized that this bill was in terms almost identical with the one introduced ten years ago, I took the trouble to refresh my mind as to what had gone on in the committee when the earlier application was under consideration. In the proceedings of the house committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in 1956 we find that Mr. Hugh E. O'Donnell, Q.C., solicitor for the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company, appeared as a witness. He had this to say, as reported at page 10 of the committee evidence:

> Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, this is a very simple bill.

I do not know why it is that all these bills that come in as private bills are always described as being very simple bills. Whether this is because they consider that members of the House of Commons are a bit simple minded and can only cope with simple bills, I have never been able to decide. Mr. O'Donnell continued:

> It is merely asking for authority to extend the franchise for a further ten years. The railway was incorporated, as hon. members know, in 1947 and its purpose was to permit the construction of a railway from a point on the St. Lawrence River to Ungava Bay.

Then he went on to describe the route of the railway, which was shown on a map placed in a position where members of the committee could see it. He pointed out that——it runs from Seven Islands to Schefferville which is 375 miles; 138 miles roughly from the river to the southern boundary of Labrador and then for a distance of 212 miles across Labrador and back into Quebec at Schefferville which is approximately 25 miles beyond; there is approximately 300 miles from Schefferville to Ungava Bay, and at the present time there is no requirement for transportation in that area.

Then a little later on we had before us Mr. W. H. Durrell, the vice president and general manager of the Iron Ore Company of Canada. The then hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, now Hon. Howard Green, was a member of the committee and he questioned Mr. Durrell as follows, at page 14 of the evidence:

By Mr. Green:

Q. Your company built this railway in order to get out your own iron ore deposits in the vicinity of Schefferville?—A. That is right.

Q. That is the real and only reason that you constructed the railway?—A. We had sufficient tonnage to justify the building of the railway.

Q. Have you any rights north of Schefferville towards Ungava Bay?—A. Yes. Our company and our subsidiaries are doing a lot of work in that region. When you say 'rights', you mean ground?

Q. Yes?—A. We have a subsidiary company called Orlando mines which spent several million dollars in the last few years to justify the extension of the railway.

Q. Would you please point out on the map where you have these deposits and rights north of Schefferville?—A. On this ground we staked the same as any other prospector.

He went on to point out that at Fort McKenzie they have a small copper showing. Mr. Green then asked:

Q. What other companies or groups have rights, or are working in that area between Schefferville and Ungava Bay?—A. I could not name them all, but there are a number, such as Long Lake gold mines which is in the same general vicinity. They are about here on the map at this point, south of the Koksoak River, and Fentimore iron is in there. They will be doing considerable work with their base metal concessions. The Labrador trough is about 50 miles west, and in this 35 miles of the western section is where they find iron. Due east of this brown area, there is a belt about 15 miles in width.

Q. That little strip from Schefferville to Ungava Bay is a very promising area?—A. Yes, it is very promising.

Discussion proceeded on the basis of inquiry by Mr. Green and other members of the committee into the mineral potential of the area as it was then known. At page 19 of the evidence there appeared this question by Mr. Carrick:

Q. Have you in mind any estimate of the time likely to be needed for this construction?—A. My understanding is that it would take at least six years.

Q. Would you feel justified in commencing the construction of the railway right away? I understood you to say earlier that the date of beginning construction depended upon exploration to be carried out in the northern territory.—A. There is nothing at the moment to justify the construction of a railway. Surveys show areas which may be suitable for mining development, but so far, as I said, we know of nothing which would justify beginning construction.

Q. So in addition to the six years you think it would take to complete the project you would need to have a period of time in which to consider whether it would be justified to begin construction?—A. It would take at least three years to locate sufficient tonnage.

Then Mr. Hamilton, who was then the member for York West, went into some questioning about what they had in mind when they got their franchise, and as the evidence proceeds it is clear that in the minds of at least some members of the committee the proposal to grant this franchise for a further ten years from May 14, 1956, was conferring pretty firm monopoly rights upon this particular concern, at least for practical purposes in the future exploitation of the mining resources of that whole area.

At page 26 of the evidence Mr. Green, who was one of the principal spokesmen for the then Conservative opposition in the house on matters dealing with transportation, said this:

On clause 1, Mr. Chairman, I would like to move an amendment in line 9, to substitute the word "five" for "ten". The result of that would be that the extended time within which this company could complete the extension to Ungava Bay would be five years from the 14th May 1957 instead of ten years. In other words, they would have until the 14th May 1962.

In support of this amendment I point out the nature of this railway changes from Schefferville to the north. The company built this line from Seven Islands to Schefferville for the purpose of getting out this company's own ore, the parent company's own iron ore. But once it goes beyond Schefferville then the company has no specific interest, and the line will then become a railway for the use of other Canadians who are interested in that particular area. There is quite a different background, then, for the construction from Seven Islands to Schefferville.

Based on the evidence that had been given to the committee, Mr. Green added:

I would point out also that the area is developing rapidly. Mr. Durrell admitted that himself...

It is all right to give this company a concession, but there is no rhyme or reason why this company should have a strangle hold on the country in question for ten years. They can sit down and do absolutely nothing for ten years, and in fact nobody else can move into that area.

That was said in 1956. Now, in 1967, we have this company coming before us with an identical proposal for a further ten year extension which, if one accepts Mr. Green's view as stated in 1956, gives them a "strangle hold on the country in question for ten years," and "nobody else can move into the area". I suggest that Mr. Green's words have proven to be quite prophetic.

The bill which we have before us today shows that in fact Mr. Green was quite correct when, before the standing committee of 1956, he suggested that parliament was then creating a situation in which this company could sit on this franchise for 10 years and do nothing about it. Now the company comes before us again to ask for a further 10 year extension. From the understanding I have of the evidence they gave before the committee, they have no intention to build this railway line to Ungava Bay within the period of the next 10 years. I would suggest with all seriousness that this sort of approach to parliament is one which should give rise in the minds of hon. members to some very serious questions.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Mr. Barnett: I am sorry I did not get around to quoting my own remarks.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I am wondering whether we might hear a few remarks from the sponsor of this bill. If he is prepared to speak to it, I would be glad to yield the floor to him.

[Translation]

Mr. Blouin: Mr. Chairman, I feel everything has been said which could be said about Bill No. S-31, entitled an Act respecting Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company. Still, I noticed what the hon. members for Timiskaming and Comox-Alberni (Messrs. Peters and Barnett) had to say.

I do not think that the company concerned, or the other companies, because there are others operating in that area—

[English]

I should like to say to my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni, in respect of his statement that for the past 10 years, or at the time when Mr. Green gave evidence before the committee in 1956, everything was frozen, that there has been a great deal of movement in that part of the country in question. As you know, this was started by one company, the Iron Ore Company of Canada. Three very large companies are operating up in that area now.

From Schefferville to Ungava Bay there are 282 miles of country in which at the present time there is absolutely nothing. I do not believe this company should be forced to build a railway 282 miles in length for the caribou. With the development which is going on in that area, we have no assurance that some other company will not ask for a charter to build a railroad in that part of the Ungava and Labrador area. I do not see anything in this bill which suggests that with this 10 year extension this area will be frozen.

The proof of this is that we have seen the Wabush mines develop the Wabush area. They built their own railroad on a 42 mile stretch which connected with the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway which comes down to Seven Islands. This railroad was built, even though this clause in respect of the 10 years existed at that time.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question. He said that another railway company could come to parliament and obtain a charter. This I believe was in respect of the unbuilt line of railway from Schefferville to Ungava Bay. Is the hon. member seriously suggesting that another company could come along, ask for a charter, and then take the risk of building a railroad through that distance of undeveloped country which he mentioned? I am sure he knows the country much better than I do, although I did fly over it last summer while on the way to Frobisher. Is he seriously suggesting this would happen when another company has been given by parliament the right to build a competing line running parallel to it?

I have another question which has to do with the area he mentioned, where the Wabush Mining Company has its railway. Does he not feel, because of the charter granted by parliament to this particular company, that it would have a big hand in negotiations with another company in respect of an extension to that line? Does he not feel that this charter extension gives this particular company an unfair advantage, if it wished to use it, in its relations with another company which might wish to develop a mine?

Mr. Blouin: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the first question, as this area between Schefferville and Ungava Bay is entirely in the province of Quebec, if because of economic developments some company wished to build a railroad there, they would not have to come to the Canadian parliament; they would just have to go to the Quebec parliament and obtain a private charter in the same way the Quebec-Cartier Mining Company did. They are private carriers; they are not common carriers because they are operating in one province only.

In respect of the second question, I do not think the charter of the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company has prevented the Wabush mines developing this large area, because so far that company has invested $295 million and another $112 million in their pelletizing plant at Sept-Îles. I should like to repeat that even though this clause in respect of the 10 year period is in existence I do not think, if economic developments warranted the building of a railroad, that anybody else who wished to build a railroad would be prevented from doing so. They would merely have to apply to the Quebec parliament for a charter, and obtain it.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question. I have been endeavouring to get this matter straightened out in my mind. Is it true that this charter which was granted to the company originally 20 years ago was contingent on that company completing the railroad through to Ungava.

Mr. Blouin: So far as I know this charter was granted in 1947 and renewed in 1957.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Yes, but it was granted contingent on the railroad being completed from the St. Lawrence river to Ungava bay.

Mr. Blouin: The original charter, yes; but there was nothing to justify their going beyond Schefferville. The original charter was granted in respect of a line to Ungava, because of the desire to have access to a seaport. At that time the engineers said that the only way to ship this ore through a deep sea port was by building a line to Fort Chimo on Ungava Bay. Since then the engineering studies have indicated that this ore can be shipped feasibly over a rail line from Schefferville to Seven Islands. That is what is being suggested at the present time.

• (6:50 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, this bill was considered extensively by a committee. The officials of the Iron Ore Company appeared and told in a straightforward way about their future plans for the development of that area. I was very much impressed with their testimony and the story they told about this development in Quebec and Labrador. As one who does not know very much about the area, let me say I think this is an interesting idea and I support their request for a 10 year extension.

Some information was given today by an hon. member to my left to the effect that this company was asking for an exclusive franchise or a blank cheque. Actually the company is asking for nothing more than a 10 year extension. They have indicated the difficulties involved in this whole project, and that apparently no other company seems to have an interest. That to me is significant. I recall asking the representatives of that company during a committee hearing whether there was any such interest. If we do not grant this extension and take away this franchise we will do a disservice to this area because the rail line may never be built. In view of that fact I for one want to indicate my interest and personal support in respect of this request for an extension.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question? If I understood him correctly, he made some reference to a statement made by an hon. member in this area of the house. Is the hon. member trying to suggest that the concern expressed by Hon. Howard Green ten years ago was concern expressed through the top of his hat? I am not suggesting that Howard Green was not interested in the development of that area, but he certainly expressed some concern originally about the kind of action proposed by this bill.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I was probably a member of the committee at that time, though I do not remember the particular hearing to which the hon. member has referred. Presumably Mr. Green was his usual optimistic self at that time, but things did not work out as expected. Surely we should not criticize his optimism. The only thing I objected to in the hon. member's statement was his reference to a blank cheque. By adopting this bill we will not be issuing a blank cheque. All we will be doing is extending the company's right to continue something in which nobody else seems to be interested.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, it is all right to suggest that this charter does not have an exclusive aspect, but every time a property is discovered with some valuable ore deposits, this company will be able to dictate who can develop that property, just as the Wabush Company has done. Anybody who appreciates the troubles between the Wabush Company and the Iron Ore Company of Canada must be aware that this whole matter is not a simple one. We gave that company the absolute right to say who is going to operate a mine in the area in which it is located.

If we do the same thing in respect of the company in question no prospector will go into that area looking for whatever resource properties may exist there, because he will not be able to develop them without building a rail line at a construction cost of perhaps $500,000 per mile. We will in effect be allowing this company to decide what arrangement may be made for the development of this area. It may well go to the provincial government for a charter as a common carrier, in order to develop its own holdings.

Surely it is apparent that this company no longer intends to do what it originally had in mind. In the original charter it was stated that if within set periods the line of rail was not commenced or completed and put into operation the power in respect of construction conferred upon the company by the parliament of Canada would cease, and be null and void in respect of that part of the said line which remained incomplete. The company agreed that if it did not build the line outlined in the charter it would not have control of the construction of the remainder.

I am in agreement with the hon. member that the company found it extremely expensive to build a line in order to have a deep sea port on Ungava Bay. For that reason the company decided not to use that area as a shipping point. Almost all line construction now leads to Seven Islands, and the company is not at all interested in developing this other portion.

Surely there is no reason for extending this charter for another ten years. The hon. member for Skeena suggested that this company should put up a performance bond in the amount of $10 million, or $1 million per year for ten years. That amount of money would finance the construction of an additional 20 miles of line. Surely that is not an unreasonable amount in light of the fact that some 220 miles of line is contemplated. That is not an extravagant requirement.

Originally we gave this company an opportunity to develop this rail line in a certain area. There is an inherent commitment on the part of the company. I predict that within a short period of time the company will come back to this house or to the provincial government asking for another extension in respect of another 60 miles of rail line to be built in another direction. The original charter was quite explicit as to where the line was to be built, although the company was given a great deal of leeway.

It is my opinion that if we grant this extension the company will build rail lines in directions other than the one originally contemplated. While I have no objection to giving this company the right to develop their property or to construct a rail line, I believe the people of Canada should not allow it to develop its rail lines in a disorderly fashion—a short piece of line going this way, another piece going that way, and still another going another direction.

For the various reasons I have outlined I think this company should be required to abide by the original injunction to which it agreed in 1947. If the company is prepared to make a commitment similar to what has been suggested, I am prepared to support this bill. The very fact that they have not suggested a performance bond is an indication that the company has little interest in the extension of this line as originally contemplated.

• (7:00 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, may I call it seven o'clock.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): The hour appointed for the consideration of private members business having expired, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: This sitting is suspended from now until eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Brand: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock I was discussing several of the seven points which I believe are at issue in this very vital debate. If I may review them briefly, they concern the effect on morale of the proposed unification bill, the so-called savings about which the minister has been talking, and the so-called increase in efficiency which will result from unification. I mentioned briefly the issue of conscription, and what we mean by the expression "unification of the armed services".

Now I should like to go on to discuss briefly the sixth point, namely whether or not the unification proposed by the minister and the government will create any incompatability between our armed services and the armed services of other countries. Let me refer once again to the committee's proceedings which, at page 1320, contain a remark by General Moncel in response to a question by the hon. member for Queens. It reads as follows:

> Mr. MacLean (Queens): Do you believe that our oportunity to gain from the experience and resources of our allies, which you mentioned some time ago in reply to a previous question—chiefly, Great Britain and the United States—will be lessened if we have an entirely different organization in the form of a unified force?
> Mr. Moncel: Of course, it will.

He goes on to give an example. From General Moncel's reply one gathers there will be a great lessening in the amount of interplay that can go on properly between the armed services of this country and the armed services primarily of Great Britain and the United States. Yet the minister still persists in pointing out how efficient we are going to be if we have a force which will be, as he says, truly Canadian, with one uniform but no Royal Canadian Navy, no Royal Canadian Air Force and no Canadian Army: Just the Canadian forces. But is this realistic? Can we, so to speak, go it alone? Can we have an armed force, unique in every sense of the word, but different from the armed forces of our allies? Do we plan to fight our own wars or do we plan to let somebody else do the fighting for us? Is this the type of attitude that Canada exhibited during the last two wars? Of course it is not. But is it the minister's plan for the future? We are being inundated with plans for the future.

I read a rather interesting article in last night's Ottawa Journal under the byline of Peter Newman. I think it is a very interesting comment which should go on the record. Mr. Newman says this:

> It must be emphasized that none of these startling ideas are in the process of becoming government policy. They reflect only the serious questioning that's going on about Canada's military future.

A little later I will explain why I feel it is worth putting this article on the record, but let me diverge for a moment. When I listened to the minister's speech the other night I could not help but be struck by the similarity between the article which appeared in Tuesday night's Ottawa Journal written by Mr. Peter Newman and the speech made by the minister. Far be it from me to suggest that there was any collusion between the minister and Mr. Peter Newman. I would never think of suggesting such a thing; but the fact is they were both discussing in exactly the same way—and the words are indeed very close—the relationship between Mr. McNamara and the joint chiefs of staff in the United States. With this background, and realizing that there appears to be some rapport of some kind, I would like to read the following excerpt from Mr. Newman's article:

> A much more dramatic break with Canadian military tradition is being advocated by some of Ottawa's younger Liberals. They want, in effect, to demilitarize our unified armed forces—

Let hon. members note that the services are already unified in their view.

> —and turn them into an economic instrument. This would mean moving young men into temporary service in the armed forces during periods of economic recession,—

I have no doubt that the government is afraid of exactly that in the near future. It goes on to read:

> —giving them trade training while they serve, and letting them rejoin the labour force when jobs become available again.

This is what the government is planning for the armed forces of our country. It continues:

> At the same time, the Department of National Defence would be turned into the headquarters—

And this is the pièce de résistance.

> —for a sort of domestic and foreign peace corps.

This is an incredible summation for a journalist who over the past few years seems to have had a tremendous affinity for hon. gentlemen opposite. I am sure that Mr. Newman would not think of writing anything in the Ottawa Journal, or any of the other papers which carry his column, which did not have a large element of truth in it. Imagine, Mr. Chairman, turning our armed forces into an economic instrument.

What about our commitments? The most important point of all is our ability to meet our commitments with a unified force. Many references were made in the evidence to this point. As reported at page 1384, Air Marshal Annis pointed out that he did not believe that with a unified force we could carry on our present commitments under NATO, NORAD and so on. As reported at page 1312 General Moncel said exactly the same thing, Let me just quote briefly what he said in reply to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, whose name I understand is familiar to the minister:

> —I will write you a commitment for the country which will generate the need for a unified force. It is very simple. But with your current commitments you do not want one. In fact, it is better that you do not have one.

Air Vice Marshal Hendrick gave evidence on this point at page 1451 of the report. Lieutenant General Moncel dealt with it again, as reported at page 1323. He was asked this question by the hon. member for Greenwood:

> Therefore, the real choice that we have to make, as a nation and that we are responsible for making in parliament, in the matter of making sense out of unification, is whether we are going to continue the roles that we have or concentrate on this mobile intervention force?

To that question General Moncel answered: "Yes".

I could draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to many more comments of this nature. I think it is interesting to note that General Moncel made a rather appropriate comment when he said that we were moving on an unchartered course at a very high speed toward an unknown destination. And guess who is at the helm, Mr. Chairman—a man with no navigation experience at all, the Minister of National Defence.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, in view of the preponderance of evidence—

The Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

[Mr. Brand.]

Mr. Brand: I have just one final sentence, if I may have the permission of the committee.

The Chairman: Does the committee give the hon. member unanimous consent to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brand: I thank the members of the committee for their generosity; I have one final summation to make.

In view of the preponderance of evidence, which indicates that we should stand back and take a second look at what is going on here, I submit we should heed the advice of these experts who appeared before our defence committee and the minister should take time for sober second thoughts about this legislation. Let him put if off for now, think about it, plan for it properly. Let him meet with the minister of external affairs, and perhaps they together can come up with some ideas about a force and a foreign policy which can be integrated. I think this is essential if we are to continue to be able to defend our country in the future as we have in the past.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but on listening to the minister's speech last Tuesday afternoon it seemed to me there was an indication that he might be mellowing just a bit. Since I have had the pleasure of knowing the minister personally for a number of years, I thought that if I stood up and made a personal plea to him to reconsider his position he might do just that. I have known the minister, as I said, for a number of years and had always thought that he was an understanding and tolerant man. Regrettably I must say that some of his recent actions and some of his not so recent actions could well indicate otherwise.

I want to talk for a little while about integration and then about that now infamous word, unification. I am not going to speak on the subject with the degree of authority that someone who has considerable military experience might. I do not pretend to be an expert. However, I do have some views to express, mainly because I have had the opportunity of discussing this issue with many people right across Canada. I have talked to people of all ages, people with military experience and otherwise, people in the army, the navy, the air force and civilians.

I agree, I say at once, with the principle of integration. I think there are services that operate economically and efficiently under integration—for example, hospital services, medical services, chaplain services, administration, and in some respects supply services. They can be and are integrated, with a saving of some considerable consequence. I am sure that with research and with a little greater knowledge of the subject I could make many suggestions where like savings could be effected. I also believe that practical business procedures should not be foreign to defence administration and that the application of some business sense and business law can effect some significant savings in the long run.

Getting back to this infamous word unification, Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that the minister does not know what the word means. The previous chairman of the defence committee was not sure what it meant when he spoke in this house Tuesday last, April 11.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if you take away from servicemen the identification of their skills, the uniform that identifies them with a specific service, and you give all servicemen a pea-green uniform, then you have nothing left. You have no meaning or symbol; you have no tradition; you have no history. You really have no meaningful defence posture. I suggest that in his haste the minister is willing to sacrifice all of this identity because he wants at all costs to create this new warrior as his personal centennial project; and for the sake of the minister I hope that he is right and that he knows what he is doing.

The minister is not altogether without friends. I read the white paper when it came out in March of 1964. In April of that year I was invited to speak to a service club in Edmonton, and at that time I tried to show some of the anomalies and inadequacies in the proposal. The only newspaper in Edmonton, The Edmonton Journal, on April 9, 1964, took it upon itself to criticize me for expressing a view on the matter. I have the editorial before me. Subsequent action and the introduction of legislation proved that my initial contention was correct. The editorial said:

> Mr. William Skoreyko made some reasonable criticisms of the new defence proposals, when he spoke to the Macdonald-Cartier Club here, but he also fell into a number of careless or inaccurate statements—
> What Mr. Hellyer has emphasized over and over again, and what is a central theme of his white paper, is that housekeeping costs are to be reduced so that a higher percentage of the defence budget can be devoted to the purchase of capital equipment.

I agree with the sentiment of the last sentence. It continues:

> At another point in his talk, Mr. Skoreyko tried to make a problem out of the proposed gradual conversion of the fourth brigade (in reverse in Canada) "into a special service force."
> We quote the white paper's wording. He asked how the three services would feel, after being jumbled into one force, when they see a new force created with special uniforms and name.
> Mr. Skoreyko sees something that isn't there. We take the white paper and the minister to mean, simply, a force or unit for special service. Who, apart from Mr. Skoreyko, has suggested that it would have a special uniform?

I do not wish to criticize the editorial writers of the newspaper, though I know something of their political backgrounds. I would not ask the minister to communicate with them, telling them to write another editorial to tell the people of Edmonton that the previous editorial was wrong, that the minister has now decided on a pea-green uniform. The editorial goes on to say:

> By no means all Mr. Skoreyko's statements are open to criticism. But in so vital a matter as a radical change in defence policy he ought to be certain that none of his remarks is careless, inaccurate or misleading. Defence is much too important to be left to confusion.

I agree with the last paragraph. But that newspaper is not justified in asking us to refrain from speaking when the responsibility for unification or integration is that of the present Minister of National Defence.

Turning to another subject, I listened with considerable interest to the minister's speech of last Tuesday afternoon. Most of us, when we are apt to be affected politically have short memories, but I wish to refer to a paragraph on page 14788 of Hansard of last Tuesday afternoon, in which the Minister of National Defence attacked the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. The minister said:

> The second example I should like to give is the choice of the airplane for the strike role; I am referring to the CF-104. Here again, Mr. Chairman, there is a very unusual sequence of events. The choice that was made of the CF-104 was a government decision. It is true that eventually the chiefs of staff made a recommendation, but only after they had been directed to do so by the government—> —of the right hon. gentleman and only after they had already said that this was not the best airplane to carry out the role and was in fact not suitable to carry out the role.

Who, does the minister think, should have directed the chiefs of staff, if they needed directing?

It is interesting, when reading the clippings, to see that the minister does not enjoy the cleanest record when it comes to taking advice from people in authority in the defence structure.

I have in my hand a clipping headed, "Hellyer Rejected Plane Advice". To me that means that the Minister of National Defence is putting himself above a prime minister of a country. The minister says that the prime minister, obviously in 1961 or 1962, rejected the advice of the chiefs of staff and bought an aircraft. The present Minister of National Defence rejected advice, and he also bought an aircraft. The article says this:

> Hon. Paul Hellyer, minister of defence, rejected the recommendation of most of his senior military advisers when he decided on purchase of a fighter-bomber.
> Informed sources made the disclosure Tuesday.
> However, the sources added, the senior officers did not resent rejection of their advice nor did Mr. Hellyer question their ability in making it. Such decisions were up to the government and the military accepted them.

The minister sits on the government benches today; it is all right for him to recommend certain things to the chiefs of staff, but it is not all right for the former Conservative prime minister to have advised his chiefs of staff. This is an interesting article. It continues:

> Air Chief Marshal Frank Miller, chief of the defence staff, issued a statement Tuesday denying a Canadian Press report Monday that Air Vice-Marshal Wilfred Bean was transferred to Europe because he opposed purchase of the CF-5.

Perhaps the minister will take the opportunity to answer that charge:

> The statement did not deny that Air Vice Marshal Bean had opposed acquisition of the CF-5. It described his posting overseas to 4th Allied Tactical Air Force as routine. He had been assistant chief of defence staff.
> Informants said Air Chief Marshal Miller and Air Marshal Clare Annis, chief of logistics, as well as Air Vice Marshal Bean, favored purchase of the American McDonnell Phantom jet fighter-bomber on strictly military grounds.
> They noted that Air Chief Marshal Miller did not attend the press conference at which Mr. Hellyer announced choice of the CF-5 though he had attended a similar press briefing in December when selection of other defence equipment was announced by the minister.

One can see the degree of co-operation existing as early as August 25, 1965.

Another interesting point in this article is that the CF-5 program of up to 125 aircraft made by Canadair Limited, Montreal, is relatively cheap, as such weapons programs go:

> While the decision to turn down the Phantom and buy the CF-5 was in the long process of being made, the objections of senior officers to the latter plane filtered down through the RCAF, officials said.
> As a result, they said, a major "selling job" had to be done among men who would fly and maintain the plane. There are already two Northrop-made CF-5s at Cold Lake, Alta., the RCAF's big jet training base, for demonstration purposes.
> Northrop has made no secret of the fact it accepted an extremely low payment—

It does not matter how cheap an aircraft is. Another article that I have describes the CF-5 as a peashooter.

• (8:30 p.m.)

I wish to refer to another editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of April 12, 1967. It read in part:

> More than one year ago John Diefenbaker asked for an investigation of the proposed purchase of CF-5 aircraft to cost $215 million. The leader of the opposition made the demand because of continual changes in the assessed capacity of this plane.
> Briefly it had already been established that the CF-5 had:
> (c) No long-range capacity.
> (g) And deemed useless by the U.S. air force for service in Viet Nam without costly modifications.

Yet the minister criticized the present Leader of the Opposition for adopting the CF-104 which had been developed by the Liberals and which, as I am sure he will now admit, has done excellent service in NATO and elsewhere.

This is not all that has been said about the CF-5. An article which appeared in the Edmonton Journal, written by Charles Lynch and headed "Combat Tests on Tap for RCAF's New Jet" stated:

> One of the embarrassing things about Canada's purchase of the American Freedom Fighter aircraft is that, to date, the United States hasn't bought any for its own use.

That is wrong, now. They have bought about 100. The article goes on:

> Officials of our defence department have been saying all along that the U.S. intends to make such purchases, and that the United States Air Force desperately wants the Freedom Fighter, the Canadian name for which is the CF-5.
> Now, the evidence is beginning to come in and the defence department is delighted.
> What's happened is that the U.S.A.F. has persuaded Defence Secretary Robert McNamara, long a sceptic about the Freedom Fighter, to send 20 of the planes to Viet Nam for combat testing. Later, in the fall, they will go to Viet Nam for strafing and bombing missions.

The writer goes on to say:

After all, the Tories turned down an earlier version of the Freedom Fighter in 1959, and it is unlikely that they will applaud the government's purchase of it now.

That is very true. How could we?

Freedom Fighters for Viet Nam cost $700,000 apiece, somewhat lower than the starting price in Canada of $900,000 each which would be inflated by other charges.

In the words of one Washington dispatch, the Freedom Fighter might well serve as a better peashooter than some of the planes now in Viet Nam. I should like to hear a little more about this fantastic aircraft, in the light of the hon. gentleman's criticism of the CF-104.

With reference again to the minister's speech of Tuesday, April 11: After an exchange of words with the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. gentleman said—and he was referring to my right hon. friend:

He was not going to be pushed around by the industrial military complex. He was going to show who was running Canada and cancel the Avro Arrow regardless.

Well, it seems the Minister of National Defence is not going to be pushed around by anyone. I will come back to that later.

If hon. members would refer to Saturday Night of March 1965 they will find there an article written by Kenneth McNaught which states, in part:

My conclusion is that the Liberals never really wanted to accept nuclear weapons, that they did so in order not to upset their principal supporters in the business community, who were worried about the possible effects of our recalcitrance on economic relations with the United States, and that we are now seeking a way out of the nuclear commitment.

Here he is saying that the Leader of the Opposition did not wish to be pushed around and thought it best that he cancel the Avro Arrow because it did not fit well into the economy. Because he did this he was showing that he did not intend to be pushed around. But the Minister of National Defence did not intend to be pushed around, either, because in 1962 he spoke up in the House of Commons, as only he could, in favour of a policy of no nuclear weapons for Canada. Then he changed his mind.

I wish to speak for a few moments about the veracity of this government and of the minister. We are now asked to believe the government when it says that all is well in the armed forces. We should have no doubt about the government's sincerity in connection with Bill C-243. But we have had considerable experience with this government. The desire to get elected was a major reason for some startling changes in their attitude a few years ago. But sincerity is not something which one practices only when it is convenient.

I have here an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of February 13, 1963 and I think it should once again be placed on record because it is a most interesting article. It begins:

The Liberals are the most bewildered and bewildering of all the four parties on the nuclear issue. Statements by Lester Pearson and Paul Hellyer after the Liberal council meeting this week have added to the confusion.

This is not surprising. It is in keeping with the party's attitude for the past four years.

Since 1960 the Liberals have been against nuclear weapons and for nuclear weapons; they have been partly against nuclear weapons and partly for nuclear weapons; they have been against nuclear weapons in Canada but maybe for nuclear weapons for Canadian NATO forces in Europe.

Here are some highlights in the Liberal record:

Paul Hellyer, Liberal defence critic, announced his party's defence program in the Commons on August 4, 1960. The main points were no nuclear weapons for use on Canadian soil or in Canadian air space; scrap plans to acquire the Starfighter for Canada's NATO forces; scrap the Bomarc-SAGE program for anti-bomber defence of this continent.

• (8:40 p.m.)

That was a noble stand.

The following day Mr. Pearson said in the Commons:

"In my view we should get out of the whole SAGE-Bomarc operation, and we should not spend any more money on radar gap fillers. Our objection to the Bomarc is not only that we do not think it is an effective weapon... our objection is the kind of defence strategy it represents and which we do not think will be effective, however effective the weapon may be. If the United States wishes to continue that kind of protection, let the United States do so. Let us withdraw from that direct form of continental defence."

That is also a noble statement.

The Liberal leader took a different attitude toward "commitments" at that time.

Mr. Pearson went on to say, "After all, this kind of defence is primarily a United States responsibility. It is the defence of the deterrent. We know how important that is; but it is a deterrent which is under the sole control of the United States of America."

Nor was the Liberal leader much concerned about anti-Americanism, for he continued, "It is not a defence, and in the nature of things I submit it cannot be a defence, of our territory in the traditional sense of the word, and it will soon be no defence of anything... It seems to me, Mr.

Chairman, that our experience in the past three years has shown that in attempting to participate in continental defence in the way we have, we are becoming nothing more than just the last two knots on the Bomarc tail of the defence kite."

I do not need to tell the committee what happened only weeks after he made those statements. For the benefit of hon. members on the other side who were not here at the time and would like to read the record, they will find it at page 7606 of Hansard for August 5, 1960. This seemed to be the Liberal party position until January 12, 1963, when the Prime Minister visited Toronto and had this to say at a meeting of the York-Scarborough Liberal Association:

"It (the Ottawa government) should end its evasion of responsibility, by discharging the commitments it has already accepted for Canada. It can only do this by accepting nuclear warheads, for those defensive tactical weapons which cannot effectively be used without them, but which we have agreed to use. An agreement with the United States for this purpose would have to be negotiated—

That was on January 12. A few days later it was not negotiation he spoke about. He said it should be reviewed. I do not need to put any more of this article on the record, Mr. Chairman.

I again point out one simple fact. The Minister of National Defence is asking us to accept his word that everything is all right so far as Canada's defence structure is concerned. His attitude is, "We will look after the armed forces. Leave it to us. Pass the bill and let us get ahead with the job." All I say is that we have had considerable experience with the government. We have had considerable experience with the Prime Minister. We have had considerable experience with the veracity of the Minister of National Defence. I am not sure that as a member of parliament I want to turn over to him the sole responsibility of taking care of an essential part of our country's defence.

How confident is the minister that the program he has embarked on is the right one? I suppose any normal human being, after making a statement of fact in the House of Commons, would assume that, if it was a statement on a subject of vital interest to Canadians, they would read it in the press, and if further interested they would find ways and means of obtaining more information relative to the subject. That is not the case with the Minister of National Defence. He made a speech in the House of Commons, and then to make sure it was read, though it really did not matter whether it was read or not, he went out and spent $5,398 of the taxpayers' money to make sure that it was read. I quote this report from the Edmonton Journal of March 14:

Defence Minister Hellyer disclosed in the Commons Monday that his department spent $5,398—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent in the committee to allow the hon. member to continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Skoreyko: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was quoting a newspaper report dealing with the degree of confidence that the minister had in his own policy statement. It says that the minister ordered 45,240 copies of his December 7 speech for distribution at the taxpayers' expense.

Mrs. Rideout: Don't be nasty.

Mr. Skoreyko: I beg the lady's pardon. I say again, Mr. Chairman, the minister is asking us to turn over to him, without debate—

Mr. Matheson: Without debate?

Mr. Skoreyko: —the full responsibility for the job he is trying to do. I am not sure he knows what it is that he wants to do. I am more and more convinced he does not know the implications of the word unification. He has still not told us the state of affairs respecting our commitments to NATO and NORAD. When he finds time to answer some of these questions we may be able to take a better and closer look at this bill.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, you know I am the soul of brevity and I just wish to take two or three minutes to correct some inaccurate information given to the press last evening by Mr. Lee who, I understand, is the information officer for the minister's office. Yesterday I asked the minister this question, as recorded at page 14829 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I am informed that a dozen chief petty officers and petty officers from the Royal Canadian Navy, coming from the east and west coasts, are attending a supply course in the district. As one feature of that course they are present in the gallery of this chamber. Before coming here they were told to remove their uniforms because the unification debate will be taking place and it would not be appropriate for them to be in naval uniform on this occasion. Can the minister explain this situation?

The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, not only am I unable to explain it, I had not heard about it until this moment. I will make inquiries.

However, as soon as I had asked the question Mr. Lee went around to the press and to the radio people in the house and informed them that the reason these men were not allowed in the house in their uniforms was because this was a tradition from the time of Charles I. While there was no law in this respect—he had consulted the legal office of the minister's department—it was a tradition and a practice in all parliaments of the Commonwealth.

This is quite incorrect. During my experience here of nearly 22 years I have never seen a member of the armed forces denied admission to the galleries. I have made inquiries since yesterday and I can truly say that no Speaker and no Sergeant-at-Arms has ever issued an order that members of the armed forces who come to the galleries, unarmed and in uniform, shall be denied entrance to the galleries of the house. The same rule applies to the mother of parliaments.

As a matter of fact I was at Westminster in Great Britain when, for one moment, being a member of parliament from Canada I was what is known as a distinguished visitor. The procedure is that you line up and your name is called. In front of me was an admiral of the Royal Navy in full uniform and we sat together in the distinguished visitors gallery of the house, one of my brief moments of glory in a rather mediocre career.

Anyway the practice is the same in the mother of parliaments. Last evening I was asked to appear on television at a private television station. I made some comments on this matter. One of the members of the press finally came to me with the statement made by Mr. Lee. I said this was nonsense. Strangely enough a gentleman who stays at the University Club of Toronto immediately wrote me as follows:

> Dear Mr. Herridge: I have just heard on "The World at Six" C.B.C. radio program of your hassle with Mr. Hellyer over his ruling that it was improper under a tradition going back to Charles I for military or naval personnel to appear in the gallery of the House of Commons in uniform.

Of course it was not a hassle with the minister; it was a question of something which originated with the minister's information officer, parliamentary assistant and chief factotum. The letter continues:

> This is nonsense. In 1917, after being wounded and invalided home, I was for a year private secretary to Sir Edward Kemp then minister of militia and defence in the Borden government. In September or October of that year I sat on the floor of the house in uniform, in front of the minister, during the debate on the Military Service Act providing for conscription. The gallery was liberally sprinkled with officers and other ranks of the army and navy—no Canadian air force then existed—all in uniform.
> The reason for my presence was that I had assisted in drafting the bill which was finalized by the late Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, then solicitor general, who steered it through the house.
> The late Major Gen. Eugene Fiset, then deputy minister, later Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, would normally have been on the floor on that occasion and had, of course, been there many times during the war years always in full uniform.
> It looks as if Mr. Hellyer has pulled another boner.
> Yours sincerely, Everett Bristol,
> late Major 15 Bn. 1st Can. Div.

He is quite mistaken. It was not a boner on the part of the minister; it was a boner on the part of the gentleman behind the scenes. However, I am sure all of us, the minister and everyone in this house regardless of party, welcomes members of the armed forces of Canada to the galleries of this chamber. I am very pleased to see that Mr. Lee's decision already has been revised, because in the gallery behind me are two members of the Royal Canadian Navy in uniform.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: Regardless of our opinion for or against, this debate on the unification bill is of great importance to the Canadian people and of great interest to members of the armed forces.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Chairman, many members have been prompted to speak for various reasons. My reason for speaking is the fact that I completely agree with the Minister of National Defence on the principle—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mandziuk: Wait until you hear the rest of it—on the principle that it is the civilian authority which runs the nation and not the military. This is a principle which I believe the minister has enunciated more than once. I completely agree with him. I do not see how any Canadian could disagree with him on that score. History has shown us that in any nation, where the army or the military forces have taken over the government, civil freedom and civil liberties naturally were kicked out the window. I also wish to speak in respect of Bill C-243 as a Canadian expressing a civilian point of view. I have listened with interest to what gentlemen on both sides of the house have had to say. I attended some meetings of the committee on national defence and have read very faithfully the comments which have appeared in the press.

As a Canadian with near relatives who have served this country as members of the forces I am as confused as some of the gentlemen who have spoken during the last number of days. I am confused, and I believe people in the rest of Canada are confused by the very fact that there is such a divergence of opinion between the Minister of National Defence and those who either were fired from the forces, or left before their normal retirement period. I am referring to those men who performed a distinguished service to this country as members of the army, navy or air force. These men who have served this nation well do not agree with the proposal submitted by the Minister of National Defence and his government. What axe do these men have to grind? Is this what one might call a conspiracy against the government? I do not think so; I do not think they are doing this for political reasons. They simply do not believe in this policy.

Whose judgment should the people of Canada accept? Should they accept the judgment of these distinguished men who have been in the services or the judgment of the government which is proposing something altogether new? This is confusing. Another thing which leads me to believe there must be some substance in this is that on the opposition side we have men who have distinguished themselves in the army or the navy, and have served this country well. These men are of the opinion that this policy of unifying our forces and making them into one force is not to the advantage of this nation and is not something which will provide a proper defence for this nation. Whom should the people of Canada believe?

I even have had a letter from a constituent who wonders why green was chosen as the colour for the uniform. Why not yellow, white, grey, black or any other colour? If we were in Ireland and the Irish Republican army were dressed in green we would not be surprised; it is the Emerald Isle. I do not think that green is an attractive colour. I do not look at our stewardesses on the airplanes more than once now, because they are dressed in green. They looked much better when they wore air force blue. Why, of all colours, did the minister choose green.

Mr. Hellyer: Would my friend like an answer to that question?

Mr. Mandziuk: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: I did not choose it. The armed forces have been responsible for the colour of the uniform, as they have in respect of all the other details related to the principles we have been discussing in this house. Surely the hon. member would not wish to reflect on their choice. It was a spontaneous choice and they have been responsible for the development right from the outset.

Mr. Mandziuk: Thank you. I am glad the minister gave us this explanation. If he were as frank in respect of all matters which come up in this discussion, I think we would make more progress.

Mr. Matheson: Read Hansard.

Mr. Mandziuk: I will be putting more questions to the minister before I am through. One of my colleagues on this side of the house was considerably perturbed, and really wondered who was behind this and who conceived the idea of the unified force.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Who fathered the thought behind this program? My colleague did not want to give that honour to the Minister of National Defence, and I agree with him. I believe this idea was fathered by another gentleman who sits in the front benches. That gentleman holds the portfolio in the ministry of external affairs. He is a man who, during the last several years, has gone to great pains to establish peace in the world, and I take my hat off to him. He is an idealist and feels that Canada can play a great part in stamping out small conflagrations. He believes that Canada has a great part to play in policing the world. And we have considerable experience in this regard as a result of our efforts in the Gaza strip in keeping the Arabs and the Jews away from each other's throats.

Our boys have been stationed in various areas of the world, keeping the peace, and as things now are it looks as though they will be there forever. Hon. members of this house will recall that the Minister of National Defence jumped at the idea of sending our troops to keep the peace in Cyprus. The United Nations had no funds at that time and we had to shell out the money. This exercise was supposedly to last for three months, but our troops have been there for several years. The minister has been very quiet about this fact and has made no forecast as to how long they may be required; but the taxpayers are paying the shot. There is no hope of a settlement because presumably no steps are being taken to encourage a settlement, or at least the newspapers have not been reporting these steps.

The minister of external affairs has indicated that he hopes his peace efforts will be successful in Viet Nam, he is in favour of sending our boys to Viet Nam to keep the north and south Vietnamese from fighting. He believes in keeping peace in the world. I do not doubt the minister's sincerity, but I wonder why he feels that Canada should no longer worry about her own defence. That worry has been prompted by the words of the Minister of National Defence regarding the proposed mobile force which can be sent to any part of the world under the auspices of NATO, the United States or some other power.

The Minister of National Defence is becoming complacent about Canada's position, because of the considerable diminution of the cold war. We have all observed the outstretched hand from Moscow and we are not going to refuse to grasp those hands which offer friendship and peace. We have all listened to those friendly overtures from that red empire, which now occupies most of Europe. We have all heard of communist attempts to establish consulates in western countries, including Canada.

It is my belief that we are being hoodwinked by the cultural exchanges of communist students and students of the western world. We are beginning to believe that there is no longer any danger of difficulties with the U.S.S.R. It is my feeling that this is the belief of the minister of defence and the minister for external affairs. Apparently on that premise they have adopted this unification program.

Our position is becoming somewhat confused. We have spent a great deal of money in conjunction with the United States to set up a defence against the onslaught of the red army. We have spent a great deal of money in respect of our NATO efforts. I hasten to add that were it not for NATO many countries in Europe would not be free today. We will not refuse to grasp the hand of friendship. Before we place trust in the friendship of men like Kosygin and Brezhnev we should ask them to go further to show their good intentions.

In this regard, Mr. Chairman, the Soviet union should remove the iron curtain and that abolish their border restrictions so that Canadians and citizens of other western countries can visit their lands, and in order that the people of those iron curtain countries can visit and even emigrate to western countries. These communist countries should allow the wives and children of people living in Canada to rejoin their families. Once they have shown that type of goodwill, perhaps we can accept their proffered friendship without restraint.

The right hon. leader of the official opposition suggested when he was prime minister that Khrushchev should free the 14 nations that compose the U.S.S.R. empire today. These people have different cultures, languages, and history. They should be allowed to vote freely, to retain their status in the union or to become independent. In this way the Russians could show their goodwill.

Apparently the Minister of National Defence is not concerned in this regard, but concerned only in grasping the outstretched hand. I suggest there is a good reason for this extension of friendship to the Americas by the U.S.S.R. That reason relates to the fact that officials in Moscow and Peking have ideological differences and are at loggerheads. Let us not forget that the Chinese have a claim against Russia in respect of some lost land in Siberia. The Chinese feel that Stalin was a good man and that the present-day officials in Moscow have torn him from his exalted position. One faction idealizes Khrushchev while the other does not. Let us never forget that neither of these two giants has renounced the idea of burying the western powers, just as Khrushchev suggested to the United States.

What will happen if these two great communist powers embrace each other again as they once did? They will likely march together hand in hand to capture the entire world. If that should take place the U.S.S.R. will again show its teeth by building a bigger wall in Berlin. If the worst happens Canada will become a buffer zone between the United States and the Soviet union. This will be the battleground between these two nations, and let us not fool ourselves in this regard. Which side will we join? I mean every word when I say that I would rather be clawed by the American eagle than crushed by the Russian bear.

One thing leads to another. We are pleased to see the world heading for what we think is peace. But is our force going to have no other duties to perform than policing difficult areas in the world? Are we going to have a force which will contribute to the defence of this nation? Have we no national pride? I believe that those gentlemen who have served in the forces, and the gentlemen on this side of the house who are opposing this bill so strenuously, deserve support; and I think they are getting a great deal of support in the country.

I received a telephone call just today. I asked the gentleman, a constituent of mine, "What is the reaction to this continuous debate on the unification bill?" He said, "Our request is, kill it." This is actual fact. I do not think we will kill it because the minister has sufficient guarantees from some of the smaller groups in the house to push the bill through; but he will not push it through until the country realizes what the bill means. Once the country realizes what it means, and that there is something rotten in the state of Denmark, the minister and the Liberal party will pay for it in the next election.

Ladies—excuse me, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: There is one here.

Mr. Mandziuk: Yes, there is a lady here.

Another point is economy. We heard a great deal from the minister a couple of years ago to the effect that it would be economical if we unified our forces. We do not hear so much about that today, because the estimates show that the minister's department is spending more than it ever did. Of course, that is the usual thing. That is what this government has been doing in every department. They talked about economy in 1963 and 1965, but that is now forgotten. Political promises are made only to be broken. That is the way this government has been carrying on. Where is the economy in this proposal? Canadians swallowed the idea that it might be more economical to have one unified force rather than providing supplies for three forces.

In 1966 the minister said that a survey was being made of our defence establishments with a view to cutting them down, and as soon as the survey was made a decision as to their future would be reached. There is no harm in having a survey. But when asked from time to time whether he had made his decision, the answer was always no, a decision had not been made. In spite of that, certain defence establishments were nibbled away. I have in mind the one in my riding, the Canadian joint air training camp at Rivers. Personnel of the various units were moved out; they vacated the houses they had been renting in the area. Their children have had to get out of school. The population of that training establishment has been reduced, in spite of the fact that the minister says he has not made up his mind. When I placed a question on the order paper asking the minister when this establishment was going to be phased out, his answer was that it would not be done this year. But apparently it will be done some time in the future, if what his department is doing is any indication.

The minister should be honest and frank, just as frank as he was about the colour of the uniform, and tell these people what is to happen with that camp. Why prolong the agony? Why not tell them whether the establishment at Rivers is to be retained or phased out? The minister flew down there last fall in order to appease some of the vociferous Grits who were complaining, together with the Tories, that they wanted the issue brought to a head and wanted to find out whether this establishment was to be phased out. The minister neutralized some of the vociferous complaints, because these people are now keeping quiet. They trust that the minister will keep the establishment in operation, but it is being nibbled and nibbled away.

What function does this training establishment perform? It was set up in 1939. It has all the buildings and runways necessary for parachute-jump training. The river there has been dammed. There is a wonderful lake where the troops can practise jumps on the water. They have a joint school. The high school is only three miles from the base and it is at the disposal of the students at the base. Considerable sums of money from Ottawa were poured into the erection of the school at Rivers. The facilities at the base were not suitable or sufficient for the junior and elementary grades; they did not have the proper teaching staff, and these students have been attending the Rivers school.

What is the situation there today? I say that this establishment is being chiselled away. Rivers high school has lost 44 students because their parents have been moved to God knows where. The elementary school has suffered because two rooms are now receiving no school grant. We have in this small community 1,600 people. This establishment depended on defence dollars for its existence. I tell the minister quite frankly that today there are 55—this is the situation today because I have today's statistics—houses and suites which stand empty. The people of Rivers built these houses for business purposes. They were rented by the personnel at the base. As I say, 55 houses and suites are now empty. Three houses built with the assistance of C.M.H.C. mortgages have been empty since last year. A house that cost $15,500 last year can be bought for $9,000 this year. I suggest that if the minister wants to retire somewhere in Canada he can buy a cheap house there. These people are going through the agony of uncertainty.

The minister tells us that the base will operate this year, but what will happen in 1968? This base has been nibbled and nibbled away and there will be nothing left in 1968. All the millions of dollars that were poured into the base to provide all these facilities will go to waste, Mr. Minister. Why is this? Why not be frank and tell the people what you are going to do?

An hon. Member: He doesn't know.

Mr. Mandziuk: I agree that he doesn't know. The survey has been carried out, but the minister has not yet made up his mind. I think he has made up his mind but will not tell us his decision. Last fall he made up his mind to receive a delegation from Rivers. The Minister of Defence Production was to set a date for the delegation to attend here. That date still has not been set, and these people are angry and unhappy.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman, as a contribution to this debate. We are disturbed because under the guise of economy more money than ever is being spent by the Department of National Defence; under the guise of economy certain areas in Canada will be ruined, because Rivers air training camp is not unique and I understand training camps in other parts of Canada are threatened with the same fate. The minister, just like Nero, fiddles away while Rome burns. This nation is in desperate straits and it must be given some clarification.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to say a few words at this point in the debate.

I have no wish to prolong the debate for I feel it has already lasted long enough. I listened closely to several speeches and, to my mind, they are all alike.

I shall not say exactly the same thing as the other members, because I have different convictions. What I have to tell the house will therefore differ from what has already been said.

I believe there is general agreement with regard to maintaining armed forces and their role. The two parties, Grits and Tories, wholly agree on that score. The only disagreement between the two concerns unification.

I do not think that is so important. I do not see why there is so much insistence on telling the minister and reminding the goverment that this is not the time to unify the armed forces. Unified or divided, they will always be armed forces and that does not change the situation.

Mr. Chairman, we are in favour of unification too. We want the least division possible because the more united things are, the better. I do not think that dividing the armed forces will improve things. I suggest that perhaps everything will go better if we unify them. It is something worth trying. If that does not work, we can always come back to the present situation.

In my opinion, the Progressive Conservatives are wrong to maintain their argument, to maintain that the status quo must be preserved at all costs. In life one must move ahead. That is progress. We, for our part, are in favour of any possible progress, of anything that can be improved. We are all for that. And that is the reason why we will vote for unification of the armed forces. That does not mean we fully agree with the government on that matter, because I feel that the armed forces we keep in Europe, supposedly to maintain peace, should be brought back to Canada.

I think that we should bring back home all our troops which are in Europe at the present time. I ask the minister and all the hon. members this question. Who are our enemies? Why do we maintain troops if we have no enemies?

[English]

Mr. Webb: May I ask the hon. member a question? He just stated that he agrees with the policy which the government is introducing now. There is no question but that this policy will result in conscription to supply our armed forces with the necessary personnel. I should like to ask the hon. member whether he agrees with conscription?

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I do not favour conscription, far from it. But, on the other hand, I agree with the maintenance of an armed force in the country, not outside the country. I see no point in maintaining armed forces outside the country and I even believe that it is against unity and peace in the world to send armed forces to Europe.

Coming back to the point I wished to make, I want to say that the troops we maintain in Europe cannot be of much use. An analysis of the situation will show that if we accepted the facts as they are, we would come to the conclusion that a withdrawal of our troops from Europe would be better.

If we want peace, it is certainly not by waging war that we shall have it. If we really want to help the destitute and needy people of Europe, it is not by showing them guns or by keeping them in fear that we shall succeed.

You know, it is by practising love and charity that Our Lord made conquests. Now, we must practise charity. Since we are able to practise charity in Europe, let us do so. European people want peace. Instead of sending them guns, deadly weapons and armed forces, let us provide them with bread to enable them to live and develop like all other nations.

This would enable us to reduce our armed forces and as a result achieve considerable savings on that score. These savings could be used elsewhere. In fact, we could help entire countries for several months.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that if we want peace, we have to show it. It is not by showing off our armed forces that we will win. Once again we will succeed through love and charity. We shall win by doing good.

We all have a mission to fulfil. If we fulfil it well we may do great things for the world, for the development of individuals not only physically but morally and intellectually. We could help so many people with these same sums of money. We are wasting considerable money on our armed forces.

Yet we are not doing Canada much good. If we decide to unify our forces and strengthen our armed forces in Europe and in Canada, Mr. Chairman, what will that mean? It will mean more taxes for Canadians, who are having a hard time as it is. They must be shamefully over-taxed in order to maintain and finance our armed forces today.

What will we gain by making enemies in Europe and by making enemies of the Canadian people? We know that all is not well in Canada, that there is dissension and dissatisfaction throughout the country. We see strikes happen here and there, and that may be the reason for the general dissatisfaction. In fact, it is one strike after another; when one is settled, ten others are called. We will not settle the problem in that way.

Now if we sent our armed forces to Europe and if we were attacked tomorrow morning, how would we defend ourselves?

Mr. Chairman, I submit all those things to the attention and consideration of the minister.

Mr. Chairman, we are often unable to bring unity in our homes, our industries, our country, let alone in a world torn with fear, envy and hate.

• (9:30 p.m.)

When a legislature such as ours is no longer afraid of what people will say, it may be in a position not only to act justly, as the Almighty wants us to, but also in legislating and seeing to it that justice may prevail in North America. Once again, it may disclose to other nations the secret of enduring freedom and show the world the way leading to a durable peace. Where in this world can we urge people to live in our modern society and build a brave new world? We must build a complete new world. The world of warfare and destruction is far from being a novelty, Mr. Chairman.

In fact, there is nothing older, more cruel, more diabolic and more inhuman. Let us get out of the dreadful chaos which leaves the people fearful, destitute and insecure.

If we have insecurity in Canada, it is mostly due to those armaments, those funds squeezed out of Canadians while they are deprived of their purchasing power, their power to live properly and comfortably, with all that earmarked for the upkeep of our peacekeeping forces under the pretext that other countries will be saved.

What did we do during the last 1939-45 war, Mr. Chairman? We fought against the great communist theories and we implanted communism in 50 per cent of the countries throughout the world.

That is what we have achieved, and we are now fighting against the same ideology. We must strengthen our forces and our finance. We must discover all these techniques by our own means, and we must also devote all that to destruction.

For once, let us try to work like men. Let us work to rebuild ideals, to save the situation and to establish, once and for all, a lasting peace in our country, a country that abounds with riches.

Mr. Chairman, if we mind our own business, if we put our nose where we should put it, in short, if we do not attack anybody, it happens very seldom that others attack us. Then, if we take care of our own business, if we stay home, if we provide people with bread instead of guns and weapons of death, we will really work for the good of mankind. We will show that we will really work for peace and not only for war.

Man has risen through technology and industry. We have become giants in this field, able to wipe out continents, explore the stars, exchange information between continents, through means we could not even think of hardly 50 years ago.

But the fact remains that there are serious problems to be solved in this country. We must realize that most of the problems go about on two legs and the colour of those legs does not alter the problem.

Mr. Chairman, until such time as we resolve to create a force composed of capable, intelligent, honest men who will not be corrupted by money or power, in short, men capable of building our country, we will continue to live in fear and growing division.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that the only thing we will achieve by broadening the scope of our armed forces, by increasing the moneys to be spent to that end, will be merely to enrich arms manufacturers, shipbuilders and financiers. They are the ones, Mr. Chairman, who will be favoured and well paid at the expense of the Canadian people who are bled white in order that we may maintain our armed forces.

Therefore, we should fight against this and withdraw our forces from Europe. I am in favour of a good common force in the country, a mobile, active and modern force, but that is all. We will defend ourselves when we are attacked. For a long time now we have put our nose in other nations' business and some day we will suffer for it, because we are too active and too curious about things which are none of our concern.

That is what I wanted to tell the minister. That is my idea of the army and the funds earmarked for its upkeep.

If labourers copy capitalists and claim more and more, while they work less and less, this will cause a continuous increase in the prices of goods that other labourers and other citizens have to buy.

We have heard that we must strengthen our armed forces and increase the number of their units. Mr. Chairman, we should above all set up an army of another kind, an army of avowed revolutionaries, of resolute men who will attack boldly injustice and corruption, because they will not fear to have light shed on their personal life.

We need an army of competent men, an army of responsible men, an army of men who understand the human being, and an army of Christian men. That is what we need. Those are the ideals which we should pursue and which we should proclaim throughout the world.

We need men and women capable of facing the problems instead of shunning them, men and women who will apply the strict principles of honesty and unselfishness in their daily lives.

There are too many fat people and too many skinny people in the world. There are enough resources in the world, Mr. Chairman, to satisfy the needs of everyone, but not enough for the cupidity of everyone.

But men do not yet have enough love, they do not share enough, so that everyone may have enough in this age when God and man want everyone, black, white, brown, yellow, red, to walk proudly in equality, dignity and peace.

It is selfishness alone which breaks up the homes and divides the races, and this increases hatred. It is selfishness alone which devilishly destroys any hope we may entertain to see a moral maturity develop to the level of the technical and industrial opportunities of our time.

Man has become an unbelievable industrial giant. It is now possible, in the modern world, to feed everyone properly, to give everyone decent and adequate shelter, in short, it is possible for everyone to have an opportunity in life, whatever his environment, his education or his economic or social condition.

Down with the old hatred, the old fears, the old desires of the human heart. America must understand that and say with all its will power and self-control: We are going to make great strides, we are going to push the clock ahead, so that all mankind may reach the next phase of human development. Otherwise, the world will destroy itself, or we shall head into an era of somber slavery, and then we will have the atomic war.

We know what the atomic war can mean; we know also what will be left after an atomic war. Therefore, we have no reason to venture into atomic wars, we have no reason to equip our country with atomic or nuclear weapons.

There are countries which never waged war, which live in peace. They are capable of helping, not by providing guns, but by providing comforting help. That is how help can be given. It is not by showing off the power of our armies that we will conquer the world, but rather by showing others that we can help ourselves, that we can develop ourselves thanks to a system whereby every Canadian can live comfortably in his country where wealth is abundant.

Our wealth must not be used only to make cannons but also to improve the welfare of all mankind. Money cannot even be found to increase family allowances. Many families live in slums; their income is inadequate. When our people work, their salaries are cut by 50, 60 per cent to maintain armed forces, to make cannons and tanks, and that to make a few individuals wealthy. We must not let that happen, Mr. Chairman. Right now we stand on the threshold of an era of tyranny, an era of death and destruction; or an era of a new kind of man, different from the man of the stone age, the steel age, the dollar and sex age.

Mr. Chairman, we Canadians, could accomplish great things, if we wanted. Not one of those opposed to the unification of the armed forces has asked for the withdrawal of our forces from Europe, has asked the government to mind its own business. By minding its own business, it could then help foreign countries.

If we could reduce our defence expenditures, we could promote and develop agriculture on a large scale. If we were able to produce bread, we could then give some to India, to Africa and to all needy countries. Then, we would be peacemakers, we would act like men, like Christians, like people who love one another. We would strive for the reinstatement of peace throughout the world and inside our own country.

I shall say no more. My feelings, I hope, will be taken into consideration. If we cannot withdraw our forces immediately, let us do it gradually. Afterwards, we would be in a position to help other countries, as I said before. We supported France and England with all our might.

Today, France turns her back on us. What guarantee have we that Great Britain will not do the same thing tomorrow morning? I knew soldiers in Great Britain who were not satisfied with the situation, Canadian soldiers who stayed in Britain after the war. They are living in Britain and are not even getting any pension from that country. Our soldiers are not satisfied. If they are not well treated, Mr. Chairman, why not repatriate them?

After all, what are we doing for peace? What can we have done to settle other countries' problem? Even though we make suggestions, even though we travel, even though we send the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) to make speeches, all that does not matter. Other countries pay no heed to that. Then, we have no business sticking our nose into those countries. Let us withdraw. That is what we must do. And if we do it, we will be acting as Canadians who want to live not die.

We can do that. As a matter of fact, it is easier to achieve than to enlarge our armed forces, to continue to invade other countries and to spread fear with our guns and our engines of war.

It is not through fear or hate that we will instill something in the hearts of men. We will put justice in the human heart when we are able to keep peace and, to do that, we must start by establishing peace at home and allowing our citizens to live in peace. Now, to live in peace, the needs of our citizens must be met, they must have at least the necessities of life. At that time, we will be able to say to our French speaking or English speaking Canadians: Work under the aegis of the Canadian flag and you will be able to develop your country.

Be alive, be proud of your country, be proud to walk under your flag. However, if it is a blood-stained flag, a flag that was sullied in Europe, French speaking as well as English speaking Canadians will refuse to walk under it. If we possibly can, then it is our duty to keep our flag immaculate, and to show Canadians a brand new unsullied flag. We can do it if we want to, and I ask every member of this house, in this decisive and important hour, to give at least some thought to the fact that we can settle our problems without increasing our armed forces and shamefully overtaxing the population for defence purposes and for the production, in Canada, of guns, planes, tanks and so on.

We can accomplish other things besides. We need bread and not guns. We must have justice and peace prevail and not hate and division. This objective will only be attained through love and charity and through an increase in our national production. Then we could help needy countries according to our means, with our surplus production. Our contribution will not be guns, but drugs and bread, in short, all that people require to progress intellectually and morally and in other respects.

[English]

Mr. Ballard: Mr. Chairman, after hearing the previous speaker, a member for the Ralliement Créditiste, it is easy to see why he and his party will vote with the government. The hon. member qualifies himself almost for a Nobel peace prize, paralleling, in his speech, other hon. members who also qualified for peace prizes. The hon. member was more forthright in his remarks than have been members on the government side. He intends to solve the world's problems by financial means, by encouraging food production, and so on. In this way, by helping the peoples of all the world, some future conflagration may be prevented from breaking out.

It is interesting to note that the contempt felt for the United States was greater after huge gifts of foreign aid had been given than the contempt felt before those gifts had been given.

If we do as the hon. member suggests, if we bring our armed forces back to Canada and give them the role to play that he suggests they should play, we shall wind up with having the largest police force of any nation. We shall have a force of boy scouts who do nothing but put out forest fires, and that sort of thing. When I speak of forest fires, I do not do so in the same way that other hon. members have spoken of forest fires.

I suggest to the hon. member that as a centennial project the members of the Ralliement Créditiste should travel around the world informing other people about the Social Credit creed. The people in the various troubled spots of the world will become so confused that they would have no stomach for causing more trouble.

It is always interesting to hear hon. members with high ideals, like the one immediately preceding me in the debate. Unfortunately, however, those ideals are being preached to the wrong people. The hon. member should convince those who are behind the iron curtain; he should convince the people in the troubled parts of the world to live in a spirit of brotherly love, to expend their efforts more in raising food than in making weapons.

I do not pretend to be an armed forces expert. As a matter of fact I had not intended entering this debate. I decided, however, to enter it, after becoming concerned with the government's lack of co-operation in showing exactly what is meant by unification.

As a result I have read some of the evidence which was placed before the committee on defence and I find that most of the witnesses were also confused as to what was meant by unification. It is fortunate that the minister was able to find someone in the senior ranks who agreed with this concept of unification, whatever that happens to be, before he ran out of officers. Statistics show that one after another a great number of officers in all three services were fired, or retired early, because they did not agree with the concept of unification as laid down by the minister.

The minister has his own interpretation of unification. It is not spelled out in the white paper. Most of the witnesses expressed a fear that there was some hidden reason for ramming this bill through parliament at this time. Most of the witnesses said we were not prepared for unification. Some of them said they did not understand what unification meant. In the absence of definite information from the minister we can only assume that he himself does not know what unification means; possibly he is a tool of some higher authority.

There has been considerable criticism of the common rank structure. There has been criticism of the effect this bill will have on morale. There has been considerable discussion about the economics of this policy. The minister has not been able to show us that there will be appreciable savings as a result of this step. He has not been able to show that we shall have sufficient personnel to maintain a unified force. One of these senior service witnesses estimated we would need 150,000 service personnel at a cost of slightly over $2 billions in order to maintain the commitments we have undertaken.

It seems strange to me that the minister, if he desires this bill to go through, cannot be honest with the house, and explain what unification means and how it will bring economic benefit to this country. Can he assure us that we shall have sufficient personnel whose morale is sufficiently high to maintain our defence forces at the standards we have known in the past?

One of the witnesses before the committee was Air Marshal W. A. Curtis. He found it peculiar that we should be discarding the three separate services and placing them in one uniform under one command. He had this to say—and I quote from page 2149 of the 33rd report of the committee on national defence:

In 1918 the British government decided that air operations were so important a part of war that they should be a separate service, and on April 1 of that year the RAF was created.

In 1924 when the entire defence budget was only a fraction of today's, the Canadian government decided to separate the Canadian Air Force from the Army, and on April 1, 1924, the RCAF was born.

The United States government was convinced during World War II that the United States Army Air Corps should be a separate service, and as a result the United States Air Force was formed in 1947.

In my opinion the proposed organization whereby the Canadian Air Force becomes nothing more than a branch of the ground forces, is a fantastic attempt to turn back the clock.

A little later on, he said:

I have quite naturally discussed the proposed changes to our military organization with friends in other countries, and the reaction goes all the way from shaking the head in disbelief to asking whether the Minister is out of his mind.

The same thought occurs to us on this side of the house. We wonder whether the minister is out of his mind. Our two largest allies have separate forces, yet we are in the process of unification. The military experts, on whom we rely for the training of our forces, break the forces down into three component parts; yet we are talking about unification. It makes some members on this side ask the same question as was asked by Air Marshal Curtis: Is the minister out of his mind? I am sure the minister is not out of his mind; he is just stubborn. Otherwise he would be forthright enough to give us the answers to our questions, or else he would delay the passage of this bill or listen to the advice of military experts in this country and in others. I will leave it at that, for now. I ask the question: Is the minister out of his mind?

May I call it ten o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: What is the menu for tomorrow?

[Mr. Ballard.]

Mr. Hellyer: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will continue with this debate.

• (10:00 p.m.)

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

IMMIGRATION—REPORTED PRESENCE IN CANADA OF GERMAN WAR CRIMINALS

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on April 1 of this year there was a program on the C.B.C. with respect to certain nazi war criminals now living in Canada, which caused considerable concern to many persons who heard the program. Later on the same date a Canadian Press dispatch dealt at somewhat greater length with the question. I am going to quote the press dispatch so that the house may understand what I am talking about. It emanated from Ottawa and read:

Ottawa admits it got list of war criminals.

The External Affairs Department confirmed yesterday that a list of names of people alleged to be nazi war criminals living in Canada was given to the Canadian embassy in Vienna last year.

Simon Wiesenthal, the man who found Adolph Eichmann in Argentina in 1960, said in Toronto Friday that the names of 15 eastern Europeans who had committed crimes in Poland and the Baltic countries had been given to the embassy in Vienna about six months ago.

He said the people were not of serious consequence in the nazi hierarchy.

An External Affairs Department spokesman said Wiesenthal had handed the list of names to the embassy with no documentation. The names were sent to Ottawa where they were distributed to "the appropriate government departments."

He declined to say how many names were on the list.

The C.B.C. news report and this press dispatch have given concern to a good number of people and I have had letters on this subject and some phone calls from those persons who were concerned. To illustrate the concern of some Canadians with this situation I wish to quote one letter which I received:

Dear Mr. Herridge,

I was quite shocked tonight to hear via the C.B.C. that we are harbouring at least 15 nazi war criminals in this country. The author of this statement is a chap called Wiesenthal, or reasonably close to this spelling, who operates out of an office in Vienna. He is Jewish and has dedicated his life to tracking down nazis who were and are responsible for many atrocities and he has had some considerable success. He claims that he advised the Canadian government of this fact some time ago but does not know if they have taken any action in this regard.

I would certainly like to have this matter raised in the house and can think of no one better equipped than yourself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I am very glad I got applause on this occasion, from the limited audience on both sides of the house.

I now wish to refer briefly to an editorial which appeared in the Vancouver Sun on May 1, 1953, after Mr. M. J. Coldwell, former national leader of the C.C.F., had raised this matter in the house. He was very concerned at that time that we were somewhat lax in allowing these people into the country. This is what the editorial had to say:

There is sound sense in what M. J. Coldwell, C.C.F. national leader, says in warning against letting fascist and nazi sympathizers immigrate to Canada. If as he claims too many of these people are getting in the department of immigration is at fault and should institute more rigorous checks.

We wouldn't accuse anyone in the department of being secretly sympathetic to totalitarian thinkers of this shade. But the current strict check on communists possibly causes an unconscious attitude of carelessness at the other end of the political spectrum. The inquiries into the political pasts of the intending emigrants should be more searching.

I wholeheartedly agree with that editorial and with the prior remarks made by Mr. Coldwell in the house. That is why, Mr. Speaker, on April 4 of this year, as recorded at page 14488 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) this question:

Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and I do so at the request of a number of persons who are quite concerned about this matter. In view of the statement made on the C.B.C. on April 1 by Mr. Simon Wiesenthal that Canada is harbouring at least 15 nazi war criminals and that he advised the Canadian government of this fact some time ago, has the minister been advised by Mr. Simon Wiesenthal of these war criminals being in Canada and, if so, what action does the minister intend to take on this information?

I shall look forward to the reply to my question by the minister or by the person representing him here this evening. I shall be anxious to know what action the government is taking in an effort to locate these former nazi war criminals, because I believe, as I think a good many other members of this house and the Canadian people believe, that the sooner the government takes action to rid Canada of people of this type the better it will be for the maintenance of democracy today and in the years to come.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that Mr. Wiesenthal did indeed come to Canada several weeks ago. He came to Toronto in connection with the release of his most recent book. Last summer Mr. Wiesenthal did, as the hon. member said, write to the Canadian embassy in Vienna to provide the embassy with the names, and in some cases the addresses, of people who he alleged were war criminals resident in Canada. The evidence respecting four out of approximately 12 such persons was considered by Mr. Wiesenthal to be particularly strong. He did not, however, supply our ambassador with detailed documentation concerning his allegations.

The information received from Mr. Wiesenthal was passed to other Canadian government departments, and the government departments concerned are continuing their examination of the general questions raised by the allegations that there are war criminals residing here. I am sure that the hon. member would be the first to agree that we should be governed by the system of law that we have in force, and, therefore it might be useful for him to know the exact circumstances under which these cases are considered.

A most careful study has been given to this matter and it is the considered view of the departments concerned that, even if such a person has in fact been guilty of a war crime committed abroad, it is unlikely, should he have acquired the status of a landed immigrant in Canada, that he could be punished in or deported from Canada for such activities. The Canadian Criminal Code does not extend to crimes committed outside this country—with one or two exceptions which are not relevant to the present circumstances—and, once an immigrant has acquired Canadian domicile, he is not subject to deportation for any but a specific and limited number of crimes which have been committed in this country and which are not relevant to the matter at issue.

I am sure the hon. member will recognize that there is a conflict in principle here between the grave concern we may have that persons who may have been guilty of the most abhorrent crimes have not been brought to justice and a basic principle which we have inherited from British justice, that criminal law should not be made retroactive in its application. However, with regard to the policy of the Department of Manpower and Immigration concerning the admission of persons in respect of whom there might be evidence of this kind, in the future I am sure the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and his officials will take notice of this question and bear it particularly in mind with regard to future applications.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—PROTECTION OF NUTRITION STANDARDS FOLLOWING MILK PRICE INCREASES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, two days ago, in view of the fact that the price of milk was to go up by two cents a quart within a month, I asked the Prime Minister what plans he and the government have to protect the nutrition standards of individuals and families on low incomes. Mr. Speaker said that that was a question which should not be asked at that time, on orders of the day. We have talked about reforms here in this house and I should very much like to see a change made in the rules so that it would be possible to ask such questions on the orders of the day, especially questions which have to do with nutrition, housing and other important problems which affect the consumers of the country.

My question was based on two news stories, one of which appeared in a Toronto paper and the other in an Ottawa paper. The Toronto paper mentioned that a two cent increase in the price of milk is expected on May 1. The Ottawa paper mentioned two cents or three cents. When I investigated the story I was first inclined to think that what we had been told was correct, that this increase in the price of milk would help the farmer. However, I discovered that the director of the milk marketing board for Ontario clearly pointed out that in any case only one cent of the two cent increase woud go to the farmer, and if the story in the Ottawa newspaper is correct that three of the leading dairies here will increase the price of milk by three cents, the farmer will still get only one cent and the dairies will get the other two. He also stated that the one cent received by the farmer would be practically wiped out because of a decrease in the consumption of milk. As a result I am beginning to wonder whether this increase will go to the farmer or whether the dairies will cash in.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

I am concerned with the living standards of the people in this country on low incomes. According to Canada's food guide, a publication of our own Department of National Health and Welfare, children up to 11 years of age require 2½ cups or 20 fluid ounces of milk per day, adolescents require 4 cups or 32 fluid ounces per day, adults require 1½ cups or 12 fluid ounces per day, and expectant and nursing mothers require 4 cups or 32 fluid ounces per day.

Nutritional experts suggest that milk is essential for growing children, pregnant women and nursing mothers, and that there is no other food which will provide calcium in sufficient quantity. A child would have to consume 7½ cups of raw cabbage in order to obtain the same amount of calcium obtained in one quart of milk. When considering that a child needs 2½ cups of milk per day one realizes how ridiculous it would be to suggest that cabbage could be used as a substitute.

I am also informed that one would have to drink 11 cups of orange juice to get the same amount of calcium obtained in one quart of milk. Calcium is a basic need for healthy teeth and bones.

According to the best information I have available the consumption of milk has been dropping over the years. In 1940, Canadians consumed 1,160 pounds of fluid milk per year per person. By 1950 this consumption had dropped to 1,140, by 1960 to 900 pounds, and in 1965 the consumption was 907 pounds per person. There were increases and decreases in consumption in the intervening years, but the figures I have given indicate a definite trend.

I do not know all the reasons for this trend but the basic one is the increased cost of milk during the years. On January 31, 1940, whole milk cost 11 cents a quart here in Ottawa. By 1951 the price had increased to 22 cents a quart. Last year there were two increases in the price of milk, one in March and the second in July. Today the cost of a quart of whole milk in Ottawa is 30 cents.

These increases in costs are beginning to interfere with the nutritional standard of people in this country. I should like to know what is going to be done about this situation to assist those families on low income. These days we hear a great deal about physical fitness. A man who raises chickens once said that if a small chick's nutritional needs were neglected for even one day, the chick would be unable to recover that loss during its entire life. If that is true for chicks, what about children?

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and I appreciate her concern in this most important matter. I must hasten to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I prefer not to compare children with chickens. In my opinion children have a far higher priority. My interest is a very personal one because I have three children and I recognize the importance and need of nutrition and nutritional value for the children of today and for our future generations.

I am sure the hon. member is well aware of the fact that the government is as concerned as everybody else that Canadians have access to food of the highest nutritional quality. While I cannot with any great wisdom comment on a possible increase in the price of milk, I can assure the hon. member that the Department of National Health and Welfare is obliged to ensure that milk is clean and safe and meets adequate standards of nutrition and purity. One of the most economical and best sources of nutrient value in milk is in powdered milk, and as far as we know to date this commodity will not be affected by the price increase.

I should like also, if I may, to draw attention to a recent conference that I had the great privilege and pleasure of attending. I refer to the conference on child and maternal health. That conference was sponsored by the Department of National Health and Welfare and problems of this nature were brought very forcibly to the attention of all who were there. I think this government has made every effort to ensure that all Canadians, whatever their means, will be able to provide their families with sufficient quantities of milk.

I would refer particularly to the Canada Assistance Plan. This plan was enacted by parliament to ensure that people who do not have means adequate to provide food and other necessities can, through the assistance of the provincial and federal governments, meet the needs of their families for these necessities. I would like to assure the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that not only am I concerned about this problem but the department for which I have the great honour to work shares her concern, and indeed concern for all the people of Canada.

POSTAL SERVICE—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN GASPÉ AND BONAVENTURE CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, on April 12, 1967, I put the following question to the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté):

> In view of the large number of representations received from the far-away county of Bonaventure and a few communities in the county of Gaspé because of the long delays in the local delivery of mail, could the minister investigate to see whether such a deplorable situation could be corrected, if he is anxious to achieve the intended purpose in implementing the mail delivery by truck?

In raising such a question, which I admit, Mr. Speaker, is not of national urgency, my intention was not to delay unduly the normal proceedings of this house nor to embarrass the minister, but rather to point out to him in a particular way a problem which, in the area concerned, is considered as one of great local urgency.

In order to show more clearly the seriousness of the problem, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be appropriate to give a brief historical account of the recent changes that occurred in the delivery of mail in the constituencies of Bonaventure and Gaspé.

For many years, numerous representations were made to the Post Office Department, through local parliament members, responsible bodies such as the district chamber of commerce, several local chambers of commerce, municipal councils, etc., in order to improve postal service on the southern shore of the Gaspé peninsula, from Cross Point, in the constituency of Bonaventure, up to Gaspé, in the county bearing the same name.

The Gaspé peninsula, which unfortunately is always considered as too remote every time one insists on establishing industries in that area which would improve its economy and even attract members of the professional classes, doctors, lawyers, to provide normal and essential services, has suffered and is still suffering from this remoteness, as regards mail delivery.

• (10:20 p.m.)

The present minister is well acquainted with the Gaspé peninsula; since his appointment to the department which he is now heading he has thoroughly visited the Gaspé area and obtained on the spot, not only from those who make use of the mail, but also from the post office employees and civic authorities some information in the light of which he has set himself to the task not to attain perfection in the mail distribution in the Gaspé peninsula, but at least to bring some considerable improvements.

For example, in order to dispatch the outgoing and incoming mail in the shortest possible time, the Post Office Department initiated on February 1 last on the southern coast of the Gaspé peninsula, the transport of mail by truck, forgoing the traditional mode of transport, the railway.

An experiment had been made last year whereby second class mail and newspapers were moved by truck; the experiment had proved most satisfactory to the whole population.

In spite of this, Mr. Speaker, the new system inaugurated on February 1 last does not seem to operate to the people's satisfaction. It must be said that the numerous storms that struck the Gaspé peninsula last winter did not help matters. Still, February, March and half of April have gone by and the situation has not improved. Delays do not seem frequent in the delivery of mail from Gaspé to outside points, such as Montreal, Quebec and Ottawa, for instance.

As proof of this, I have here a letter from the secretary and general manager of the Gaspé C.F.U., Mr. Jobin, to the Postmaster General. Dated April 10, mailed on April 10 at Black Cape, in the Gaspé peninsula, it reached the House of Commons on April 11.

In general, complaints deal with mail deliveries between local post offices. The trouble is with the routing of the mails between post offices in Gaspé.

In the same letter addressed to the Postmaster General by Mr. Jobin,—he mentions, for instance, a letter mailed on March 31, 1967, in New Richmond, in the riding of Bonaventure, to the parish priest at Grande-Rivière, 85 miles away. It reached its destination on April 5. It took 6 days to cover 85 miles, whereas another letter from Gaspé took only one day to cover 700 miles.

Mr. Speaker, that is a new service and, as in the case of any new business, before the personnel is used to its operation and its organization in every detail, it may take some time, and some difficulties we are not accustomed to may arise.

Tonight, however, I would ask the hon. minister, whose efficiency is only equalled by his talents and stature and who, in establishing transportation by truck in Gaspé, wanted not to delay the delivery of mail but to improve it considerably, to insist that his officials keep their eye on the present situation in Gaspé, in the best interest of those who use the mails and of the Post Office Department in general.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I readily understand that the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Béchard) is somewhat disappointed by the reorganization of postal services in the Gaspé peninsula.

If I were living there, I would possibly be disappointed also. But I should like it understood, Mr. Speaker, that we have undertaken a complete reorganization of mail delivery in the Gaspé peninsula. This reorganization is in two stages: the first, as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) mentioned, was first to carry outside mail by truck instead of by railway. And the same thing applies to the mail from Gaspé to the outside.

The second stage is the reorganization of mail distribution within the Gaspé peninsula. This phase, not yet completed, produces some temporary delays in mail deliveries.

For instance, sorting which used to be done on the train between some centres of the Gaspé peninsula, is now done in the offices and the distributing offices which we organized.

We still have to organize the rural routes before June 1st, and many small post offices will also disappear because too much mail is now spread about in too many small post offices and the postmasters, even though they would like to complete the mail bags intended for a given place, must, to complete a bag, put in it several letters which are often sent to a community where the addressee does not live, and that causes undue delay.

But I can assure the hon. member that, before very long, instead of finding fault with the Post Office Department, he will only have congratulations to offer that department, because we think that within a few months, the reorganization will be fully completed and the Gaspé peninsula will then enjoy one of the best mail services in Canada. That experiment which we tried this year in the Gaspé peninsula will surely be carried out elsewhere in the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must tell the hon. member that an inspector has been on the spot since last Monday—he got there during a snow storm at that—to inspect all post offices and to explain to the postmasters the new departmental instructions. I believe this will result in an improved service within a short time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 14, 1967

The house met at 11 a.m.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING RIGHT OF STUDENTS TO REGISTER

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-289, to amend the Canada Elections Act (students' franchise).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Roxburgh: During the general election of November, 1965, many university students found themselves disfranchised under the provisions of subsection 9 of section 16 of the Canada Elections Act. I should like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that pursuant to subsections 6 and 7 of section 16 of that act, ministers and teachers may move into a new constituency at any time in the interval between the date of the issue of the writ and polling day, and register as voters. All this bill is asking is that registered university students be given the same privilege.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AIR POLLUTION

PROVISION FOR ABATEMENT ASSISTANCE TO OTHER AGENCIES

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-290, to control air pollution.

• (11:10 a.m.)

Mr. Haidasz: Air pollution is today one of the most vital and urgent problems confronting Canada. Pollutants in the air are causing injury to people, animals, vegetation and property. The progressive increase and complexity of air pollution brought about today by urbanization, industrialization, automobiles and the nuclear age, call for increased national leadership to protect all our national resources, including clean air. Within the limits of federal jurisdiction, this bill provides for action to assist provincial, regional, municipal and private agencies to abate air pollution.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MAINTENANCE OF PROTECTION FOR CANADIAN AGRICULTURE IN UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the departure on Monday, I am informed, of quite a large number of Canadian ministers for the United Kingdom will leave a large void in the treasury benches for the time being. I presume that one of the subjects to be considered will be Britain's application for entry to the common market. I would ask the Prime Minister whether he would assure the house that the cabinet delegation, while admitting Britain's right to make her own decisions as to the course she will follow, will press strongly for the protection of Canadian agriculture in the maintenance of those preferences that are now in existence?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the delegation undoubtedly will listen with interest to a report by the United Kingdom government on its recent policies and approaches with regard to entry into the common market. I can assure my hon. friend that in any discussions that take place we will make Canadian interests quite clear in this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And does that include agriculture, to which I specifically made reference?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, indeed it does, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUEST BY UN SECRETARY GENERAL FOR CEASE FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, over a week ago the Prime Minister promised to look at the text of the appeal by Secretary General U Thant with respect to a unilateral cease fire in Viet Nam, and particularly to look at that part of the text which was quoted in the press as follows:

It becomes ever more clear to me that this impasse can be broken and a halt put to the increasingly horrible slaughter and destruction of the Viet Nam war only if one side or the other shows the wisdom and the courage and the compassion for humanity to take the initiative of a first step, that is to say, by undertaking unilaterally to put the standstill truce into effect and thereafter to fire only if fired upon.

The Prime Minister was going to look at this text and, I believe, seek some clarification from the Secretary General's office. Is he now in a position to say what is Canada's position with respect to this request by U Thant?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the United States government has already indicated its willingness to accept at once the Secretary General's proposal that the fighting stop and peace negotiations begin. That proposal which would have brought the war to an end and have instituted a cease fire was rejected by the government of North Viet Nam.

The Secretary General made an additional proposal to which my hon. friend has referred, that unilateral action be taken by one side—in this case that could only be the United States and the South Vietnamese side—that the fighting stop on one side irrespective of action taken on the other side. This proposal is no doubt being discussed by the Secretary General during his present trip to Asia.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs expects to see the Secretary General next week in London when he will be discussing this whole matter with him, including the proposal to which my hon. friend refers. I should add that the Secretary of State for External Affairs tells me the meeting may not be in London, but he will be seeing the Secretary General shortly.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Secretary General has again made an appeal for a unilateral cease fire, which he has repeatedly said would be applied only if the other side did not fire on United States forces, do I take it that the Canadian government is not yet prepared to support this appeal to the government of the United States?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, any proposal to bring about an end to hostilities certainly will be considered by this government. As I have said, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be discussing this matter with the Secretary General of the United Nations following his visit to London next week.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the widespread feeling on the part of Canadians that there should be a pause in the bombing in Viet Nam, may I now ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question? Will he reconsider the decision he made some months ago and have placed before the House of Commons a resolution so that Canada can speak with unity on this subject, and so that Canada's position will be clearly understood?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the committee on external affairs is meeting at the present time, and this matter could be discussed before that committee. I cannot think any useful purpose would be served at this moment by putting such a resolution on the order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister then suggest that the Secretary of State for External Affairs make known the view of this house, which seems to be fairly general, in a clear and definite statement instead of leaving the equivocal uncertainties which exist in this connection?

Mr. Pearson: I take it that the right hon. gentleman is referring to his own view that the bombing should be stopped and no action taken concerning the infiltrations from the north into the south. That is not the position of this government. The position of this government is that the war should stop and that there should be a cease fire at once.

AGRICULTURE

NORTHWESTERN QUEBEC—DEVELOPMENT OF RESOURCES UNDER ARDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, who is responsible for ARDA.

Did the minister have any talks with northwestern Quebec organizations with a view to proceeding to the development of the James Bay area, where tremendous resources could be developed if only ARDA assistance were available.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Under federal-provincial agreements, Mr. Speaker, organizations in northwestern Quebec should discuss this matter with the provincial minister responsible for ARDA, not with the federal minister.

FLOODS

FRASER RIVER—REQUEST FOR PREVENTIVE ACTION BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the right hon. Prime Minister. When replying to a question raised by the hon. member for New Westminster a few days ago the Prime Minister indicated that the officials had been instructed to look into the question of the flood danger in the lower Fraser valley. I wonder whether the Prime Minister has had a report on this situation, and whether he could make a statement to the house at this time.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I have had a report from the officials and experts to the effect that it is too early to reach any conclusion concerning whether there is going to be really dangerous flooding in the Fraser valley, but that we should certainly be on the alert because this could happen. We have advised the provincial authorities who are in daily touch with the situation that the federal government will help in every possible way if this danger should materialize, and that we will be ready to meet any reasonable request for assistance in this regard.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BELL ISLAND, NFLD.—ASSISTANCE FOR UNEMPLOYED MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Joseph P. O'Keefe (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the minister inform the house what steps have been taken or what measures are contemplated to assist the residents of Bell Island in Newfoundland as a result of the sudden closing of the DOSCO iron mines?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe a similar question was put to the Prime Minister yesterday by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. We have been in continuous consultation with the government of Newfoundland concerning appropriate measures which would assist the island.

In anticipation of the lay-offs, in the spring of last year we designated the island as an area whose work force would be eligible for grants rather than loans under our mobility program. So far this measure has resulted in moving out of the island almost one quarter of its population of 8,500 persons. The workers concerned have either been placed in employment or are being provided with retraining. The radically changed provisions of our mobility program, which became effective two weeks ago, will increase our ability to give effective help to the remainder of the population.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration what plans the federal government has in respect of the three quarters of the population who have not been moved out of that island, who are still apparently unemployed and suffering great hardship at the present time.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I believe I answered the question in so far as the jurisdiction of my department is concerned. I do not think there is any one answer in so far as the second part of the question is concerned. It is always difficult for any community when the only company or plant is closed down. There are problems of reclassification, retraining, relocation and so on involved. It is not easy for us or anyone to solve this problem. We are trying to relocate these people and retrain them. That is all we can do at this moment.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question. Yesterday the Prime Minister stated that more than one department was involved in the discussions between the federal government and the government of Newfoundland. I should like to ask him whether any plans are under way to assist in the development of new industry in that area. What other departments are negotiating with the government of Newfoundland to help the people of Bell Island?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the people on that island have been helped and we are continuing to help them in the manner indicated by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the Prime Minister consider pulling the Minister of Industry off his world trip and sending him personally to Bell Island to do something about this situation? It has been known for many years that the island was in trouble.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO CONCLUSION OF GENEVA NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Because of the serious implications to the agriculture industry of any changes in tariffs in regard to fruits and vegetables I should like to ask the minister, who I know is very close to this matter, whether he is optimistic that the very serious negotiations being carried on at Geneva at this time will be completed before the prescribed time limit set by the United States.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. According to the authority under which the United States is negotiating the negotiations will come to an end at mid-year. They have no legislative authority to negotiate beyond that time. Most of the nations—I think it would be fair to say all of them—are now negotiating on the basis of a target date of April 30 for completion of the substantive negotiations so as to allow an adequate opportunity to complete the details and related arrangements that are necessary in the time intervening between then and mid-year. We are negotiating on the basis that the target date for terminating arrangements will be met.

BID BY CANADIAN COMPANY FOR CONSTRUCTION OF NUCLEAR REACTOR IN FINLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that General Electric of Peterborough, Ontario was the successful one of three bidders for the construction of a $100 million nuclear power station in Finland, and in view of the Russian pressure put on the Finland authority to delay the project in order to provide Russia with an opportunity to bid on this project, have the Canadian authorities been aware of this situation and what action have they taken to counteract the Russian pressure?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think both the preface and the question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, this is a very urgent matter which might involve the loss of a $100 million contract. I do not think there is anything more urgent.

[Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert).]

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the contract will be saved by the hon. member's question, or by the answer which might be given.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think it is urgent that the Secretary of State for External Affairs ascertain the position in this regard through the proper diplomatic channels, so that Canada's opportunity will not be jeopardized by any intervention on the part of Russia.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this matter comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. However, he and I will discuss this matter at once.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR ADVICE ON SPRING PLANTING ON PRAIRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have an urgent question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. With wheat seeding operations on the prairies about to start is the minister in a position to advise farmers whether they should increase or decrease their wheat acreage this year in view of the apparent difficulty in negotiating a new international wheat agreement?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much advice the western farmers need from me about planting wheat. However, earlier this week I had the opportunity to be in Regina, and stated that according to the forecast by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics western farmers will plant more acreage in wheat this year than in any year in history. I think that indicates the confidence they share with us that a new and better world wheat trading agreement will result from the negotiations now taking place.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO PROSECUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to ask my first question of the Minister of Justice. Being the first question it will be a simple one. Can the minister inform the house whether Harold Chamberlain Banks is going to be charged with an offence under the Criminal Code as a result of consideration being given to this matter by the minister, the attorney general of the province of Ontario and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer would be that in normal cases the administration of justice does come under the province, but there may be special circumstances here. With your permission, sir, I would take the question of the hon. member for Kootenay West as notice and look into it.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

REPRODUCTION OF COAT OF ARMS MEDALLION FOR PUBLIC DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. I have before me a document entitled "Coat of Arms of Canada", issued by the Secretary of State, showing the coat of arms with the union jack, the unicorn, the lion and the fleur-de-lis. Has there been any change made of the coat of arms for Canada in recent days or weeks?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Not that I am aware of, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I want to know on what basis the centennial medallion which is shortly to be distributed is accompanied by this explanatory note: "The obverse or front side of the medallion has on it the Canadian coat of arms with the word 'Canada' ". I have here a replica of the particular medallion, which is an emasculated neuter. I ask on what authority that is going to be distributed to the school children of Canada when there has been no change in the coat of arms?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the medallion for some months, and unfortunately I cannot say from recollection what differences there may be. But I shall of course be happy to look into the matter and make a report to the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, will the minister indicate on what basis the lion and the unicorn, the words A mari usque ad mare, and some other portions of the coat of arms have been removed; I ask why this kind of caricature is going to be distributed to Canadian children when it does not represent Canada's coat of arms.

TELEVISION

DISCUSSION WITH C.B.C. RESPECTING EDUCATIONAL BROADCASTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that the board of directors of the C.B.C. in its comments on the white paper on broadcasting which were made last November requested a discussion on the question of who might operate educational television broadcasting, may I ask the Secretary of State whether there was any discussion between the government and the C.B.C. with respect to this matter before the policy decision was made which is now before the house.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker. During the formulation of the policy itself the C.B.C., as the major adviser to the government on broadcasting matters, was of course consulted. The matter was discussed. There is no compulsion, of course, to always accept the advice of your advisers, and in this particular case the advice of the C.B.C. was not accepted, by virtue of the fact that the C.B.C. is primarily a program producing agency while an educational television agency as conceived by the government is primarily one of providing facilities only and renting air to other program producing agencies.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a fact that in the field of educational broadcasting the C.B.C. has been only an operating agency?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative, and is not in order.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWESTERN QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR ACCESS ROAD TO JAMES BAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The government has placed $100 million at the disposal of the department to build roads in the far north to improve communications. Has the minister been asked to build, out of those $100 million, an access road leading to James Bay in northern Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question should be put on the order paper.

National Defence Act Amendment

[English]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR REGULATION OF CIGARETTE ADVERTISING IN BROADCASTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Some days ago the minister's parliamentary secretary indicated that the government was giving consideration at this time to the regulation of cigarette advertising on radio and television. Can the minister indicate when a decision on that important question may be expected?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not possible for me to say when a decision will be made on this point.

FINANCE

PRUDENTIAL FINANCE—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN REIMBURSEMENT OF SHAREHOLDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the premier of Ontario has indicated possible financial help to the unfortunate shareholders of Prudential Finance, does the federal government intend to participate in this plan of reimbursement to the persons who have suffered?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the plans of the government of Ontario. However, I can say that the government of Canada has no intention of participating.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 13, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose last evening clause 2 was under consideration.

[Mr. Speaker.]

On clause 2—Canadian forces, Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Ballard: Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned last night I was in the process of pointing out to the minister that he was flying in the face of convention by trying to unify Canada's armed forces while in the past few years our two traditional allies, the United States and Great Britain, have proceeded to a policy of deunification. I pointed out that at one time Great Britain, Canada and the United States all considered their respective air forces so important that they set them up as separate units. As a matter of fact the United States separated the air force from the army and the navy in 1947.

Toward the end of the sitting yesterday I echoed a question asked by Air Marshal Curtis; "Is the minister out of his mind?" I do not think I am alone in questioning the ability of the minister to make a decision such as the one he made. As a matter of fact I also pointed out last night that the minister found it necessary to fire or retire a great number of high ranking military officers until he found a corps of officers who would agree with the stand he has taken.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ballard: So the minister is sitting on his side of the house stubbornly ignoring all the pleas and suggestions put forward not only by members on this side of the house but also by senior ranking officers who have gone into retirement, either voluntarily or been forced to do it. Even the press of Canada has written about the stubbornness of the minister. As a matter of fact one of Canada's foremost columnists, Mr. Charles Lynch, wrote the following in the Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, March 22:

> Mr. Hellyer has locked himself into so rigid a position in support of the unification bill that it is hard to imagine him accepting major modifications.

We are not asking for major modifications. We are asking for minor, reasonable and sensible modifications to the bill now before us. Mr. Lynch went on to explain the reason the minister will not accept any changes. He wrote the following:

> If he did accept them, it is hard to see how he could stomach the political implications of such a humiliation—and that is how his critics would interpret it.
> At best, he would have to move to some other portfolio, accepting a major setback to his political ambitions.

So it is not only we on this side of the house and some members of the minister's own party who recognize the fact that the minister has political ambitions. It is recognized by all across the country that the minister has designs on the highest office in this land, and in my opinion he is prepared to frustrate the defence efforts of this country in order to further his own political ambitions.

Mr. Byrne: Who is Mr. Lynch? He is not a member of parliament.

Mr. Ballard: Mr. Lynch says also:

> The simplest solution, and the one that most likely would have been adopted had rigor mortis not set in as stiffly as it has, would be to amend the bill in a way that would preserve the army, navy and air force identities within the proposed unified structure.

In other words he suggests integration but not unification. The opinion is now fairly widespread regarding the unacceptability of the concept of unification. As a matter of fact some of the prominent witnesses who appeared before the defence committee were quite convinced that a change in the armed forces to bring about the unification which is now proposed would automatically alter our defence commitments. I should like to quote two or three of these, Mr. Chairman, but I do not want to quote them all because that would be too time consuming. First of all I should like to quote from the evidence of General Charles Foulkes as recorded on page 1220 of the evidence before the defence committee:

> However, the roles of these two brigades in NATO are not indicated. Nobody knows what they are going to do—if they do, they do not say so—or under whose auspices these forces will be employed in this world-wide pacification role.

We are suspicious that Canada's defence forces are being tailored for a particular purpose. We suspect that the defence forces are being groomed with the idea in mind of dropping out of our defence commitments in NATO and NORAD and carrying on with only our commitment to the United Nations.

I should like to suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the minister should take a look at history. He would find a very distinct parallel between what is taking place today and what took place prior to the war of 1939-1945. He would find that the attitude of Great Britain and other countries was pacific. At that time the major nations of the world were putting a tremendous amount of faith in the League of Nations. They considered that the greatest deterrent to any armed conflict was the world opinion that would be against any kind of war. As a matter of fact, even in the last days before the war the British people were convinced that the public opinion that would be aroused against any action taken by Adolf Hitler would force him to recant and proceed with his plans in a peaceful manner.

We find ourselves in the same situation today, Mr. Chairman. We have people advocating that we ignore what is commonly called power politics and pin our hopes entirely on the United Nations. As a matter of fact the Prime Minister of this country, before he was prime minister, made a speech at the University of British Columbia on this thought that public opinion would deter any future war. He was speaking to the University of British Columbia on the transformation of the traditional concept of international power politics to the rule by international law, international organization and international force. He had this to say in 1961:

> During this period of transformation, it is certain that force will continue to be a basis of policy. In the past, it has often been used with cruel injustice. But not always. In the hands of conscientious patrons it has also been the instrument for maintaining rough international justice, as well as security and stability. It is when great power is controlled by governments that cannot be counted on to use it justly or responsibly, that we grow fearful. So we collect counterforce and use it through power politics to prevent ourselves being overpowered. If we did not, diplomacy and the negotiation of disputes would be determined by the threat of one sided force in the background.
> This, then, is the situation which in reality determines our approach to the ideal disarmament and the abolition of national force. All our high sounding declarations must be interpreted in that context. We should not try to deceive ourselves.

Well now, Mr. Chairman, this was the attitude of the present Prime Minister of this country. He said, and I repeat:

> This, then, is the situation which in reality determines our approach to the ideal disarmament and the abolition of national force. All our high sounding declarations must be interpreted in that context.

How does this statement fit into the present situation? We find that the Minister of National Defence is trying to abolish the traditional fighting forces of this country. We find the Secretary of State for External Affairs trying to assure this house that we are not going to change any of our international commitments. When he was referring to NATO and NORAD he made it very plain to this house that the government had no intention of changing those commitments for the moment. There was no suggestion we would carry on these commitments for a year or five years or ten years; he said "For the moment". I think we are entitled, and the people of Canada are entitled, to know that these commitments will be continued for an indefinite period.

As we all know, the NORAD agreement will be renegotiated next year. The question I should like to ask is this. Will our defence forces be changed to such an extent that we will not be capable of being a partner in NORAD? Is this a deliberate move by the government of this country to develop forces capable only of action in respect to our commitments to the United Nations? The attitude of the Prime Minister leads one to believe that he is staking his political future on the hope that moral suasion will be an effective deterrent to war. If it is, it will be the first time in history that this has happened.

It might be pointed out that the only countries that have really followed the dictates of the United Nations have been the western countries. The eastern countries, for example Soviet Russia, have used the veto over 100 times. The only large concessions that have been made have come from the western countries. In spite of this the Prime Minister of this country, according to his speech to the University of British Columbia in 1961, believes that the United Nations can mobilize the moral forces of the international community against any bloc which threatens world peace. I remind you that the same thing was said of the League of Nations before the war of 1939.

Referring again to the speech delivered by the Prime Minister I find this:

> The United Nations assembly is creating something in the nature of a world public opinion. This does have an effect in checking, if not yet in preventing, aggressive actions by predatory individual states. It has its own power for peace.

Lord help us, Mr. Chairman, if we rely strictly on world public opinion for the peace of this country. I say I suspect the change in the military forces of this country and the adoption of an untried method of operation is directly designed to tailor the forces of this country for the United Nations, and for the withdrawal of this country from its commitments to NORAD and NATO.

I am not alone in that thought. Lieutenant General Moncel, when questioned about changes in commitments, said this at page 1305 of the committee evidence:

> —if you do change your commitments and produce a unified force to meet these much reduced commitments, then you should bear in mind that you are never again going to have a commitment that might call for something other than a unified force.

Lieutenant General Moncel was saying that once a force is unified it can only be used in the context where a unified force is necessary, and it will not be useful for NATO or NORAD. Air Vice Marshal Hendrick at page 1451 of the committee evidence agreed with Lieutenant General Moncel and said:

> The policy changes, in my view, are there by implication; by the withdrawal from NORAD, the withdrawal from NATO, and the concentration of our efforts in the support of the United Nations. This seems to be inevitable from the events that are taking place and the equipment policies that are going on.

It is all very well for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to say that we do not intend to change our commitments for the moment. We want to know, are the defence forces of this country being tailored to suit United Nations projects to the exclusion of commitments that we have with NATO and NORAD? Lieutenant General Moncel has suggested that this is so. He said that once you start down the road of unification there is no turning back.

Members of this house and the people of this country have a right to demand a fuller explanation from the ministers than has been given up to the present time. I suggest that consideration should be given to withdrawing this bill, and more thought should be given to the commitments we have abroad.

Mrs. Wadds: Mr. Chairman, I have listened carefully to many excellent speeches in this debate. Many of the speeches were by hon. members with tremendous experience as soldiers and outstanding records in this regard to back their opinions. If experience in war is not the best qualification for participating in this debate, then I should like to hear hon. members on the government side say what is the best qualification. I was astonished to see the light attendance on the government side when the former minister of national defence opened this debate in the house. He has a tremendous record as a minister, a tremendous record in war, and he is one to whom everyone in this house should listen with great respect.

I was amazed yesterday, when the hon. member for Northumberland was speaking from first hand experience about the vital importance of morale in the armed forces, to notice considerable smirking on the government side. I heard one backbencher saying

"What's that got to do with it?" I submit what the hon. member for Northumberland said was extremely relevant. Seldom have I seen an ex-minister, a former soldier of the hon. member's calibre, faced with such a smug reaction. If hon. members sitting opposite take the trouble to look into the contribution made during the war by the hon. member for Northumberland, they will probably blanch. They ought to have had the good sense to listen to what he said on this subject, and they should have shown respect.

Mr. Churchill: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Wadds: Knowledgeable speakers have made reasonable speeches in this debate, but they have been met with supercilious smugness. Rarely do we see this behaviour when hon. members who are doctors rise to speak about medicine. They are not met with derision. Treating their remarks in that way would be silly. It seems silly, under these circumstances, to treat with derision the remarks of hon. members who have experience and knowledge of the subject.

I support the hon. member who has just spoken and the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, who appealed to the minister and to the Prime Minister to reconsider this legislation which is meeting such sincere and stiff opposition.

Mr. Churchill: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Wadds: Yesterday the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton made an excellent speech in which he asked the minister questions. The minister either cannot or will not face them. Every member of the house knows that the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton does not speak lightly, that he does not often take up the time of the house. He speaks when he is gravely concerned with an issue under discussion.

I heard a smug interjection yesterday from the government side of the house to the effect that those members on this side now taking part in the debate have been told to do so by our whip. That was letting the cat out of the bag. If that sort of thing happens on the other side, I can only assure hon. members that it does not happen with us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: They even get their speeches written for them.

Mrs. Wadds: They are lucky. We speak when we want to speak, and if the government will not respect our contributions of sincere criticism then I feel that the Canadian public will.

A great deal of the spirit in our centennial celebrations, much of the pride we feel in being Canadians, a pride built up over 100 years of nationhood, comes from the achievements of our armed forces. We are a thinly populated country with vast land area, but we feel akin to other countries with relatively small populations such as Finland, Norway and many others like them, which have histories of glorious military achievements.

As has been asked by other hon. members, are we to barge blindly into a position where we cannot dovetail our forces to fit our international commitments? Are our forces to be left sadly at home on Canadian soil, carrying on in their own little Canadian way? The Secretary of State for External Affairs, in supporting the Minister of National Defence, says this measure will not make any difference to our commitments; yet the testimony of military experts is that it will make a difference, a great difference. Surely that very possibility points to an uninspiring future for a country that has done so much already by way of international military co-operation.

I noticed yesterday that when hon. members mentioned General Moncel or quoted from his testimony there was no great show of joy on the faces of government members sitting on the front benches. On page 1317 of the committee proceedings Lieutenant General Moncel is reported as saying:

• (12 noon)

> It must be a progressive thing all the time, toward the most effective Canadian defence force. This is the object of the exercise; it is not unification.

This is an eminently sound, sensible and reasonable statement. Integration has been progressive and promises to continue to be acceptable as it proves itself step by step, but I submit that an attempt to impose unification on Canadians as a sort of extended integration is unfair. It has been said by the opposition in the course of the democratic process which is practised here that we should know where we are going before we take such a gigantic step, such an irretrievable step.

Yesterday the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, asking whether the government was justified in taking such a serious step, wondered whether they had anything further to back them up than promises of success and improvement. Experts say that morale will not be improved and that costs will not decrease. But the minister chooses to make fun of experts, using an amusing rhyme. I am sure the minister can be very entertaining on other occasions with such amusing rhymes, but I submit there is hardly a place for them in such a serious debate as this, particularly in an age in which specialization is the keystone of success in science, medicine, education and certainly in military affairs.

Ridiculing experts in any area is hardly in keeping with the kind of society in which we are living today. If the government is as sure of itself as it should be in connection with such a serious matter as this, why are not more of the senior ministers coming to the aid of the minister of defence? The Minister of Transport was not very convincing. On April 7, as reported at page 14666 of Hansard, he said:

> The idea of parliament prying, probing and trying to get at the advice the minister received instead of discussing the question on its merits ... does not seem to be an effective way of reaching a conclusion.

It seems to me it is important for the house to know where the minister gets his advice, if indeed he gets any advice at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Wadds: It seems to me it is fundamental in our approach to any legislation to know where a minister obtains his advice. Further, the Minister of Transport said we were heading straight into an unknown area. As reported at page 14667 he stated:

> The point I am making is that in so far as the progress on integration is concerned, that has been going on for three or four years and the evidence of military experts is, of course, of great relevance. However, in so far as unification is concerned it has no relevance whatever. I want to repeat that. The evidence of experts is of no relevance whatever because there are no experts. There never has been, under modern conditions at least, a unified military force.

I want to repeat certain of those words.

> The evidence of experts is of no relevance whatever because there are no experts. There never has been, under modern conditions at least, a unified force.

Later the hon. gentleman told us:

> It is a step into something which nobody has ever experienced. I suggest that generally we are apt to get the most imaginative views from young people who have a sense of adventure and not from people who fought in the last war, however gallantly.

I regret that an hon. gentleman I find so personally amiable as the Minister of Transport, and one who is considered such a great source of strength to the Liberal party, should make a statement of that sort. A sense of adventure is a delightful attribute and may well lead to imaginative views, but to imply that a sense of adventure and imaginative views replace the blood and sweat of experience in combat seems to me a trifle ludicrous. One would imagine we were discussing the qualifications for modern art rather than the realities, in deadly earnest—kill or be killed —which war brings.

The present debate reminds me of a family which is trying to urge a senior member to make a will. Nobody likes to put into words the real reason why it should be done. Nobody likes to discuss the realities of war, the killing side of it, the horrors of war. But we would be derelict in our duty if we allowed this debate to slide along on a superficial level at which men of proven courage, bravery and experience are listened to less than those of imagination.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Wadds: The Minister of Transport continued by expressing an opinion that in the last war there was very rapid promotion of young people "because it was felt that in battle young, vigorous and imaginative people were needed". The former minister of defence, my hon. friend from Calgary North, interjected "It was a question of endurance to a large extent." To which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate answered "Maybe it was. Perhaps this is not a very good or strong argument." Mr. Chairman, the minister of defence needs stronger support than this from his cabinet colleagues if he is to convince us on this side that the government has its heart and soul behind this project.

Surely it is fair to ask the minister what he proposes to do if the opinions of the experts —experienced people, intelligent people, and certainly sincere people—prove to be right and no one wants to join this unified force. Is he prepared to let Canada's defences collapse and tell the world that we have disarmed ourselves by accident, or confusion, or misunderstanding? Or is he prepared to accept conscription? Or does he know some way of un-unifying unification? It may not be considered flattering, but it might well be considered sensible to ask a person in a leaky boat whether he knows how to swim. Has the minister any alternative apart from abandoning our defence contribution to the free world should the criticism directed at this bill prove to have been correct?

(Mr. Groos) will not like what I have to say now. On Tuesday of this week he expressed the opinion that too much criticism in this house might be demoralizing to the armed forces. I submit that any legislation which will not stand up to criticism will not stand up to practice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Wadds: I do not consider myself irresponsible, and I do not consider those who have taken part in this debate so far from these benches to be irresponsible. Much as I would sincerely regret any demoralization of the armed forces for any reason, it does appear to me that this bill is worthy of further study and consideration. If the very discussion of it may cause demoralization it is obvious that we are not on very firm ground. Surely discussion and debate of good legislation improve and strengthen it. It is the responsibility of the government to prove that this legislation is good. Scoffing at opposition warnings on the ground that debate and criticism are demoralizing is hardly designed to carry out that responsibility. To expect authority to continue with integration where each step can be followed and observed is one thing. It is altogether another thing to expect authority to proceed on a course which the Minister of Transport tries to classify as an adventure by stating there are no experts with regard to it because the plan is too imaginative.

The controversy with regard to Lord Louis Mountbatten's opinions has been far reaching, but the position is now entirely clear. The daily Colonist of Victoria, B.C. of April 5 reported the following statement:

In the British reorganization care has been taken to preserve esprit de corps and morale and those traditions which help to maintain this in the services and fighting units.

It has been accepted that to achieve this the three services must retain their uniforms and ranks with an identifiable professional head of their service. The idea of a single uniform and rank structure was also rejected as undesirable and unnecessary.

Further on he said:

The general cut and colour of naval uniforms are internationally so well known that a sailor from any one country can readily be recognized as a sailor in any other country. Sailors the world over take great pride in this and so in their own services do soldiers and airmen. No compensating advantage could be seen in attempting to impose so unpopular a change.

The minister and the government cannot hide behind accusations of opposition obstruction and delay in this debate. There has been too much criticism outside the house, even in the Winnipeg Free Press, which on Tuesday, April 4 carried a lead editorial headed "Destroying Defence." Part of it reads as follows:

This revolutionary gamble and experiment is being foisted on Canada in face of the strongest possible protest by nearly every experienced admiral, general and air marshal in the country.

If this step could simply be classed as a further blunder by an accident prone government, and could be corrected when its faults became clearly apparent, the country could perhaps afford to go along for the ride.

When it is realized, however, that Mr. Hellyer is playing with an annual investment of some $1.6 billion which vitally concerns the defence structure of the nation and involves our international obligations, the magnitude of this error becomes obvious.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said, "We on this side of the house have said that we should retain the three services, work away at the integrated side and see whether we can make a success of it." The insistence on hurrying this bill through seems to us unnecessary, at least militarily though possibly not politically. The Minister of National Defence seems to be very pleased when he is referred to as a minister of the jet age. That seems to me rather close to being called a minister of the jet set. We all know the jet set go very fast but it does not follow that they are accomplishing anything of much value.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does the hon. member realize that regardless of the issue, her entry into this debate and her charming presence and delivery have raised the morale of members on both sides of the chamber?

Some hon Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I see the hon. lady nods her assent.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, for reasons that will be obvious in a moment or two, I do not rise to discuss the terms of the bill now before us. Neither do I intend to make any comment on the nature of the debate or on the positions taken by the opposing sides. But I do have a suggestion to make regarding our procedure. I make it in the best of faith, and I make it now in the hope that it might be considered over the week end or perhaps for even a day or two longer than that.

If I may say so without arousing any feelings, it is now fairly clear that there will be a time established when this debate will come to an end. That may be arrived at by agreement or it may be arrived at by the procedures laid down in one of the provisional rules under which we are operating. At the moment I am not discussing the rights or wrongs of that course. I am simply suggesting that it is fairly obvious that a time limit will be set.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think it is a matter of some concern that during the time this bill is before us we should have discussion on a number of its clauses. It looks to me as though the earliest this debate could end under provisional standing order 15-A would be a week from next Tuesday, but I think it would be most unfortunate if all our time between now and then were spent on clause 2. That may happen, though there is always the possibility that the debate on clause 2 could end even without any arrangement or understanding.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are 65 clauses in the bill and two schedules. I recognize that many of them that are clauses which contain details may not need to be discussed at length, but there are some very important provisions in some of the other clauses and I think we ought to have a chance to discuss them. It would be most unfortunate if the application of rule 15-A were such that we spent all our time on clause 2 and then had to vote on all the other clauses without any discussion. This would be unfortunate in terms of the bill and unfortunate for parliament, and I can readily imagine the things that will be said if this happens. All this could be avoided if we could come to an agreement.

I am not proposing that anything should be done in any other way than by agreement. Let me put it this way. Maybe on Monday night we could agree to adjourn the debate on clause 2 and proceed to take up some of the other clauses. I am not suggesting that a vote be taken on clause 2 at that time. I am only suggesting that we adjourn the debate on it and move on to some of the other clauses which deserve to be discussed. I understand that clause 6 should be discussed at some length and a few other clauses dealing with uniforms and rank structures in the services. There are also matters in the schedules that should be discussed.

It may be argued that we should not discuss these other matters until we have decided on the principle of a unified force which is set out in clause 2, but I suggest we should not try to reach a decision on that clause by forcing a vote on it if hon. members want to discuss other clauses. Let us not get ourselves into a position where we can be called upon to make a final decision on a bill 64 clauses of which have not been discussed at all.

Again I say I am not assessing blame. I am not saying the opposition is preventing the discussion of the other clauses by discussing clause 2, and I am not suggesting the government is to blame for asking the house to consider the use of standing order 15-A. I am asking all of us to face the fact that we have a limited amount of time left—it might be seven or eight days or it might be longer—to discuss all the clauses in the bill which hon. members want to discuss. I am sure there are many other clauses that are important, and they should get a bit of an airing in the committee of the whole.

Of course I hope the application of standing order 15-A will not be too severe. As I say, even the minimum times allowed under it would keep this debate going in committee stage and on third reading until a week from Tuesday night, but it may extend longer than that. All I am asking is that we think about this over the week end and come to some agreement.

I have looked up the rules and I believe you would have difficulty, Mr. Chairman, if a motion were made to stand clause 2 without general agreement. There would be no point in having a procedural wrangle over that. But I think we could have an understanding that having spent 10 or 11 days on clause 2, without taking the vote on it at this point, we should go on to discuss the other clauses. The result of this might be that if members of the official opposition continue to stage their case on some of the other clauses they would persuade the government that the bill should be held off. Let us not use all our time on one clause. Let us take a good look at all the provisions of the bill. I hope this proposal will be considered.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, this is a most reasonable suggestion on the part of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I must say that I am in complete agreement with it, and I would hope this idea would commend itself to members of the committee. It is in fact the same procedure which was followed in the standing committee on national defence, which worked very well there. Perhaps during the course of the day representatives of the various parties could meet under circumstances which would enable us, later this day or at the first of the week, to continue under a procedure along those lines.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question. There is another suggestion which might be advanced. Over the week end would the minister consider withdrawing the bill and postponing it until the fall because, as he has told us, it really will not become operative until about five years from now.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, of course I would be glad to consider that, but as I have told my hon. friend I really believe it would be irresponsible action on my part if I were to withdraw this bill at this stage and postpone it.

Mr. Churchill: You would be praised for it and would be a man of great distinction.

Mr. Hellyer: I might be praised by the hon. gentleman, but certainly not by the officials who are charged with the responsibility of implementing the integration and unification program. It is as a result of their advice that I feel we must proceed at the present time. There are a number of questions which must be answered. Only when we know the will of parliament will we know on what basis to proceed.

I agree completely with the advice of the sincere, dedicated and experienced hon. lady who spoke a few moments ago that we should proceed at this time and let the will of parliament be known so the officials who have the responsibility of implementing this policy will be able to prepare their plans based on the will of parliament.

Mr. Churchill: Is it not a fact that in the committee General Allard told us that he would like to see the proclamation of the bill postponed for at least four months, and that until the bill is proclaimed no action can be taken with regard to the steps toward unification. That is the advice of the senior officer in the defence forces.

Mr. Hellyer: That is quite so, Mr. Chairman; it will not be proclaimed for several months after parliament approves it, if it does approve it. Even more time than that may be required; but as was clearly pointed out in the committee certain action must be taken in the department which really can be done only after the bill has received parliamentary approval and after the exact wording of the bill is known to the staff in the department. This includes a rewriting of the entire Queen's Regulations and so on. It is for that reason it is necessary to have the parliamentary decision now. The proclamation, of course, will be postponed for some months while the detailed planning directly related to the bill in so far as personnel management is concerned is worked out by the responsible staff.

Mr. Churchill: Is it not a fact that not one single act with regard to unification can be taken until the bill is proclaimed? Until the bill is proclaimed it is not the law of the land.

Mr. Hellyer: It is quite true that it is not the law of the land, but the planning which is required to implement the bill can proceed once the bill is passed and once the staff know what are the provisions of the law.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister, is it not a fact that General Allard said in his evidence that he thought it would be extremely damaging to morale if there should be a continuation of the uncertainty which exists at the present time. I believe he urged the committee to proceed to a decision at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Hellyer: That is correct; that is General Allard's opinion, and I concur in it. It is also the opinion of other senior officers at headquarters who are charged with the responsibility for implementing the reorganization program.

Mr. Lambert: This is putting the cart before the horse.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I believe we are getting slightly away from the point. The minister made an interesting statement. He said the plans have not been completed in respect of this bill concerning unification which we are discussing. Obviously if we do not know where we are going we should not have this bill in front of us. With regard to proclamation, what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has said is quite correct; there is no legal possibility of proceeding with any plans until we do have the bill proclaimed. For the life of me I do not see why, if the bill is going through, it should not be put through and proclaimed immediately rather than be delayed for some further decisions which perhaps the minister wishes to have included.

In other words the bill itself is a carte blanche for anything the minister should like to put forward. The fact of proclamation cannot change this in any way, shape or form. I fail to follow his argument in respect of proclamation. I do not understand why we should hesitate. I am sure there is some planning necessary, but the intention of the minister should be placed before the house so this can be discussed when the bill is before us and when we are considering it clause by clause. We should have from the minister a clear statement concerning what he intends to do.

Mr. Hellyer: This question was raised in the standing committee on national defence and the Judge Advocate General pointed out that there are certain regulations which cannot be completed until the form of the bill is known. Let me give an example. The committee already has proposed an amendment which gives to the governor in council the responsibility to designate the names of the ranks to be used, whereas in the original draft of the bill this power was given to the minister. This means there will be a difference in the type of order which must be promulgated in order to give practical effect to this provision.

It is quite impossible for the legal staff to properly prepare the orders until they know what actually is the text of the law. The Judge Advocate General said it would be several months after the bill has been approved by parliament before we would be in a position to ask the governor in council to proclaim it.

Mr. Pugh: On that point may I say that I fail to see what effect the fact that orders will have to be issued down through the services will have on the matter of proclamation. This will in no way be affected by the fact that the bill has been passed by parliament but is unproclaimed. The proclamation of the bill in the end will not take away the uncertainty. Certainly any problems which might exist in respect of the issuing of orders down through the various services cannot have any effect on the proclamation. The bill will not be changed in any shape or form, nor will any new wording be introduced in the bill. After the bill is passed, if it is passed, there will be no changes made in the bill itself. The final proclamation of the bill will give it full effect and force under the law. If the proclamation is held up I think this will leave in the minds of the people a doubt concerning what the minister intends to do.

Mr. Hellyer: My hon. friend seems to miss the point. A number of changes were made to the text of the law during the hearings of the committee on national defence, and these changes have been recommended to the House of Commons and this committee. It is possible that during the course of the deliberations in this committee there might be other amendments. I cannot say whether there will or will not be. It is quite possible, however, that we might find that other technical changes are desirable in the interests of implementing the general proposal. If that should happen this would alter the regulations which must be prepared based on the law. Consequently I believe it is a perfectly valid proposition that the staff cannot provide the draft regulations until they know precisely what the law looks like.

Mr. Pugh: Far from my missing the point, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that what the minister has just said of course bears out exactly what I have put forward. Nothing in this bill can be changed in any way, shape or form after it has been passed by this house. Any amendments which may be put forward by the government or accepted by the government as proposed by the opposition cannot be made after the bill has passed this house. These changes must be made during our clause by clause consideration. I suggest the regulations will be made in accordance with the bill as passed.

The suggestion that proclamation be withheld leaves me uneasy in my mind. I have an underlying uneasiness that the minister proposes to hold up proclamation because he is finally afraid to implement the purposes of this bill. Maybe he has received some advice from the cabinet that we should not go ahead with these measures, in which case we are now wasting our time. We should know now that when this bill is passed it will go immediately to that other place, where I hope it will be given long, serious and sober thought. Perhaps they will throw it out.

We should have proclamation at the earliest possible time following passage of the bill. We do not want any hidden idea that the minister is getting advice from down the line somewhere regarding possible changes. Regulations can only be made according to the bill as passed by this house, and the bill as passed by this house will be the bill finally proclaimed. Why should we wait for months?

I read over General Allard's evidence, and assure you that he said it would take some time before the bill would be proclaimed and that when he was good and ready he would tell the minister to proclaim it. That is in the evidence and I heard him say it. I wondered about it at the time. It seems to me that withholding proclamation after passing the bill for any purpose whatever will raise the speculation that something else will be slipped in, in some way or another.

I am very clear as to what the minister has said, but surely we cannot hold off proclamation after passing the bill. To do so would be completely and utterly wrong and would leave a feeling in the minds of all members of the house that there is something devious going on. The minister gave one example of why proclamation could be withheld, but surely that related merely to a departmental matter. How can they go ahead and implement these measures if the bill is not promulgated? These people know it will be promulgated unless the government is defeated in the meantime. That might change the whole pattern.

In any event the armed forces will be left in doubt about the whole matter until proclamation. Whether that takes four months or four years does not make much difference if these measures are to be implemented on a piecemeal basis, but this will leave an uneasiness in the minds of many people, and this uneasiness will find its way to service personnel. This in turn will have an effect on the morale of our servicemen. Surely the minister must realize that.

Mr. Hellyer: We shall keep in mind the advice of the hon. gentleman to the effect the bill should be proclaimed as expeditiously as reasonably possible after passage by parliament.

Mr. Churchill: It should be withdrawn now.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): After listening to what the minister has said about delaying proclamation I cannot help but say that this sounds like someone getting married six months after a child has been born. I do not need to tell you what kind of a child that is in my opinion.

Mr. Pugh: They do not proclaim it very loudly at that time.

Mr. Hellyer: It is like getting a licence before getting married.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have not spoken so far on this bill although I have intended to do so for some months. So far as I am personally concerned this is the time to speak. Whether the proposal suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should be considered over the week end—and that is another matter—it is at this time I feel I should speak on the bill. If the hon. member's proposal was accepted we would to a certain extent be anticipating the prerogative of Mr. Speaker to allow two days for the proposal of amendments under the new procedures, but I think the suggestion is worthy of consideration.

Many hon. members have said they had not intended to speak during this debate but have done so because of the arrogance of the minister and the lack of information. I have always felt that the part of this bill which abolishes the navy is shocking. For many months I have felt that I must say something in this regard. The traditions and the separate identity of the navy are very important. On many occasions I have risen in my place and said that I for one have been alarmed at the lack of attention given to the sea and its importance to this country which perhaps has the longest coast line in the world. This is a nation of landlubbers. Instead of being proud of the traditions of the sea and bringing up our young people accordingly, we forget about it.

By passing this bill we will completely wipe out the navy. That is a retrograde step, and as one who has been kicking around the waterfront for many years, and who was privileged to sail from the rugged shores of Canada and safely return, I am alarmed. I think this step will set us back many years.

The tradition of the navy is very interesting. I wonder what will happen to all those posters that one recalls in a nostalgic way which suggested to our youth "Join the navy and see the world"? I suppose the old slogan that a sailor has a girl in every port will no longer be of any value. I do not know what the girls will do or whether they are concerned, but that has always been part of the adventure of joining the navy. That idea will be completely forgotten as part of our Canadian way of life. I have very carefully read the testimony and the speeches pertaining to the navy, and I find they have been mostly one-sided. No answers were given in respect of the pride of separate identity. Our youth will no longer have the opportunity of feeling that pride.

If one needed an excuse to take part in this debate the intervention by the Minister of Transport last Friday is excuse enough. The hon. member for Grenville-Dundas has referred to one or two quotations from the speech of the Minister of Transport. I am comforted by the fact that in her excellent address she used them to even greater advantage than I might have done, Mr. Chairman. I was amazed to sit in my place and listen to the Minister of Transport refer, as he always does, to what went on in the minds of the members of the cabinet and other members on the government side regarding this abolition bill. Why a minister from Newfoundland should speak in such gloating terms about doing away with the navy is beyond my comprehension. Perhaps that is the reason he was sent up north this week.

The minister has had many troubles in his department with respect to navigation on the St. Lawrence. The Registrar General was in the chamber a moment ago following the debate. I would have liked to hear him express his opinions on this matter. We all know the reason for not having Canadian navigation on the St. Lawrence river. It is because we do not have qualified seamen here. Seamen of this type are not trained in Canada. We have to go to the United Kingdom for most of our pilots. Our young fellows do not follow the sea.

Many measures have been taken by the Department of Transport to try to interest our youth in this career. We have a coast guard training school. Its members are in naval uniform. We are trying to build up a pride of service there. If this bill goes through where will Canada stand as far as our navy is concerned? We will have coast guard officers and ferry boat captains. Won't that be nice when we meet the nations of the world at naval meetings? I recall nostalgically the large convoy meetings that were held in Halifax and Norfolk during the last war, when the various ships and navies came into port. It was a sight to see them all in their naval uniforms receiving orders for the convoys that were the lifeblood of the troops and the people in Europe. Will it not be ridiculous if we have another war and hundreds of naval officers are gathered in a room planning the convoys and the Canadians are sitting there in their jolly green jumpers? It is too ridiculous, in my opinion, to even talk about.

The remarks of hon. members opposite, and particularly those of the Minister of Transport, show what little consideration was given in cabinet to this matter. I searched the record vainly for answers to the questions we have asked. I searched for answers to the questions we have raised about naval tradition, particularly in the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.), a distinguished naval officer. We have asked why morale is reduced, recruiting so difficult, and our young people are leaving the service. The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) and the Minister of Transport dragged in everything they could about the swingers, Marshall McLuhan and other things.

I have mentioned the naval record of the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.), and I wish to pay tribute to the admirals who courageously came forward and were criticized by many hon. members for stating their opinions. I have read the testimony of Admirals Landymore and Rayner. Everybody in Canada, regardless of the outcome of this debate, owes them a debt of gratitude for putting their case forward.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I can say this from a very unprejudiced standpoint, because I am one person in this chamber who was as far removed from admirals as anybody could possibly have been during the last war. In fact my only contact with an admiral was in a certain port where I helped carry a case of rum ashore from our merchant navy ship for some rear admiral.

Mr. Churchill: Was the case full when it was delivered?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I suppose that is another tradition that will be lost. I imagine the minister will wipe out that tradition, too, and will try to prevent anybody who goes to sea from drinking rum.

Mr. Hellyer: The case for the admiral or the tot for the crew?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I pay tribute to these admirals for expressing their views in a straightforward way. I have looked through the record of this debate for answers from the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.), the chairman of the committee, the Minister of Transport and others who have spoken on that side of the house, to the questions that have been raised. One remark by the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) struck me as needing further explanation, though I appreciate that he did not put it forward in too serious a way. He said that if the navy on the east coast was not able to do the job, then the west coast could take over. This burns me up. There are many good sailors on the east and west coasts and they were interchangeable during the war, but Halifax was the only city in Canada that really felt the brunt of the war. Those in Halifax knew the battle of the Atlantic. They knew what it was to lose sons, fathers and brothers.

I can pay tribute to Halifax because I am not from that city. We in Saint John rival Halifax, but that was the only Canadian city to really feel the effects of the war. I think this is why tradition dies hard down there, and we should take note of their feelings in this matter. I say to the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) that the people in this area have experienced the hardships of war and we should pay attention to their feelings. Not only will they be hard hit when the navy is abolished, but it will cut into their whole way of life and decrease to a sad extent the interest of those who go to sea.

I wish to make a personal remark here because many of us who were in the services during the second world war—I do not believe for one minute in trading war records—did not end up doing the jobs we wanted to do. The second world war was very different from the first in this respect. In the second world war we dreamed of being Spitfire pilots and leading commando raids, but this was not possible for all of us. This was the situation of about 90 per cent of those who served in the second world war. In the first world war you fought in trenches, and that was it; it was simple. You might not have lasted long, but there it was.

The second world war was global. We had different responsibilities, and many of us were frustrated by what we were doing and were perhaps not happy about it. I for one have always felt that although many Canadians made just as great a contribution as anyone else, they would have been happier with a little more glory and glamour. It could be the case that the minister, in becoming mixed up in this business, is carrying over a frustration from some of the things that did not turn out the way he wanted in so far as his own personal career was concerned; and I say that without any animosity.

I have read the record of this debate to try to find the reason behind this proposal. I have tried to find where the unification idea came from. The other day somebody told me that when he was at a defence college they used to throw this out as an exercise when you first arrived. They said "Go and write an article on unification", as though it was a big joke and something very hypothetical. Is this where it came from? Did some junior officer at defence college write a thesis on unification, and was it picked up? Did the idea come from this unknown wing commander who hovers around this chamber on cloud nine? Who conceived this idea? We do not know where it came from.

We have not even heard from anybody who supports it. There must be some retired officer in this country who could come forward and support it. I have looked for such support and for the answers to the questions we have raised. I have looked to the navy for support for this proposal. I read the debate on the contention put forward by Admiral Rayner, and I compliment him for putting it forward. I was amazed to find this answer given by Admiral Rayner, as reported at page 2022 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 31 of the committee, and I presume it is true because it was not challenged. This is an insight into the thinking of the minister:

> Mr. Rayner: I think the uncertainty is caused in large measure by changes in plans. To give you an example of what I mean, in the spring of 1964—in April—the Minister of National Defence went to Esquimalt and talked to the sailors there. He was questioned on interchangeability.
> He explained that he did not see why an army cook could not cook just as well at sea as he could ashore; and similarly, with a radar technician, he did not see why any air force radar technician could not serve just as well at sea in a ship as he could on an R.C.A.F. station.

• (12:50 p.m.)

Everyone knows that a cook aboard a ship is important when sailors have to be at sea for three months or more. I admit that one could recruit a cook from the shore and put him on a ship, but he would not last very long, and that is why cooks have been dumped overboard late at night. Another question was put to Admiral Rayner concerning the uniform. In answer he quoted the minister as follows:

> Well, take the case of the Bonaventure, for example. When you have soldiers and airmen and sailors all on the Bonaventure and have them all falling in in these different uniforms—

Does the minister mean he is going to put the three services on the decks of the Bonaventure, if we ever do get the bloody ship fixed, and have them running around there? What is going on in the mind of the minister is fantastic. I suppose this is the reason he wants the three services in the same uniform.

The navy is a very special service. It is a service which demands high quality and high standards. It is the one above other services which has a definite role to play. Yet the navy is the first to get the axe. Those of us who went to sea—and I for one have never felt that the sea got me—have recognized that one must have special attributes to join the navy.

Admiral Landymore, in his brief on the navy's place in unification dated February 1966, pointed out in admirable fashion that, first of all, a young man going to sea must be a tradesman as well as a sailor. I do not know which qualification he puts first; they are interchangeable. A sailor has one particular job to do aboard a ship, but he has to learn many other duties. I know this is why we have had difficulties in building up a merchant navy in Canada. We are a very affluent country and our sailors are reluctant to undertake the hardships at sea without receiving wages comparable to those of their fellow workers on land. This makes it more difficult to interest men in a merchant seaman's career.

Admiral Landymore in his brief remarked on the extra hardships imposed on sailors because of their long absences from home. In this regard they are unlike other members of the service. This is particularly true in peacetime when they are away from their families, and that is an important point in today's modern society. Sometimes they are away for long periods of time. For this reason among others there is a lower re-engagement rate for those in the navy. The navy has a hard time to hold them in the service.

The third point Admiral Landymore made, and which I think is of great significance, refers to the separate identity and esprit de corps which are particularly necessary aboard a ship. The best sailors are those who possess this spirit. The same applies to a football team, and we dress a football team in a special uniform so as to build up the necessary esprit de corps. The leaders of the teams are those who have the most spirit and who take the teams and their colours seriously. Yet it is the best men, the ones who want the traditions of the silent service to be maintained, who will be the first to go under the plan proposed by the minister. They will be disappointed and will leave the service.

On page 4 of his brief Admiral Landymore said:

> The man we want is one who under no circumstances will let his ship down, who is proud of his uniform, who does his job to the best of his ability regardless of how long it takes him to do it, and who is ready to die if need be, to prove he is better than his enemies.

In closing I ask again the question, who is the power behind this unification program? Where did the idea come from? Did it come from the unknown wing commander? What is his experience? We know the experience of the minister and I have suggested, I hope not unfairly, that perhaps what motivated the minister was a touch of frustration during the second world war. Is the minister saying that he and this unknown wing commander have more knowledge than the 80 officers who were retired or have resigned? This is the conclusion one must reach. We did not hear an answer from the Minister of Transport, nor did we hear an answer from the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.), however distinguished a war record he may have.

My final plea is to ask the minister not to rush this program of unification. The minister was in the house, as I was, when the defence production bill was being debated. I am not harking back to the pipe line issue, which is another story, but the minister will recall the defence production legislation brought forward by the late Mr. Howe, who asked for blanket authority. Some of us took an interest in this, particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. Why did Mr. St. Laurent, the prime minister of the day, send the late Mr. Howe on a fishing trip during which time he changed some of the key clauses in the bill?

This might be a way out; but no, this is an action of an arrogant government. Introducing a common uniform will not bring about an economy. There is no rhyme nor reason in the loss of identity of the services. I like the comparison of this government with its prime minister to a crew, adrift 40 miles out at sea, and the prime minister saying "Untie the ship". I think this is an excellent naval example describing what is happening here.

The Chairman: Order, please. It being one o'clock, and pursuant to an order of the house made on Thursday April 6, this sitting stands suspended for one hour. The committee will resume at two o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I believe I have a minute or two left. I want to put on the record one of the reasons for my intervention in this debate. Before I do so, I want to tell the minister that my remarks about landlubber cooks in the navy should not be misinterpreted. My colleagues wish me to say that they hope anything I said will not affect recruiting of cooks for the navy in the future.

I have a copy of a telegram sent to the Prime Minister by the Naval Officers Association of New Brunswick and I should like to read it into the record:

> The Naval Officers Association of New Brunswick at annual meeting in Saint John April 7, 1967 unanimously agree that while we wholeheartedly approve of integration at the command level, for logistic support, in administration and of medical services, we abhor the thought of total unification of the armed forces.
> We feel that the arguments put forward opposing unification as expressed before the House of Commons defence committee far outweigh the ideals as put forward by the defence minister. We concur and fully endorse the recent statement of Lord Louis Mountbatten and urgently request you and your ministers to take appropriate steps to ensure that the three services retain their individual identities which we sincerely believe is vitally essential to the morale of our armed forces.
> Naval Officers Association of New Brunswick

This telegram speaks for itself, Mr. Chairman. I hope the minister will take note of this telegram from men who probably know a lot more about this problem than the minister and I. I have made my plea and I hope the minister will take full cognizance of it. He has made exceptions already in the case of the Scottish regiments which can retain their kilts and in the case of the French through his offer to retain the Royal 22nd Regiment.

Mr. Hellyer: I am sure my hon. friend would not want to create an impression by that remark which he might have created inadvertently. The exception in so far as the regimental system is concerned is a commitment that I made three years ago and has nothing to do with English speaking or French speaking people or the Royal 22nd specifically.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I thank the minister for his refinement of that statement. The fact, is, however, that concessions have been made to certain groups. As one who has always thought, with some justification, that we have to interest our young people in the great sea traditions of this nation, I humbly ask the minister now to at least give the sailors their distinctive uniforms.

Mr. Loiselle: When the previous speaker commenced his remarks, Mr. Chairman, he said he was intervening in this debate because of the arrogance of the minister. I am intervening in the debate for the same reason but because of the arrogance of the members of the opposition. They are doing their utmost to delay the passage of this bill, and that is my reason for taking part in the debate.

[Translation]

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, as Canada is becoming increasingly aware of the role it can play on the international scene, it will be able to perform that role even more effectively.

Indeed, our country is undergoing deep changes at present and thanks to its dynamism and its vitality, it is now reflecting in foreign countries a favourable and influential image.

Canadians are proud to note the increasingly important position their country is occupying within the United Nations, and they are also proud when they realize that Canada is providing developing countries not only with financial assistance, but also all kinds of assistance in every field, with the help of its experts, which gives our country a sense of leadership and dynamism.

Bill No. C-243, which we are still studying today, deals with the proposed unification of the Canadian armed forces. Therefore, this intention on the part of Canada is no secret. Some people, afraid of the decision we are about to make in this respect, are fighting it desperately. They are against the new plan. However, I must tell them that a number of experts in this field have pointed out to us in various ways the importance of unification and of certain legislative and national values implied in the concept.

I should like to make some comments on Personnel and Careers in the Canadian armed forces. First of all, I should like to read a statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) in answer to certain assertions made by some of the witnesses who appeared before the committee on national defence. They claimed that integration and unification would turn the members of our armed forces into jacks of all trades. Then on December 7, 1966 the minister said:

> The combat units will retain their identity, and their specialized functions and training. It is important to state—> —that it is not and never has been any part of the planning associated with unification to convert our servicemen to "jacks-of-all-trades". An infantry soldier will not be asked to do the job of a sailor in a fighting ship; a sailor will not be asked to fight in an infantry platoon; and a fighter pilot will not be required to drive a tank.

—continues the Minister of National Defence—

I agree with the minister whole-heartedly. Besides, is it not true that those who put this argument forward seem to ignore the following fact: All the members of a defence force must acquire a certain basic training and discipline, although each service must play its proper role.

I must also point out that, in considering this matter more closely, I based my opinion on the very evidence given by qualified people responsible for setting up and carrying out the said Personnel and Careers plan. It is all there in black and white and references are available for those who might have some doubts.

As announced last fall, the major interest of career men as far as prospective promotions are concerned is based on the new structures. These measures, however, constitute a serious problem in the sense that they bring about the dearth of subjects, that is, there were 346 subjects and there are now only 97. The chief of personnel, Air Marshal Reyno testifying before the national defence committee on February 9 said as reported on page 597 of the proceedings:

I should add that this reduction has been achieved with remarkably few complaints, and no loss of efficiency, and will in time produce considerable economy through consolidation of training.

The many trades involving few people have been merged into 97 trades involving larger numbers. The restrictive rank structure of the smaller group has been eliminated by the personnel concerned having the opportunity to compete for promotion in the larger group. In doing this we have eliminated a number of minor trades which were unattractive as career prospects.

Mr. Chairman, this is the opinion of an expert who is currently member of the general staff and who would be responsible for the success of integration and unification.

This new structure required an increase of 14 per cent in pay and this has been the starting point of the first revision in pay in 20 years. And it is that review, postponed for such a long time, which undoubtedly put the positions of the members of the armed forces on the same level as civilian positions in industry. Of course, that was only the beginning of the readjustment. Several other things, beneficial to servicemen's families, as, for instance, certain allowances, etc. clearly indicate all the efforts made to protect the rights of these people and their families. Some persons asserted that all those steps could have been taken without resorting to unification. But I should like to point out that the program is still incomplete. It cannot be denied that it was that reorganization which revealed all those shortcomings and it was that progressive spirit, put in concrete form by unification, which brought forth the solution of those difficulties which were due to incompleteness.

[Mr. Loiselle.]

After reading once again Marshal Reyno's brief, we notice that he deals accurately with the conditions and qualifications necessary to have armed forces made up of men interested in a promising career. And he sees in them individuals able to adjust to new conditions.

Moreover, that reorganization attracts individuals able to adjust to these new conditions. Reclassification will add to the flexibility of the personnel. It will be an organization able to compete with industry in the matter of manpower, because its leaders will be able to initiate its members in various jobs so that they in turn, can become leaders, able to take over.

We can but approve the tremendous amount of work that has been done and applied by the new organization.

Air Marshal Reyno summarized his testimony by saying, as reported on page 605 of proceedings No. 16, justifying every opinion expressed before the national defence committee—and this confirms that those responsible for carrying out unification are aware of their problems—

Finally, I would like to say that we are extremely conscious that personnel constitute our single greatest asset and that is worth repeating and also that we would fail in our task if we did not ensure that the complete management system would respond to the needs of the commanders as users of the manpower in both peace and war.

I would point out again that the development of our structure and the management organization is the result of continuous consultation with our field commanders and senior managers and I am confident that the system I have outlined will meet the requirement.

Mr. Chairman, if I quote some sentences, some excerpts from our experts currently responsible for the application of such integration and unification, it is to counterbalance, as I said at the beginning, the other outside experts who claim that unification and integration will not bring about the hoped for results.

If we understand the main objective of the personnel and careers program within a unified defence force, we must recognize, in view of the overall plan, that we can no longer delay unification which will achieve good results, both economically and administratively. I am sure that those who oppose it, for patriotic reasons which must, however, be admired, will adapt themselves and will substitute to the traditional customs the necessities of the role Canada must play in the council of nations.

Even Air Marshal Sharp, vice commander of defence command, favours the new organization of the personnel and careers program. In his evidence before the defence committee, he singled out seven reasons which justify the move. Those reasons can be found on page 460 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence for February 7, 1967, and here is the table set up by Mr. Sharp:

1. An occupation which is clearly worthwhile.
2. Work which challenges the capabilities of the individual.
3. Work which employs up-to-date methods and equipment.
4. Work in an atmosphere or environment which accepts the change necessary to keep up with advances in science; an environment which is recognized as a leader in the field.
5. Advancement based on ability, and at a reasonable rate.
6. Reasonable financial and other compensations.
7. Recognition by the public and friends that the individual's work is demanding.

And, by the way to prove the measure of success which was achieved, he added:

• (2:20 p.m.)

Full implementation of the policy contained in the white paper will go a long way to providing these necessary conditions.

The important thing in considering this matter, and I hope everyone has now realized it, is that there is no question at all of turning members of the armed forces into jacks of all trades, as was suggested by some witnesses before the committee. I mentioned the fact at the beginning of my remarks when I referred to this statement of the minister in his speech to the house on December 7 last. I am also gratified to note that staff officers have repeated this assurance during the sittings of the defence committee.

I am positive, Mr. Chairman, that we have recognized, up to now, that any person who joins the armed forces has great and new opportunities to make quite a promising career. Those same recruits will have the advantage, with that new organization, to go ahead in a force which will facilitate their promotion according to their ability and their potential and not simply on seniority. The military candidate has a greater realization of the special interest taken by the Department of National Defence in his possibilities and his welfare, contrary to what some have attempted to make us believe. In fact, that interest has already been shown by the new structures, a salary increase, an allowance increase and the undertaking of a planned career. Therefore, he will rightly be proud to represent Canada when putting on the new proposed uniform and he will be happy to wear it.

The integration and unification project is not new; for many years, prominent people, civilians as well as military men, have considered it. Within the Canadian forces, and even at the Liberal national convention in January 1958, when the Liberal party was in opposition, the project was revived and this can be seen from the minutes of that convention as shown on page 223 of the proceedings.

Since the coming into power of the Liberal party in 1963, it has been the first task to which the Minister of National Defence has set himself. As early as March 1964, the white paper on defence was published and since then integration has been emphasized, the unification stage being the next problem which the defence staff will tackle.

Since the publication of that white paper, that is three years ago, the matter has been constantly raised in the House of Commons and it has made the headlines not only in the press, but also on television and radio. Finally, all sources of information have stopped reporting the views of experts and so-called experts on the matter.

For the past three years, the standing committee on defence has been sitting and hearing witnesses, not to mention that certain politicians kept debating the matter and that the news media did not fail to talk about it.

We can very frankly say that the opponents of the principle of the bill were given ample opportunities to present their views.

The defence committee, which sat from February 7 until March 21, held 55 meetings and heard more than 30 witnesses. As a member of this committee, I can tell the members of this house that the same questions were duly put to each witness. In short, I believe that we have debated this subject long enough for the past three years, that the house has now reached the last stage of discussion on this bill, and that the opposition would be acting in bad faith if it attempted once again to make the headlines as we have known it to do during the flag debate.

In all that time, opposition members have had the privilege, and they used it, to criticize the project. You will agree with me that, in three years, everything that could be said was said long ago. But there is a constant repetition of what has already been said.

As a party in opposition, they have done their duty to the people, and therefore a decision must be made. Whether they accept the principle or vote against the legislation is their privilege. They must go one way or the other, and not indulge in endless debate.

I fully realize, Mr. Chairman, that I am not an expert on military matters and yet, as I read the proceedings of the defence committee—of which I am a member—what struck me was the appropriateness of the action taken for the realization and success of the amalgamation of our three armed forces into a single Canadian force.

If we want to define the word "unification" and make its meaning known, I wonder why we are taking so long to reach a decision on that matter. Let us think of the very aim of that meaning and we have in fact unification. That very meaning of the combat forces differs not in their aims and objectives but rather because of their means and tactics, in short because of their instruments.

Moreover, in view of the vastness of the country in which the three defence services operate, would not unification help to smooth out the difficulties which arise due to the lack of communications between headquarters and the field services?

Other countries, which are not faced with such a widespread territory, have not felt the same problem. After weighting all the points raised here, I think that a decision must be reached for unification.

Before concluding my observations, Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to quote, in summary, the concept of the commander in chief of the Canadian forces, General Allard, at the end of his brief submitted to the committee on national defence. Here is the opinion of the commander in chief of the Canadian forces, whose task it will be to bring into being such a unification, in which he believes whole-heartedly, as can be seen on page 1770 of the minutes and proceedings No. 27. Here is what he said, and I quote:

> In summary, then, gentlemen, the situation is this: The idea of a single force, in a single, distinctively Canadian uniform, working, living, training, and—most important—thinking together as one entity is an exciting and challenging idea. After all it is designed to meet the problems of a modern world—a scientific world—which is growing away beyond the barriers of the past at a speed that cannot stand the slow pace of yesterday. For all this, you know that we do not intend to proceed in haste—I said it was a starting point—but rather in a carefully planned manner which will extend over a number of years. All that is required now is the authority to do so.

Mr. Chairman, before resuming my seat, I appeal for the last time to the hon. members opposing Bill No. C-243 to grant the general, the members of our staff, this permission, this right to pursue the unification of our forces and if, by any chance, it should prove unsuccessful, which I do not believe, the opposition members would then be free to attack the government and at that time, they would be acting in good faith.

[Mr. Loiselle.]

[English]

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, I believe it is customary for anybody embarking on a discussion of matters military to try to establish his credentials. In my case I have none. I am certainly a layman, not an expert. However, I confess that as a civilian I volunteered my services to the army and served therein, volunteered my services to the R.C.A.F. and served therein, and got out as fast as I could when the war was over. I have served in the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Royal Air Force, and under an American general, British officers and Canadian officers. I believe my experiences with senior officers have been the same as 99 per cent of the troops —most unhappy ones. Like many serving personnel I could never tell for certain whether I was going to be courtmartialled or praised. So with this limited background I have naturally refrained from debating this subject.

On the other hand, it is true that I did serve in a theatre of war where it was very hard to distinguish the services. Even though I was nominally in the Royal Canadian Air Force, at the time I wore a green uniform in the jungles of Burma I found it was just as smelly, dirty and dilapidated looking as the battledress I wore in the army and the dress uniform I sometimes wore in the air force. I do not think that is the key issue, and if I pose today as one giving advice to the minister it is as one who is trying to find an answer from the point of view of a layman trying to make the right decision.

This bill has a finality about it that makes it imperative that we give it more than the casual type of attention that we give to bills that can be amended from year to year as more experience is gained. I have been watching this debate. I think the position of the people of Canada was well put last autumn in a Globe and Mail editorial dated November 7 which said:

> There must be a most thorough public discussion of where the Canadian forces reorganization act is leading us. Mr. Hellyer must be made to show the urgent and valid reasons for undertaking the changes he has proposed or forced to admit that there are none.

That puts the matter into a simple sentence. Has this information been made available to the House of Commons and to the public?

One of the subjects that was debated at length in the defence committee and the committee of the whole was the morale of the armed forces. Was recruiting falling off, was recruiting holding steady? I have looked at the evidence on both sides and so far as I am concerned it is very difficult to decide. When you look at one set of figures it looks like there has been a serious falling off in the totals. Yet the minister and his staff have done their best to show that there has not been a falling off. But this misses the point I am coming to. On the question of recruiting there is no clear evidence.

The question of morale has been dealt with by men who have had experience in all branches of the services and they have emphasized that if we are going to have a defence force morale is the key to it. Canadians are a type of people much different from the British. We are certainly much different from the Americans. We tend to lack the discipline of the many centuries of military service which the English have. We tend to lack, do lack, and in fact are rather proud that we lack the statistical approach, the computer approach to manpower in our services that the Americans seem to have. We are different. I suggest that one cannot ignore the very sincere and heartfelt observations made by men in this house with much vaster military experience than I have, men who certainly climbed to higher ranks than I was able to achieve. They know the necessity of morale. I cannot deal with it. All I know is that the people do not know who has won the debate as to recruiting.

The second question which the layman is asking all across Canada is, will this bill save him, the taxpayer of Canada, money so that he can put that money into things desperately wanted by the Canadian people? I would say that in the beginning, eight months ago, the vast majority of laymen across the country were, like myself, in support of unification because they believed that it would save money. On the surface unification into one force instead of having three or more forces seemed to be the answer to a desperate need of our people.

The majority of our people do not object to the taxes which are necessary to maintain our military posture but they do wonder whether they are getting the maximum results for their money when there are so many other things they want just as desperately. On this second issue, the saving of money, I have read the evidence on both sides and on the figures it looks like we are not saving money. The minister answers by saying that if we take the real value of money today we are saving or are roughly holding our own. But once again that is not clear to the public and so there is a certain amount of confusion.

In the last two or three days another issue has arisen, and this is the question of parliament itself. Ordinarily in our concept of government when we deal with a matter that requires expert advice we use the technique of the committee to draw from the experts answers to the questions which are in our minds.

The vast majority of the evidence given to the defence committee indicated that we should go slow, and take three to five years to decide on the question of unification. The military experts say, "Give us time to put integration into effect." I am assuming that we are all in favour of integration. If we believe in the parliamentary system we must consider the advice of these experts to the effect that we should take time on this very small item which is so close to the emotions and the hearts of the serving personnel, because to them matters such as the uniform and one service are desperately serious, something which I find it hard to understand. To a layman these are small points, but all the experts are asking is that the minister go slow.

Therefore I was very pleased today to detect what I thought was evidence of a trend toward moderation. We heard the minister say he would be willing to listen to proposals made on this side of the chamber for some sort of understanding over the week end. Therefore my next remarks are going to be directed toward some form of compromise proposal that will not only permit parliament to work effectively but will also move toward a more rational and responsible type of action.

Speaking now of the field in which I have some knowledge and dealing with the perspective of this bill and the over-all responsibilities of government, what do I see? First of all, military policy is not an end in itself. It is simply the operational arm of a policy of a government. The policies of the government in matters foreign and in matters economic must be clear to us in the house so that we may understand that in the bill which deals with the operational arm, the military, designed to carry out one component part of government policies, there is coherence and there is logic.

At the present time and going back for many years Canada, not just under this government alone, has had no clearly delineated foreign policy. No government has directed its attention to what role this country, with 20 million people now and unlimited resources, is going to play in the future defence not only of this continent but in peacemaking all over the world and in space as well. We lack a clearly defined foreign policy which would enable us to know what type of military posture we must assume in order to carry out in our sphere of activity the foreign policy of our country.

To be more specific, how can parliament decide whether this bill is the correct and only course we should follow when we have had in the committee evidence to the effect that the unified force concept does not meet all the responsibilities which have been partially accepted by governments of the past and the present? For example, the United Nations is an organization which we have supported and still support. It was originally set up to include a United Nations force. That never came into being because of the veto power in the Security Council. In the last two or three years there have been proposals that smaller nations of some strength, which are not leaders in the major power struggle between the large nations, should have forces which could act in the policing role if the United Nations so requests. This is a concept which I believe members of all parties support. According to the evidence this type of unified force might be able to meet that function of a military posture.

Second, there is NATO. Is there any member of this house or any opinion leader in this country who does not know that the whole purpose and method of operation of NATO must be redefined? The need to redefine NATO both in the military and economic spheres has been clear for many years. The failure on the part of the members of NATO to define clearly for the next 10 or 15 years the purpose of NATO, in view of the new technology in the military field, makes it almost impossible for members of this house to make a learned and responsible decision in respect of this bill. We cannot do this until we know what our responsibilities in NATO will be.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

The evidence given by the experts who appeared before the committee on national defence was that a unified force would not meet our present responsibilities to NATO. The fact that we do not have a 10 or 15 year projection of what our various responsibilities will be under NATO certainly adds weight to the view expressed by the experts that we should not rush into the unification concept and then take three to five years in bringing about a result which could be final and fatal.

Third, under NORAD we have responsibility under a treaty with the United States for the defence of the North American continent. Surely any person who has looked into the situation in respect of NORAD knows that this organization must be redefined in view of the new weapons which have come into technical use in the past few years. Once again we would be able to perform our function in this house in a much more responsible manner if we had a clearcut statement concerning the role of NORAD not only in the ballistic and antiballistic field but also in respect of the seacoast and the defence of North America.

The fourth point, which deeply concerns the members from the maritimes, is the question of the anti-submarine role allocated to Canada in the North Atlantic. Is this role to be discarded? We do not know. We are told it is still one of our responsibilities. Yet the experts tell us that under the unified force concept we cannot carry out this role. This is the type of evidence we have before us. Once again, instead of giving hints that we are going to withdraw and reduce our strength on the sea I think any responsible government, before asking us to rush into unification which could be so fateful, should give us a clearcut statement on this point.

Finally, and most important, is the matter of the defence of Canada itself. I believe there is a general hope that war never will come to the shores of the western continents of South and North America. However, I believe it is our responsibility to make plans to be able to defend our continent by land, by sea and by air. What is the capacity, what is the effectiveness of a unified force in Canada when working with a military force to the south and sharing the responsibility of carrying out this most vital of all the defence postures which have to be assumed in peacetime by Canada?

I believe the evidence here is most disturbing. It would seem to indicate that the unification concept will not work in any modern concept of a joint defence of Canada which means, in truth, a joint defence of the continent. Therefore, since we do not know how this will be done under the unification concept, what is my proposal?

I suggested that I thought I had detected an air of moderation on both sides of the house earlier in the debate today. One idea which recommends itself to me is the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. He put forward the simple proposal that we adjourn this debate and then bring the matter up again at the next session when a little more would be known about the plans of the defence department. I would like to modify this proposal, if I may, for a slightly different reason than was advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

I believe there is general agreement in Canada that all the provisions of this bill must be debated with some responsibility by the members of this house. I suggest that a precedent has been set in this parliament during this session. We had before us a very difficult bill which was presented to this house last September concerning the national transportation commission. It had been introduced originally in 1964 and was so unacceptable that the government withdrew it. In 1966 they brought in a new bill on which they had worked for two years. It was a much better bill. Even though it was a much better bill, in the standing committee and in the committee of the whole house it was amended almost 80 times. On that occasion we had the Minister of Transport working with those of us in the opposition not only on the floor of the house but in the committee, outside the house, and in corridor sessions. Some of our amendments were accepted without debate and others were fought by the minister. Parliament then was at its best when members of all parties worked together to achieve, in respect of a matter which had tremendous implications for the transportation system of Canada, the best bill we could provide.

The key to the success in respect of that bill was the fact that the minister knew there were two or three items which were extremely controversial, just as we have two or three items in the 61 clauses of the bill we are now debating which are deeply controversial. For the sake of common sense and logic I would ask the minister to consider over the week end letting these two or three controversial clauses stand.

Mr. Hellyer: Which ones?

Mr. Hamilton: I am not an authority on this bill but I would certainly suggest that clauses 2 and 6 should be put over. However, I would ask that this matter be discussed with spokesmen on this side of the house because I am not an authority on the bill. I am sure the chairman of the defence committee will be glad to discuss it with the minister. If we could move into a consideration of other clauses of this bill in the way the people of this country expect I think we would clear up some of the controversial points that are bothering us. It is my hope that the minister will accept my main proposal in good faith. Several weeks ago we received a pleasant surprise. An article appeared on April 4 in the Toronto Globe and Mail headed "Hellyer Says Bill Statement Of Intent", "Instant Unification Is Ruled Out". In the body of the article the following is stated:

• (2:50 p.m.)

Approval of the bill to unify the forces will not mean instant amalgamation of the navy, the army and the air force, Defence Minister Paul Hellyer assured the commons yesterday.

"It will be a statement of intention that the ultimate goal is a single service", he explained. "This must be known so that planning can proceed on an orderly basis."

I took from that statement there was an understanding in the minister's mind that it would take some time to implement this measure and therefore there would not be immediate unification. The minister confirms that understanding now by nodding his head.

Preceding that article another article appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on March 29 in respect of what the Prime Minister stated. This article states in part:

Prime Minister may exercise his influence to delay the implementation of the defence unification bill after it is passed.

Later in the article the following is stated:

—an effort on his part to see that defence minister Hellyer does not attempt to implement the unification legislation right away.

That article appeared about two and a half weeks ago and it gave a breath of hope that some statesmanship would emerge in this debate. I hope the minister will accept the suggestion that members on this side of the house are quite sincere in their concern about this matter and the people generally are concerned because they have yet to receive satisfactory answers.

We do not wish to hold up discussion on the clauses of this bill and I think we should leave the controversial ones for later and consider the others. We should not ram the whole bill through at this time. The controversial clauses, perhaps 2, 6, and 61, which is the proclamation clause, should be deferred at this time and left to be dealt with at the next session. If the minister could bring back the drafted regulations at that time we would know what we were buying, know his plans in detail, and at that time we would be happier to deal with them.

It may be that the military experts are right that we should leave out one or two clauses of this bill and not deal with their purposes for a couple of years. However, if we knew the mechanics for unification we could then consider the body of the bill and move forward. In this way we could leave the controversial clauses until next session. In this way we could indicate to the country our desire to move forward on this bill but that we were not yet convinced of any immediate need for unification. The majority of the experts hold this view.

I am not an expert but I cannot see how a decision to put our forces into a single force and a single uniform would prevent integration. In this way I am sure we would show statesmanship on the part of this house and particularly on the part of the minister and the Prime Minister. This would be welcomed by the people of Canada and it would give the opposition a chance to show its willingness to co-operate.

Let me conclude by saying I think we are aiming at the wrong target in this debate when we aim at the minister. He has been somewhat inflexible, but I think the real target should be the lack of a foreign policy and a clear definition of what the government wishes the military to accomplish. Surely that is the root of the minister's difficulties. If he has been a little hard to get along with as an individual I suspect it is because he has been attempting to carry out an instruction he felt he was given. Now that we have received further information from the experts it would be wise on our part to put a little pressure on the Secretary of State for External Affairs to give us a clear definition on behalf of the government regarding the direction of our external affairs policy for the next 15 years. We could then define what we think our role in NATO and NORAD should be and what we should do about the anti-submarine role we are supposed to be playing. Certainly we have a right to know these things.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

What are we going to do in respect of the defence of Canada and the continent? We should have a clearcut delineation in respect of this function. We might then be able to decide what to do about this bill. As I understand the evidence of the experts, a unified force will not help us meet our commitments to NATO and NORAD and certainly not to the defence of Canada. For that reason we have a right to ask the Prime Minister of our country to give that leadership prime ministers are expected to give at times of difficulties such as we are now experiencing.

My colleague, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, reminded us this morning of the defence production bill and that Mr. Howe had lost touch with reality in that it was introduced in peacetime in 1955 rather than in a time of war as in 1945. At that time Mr. St. Laurent watched the developments and realized that the house was approaching an impasse. He took the necessary and available steps, exercised the art of getting along, and asked Mr. Howe to disappear for a few days until arrangements with the opposition to accept an amended bill could be made. In other words, he properly exercised the functions of a Prime Minister.

If the minister has been forced to accept a rigid position, and we have seen this hurt him so far as public relations in this house and across the country are concerned, perhaps the Prime Minister could move in and accept the responsibility of making those little adjustments required to make possible the efficient working of this house. Canada would be well served if we had that type of statesmanship from the Prime Minister at this time.

I know enough about government policy to realize that the government cannot come out with policies in respect of NATO and NORAD overnight, but we could have some clear definition or indication of the direction in which we think our military should move. I hope the minister will consider this suggestion over the week end. After consultation between members on all sides perhaps we could deal with the non-controversial clauses of the bill and then come to some conclusion about what to do with the controversial clauses in light of what the experts have said.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I hope the suggestions of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle will commend themselves to the minister and that there will be some compromise in our approach to this bill. In this way we could consider the bill in a more sane and sensible manner without becoming boxed into irreconcilable positions.

In my opinion the press does a disservice to this institution when it talks about this debate dragging on for nine days. After all, this bill relates very fundamentally to our defence structure. Surely it is not unreasonable to debate for nine, 10 or 20 days something that has been in existence in this country for a hundred years. We have had many longer debates in this house since I have been a member on less important matters than the reorganization of our defence forces. This bill proposes to change the entire structure of our defence forces which have been tested and tried during two world wars and the Korean war. Surely this should be considered seriously, particularly when one remembers that old Liberals of certain fame have crossed party lines by suggesting that the minister should take the pause that refreshes and look at this whole plan again.

If this debate drags on for nine days or longer, members on this side of the house are prepared to face whatever penalty or reward follows at the next election. The debate does not make startling news for the members of the press gallery. There is no scandal, no sensation, no sex. It is a debate on the very substantial topic of defence and what we are to do in this area. If unification goes through, I suggest that within five or 10 years we will have another debate in the house on this question.

Perhaps the minister should have taken the bull by the horns and we should be debating whether Canada should have any defence stance or posture. Perhaps that would be a debate the minister would like to carry on, because the ultimate conclusion of the path we are now on—we have not reached the dead end yet but we are certainly quite a way down the road—leads to a position where Canada cannot contribute anything constructive to the defences of the free world. The important question that is being asked by Canadians is, how are we to contribute to the free world with our population of 20 million and the giant to the south of us with a population of 200 million or more?

The press are doing us a real disservice when they criticize members with no military experience, of whom I am one, for participating in this debate. Hon. members are confined by the rules of debate and have spoken less than the Minister of National Defence or other ministers, the three musketeers on that side of the house, who have spoken. These members of the cabinet can speak a little longer than we on the opposition side. However, I have no qualms about participating in and making a contribution to the debate. In the last few days the debate has not gained the headlines that other topics are given in the press. I believe we are debating a matter of substance and that hon. members opposite have misjudged public opinion and the opinion of hon. members of this party who have contributed with sincerity and purpose to the debate.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I feel sorry for the minister sitting there in solitude, in a sort of stubborn isolation, supported by the 26 other members of the cabinet. The other day there was a cabinet reorganization. A couple of very bright, virile, intelligent Canadians were appointed to the cabinet. They will contribute much to this land but they have not contributed to this debate. I can understand the minister, in view of his present position, finding some solace in and relying on lyrics and poetry to help while the hours away so he will have something with which to occupy himself. He is not going to listen to what we have to say and therefore has to compose lyrics or poetry. I am not sure of his family status but in my opinion he cannot have read children's tales and those lyrics which we read in our childhood. He cannot have read the folklore that we as children used to read. I say that he cannot have read these things in view of the debate we have had in the house. The minister certainly cannot have read to his children the tale of Lady Godiva on the horse that I mentioned once before.

Hon. members opposite have taken great pride in the fact that they are blazing new trails, that the world is looking at them in splendid isolation. Lady Godiva was looked at and peered at and she was somewhat embarrassed and, I would suggest, somewhat exposed as we are going to be exposed if the plans of the minister do not succeed in detail, principle and purpose as he hopes. Lady Godiva perhaps had more on the ball because at least the horse on which she rode knew where it was going whereas frankly we are not too sure exactly where the minister is going.

This minister cannot have read "Goldilocks and the Three Bears" to his children because in the new, rewritten, revised and unrepentant edition of "Goldilocks and the Three Bears" it is "Goldilocks and the One Bear." Who cares about three? "The Pied Piper of Hamelin" must cause the Minister of National Defence some concern, because if he is not successful with regard to this measure he must ponder the fate of the many people coming behind him to the tune of the flute and falling in the "drink."

We are worried about the navy. We do not have the ships for the navy to carry out its task effectively. That must cause the minister some concern, let alone the fact that the story of the turtle and the hare and the barnacle on the shell of the turtle shows that much steadier and more worth-while progress is achieved than in the case of the flea on the behind of the rabbit. These stories illustrate that steady progress is much better in the long run than the pace exhibited by this new race of Liberals. If we look at the record, without going much further on the philosophical topic of Aesop's Fables, or Hellyer's tunes and tales, I think we should wonder where we are going in respect of this proposal. Frankly, I have not contributed to any war effort because I was too young to serve. I am not, therefore, speaking from any war experience. My only experience is that of a great many Canadians in that I was a cadet.

It has been interesting to me since this debate started months ago—not in the last nine or ten days only—to learn that the sea cadets, the air cadets and the army cadets want to know just what is going on and what is the purpose of having a separate identity for the cadets if we are not going to have a separate identity for the forces to which they eventually aspire. This has caused a great deal of confusion in the ranks of the cadets across the country. It is one question that could be easily answered, I suppose it might be said, if the cadets read the minister's statements in the house, the press releases emanating from his office and the remarks of his "Lee ward" friends because the cadets would certainly get clarification on some of these confusing points.

One reason for my entering this debate, regardless of some interest I have in it because in my riding there are defence bases, is the apparent hypocrisy in the whole attitude toward efficiency and economy if our forces are unified.

Right here in parliament we have two legislative assemblies, the Senate and the House of Commons. We have separate protective staffs for the Senate and the House of Commons, we have a separate messenger service for the Senate and the House of Commons, we have separate cleaning staffs, those ladies who clean our offices. We even have separate barber shops for those of us who are fortunate enough to have any hair to cut. If there is efficiency and economy in the concept of unification, let us have for the first time—there have been in the past so many people who have just preached the gospel—ministers who are prepared to put into effect all the changes they say they would like to make. One hon. member recently elevated to a portfolio, and a friend of mine off the floor although I have to disagree with him in this chamber, goes around making speeches and soliciting support for nefarious purposes. These people who go around the country recommending changes here and there should put their theories before cabinet and see that changes are made in government so that we may have a much more efficient system. They are not doing anything in a constructive way by just making speeches. They should see that these changes are brought about.

The minister says that the program of unification will result in efficiency and economy in our armed forces. Yet we are split right down the middle of this building because we have separate services in both houses. I believe that the cleaning ladies even order different wax with which to polish the floors and tiles of the Senate and the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, I will permit a question. Whether I can answer it is another matter.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member advocating that if this bill is put through by the government another bill should be introduced to abolish the Senate? If he is, that is a good argument for it.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I am a member of a party that has a vicarious interest in the Senate which perhaps distinguishes me from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am not debating the merits or demerits of the abolition of the Senate; I am debating the proposition of the Minister of National Defence, the Prime Minister and others in the party on that side of the chamber with regard to unification and its economy and efficiency. I am suggesting that the ministers opposite should look at our own house and instead of several ministers travelling across the country recommending tremendous reforms of parliament and everywhere else, they should see that the reforms they advocate are put into effect. In other words, they should put into deeds some of the words they are speaking. The greatest hypocrisy in this respect is the fact that the efficiency and economy of the Senate and the House of Commons are impaired because the functions in respect of each are divided as though they were east and west and would never meet. When one considers that even the wax purchased by the Senate is different from the wax purchased by the House of Commons and that the two houses even have separate post offices, then one realizes that efficiency and economy right here in the House of Commons could surely be improved under the joint direction of the chiefs of staff of the two speakers. Instead we proceed in our own merry way. Perhaps there are some hidden advantages in this practice of which I am not aware and perhaps I am not sufficiently initiated. However, what I cannot understand is that the minister, who has a lot of good qualities, is engaged in this sheer hypocrisy of announcing greater efficiency and economy in the services when right here in parliament we allow such inefficiency to exist. I think it is time for this jet age minister—

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, surely the hon. gentleman would give me credit for the following facts. The armed forces are by law within my administrative responsibility and, having discussed this proposal for a number of years, I am doing now exactly what he has suggested, attempting to implement it, to end the talking and get on with the job. In so far as this house and the Senate are concerned, they come within the jurisdiction of parliament itself. I have no more voice and no more responsibility concerning these matters than has the hon. member. I agree with him that there is room for improvements, particularly with regard to the rules of this house.

Mr. Nowlan: I am glad the minister has intervened. I will not belabour the point further. However, as we proceed with the issue of integration and unification I believe I should mention a point in which I am particularly interested. It concerns interchange or mobility. What is to stop us from applying interchange or mobility with regard to ministers of the crown? Who is to say whether the most efficient and economic way of running the government would not be to interchange clerks in the different departments of the government? A clerk in the Department of National Health and Welfare could fill a vacancy in the Department of National Revenue. In view of the amount of money which goes in and out of the Department of National Revenue, there are certainly many holes there which could be filled.

I see the Postmaster General is present in the house today. Credit can be claimed for the fact that words expressed on this side of the house have brought forth so many ministers today. There are exactly two here at the moment. I think the minister as well as the opposition can claim credit for the fact that so many ministers are present today. Who is to say, following the philosophy of the minister concerning interchange or mobility, that clerks, stenographers and in fact whole secretariats could not be interchanged from one department to another when vacancies occur? According to the computers this would be the most efficient and economical way of filling vacancies. Is this the next step in government management? Perhaps this question should be asked of the Minister of National Revenue.

But the same principle should apply to the government as to the forces, and this is certainly not the way to run the armed services. Perhaps this is why these examples are ludicrous. In spite of my limited knowledge, which I have gained through association with various armed forces personnel, I do not believe that the armed forces can be run in the same way as General Motors is. If the government is going to operate on approximately the same principles as General Motors does, then let us apply an interchange of personnel and trade employees back and forth.

The minister answered this point in a way when he spoke about being in charge of defence and about the responsibilities of the House of Commons. Frankly I must say I have tried to rationalize his arguments through the use of arguments which have been put forward on this side of the house. Yesterday one of the young members on the other side of the house made a speech. I believe it was the hon. member for Renfrew North. He spoke about his youth and about the fact that he had not been in the forces, as is true in my case. He gave examples going as far back as the Napoleonic wars and he referred to Hannibal's forces travelling across the Alps on elephants. I will not go that far back to criticize the minister's program. It is sufficient to look at the record of what the minister has said. Without getting too involved, we have only to look at what has happened in the last two or three years to find out whether there is a foundation or basis for unification and by examining how successful the minister has been in the steps he has taken. All we can see is that the steps which the minister has taken can be compared with those taken by an infant who takes one step along an uncharted road full of perils and pitfalls and ends up flat on his face.

Let us consider the compulsory retirements. I will not go into this matter too deeply because many experts have talked about it. The compulsory retirements have had a most unsettling effect on the armed forces at a time when integration was supposed to stabilize and unite them. For instance, we had the case of the 500 trained pilots. According to General Foulkes' estimate, the training of each of these pilots cost this nation $50,000 and the total cost of training the 500 pilots amounted to $250 million. Yet they were dismissed arbitrarily. Would it not have been better to have retired older pilots and given them gratuities so as to make way for younger men? I am advised that the jet pilots who serve in the armed services can expect to fly for eight to ten years before being retired to a desk job. This was certainly not a very constructive step on which we could congratulate the minister.

Then we witnessed the reflex action of the minister and his advisers who tried to counteract the drain of pilots in the air force by increasing their pay. As a result other air crew members were angered and the minister had to revise the whole pay structure. It is questionable how successful the re-engagement bonus has been. The expenditures of the Department of National Defence have gone up by $125 million. According to the return tabled on October 12, 1966, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Halifax, there were 79 premature retirements of officers of the rank of commodore and above. This figure is given at page 8561 of Hansard. If one totals the years which those men would have spent in the service of this country one finds that 59 years of experience have been lost. This has not been a very efficient action by the minister and I cannot see any economy resulting from it.

I should like to mention an interesting fact which I do not believe has appeared in the press lately. I wonder how many people realize that the turnover of what are termed fogbound generals, brainless colonels and other top armed service personnel has resulted in a decrease of only seven officers. This was the fantastic turnover of which we have heard so much. There were 79 retirements between January 1, 1965 and August 30, 1966, 59 of whom were prematurely retired for various reasons. The more the defence committee met the more disagreement there was with the policy of the Minister of National Defence. In December of 1965 there were 119 senior officers in the rank of commodore and above. As of February 28, 1967, there were 112 officers in the rank of commodore or above. How can the minister speak of economy and efficiency when this supposedly tremendous turnover has resulted in the loss of only seven officers? All the other retired officers have had to be replaced. The positions of these men who have given tremendous service to this country in two world wars have had to be filled. I was amazed when I first heard of this fact. How can one believe the minister's argument that his program will bring about greater economy and efficiency?

There is another area about which I should like to talk and it is a little parochial. One can talk grandly about strategy and tactics. I do not know what the tactics or over-all philosophy or policy of this country should be. I have some ideas and obviously the minister has some ideas. However, there is something not too many people realize, and I want to put this to the minister, in connection with the turnover. We have heard the minister stand up in the house and deny that there has been any decrease in enrolment. He has said that the enrolment curve has flattened out and the position has become stabilized.

I want to tell the minister that I have had letters from many serving officers, not colonels or commodores but flight lieutenants and petty officers. I have four or five of them in my hand now. Within the last two weeks these people have been told that they cannot get out of the service. There is no longer the problem of transferring within the services because you do not have services now. You now transfer from one environment to another. We are not a warlike country now, we are a peace keeping country. I think it was Moncel or Fleury who said that in his day, according to his terminology, peace keeping meant preventing war or fighting a war.

Today, as I said before, we do not have services or we will not have if this bill is passed. We have environments and interchange within environments. I should like the minister to stand up and deny the fact that there has been a freeze on the release of officers who under normal circumstances would be qualified to obtain their release from the service so they could go to whatever vocation or occupation they would like to follow. I will not read the names of these people because they are still serving officers. I have a letter from the wife of one of them dated March 29, 1967 in connection with his enrolment. She writes that he was told the policy would allow him release on request three years after graduation. This is not a man who has been commissioned under the R.O.T.P. plan, whose education was financed by the government and who now wants to get out early. Every one of these letters is from a man who has served his time, in all cases over three years.

There is a certain regulation—I do not know the numbers of these regulations—to the effect that in normal cases six months' notice is sufficient to allow a release.

An hon. Member: That is what the minister told us.

Mr. Nowlan: I can believe that because the hon. member always makes good sense. These men are pilots and they want to get out. They entered the service under certain conditions, namely, that they could get out on six months' notice. The wife of one of them writes she has been advised that her husband has to complete two more years of service. He has been serving for three years and has a commitment to a private firm which, of course, is jeopardized. This man is not one of those at the top; he is right in the ranks.

Another pilot writes under date of March 29, 1967 to the effect that last week officers had their release dates cancelled. Another member of the air force says that service policy resulted in a statement to the effect that all graduate pilots holding permanent commission will be retained in the service until the completion of five years of qualified pilot service. I am suggesting that at the time these pilots entered the service this policy was not in existence and it has resulted in discrimination. This man wants to go back to law school.

I should like to ask the minister to tell us, either now or at the end of my remarks, if there has been a change in policy with respect to the length of time these men will be retained in the service and what is being done about it. I should like this statement so that people who may want to join a unified service, if there are any and I hope there are, will not walk into this situation blindly where people who are not colonels or commodores are being retained in the forces.

If I were a young applicant for the forces I would not want to be trained by any of these officers. Two of them are not in my constituency but are in another area in the west where training is given. If these men really want to get out, I would not want to be trained by them because they might become a handicap. I have other remarks to make but this was one detail to which I wanted to refer, without generality or platitude, to illustrate the way in which the present unification policy is directly affecting these men. I am told there are many more like them. This all has to do with the turnover.

Mr. Hellyer: If the hon. gentleman would like me to do so, I would answer this point now. I may say that there has been some consideration of this matter by the staff. The same question was raised earlier in the debate by the hon. member for Lapointe. I hope to be able to make a statement on the question on Monday.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the minister for those remarks. I know that these gentlemen and others as well will certainly appreciate the minister's statement because they have made business commitments which are now in jeopardy. I did not hear the hon. member for Lapointe but I intended to raise this question many days ago. However, I thought this was perhaps the proper time to raise it. I am glad the minister is going to make a statement on Monday.

All these things, Mr. Chairman, cause concern. When one looks at the over-all picture one realizes that, no matter how well-intentioned the minister may be or how much backing or lack of backing he may have, there is no doubt that Canada is going against the current. The hon. member for Queens summed it up well yesterday when he said it is not a question of being a trail blazer or leader. How can you lead when no one is behind you? We are off in the pasture so far as military philosophy is concerned with this unified force.

I believe the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was quite correct when he said the minister deserved some credit for tackling this problem. He has focused attention on defence but undoubtedly defence is intertwined with foreign affairs. With all respect to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I think the position of the Minister of National Defence has been made untenable because of the fuzzy or foggy approach of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In Britain reference is made to a foggy bottom or perhaps it is in connection with United States foreign affairs that the term "foggy bottom" is used. If there is a foggy bottom in connection with foreign affairs we certainly have it with our present minister who gives the most convoluted answers to simple questions. We recognize that the job of the Minister of National Defence is difficult when the foreign affairs position is so foggy. I believe this has been the real problem with which the minister has had to cope, but of course he cannot speak about that.

I should like to deal with another area during the time I have left, and it relates to something very close to home. I should like to reduce the general talk about the policy of unification to human terms. It is very easy to sit in a gallery and write an article asking why this or why that. I have not taken a partisan, provocative interest in defence policy in the last few months regardless of the fact that I might have received the stimulus from the minister to do so.

I have several bases in my riding, one of which is the naval base, H.M.C.S. Cornwallis, as the minister knows. The minister, as well as the minister from my province, have come down there and said that statements about this base are unfounded or irresponsible rumours. There is one way to clarify a rumour and that is to have a statement from the minister. The base at Cornwallis was commissioned in 1942 and it has been a training base. Training is part of the program if we are going to have forces. At the moment there are 400 personnel at the base which is the second largest single employer in my riding. There are 400 military personnel, 500 full-time civilians and 800 trainees. There are over 2,640 dependants of these people who are involved with the base. There are over 4,300 people directly involved in the operation of Cornwallis, not including farmers or fishermen who are naturally tied up with it. About 90 per cent of these people live right in the area within a 20-mile radius.

It has been estimated that one person out of every four in our area either works at or is supported by a person working at H.M.C.S. Cornwallis. All these people will be adversely affected by any program of consolidation. I realize that we must have progress. If we are to push buttons, and if that is progress, then we must accept it. Nevertheless bases must be maintained. My constituents cannot see the logic in removing this base from their area and placing it in another part of Canada with greater natural resources. They cannot see the logic of removing it to the prairies or to the rocky mountains or to another part of our vast country.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Our history has been one of providing service for the services. That is how we have gained our livelihood. As I say, we have not the resources of other parts of Canada with which to earn a livelihood. We are also close to the sea. No matter what one calls this program, be it unification, integration or anything else—some of our people have strong names for it—closing this base and removing it to another part of the country does not make sense, especially when one considers that it is useful for training those who go to sea.

Many of our people have built their lives around the base. Over 80 per cent of the people in the immediately surrounding area have been employed there for over 11 years. Three persons out of four live in their own homes, homes bought mostly by veterans with the help of the Veterans' Land Act. Should the base close, what alternative source of employment will our people find? How will they make payments on their homes? Many of the people employed are not professionals but would be classified as semi-skilled or unskilled labourers. They may not find alternative sources of employment.

The Chairman: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him that his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the committee. I shall try to consolidate my remarks more successfully than the minister is consolidating his bases. We have many bases in the east and undoubtedly some of them will be affected by any consolidation program. As I said previously, we must have progress. On the other hand, we find it illogical to close down a base on the seashore, the largest establishment of its kind in the Commonwealth, when its facilities are needed for training. Though the evidence of Admiral Rayner may have provoked some hon. members opposite, he did say that if people are to go to sea they must be trained on the sea. For the initial six or eight weeks sailors may be trained inland but eventually they have to learn to live with the sea.

I had intended reading some letters received from 300 of my 900-odd constituents at that base but I shall not do so. The letters speak in provoked terms about the effects of closing this base.

I hope the air of moderation which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle optimistically detected in the chamber will prevail. I hope the minister will not act as a builder who has constructed something but in so doing has forgotten the rights of parliament and constructed an edifice against the wishes of parliament. We must be positive in our thinking. I hope the minister will not follow the philosophy of another minister who thought he could act in a manner contrary of the wishes of parliament. I hope the minister does not fall into that trap.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, it had not been my original intention to participate in the debate on Bill C-243, an act to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof; and my remarks will be relatively brief.

Unfortunately I was too young to enter the services in the first war and too old to join in the second world war. As a result I felt that consideration of the proposals of the Minister of National Defence and his advisers to amend the National Defence Act should be left to those members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition who have had actual military experience and who have served so faithfully and, I must say, so effectively on the defence committee over the past few months.

I should pause here to say that we backbenchers owe those committee members on our side of the house a deep debt of gratitude and, yes, the people of Canada owe them a deep debt of gratitude for their careful examination of the witnesses and exhaustive study of the testimony which has been evidenced many times in the house in recent days by the calibre of speeches. After listening to these contributions and studying the committee reports, I felt impelled to speak. I had no alternative to adding my voice to the widespread cry of alarm that Canadians across this land are expressing from day to day as they finally realize what the Minister of National Defence and the Liberal party are bent on doing to Canada's defence forces.

Following the more expert technical contributions made by our members who have served in Her Majesty's forces and on the defence committee, the speeches made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition on Tuesday and by the hon. members for Victoria-Carleton, Northumberland, and Rosthern yesterday must surely sound a serious warning to the Minister of National Defence, the Prime Minister and others across the way that the present policy espoused in Bill C-243, especially that segment dealing with the principle of unification, is entirely wrong. Many observers and responsible writers outside parliament have come to the same conclusion.

I now wish to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on Wednesday, April 4, a newspaper not entirely favourable to the policies espoused by our party. The heading is in strong language, "Destroying Defence", and the editorial reads in part as follows:

> It is beyond comprehension that Mr. Hellyer, by insisting on total unification, should ask parliament now to endorse a completely new defence structure, entirely foreign to both British and U.S. defence organizations. Unification, and elimination of service identities, despite Mr. Hellyer's statements to the contrary, have been openly rejected by Britain after much study—as declared in the white paper of 1963. A check with Washington would also reveal that the U.S. has no intention of unifying its combat units. To the contrary, the present purpose is to build up the proud reputations and esprit de corps of individual fighting units, whether it be the "Green Berets", the Marines or the First Cavalry Regiment. For Canada to launch into a radical experiment which will make our defence organization incompatible with U.S. and British organization constitutes the most drastic step ever taken with the defences of this country. It could, in large measure, destroy our existing defence structure.

Here is another excerpt, this time from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail under the heading "An Unseemly Rush To What?" I will quote the salient points for the sake of this debate. Citing Air Vice Marshal Miller, the article states:

> He said that he saw no significant financial or military advantage in unification as compared with integration."

Another expert, Admiral Louis Mountbatten, expressed his views on integration and unification in an article which appeared in the Colonist on April 5. The question was brought up by an hon. member who is well known in the house, the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.), and the admiral's views are stated as follows:

> In the British reorganization care has been taken to preserve esprit de corps and morale and those traditions which help to maintain this in the services and fighting units.
> It has been accepted that to achieve this the three services must retain their uniforms and ranks with an identifiable professional head of their service. The idea of a single uniform and rank structure was also rejected as undesirable and unnecessary.

There is one other comment which I believe adds weight to my argument. It is one of the points raised by the Tri-Service Identities Organization.

It seems remarkable that the critics of the reorganization have been variously categorized as emotional, unprogressive, unreasonable, disloyal, obstructionist, destructive, politically motivated, or without responsibility. Do none of the extensive body of Canadians who hold opinions contrary to those of the Minister of Defence do so by reason of knowledge, capability, experience, conviction, concern or sincerity? Surely the calibre of some of the witnesses who have appeared before the defence committee dictates a high degree of credibility for their views and in no way justifies any discounting of their evidence and opinions.

The memorandum goes on to say:

Overwhelming support for the reorganization program does not exist amongst Canadians generally. Thus the latest Gallup poll showed less than 50 per cent of Canadians support it. Observing that this poll was taken before the defence committee started its hearings, and before so much cogent evidence was presented by so many knowledgeable persons against the plans and policies as presently disclosed would certainly permit the conclusion that even fewer Canadians support the programme now than six weeks ago.

One could continue to read weighty evidence for hours on end in support of the contention that the Minister of National Defence would be well advised to go slow on this issue. However, it is on the basis of the many expressions of concern which I heard from the ordinary man in the street while visiting my riding during the Easter recess that I turn to the next part of what I have to say. These conversations made me appreciate that Canadians everywhere are becoming deeply concerned about the direction in which the minister is taking us. They are additional reasons for my asking the minister to turn back before it is too late. I realize it would be tough medicine for him personally but it would help to vindicate him in the eyes of the nation and atone for some of his serious misdemeanours such as tampering with evidence, charging high-ranking officers with disloyalty and using what many have referred to as the big lie technique employed so effectively by one of the world's most hated leaders of a foreign power not so many years ago.

Canadians thought at first that the government's policy on defence was bold and daring and that it would save them millions of dollars. This impression was, of course, created by the minister's own public relations effort and resulted from the emphasis laid on the integration of our services. However, when the minister began the infiltration process by using the word "unification" from time to time, interchanging it with the word "integration" and even using the term "amalgamation", people in general and even the commanding officers in the forces became completely confused. Many are still confounded and confused, as previous speakers in this debate have so clearly illustrated in the course of their remarks. Now, however, the people of Canada as well as those in other parts of the world are beginning to ask questions. The ordinary man wants to know whether Canada has any bona fide external affairs policy. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle mentioned this point a few moments ago, as did the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. External affairs policy as enunciated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been so fuzzy and woolly that none of us understand it and Canadians do not appreciate what it is.

Does Canada have an adequate and proper defence policy? Defence and external affairs are, of course, so closely related that we must have a good idea of both before we can be sure about either. This has been said by many previous speakers who are more qualified than I am to debate this problem. Nevertheless it is pertinent. The average man is beginning to ask what our defence policy is and what our foreign policy is to be. This subject alone could lead us into a lengthy debate.

The third question which is often put to me is: Now that the 1967-68 estimates are out and defence spending has risen by $120 million, where is the saving which the minister suggested we would make? Out of our total budget we are spending between 20 and 25 per cent on defence. Since the total is 15 per cent above that of last year, some $1,600 million is involved. The taxpayer is naturally interested in the direction our defence policy is to take.

A fourth question, and one which has been put to me many times, is: In the light of the low morale of our services, will it be necessary to bring in conscription to keep them up to strength? What about the Liberal members and the Creditistes from Quebec? What is their reaction to this question?

The fifth question I have been asked is: What is to become of our commitments to NATO, NORAD and the United Nations? This again is an important question tied in with Canada's external affairs policy. How can we make a decision on this bill until we decide where we stand as far as our NATO and NORAD commitments are concerned?

Another important question which has been raised over and over again is: Did anybody estimate the cost in millions of dollars to the taxpayer represented by the loss of some 75 or 80 of Canada's most highly qualified military officers in the three services who felt impelled to step into retirement prematurely because they could not stomach the minister's policy of unification? Here is a question serious enough to warrant a wide-ranging debate. It is hard to determine the size of the investment represented by the training of these men, so many of whom have stepped out of the picture. How can they be replaced, and what would be the cost to the taxpayer?

Another question I have heard is: Can the great loss of these military officers with their vast reserve of practical experience be adequately replaced by the appointment of others who have never had the same experience or proper baptism in the line of battle? I would remind the committee of the old axiom that experience is the best teacher. These younger officers are naturally full of vim and vigour, but without this experience how can they properly provide for the defence of Canada and for the fulfillment of our commitments to other countries?

Next: Will the cutback in the number of ships and navy personnel mean that our neighbours to the south will have to move in along our shores to defend us and that as a consequence Canada will lose yet another segment of her sovereignty? Today we are worrying about our economic sovereignty. Will our military and political sovereignty be our next worry? This is an important question to Canadians. Why should Canada, which established such an honourable reputation with her fighting forces in two world wars, be the first country in the world to toy or experiment with such a questionable policy as unification when all the evidence is stacked against it? If the policy of unification of our armed forces is so good, why have not senior ministers of the crown, including the Prime Minister, supported the Minister of National Defence in this debate and at least made it appear they believe in this policy? Instead we have had silence, smirking grins and catcalls.

Another question that has been asked over and over and over again, and one that must be answered, is, where did the idea of unification come from in the first place? The hon. member for Saint John-Albert emphasized this in his speech this morning. Where did this idea come from? Who is behind it, and why? These and many other questions are deeply worrying Canadians everywhere today.

The minister has created a military mirage, an Alice in Wonderland military fantasy, a boomerang. He has loosed a wind and will reap a whirlwind. I implore him to turn back before it is too late. In my honest opinion unification cannot work, will not work, and is only an exercise in futility.

As the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton pointed out yesterday, it is not our responsibility to prove the minister wrong; it is his responsibility to prove he is right. As the hon. member for Wellington-Huron suggested yesterday in his speech, I would also like to suggest that the Prime Minister allow a free vote on this legislation so that members will not have to follow party lines. Such a vote would be a truly democratic expression of opinion and the quickest and most logical way to settle this most controversial issue. If the minister does not need the advice of Her Majesty's loyal opposition and amend this bill to make it a reasonable and rational piece of legislation, I will have no alternative but to vote against it.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I am convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the unification bill must not go through. There is sufficient evidence to show it would create great and long-lasting harm to Canada's armed forces. I am equally convinced that integration as we now have it under our present laws is quite sufficient in the light of the objectives which our armed forces must be prepared to attain, whether in defence, peace keeping or whatever other role may be necessary in accord with our foreign affairs policy.

I am not participating in this debate without having first considered the evidence of the witnesses who appeared before the defence committee. I was not a member of that committee but I had a good record of attendance there and I listened not only to the witnesses in favour of the proposal but to those who were against it. This has helped me make up my own mind. There is a preponderance of evidence on one side to create a doubt in my mind as to the validity of the bill which the minister has presented.

This debate is not new. Those who say it has been going on for nine days must realize it is the culmination of two to three years hard work by the defence forces to bring about something new in Canada's defence image, force-wise. We had a debate on second reading of the bill. We had committee meetings recently and now we are debating the matter in committee of the whole house. I feel this bill is of such importance to Canada that we should forget the political aspect and re-examine it in the light of the knowledge we have gained.

The suggestion was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that the minister might have been put on the spot and told: Go ahead; you have got to do this. He suggested that the minister had quite a cross to bear because of that. I do not believe so. The minister may have used his authority in the cabinet. It may be that it was a decision of the cabinet to go ahead with this bill but in any event, giving the minister the benefit of the doubt, as Minister of National Defence he has been most delinquent in his duty because he should have told the cabinet that this whole unification plan was not feasible.

There is sufficient evidence on very many points to raise serious doubt in the minds of all thinking people right across Canada. I shall enumerate these points on which we have secured evidence in the defence committee and from elsewhere. First, there is the very word unification itself, its definition, and the public relations image of the minister with respect to it. There have been continuous efforts to maintain the minister's shining, bright, forceful image, all those wonderful qualities the minister would like to have and to retain after this debate is concluded. Second, there are the statements by senior officers that unification was not the subject of discussion in depth. Third, there is the minister's lack of understanding of service abilities and traditions. Fourth, there are the voluntary resignations of senior officers and, fifth, the forced resignations of senior officers. Sixth, there was the Landymore incident, that horrible incident and, much more horrible, the minister's subsequent apology. Seventh, there was the denial of evidence in committee prior to second reading. We asked for committee hearings before second reading so that we might hear further evidence but we were forced to vote on the bill in principle without being allowed that. Eighth, there are the uncertainties and the effect on morale, which have been mentioned so forcefully by many hon. members. Ninth, there is the role of Canada's armed forces as against Canada's foreign policy commitments.

I have always wondered about the term "unification". I wondered even more when we heard the minister in the defence committee stand up and say he wished he had never heard of the term "unification". When he said that, there was a sort of gasp from Liberal members of the committee. Whenever they were asked about the meaning of unification all they would say was that it is a glorious thing.

The most telling part of this debate on the tern "unification" came when the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) was speaking. He, incidentally, was chairman of the defence committee and he said, as recorded at page 14774 of Hansard for April 11:

> My personal definition or view, which incidentally is the same today as when I started considering the matter many months ago, is that when we speak of unification we are talking about taking integration as far as it is practical to go.

Then he says that instead of using the word unification—the minister's word—he is going to use the expression integration-unification. I have heard a lot of rough words in this chamber and there are some I could use now. It seems to me that that is the most telling argument against unification. I started out by saying that I thought under present circumstances integration is all that is necessary for the good of our armed forces and for any role which they might happen to be called upon to play.

Another thing which attracted my attention in committee was the fact that the little trained seals in the Liberal party, without any ifs, ands or buts got up and spoke of the United States Marine Corps. They wondered why we could not have unification like they have in the United States with their marine corps. This shows a complete lack of knowledge. If anyone thinks that the marine corps is the total of the United States forces, then he is mistaken. They have an army and an air force. The point is that it takes each part all down the line to form the whole.

No one can tell me that in Canada we can do it in any other way. Let us take the word unification. The hon. member for Victoria, (B.C.) used the expression integration-unification. No member of that committee, no member of this house, no senior officer, not even any Liberal, has said that he does not believe in integration and does not believe that it is a good thing for our armed forces. We know it is. It is not new. It started many years ago. Integration is something which we all know must be carried out. But to do what the hon.

member for Victoria (B.C.), suggests we should do, carry integration as far as we can and then call it unification, is not good enough, because we have had no definition whatsoever of the term.

The white paper, of course, set out the aims and objects of unification. These were good: a more effective and more efficient defence at less cost. There is, however, not one nickel's worth of evidence in this house or in the committee which would indicate that the minister's proposed force would be any more effective. In fact, as I read and listened to the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller I could not help but be struck by the answer he gave to the hon. member for Calgary South when he was queried about the effectiveness. His answer left in my mind, and I am sure in the minds of many members of the committee, the thought that probably by implementing the minister's new idea we might have a less effective force.

Let us take the reference to a more efficient force. There is no evidence of that. Then we have the suggestion that the cost would be less. We have heard all the evidence on that and we know that it is costing more. So I am a little suspicious of the minister in that regard. This has given rise to grave doubts in my mind and in the minds of members of the press throughout this country. Someone said, the press has suggested that we are spending a long time on this. I do not think we are. From my reading of editorials all across Canada it would seem the opinion is that we are not spending too much time. There seems to be a suggestion that we should hammer at this thing and not let it go through, because there is a reasonable doubt as to its value.

Let us consider the senior officers who held high positions in the Canadian Armed Forces. The minister has shown a careless disregard for their advice. He has not paid any attention whatsoever to their advice. I am glad to see the minister leave the chamber now because he looked as though he had had enough. I am not surprised, because when I listened to what he had to say last Tuesday I thought what he said about the senior officers was one of the worst insults I have ever heard flung at the armed forces by anybody. He said that the senior officers were prone to become fixed in their views. He suggested that because they had grown up in one service they would favour that service over any other. Were he in the chamber at this moment I would ask him a direct question, but perhaps be will read this and answer it later. What about Air Chief Marshal Miller who was chief of staff? He was one of our great men and was appointed by the present Minister of National Defence.

The information I have been able to obtain is to the effect that Air Chief Marshal Miller, who was trained and brought up in the air force, when acting as chief bent over backwards in favour of the other two armed services. There is no question about that. If the minister has one tittle of evidence to bring forward in that regard, I hope he will do so. He has, however, insulted the senior officers. He says that they are service trained, came up through one service, and that if they do think they think wrong. Those are not his exact words, but the implication is there. If you read his speech I am sure you will not obtain any other inference from it.

As I said, we have a series of doubts. That is one more doubt in my mind and I am sure it would be a doubt in the minds of members opposite if they would read the editorials. Now there is an even graver doubt. We have senior officers who voluntarily retired. I should like to emphasize this. These senior officers have voluntarily retired because they could not put up any longer with the backhanded unification which was going on. The evidence of the senior officers is that unification would not work. I am not basing this statement on what I have read in the press. These officers were subjected to cross examination recently in the committee, and that was their evidence.

What about the senior officers who did not leave voluntarily, but were fired. Any officer who did not give a "yes man" answer when he was asked for his opinion about unification was forcibly thrown out; he was retired prior to his proper retirement time. This is a disgrace; it is something which never should have happened in our Canadian armed forces, but it did happen. Here we have senior officers, who were either kicked out of the forces or retired voluntarily, who were in the armed forces at the time of the moulding of integration. Men like that are not replaced too easily.

I hear Liberal members moaning and groaning. It does my heart good. It is not necessary for me to mention the name of Mountbatten, but I will; and I will mention other countries which have exceedingly good armed forces.

What is the attitude of those countries of the world that have studied this proposal for unification? They have all emphatically turned it down. Mountbatten was very forcibly against this proposal. The minister thought he would be in favour of it but he got a rude jolt the other day as a result of an editorial in this regard.

In the minister's treatment of Admiral Landymore, we have witnessed one of the most terrible and shameful things to have ever taken place in Canadian military history.

An hon. Member: Hah.

Mr. Pugh: I heard a Liberal say "Hah". I wish you had been there to hear the minister apologize.

An hon. Member: I was there.

Mr. Pugh: I am glad you were there because you must have heard all about the charge regarding the 18 months of continuing disloyalty of Admiral Landymore. When the minister was asked to indicate how Admiral Landymore had been disloyal for 18 months he said that we could not pin him down. He could not tell us what the disloyalty was. Even the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, suggested there was no evidence whatsoever in this regard. Therefore you need not bother to tut-tut on that side of the house. The chairman of the committee said this, as reported at page 1754 of the evidence of the committee:

> While I certainly can find no evidence of disloyalty in anything that has been revealed here this morning, I think it is probably fair to say that if I were looking for a man to help me support the idea of unification, the name of Admiral Landymore would probably come slow to mind.

At page 1755 of that same volume the minister made this statement in apology:

> Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I accept completely Admiral Landymore's statement that he was at no time disloyal. I believe that it is absolutely correct, that there was never at any time any disloyalty intended to his service or his country. This does not mean that I condone all of his actions, during the period in question, because I could not.

I suggest this represents a shameful chapter in the history of our Canadian Armed Forces. It is no wonder that the minister was annoyed at Admiral Landymore. We all know about the tampering with the evidence. We all wanted more evidence from other witnesses before giving approval to this bill in principle on second reading. The minister was afraid to hear that evidence before second reading because, had we heard the evidence at that time, I am sure this bill would never have been given second reading.

In view of the lack of evidence to support the charge that Admiral Landymore was disloyal for 18 months, I keep asking myself the $64 question: Why was Admiral Landymore fired? He was fired because he refused to be a "yes man" for the minister. There is no doubt about that. Incidentally, I should like to point out that Admiral Landymore received a pat on the back by General Simonds, who is no mean slouch as a military expert in this country. That gentleman said that Admiral Landymore not only had the right to make inquiries, but the absolute duty to report the results to his senior officers.

In this regard I heard the minister make one of the most laughable statements I have heard made in a committee of this house. He criticized this man, used the word disloyalty, and then admitted before the committee that he had never looked at the reports Admiral Landymore had made to his senior officers. I was flabbergasted when I heard that statement. The minister levelled charges on the basis of fictitious evidence. He then apologized and that was supposed to end the matter. Surely that is a terrible way to treat such a man.

Every serving officer must be satisfied with the state of morale of his command. General Simonds testified on this point, suggesting that good morale was probably more important than equipment. Anyone who knows anything about military action will realize that without morale and the ability to stand fast a force will not be successful, regardless of whether or not it has the best equipment in the world. Surely that has been proven by all the great battles of the world. That will be the situation a thousand years from now.

Let me now refer to the evidence of Lieutenant General F. J. Fleury. He said he found a lack of security in headquarters. Junior officers apparently knew more about what was going on in the minister's mind than he did. Let me repeat what the general said. He said that other lesser lights knew more or said they knew more about what was in the mind of the minister than he did. He said that he found security information, as he knew it, practically non-existent. He said the whole headquarters reminded him of a giant sieve.

This man found he could no longer accept things as they were, and resigned. This situation in respect of the lack of security prompts me to ask where the minister got his information about what was taking place in the services. He apparently did not get his information from the senior officers. Where did the information come from in respect of the minister's charge that Admiral Landymore was disloyal? Perhaps this whole thing is nothing more than a public relations effort. In any event, this whole story creates grave doubts in my mind about the value of unification. I suggest the minister should have the common sense to either withdraw this bill or amend it.

A committee of this house was denied the right to hear additional evidence before the bill was accepted in principle. When we were discussing this matter I made a speech, as a result of what the Associate Minister of National Defence had said. He indicated that he had had some sleepless nights over the questions surrounding unification. I respect that man, because I think he is reasonable. He had some doubts in his mind and he felt he should find some answers. He went to the senior officers and asked questions.

The thing that bothers me about this whole matter is that we were not allowed to obtain the answers to our doubts and questions regarding the same things which apparently bothered the associate minister, and bothered him to a point where he took it upon himself to find the answers.

We do not have to accept the hearsay given to us by the Associate Minister of National Defence that everything is rosy. His idea of "rosy" and mine are entirely different. I have no hesitation in saying that having listened to the evidence of all those very, very eminent men who appeared before the committee, there is left in my mind no doubt—and I do not think there is any doubt left in the minds of the people of Canada—that there is a very reasonable suggestion that unification is nothing but an airy-fairy word and is a concept which, if we are to understand the evidence presented to the committee, cannot possibly be put into effect in its final form, as the minister would like, until after about five years of integration. It is said that it will take this long to put unification into effect because of the work involved with staffs, equipment, and so on. We have been told that this program cannot be put into effect quickly, that it cannot be done at headquarters, materiel command, and so on, because these things cannot be changed quickly.

Next, Mr. Chairman, I wish to deal with the role of Canada's armed forces vis-à-vis Canada's foreign policy and commitments. In fact this is one of the most important points in this whole defence debate. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle and others have dealt with this question during the last few days. We have heard it discussed from all sides of the house. I wonder whether there might not be some truth in the assertion that the Liberal government has not really made up its mind about what our role is to be in this area. Are we going to be a brush fire outfit, a peace offering to the United Nations? Are we going to prevent little wars starting? Are we going to police areas in which there is likely to be trouble? I do not know the answers to these questions, but I am very much concerned about this aspect of the matter.

If our whole effort is to be directed toward peacekeeping, I believe we will leave ourselves open to becoming very, very quickly embroiled in a larger conflict. The United States went into Viet Nam with not too many troops. They now have 400,000 troops over there and are hopelessly embroiled in the conflict; they cannot withdraw. It is all very well to say that in a peace keeping role we will be able to go into these areas and act as policemen, but these things are not that simple.

There is another point where I think the people of Canada are very interested in the concept of a peace keeping force. It costs a great deal of money to maintain peace keeping forces. Our troops are abroad acting on behalf of the United Nations. Who pays the shot? The United Nations does not pay the shot; it is the Canadian people who pay. Every dollar spent on maintaining and equipping our troops abroad is paid by Canada. Peacekeeping is quite an expensive operation.

As I listened the other day to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the other Paul, I was wondering—I have never been able to learn this, and I do not suppose anybody has; I do not think the minister himself knows—just where we are headed in our external affairs policy and in respect of the commitments we have been so proud to make to NORAD, NATO and the United Nations.

I conclude, Mr. Chairman, by saying that in this area of defence and unification far too many things are suspect. Most of the evidence heard by the committee indicates that there is a very serious doubt in the minds of men whom throughout the years we have learned to respect. There is doubt in the minds of those in the armed forces. There is doubt in the minds of many officers who have not spoken out. Perhaps they have not spoken out for good reason, because if they spoke out they would jeopardize their careers. The sum total of the evidence presented to the committee has raised a serious doubt in my mind, and I know it has raised a serious doubt in the minds of people for whom I speak, and others all across Canada. It has also raised a serious doubt in the minds of a great many newspaper editors.

The doubt raised is of such a serious nature that if this question were dealt with in a court of law the judge would say, "You cannot possibly do this." I have serious suspicions and doubts about this proposal. The preponderance of the evidence has been such that it has raised a great deal of doubt. We believe that unification is not necessary. Integration, if carried forward properly, will do each and every thing that the minister has stated he requires under unification, with the exception of those little green uniforms and one or two other items. I believe that the minister should impress upon the cabinet, or the cabinet should impress upon him, the advisability of reconsideration of this whole question before the government allows it to come to a vote in the house.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I enter the debate at this time with absolutely no apologies and with a definite interest in mind. As a matter of fact, after reading the terms and clauses of this bill, being familiar with the debate and reading the evidence presented to the committee, I fail to see how anyone who at heart is interested in the future and the defence of this country, or who is speaking on behalf of the constituency he represents in this house, can refrain from participating in the debate. I hope to approach the problem with which we in the house are faced with all due sincerity and a sense of responsibility, and I hope I can logically and factually place on the record, on behalf of those people I have the honour to represent, the feelings in regard to this unification bill.

When this proposition was first advanced —I think its aims and objects were very well presented—and it was said that an undertaking of this kind by the government would safeguard the defence of Canada, would uphold and magnify the military prestige we have won through the years, would give us the most modern and up-to-date fighting force in the world and at the same time save a tremendous amount of money—I think it was said that the saving would be $100 million per annum—I, and I think the people in my constituency, thought that those aims and objects were very admirable indeed, and that this was perhaps what had been needed for a great many years as far as our armed services were concerned.

Therefore, in all fairness, at that time in my area of Ontario I think there was a great deal of support for this undertaking which the government was proposing. It is true that there were individuals with military experience, veterans of two world wars, students of military tactics, men who have been connected in different ways with the armed services, who were a little sceptical and questioned this proposal, because the Minister of National Defence who is actively promoting and guiding this new concept had not in previous months been too consistent in his views.

I do not propose to dredge up all the activities which led to this view. I will simply state that when the present Minister of National Defence was in opposition he was of two minds as to whether or not Canada should have atomic weapons, when he first opposed it and then favoured it, and then when he became minister showed hesitation in equipping our planes overseas with the very atomic weapons which he said were absolutely necessary for a proper operation, and which were a definite commitment made by the previous government, he delayed the implementation of this proposal. Naturally there was some doubt regarding the validity of the claims which the government had made. Nevertheless I will say in all fairness that the majority of the people in Canada, especially those who are not experts in military matters and who only wish their interests to be safeguarded, went along with the proposal which the government made to the Canadian people. In looking back I believe the Minister of National Defence made a cardinal mistake when he refused to answer completely and frankly the questions put forward by the opposition. There is no doubt that he had his own personal reasons for taking this attitude, but it soon became apparent from the questions asked on this side of the house that a growing doubt arose that the aims and objectives of the new proposed measure would be attained.

In fact, grave doubts began to creep in concerning the very wisdom of the action proposed by the minister. As is always the case with any major legislation facing this country, there is much speculation in the press, and many editorials concerning this legislation appear in the newspapers. It became apparent here and there that second thought was being given to this problem by some newspaper analysts, men who had considerable experience in politics and who had the opportunity to visit the various theatres of war during active engagement. These men began to point out the various weaknesses which were beginning to appear in the administration of our armed services. Most members of the house and people across this nation began to realize that not only was this new legislation going to be brought before parliament but that the minister had already taken the first steps in implementing it before presenting it to the house in its entirety.

Naturally the questions from this side of the house increased in intensity. Once again the minister in his wisdom took an evasive course and refused to give us the detailed information which we sought so earnestly. This lack of response from the minister intensified the growing doubt across the nation as to the absolute wisdom of this course of action. Later the question of the drop in morale in the armed services was discussed on the floor of the house, among the personnel in the armed services, in the press, on radio and television. It was charged that a tremendous drop in the morale of the armed services had taken place, that men were becoming very dissatisfied with their jobs in the armed services, and that they were asking to be relieved of their duties. Yet the Minister of National Defence gave us assurances at that time that morale was never better, that all this was mere speculation and that the rumours had no foundation. As a matter of fact hundreds of our R.C.A.F. personnel left the Royal Canadian Air Force at that time; many officers left the armed services. As we have heard in this debate, officers of the highest rank retired a great deal sooner than was anticipated. Still, the minister maintained that all was well.

I think that at that time the people of Canada were prepared to accept the minister's statement that all was well. Certainly the public relations branch of the Department of National Defence was sending out across the country hundreds of thousands of words in support of the minister's proposal. I have great sympathy for the news analysts and political commentators who were bombarded daily with this deluge from the office of the Minister of National Defence. I do not think it helped his cause, indeed it hindered it because the very men who were receiving this deluge of one-sided opinion became increasingly suspicious that if such action was necessary then indeed all was not as portrayed.

It is at this time that the eyes of the ordinary citizens were opened because when leave was granted to servicemen they greeted their relatives and friends, whose interest in this issue was aroused through the various means of communication, with their accounts of and opinions concerning unification. It is my opinion that it was at that time that the ordinary citizens of this country became convinced that the constant protestations by the minister and by his department with regard to the morale in the services were absolutely incorrect and that the assurances given in the house that all ranks, particularly the lower ranks in our armed services, supported unification completely were a hollow mockery, because it soon became apparent that such was not the fact. This is why we scanned eagerly the reports at the end of the year to find out how much the enlistment in the armed services increased.

We find the story has been put on the record, Mr. Chairman, that in spite of the pay increase, in spite of the re-enlistment bonus and everything else, enlistments did not increase but decreased. So, Mr. Chairman, we have this—

Mr. Hellyer: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. This statement is not correct because enlistments did increase over the previous year, and they were higher than the two previous years. I am sure the hon. member would not want to leave that mistaken fact on the record.

Mr. Danforth: I am prepared to accept the allegation of the minister at this time, that this statement is incorrect. However, Mr. Chairman, when the various service personnel come home and assure the people that there are tremendous numbers of units that are undermanned, that we have not enough sailors to serve on our vessels, that we have not enough aircraft to defend this country, it is a hollow thing indeed for the minister to say that all is well. This will not serve to satisfy the people who feel they have first hand knowledge.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as a result of a feeling that all was not well across Canada, when this bill was presented to the house the opposition seriously requested the government to consider sending the bill to committee before the second reading stage, in order that evidence could be heard on the principle of the bill before this country was committed to accepting it. When this request was not accepted by the government, it added to our suspicion that something was indeed wrong. Since we are not qualified military experts, and since we began to get this idea, that all was not well in Canada, each of us started a search in his own fashion for pertinent information.

What about all these great savings in money that were to take place? We have had put on the record by speaker after speaker facts to prove that not only was there not a saving of $100 million, as there was alleged to be as a result of this action, but expenditures have increased by $125 million or $160 million. I think, in all fairness to the minister, I can recall his putting forth the proposition that had money been worth today what it was when he brought forward his original proposition there would not have been any increase in expenditures. However, when you get down to the facts, Mr. Chairman, we find that not only have we not saved this $100 million, but expenditures have increased by $160 million. If my arithmetic is correct this gives us $260 million or a quarter of a billion dollars by which expenditures have increased.

Mr. Hellyer: Your arithmetic is not very good.

Mr. Danforth: How about all this new equipment? We were going to have the finest equipment in the world. Since I am not a military expert, I was interested in the fact we were told we were going to have some of the new types of equipment; we were going to have an armed service which would be the envy of the world. I think the minister did receive favourable comment as the proponent of the jet age, the man who was going to give us everything modern.

We know the story of the attempt to develop the hydrofoil; the disastrous fire and the delay in assessing the damage. Then there was the indecision about whether or not to proceed. There was delay in the purchase of new air equipment and controversy followed. We are in a predicament because we do not know where we are going. To the ordinary layman it seems we are in a period of absolute confusion. I listened to a chap the other night and I thought he advanced a proposition which covered the position of this government. He said it seems they cannot formulate an opinion at this time where they are going because they not only do not know where they are now, but they do not have the faintest idea where they have been.

Speaking on behalf of ordinary Canadians, I should like seriously to ask this government and this minister to consider the people of this country, to consider the future of this country. Instead of trying to give the impression that the bill before this house is complete so far as research is concerned, they should allow the House of Commons to work as an important component of parliament. I suggest the minister should listen to the opposition in all seriousness, so that working together in a new session we can bring about, by combined effort, a bill that will indeed work in the best interests of Canadians. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, this was accomplished in connection with the transport legislation, another important item of business.

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, the desire to do what is best for Canada does not lie solely within the government. We in the opposition, all parties in opposition, are sincerely concerned about the defence of this country. We are going to have to share equally the responsibility for any major mistakes that are made in connection with our future defence. So, Mr. Chairman, this is a sincere plea on my part for the minister and the Prime Minister to rise to the occasion and put country ahead of partisan politics for the benefit of Canada.

Mr. Kennedy: I see there are only a few minutes left, Mr. Chairman, and I regret this because I have been waiting for some time to take part in this important debate. I can say frankly that as time goes on the debate becomes more interesting. There has been a lot of information divulged and good thoughts have been brought forth. This makes me feel more convinced that we should not proceed with this measure.

My conclusions derive partly from about 30 years of military connection in full time and part time service, ending on the fields of Normandy. In that regard one of my friends once made the humourous quip that my military career might have been longer if I had been able to get closer to the grass roots. I thought I was as close as I could get to the grass roots. If at that moment I had been two inches closer I should not have bought the package.

I know the evidence of the defence committee, on which I did not serve, was overwhelmingly against the major change contemplated in the bill. People generally I expect are against change. The older we become the more we tend to resist change. The officers who testified had had expert experience, with a lifetime of loyalty and service to the country. Most of them had gone through many experiences. One cannot conceive that they would base their thinking on something that is out of of date. Rather, they were concerned that the right step be taken.

I recall during the war that a proposal was made for officers to be formed into a corps, out of which they would go to various units needing replacements. It was proposed, for instance, that officers with artillery training, with engineering training and so on would be sent to various units to fill vacancies caused by promotion. Had this idea been implemented it would have been disastrous. The step we are about to take, with this bill, is much more serious than that, and needs to be even more carefully considered. We are not considering this measure as a general staff, but as representatives of our nation. We must first think of defence.

Though we are at peace many problems must be faced. Many of those who served in the forces during the war would have nothing to do with the forces after the war. When war came they gladly enlisted and accepted hardships because of the emergency which existed. They hoped that by playing their part they might in some measure shorten the war, and they served without grumbling too much. That is a contribution one cannot expect in peacetime.

I do not think the Canadian people support this major change in the armed forces. It is hard to change traditions, and anything that changes a tradition should be considered carefully. It is said that young people do not care about tradition; I doubt it. I think they should care, and I think they do. When I undertook military training as a young man I did so voluntarily. Reserve units in our area were looking for young people to train, to give them experience as soldiers. There was no remuneration in those days. You packed your lunch on Sunday, walked six miles, trained all day and walked back. You were not remunerated but you felt you had done something for your country, that you were taking your responsibilities seriously as a young man.

I do not think that this government, a minority government, a government without a particular mandate from the people, had the right to take a step as big as is contemplated in this bill. I do not recall support for this measure being solicited during the last general election. This country cannot maintain forces on a war footing because our resources will not permit it.

I see you looking sideways at me, Mr. Chairman. May I call it five o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): I assure the hon. member that I had not lost interest in his speech.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house will now proceed to consideration of private members business listed on today's order paper, namely public and private bills.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, may we, by unanimous consent, stand public Bills Nos. 1 to 14 inclusive on the order paper and proceed with public Bill C-52, in the name of the hon. member for Kootenay West.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to allowing orders 1 to 14 to stand, and taking up for consideration the second reading of order No. 15?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL DISASTERS

PROVISION OF FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO MEET LOSSES

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-52, to provide for the Establishment of the Canada Disaster Fund.

He said: I am sure that as I begin my remarks in connection with this bill every member of this house is thinking of the disaster which recently occurred in Fernie. As we discuss this measure and the need for legislation to meet the consequences of such disasters as these from a national point of view, I am sure the sympathy of all hon. members goes out to the miners and their families who have suffered so greatly as a result of this mining disaster.

For years the federal government has made contributions to various disaster funds across Canada because in some cases the losses involved obligations beyond the resources of the municipality concerned, and in others they were beyond the capacity of the provincial government in question. I think it is right that these contributions should be made. Not only is financial assistance provided but an indication is given to those who have suffered that their need is recognized all across Canada.

I wish to give full credit for these contributions to the governments which were in office at the time, as well as to members of the armed forces and civil defence units which have been called in on numerous occasions, for example in connection with works to confine flooding in Manitoba, and in British Columbia on the Columbia and Fraser rivers.

After discussing this question with a number of organizations and groups across Canada I am of the opinion that we should set up what I would term a national disaster fund. The bill before us is entitled "An Act to Provide for the Establishment of a Canada Disaster Fund". I suggest that in view of a later development it might be better at a later point in procedure to amend the measure so that it may be referred to as an act to set up a national disaster fund. I will deal with this point shortly. I found after consulting with organizations in my constituency, elsewhere in British Columbia and in Toronto that it was considered by them to be a good idea for this parliament to establish a national disaster fund, and this is why I have introduced a bill to that end.

The purpose of the measure is to meet the problem of deciding at what point a province becomes incapable of dealing with disaster losses effectively, and to determine when a disaster becomes national in scope. The bill sets up a fund to which contributions can be made in advance by federal and provincial governments and by individuals, companies and institutions. The board of trustees each year determines in advance in respect of each province the provincial financial tolerance point above which losses are considered to be national in scope. Should a disaster occur in that province, the board contributes to the province out of the fund in respect of the losses above the tolerance point.

This, in brief, is the general purpose and objective of the present bill. On discussing this matter I find there is general support in the house for what it seeks to do. I recall that on the last occasion it was before the house the cabinet of the day gave some consideration to its subject matter. Since I introduced Bill No. C-52 I have received the following letter and I intend to place it on record for the information of hon. members, and in fairness to the organization concerned.

This is a letter from Mr. A. Ross Little, Secretary-Treasurer of the Canadian Disaster Relief Fund Incorporated, and it is addressed to me. It reads as follows:

> We wish to call to attention the close similarity of the names and objects of this fund and of the fund which you are proposing by seeking the enactment of Bill C-17. We feel quite strongly that there should not be a second fund called "The Canada Disaster Fund" as people might think they are dealing with one fund when in fact they are dealing with another.
> We would be most appreciative if you would consider proposing some other name which would avoid such confusion.
> I enclose herewith a copy of our act of incorporation and a copy of the press release which was issued when our last annual statement was filed with the Secretary of State and which will give you some idea of the uses to which the fund has been put.
> We trust you will agree that it would be in the interests of both our fund and your proposed fund that confusion in regard to the names should be avoided if at all possible.

It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that I suggest my bill could be amended at a later date in order that this fund might be called the national disaster fund.

In dealing with this question I wrote a letter to the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon). I intend to place this letter on the record for the information of hon. members who may wish to follow the developments which have taken place since this bill was introduced.

> Dear Mr. Gordon:
> No doubt you have noted that I have introduced a private bill to provide for a national disaster fund. I have had it drafted so as to escape the Speaker ruling it out of order because it involves the expenditure of public funds. In view of the present uncertainty of the provincial, federal and municipal Governments as to their responsibility, I do think it would provide an opportunity for some discussion of this immediate question.
> I would appreciate any information which you could let me have with respect to the disaster funds to which the federal government has contributed during the past ten years. I would also like to know the names of the trustees, if possible, and the amount of the unexpended balances in each case.

Hon. members will notice my reference to drafting this bill "so as to escape the Speaker ruling it out of order". I had to be very careful in that respect. I went to great lengths and consulted several members of the legal fraternity as to the best way of doing this in order to avoid the Chair's ruling the bill out of order on the grounds that it involved the expenditure of public funds.

In reply to that letter, the hon. gentleman went to considerable trouble to obtain the information I needed and I will quote his reply in order that members may appreciate the circumstances which exist at the present time, and more fully realize the weight of my argument.

Dear Mr. Herridge:

I must apologise for the delay in answering your letter of April 21st in which you asked for information about disaster funds to which the federal government has contributed during the past ten years.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The information given below has been taken from departmental records and I hope it will serve your purpose. I should mention however, that with one exception disaster funds have been administered by some government or agency other than the federal government and consequently our records show only information about the federal contributions rather than the disaster funds themselves. The exception is the Mackenzie District flooding in 1963; most of the disaster relief funds in this case were provided and administered by the federal government.

This is the information:

1954—Hurricane Hazel.

An amount of $1 million was appropriated in supplementary estimates 1954-55 payable to the government of the province of Ontario. $330,258 was in fact paid during the fiscal year while the unexpended balance of $669,742 was re-voted in 1955-56; of this latter amount, $434,379 was paid.

In summary then, $1 million was appropriated, $764,638 was paid to Ontario as a federal contribution towards the disaster relief fund, and there was an unexpended balance of $235,363.

1955—Saskatchewan and Manitoba floods.

In the supplementary estimates of 1956-57, an amount of $120,000 was provided for payment jointly to the governments of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba for disaster relief. The actual payment amounted to $49,549 leaving an unexpended balance of $70,451 which duly lapsed.

1956—Springhill Mine Disaster.

This was a very similar disaster to the one which happened recently at Fernie.

The federal contribution was $25,000 and was paid from funds appropriated in 1956-57 supplementary estimates directly to the Springhill Mine Disaster Relief Fund. There was no unexpended balance.

There rarely is when you come to deal with a mine disaster.

1958—Springhill mine disaster.

On this occasion an amount of $100,000 was appropriated in 1958-59 supplementary estimates and the full amount was paid directly to the Springhill Mine Disaster Relief Fund.

1959—New Brunswick fishermen's disaster.

A payment of $50,000 was made directly to the New Brunswick Fishermen's Disaster Relief Fund—this was the amount provided in supplementary estimates 1959-60.

1961—New Brunswick floods.

$50,000 was made available in supplementary estimates of 1961-62 and was paid to the New Brunswick Disaster Relief Fund.

1963—Mackenzie District floods, N.W.T.

Supplementary estimates (A), 1963-64 of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources provided an amount of $1,500,000 for financial assistance in respect of losses incurred during these floods, in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Treasury Board. Payments against individual claims amounted to $805,471 during the fiscal year leaving an unexpended balance of $694,529. Further assistance was voted the following year in an amount of $400,000 which included contributions towards the relocation of housing and the development of a new subdivision. Payments to date out of this provision total $237,558—I am told that the accounts for the fiscal year have not yet been closed.

The Council of the Northwest Territories appropriated $100,000 from territorial funds for flood relief and rehabilitation. This money, together with the federal contribution, was disbursed by the chief treasury officer of Northern Affairs who was also acting in the same capacity for the territorial government. With the approval of the Treasury Board, on the recommendation of the territories council, compensation was based on a graduated scale for various categories of appraised damage—100 per cent of the damage to residential real property, 80 per cent of the damage to all personal effects, 70 per cent of damage to commercial stock in trade, and 80 per cent of damage to business real property and equipment.

Apart from the funds provided by the federal and territorial governments, contributions for flood relief were also made by private citizens. I regret, however, that we have no information on file about these funds which I understand were administered by a local flood relief committee. Possibly the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories could give you some information about the activities of this committee if you wish to pursue the matter further.

1964—Port Alberni floods.

A payment of $250,000 was made to the Alberni Valley and West Coast Disaster Fund as provided by 1964-65 supplementary estimates.

Yours sincerely,
W. L. Gordon.

I place that information on the record because I think it will be of interest later on when this subject receives further consideration. I know this matter was discussed within the cabinet this time, and I know there was considerable support for the principle of this bill. I was interested to read in the May 19, 1966, issue of The Manitoba Co-operator the following item:

Disaster Legislation May be Introduced in Ottawa.

The Federal government is considering introducing legislation to cover all types of disasters rather than deal with each one as it arises, Prime Minister Lester Pearson told the house last week.

He said the situation has been under consideration for some time and it is hoped that progress in parliamentary business will enable the government to deal with this matter before long.

In the Manitoba flood situation this year the federal government, following the policy set in the 1950 crisis, provided 75 per cent of the flood fighting costs.

I do not know what the government's intentions are at present. I realize, Mr. Speaker, we have got a full agenda in front of us before this session is prorogued. However, I do trust that this legislation will receive consideration by the government before it introduces its legislation for the coming year. I know there is a great deal of support for this legislation, and once again I suggest that if the government introduces legislation to meet this situation it should recognize the fact that there is this other fund incorporated, known as the Canada Disaster Relief Fund, and introduce any federal legislation as a national disaster fund.

Since the introduction of the bill I have been discussing this matter with some members of the cabinet and with other persons, and I do hope before too long we will see the government take action to introduce legislation along the lines I have suggested in this bill, so that the parliament of Canada will have a rational and, shall I say, logical basis for meeting the needs that occur in any disaster in any part of Canada, in association with the provincial government concerned and the municipality particularly affected.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on Bill No. C-52, an act to provide for the establishment of the Canada Disaster Fund. I note that the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) introduced a similar bill in 1965, which received first reading as Bill No. C-17 on April 8, 1965.

It is often said that the times in which we live are characterized by the rapid development of science and technology. Our times are also characterized, on the human plane, by the interdependence of peoples which is exemplified by their solidarity in times of disaster.

Thus, when part of the coast of Ceylon was devastated by a tidal wave a few years ago, the Canadian people, through the Canadian Red Cross, helped the fishermen deprived of their livelihood by that disaster.

The Canadians also gave assistance to India, stricken by starvation, and more recently to Chile, where earthquakes had made many victims and caused a great deal of harm to part of the population.

Such mutual aid at the international level made it possible for a great many victims of disasters throughout the world to benefit from assistance which their respective governments could not afford.

Transposing the situation to the national level, it can be said that the same applies to Canada. Indeed, in the case of disasters, floods, hurricanes and other calamities, causing considerable material losses, the local public powers are primarily responsible for the organization of assistance. Thus, municipal and provincial authorities have the power to operate directly in such a field.

Since the world war, Mr. Speaker, the federal government has granted assistance in the case of certain disasters. The hon. member for Kootenay West mentioned a few of those. Allow me to point out others: the Fraser river, in 1948, the federal contribution was $14,700,000; the Red river, in 1950, $16,000,000; the fires in Rimouski and Cabano, in 1950, $2,800,000; the Sarnia tornado, in 1953, $137,462; the Hazel hurricane in 1954, $764,638; the Saskatchewan floods, in 1955, $32,000; in 1966, on the occasion of the Red river flood in Manitoba, the assistance granted by the federal government in this respect is not definitely known, but if we take as a basis the cost estimates for the province of Manitoba in this regard, the total assistance of the central government came to $11,550,000, of which $9,600,000 will be used to fight the flood, to restore highways, bridges and waterways and to offset damages to houses, farms and small enterprises.

I think it is understood that the rest will be mainly earmarked for the building of permanent dikes.

Bill No. C-52, now under study, is intended to lead the public authorities to take another step toward granting adequate help to the victims of a disaster. Although the principle of this bill is most praiseworthy from the humanitarian point of view, the fact remains that it brings up a constitutional problem which deserves a very careful and detailed consideration, as any matter of such an importance.

Thus far, the government has participated in emergency programs only on the special request of the provinces concerned.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) briefly indicated the course to be followed in such a case when answering a question asked in this house on April 29, 1966 concerning requests for help from areas devastated by a storm on Lake Erie. This is what he said then:

> This matter was called to our attention yesterday by a member of the house as well as by letters from members representing the area concerned... In respect of matters of this kind any approach for assistance should come through the provincial government.

Several days later, on May 5, he stated that he was fully aware of the problem and added that the government had been considering it for some time and that he hoped soon to be able to deal with this matter in a different way, and not pragmatically as it had been the practice in the past. Indeed, no plan for federal participation to those rescue operations has yet been evolved, so that support by the central government has always been in the form of an ad hoc measure, consecutive to a provincial request to this effect.

The federal government recognizes, Mr. Speaker, the problem posed by the establishment of an appropriate compensation plan for victims of peacetime disasters and it realizes that past action, in such circumstances, may not always have been satisfactory from all points of view.

For this reason, the Minister of Industry and Defence Production (Mr. Drury) was authorized last year to initiate an interdepartmental study of these problems. That authorization gave rise to the setting up of an interdepartmental committee, and the Emergency Measures Organization was entrusted with the task of ensuring its continuation.

The merit of Bill No. C-52 would be to create a fund to which the federal and provincial governments could contribute as well as private individuals, institutions and companies. A board of directors would have to evaluate beforehand each year the maximum amount which each provincial government would have to contribute. If losses exceeded that amount, they would be considered to be on a national scale and that is when the board of directors would step in to take from the fund all the money needed to provide compensation for losses in the province concerned.

Such a measure would result in providing all Canadian provinces with equal opportunities, so to speak, in case of public disasters, caused by an act of God, or and in cases of absolute necessity.

The purpose of this bill is therefore to co-ordinate the national effort so as to repair the damage sustained in any area of Canada, in cases where the province concerned could not cope with the situation alone.

But as has just been pointed out, the wording of this bill raises a constitutional problem which may give rise to some protests on the part of certain provinces. As a matter of fact, federal participation in such activities could be denounced as an infringement by the federal government in a field considered as coming under provincial jurisdiction.

Moreover, before undertaking such a plan, I think it would be advisable and wise to study thoroughly the cases in which the federal government has been called upon to assist the victims of disasters in various regions of the country. It must be considered that Canada is an extremely large country where all sorts of disasters may strike: floods, forest fires, land-slides, etc.

If we refer to the crown liability act, we realize that it does not extensively involve the responsibility of the federal government and thus it seems that Bill No. C-52 would not be in agreement with the general economics of the above-mentioned legislation since the bill would considerably increase the responsibility of the federal government.

In the field of relief to victims of disasters, the federal government of the United States took, a few years ago, a number of adequate steps to ensure efficient action from the states as well as from the central government. In accordance with the 1950 "Disaster Act", the president may, at the request of a state, declare that a disaster is such that it requires federal government intervention.

Therefore, the president empowers the federal government to grant the proper assistance to the state involved. A federal law provides, on the other hand, for a federal relief fund for people who are victims of flood, under the "Flood Insurance Act" of 1956.

Another federal legislation provides for the organization of civil defence to help the states repair essential public works, such as roads, bridges and buildings, for instance.

Mr. Speaker, there is still quite a bit to be done by the interdepartmental committee; it is already obvious that a large number of difficult questions still have to be solved, most of which are not dealt with in Bill No. C-52, as for instance:

(a) The definition of allowable expenses, more particularly how to deal with insured and insurable losses, public and private losses, maximum and minimum amounts, etc.;

(b) Should the federal government, or rather Canadian taxpayers, pay contributions for comparatively small disasters and, if not, what is the limit and how is it arrived at?

(c) Furthermore, would it not be preferable, particularly in the case of commercial establishments, to consider a disaster insurance scheme?

(d) Also, what relationship is there between a general proposition to help the disaster victims in peace time and the current programs on certain types of disasters as, for instance, the crop insurance plan and others?

But before such measures can be translated into legislation, inherent constitutional problems should be discussed and resolved at a federal-provincial conference.

Mr. Joseph P. O'Keefe (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, not too long ago on an occasion when I spoke in this place the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) applauded me. I was very grateful for that applause, if a little bit surprised. I was not surprised at the conclusion of my speech when the same hon. member on a question of privilege asked that his applause be rescinded because I did not agree with him. This afternoon I hope that hon. member will not have reason to do the same thing. On this occasion I am almost totally in agreement with him, or at least with the principle of his bill.

There are many meanings of the word disaster. Webster's second edition says that the word disaster is of astrological origin, hence an ill portent. It also states it means a sudden and extraordinary misfortune or a calamity; an unforeseen and ruinous mischance or misadventure such as a shipwreck. I am sure you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that we from Newfoundland know plenty about shipwrecks. It is also suggested that the word means the failure of a great enterprise. We also know something about that situation. The hon. member for St. John's East represents that little Bell Island. I think it was Mary Queen of Scots who once said—perhaps the historians will correct me if I am wrong—that when she died the word Calais would be found written on her heart. When this hon. member passes on and someone takes the trouble to look he will find written the word "Wabana", the Indian name for Bell Island.

Webster's third international dictionary defines disaster as to bring harm upon, to injure or to ruin. The Oxford English dictionary suggests that great poets and writers have used the word disaster in many different connotations. The famous writer Macaulay stated:

> Faithlessness was the chief cause of his disasters, and is the chief stain on his memory.

Milton's reference was:

> —From behind the moon in dim eclipse, disastrous twilight sheds on half the nations.

You will all remember Goldsmith who said in his delightful if poignant "Deserted Village":

> Full well, the boding tremblers learn'd to trace the day's disasters in his morning face.

Be that as it may, most of us in our own lifetime have often had tragic reason to know just what disaster means. Before I proceed may I pay full and sincere tribute to that wonderful company of men and women banded together under the Red Cross. Of course there are many other organizations and individuals, many of whom if not most are completely voluntary. The good these people do simply cannot be weighed in words. Even they cannot know the good they do; just as one unremembered act of kindness by an individual lives.

The effects of disasters have been little studied and are difficult to summarize. It is especially difficult in the present state of knowledge on the subject to differentiate accurately between the effects of a sudden catastrophe and a long drawn out disaster. Often when a large area is affected there ensues a period of social and economic instability. This is often characterized by fluctuating prices, shift of class lines and movement of population.

The shock of sudden disaster often produces unusual or extreme types of human behaviour. On the one hand acts of kindness, of help, of assistance, and plain good neighbourliness and charity are called forth. On the other hand there are often exhibitions of unusual greed and of publicity seekers. We are inexorably involved with and responsible for each other.

For nearly 500 years our province has been bothered by the disasters of history. More often than not disasters are caused by men, not by God or by nature, although we have had our share of those. Bell Island, another area in my own district within a few miles of St. John's, is a battery of impending disaster.

We have had only 18 years of Confederation, not 100 like most of you, yet Newfoundland will not be lacking in enthusiastic celebration of our centennial. We, like Abou Ben Adhem, may still lead all the rest.

The bill presented by my hon. friend opposite, Bill C-52, would set up a national disaster fund with a board of trustees to determine in advance a point for each province over which disasters would be considered national in scope. Contributions to the fund could be made in advance by federal and provincial governments, and by individuals, companies and institutions. Disaster is defined in the bill as:

> —an inevitable accident or an act of God resulting in losses to persons within a province where such losses exceed in total an amount fixed annually by the trustees in respect of a disaster within that province.

I do not necessarily agree with that definition. I have several questions I wish to ask although there may not be time to ask them all. Could the amount of federal contribution to a disaster be influenced by the size and wealth of the province in which the disaster occurred? In other words, should the federal response to a $1 million disaster in Ontario be the same as the response to the same $1 million disaster in Prince Edward Island, or indeed Newfoundland?

Implicit in the proposal is the relative weakness of any province, particularly the have-not provinces. Although Newfoundland is now a have-not province I am sure that within my lifetime it will become a have province. This proposal would regularize the function of disaster relief in the cases that are not clearly national emergencies, but outside the ability of the province to control. At the present time there are no regular channels or plans and each emergency is met in ad hoc fashion. For example, during the Red River flood in Manitoba, federal aid was worked out through the medium of defence capabilities—the emergency measures organization. One could conceive of some level at which a disaster would be large enough to endanger defence preparedness, even under unification.

In the United States, as a result of the federal disaster act of 1950, the national government can provide disaster aid to states in the most effective way by co-ordinating, through the federal civil defence administration, the activities of all pertinent federal authorities.

The point of view of the Canadian government on the matter of disaster relief was clarified on May 5, 1966, by the Prime Minister in the following statement:

> We in the government have been giving consideration to this situation for some time, and I hope the progress of parliamentary business will enable us, before long, to deal with this matter of disasters, on a somewhat different basis than the pragmatic way in which we have been approaching it over the years.

Certain general aspects of any effective approach to the problem comprise the broad review of the physical characteristics and the human and physical consequences of natural disaster; the nature and scope of government efforts that must be far reaching, complex and co-ordinated in the handling of voluntary relief. The kinds of accidents to which Canada is prone are widespread and no one should approach this issue without a detailed knowledge of such historic disasters as wartime St. Lawrence shipwrecks, a tragic fire in Newfoundland, a tornado that blew down much of Regina, a hurricane that hit Toronto, an avalanche in Alberta, a coal mine disaster in Nova Scotia, a flood in Winnipeg, tragic bushfires in the north and in my own province of Newfoundland, and a bridge collapse in Vancouver.

The essence of the matter is that there is no actuarial basis for such events and normal insurance techniques will not apply. Related to this is the fact that Canada is one of the most accident prone countries in the world, and all the demographic aspects of this problem must be taken into consideration. The effect of Bill C-52 would be to regularize the function of disaster relief in those cases not clearly national emergencies, that is, that would impair defence capabilities—but which are clearly beyond the ability of the province to cope with. The board proposed would set a limit in dollars for each province, which would be a measure of that province's ability to cope. This fund would cover all amounts above these limits.

At present there are apparently no regular channels or plans for federal relief and each request for disaster relief is met in ad hoc fashion. Several recent examples have been reported in Hansard debates. One case was the Red river flood of 1966, in which federal aid was carried out through the medium of federal defence capabilities, the E.M.O.

The proposed fund is all-inclusive. In the United States there is a federal insurance plan for flood relief only. Another plan is tied in with the federal civil defence organization to assist states to restore essential public works, that is, roads, bridges, waterworks, building, etc. Under the disaster act the president, on a request by a state governor, may decide to declare a "major disaster" and so authorize this form of federal assistance. The main problem for such proposals in Canada is a constitutional one. Disaster relief is under provincial jurisdiction. I know the problem Bill C-52 is proposing to meet has accordingly been referred by the Prime Minister to the federal-provincial conference for discussion. Whether or not discussion has actually taken place is a matter for conjecture.

The Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) stated on October 22, 1964, that informal consultation was being carried out with the United States on the question of peacetime disasters and the role played by a federal civil emergency organization. He said:

> Specific recommendations can be expected to emerge from these discussions.

I am in complete agreement with the necessity of providing relief in the case of disasters. I do not suppose there is a province in Canada that has had so many disasters as my own. Perhaps they have not been big, national disasters, but every disaster, if it affects a human being, affects all of us. You, sir, and I know of the many nights when the door was kept ajar while the storm raged outside. I believe our friend, Ned Pratt, who is a Newfoundlander—he was born in Newfoundland—and who should be, if he is not, poet laureate of Canada, stated it perfectly when he wrote:

> It took the sea a thousand years,
> A thousand years to trace,
> The granite features of this cliff,
> In crag and scarp and base.
> It took the sea an hour one night,
> An hour of storm to trace,
> The sculpture of these granite seams,
> Upon a woman's face.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to support the principle of this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to give my views concerning this Bill No. C-52.

It is evident that everybody should agree that the principle of this bill is based on the most ancient and the most natural humanitarian laws.

In my area, and even in my riding, since the beginning of the century, we have suffered several disasters and conflagrations.

I remember the stories told by older people regarding the shipwreck of the Empress of Ireland in 1914, at Sainte-Luce, near Rimouski and Pointe-au-Père.

I also remember very well the fire that destroyed at least a third of the town of Rimouski, where I live, on May 6, 1950. One third of the city was destroyed and the damages amounted to several million dollars. I remember that we got help from the Red Cross, the army, and that a special fund was created thanks to people of goodwill. Insurance companies helped us also. Besides, I think that the C.M.H.C. let us use all the advantages it can offer by way of building and home reconstruction, so that we could rebuild our city. That is why Rimouski was able to remain one of the most important cities on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, in eastern Quebec.

At the same time, on the same day, I believe, another town in our area, located in the constituency of our colleague the hon. member for Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata (Mr. Gendron), the town of Cabano, was almost completely destroyed by fire.

Those two fires caused damages amounting to $12,023,400. Insurance policies covered damages up to $2,545,000 and we suffered a loss of $9,478,000. On the other hand, we benefited from all the help I have already mentioned.

Along the Rimouski river there was also another disaster, another calamity: a mountain of mud and clay slid into the Rimouski river; this landslide destroyed several farmers' establishments, changed the course of the river and buried machinery valued at several thousand dollars owned by contractors who were doing work in the vicinity.

The hon. members who spoke before me mentioned many other disasters which happened here in Canada. In addition to those disasters, I think that it is advisable to remember also the collapse of the Quebec bridge about which a lot was written at the beginning of the century, and which caused some casualties and a great deal of damage. That accident occurred on August 28, 1908, with 75 dead. When the Duplessis bridge collapsed, on January 31, 1951, it was also a conflagration if we consider the damage and the four casualties.

Upon consideration of those disasters as well as those mentioned by the hon. members who spoke before me: the fire in St. John's (Newfoundland) which caused several casualties, in 1942; the tornado which destroyed 500 buildings in Regina, in 1912; the hurricane Hazel, in 1954; the avalanche in Alberta, which completely destroyed a town and killed 66 people; several disasters in coal mines in Nova Scotia; floods in Manitoba; the forest fires of 1911 and 1922; the Porcupine fire in 1911, and the Haileybury fire, in 1922. It is obvious that we cannot disagree with the principle of this bill.

However, upon reading the bill, I think that three major points must be considered, and all our colleagues in this house, I am sure, have already examined them.

First of all, as someone said a while ago, in the past the federal government did not delay in meeting the requests of the provinces in such cases. Often, federal assistance even preceded the requests. Moreover, a federal minister has been assigned to correct the effects of those disasters.

Mention was also made a while ago of the amounts the federal government paid to alleviate the distress in those circumstances.

I have a few figures here which I want to mention rapidly: the Fraser river disaster of 1948: contribution, $14,700,000;— may I mention that all these disasters occurred since world war II—the Red river disaster, in 1950, $16 million; Rimouski and Cabano, in 1950, federal contribution, $2,800,000; the Sarnia tornado in 1953, the federal contribution was $137,462,000; hurricane Hazel, $764,638; the flood in Saskatchewan, in 1955, $32,000; other floods in 1955, in Manitoba, $18,000; the Springhill disaster in Nova Scotia in 1956, $25,000; another disaster, at the same location, in 1958, $100,000; the New Brunswick fishermen disaster in 1959, $50,000; certain floods in New Brunswick, in 1961, $50,000; and other floods in Port Alberni, $250,000. This makes a total of $34,927,000.

The second point which is important and on which it is essential to call attention—it is almost a corollary of the first one—is that the federal government recognizes a real need to establish a statute to correct the effects of disasters. On the other hand, as I said a while ago, the Minister of Industry and Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Drury) was given authority to direct interdepartmental studies on these problems with a view to setting up a commission.

Third, in order to draft an adequate bill providing compensation when a disaster occurs, many difficulties and complications must be considered. For instance, it would be advisable to set up an acceptable scale of costs. It would be a good idea also to some disasters which are not big enough to require the help of the federal government.

The size or importance of a province's territory or wealth should also be considered. For instance, should a disaster resulting in a loss of $1 million in Ontario or Quebec be considered on the same basis as a similar disaster in Prince Edward Island?

It would also be necessary to enter into certain agreements regarding the participation of the provinces, because even if the federal government were to pass a legislation to that effect, the provinces would be required, under the constitution, to continue their participation to such programs.

On the other hand, the part played by insurance companies in the past and still to be played in the future must also be taken into consideration. In addition, there are certain details to be spelled out.

In summary, it is those small details which lead me to believe that the bill in its present wording is perhaps being presented in too simple a form to succeed in correcting a complex situation and in solving difficult problems.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour for the consideration of private members business is expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, what will be the business for next Monday?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I expect the item of business with which we have been dealing today will be called on Monday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 17, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

INCLUSION OF SPEECH AS APPENDIX TO OFFICIAL REPORT

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the house and in accordance with custom I move, seconded by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General, the Right Honourable Roland Michener, Q.C., together with the address of welcome made by the Prime Minister in the Senate chamber on April 17, 1967, be printed as an appendix to the official report of debates of the House of Commons, and form part of the permanent record of this parliament.

Motion agreed to.

[Editor's note: For text of speeches referred to above, see appendix.]

HONOURS AND AWARDS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ESTABLISHMENT OF SYSTEM IN CANADA

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to announce to the house the establishment of a system of honours and awards for Canada. Practically every sovereign country has such a system which it uses as a means of recognizing merit or gallantry, or distinguished public service. I believe that recognition of this kind can strengthen national pride and the appreciation of national service.

There has been no system of Canadian honours and awards. The Canada Medal was instituted in 1943 as a possible way of filling this gap, but it has never been awarded and is now being replaced. Because Canada has lacked an official system a number of unofficial or semi-official honours and awards have developed over the years. In addition, the professions and the universities have methods of bestowing recognition upon persons they desire to honour.

The government considers that there is a need in Canada for some official Canadian method of recognizing outstanding merit and public service in many different fields. The centennial of confederation would seem to be a logical time to introduce such a system. Any such system of course, Mr. Speaker, must be distinctly Canadian and include no titles nor confer any special privileges, hereditary or otherwise.

It is my pleasure to announce that on the recommendation of the government Her Majesty has approved the issue of letters patent constituting the Order of Canada. The constitution of the Order provides for the creation of Companions of the Order. Fifty may be appointed in this centennial year and not more than 25 in any year thereafter, but the maximum shall never exceed 150. The principal Companion of the Order, the Chancellor, will be the Governor General. Nominations for the award will not be made by the government but directly to the Governor General by an advisory council composed as follows: the Chief Justice of Canada, chairman; the Clerk of the Privy Council; the Under Secretary of State; the Chairman of the Canada Council; the President of the Royal Society of Canada; the President of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. Companions will be selected on the basis of "merit, especially service to Canada or to humanity at large".

The constitution of the Order of Canada also provides for the recognition of acts of outstanding valour. To this end it specifies that there will be a Medal of Courage which may be awarded to a person who "performs an act of conspicuous courage in circumstances of great danger". There will of course be no fixed maximum number of awards in this category.

The constitution also provides for a Medal of Service, to be awarded but for different categories of meritorious service than that for Companions and in somewhat larger numbers. Not more than 50 Medals of Service will be given in 1967 or in any year thereafter.

Any person or organization is invited at any time to suggest names of persons whom they consider worthy of receiving any of these awards. These nominations, which should include particulars of the merits and accomplishments of the person nominated, should be submitted directly to the secretary to the Governor General, at Government House in Ottawa, who will act as secretary to the advisory council and who alone will make the recommendations.

The government believes that these three awards, the Companion of the Order of Canada, the Medal of Courage and the Medal of Service, will help to fill a need in our national life and will enable proper recognition to be given by Canada to its own citizens and to others. By the method of recommendation, careful selection based strictly upon merit for two of the awards and upon conspicuous courage for the other and strict limits on the number of recipients, it is intended to maintain the quality of these awards at the highest possible level.

Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to table copies of the two orders in council involved, including the text of the letters patent and the constitution of the Order.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a matter such as this I would have hoped the Prime Minister would have given notice. Had he done so, it would have been possible to discuss this question in a manner in keeping with the step which is being taken.

All of us realize that in 1919 Hon. W. F. Nickle of Kingston introduced a resolution in the House of Commons to the effect that honours should not be awarded. That motion received fairly general support and remained in effect through the years until Mr. Bennett became prime minister of Canada. During Mr. Bennett's period of office a number of knighthoods were awarded.

Certainly this is a break which must cause deep concern to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), because after all he is the testamentary successor to Right Hon. Mackenzie King. Mr. King did not like decorations, prefixes or suffixes. The only person who has a close link with the past in this regard—a close link with that prime minister —is the Minister of Transport. The Prime Minister of course also has a close relationship, having been under secretary of state for external affairs while Mr. King occupied the position of prime minister.

As I recall it, Mr. King had been given a C.M.G. in 1908, Companion of the Order of St. Michael and St. George. So opposed was he to anything in the nature of awards that I understand he had one of the high commissioners of Canada approach His Majesty the King to ask for permission not to have to wear the C.M.G. ribbon. He would have been shocked to have been compelled to wear the decoration. It was so totally removed from his ideas of democracy. My information is that the King answered the request by saying that Mr. King might wear the medal wherever he chose. In any event Mr. King did not wear the decoration.

Then in 1948, following notice that he intended to retire which he gave at a press dinner in that year—in those days announcements of that kind were made at press dinners—Mr. King remained prime minister after Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent was appointed his successor as leader of the Liberal party.

I do not know what happened to Mr. King's feelings on the subject of decorations, but something abnormal occurred. He went over to London and saw the King. He felt that Canada had never been properly honoured for services rendered by Canadians during the second world war, and my information is that membership as a Companion of Honour was to be made available. Apparently Mr. King did not feel that was high enough an honour.

The Order of Merit is restricted, I think, to some 26 members; I am speaking entirely from memory because I did not receive notice of the intention of the Prime Minister to make this announcement, but as a result of a fortuitous occurrence, the death of a member of that order, Mr. King received the Order of Merit.

He then visited the Queen of the Netherlands and pointed out the services that Canada had given to the people of the Netherlands. There he picked up another decoration; I think it was the Order of Orange-Nassau. I can imagine his feelings, loaded down with two decorations on the one trip. He was used to the situation by then and went to Belgium, where in passing he picked up the order of Leopold. Time marches on. He went to Paris where he became a chevalier of the Legion of Honour. For one trip that was par for any honours course.

I mention this because, as the then member for Prince Albert, he was made honorary president of the Prince Albert Agricultural Society. If you visit Laurier House you will see the five honours all in a row, and I must say that Prince Albert was honoured by having its award included among the decorations. Even the C.M.G. was resurrected.

It is well to remember that in 1792 during the famous debate in the British House of Commons, in which Pitt the Younger, Edmund Burke, Charles Sheridan and Fox participated, this whole question was considered. During discussion whether appointments to the legislative councils of Upper and Lower Canada should be hereditary, the attitude of Burke was, as I recall it, if they were made hereditary the preservation of Canada would be assured.

None of the history books seem to reveal what happened in 1943. The diary of Mr. King is singularly silent on this question. He rushed over to the United Kingdom, he saw the King, he asked for the creation of the Canada Medal. There was a great rush; it had to be done at once. Five copies were struck. Today they have become numismatic curios, and where they are we do not know. Now we are to have the Order of Canada. I have noticed the precautions that are going to be taken to ensure that this award will be of the highest order. There has been some suggestion that appointments to the other place under this government would not have been made if there had been an advisory council.

I say, sir, that one of the unusual circumstances connected with our development has been that following Mackenzie King's lengthy period of service as prime minister with those who followed him holding similar views, we are now in 1967 to have the Order of Canada. I hope this does not mean that decorations for valour by Her Majesty the Queen will be done away with; otherwise it can only be said that this is another of these advances, so highly regarded by members of this government, whereby every vestige of our relationship with the United Kingdom is being swept aside. The latest example is in that caricature that is going to go out to the children of Canada, in the form of a medallion, bearing on its front what is described as the coat of arms of Canada. It resembles the coat of arms about as much as I do Hercules.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members will agree that it is a pity the right hon. Leader of the Opposition did not have earlier notice of this announcement—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not one minute.

Mr. Lewis: —because if without notice he could enthral us with a history of things no doubt relevant to the announcement by the Prime Minister, I can imagine what he might have done if he had been given notice.

I want to say on behalf of our party that we greet the announcement of a Canadian order and the fact that it is Canadian. I am sure I need not remind any hon. gentleman that there are in every society thousands and thousands of men and women who in their daily lives do a great deal for our community and never become recognized no matter what kind of order exists. I am sure all those who will receive companionhood under this proposed order will remember that theirs is the recognized contribution, but there are always thousands whose contribution is as great and as important who cannot be recognized.

We in this party are also very happy that the government has taken the precaution to make sure that appointments to the order will be made in such a way as to leave out any possibility or suspicion of political interference. Perhaps the same attitude and the same process will be applied to a good many other appointments in our society, which I think would do Canada a great deal of good.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we join with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), as well as with the spokesman of the New Democratic Party, to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on the establishment of the Order of Canada, whereby deserving Canadians will be created Companions of that Order and medals for valour and meritorious service will be eventually awarded to a total of 150 persons, 50 of whom in this centennial year of confederation.

Mr. Speaker, everybody agrees that we are living in a sovereign contry and that it was very important, even urgent, to have in Canada an organization designed to recognize the good services of Canadians who have made an outstanding contribution to the common good and to the unity of Canada, as a sovereign country.

We, therefore, thank the Prime Minister and the members of the cabinet for having created the Order of Canada.

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, without seeking it for themselves many Canadians wonder just what did happen to the Canada Medals that were struck and just what was the purpose of the government as far as that particular medal was concerned.

We join in welcoming the announcement regarding the establishment of the Order of Canada. I think we have to remember that ingratitude is one of the greatest sins of our day, and I believe it is good for us as a nation to recognize the great contribution that is being made and will be made by many of our fellow citizens. It will be a recognition of their contribution and a recognition of our appreciation for what they have done.

We also appreciate the fact that some safeguards have been established to keep this from becoming another matter for political patronage. The establishment of this advisory council will, I am sure, do much to preserve this particular recognition as something that is really worth while and something that has vital meaning. Therefore we trust that in the future as these recognitions are given to various individuals they will be an acknowledgement of the fact that they have made a contribution for which all Canada is appreciative.

QUESTIONS

NUMBERS OF SEALS KILLED

Question No. 2,796—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

What is the number of seals estimated by the Department of Fisheries on the Atlantic coast and in the St. Lawrence basin which, in addition to young Harp seals, were killed in each of the years 1964, 1965, 1966 and 1967 to date?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): 1964, 96,217; 1965, 50,985; 1966, 83,619; 1967, season still in progress and figures incomplete.

ALBERTA—TRANSFER OF PROPERTY FOR NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 2,808—Mr. Herridge:

Have there been any discussions between the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Premier Manning of Alberta or any of their officials, with respect to the possible transfer of an area of Wood Buffalo park to the provincial government in return for an appropriate area of provincial land to be used as a national park?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes. Federal and provincial parks officials have looked at one area in Alberta and negotiations at the ministerial level are expected in the near future.

*C.B.C. AUTHORITY FOR DISTRIBUTION OF COLOUR TELEVISION SETS

Question No. 2,850—Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South):

Where is the legal authority for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to make presentations of coloured t.v. sets to any person, and in any event to persons, whatever their public position may be, who are not connected with the C.B.C.?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the corporation's legal authority is the Broadcasting Act and decisions are made in accordance with this legislation. Colour television sets are not presented to individuals as gifts. They are assigned or loaned to positions or offices and remain the property of the corporation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR ERASURE OF CRIMINAL RECORDS AFTER GOOD CONDUCT PERIOD

On the orders on the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of events in the last 24 hours, to which I am not going to allude, will the government introduce as a centennial project before this session ends, a measure to provide that any persons convicted of a crime the result of which was incarceration in a jail or penitentiary, may after a period of years, say from five to ten years of good conduct, have that record erased so the stigma which otherwise results will be removed?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I think I will ask the Solicitor General to deal with this question, if my right hon. friend does not mind, since he has discussed it.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that the officials of my department are now in the midst of preparing a memorandum for my office and for submission to my colleagues in the cabinet. In addition I have requested that a private bill proposed by the hon. member for Welland be sent to the committee on justice and legal affairs. This subject matter is now under consideration by the committee and I am awaiting their report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I suggest to the minister that time is of the essence in this connection, and that procrastination is no excuse. Everybody knows, or almost everybody realizes, the injustice of the present position. Surely in view of the events of the last two days this parliament should act now.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that there has been no procrastination. It might be of interest to the right hon. gentleman to know that I have given public support to the principle he has enunciated in the house. I have outlined in public one general approach that might be taken to this question. It is therefore clear that it is uppermost in my mind, and I am actively considering it.

HUMAN RIGHTS

REPORTED RACIAL DISCRIMINATION IN REQUESTS TO MANPOWER OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the minister received a confidential report from the Jewish labour committee alleging that some officials in some manpower offices have accepted requests involving racial and other discrimination? Will the minister indicate to the house whether he has had time to study the report, and what steps he is taking to deal with the situation revealed in it?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I have not seen any report as yet, but it may be in the department. I just read the news report in the Globe and Mail this morning, and I am very concerned about that. The only thing I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that the instructions to the district offices are very strict on that point. I do not say they are followed; perhaps the report of the council is correct, and I am looking into the problem and as soon as I have read the report I will make inquiries. Then I can answer the hon. gentleman.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): When the minister is looking into this matter will he investigate whether the officials of the Ontario human rights commission, the Ontario government agency dealing with this problem, brought this matter to the attention of the officials of his department in Ontario a year ago, and why action was not taken then?

Mr. Marchand: I am not aware of that, Mr. Speaker. I can inquire into the allegation and reply at the same time I give a general report.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister is looking into this matter, will he ascertain whether the instructions of the former national employment service regarding this practice were cancelled when the subject was transferred to his department?

Mr. Marchand: No, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. gentleman is interested I can read what the instructions are. The instructions to all our representatives in the manpower centres are as follows:

> No applicant seeking work will be discriminated against by reason of his or her racial origin, religious belief or political affiliation. There will be no discrimination for any of the reasons stated, and upon proof of any such unfair practice, the officer found guilty will be liable to discipline.

These are the formal instructions that have been given. I cannot tell you this afternoon that they have been followed, but we have this report and I am ready to ascertain to what extent these instructions are followed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman give us the date of the instructions?

Mr. Lewis: Following what the minister has just read, would he consider issuing further instructions to his officers to the effect that they should refuse to deal with any request coming from an employer which attempts to set down a discriminatory choice?

Mr. Marchand: I can assure the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that we are going to renew the instructions and insist that they be followed. This is something in which I personally believe very deeply. I will do all I can to prevent what is alleged in the newspaper to have happened. Hon. members can be sure I am going to check into it and see that instructions are followed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a supplementary question. On what date were these instructions given to the various offices across the country?

Mr. Marchand: I do not have the date here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How recently?

Mr. Marchand: I cannot tell you the date. I can tell you tomorrow. I know these instructions are in the manual manpower centre which is distributed to all the Canada manpower offices in the country. I am going to look into the matter and I will ascertain the date, but I do not have it here.

AGRICULTURE

CONSIDERATION OF REQUEST FOR HIGHER PRICE FOR INDUSTRIAL MILK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

During his recent meeting with the dairy producers, did the minister state that his department was ready to reconsider the request for a price of $5.10 per hundredweight for manufacturing milk, as long as the total amount of $120 million available to the department is not exceeded?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that the question, as put by the hon. member, is acceptable.

Mr. Caouette: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES—PROPOSED COMMON MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs having to do with the decision taken at a meeting of the Organization of American States at Punta del Este to establish a common market among the countries of South America. Can the minister give the house any information as to the possible effect of this decision on Canadian trade with South American countries, and in particular what steps the government is taking by way of representation to ensure that this development will represent an enlargement of opportunities for Canadian trade in South America rather than the development of another trading bloc from which we might be excluded?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): At the recent conference of the heads of state of the Organization of American States, the Canadian ambassador in the Argentine acted as observer for the Canadian government. The proposal at this meeting to establish a common market is to reach a certain stage of acceptance by 1970 and to become fully effective by 1985, so this does open up an opportunity for a full examination of what the advantages would be for Canadian participation. The government, now that this matter has been formalized in this way, will of course be giving consideration to this and other proposals through the appropriate departments.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask a supplementary question. In the light of this development and its implications for Canada, may we expect an early initiative to be taken by the government to ensure Canadian adherence to the Organization of American States, a step which was firmly advocated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he was on this side of the house?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The last observation, of course, is correct.

Mr. Fulton: Is the conclusion correct, that we may expect early initiative to be taken by the government?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend, as an experienced parliamentarian, knows that when the government decides policy it is announced in the usual way.

Mr. Fulton: My question is, has the government got a policy?

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SUPPLY OF WAR MATERIALS TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs which arises as a result of the severe criticism now being levelled at the government because of its defence sharing program with the United States, through which Canada is supplying war materials to the United States to be used in Viet Nam.

Will the minister for external affairs very shortly consider issuing a clear and concise statement regarding this matter, so there is no conflict between our defence sharing program with the United States and the supply of war materials through the United States to Viet Nam?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, conciseness is, of course, a relative term. I call my hon. friend's attention to the statement that was made in this house by the Prime Minister on January 18, which I think would meet all the criteria of my hon. friend's concept of conciseness.

FEDERAL EFFORTS TO ATTRACT DOCTORS FROM OUTSIDE CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but in his absence I will address it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the severe strain on the emergency departments of hospitals throughout Canada, which is increasing by 10 per cent every year, and in view of the acute shortage of general practitioners across Canada, would the minister indicate whether the federal government has taken any steps to attract doctors from outside Canada to help fill this gap?

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to bring this to the minister's attention.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST ENGLISH SPEAKING MEMBERS OF SECURITY STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a most important question to the government house leader. Will the house leader explain to the house the reasons for the increasing discrimination against employees who speak only English, culminating in the recent order that irrespective of seniority only those members of the security staff who are bilingual shall henceforth be stationed at the main entrance to the House of Commons and Senate?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question relates to House of Commons personnel and should be directed to the Speaker.

Mr. Winch: On a point of order, sir, I understand that a member could never address a direct question to the Speaker on matters of this kind.

Mr. Speaker: Any question can be directed to the Speaker in writing.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT RESPECTING LEVEL CROSSINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport, whom I admire very much.

Another railway tragedy, which took the lives of four people yesterday in Ville Laval, is to be deplored. Here is my question to the minister: In view of the fact that the era of turbo-trains and ultra-fast trains is about to begin, is a policy being developed concerning grade crossings in order to deal with this contingency?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not believe that this contingency is so near that the question can be put now.

TRANSPORTATION

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON MARITIME STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Now that the government's two year freeze on maritime transportation rates has been reduced to 19 or 20 months, would the minister advise the house when we might expect the special study into maritime transportation?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Soon, sir.

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary question. Might I ask the minister whether by "soon" he means in this present session of parliament?

Mr. Pickersgill: Soon, sir, is a relative term.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—PROTEST RESPECTING PROPOSED REDUCTION OF SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Following a resolution passed unanimously, the Quebec legislature asked the C.N.R. last week to continue its passenger service between Quebec city and La Malbaie.

Does the Minister of Transport intend to make representations to the C.N.R. authorities to get them to withdraw their application to the Board of Transport Commissioners to abolish their passenger service between Quebec city and La Malbaie?

Mr. Speaker: The question should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR APOLOGY FOR REPORTED INSULTS TO PEOPLE OF GERMAN DESCENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Secretary of State, but as I notice she is temporarily out of her seat perhaps I could direct it to the Prime Minister.

In view of the pending legislation by the government concerning group libel, would the Prime Minister request the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to make an apology to the people of German descent in the area of Kitchener, Ontario. I ask this question in view of a radio program broadcast at 10.30 last Thursday evening on the national network of the C.B.C. which suggested that the persons referred to in the program were disloyal to Canada, were anti-semitic and were nazis. These people have been in Canada for many generations and the inferences in this program were quite unwarranted. I hope this matter will be taken up by the C.B.C.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to forward my hon. friend's question to the authorities of the C.B.C.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO RELIEVE UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the fact that the latest reports on unemployment indicate that in Quebec unemployment has increased by several thousands, is the minister in a position to say whether his department intends to take special measures to check this constant increase in unemployment in Quebec.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the department is taking general measures against seasonal unemployment applicable to the province of Quebec as well as to the other provinces. If the hon. member for Lapointe wants truly specific measures for the province of Quebec, he could possibly move to the Quebec Legislative Assembly and there present his requests where they would be appropriate and in accordance with his principles and the problems which he is raising.

Mr. Grégoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that I would be agreeable to the suggestion of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, would the minister tell us whether he would agree, in addition to transferring me to Quebec, to transfer to Quebec the taxes paid by Quebec to Ottawa?

[English]

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED PROTESTS RESPECTING TRADES TRAINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, may I pose my question to the minister of manpower and ask him whether he would reply today to the question I posed to him on Thursday, regarding a communication which was forwarded to him through the unemployed workers' association at Sydney, expressing dissatisfaction with the selection of applicants for training?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, having come straight from my office I wonder whether the hon. member would mind if I answered his question tomorrow.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNIONS TRUSTEES—REFERENCE OF REPORT TO HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Now that the report of the board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions has been received, would the minister consider referring this report to the standing committee on labour and employment so the committee can call the board of trustees before it when the report is being considered?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the minister will not only consider the suggestion, but will be very pleased to get in touch with the chairman of the board of maritime trustees and discuss the situation with him, and then will take the matter up with the chairman of the committee in question.

GRAIN

QUEBEC—ANNOUNCEMENT OF LEASE OF ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. Could he tell the house whether the government has authorized the leasing of grain elevators in Quebec and, if so, have steps been taken to guarantee the supply of domestic grain?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the government has authorized the National Harbours Board to lease the grain elevator at Quebec. The conditions of the lease include the fullest protection it is legally possible to give for traffic in domestic grain and for those who are engaged in that traffic.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Will the Minister of Transport also consider the possibility of using Quebec grain elevators or putting grain into them during the winter, when shipping is possible on the St. Lawrence river?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that the supplementary question is urgent.

OIL

ST. PIERRE-MIQUELON—CONFLICTING CLAIMS TO OFFSHORE EXPLORATION RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): In view of the fact that offshore oil rights have been awarded by the federal government to British American Oil in an area south of the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, while United States companies have acquired rights in the same area from Newfoundland and France has granted exploration rights in the same area to a company owned by the French government, what plans have been made by the minister to settle the conflicting claims to offshore exploration rights in this area?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the hon. member knows, there have been discussions between the French and Canadian governments concerning this matter. These discussions are continuing, and when we are in a position to make a report on their progress I shall be pleased to advise the house.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. At the present time it is my understanding that offshore drilling rigs are being established off the east coast. Will licences for the supply ships serving these offshore rigs be granted only to ships of Canadian registry?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I do not think that question can possibly be answered without legal research, and I do not feel able to give a legal opinion offhand to the house.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROPOSED CHANGES IN ROLE OF ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he will clarify the future role of Canada's armed forces prior to his departure overseas. Does the minister approve of the war-making and armed intervention mission proposed for Canada's armed forces by the Minister of National Defence and the vice chief of defence staff under the disguised title of peace restoring?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member and the minister might like to take this up when we move into committee shortly to consider the subject which is before the committee.

Mr. Churchill: The house will be deprived of most valuable advice during the next few days because the minister will be away. He failed to clear up this matter when he had the opportunity to speak. Surely, then, we should have the information now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the minister will be away that long.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Under the threat of closure we shall not have the opportunity to hear from the minister on this point, and perhaps if he would clear it up closure would not be applied to the House of Commons by the government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think it would be a good idea for the hon. member to come with me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADA MEDAL

SUGGESTED POSTHUMOUS AWARD TO LATE GOVERNOR GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister which I hope will be found non-controversial. Will the Prime Minister, as head of the government, give consideration to the official issuance of the one and only Canada Medal, from its inauguration to its discontinuance, posthumously to the late governor general, General Vanier?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): That is a very interesting suggestion indeed, and I will be glad to take it under consideration.

DRUGS

REPORTED PRICE INCREASE FOLLOWING SALES TAX REMOVAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I had a question I wanted to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In his absence Your Honour might allow the parliamentary secretary to take it as notice. Has the minister received, as I have, complaints about increases in drug prices which it is claimed could nullify the promised benefit of the removal of the sales tax?

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have checked this matter with the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Incidentally, he is convening a federal-provincial conference at the moment. The answer to the hon. member's question is no.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

STEVEN TRUSCOTT—INQUIRY AS TO FINDINGS OF SUPREME COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. Can the minister tell us whether there has yet been any indication from the Supreme Court of Canada as to the date on which the findings in the case of Steven Truscott will be reported to the government?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): I am not able to be of any help to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker. I have no advance information.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR MATERNITY PROTECTION FOR FEMALE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have a question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the findings of the women's bureau of the Department of Labour that women workers in Canada lack maternity protection—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): —will the government take steps to provide the legislative measures necessary—oh, he is not to do it single handed—to secure this protection for women workers under federal jurisdiction?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): First I must thank the hon. lady for the assurance that she gave me in the course of that question. May I take the question as notice.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Then may I ask a supplementary question. When does the government propose to ratify the maternity protection convention passed in 1919 by the I.L.O. at Geneva?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether that question is very urgent.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Friday, April 14, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole to consider Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and others acts in consequence thereof. When the house rose on Friday evening, clause 2 was under consideration.

On clause 2—Canadian forces, Canadian armed forces.

[English]

Mr. Kennedy: When I spoke toward the end of Friday's debate on Bill C-243 I was making an appeal to the Minister of National Defence to delay further consideration of this measure until additional studies had been carried out as to its possible effects upon our armed forces. I was referring to the amount of defence which a country such as Canada can afford. What we must strive to attain is the most effective defence possible having regard to the means we have at our disposal; we must seek to strike a balance, and this principle applies not only to Canada but to all countries.

The cost of defence arises almost entirely from the maintenance of personnel and the supply and maintenance of equipment. From the point of view of cost it matters little what type of organization is set up; what does matter is that the force should be organized on the most efficient basis. Major changes should not be undertaken unless there is a reasonable chance of success. When a major change is made such as is contemplated by this bill, it is unlikely that in future years we shall be able to return to what we have now.

Everything has a price, freedom included, and we must be prepared to meet that price if we value our freedom. If we can preserve our freedom by the expenditure of dollars let us get on with it because in the past our freedom was won at a much costlier price, paid with the blood of our young people. If we can avoid paying such a price in the future by having a force which can deter or effectively contain a threat to our freedom, let us get on with it, but I would point out that our forces as at present constituted in three services have a tremendous record under the traditional idea of units raised through voluntary contribution by many people. In times of emergency our men gave all that men could give, and I do not know how any reorganization of our forces can improve on a man who is already giving everything he has.

Traditionally our concept of Canada's armed forces has always been that these forces are of a voluntary nature. We ran into difficulties whenever we resorted to any other way of raising forces. In effect this means that in peacetime we must have regular and reserve forces, particularly reserve forces because we cannot afford a large enough regular force to handle all emergencies. Supporting our regular force we must have an organization which allows quick and efficient mobilization of partly trained personnel.

Recruitment to our forces depends upon some attraction, and the greatest attraction at present is the three choices open to those who wish to serve their country. They can go into the navy, the army or the air force provided they can meet the basic requirements of the services. It is no secret that in all our present-day forces including the infantry, which has always been looked upon as the bottom of the barrel, every serving man is a specialist in his own right. Even the infantrymen are specialists today. Nobody should think that the infantry is outdated. In Viet Nam more infantrymen are being used than any other type of fighting personnel.

I wish to deal briefly with the question of morale. It is something which is hard to explain. Morale is something that is within a man himself. Not even the man who possesses it can explain what it is. It depends on many things such as environment and faith or confidence in various things, not least faith and confidence in the people surrounding one. One of the major attributes of morale is esprit de corps. I do not know how greatly unification is going to disturb esprit de corps but I suggest that our present method of organizing forces linked to traditionally famous units is very good for morale. It invites friendly competition and even in peacetime it is a great attraction for those who wish to serve their country by affiliating themselves with something to which they can look with pride.

One of the greatest difficulties I found in service operations lay in the field of communications. There was no difficulty in having various arms of the services. On the beaches of Normandy on D-day it could not have mattered less that a lad was in a naval suit, an army suit or an air force suit. As a matter of fact, on the beachhead many people wore the uniforms of many countries. It did not matter to the infantry coming in on a landing barge that a navy chap piled out first into the water with a rope and went ashore in order to make fast the barge so they could follow with their equipment and reach shore without drowning. There was no misunderstanding. Everyone knew his job and did it.

So far as morale on D-day is concerned, many men went ashore ill from seasickness after crossing rough water, but they had been so well briefed and the organization was of such a standard that the minute they reached land they went into action and were as good as the rest in practically no time. I know of a company during the second world war which started with 110 officers and men. It went through hell to reach an objective and only 18 men survived to reach that objective. You cannot tell me those men did not have morale.

We must be very careful in peacetime not to do anything with our forces that will upset the spirit of challenge and opportunity and security. These are the three most important things which affect morale. We know that at present there are certain people who are "browned off" with the forces and want to get out of them. I have talked to a lot of these people and their principal grievances are about these three things. They do not know where they are going. They become tired of being pushed around without being given a straight course to follow.

I might say that there is also a bit of hypocrisy involved in this issue. During the time of mourning for our late and beloved Governor General I had an opportunity to see the chief of staff, General Allard, being interviewed on television about the famous Canadian regiment, the Royal 22nd, in which both he and the late Governor General had served. He mentioned the terrific esprit de corps which this regiment had created. General Allard said that from this regiment eight generals, I believe, had sprung, and he expressed the opinion that had it not been for the existence of such a regiment many of those people of French descent might never have reached such high rank. That admission shows that an established regiment does a lot for a soldier.

There is another bit of hypocrisy with reference to the celebrations commemorating the great battles of the first world war. Endless reference has been made to the famous units which took part in those battles and the fact that the men covered themselves with glory in order that the names of their regiments would get into the history books.

In conclusion I express the fear that if complete unification is proceeded with it may bring into the armed forces some type of socialism. It might upset the relationship between officers and men which is so important. It might lead to a complete rotting away of the heart and soul of the armed forces. It might even end up in a type of dictatorship. Furthermore, I believe that unification will lead to compulsory service in peacetime and conscription in time of war. As an old infantryman I know that a large part of the training of an infantryman is concerned with learning how to use the ground. This means that he learns to use the ground to conceal himself from the enemy, protect himself and get as close to his objective as possible. The objective of the infantryman is to close with the enemy. The only danger is that once he finds a hole in the ground, gets into it and is then shot at, it takes a lot of courage to get out of the hole again. I should like to say to the minister that he has been shot at not only by his own troops but by his enemies. He has perhaps got himself into a bit of a hole. I hope he will have the courage to get out and face reality.

[Mr. Kennedy.]

Mr. Rochon: Mr. Chairman, at the very outset of this debate on integration and unification of the Canadian armed forces, I proposed to take part in it.

Then, having heard the members of the opposition, and more particularly those of the Conservative party, and the lack of seriousness of the arguments put forth by their leader, I felt my intervention would be useless, convinced as I was that they had muffed their strategy and that the house could, the very next day, pass the bill.

Now, however, events having turned out as they have, in view of the partisanship and their obvious obstruction, I have thought better of it; I decided, at the very last minute, to revert to my first intention. Indeed, I felt it was my duty to intervene and protest against the ill will, the lack of understanding and the retrograde attitude which inspired most of those we have heard.

In his speech the official opposition leader (Mr. Diefenbaker) gave us a fine vaudeville act. It was lively, I admit, but not very constructive. He proved that his party had run out of arguments to fight this government project. We realized that he, as much as his members, opposes the bill perhaps not for the sake of opposing it but rather to lead the people into believing that they are, in our Canadian parliament, the true defenders of our traditions.

For almost two months now, Mr. Chairman, either in the permanent committee on national defence, or here in the house, we have heard the same arguments, if that name can be given to a negative and systematic opposition far more akin to sentimentality than to reality.

We have heard thousands of words based on what retired members of the forces have said. They are certainly not incompetent, for they served their country well, they performed their duties nobly, and we are grateful to them for it. But mind you, they are no longer responsible for administration and command and, therefore, they are not as well informed as those who are on active service.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, I followed closely the proceedings of the defence committee, I listened to and I studied the evidence given by the experts who paraded in the front of us and I came to the conclusion that the unification problem is, first and foremost, a technical problem.

Indeed, our military commitments, the policy of development of our armed forces and the matters of strategy, are closely related to the very structure of our military system. In that sense, it is normal for the hon. members to examine the policy of the government, and to wonder whether the new planned structures for our armed forces will meet Canada's requirements.

But I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we narrow deliberately the scope of the debate when we completely forget the technical area in order to show that the new format of our forces will reduce our military capabilities and therefore, jeopardize the defence of our territory and our continent.

To look upon unification as a simple matter of adopting a common uniform, eliminating the word royal and making a few other changes, generally of minor importance, compared to the tremendous administrative, economic and military advantages of the government project is to distort the problem further.

A lot has been said up to now about the opposition of some senior officers to the government project.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to emphasize the false impression that the opposition tries to create by implying that all the well-informed military people are opposed to the project when those who support it, are either misinformed or politically committed.

First, we must remember that, by tradition, military people are rather conservative. They do not like structural changes and generally prefer the status quo to innovations. That is, I think, something which can be noticed in all the armies of the world. I do not say that such a stand is wrong in itself. On the contrary, in a sound democracy such as ours, it is precisely traditionally based institutions like the Army, the Navy and the Air Force which ensure the permanency of certain principles which are dear to us.

But this does not mean that we should stand aloof from progress, be wrapped up and live in the past, without being aware that the world is changing all the time and that in this atomic age, every year, even every month is bringing something new, as one would have to be blind not to understand that we also in Canada should make it our duty to progress, to change and improve what was good 25 or 30 years ago, in order to adapt it to the needs of modern times, for the greatest welfare of this country.

Mr. Chairman, may I at this stage quote a few lines from the evidence given by General Allard. I quote:

> The complexity of modern strategy and the size of forces we can afford to maintain make it essential that our forces be made up of mutually-supporting, flexible and mobile forces. This type of force dictates that in the planning, management and command aspects the whole emphasis must be on unified thinking among all its elements. So much for the changing circumstances under which we are operating.

Much has been said up to now, Mr. Chairman, about the opposition shown by certain senior officers to Bill C-243. Allow me to recall once more some other words on the part of the chief commanding officer of Canada's armed forces—as part of his evidence before the committee on February 28 last. I believe they do reflect the feeling of the majority of the Canadian people:

> On the one hand, there are called before you officers of the forces, like myself, who are responsible for the organization, efficiency and morale of the forces for your defence, and who can speak only within the bounds of these responsibilities under the policies set forth by the Government. On the other hand, other people are called before you, who have no responsibilities to anybody but themselves, and therefore can make statements on matters for which they bear no responsibility.
> I would like to make it clear, therefore, that in making my presentation before you I do so as the man responsible for carrying out the policy of the government through the Minister of National Defence, for ensuring that the defence forces we have today are organized, equipped, and trained and possess the morale—

—something was said about the morale, Mr. Chairman—

> —to accept any task they have or are likely to be given. Since the passing—

General Allard went on,

> —of Bill C-90 and my appointment as Chief of Operational Readiness, then as Commander Mobile Command and latterly as Chief of the Defence Staff, I feel absolutely confident—

Here again, these words are from the chief commanding officer of Canada's armed forces, > —that this task can be carried out best by the reorganization of the forces as set out in Bill C-243.

Following these words, Mr. Chairman, I understood that I could not very well accept the first objection raised, even if it originated from respectable military circles.

I have a great deal of respect for Admiral Landymore, General Fleury or General Moncel, but the fact remains that they are not at present in the armed forces. They served their country gloriously, and we should be very grateful to them, but it is quite another thing to accept their evidence as the integral truth, and we cannot conclude from this that all experienced military personnel are against the program proposed by the government. Even those who, like General Miller, do not accept this program, cannot help but say, as they did before the defence committee: "Perhaps the program will eventually turn out to be a good thing".

Another mistake, Mr. Chairman, on the part of those who are against the program, is that they turned a basically technical problem into a sentimental and political football. Instead of trying to show that Canada will be less prepared to take on military responsibilities within NATO or NORAD or to assist the United Nations, efforts have been made to question the integrity of the chief of staff, to involve royalty in this problem, to arouse the public on a matter of uniforms.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) was brilliantly supported on this point by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) who made it quite clear that Canada will not only be in a position to carry out its military commitments but will be in a better position to play its proper role in the defence of the free world.

Instead of insisting on wasting the time of the house, to discredit the parliament of Canada, as was the case with the flag debate, it seems to me that the opposition should once and for all admit that the government may sometimes be right, that the experts of the national defence department are not all incompetent, that the armed forces personnel agree with the project and, finally, that the majority of Canadians have given the present government the responsibility of carrying out this project.

Mr. Chairman, it has been my privilege last fall to visit the Canadian military bases in Europe. Allow me to say how proud I was of being a Canadian. Our servicemen received the parliamentarians with warmth and dignity. They displayed good manners and reassured members of parliament on their excellent training. I think Canada is second to none as far as its forces' behaviour and their excellent morale are concerned.

If, as Conservative members claim, morale is very low among our forces, this was a perfect opportunity for the officers to say a word about it to the visiting legislators. In fact, Mr. Chairman, we never heard—and here I am certain that the hon. members for London and Queens-Lunenburg (Messrs. Irvine and Crouse) who were in the group will agree with me—unfavourable comments on unification.

But so many favourable comments, Mr. Chairman. Servicemen were happy to talk about the numerous administrative and even strategic advantages, in regard to co-ordination of command, for instance, thanks to the plan now before the committee of the whole.

I do not venture into technical discussions where even experts take divergent views. And that is not new. If generals find it difficult on the battlefield to agree on a plan of attack or defence, as we can see from memoirs of every army chief, all the more should we expect that, sitting comfortably in their offices, they have a tendency to apprehend certain innovations, while others endorse them enthusiastically.

Therefore, if the commanding officers can hardly reach an agreement, how do you expect me to share the views of laymen in this matter, such as the hon. members opposite, who have been attempting to raise a bogey for so many days?

Where did they get they military science, which they believe is so up to date? Where, Mr. Chairman, I ask them?

On the other hand, we keep referring to the evidence given before the committee on national defence. I was a member of that committee, and I followed its meetings with a great deal of interest.

What did I see there? I saw members who came not to find out objectively what the merits and faults of the bill were, but to oppose the minister, and to use every possible means to try to extract from the witnesses a condemnation of this measure.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the people—and what we have seen in the papers for several days is a striking indication of it—have already drawn the line between partisanship and seriousness a long time ago, in this debate.

I myself prefer to trust a man like the hon. Minister of National Defence who is not given to putting forward ill-prepared bills or a man like the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs who gave his approval to the bill, rather than the perpetual malcontents opposite, who cannot draw the line between their duty to legislate and their desire to be re-elected by any means.

When the time comes, Mr. Chairman, and I hope it will be very soon, I will wholeheartedly support the government's bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? Would the hon. member like to correct his remarks in Hansard and remove the reflection that he cast upon members of the committee, whom he said went there not to gain information about the bill but merely to make life difficult for the minister? Were not members of that committee in the same position as the hon. member? Were they not there for the purpose of performing their duty to the House of Commons?

[Translation]

Mr. Rochon: Mr. Chairman, I want to point out to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) that I did not mention the members who belong to the committee, but rather those who attended, as spectators, the meetings of the committee and who tried, on several occasions, to distract by their remarks, the witnesses and the members who wanted them to give some explanations.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member is casting reflections on members of the House of Commons. He is imputing motives to them in their attendance at that committee. Every member of the House of Commons is entitled to attend committee hearings and is in the same position as the members of that committee with regard to responsibility. But I suggest—this is the question of privilege—that the hon. member is imputing motives to members of this house and he should withdraw that statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Rochon: Mr. Chairman, I do not impute motives to any member of this house, but we must understand that words have their meanings; that is "yes" means "yes" and "no" means "no". When there is criticism, we can understand what the critic meant to say or do.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I raised a question of privilege on which I think you must make a ruling. It is all very well for the hon. member to get up and say yes means yes and no means no, but he made a statement imputing motives to the members of the House of Commons who were in attendance at that committee. It is not within the rules to impute motives and the hon. member must withdraw that statement. I ask for a ruling from the Chair.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I believe the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Rochon) knows the rules of the house. It is not the practice in the house to impute motives to other members as far as their attendance in the house or in a committee is concerned. I trust that the hon. member did not intend to impute motives to hon. members of the opposition who attended meetings of the committee on national defence, either as members of the committee or as spectators; therefore, I would ask him to withdraw his words.

Mr. Rochon: Mr. Chairman, if my words have been misinterpreted, I shall give in to your request and withdraw them.

Mr. Régimbal: Mr. Chairman, like several other hon. members who spoke in this debate, I had also decided not to speak but to listen to the views of the members of the standing committee on national defence, for most of them were particularly knowledgeable in this field, either because they were former ministers of national defence or because they had served in the armed forces, or because they had closely followed the committee proceedings and heard the evidence and comments of various witnesses who appeared before the committee.

For my part, not having had any of these experiences, I did not think myself competent to participate in the debate. However, it was the very weak speech made last Tuesday, on April 11, by the minister himself, which led me to change my mind and gave me self-confidence.

As it can be found in Hansard of that day at page 14792, the minister stated the following on April 11:

> Of course the chiefs of staff were predominantly opposed to the unification of the armed forces. Chiefs of staff all over the world are opposed to the unification of the armed forces.

So in the light of their experience, their knowledge, their studies and their research, the chiefs of staff are opposed to this experimental measure concerning unification, which has already been rejected by all major countries of the world, after long and careful studies.

For this reason, our officers have been summarily fired or forced into early retirement, because the views of the little corporal must prevail.

So, in his view, experience no longer counts. Wisdom and prudence have little meaning any more and if that is a worthwhile principle, it should find some application elsewhere, in industry, in the teaching profession, in the cabinet, as well as in the House of Commons.

Therefore, I have no fear in putting forth my opinions since the minister encourages me to do so, and under the same principle he must admit that I speak with greater authority than he, inasmuch as he has more experience than I, and experience does not count.

I take part in this debate for the simple reason that little by little, as it becomes more protracted, public opinion is beginning to awaken and to take an interest in the matter.

I fully realize that by prolonging the debate, we take the risk of being charged with filibustering, but I am quickly consoled for I realize that those reproaches come almost exclusively from narrow-minded persons, from blind supporters of the government, from servile followers who contributed to Hansard prepared speeches, delivered unconvincingly and without much imagination.

They also come from those who take particular pleasure on every occasion in making fun of those procedures—

Mr. Béchard: On a point of order. A little earlier the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Rochon) had to withdraw certain remarks because it was claimed that he was trying to impute motives to some hon. members. Well that is what the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes is now doing in his speech.

Mr. Régimbal: Whoever feels stung should scratch himself. But, if one listened attentively, I said: for I realize that those reproaches come almost exclusively from narrow-minded people. Therefore, if the hat fits, wear it.

They come also from those who revel on every occasion in making fun of the procedure of this institution.

[Mr. Régimbal.]

Besides, I realize more and more that the public, the people in my riding as well as in others, and the editorial writers practically everywhere, are beginning to see the dangers inherent in that unification adventure, as stated earlier by the hon. member for Laval; that adventure into the unknown.

• (4:10 p.m.)

An ever growing concern is being felt in all segments of the population because of the uncompromising attitude of the minister who is left alone to defend himself. Only two ministers have come to his rescue, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) who admitted himself the weakness of his arguments, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) who soon fell back upon a diplomatic jargon, remaining silent about the direct implications of unification on our commitments to various military alliances.

At the beginning, the population in general would have supported the minister, because he had carefully started by speaking about integrating the general staff and unifying command for purposes of effectiveness, of co-ordination and economy.

It has only been realized in the last ten days that the intention is to develop a kind of international police force, made up of handymen, interchangeable from one occupation to another, but unable, according to expert evidence, to ensure our own national defence.

The people are concerned by the fact that not a single allied country came and testified for that project. They realize, from day to day, that once it is over, that change will oblige us to depend on our neighbours to the south for our own protection and even to allow them to occupy strategic points in our country.

They fear that if a foreign country thus occupies those strategic points, it will try first of all to protect and defend its own territory, and we will be expendable.

In addition, a good number of our citizens may have noticed that the unification of the armed forces, to such an extent as to completely remove the means of identification of the various services, or units, does not exist in any other field.

Then, why did we not unify social clubs whose common goal is to help? Why not just one social club? Why do we have the Richelieu, the Lions, the Kiwanis, the Kinsmen, the Rotary clubs? Again, why not a single group of university graduates, a single association? Why have doctors associations, lawyers, engineers, sociologists and teachers associations?

In all these areas, at all times, it has been found that the identification with a particular cause or task has been an efficient, stimulating and progressive way of increasing one's skill and achieving full development. Why should it be different with the armed forces? The evidence given by the experts has been practically unanimous on this point.

Mr. Chairman, there is another matter on which nobody has insisted very much and which will certainly recur when the house examines clause 6 of this bill. I refer to this at the resolution stage of the debate and some hon. members opposite have called this a childish point. Still, it was stated that to fulfil the contemplated tasks properly, it will be necessary to have at least 100,000 people in the forces. It is a fact, moreover, that the number of resignations is increasing and that there are fewer enlistments. It is feared, and rightly so, that young people will more and more hesitate to enlist in a common force, rather than in a definite service, such as the air force, the army or the navy.

What will happen if the number of our men becomes less than the required minimum? There is only one answer, and indeed, the minister did not deny it, that is conscription. I can hardly imagine how some members opposite and members of other parties, especially members of the Ralliement Créditiste, will manage to explain their attitude to their constituents?

Yet, the result is unavoidable and the first signs can already be seen. In fact, the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) pointed out to the house last Friday, April 14, the objections put forward by five of his constituents who are in the armed forces at the present time and who were refused permission to retire so as to return to civilian life, notwithstanding commitments to the contrary made to them when they enlisted. This is conscription.

We were also told that the men in the armed forces at present will have to accept transfers due to unification. Again, this is conscription. It is obvious that if future commitments force us to bring up the strength of our forces, there will have to be conscription, and this, as I say, the minister has not denied and cannot deny.

Still, the present system is fully adequate in terms of our obligations. So, why the transformation? To gratify the ambition, the idea of one man who, once again, stands alone in his stubbornness.

This leads me to the last point, Mr. Chairman, which has been mentioned repeatedly: the whole armed forces system, the whole system of national defence must be closely related to the external affairs policy; it is obvious that the unification the minister proposes cannot meet the demands of our commitments with NATO or NORAD, for instance.

No co-ordination is possible with the armed forces of our closest allies, namely the United States, Great Britain, France, or the western countries, for the simple reason that they have not adopted the same defence system. We are bound to be completely alone and we shall inescapably become an international laughing stock. Last week, the minister candidly asked us to give up the discussions and to put the question immediately.

My hon. friend from Sainte-Anne (Mr. Loiselle) repeated the same request saying: We are willing to take our responsibilities, and if we are mistaken, if this undertaking is disastrous, the people can always vote against us. What candour! What arrogance!

The security of the country is involved, not the security of the party or the Liberal government; we do not care about them, we do not give a hoot about them. Our national sovereignty is involved, so is our international prestige; also involved is the confidence of our allies, in short our maturity. We are not concerned about the minister's future but about our own future and that of the whole country.

[English]

We must admit, Mr. Chairman, that many points have been repeated in the course of this debate in order to try to get our feelings, our doubts and our objections across to the minister. I also admit that this has been the most futile and frustrating experience of this whole session. The minister will not listen to reason. The minister insists on going ahead with his own little game of Russian roulette. If he wants to commit political suicide, I suppose that is his business, but trying to prevent this nation from committing suicide is our and everybody's business. This is why I do not agree that we should get back to other government business. What is the hurry? What more important business is there than the security and the defence of our nation for years to come? We have been on this subject for nine days. No one should mind spending 90 days when our future is at stake if we can avoid suicide or having to rebuild our defence system if this pipe dream proves to be the failure which we expect it to be. It is not time to stop the debate; it is time for the matter to be taken out of the minister's hands and for us to hear a greater authority on the subject than he is. It is more than time for us to hear from the Prime Minister himself.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, there can be no question of putting an end to the debate until the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) himself tells us in this house that he takes full responsibility for that measure, explains what he means by unification, what it will cost the nation, what our allies think of it.

The minister has very clearly lost the confidence of the opposition, the general staff, or a good number of them, newspaper writers and commentators, and a large number of citizens. It is time for the Prime Minister to step in; the Canadian people have the right to expect explanations, either his full approval and his reasons therefor, or his disapproval and his decision to postpone consideration of the matter, after thinking it over and consulting all the parties concerned, in Canada and abroad.

Mr. Chairman, I do believe that the Prime Minister should take the floor.

• (4:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member mentioned the absence of the Prime Minister during the whole course of this debate. Is the hon. member of the opinion, in view of the threatened resignation of the Minister of National Defence and the absence of the Prime Minister during this debate, that the Minister of National Defence is really the most powerful member of the Liberal cabinet?

Mr. Régimbal: It would seem so, without a doubt. He feels very much alone, and we have constantly underlined the fact that he is sitting alone.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question? Would he indicate to the house who wrote that speech, because it certainly did not sound like him?

Mr. Régimbal: I have a witness in the house who can prove it was written by me. Even the most reasonable people in this house are unanimously of the opinion that unification is a bad move.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I was proud to be a witness this morning in the other place to the installation of the new Governor General, His Excellency the Honourable Roland Michener. I am sure that all hon. members will permit me at this moment to say on their behalf as well as mine that we were all proud to be there at this fine ceremony which brought home to us once more the importance of our system of government. We are proud also of His Excellency and of his gracious lady and the part they played this morning. Canada can take great satisfaction, Mr. Chairman, from her long line of illustrious Governors General. The late incumbent so dear in our memory, Hon. Georges P. Vanier, brought great prestige to this office. I know that the outstanding man Canada recognized and installed in the office this morning will in turn bring his great discernment and knowledge to that high position. The great magnanimity of this outstanding Canadian will bring honour to this position and to his service to Canada as Her Majesty's representative. As the program progressed I thought, as I am sure other hon. members did, of our political system of responsible government under a constitutional monarchy. Like many others in that great chamber I concluded that in this year of our centenary of confederation this system has stood the test of time. May it continue to serve our country far into the many centuries of our future.

Having permitted me to mention the events of the day, Mr. Chairman, we must now get on with this debate. I have listened carefully to the proceedings thus far. Last year I spoke in protest against unification of the armed forces and my remarks appear in Hansard at page 9793. I spoke on behalf on the Napanee and Picton militia units in the riding of Prince Edward-Lennox. The policies of this government have annihilated these militia units so they no longer exist. I protested the closing of the armouries in my constituency and in other constituencies. At that time we put forward logical arguments on behalf of the volunteer system, on behalf of the well tried and proven militia system which has been the defence of this country in the past.

The maintenance of these services, the persons who manned them, their methods and their great principles, have been part of the policy of the Conservative party. We do not believe in abandoning methods and systems that bring to the fore the enterprise of the individual. We do not believe in abandoning productive and reliable existing services that are now and have been employed for the protection and defence of the individual and of our country. We will not sit here passively and submit to the passage of Bill No. C-243 because we believe it is our duty as Canadians to offer constructive criticism to this, the worst military legislation that has ever been presented to a Canadian parliament.

I have been awaiting with interest the rumoured lawsuit the Minister of National Defence said he was going to bring against the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona if he repeated certain utterances outside the house which he had made within the house. The minister has, through his minions in his department, fired all those who would dare offer any opinion against the unification scheme. Through the Prime Minister, the cabinet and party discipline he has been able to silence most of those on the Liberal benches. However, there are bound to be many supporters of the Liberal government who are against the unification policy. Of course, party discipline has a far greater influence on their minds than the happiness or welfare of the members of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force. I have used this nomenclature, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force because they still exist. However, if clause 5 of this bill passes those names will pass forever into obscurity and oblivion, which they certainly do not deserve.

I have another point to make. The minister has contended that a man's attitude toward unification has no bearing upon his service with the Department of National Defence. When I was at Trenton the other day I found this statement was not borne out by the facts. An example is clearly evident in Trenton. Air Commodore Diamond, the commander of air transport command at Trenton, who was never an advocate of unification and who had been uneasy about it, was recently retired prematurely. He still had a couple of years to serve. Recently he was replaced by Air Commodore Hull, an advocate of unification who, as of last Friday, was promoted to air vice marshal in charge of the same command.

Mr. Hellyer: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman. Air Commodore Diamond retired I believe about three months ahead of his normal retirement time at his own request in order to take a position with private industry. He was a fine, dedicated and gallant officer. There has been a request outstanding for many years to recognize the important part that air transport command plays in the over-all operations of the Canadian armed forces. It was never given the recognition it deserved and I accepted a recommendation of the staff that we promote Air Commodore Hull in a long overdue acknowledgement of the excellence of air transport command and the important part that it plays in the over-all effectiveness of the Canadian armed forces. I have no hesitation in saying that there is no connection of any kind whatever between the beliefs of these two men, because I do not personally know their beliefs, and the recent promotion which took place. It was simply, a long overdue recognition of the relative importance of that command and the excellent air and ground crews who serve under it.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I thank the minister for his effort to explain the glaring coincidence that nevertheless continues to exist. I also thank him for correcting me on the length of time that Air Commodore Diamond would have been able to serve. I said that he retired prematurely and the minister has borne that out; there was still time remaining that he could have served. However, the people in the Trenton area as well as the servicemen at the air station there could not help but be aware of the inequitable policy of the Minister of National Defence and of the present government.

What is the reason for this, Mr. Chairman? I have been watching this situation for some time and I contend that the minister and his staff have betrayed the services. I am sure we can all see now what is taking place, something which has been mentioned before. What we are witnessing is sweeping socialism, or perhaps we might better call it creeping socialism. Socialism has now crept up on these three services with the assistance of the minister and the present government.

The government today is not a Liberal government which is carrying on the time-honoured traditions of Liberalism. This government is nothing but a socialist government, consisting of a minority of the members of this house who are supported on the government benches by the splintered crutches of socialism. This sickly body of members is ready to vote yes at the first opportunity without debating the matter in order to pass this bill and to further additional socialistic policies and legislation which will stifle and stultify individuals in this country.

This is all too evident today, Mr. Chairman, as we watch the actions of this government. They took away one good and distinctive flag and gave us two or three others in its place. In many cases they have removed the coat of arms as a distinctive insignia. Wherever the government could disregard or remove any of Canada's traditions they have done so, especially our Anglo-Saxon traditions.

I wonder what explanation the government will have for a little incident that occurred in the other place this morning when only six bars of the royal anthem were played. The same thing occurred in front of the peace tower.

Mr. Prud'homme: Could I ask the hon. member a question? I understand that six bars are played for the Governor General, nine bars for the Queen's husband, the Duke of Edinburgh, 12 bars for Princess Margaret and the entire anthem for the Queen. That is why six bars were played this morning.

Mr. Alkenbrack: It was most inadequate, Mr. Chairman, and the explanation of the hon. member is also most inadequate. To continue my remarks, what possible advantage can there be in taking from our servicemen their traditions and time-honoured uniforms as well as the insignia that identify them proudly and particularly with the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army or the Royal Canadian Air Force?

I am sure that economy cannot be the reason for this step. Stocks of uniforms and related equipment now held by the government must be of enormous value and represent a tremendous investment. Even at the most conservative estimate the cost of such a changeover must be overwhelming. Not only are the present stocks to be sacrificed but the tremendous cost of new uniforms and equipment must be met as well. No, sir, economy cannot possibly be the reason. Such a measure as this, Mr. Chairman, is obviously self-defeating before it starts. Talking just about cost at this time is useless, but it does remind me that the present government in its spending practices is the most irresponsible government that Canada has ever had. This government obtains less value for the taxpayer's dollar than has any government in our history.

I ask the minister this question, and I think I know what his answer will be. Why this passion for conformity at this time, this passion to put all our soldiers, sailors and airmen into one uniform? Is this for the sake of appearance or is the minister just anxious to get this measure through in time to send a detachment of our armed forces to Expo in their new green uniforms? I suppose such a consideration is not even worthy of thought.

The existing uniforms of our armed services are hallowed and respected not only by the men who wear them but also by the Canadian people, not just because they are time-honoured but because they have been worn by men who shed their blood in conflict. By whose declaration do these uniforms suddenly become unworthy? While we are speaking in this chamber young men are following in the traditions of Chateauguay, Crysler's Farm, Beaver Dam, Queenston, the Transvaal, Yprès, Vimy Ridge, Dieppe and Hochwald Forest. These are but a few among many names of places where Canadians have served and they ring with courage and with sacrifice. We are now about to discard one more of the many traditions which were so bitterly won in these fateful places.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. Alkenbrack: No, Mr. Chairman, I think I have been very generous in giving the minister time, but I will permit a question when I am finished.

Last year I remember accusing this government of following a policy of nihilism, of being interested in nothingness. In face of all of the honour which has been won by our soldiers, sailors and airmen we are proposing to take their trophies away from them. We are going to lump them together in a nondescript, common and unidentifiable cloth shorn of honours and indicative of nothing. Up to now one could identify a serviceman on the street and the honoured occupation of his choice by his uniform. This will not be the case if this bill passes. The minister, the Prime Minister and his cabinet—this cabinet of socialistic nihilists—will have done their work of consigning the three individual defence systems to oblivion.

I suppose that of the three services the navy will be the hardest hit. The uniform of our seamen is the oldest and least changed of the three throughout the years, and it lacks for nothing in the pride with which it is worn. What could possibly replace our naval uniform, Mr. Chairman?

I have a further point to make in opposition to this bill. Certain sections of opinion in this country are against the coercive measures which the minister is proposing. At some time in the future these could lead to the impressing of our youth into the monolith which the minister is trying to build. I have in mind the conscription measures which could result from this legislation.

A great many men joined one or another of the three services because of difficulty in finding civilian employment, or they had dropped out of school. At present they exercise a degree of freedom to the extent that they can enter the service of their choice. Recruiting from this source is one of the mainstreams which has fed our volunteer system, and it has been found good. Unification might well damage this system. A man might wish to join the air force. Under this unification plan he might find himself serving in the navy or in the air force. This is tantamount to conscription.

Mr. Hellyer: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. member but that is not going to happen.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I wish to make a further point. What is it that attracts visitors to the spectacles at Old Fort Henry, Fort York and other historic places where the old drills and formations are reenacted by platoons of men in the direct tradition of those who took part in those engagements long ago? What about the colourful changing of the guard ceremony which is held right here on parliament hill—a tremendous attraction to tourists who come to our country as well as being of tremendous benefit to culture? During the summer months this ceremony is performed by the Canadian Guards, one battalion of whom is stationed at Picton in my own constituency of Prince Edward-Lennox. One is bound to agree without hesitation that on these occasions the colourful and distinctive uniforms are the chief attraction. By what strange process do we reason that the three services cannot work together as an integrated force unless they are dressed in the same uniforms?

Amphibious landings on a gigantic scale were successfully carried out in the second world war. I think particularly of the landings in Normandy on June 6, 1944. One of my brothers who took part in that operation said: "Thank God for the blue-clad navy which made it all possible and for the air force which secured the air over our hard-pressed troops as they found the land beneath their feet."

One is reminded that centuries ago it was the custom to deprive a regiment of its unit badge or some other insignia as a punishment for having retreated contrary to orders or for committing some other piece of gross misconduct. Today we are doing the same to the Canadian armed forces and debasing them for no better reason than political expediency. One of these expedients is the removal of Anglo-Saxon traditions from our services.

Mr. Hellyer: Nonsense.

Mr. Alkenbrack: That is glaringly obvious. It is so obvious that it cannot be anything else but deliberate. If there are any other reasons they are as yet obscure and denied to the knowledge of the Canadian people. Regiments of marching men, men who man ships at sea and submarines beneath the sea, men who fly our aircraft and who service them on the ground have their separate distinctions even within the pattern of their individual services and to insist on driving them into one common mould is to deprive the nation of the efficiency which has arisen because of their pride of service in their separate organizations.

What does our youth think about this question? I quote an excerpt from a first-prize-winning address made by Mr. Glen Davidson of Flinton, Ontario, a student of North Addington high school, at an oratorical contest held at the town of Napanee last week. His subject was unification and I quote one powerful paragraph from the address which this intelligent young man made:

> We now have a volunteer army of men who choose to join either the army, the air force or the navy. If these men are now to be railroaded into the new system, their contracts torn up and themselves forced into a unified force, then their preferences are trampled upon and this can demoralize them as defence men. Moreover, it kills all competition among the three forces and hence will hurt morale.

Mr. Chairman, that is the youth of Canada speaking, and speaking very eloquently and sensibly.

Mr. Nowlan: He won the contest.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I warn the Prime Minister and the government that they should pay attention to the youth of Canada and govern themselves accordingly.

I also wish to quote from the Globe and Mail of April 13. This passage may have been quoted earlier. In any case I believe it is timely to mention it. These words appeared in the column headed "Just what was said" and the newspaper quotes Admiral the Earl Mountbatten with reference to the reorganization of the armed forces in Britain. He said:

> In the British reorganization care has been taken to preserve esprit de corps and morale. It has been accepted that to achieve this the three services must retain their uniforms and ranks with an identifiable professional head of their service. The idea of a single uniform and rank structure was also rejected as undesirable and unnecessary. Unified command at the appropriate level is exercised by an officer from any one service, wearing his own uniform and using his own service rank (assisted by an integrated staff) who commands all units of the three services placed under his command.

I am sure Earl Mountbatten's naval record will commend this quotation to the administration.

There is one other point I wish to make. The Minister of National Defence has not made out a good case for unification. He has tried to be a Hitler or a Mussolini or a Napoleon by firing all those who disagree with him and lionizing those who agree. Those who occupy positions of power can always find plenty of Allards during a contentious issue such as this but the invaluable Landymores do not come forward in very great numbers.

I quote here from an editorial which appeared in the Napanee Beaver of April 12, a newspaper in my own constituency:

> Neither Defence Minister Hellyer nor any serving officer has been able to make a good strong case for creating a single service with a common uniform and rank structure.
> Mr. Hellyer has never been anxious to specify exactly what kind of role he sees for the unified Canadian force. If the defence committee succeeds in clarifying that, even if it fails to stop unification, it will have served a useful purpose.

The Canadian people, all of whom are interested in the preservation of the defence of this country, do not require the Minister of National Defence to be taking any cues from or listening to the admonishments of the Secretary of State for External Affairs or even of the Prime Minister. I say this to him because the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs are pacifists who will do anything for peace, such as the selling out of the interests of Britain and France by the Prime Minister in 1956 of the Suez Canal question whereby he put Colonel Nasser of Egypt in the driver's seat which Nasser has occupied ever since.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Alkenbrack: This won the Nobel peace prize for the Prime Minister in 1957, and it is also sponsored by a socialist and pacifist organization. I say now to the Prime Minister, in the light of the latest happenings in Aden, Arabia, that he should admonish his protégé, Colonel Nasser, to stop fighting the efforts of Britain, so beleaguered at this time in trying to keep the peace in that country to which, I understand, Colonel Nasser has sent upwards of 50,000 troops. I would think the Prime Minister's influence might go a long way with these ruffians.

To return to the Minister of National Defence, I simply ask him to pause for a minute. He should forget about this grandiose plan and forget about playing with those things that are dear to the hearts of the men who serve this country. He should think about his own personal duty in the position of power that he occupies. He should think about his duty with respect to the defence of Canada. The minister of defence of this or of any other democratic country is not supposed to be a pacifist. It is the duty of the Minister of National Defence to see that the most effective war making instruments and devices are available at all times to the people of this country through their armed forces, no matter what the international situation is, no matter what the Prime Minister tells him, and regardless of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs informs him is the state of NATO, NORAD, the United Nations or any other international defence organization.

I remind the Minister of National Defence that he does not perform duties such as his with normal and expected efficiency by tearing down the morale of the men who have to fight for Canada. In any and all eventualities the minister might better resign than force this bill through by closure at this time. The people of Canada are watching again, as they did before, and the Liberal parliamentary pedigree is running true to form: pipe line debate—closure; flag debate—closure; and now unification of the armed forces into the same pants and jacket—closure. I admonish the minister to think twice before he proceeds with legislation that is going to be so injurious to the men who defend our country, so injurious to their morale, and does nothing for the defence of Canada at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the question I was going to ask the hon. gentleman is this: Does he really believe that the other ranks, particularly in the air force and the army, are proud of their summer uniforms?

Mr. Alkenbrack: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I think that all ranks are proud of their uniforms.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the hon. member not aware, that the cloth is so bad that after they wear the uniforms on the parade ground three or four times they look like they have not been pressed for days or weeks, and is he not aware that they can hardly wait to get a decent cut and decent cloth so they can be smart on parade and wherever they go?

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I would refute that statement with the suggestion to the minister that if the cloth is inferior, if it will not stand up to normal use in all normal weather, then that is a matter for him to investigate. If it is inferior that is his fault.

Mr. Hellyer: That is what we are doing.

Mr. Alkenbrack: The remedy is to change—

Mr. Hellyer: We are doing something about it.

Mr. Alkenbrack: —the cloth, not change the uniform.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, this is the first opportunity I have had to speak on this bill in committee of the whole. I spoke on it before it was referred to the defence committee which held lengthy hearings that were most instructive. I have not changed my mind one iota in the interim. In fact the committee hearings and the evidence which came from them have pointed out more and more that this bill should not be proceeded with.

I heard the hon. member for Laval speak today and on April 7 I heard my hon. friend from Chicoutimi speak on this bill. In that connection I refer to page 14675 of Hansard for April 7 where the hon. member for Chicoutimi is recorded as saying:

> Opposition to this bill on emotional grounds is understandable but I cannot condone it. Opposition on logical grounds indicates a lack of information, but opposition to this program when hon. members have had as much information and evidence as has been presented to them by the standing committee on defence is nothing short of obstruction and is a reactionary attitude.

He went on to say:

> The same members who opposed the flag are now opposing the unification of the forces, and for the same reasons. They are rooted in the traditions of a foreign country—

To this I reply that I attempt to be and am broadminded on matters which go on inside this house and outside it. I enjoy getting together with members like the hon. member for Chicoutimi and singing many French songs, "Le Régiment" and so on, and in turn I expect French Canadian members, from the province of Quebec and other parts of the country to have some idea of my feelings in matters of tradition.

If I am accused of being emotional at times, I do not care. I am of Scottish descent. If I feel a bit of emotion when I hear the skirl of the pipes and the swish of the kilt, or when I sit back on Sunday at home and listen to Sir Harry Lauder, then I say I am proud of my heritage just as I know the hon. member for Chicoutimi is proud of his, as he has every right to be. I say to hon. members, no matter what your heritage and nationality have been, you have the right to be Canadians. That is not the leading factor. The leading factor was the evidence so very aptly brought out in the defence committee, which very amply points to the fact that this bill should not be proceeded with. I shall go into details with respect to that as I go along.

I always enjoy listening to the hon. member for Colchester-Hants. He is a man who is close to the people, a man with extensive military experience and a lot of good common sense. One thing which he emphasized so well this afternoon was that if we proceed with this bill at this time we cannot turn around in the future and make changes. I believe it was the hon. member for Trois-Rivières who said, when he was asked by opposition members to show a little self-control, that if the government was making a mistake in respect of the bill the voters will pass judgment and turn out the government at the next election. This matter was referred to by the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes. This legislation is not ordinary legislation; it is legislation which has to do with the defence of Canada.

I believe there is ample reason for not proceeding with this bill. The first is the defence of Canada. We know that at the present time there are three armed services and I believe they are most necessary. Then there is the matter of our international commitments. I liked the way in which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle put the situation when he spoke in the house. He set out the various matters in respect of national defence which must be looked at. He put forward what I would call a legal brief. I may be jumping around in making my presentation, but this is the way I like to set out things. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle outlined the situation very well. He went into the matter of the defence of Canada, our international commitments in respect of NATO and NORAD and our role with the peace keeping forces throughout the world.

Other members on this side of the house have gone into the evidence which was given before the committee. I do not intend to spend any time on this. In my opinion the evidence given before the committee by such distinguished witnesses as General Moncel pointed out that with a unified force our role can be only that of peace keeping. We know that the principles of NORAD and NATO probably will be renewed in 1968 or 1969.

As I have said, we cannot turn back. I believe we should hesitate now, pause to see what our role will be internationally and then cut out our defence suit to fit that role. The policy of the New Democratic Party, of course, is one of peace keeping. I see the hon. member for Kootenay West sitting there. General Moncel said in effect that if unification were carried out peace keeping would be the only role for our defence forces.

Mr. Herridge: Correct.

Mr. MacEwan: I stated that I would not go fully into the evidence given before the committee and I do not intend to do so. However, there is one matter mentioned by Admiral Rayner to which I should like to refer. This is something which is most important especially to areas such as mine on the Atlantic coast. On page 2006 of minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 31 of the committee on national defence for March 13, 1967, Admiral Rayner said:

> The Minister assumed office in April 1963. Here is what has happened to the navy since that time:
> (b) The numbers of ships in commission were reduced from 64 in July 1963 to 34 in July 1966. Now, in 1967, we are informed there are only 28 ships left, of which a mere 16 are immediately available.

[Mr. MacEwan.]

He goes on to mention the matter of experienced officers being prematurely retired and then states:

> After nearly three years nothing new and substantial seems to have been added to the naval equipment program except for gas turbine propulsion in the helicopter-destroyers. All the principal items were either under way, or in the planning stage, before the present minister took office. At least three years have been lost in the ship replacement program and every day that passes without ordering the helicopter-destroyer widens the gap.

Last week I asked the minister about this. He said that he understood tenders would be called for these in March. The minister did not say definitely this would be done but that he expected it would be. Now he says it will be later in the year. In the Chronicle-Herald of March 16, 1967 there is an article headed "Nagging Doubts".

Mr. Hellyer: In what paper?

Mr. MacEwan: The Chronicle-Herald.

Mr. Hellyer: It is the only one.

Mr. MacEwan: The minister says it is the only one. I will refer to another in a moment. The article reads as follows:

> Doubts about whether the Royal Canadian Navy's anti-submarine role is to be maintained, or expanded, under the defence department's unification program continue, notwithstanding Defence Minister Hellyer's protestations.
> The latest to express such doubts is Captain P. B. Ryan, U.S.N., former American naval attache in Ottawa, who has written an article which asks whether the minister and his aides are "relying on the U.S. Navy to assume the burden of anti-submarine warfare operations for both countries?" Presumably, Captain Ryan is worried about the possibility that a future emphasis on peace-keeping operations might reduce the Canadian navy to a troop transport role.

The article points out that the minister denied this. Then it continues:

> Why, he asked—

The minister.

> —would the government continue a military procurement program, including destroyers and submarines, if that were its sole intention?
> The reason for such doubts as Captain Ryan expresses undoubtedly is that the navy's anti-sub ship replacement program appears to be of a magnitude which can only increase the average age of fleet ships, and thus their eventual reduction in numbers. In short, not enough new ships are projected to keep the fleet at its present, and reduced, strength.

In line with that I quote from a second paper in the Atlantic area, the New Glasgow Evening News. This paper has reprinted a letter which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail. It is from a very distinguished Pictonian, a man who served his country well in the last war, Rear Admiral Leonard W. Murray. Rear Admiral Murray comes from an area in my constituency known as Granton and now lives in the United Kingdom. In respect of the officers he points out the following:

—it will be difficult for their NATO counterparts to be able to realize that their old friend Lieutenant-Commander Huggins who is the C.O. of H.M.C.S. Chaudiere is now some sort of a peculiar major in command of the C.A.F. Chaudiere or that the captain of the C.A.F. Bonaventure is a brigadier. It is all so damed silly and to no good purpose.

He points out that the navy takes a pride in being able to show how smart a Canadian can be. He says:

They are sailors and wish to be recognized as sailors and they do not relish the task of putting Canada across in a nondescript green uniform of the Canadian Rangers.

He calls the force the Canadian Rangers. I do not know whether that is the name. When speaking on second reading I pointed out what the native people in Halifax had to say about the jolly green jumper. I do not know whether I can find the quotation again but it is worth rereading. One sailor said a couple of years ago he would not have thought of wearing his dress uniform on the street because it was very worn. He said, however, that he would not buy a new one because he knew the jolly green jumper was coming. With the jolly green jumper coming he did not think it seemed to matter.

A saltier colleague put his feelings in more colourful language. He said:

I'll be flipped if I'm going to wear the Jolly Green Flipping Jumper regardless of what Paul Flipping Hellyer flipping well says.

I do not know whether the uniform is going to be the green uniform of the rangers or the jolly green jumper, but I do believe that nothing can be gained by having this new uniform. The minister did not answer the hon. member who asked whether this will be the uniform used at Expo. We will have to wait and see. I would not be surprised. Perhaps there will be a guard of honour outside one of the pavilions and we will have to go and watch it perform.

Rear Admiral Murray, a man who served his country well, said—I think this is most important and it goes along with what the hon. member for Colchester-Hants had to say—that he does not believe any economy would be achieved by unification. He went on to state:

Anyone can save money on the fighting services by the simple expedient of not spending it. This has been done frequently with the Canadian forces in the past, but it has always shown up very quickly in the value of the end product...

In the case of the fighting services, since the lives of your sons may some day depend upon its efficiency, no efficiency can be considered satisfactory which is less than 100 per cent. Any money saved at the expense of the end product is not a saving at all. It merely means that the remainder which has been spent is spent to no avail in building up a fool's paradise. It cannot but fail the nation in the hour of need.

The minister has set out various points and it has been argued that most of the objections to unification and this bill have come from admirals, generals and so on. Let me point out that two O.R.'s from the air force came to see me a few days ago to place before me their feelings in respect of unification. Some of their senior officers, one of whom was due for re-engagement soon, interviewed them and said: "Do not worry, have faith". Those were the exact words. The senior officers did not spell out what unification would mean to the future of these young men. I was glad to talk with these O.R.'s from the air force as I had talked before with a number of junior members of the navy but none from the air force. These young men do not know what unification will mean to them. They feel the navy has been let down and they have reached the end of their careers.

Many young men in our forces will soon have to decide on re-engagement. If many of them have this attitude they are not likely to re-engage. I suggest this will leave the air force and army in a similar position to that in which the navy finds itself, unable because of a lack of personnel to man its ships. Soon we will not have men to fly our aircraft.

Not only are top ranking and retired officers of our forces complaining about unification but many O.R.'s are concerned about what will happen. They feel that something is in the air; yet all they are told by their senior officers is to keep faith. I should like to ask to what they are supposed to be faithful.

The hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings spoke very forcibly on the situation in respect of the naval recruiting and training base at Cornwallis. One hon. member pointed out the necessity of having such a base located close to the coast. Surely trainees should be trained to sail ships. The evidence of Admiral Rayner to the committee made this very clear.

As pointed out by the hon. member for Halifax, I believe these bases are extremely important to the economy of the Atlantic area. They are also tied in with our anti-submarine role in NORAD and NATO. If we keep retiring ships without building new ones with adequate crews, we cannot perform that role. So far as our naval force is concerned it well end up with a transport function. That is not good enough.

If we take the step of unification I believe, like the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, that we will regret it very much. That hon. member made a suggestion to the minister last week to the effect that we stand the contentious clauses and deal with the remainder of the bill. In this way we could have the opportunity to discuss other parts of the bill. Apparently the minister has decided to reject that suggestion and proceed on the same basis.

Many members on this side have argued that we should move forward very slowly with unification. The defence of Canada is the most important feature of our national defence organization. We realize that because of the size of this country and its population we cannot carry on alone. Let us go ahead with integration. I have always agreed that the administration and service corps of our services should be integrated. In view of the fact that the renewal of two international agreements relating to NORAD and NATO will be coming up soon we should not take the step of unification.

Many people feel that in order to be progressive we must have change. I believe it was the hon. member for Laval who said that this step involved only a technicality and meant nothing else. Apparently he is in favour of change for the sake of change. Edmund Burke once said:

> People will not look forward to posterity who never look backward to their ancestors.

The immortal Burns, for whom I have a soft spot in my heart, said to the masses.

> The best laid schemes o' mice and men
> Gang aft a-gley;
> An' lea'e us nought but grief and pain,
> For promis'd joy.

Let us go back even farther to the Greeks. I think the following can be related to the minister and this bill:

> Men having often abandoned what was visible for the sake of what was uncertain have not got what they expected and have lost what they had—being unfortunately an enigmatical sort of calamity.

[Mr. MacEwan.]

Mr. Stewart: Who was the author of that statement?

Mr. MacEwan: That is from Aethenaeus, 200 A.D., Austingave Demetrius Phalerius.

Mr. Hellyer: He was a Conservative too, was he not?

Mr. MacEwan: I think it is so appropriate the minister should take that statement from the Greeks and have it framed. Perhaps if he hung it in his office or put it under his pillow and slept on it he might withdraw this bill.

Our anti-submarine role is not only important to the defence of this country on the east coast but it is important for another reason which came to light during a trial which took place in Ottawa. A young chap was accused of taking certain maps from the former department of mines and technical surveys. An article appeared in this regard in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald on April 8 of this year. A witness was being asked about the operation of Russian trawlers off our coast. He apparently refused to answer questions on the grounds of security. After a short recess he went back into the stand and was asked:

> Is it suspected they are doing a hydrographic survey?

Commander Norton then replied:

> Among other things, yes, sir.

That is another indication of the importance of our anti-submarine role. Surely we must have an adequate navy in view of situations such as the presence of this large trawler fleet off our coast.

• (5:20 p.m.)

There are other matters which I could go into but I shall not at the moment. I do not intend to repeat the arguments that have been put forward except to say to the Prime Minister of this country: Tread softly for our good internationally and especially nationally. For the good of the defence of Canada, withdraw this bill.

Mr. Chatterton: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words with respect to the unification bill. My objective will be to debunk some of the propaganda being spread from the other side of the chamber. The minister has been quoted so often as an authority that I thought I might bypass him and confine my remarks to the people on the other side who are supposedly most knowledgeable in this area, namely, the two chairmen of the defence committee, the hon. member for Victoria

One of the first pieces of propaganda being spread from the other side is that the debate now going on is adversely affecting the morale of the armed forces. I quote from the speech made by the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) as reported at page 14775 of Hansard:

> I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying that this house is in the process of creating, if it has not already partly created, a problem of morale in the armed forces which requires active consideration by all of us as members of parliament.

Again I quote from the speech of the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) as reported on the same page:

> For example, were the armed forces of Canada to become demoralized by protracted debate and ridicule lightly heaped upon this new idea by this house, we would all suffer.

Then we get the echo from the hon. member who was later chairman of the defence committee. It is to be found at page 14715 of Hansard there the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra is reported as having said:

> It is necessary that we finish the work of reorganization now, get off the back of the chief of staff and let him get on with his work. It is essential that these men should know what to call themselves if they are to have pride and a sense of esprit de corps as members of the new force. It is essential that this be done now and that we cut out this ridiculous debate.

To my mind this argument is one of desperation. The theme of hon. members opposite is that by our continuing this debate we are in effect causing morale in the armed forces to drop. This is an argument of extreme desperation because there has been ample evidence that a number of separations from the armed forces occurred long before this debate started. From listening to the opinions of members of the armed forces, certainly those in the greater Victoria area which includes the base at Esquimalt, the fact of the matter is that morale is so low that the arguments we are presenting are offering a ray of hope at least to members of the navy.

So much for the first piece of bunk, namely, that this debate is affecting the morale of the armed forces. I come to the second piece of bunk, namely, that unification and integration are the same thing. For many months propaganda has issued from the Ottawa office of Mr. Leaky Lee to the people of Canada that integration and unification are the same thing. Reams of propaganda material have been issued showing the savings affected by integration. The obvious implication was that similar savings would be accomplished by unification. The minister has recently devised the term "the integration-unification cycle". The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.), at page 14774 of Hansard, tries to continue the spreading of this false propaganda when he says:

> My personal definition or view, which incidentally is the same today as when I started considering the matter many monthe ago, is that when we speak of unification we are talking about taking integration as far as it is practical to go.

We on this side of the chamber have not said that integration has been wrong although we may have differed with some of its aspects. But there is an obvious attempt not only by the minister and the two chairmen of the defence committee but by other hon. members on that side to try to confuse the Canadian people as to the difference between integration and unification. If I need any support for my argument I can quote from an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 4, 1967, as follows:

> It is beyond comprehension that Mr. Hellyer, by insisting on total unification, should ask parliament now to endorse a completely new defence structure, entirely foreign to both British and U.S. defence organizations. Unification, and elimination of service identities, despite Mr. Hellyer's statements to the contrary, have been openly rejected by Britain after much study—as declared in the white paper of 1963. A check with Washington would also reveal that the U.S. has no intention of unifying its combat units. To the contrary, the present purpose is to build up the proud reputations and esprit de corps of individual fighting units, whether it be the "Green Berets", the Marines, or the First Cavalry Regiment. For Canada to launch into a radical experiment which will make our defence organization incompatible with the U.S. and British organization constitutes the most drastic step ever taken with the defences of this country. It could, in large measure, destroy our existing defence structure.

The first argument to which I would like to refer is that put forward by hon. members on the opposite side of the chamber that those people who oppose the unification bill are, so to speak, old fogeys, sticks-in-the-mud, people who do nothing but look backward and do not look to the future. The Minister of National Defence has given the impression that the uniforce he is going to create will be a modern force which will accommodate the requirements of a modern society. I quote from the speech made by the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.), a man who has had distinguished service in the Royal Canadian Navy. In the speech he made in the house on May 10 he gave examples of how in the past the navy had resisted changes. The first of these changes was when it was suggested that naval men should be allowed to mix cola with a tot of rum. I can do no better than quote from an editorial in the Victoria Colonist of April 14. It is headed "A Rum Business", and reads as follows:

> When Canadian sailors were allowed to mix cola with their rum tots, former R.C.N. captain Mr. David Groos, M.P., said in the Commons, "you should have heard the uproar" from some of his "overly conservative" one-time naval colleagues. Whereas, he added, Admiral Nelson would have liked the mix because he was a very progressive admiral.
> One hopes Mr. Hellyer was listening, for a year or two ago he was reported as telling local naval officers when pressing his unification theme that they weren't living in Nelsonian days. And he didn't mean this as a compliment to the world-renowned admiral of history.
> But speaking by the way how does Mr. Groos know that Nelson would have liked to have his drink diluted with something else? He may have preferred it straight and true, the stronger the better.
> What Lord Nelson wouldn't have liked, one feels sure, would have been to see his navy downgraded and its proud title absolished. Mr. Groos should have been more careful in his allusions to famous men. For he is decidedly in favour of Mr. Hellyer's plans.
> So much does he support the unification bill that, he told the Commons, he would return to the navy willingly tomorrow.
> What "navy", one may ask? When the bill goes through there will be no formation of such designation; there will only be one composite armed force, under a name yet to be chosen.

Next there is a reference to me which, being very modest, I will omit. However, I will read the last two paragraphs of this editorial:

> If one is to judge by Mr. Hellyer's advocacy on the subject, there is to be no limit to the extent of military unification. The defence minister in fact claims that as far as military organization is concerned Canada "will be leading the world".
> It would be interesting to hear what defence staffs of the major military nations think of that chauvinistic boast. And Mr. Groos also.

The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) tried to convey to the house the idea that the armed forces, and in particular the navy, have always been too conservative, have never wanted to face the facts and have always looked at the rear view mirror. I received a letter from another naval officer in Victoria who said that the only reason the navy personnel objected to the Canadian volunteer service medal being worn was that it was made of compressed cardboard and it split at the seams at sea. Furthermore, the same medal was awarded also to conscripts. The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.), in trying to show how outmoded and backward the navy was, also gave the example of the painting of the maple leaf on the funnels of Canadian warships. This officer told me that the maple leaves were ordered removed from the funnels by order of the admiral in charge of the various ships because it could be used as a mark to aim at.

The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.), also used as an example of how backward-looking the navy was the fact that during the last war navy personnel objected to wearing the Canada flashes on their shoulders. The officer from Victoria to whom I have already referred wrote to me as follows:

> We didn't need Canada flashes. We could tell a Canadian by the cut of his jib. The word "Canada" was on our buttons, so why the shoulder badges?

It seems to me that the examples given by the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) were the poorest examples that could be used by an ex-officer of the Royal Canadian Navy, one who gave distinguished service while in the navy, to illustrate that the navy was always behind the times. Even if his arguments that the navy refused to wear shoulder badges and certain medals, that it refused to have the maple leaf painted on the funnels of warships and so on, were correct, how can they be used as reasons for the major step being proposed by the minister and the government for the reorganization of our armed forces?

The idea that any opposition to change is being advanced by people looking to the past was promoted also by Major General F. F. Worthington in an article in The Ottawa Journal of Tuesday, April 14, 1967. The headline of the article was: "Annihilation Could Be Result Of Keeping Old Generals". That is an eye-catching headline. The article reads in part as follows:

> Unification of certain trade structures and professions cannot help but be beneficial in achieving efficiency and economy in such branches as medical, pay, communications, transport, police, mechanical engineering and so on.

So even General Worthington, the great advocate of annihilating all the qualified and expert people in the armed forces, admits that only the unification of certain services would be of advantage.

The most ridiculous argument I have heard from the other side came from the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. By this time no doubt the hon. member and many others and possibly many members of the cabinet have heard from people all across Canada. They are becoming worried. I know full well that last October and November there was very little interest across the country in unification. As a result of the very clever propaganda put out by the minister's office, people accepted the statement that unification and integration were the same thing. The minister quoted reams of figures to show how integration had saved the taxpayers' money. Of course, the obvious implication was that more money would be saved by unification.

When the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and others started to hear from people across the country that perhaps unification and integration were not the same thing and that they were perturbed about the possible destruction of the identity of the three fighting forces, the chairman of the defence committee came up with a most ingenious idea. He told the people that the only thing involved in Bill No. C-243 was a change in the name of the armed forces. I should like to quote from the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra as recorded on page 14714 of Hansard:

> Only one thing of any real importance remained to be done and that was to give the new single force which we had created in 1964 a name.

On page 14715 we find these words:

> I repeat that this bill asks us to do only one thing of consequence. It asks us to give our forces a name: "The Canadian Armed Forces."

How desperate can those on the other side get when they will say that the only effect of this bill—this statement was made by the chairman of the defence committee, one who supposedly has the confidence of the government and the endorsation of the Minister of National Defence—is to give the forces a new name. I should like to hear from the Minister of National Defence before long as to his reaction to the interpretation of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra of this bill. All it seeks to do, according to the hon. member, is to give a new name to the forces that already exist.

If that is all this bill does the question arises, why the hurry? Why is there this pressure? The minister has said that after the passage of the bill it will not be proclaimed for four or five months. Why the rush if the only effect of this bill is to change the name? Why the insistence by the minister that the morale of the armed forces must be preserved and we must proceed immediately to approve this bill during this session? He says that the department cannot get on with the reorganization until the unification bill has been passed. In my opinion this is an argument of the utmost desperation.

Let me point out the difference between the old sections 15 to 18 of the National Defence Act and the provisions of this bill. The old sections of the National Defence Act read in part as follows:

> The Canadian forces are the naval, army and air forces of Her Majesty raised by Canada and consist of three services, namely, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force.
> There shall be a component of each service of the Canadian forces consisting of officers and men who are enrolled for continuing full-time military service; and those components are referred to in this act as the regular forces.

The fact of the matter is that the main effect of Bill No. C-243 would be to destroy the identity of the three fighting services of our armed forces. Yet the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra dares to say that the only significant change that would be occasioned by the passage of this bill would be to change the name of the armed forces as already created by Bill No. C-90. No wonder the Liberals are not putting up any more speakers; they have obviously run out of even the most desperate arguments.

I believe this would be a good time to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on Wednesday, April 4:

> In his initial position on "integration" Mr. Hellyer's statement indicated both wisdom and a broad-minded approach.

I do not completely agree with that statement. We were in agreement with the general idea of integration, although we believed the minister committed many faults in bringing it about.

> Seemingly when he raised the matter of total unification, however, he was unable to accept the fact that his most experienced officers, both outside and within the service, advised strongly against it. This qualified and considered advice was interpreted by Mr. Hellyer as interference and personal opposition to his will, an attempt to obstruct and thwart his own ambitions. In this context, Mr. Hellyer has apparently determined to plunge blindly ahead regardless of any harm done to himself, the services, his government or the nation.

Surely by now, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Defence and the government must have some inkling of the serious opposition to the proposed unification measure. I have received a great number of letters on this question. Incidentally, I would venture to say that the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) is out of touch with the people at the Esquimalt base. Judging by the letters I have received and by the telephone calls I received when I was home for Easter, there is great concern amongst the members of the navy at Esquimalt. Quite a number of these people are afraid to let the way they actually feel be known. This letter is typical of the ones I have received from junior officers and describes some of the penalties that are involved. I should like to read from this letter:

> We have seen statements by the Minister of National Defence which imply that dissatisfied personnel may resign with notice—but with no other benefit. Although there have been opinions expressed as to the legality of compulsory conversion from the old services to the new, there has been little emphasis on obtaining for those who do wish to resign, some recognition for services rendered.
> To give you a specific example of some of the economic effects presently involved, a 31 year old lieutenant with a wife and three young children would receive: no pension; no rehabilitation leave for 13 years' service; no interest on pension contributions returned (less income tax); no portability of pension beyond the civil service; and no relocation expenses. Since in my own case I should wish to return to the west coast, the cost of moving family and effects would be about $4,000—a little more than returned contributions. Thus at the very outset of a fresh start I should be in debt.
> This is part of the price to be paid for a resignation by a junior officer on a point of principle.

I would ask the minister to keep this in mind. To my knowledge there are a great number of cases of members of the Royal Canadian Navy who would not wish to continue once the unification bill is passed. However, leaving the ranks would make things so difficult for them that they have little alternative but to stay in the armed forces. In effect, Mr. Chairman, this amounts to compulsory service. Surely the minister will realize that people who continue to serve against their will because they are forced to do so for economic reasons cannot give of their best to the navy or to other branches of the armed forces.

The Prime Minister has been strangely silent in this debate. He did make a brief press announcement following Air Chief Marshal Miller's evidence, seeming to be impressed with that evidence. Consequent upon the statement of the Prime Minister we had hoped that he would make a speech in the house. This is a matter of great national importance possibly affecting the security and sovereignty of Canada. Certainly it is causing great doubts in the minds of people across the country. Therefore I feel it is time for the Prime Minister formally to associate himself one way or the other with the policy announced by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chatterton: Certainly.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is mentioning the Prime Minister. Has the hon. member any reason for the Prime Minister's complete indifference to this debate? Is it because the Prime Minister is afraid of the Minister of National Defence?

Mr. Chatterton: This is why I mentioned in the first place that questions are being asked not only by the members of the opposition but also by people across the country. They are asking where the Prime Minister stands on this question. This is a government bill dealing with a matter of great importance to Canada. Yet the Prime Minister has not spoken on it with the exception of an indirect reference to the bill when he had read the evidence given by Air Chief Marshal Miller. Certainly we had hoped the Prime Minister would speak.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Chatterton: Mr. Chairman, in closing, if I can just urge—

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee unanimously agree to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chatterton: If hon. members on the other side listen they do not understand, or what they hear they do not want to hear.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Why don't you make a contribution then?

Mr. Chatterton: Why does the hon. member not stand up and make a speech? A great number of members on the other side remain silent on this question. How many of the ministers on the front benches have stood up and made a speech? The Minister of Transport made a contribution, and I have never heard such a lame defence of any government measure as that made by him. He did not even refer to the subject matter of the bill. But how many other members on the front benches have spoken, Mr. Chairman? After all, this is an important measure. The Minister of National Defence says that it will be a great thing for Canada, that it will create a force to serve Canada in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chatterton: Why do hon. members opposite not support the minister and make a speech? Are they afraid?

An hon. Member: Let us bring it to a vote.

Mr. Chatterton: They are trained seals. Why does the Prime Minister not make a speech?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Let us take a vote and then we will find out who has support.

Mr. Chatterton: That is the old, arrogant attitude of the minister—we know we are right so let us vote. That has been the attitude of the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) as well as the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. Why does the Prime Minister not stand up and say where he stands?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Let us vote on the matter; that is the attitude of democracy.

Mr. Chatterton: Surely this house is entitled to hear from the Prime Minister of Canada—

Some hon. Members: Time up.

Mr. Chatterton: —and leader of the government as to where he stands on the question of unification, a matter which a great number of people in this country feel could affect the very future and sovereignty of this nation. Why is the Prime Minister not in the house listening to the speeches? May I call it six o'clock.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would ask hon. members for their customary indulgence, so that I may read the different questions to be debated at the time of adjournment tonight.

It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be debated at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette): Public buildings—Ottawa—inquiry as to contracts for demolition; the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow): Housing—inquiry as to possibility of meeting economic council target; the hon. member for Charlevoix: discontinuance of passenger service between Quebec and La Malbaie.

[English]

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, my constituency could not be described as a military constituency or one that has a direct economic interest in the ramifications of the bill under consideration at the present time, but I should like to participate at this point in the debate to emphasize one or two matters that I think are important. I also wish to prevail upon the indulgence of the committee in order to move into an allied area and say one or two things which I think are of equal importance.

With respect to the unification aspect of the present bill, if the various regiments and corps of the army are intended to survive the unification procedure I wonder whether it is possible to make the assumption or to reach the conclusion that the mere disappearance of the army as a service will not make much practical difference to those serving in it. The permanent nature of the army's subdivisions, corps and regiments means that a soldier's first loyalty is to that subdivision to which he belongs—his corps or regiment. His loyalty is there, and this is why soldiers have been known to attempt every trick and to use any procedure in the book to avoid being posted to another unit.

However, I suggest that the disappearance of the navy and the air force as separate entities compares with the disappearance of the army as a separate totality is a very different matter. Sailors and airmen are going to be deprived of a permanent institution to which they feel a loyalty of their own. If this were the case with the army it might be possible in the end to overcome this weakness by building up a single loyalty on the part of all three services to the new combined service that is proposed. However, one questions the possibility and the likelihood of that being done if the individual corps, regiments and units of the army continue to exist. The soldiers will continue to have a sense of belonging to the artillery, the Black Watch, the Royal Engineers and so on, and within these groups they will feel at home. The sailors and the airmen will have nowhere to feel at home; they will be permanent outsiders and their morale is bound to suffer.

This could be avoided, theoretically, by widening the army's corps structure to include all three services. Thus, all gunners could be put into a single artillery corps. One doubts, however, that this would work. Techniques of gunnery on land are so different from those at sea that it would not be practical to exchange gunners between sea and land, and unless this could be done the corps would never develop the cohesion which is so essential, nor would it develop the loyalty which is so necessary to the proper fulfillment of its functions.

What the effect of all this will be on the navy and the air force is hard to say. It is possible that it may not have much effect on the air force. This is because the air force does not fight as a force. It is unique in that the actual fighting is done by a very small proportion of its numbers. The fighting members of an R.C.A.F. squadron are so few that they can, and do, build up a squadron loyalty in a very short space of time. The vast majority of air force personnel are required to keep planes flying and to put them into the air. The pilots are the men who go to fight. It must be exceedingly difficult to create and maintain any esprit de corps within the ground staff of the air force, and this includes all its non-commissioned ranks.

One would expect the effect on the navy to be catastrophic. Warfare in the navy is total, even more so than in the army. Even in an infantry battalion there are some men who are not in the front line. But in a ship everyone is in the war. If the ship sinks all hands sink with it. A high state of morale among the whole crew is essential aboard any navy vessel and it is difficult to see how this can possibly be achieved unless the sailors who man the ship are proud of being sailors, and they will not be proud of being sailors unless there is some recognizable organization of sailors to which they belong and with which they can identify themselves. This is the organization we now know as the navy.

The minister's answer to this argument could take one of two forms, as I see it: First, that the separate regiments and corps within the army could be abolished. If the hon. gentleman is planning to do this I suggest he should do it before doing anything else and see whether he can run an army without any regiments and corps. The present time would seem to be the logical point at which to undertake such an experiment—an experiment on a small scale rather than on a large scale. Or he might say, in the second place, that we could if necessary create a naval corps within the unified force. But this would make nonsense of unification, would it not? He would just be recreating the navy. Nothing would have been achieved except for the change of uniform and rank structure.

On the subject of rank one cannot help notice that the two lowest ranks in the new force are to be corporal and private. This gives rise to two interesting questions. In the artillery, as most of us know, corporals are called bombardiers. One wonders whether it is intended to change this practice and call them corporals. In the rifle regiments privates are called riflemen, in the engineers, sappers, in the armoured corps, troopers, and so on. Are we to assume that all these ranks and titles are to be changed and that all the men serving in these capacities are to be identified as privates or corporals? If the answer to these questions is yes, there will of course be howls of protest from various parts of the army. If the answer is no, then why is a seaman to be called a private while the troopers' title is to be left alone?

Another potentially dangerous result of unification in my view is that the tactical thinking of the numerically strongest arm, the army, will come to dominate that of the navy. If we call an admiral a general we are half way to thinking that a sailor is merely a soldier who fights on water. There is a great myth about unification, it seems to me, the myth that this is a forward thinking and progressive concept whereas in reality, historically speaking, it is retrogressive to the extent no less than four full centuries. Contrary to what is being said, the idea of a unified fighting service is not a new one. Far from being progressive in his thinking, the minister is putting the clock back 400 years. Before that time all fighting was done by soldiers and all armed forces were commanded by generals. The English were the first to realize that fighting at sea was a different art from fighting on land. So they organized a separate navy. This happened during the reign of Elizabeth I. When Philip II of Spain decided to attack, he put his army on a fleet of ships commanded by his best generals and sent them off to England. This fleet was, of course, the famous armada. The naval battle in the channel was the last ever fought by a unified service and the armada was destroyed just because it was a unified force. The men who commanded it were soldiers and their object was to fight a land battle on the water. The English fleet was commanded by sailors who knew how to fight a naval battle. And they won.

The lesson was not lost on the men of those days and soon every nation separated its navy from its army. It would seem, however, that the present government does not care to take cognizance of this lesson of 400 years historical standing and is planning to make the same mistake as was made during the period of Philip II, thus putting naval and military organization back at least four centuries.

These are some of the thoughts I have had on the question of unification and the bill before us. There are one or two other arguments which are set out in an excellent series of newspaper articles written by the publisher of the Winnipeg Free Press, Mr. R. S. Malone. The former colonel makes his points so eloquently and well that I would not presume to try to improve upon them and I ask the indulgence of the committee to put one or two of his conclusions on the record. Mr. Malone was the author of a series of articles which appeared on the editorial pages of the Winnipeg Free Press during August, 1966. In the course of preliminary articles in the series he drew attention to two or three of essential errors in the program of unification now being undertaken by members of the government. In one of these articles toward the conclusion of the series he wrote:

> It is considered by many qualified observers that by sacrificing regimental spirit and identification Canada will lose far more than she can gain in dollar economies or efficiency by forcing integration down to the level of combat units, either army, navy or air force.

> As indicated in the earlier articles, England, although adopting a degree of integration after a serious study of the factors, has stated that regimental identification of combat units will be preserved as an absolute essential to morale.
> Recently New Zealand has also considered this subject and come to the same conclusions regarding combat units. In a white paper this year—

That would be 1966.

> —it states that while they accept the fact of unification of such facilities as supply, personnel, administration and other support areas and standard procedures, in supply depots separate identities will be retained in the combat units.
> The same situation exists in the United States where an increasing effort is now being made to create and expand on regimental identification. To quote the U.S. Secretary for the Air Force, "men have functioned most effectively as members of an identifiable group. The spirit of unity . . . of brotherhood . . . is enhanced by tradition, pride in one's organization and by a distinctive uniform which is a mark of membership.
> The value of esprit de corps cannot be measured with precision. No price tag can be placed on it, yet we all recognize its intrinsic contribution in the quality of our armed forces. It is the heart of the true fighting force.
> We should not tamper with that precious esprit de corps, that sense of identification, by immersing it in a vast agglomeration of a single service."

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, these points are made in what I and many others consider to be a profound series of articles on the question of integration and unification. I know that the minister himself considered it a profound and reasoned series of articles, although obviously he and Mr. Malone take different points of view. But I felt it valuable to place one or two contributions from Mr. Malone's editorials on the record and in the context which I have offered them because I think they state the case for retention of individual identity at the combat level far more eloquently than I could do myself.

That brings me to an allied subject which I presume is covered under the aegis and umbrella of the debate in which we are involved at the moment. I want to say one or two words about the area of our international commitments which is inextricably tied to our defence posture, defence planning, and defence deliberations in this committee. With respect to the change in our defence system and the make-up of our armed forces being contemplated by members of the committee, I would ask whether or not this country, in the view of the Minister of National Defence and of the government, is embarked on a path for Canada of professional neutralism? If we are embarked on such a path are we sure we are right in going in that direction?

The question of collective security in the world and of our commitments under collective security accords into which we have entered must be paramount in our consideration and reasoning as we address ourselves to this proposed legislation. It seems to me that the legislation as drafted and proposed envisions some kind of world where there will never be another conventional war, at least not one in which Canada will be involved. It seems to me that it takes for granted that the era of war in the classical sense, in the historic sense, war as we have known it so painfully in the lifetimes of all of us in this committee, has come to an end, and the only kind of war with which we may be confronted in the future is one of two types, either a total thermonuclear holocaust which will not permit of any kind of protracted hostilities, or a type of brushfire war, the type of police action war in which many of our troops and units have been engaged in recent years under the flag of the United Nations.

I hope that if we make that decision, sir, we will have considered all the possibilities for the future. I hope we are possessed of a certain omniscience in coming to that conclusion because, should we be wrong, the pain and the agony that will confront us as a nation involved in any kind of conventional war in the future will be severe indeed. It seems to me we move too hastily if we assume we can take for granted that we will not be involved in a conventional type of war and conventional type of defence of our country. The proposed legislation which we are now considering assumes just such a development.

We have moral commitments under the collective security arrangements and agreements into which we have entered around the globe, and I submit we owe a debt and discharge of a fulfilment to our allies that requires the maintenance, improvement, development and, if necessary, the expansion of conventional forms of fighting arms, conventional forms of fightings units, that can fit into the over-all pattern of defence envisioned by those allies who, with us, belong to those collective agreements and collective arrangements. Therefore, as many a speaker preceding me in this debate has pointed out, we come to the vital question of foreign policy and the more crucial question of whether or not our foreign policy is being decided and determined by our defence policy. Sir, I wonder whether Canadians are satisfied in coming to the conclusion, or having the conclusion developed for them, that in the future we are merely to be the bearers and operators of an international fire brigade? This is what we would be reduced to being with the unified force proposed in this legislation.

As I asked a moment ago, what of our allies with respect to this question? What do they expect of us, what do we expect of them? Can we fulfil the commitments and the pledges we owe if we make such a drastic, revolutionary and convolutionary change in our military posture and establishment? With respect to the possibilities of a major conventional war, will we not have our traditional responsibilities as partners in the free world alliance? I submit it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to fulfil those responsibilities if we proceed with the revolutionary change proposed in this legislation, at least before much fuller consideration has been given to its development in the context of the collective arrangements to which we belong and in the context of the threat to freedom in the world today.

We owe much to our allies. In my view we owe much in particular to our brave allies in the United States whose sons are dying in Viet Nam today to keep the world safe for democracy. President Johnson said with respect to that struggle, "We did not choose to be the guardians at the gate, but there is no one else."

I was in the Pacific a few weeks ago. I was fortunate enough to have a few days in Viet Nam and Henry Cabot Lodge, the outgoing, widely loved and respected United States ambassador to South Viet Nam, told me, "It is not a choice out here between war in Viet Nam and the broad high road to peace. If it were such a choice we would take the broad high road to peace, but this is a dangerous world in which we live, and this is a particularly dangerous part of that world, and the choice out here is between different dangers, between a broken arm and a broken leg. That is always the choice in a dangerous world. We are making a stand in Viet Nam which we would have to make somewhere."

My own personal view of the situation and of American involvement there really turns on a statement made by Thomas Jefferson many years ago when he asserted that it is sometimes necessary for men to fight small wars in order that great wars can be avoided. I think this is the moral fulcrum on which American involvement in Viet Nam turns, and I believe in the essential correctness of the American involvement at this time in that place. I also believe in the essential correctness of criticism, but not distortion, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that criticism in this country of our American allies has grown out of all proportion and now amounts in many cases to nothing more than incontrovertible distortion of the role that the United States is playing in world affairs.

There is a cult of anti-Americanism being formed in this country which is unworthy of us as Canadians and destructive to the causes of friendship, freedom and peace. This is an imperfect world. Together, we and our historic friends and allies can make it better. We debase the dreams of all North Americans of good will, Canadians and citizens of the United States, when we demean ourselves by stooping to the practice of mean and petty criticism of our friends, encouraged by those who have no care for the dangerous game they are playing. This is a practice which is based on half truths, untruths, rumour and a misguided form of so-called patriotism. I deplore the widespread denigration of the American effort. We should do all we can to contain this run-away criticism before it does both our countries irreparable harm.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take part in this debate again for two reasons. The first is that a number of questions have been put to the government during the course of this and previous stages of the debate which have not been answered. If any answers have been given to most of the questions with which I will deal, they have been given either in a vague way or with equivocation. One reason, and I believe the main reason despite what some members of the government may think, that this debate has gone on so long at the different stages is that there is a genuine desire on the part of the members on this side of the house to find out what exactly are the implications of this bill.

I do not think there is any member in this house, whatever his party, who really would wish to jeopardize our defence effort. All of us are interested in the future safety of our country. Some of us are worried about the course the government is taking. Until we have adequate answers to many of the questions which have been asked I do not believe we will be in a position either to approve or disapprove of this bill. The reason I am making further remarks at this time is that I hope to elicit answers from the minister. I sincerely hope the minister will give us these answers before the debate on this stage of the bill is completed.

The second reason I am taking part in the debate again has to do with the tactical handling of this bill by the government. I believe this to be a matter of very great concern not only to members of this house but also to people outside the house. I suggest that the government has not handled the bill well from its inception. I realize I cannot refer to matters previously passed on by the house and I do not intend to do so. I do wish to refer, however, to the difficulty we have had in acquiring the information we need.

In this regard I suggest it would have been better had the government in the first place sent this bill to a committee, perhaps at the resolution stage, so that the matter could have been gone into at that point. At that stage we might have learned about the nature and content of the bill. Then, at a later stage when the bill came back to the committee of the whole it might again have been referred to the standing committee as was done after second reading. It is quite evident now from a reading of the evidence before the defence committee that many questions are still unanswered. Had there been two sets of hearings, I believe that some of the points which are still unanswered might have been answered and clarified.

If I may use a favourite expression, this is water under the bridge. This is something which I believe the government should have done. The government has embarked on a very strange course indeed, the course of closure. I know it may be said by my friends on the government side of the house that it is not closure on which the government is embarking now. There is an old expression, "No matter how thin you slice it it is still boloney". This new rule in some ways is a much more severe form of closure than the old closure rule because under the old rule closure had to be applied to each clause of the bill whereas under this arrangement the whole bill has to be dealt with summarily in a very brief period of time. It seems very strange that the government should have embarked on this procedure in dealing with this bill.

As of last Thursday afternoon when the government house leader mentioned it was the intention of the government to allocate time—I believe that is the term which was used—25 members of the official opposition had spoken on this bill and 29 members of the government and its allies in this house. I have been a member of this house for quite a long time and it always has been my impressoin that when closure or any form thereof was invoked it was because one group in the house was greatly protracting the debate or was holding it up by what sometimes is referred to by members of the government as filibustering. If one wishes to be very technical about this, I might point out that up to the time of the announcement by the house leader 29 members supporting the government had spoken and only 25 opposition members. One might ask who was filibustering.

It seems very strange indeed that this type of procedure should have been adopted. However, that is the government's responsibility. I believe these matters should be clarified. Closure of any form should be used only if a matter is of great urgency or import. I do not think anyone would claim that this subject is not a matter of great import; of course it is, and very much so. However, it certainly is not a matter of urgency, to say the least. The other day the minister told us that if the bill should be passed right now it was not his intention to have in declared law until another six months have passed and the regulations have been drawn up. Therefore it would not seem that there is any urgent necessity to get this bill through the house at the present time. That argument seems, as one might say, to have been knocked into a cocked hat. There just is no reason for doing it.

I believe this government has its own reasons for invoking closure. From the government point of view I think the reasons probably are rather good. The minister, and when he is not here his associate minister, either cannot or will not answer questions. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has developed quite a reputation in this house for some time as a master in circumlocution, but the Minister of National Defence when he does answer questions makes the Secretary of State for External Affairs seem informative and concise by comparison. I think his failure to answer these questions adequately, has been the source of considerable embarrassment to the government. This has been pointed out very well by editorials which have appeared in a number of prominent newspapers in this country, including the Montreal Gazette of last Saturday, the Globe and Mail, the Winnipeg Free Press and others. They have all pointed out that the purpose of this bill and everything connected with it is unclear and murky. This is not surprising in view of the minister's failure to answer questions adequately.

For that reason I think the government wants this debate to end as quickly as possible. It has also taken this point of view in respect of the desire, as announced by the Prime Minister, to have this session end and the centennial session commence. We have been told that this session should conclude by the end of this month. The centennial session would then begin and last through to the end of June or the early part of July. I am sure most members would like to see that happen.

But whose fault is it that we are again faced with a critical situation—if it is critical? I suggest this situation is the result of mishandling of the business of the house of the government.

Mr. Robichaud: Be serious.

Mr. Nesbitt: If the Minister of Fisheries would like to know the reasons behind that remark I will be glad to give them at this stage. It is quite clear that one might say the cabinet is made up of a number of prima donnas who have pet projects they want pushed through the house. One cannot know the reasons because he cannot look into the minds of members of the government to ascertain their motivation. The Minister of National Health and Welfare threatened last year that he would resign if the medicare bill was not put through. That was an important measure, but certainly there was no urgency because it will not become law until 1968.

Last summer we dealt with the Canada Assistance Plan. That also was a very important measure but it was pushed through this house under the threat that we would have no vacation and that hon. members would not be able to return to their constituencies to carry out their normal duties. It was also suggested that we were holding up the extra assistance to be given the needy. That measure was passed last July, but it has not been put into effect anywhere in Canada, except in the province of Ontario, and even there only as of April 1 of this year. There was no great rush in that regard.

We are now faced with this measure which the minister said will not go into effect for at least four to six months. On the basis of the evidence given before the defence committee it may not be put into effect for two or three years. What is the hurry?

In my submission the business of this house has been mishandled by the government. I do not blame the government house leader because I should not like to have his job; it must be very difficult to arrange parliamentary business in an orderly way when this sort of thing is taking place. In any event those are the reasons for this lengthy session. The minister wants the bill put through in a hurry so the centennial session deadline can be met. It is no one's fault but the government's that this deadline cannot be met in an orderly way.

Another very strange development in relation to this bill now before us was the suggestion in a letter by the chairman of the government caucus to his constituents that undoubtedly it was going to be necessary to use closure. That suggestion was made before we had commenced this stage of consideration. Surely that is a strange way of doing things. Had the statement been made by a backbencher on the government side, or someone with little responsibility, I would not have thought much about it: But it was made by the chairman of the government caucus.

As a result of that statement coming to light the chairman of the caucus was taken to task by an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail, which stated that a great many things should be brought to light before any kind of closure was brought in. Certainly before closure has been brought in by any government it has been the accepted practice not to use such a procedure unless the government has overwhelming public support for its legislation, and that it involves a matter of urgency. Certainly there is not overwhelming public support for this bill and on the basis of the admission of the minister, there is no urgency. We view with great concern the course of action the government is now following in the handling of this bill. There is no reason for that action and no explanation, except those relating to the government's embarrassment and the desire to commence the centennial session.

One can find a clue to the government's action in pushing this bill through from the statement made last Thursday by one of the minister's fans in the press gallery. A public affairs commentator said in reference to questions posed by the opposition to the minister that they had not found out the answers either. I think that situation provides another answer as to why the government wishes to terminate this debate.

Many of us have found something else very strange in relation to our unanswered questions. I refer to the rather odd but detached manner the Prime Minister has taken not only in respect of this debate but on the matter of unification itself. He has had a lifelong concern for the subject of foreign affairs and foreign policy. Defence measures are really the strong arm of foreign policy. It is startling to most of us to note that the Prime Minister is apparently disinterested in this matter. According to information revealed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre earlier during this debate, the only time the Prime Minister discussed this question with the former chief of staff, Air Marshal Miller, was in 1964; and at that time the major discussion was integration, not unification.

Certainly before this debate concludes we should hear from the Prime Minister about this very important matter of unification. Unification will have an effect on the whole defence future of this country. I hope because of the interrelationship between defence and foreign affairs we will hear from the Prime Minister, who has been associated with and has a great reputation in the field of foreign affairs.

Let me now refer to the questions which have not been answered—and it is my submission that if the minister will provide some answers he will find it much less difficult to get this bill passed, thus creating a more amiable atmosphere in the house. To date he has not done so, but I appeal to him to reconsider his position in the interests of putting this bill through in an orderly fashion.

Let me remind the minister of the example set by one or two of his colleagues. When the highly complex transport bill was before this house it was examined carefully—

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. member permit a question? Will he indicate the specific questions I have not answered?

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes, I was just going to do so. I have them enumerated and I will be very glad to bring them to the minister's attention. I would suggest to the minister that he look at the results achieved by his colleague the Minister of Transport with regard to the transportation bill. That was a very complex, technical matter. The bill went to committee and was carefully studied. A great many amendments were made to it, some 70 of which I believe were accepted by the minister. This was referred to by many writers and observers of parliament as being parliament at its best.

Then there was the Bank Act, an equally difficult and complex matter. The Minister of Finance, again, accepted many suggestions that were made. Many people thought that bill would be a matter of great controversy. There were some controversial aspects in the bill, but generally speaking it was not controversial. The minister listened to suggestions and accepted them when he thought it wise. Of course no one expects a minister to accept all suggestions made, but at least he should be prepared to accept some. In this case the Minister of National Defence has not shown an inclination to accept any of the suggestions made.

A few moments ago the minister asked what questions I have in mind that he had not specifically answered. The first question is: Who was the author, who conceived this plan of unification? Was it one of the senior staff officers; was it the minister; was it one of the minister's advisers? Who was it? I think we should know the answer to this question because this is a very important matter, one of the most important that has come before the house. I think therefore we are entitled to know whether this concept of unification was a matter thought up by some people with a great deal of military expertise, or was it thought up by persons lacking this expertise, however well intentioned they may be? I am not suggesting that it was thought up by persons lacking military expertise, but we would like to know who was the author of the plan.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. gentleman agree that Lieutenant General Weeks, a former vice chief of general staff in the United Kingdom, would be a good author for this kind of program?

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister is telling us that he is the author of this program.

Mr. Hellyer: I did not say that, but I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman would have confidence in his judgment, in view of his experience in the second world war and the fact that he conceived a plan which is almost identical to the one we are proposing for this country. Would the hon. gentleman, in view of those facts, consider him to be a proper authority?

Mr. Churchill: I thought Terence Robertson was the author.

Mr. Nesbitt: I would be very interested to see the plan of the gentleman mentioned by the minister. I should also like to see the general's qualifications. But again, Mr. Chairman, I ask the minister, who was the author of this unification plan? In reply to what the minister said earlier, Earl Mountbatten does not seem to have the same view as General Weeks. I take it that General Weeks was one of the indirect authors of the plan, but we would be very glad to hear from the minister who else he got the idea from. The next question concerns the purpose of this unified force. Unfortunately we have heard various explanations on the functions of the force.

Mr. Hellyer: I told you in my speech on second reading.

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes, and I will be coming to that shortly, if the minister will contain himself for a minute. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said in effect that the purpose of the force was to fulfil more effectively our present military commitments. Unfortunately the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not place before us one whit of evidence of how this was to be done. In his customary genial, bland manner he said that is what the force was going to do and he was satisfied that it would more adequately and effectively fulfil our present commitments to NORAD, NATO and the United Nations. He did not say how, of course, but he said the force would fulfil these commitments.

The Minister of National Defence has denied categorically in this house—this is one thing about which the minister has been very specific—that the new, unified force is designed only for service with the United Nations. This matter has been raised on many occasions by many hon. members, and the minister has categorically denied that this is the purpose of the force. Newspaper comment and editorials have been to the effect that the force is intended to fulfil more adequately our commitments to that organization. However, somebody very close to the minister, who I think is really in a position to throw some light on this point is the present chief of staff, General Allard. I have read part of the evidence he gave before the defence committee and I shall put it on the record again. His evidence was quite contrary to what the minister told us. The question with which we are faced is, whose evidence are we to accept? We should accept the minister's explanation, of course, because he is in charge of this department; but his own chief of staff says something different. Where do we go from there?

I again put on the record General Allard's evidence given to the defence committee on Tuesday, February 28:

> Canada now wants, while remaining faithful to its existing commitments, to decide itself on the part it wishes to play in the new international society. This is not only its right, it is also its duty. It is its duty to participate, to the best of its ability, in keeping the peace by supporting the organization which has made itself the champion of the smaller nations, the United Nations organization.
> In short, that is the transformation proposed by the white paper. That is what we are trying to do. My duty is to organize the military forces in accordance with government policy.

When you read that statement and the minister's statement, you find that the two are as far apart as the north and south poles. This makes it very difficult for members of the house to decide just what the answer is to the question as to what is the purpose of the force. I hope the minister will make a further attempt to clarify this matter, or perhaps he will get his chief of staff to give a further explanation of what he meant when he gave that evidence to the defence committee. It is confusing to people to have these contradictions.

Mr. Matheson: What is the next question?

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, what is the hon. member for Leeds asking now?

Mr. Matheson: Is there any other question?

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes, there are several more questions. I would ask the hon. member to just contain himself. I might add, in the same vein, that after his speech in the house on the purpose of this force, when the Secretary of State for External Affairs told us that the whole purpose of the force was that we could more effectively carry out our present foreign affairs commitments, the other day in the external affairs committee he made the announcement—it was really more a statement to a press conference than to the committee—that he was going to offer troops for Viet Nam, should they be required, for peace keeping.

In view of what General Allard has said, and editorials which have appeared in the Ottawa Citizen, which is often thought of as the spokesman for the government—and for good reasons—editorials which have appeared in the Globe and Mail and other prominent newspapers, and the fact that the Secretary of State of External Affairs mentioned this offer of troops for peace keeping, it is not unreasonable that people would think that the new force is designed only for United Nations service. What else could a person think?

The next question concerns the matter of saving money. I agree that when it comes to the country's safety the saving of money is not the all-important factor. It is important enough, certainly, but it is not the all-important factor. The saving of money has been one of the reasons the minister has given for wishing to have this bill passed.

Air Chief Marshal Miller said in effect that there was no particular financial advantage to unification. Then we find in the estimates for the present fiscal year, starting April 1 of this year, that $115 million more is being spent on the armed forces. These estimated expenditures are based on the assumption that the unification bill will go through. Various government members have tried to explain away the $115 million. The explanation of the hon. member for Peterborough as reported at page 14630 of Hansard was most entertaining when he said:

> Hon. members should consider for a few moments the effects of inflation upon a relatively constant budget over a six year period.

This just goes on to show the problems one can sometimes get into in the house by trying to make excuses for one action of the government, and blunder into a rather unfortunate admission regarding other activities of the government, in this case in the field of the control of the cost of living.

But despite all the explanations—and I know some hon. members have said that it might be more expensive if we did not have unification—we have not had an adequate explanation of the $115 million increase. Hon. members can say that the ratio of defence spending has decreased in proportion to the total government expenditure, and other such explanations can be made, but the fact is that defence is still costing more. I do not think it is a matter of all importance, but it is certainly a matter of some importance.

Then there was one question which the minister has not answered, and it is this: Will this new unified force have to be trained in all three services? I think General Allard referred to them, rather unfortunately, as finks, that is flying infantrymen with naval knowledge. How in these days of specialization are these people suddenly to carry out purely army type duties with our NATO allies? This has never been explained. I believe some months ago a question was put to the minister asking whether there could be an interchange between army and naval officers, and he replied that there is no reason that a gunnery officer in the army could not take on general duties in the navy. Superficially this looks possible, but there are certain duties that naval gunnery officers have to carry out, such as shiphandling and navigation, which an army officer could not perform.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to his speech has expired.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I am prompted to make a few comments at this time because of the attempt by the hon. member for Oxford to denigrate, besmirch and generally tarnish the provisions of standing order 15-A. He advanced the most amazing argument I have ever heard. He tried to argue that because he did not receive satisfactory answers, and I presume agreeable answers, to the questions he has put to the minister, he and his colleagues have the right to deny every other member of this house the right to make a decision. As hon. members know, this has been going on in the committee for the past 10 or 12 days in the discussion on clause 2.

However, that is not all. We have also had a repetition of thoughts which had already been advanced in the house previously—

Mr. Churchill: Prove that.

Mr. Olson: —respecting the same matter, during about four days on an interim supply motion in November of 1966. We also had the same arguments advanced on second reading of the bill earlier this year. In addition there were about 40 meetings of the standing committee on defence—I am not sure of the exact number—where the same ground was covered.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): We have heard that also.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is repeating himself.

Mr. Olson: It seems to me to be a complete contradiction for anyone to subscribe to the provisions of a democratic institution and at the same time argue that he has a right to prevent members of that democratic institution from taking a decision, after all the points of view from all those who want to be heard have been put forward. The only argument that was advanced by the hon. member for Oxford this afternoon to support the continuation of this filibuster was that the members of his party have not received satisfactory answers from the minister.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Does not the hon. member realize that the Minister of National Defence just denied him an answer?

Mr. Olson: I am not arguing at this time whether or not I agree with the answers given by the Minister of National Defence, but if hon. members wish to be reasonable they have to extend to the minister the same privileges as to any other members of the house. They cannot force him to say something he does not want to say. The minister has a right to his opinions, the same as members in the Conservative party have a right to their opinions, and have a right to express them. The hon. member for Oxford said a few moments ago that only 25 out of 95 or 96 members of the Conservative party have taken part in the debate.

Mr. Nesbitt: I never said that.

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Olson: We know that some of them have spoken on clause 2 as many as four or five times. Surely it follows that if any of the other 70 or 71 members of that party wanted to make a contribution to the debate they would have full and ample opportunity to do so. Therefore no member in the house has been denied the right or the opportunity to speak; and I contend—

Mr. Régimbal: Seven o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: It being seven o'clock, pursuant to an order made on April 6, the committee stands adjourned until 8 p.m.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Olson: When the committee rose at seven o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I was making a few comments on the amazing argument advanced by the hon. member for Oxford as to the justification for this filibuster that he and his party have been carrying on for the last few days on clause 2 of this bill. It seems to me that it is a disservice to this house and to the standing orders—

Mr. Nesbitt: Why didn't you bring it up at the time?

Mr. Olson: —for any member to attempt to defile the provisions of the standing orders which have been agreed to by this house. I know he is probably still under the illusion that there is some stigma attached to the word "closure" because of what happened in the House of Commons in the famous pipe line debate of 1956. He may be right. However, as I said, I believe this is an illusion. While I was not in the house at that time, I am convinced from reading the record and having taken an interest in the proceedings through the various news media, that there were other contributing factors in that particular debate which led to success in the next election campaign.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, it is a wrong concept of the processes of democracy when a small number of the members of this house can continue to violate the rules to carry on a filibuster which results in preventing members from taking a decision. I am reasonably sure that the hon. member for Oxford and his colleagues, the 25 to whom he referred who have taken part in this debate once or more than once, have not changed their minds. I am not asking them to change their minds. They are entitled to their opinion respecting the bill that is before us, and they are entitled to vote in accordance with that opinion. What I object to, Mr. Chairman, is this small minority of members preventing the majority from doing the essential public business of the country.

As I said before seven o'clock, Mr. Chairman, they have a right to be heard. This is also one of the fundamental democratic processes. They have been heard over and over again, as many as four or five times. When an hon. member says there has not been an opportunity for every other member of that party or any member in this house to be heard, he is making a wrong assessment of the situation. I know that the chairman of this committee has been careful to make sure that any member who has not been heard will have precedence over any member who tries to speak a second time.

Mr. Churchill: You are speaking a second time.

Mr. Oslon: I know, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member has indicated that members who have not spoken in this debate should participate before members speak a second time. He is now speaking for the second time, so I think you should ask him to sit down and surrender his place to someone who has not participated in the debate.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Olson: The hon. member—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Chairman. If you were to work out the ratio I would have to make 50 speeches in order to make the same representation for my party as the hon. member is for his.

Mr. Olson: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is consistent in his usually confused way in trying to imply that I said something I did not say. I did not say that any member of this house does not have a right to speak a second time in committee. I said that the presiding officer in this committee has meticulously, in my opinion, given precedence to those members who have not spoken if they indicated a desire to speak.

Once more, for the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, may I say I believe this is a proper precedence to be given? The fact is I would not be surprised if the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is not one of those who have spoken more than once. In fact, I believe he has spoken four or five times since we went into committee on clause 2. He also made a contribution, for whatever it was worth, to the debate, on second reading. He made several contributions, perhaps five or six, on the supply motion back in November, 1966, on the same subject matter. I presume he has exhausted himself in so far as bringing up anything of value is concerned. If he has been unable to persuade other members of this house, surely there ought to be a time when we can vote on whether or not we have accepted these arguments.

Mr. Churchill: There is a general demand for me to speak again.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: That is not what they are trying to do. What they are trying to do is to prevent a decision being taken by the majority of the members of this house. I do not mind this sort of tactic for a while. In fact this house has had to put up with it on a number of occasions in various previous debates. But then to come along when they are faced with standing order 15A, which was agreed to by this house, and to try, as the hon. member for Oxford did, to denigrate, besmirch, tarnish and generally defile the provisions of the bill before this standing order can be used, is in my opinion doing, a great disservice not only to democracy but to the proper functioning of this house. They have violated the rules all through the debate; and what is more, they have admitted as much.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Since the hon. member for Medicine Hat has been imputing motives, which is clearly out of order and unparliamentary, as I think the hon. member, who prides himself on being an expert on the rules, should know—

Mr. Olson: What is your point of order?

Mr. Nesbitt: My point of order is that the hon. member, as he says, was in this chamber while I was making my speech. Since he is so concerned about the rules of this house, I would point out that at no point did he raise a point of order during the course of my remarks. It is only since then that he has decided to do so. I think he should have raised this point at the time, not now. We should like to know why the hon. member is raising the point now instead of at that time, when he should have raised it.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Okanagan-Revelstoke has just whispered to me that I am long suffering, and I think that answers the hon. member's point. The answer is that there was no valid point of order, as I am sure the hon. member knew when he rose.

Mr. Nesbitt: Now you have no valid point of order.

Mr. Olson: What I was trying to explain, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted a few moments ago, was that the members of the Conservative party who have participated in this debate have admitted that they have been violating the standing orders of this house. If the hon. member wants me to quote to him chapter and verse from the standing orders I will do so. Standing order 34(2) says:

> Mr. Speaker or the Chairman, after having called the attention of the house, or of the committee, to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance, or repetition, may direct him to discontinue his speech, and if then the member still continues to speak—

—Mr. Speaker is authorized to take other action. The hon. member for Oxford admitted that he was asking the same questions over and over again, and that in itself is a violation of the rules. He is not supposed to repeat his remarks or the remarks of any other hon. member.

So it seems, Mr. Chairman, that a new definition or concept of our parliamentary and democratic processes is being foisted upon this house by the Conservative members at this time. First of all, they argue that if they cannot have their way they will continue the debate interminably and impose some kind of perseverance test.

Mr. Danforth: Who said that?

Mr. Olson: That is precisely what the hon. member for Oxford tried to convey. He said that unless and until the minister gives satisfactory and agreeable answers, they are going to carry on and on with the debate. These are not his words, but that is the essence of what he was trying to say. It was not even necessary for him to say it, Mr. Chairman, because it has been completely obvious to us all for the past week or ten days.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I should like members in all parts of the house to know that the terms of standing 15-A of the standing orders of this house do not have any stigma attached to them as far as I am concerned. I think that we, as members of parliament elected by the people of Canada to conduct essential public business at the federal level, have the responsibility to move from one piece of legislation to the next. We know very well that because of the tactics which are now being employed a lot of essential legislation and public business is being neglected. We are not getting to it.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, let me say that I agree that these members have the right to be heard. They have been heard over and over again. I think it is now time for these half dozen or dozen Tories to respect the rights of the other 200-odd members of this house and let the members of the house come to a decision on a matter that has been occupying their time for far too long now.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Chairman, in spite of the homily from apparently the self-appointed guardian of the rules of parliament, I would point out that I have yet to speak on this issue. The hon. member may not wish to hear me, and I am sure that most of the government benchers will have no interest in what I have to say.

Of course the problem created by rule 15A is the government's problem. The committee that suggested it—I was a member of the committee and was very glad to be a member of it—envisaged the business committee meeting more or less constantly. It is too bad that the government has waited until this highly suspect and controversial bill is before parliament before having the courage to invoke the formula that was provided by the rules.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, may I raise a point of order. The matter before the committee of the whole for discussion at this moment is clause 2 of this bill. Standing order 15A is not before the committee.

Mr. Ricard: Why didn't you say that a while ago?

Mr. McIlraith: I should like an opportunity to be heard and to raise my point of order, Mr. Chairman. I think that is a proper request.

Mr. Ricard: Why didn't you speak up before?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I show respect to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, though I admit there are times when it does test one's patience.

Mr. Ricard: This is nothing but hypocrisy.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, it is quite improper for the hon. member to charge me with that. If he will read the rules he will see that what I say is the case. If the hon. member were a different type of member I would ask him to withdraw that charge—

Mr. Ricard: Don't worry about me.

Mr. McIlraith: —but since he does not have that kind of nature and background I will not make that request of him.

Mr. Ricard: This is sheer hypocrisy.

Mr. McIlraith: With all respect, Mr. Chairman, I want to raise a point of order, and I started a moment ago to do so. What is before the committee is the clause by clause consideration of this bill. We are now discussing clause 2. The hon. member who has the floor is seeking to debate one of the standing orders of the house. With great deference, that standing order is not before the committee of the whole house at the moment, and therefore his remarks are out of order.

I think the hon. member, who has a good appreciation of the rules, will agree on reflection that the rule in committee of the whole house is that hon. members should stick to the clause of the bill under discussion. Admittedly clause 2 is quite wide in scope and gives the hon. member latitude to debate the question of the armed forces; but it is not—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the minister on reflection agree that he ought to have raised this point earlier?

Mr. McIlraith: I was not in the house at the time. As soon as I came in—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sure hon. members noticed when I came into the house.

Mr. Nugent: Would the minister accept a question?

Mr. McIlraith: I will in a moment. Had this rule been debated earlier in my presence I would have raised this point of order. It was not debated in my presence, I am sorry to say.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, since the minister says that he was not in the house and the entire speech of the hon. member for Medicine Hat was devoted to this particular rule, and in view of the fact that the hon. member for Royal was only going to take a few minutes to answer the hon. member, does the minister not think that he should withdraw his point of order so that, in fairness, a short answer might be made to the lengthy and completely hypocritical tirade of the hon. member for Medicine Hat?

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: No, I would not agree to any such proposition. When I came into the house a moment or two before the hon. member for Medicine Hat had concluded his remarks, he was taking the official opposition to task for their conduct during the last number of days—for repetitious debate. That is what he was discussing.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): That has nothing to do with clause 2.

Mr. McIlraith: In any event, I have raised the point of order and I respectfully ask your ruling on it, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: I must say that the Chair allowed a certain latitude when hearing the hon. member for Medicine Hat on the subject, and maybe we could hear the opinions of the hon. member for Royal on the subject raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. However, I would ask that, having heard the hon. member for Royal, hon. members of the committee should confine their comments to clause 2.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: There is one difficulty. It is only fair, and indeed it is my obligation to point out, that the business committee of the house for which provision is made in rule 15A has not yet reported; it is still active, and until it reports its work becomes impossible if the proceedings under the standing order are to be debated in the interval.

Mr. Olson: On a point of order: Two or three members of the committee have stated that it was I who raised the matter of standing order 15A. I should like to point out that it was the hon. member for Oxford who raised this question and tried to decry the provisions of that order. This prompted me to make my comments.

Mr. Fairweather: Now that we have followed the perambulations of the leader of the house with regard to points of order and so on, I should like to assure the hon. gentleman that I was on the committee which recommended rule 15A to parliament. I support the rule. But I feel it is too bad that the government did not have the courage to use the business committee throughout our proceedings in parliament, and has resorted to it only when a bill as controversial and as badly conceived as this, is before us.

I have one or two other things to say about the rule which I intend to get off my chest, in spite of spurious points of order. As was pointed out in the Montreal Gazette on Saturday last, closure or a form of closure should be used in connection with legislation which has evident, urgent and imperative aims. The bill before us fulfils none of these requirements. We have the minister's own evidence and his speeches before this committee to support that statement. The questions asked by the hon. member for Greenwood remain unanswered. He said on April 3:

> Mr. Chairman, what we in Canada need in the field of defence is a clear defence policy. In all the mass of words spoken by the defence minister and his aides on the subject of unification, there has been complete failure to clarify or justify our defence roles, a failure to say what the future of the armed forces is to be, what purposes they are to serve, what sort of hostilities we expect to be involved in.

As the Gazette points out, a fundamental weakness in the government's position is the lack of clarity, the cloudiness surrounding this bill.

> It is unreasonable for the government to push ahead with dogged determination on such an issue and expect the opposition (among them many who are friendly to the principle involved) to go along for the ride. It cannot drive ahead on a cloudy issue, except by driving into the clouds.

We have been treated to a good deal of editorial comment on this issue in the last few months. As many speakers have pointed out, one of Canada's great newspapers, the Winnipeg Free Press, has dealt with this matter, and its distinguished editor Mr. R. S. Malone was undoubtedly the editorialist who wrote the article which appeared on April 4, from which I take these words:

> Members must surely recognize the grave responsibility they bear as individuals when voting on this bill. This is a question which far transcends both politicking and party.

It is in this spirit that I wish to say a word or two about the bill before us, in spite of the fact that some people object to an issue taking up ten or 12 days of the time of parliament. I make no apology for adding a few minutes to the length of this debate. I happen to be worried because the defence structure of this country is being dismembered without either the minister or his department really knowing what the alternative will be. By using the technique of public relations and hard sell it is easy to smother the committee and the country with statistics and with figures. Nowhere, however, have I seen a clear exposition of Canada's role in defence for the next decade, or for that matter for the next three decades. I believe we are entitled to this information as we study a matter of such crucial importance.

Nowhere have I seen any real evidence of substantial savings—one of the great boasts made by the minister in the early days of the hard sell—as a result of this new proposal. Nowhere have I seen any evidence that the efficiency of our fighting forces would be increased. I myself, for what it is worth, favour integration at the command level, for logistic support, in the administration and in the ancillary services. Our forces must be so organized that they may continue their ready integration with United States and United Kingdom forces—that word "integration" is a dangerous one to use in this debate, but the use of the word integration is all right in this context because, obviously, no matter what may happen in the world in the next two decades, those two countries will remain our closest allies.

I am not one who is against radical experiments if they are made to reform situations or overcome problems of such pressing urgency and importance that ordinary time-tested methods will not do. But I am against having a concept forced upon the country for no other reason, as far as I can see, than to advance the minister's ambitions.

The hon. gentleman has become, I suggest, the captive of his own propaganda. He has become, I maintain, a handmaiden—if that is a possible concept—of the technocrats whose thrills are obtained by listening to the whirring of computers and whose excitement is the result of flashing lights and figures disgorged in steady and unrelenting streams.

May I return to quote a paragraph or two from the editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on April 4?

Mr. Hellyer: That has been read into the record seven or eight times already. There is a rule against repetition, of which I am sure the hon. member has heard.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Fairweather: If the rule of repetition were enforced in this parliament we would have been home four years ago.

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fairweather: I think that if we all had to plead guilty to the breach of such a rule the place would be emptied forthwith.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The truth is always the truth, no matter how many times repeated.

Mr. Fairweather: Quoting the editorial:

> In Mr. Hellyer's white paper on the subject of integration two years ago, he forecast that it was experimental, that we would have to feel our way, that errors might be made. Surely the time has come for honest acceptance of the fact that it would be a major error to force 'complete unification' and destroy all service and unit identifications.
> In his initial position on 'integration,' Mr. Hellyer's statement indicated both wisdom and a broad-minded approach.

That is an historic statement, part of the history of the development of this bill, and I am sorry that part of its history has been forgotten.

> Seemingly when he raised the matter of total unification, however, he was unable to accept the fact that his most experienced officers, both outside and within the service, advised strongly against it. This qualified and considered advice was interpreted by Mr. Hellyer as interference and personal opposition to his will, an attempt to obstruct and thwart his own ambitions. In this context, Mr. Hellyer has apparently determined to plunge blindly ahead regardless of any harm done to himself, the services, his government, or the nation.

It has been said, and I must admit there is truth in this statement, that the country is bored by this debate, and that the issue is not one which interests the majority of Canadians. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that this fact, if it is true, makes it even more important that we here, as representatives of the public, reach a right conclusion after careful and exhaustive consideration of this proposal.

As Air Vice Marshal Miller told the defence committee—and by the way, I am sure the minister will be disappointed that I shall be quoting him for a paragraph or two, because undoubtedly others have come across his evidence and placed portions of it on the record—> —that unification, while it might wel be the end result of integration, would not at present be timely, that more time was needed for the orderly development of the integration process. "I felt that a lot of careful planning was necessary and probably time to educate people was required before the next step of unification."

> He said that he saw no significant financial or military advantage in unification over integration.

What I have quoted, Mr. Chairman, is part of an editorial in the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, March 22.

Surely if there are neither military nor financial justifications for this measure, then there is no other reason for it.

Presumably the charge will be made that we who are in the opposition should have some alternative proposals, and because I like to dabble in the somewhat cloudy ideals of defence and international affairs I am going to dare to make a suggestion or two to the minister. Where we should use the word integration is in the formation of our defence and foreign policies. Here we need an integrated if not a unified approach. As I said a minute or two ago, our relationship with the United States is crucial.

We have been warned recently through a very interesting series of articles in Canadian newspapers about the build-up of the debate in the United States concerning a program costing $30 billion for antiballistic missiles. The debate is going on between the Secretary of Defence in the United States and his military advisers, and will soon be joined by the United States Congress. Mr. Chairman, Canada cannot be drawn into this arms race under any pretext and I assume that we—"we" meaning the government of Canada and the country—have already served notice on Washington to this effect.

The west can continue on its present course of repression of social problems and effective action on them through global military commitments and continuing "far off wars"—to use an expression from that interesting book titled "1984". These will involve a direct racial conflict and will keep the world precariously on the edge of an arms race and nuclear war, and will involve a continuing drain on men and the morality of the empire to maintain the frontiers—that, of course, is the empire of the west—or the west can embark on a full program of dealing with the root problems of developing areas in a "helping the people to help themselves" manner which will promote international co-operation and intercultural exchange, eventually bringing about world law, if not world government.

Perhaps I will be accused of idealism, but perhaps it is time, in a debate that has gone on for 10 days, for a few minutes of idealism.

Of course the second of the alternatives I outlined is the one that I espouse.

What might be in order, then, to use a phrase coined by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, is the employment of the "walking into the beverage room backwards" technique, and we might be using this technique with our good friends the Americans. Perhaps these suggestions may have some merit. At least they will take the house leader's mind off standing order 15A which seems to trouble him a bit.

The first suggestion is—and here of course I speak for myself and not my party, something which will be obvious in a minute—that the Canadian armed forces might be reduced to a mobile brigade group on United Nations standby. Canada would also supply UN training cadres for international forces and the Canadian militia, if there is such a thing any more.

Second, a specific function in the total North American defence network would be assigned to us, this function to be in a non-arms race sector, and preferably to have civilian application, that is, application in the field of communications, medical services, radar warning, transport, or what have you.

Third, there might be a year of compulsory national service for all Canadians at age 18 in one of the following areas—I digress to say I see my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe-Bagot look at me with alarm, but I would repeat that this proposal is only my own—the first of the areas being the militia or reserve forces. Second, and of equal importance in this catalogue would be the Company of Young Canadians; third, an adjunct to that, a youth conservation corps; fourth, hospital work; fifth, work in our northern areas, the choice in each case to be up to the individual. This, I am advised, would amount to about 400,000 people a harnessing of youthful idealism, and if I can still claim youthful idealism I shall do so. In any event, this is the number of people who could be enlisted each year.

Another suggestion is that $1 billion of the $1.6 billion we now spend on defence would be used for foreign assistance programs for developing areas. My suggestions are that this could be used through integrated economic development programs for total regions and nations. There would also be what I call personal service, because I do not like the word personnel, covering the provision of teachers, doctors, technicians, etc. some of whom might be drawn from the corps of 400,000 which I have mentioned.

Also included would be capital assistance to individually owned farms of up to a certain acreage, to small industries controlled by the workers and minority shareholders, to co-operatives, and to all popularly controlled enterprises which would promote true free enterprise rather than perpetuate a basically feudal system. Then there would be grants for specific jointly planned projects such as universities, schools, plant and so on which would be returned in trade, or not at all, depending on the facility. Surely in respect of any subject such as this it is important that we in Canada help other countries train their people in those countries, and not rely so much on bringing them here to Canada thus creating the additional problem of their forgetting their homelands. I believe Canada could perform an invaluable service to the United States and the world in general by taking the lead in dealing with root problems. Canada has all the advantages of the United States, such as wealth, technology, and so on, and less of the disadvantages such as civil rights problems, colonies, size of population and so on.

A lot of this no doubt is highly idealistic, but I must say that as a result of what I read and study I become a little tired when I hear experts tell me that the solution to the problems of man rests in alliances such as NATO, NORAD and so on. I think that somehow, once we get into these alliances, we become so inflexible in our policy that detachment from it becomes increasingly difficult. NATO obviously was an important instrument of policy when it was initiated some years ago. I for one feel that its days are numbered, and the sooner we in this country recognize that fact the better it will be. I am not thinking in a miserly way of the dollars involved: I just believe, in my humble opinion, that the need long since has been overcome by events.

Now, if I may—still not committing an infraction of rule 15A—I should like to place on the record two paragraphs from a book written by one of the truly great men in the world, Lord Boyd Orr. I believe that if we spent more time listening to idealists such as Lord Boyd Orr we would have less trouble over matters of national defence. In a book entitled "As I Recall The 1880's to the 1960's" he said:

> The most important question today, when the terrific advance of modern science has shaken the economic systems of the twentieth century, is whether man has attained the wisdom to adjust the old systems to suit the new powers of science and to realize that we are now one world in which all nations will ultimately share the same fate. The only hope of survival, as so many statesmen who are not in office and other intellectuals have realized, is a world government able to keep peace by getting the cooperation of all nations, including China, as political equals, on a basis where their influence is adjusted to the size of the population. Some people believe that man's wisdom has not kept pace with his scientific achievements, and the wealthy privileged nations will continue to exercise their powers to retain their privileges.

Lastly, this great man of the world says:

The many non-governmental organizations to which millions of people adhere in all countries are continually holding conferences to consider ways and means whereby we can attain peace, economic prosperity and international friendship. It is difficult, however, to get governments to realize that this is the only road for the survival of our civilization. After the first world war president Woodrow Wilson tried to usher in the new era by setting up the League of Nations for which the European countries were not ready. Their governments tried to build up the old system which collapsed in the second world war, and unless the present efforts succeed, our civilization will collapse in a third world war. It is a race against time. The hope is that wisdom may prevail and the great powers of science be applied in co-operation by all nations to create a wonderful new era free from the intolerable evils of war, poverty and disease. Then we will have a world in which the people of all countries will rise to a higher standard of living and a higher culture than has yet been attained by the most privileged people in the most privileged countries of the world. Such is the world which the present statesmen could, if they were wise, hand on to our children.

Mr. Chairman, as one who represents a constituency in what is one of the privileged countries of the world I suggest that parliament and the people of Canada would make better use of their time by thinking about some of the concepts put forward by Lord Boyd Orr and others toward ensuring the peace of man than, I suggest, in wasting it by considering this bill which it seems to me is nothing more than a technique in personal puffery.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I have never spoken previously in this debate, but after hearing the hon. member from the neighbouring constituency of Medicine Hat I felt prompted to enter into the debate for two reasons. First, I wish to answer his argument and, second, I wish to set forth some of the points of view which I, as a Canadian in this day and age, feel should be set forth at this time in respect of the matter of defence. There was a suggestion made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat that we were carrying on delaying tactics with reference to this bill. I would say to him that anyone who has been reading the newspapers—

An hon. Member: Liberal minded.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes; I know he is very Liberal minded on occasion, and at the right times. I should like to say to him that if he wishes to project himself forward as the representative of a small divided group and say to this committee that the main opposition in parliament is delaying this legislation, this is a good way to project his personality, get the necessary propaganda back home and say "I am the great man from Medicine Hat and I am saving parliament". He has tried those tactics on many occasions since I have been a member of parliament. I know them well and do not intend to answer them any further. I do, however, wish to show the House of Commons once again the motive and nature of the man from Medicine Hat, who is Liberal minded at the right and proper time to save the government from embarrassment.

As I have said, I have not spoken previously in this debate, but I am happy now to enter into a debate such as this which concerns the security of this nation. If I may be personal for a few moments, let me say that only last week I had my fiftieth birthday. Twice during the past 50 years the freedom of the western world has been threatened. Had it not been for those countries of the western world who can work together, although sometimes they fail to do so, perhaps the freedom I enjoy tonight to speak freely and have members on the government side listen would not be possible.

Before entering into the main theme of my remarks tonight I should like to say that young Canadians, and I used to consider myself among them, would realize how important it is not to rush through parliament, measures on the important matter of defence and security, had they witnessed German solciers goosestepping down the streets of Canadian cities and had there been that destruction in Canada which occurred overseas as a result of bombing. Surely these young Canadians, had they seen the suffering of civilians during the last war, would realize how important our defence forces are, not only to the security of this nation but to the very existence of the western world.

If this country is to have influence, we must be prepared to take our place alongside the nations of the western world. The world is becoming smaller, as has often been said, but the various camps are becoming larger. We now have the camp of the western world on the one side, with communism on the other. It has been my belief for some time that even had we not been victorious, because of our combined and dedicated services toward the maintenance of freedom, that way of life which best suits man would have survived.

Let me come to my next point in reference to delay. I joined with members of the Conservative party in asking that this matter be sent to a committee for study before second reading in order that we could hear the evidence of experts. Had we been allowed to do so I am sure this debate would have been shortened. The minister on that occasion, because he is a stubborn man, was as unyielding as he is tonight. He would not move because he is inflexible. His attitude has been one of stubbornness. He has said we intend to do certain things and they must be done his way without compromise. In this regard let me first say that had the minister been prepared to compromise and allow this matter to go to the committee in order that the bill could be examined clause by clause before second reading, we would have saved time. For that reason I make no apology for taking part in the debate at this time.

I have thoroughly read the only speech made by a member of the executive on the government front benches, other than the minister of defence. That speech was made by the Minister of Transport, whom I have always respected for his intelligence, though never for his intellectual trickery such as that exemplified by the change in his position on the Crowsnest Pass freight rates, in the transport bill. I never thought I would, either as a Canadian or a member of this parliament, read a speech of the nature delivered by that minister. Let us look for a few minutes at what he said. Many of the things said by that minister should be exploded before this debate concludes. I hope the hon. member for Medicine Hat has read his speech and will be able at the appropriate time, and place, and with the appropriate audience in Alberta, to endorse his words.

Some of the things the Minister of Transport said are very unusual. In reference to the question of unification he suggested this was not something for experts to decide. He said there was no point in calling the chiefs of staff and high ranking officers because we had never before attempted unification, and to do so would be a waste of time. He said he did not put much faith in that kind of evidence because it was worthless. In the event that anyone doubts my analysis of what he said in this regard let me quote briefly from his speech. I know the rules in this regard and if anybody objects to what I intend to do let me say that I am familiar with his words and can readily paraphrase them. This is what the Minister of Transport said, which was so shocking:

> The point I am making is that in so far as the progress on integration is concerned, that has been going on for three or four years and the evidence of military experts is, of course, of great relevance.

Apparently this evidence was of relevance in respect of integration. As pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary North, we have realized for a number of years that integration must take place and has been taking place. This is true of Canada as well as of other nations. Then the Minister of Transport said:

> —in so far as unification is concerned it has no relevance whatever.

Let me point out that the fight being debated in parliament tonight is not in respect of integration but in respect of unification. I have heard on television and read in newspapers the use of the two words as meaning the same thing. A distinguished British officer, and I do not intend to mention his name, was being interviewed on a C.B.C. program. Twice during that program I heard the words "integration" and "unification" used as meaning one and the same thing. Surely that was done for the same reason the minister uses the words in this way. It was done to confuse the people. Even the Minister of Transport followed the same course in an attempt to indicate that there was no difference between integration and unification.

I intend to define these two terms by quoting the definitions of those experts the Minister of Transport feels should not pass an opinion. The Minister of Transport then said, as reported at page 14667 of Hansard for April 7:

> I want to repeat that. The evidence of experts is of no relevance whatever because there are no experts. There never has been, under modern conditions at least, a unified military force. It is like every step forward, and I believe this is a step forward; it is a step into something in which nobody has any experience.

In other words he is suggesting that the air marshal and the chief of general staff and other high-ranking officers are not qualified to speak on unification.

Who are the two Canadian experts on the question of unification? Apparently they are the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Transport. That being the case, why did the minister bother calling the committee together? Surely that was simply a waste of time. The Minister of National Defence is the same man who boasted when on this side of the house that when he became minister he would set up a special defence committee to hear evidence and expert opinion. The Minister of Transport, I am sure with the support of the Minister of National Defence, said that the opinions of these men would be worthless because we have never had unification. Let me draw an appropriate analogy. Apparently the evidence and expert opinion of a top medical practitioner would be worthless in respect of a new treatment because it was new and had never been used before. That is the pith of the argument used by that intelligent Minister of Transport and, of course, endorsed by the Minister of National Defence. If what they suggest is true, then the defence committee wasted its time.

Let me pause here for a few minutes without taking too much time of the committee—and I am sure this is relevant. I have come to the conclusion, in my 10 years as a member of parliament, that in many cases—I do not say all, because I want to be fair —committees of the House of Commons are a farce because the government controls committees. I will draw an analogy. I know more about the general subject of committees, because I was not a member of the defence committee, but I have read the reports and will quote from them. Take the committee on northern affairs. That committee heard evidence for a week. The government members were in the majority and were hand-picked by the minister. They whitewashed the whole picture as far as our national parks are concerned. This sort of thing went on in the defence committee and goes on in every committee in the House of Commons. Hon. members opposite talk about the great intellectuals on that side of the house and how they will improve our committees system. They know as well as I do the extent to which politics are played in our committees.

An hon. Member: Committees are loaded with government members.

Mr. Woolliams: An hon. member says committees are loaded. They are loaded in more ways than one. The government members on committees whitewash the reports of committees. If there are politics in the subject before the committee, it is swept under the rug. I would think that the hon. member for Medicine Hat, because of his length of service, experience as a parliamentarian and as a rules expert, would have seen through this subterfuge. Listen to what the Minister of Transport had to say, as reported at page 14667 of Hansard:

> It is like every step forward, and I believe this is a step forward; it is a step into something in which nobody has any experience. I suggest that generally we are apt to get the most imaginative views from young people who have a sense of adventure and not from people who fought the last war—

I say to the minister that I have a great deal of respect for our youth, those in colleges and universities, and always have, because the strength obtained through knowledge is the strength of the nation. I recall that in 1935 to 1939 the Oxford Group wandered around the western world preaching and selling peace like insurance agents selling insurance policies. One by one the freedoms of the western world were drained to the depths by these people. If it had not been for Winston Churchill and other great leaders of the western world I would not have had the opportunity tonight to express my views, which this government does not want to hear anyway. I agree with a former minister of national defence of our government, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, when he said, as reported at page 14667 of Hansard:

> I am fed up with this stuff from non-combatant people who are making fun of fighting men.

I am a red-blooded Canadian and I am glad the former minister of national defence had this to say and put it on the record of Hansard for others to read. He had this to say about the great debate in which we are engaged—and it is a great debate:

> Mr. Churchill: I thank the minister very much. But when I spoke in rather a personal fashion I was not speaking for myself, because I do not care much what is said around here. However, I am disturbed about the attacks that are made upon men who served much better than I did in both wars. People are making scurrilous remarks about them, talking about them as being out of date and all the rest of it. They are attempting to pretend that these men were not good servants of their country, and that is what I object to.

That is what I object to in reference to this debate. I object to the standard of debate that we have seen from the front benches, the executive, of this government. In my opinion the speech of the Minister of Transport is, in plain, ordinary English, a disgrace. I am sorry to see the Minister of National Defence endorse that type of drivel, particularly in view of the ambitions he had, about which I have read in many periodicals in the last few years. With the greatest respect to the Minister of National Defence, and he knows that I have respect for him, I do not think his image as potential leader of that party has been enhanced by that kind of drivel.

What went on in the defence committee? We heard the Minister of National Defence time and time again—as we have heard him in the last two or three years—criticize the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in respect of defence matters. The minister has said he can save the country money. He has said this right across our nation. This has been his great sales talk. He has said, "I can save the taxpayers of this country money because I am an expert and can streamline defence."

Even though the Minister of Transport does not agree with Air Marshal Miller, Air Marshal Miller had something to say about the saving of money in the area of defence. Let us look at page 2297 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the committee on national defence. Air Chief Marshal Miller was asked this question by a former minister of national defence, the hon. member for Calgary North:

> Do you, yourself, see any financial advantage accruing from the proposed scheme of unification?

What was the answer? Air Chief Marshal Miller replied:

> There are no significant financial advantages whatsoever as far as I can see.

Naturally the Minister of Transport had to say that we cannot accept the evidence of these experts. He asked, who are they to pass opinions? They only served 30 or 40 years in the services. Then the Minister of Transport said that they pushed aside these men of experience in the first war and put in young people in the second war. When the former minister of national defence asked him to name the great generals of the second world war, he could not name them. His argument fell flat on its face, as have his words across this nation. What else did he say about that subject? As reported at page 2302 of the committee proceedings, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona asked this question:

> In fact, sir—I am going away out on a limb here—was there any thought in your mind or did you have any evidence on which to base an opinion that unification itself had any hope of achieving any sort of substantial savings in itself, at all?

Once again Air Marshal Miller said, "No." How, then, can the Minister of National Defence continue to peddle that sort of drivel across the nation and say that this program, no matter how dear and close it is to his heart, will save the taxpayers' money? The proof of the pudding is in the eating. The estimates of the minister's department have been published, and the budget for defence is up by $150 million.

An hon. Member: It is $115 million.

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody says it is up by $115 million. I see that the minister is laughing. What is $115 million to him? If he thinks an increase of $115 million is a lesser sum than $150 million, in this context, he and I went to different schools. Then we have the great cross-examiner, the hon. member for Kootenay East. I would never want the hon. member to be beside me in the defence of any case, because if I were defending he would be the most powerful prosecution attorney one could imagine. If you are defending and want to make a point for the prosecution, you put Byrne in. Listen to this one. This is a dinger. This will be quoted in our law schools across Canada for time immemorial. He really brings this matter to a head for the Liberal government. I congratulate him, because he has put this matter in the proper perspective. This is the kind of cross-examination I have always dreamed of but hoped it would never happen to me. The hon. member for Kootenay East asked this powerful question:

> Then, do you believe that the implementation of Bill C-243 would result in significant demoralization of the various forces?

This was most potent cross-examination of Air Marshal Miller:

> Then, do you believe that the implementation of Bill C-243 would result in significant—

I like that word.

> —demoralization of the various forces?

That has been our argument. That is the great question. What did Air Chief Marshal Miller say when answering that question put by the prosecution? He said:

> If rushed, I would think so.

What a question, and what an answer. This is where I rest our case, Mr. Chairman. I am glad to see the chairman of the defence committee, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, wave at me from across the way. He made a great speech. He said that this bill, with all its clauses, means nothing. He said it merely changes the name of the forces, and that the feelings of the serving men and their morale are nothing. The hon. member says we are really debating nothing. It is something like medicare, we will merely pass this measure to gain influence and for window-dressing.

So I say to the minister, first, it is not saving the nation money, and second, it is demoralizing the army. He may say, as did Air Chief Marshal Miller, that he cannot predict whether or not there will be less recruits. But I cannot believe that a man will join a force in the belief that he will serve at sea, and end up as a footslogger in the jungles. The minister denies now the charge that he cannot get the necessary recruits for the air force and the navy. I say the minister is a failure.

Tonight we are making history because when the present government occupied this side of the house—and I believe this is the very seat the minister occupied—the defence policy of our government was attacked and we were defeated. At that time the hon. member for Medicine Hat and other members in his party, which was much stronger at that time, voted with the government and turned out the Conservative government on account of its defence policy.

If ever there was a climax and a mess created by the Liberal party and the Liberal government, it is that government's policy on defence. I will remind the government that its record in that regard is consistent tonight, and in looking back at the history of that party with regard to military affairs I should like to hang an albatross around their necks. I am referring here to the scandal of Hong Kong. It was a week before Christmas when the Liberal government sent our ill equipped force there. I should like the minister to visit one hospital in Calgary and to look at some of the human wrecks who are there now as a result of the decision taken by those great experts on defence, the Minister of Transport, the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister, all Liberals. This is the albatross I would hang around their necks when they speak about defence matters. What I am saying may seem a little tough, but it is true and true facts cut deeply.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat says we should not debate this subject any further. Yet I am still convinced that in working together with our neighbours we can keep peace and security but, as the late President Kennedy said, we cannot negotiate from a weak position. We can never negotiate from fear but we must not be afraid to negotiate: A weak force means we would be negotiating with other nations from fear. If we allow ourselves to be weakened, the communists will run all over us. That is no way to secure peace. The policy of appeasement has failed in the past and we have seen the loss of freedom which it has brought about.

I should like to conclude with the words of Winston Churchill when he spoke about defence, with reference to world affairs. He made the speech at Harry Truman's birthday party. At that time the western world was afraid of the Russian communists, just as now it is apprehensive about China. Let us hark back to those times. I do not remember the exact words which Winston Churchill used, but he said in effect that the United Nations, which he hoped to be the majestic centre of world security, has been reduced to a mere cockpit where ancient states and mighty nations hurl reproaches and recriminations at one another to prepare for what would seem a third world war. He said at that time that Russia dreads our friendship as much as our hostility. Then he offered a solution. He said that that is why he believed in strength, and that in working together as friends we can save the world. He said that if the iron curtain were lifted so that millions of good hearted human beings on either side could have free intercourse one with the other, the 14 men in the Kremlin who control millions of good hearted people would soon be undermined and peace and security would be ours.

I direct these words to the minister because I believe that in bringing about unification of our forces against the opinions of our military experts and of experts all over the world —because nowhere else is it being tried out in the face of such opposition—we are weakening Canada's endeavours to maintain peace and security in alliance with the western world.

I make one appeal to the minister, and I think it is a worth-while one. I ask him to reconsider his position on unification. The Prime Minister said in Calgary that it will take a few years before unification is brought about. He, the Prime Minister said he had some doubts about unification, after having heard the statement made by the deputy minister. Surely if it is the responsibility of the Prime Minister not only to govern this country but to work for the safety and security of the world, then the Minister of National Defence should cease to be so arrogant and should withdraw unification from the bill.

National Defence Act Amendment

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to participate in this debate but, in so doing, I have no apologies to make since it is a privilege shared by everyone of us, members of this house.

I have no objection to anyone in this house expressing an opinion, but I would not take it kindly if someone were to try to prevent me from speaking out.

It is not on account of some military experience that I rise to speak in this debate tonight, for I have none at all. But I have followed attentively the various speeches and it seems to me that some important points need clarification.

Many questions have been put to the minister and all or most of them have remained unanswered. Another reason for taking part in this discussion is to protest on behalf of the voters of my constituency against the government, once again, trying to gag us. They may be using a method different from the one they previously resorted to, but with the support of our friends opposite, they would fain prevent us from expressing our views.

Every time a measure is introduced to prevent us from speaking, I shall make it my duty to rise and protest, on behalf of those I have the honour to represent in this house. All we want is a clear and definite explanation of what the hon. minister wants to have passed by this house, and nothing else.

Mr. Chairman, we are accused of filibustering. What else can we do? When we ask the minister to give the information we need, the information our electors request, he refuses to give it. I feel that we cannot honestly be blamed for renewing our request; on the contrary, the minister should be blamed for his uncompromising attitude, his arrogance, his stubbornness in failing to give us the information we are entitled to.

I would hope that if we repeat this often enough to him he will come to understand at last and will be willing to make half of the way and give us at least some, if not all, of the explanations we require, if we are to feel justified to exercise the rights which are ours in the house.

Mr. Chairman, if there is one important question for a country, it is the question of defence. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) will be the first to admit this and he will also agree with me that it is every member's business to know as much as possible about this country's defence.

Who, both in this house and outside, would want to depend upon a foreign country for the defence of our land? This country belongs to us; it is ours, and we must take all available means to provide for our own defence. We simply want the minister to tell us how he intends to discharge his responsibilities as Minister of National Defence.

When he introduced this bill, the Minister of National Defence led us to believe that unification would save the taxpayers a lot of money. If one looks at the figures, one cannot but notice that over the last few years defence expenditures have gone up steadily. In fact, they climbed to $1,658 million and, this year, they increased by $115 million.

How can the minister blame us for taking a little time on such an important matter, on such heavy expenditures and for asking him to account for them? In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, we are only doing our duty as members of parliament and the remarks made by an hon. member opposite prove what I am saying. I refer to the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Langlois) who stated the following, as shown on page 14676 of Hansard:

> As members of parliament we have a direct responsibility to ensure that public funds are spent in the most effective way.
> I suggest that to ignore the advice of experts as to ways to save money and make this country's armed forces more effective is a very serious dereliction of duty.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the present minister has completely disregarded the views of the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Langlois). He does not seem to pay any attention to the amount of the expenditures. He seems also to reject or ignore the advice of at least a dozen experts, who do not approve of his proposal. And they are career men, who have devoted the greater part of their lives to the armed forces. They have told the minister that his unification proposal was not appropriate for the country.

But the minister, in his obstinacy, remains set on imposing a plan which he conceived himself and, in spite of the wish of experts in this field, he still wants to implement a plan which, according to these experts, would not answer the needs of our armed forces.

It seems to me the minister should not be surprised that we ask him questions. It is his duty to give us information. There are also other reasons why our attitude should not come as a surprise to the minister.

Hon. members will remember that a certain piece of evidence of one of the senior officers in the army was tampered with to meet the current needs. How can the minister be surprised now to see that we do not accept all he tells us without reservation? Furthermore, he accused an admiral, Admiral Landymore, of having betrayed his country. He accused him of treason and then presented his excuses. Nevertheless, he has left this admiral, a high ranking military officer who gave his best for many years, under a cloud—that of treason. How can the minister today be surprised to see that we do not accept all he tells us without reservation? It seems logical to me that we should ask ourselves whether he tells us the truth. We are justified in adopting this position by recent events.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the minister has no reason to think that we are acting otherwise than according to our conscience.

We heard him say the other day that he was trying to carry this plan into effect because he was convinced that this was in the best interest of the country.

• (9:30 p.m.)

On the other hand, on the basis of the evidence given by experts, by people who know our armed forces, we are convinced of fully performing our duty by refusing to let the bill pass before we get all the required evidence or information.

There are, in my riding, people who occupy very enviable positions in society—I am speaking of lawyers, even judges—who held high ranks in the armed forces during the last war. All those with whom I have discussed unification unanimously agreed that some degree of integration, of unification can take place, for instance, with regard to medical, legal, supply, mechanical repair services, etc. However, as far as the air force, the army and the navy are concerned, they think that those who served in the armed forces generally believe in keeping their own identity.

It is in the light of this information, Mr. Chairman, that I urge the minister to reconsider his position, because I think he is going astray.

Every year, I take part in the ceremonies on Armistice Day, November 11. We find in those ceremonies the evidence that servicemen prize the uniform in which they served. In fact, very few are those who do not wear their uniform for those ceremonies on November 11. It is noticeable how sailors stick together, as do infantrymen and the other members of the armed forces, while the airforce boys join together to share memories on feats of arms when they were at the front.

Mr. Chairman, our soldiers do care, even in peace time, for the uniforms in which they served. This means that the minister does not recognize, or want to recognize the requests of those who served in our armed forces, that he still insists on getting them all to wear the same uniform, to gratify his own wishes, his own ego. To my mind, there is no other explanation for his attitude.

I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, at the reluctance of the Liberals, mainly those from Quebec, to take part in this discussion and to raise objections, particularly with regard to clause 6 of Bill No. C-243, for this clause is the equivalent of conscription. After seeing the Liberals make their campaigns on the conscription issue for 25 years, it is odd to see to what degree they remain silent on a matter they talked so much about, to scare the people.

However, after thinking it over, Mr. Chairman, there is practically no reason for being surprised, if for instance one goes over the position taken by the hon. members opposite during the 1962 and 1963 election campaigns when they went around the province of Quebec in particular promising their constituents that they would oppose nuclear weapons.

Yet, only a few months after their coming to power, we saw them rise to a man to indicate that they were in favour of nuclear weapons which they had denounced so vigorously during the election campaign.

But they had been elected. They had what they were looking for: power. And when they are in office, their attitude is somewhat different from what it is when they sit in opposition or during an election campaign.

It may also be advisable to remind my friends opposite that in 1942, they devised that plebiscite in order to evade their obligations. Because, as you surely remember, Mr. Chairman, some people claimed to be strongly opposed to conscription in the province of Quebec.

You also remember that during the campaign preceding the plebiscite, the fathers of my good friends opposite, at least some of them, campaigned for the negative side in the province of Quebec, whereas in the rest of the country, other Liberals were campaigning for the other side.

Two policies, one for one part of the country, and another for the other part, according to the votes that could be gained for the Liberal party.

Well, Mr. Chairman, all those things have been prejudicial to Canadian unity and have given rise in the mind of Canadians to the idea that Quebeckers were not willing to assume their share of responsibility for the defence of the country.

The facts are the opposite, and I am happy to point out that during the 1914-18 war as well as during the 1939-45 war, Quebeckers fulfilled their duties.

Mr. Chairman, to conclude, I would like to appeal to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer). I want to tell him that he is wrong in not accepting the advice of experts on defence, and urge him to reconsider his position.

I know that he is anxious to discharge his duties but if he really wants to serve the country, he will have to accept the advice of the admirals, the rear admirals and all those who try to talk him out of his project. If the minister continues on his course, then the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) will have to take the matter in hand and simply withdraw this bill, so that we may have more time to study it and obtain the information which we need to enlighten our constituents.

I think that the hon. minister should think it over and not rush on with this, because the decision he is making now will certainly be against the best interests of the country.

• (9:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could be so bold as to place before the committee once again the suggestion which I made last Friday morning, as set out in Hansard at pages 14925 and 14926. My proposal then—and I offer it again now—was to the effect that we agree some time soon, possibly tonight or tomorrow, to let clause 2 stand and go on to some of the other clauses of this bill. May I make it very clear, Mr. Chairman, that I am not trying to close off debate on clause 2. I am not suggesting that a vote be taken at this time. Indeed, if we let the clause stand it will not have been passed until we come back to it at some later stage of our proceedings.

I am positive that my suggestion does not prejudice the work of the business committee. I happen to be one of the members of that committee; therefore, I shall not report on what it is doing. But I am sure that if we were to go on from clause 2 to other clauses, that would not clash with anything which the committee might report or fail to report.

I should like also to make it clear that my proposal should be considered as one which does not seek to strengthen the position of either the government or the opposition in this debate. I put it forward because it seems to me that at some point members will want to discuss other clauses. There has been a suggestion of that in the speech made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot who found himself discussing clause 6 of the bill; I believe this is one of the clauses which a number of hon. members wish to debate at considerable length.

And I said, my proposal does not strengthen the position of either side; it simply makes sure that whatever time we do spend on this bill we will divide among clause 2 and the other clauses in which hon. members are interested. I plead with the government not to bring in my suggestion in the form of a motion. I hope this is something we may agree on. It will not make sense if we spend all our time on clause 2 and then, because of the application of a rule, or whatever else may happen, the committee has to let the other clauses go by without debate. On Friday morning I thought Monday night would be a good time at which to agree to this course. That is why I have been bold enough to take the floor at this point in the debate, hoping that hon. members will consider what I had to say.

Incidentally, if there are members who feel they have anything to say which relates to clause 2 and which has not yet been said—I make no comment on that—it seems to me there are other clauses which are just as general as clause 2. For example, clause 5 states that the services now known as the three we have shall be embodied in the new single force. Surely this clause is wide enough for any discussion or for any contribution members may want to make.

I offer this suggestion in good faith. I do so without taking sides as between the two main contending groups at the present time. I do so in the hope that whatever time we spend on this bill we may apportion reasonably as among the various clauses. That is my proposal, that either tonight or some time tomorrow we agree to allow clause 2 to stand, without voting on it, and go on to clauses 3, 4, 5, and 6 as the committee might wish.

Mr. Nugent: I want to say a few words tonight, principally because of the intervention made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat—not that he said anything about the bill, but certainly his attitude echoed the prevailing sentiment on the other side of the house. Several of the things he said found an echo there because as usual the hon. member was following the line which he knows will please those who dominate him in this house—the Liberal party.

He said, in essence, that the committee had heard enough speeches—that it was the democratic thing, now, to vote. Hon. members, he said, wanted to vote on the issue and had the right to vote, now. It seems to me this illustrates several fundamental errors in the thinking of the hon. member for Medicine Hat, errors shared by hon. members who sit opposite. They are not sure enough as to the duty of members of this house or, at least, their idea of their duty does not coincide with mine. They have no conception as to the seriousness of this legislation and they do not understand the duty of a member when he feels that a course proposed by the government is basically very wrong. I refuse to accept the proposition that the minds of hon. members are so settled that they cannot be reached by some of the facts which have been so clearly brought out before the committee. I feel that when, presented in the proper light, the evidence is so clear that some of those who sit opposite will come round to our point of view.

I cannot comprehend the attitude taken by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. He seems to believe that when carrying on a fight the only question to be considered is whether you are likely to win or lose. I do not know whether it is my Irish ancestry or not, but the only thought I have is that when something is bad, you fight it. And when the results are likely to be very, very serious, you must fight it with every weapon you have. Any other concept is unacceptable to me. The hon. member's attitude—"It looks hopeless so why don't you give in?"—is one I can neither accept nor understand.

It seems to me that part of the democratic process consists of an attempt to persuade. That process includes making sure that the people of this country understand the issues. As members of the opposition we have the right to attempt to convey the facts to the people so that they may understand—to awaken their comprehension of what is going on. In consequence they might express themselves in a way which would have its effect on members opposite, so that we might even intimidate them—if I may use that word—to the point at which they would go slow with this measure. And that is the most which has been asked by so many defence critics.

I would point out to hon. members that of the time taken on this bill in the committee and in this house, about half has been spent in discussion of the method adopted by the government in bringing forward its legislation on this subject—something about which the utmost concern was expressed by the ministers senior advisers who critized the unseemly haste which the government was adopting, despite the fact that there is no logical reason for its passage at this time. There must be a suspicion in the minds of the people of this country that perhaps there is a reason for this delay and for our belief that the longer this takes the better the people will be educated as to the facts. Once they know the facts they will realize what the government is doing, and the government will be found to be in the wrong. If this indeed be the situation, I suggest that hon. members on the other side are being political when they tell us that now is the time to take a vote. They are worried about their political skins and are scared to death that the people will awaken to the truth of what the Liberals intend to do in this country. They fear the people will give us their support in time to stop them. We hope it will come to that.

I was amazed at the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice, for one, who suggested, "This is democracy. We want to vote now. Our minds are made up." Apparently the wish to speak on this is antidemocratic. The hon. member for Leeds and other hon. members opposite used somewhat the same argument by saying, "Let us get on with the job," as though only the vote is the job, and the consideration and the right of persuasion is not part of the job.

I would point out that those who labour under this apprehension of what democracy consists of certainly have a strange idea of democratic functions in this country. I loathe that tone of unctuous righteousness with which the hon. member for Medicine Hat puts forward his idea of, "Vote. Let the majority rule, and that is democracy." Of course if one belongs to the Social Credit party one must learn that tone of unctuous righteousness because this is the way they always talk.

As the hon. member demonstrated in his speech, he had nothing to say about unification. I do not think he has read the evidence of the committee. I do not think he knows anything about it; but he undoubtedly knows how to make one of those typical Social Credit speeches which reveal to us the limitations which Social Crediters believe exist on democracy—that the majority have the right to vote and that is democracy. Certainly rule by majority is the cornerstone of democracy; but don't forget that majority only indicates the power, the balance of power, and that the right to rule by power is held by every other form of government. Any form of dictatorship, if you have the power, gives you the right to rule. It is the way we get the power that makes our way of ruling by power the better. But ruling because we have the power is not the crowning glory of democracy.

It is time that Social Crediters, especially in this house, who are fundamentally lacking in this knowledge, should understand that the crowning glory of democracy is respect for the rights of minorities and individuals. It is this which gives us the right of free speech. It is not the rule by majority that is so important to us. It is that protection which individuals and minorities enjoy under our system that they do not get under those other systems which rule by power, that makes democracy worth while; it is the right to use that freedom of speech to persuade. That is the basis of our democratic and parliamentary system of government, and that is the system we are using now.

There have been suggestions from the other side of the chamber, echoed by papers across the country, that now is the time to stop this debate, that now is the time to take the vote because all the evidence has been heard. I want to point out, Mr. Chairman, that only a small fraction of the very valuable evidence before the committee has been brought before the house, that there are many good, sound arguments to be heard, and certainly no one can deny us the right to that last resort of every politician in this country who feels he is fighting for what he must fight for, the attempt to try to get the time to educate the public on this very complicated and important subject, and to ask the house to allow a time for public knowledge to spread so that public opinion can make itself felt.

I certainly realize the risks I run, Mr. Chairman, if, being one of those who has spoken, as my opponents would say, to an excessive length of time in the house, my electors should feel I have been wasting the time of the house, and they come to the conclusion I was wrong. Certainly while it is human nature to allow someone to make a mistake, if you make a mistake and press vehemently on with it, and in that course of action continue to waste the time of the house and fight as hard as I intend to fight, then I presume the penalty one would pay would be extra severe. I am quite prepared to take that risk. Of course I am convinced in my own mind I am running very little risk, but they always say the person who is crazy is the last one to know it, and it could be that I am. However, I have studied the evidence and I do have tremendous respect for the witnesses who appeared. I am convinced in my own mind that, given an ample opportunity, the result of public opinion on this subject is going to vindicate my stand and the stand of my party. Mr. Chairman, I want to make it very clear again that the points I am making are simply to illustrate the approach to this debate.

Last Tuesday, the last time I had a chance to get the floor, the minister took umbrage at my reference to the technique of the big lie, but there was something in an Ottawa paper, the Ottawa Citizen on Saturday, which is such a beautiful illustration of this technique that I must touch on it.

To begin with, to understand what I mean by the technique of the big lie, it is not necessary for someone to tell a direct lie. In fact some of the most skilful methods employed in the technique of the big lie do not use a lie at all, although certainly they use half truths. The whole idea of the technique of the big lie is to make sure the facts are hidden, or at least to make sure that if the facts are revealed they are either confused or swamped under false arguments.

I have time tonight to give only one illustration. In the Ottawa Citizen on Saturday there appeared an editorial, which I presume was written by Chris Young, headed "The Nugent Case—What's the Limit on Privilege." Anyone who read it would be led to believe that there is something wrong with the privileges of parliament, because I somehow was able to get protection outside the house and the minister was not able to get at me. This would be a distortion or false use of the rules.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, nothing could be farther from the truth in this case. The man who wrote that editorial knew very well I said outside the house exactly what I said inside the house without any question of parliamentary immunity or privilege whatsoever. I think that if I tried to ask for parliamentary privilege for what I was repeating outside the house it could not be extended to me, but I made it plain I was not reading from Hansard. I left Ottawa Wednesday morning before Hansard was available. Out west I was trying to use the exact words I had used in the house so that there would be no suggestion that I backed down on what I said. But the truth has not bothered the editor of the Ottawa Citizen whatsoever. He writes this editorial to cover up the facts with a smokescreen. It is perfect example of one technique used to perpetrate the big lie. We are used to that in the Ottawa Citizen, and I hope tomorrow I can continue with a few other illustrations of the classic use of the big lie in this debate.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, in the spirit of getting on with the business of the house and of the country, since there are some other things we would want to do later this session and next session after this bill has passed, if the committee would agree to extend the sitting beyond ten o'clock tonight?

Mr. Nugent: We have received little cooperation from the Minister of National Defence in this debate. I can understand his tender susceptibilities about time but I believe the minister had his tongue in his cheek when he said he was making that suggestion in the interests of getting along with the other business of the country.

It is ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS—OTTAWA—INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACTS FOR DEMOLITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I come back to a matter I raised a few weeks ago, the tearing-down of public government buildings, namely the old printing bureau and the Roxborough building in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, the point is to decide whether a serious investigation is necessary to unveil the truth about the adjudication of demolition contracts to companies that seem to be in collusion. In fact, a comparison of the tenders submitted to the Department of Public Works on two occasions, first for the old printing bureau and second, for the Roxborough building, reveals that the same contractors who missed out on the Roxborough demolition job, had all the chances to recoup themselves with the old printing bureau demolition job.

When the time came for the demolition of the old printing bureau, which is under way at present, the department chose to call on some contractors. Instead of calling for public tenders, where everyone would have had a chance to tender for this contract, where all contractors would have competed, they preferred to call six companies: Cohen & Cohen, Hugh M. Grant, Teperman & Sons, Greenspoon Bros.—who had not done any demolition in Ottawa for many years—Palmer-Levitan Ltd., in Hull and Hurdman Bros. in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, at the time of the first call for tenders to wreck the Roxborough building, in October 1966, Cohen & Cohen tendered for the job with Teperman & Sons—another company, which was supposed to be a rival, but they joined forces—for a total sum of $138,000, while Beaver Demolition tendered for $143,600, Panzini Ltd. for $164,000 and Palmer-Levitan Ltd. for $169,000.

Now, honest officials of the department stated that the cost of such demolition could not go beyond $25,000 or $30,000. Tenders were called for and then, Panzini Ltd., for instance, having first tendered for $164,000, now tendered for $57,000, a difference of 107,000. On the other hand, Palmer-Levitan Ltd. of Hull tendered for $68,000 or a difference of $101,000 between the two tenders.

I understand that high officials of the department, having taken a position, the companies were slightly embarrassed not to tender again at a price lower than previously quoted. But when the small difference is noted between the first tenders, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe there was collusion between the companies. The same situation occurred in connection with the demolition contract for the old printing bureau, when the two same contractors again tendered, but this time, in order that other people may not tender at a lower price, public tenders were not called for.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called on this matter not by people who want to play politics, but by people who want that justice be respected and applied.

The minister would be wrong in seeing in that any kind of political considerations, because the person who first has brought this matter to my attention, Mr. Thibault of Thibault Lumber, does not belong to my political party. In fact, he is well known in Liberal circles and I think the minister knows him too.

Financially responsible companies, such as Thibault Lumber and others—not only this one but others also—could have saved the Department of Public Works about $50,000 according to their own statement, in the demolition of the old National Printing Bureau.

Mr. Speaker, it is against this injustice, against this apparent collusion between a few important companies wishing to assume "control" of the contracts which the government or the Department of Public Works wishes to grant, or must grant, that I raise my voice. I ask the minister to keep a close eye on the tenderers in future, so far as government contracts are concerned, whether for demolition or construction works.

We do not have the right to play with the Canadian taxpayer's money, with the people's money. We must operate economically and allow contractors and businessmen to have an chance before the law, before the government and particularly before the Department of Public Works.

I rise to protest against such things, Mr. Speaker, and I call the minister's attention to these anomalies which lead some newspapers and even some radio stations to accuse the government of favouring collusion between some companies trying to "fool" the government instead of serving the Canadian people.

[English]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of attention to the hon. member for Villeneuve on the subject of awarding contracts for the demolition of the Roxborough apartments and the old printing bureau. I should like to point out one fact in respect of his earlier remarks. The two contracts were not comparable because of the nature of the structures, and that element of demolition contracts regarding the amount of material capable of being sold at the site. In respect of the Roxborough contract this element was an important factor, whereas in the case of the old printing bureau it was a very small factor, if a factor at all. These facts relate to the entire remarks of the hon. member.

The hon. member for Villeneuve then referred to the method of calling for tenders from a selected list. In respect of the Roxborough it is interesting to note that as a result of the first public call for tender the lowest tender was $138,000 and the highest was $169,000. Because of the fact that even the lowest tender far exceeded the estimated cost of the job the contract was not awarded and tenders were again called. The specifications were changed slightly in respect of two things.

As a result of the second public advertisement calling for tenders, we received 14 bids varying from $19,000 to $88,000. It was clear that the $19,000 bid was not realistic. Therefore the contract was awarded to the second lowest bidder. That contract was never fulfilled. Because the job was partly under way, and in an effort to terminate it, bids were invited from a list of contractors to complete the job. The low bid was $29,985. That was the actual cost of that particular job.

Tenders were invited from six firms in respect of the old printing bureau demolition job. This occurred because the time available was exceedingly short and the job had to be done quickly to provide space for the centennial exhibition to take place at Nepean Point and Parliament Hill.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. minister, but the time alotted to him has expired.

HOUSING—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF MEETING ECONOMIC COUNCIL TARGET

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, for months now people interested in meeting the needs of housing in this country, newspapers in every city including those which support the government, such as the Toronto Star, have been devoting pages almost every day to the tremendous housing crisis which our country is facing. The chairman of the Economic Council, Dr. Deutsch, when appearing before the parliamentary committee dealing with prices estimated that this country needs to build houses at the rate of 170,000 per year in order to meet its minimum requirements in this field.

A few days ago I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), who is in charge of housing, how close we would come this year to meeting the target suggested by Dr. Deutsch. The minister replied that we were now building homes at the annual rate of 170,000. It was only when the leader of the New Democratic Party asked a supplementary question as to how many houses it was expected would be completed this year that the minister admitted that the number of houses completed this year would be between 150,000 and 155,000; in other words, between 15,000 and 20,000 less than Dr. Deutsch said we needed.

This is not a new situation. In early March, Central Mortgage and Housing reported that housing starts had sagged by 38½ per cent. They said that in the month of January the number of single, detached dwellings started had dropped by 38.5 per cent compared with the same period last year; that apartment starts in January had decreased by 17 per cent; that row housing had decreased by the fantastic amount of 78 per cent. Of course the minister has been telling us that things are getting better, but the Toronto Telegram reported on April 15 last that housing starts in Toronto in the month of March went down by 33 per cent compared with the year before. It is not surprising, then, that one reads the kind of report which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on March 14 last, which says:

> Half the families in greater Winnipeg are living in houses or apartments that are overcrowded, or substandard from the point of view of construction or sanitation.
> Or else they are living doubled up—two families in a dwelling designed to be used by one family; or they are paying more for their shelter than they can afford.

This article in the Winnipeg Free Press goes on to illustrate the tremendous shortages in housing which have arisen. The Minister of Labour has been so busy with labour problems that he has had little time, if any, to devote to housing. The minister was responsible, for example, for the increase in the interest rate being charged on houses. This policy was intended to enable more houses to be purchased, but it ignored completely the fact that the increase in the interest rate has increased the cost of housing. For example, a house selling for between $20,000 and $25,000 will cost the purchaser, over 25 years, an additional $2,000. The result is that it is becoming increasingly impossible for people, not only in the low income bracket but in the middle income bracket, to purchase houses.

When one looks at the statistics published in the annual report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, he sees that the number of houses purchased by people with an income of up to $7,000—and the vast majority of people in this country do not earn $7,000 a year—amounts to only 20 per cent of the total number of houses purchased through N.H.A. financing.

What is required is a government and a minister who realize that housing is important, that it is not something which can be turned on and off like a tap simply because we need or do not need jobs. What is required is a housing policy which has an objective of building houses for the people who need them. I hope the government will agree shortly to the proposal which has come from all sections of the country and from all groups interested in the needs for housing, namely that we have a minister of urban affairs, one of whose major concerns would be the provision of adequate housing for the people of Canada. I would hope that such a minister would get on with the job of providing public housing apartments, row and low rental housing which the ordinary people of this country can afford.

In every city of this country it is easy to rent an apartment if you are prepared to pay $200 or more a month. But for the ordinary people who earn $60 or $70 a week this kind of rent is completely impossible. For them the minister and the government have done virtually nothing. We need to get on with the job of urban renewal.

There was nothing more depressing for me than to attend the conference on housing called by the minister, held in my city of Winnipeg, and to hear the minister excuse the fact that he has done so little in housing by saying that of course we cannot expect the moneyed people of this country to put their money into housing when they could make more money building factories and high rise office buildings on which they could charge a very substantial rate and make much greater profits. That is the kind of program which has led to disaster, up to now.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North. I think he will agree with me that the problem of housing is world-wide. Let me point out that in the great socialist haven of Sweden one has to wait six years if he is lucky and has enough influence, to find a home of any size or dimension.

Dr. Deutsch set a target of 170,000 starts in this year. I am sure that the latest statistics which I have been able to procure from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be of encouragement to the hon. member, who is so objective. As I have only three minutes I will simply point out that the number of starts will reach 170,000 by the third quarter of this year, and there is a very good indication that this rate will continue to rise. In other words, by the third quarter of this year the housing starts in Canada will have reached the target set out by Dr. Deutsch and recommended by the Economic Council of Canada.

The question of low rental housing, as is known to the hon. member, who belongs to a party which respects the constitution of this country, comes under provincial jurisdiction. The housing act puts housing at the disposal of the municipalities and housing corporations of the different provinces, and it is up to the provinces to show a little more initiative and to take advantage of the very enlightened legislation which is available, and the huge sums of money which go untapped and unused year in and year out because of the lack of initiative on the part of the provincial authorities.

In so far as the interest rates are concerned, I think again the hon. member will be pleased to know that it has been reduced from 7.25 to 7 per cent.

In conclusion I wish to say that I am very proud of the fact that because of a series of circumstances, the initiative of the minister in generating spring starts by providing 20,000 loans, the reduction in the interest rate from 7.25 to 7 per cent, and the initiative of the government in permitting the banks to re-enter the mortgage field, we will meet this year—not at the end of the year but at the beginning of the third quarter—the target which, as stated by Dr. Deutsch, is in Canada's best interests.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—QUEBEC—PROTEST RESPECTING PROPOSED REDUCTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, the question I raised today is not new, as I dealt with it when the minister introduced in the house the new bill concerning the transport commission.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

If I am renewing my attempt today, it is because since this new bill was passed by the house, immediately afterwards—and I could say even before it was passed—the Canadian National Railways applied to the Canadian Transport Commission for permission to discontinue its passenger service between Quebec and La Malbaie. This service has existed, as the minister knows, for about 50 years. It began during difficult times in order to meet the economic needs of our area. Now, the Canadian National Railways are applying to the Canadian Transport Commission for its discontinuance.

Obviously the minister is not at fault but since he assumed his office, my area suffered from certain decisions of the Department of Transport.

Hon. members will recall that last year, I also raised a question concerning the discontinuance of cruises by Canada Steamship Lines between Montreal, La Malbaie and the Saguenay. I had asked the then minister to intervene, to bring pressure to bear on that company in order that that service be continued. The minister may have made representations, but the company nevertheless discontinued its service between Montreal, the north shore and also Pointe au Pic in my riding, and that brought about a loss of employment for 200 persons and caused significant losses to the tourist industry.

This year there is another problem: the C.N.R. has decided to discontinue its passenger service between Quebec city and La Malbaie.

I must tell the minister that his decision raised a wave of opposition and protests from businessmen, boards of trade, intermediate organizations and pressure groups; immediately, the county councils met with all mayors sitting on the county councils to hire economists to study the situation. Municipalities of eastern Quebec were also called upon. The minister should know that Quebec city passed a resolution calling on the Department of Transport to exert pressure upon the Canadian National Railways so that a decision may not be rendered by the Board of Transport Commissioners. The authorities of the cities of Villeneuve and Charlesbourg, near Quebec, have done the same.

Recently, and this was the subject matter of the question I put this afternoon, the Quebec legislature passed a resolution asking the C.N.R. to abandon the proposed elimination of the passenger service between La Malbaie and Quebec.

The minister, with such data, can appreciate, I believe, the fact that all these people who have their hearts set on the economic development of this particular area, stood up and asked him, as well as the Canadian National authorities, to endeavour to study the matter more closely and to postpone the abandonment of the passenger service between Quebec and La Malbaie.

Evidently, the minister will tell me that a deficit exists. There is a deficit, no doubt. However, I am personally convinced that a public service is not a company that must register profits, but rather an organization that must serve the population. That, to my mind, is public service.

If the Canadian National Railways want to talk about losses when it comes before the Board of Transport Commissioners, we will also talk about the tremendous profits it made with its freight train between La Malbaie and Quebec city.

Mr. Speaker, ours is part of an area which has been designated, which is under-developed. Now, nothing is more important in such an area than adequate means of transport or communications.

The C.N.R. has done everything possible to prepare the abandonment of passenger service between Quebec city and La Malbaie. Rusty old cars were placed at the disposal of the public. The service was not publicized, and the hours were not adapted to the needs of the travelling public.

Today, of course, after five years of study, we are told: There are deficits. If the C.N.R. has deficits it is simply because it planned that deficit to be able to go before the Board of Transport Commissioners and say: There, gentlemen, we have no more money and we have to give up the service.

I make a very special plea to the minister. Our area has economic problems. It has a historic past. Particularly during centennial year, when we expect to welcome a great number of tourists, which will help considerably our tourist industry, I think it would be economic ruination if the minister did not recommend to the C.N.R. to give up its idea to discontinue its passenger service between Quebec city and La Malbaie.

I think the minister is aware of the problem, because he has the picture. I trust his sense of fairness and I thank him for having come this evening to listen patiently to the grievances of people who claim to be distressed by that decision of the C.N.R. I am convinced that in the face of all those facts, the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): —will honestly appeal to C.N.R. authorities and ask them to give it a try for at least two more years, to adjust the schedules—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The time allotted to the hon. member has now expired.

[English]

Hon. J. W Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can very well understand the feelings of the population served by the railway between Quebec city and Murray Bay, which feelings have been put so feelingly by the hon. gentleman. He knows what the population there perhaps do not all know, namely that this is a matter that parliament saw fit to appoint a board to consider. I have no doubt that the board will consider all the representations that have been made by the municipalities, by the legislature of Quebec, by the city of Quebec and by all those other interested parties.

I can assure the hon. gentleman that I will draw to the attention both of the C.N.R. and of the board the representations that he has made this evening. He will realize of course that it would not be proper for me personally as minister to attempt to bring any pressure on the board one way or the other. There is an appeal from the board to the governor in council, and it would be inappropriate for me to take any part in this process, when later on there might be the need to exercise judgment upon the judgment of the board.

However, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have every sympathy with the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman, and anything I can properly do I assure him I will do.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.31 p.m.

APPENDIX

REMARKS BY PRIME MINISTER AT THE INSTALLATION CEREMONY OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL, THE SENATE APRIL 17, 1967

Your Excellency, it is my privilege as Prime Minister, and it is indeed my pleasure, to extend to you on behalf of the people and the government of Canada our warmest good wishes as you assume the high and honourable office of Governor General of Canada.

May I respectfully request, Your Excellency, as your first official duty as the Queen's representative in Canada, that you convey to Her Majesty a message of loyalty and devotion from the Canadian people. Please assure her how delighted we are that our Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh will be with us on the 1st of July to celebrate the centennial of our Confederation.

You begin your office, sir, at an historic moment. Throughout the one hundred years of our history as a Confederation, the post of Governor General has been filled by men of distinction who have all contributed significantly to the development of Canada and to the achievement of the proud position which we are celebrating throughout this centennial year.

(Translation)

We have been made more aware of the opportunities and the burden of your great office by the unexcelled contribution which your immediate predecessor made to the lasting benefit of all the people of this land. His memory will be treasured and his service to Canada will never be forgotten and I am sure that his life and work will be an inspiration to you as you take up your heavy duties.

(English)

We all realize, sir, how especially heavy these duties are in our centennial year. It is yet another evidence of your willingness to serve your country that you readily consented to become Her Majesty's representative in Canada knowing that you and your wife would immediately be faced with a most demanding programme of engagements. We have no doubt, sir, that you will meet the challenges of this great office with the same skill and wisdom and calm good humour that you have met the other challenges that have faced you throughout your varied career; even, if I may add, going far back into the years when I used to pass a puck to you on the right wing, or was it the left wing, and you were expected to score a goal.

We remember well your distinguished performance when you occupied the chair in that other place and "never sold the truth to serve the hour". Although tradition will now bar you from attending there, I assure you, sir, that your reputation is secure as one of the very best and most honoured of our "first commoners".

You were, of course, no stranger to public service. It has been in the tradition of your family. Your father is remembered as a member of this very Chamber where we are now gathered. You yourself, until a few days ago when you received the Queen's summons to represent Her Majesty in Canada, were serving half way around the world as the High Commissioner of Canada to India. There you have been able to test the strength and fabric of our Commonwealth of Nations. At the same time you were the Canadian Ambassador to Nepal and in the clear light of the far Himalayas, you may have seen your country, its problems and its future in a new and different perspective.

Tennyson's lines, I believe, fit well your career,

> "Much has he seen and known; cities of men,
> And manners, climates, councils, governments,
> Himself not least, but honoured of them all".

Through all this you have been accompanied and aided by your wife whose qualities of heart and mind have earned her an enviable reputation and the esteem of all who know her.

Your Excellency, you begin your term of office as Her Majesty's representative in Canada with the best wishes of us all. We welcome you with great goodwill. Que Dieu vous garde. May God's grace and help be with you.

REPLY OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE RIGHT HON. ROLAND MICHENER TO THE ADDRESS OF THE PRIME MINISTER IN THE SENATE CHAMBER ON THE DAY OF HIS EXCELLENCY'S INSTALLATION AS GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA, MONDAY 17TH APRIL 1967

Prime Minister,

So quick has been my transition from New Delhi to Ottawa that I have the sensation of having run all the way, and arrived here amongst you, somewhat out of breath—but as you can see, that does not leave me speechless. On the contrary I am full of ideas and emotions some of which I hope to be able to express to you at least in a preliminary way.

First, I am filled with gratitude for the generous words with which you have welcomed me and my wife and with appreciation for your earlier words, even more consequential, in which you gave to Her Majesty the advice upon which she acted in naming me as her representative in Canada. The honour is great and greatly valued, however awesome the responsibility.

Notwithstanding your encouraging expression of confidence that my wife and I will be equal to the task, I am all too well aware, and here I speak for myself alone, of the gap between my qualifications and the potentialities of the office of Governor General. These potentialities have been amply demonstrated by my predecessors. The Right Honourable Vincent Massey, the first Canadian Governor General, gave the office a new significance for Canadians. Their Excellencies the late Georges Vanier and Madame Vanier in the last seven years have so fully represented all that is good in the whole Canadian community, that they have justly won the respect and affection of everyone. His courageous efforts to complete his task in failing health confirm his place among the noblest of our public men.

With other Canadians we have mourned his loss and offered our sympathies to Madame Vanier with a full realization that no other couple would be able to begin at the high level of excellence and esteem to which they had elevated their public responsibilities.

[English]

However, we are greatly heartened in entering upon our term of office by the thought that the Governor General has come to represent the Canadian people as a whole and that in addition to his necessary and important constitutional functions he now symbolizes for Canadians the stability and continuity of their national life and institutions. In consequence all Canadians have a personal interest in the office and in helping the incumbent to reflect their hopes and aspirations for the future. Already we have been encouraged by the good wishes of many of those whom we shall serve, and we hope to earn and deserve such encouragement from all. It will make our task possible and our lives happy. In any event, Prime Minister, I shall not fail through lack of effort nor of will to serve.

I gladly undertake to assure at once to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth of Canada, as you have requested, the loyalty and devotion of the Canadian people and our delight that she and The Duke of Edinburgh will soon be with us to join in our Centennial celebrations. May I add to this message my own humble duty to our Queen and my profound gratitude for the trust which she has entrusted in me.

Canadians look forward as well to welcoming other royal and distinguished visitors from Commonwealth and friendly nations who will be honouring us with their presence during this momentous year. We are grateful for their esteem and respect which will remind us that our birthday celebrations have significance beyond our own boundaries. 1967 is a time to assess our past achievements in the society of nations and to seek means of extending our contributions to the peace and happiness of the whole family of man.

To my friends in Quebec I should like to say that we look forward very much to the pleasure of living amongst them for a time each year at The Citadel. From there my wife and I shall be able to look down the river to the Ile d'Orleans where we have spent many happy days.

[English]

We now see in French Canada a renaissance of that creative vigour and intellectual brilliance which have long been a mark of French civilization. All Canadians may well take pride in the achievements which are taking place in Quebec for they will stimulate and strengthen Canada as a whole. We are fortunate to possess two mighty currents of civilization: French and British. To these first mainstreams of our national existence have been added the diverse and notable contributions of settlers from other lands and races who have ventured to our shores. They have provided Canada with additional sources of strength and richness.

We look forward, in due course, to visiting all of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific and Arctic, not forgetting Alberta, where I was born and raised, Manitoba my wife's birthplace, and British Columbia, her former home, as well as Ontario, the centre of my public and professional activities.

Having set ourselves the goal of representing what one Canadian has called "la collectivité entière qu'on appelle le Canada", we shall seek to meet and know Canadians in their home communities. In Government House we hope to welcome Canadians of all walks of life, to provide a neutral and friendly environment for the discussion of differing points of view, and a centre for the encouragement of excellence in all worthy fields of Canadian endeavour.

In concluding, may I add my prayer to that of the Prime Minister that God's grace and help may direct us all in our common efforts to sustain and strengthen Canada, our Home.

ALLOCATION OF TIME FOR CONSIDERATION OF DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENTS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present the report of the business committee on the question of allocation of time on the committee of the whole stage and all remaining stages of procedure on Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof, as amended, which was referred to the business committee on Thursday, April 13, 1967. The report is as follows:

Pursuant to the order of reference on Thursday, April thirteenth, 1967, your committee has considered the question of allocation of time on the committee of the whole stage and all remaining stages of procedure on Bill C-243, an act to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof (as amended). I now report that the committee has been unable to reach a unanimous agreement on the question referred to it.

Mr. Speaker, I give notice, pursuant to the provisions of standing order 15A, that on Thursday next I will move that an order be made allocating the time on the committee of the whole stage and all remaining stages of procedure on Bill C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof, as amended, being government order No. 107 on this day's order paper. My motion will provide that two days shall be allocated for the completion of discussion on the committee of the whole stage on Bill C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof, as amended, and that one day shall be allotted for the completion of the third reading stage on the bill. Perhaps I should add so that hon. members will understand—

Mr. Diefenbaker: We understand it perfectly well; the axe.

Mr. McIlraith: —that the motion can only come before the house on Thursday, not tomorrow. It provides for the time indicated in addition to the time that will have been spent between now and the adoption of the motion. At that time we will have had at least 13 days on the committee stage in addition to the time provided for in the motion.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY POLICY—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise), the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, namely the government's dairy policy, which is now arousing the ire of all Canadian dairy farmers, and for the purpose of arriving at some early solution to that thorny problem.

Mr. Speaker, the urgency—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member send me a copy of this motion?

The hon. member knows that the debate must deal only with the urgency of debate and not with the urgency of the motion. I would therefore ask him to make the remarks he deems necessary on that point.

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The urgency of debate is obvious, because right now the farmers, the dairy producers, not only in one but in several provinces, are organizing to march on Ottawa. They are unhappy with the recent dairy policy laid down by the government and announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene).

The farmers feel that it is very urgent to review the dairy policy so that they can get the minimum price they asked for, that is

Mr. Speaker, I also feel that the following reasons militate in favour of a debate on a definite matter of public importance and urgency, namely the new dairy policy of the government.

Whereas the amount of money made available to the Canadian Dairy Commission is inadequate;

Whereas the dairy policy does not meet with the satisfaction of the producers of manufacturing milk;

Whereas there is no guarantee that the subsidy will be maintained regularly at $1.11, due to the fact that the export premium of 10 cents per hundredweight is not sufficient and that the Canadian Dairy Commission will have to deduct the necessary amounts from the $1.11 subsidy;

Whereas this means that the $1.11 subsidy will be liable to readjustment because of shipping costs;

Whereas the surpluses of dairy producers, namely grades 2, 3 and 4 fluid milk, are not entitled to subsidies;

Whereas cream producers do not receive any special subsidy;

Whereas there are rumours that a group of over 10,000 dairy producers are organizing a march on Ottawa in protest against the present dairy policy;

Whereas there is talk of a general strike amongst dairy producers in the near enough future to slow down the overall economy of this country;

Whereas a ceiling has been put on dairy production and that beyond a certain quota, namely that of last year, dairy producers receive no subsidy to encourage greater production;

Whereas it is proved that our agriculture is now, and has been for several years, in such a state of stagnation that our farmers are dismayed and discouraged;

Mr. Speaker, for those reasons and many others, I feel that this is a matter of urgent public importance which should concern all members as elected representatives of the people.

It has become obvious that farming is no longer economic. On several occasions, farmers have expressed their wishes and their needs. They have written briefs; they have brought pressure to bear on their members of parliament and they have even marched on Ottawa.

But it remains, nevertheless, that farmers have always had to cope with the rising cost of living and yet their income has not increased proportionately.

Without the farmers, urban citizens and factory workers, members of parliament could not live.

A farmer's farm is an urgent matter, it is a private enterprise. Do we want to destroy or to save it?

I feel it is time, Mr. Speaker, to discuss that urgent matter, so that we may clearly establish that Canadian farmers, Canadian dairy farmers will be treated more fairly than they have been up to now by the Department of Agriculture, by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp) and by the government as a whole.

Such is, in my opinion, the urgency of the matter. That is the reason for my intervention today on behalf of the farmers and, to prove how urgent the matter is, I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture bring it before the house so that a free vote may be held and, if it is necessary to put the existence of the government at stake, let nothing stop us, but let us respect Canadian farmers.

This is how urgent my question is.

[English]

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly like to add my wholehearted support to the proposition put forward by the hon. member in requesting an adjournment in order to debate the very serious problem today facing a great segment of our agricultural industry. It is true that normally we would wait to debate this matter on interim supply and at that time would put the proposition before the government, but I think the problem is far too urgent to brook any delay in such a debate. The farmers of this nation are very much concerned about this problem. Meetings have been held of all the large farmers' organizations and the farmers of this country have come to the conclusion—and the government was duly notified of this—that anything less than $5 per hundredweight for milk would not be acceptable.

I think the government should be endeavouring to save this industry. We find the dairy farmers are talking about strikes, the destruction of dairy products and holding them back from the market. Nobody wants to see this type of action take place. On the other hand the dairy farmers have to find some means of bringing this most important question before the people of this country. Surely it is urgent that we as members of parliament, accepting full responsibility for this problem, take every opportunity to place this proposition before the government and see if by such a debate we can bring to their attention the real urgency in the matter. We should try to see if through such a debate we can bring to the attention of the government the real urgency of this problem and bring about an equitable solution so these farmers will not be forced from their lands and will not be forced out of the dairy business, and so Canada will not be placed in the position of having to import dairy products.

I should like to emphasize with all the force at my command that now is the time to solve this problem. A debate at this time would give us an opportunity to put before the government the very real problem with which the dairy farmers of this country are concerned. I do not feel that a delay of one, three or five days will serve any useful purpose. We should have the opportunity to debate this problem now in the house.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the house leader had to go out so I will say just one word on the subject; that is that the announcement by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture was made at least two weeks ago. Therefore it seems to me that the subject matter, important and urgent as it is to the farmers, does not fall within the class of subjects as to which there is urgency of debate. There might have been a case to be made on the day or the day after the Minister of Agriculture made his statement, but to suggest that something new has happened between yesterday and today to make this matter sufficiently urgent to interrupt the regular business set down for this day would, I suggest to Your Honour, be to make a mockery of the rather narrow provisions of the standing order. For that reason it seems to me that the motion should not be considered to be in order.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if ever there was any doubt that the motion was proper, the Minister of Transport has removed it. He stated that there would have been urgency and this motion would have been justified if made two weeks ago, but because it was not made two weeks ago but only today there is not sufficient urgency to bring the motion within the rules of the house.

Mr. Speaker, the motion could not have been made two weeks ago because people did not realize what a mishmash had been made of the dairy policy by the government. Only in the last two or three days has the realization come to all parts of this country that the dairy industry—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is an insult to the farmers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When I speak of mishmash I sometimes think of my hon. friend.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The very fact that such interruptions are taking place indicates that my argument is well founded. The dairy farmers have been crucified by this government, and they realize it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish some of the farmers could hear the Liberal members opposite jeering at that observation. Today in every part of this nation it is recognized by almost everyone, except those who sit opposite, that the situation is serious and that delay cannot be permitted. It might be said that this matter could be discussed when the interim supply motion is before the house. However, even with closure applied to the defence debate that would be a delay of two weeks. That is too long a time. The dairy industry cannot be sacrificed through delay.

I suggest therefore that a good case has been made. If it had not been for the assistance of the Minister of Transport when he said this would have been a perfect motion two weeks ago, I might have had some doubt. No longer am I in doubt.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was going to remind the minister that he has already spoken on the subject, but I understand he is rising now on a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest it is in accordance with the rules to make a correction after an hon. member has spoken who has misrepresented what I said. What I said was that there might have been an argument. I did not say it was a perfect case.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said there certainly was not a case two weeks later. It does seem to me, sir, that we should decide the question of urgency and not permit debate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I remind hon. members that contributions at this stage should be to enlighten the Chair. It is getting dark.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): It seems to me that the argument advanced by the Minister of Transport indicates the seriousness of the matter that has been raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette). The matter of urgency seems to stem from the decisions that have been taken by the farmers in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario after they have had an opportunity of examining the various aspects of the program that has been announced. So far as parliament was concerned, when the announcement was made the situation was that there had been consultations with the provinces and the various farm organizations. There was some reason for believing that the farmers were in agreement that the $4.75 guaranteed by the federal government would eventually become $5.10 with the addition of provincial subsidies.

The farmers have now had an opportunity of examining the program and are aware of three particular aspects in which it is lacking. The first is that the $4.75 for industrial milk is the full price paid f.o.b. factory. This in turn raises two problems with which the farmers are concerned at the moment. One of them, of course, is the transportation policy, and I am sure all hon. members are aware of that. Transportation was not considered in the announcement, though I believe the farmers thought it had been.

In addition, meetings have been held with the provinces which indicate that the $4.75 includes the provincial subsidies. For a considerable length of time farm organizations in general have considered $5.10 the absolute minimum to ensure efficient farm operation. We are now importing butter; because of this program our butter supplies are becoming short. For these reasons it is my opinion, and I believe the opinion of the farmers, that rather than have a strike of farmers across Canada this parliament should consider the situation and attempt to find a remedy in order to avert a calamity.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that there are reasons why this motion is in order today. In spite of what the Minister of Transport has said to the effect that the matter should have been raised several days ago, I say there was some confusion with regard to the practical application of the provisions announced by the Minister of Agriculture a few days ago. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it was not clearly understood by the members of this house or by the dairy farmers of Canada what would be the practical application of this announcement.

After a few days of consideration it has been found that the program announced is wanting in many respects so far as the dairy producers of Canada are concerned. I draw Your Honour's attention also to the fact that we have just ascertained that surplus fluid milk is going to be withdrawn from the subsidy as a result of the minister's announcement. This was not well understood when he made the announcement a few days ago. I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to citation 100, which is the one that deals with standing order 26, which says that the subject matter must involve the administrative responsibility of the government. I suggest to Your Honour that the motion by the hon. member for Villeneuve meets this requirement. The federal government pays a subsidy to the dairy industry. The Minister of Agriculture and government of the day are directly involved in these payments; therefore, as I say, that requirement of Beauchesne's citation 100 is met.

If Your Honour would now turn your attention to paragraph 2 of the same citation, it is there stated that the matter must be so pressing that the public interest will suffer if it is not given immediate attention. I suggest to Your Honour that the public interest is suffering at the present time, and that it will continue to suffer, unless this question is given immediate attention. As has been pointed out by a number of other hon. members, there is a great deal of unrest among dairy farmers with regard to this matter, and there have been indications that they are making plans to take some drastic action. In the meantime they are suffering from an economic depression that is well known to all hon. members who have studied the situation. So I suggest that this motion meets the conditions laid down in paragraph 2 of citation 100.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the matter that is probably paramount to your decision is dealt with in paragraph 3, namely the urgency of debate. As Your Honour well knows, urgency of debate applies when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and the public interest demands that discussion of the matter take place immediately.

In this regard, if Your Honour were to look at the orders of the day you would find no opportunity provided in the rest of this session to discuss the subject matter contained in the motion of the hon. member for Villeneuve. Some special motion or provision would have to be made by the government before a debate on this matter could take place during the remainder of this session. Therefore I suggest to Your Honour that the condition laid down in paragraph 3 as to urgency of debate is also met.

If we do not discuss this matter under the provisions of standing order 26, Mr. Speaker, there is no other provision that would enable us to discuss the matter during the balance of the present session. In other words, this question would have to be put over until the new session if it were to be discussed at all by this parliament.

Last, but perhaps not least, paragraph 5 provides:

> The adjournment of the house cannot be moved with reference to critical conditions generally prevailing in certain parts of the country.

This motion does not refer to critical conditions prevailing in certain parts of the country, Mr. Speaker; the motion refers to critical conditions prevailing in the dairy industry all over the country. Therefore I suggest to Your Honour that the motion of the hon. member also meets the condition laid down in paragraph 5 of citation 100.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be far more useful to spend today debating this issue and if possible finding some solution to a very serious and critical agricultural problem in this country than to spend the day in repetitious debate on Bill No. C-243, a debate which is going to come to an end in a few days anyway.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to second the motion of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), requesting an urgent debate on the government's dairy policy.

I believe sincerely that there is urgency in the matter. Everybody knows that the government house leader (Mr. McIlraith) has given us notice that a motion will be put to the house within two days and that the meaningless discussion on Bill No. C-243 will go on for the two next days.

On the other hand, a motion has now been put by the hon. member for Villeneuve, proposing a debate on the dairy policy of this government.

What, Mr. Speaker, and this is an important question which must be decided today, is the most urgent problem we have to discuss at this time? Is it national defence? In view of the motion presented by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith), will a debate on this subject produce a concrete solution today or tomorrow? Obviously, the subject matter of the motion presented by the hon. member for Villeneuve is of greater urgency. The business on the orders of the day is futile and useless, in view of the motion presented by the hon. Minister of Public Works at the beginning of this sitting. On the other hand, a discussion on the subject matter of the motion presented by the hon. member for Villeneuve could produce results beneficial to many Canadians, that is, the farmers and the milk producers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, not only is there urgency in relation to the other business of the house that we will consider this afternoon, but there is also urgency with regard to the impending demonstrations which the farmers are preparing to carry out throughout Canada. And there is also urgency with respect to the disaster entailed by a farmers' strike. We have seen recently the consequences of such demonstrations in the United States where there were many injured and large quantities of milk were dumped in the sewers and in the streets. Well, Mr. Speaker, such a disaster is imminent and the farmers are getting more angry to see that the federal government, with its dairy policy, is forgetting them. It is urgent, Mr. Speaker, to take the necessary steps to avoid such a disaster.

Mr. Speaker, there are some precedents on which we can base ourselves. For example, the railway strike. We had been told that there was no urgency just before the strike broke out and then there were losses of several million dollars each day. Another precedent: the strike in the ports on the west coast. The adjournment of the house had been asked to discuss that matter, but we were again told that there was no urgency. Now, some ten days later, financial losses of about $1.5 million daily were being incurred. We were told then that this was an emergency and that not an hour, an hour and a half or two hours were to be lost before discussing the problem. There have also been other precedents—for instance the longshoremen's strike on the Montreal waterfront.

Therefore, a number of precedents prove that if we do not debate these urgent matters before the strikes or demonstrations take place, then it will be too late, for when you are in the midst of demonstrations by strikers or farmers, there is no time left for discussion.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I say that it is urgent to meet the situation, that we must not wait until we are faced with incalculable daily financial losses because, with the present government, we must debate these subjects, since the government is unable to face them with its own understanding and counsel.

Mr. Speaker, the fact that a number of farmers are now thinking about leaving their land, seems to me another reason for the urgency of this debate.

Furthermore, the fact that a certain number of people have to suffer daily from such dairy policy also proves the urgency of the debate.

Mr. Speaker, when we consider that the debate on national defence which will take place this afternoon is thoroughly futile and useless and that, on the other hand, the debate suggested in the motion presented by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) might help to find a solution to a problem liable to prove very serious, the cogency of the motion will be recognized as well as the urgency of discussing it this afternoon.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few short remarks to make on the suggestion of my hon. friend, the member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette).

It will probably be noted with surprise that, for once, I agree with my hon. friend from Villeneuve. Generally, my views are completely opposed to his, but I feel it is urgent to deal with this problem and to find a solution, since considerable discontent is being caused among the farmers and it is a constant source of complaints.

A few weeks ago at most, a large number of Quebec farmers came to Ottawa to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) to take into consideration their urgent needs and the situation in which they find themselves.

Every day, farmers, particularly dairy producers, find themselves in an ever tightening squeeze. On the one hand, they are faced with a constantly increasing cost of production and, on the other, with an unprofitable sale price for their products.

Mr. Speaker, it has often been said in this house that we should try to solve the problems involving this nation. Well, this question of the dairy industry, to my mind, is one deserving of our immediate attention.

I will not detain the house any longer but I fully support, like my colleagues in this party, the demands made by the farmers. In fact, we have often called the minister's attention to the importance of the dairy industry and to the advisability of taking the necessary measures to ensure a reasonable price for the dairy producers. I support the motion submitted by my friend, the hon. member for Villeneuve, and I shall make every effort to ensure that farmers actually get what they are entitled to.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I do not have very much to say following the claims and the explanations relating to the dairy policy of the government. However, the member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) stressed the usefulness of the debate. I should say that it is not only useful, it is also necessary in the circumstances.

The member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) quoted the 100th comment of the fourth edition of Beauchesne's parliamentary rules and forms to indicate that it could be detrimental to the public interest. Mr. Speaker, I think we have only to refer to the situation prevalent a few weeks ago in the United States to refute his argument. Indeed, the situation of our neighbours to the south was identical to ours today, and it proved so disastrous for their dairy industry and for the American economy on the whole, that the United States Congress was forced to take action.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the point I emphasize is the urgency of the debate. We are faced at the present time with a threatening strike. We have had strikes in the past and we have had enough in one year, in one session. We always waited for the problem to fall on our heads and on our shoulders before making any move. For once, the farmers and their associations all across Canada have demonstrated explicitly that the government dairy policy is not beneficial nor acceptable. It has to be given a second sober thought here in the house otherwise they will take exceptional measures, they will go on strike and destroy their production if there is no improvement in the situation.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian economy cannot afford another strike of that kind. I think that the debate is urgent and that it is our duty to discuss the matter today and without any further delay.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope I may be allowed to suggest to hon. members that I be given an opportunity soon to rule on the motion. I do not wish to cut off discussion as a few hon. members apparently wish to contribute further. I hope the debate will not continue too much longer and that I shall have an opportunity shortly to give an expression of opinion.

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): I just wish to add a few words in support of the motion of the hon. member for Villeneuve, because nothing could be more urgent at this time than the matter he has raised. Dairy farmers are still quitting in alarming numbers. For that in many ways the new policy of the government is responsible. Furthermore, discrimination has been practised against fluid milk shippers, who received some subsidy last year but no subsidy this year.

It is said that fluid milk shippers are under provincial jurisdiction. I think it is ridiculous for a province to be asked to subsidize the portion of surplus fluid milk sold as manufacturing milk when it does not subsidize manufacturing milk sold by those who sell no fluid milk for distribution. That sort of thing makes no sense.

Nothing can be more urgent or of more importance to our country at this time than the matter raised in the hon. member's motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, being one of the sponsors of the adjournment motion moved by my friend, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), I should like to make a few observations concerning the urgency of this debate.

All the members who spoke before me recognized such an urgency. On the government side everybody remains silent, which is proof of the urgency of the debate, for none of them opposed it except the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), who was not too sure about it.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit the urgency of debate exists. In 1966, Canadian dairy producers got rid of 86,000 milch cows and we have now reached the lowest level in 46 years as regards dairy cattle.

This is one of the points proving the urgency of debating the whole question. The government should assume its own responsibilities and grant dairy producers a fair price for their products. We also note that in addition to the march the farmers intend to make on Ottawa soon, a number of them are planning to give up dairy production, if the government does not take immediate steps to enable them to get a reasonable price for their farm products.

Such is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, on the urgency of this debate.

[English]

Mr. Lee Grills (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a couple of words; I shall take a minute only. Last week I raised a question dealing with the support for surplus milk. I asked why the support was removed from the surplus milk shipped by fluid milk shippers of this country. The only answer I received was from the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, that this matter came under provincial responsibility. In 1966 it was recognized that it came under federal responsibility; why should that have been changed in 1967. The effect is to depress farmers' incomes.

That farmers have threatened to dump milk right across the country is a deplorable state of affairs in a hungry world, and I hope the threat is never carried out. If it is, the government will be held responsible for ignoring the pleas of farmers and others supporting them.

The shippers of manufacturing milk will not receive $4.75 a hundredweight, as has been suggested, because the export subsidy or export charge is subtracted from the amount paid, reducing that figure. Cream shippers are in an even worse position. The quota system, as has been suggested by the dairy commission and some persons in the Department of Agriculture, is most confusing and entirely unsatisfactory to meet the needs of farmers. In fact everybody is confused, and the milk shippers are in a furious state about present day conditions. I agree with the hon. member for Villeneuve.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that I am now in a position to make a ruling. I know that contributions made at the beginning by

hon. members are made for the purpose of enlightening the Chair and of making it possible for the Chair to arrive at a ruling. As I have reached a conclusion, I believe it would not be necessary to carry on with the debate.

Some hon. members mentioned the fact that what the Chair must consider is the urgency, but more particularly the urgency of debate. I am the first to recognize that there is a matter of great importance, a matter of urgency, I would say, but what I must consider, first and above all, is the urgency of debate. In the present circumstances, should there be an adjournment of the business of the house, as listed on government orders, to debate another matter, namely that suggested by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette)?

The matter is not easy to settle and I am grateful to hon. members for their remarks which undoubtedly helped me to reach a decision. And I want to remind hon. members of citation 100, paragraph 8, of Beauchesne's fourth edition, at page 94, which reads as follows:

> I do not think that, under the standing order of 1882, a motion on a subject of this kind, having such a very wide scope, was ever contemplated. What I think was contemplated, was an occurrence of some sudden emergency—

It seems to me that this is the main point: Is there a "sudden emergency"? I remember that over the last few weeks several questions have been asked about that problem following a statement made in the house by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene). That matter was dealt with a few times on the adjournment motion. I do not feel therefore that this is a "sudden emergency" which would justify the adjournment of the house at least today under the present circumstances.

[English]

It has been pointed out by some hon. members that there will be an opportunity for a full fledged debate on this very important matter when we reach interim supply. It is difficult to determine whether this would be soon enough to meet the necessities and requirements of the situation, but I would judge that in the present circumstances the matter might be left in abeyance, and I suggest that there is not sufficient urgency of debate today to accept the motion moved by the hon. member for Villeneuve.

[Mr. Speaker.]

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

SUGGESTED INVITATION FOR VISIT BY PRINCE CHARLES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the Prime Minister with reference to the question I am about to ask. In centennial year has the government given consideration to inviting Prince Charles, the Prince of Wales, to visit the senior of the realms he will serve as monarch in the years ahead, it being particularly appropriate that he see this country during centennial year? In any event, would the Prime Minister give consideration to extending an invitation through the proper channels for the attendance of the prince in company with his father, Prince Philip, at the pan-American games in Winnipeg?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the possibility of the Prince of Wales and Princess Anne visiting Canada during our centennial year was canvassed some months ago, and it was indicated to us that there was some difficulty in the minds of the royal family in asking the Prince of Wales and Princess Anne to take on official duties at this stage in their lives. It did not seem desirable to pursue the matter at that time in an official way with regard to an official visit.

The right hon. gentleman has suggested that perhaps the same consideration would not apply in respect of a visit by the Prince of Wales with his father to the pan-American games. I recall, as I am sure the right hon. gentleman does, that the Prince of Wales and Princess Anne both went to the British Empire and Commonwealth games in Jamaica. They had such a good time there that perhaps they would be glad to repeat the pleasure in Winnipeg. I shall be glad to look into the matter.

DAYLIGHT SAVING

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION AT DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. member for Kootenay West.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister, and I would like the house to know that my questions all originate in the minds of the people. In view of the great inconvenience suffered by Canadians in general, particularly those engaged in transportation, farming and travelling, with the present constitutional but illogical arrangements for the establishment of daylight saving time, would the Prime Minister consider placing this question on the agenda for the next federal-provincial conference with a view to establishing daylight saving time on a nation-wide basis as the result of an agreement between the federal government and the provinces?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to give me written notice of this question as coming from "a member in the twilight of life".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: If there were anything I could do by extending daylight saving time or in any other way to extend that twilight I would be delighted to do so. I think the proposal that we should have uniformity on the matter, if possible, is a very sensible one, and perhaps this could be taken up at the next federal-provincial conference.

GRAIN

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO LEASE OF ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

Could the minister tell the house whether it is true that the National Harbours Board has leased the Quebec grain elevators to the Bungee Company of New York for a ten-year period at a cost of a million dollars a year?

Did that transaction take place between the National Harbours Board and the owners of the grain elevators?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday in reply to a question put by my hon. friend from Quebec South that the government had approved a proposal by the harbours board that the grain elevator at Quebec city should be leased to the firm which had submitted the highest bid, and that bid was from the firm mentioned by the hon. gentleman. I also indicated that certain very stringent conditions were attached to this transaction with respect to the handling of domestic grain. As for the precise amount of the lease, I have not got it under my hand at the moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

Could the hon. minister or the government not find someone in Canada instead of granting a lease of that kind to people outside Canada?

Mr. Speaker: The question is controversial.

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Now that the grain elevators in the port of Quebec have been leased by the National Harbours Board to a grain company and that this company has cancelled what plans it had of building in the Sept-Iles harbour, does the Minister of Transport plan to make a comprehensive survey, jointly with his colleague the Minister of Public Works, of the tremendous possibilities the natural deep-sea harbour of Sept Iles offers large industries?

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, to deal with the last point first, the government did not authorize this lease until it had been fully assured that the company would not have proceeded with its project at Sept Iles whether or not the lease had been consummated, because we did not want to appear to prevent this project going ahead. I did meet with the mayor and other members of the council of Sept Iles, who were brought to my office by my hon. friend, and they asked me if I would speak to my colleague the Minister of Public Works with a view to having a comprehensive study made of the possibilities of the development of the port of Sept Iles. That study will be made just as soon as it can possibly be done.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question.

Is the rental involved in the lease greater or lower than the income the port brought to the Quebec grain elevators?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking for statistical information. The question is therefore out of order.

[English]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Is there any change in policy in so far as the operation of other grain elevators by the National Harbours Board in other parts of Canada is concerned?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a matter of policy. It is a matter of looking at each individual situation with a view to attempting to operate the elevators in the best interests of the producers, sellers and consumers of grain, and in the national interest, with some consideration for the treasury of Canada.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): From what the minister has said may we take it that the National Harbours Board and the department are reviewing the situation in so far as other grain elevators, particularly at Saint John and Halifax, are concerned?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is quite correct.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, the minister mentioned that a study is being made of the whole subject. Is it the intention to sign the present lease before the study is completed?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman has misunderstood me. I was talking about the study of the port of Sept Iles.

EDUCATION

REPORTED REQUIREMENT THAT SCHOLARSHIP RECIPIENTS SWEAR ALLEGIANCE TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware that Canadian graduate students accepting scholarships at some United States universities must now, in order to accept such scholarships, swear to bear true allegiance to the United States of America, with the oaths being administered by a consular or embassy officer of the U.S.A., thereby placing in jeopardy the Canadian citizenship of the students concerned? Will the Prime Minister approach the United States state department to seek a reversal of this gross interference with Canadian nationality?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such stipulation. I will be glad to inquire whether in fact it does exist.

[Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert).]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. When the Prime Minister is making the inquiry will he find out why it is that scholarships issued through the instrumentality of the department of health, education and welfare, office of education, in Washington require that Canadians should in effect disavow their allegiance in order to be awarded scholarships of this kind? I know the Prime Minister will agree that this does not look like the kind of co-operation one would expect and certainly it is contrary to any reasonable attitude between our two countries.

Mr. Pearson: I will inquire concerning whether that report is accurate. I do know that a good many Canadians who have held scholarships in the United States have never been asked to meet any such conditions.

Mr. Brand: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister doubts the accuracy of the statement, will he be willing to receive a photostatic copy of the form of declaration which has been sent to such students?

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING BREATHALIZER TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Could the minister say whether the Department of Justice is giving consideration to the recommendation of the committee on justice and legal affairs for the provision of mandatory breath tests and, if so, when a decision might be reached?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been considered by the Department of Justice. I will be taking up the matter fairly soon, along with other possible amendments to the Criminal Code, with my cabinet colleagues. I cannot say at the moment when a decision will be taken.

FINANCE

REGULATIONS UNDER DEPOSIT INSURANCE LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Finance in the absence of the minister. Could the minister tell the house when he will recommend to the house that bylaw No. 1 passed as order in council No. 1967-579 dealing with regulations under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act will be referred to the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this question as notice.

HUMAN RIGHTS

REPORTED RACIAL DISCRIMINATION IN REQUESTS TO MANPOWER OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is he now in a position to make any report to the house with regard to the inquiries which he yesterday said he was prepared to make? In particular, can he tell us whether the instructions are clear that the manpower offices are not to deal with employers who lay down any discriminatory conditions?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me whether instructions of the former national employment service dealing with anti-discrimination rules in the employment offices were transferred and have been in effect since the service became part of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The answer to this question is yes.

May I add, to answer the supplementary question raised yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition, that anti-discrimination instructions were first distributed to all federal employment offices in July, 1941. These were subsequently incorporated in the revised manual of June, 1949 and reconfirmed in circulars dated November 1953, May 1954, June 1959 and December 1963. As recently as March 7 of this year our regional office in Toronto re-emphasized to all our manpower centres in Ontario the department's anti-discrimination policy.

With regard to the request by the hon. member for York South that further instructions be issued, I should say that a new operations manual is now under preparation and will, of course, include a strong statement on non-discrimination. In addition, special instructions will immediately be sent to all Canada manpower centres to insist on the implementation of non-discrimination.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE ON NATION-WIDE ANTI-CRIME PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice or possibly the Solicitor General. In the light of the report of the Ontario crime commission concerning the extent of the penetration into various organizations in Canada by crime syndicates, will the Minister of Justice give urgent consideration to the convening of a conference of ministers charged with responsibility for the enforcement of the law across Canada to lay the foundation for the necessary practical measures and possible amendments to the law in order to co-ordinate an effective anti-crime program on a nation-wide basis?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I missed the first part of the question. I will take it as notice and answer it tomorrow or some other day.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, in view of the urgency and national importance of the need to co-ordinate measures against crime on a national scale I should like to ask the minister whether he will treat the matter a little more urgently than his casual answer would seem to indicate.

WINTER WORKS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Because of the very cold weather and very long winter we have experienced, especially in northwestern Quebec, would the minister agree to reconsider the requests originating from all quarters for an extension of the winter works program to May 15?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question has been asked several times in recent days.

FISHERIES

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY ON BOAT CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Kings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of

Inquiries of the Ministry

Fisheries. Has the minister received a copy of the resolution which was passed unanimously on April 13 by the Prince Edward Island legislature urging the federal government to honour its commitment to pay the 25 per cent subsidy to the fishermen who built boats in the 35-45 foot class? If he has received this resolution, and in view of the expressed hope of the premier of Prince Edward Island that in due course every claim will be paid by Ottawa, does the government now intend to pay this subsidy on the basis of the applications which have already been received?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I received such a letter yesterday and I replied this morning to the effect that all applications received will be dealt with as quickly as possible and that all those meeting the criteria established by the federal Department of Fisheries will be paid without delay.

HOUSING

TORONTO—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO RELIEVE SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the now daily expressions of mounting public concern about the housing shortage in metropolitan Toronto—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanbury: It is a concern which is not the exclusive province of any political party. In part, though not exclusively, it is a matter for federal action. Is the minister ready yet to inform the house what steps are being taken to relieve this situation of urgent national importance and, if so, what if any effect such measures have had to date?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question put by the hon. member is, of course, of great importance to all members. I have the impression that this subject has been raised on a number of occasions during the last few days, and I wonder whether the hon. member feels there is justification for asking it again today.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I hope it is not suggested that this matter is in order when raised by hon. members opposite but not when raised by interested members on this side.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Put it on at ten o'clock.

[Mr. McQuaid.]

TRADE

CONSIDERATION OF PREFERENTIAL TARIFFS FOR LATIN AMERICAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of President Johnson's offer to grant preferential tariffs to developing countries in Latin America, is the Canadian government considering the implementation of a similar policy to assist these nations in the development of their economies?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have for some time and are at the present time considering with the United States and other governments the best way of assisting underdeveloped countries. As my hon. friend knows, we have had discussions at various international meetings on this matter. The suggestion made by President Johnson at the recent conference involves only one method of assisting these countries. There are other ways in which this can be done. These matters are now being considered with the United States and other governments.

HONOURS AND AWARDS

ORDER OF CANADA—REPORTED CHANGE IN MOTTO

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister tabled certain orders in council, one revoking P. C. 7964. Order in council P.C. 1967-389 provides for the setting up and establishment of the Order of Canada. Attached to it was the constitution of the Order of Canada. In the copy which has now been delivered to me by the Clerk I find in paragraph 27 that the motto of the order shall be "Desiderantes Meliorem Patriam." When was the substitution made of the one now before me for the one that was tabled yesterday, a copy of which was given to members and in which reference was made in brackets to the scriptures from which the quotation is taken, namely, Hebrews 12:16? When was this change made in the document filed yesterday which was so different from the one produced to me today?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to deal with this important matter. The document filed yesterday was the only one of an official character and it included only the motto in paragraph 27. There was later typed another edition of the constitution of the order, because it was felt that it would be helpful to my right hon. friend and to members of the press to identify the source of this particular motto. Unfortunately there was a misprint and the figure "12" should have been "11". My right hon. friend, with his deep knowledge of the Scriptures, could have been expected to notice this misprint, and he did in fact spot it immediately.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the Prime Minister for that reference but I ask him now, when did the change or removal take place in that portion of the constitution which was filed yesterday?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, nothing was removed from the document that was tabled. This addition was made to the document that was circulated for the information of the press.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if this scriptural reference was made for the edification of the people of Canada, the Prime Minister has certainly edified them.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—POSSIBLE AMENDMENTS TO PERMIT RECONCILIATION WITH PROVINCIAL PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I intended to direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare but in his absence I shall address it to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that at least one provincial government has expressed its inability or unwillingness to meet the conditions of the federal medicare plan and that other provinces have indicated that the interpretation of the act will be very difficult to reconcile with their own plans, does the government intend to propose any amendments in order that the medicare plan can be reconciled with provincial plans?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare is at the moment discussing this and related matters with provincial ministers of health. Perhaps he will have a report to make after the discussion is complete. I cannot assume that any amendment to the act will be required.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

On the order:

Government orders—The Minister of National Defence—House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-243, an act to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof (as amended).

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the house do now proceed to order No. 134, namely second reading of Bill C-278, an act respecting the occupational training of adults.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the house will allow the Chair a moment or two for consultation in order to ascertain the number of the standing order which is thought to be relevant to the present situation.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Order, please. I am now prepared to make a ruling on the motion presented to the house a moment ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. It has been brought to my attention—and I am sure hon. members realize the difficulty with which the Chair is faced in connection with the motion presented by the hon. member—that the order of business is according to our standing orders, proposed by the government itself. I draw the attention of hon. members to standing order 18 which reads as follows:

(1) All items standing on the orders of the day, except government orders, shall be taken up according to the precedence assigned to each on the order paper.

(2) Except as provided in standing orders 43 and 56, government orders may be called in such sequence as the government may think fit.

An order has been called by the government today, and the only way we could proceed in accordance with the motion presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would be by suspending, with unanimous consent, the provisions of standing order 18. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be some doubt whether there is unanimous consent. I would ask the house whether there is unanimous agreement to suspend the provisions of standing order 18 so that I may put to the house the motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Before proceeding with my ruling I should also bring to the attention of hon. members a decision which is in point. I refer to a ruling by Mr. Speaker on Monday, May 14, 1956, as follows:

> May I point out to the hon. member for Kamloops that I cannot accept his motion because the order that is now before the house is a government order, and the other order that the hon. member now considers we should proceed with is order No. 12, which is another government order, and government orders may be moved only by the leader of the house. I would refer hon. members to standing order 18(2).

That is the standing order to which I have just referred.

> There is also citation 136, which reads:
> "All motions referring to the business of the house should be introduced by the leader of the house."

Therefore the Speaker considered that the motion could not be moved.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, we are faced with a very difficult question here.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lambert: I realize that this is not supposed to be a debatable motion, but I think Your Honour might take under advisement the fact that standing order 15-A did not apply in 1956. The government has availed itself of the provisions of standing order 15-A by appointing a day certain for the termination of this debate and therefore has preempted any question of the continuation of the debate at this time. In effect the government could have indicated not next Thursday but the Tuesday following or any day subsequent to next Thursday for the termination of the debate or how long it should continue. I am sure Your Honour realizes that when citing precedents they must be on all fours with the question under consideration. Unfortunately for the judgment that Your Honour has rendered, I would submit that 1956 is not today and that standing order 15-A was not then in force.

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West is interesting, but even without the precedent to which I have just referred, which to my mind is certainly relevant, there is standing order 18(2) which specifies that government business is in the hands of the government house leader. We cannot suspend the provisions of that standing order without the consent of the house. Therefore, orders of the day having been called—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order. It so happened that on April 3 it was moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-243 and the opinion of the house was called for. The yeas and nays were called and there was a recorded vote. Why, then, cannot that be done on this occasion and on any occasion when an order of the house is called? May I call for the yeas and nays on the movement of the house into committee on this bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On that point, Mr. Speaker, is there not a difference between the situation of April 3 and today? On April 3 we had the first motion that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on this bill.

Mr. Starr: We have to do that every day.

Mr. Knowles: No, we are not resolving ourselves into committee. We are again going into committee of the whole, the resolving already having been determined.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that there should not be further discussion. I bring to the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that standing order 53 is in point. I think the argument raised by the hon. member of Winnipeg South Centre has been adequately answered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Orders of the day have been called and I have no alternative but to leave the chair.

The house resumed, from Monday, April 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose last evening clause 2 was under consideration.

On clause 2—Canadian forces, Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, when this debate was adjourned last night I had just finished explaining why it was necessary for us to continue the debate in the hope that the public would become aware of the issues involved and would bring pressure to bear on government supporters so that we might stop what I consider to be a very foolish move by the Minister of National Defence. In addition to having the right to continue the debate in the hope that we will persuade the public to bring pressure to bear on the government on this question, I believe it is perfectly proper, technical procedure to point out the kind of arguments used on the other side of the chamber and the fallacy of some of the points raised in the general tenor of the argument.

In this connection I referred to the lead editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of last Saturday and pointed out that, the editor ignored the facts and copied hon. members opposite in some of the arguments they have used in this debate. Many of the arguments they use have been repeated and repeated throughout the country and are repeated no matter how many times they are disproved by the evidence given before the committee. For instance, we heard the minister and his supporters suggest that the military wanted to control and run things instead of the government. The evidence given before the committee has made it perfectly clear that this argument is completely contrary to the facts, but that does not stop government supporters repeating it time after time.

We have heard the minister repeat from time to time that what the government is now trying to do by the unification bill was explained and spelled out in the white paper. The minister has said this despite the fact that every senior military adviser who was with him at that time said they had no such understanding and certainly it could not be taken from the white paper in any manner, shape or form.

One of the most important facts that the minister keeps distorting is the meaning of integration and unification. The argument put forward by the minister and his supporters is that integration and unification are a package deal, just one scheme, and that unification is necessary in order to complete the integration process. Of course that has been disproven by the evidence before the committee and even by the minister's own chief witness, the chief of the general staff, General Allard. I believe it is proper debating technique in the house to quote the evidence before the committee proving how wrong these arguments are. Of course the purpose of doing this, if government supporters insist on using almost exclusively arguments which are obviously contrary to the facts, is to prove by the facts that the government has a very weak case. This is the situation today. If we take away all their fallacious arguments the government has nothing left on which to pin its support of unification.

I have often thought that the meanest and dirtiest argument used by government supporters is that those who are opposed to unification are opposed to progress. This has been echoed by various members in the house. In the Ottawa Citizen of last Saturday there was an article on the editorial page written by Charles King, the associate editor, which repeats what I would call a typical example of the technique of the big lie. I am sorry that my copy of that issue of the Citizen is missing because I would have liked to quote a paragraph or two from the article. However, I think I am being fair to Mr. King when I say that the purport of his article was that those who oppose unification—

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order which I will state very quickly. My point of order is that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona has over the past few days, both in the House of Commons and out of it, repeatedly used the word "lie" in connection with another member of this house. I call the attention of the house to citation 145 on page 126 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, which reads as follows:

> It has been formally ruled by Speakers in the Canadian Commons that a statement by an honourable member respecting himself and peculiarly within his own knowledge must be accepted, but it is not unparliamentary to temperately—

I wish to emphasize the word "temperately"

> —criticize statements made by a member as being contrary to the facts; but no imputation of intentional falsehood is permissible. B.352, 365. A statement made by a member in his place, is considered as made upon honour and cannot be questioned in the house or out of it.

I repeat the words "in the house or out of it". We know what has been said in the house over the past few days by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, and I will refer to a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press of Thursday, April 13, which quotes what the hon. member has been saying outside the house and is therefore relevant to citation 145 which I just read.

It reads as follows:

> Terry Nugent, Conservative member of parliament for Edmonton-Strathcona, Wednesday kept a promise to Defence Minister Paul Hellyer by repeating outside the Commons, an accusation that the defence minister used the "big lie" system developed by Adolf Hitler.

The next paragraph reads as follows:

Wednesday, Mr. Nugent took up the challenge—twice. Early in the day he repeated it to Winnipeg broadcasters, making it clear that he was reading from Hansard, the official record of the Commons.

Further down it reads:

He (Mr. Hellyer) has opened his mouth and put his big foot in it again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deachman: I gather from the applause of hon. members opposite that they concur in the use of this kind of language by an hon. member and they believe this is the way in which members of the house should behave both in and out of it. I say, shame on them. I continue to read from the same article:

Mr. Nugent said he meant every word when he said Mr. Hellyer was using "big lie" tactics. He said proof of the technique is in Hansard. "The biggest lie is more defence for more money"—

Farther along the article reads as follows:

Mr. Nugent said the defence minister says those opposed to unification are against progress. This is a "big lie".

He also said Mr. Hellyer's report that admirals were trying to run the department was "a big lie"—

Farther down it reads:

Can you wonder why I refer to the term of "big lie"? He received a standing ovation from the 150 party supporters—

They were Tories.

—when he pledged that if he has his way, unification will be achieved only "over my dead body."

On the front page of the Winnipeg Tribune of April 13 the following appeared:

During his 30-minute speech he employed the contentious phrase "the big lie" seven other times. In addition he called Mr. Hellyer a "blockhead".

All this may appear very humorous to hon. members opposite. Perhaps it is their belief that this is parliamentary language and that this is the way in which hon. members in the House of Commons and out of it should conduct themselves toward each other. I say this is unparliamentary language. It is a violation of the long-standing customs of this house. It is a violation of the customs of the British house and of parliaments everywhere. It is not the kind of language which hon. gentlemen everywhere who respect themselves, their persons or their parties should use. It is despicable language, it is dirty language and it is language for which the hon. member should apologize. We are here to reason together.

Mr. Nugent: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Deachman: We cannot conduct our business by such language. I say that the language which the hon. gentleman has been using is unparliamentary and out of order both when the hon. member uses it in the house and elsewhere. It is filthy language which should be retracted.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary for me to reply to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: I understand the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is speaking on a point of order. When he has concluded his remarks I will hear the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Nugent: The intemperate language used by the hon. member when he told me that my language is intemperate should be answer enough. The manner, conduct and behaviour of the hon. member in the house are usually such that he is the last person on that side from whom we should expect such language. I know that several of my friends wish to bring the behaviour of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra to the attention of the committee but I do not think anything can be gained from it. Certainly the hon. member is one week late. I used the phrase "the big lie technique" exactly a week ago today. Of course it would take him that long to wake up and act on instructions from the minister.

The particular falsehood which annoys me the most in this big lie technique is the one which perpetrates the idea that those who are opposed to unification are opposed to progress. This was the sum and substance of the argument advanced last week by the hon. member for Leeds. I thought that rather than bandy these words about today it would be more worth while to give a solid illustration of how far away these arguments are from the truth. It may be that hon. members have not heard or read the evidence of the witnesses. It may be they are unintentionally slandering the officers to whom this country owes so much for their long period of service.

Mr. Deachman: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, at the moment there is a point of order before the house regarding the use of parliamentary language both in and out of the house. I believe the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is neither objecting to nor discussing the point of order. The hon. member is reverting to his speech and is again using the very words to which I called the attention of the Chair. With respect, sir, I should like a ruling with regard to the use of such language against other hon. members in this chamber.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona completed his remarks on the point of order?

Mr. Nugent: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The hon. member has raised a question with regard to the use of words in this chamber. I say to the hon. member that when members on this side are asked to withdraw true statements because of the rules, then it is time the rules were changed. In so far as the word "lie" is concerned, that word was bandied around by the Minister of National Defence the other evening as can be ascertained from checking Hansard. He accused members on this side of the house of repeating lies. I see no difference between what the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is doing now and what the Minister of National Defence did last Monday evening. I would draw the attention of the Chair also to the fact that the hon. member who is now raising this point of order based on the rules did not use the technique of the big lie but used the big lie itself. I say to the hon. member who raised the question that he deliberately lied to this house on March 3, and I refer to page 13702 of Hansard.

The Chairman: Order, please. I must say to the hon. member for Cape Breton South that he surely does not want, even on a point of order, to accuse another hon. member of deliberately lying. This would be completely unparliamentary language.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The hon. member raised this question and I intend to prove the statement fully by reference to Hansard for March 3, page 13702, and the March 3 proceedings of the defence committee, page 1960. The hon. member who is now making reference to lies is the very person who came into this house and reported that something had happened in the defence committee which never did happen.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Your question of privilege was raised.

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair is already listening to a point of order raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. If the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra has a question of privilege, I will hear him next.

Mr. Deachman: I have two points of privilege in respect of this matter.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I should like to call the attention of the committee to the question of privilege raised on March 3 when members on this side stood up and denied that there had been a show of hands called for in the committee on that particular occasion.

The Chairman: Order, please. I recognize the point the hon. member is attempting to make. The question before the Chair is one concerning unparliamentary language and I suggest to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, as well as to other hon. members, that if this point of order is to be placed before the Chair we should discuss the question of unparliamentary language.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): To that I can only say that the matter should have been raised by someone in whom we could believe. The hon. member has raised a point of order based on the fact that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona said that the Minister of National Defence was using the big lie technique. I only wanted to bring to the attention of the house that the Minister of National Defence used the same word. This hon. member is the last man who should stand up and point a finger at anybody. The proof of that statement is in the record of this house. I repeat that if any member of this house has to withdraw a true statement because of the rules, then it is time the rules were changed.

I point out too that the Minister of National Defence used the same word. He can get up now and deny it if he wishes but in his last speech he said that members of the opposition were repeating lies. Why did the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra not raise a point of order at that time? Why did he not refer to the rule book when he came into the house on March 3 and lied to the house? This is a true statement and can be substantiated by reference to Hansard and the evidence of the defence committee. It is a true statement and one that no rule can make any member back up from. If we have to back up from the truth, then it is time the rules were changed. It is certainly time the rules were applied to an hon. member who gets away with lying in this house.

Mr. Deachman: On the point to which the hon. member for Cape Breton South has just referred, I may say that this matter of privilege was brought before the house and dealt with by a ruling of Mr. Speaker. What the hon. member is doing now is reflecting on a ruling of the Chair which tossed out that particular case. There is no case of any kind here because the matter was dealt with by the Chair. In this house one does not reflect upon the rulings of Mr. Speaker. This is clear.

Might I say further, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. gentleman is still addressing himself to the very point of order I am raising, the use of the word "lie" in this chamber as has been done by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, supported by the hon. member for Cape Breton South who has used the same word. Incidentally, this is nothing less than a revolt against the rules of decency which govern this chamber, a revolt by hon. members opposite against the rules of decency which govern debates in this parliament.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, in spite of all the desk slapping that has been going on on the Liberal side I should like to deal strictly with the words which have been used in this debate. I should like to refer you, sir, to page 14786 of Hansard for April 11. I am quite sure the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra was in the house at the time this statement was made but I did not hear him raise a point of order with regard to unparliamentary language. May I quote to you exactly what was said and by whom it was said so you may take these facts into consideration in case you feel there should be some condemnation of the use of these words. The pertinent part reads as follows:

Mr. Hellyer: And yet the Leader of the Opposition repeats the lie—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You should never talk about lies.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South).]

Mr. Hellyer: —as his followers have on numerous occasions during the course of this debate.

I say to you, sir, that it would have been rather nice if some Liberal had stood up and condemned the Minister of National Defence for this effrontery. No point of order or question of privilege was raised at that time. It seems to me that what is fair for one side certainly ought to be for the other side. In so far as the point of order is concerned, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is in the course of developing an argument. It is an argument which has been made before within and outside this house. I feel that the house is entitled to hear precisely what he has to say. He is bringing forward something which many members have stressed during this debate. It is a point which I feel is well taken. Certainly the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is quite capable of taking responsibility, either within the house or outside it, for anything which he cares to say.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, it is clear that in the course of any debate over any length of time things will be said which will be regretted by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house. That is something that tends to happen.

Mr. Nugent: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Matheson: When I rise I usually try to prepare myself and to conduct myself when on my feet as a gentleman. I try very hard to do that. It is not very easy because my instincts are not always gentlemanly. However, may I say this. When a matter is raised as a point of order, as it has been, it is incumbent on the Chair, with respect, to make an adjudication. It is clear that in the course of this debate no challenge has been made to such remarks. I think the point has now come when we must make such a challenge and from now on guard ourselves against untimely, improvident and ill-considered remarks, which are clearly out of character with the traditions of this chamber. I suggest it serves no useful purpose to review every development of the past days or weeks. What we are concerned with here is the matter which was raised a few moments ago. I think we are entitled to a ruling from Your Honour on this point for guidance in future debate.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I rise on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. The hon. member referred to a question of privilege which was raised on March

3 and indicated that the Speaker had made a decision at that time on the matter. I would draw the attention of the hon. member, and also the minister if he will listen for a moment, to the fact that we had no way in which to support the argument put forward by members on this side of this house on March 3 because the evidence which supported our argument was not available at that time. It was quite some time later that the evidence of the defence committee was found to substantiate the claims that we on this side of the house were making.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra suggests that, the Speaker having made a decision on the matter, we should forget it. This is not the first time, that a question of privilege has been raised in this house with respect to the hon. member's actions in committees. The evidence is now available, and despite what he or anybody else says about forgetting the matter the fact remains that Hansard for March 3 and also the evidence given before the defence committee on March 3 indicate that the hon. member did lie to this house.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, if I may speak further to the question of privilege, I think that somewhere along the line credibility has to be considered. I remind the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, through your good offices, Mr. Chairman, that not only are hon. members opposite filibustering this afternoon but as reported at page 14613 of Hansard for April 6, half way down the left hand column of that page, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, speaking to a motion for papers during private members' hour, said:

> Mr. Speaker, just before I rose to speak I was listening to the words of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) and I noticed something very peculiar in the chamber. Finally it became apparent to me, after looking around, that the trouble was that we were not graced with the presence of a single Tory.

The Chairman: Order. Surely what the hon. member is saying now is a little removed from the point of order that has been raised. The question before the committee is—

Mr. Forrestall: I was speaking to the question of privilege, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The question before the committee is whether or not the language used by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is or is not parliamentary. That is the question that the Chair has to decide. If hon. members have completed their remarks the Chair is now prepared to make a ruling.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: If hon. members wish to continue I shall hear the hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I am not speaking to the point of order but am rising on the question of privilege. I thought we were speaking to a question of privilege. I thought Your Honour was going to deal with the question of privilege which was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra subsequent to the point of order. I am talking about credibility. This is a matter of privilege, and if it becomes a matter of my raising it that is indeed what I will do.

I quoted the comments of the hon. member during private members' hour. As reported at page 14636 of Hansard for the same day, the right hand column near the bottom of the page, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra said:

> I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At one stage of the committee procedure—

He is there referring to the earlier session of the committee during the afternoon.

> —we could not find a Tory in the whole house, so I do not think there is anything wrong with a member of the cabinet discharging his duty outside the house.

My question of privilege is that the hon. member is now rising on a point of order having himself been guilty less than ten days ago of exactly the same indiscretion.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra was instructed to become as excited as he did, but if he had bothered to listen to what I said yesterday he would have heard my explanation as to what is meant by the technique of the big lie. As reported at page 15022 of Hansard I illustrated the context in which I used that phrase in this house. I said:

> To begin with, to understand what I mean by the technique of the big lie, it is not necessary for someone to tell a direct lie. In fact some of the most skilful methods employed in the technique of the big lie do not use a lie at all, although certainly they use half truths. The whole idea of the technique of the big lie is to make sure the facts are hidden, or at least to make sure that if the facts are revealed they are either confused or swamped under false arguments.

The hon. member's point of order is that this is unparliamentary language. I have not used the word "lie" or suggested that someone has lied, as the Minister of National Defence had the temerity to do the other day, at which time the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra raised no objection. I understand the sensitivity of the hon. member opposite because he recognizes in the technique I have described something that hon. members opposite have been following which the hon. member hoped they could keep hidden. He hoped that the kind of methods they employ would not become obvious.

The truth may hurt, Mr. Chairman, but I suggest that there has been no bending or breaking of the rules in this case. It is simply a case of the sensibilities of hon. members opposite being offended, as they usually are when something does not suit them or flatter their point of view.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who for a time was chairman of the defence committee, may I say first of all in defence of the hon. member that from the time he took the chair he endeavoured to work toward a solution without the committee taking a recorded division. He attempted to have matters resolved without a vote being taken. No vote was taken at any time up until the committee began to deal with the bill clause by clause. I realize that I am not as articulate as some of the lawyer members opposite. However, I feel that this is an important matter and the charge that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra has misled the house should not be allowed to go unchallenged.

I now wish to refer to proceedings that took place in the house on March 3. The hon. member as found on page 13702 of Hansard, pointed out that he had endeavoured to determine the consensus of the committee regarding sitting on the afternoon of March 3. The hon. member said:

> I am as willing to admit, as are some hon. members opposite who were in the room this morning, that there was some confusion about whether a motion had been put. I certainly am right, however, in saying that I suggested—

The hon. member did not say he put the question.

> —we meet at two o'clock, following which there was some dissension in respect of the idea of meeting at two o'clock, and then I pleaded with the committee to meet this afternoon in order to further the business of the committee. Finally, as the bells were ringing, I asked whether members were willing to meet this afternoon and hands were raised indicating willingness to meet this afternoon.

There was a show of hands.

An hon. Member: No, there was not.

Mr. Byrne: I am sure that at least four members, myself included, raised their hands to show they were willing to sit that afternoon.

An hon. Member: What about the others?

Mr. Byrne: The chairman did not say that a vote was taken. He asked for an indication of the consensus of the committee and he determined that a substantial group was willing to sit in the afternoon. He simply ruled on that consensus. He did not mislead the house in any way on March 3.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: I think the Chair has heard enough to rule on the question.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, arising from the statement made by the hon. member—

The Chairman: Order, please. I must point out to the committee that an allegation of fact does not constitute a question of privilege. A question of order is before the committee and I hope that the committee will allow me to rule on the point of order and make a few comments.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Before any ruling is made I wish to call on the written record to answer the hon. member. As found on page 13702 of Hansard of March 3, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra said during the course of his remarks:

> —I said we should meet this afternoon at two o'clock. There was some dissent and I asked for a show of hands—

May I now turn to the proceedings in the defence committee on March 3 as recorded on page 1960 of the committee reports.

> The Chairman: Now, we must get on with it. We will meet this afternoon at two o'clock. I think that would only be fair.
> Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, that is your decision now, autocratically arrived at.
> The Chairman: I am always at the—
> Mr. Churchill: No. This is the Chairman's decision. I want that on the record.

The Chairman: I am always at the disposal of the committee and I will call for a vote on that from those who will meet here this afternoon.

Mr. Churchill: No, no, you cannot call for a vote, sir. You have to have a motion.

An hon. Member: I move that we adjourn until 2 p.m.

Get a load of this:

The Chairman: We have a motion. Now gentlemen, we have business to do. I have no motion in front of me, gentlemen—

First there is a motion, then there is no motion. I continue reading:

An hon. Member: You have a motion.

The Chairman: —and the bells are ringing. We have been meeting regularly at this period and we should be here this afternoon—

Mr. Churchill: That is your decision.

The Chairman: —at two o'clock to deal with this.

Mr. Churchill: That is your ruling arbitrarily arrived at.

Mr. Lambert: It has not been the regular practice to meet Friday afternoon, although there has been the odd meeting. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, what you are doing is asking those people on this side of the chair to absorb the brunt of what happened yesterday afternoon, the long division bells.

The Chairman: Gentlemen, the House of Commons itself was involved in that. Gentlemen, two o'clock.

One can go through the proceedings and nowhere on March 3 will one find anything to corroborate the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra when he lied to the house that day by saying, "I asked for a show of hands." The evidence does not support that. Now the hon. member for Kootenay East is supporting the same lie supported by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Knowles: Order, please.

The Chairman: Order, please. Sufficient has been said for the Chair to rule on the point of order. Far be it for the occupant of the Chair to lecture the committee on parliamentary language, but I suggest to the committee, and this applies to all parties, that more care ought to be taken in confining language to those statements and phrases usually considered parliamentary.

May, seventeenth edition, says at page 455:

Allegations against Members.—Good temper and moderation are the characteristics of parliamentary language. Parliamentary language is never more desirable than when a member is canvassing the opinions and conduct of his opponents in debate.

With reference to the point of order now before the committee, citation 154(3) of Beauchesne, fourth edition, says:

The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged, misrepresenting the language of another, or accusing him, in his turn, of misrepresentation, charging him with falsehood or deceit; or contemptuous or insulting language of any kind; all these are unparliamentary and call for prompt interference.

Citation 154(5) says:

It is not unparliamentary to say that a statement is untrue, but it is unparliamentary to say that it was untrue to the knowledge of the member addressing the House.

I say to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona that the Chair and the committee would be appreciative if he could co-operate and use language more within the confines of that considered to be parliamentary.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I am always willing to co-operate with the Chair. The entire purpose of my speech today is to point out the reliance of the minister and his supporters on arguments which have been disproved by facts.

An hon. Member: Boloney.

Mr. Nugent: I trust that the sensibilities and sensitiveness of hon. members on the government side will restrain them while I remind them of certain things. I wish to read from the Ottawa Citizen of last Friday, April 14. An article by Charles King is headed, "It's Time To End The Row On Unification." Under the subheading, "They're Reactionary", Mr. King says:

There is no doubt—there never has been—that a great many serving officers, and perhaps some of the men they order about in feudal fashion, don't like the assignment parliament is giving them.

That is too bad. It would be nicer to think that they were behind the government on this, recognizing the inevitability of change, and the supremacy of parliament in these matters.

But the army and the navy, and to some degree the air force as well, have always been somewhat reactionary in their attitudes, leaning heavily toward tradition, pomp, and regimental finery.

I would think that the members of the defence committee as well as the Minister of National Defence might rise in wrath against such an article. The allegations against those who testified before the committee—Generals Moncel and Fleury, Air Marshals Miller and Annis, Admirals Landymore and Brock, etc. —are clear. But I did not hear any annoyance expressed on the other side of the house at these gentlemen being so insulted. Members who sat on the committee will recall the testimony of General Moncel about how enthusiastic they were about integration, how many plans were drawn up, and how they were pressing on with integration. In this connection I think I shall read from the committee evidence to show the attitude of some of these gentlemen.

Committee report No. 35, page 2290, illustrates the attitude of Air Chief Marshal Miller who was chief of staff until just six months ago and is now being subjected to this sort of statement which is supported by members of the Liberal party. As recorded at page 2290 of the proceedings Air Chief Marshal Miller said:

I do not think anybody is ever completely satisfied with an organization. We made very many changes in our first integrated organization we set up, I imagine that they are still making changes. However, the large basic organizational frame is there, and I think it is a good one as far as an integrated defence staff is concerned.

Here we have Air Chief Marshal Miller praising the steps taken to date. This does not sound like somebody who is reactionary. A little farther down on the same page he is recorded as saying:

I certainly believed what was in the white paper, which said that integration was the first step. I had never heard, during my tenure, all the implications on unification spelled out. It had been something that was held up as the end result, but in my understanding of it, there was no particular hurry over it, and the important thing was to get the integration organization going, and that we would then have a chance to look at integration in a more leisurely better organized way.

I do not know how anyone can suggest that this is a reactionary attitude. At page 2291 of the proceedings Air Chief Marshal Miller said:

On the principle of integration, my own feelings about it are that it might very well be the end result.

I believe the word he meant there was unification.

I do not think it is timely now. I have felt that the problem of integration and getting the organization, if you like, was the area where the biggest return in manpower savings and in effective control of military lay, and it was important to get that right before we had ventured into the areas of unification.

The area of unification is a very sensitive one, as you well know. It strikes at the traditions and the feelings of a lot of people. I did not see, up until the time I left, that the return from pressing the unification sign was commensurate with the disruption and the great concern to the man in uniform that would result from it.

[Mr. Nugent.]

That is the attitude of Air Chief Marshal Miller and I suggest it shows the falseness of the argument in Mr. King's article. Mr. King started his article by stating that he did not have much experience in this field, and I am sure he has been led astray by the arguments of the minister and his supporters.

The attitude of Air Marshal Annis can be found in volume 23 of the committee proceedings at page 1378:

While I do not think there is yet sufficient favourable evidence to justify totally abolishing the three services, I do believe integration is the right direction in which the service should be moving and pressing their research to move further.

What nonsense is this spouted by the hon. member for Leeds who says that people who are against unification are against progress? Can the hon. member tell us he has read that evidence and similar statements by other witnesses who were pressing on with integration and trying to make it work? For a man to stand up in this house and say such a thing is not being fair to these people. He is even dishonest when he suggests that those who oppose unification are against progress.

As recorded on the same page Air Marshal Annis said this about unification:

I think that unification, certainly at this stage, without a lot more preparation, could be achieved but it would mean destroying most of the combat capabilities and versatilities now, or at least until recently, existing or inherent in the Royal Canadian Navy. I think it would mean destroying in the longer term the ability of the unified force to retain a meaningful air combat capability or, in fact, any significant combat capability except for ground attack.

His attitude can be seen in other comments. I quote from the bottom of page 1382:

—I would suggest that we experiment thoroughly with integration of the supporting forces including performance tests—and I could talk about that for quite a while because it is very important. And having experimented thoroughly with how far one can go with integration of the supporting forces and whether or not in an integrated form they can give adequate response to the chief of naval, army or air, in their combat roles, then make a decision of whether to go on to unification. I still think unification might be possible—it could very well be—but we do not know.

Can you ask for a fairer attitude, Mr. Chairman? How can you have anything more dishonest than the argument that a gentleman who is using that sort of language is opposed to progress because he is opposed to unification? What he is saying is, "We want to make integration work, but to do our best unification right now is wrong." He gave us his reasons, and they were very honest reasons, when he appeared before the committee.

Then there is the attitude of General Moncel. Certainly very few officers coming before us had greater qualifications than he. We were all impressed by his useful attitude and his willingness to experiment. He was the man who had drawn up practice plans for unification if required. In volume 22 of the committee proceedings, as recorded at page 1312, his attitude is shown in answer to a question I asked him. I quote as follows:

Mr. Nugent: I know that question sounded silly but it bore some relation to the minister's statement that the end result of integration is unification. I wanted to try to indicate that although integration is a progressive performance, and you can find many places where it operates, that does not necessarily mean that integration works everywhere or that it has no other logical end but unification?

Mr. Moncel: Precisely; and as I tried to explain to one of the other inquisitors this depends entirely on your commitments. Give me a pencil and a scratch pad and I will write you a commitment for the country which will generate the need for a unified force. It is very simple. But with your current commitments you do not want one. In fact, it is better that you do not have one.

All I can say, Mr. Chairman, is that if those senior officers had shown before the committee such a lack of honesty as Charles King's argument shows, none of us would have been impressed, as we certainly were, with their dedication to this country. I am not blaming Charles King particularly. As he pointed out in his own article, he does not know much about the matter. I know who has been misleading him. It is not a coincidence that he happens to be working for a Liberal rag.

Then there is the attitude of General Fleury, as recorded at page 1490 of committee proceedings No. 24, when he said:

I myself held an integrated position in headquarters for just under a year, from the fall of 1965 to the summer of 1966. There had been over the years a good deal of consideration—possibly more consideration than action—toward integration. I had always felt that the armed forces would benefit by a much greater degree of integration than was the situation in 1964. I think it would not be unfair to say that I was a supporter, maybe even an enthusiastic supporter, of the principle of integration.

These are the people Mr. King and the minister's supporters label reactionary. These are the people they say are opposed to progress because they are opposed to unification. Some annoyance has been displayed about language and imputation, but surely there should be some show of anger or annoyance by anyone who believes that people who have given the public service of this country their entire adult years and to whom this country owes so much should not be treated in this way. We believe these people are honest and decent gentlemen and we resent very much this sort of article and slanders of this sort against these gentlemen.

Can we not call a spade a spade and say that when people go so far as to ignore the facts and distort the truth there is only one argument that can be used? This is a perfect and classic example of the technique of the big lie, and I do not care whether it is based on the ignorance of Charles King or on political necessity as in the case of some of my hon. friends opposite. When it is used it is unfair, it is dishonest, and it is typical of the arguments that are advanced to support unification and the minister's move to bring about unification now.

It is certainly part of fair debating technique to talk about the qualifications of witnesses, their manner, bearing and deportment, and whether we should listen to and believe them. It is not, I submit, fair to twist the record. I challenge the hon. member for Leeds, or any hon. member on that side of the house, to take the evidence of any of the witnesses who appeared before the committee and point to questions and answers which will substantiate the statement that false and malicious charges have been made on this side of the house by those who are opposed to unification or opposed to progress. In fact, much of the evidence indicates that many of those who are opposed to unification are opposed to it because they believe it will interfere with integration, a process which they believed was making progress.

The entire point of this exercise, of course, is to remind members of the house that those who have already said they will support this measure have said that they will rely on the facts. This reminds me of the statement by the minister that it was not necessary for this matter to go to the committee. I say that any man who believes the facts will support him should want those facts revealed. I do not know of any one who believes this who would not want the facts stated accurately and truthfully so that the accuracy of his statements would stand out and support his argument. It is my opinion that the only people who use this sort of argument are those who realize they do not have a case and that there is no evidence to support their case.

It is my hope that the people of this country will come to realize this. If hon. members opposite, for their own particular reasons, insist on taking the stand they do, probably they will soon feel the weight of public opinion and perhaps a little common sense will then appear and this measure can be stopped before irreparable harm is done to the country and to its defences.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, since this debate started it is safe to estimate that some two million words have been placed on the record covering unification. As a result we have heard considerable urging from hon. members on the government side of the house that we should terminate this discussion and get on with the business of the house. At one stage in the debate I would have agreed with that point of view. However, as the debate continues it is amazing to note the change of viewpoint of the Canadian people toward this important matter. Therefore I think it is only fitting that I, as the member for Queens-Lunenburg, an area which had a high rate of enlistment during the first and second world wars, state my views on the bill now before us.

I think it is only proper that I should establish my credentials first before I become too deeply involved in the subject matter of the debate. I was not a member of the committee on national defence but I followed quite closely the reports of the evidence given before that committee. I do not consider myself an expert on military affairs, having volunteered and served during the second world war in the Royal Canadian Air Force which, after all, is only one branch of the Canadian armed forces. My lack of information in respect of the other branches of the services, especially the navy, has been redressed greatly in recent months. One can readily understand the source of my information when I tell the house that in my riding there reside presently three admirals who recently retired from the armed forces.

Mr. Byrne: Presently raising cattle.

Mr. Crouse: There was an interjection by the hon. member for Kootenay East which I did not hear.

Mr. Byrne: Raising cattle.

Mr. Crouse: Some of them are raising cattle. Others are still deeply interested in matters pertaining to Canada's armed forces.

I point out to the Minister of National Defence that in Nova Scotia we are not called "Bluenosers" without just cause. Along the eastern seaboard where Canada meets the sea, Atlantic rollers surging toward the shore beat a rhythm which seems to make the blood tingle and calls forth hardy men to sail on the bosom of the deep. There is a love of the sea and its traditions among maritimers which can never be fully appreciated or understood by those who have never sailed upon the broad Atlantic or never have watched a sunset at sea or white water cresting mountainous waves. As a Nova Scotian I sometimes find myself getting homesick for the sight, sound, and smell of the sea. Only after I return to my home in Lunenburg is the balance restored. My remarks, therefore, concerning this bill will be general in nature and specific only in respect of Canada's navy and the effect of this bill upon the men who enlisted in and are devoted to this service.

We were first made aware of the plans of the government and the minister for unification when the white paper on defence was tabled in March, 1964. This loosely worded document stated:

> The objectives of Canadian defence policy, which cannot be dissociated from foreign policy, are to preserve the peace by supporting collective defence measures to deter military aggression; to support Canadian foreign policy including that arising out of our participation in international organizations, and to provide for the protection and surveillance of our territory, our air space and our coastal waters.

These, Mr. Chairman, are policies which I can support. We need collective measures for the maintenance of peace and security as embodied in the charter of the United Nations. We need collective defence as embodied in the North Atlantic Treaty. We need and must retain our partnership with the United States in the defence of North America, and we need national measures to discharge our responsibility for the security and protection of Canada.

At the beginning I was in favour of integration which I construed to mean the combining of the headquarters and the field commands of the three services, thus effecting a saving in defence dollars. To the thrifty, hard working, independent people in my riding this type of thinking made sense. They said that here at last we have one minister in this spendthrift government who knows the value of a dollar. Unfortunately their joy was short-lived, for it now has been admitted that the steps in the reorganization made possible under Bill C-243 will not lead to savings of any account. In fact, when one checks the blue book of estimates which has been tabled for 1967-68 one finds that the estimates for national defence have increased by some $115 million.

I said that originally I favoured integration. I have not changed my opinion. Very few people will oppose integration of the pay corps, the medical and dental corps, the chaplain service, the victualling depots, clothing, communication and transportation services. This certainly seems to be the most economical way to provide these services. However, I believe these changes can be achieved with the three services retaining their uniforms and ranks under specific commands.

Up to this point I believe the Minister of National Defence and I are in agreement, but our agreement ceases when he states that integration is only the first step toward establishing a single unified defence force for Canada. I believe that the minister's proposal to place Canada's armed forces in one green uniform will destroy morale. This is an intangible weapon whose force knows no boundaries in any fighting unit. According to all reports, morale is at its lowest ebb today in Canada's armed forces. This is due to the fact that many service personnel are deeply disturbed by the uncertainty which now exists in regard to a service career, and they are unwilling to accept reorganization as they now see it.

I said that morale is an intangible thing and I can cite many examples to prove it. During the second world war it was an easy matter for airmen to get into a first class row with army or navy personnel when they got together. Whether in a restaurant or at any other gathering all they had to do was start singing softly:

> Wings over the navy,
> Wings over the sea.
> We're the top of the service,
> The navy's cavalry.

They seldom got beyond that point before a good row was under way with either the army or navy personnel present. This indicates pride of service and uniform. These very people were the first to applaud when the going got tough and the fly-boys came over and gave them cover. At these times they worked together and fought as a unit.

I think the statement by Admiral Mountbatten, when he was asked to express his opinion about a single uniform and rank structure, is worthy of repeating. He said:

> In the British reorganization care has been taken to preserve esprit de corps and morale and those traditions which help to maintain this in the services and fighting units.
> It has been accepted that to achieve this the three services must retain their uniforms and ranks with an identifiable professional head of their service. The idea of a single uniform and rank structure was also rejected as undesirable and unnecessary.
> There was some talk of taking the uniform and ranks of one service and imposing this on the others but the idea of a man in say army uniform with an army title arriving at a foreign port in command of a warship was generally felt to be so ludicrous that it was not pursued.
> The general cut and colour of naval uniforms are internationally so well known that a sailor from any one country can readily be recognized as a sailor in any other country.
> Sailors the world over take great pride in this and so in their own services do soldiers and airmen. No compensating advantage could be seen in attempting to impose so unpopular a change.

These are the words of a great British admiral. Surely the minister cannot throw them lightly aside.

Coming closer to home, I should like to quote the words of a gallant rear admiral, now retired from the Canadian navy, on the matter of a single uniform for all three services. On July 8, 1966, Rear Admiral H. F. Pullen wrote to me as follows, and I quote only part of his letter:

> It is of the utmost importance that the officers and men in our navy be recognized as members of a naval force wherever they go in the world. The rumours, half-truths, etc., emanating from Mr. Hellyer's office, or from these anonymous spokesmen at national defence headquarters, that suggest the abolition of the present naval uniform and its replacement by some abomination in bottle green, are causing a very great deal of distress, misgiving and uncertainty. Of this I am well aware, and I can produce evidence if necessary.
> You and your colleagues will earn the undying gratitude of all of us who have served, and are serving Canada at sea, if you can defeat and destroy the evil designs of Mr. Hellyer and his team.

Those words are not very complimentary to the minister but they are the strong beliefs of a former admiral and I endorse them. I ask hon. members, can all these men be wrong and only one man, the defence minister, right?

I think it is significant that not one of the recently retired senior officers of our three forces has supported the program of unification which will come into effect if this bill is approved. I think it is also significant that everyone of any stature outside the services or the government, whose military opinion could command respect and who testified before the defence committee, has expressed criticism or reservations on the proposed reorganization of the defence establishment.

In all honesty we must ask ourselves who is advising the minister on the course he is presently pursuing. His critics have all been brushed aside, and at one time or another the minister has called them emotional, unreasonable, disloyal, destructive, obstructionists, politically-motivated or lacking in responsibility. I ask the minister if it would not be equally as fair to say of this large body of Canadians who hold views contrary to his own that they do so because of their knowledge, their experience, their convictions and their sincerity. Surely the testimony given before the defence committee by so many men of such high calibre, who have given such outstanding service in war and in peace, has a ring of truth about it which cannot be ignored by the minister and the government. In my opinion, if we follow through with this bill we will destroy the effectiveness of Canada's armed forces who are charged with the responsibility of protecting this nation in time of war.

Let us return to the white paper on defence of 1964. At the top of page 14 the minister stated:

> The major threat to North America at this time is from the air, and it is in the field of continental air defence that co-operation with the United States has assumed the largest proportions.
> The future of continental air defence, therefore, is obviously of great concern to Canada, both because of the sizeable resources devoted to it, and because of the question of nuclear warheads. While a downward trend in continental air defence forces seems likely, yet, short of total disarmament, one cannot foresee the day when Canada will not be directly involved in some form of air defence operations.

Those are the minister's words and I ask him, does he believe them? If so, when he was making such drastic cuts in the effective strength of our forces, which today number less than 104,000 men or 20,000 less than on March 31, 1963, why did he fire by the device of premature retirement 287 senior R.C.A.F. pilots? Granted, these men were all within three years of compulsory retirement age, but they included the most senior and capable men the R.C.A.F. had flying. What happened as a result? The air force was left short of senior instructors, pilot leaders and instrument check pilots. Our transportation command with its world wide commitments was severely hit by the minister's arbitrary action. Today there are barely enough pilots left to man the planes we have.

The minister may say: "So what? I made one blunder." This brings me back to my original question. Who is advising the minister? By dismissing these pilots he acted contrary to his own statement in the white paper regarding the importance of air defence. Surely the sensible thing to do would have been to approach these pilots on an individual basis and give them the opportunity to leave the service or stay on for an additional period, thus giving the nation the benefit of their extensive knowledge acquired through a lifetime of service. We are often told we cannot be wasteful of our resources without suffering the consequences. I believe this is equally true of our human resources. Yet this is exactly what the Minister of National Defence did when he prematurely dismissed these Royal Canadian Air Force pilots.

A similar situation with regard to morale and personnel has developed on the east coast in our navy. The great exodus of naval personnel from the service of this country does not seem to worry the minister. This may be due to the fact that in his subconscious mind he really believes that the major threat to North America is from the air and therefore we no longer need to attach any great importance to retaining a strong navy. However, this is not supported by known facts.

I believe it is safe to say that any future confrontation in which Canada may be involved will be with the communist-dominated countries controlled by the Soviet union. For this reason we have joined NATO and NORAD, and up to the present time we have made a military contribution to these organizations for the collective defence of Canada. The minister has stated that in the event of aggression against Canadian territory Canada would rely on the active support of the United States. He also stated that in Canada's national interest certain matters must come under our control.

In this regard he lists on page 13 of his white paper these items: the ability to maintain surveillance of Canadian territory, air space and territorial waters, the ability to deal with military incidents on Canadian territory, the ability to deal with incidents in ocean areas off the Canadian coasts, and the ability to contribute within the limit of our resources to the defence of Canadian air space. These are worthy objectives, Mr. Chairman, but in view of what is happening to our armed forces we cannot help but ask the question, can we live up to them?

Let us examine the statement by the minister, for example, that the major threat to North America at this time is from the air. Who is advising the minister? From whom is he getting this information? In the January-February issue of Aerospace-International published for the leaders of the free world by the United States Air Force Association, there is an authoritative analysis of the size, organization and equipment of the armies, navies and air forces of 49 major powers. This analysis covers the free world, the communist bloc and the non-aligned nations and is presented by special arrangement with London's Institute for Strategic Studies. I commend this magazine to the minister for his week end reading. It will give him a better idea of the military strengths and weak points of his friends and the enormous combined strength of his potential enemies.

It is not my intention to burden the committee this afternoon with all the figures of the combined strength of the communist bloc or of the potential power of the Soviet army or air force. However, I wish to place on the record a list of the surface ships and total seapower of the Soviets, which is awesome in its threat to the peace and security of the free world. I quote from the magazine in question. It lists under "Seapower" the following:

> The strength of the Soviet navy and naval air force is 465,000 men. In total tonnage, it is the second biggest navy in the world, and its main strength lies in the submarine fleet. An unusually high proportion of the fleet is kept in commission. There are indications that the naval air force and the missile bearing submarines have an increasingly important role in Soviet strategy.
> There are now some 350 conventionally powered and 50 nuclear powered submarines. (Nuclear submarine production appears to be at the rate of at least five a year.) About 15 of the nuclear and 25 of the conventional submarines can fire ballistic missiles and carry an average of three missiles each; 12 of the nuclear and 28 of the conventionally powered submarines are equipped with cruise missiles which have a range of between 300 and 500 miles; they are thought to carry an average of four missiles each. The remainder are training vessels or attack submarines equipped with torpedoes. The four submarine fleets are distributed approximately as follows: 75 in the Baltic fleet, 175 in the Arctic, 45 in the Black Sea, and about 100 in the Far East. The missile carrying submarines are mostly divided between the Arctic and Far East fleets.
> Seaborne missiles. It is now believed that the Soviets have successfully developed submerged firing of the Serb missile, which has been shown on Moscow parades. It is probably being gradually introduced into service, but its range may not be much greater than 650 miles.
> Tactical missiles. Some ships and submarines are known to be fitted with cruise missiles which are intended primarily for antiship use. However, these might also be used against shore targets and, in the case of submarines, would be fired from the surface and from fairly long range.
> Naval air force. There are no aircraft carriers in the Soviet navy. The land based naval air force comprises about 500 bombers and 350 other aircraft. Most of the bombers are based near the northwestern and Black Sea coasts of the Soviet Union.

Under the heading "Surface Ships" the article says:

> The surface ships of the Soviet navy consist of the following:
> 20 cruisers, of which one carries surface-to-air missiles.
> 105 destroyers, of which 25 carry surface-to-air or surface-to-surface missiles.
> 100 other ocean going escorts.
> 300 coastal escorts and submarine chasers.
> 350 fast patrol boats, many with short range surface-to-surface missiles.
> 300 minesweepers.
> 200 landing ships and landing craft.
> 1,050 other vessels.
> Some adapted trawlers are used for electronic intelligence.
> A proportion of the destroyers and smaller vessels may not be fully manned.
> The cruisers are of three different types.

Then it lists the cruisers and destroyers and their names. The article continues:

> Recent Soviet comment has indicated a renewed interest in amphibious forces. There is a small marine corps of perhaps 3,000 men, units of which are stationed with the Baltic, Black Sea, and Pacific fleets.

Against this threat—and in this magazine Canada's total forces are listed—we are shown as having a population of 20 million and total armed forces of 107,100 men. Our total navy strength is listed as 18,100 men, one light aircraft carrier, 23 destroyer escorts, six other escorts, three submarines, including one British under Canadian operational control, and two support ships, CS2-F2 Tracker aircraft and Sea King helicopters, the article says, are embarked in the aircraft carrier, and Sea King helicopters in some of the destroyers. Our naval reserves total is listed as about 2,500 men.

The Canadian people are asking, who is advising the minister? We have obligations to NATO and to NORAD and these obligations can only be fulfilled if our forces retain their own uniforms, their own individualities and their own traditions. We must be in a position to work in co-operation with our major allies, the Americans and the British, so that our armies, navies and air forces can work together in harmony. It is vitally important that we retain our navy and that we place greater emphasis on its over-all role in our national defence.

In view of the figures which I have placed on the record with regard to the strength of our potential enemy, I believe it is almost mandatory that we give deeper consideration to restoring our naval strength. An inconspicuous fishing trawler or a high-speed submarine with a mine-laying configuration could effectively seal Halifax harbour to all shipping for an indefinite period of time. There would be virtually nothing the Royal Navy could do about it at the present time because of the ludicrous mine warfare policies which have been adopted by this minister and the government. In my opinion, if the present attitude toward our navy is maintained by the government, prior to any obvious act of war a foreign naval power could stop almost completely the movement of every commercial or war vessel in or out of Canadian waters. With our ships bottled up in harbour, North American defence on our seacoast would have to be taken over by the American navy, which hopefully would not be faced with a similar problem.

In view of the Soviet military might which I have cited, it is evident to me, if not to the government, that Russia has not altered its objectives. The detente at present being experienced in Europe is indicative only of the fact that the Soviets have altered their timetable.

While I realize it may be unwise to consider defence spending as an essential component of economic activity, I would also point out to the minister that the economic results of defence spending cannot entirely be overlooked as a means of helping to restore the great economic imbalance that exists between the Atlantic provinces and the more prosperous parts of Canada.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I believe that we must reassess our military thinking, as well the stand taken by our external affairs department toward our position in NATO. In my opinion, a nation of 20 million people living in a country the size of Canada must depend upon the support of its allies in time of war for the collective defence of this country. In the course of next year Canada will be reviewing her military commitments under NATO, and common sense alone tells us that we should delay any major revisions of our defence forces at least until these revised undertakings become known. I hope the minister will follow this course in the best interests of all Canadians.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Chairman, Bill No. C-243 which has been before us for several weeks has obviously raised great interest among the Canadian people as a whole.

The government claims that we have spoken enough on that legislation and that we should now vote on it. But before doing so, I think that we, as members of the opposition, must ask ourselves certain questions. We must first ask ourselves whether we should let the government take its responsibilities and accept the judgment of the population for the errors which, in our opinion, are contained in this bill on unification.

We know that in a democracy, the official opposition is formed by the party having the greatest number of seats in the house of commons, and that that political party will be called upon eventually to replace the government in office. In fact, as a wise politician once said: When we are sitting in the opposition, we are headed for power but when we are in power, we are headed for the opposition. You might tell me that this is self-evident but if the minister fails to be more co-operative in this legislation he has introduced, I am convinced he will be co-operating more with the Canadian people, so that his government and his party will sit in opposition after the next election while we, on this side, will take over.

Mr. Chairman, if we are to pursue further the discussion of this most important legislation which will have grave consequences for the organization of our armed forces, it is because the members of the opposition in the last few days, have put certain questions to the minister and asked him to supply to the house the information required to understand the bill now under consideration. We must regretfully state that the minister has neglected, refused or deliberately avoided supplying to parliament, the representatives of the people, the necessary information to enable them to take a decision and to vote on this bill.

I compare a piece of legislation brought before the house to a case a lawyer has to plead before a court and, of course, when appearing before the court, it is necessary to prepare it properly in order to win. In the present case, namely the measure before the house, that is Bill No. C-243, I must say that the minister has failed to prepare his case, because if he did, he made a botch of it or he has been ill-informed about the object of the bill under study.

When a bill is first brought before the house, the onus of proof as to the aims of the bill lies with the minister of the crown, just as the burden of proof lies with the lawyer appearing before the court, who must submit all relevant information. Since the onus of proof lies with the petitioner, as with the minister who brings a piece of legislation before the house, we must know about all the elements likely to enlighten us as to the merits of this bill.

We often wonder whether the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) is really the author of the bill. He never said so very clearly. We do think that he was informed by his department officials but we would be interested to know who is really the author, who was the mind, the brain behind Bill No. C-243 and who built the structure now before us.

Hon. members opposite hold us responsible for the delay in passing the bill. Therefore, I take the liberty to make a suggestion to the Minister of National Defence, as well as members of the government. If they want this bill passed as soon as possible, they should tell the minister to give at once a clear answer to the important questions which we, on the opposite side, have asked him on several occasions, during this debate.

For instance, we have asked him this question: Why did 40 odd senior officers of the army, navy and air force say "no" to unification?

• (5:30 p.m.)

We had, of course, the privilege and opportunity to read the evidence of those officers when they appeared before the committee on national defence, but we would like to know why some 40 senior officers who had not yet reached the age of retirement have chosen to retire prematurely rather than to follow implicitly the views and ideas set forth by the Minister of National Defence on unification.

In one case at least, the minister has shown no patience with his senior officers, has not respected, in my opinion, their freedom of speech and has even contributed to their premature retirement.

I feel that some very important matters have been raised in the house concerning our commitments to NATO. We all know that our commitments to NATO are of a military nature, just as we know that the member states of NATO are going through a deep crisis at present. We are also aware that since the French government demanded that the military forces of NATO member states leave French territory, this organization has been undergoing a complete military overhaul, since it is first of all a defence organization against possible aggression by the other block.

Now, since we are members of this international organization, it would be a good thing to know whether the minister has consulted the military leaders of those other countries which adhere to NATO, in order to find out how this unified force which is being considered for Canada may serve efficiently within the framework of this international body.

Naturally, the ministers of the crown do not agree on this question. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) told the house in a long speech that the unification of the armed forces did not change in any way our undertakings with regard to NATO.

On the other hand, the minister also seemed to say in a speech that the unification of the armed forces concerned only the United Nations forces. I think that these two ministers of the crown, who hold very important portfolios, should agree on our undertakings with regard to NATO, so as to determine whether the unification of the armed forces will be prejudicial to these undertakings and whether we should instead assume other responsibilities, so that the unification of our armed forces may be adapted to the present NATO defence system for our mutual defence.

We have also commitments to NORAD; unless I am mistaken, the NORAD treaty was signed in 1963. That treaty provides for the joint defence of the territories of Canada and the United States respectively. We would therefore like to learn from the minister whether the unification of our armed forces involves a revision of our commitments to NORAD.

I believe that those questions are most important, because we cannot state, from a military point of view, that we might proceed alone; here on the North American continent, as far as territorial defence is concerned, we are bound by the NORAD treaty, and at the international level, we are a member country of NATO.

So the minister should tell us whether that aspect of the question was looked at and whether our commitments to NATO and NORAD will have to be re-evaluated in the light of this new proposed legislation, namely the unification of our armed forces.

Obviously the minister will have to prove, as I said at the start, that the unification of the armed forces will also be effective for our military men who will have to serve in NATO as well as in NORAD.

Recently I met a number of students, who are rather concerned about their commitments to the armed forces in the future. Mr. Chairman, we know that many students signed written commitments with the armed forces and these young men often have to do military service during the summer holidays, in order to fulfil their contract with the armed forces. I am being told that these young students have asked the military authorities long ago whether the unification of armed forces will affect their commitments with the military authorities. It would be high time for the minister to give us information on that matter, because students must, of course, work during their summer holidays and they must know immediately, before the end of the school year, if they can depend on the enlistment contracts they signed with the armed forces.

There are also, in that bill, some disturbing provisions, especially clause 6 which gives the military authorities, under the guise of unification, the power to decree compulsory transfers from one service to another, be it the navy, the air force or the army.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, such compulsory transfer from one of the three services implies a degree of conscription in our armed forces. Of course, when conscription is mentioned, it always hurts our friends opposite and ourselves, the Conservatives, because we know what it has done to us in the political field in the province of Quebec since 1917, because our Liberal friends have always blamed the Conservatives for conscription which was put into force in 1917 by a Union government, in spite of the fact that it was made up of Liberals and Conservatives. The fact remains, however, that we have carried, since 1919, in the province of Quebec that burden of conscription which was forced on us by an act of parliament, as everyone knows.

I feel that the clause which provides for compulsory transfer from one military service to another is some kind of camouflaged conscription and I also feel that, under that bill, the minister has the power to call young men into the armed forces when the number of men needed to meet the requirements of the armed forces falls below the minimum. The minister claims that he will need 100,000 men in uniform.

Now, I am divulging no secret in saying that, from the time we began talking about unification, enlistment of our young people in the armed forces has gone down considerably. And this is readily understandable, for those young people must leave everything to chance when they enlist. Some would rather keep their freedom, meaning that they want to be free to choose the service in which they will enlist. Some of those young people would rather be sailors, while others would prefer to become airmen or yet soldiers. Now, of course, under clause 6, military authorities will be empowered to transfer recruits from one service to the other without even getting their previous consent. In my opinion, this power provided for in clause 6 is tantamount to conscription, a type of slavery which our young people fear. They want to keep their freedom. In enlisting, they want to be free to serve either in the navy, in the air force or in the army.

In the very beginning, when the minister brought down his white paper on national defence, here was some wave of sympathy. Admittedly, our population realizes that our governments are allocating too much money to national defence. The white paper, which the minister had presented, and his subsequent statement suggested that it was possible to save money for the taxpayers through unification of the armed forces and this, I suggest, was a very good asset for the Minister of National Defence.

But when the taxpayers studied the estimates for the coming fiscal year, they noticed that the estimates for national defence had gone up by $115 million. They wonder how the minister can possibly claim that he can save public funds through passing of the bill on the unification of the armed forces.

Mr. Chairman, considering that it will cost several million dollars in taxpayer's money to change the uniform, that is to give the same uniform to the three forces, we wonder how in the white paper and his speeches in the house and elsewhere, the minister could justifiably claim that passage of the unification bill would spare Canadian taxpayers considerable expense.

I say it again: this year, the budget exceeds that of last year by $115 million. And yet there are other problems far more pressing than just changing the uniform of our soldiers. We had obvious proof thereof this afternoon when an emergency debate was requested in order to help the farmers of eastern Quebec. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) refuses to give the farmers a minimum of $5.10, which would represent an outlay of some $30 million, while on the other hand $115 million more will be willingly spent on our armed forces during the coming fiscal year.

I wonder whether the present government has any common sense. This is not demagogy, it is irrefutable fact. Let the member who wants to interrupt me look up the estimates and he will see that the minister asks for $115 million more this year. Let him look then in the direction of our farmers: he will see that they need a higher income to make ends meet. And then we are told that the government is sensible.

Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member wishes to ask me a question, let him rise.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question. What did the government of which the hon. member was a member do for the farmers between 1958 and 1962?

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): The Conservative government did more for the farmers than the present government ever did. I should add that the party that was in power at the time at least listened to the complaints of the farmer. In fact, they were not arrogant toward the farmers as the present government is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Chairman, if the minister wants us to vote at the earliest possible time, he should first supply us with the information we have been asking for since the inception of this debate.

We have asked questions because we need the information. We are here to represent a certain area of the population and we have a right to all information in order to know just what we are voting on.

The minister also—

Mr. Béchard: Just one more question, Mr. Chairman, and not an embarrassing one this time.

Could the hon. member tell us how many hundred of letters he has received from his electors concerning the debate now going on?

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): All that my constituents tell me when I visit my riding is how can the government be sincere when it claims that unification of the armed forces will result in savings for the taxpayers, when in the present budget the appropriations for defence purposes will increase by $115 million. Therefore, I am wondering about the government's sincerity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): It has also been suggested that morale was low in the Canadian armed forces. I am quite sure that the minister has kept information from the people involved with that unification. People do not know exactly where they are heading with unification and I can prove it. I met recently a young serviceman and I asked him what he thought about the unification of the armed forces. He answered: Sir, I am not too familiar with the subject, but all I know is that, in my case, perhaps it makes sense. I asked him why. He replied: We shall be on an equal footing with the seamen and the airmen —he was in the army. I then asked him to explain. He said: We had to take part in a march with airmen recently, and I was most surprised to find that since unification has been mentioned, we are given the same lunch as airmen. I asked him why. He told me: In the past, when airmen made such marches, they were allowed to bring bananas in their lunch box; now, since they began telling us about unification, they have been trying to treat us better, and that time soldiers also had bananas in their lunch box.

That goes to show that the minister has not given proper information for the military to understand the aim of his bill on the unification of the armed forces.

Mr. Chairman, I should also like to know whether this unification bill will give French Canadian members of the navy, the air force and the army the same promotion opportunities as those enjoyed by their English speaking colleagues. You know that in our various services, French Canadians have received somewhat less than preferential treatment with regard to promotions. Once in a while one of them gets a promotion.

However, in the past, French Canadian people, I think, have fulfilled their duty when the freedom of our territory and our citizens had to be protected. They have never been reluctant to perform their duty and to assume their responsibilities in this field.

In this bill on the unification of our armed forces, French Canadians who wish to join our Canadian forces should be assured they will have equal opportunities of success and promotion as their English speaking colleagues.

Mr. Chairman, those are the remarks I wanted to make during this debate. If the Minister of National Defence refuses to give us the information we have asked him for for a long time, I think that the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson), who is the leader of the nation, will have to come and tell the house what he thinks of this bill on the unification of our armed forces—if the minister stubbornly refuses to give us the necessary information.

I strongly urge the Prime Minister to clear up any misunderstanding within his cabinet with regard to the unification of our armed forces—he will have to tell the Canadian people what is meant according to him in this bill and if this bill, as claimed by the minister, will really be in the interest of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to say that I believe there is unanimous consent to suspend the sitting until eight o'clock for a dinner hour. Since there are only a few minutes left before six I suggest we might rise now so as not to interrupt the next speaker.

The Chairman: Order. I should point out to the committee that there is already an order of the house before the committee to suspend its sitting from seven till eight. If it is the wish of the committee to do otherwise, this wish would have to be expressed with the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Leboe: I think there is unanimous consent in the committee to rise at this time.

Progress reported.

Mr. Hellyer: I move that this house adjourn until eight o'clock, to resume its business at that time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Should the house wish to change the order of Thursday, April 6, unanimous consent will be required. Does the house give unanimous consent to suspending the sitting from now until eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before adjourning I shall announce the proceedings on tonight's adjournment motion.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Schreyer), Agriculture—inquiry as to basis for fluid milk subsidy; the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), Agriculture—inquiry as to new dairy policy; the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), Transport—inquiry as to grade crossings policy.

Does the house agree to resume the business interrupted a few moments ago?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Pursuant to the agreement just reached the sitting of the committee is suspended until eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock clause 2 was being considered.

Mr. Bower: Mr. Chairman, I have had every intention of speaking on this most important piece of legislation since the moment of its introduction because on the validity of its proposals our very existence as a country may depend, and because it will govern the way that expenditures of a very large segment of our national budget are to be made. We must be right in the legislative road that we take on this matter.

Sir, although not a member of the standing committee on defence, I have, however, read the testimony of the witnesses who appeared before that body, and I have followed the speeches on Bill C-243 in the house and in Hansard, through its various stages to the present. I can assure you right away, Mr. Chairman, that I do not propose to participate now on the basis of an analysis of the testimony of the expert military witnesses before the standing committee on defence which, as might be expected, was conflicting, although on balance in my opinion the concept of unification was then definitely negated. Rather, it is what has not been said that disturbs me greatest—this along with what would appear to me to be contradictions and violations of basic principles; the attitude of the government that parliament must swallow this whole bill on faith, and be damned quick about it. This is what forces me to my feet.

The Minister of National Defence stated last Tuesday, in what I took to be his peroration, that there were witnesses available favouring unification who were not called. Why not? Why the unseemly haste in getting the bill back to the house and securing parliament's approval of a process or policy admittedly calculated to take years to implement fully? Surely a week or a month more on a matter so vital, involving the expenditure of so many billions of dollars, and perhaps an irrevocable commitment, merits no short changing in the investigation of its validity. That statement of the minister in itself casts shadows of doubt. It smacks of the salesman of the gold brick or the Brooklyn bridge, with his admonition to "hurry, hurry, hurry, or you'll miss the opportunity of a lifetime." There is an odour here of super high-pressure salesmanship that shakes one's confidence in the proposition.

A great deal of the debate, it seems to me, has been on points peripheral to the basic issue. While not discounting, for instance, a weight to tradition, I cannot get worked into a frenzy as to whether uniforms are baby pink, green, blue, yellow or purple, and above all on the insistence that a single uniform is going to work miracles of efficiency and economy.

What is important in the unification issue is that basically we are dealing with a system of management and organization. That system should be calculated to provide an optimum defence posture for our country, taking due note, as I am sure does the groaning Canadian taxpayer, that the defence department will be laying out about 20 cents of every dollar of the estimates recently tabled in the house.

I cannot and I do not believe the people of Canada are persuaded that it is advisable to jump into something so fraught with awful consequences, just on slogans and assurances that because it is good, ergo it is good. Dr. O'Leary runs about extolling the use of L.S.D.—that it is just dandy; it is the latest. I wonder whether the public goes along with the high priest of hallucinations on that basis.

The minister's semantic juggling of integration and unification, with his invocation of cycles, suggests that perhaps he has in mind a bicycle, a vehicle used by the Bersaglieri of Italy in the first world war 50 years ago—very old hat indeed. But seriously, sir, I was disturbed by the minister's verbal acrobatics and analogy last Tuesday, likening integration and unification to the cycle of conception and childbirth. This left me aghast, for death is part of that cycle and that, sir, is disintegration.

This brief preface leads me to the fundamental point I wish to make and to which I referred in my opening remarks. In Bill C-243 we are dealing essentially with a management and organization problem, the correct solution of which is vital. While there seems to be near unanimity in respect of the benefits to be derived from integration in the defence department, I would call the attention of the committee and the country to the fact that there are places where effective and modern managerial and organizational procedures are of the essence. We have for example oil companies which are fully integrated on the multi-functional bases of exploration, producing, refining, transportation and distribution activities. The preservation of the integrity of these functional components is considered a must by men who are neither Liberals, Conservatives, Socialists, Social Crediters, nor any other political or ideological category, but who are swayed by and for their judgments on the best possible management of an entity—men who are every day seeking new things and who are charged with the responsibility to spend—and do spend—millions and millions of dollars on basic research. I am not speaking of old reactionary men when I speak of these men who have arrived at the conclusion that the integrity of the functional activity must be preserved in relation to the multibased activity.

To superimpose, cycle in, or otherwise clutter up the preservation of that integrity would be to violate the very rudiments of good management and organization. It would invite bankruptcy and the disappearance of the company as an entity. From this homely but practical analogy I submit that it is not in the interest of good management and organization recklessly to rush into, or go into at all, a process of making a hash of sea, air and land functions, any more than it would be to make a stew of geologists, drillers, refiners, pipeliners and distributors.

No, Mr. Chairman; hashed or stewed up, defence operations are not what the citizens and taxpayers of our country deserve.

Neither do I think that this is what the members of this house would wish to hand out to them. We of the official opposition certainly have made it abundantly clear that we do not wish to be so tainted. Mr. Chairman, what the Canadian people want and deserve is $1,700 million worth of defence and not $1,700 million worth of Hungarian goulash.

In trying to reduce this complex debate to graspable size, I might say I get the feeling of being at a town meeting where the mayor proposes doing something which is generally agreed to be logical and desirable, but then extends the proposal to a point where it becomes something he does not define, to take care of doing something he does not specify, with the evolving proposal in its entirety running through 20 per cent of the town's budget.

I submit there is not one ratepayer group in this country of ours which, if they saw it in this light, would swallow the proposition of unification. Since the bill was first introduced in the house it has become abundantly clear that to put it mildly, the minister does not have the enthusiastic support of his colleagues in the cabinet. Obviously they feel he has painted himself into a corner, and for some reason, perhaps self-preservation, they are letting him fight his own way out of this self-created situation. The minister in the last few days has been accused of being dictatorial and like Napoleon. Perhaps he is more like a Napoleon standing on the burning deck.

If one looks behind the sort of avuncular facade as reflected in the speech of the minister of external affairs, it appears that he did suggest some diversionary feints on peace keeping and peace restoring. He did make a very good case for the preservation and differentiation of the functional activities of the armed forces. This is precisely the point I am making, and it is the antithesis of unification.

The Minister of Transport appealed to the members as civilians to judge this bill on its merits and soundness of objective. The objective of the bill—and I presume the minister would agree with me—is to achieve maximum effectiveness of defence for a minimum of outlay. However, if the bill involves procedures which violate the practices followed by the management of large and complex organizations, then I submit that, as it has been concocted, it fails on its merits.

The idea of unification has been kicking around the defence departments of the world for many years, so it is not a new idea. That fact pulls the rug from under the main support which the government benches have relied upon in pressing this legislation. Let the government withdraw the bill, go back and do its homework and then come forward with a new bill during the next session which will not strain the credulity of a practical minded public. I for one cannot support Bill C-243 which embodies a basicly wrong approach to obtaining a universally desired end.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, this debate seems to have become nothing more than an attack on personality. Much of what has been said in the past two weeks has been about individuals rather than about the subject matter of the bill. Even during the defence committee hearings some of us were charged with the fact that we did not have military experience and for that reason should not be heard. Some doubt was cast as to whether or not we were eligible for committee membership itself.

In defence of my position I said at that time that I had offered my services, and was turned down. I remained active in an industry which concerned itself almost exclusively with the production of war materiel. As a result, I believe my health suffered even more than the health of most of the members of that committee. I certainly do not apologize for taking part in this debate. I am sure that the day will come when all the members of this house can say with pride they have no military wartime service. We hope war is a thing of the past and that wartime service will not be used in this chamber as a red herring.

Let me refer momentarily to a speech made by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, which was unworthy of him and certainly unworthy of his constituents. I am sure they must have cringed with embarrassment, if they were unfortunate enough to have watched that television report which originated in Winnipeg. It was of very low quality and I am sure the hon. member's constituents will deal with him in an appropriate manner at the next general election.

Mr. Churchill: When are you going to get away from personalities?

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member for Bow River blew in yesterday for one of his one day stands. During the committee hearings that hon. member sought to discredit my capability. Certainly that would not be difficult. I am not an eminent lawyer like the hon.

member. I am not a graduate of the University of Saskatchewan. I graduated cum laude from the school of hard knocks. I do not pretend to be a lawyer who might qualify as a prosecutor or attorney for defence.

The hon. member for Bow River unwittingly put his finger on one of the most important pieces of evidence I wish to refer to this evening, and that is the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller. That gentleman appeared before the committee in opposition to Bill C-243 without having taken the trouble to read its contents. Surely that was an affront to the committee and its members. Surely he should not have taken that attitude in giving evidence in opposition to a measure which admittedly he had not taken the trouble to read, though it had been given first reading five months earlier. For this very reason I asked a series of questions of Air Chief Marshal Miller, because I wanted to bring this fact to the attention of the committee. I would have thought that even an unperceptive juryman would have seen what I was endeavouring to do, but obviously the hon. member for Bow River did not. I asked the following questions:

• (8:30 p.m.)

Do you consider that the prospects of unification held out to the public has been detrimental to naval or other recruitment, thus far?

Whether this is so is another question. An article appeared in the Toronto Telegram of March 25, 1967, which indicated that recruiting is reaching a relatively high level and that for two months the recruitment was 2,196; that there were 556 in the—

An hon. Member: How many people went out in that period?

Mr. Byrne: —navy, 752 in the army and 888 in the R.C.A.F. In reply to my question Air Chief Marshal Miller said:

I would be giving a "Blue Sea" opinion on that that I could not back up. I think it has, but there are so many factors involved in what persuades anybody to join the navy, that for me to say that this is a factor or not, is just a matter of opinion and I could not make that.

So that in his opinion there are a number of factors that influence recruitment, but the question of unification was no more important than the others. I then asked:

Then, do you believe that the implementation of Bill C-243 would result in significant demoralization of the various forces?

The hon. member for Bow River seemed to think that "demoralization" was not a proper word; at least, he was quite exercised about it. I took the trouble to look up the meaning of "demoralization", and I found that to demoralize is to weaken the morale, to destroy normal function, to throw into disorder. I wanted to establish whether Air Chief Marshal Miller was deeply concerned with the question of morale in the armed forces. His reply to my question was:

If rushed, I would think so.

That answer obviously means that he differs in the matter of timing; unification may be all right a year or two from now, but it is not all right at the moment. Then I asked Air Chief Marshal Miller this question:

You said at the outset—

Meaning the beginning of the hearing.

—I believe it was in answering Mr. Forrestall—

Actually, it was in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Vancouver East.

—that you have not had time to take a look at the bill? Do you know when this bill was given first reading?

This may go down in history as one of the most ludicrous pieces of cross-examination, as was suggested by the hon. member for Bow River; but I want to point out again that the purpose of the questioning was not to establish that unification had a demoralizing effect, but rather that the witness who appeared before the committee and expressed such great concern about unification had not taken the trouble to read the bill. We were in fact dealing with clause 2 of the bill which has the effect of eliminating sections 15 to 18 of the National Defence Act. Of course sections 15 to 18 of the National Defence Act deal with the structure of the forces. Therefore, in effect Air Chief Marshal Miller was appearing before the committee in opposition to the bill and was speaking on the specific clause dealing with unification, yet he had not taken the trouble to read the bill.

As further evidence that Air Chief Marshal Miller had not read the bill, and did not know of its contents, I wish to quote further from the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee hearing of March 20, 1967, page 2295.

An hon. Member: He would have been wiser if he had read the bill.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member for Hamilton West asked this question:

What are you unhappy about, sir? Can you specify what aspects you are unhappy about?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: Unification is just a word and it has come to be associated with the uniform. It has come to be associated with a single uniform, but it is more than that—a lot more than a single uniform.

Are the people of the forces going to be compelled to switch from their present uniforms to this new uniform and, if so, when? Under what conditions are they going to amalgamate the people in the various trades in the various services? Are there going to be strictures on staying in one force or are the people going to be compelled to go into employment in what used to be the old force? I do not know.

Obviously he did not know because he had not read the bill, Clause 7 of which provides:

Except in an emergency, no officer or man who was a member of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army or the Royal Canadian Air Force immediately prior to the coming into force of this part shall, without his consent, be required to perform any duty in the Canadian forces that he could not have been required to perform as a member of such service.

Air Chief Marshal Miller showed some concern, as did members of the committee, that units and elements of the forces were to be eliminated. Clause 5 (2) of the bill puts everyone straight in this regard. It provides:

The units and other elements of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force existing at the coming into force of this part shall, subject to the provisions of the National Defence Act, continue to be the units and elements of the Canadian forces.

• (8:40 p.m.)

We have heard much about the many witnesses who appeared before the committee and spoke in opposition to the bill. It has been said that most of the witnesses who appeared before the committee were in opposition to the bill. I think this can be very easily understood. If one goes back to the proceedings of the committee he can find that on three occasions at least the steering committee recommended for adoption by the committee that no more witnesses be heard. However, upon the insistence of those who were opposed to the bill that more witnesses be heard, there was a disposition on the part of the chairman, whom I want to congratulate for his very fair and understanding conduct of the committee, to go back to the steering committee and return with the proposal that another witness chosen by those opposing the bill be heard. I believe this happened on three occasions at least. Those of us who are not opposed to the bill did not insist on further witnesses, although many could have been called and, as everyone knows, pressure was put upon us to report to the house before the Easter recess.

[Mr. Byrne.]

Surely if the witnesses who were in opposition to the bill were credible witnesses—and we do not doubt their credibility—then the serving officers who spoke in support of unification must not be doubted either. Obviously the serving officers and the witnesses who appeared in support of unification are as convinced as those who are opposed that the matter of unification is important and that it should be dealt with at this time. So in the words of General Allard, let us get on with it.

While the hon. member for Bow River and other members of the opposition feel that the questioning in the committee did not elicit substantial information to assist them, I am sure that at least one member of the opposition was quite satisfied with the replies he received from General Allard. I should like to refer for a moment to the proceedings of the committee meeting of March 2, 1967 at which time the hon. member for Vegreville was questioning the general. The members of the opposition had expressed considerable concern about the loss of identity in the services and, following a series of questions, the hon. member for Vegreville said:

You remarked, I believe it was today sometime, that you had considered placing an air force officer in charge of a brigade and you had also considered placing a navy officer in charge of a brigade.

General Allard: Not in charge of a brigade in the case of the navy officer, but in the case of the air force officer, yes. I considered this because it became very important for one role. If you have an air mobile group, there is no reason why it should not be commanded by an airman, but unfortunately the difficulty at the moment is that our staff duties are so different and the methods of employment are so different that he would have had some difficulties had he been deployed in some exercise, and he would have had difficulties in co-ordinating some part.

Further on General Allard went on to say:

I think he would have done a good job just the same, but this only highlights the point that we have a great number of officers in the air force today who could have a much broader employment field than they have now. The fact that they are restricted after a certain rank in the air force means they cannot benefit by the possibilities and, in fact, some of them if they were trained are excellent people—good fighters, excellent people—who could do a magnificent job, but this is impossible at the moment. It is impossible, but I considered this very carefully and discussed it with the man concerned. He would have been prepared to accept it, but I think it would have been just a wee bit premature for him, so we think we should take a younger officer, train him through our staff college system and then bring him along; give him a staff job somewhere, because there is such a requirement. The blending of the two is getting to be so great that there is an absolute requirement for it. I see no reason on earth why, in a few years time, these people should not be exchangeable.

I suppose the word meant here is "interchangeable." The hon. member for Vegreville went on with his questioning and, following a reply by General Allard, he said this:

That is more comforting than the information we have been able to get so far.

After further questioning the hon. member for Vegreville again said:

I am very happy to have been able to have this information from you, general, and it is definitely something we have not had before. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

He also said, I believe, that he had been an officer for some 51 years and that his fears had been allayed by the evidence which had been given by General Allard.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Will the hon. member permit a question? Just now he referred to the evidence given by General Allard in answer to questions asked by the hon. member for Vegreville. Where in the evidence is there any indication that the hon. member for Vegreville, who had not heard the evidence before, approved it?

Mr. Byrne: I should think the words of the hon. member for Vegreville speak for themselves.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Would the hon. member read the words of approval? The words "thank you" need not necessarily be taken as approval.

Mr. Byrne: If the hon. member wishes to have a private conversation with the hon. member for Vegreville, I will have no objection.

It has been said that newspapers across the country are rising to the challenge, that they are suddenly becoming aware of the great danger that is facing the Canadian people and encouraging the opposition to oppose this measure. However, I am not one given to quoting editorials. As a matter of fact I consider it a breach of the rules of the house to do so, and I do not intend to quote them. I am sure hon. members have noted within the last several weeks, however, that most of the reputable newspapers across Canada are saying it is time that this debate was concluded, and that the majority in the house be given an opportunity to make a decision.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit a question at this point? It is a very simple question with regard to concluding the debate. Can he explain to me why the government today would not allow this house to get on with other matters on the order paper rather than provide an opportunity for the hon. member to prolong this debate? We earnestly asked for a change in the business so we could do something else that is on the order paper. Why was the request not granted?

Mr. Byrne: Those who have said more than should have been said or than could justifiably have been said, now seem anxious to deny members on the government side an opportunity to speak. Of course this is another form of closure, in reverse. I am not too well aware of the rules of the house. I used to make a very concerted study of the rules, but I found that the opposition abrogated them so often that I lost interest. I just go forward now from day to day, since the opposition seems to make the rules from day to day. The question raised by the hon. member is one he should discuss with the house leader. If they come to an agreement that we should take a vote on this question tonight I will be happy to sit down at this moment. If debate is to continue, as it so obviously did this afternoon, I feel I should say a few words even if only in defence of myself if not in defence of the minister and his measure.

I regret very much having had to refer to the hon. member for Bow River at a time when he was not in the House. However, it is difficult to find a time when he is here. It has been said that we have been asked to accept this bill holus-bolus, that the minister is immutable and will not accept amendments. Surely if members take the time to look at the reprinted bill, as opposed to the bill which was given first reading on November 4, 1966, they will find a large number of amendments have been made to it. Surely it is rather too early to say that the minister will not accept amendments, that he is completely immutable while we are still discussing clause 2 of the bill. I believe therefore that this argument, if I may use an expression, has been shot down in flames.

Certainly there has been sufficient debate on this subject for one to say that it has been dealt with adequately. The standing committee on defence heard 41 witnesses. The testimony covered a total of approximately 2,000 pages; the total number of words spoken, about one million; total number of questions asked, 5,000; total number of sessions, 55; total number of weeks of hearings, six.

Then, we have further statistics here covering the discussions of defence in the house, and this includes the question and answer period, supply, interim supply, estimates in both special and standing committees, and the white paper on defence from March, 1964 to April, 1967, inclusive. We find the total number of words spoken amounted to over 3,100,000; the total number of questions raised, approximately 11,040—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): How many answers?

Mr. Byrne: There were an equal number of answers, of course.

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: Does the hon. member wish to continue? Does he have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Byrne: We have obviously slipped away from the very strong feelings against one another, so I may say I deeply appreciate this consideration.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I should like to draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that this courtesy has always been available to hon. members on the other side, but not to members on this side.

Mr. Pilon: That is not true.

Mr. Byrne: I expected to hear from the hon. member for Cape Breton South. He never fails to get into a debate, one way or the other. The bill was returned to the house to be dealt with in committee of the whole. Up to April 17, there were 101 members who had participated in the debate. The number of words spoken amounted to 359,275. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has spoken four times; the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, five times; the hon. member for Halifax, four times; the hon. member for Edmonton West, three times; the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek—my home area—three times; the hon. member for Cape Breton South, three times.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I rise now on a point of order.

Mr. Byrne: Adequate time, therefore, has been given for discussion of this bill.

[Mr. Byrne.]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I should like to draw to the attention of the hon. member and the committee that I have spoken three times because, through the courtesy of hon. members on this side, members on that side were allowed extended time. Although I spoke three times I had less time for debate than the hon. members on that side who have been given the privilege of extended time. I spoke three times simply because I was refused the extra time allotted to the Liberals.

Mr. Byrne: It is hardly a point of order for the hon. member to point out that he had less to say than hon. members on this side of the house.

Mr. Kindt: I see the crocodile smiles on the faces of members in the second row on the government side. I hope they will laugh now, and also after I have completed my remarks. Ever since I had the opportunity of seeing Bill No. C-243 and to read it carefully and quietly, to myself, it has been my intention to speak on the bill. I feel that when $1.7 billion is involved, when the efficiency of our fighting forces is involved, any member in this house representing the taxpayers of this country should find sufficient time to speak on the bill and try to protect the interests of the people of Canada who are paying the money.

I was greatly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay East. I did not interrupt him but remained quietly in my seat. I hope he will supply copies of his speech to his constituents. If he does, Mr. Chairman, I am certain that he will not be back in this house again.

I have nothing personal against my colleague who is in a constituency to the west of mine. We have worked together on many issues. Whenever a crucial matter arises affecting coal shipments to Japan—in the initiation of which I played some part a number of years ago—my hon. friend from Kootenay East seems to grab all the publicity; he is good at that. With the present Liberal government in office I have a hard time to get my proper share of the credit for coal shipments to Japan.

Be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member commenced his speech by stating that he was not going to deal in personalities. Yet his speech dealt in personalities from start to finish. First of all he picked on the member for Edmonton-Strathcona. He seemed to find nothing good to say about any hon. member who had spoken in committee against the policies of the minister, or against unification. He said they were all off beam and that he would set the record straight.

I have a lot of admiration for the witnesses who came before the defence committee to give evidence, Mr. Chairman. I have had the privilege of studying much of the evidence given, having read the reports of the standing committee so as to inform myself on this question. I attended meetings of the committee and was present when Air Chief Marshal Miller gave his evidence. I was especially disturbed by the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay East about Air Chief Marshal Miller, who gave evidence that was acknowledged by all who heard him to be sound.

I should like to refer to an article in the Globe and Mail for Wednesday, March 22, which quotes some of the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller, and which is as follows:

> Air Chief Marshal Miller told the committee that unification, while it might well be the end result of integration would not at present be timely, that more time was needed for the orderly development of the integration process. "I felt that a lot of careful planning was necessary and probably time to educate people was required before the next step of unification". Implementation of the bill could seriously demoralize the forces if it were rushed, the loss of personnel so far had been bad for the forces—

Then he closed by saying that some key men have left.

The hon. member for Kootenay East seemed to throw cold water on the testimony of this witness, so I should like to read what Charles Lynch had to say about it. Charles Lynch characterized him as a most impressive witness. According to his article in the Ottawa Citizen for Wednesday, March 22:

> Of all the witnesses to oppose the armed forces unification bill, Air Chief Marshal Miller is by far the most impressive. His credentials render unthinkable any attack on his motives—

I should like the hon. member for Kootenay East to reconsider his remarks in light of the statement of one who takes an unbiased position, Charles Lynch. According to Charles Lynch:

> His credentials render unthinkable any attack on his motives, and render difficult any reflections on his professional judgment by either Mr. Hellyer or members of his current military entourage.

Later in his article Charles Lynch goes on to say:

> Despite the outward loyalty of the current team of top officers to Mr. Hellyer and his program, and despite the call of the current defence chief, General Jean Victor Allard, for speedy unification, there can be no doubt that there are grave misgivings inside national defence headquarters, and beyond that in the various services and commands.
> There is anguish right at the top of the military structure about the rigid positions that have been assumed, creating the impression, as set out in the bill, that the land, sea and air arms of the forces are going to be obliterated.
> The simplest solution, and the one that most likely would have been adopted had rigor mortis not set in as stiffly as it has, would be to amend the bill in a way that would preserve the army, navy and air force identities within the proposed unified structure.

With the material I have before me, Mr. Chairman, I have tried to nail to the cross the statements made by the hon. member for Kootenay East in his attempt to discredit Air Chief Marshal Miller, whose testimony was above reproach. He had no motives other than to speak the truth. I may tell the minister and also the hon. member for Kootenay East that my reading of the testimony given by people who were unbiased has convinced me that they, in turn, were speaking from the depths of their own consciences and in the best interests of the people of Canada.

There are others, including the minister, who have had more military experience than I, or more association with military forces. Nevertheless let me tell the minister, in justification of my position, that once I was a corporal. Indeed I became a sergeant and was promoted to lieutenant. I was with the 2nd A.M.R.—Alberta Mounted Rifles—as well as in the Canadian reserve for a couple of years. I was also with the Canadian Officers Training Corps for three or four years. All in all I had an opportunity to learn something, though grant you not too much, about military life. I have the feeling that because of their training in the army and the type of work they are expected to perform in the defence of Canada, those in the army are not suited to be members subject to transfer to the navy or air force, especially, against their wishes.

Also, personnel enlisting will not be able to join the air force, army or navy, which at present are separate services with a long tradition of growth over the years. All countries have separate services, therefore there must be some merit to their separate existence. When we join hands working with the forces of other countries, we fit in with their patterns of working. Other countries have separate forces. The minister intends to obliterate our three separate forces and bring in their stead one unified force. The effects of this must be looked at objectively.

The hon. member for Kootenay East praised the work of the committee. I can understand that; he was one of its members. Nevertheless there was so much bias shown in that committee—and this applies to nine out of ten committees of this house and the work they turn out—that, for the people of Canada, its work was almost useless. This parliament will never function properly until we have committees before which witnesses can testify properly and which bring in reports not biased politically.

Take as an example the committee on Indian affairs and northern development. All the minister had to do was say something ought to happen, pull his strings, and the Liberal members would support him. That sort of thing has happened again and again in our committees. The hon. member for Kootenay East may laugh, but he knows what I say is absolutely true. If parliament is to function properly, if we are to present before it important legislation, some means must be found to reflect in this house the feelings of our people. As matters now stand too much political bias enters parliament's deliberations.

I now turn briefly to other matters. I have already talked about the evidence concerning unification. That evidence shows that unification is not a good thing. By expunging the biased statements of the minister, the hon. member for Kootenay East and others like him, and reading the evidence of persons such as Air Chief Marshal Miller who were in the position to speak their minds, and did so, one will find that the weight of evidence goes against the minister. Unification of the armed forces is shown to be undesirable.

When the integration bill was introduced I said nothing against it, believing as an economist that certain benefits would flow from it. This is not so with unification, which is vastly different. It has taken us a long time to fathom what was in the minister's mind when he spoke of unification.

I believe firmly that the navy, the army and air force ought to be separate. All countries of the world have three fighting forces. So far, maintaining three separate forces has been found to be the most effective method of maintaining military strength. This minister, unlike defence ministers of other countries, is tampering with the defence forces of Canada. He wishes to obliterate the navy, army and air force by merging them into one hill of beans, with all personnel wearing the same type of uniform. By so doing the minister will destroy service traditions.

In former years people volunteered for the navy, army or air force because they liked the tradition of the service they were about to join. During the first world war I tried to join the 137th battalion from Calgary, but could not because I was not of age. The record of that battalion had attracted me, as it had attracted others. The same thing is true about the air force and navy. Some are attracted by their traditions, and join. If those traditions are lost, buried or obliterated, as the minister intends, then an irreparable injustice will have been done to the fighting forces of this country.

In closing, let me say to the minister that he should have conducted himself as the Minister of Transport conducted himself during the debate on the transportation bill. The Minister of National Defence ought to have kept an open mind and listened to the views of different people. Instead of that his mind has been closed. He has not yielded on one point. Personally, I think this bill ought to be sent back to the committee for amendment. No bill entailing the far reaching consequences of this one ought to be passed in its present form. It ought to be amended to preserve for the time being at any rate the army, navy and air force to protect the $1.7 billion our taxpayers are paying.

Unless the minister is prepared to make concessions by adhering to the will of the people of this country, he has no alternative but to resign.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I have not been a member of the defence committee. I have not had the opportunity and privilege of hearing all evidence presented to that committee, nor has it been possible for me to read it all. There are various reasons for this, the main one being that as a fairly active member of the finance, trade and economic affairs committee which was considering the Bank Act over many months, it was impossible for me to absorb everything that went on in the defence committee. But despite my lack of technical study and knowledge concerning Bill C-243 I could not help over the last several weeks coming to certain conclusions.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I was in my constituency last week end, and on that occasion and previously had many conversations which indicated to me that the people are worried. They are inclined to feel that the minister has gone too far too fast.

Originally when this debate commenced I had not expected to speak. I thought I would leave the speaking to those members with technical knowledge or experience, which to me would seem to be required if one were to make a worth-while contribution. But I now feel I should enter the debate and make my views known in the House of Commons, and I would point out this is the first time for me to speak on the bill.

Some news media have been proclaiming that we on this side of the house should turn over and play dead. They have been proclaiming that we should accept the word of practically one man, the minister, against the evidence of so many retired and discharged senior officers, concluding with the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller. They have been proclaiming that closure is justified in order to close the mouths of the official opposition. They have been proclaiming that the implementation of this unification bill is inevitable, so why not capitulate to the stubborn attitude of the minister.

Today we are faced with the house leader having moved closure. Sir, to me this is inexcusable. The defence of Canada is much too important to be decided by the government in this manner. Unfortunately the government has repeatedly shown its contempt of parliament. It is now continuing that contempt, and this time the government has chosen the most important issue we could be faced with, namely the defence of Canada. As I see this whole defence matter, we are taking one step further toward dependence on our great neighbour to the south. In the past the government has taken numerous steps toward republicanism; this step, as I see it, is the biggest and most dangerous.

I feel that certain news media which support the government have tended to confuse the issue by using the words integration and unification interchangeably. This should not be done. They are two different and distinct steps; they have two absolutely different meanings.

Integration has met with general agreement. In fact it was furthered by the government of which I had the honour to be a member. This step, however, does not completely do away with the army, navy and air force, as it is now proposed. That step is what unification means. Integration of certain services and administration facilities seems reasonable and sensible, but to take the big and dangerous step of completely unifying all our forces does not seem sound. This last move, Mr. Chairman, is against all the advice given by retired and discharged officers. They advised a period of a few years to have steps already taken shake themselves out before taking this last, irrevocable step.

Many times the minister has said that one of his reasons for this move is to save money. Anything to save money should be considered very carefully. Certainly the government has been reckless in its expenditures in all fields, and savings should be encouraged. But that is not what is happening. As has been pointed out on more than one occasion, this year's estimates for national defence are up by approximately $115 million. Evidence indicates that effective savings will not be effected by unification. I would suggest that we enjoy a pause in this headlong rush.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, the following are the main reasons why unification should not be proceeded with at this time:

The majority of people in Canada are not convinced the minister is right, in fact they are very sure he is wrong.

No other country in the world has dared to take this step. I am for progress, something which was urged by the hon. member for Leeds; but I do not consider this final step of unification at this time to be progress. I consider it foolhardy.

To continue the list of reasons:

Unification can only result in further dependence upon the United States in case of emergency.

There will not be the dollar savings that the minister has wanted us to believe there will be.

Doing away with the army, navy and air force can only cause frustration, discouragement and lack of direction for the soldier, the sailor and the airforce man; in other words, confusion, falling off in efficiency, and demoralization, all of which are dangerous to the security of Canada.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Another reason is that the minister has not answered the pertinent questions which were asked of him concerning the effect unification may have on Canada's commitments.

My last main reason is that the minister has admitted that the act will not be proclaimed for some months. I ask the question: Why, then, the urgency to shove it through in this manner?

Many other reasons have been brought to the attention of the house by other hon. members during this debate. Now we are to be forced by closure to accede to the government's whims. This step is wrong. Closure never should be forced on the House of Commons, least of all when our security is at stake. This is not right.

When I started out I stated that I intended to be brief. I will. I should like, however, to close by quoting from an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of yesterday—that Liberal paper which is so friendly to the government. This is what they say concerning this last unforgiveable step which has been taken by this government. I think this should be placed on the record.

> The federal government could be making a mistake—

Let us not forget that this is from yesterday's Winnipeg Free Press. They anticipated the possibility of what has happened today.

> The federal government could be making a mistake if, in its determination to impose unification on Canada's armed services, it should resort to some form of closure on Parliament.
> The government can argue that the unification bill has been through the legislative mill, including the defence committee, and that there is nothing of value to be gained by prolonging the discussion. In fact, not all witnesses who should have been heard were called before the committee. And in spite of all the talking that has been done, some major questions remain unanswered—notably those concerning the effect that unification may have on Canada's military commitments under NATO and NORAD. The suspicion is growing that the reason these questions have not been answered is that the government does not know the answers. If closure is resorted to, this suspicion will be strengthened.
> Unification is government policy, but it is a policy that has met vigorous opposition from many members of Parliament who must feel that they represent a substantial body of opinion. The government can press on; that appears to be its intention. But if it does so at the expense of cutting further debate, it cannot help but leave the same kind of impression that the St. Laurent government left when it used closure in 1956—that here is a government which has failed to convince the majority of the population.

On that note I shall sit down but I wish to say that I do feel this editorial sets out as succinctly as one could the position which the government has taken, the errors it is making and what it is doing to Canada by pressing forward with this bill at this moment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I waited for some member on the government side to get up to address the house because just a few minutes ago the hon. member for Kootenay East said that we were trying to prevent their participation in this debate. Every opportunity was given to them, as people here will have noticed, and no one rose from the other side to support the Minister of National Defence or to enter into this debate. Earlier today two opportunities were afforded to the government to change from this particular debate, of which they are making much, and deal with, first, the dairy problem which is a serious problem in Canada. They refused to accept this opportunity which they had. A second opportunity was given to them to deal with the minister of manpower's bill on adult training. They declined that opportunity and said in effect that we must continue with the debate on the unification bill. Then they turn around and accuse us of prolonging the debate. We gave them every opportunity to get on with other business which appears on the order paper and they did not take advantage of the opportunity.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me ask this question: Who is prolonging this debate? Those on the government side. For what purpose? Solely so that the house today could hear the hon. member for Kootenay East, and what a treat that was.

An hon. Member: Did he speak?

Mr. Churchill: There was nothing in his speech worth any attention whatsoever. This is a peculiar way to operate the House of Commons when the government insists on going ahead with a debate which they have been telling us they wish to terminate. We gave them the opportunity today.

I intend to do something which I very seldom do in this House of Commons; that is, quote extensively from an author. In just a moment I will give the reason for this. The author from whom I intend to quote is Mr. Terence Robertson who is an author of distinction. He writes for the Canadian people and for international areas. He is called a military specialist and has been one for 20 years. I might mention two of his books; one is about Dieppe, "The Shame and the Glory" and the other is about the Suez crisis.

Mr. Robertson has an intelligent knowledge of the House of Commons. He made a speech to the Canadian Club of Ottawa on December 4, 1964. On page 8 of his speech he said this:

> If any government, no matter which party is in power, can get its own way simply because a debate is considered drawn out and tedious in some quarters then the two party system is already on the way out the window.

[Mr. Monteith.]

That was his observation of the House of Commons in 1964 and I am sure it would be his observation today with regard to this particular debate. We are entered upon one of the great debates of this institution. This is an historic debate and every member of this house should record on Hansard his opinion with regard to the policy of the government. This debate will be studied by an author like Mr. Terence Robertson. He will be writing a book about this debate and with justification because nothing is more important than a fundamental alteration in the defence policy of Canada. Every citizen of Canada has an interest in what is done by parliament, and some time next week I presume the issue will be decided. There will be a vote and the government, with the assistance of the New Democratic Party, the assistance of the Social Credit rump in the house and with the major assistance of the Créditistes led by a member who boasts of his lack of effort in wartime—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: —Canada's defence policy will be changed.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) has no right to impute any intentions to me; whether or not I was a member of the Canadian army, that is none of his business.

I must tell him one thing, however; it is that I am as good a Canadian as he can be and that there are Canadians who can be excellent people and behave with dignity in Canada, without having been members of the Canadian army. I wish the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would get that into his head from now on, for he seems to forget that one can be a Canadian without treading exactly in the somewhat doubtful footsteps of the hon. member himself.

And I want to tell him, still on the same point of order, that I am not to be taught any lessons by him and that I am welcome in the ten Canadian provinces much more than he is himself.

• (9:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Churchill: What is the point of order, Mr. Chairman? I suggested that the government will have the support of that hon. gentleman in this house and he now objects to this fact. This is known to everyone and it is with that support the government hopes to pass this bill. I hope the people of Canada realize that fact.

It has frequently been asked in this house why the Prime Minister does not participate in this debate. We have not heard from him. He neglects parliament in this regard. It has often been asked, as I have asked, what is behind his attitude. Why is the Minister of National Defence pursuing this course? There must be some undisclosed reason behind his attitude. Why does he want to destroy the Royal Canadian Air Force, the Royal Canadian Navy and the Canadian Army?

I believe I have found the answer to these questions in an article written by Mr. Terence Robertson which appeared in one of the supplements attached to the newspapers of this country. I regret that I do not know the exact newspaper to which this one was attached but it was published in 1966. Mr. Robertson is a great admirer of the Prime Minister, and in his book on the Suez crisis he pays him great tribute for his efforts on that occasion. Mr. Robertson has maintained an interest in military affairs. Last summer he wrote this article and perhaps someone can identify the newspaper company which published it. The title of the article is "The real reason for putting them all together". He was referring to all the members of the three services. Let me read some of the statements in this article. Mr. Terence Robertson states:

> There should be a sign outside defence minister Paul Hellyer's office saying "Keep Clear—Nationalists at Work". For behind all the uproar, all the insinuations and ill feeling that surround the future of our armed forces, lies the one big issue of Canadian nationalism.

Mr. Hellyer: Do you believe everything you read in the newspapers?

Mr. Churchill: The minister interrupts me and asks me if I believe everything I read in the newspapers. I do not attack the newspapers; I commend them for a great many things they have done. I read the articles written by Charles Lynch which deal with the Minister of National Defence to find some inkling of what he is like. I am inclined to believe that sort of article. I do have some confidence in the writings of Mr. Terence Robertson.

That hon. gentleman then states in this article:

> If any cabinet minister undertakes a policy that will politically justify replacing symbols of our past with new and distinctively Canadian ones, he can be sure of Prime Minister Pearson's wholehearted support.

Hellyer's defence policies are bang in the middle of this new tradition. He is trying to Canadianize the armed forces by ridding them of the trappings of "foreign" (British) origins.

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Churchill: Someone on the other side said "good". Just because my ancestors happened to come from Great Britain they suggest I should be ashamed of them and that I should deny my origin and have no pride in it. On the contrary, I have a great deal of pride. I hope those people whose origin is French will have pride in that origin. Apparently anything now that is British is foreign.

Mr. Terence Robertson then writes:

I believe this is far more important for the country, the government, Hellyer and for the forces themselves than any purely military argument on the merits of one service, three, or even a dozen . . .

According to Hellyer's plans, the front line formations of the navy, army and air force will function in the future much as they do today. But they will be the sea, air and land arms of the new service—not the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Air Force, the Royal Canadian Artillery, or the Royal Canadian anything else.

This is what is said by an observer who suggests that the real reason behind this whole program is a policy of the Prime Minister, supported by the Minister of National Defence, to do what Mr. Robertson calls Canadianization of our armed forces by getting rid of our traditions. These have been noble traditions.

Let me continue with Mr. Robertson's article as follows:

Uniforms are the most tangible trappings of any military structure . . .

No matter how much Hellyer integrates or unifies, he cannot succeed in Canadianizing the armed forces without first getting rid of the present uniforms for they are the ultimate public symbols of Canada's military heritage.

The most effective and economical way to Canadianize the forces is to put everybody—soldier, sailor and airman—into the same suit. This would have the effect of putting a single service on public display without actually creating one, and without imposing any fundamental disturbances on the existing military structure.

Apparently we should meld them together by dressing them the same and by getting rid of all our past traditions. In this way we might Canadianize the armed forces. Having served in the Canadian Armed Forces on a good many occasions over a good many years, let me say that neither I nor my friends had any doubt that we were Canadians and not anything else. We were never confused for the British, Australians, New Zealanders, South Africans or United States soldiers.

Mr. Robertson then states:

When Hellyer took office three years ago, he was deliberately vague about the lengths he would go with integration. "Integration breaks new ground" he said then. "We don't know yet where it will end".

It's quite possible that he didn't really know himself—that though he knew of the Prime Minister's intention to Canadianize Canada, he hadn't worked out how the principle could be best applied to the armed forces.

He is still very vague and he still does not know where this is going to end. It will end in great confusion and will be a great disaster for Canada. Mr. Robertson then states:

Hellyer needed time, not only to learn about the entire defence organization, but also to assess where, and from whom, he might expect opposition. His most senior officers were relatively young. They had superb records in war and peace, and they controlled forces that enjoyed unexcelled reputations for efficiency and elan among NATO allies.

Those are the men the minister started to work with, and he paid them a great compliment.

• (9:50 p.m.)

The article continues:

Most of them supported the idea of integration from the outset, and Hellyer has said all along that he couldn't have got integration off the ground without their enthusiastic support.

These are the men that the minister threw out of office just a year ago, in the summertime. These were the young, able men with good records in war and peace who supported the minister when he commenced this operation of his, and he disposed of them last summer. That's gratitude for you. He could not have got his operation off the ground had they not supported him; yet he threw them to one side when they opposed some of his plans. This same author, Mr. Terence Robertson, writing a year earlier in "Weekend Magazine" of February 6 had this to say with regard to that assistance:

Hellyer readily admits even though he didn't reap a whirwind of protest, his revolution might have stalled at the white paper stage had it not been for the co-operation of the senior officers at defence headquarters. The chiefs of staff fell in behind him, decided among themselves to set an example to all ranks by avoiding controversial public debate and by declining to comment in the press.

The Minister of National Defence owes everything to those men. Mr. Robertson in that article of 1965 goes on to speak of some of them. Just listen to the names: Air Chief Marshal Miller, Lieutenant General Geoffrey Walsh, Vice Admiral H. S. Rayner. Where are they now? They are cast off. They were useful to the Minister of National Defence when he was launching his plan. They supported him with regard to the white paper. They started off the program of integration. But having squeezed them dry, the minister discarded them. He used their ability, brains and assistance and was grateful for it at the time, and he said so; and the minute those men said, "Slow down. We are not yet ready for unification", he said, "Out". That is what this minister has done to the men who helped him in the days when he really needed help.

Who is helping him now? Not even the Prime Minister. I continue to quote from the article of 1966:

> By last July, four admirals, three air marshals and two generals had quit, some helped along with an early retirement bonus. With so many vacancies at the top, Hellyer was able to couple Canadianization with the appointment of a chief of defence staff. He was fortunate to have a widely respected French-Canadian officer, General Jean Allard, available for the job.
> Allard's views coincide closely with Hellyer's. He is reputed to believe that only regiments with pure Canadian origins should keep their identities because the others, those with foreign impurities in their histories, have nothing Canadian to lose through unification.

There is Mr. Terence Robertson's objective view of what is behind this program. He set it out. He is a man with years of experience, a man who has a knowledge of Ottawa, a man who is a close acquaintance of the Prime Minister, from whom he has high regard, a man who obviously must have had some conversations with the Minister of National Defence or certainly with his staff because he writes with knowledge of this situation. There he gives us the real reason behind this exercise of the Minister of National Defence.

The idea of the minister is to Canadianize our forces. He says: Dispel tradition; forget the past; forget second Ypres and Vimy Ridge; forget the landing on the Normandy beaches in 1944; forget Dieppe; forget Hong Kong—we are starting afresh. The minister says: Wipe out the Royal Canadian Navy; wipe out the word "Royal" wherever it appears. He says: Canadianize our forces. Yet, as I have said so often, this country has an admirable history, an admirable tradition extending over centuries. All national groups that have lived in this country have made a contribution to that tradition, the sacrifice that has gone into building up this country and maintaining our independence, the sacrifice that has gone into sustaining that independence and the freedom of the free nations of the world during this century. These things have been based upon the forces which the minister now wishes to change and for which apparently he has little respect.

This minister wants to wipe out most of the things that serving men have ever treasured with regard to the life they have lived. Why wipe out the Royal Canadian Navy or change the uniform of the men in the navy? After all, they are volunteering to sacrifice their lives in case of emergency. Surely they should be permitted, then, to retain those things which they consider to be part of their life. Is not the same true of the Royal Canadian Air Force, those men who volunteer and risk their lives. They die even in peacetime; I do not know how many pilots we have lost during the last 10 or 15 years. These men are ready to die in wartime. Why cannot they retain their title "Royal Canadian Air Force" and their uniform?

The same is true of the army and all our famous regiments. Forty eight Canadian infantry battalions fought at the battle of Vimy Ridge, which we were commemorating a few days ago. The famous 22nd regiment was there. There were 47 other battalions there, all of whom went over the top at Vimy Ridge in two waves, 15,000 in the first wave and 15,000 in the second. Are not those battalions entitled to maintain their traditions? Of course they are.

Sir, I have now placed on the record of this historic document of Canadian Hansard the real reason, according to Mr. Terence Robertson, why this unification program of the Minister of National Defence was started and has been carried through. Now we know why the Prime Minister has made this minister go ahead with that program; in fact, it is the Prime Minister's idea and it is with his approval that the Minister of National Defence is carrying on in the way he is.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask whoever is leading the house whether we will go on with other government business tomorrow, or are we to provide another opportunity for government members to speak on the subject of unification?

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, we had hoped that all hon. gentlemen opposite would have had an opportunity by now to express their views fully and completely in respect of clause 2 of the bill. But in view of the fact that they apparently have not, we will carry on this debate tomorrow. I would hope, however, that very early in the day we could get on to another clause. Perhaps we could agree to stand clause 2 so that we could give adequate consideration to all the clauses in the bill.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you very much. I have another speech ready for tomorrow.

• (10:00 p.m.)

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—INQUIRY AS TO BASIS FOR FLUID MILK SUBSIDY

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I think it is timely that I should have listed for debate this evening after the ten o'clock adjournment the subject matter of the government's dairy policy. It is timely because, after all, it was this afternoon that one hon. member on this side of the house attempted to adjourn the house under standing order 26 in order to debate the urgency of the situation regarding the inadequacy of the government's present dairy policy. Of course it is not my intention at this time to go into any details regarding the many ways in which the present dairy policy is inadequate. Other hon. members in the course of the past week have advanced many reasons why the present policy falls short. However, it is necessary to point out with emphasis once again that the problem in the dairy industry has been growing in a very dramatic and alarming way in the past few months.

It is a long standing problem which this industry has faced, along with other sectors of agriculture, but it has been increasing to an alarming degree. Everything the government has said through its minister, and through other speakers today, has not offered a solution to the problem. On the one hand we have a minister who takes an attitude of almost complete indifference to a problem that is facing the nation, namely one of continuing low income among our food producers, a minister who is showing indolence and nonchalance, and on the other hand we have a minister who is trying to push through the house legislation unifying our armed forces, a matter which is of no urgency at all. The government is spending days and weeks ramming through legislation of no urgency, and yet the Minister of Agriculture, despite repeated pleas, refuses to give any indication that he will reconsider a dairy policy which is damned and condemned by all spokesmen of the dairy industry in this country.

I cannot understand the government's order of priorities and its poor sense of proportion with regard to problems that face our country. No doubt tomorrow the Minister of National Defence will again insist on the passage of this legislation, while the Minister of Agriculture might very well not be around to answer some of the pointed questions which will be put to him by members on this side.

The question I asked last Tuesday, as recorded at page 14765 of Hansard, dealt specifically with the jurisdiction and responsibility for price support on fluid milk. I must admit that the minister has stated repeatedly that under the new policy there will be a more clear division of responsibility with regard to the dairy policy, that the federal government is subsidizing manufacturing milk to a greater degree, which is a fact that no one disputes, and that therefore the fluid milk price levels will become the responsibility of the provinces. However, there is a flaw in the reasoning there because fluid milk in excess of the quota becomes surplus fluid, and in effect manufacturing milk, and the federal government therefore should not try to absolve itself of its responsibility in that field.

As I said on the day when the minister made his statement a few weeks ago, I think the federal government has made a great mistake in transferring to the provinces the control of price levels for fluid milk.

Other members have put this compelling argument to the Minister of Agriculture, and it is a very reasonable one. Since surplus fluid milk goes into manufacture, on what basis can the federal government withdraw its support? Under this new policy support has been withdrawn and this will mean that the shippers of fluid milk will find themselves in a much more difficult position financially. Statistical data put out by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and that compiled by the dairy, organizations themselves, has shown that in the last few years, despite the existence of a small measure of federal support for surplus fluid milk, there was a deterioration in the income position of fluid milk shippers.

Now that the federal government has withdrawn support, the problem becomes aggravated.

I must ask therefore the question I asked last Tuesday, and to which I received no reply. Was his decision to withdraw any degree of support for surplus fluid milk taken by the federal government unilaterally, or only after consultation with the provincial governments and perhaps upon their request? I would find it inexcusable, may I say in conclusion, if the decision were taken by this government in a unilateral manner without even acquiescence or a request by any provincial government. Time will find this out.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): My presence here tonight is dictated by the fact that my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) is in London looking after the interests of Canadian food exporters. His parliamentary secretary is out of town on government business.

The decision to apply federal dairy subsidies to shippers of manufacturing milk and cream and not to shippers of fluid milk, is a policy decision to avoid a conflicting jurisdiction of federal and provincial authorities. In this decision, the federal government is accepting responsibility for the returns to manufacturing milk and cream shippers.

The hon. member may recall that the province of Quebec has, for a few years, paid subsidies for manufacturing milk and cream, and that the Ontario government introduced such a subsidy last fall. In discussions with the ministers of agriculture of those two provinces last fall, our Minister of Agriculture undertook to recommend to his colleagues that starting the 1st of April this year the federal government, in its support program, would make up the amount of the subsidy paid by the provinces. At the same time, the ministers of agriculture of Ontario and Quebec undertook to withdraw on that date from the subsidization of manufacturing milk and cream. The federal program has of course gone well beyond meeting that commitment financially.

The economic situation of fluid milk shippers is of course subject to matters which are under provincial or local control, and over which the federal authorities have no jurisdiction. The two major factors in this are the fluid quotas and the price of fluid milk. These are determined locally within a province.

The decision to apply the direct federal assistance only to manufacturing milk and cream shippers is, therefore, an acceptance of responsibility for the basic returns to that part of the dairy industry whose product is used entirely for manufacturing purposes, while leaving to the provinces, who have the jurisdiction, the responsibility for the fluid milk side of the industry. This is a cleancut and desirable division of jurisdiction and responsibility.

I am sure the hon. member understands, of course, that surplus milk from fluid shippers does benefit from one phase of the federal stabilization program. That is the phase which supports the market price of major dairy products on all fronts and which establishes the basis of price for all milk used for the manufacturer of these products.

AGRICULTURE—CONSIDERATION OF REQUEST FOR HIGHER PRICE FOR INDUSTRIAL MILK

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the new dairy policy of the present government is distinctly unfair to Canadian farmers and dairy producers.

First of all, because it does not meet the minimum goal of $5.10 per hundredweight for manufacturing milk, and second, because the amount of money put at the disposal of the Canadian Dairy Commission is insufficient. Indeed, a government that can make available to the Minister of National Defence an additional $115 million should surely be in a position, through the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp), to put another $60 or $80 million at the disposal of Canadian farmers.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, there is no guarantee that the subsidy will normally remain at $1.11 per hundredweight that is $1.21 less 10 cents for the export premium. If the amount allowed for export, namely 10 cents per hundredweight, proves insufficient, the Canadian Dairy Commission will have to deduct the necessary amount from the $1.11 subsidy; this means that the subsidy of $1.11 is liable to be lowered as a result of the export premium, quotas, etc.

According to the statement of the commission, each producer is allowed an individual quota equal to the amount produced last year. This means that greater milk production will not be encouraged in Canada. Quotas are not to exceed what they were last year.

Now, last year, because of bad weather, hay and feed crops and pastures did not supply quality feed, with the result that milk production went down.

Now, this year, there is no intention to promote or facilitate any production increase, although we are forced to import butter and other dairy products from foreign countries. There is no intention to help our Canadian farmers.

Surplus fluid milk of producers, namely milk of categories 2, 3 and 4, is not eligible for subsidies. Cream producers receive no special subsidy.

What farmers want is a minimum price, not an average national price. In 1966-67, prices varied from $3.74 to $4.44, including all federal and provincial subsidies.

Every member of the Ralliement Créditiste has asked for a better policy for Canadian farmers, and it is true that the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Schreyer) has just asked the same thing.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) has also asked the same thing. And this afternoon, when I moved the adjournment of the house, in order to discuss the dairy policy, not one government member from the province of Quebec had the courage to stand up to make his views known —including the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Speaker, last night on the national news, I heard the national president of the C.F.U., Mr. Lionel Sorel, state that members of parliament lag behind with regard to the dairy policy. Now, Mr. Sorel, for his information, if he is not intellectually dishonest, must admit that we took our stand on the side of farmers, of dairy producers in this country, and particularly in the province of Quebec.

Here, in the April 5 issue of La Terre de Chez Nous, a farm newspaper, we read:

> Under the circumstances, the C.F.U. leaders must come to the conclusion that the members of parliament, particularly those from Quebec, only tried to save their interests so as not to lose face.

And today, Mr. Speaker, we read in La Presse statements by Mr. Sorel and Mr. Harvey, president of the Canadian Farmers Federation. Mr. Sorel says:

> The farmers will attack the members of parliament in all ridings to make them aware of the farm problem.

Well, here I want to tell Mr. Sorel and Mr. Harvey: We never needed them to become aware of the problems facing the farmers, because I know those problems personally.

Hon. members, my colleagues of the Ralliement Créditiste know what those problems are in their respective ridings. We realize that hon. members from Montreal do not understand them at all, because they have never seen a cow being milked, but in the rural ridings, Mr. Speaker, we know the problems of the farmer and when we get the opportunity to move a vote of non-confidence, we will not hesitate a single moment and we are ready to face a general election on the specific problem of agriculture in Canada, and particularly in the province of Quebec.

However, as far as the C.F.U. is concerned, we are tired of hearing from people, such as Mr. Lionel Sorel, who have no idea of what is going on in the house. Those people think that a vote of non-confidence can be moved at any time of day. Unable even to understand parliamentary procedure, they start among the farmers rumours to the effect that here, in parliament, we have no feelings, we do not want to assume our responsibilities to the farmers.

There are farmers in my riding of Villeneuve. There are some also in the next riding of Pontiac-Témiscamingue, and I do not hesitate to take a firm stand for the farmers. But I distrust, for instance, some agricultural leaders of the C.F.U. who attempt to stir up the farmers by making representations which prove to be rather a storm in a tea cup. Let those people be honest with their members, and we, as members of parliament, will be honest with the farmers. And when I say honest with the farmers, I do not mean only honest with Messrs. Sorel or Harvey; it means honest with the farmers, the dairy producers of our country and of our province.

That is the stand taken by the Ralliement Créditiste, and I ask the government to revise its dairy policy; otherwise, one of these days, it will have to face very soon, as soon as possible, a non-confidence motion with regard to the dairy policy implemented at the present time by the Liberal government in Ottawa.

[English]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member will be kind enough to forgive me for replying in the only language I have a facility with. Had my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture been here tonight he would have used that happy facility in replying that I do not possess. As the hon. member knows, the Minister of Agriculture is attending the meeting of Canadian and United Kingdom ministers in London and I have not been able to inquire of him the exact nature of any discussions which he may have had with dairy producers.

I would doubt, however, that he would have implied that if the $120 million allotted to the Canadian Dairy Commission is not fully expended at the $1.21 per hundredweight subsidy rate, any balance would be used to increase the rate of subsidy. The $120 million will permit the payment of the $1.21 subsidy on approximately 99.5 million hundredweight of milk. This also is approximately the quantity on which subsidy was paid to manufacturing milk and cream shippers in the year just ended, and is also approximately the amount required to meet domestic requirements for dairy products.

As has been announced, each shipper will be given a quota for 1967-68, which will be the amount of milk or cream on which he will be eligible to receive subsidy. The quotas will be related to each shipper's deliveries in 1966-67. If the quotas are not fully utilized, which would be the only circumstance under which there would be unexpended funds, I would think it more likely that the residue would be used to make any deserving adjustment in quotas rather than to increase the subsidy rate.

I understand that this, in such an event, would be the procedure which the Canadian Dairy Commission would recommend.

TRANSPORT—REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT RESPECTING LEVEL CROSSINGS

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like, before entering into the heart of the matter, to explain to my hon. friend from Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) that if we did not ask for an emergency debate this afternoon, it is because we knew that the standing orders did not allow a debate of this kind under such circumstances. The Chair proved that we were right when he rejected the request. So,—

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Choquette: There is no point of order at this time.

Mr. Caouette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Choquette: There is no point of order at this time.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, is it the hon. member for Lotbinière who will decide whether or not the point of order is well taken?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There is no point of order which can be allowed at this time, but I would suggest to the hon. member for Lotbinière that he should adhere to the question which he rose to ask and comment upon.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put to the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) tonight a question concerning a subject which I have already had the opportunity of raising in other circumstances in this house, that of grade crossings.

There is no need for me to repeat what I asked in the past, but I should like to call the attention of the authorities to a problem which is becoming more and more pressing, that of very fast trains, called turbo-trains, soon to be put into circulation.

It is extremely important that the government draw up a modern grade crossing policy taking into account the new needs which will arise as a result of the greater chances of accident attending the operation of these very fast turbo-trains.

That is why I believe some short term measures could be taken to meet this situation.

Mr. Speaker, there are things which are difficult to understand in the legislation. First, the contribution coming from the grade-crossing fund amounts to $15 million a year and that, up to a maximum amount of $500,000 for any project.

It is obvious that this is just nonsense, because works to be built at dangerous places—I think of Dorion in particular—would amount to several million dollars, and with a federal contribution of not more than $500,000, it is impossible to initiate such works unless the legislation is amended.

So, a first improvement is required.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is getting more and more urgent to increase the contribution of the grade-crossing fund precisely because of the new requirements due to the operation of new trains.

Money is requested often and everywhere, but this will show certain associations which sometimes make excessive demands, that the administration is extremely difficult, because everyone is always asking for more money.

Another suggestion I would like to put forward is that I believe, Mr. Speaker, if we are to be guided by the reports of the Board of Transport Commissioners, they have absolutely no time to deal properly with requests connected with grade crossings.

For instance, I read in the 1965 report that the Board of Transport Commissioners has received 2,584 requests under various pieces of legislation they administer. They have issued 3,080 orders and two general orders.

It is obvious that the Board of Transport Commissioners is overworked and that applicants sometimes have to suffer from the delays in procedure and the slowness to make decisions. It is not intended to criticize the board, but to deplore a factual situation from which the board itself has to suffer. It is only through amendments to the legislation that we will be able to correct this situation.

As to the safety measures already suggested in the past, namely the installation of rotating lights on the engines or phosphorescent lines on every car, or still convex mirrors, a great many have been suggested in the past. I wonder how intensively they were studied by the Board of Transport Commissioners. Mr. Speaker, I believe that we realize regretfully at this time that the grade-crossing policy is not in accordance with the new modern requirements of very fast trains, that is turbotrains, that will be put in operation.

Therefore, I urge the authorities to act accordingly, so as to provide the public with maximum security.

[English]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to compliment the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) for the very forceful representations he made this evening and for the representations which he has made in the past. He has shown a very great concern in respect of this matter and I am sure this is not the last representation he will make to government.

As I am sure the hon. member will understand that, at the moment the question of grade separation is one for determination by the department of highways, or its counterpart, under provincial jurisdiction. It is for them to determine where and when a grade separation should be made. Then the federal government pays 80 per cent of the cost of the grade separation up to $500,000. The hon. member has said that $15 million in the fund is not sufficient. I have not heard, however, of any circumstance in which an application has been denied on the basis that there were insufficient funds. They have been denied by the board rather on the question of whether or not the facility so recommended is of sufficient importance to justify the cost.

Usually, of course, the railway company makes its recommendations based on the count at the crossing, and so on. No one of course can guarantee that an automobile accident will not take place; this is one of the hazards of the modern age. Just the other day in my riding a completely inexplicable accident took place on a straight stretch of road between two automobiles driven by responsible people. Seven persons were killed; no one survived. So, accidents do happen on the highways, certainly more frequently than at grade crossings. This is not a suggestion that we should not give this matter urgent consideration, particularly in respect of the high speed train program which is being developed.

There is no question but that high speed turbo trains must operate on a completely protected track. It is unthinkable that there would be a grade crossing where there might be a train travelling at speeds of 100 or 120 miles an hour. Even a bird could cause damage if it were to hit a train travelling at such a speed. A collision with a gasoline truck or a similar obstruction would simply mean that an entire train would be in flames in a moment. There is no question but that this policy must be reviewed and the government is giving it a great deal of consideration.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING DISTURBANCES IN PARLIAMENTARY GALLERIES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve) asked for leave to introduce Bill No. C-291, to amend the Criminal Code (Disturbance in Parliament).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, some time ago a visitor in the Commons galleries threw a number of tracts on the floor of the house, close to Your Honour's chair, thus disturbing the peace and order in the house.

Therefore, this bill provides that any person who, from any gallery, either in the Senate or in the Commons, breaks the peace of senators and members of parliament, is guilty of a punishable offence upon summary conviction.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Walkerville, Ont.	3,275,800	15,810,000	19,085,800	114,600
Wolfville, N.S.	12,800	—	12,800	10,000
	$14,603,100	$15,971,100	$30,574,200	$527,100

Questions

Note:

All amounts have been rounded to the nearest hundred dollars.

Cost of operation in each case includes standard object expenditures such as salaries, travel expenses, telephone, supplies and equipment; cost of employee benefits; also cost of accommodation and financial services provided by other government departments.

Excise duty revenue at Hull and Walkerville is collected and controlled by excise duty surveys which are separate from the customs ports.

* GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

Question No. 2,755—Mr. Herridge:

1. What was the total of the gross national product for Canada in 1966?

2. What increase would be required in the personal, corporation and sales taxes to provide 1 per cent of the gross national product?

3. What increase would be required in the personal, corporation and sales taxes to provide 2 per cent of the gross national product?

4. What increase would be required in the personal, corporation and sales taxes to provide 3 per cent of the gross national product?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Member of the Administration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is $57.8 billion.

The answer to parts 2, 3 and 4 is that it is difficult to relate increases in personal, corporation and sales taxes to percentages of the gross national product by reason of the fact that tax increases themselves have an influence upon the levels of the G.N.P. and thus upon revenues. However, $578 million is 8.5 per cent of the aggregate of the federal revenues, including old age security tax revenues, from personal income tax, corporation income tax and sales tax, twice $578 million would be 17 per cent and three times would be 25.5 per cent.

PAYMENTS TO BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM COMMISSIONERS

Question No. 2,771—Mr. Coates:

1. What is the total amount received to date by the commissioners of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism, and in each case what is the breakdown of the moneys received as between honoraria and expenses?

2. How much has each commissioner received that has been classified as tax exempt?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by Prime Minister's and Privy Council offices and by the Department of National Revenue as follows:

1. Since their appointment three years and nine months ago, in July 1963, the commissioners have received the following amounts:

	Honoraria	Travel and living expenses
Rév. C. Cormier	$26,600.00	$10,922.01
A. D. Dunton	44,800.00	4,150.70
R. Frith	40,300.00	11,011.51
J.-L. Gagnon	65,650.00	14,175.10
G. Laing	33,350.00	21,117.92
P. Lacoste	14,450.00	575.30
A. Laurendeau	74,100.00	13,903.40
J. Marchand	14,450.00	5,215.03
J. Rudnyckyj	31,800.00	15,099.87
F. R. Scott	32,850.00	7,206.99
P. Wyczynski	32,700.00	3,884.21

2. The amounts designated as travel and living expenses in part 1 are considered to be exempt from tax under the Income Tax Act.

RANDOM HOUSE (CANADA)

Question No. 2,809—Mr. Barnett:

1. To the knowledge of the government, is Random House (Canada) a subsidiary of Random House (U.S.A.)?

2. Is Random House (Canada) able to import for distribution in Canada books published in the U.S.A. without payment of tariffs or other taxes?

3. If so, what classes or kinds of books are importable without payment of tariffs or other taxes?

4. If not, what rates of tariffs or other taxes are collected on imported books?

5. Is there a price differential on books published in the U.S.A. when sold at the retail level between Random House (Canada) and Random House (U.S.A.)?

6. If so, are prices higher or lower in Canada than in the U.S.A.?

7. What, in absolute or in percentage terms, is the average difference in price levels?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Department of National Revenue as follows: 1. Information not available.

2. The Customs Tariff Act provides for the duty free entry of certain books. Any importer, including Random House of Canada Limited, is entitled to the duty free provisions.

3. The following books are entitled to entry at customs free of duty and sales tax exempt: Books in the curriculum of a Canadian university, college or school for use as text books or as works of reference, not including dictionaries; books for use in intelligence testing; books for bona fide libraries, and being the property of the organized authorities of such libraries and not in any case the property of individuals or of business concerns; books for the promotion of religion, medicine and surgery, the fine arts, law, science, technical training, and the study of languages, not including dictionaries. These books are sales tax exempt provided they are not to be written or drawn upon and bear no advertising; books not including those to be written or drawn upon, printed in any other than the English language.

4. Other books, not to be written or drawn upon, such as novels, dictionaries and general encyclopedias are dutiable, when produced in and imported from the United States, at 10 per cent ad valorem. These books are exempt from sales tax.

5, 6, and 7. Information not available.

REVISED CUSTOMS ENTRY FORM

Question No. 2,813—Mr. MacLean (Queens):

1. What is the difference between the "Canada Customs-Entry for Home Consumption Form B-1 Rev. 11-63" and the revised "Canada Customs-Entry for Home Consumption Form B-1 10/65"?

2. Why was the introduction of the new form necessary?

3. Were stocks of the old forms destroyed and, if so, what was the estimated cost of the destroyed forms?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): 1. The tariff item column was transferred from the extreme right of the form to an area immediately to the right of the description of goods column.

2. The previous location of the tariff item column interfered with the use, by industry, of electronic entry writing equipment. It also interfered with high speed coding methods employed by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

3. Yes, stocks of old forms were destroyed; estimated cost $2,100.

EXCISE TAXES ON SPIRITS AND BEER

Question No. 2,818—Mr. Caouette:

What was the total amount collected in excise taxes on the following products during the years 1965-66, 1964-65, 1963-64 in each province on (a) spirits (b) beer?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Under the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952 c.100, as amended, no excise tax is imposed on either spirits or beer. No breakdown is maintained by commodities of the amount of consumption or sales tax collected under part VI of the Excise Tax Act.

DISTRIBUTION AND EXPENDITURES OF ARMED FORCES IN CANADA

Question No. 2,829—Mr. Chatwood:

1. What is the number of armed forces personnel stationed in each of the ten provinces and in the territories?

2. What is the total expenditure of the Department of National Defence in each of the ten provinces and in the territories?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. As at December 31, 1966:

Newfoundland, 678; Nova Scotia, 14,546; Prince Edward Island, 1,320; New Brunswick, 6,325; Quebec, 10,624; Ontario, 28,471; Manitoba, 7,757; Saskatchewan, 1,635; Alberta, 7,142; British Columbia, 8,781; Northwest Territories (including Yukon), 627.

2. Information is not now available to provide an accurate answer to this question, and the necessary expert staff is not available to undertake the large amount of work which would be required to gather the necessary information.

PROSECUTIONS FOR OIL SPILLAGE IN HARBOURS

Question No. 2,830—Mr. McCleave:

1. How many prosecutions have been initiated by the Department of Transport involving the escape or spillage of oil from ships in Canadian harbours in each of the past five years, and how many were successful?

2. With regard to such prosecutions, what were the totals for the five years in specific harbours, naming the harbours?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. 1962: seven, 6 successful; 1963: eleven, 10 successful; 1964: eight, all successful; 1965: eleven, all successful; 1966: fifteen, 14 successful.

2. New Westminster, B.C., 10; Montreal, P.Q., 9; Port Arthur, Ont., 7; Vancouver, B.C., 5; St. Catharines, Ont., 4; Nanaimo, B.C., 3; Sorel, P.Q., 3; Saint John, N.B., 3; Tahsis, B.C., 2; Quebec, P.Q., 1; Halifax, N.S., 1; Welland, Ont., 1; Chicoutimi, P.Q., 1; Port Alfred, P.Q., 1; Newcastle, N.B., 1.

Questions

Where an offence occurred in waters adjacent to a harbour, the case is identified with that harbour.

RE-EXAMINATION OF C.M.H.C. PROGRAMS AS TO BILINGUALISM

Question No. 2,839—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Referring to page 32 of the 21st annual report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, what was the nature of the re-examination by the corporation of its various programs to be assured that the objectives outlined in the Prime Minister's statement of April 6, 1966, on bilingualism are being met?

2. What were the programs so re-examined?

3. How was the re-examination carried out?

4. What was the result of the re-examination?

5. What action, if any, has been taken as a consequence?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5.

Following the statement of the Prime Minister of April 6, 1966, the management of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation established staff committees to study the corporation's existing policies and practices relating to bilingualism. The terms of references of the committees specifically included programs relating to recruitment, staffing, language training and communication within the corporation and with the public. As a result of the committees' studies, the corporation issued a restatement of its policies and practices which would meet these objectives. The revised policies intensified the language training of corporation personnel in both French and English and the use of both languages in its internal communications. The practice of communication with the public in the language selected by the correspondent was continued. In its staffing, language training and recruitment, plans were made so that the various corporation functions would be adequately staffed with personnel qualified in both languages.

CAPE BRETON HIGHLANDS PARK—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF CARIBOU

Question No. 2,844—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

With reference to question No. 1,349, answered on May 9, 1966, is the department concerned now prepared to re-establish caribou in the Cape Breton Highlands national park and, if not, for what reason?

[Mr. Byrne.]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, action is being taken to implement the re-establishment of caribou in Cape Breton Highlands national park.

PAY ADJUSTMENTS FOR ARMY DOCTORS

Question No. 2,849—Mr. Noble:

Will the medical doctors in the army receive a pay adjustment that would be commensurate to their skill and at least on the basis being enjoyed by the dental officers and, if so, when?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): The matter has been referred to Treasury Board for consideration and a decision is expected shortly.

TERRACE, B.C.—DISPOSITION OF LAND

Question No. 2,855—Mr. Chatterton:

1. Did the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development sell or dispose of some 20 acres of land in Terrace, British Columbia, since January 1, 1967?

2. If so, what was the price and who was the purchaser?

3. Were tenders asked for?

4. If so, who were the tenderers and what were the amounts of each of the tenders?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. No.

2, 3, 4. Not applicable.

*REBUILDING OF HIGHWAY IN RIDING MOUNTAIN PARK

Queestion No. 2,859—Mr. Forbes:

1. Is it the intention of the government to rebuild and blacktop No. 10 highway through the Riding Mountain national park from the North Gate to Clear Lake?

2. Has provision been made for this in the 1967-68 estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and, if so, when will tenders be called?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows. Part 1, yes; part 2, no; funds have not been provided for this year. However, it is planned to provide for repairs to this highway within the next five years.

IMMIGRANTS ENTERING CANADA

Question No. 2,860—Mr. Monteith:

1. How many immigrants have entered Canada from January 1, 1946, to December 31, 1966?

2. For that particular period, what was the number entering per year?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. 2,698,763.

2. 1946, 71,719; 1947, 64,127; 1948, 125,414; 1949, 95,217; 1950, 73,912; 1951, 194,391; 1952, 164,498; 1953, 168,868; 1954, 154,227; 1955, 109,946; 1956, 164,857; 1957, 282,164; 1958, 124,851; 1959, 106,928; 1960, 104,111; 1961, 71,689; 1962, 74,586; 1963, 93,151; 1964, 112,606; 1965, 146,758; 1966, 194,743.

MUNICIPAL ANNUITY PLANS

Question No. 2,863—Mr. Madill:

1. How many group contract—government annuity plans are there in municipalities in Ontario?

2. To the knowledge of the government, have any of these plans been replaced by OMER and, if so, how many?

3. Do any of these municipalities carry both plans?

4. If municipalities have a government annuity plan, are they compelled to pay into the Canada pension plan?

5. Is legislation anticipated to provide for the repayment of these frozen assets to those municipalities now entered in other plans?

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): 1. 223.

2. 201 plans have been suspended or discontinued and it is believed that these have been replaced by OMER.

3. No information, but it is possible in respect of the 22 government annuity plans which are still active.

4. Yes.

5. No, because the annuity pension credits remain in force for the individual employees concerned.

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to bring to your attention the fact that I have had questions Nos. 2,532 and 2,606 on the order paper since January 26 and February 10 respectively. They are both simple and straightforward questions, and I see no reason why they could not have been answered by the government within a reasonable time.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, motion for papers No. 227 is acceptable to the government, subject to the usual reservations concerning privileged papers and authorization by the governmental authorities concerned.

Would Your Honour be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 221 and 223?

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

FLOOD PROTECTION ON FRASER RIVER

Motion No. 227—Mr. Deachman:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house copies of all correspondence since May 1, 1963, between any department of the government of Canada and any department of the government of British Columbia relating to the raising of dikes, the building of dams on the upper reaches of the Fraser river and all matters relating to the protection of the flood plain of the Fraser river.

Motion agreed to.

AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC RESPECTING ADULT TRAINING

Motion No. 221—Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski):

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of the federal-provincial (Quebec) agreement with regard to technical and professional training for adults, mentioning the date on which such agreement was signed, and a copy of all correspondence on the subject between the federal government and the government of the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the department has communicated with the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. LeBlanc).

The papers which are requested by the hon. member deal with the agreement with the province of Quebec concerning grants for training.

There is no objection to tabling this correspondence, with the consent of the province.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations or conditions expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house that notice of motion No. 221 be adopted?

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL WITHDRAWAL FROM VOCATIONAL TRAINING PROGRAM

Motion No. 223—Mr. Orlikow:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence between the provincial governments and the federal government in respect to the decision of the federal government to withdraw from the technical vocational training program.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, if there is any doubt about this notice of motion perhaps it had better stand.

Motion stands.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTINUATION OF OFFICER TRAINING CORPS IN CANADIAN UNIVERSITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I would like to ask whether it is the intention of the government to discontinue the Canadian officers training corps in the universities of Canada, or has this already been done?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions with the universities as to what form our future co-operation with the universities should take. A policy paper has been prepared by the department. There has been some discussion which has not yet been promulgated. As soon as a decision has been approved I will make the announcement in the usual way.

Mr. Churchill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do I understand by that answer that objection has been raised by some of the universities of Canada to operating the Canadian officers training corps?

Mr. Hellyer: I could not say there has been no objection by individuals, because I would suspect there has been some although I cannot at the moment recall specific cases. But in so far as negotiation with the Association of Canadian Universities is concerned, it has been most harmonious and co-operative and they have been in the picture all the way during consideration of the new policy.

Mr. Churchill: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would it not be advisable to continue to draw officer personnel from students at universities, in view of the tremendous purge of senior officers that has been carried out in the department?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The supplementary question is argumentative.

Mr. Hellyer: There will be continued provision, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and ask whether he can report to the house with regard to the meeting he has just held with the provincial ministers of health, with particular reference to the contention of the minister of health of the province of Ontario that if commercial insurance carriers fit into the category the provinces should be allowed to turn the administration of medicare over to such groups. I want to ask the minister whether he can assure the house that the government intends to adhere to the original definition which he gave, according to which the public administration of medicare would be handled by other than commercial insurance carriers.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the conference of the ministers of health which ended yesterday was very successful, especially in terms of the discussion of the Medical Care Act. It is my view that all the provinces will be participating in a medical care program at the time the federal contributions will be available. I think we have made great progress in this field, and the conference was very heartening and encouraging in that respect.

The role of commercial insurance carriers has been laid down in the Medical Care Act. It is within the jurisdiction of a province under the act to designate a private insurance carrier as an agent to collect premiums and pay benefits, but it will not be possible for such an agency to assess accounts or determine the amount of payments. This has been part of the act and there has been no change in the terms of the bill that was approved by parliament.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sure all hon. members will share the minister's pleasure at the indication that there is every likelihood that all the provinces will come under the plan by July 1, 1968. Do I take it from the minister's reply that the federal government intends to adhere to the original proposition that the administration of the plan must come under a public body appointed by the provincial government?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. There is no change in that policy. There must be a provincial authority administering a public plan, and the roles of other agencies, such as private insurance carriers and plans sponsored by doctors, are laid down in the bill itself. There has been no change from that point of view.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) concerning the recent federal-provincial meeting on health.

Can the hon. minister tell the house whether it has been determined that the provinces will be the ones to decide what further health services will be admissible to federal subsidies?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: The method of adding further health services to the health plan has been set out in the bill. The attitude the government of Canada took at the conference was that when a consensus developed amongst the provinces as to the importance of further services, the government would consider adding those services to the plan. We have made no decision as to further services at the present time except the statement that has been made with respect to services provided by dental or oral surgeons.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. At that federal-provincial meeting, was there any discussion about giving fiscal compensation to provinces not coming under the federal medical care insurance plan?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member not think that the question he has just put launches us in a debate and that, for this reason, it should not be allowed?

Mr. Allard: I do not, Mr. Speaker, because this question proceeds from the previous one.

[English]

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he has had any requests from any of the provinces for an extension of services other than those which the government initially stipulated for the medicare program?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am very much afraid that the question asked by the hon. member is substantially the same as that asked by the hon. member for Sherbrooke.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the light of discussions at the conference of health ministers during the past two days, is the government considering the possibility of advancing the effective date of medicare, as provided for under the Medical Care Act.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, this matter was raised at the conference but there was no request or disposition by any province to advance the date of medicare implementation. Accordingly the position of the federal government is unchanged. The starting date will be July 1, 1968, as provided for in the bill.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A supplementary question. The minister said that there would be no advancement of the date from July 1, 1968. When pushing the legislation through the house he said the bill might be implemented on or before July 1, 1968. I ask the minister what happened to that "before".

Mr. MacEachen: That has already been answered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knowles: It was just window dressing.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—REASON FOR HIGH RATE OF UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Since the minister has probably studied in detail the unemployment situation in Canada, could he tell us why, every year, just like this year, the province of Quebec alone has 40 per cent of the total number of unemployed in Canada? What are the reasons for such a situation?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the question is much too broad, much too wide. Therefore, the question as asked is not in order.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, for a number of years we have witnessed the same situation. My question is quite simple. Can the minister explain to the house the reason why Quebec always has 40 per cent of the total number of unemployed?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that his question cannot be asked at this time.

[Later:]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration on unemployment in Quebec.

I would like to know whether the minister intends to meet with the provincial authorities to discuss the measures indicated in an effort to reduce the unemployment rate in Quebec?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if Quebec feels the need of our co-operation to combat seasonal unemployment, I shall be happy to meet the representatives of Quebec.

As far as my department is concerned, we are already taking measures to combat seasonal unemployment with, among other things, the winter works program undertaken jointly with the provinces and the municipalities. There are also other federal programs, but we have no objection to considering any other suggestion from the province of Quebec which is aware of such problems, if they indicate their interest in solving them.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Apart from the winter works program, would the minister have any idea of other steps which should be taken in Quebec to reduce the unemployment rate?

Mr. Speaker: I think that this question is much too comprehensive. The hon. member is asking the minister for a statement normally made on motions.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

I would like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration when his department will be in a position to cope with all the applications made by the unemployed in Quebec for retraining courses as a result of technological changes?

Mr. Marchand: We are ready to cope with all the applications of the provinces which are prepared to provide courses, teachers and facilities.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INTERIM ADJUSTMENTS IN PENSION RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and ask whether he has yet received the report of the committee studying the question of veterans pension rates.

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received that report.

Mr. Patterson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would now consider the advisability of further interim increases and the inclusion of dependants in such increases.

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Speaker, that is the purpose of this study, and as I have already indicated I hope to have this report as soon as possible. If there is undue delay, then certainly the matter will be considered.

CAMP HILL, N.S.—REPORTED LACK OF HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he is in a position today to reply to the recurring questions I have been posing regarding the availability of bed space for veterans at Camp Hill hospital?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, I have had an inquiry made into this matter. The report I received enables me to assure the hon. member that no veteran has ever been refused hospitalization for a pensionable disability. However, the time of admission may not always coincide with the veteran's own wishes. This decision is reached in the light of medical emergency factors and is made by qualified medical practitioners. In terms of the specific case to which the hon. member referred me, I will give him a private report.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I thank the minister for his reply. I know he can only be guided in the answers he gives by the information he receives from Halifax. With your permission, sir, I should like to debate this matter at the first opportunity on the adjournment.

INCOME TAX

ACCEPTANCE OF RETURNS BEARING DATE OF MAY 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that the final date for the filing of income tax returns falls on Sunday, April 30, can the minister say if income tax returns filed or mailed on May 1 will be accepted as having been received on time?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): I will take the matter under consideration.

[Later:]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, further to the question raised earlier by the hon. member for Wellington South, the final date for filing personal income tax returns will be May 1. Returns postmarked up to midnight of May 1, 1968—

An hon. Member: For 1968?

Mr. Benson: I beg your pardon; I should have said 1967.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benson: Returns postmarked up to midnight of May 1, 1967, will be deemed to have been received on time, as provided for in the law.

SPORTS

APPLICATION TO HOLD 1970 WINTER GAMES IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister inform the house if any decision has been made with respect to Canada being host to the winter games, including alpine and nordic events, proposed for Banff national park in 1970 by the Canadian Amateur Ski Association?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I think probably the first part of the question should have been answered by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare. However, I believe he will permit me to tell the hon. member that we have made a small grant to assist the ski association in making the application. At the same time because Banff was indicated as a probable site they have been told we would much prefer that no application be made in respect of the nordic section.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT ON JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Solicitor General whether his attention has been drawn to a statement by Professor Ronald Price, who was a member of the special committee of the Department of Justice which prepared a report on juvenile deliquency in 1965, in which Professor Price is severely critical of delays and failure to implement the report's recommendations. Can the minister advise the house whether the government has accepted the report and if any progress has been made in implementing its recommendations?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question, which deals with a very important subject.

A study of the report is actively under way within the department with a view to revising the act. I cannot, of course, state categorically that we accept the report in full, because it raises a number of constitutional points. I should point out that the matter is complicated by the fact that the constitutional validity of the Juvenile Delinquents Act is now being questioned in the Supreme Court of Canada and, of course, any action should await the judgment of the court.

I should also add, Mr. Speaker, that at my request the report was discussed by the criminal law section of the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE ON NATION-WIDE ANTI-CRIME PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet perhaps I might deal with the question that was raised by the hon. member regarding a conference of attorneys general.

At the last conference of attorneys general the date of a future conference was left in abeyance. The law officers of the crown have had some correspondence with two attorneys general regarding a conference to discuss law enforcement and other matters. This exchange of correspondence is continuing and the matter of the conference is under consideration in terms of an agenda and timing. The extremely heavy commitments of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the centennial year is one consideration bearing on a date for such a conference.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAY DISPUTE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. K. Andras (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister tell the house what progress is being made in connection with the contract negotiations with the brotherhood of railway trainmen?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the house that I have received the final report of the mediator, Mr. Goldenberg. The tentative settlement that he reported to me some time ago and which needed confirmation by the members, has now been confirmed by an overwhelming majority, some 75 per cent. Therefore this leaves only one of the major railway disputes outstanding, and the board of arbitration set up to handle this dispute will be meeting within a matter of a few days. This, of course, will be an organizational meeting. Hearings will follow.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTED STUDY BY PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada.

[Mr. Pennell.]

In view of the statement made by the Quebec leader of the opposition, Mr. Lesage, as regards the necessity of modernizing our constitution, is the minister now willing to create a parliamentary committee on the constitution?

Hon .P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that the position of the government in regard to that question has not changed, that we still believe it is too early to set up such a committee.

[English]

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I should like to address a question to our energetic Minister of Labour, who also spends part of his time looking at Canada's housing crisis. In view of the continuing housing crisis has the minister anything further to report on the statement by the Prime Minister that the government is considering new initiatives to meet the situation? If so, can the minister tell us what those initiatives will be?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday I refused to allow the question on these lines from the other side of the house. The question asked by the hon. member sins in the way the question asked yesterday sinned. It is too general and asks the minister to make a general statement. For that reason I do not think it can be accepted in its present form.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): By way of a supplementary question may I ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot ask a supplementary question. He may ask a different question.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I shall do that. Several weeks ago, answering a question of mine, the Prime Minister said the government was giving consideration to the creation of a national ministry of housing and urban affairs. Has such a decision been made. If so, what sort of decision is it?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I question whether the hon. member has quoted the Prime Minister correctly, but regardless of that, I wish to say that if and when the government has any statement to make along the lines suggested by the hon. member it will be made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Grafftey: It is too late for this year.

[Later:]

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): I have a question for the Minister of Labour in connection with the housing problem.

An hon. Member: "Crisis."

Mr. Prittie: "Crisis", my hon. friend says. I should like to ask the minister whether reconsideration is being given to the policy of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation of refusing to grant loans in connection with apartment buildings in metropolitan areas.

Mr. Nicholson: This matter is under constant study, but—

Mr. Grafftey: That is all you do; study, study, study, study. No action.

Mr. Nicholson: I cannot see any likelihood of the corporation having to make a change in its policy, because the indications are that the traditional lending institutions are now coming back into the field on a scale which should make up for the deficit experienced last year. The figures indicate this clearly.

Mr. Grafftey: A minister of studies.

Mr. Prittie: In view of the fact that most people in Canada cannot afford to buy through the National Housing Act because their salaries are not large enough to enable them to qualify, what new proposals is the minister considering in order that these people may be in a position to qualify to purchase homes?

Mr. Speaker: Again this is far too general a question.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Revenue. I wonder whether the minister would consider removing the 11 per cent sales tax from building materials in order to facilitate house construction.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

FAILURE TO BROADCAST NEWS OF DAIRY POLICY DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State, who answers for the C.B.C., and pertains to the motion brought in yesterday by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette). Knowing the great interest that Canadian farmers have in this matter, would the hon. lady inform the house why the discussion was not mentioned last night on the C.B.C., so that Canadian farmers and all those in the various political parties interested might be reassured?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making representations to the minister instead of asking her a question.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, in that case, I wish to discuss the matter at ten o'clock.

EXPO '67

REPORTED INSISTENCE ON U.S. FUNDS AS PAYMENT FOR ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, my question arises from a newspaper article in my hand. I wish to address it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce who is responsible for Expo, but in his absence I shall address it to the minister answering for him. Is the government aware that certain motels and hotels in greater Montreal area are refusing other than United States funds in payment of accommodation? Also, does the government not think this is an insult to Canada and Canadians?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am not sure who is the acting minister of trade and commerce, but as I am the acting minister of almost everything else—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the absence of the Prime Minister I shall take the question as notice and see if there is any truth in the extraordinary statement the hon. gentleman has made.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HALIFAX—REQUEST OF DOCKYARD COUNCIL RESPECTING PAY RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): I wish to ask the acting minister for everything else my routine question, about an important matter. I wonder whether in the Prime Minister's absence the minister could indicate the government's position with respect to the matters raised in the urgent telegram forwarded today from federal local 173 of the Canadian Labour Congress in Halifax regarding artillery crafts, general trades and labour in H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): The telegram has not yet been brought to my attention. I can assure my hon. friend that it will be dealt with as soon as it is.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED PROTESTS RESPECTING TRADES TRAINING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on April 13 the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir) asked me whether I had received a representation from a group of workers of Sydney, Nova Scotia. I did receive such representations complaining of or charging political discrimination at the Canada manpower centre in Sydney and making allegations with respect to training allowances. I have ordered an investigation into those charges. As soon as I have that report I shall inform the house of what has taken place.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

NOTICE IN "VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS" ON ALLOCATION OF TIME FOR DEFENCE ACT DISCUSSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister who I presume is now the acting house leader. My question pertains to a notice of motion presented yesterday by the house leader and published in Votes and Proceedings. The house leader said that on Thursday next he would move a motion pertaining to closure. The latter part of the notice of motion as printed in Votes and Proceedings says:

> —that the motion will provide, that two days shall be allocated for the completion of discussion on the committee of the whole stage on Bill C-243, an act to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof (as amended), and that one day shall be allotted for the completion of the third reading stage on the bill.

Sir, the house may be taken by surprise unless those two days refer to two days in May, June, August, October or November, as I suggested to the house leader. There is nothing specific in the notice of motion to guide the house. The matter is indefinite and I ask the acting house leader if he can explain this type of invalid notice of motion.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I feel that to explain a notice of motion that is on the order paper would be anticipating a debate and contrary to the rules. I shall, however, ask the house leader if he will communicate with the spokesmen for parties on the other side of the house to clarify any lack of clarity there may be in the matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Will the acting house leader, who as usual is making light of a serious matter, not consider my question? Does the government not wish once again to be extricated from an error? This motion will be invalid if placed on the order paper tomorrow in this wording. We shall accordingly have to protest, to defend the rules of parliament.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member should protest at the appropriate time. I can assure him that I will not accept with levity any protest from so experienced a parliamentarian.

Mr. Churchill: May I direct a supplementary question on the same subject to the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister not pay serious attention to this matter, if he really intends to apply closure to the bill that has consumed so much of his time recently?

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR SUBSIDY ON SURPLUS FLUID MILK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to address a question to the acting minister of everything else, which I presume includes agriculture, and ask him what the government's response was or will be to the request that surplus fluid milk be reinstated in the dairy subsidization program.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I inadvertantly misinformed the house; I am not the Acting Minister of Agriculture. My colleague the minister for Indian affairs is, and he is much more experienced than I am.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Minister of Agriculture): I am so experienced that I will undertake to draw this question to the attention of the minister immediately on his return from his duties in London.

Mr. Olson: May I ask the Acting Minister of Agriculture how long that will be?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF LAURENTIAN SINGERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State, who is not afraid to answer anything. Will the hon. lady who is in charge of our centennial celebrations ask the centennial commission to consider inviting other non-Canadian groups as fine as the Laurentian Singers, now in the public gallery—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCleave: —to join in this Canadian celebration?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I thank the hon. gentleman for the compliment, and I should like to join him in welcoming these visitors.

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF BILINGUAL PREMIUM POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): I have a question which I trust is in order. After consulting with my very good Conservative friend from York-Humber (Mr. Cowan)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Choquette: —I thought I would direct the following question to a minister of great competence, the Minister of National Revenue. Is the government prepared to apply the 7 per cent premium policy to bilingual employees of the House of Commons?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): This is a question which I believe is more appropriately addressed to you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243 to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening, clause 2 was under consideration.

Mr. Dinsdale: It had been my hope that it would not have been necessary to participate again in this debate. I say this because as last week concluded it appeared the minister intended to spend a quiet week end considering some of the recommendations which had been made by members of the opposition, so that when the present week began it would be possible to arrange a reasonable compromise along lines which are usually followed by parliamentary institutions in a desire to resolve difficulties created by controversial measures of the kind now before us.

Unfortunately the attitude of the government has hardened instead of softened and the opposition is now faced with the inevitability of closure. This it seems to me is the antithesis of the process of parliamentary discussion, having regard to the nature of the bill now before the house. We have not moved beyond clause 2 in our consideration for the very good reason that that clause is revolutionary in its implications and in the effect it will have on our troops, on the defence of this nation and on the discharge of our obligations under international commitments. Some speakers have indicated that clause 2, which is the heart of the matter, is so revolutionary that it can only be compared with the great leaps forward which are taken by totalitarian régimes from time to time.

It was the irresponsible attitude on the part of the minister, supported, obviously by other members of the government—because no one on that side has disagreed with his viewpoint on this subject—which caused senior officers to retire prematurely rather than become identified with such a policy with respect to national defence and external affairs obligations undertaken by this nation.

I say it is customary among parliamentary institutions to reach some kind of consensus or compromise when there are such fundamental differences of opinion, and I enter the debate once more at this time in the realization that the government has obviously decided to continue its bulldozer approach to the legislation before us. Democracies move forward slowly. The very reason we suffer the relative tedium of the democratic process of discussion is because we all realize that no government or group of individuals is infallible.

• (3:20 p.m.)

It was Winston Churchill who said that democracy is the worst form of government ever devised by the mind of man, except for all other kinds. It seems to me that our friends on the government side who have decided on the application of closure have agreed with the first part of that thesis, that democracy is the worst form of government ever devised by the mind of man, and they are going to eliminate the processes of a democratic House of Commons that have been going on with reference to this present important issue, notwithstanding the fact that there have been reasonable alternatives put forward to the minister whereby he might achieve some sort of consensus. A consensus in a democratic country is always a relative thing.

I have been in this house for some 16 years and I have found that most of the legislation which has been passed during the period I have been here has been revised three or four times. The minister, however, takes the point of view in respect of this bill that it is absolutely perfect, that all other countries in the western world with follow the pattern that has been laid down by Canada and that this legislation will bring about a great increase in efficiency in our armed forces. In other words, it is the essence of perfection in so far as legislative procedures are concerned.

I submit that this is characteristic of the totalitarian mind. I have read the evidence of the former chief of the defence staff, and that given by the other men who were responsible for the military affairs of this nation less than one year ago. Without exception they have withdrawn their support from this legislation because they believe it is something that is going too far too fast, and that it will endanger Canada's position in the field of national defence. As I have indicated already it is only the minister and the government that have taken the totalitarian point of view that this is the essence of perfection. Throughout the discussion I have marvelled at the ability of the government party to maintain unbroken discipline in the course of the debate. We are dealing with a most serious subject. Obviously there are members on the government who must have serious reservations. The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) for example, is such a member; but he rationalizes the legislation and says that actually it is no different from integration.

All members of this house agree with integration as it was provided for under the legislation of 1964; yet we are accused of being Colonel Blimpish, of tilting at windmills, and of resisting the process of technological change. These are fine propaganda phrases. I shall in the course of my remarks deal with that particular item. Our friend, the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) who should be resisting this legislation, rationalizes and says that it is nothing more than integration.

It seems to me that hon. members on the government side have not really read even the explanatory notes in the bill, because I find in these notes the following:

> The policy of the government that the three services of the Canadian Forces be unified was stated in the white paper—

And so on. Then in the last sentence of this explanatory note it goes on to say:

> Since that time the planning required for the integration process has continued and it is now considered appropriate to proceed to the final goal of a unified defence force for Canada.

That is the aspect of this legislation that was resisted, even at the sacrifice of their careers, by the responsible military leaders of this nation. Then we go to the explanation of clause 2:

> The purpose of the amendment to section 15 is to provide that the Canadian Forces will consist of one service called the Canadian Armed Forces, rather than three services as at present.

This is not integration; it is unification or, as it is described on the order paper, amalgamation of the navy, the army and the air force. I submit that this is a revolutionary leap forward and is not the usual manner in which democracies adapt to changing circumstances. It is more in line with the slogan which seems to have replaced the traditional policy of our Liberal friends. They now follow the slogan of power, patronage and perpetuity.

The minister himself has indicated—and it is repeated in the explanatory notes—that he has legislative authority to proceed with the necessary reorganization and now what he wants is a blank cheque to completely change the basis of the organization of the armed forces of Canada. Democratic parliaments do not give blank cheques to governments. Democratic parliaments—particularly those which follow the British pattern—always reserve the right to demonstrate where the government is in error. In this particular instance the minister has substituted slogans for facts. This has been commented upon editorially as being an unseemly rush. He has drawn rosy pictures of the inevitable result of this well evaluated legislation. He has described it in the most exaggerated terms. This seems to be an unusual position for someone who operates under our democratic system of government to take.

I know the suggestion has been and is being put forward that the government has been forced to bring in closure because the opposition refuses to let this decision be made by the due processes of discussion in the house. We know that this is a house of minorities; we know there is a regional imbalance of representation in this parliament. We know that the government does not respect the national perspective or the national consensus on any matter. This is the reason I feel it has been able to get away with divisive legislation during its brief three or four year history in this country.

This decision to invoke closure, however, is not new. It was referred to by the chairman of the Liberal caucus committee, the hon. member for Durham, away back on March 28 when he indicated in a letter to his constituents that this likely would have to be the ultimate manoeuvre of the government if it was to get its controversial bill through the house. This is not a conclusion they have reached because of the intransigence of the opposition. They were thinking in these terms long before this debate in this final stage was under way in the house. This, of course, is true to the Liberal attitude on most matters.

During the second world war the Minister of Agriculture served with a night fighter squadron much the same as I did. I am surprised he has not taken part in this debate, because night fighters above all groups were aware of the success of combined operations, and the benefits in esprit de corps of the rivalry and competition based on traditions and records that had been established. There was this sense of keen competition even between the three Canadian night fighter squadrons. As I say, I am surprised based on his experience he has not taken part or made any comment about this measure.

Some two weeks ago we invited the Minister of Agriculture to my constituency to preside at the opening of the Manitoba Winter Fair. Unfortunately he could not find room in his departmental aircraft for the member for Brandon-Souris and I was not able to accompany him to that constituency on that occasion. At that time he did make certain statements which I thought were a little out of place for a man who had been invited to preside in a ceremonial way at the opening of that fair, which is reputed to be the best of its kind in Canada, next to the Royal Winter Fair in Toronto.

I have in my hand an article from the Brandon Sun of April 4, just after the minister's visit, in which he is reported to have said he had all sorts of useful agriculture legislation to bring before the house but the opposition would not let him do so. One might say that kind of comment is a violation of western hospitality, and if the minister were a westerner I am sure he would not have trespassed in this manner. One does not deal with partisan political matters when attending a function as a result of an invitation by the people concerned.

According to this article the minister, in reference to loans for agricultural fairs, said this:

> Noting that making such loans available was "one of the planks in our last campaign", Mr. Greene noted that "delay" by the opposition has prevented the government from bringing the measure to the house so far.

Who is in control of the business of this house, the government or the opposition? Obviously the government cannot get other business done if it insists on pursuing controversial items of this kind. The Minister of National Defence said that all he wanted was a blank cheque. I quote him quite precisely on this regard. He has also said he has the legislative authority to proceed with integration and reorganization. He gave this assurance in the explanatory notes and during his opening statement at the commencement of the committee stage on April 3. The minister has also said that unification will not go forward to completion for five or ten years. Why are we blockading all the other wonderful pieces of legislation the government continues to talk about? The government suggests that the opposition in this house is creating this blockade. This is unadulterated propaganda.

It must be obvious to anyone who has travelled in western Canada that we have a good sense of humour. In this regard let me refer to a headline which appeared in the Brandon Sun on April 3. The headline is "Greene in city to open fair today". The subheading is "Bull judging first big item". I think this speaks for itself, having regard to the comments made later by the minister for agriculture. I am not sure whether he got first prize or not because the story does not go on to deal with that aspect of the matter.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the minister qualify as an expert in this field?

Mr. Dinsdale: I should not like to express an opinion because in a democracy we do not deal with absolutes. In a democracy we move forward slowly in order to avoid making great mistakes, such as those made by totalitarian states within recent tragic memory. Keeping this in mind I ask again why we are pressing forward with this measure regardless of consequences.

I have read clause 2 and the explanatory notes. I have searched the records of the committee, I have been in the house during most of the debate on this bill, and I have come to the conclusion that the amalgamation of the navy, army and air force, as a matter of practical organization, cannot be successful. No matter what we call these forces, we still have one operating on the land, one in the air and one on the sea. Three separate environments are involved. No matter how you bang your head against the wall you cannot amalgamate, unify or bring these three environments together, into one.

I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for St. Ann, one of the few government spokesmen thus far. He assured the members of this committee that combat units will retain their identity. In my lexicon that means there is not going to be unification or amalgamation This whole matter is very confusing. The hon. member for St. Ann also said the men would not be jacks-of-all-trades. Surely that is gobbledegook or double talk of the most confusing kind.

If these forces or units are going to retain their operational identities, why should we go through this charade of amalgamation or unification? Why should we continue to push forward unnecessary legislation? A democracy should try to get by with a minimum of legislation, yet this government insists on a maximum amount camouflaged as positive action. All we can do is change the names of these forces, and a rose by any other name will smell as sweet.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre dealt in detail with this whole matter of name change. Like that hon. member, the only logical explanation I can discover for supposed unification or amalgamation is that this is an attempt to change the name, because unification or amalgamation is an operational or organizational impossibility. If the minister wants to change the names why does he not do so in a forthright and direct manner rather than by this subterfuge?

Clause 2 of this bill states in part:

> The Canadian forces are the armed forces of Her Majesty raised by Canada and consist of one service called the Canadian Armed Forces.

If this one force is to be Her Majesty's armed forces why should we not call it the Royal Canadian Armed Forces? There seems to be something in this whole business that is not according to Hoyle. There have been some other contradictions in the minister's statements, some of which have been pointed out. He suggests that we must have civilian control of the armed forces and that he had to take severe disciplinary action against insubordination in the military ranks. His treatment of those who have spoken out against unification and amalgamation is quite different from the treatment of those who spoke out in favour of it. Those in favour of amalgamation and unification are the latter day experts who have come to positions of prominence because they have supported the minister.

This is totalitarianism; this is not democracy in action. This is authoritarianism. The principle is: You agree with me, or off comes your head. This prevents the possibility of debate. It prevents the possibility of any difference of opinion, if you are going to listen only to those to whom you want to listen. There are none so blind as those who will not see, or so deaf as those who will not hear. As the Globe and Mail editorial of Wednesday, March 22 put it, "Does Mr. Hellyer hear only what he chooses to hear?"

We have military leaders at the moment verging perilously close to participating in political discussion while this debate is continuing, yet they are praised by the minister for their great sense of responsibility and public duty. Here is confusion and contradiction beyond all comprehension. The other day the minister criticized the right hon. Leader of the Opposition because that gentleman when he was prime minister had the temerity to exert civilian control over the military with respect to the selection of the CF-104. Yet the minister himself has stoutly defended the selection of the C-5, even though it was just as stoutly resisted by the air force authorities. I am not going to get into a debate on that subject; perhaps we will deal with it later in this discussion. I do not want to take up time in dealing with some of the technical details with respect to the merits of the CF-5 as opposed to the other types of aircraft which might have been selected. However, perhaps I may mention that its load capacity is limited as compared with the F-4 or the A-7. Its air refuelling capacity is less; its endurance is half that of other types of aircraft. Notwithstanding all its deficiencies and the recommendations of the authorities, the minister chose the C-5. But he criticizes the right hon. Leader of the Opposition for similar action when he had the responsibility as prime minister of this nation.

There is another question that interests me. I refer to the control of the news media by the minister and his staff. I mention this in passing. I recall the night of the famous interview on television of Lord Mountbatten. In the middle of the interview and out of the blue—it turned out that this particular television clip had been taken some months previously—strategically and suddenly at a critical moment in the debate Lord Mountbatten seemed to be supporting the idea of unification and amalgamation. There is something rotten in the state of Denmark, as they say.

There is another reason, of course, why the minister is pursuing this headlong course. It is because of his inexperience operationally, which has been mentioned before. We have been described as Colonel Blimps resisting change; but if you unify our forces in this complex, technological age, if you bring them all together in one great monolithic unit, how can you maintain the specialization and flexibility that are required to meet the complexities of our technological age? A monolithic unit, rather than providing for flexibility introduces rigidity. The minister says: If you have a single supreme commander, you must have a single force. That is nonsense. It is not even necessary to debate the point, because in every other area of modern society we are moving toward specialization, we are moving toward specialized knowledge in complex fields so that we might not introduce institutional rigidity into our national structure. Anybody who has operated under conditions of modern warfare will understand that this is so. This is why Lord Mountbatten emphasizes combined operations and bringing the various units together, with their backgrounds of tradition and esprit de corps, with their specialized knowledge. This business of rigidity and inflexibility is the product of the sawdust Caesars, the men of the first part of the twentieth century who brought their nations to the brink of disaster by their rigidity and even their stupidity in their approach to military matters.

Not very long ago I was re-reading "The First and the Last" by the German general, Adolf Galland, who commanded the luftwaffe during the last war. He attributes the collapse of the luftwaffe, which was supposed to be supreme in its field, to the fact that the civilian authority took over, interfered with and ignored the advice of the military experts. I mention one example in this respect. I would recommend the reading of this book to the minister, who is obviously a military strategist. Corporal Hitler overruled the luftwaffe experts when they had developed the jet aeroplane ahead of other nations. The jet aeroplane could have played a major role in determining the outcome of the war. Corporal Hitler overruled his experts and decreed that the aeroplane should be modified and used as a blitz bomber rather than being involved in the fighter force. This resulted in a delay of some six months in the production of the aircraft. Decisions of this nature had the gravest consequence.

I am not going to deal further with the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. His was one of the major contributions to this debate and I think what he said has been adequately dealt with. The Secretary of State for External Affairs did not in any way reassure the members of this house that we were going to be able to meet our commitments to NATO, NORAD and the United Nations. In fact, it is impossible for us to say we will be able to meet those commitments because we do not yet know what they are going to be. Also, we have the expert advice from retired generals, admirals, air marshals, and so on, that the reverse will be the case.

I want to conclude my remarks by dealing with a matter that I do not think has been raised in this debate. The minister has talked about the interservice rivalry which will be removed by amalgamation. I would like to suggest—

The Chairman: Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired. Does the hon. member wish to continue?

Mr. Dinsdale: With your permission, Mr. Chairman, and that of the committee I should like to finish this point.

The Chairman: Does the hon. member have the permission of the committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Dinsdale: I thank the committee and you, sir, for this consideration. The removal of interservice rivalry has been put forward as one of the main reasons for the necessity for unification. But what are we doing? We are developing a mobile command which will constitute a large part of our Canadian armed forces; 29,000 men will be in the command when it reaches its peak. Its headquarters are located at St. Hubert, which again is contrary to good military policy because we are locating the headquarters or the core of our armed forces on the fringe of a metropolitan complex which would be the first to be destroyed in the event of a missile attack. Hitherto the emphasis has always been on decentralization and dispersal of our strategic military headquarters. It would be much better to have it out in the west—I suppose the west is expendable; at least it is from the government's standpoint—where there will be no danger of obliteration by ICBM's which most probably will be aimed at Toronto and Montreal. St. Hubert, which is the heart of our mobile command, sits right in the centre of the target. This makes no sense whatsoever.

The mobile command consists of three infantry brigades in Canada and later will include four squadrons of CF-5 jet attack planes, as well as Buffalo transport planes and heavy and light helicopters.

It has administrative control of the infantry brigade in Europe. It is also expected that mobile command will take over maritime command's fleet, the replenishment vessel, the Provider, as a troopship, and two similar ships for which contracts were recently awarded. The maritime command being mainly naval is of course disturbed about this. The R.C.A.F. component of maritime command, the four squadrons of patrol planes, is obviously unhappy about being swallowed by the navy. Also the R.C.A.F. fear that mobile command will try to get its hands on air transport command. This seems to be inevitable in view of the course that is being taken at present. It leaves the air force with only the air division in Europe, and the air defence command, and both these roles are withering away.

[The Chairman.]

The minister said there are no complaints in the armed forces. He said the troops are rejoicing at what is taking place. This is not what my mail says, this is not what my wartime buddies say. They are trying to get my ear at every opportunity to try to encourage us to stop this headlong rush toward confusion on which the government is embarked at the present time.

These informants tell me that the old power struggle between the three services is being rapidly replaced by an even fiercer struggle between the field commands. Inevitably we will be faced with the situation where mobile command has become a power unto itself. This will create divisions and jealousies. Unification will destroy the old names and the old esprit de corps. The second state will be much worse than the first.

It is these considerations that have persuaded me to address myself again to the minister as an old friend. A short time ago the minister was making laudatory headlines with regard to the necessary reorganization of integration. However, today he is beating his head against the wall and is rapidly losing his reputation. Let us, in the spirit of democratic institutions everywhere, try to come to some reasonable compromise. Let us either accept some of the amendments which were put forward in the committee's discussions, or else perhaps let us delay the proclamation, if that will resolve the present impasse which faces the house. Another possibility, which I think might be the wise course to take, would be to withdraw the bill. The bill is not necessary. We have all the legislative power that we need. Let us move forward step by step to make sure we do not make the fundamental errors that other totalitarian states have made in this twentieth century.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, to change slightly the tone of this debate which has lasted for several days, and even several weeks, I should like to say that it stirs no interest in the public. I feel that the Conservative members would put an end to this useless and futile debate were it not for their fear of losing face as a result of the attitude they adopted long ago.

They have accused us of wanting to help the government by voting in favour of the unification of the Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Chairman, in the public at large, we meet people who favour unification, and others who are against it. For that matter, the situation is the same here in parliament.

During a similar debate, that on the adoption of a distinctively Canadian flag, a lot of interest was stirred up right across Canada, and we received hundreds and thousands of letters from all over the country, asking us to take such or such an attitude, but we find no similar interest in the case of the unification bill. People do not write in about this.

Yesterday at noon, I addressed the Ottawa West Rotary Club, English speaking people, businessmen, professionals, industrialists. They are definitely disgusted with the time lost here in parliament by the extension of this debate, through repetitions without, however, any clear and precise solution to the problem.

We are studying Bill No. C-243. All its clauses were studied by the committee on national defence where every member had the right to attend, where he could discuss, and express his viewpoint. Everyone interested in the matter went there. Back in the house, we will have to go back once more to the committee. The discussion here is as long as it was in committee. Later, in committee, it will be as long as it was here. The bill will come back for third reading and we will no doubt discuss it again, repeating once more what we have heard for a month and a half. In the meantime, the Canadian people are paying for that loss of time.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday I proposed the adjournment of the business of the house to discuss a definite subject namely the problems of the dairy industry. All the Conservative and Liberal members should have supported the motion to change the debate and discuss a matter concerning an important sector of the Canadian economy, namely agriculture. Instead of that, we carried on the debate on Bill No. C-243. There are pros and cons. Some are afraid of closure, others are afraid to lose votes in their ridings.

I was saying that the Canadian people were not very much interested in this matter. In fact, I received one telegram and one letter. The telegram was from London, and the letter from Winnipeg—probably from the riding of my excellent friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill)—and I quote:

• (4:00 p.m.)

[English]

Dear Mr. Caouette,

I cannot understand why unification of armed forces must proceed. It almost sounds like "peace at any price" of those who appease war-makers. If it is clearly so good why do great numbers of taxpayers, students, armed service personnel (of long practical experience) oppose the plan and its consequences of Canada having no effective fighting force to defend Canada first?

How can one possibly believe the idea money will be saved except by combining, say, postal and health services? Without competition between fighting regiments (or their sports) how can their morale possibly be as good? Until these and other dangers stated and unstated are settled carefully would it not be safer for Canada to vote no? Keep up the constructive work you do as a fighter for freedom with responsibility and private enterprise.

I will not mention the name, but the letter comes from Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Mr. Churchill: Will you vote against the bill now, having received that?

Mr. Caouette: Pardon?

Mr. Churchill: Will you vote against the bill, having received that letter?

Mr. Caouette: Well, I have a telegram which—

Mr. Churchill: It is very sound advice.

Mr. Caouette: Yes, it is very sound advice. I have a telegram here which is a little clearer. It is dated April 18, which was last night. I should like to read it:

Mr. Réal Caouette
Social Credit Rally Leader,
Parliament Buildings, Ottawa.

Dear Sir: I am not a Social Crediter—

He may be a Conservative.

Mr. Churchill: A wise man.

Mr. Caouette: Yes.

—but I think that you have the interest of the Canadian people at heart, so would you please use your influence in trying to get this unification bill through.

Mr. Churchill: He is a Liberal.

Mr. Caouette: I continue:

I am a veteran of 18 years of service—

Just as many years as my hon. friend.

—and I would say that 85 to 90 per cent like I are in favour of this unification bill so would you please help to keep us together. We have full confidence in our Minister of Defence, Mr. Hellyer.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): It sounds as though Bill Lee sent that telegram.

Mr. Caouette: The telegram reads:

We have confidence in our Minister of Defence, Mr. Hellyer.

It is signed, "A corporal from London, Ontario". I will not say the name, but he has been in the armed forces for 18 years. My friend was asking me if I would vote against the bill now. These are the only two communications I have received, one from London, Ontario, and the other one from Winnipeg, Manitoba.

[Translation]

In my province, Mr. Chairman, we did not receive a single letter or telegram suggesting that we should vote one way or the other. In Quebec, we have the Royal 22nd which is, I think, a rather important and illustrious regiment in the Canadian army, and although we are told today about experts in the Canadian army who are fighting Bill No. C-243, there are others who are not fighting it.

General Allard is not opposed to it. Some may say that General Allard is in favour of unification because he is the commander in chief of the Canadian armed forces. We can impute motives to him, Mr. Chairman, but we can also impute motives to those who hold different views.

We live in a democratic country and we certainly have the right to be against this measure. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) has the right to oppose Bill No. C-243, but we have just as much right to be in favour of this bill. We have reasons for approving this bill, just as the hon. member has reasons for being against it.

Personally, I see one Canadian army, not three. I see one Canadian army as a Canadian family, with a father, a mother and 10 children. The 10 children, sir, will not all become lawyers, or businessmen; they will not all get into the same trade; no. Each of the 10 children will go his own way, but will nevertheless remain within the same family; that is a unified family.

What prevents the people in the air force, the army or the navy from being part of a single force while remaining in the land army, the air force or the navy? Nothing whatsoever, Mr. Chairman.

I suggest all this is a tempest in a teapot; somebody is trying to turn the matter of the Canadian army into a clearly and purely political matter. Now, the Canadian army must stay above political matters or considerations. The Canadian army is neither Conservative nor Liberal nor Social Credit; the Canadian army is the army of the Canadian people. It is the army of all Canada. This army belongs to the Canadian people and not to the government. The present government may change in a year or two; it will be followed by another which will possibly be changed four years later, whereas the Canadian army will last regardless of political considerations or changes of government.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is perfectly aware of what I say and he knows I am right in speaking as I do.

When his government was in power, pressures were then exerted to unify the Canadian armed forces. If this government were still in power now, it would probably have to introduce a bill which might not be Bill No. C-243 but possibly Bill No. C-995 but which would propose exactly what the government or the Canadian armed forces are now asking.

Look at what is going on across Canada. The hon. member knows that the present debate is of no interest anywhere in Canada, neither in his own constituency nor in my own, neither in Montreal nor in Toronto.

Yesterday I met prominent citizens of Toronto, people who had military service in Canada and who support the unification of the Canadian forces into one army.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I did not understand what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) said.

Mr. Mongrain: You haven't missed a thing.

Mr. Caouette: So, I haven't missed a thing.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: I asked the hon. gentleman if he met the people from Toronto who were not in favour of unification?

Mr. Caouette: I will be very frank with the hon. member and say that up until now I have never met anyone from Toronto who was against this Bill No. C-243.

Mr. Dinsdale: Have you met the members of TRIO? They seem to be against it and they are based in Toronto.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I do not deny the fact just referred to by the hon. member. I do not dispute it. It may be true. But with those I have met from Toronto yesterday, it was not a question of finding out whether they were Conservatives or Liberals or Social Crediters. Not at all. But we did discuss this debate and everybody found it horrible.

And the Conservatives are responsible for it because we have been ready to vote on this bill for two weeks now. If the bill is defeated, all right then, it will be defeated; if not, then it will pass.

It seems to me that under our democratic system we should at least have the privilege of taking a stand by voting in the house. The Conservatives are free to vote against Bill No. C-243. But as it is, they are preventing the house from voting on this matter, by going on with this marathon of speeches.

I sincerely think that I am now giving to Canada as a whole a true image of what is going on in parliament. This debate is disgusting to the people, costs hundreds of thousands of dollars to taxpayers and settles absolutely nothing. If the unification of the forces does not answer the purpose in ten years, it will still be time to change something.

We are neither angels nor saints. Legislation passed today can be amended in a year if it is not effective then.

The Canadian army is not now what it was in 1914-18. The means to fight are not the same as those which were used then. Everything has changed since 1914, even since the 1939-45 war. Weapons are not the same, means are not the same, systems of communication are not the same. Everything has changed, everything has evolved. Only the Conservatives are not following the times. They remain firmly seated in their place. They keep their conservatism: Let us keep outworn doctrines, obsolete methods, let us stand still; Let us show some stability. And what is the meaning of stability? To move neither forward not backward, but to remain always at the same place? But this is exactly what the Conservatives are doing at the present time.

The hon. member is making fun of Canadians, he is showing a complete lack of concern for the Canadian taxpayer in trying to prolong the debate. Tomorrow he will shout "closure" when a motion is brought in to put an end to the debate.

Mr. Chairman, we are going to accept that closure, to muzzle those irresponsible members of the house. We are certainly going to vote in favour of it.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Caouette: Certainly.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member accept a question? A question now and again helps out a debater who is running short of ideas.

Mr. Hellyer: You could have used some yourself last night.

Mr. Churchill: In view of the really grave problem that the hon. member raised yesterday concerning the dairy industry, and the opportunity that was afforded the government to debate the matter in the house yesterday, was it not the fault of the government that we continued on the unification bill? Second, does the hon. member not realize that the Liberals, whom he so slavishly supports on every occasion, do not really want his assistance; otherwise they would have permitted the debate on the dairy industry yesterday?

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, as for the first part of the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, I will say he is right. Yesterday, I believe, the Liberals dodged their responsibilities and I charge those of the province of Quebec—I can see some there—who were too scared yesterday, and it is very much in order to say this, to get up and stand for the farmers, for the milk producers of Canada. This I will repeat throughout the whole province of Quebec, and in any case the whole province knows about it.

I make an exception for those from Montreal who never saw a cow being milked in their lives and do not understand the dairy industry situation, but the others from the province of Quebec are responsible if the government's dairy policy is not more generous.

The second part of the question is to the effect that we have an understanding with the Liberals, to support them or to have them support us on another occasion; there is no question of that and there will never be any question of that. And the hon. member is very well aware that we have voted more often with his group against the government than for the government since 1962. It is a fact. We are not bound to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre or to the Liberal members. The Liberal members from Quebec know that we are not bound to them. We are free. We can say whatever we like and we can vote as we see fit. But we want to vote in the best interests of the Canadian people.

As far as the change proposed in Bill No. C-243 is concerned, I think it cannot be effected overnight. It will take ten or 15 years perhaps before unification can be accomplished. But I am pretty sure that at that time, the cost of national defence for the country as a whole will be less than it is at present. We shall then be able to take out of the billions saved through unification certain amounts that we could appropriate to agriculture, to our domestic expansion, to the development of our natural resources.

Then, as I say, we will have helped every class of our Canadian society, every Canadian, regardless of political consideration. I am convinced of that.

That is why we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, have decided to vote in favour of Bill No. C-243. There are no other reasons. It is not for the reason suggested by the hon. member, to the effect that the Liberals opposed the debate yesterday, though it is true that they did oppose it.

Had the ministers, had the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) suggested yesterday that we should debate the matter of the Canadian dairy industry, Mr. Chairman, we would probably be still at it today, had the house given unanimous consent. But no, there is no wish to—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I believe that the hon. member has no right to speak as he is doing at present, because we are quite familiar with standing orders on this side of the house and we knew that the motion introduced yesterday would be lost, as it actually was.

I would ask my good friends of the Ralliement Créditiste to learn the rules of the house properly and not to introduce to no avail motions for an urgent debate when the said rules do not allow it.

[English]

The Chairman: Order. This might be a good time for the Chair to remind hon. members that the question before the committee is clause 2 of Bill No. C-243.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) rose last night and took the time to say what he had to say. Again this afternoon he is allowed to repeat exactly the same stupidities he uttered last night in this house.

I want to say this: if the Liberals had accepted the debate yesterday, we would have had it. They know that the motion has not been ruled out of order. It was said yesterday specifically that it was not the proper time for such a debate but that it might be the proper time today.

When the time comes for a vote of non-confidence Mr. Chairman, the member for Lotbinière may take a position for or against the farmers of his constituency of Lotbinière.

As far as the standing orders are concerned, I believe the members of the Ralliement Créditiste understand them as well as the hon. member for Lotbinière who is 100 per cent wrong and far afield when he rises in the house to make a speech or on a point of order.

Mr. Choquette: Sure. That is because I like the fields.

Mr. Caouette: Precisely, but perhaps you do not like the same sort of things.

Mr. Chairman, I do not hold a grudge against the member for Lotbinière, not at all. He is a fine fellow, a gentleman. His only weakness is being too Liberal. When he is not overly Liberal, he is otherwise intelligent.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, I conclude my remarks here with a specific and clear reminder that we want to be objective in this debate. The Conservatives know that we are wasting the time of the house and that there are other important items of legislation to pass. They have been told that we could stand section 2 temporarily, in order to pass other sections, and that we could come back to section 2 later, but no, they do not want to do so; they are stubborn.

All I ask is that the debate make some progress, that we get on with our discussions and that we stop ridiculing the Canadian people and making ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the Canadian people. This question of unification must be settled. Very soon the government will be charged with dictatorship because of a motion calling for the end of the debate in committee. I do not consider that as the application of a gag but rather as the establishment of some kind of order to make us stop wasting our time here.

We must be objective and see the bill as it is. If we must try something new, let us go ahead. Something must be tried. If it does not work, it is possible to make a change, but let us try it. And if the experiment proves to be useless, unsuccessful, I will be the first to turn against it and to look for a new way of creating a Canadian army which will be effective, which will not waste money, of which we will be proud not only in Canada but throughout the world.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a contribution to this debate, because I think it is a most important and most interesting one, and because I cannot understand the stubbornness of the official opposition in fighting this legislation, particularly the stubbornness of the flying squad, if I may call it that, composed mainly of the hon. members for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent), the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis).

One of the arguments of the official opposition against Bill No. C-243, from the start of this debate, has been that all retired top officers oppose the unification of the armed forces.

At the beginning of my remarks I should like to put on the record some of the statements issued by officers who are surely as distinguished as those who are opposed to unification and integration, by high-ranking retired officers who give their unqualified support to unification.

The first is that of Air Vice Marshal Sully, as reproduced by the Canadian Press on November 9, 1966, and I quote:

[English]

When so many ex senior officers are bursting into print with emotional opposition to Mr. Hellyer's plans for unification of our defence services, it is time that some of us who support this forward movement spoke up.

As an experienced senior officer and as a businessman,—

And I emphasize "businessman".

—I find it difficult to understand how any rationally-minded man could oppose this excellent move to unification of our defence services.

Mr. Dinsdale: He must be a Liberal. A Liberal must have written that.

Mr. Prud'homme: Politics are not allowed in the Canadian armed forces.

Continuing:

I speak with intimate knowledge when I say that if the public was aware of the tremendous overlapping of effort, and the consequent inefficiency, and of the appalling inter-service jealousies and rivalries for status, they would rise as one and demand immediate unification and at a much faster clip than is now planned.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member identify the author of that?

Mr. Prud'homme: In case the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre wonders, I did my share in the Canadian armed forces. I was in Shilo, Manitoba, for two years, and I was in a position to see that what the minister advocates is correct. I shall now continue quoting:

Another problem that worries me and indeed frightens me, is that this plan was put forward over two years ago. Everyone was informed of it and the intention of this plan was obvious to any thoughtful man or officer. What were these senior officers doing in the last two years? They have had every opportunity to express themselves. Have they just finally found their way through on this business? This frightens me. Is this an indication of the lethargy in thinking in our services? Fortunately, I have spoken to many young and dedicated officers and they are all enthusiastic about the plan. Of course, some others will have to "pull up their socks" and perhaps they shudder a bit.

[Translation]

And he continues as follows:

[English]

To our politicians, please get thinking about Canada. Forget about your party status. This is a real opportunity and you will be happy and proud you had a chance to help.

Mr. Churchill: Who signed that article?

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: I would ask you now to hear what Commodore A. B. Fraser-Harris has to say:

[English]

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member identify the author?

Mr. Prud'homme: This is by the Canadian Press of November 9, 1966.

Mr. Churchill: But who is the author of the letter?

Mr. Prud'homme: Air Vice Marshal Sully.

[Translation]

Let us listen now to Commodore A. B. Fraser-Harris, who said the following in a telegram he sent to the Canadian Press, probably to Mr. David MacIntosh, of whom I should like to speak later:

[English]

Heard from abroad the traditionalist uproar against service unification. At a time when enlightened people throughout the world are learning at last that the pigment of human skin is not a mark of quality, local concern over the colour of a uniform or the title of a man appears singularly unimpressive.

And please listen to this:

Let us always be willing to learn from history and be strengthened by tradition but let us never forget that history is made by the actions of men and that men create tradition and pride of title not vice versa.

Unification of the three services is undoubtedly sound and timely. Let interservice jealousy, personal rivalry and the extravagances of triplication give way to a single, effective and streamlined service in which Canadians can build future history and new tradition in the service of Canada, whether by land, sea, air or space.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would the hon. member permit a question? It seems to me that the hon. member is talking about integration and not unification. If he talks of unification how can he bring the sea, land, air and space together.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: I very seldom rise to speak in the house and hon. members opposite have told me so. With your permission, I shall come back to this whole problem. As far as I am concerned, it is part of the same operation.

Those statements, Mr. Chairman, are those of retired senior officers. They know very well what they are talking about and they definitely support unification. Their number increases constantly.

As for members of the opposition, at a certain time, and even today, I count seven of them—which shows the extraordinary opposition they have raised against this matter which, according to them, will destroy our traditions—I count one, two, three, four, five and even nine of them in the house. Monday night last, April 3, there were only five. That is no doubt an indication of their conviction.

Wing Commander Yellowlees certainly put his finger on it when he said, and I quote the Calgary-Herald of December 10, 1966:

[English]

For months now Canadians have been watching military traditionalists arguing against unification. The dispute unfortunately, has been shamefully distorted by emotion, blatant politics and jowl-shaking demagoguery.

This is written by a man called Yellowlees —not Lee.

Mr. Churchill: Lee's name comes into everything.

Mr. Prud'homme: That is the name I have heard many times since this debate started.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

However, I cannot understand those relentless attacks against a man by the name of Lee.

[Mr. Prud'homme.]

[English]

I have heard it said of Mr. David McIntosh of the Canadian Press that he is biased, superficial, and does not report objectively to the Canadian population. He may be biased yet many editorials are written on his reports, columns are based on them and cartoons are drawn. I do not wish it to be thought that when I speak I reflect the words of Mr. Lee, just as I do not think when the hon. member for Athabasca speaks he reflects the hidden words of Mr. McIntosh. I do not care to behave in that way. I shall now continue:

Modern—and future—military operations call for hard, business-like methods. The scientist, the engineer and the logistics expert will be all-important.

That might have concerned the hon. member for Brandon—

An hon. Member: Brandon-Souris.

Mr. Prud'homme: Brandon has a nice sound. I went there every week end for two summers.

Mr. Churchill: It is close to Shilo.

Mr. Prud'homme: I continue quoting:

The future demands the utmost in efficiency. Let us listen to Mr. Hellyer.

[Translation]

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see briefly who is against this policy. They are of many categories. First, there is the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) who still endeavours to define unification but who did not bother to read the record of the committee proceedings in which, on many instances, the minister defined unification as follows:

[English]

When I refer to a unified force, I refer to a single integrated service encompassing the naval, land, air and support units necessary to carry out its assigned roles and missions, and operating under unified management.

[Translation]

That is clear enough, I think. And then there is the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent). I intended to take up every point of his numerous statements. I am not in the habit, on the other hand, of launching verbal attacks against anybody in an unparliamentary manner. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) must have noted that I have followed his remarks very closely. I have listened to his many interventions which are always made courteously. I obviously disagree with the hon. member, but I must admit that he expresses his views in an acceptable and reasonable manner, at least in this house.

His participation in this debate is not to be compared with that of the member for Edmonton-Strathcona who is constantly using insulting language and always suspecting conspiracies everywhere, behind the curtains, in the office of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) and in the Liberal caucus. I would rather not mention the hon. member's remarks, but I say to this house that whether or not we are in favour of the unification and integration of our armed forces, we ought never utter such words. That was unfortunate, and if I were allowed to do so, I would apologize for him before the house for the remarks he made here.

Next, there is the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis). All hon. members know him.

[English]

He is a jumping member, always very devoted to his constituency, I would agree; but when it comes to these large and important questions I think he is completely out of order. I am sorry he is not here; I am sure we could have a good debate between us. Perhaps we shall have it at another time.

[Translation]

But for some reason, which is beyond my understanding, the member for Cape Breton South replaced the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Fane) during some of the committee meetings.

The major contribution of the hon. member of Cape Breton South during the discussion was a personal and malicious attack against the minister. I took out several other epithets, because I want to concentrate on what I said earlier about the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. Mr. Chairman, I pass over three lines of the text which I had prepared and over all the epithets which I could have used to qualify, not the member for Cape Breton South personally, but his statements. So, he said these things about the hon. minister, and above all, he offered the fallacious idea that unification would lead to conscription.

Moreover, our hon. friend, the member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) said the same things last night. He also saw the dark cloud of conscription looming on the horizon. He knows that his words may cause the people to follow him, the nation or the state call it what you will; I do not like semantics as much as that. He will try to arouse the feelings of the French speaking population which seems to be afraid of conscription. I think the hon. members for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot and for Cape Breton South get on well together. They will probably be conscripted, but certainly not in the army.

Now, I shall talk about the contribution made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, instead of dealing with Bill No. C-243, made a violent diatribe against the new Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) who, it seems, had written some articles in a magazine called Cité Libre. Therefore, I made a few inquiries. I remember when I was a student, regularly reading Cité Libre as all the University students did in the province of Quebec.

I particularly remembered that the new Minister of Justice was even then an impartial observer, and that he had not merely talked about Liberal members and the Liberal party.

In an article I will be allowed to quote—I will do exactly as he did—written by Pierre Elliott Trudeau in Cité Libre on April 16, 1960, here is what the author said of the then prime minister, Mr. Diefenbaker now Leader of the Opposition:

DIEFENBAKER UP IN A BALLOON

—Mr. Diefenbaker could have chosen—without being blamed for it—to govern quietly during the years required to learn the trade of statesman. If he had proceeded thus, by slow and thoughtful maturation, the Conservative leader might have eventually given his party a truly historic dimension. Whereas now, that party is in way of becoming the usual mixture of loud-mouths and adventurers, a collection of lawyers at so much per mile and contractors at so much per square foot, in short, the traditional party of Canadian politicians.

In fact, Mr. Diefenbaker has chosen to strain his talent. Elected by the greatest majority since confederation, this leader could hardly bear to think that some traces of the Liberal legend could subsist. He seemed determined to overshadow the very shadows filling our current political history.

First, there was Mr. Pearson, Nobel prize, highly respected in every chancery throughout the world and leader of the opposition.

Mr. Grafftey: That is because Mr. Trudeau was a socialist at that time.

Mr. Prud'homme:

Mr. Diefenbaker had to rush to overshadow him by rising as a giant on the international scene.

You remember Mr. Chairman, his dream, his vision of a great commonwealth—

To go on:

Unfortunately, his balloon sprung a leak over Asia, notably in Pakistan where misery, riots and anti-parliamentary governments showed him a thing or two on the hazards of a common policy—

But there was also Mr. Howe, this satyr of trade and finance who had left his indelible imprint on the direction of our economy.

Mr. Diefenbaker decided that any trace of that man had to disappear, and he hurriedly announced a drastic 15 per cent reorientation of our international trade. In terms of political economy, it was very odd; but Great Britain made as though it played the game by proposing a free-trade system between our two countries.

• (4:40 p.m.)

There was also Mr. St. Laurent, one of the main architects of NATO and, who, in another field, was responsible for the repatriation of part of the Canadian constitution by amendment No. 2 of 1949. To outdo as fast as possible the achievements of the former liberal leader on strategic matters, Mr. Diefenbaker hurriedly led us into certain commitments towards NORAD with such an ill-considered zeal that our country finds itself in a state of military dependence which brings it back 100 years. And now, in the constitutional field, Mr. Diefenbaker announces that he will repatriate—

I spare you the rest, Mr. Chairman, but I wind up Mr. Trudeau's article, and I have many others anyway. Therefore I quote:

In all those instances, and in many others, those were generous measures but—one must regret it—they remained for the most part, just good intentions. They were balloons filled with hot air and pushed by the wind which invariably crashed with their operator before going too far.

Mr. Diefenbaker's good intentions have failed so often that we are justified to find in them the very nature of his style—

And he has not changed, as you will note.

—now, as Buffon said, the style is the man himself. Thinking that inspiration does for reflection, he lacks the patience or the modesty to hurry slowly, he does not find it necessary to gather around him men able to establish the Canadian policy on deeprooted reason.

I will spare the house this quotation and go on.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Asselin, Richmond-Wolfe): Will the hon. member allow the hon. member for Rosthern to ask him a question?

Mr. Prud'homme: When I have concluded my remarks, Mr. Chairman. I come now to retired officers.

Mr. Grafftey: He was giving his support to the New Democratic Party at that time.

[Mr. Prud'homme.]

Mr. Prud'homme: Yes, and that goes to prove the open-mindedness of the Liberal party; he saw the light and joined the Liberal party. What can I do about it?

You know, Mr. Chairman, some people spend their lives dreaming. As for him, he is a practical man. He knew he could build something concrete, he realized that only within the Liberal party he could make his fair contribution to the greatness of this country, Canada, and that is why he joined the Liberal party. That also is the reason why the hon. member for Hochelaga became a member of the Liberal party, and that goes for the Quebec leader also. What is wrong with that?

The Progressive Conservatives cannot do that because they would rather look to the past than to the future.

I quote the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, when he said at the beginning of his remarks on April 5, 1967—

Mr. Grafftey: They are only good opportunists.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi wants to, he can tell it himself to the Minister of Justice who will surely reply.

I ask the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi to note the essential difference between the Liberal and Conservative parties. I therefore quote the member for Winnipeg South Centre who said on Wednesday April 5, 1967:

I begin, by expressing my regret that in our centennial year we should be involved in a debate such as this. During centennial year, we are emphasizing the history and traditions of our country in every hamlet—

I will read no further, Mr. Chairman. But when the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre rose to speak and set forth his theory on Canada, my speech was ready and I wanted to rise and say:

As we enter the second century of our existence, we must come up with bills such as the one proposed to us by the defence minister, which are oriented toward the future, without necessarily disavowing the past.

But the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was consistent with himself and with the policy of his party, which is to look to the past and ignore the world in which we live. He is consistent with the policy of his party. I do not blame him for it, I am not insulting him. Let us not disturb him, for he is listening carefully.

That is the basic difference between a Conservative and a Liberal. Perhaps, the Conservative party needs a unification and integration bill, for the integration of the forces which are scattered for unification.

There are retired officers. I think Group Captain Patrick—and I should like to insist, because I would not want the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre or some other hon. members opposite to say that I am trying to speak against our British institutions, for I respect them—

[English]

—I will say that in English. I respect our traditions and our past. I am proud to be a member of this House of Commons where we have the British parliamentary system. I respect that; but I am not so blind that I cannot look to the future—

[Translation]

—said exactly what I should have liked to say, but I prefer to quote his own words, which are at the bottom of page 1284:

[English]

One of the fears expressed about integration which does have a certain amount of popular appeal has to do with tradition—and tradition is symbolized by one word, "uniform".

We do not have a Canadian uniform, just as we did not have a Canadian flag. Many of the same kind of people who raised such a fuss about getting a new flag now do so over the uniform and for the same reasons.

[Translation]

I went to the trouble of seeking out the names of those who spoke in the flag debate. I went to the trouble of listening to the 290 speeches made in this house at that time. I was a brand new member of parliament. The same arguments were repeated then. The hon. members taking part in the present debate are the very same ones who spoke then. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent) spoke eight times; the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) spoke three times; the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) spoke five times; the hon, member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) spoke ten times; and the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) spoke 22 times. These same people, today, when we are studying a bill to Canadianize our institutions, are again rising to accuse us of wishing to repudiate our past.

I do not deny our past and our Canadian institutions. But I believe Canada is the country in the world which has known the longest and most peaceful evolution toward complete sovereignty.

And I say that this bill is part of this normal evolution of Canadian institutions. When I look to the future, does that mean that I jeer at the past? Does that mean, for instance, that I am not proud of the part played by my brother who served in the armed services and fought in Europe during seven years? Does that mean that those who died, whether they were French speaking or English speaking—

[English]

Personally I am becoming a little tired of speaking in both English and French. I should like to make this clear, however, that I am proud to be participating in this debate as a French Canadian. To correct myself, I will say I am proud to be participating in this debate as a Canadian of French culture. So I am going to speak in your language because I like you. At least you stand for your principles. I disagree with your principles, but at least you stand for them. However, as a Canadian of French culture I believe you know where I put the emphasis. I think this is a good bill; it is a bill for the young Canadians to be proud of.

[Translation]

I do not see why the hon. member would not be proud to take part in it. Air colonel Kenneth Patrick continues by saying:

[English]

We do not have a Canadian uniform.

The Canadian Navy uniform is a copy of the British Navy uniform.

[Translation]

And I have another quotation.

[English]

I think it was Admiral Brock or Admiral Rayner who explained that the Canadian Navy uniform is different because it has a zipper. Big deal.

I will continue with the quotation:

The Canadian Army uniform is the British Army uniform.

There is nothing distinctively Canadian about any of our uniforms and this has already caused some real problem in our peace keeping tasks. There is a quotation here which is very long and I do not intend to read it, but I suggest that hon. members might read it. During the last war and during the years since, Canadian servicemen have had a problem to identify themselves as Canadians. One of the ways of doing this is with a distinctive Canadian uniform. Is it being anti-British to ask for something that is pro-Canadian? I should like somebody some day to explain that to me.

There is evidence at the moment that in England there is a new demand for one armed service. I turn to the Morning Herald of Sydney, Australia.

You should read this article. It is very interesting.

> The debate has been given impetus by the submission of annual plans by individual departments.
> Critics are saying that Mr. Healey's latest reforms, mainly the abolition of separate ministers for each of the three services, do not go anything like far enough.
> It is known that proposals for much more sweeping reforms have been put to Mr. Healey—

Not Hellyer—Healey.

> —particularly for a unified policy on weapons. Mr. Healey has rejected these proposals. He is a "strong" minister who feels he can overcome inter-service rivalries and he refuses to contemplate an ultimate unified armed service. He argues that tradition is too deeply embedded.

It seems that only Canadians could think that our minister could not do something good in this way. It seems to be the belief of some that everything the minister does, because he sits on this side of the house, is wrong. I have read the article in the Sydney Morning Herald where it refers to Mr. Paul Hellyer as the able and thrusting Canadian defence minister.

[Translation]

I conclude—I still have five minutes; I kept track of my time—with Mr. Patrick's last paragraph.

[English]

> There is talk about the new uniform, the colour and what type it should be. I do not think anybody really cares so long as it is sensible and functional.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, a fortnight ago the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre—he has a lot to say—asked that the Red Ensign be flown at Vimy. I respect the Red Ensign, but it no longer is the Canadian flag. The single leaf flag is Canada's flag.

Mr. Chairman, much is said, often blindly, within the bounds of tradition, with no possibility of escape toward new attractive concepts.

[Mr. Prud'homme.]

[English]

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Prud'homme: I have just four minutes.

Mr. Churchill: All right.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) have asked for a pause in order to think things over and make sure we are heading in the right direction. But did they stop to think whether it was wise to clamour for the resignation of the chief of staff, General Allard, or to tell him in the house to "shut up"? Did they take the time to check the accuracy of the reports published in the press? Surely not. No more, indeed, than they apologize for the off-hand manner in which they handled this unfortunate affair.

On the other hand, we find on the part of headquarters nothing but sensible and effective planning, checked and double-checked, with the assurance that it is time to go ahead, that we are going in the right direction and that the time to act has come.

Mr. Chairman, I pass over two quotations, because I would like to read the last one. I shall not say—I do not think I will be forced to do it—who said this.

• (4:50 p.m.)

[English]

If you should like to know who made the statement let me read you the last paragraph of my speech. Before doing so I should say that I am not referring to any hon. member of this house. This is the quotation:

> Any idiot can go on doing what has been done before, but it takes real courage, intelligence and character to assess the needs of the future, to devise a sound program and carry it into effect. This is particularly true of the armed services, which become merely an expensive luxury unless the process of improvement, modernization, forward thinking, and planning goes on continuously.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Prud'homme: This was said in an address to the Royal Society of Military Engineers on July 20, 1962, by someone I hope my hon. friends will respect. It was said by none other than the husband of the Queen of Canada, the Duke of Edinburgh.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Prud'homme: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I still have three minutes so that—

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. gentleman's allotted time has expired. Does he have unanimous consent to answer questions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, my question is as follows: I admit that the hon. member for Saint-Denis' eloquence is proverbial, if I can thus express myself. He entertained us and was interesting. Why did the hon. member not show the same eloquence in favour of Canadian milk producers yesterday when I brought forward a motion to adjourn the business of the house to discuss the matter?

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Chairman, I know that I am probably out of order, but I will answer briefly. If the hon. member knew the work performed at the Quebec caucus, if he were aware of the representations made by the Quebec members at the national caucus, in short, if he knew the work done in a special committee of the Liberal caucus of Canada concerning farming policy—he is just coming from Montreal, he said so—he would not speak as he is doing now. Soon, however, he will recognize what has been accomplished, by the hon. member for Lotbinière, Richmond-Wolfe and Lévis, Messrs. Choquette, Asselin, Guay, in short, by all those who represent rural constituencies.

Mr. Choquette: Another $30 million for agriculture.

Mr. Prud'homme: Then, the hon. member for Villeneuve will see that farmers will be delighted to meet unbiased members of the Liberal party who do not wish to be demagogic with respect to the dairy policy of the Liberal government.

Mr. Caouette: Ineffectual work.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. The committee has heard the question and the answer, both of which are out of order.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, the same old story is coming from the Liberal side of this house; there is no need to discuss this bill further.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bigg: It is always encouraging to receive applause at the beginning of one's speech. I am quite sure that when I have finished there will be little applause from that side of the house. I had not intended to begin on an emotional note, but the last speaker would be disappointed if I did not pay some attention to his remarks. Let me say a word or two in this regard. That hon. member was trying to present the same old argument. In doing so he was attempting to drive a wedge between loyal English speaking Canadians and loyal French speaking Canadians, and there are many in both categories.

It is not fair to say that because a man spoke on the flag debate or now speaks on the defence debate, he is necessarily a wasp. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that on June 13, 1940, I was not baring my little bosom to the spear in the outskirts of London. I was within 30 miles of Paris, and I was with a very specialized arm of the services, the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery.

Some hon. Members: Near the rear.

Mr. Bigg: I do not believe unification as it has been explained so far is at all necessary to meet the needs for men of tremendous experience, training and specialization. I am not one of those, nor shall I ever be, who would refuse to serve my country because of the colour of the uniform—and I know something about serving in a colourful uniform, as many hon. members are aware. I like to put first things first.

When I spoke on this debate the other day I was referring to the survival of Canada for Canadians. We must attack this whole suggested method of survival at its root. Are we willing as a nation to defend Canada to the last man? My answer is an unequivocal yes. I believe everyone who has accepted Canadian citizenship, whether of French, Ukrainian, German or any other origin, would accept anything that would increase the efficiency of our armed forces.

We are debating this bill because we want to satisfy ourselves that in the long term planning for the defence of Canada it will be sound in every last detail. I am not against any revolution which is evolutionary and will streamline our active forces.

As my last reference to personalities during this debate I should like to say that I find it a little tiresome to be lectured about my dedication or motivation by an individual whose great claim to military experience is two years at Camp Shilo and three years in Laflèche Caverne. I speak from experience because I was on the outskirts of Paris in 1940. I think that everyone should give credit to those who were there for having decent motives.

Let me paraphrase what Gibbon wrote in "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire". He said that Rome fell when the young men would rather wear silk pants and play with dice in the streets than defend the walls of Rome. I appeal to everyone within the sound of my voice or who takes the trouble to read Hansard—and I know that I will not be quoted by the press—to realize that we are dealing with a very basic principle of survival. Surely we should all listen to anyone who wants to make some contribution to this debate.

The role of the defence department is unique and defence should not in any way be based on politics. This department should serve Canada. That is its only job and only reason for existence. If you will pardon my rather stilted French, it is the raison d'être. I assure the minister and the defence department that I am not afraid of revolutionary changes which increase the efficiency of our armed forces.

As I said before, I do not think these things depend on the colour of the uniform. We have listened to many emotional appeals with regard to these wonderful uniforms, but I think any real soldier would serve Canada regardless of the colour of the uniform. If there is a policy, whether it is in the mind of the minister, the Department of National Defence as a whole, a political party or leaders in this country, no matter how eminent they may be, of looking forward with confidence to the peaceful existence of mankind on this planet, and that policy with regard to our defence is predicated on this wonderful dream, I say those who have devised the policy are self-condemned and self-disqualified in respect of this very important job.

I believe the revolutionary ideas of the minister are pale, compared with some of my own. I am not the minister of national defence. Rather than the emphasis being put on unification and doing away with regimental mottos and regimental dress, I would like to see a standardization of defence for the North American continent. I would like to see our defence units interchangeable with those of the Americans, because nobody but a blind man, nobody but a deaf man would suggest that we can survive in the next 25 years on this planet unless we stand shoulder to shoulder with our American allies. I say "American allies" because we are allies of theirs in two great theatres; I do not think you could call us allies of theirs in the Pacific theatre at the present time. I believe very sincere efforts are being made by Canada to be a mediator in this conflict. I would like to see Canada able to mediate and be instrumental in bringing peace to Viet Nam, peace with honour, in the name of humanity. But I do not think a red herring should be dragged into this defence debate and that because we are trying to do something worth while in Viet Nam, Cyprus or the Gaza strip we should close our eyes to the need for taking a very, very hard look at establishing a fully effective armed force for Canada.

I believe it is not necessary to unify our forces in the way put forward in this bill. I would like to see this money spent in standardization, because I believe that standardization between us and the Americans on land, sea, in the air and even in space, would in the end result save us money; and who is there so base that they would not try to save us money—with apologies to Shakespeare.

The standardizing of training is extremely important. I cannot conceive of our taking part in another world war without our American cousins there to supply men at the ratio of 10 to 1, and probably 20 to 1 in dollars. It would be a sensible move on our part if, when we needed ammunition, we could get it from our allies; if when we needed spare parts for our tanks, the assembly lines in the United States were able to supply them; if when we needed shells, we could get them from our allies. We should be able to call upon our allies to help us when help is needed. In a total war, which we can visualize, the whole potential of Canada's manufacturing industry could be knocked out with one blow. With about three atom bombs you could knock out Canada's effectiveness in manufacturing.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we should go for standardization rather than unification. In my opinion it will not help Canada one bit to establish a small, very ineffective, unified force as envisaged by this bill. The colour of the uniform of this unified force will not help in the defence of Canada. I doubt very much whether changing the uniform to that of one solid colour, whatever colour it may be, will encourage us to stand together man for man and carry our burden man for man. We would all go for a standardization of uniform if it meant there would be no such thing in the future as a hyphenated Canadian and we were all just Canadians. Would the previous speaker have me believe that standardizing the uniform will mean we will get more volunteers from all the ethnic groups in Canada? Does the hon. member think that for a minute?

I can see something in standardizing training. Certainly we should train all our officers so that they have a broad knowledge of military affairs. We live in a complicated world. In future wars we will probably want to transport our troops by air. It would therefore be very desirable if all our officers, and men if we could do this, had a working knowledge of airplanes, tactics and aerodynamics. However, as an ex-service officer I know this cannot be done. I know that you cannot make an expert artillery officer, an expert submarine commander and an expert jet pilot out of each and every one of us. We all know this, so why pretend? If we realize that we cannot do this, why not spell it out and say so? If we do not expect men to be jacks-of-all-trades and masters of none, let us spell it out and say that we still need specialists.

The minister does not say this; he uses ambiguous language in this bill. As we discuss the clauses of the bill we will take every word and deal with its significance. It is said that in an emergency servicemen can be transferred. Gentlemen, war is an emergency. The only reason for having armed forces at all is the threat of war. We are not spending $1.7 billion a year to maintain a gentlemen's club. The object should be to train men for war. That is the only reason for our having a Department of National Defence.

I would be delighted to make some contribution to a world peace keeping force. As hon. members know perfectly well, the recent suggestion by Canada has already been turned down. I have no doubt that as the United Nations gains in world prestige and as the communist nations in particular mature and recognize the need for world peace, nations will be willing to go along with the consensus of the world. I hope this will be the case, but we have not yet seen any indication that it will be. Russia has consistently refused to pay her way in the United Nations. China is not yet seated in the United Nations. We are not debating that topic at the moment; we must look at the world situation as it exists. Every move made by our Department of National Defence must be toward the security of this nation. The Department of National Defence should be taking a long term view in this respect. We must put wishful thinking in the background, which is its proper place.

The last speaker mentioned one or two things with which I cannot disagree. We need men of courage. We need men of character. We need men who are not afraid to lead. We need men who cannot be panicked in any situation. We need men who will put the defence of Canada first. We must have men whose characters stand up between wars, who are prepared to take a cold, hard look at the situation in the world and say that we must remain prepared and must remain strong.

I would like to see Canada so strong at home, so united, so well trained in our armed forces, and so well able to protect this sprawling northern half of the North American continent that she could afford to give some of her armed strength to the underprivileged nations of the world, in the name of the United Nations. I am proud of the contributions we have made so far, but if we take 29,000 men and spread them out to put out six spot fires in the world, what are we going to do if the ugly shadow of a war were to hang over Canada?

I do not know whether I am making my point clearly. I am not only criticizing; I am offering an alternative. My alternative to unification, as it is laid down in the bill, is standardization. It also means national service. This is supposed to be a dirty word; it is supposed to be one we are afraid to use in this country. Why should it be? What is wrong with serving Canada? I am not asking anyone to go off on Anglo-Saxon wars. I am asking that Canada be defended. Why should it be otherwise?

Some of my ancestors were in this country when Jacques Cartier landed. Let nobody give me the senior citizen act, in other words, "We were here first and you took our country away". We did no such thing. The Anglo-Saxon part of my family came out here looking for exactly the same thing as did the glorious French settlers. They were looking for a better life. They were looking for freedom. These people have made me proud to be a Canadian.

We Canadians of the two founding races stood together on two occasions when we were invaded by the now friendly nation to the south, something it has not seen fit to do again in 150 years. It was not because our soldiers were dressed in a common uniform. They had no uniforms: They fought in their overalls; they fought in their skirts; the women helped, the children loaded the guns. The only unification we had then was the unification of our dedication to Canada. We will not achieve unification in Canada by branding everyone who does not speak the same language or is not of the same race. Name calling, whether it be between person and person or race and race, will never make Canada what I want it to be.

I hope the small contribution I made during the war will not be misinterpreted, because at that time I was fighting for the French Canadians as well as the English Canadians and the Indian Canadians. I fought for the little creek out west as well as for the little creek in Quebec, and the acreage surrounding it. So let us stop calling each other names. Let us take a good hard look at our defence. Let us not indulge in negative emotionalism, which is just as bad as positive emotionalism.

We should all be aware of the contribution made by the people of French origin in this country, the members of the Royal 22nd Regiment, which is second to none. I may be wrong and I stand to be corrected, but it is my understanding that an exception will be made in the case of the Royal 22nd Regiment so far as unification is concerned, in that it will be allowed to keep its proud traditions. If such is the case, why then should we ask all other units to give up their traditions? There is good reason for allowing the Royal 22nd to keep its name, and the reason is that in two world wars it has made that name immortal. There is no virtue whatsoever in burying traditions which are worth keeping, but I would be the first to bury those traditions which tend to divide us.

The hon. member for Saint-Denis did not take the trouble to remind the house that I spoke four times in the flag debate for a total of 160 minutes. I am not ashamed to advise hon. members to get out their Hansards and read my speeches. If anyone can find one word in those speeches which tended to inflame our differences, rather than to beg for mutual respect, which I expect and which I give to every Canadian citizen, I will resign my seat in the house. During those speeches I was interrupted and was told to my face that I would be "rubbed out". I did not lose my temper because I realized that those were emotional interjections which were not to be taken seriously by anyone who wants us to be a great nation—which we can be and which we are.

It is unseemly for us to put anything above the welfare of Canada. We need a department of defence which represents parliament and therefore the people of Canada. We need a minister who is not only daring but who bends an attentive ear for all those people who can help him achieve this great end. Having served under men like Lieutenant General Guy Simonds I cannot believe that he would do anything but give the minister, directly or indirectly, the kind of advice which comes from the bottom of his heart.

I cannot believe that men, some of whom have served in the Royal Canadian Navy for more than 30 years, would do anything but give the minister the kind of advice which they believe will make Canada's navy even better than it has been throughout our magnificent history. The same applies to our air force. By the turn of this century we may have to move into a category of defence where space looms large. I hope that the other branches of our services, which relatively speaking are falling in importance, our land, naval and air services, will be given proper emphasis and the proper number of dollars in their kitties. Are we to be panicked into unifying our forces, without thought, merely because in the past there were those in the armed services who thought more of building a little empire of their own than they did of serving Canada, or those who would rather climb over the next in rank in order to get the brass. No doubt there would be such people in Canada but they are few and far between, or else Canada would not have the finest naval, air force and army personnel to be found anywhere in the world.

We are not happy to give up our traditions. We are proud of the gallant men whose ranks are thinning, men who made greater sacrifices and gave greater service to the country than I ever did. I had to see the Battle of Britain from the ground. I was in England for four and a half years and ate the rations which were brought across by our merchant navy, which has not as yet received the recognition which I think it deserves. Who would not rather have been an infantry officer in England stationed in the sunny south downs than chief petty officer in the stoke-hole? But these little things are not important. There is not a serving member in the Canadian armed forces who cares more about medals or uniforms than to serve the country and keep it free.

I am sincerely worried about whether or not Canada will ever take her part again in fighting, if necessary, an aggressive war for freedom. I do not know when a war is aggressive and when it is purely defensive. The little training I received taught me that in many cases the best defence is offence. You have to be trained therefore to last, as well as to retain your temper and to keep quiet. There is a time for fighting and there is a time for talking peace. The role of the defence department is not that of talking peace. They have one job, and one job only, and that is to make sure that in time of danger Canada and Canadians can give a good account of themselves.

Are the days of 1914 when Winston Churchill was First Lord of the Admiralty forgotten? In the first days of August the cabinet met and decided it was inauspicious —that is the kind of word we use in peacetime—for the British parliament to mobilize the British fleet. However, during the 48 hours before war was declared Churchill mobilized the British fleet on his own initiative. This was not very democratic but is was common sense. This type of common sense has not been bettered in 53 years. This is the kind of leadership we need, but we cannot legislate that kind of leadership.

I could not agree more with the hon. member who just spoke when he said that you need character at the top. Character at the top will sift down right to the last serving man, to the last taxpayer in Canada. When you get this kind of dedication, this type of character, then the battle is half won. I have nothing to say about the character of the defence minister except perhaps to suggest he should take a good look at this bill to make sure the idea behind it is based on this one, clear fact, that this change is the best change he could make at this time for the future of our country. He has to be able to do that, perhaps against the will of his own leader. His own leader has the job of being a world statesman; he has to go to the peace tables around the world to try to make deals. The defence minister in Canada cannot make a deal with anybody, except his own conscience, before God, because the life of every man, woman and child in Canada is on the table.

Personally, I do not believe anything short of some definite move toward national service is any good at all. I do not expect there will be general agreement with this idea. We are in between two wars and we see no enemy. Certainly, I know that the survival of Britain depended on the fact that four out of five in England had seen some service. It was the home guard of England which held her together in the darkest days of the blitz. Thousands and thousands of men, some of them as old as 70, knew what to do. They knew where to go and how to take orders. The whole nation, at least mentally, was geared for war. It was the brass that let the people down then. The generals and the admirals did not speak out strongly but allowed the government to go to sleep. It was a miracle of character, a miracle of training, that held the British nation together. I unhesitatingly, therefore, believe it would be good for every young man in Canada to have a reasonable period of back straightening.

I have thought a lot about this matter. It would be a wonderful thing if every young man in Canada between the ages of 18 and 25 had an opportunity to put in, say, 18 months of national service. He could get out in the fresh air, meet friends from every corner of Canada and develop a little bit of physical fitness. He could get a little bit of discipline and be introduced to a pair of shears. You could clean him up and give him some soap and water. Who knows, he may get used to it. By the way, I am not pointing the finger and saying that I believe all young Canadians are long-haired slobs. They are not; but we should give every man, and today perhaps the women as well, not only an opportunity to do his or her duty but should give them the opportunity to undertake a national obligation by putting themselves at the service of their country for a short time. They should be given an opportunity, while they are young and active, not only to know themselves but to know other young people in Canada, who I know are basically just as good as we ever were, and perhaps in many cases a good deal better.

The Chairman: Order. I wish to advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Finish your remarks.

Mr. Bigg: Thank you. I have spoken to thousands of people in Canada and I know that this sounds like a politically hot issue. However, if we can get together to give our young people in Canada an opportunity to do this, I think it would be a nine day wonder. Before the turn of the century, people would look back and say that in centennial year we did some planning, that we gave up talking about the meaning of words like "unification", "standardization" and "morale", and all these other things and took some positive, sensible steps to see that when our test comes our young men will not be sitting in the streets playing with dice but will be manning Canada's walls.

National Defence Act Amendment

Mr. Herridge: I wish to make a few comments with respect to what I consider to be a certain amount of discrimination against the women who serve in our armed forces. My comments are based on conversations I have had with women serving in the navy, army and air force, as well as a number of other persons who are interested in this question either because of their interest in the armed forces or their interest in the question of non-discrimination because of colour, creed or sex. What I have to say, Mr. Chairman, is related directly to the principle and purpose of this bill because it is related to the efficient development of integration and to the maintenance of morale in the armed forces.

I know the minister has spoken on this question several times during the debate. I know the associate minister is also interested in doing all he can to maintain the morale of the armed forces. In that connection and in support of the argument I wish to make very briefly later, Mr. Chairman, I should like to quote from a statement made by the Prime Minister in this house on February 3 when he annonced the appointment of the royal commission on the status of women:

• (5:30 p.m.)

The government has decided to establish a royal commission on the status of women.

The Chairman will be Mrs. John Bird of Ottawa. Other members of the commission will be announced when their appointments have been completed.

The royal commission will be asked to inquire into and report on the status of women in Canada and to recommend that steps might be taken by the federal government to ensure their equality with men in all aspects of Canadian society. Its findings will, of course, have to take into account the division of legislative powers between the federal and provincial governments under the constitution.

The commissioners will be free to look into such matters as they feel are relevant and in particular the following areas:

—Laws and practices under federal jurisdiction concerning the political rights of women;

—The present and potential role of women in the Canadian labour force, including the special problems of married women in employment and measures that might be taken under federal jurisdiction to help in meeting them;—

That includes the Department of National Defence.

—Measures that might be taken under federal jurisdiction to permit the better use of the skills and education of women, including the special re-training requirements of married women who wish to re-enter professional or skilled employment;—

[Mr. Bigg.]

That too applies to the Department of National Defence.

—Federal labour laws and regulations in their application to women;

—Laws, practices and policies concerning the employment and promotion of women in the federal civil service, by federal crown corporations and by federal agencies;—

That provision relates directly to the Department of National Defence.

—Federal taxation pertaining to women;

—Marriage and divorce;

—The position of women under the criminal law;

—Immigration and citizenship laws, policies and practices with respect to women.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the policy announced by the Prime Minister to which the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has given his endorsement on many occasions in this house, as well as in speeches across the country. He is particularly concerned with the question of discrimination on any ground whatever in this country, and I support both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in their approach to this very important matter. I am bringing these matters to the attention of the committee, Mr. Chairman, because they have been brought to my attention.

The committee may be interested to know that a number of women serving in the armed forces have informed me that they consider there is a measure of discrimination in the fact that women are not permitted to be trained for combat service in peace keeping operations. I was rather surprised to find that that was the case. I did make inquiries of certain sections of our armed forces, but I found no direct representations have been made to the navy, army or air force women's sections in this regard.

However, it has been suggested that the government should consider the policy adopted by the state of Israel and other countries whereby women have proven to be an effective arm of the combat forces of the country in question. I might say that in this respect there is a precedent in Canadian history. Anyone who knows the history of this country is aware that in the early days men and women fought together to defend this country from the invader and the enemy.

I am pleased to see that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare is showing some interest in this question. I mention it here because it has been brought to my attention, and I always try to represent the views of persons in my constituency and in other parts of Canada. As a result I agreed to bring the matter to the attention of this house. I would suggest to the associate minister, who I am pleased to notice is listening to me very carefully indeed, that he bring this question to the attention of the minister so that some consideration might be given to the inclusion of women in combat forces particularly used for peace keeping purposes.

I want to bring to the attention of the associate minister another matter in connection with the reserve officers training plan. I am informed that this does not apply to the army at all, and to the air force only when commissions are given from the ranks when the requirement exists. I understand that there is no discrimination as far as the navy is concerned with respect to their servicemen having the opportunity to take advantage of the reserve officers training plan.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this is another illustration of a form of discrimination which requires the attention of the minister and the associate minister, particularly in view of government policy as announced in this house and by various ministers throughout the country, and also in view of the speeches made on this question by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the present Minister of Justice, both of whom are very interested in this problem. I trust that the associate minister will make note of this question for later consideration. There have been some complaints in this respect and I did promise to raise this matter in the house.

I should also like to deal with the medical students subsidy to those serving in the armed forces. I am informed that this subsidy is not applicable to women serving in the army, as they are considered a reserve. I am also informed that the air force has not received any applications for medical students subsidy and therefore does not consider it necessary at this time. I might point out that it has not received any applications because nothing has been done to promote any applications. In many cases people are unaware that the subsidy is available. I am also informed that the medical students subsidy does not apply to the nursing service. I am told that it is not the policy of the nursing service to subsidize young nurses in schools of nursing. This is the practice in the United States, where I understand very substantial subsidies are given for training, as is the case in other countries.

I trust that the associate minister will correct me if I am inaccurate in this respect, but I understand that the Canadian defence authorities feel that many young girls would marry before completing the course. I am not sure that that is a valid argument because I know that there are a number of young women who would like to train for nursing in the armed services. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, once again I suggest there is discrimination in the application of the medical students subsidy, and I think this also merits the attention of the associate minister.

If I appear to be hesitating, Mr. Chairman, it is because I am somewhat at a loss for words and I am a little embarrassed to some extent. When I was on the defence committee following the second world war I made certain inquiries and discovered that the defence department had thousands of pairs of unused items described officially as "leg coverings, female, black". I inquired what these were, and I must say that this is a rather delicate question for a shy, old backwoods man like myself to deal with. However, when duty calls I am prepared to accept the call. I will try to be as lucid as possible on this rather unusual topic, but in order to complete my argument I must rely to some extent on the imagination of the members present. I have gone into this matter, Mr. Chairman, and I am pleased to say that this practice of distributing, by order, what were known as "leg coverings, female, black", has been discontinued. I inquired of the services most carefully, and I am glad to say that that has been discontinued, that at the present time another policy has come into force and that a grant of $15 is given to each woman on joining the armed services toward the cost of her unmentionables. In addition, the service is so generous—one ought to relate this to what the men get—that there is a grant of $1 per month to each woman in the armed services for the maintenance of these unmentionables. That is an improvement on the former policy. I note that, because I thought it was most improper for the general staff to choose the colour of a lady's unmentionables.

I understand that women in our armed services up to the rank of warrant officer first class are entitled to a clothing allowance of $8 a month. I find that there is much discrimination in the amounts allowed by the armed services, when one compares the allowances given to women as against those given to men. The small allowances given to women for the maintenance of their garments in question does show that the minister and associate minister ought to look into this matter carefully to make certain that this gross discrimination does not continue.

As I said before, this is a delicate and difficult subject. I promised the ladies in question that I would bring it to the attention of the house and I have done so, even though it has been difficult for me. I am sure you appreciate that, Mr. Chairman, knowing my usual modesty.

I also wish to deal with the question of disease and the population explosion, and here again I am somewhat embarrassed. I am informed that the men of the armed services are provided with certain devices to prevent disease and the population explosion. That information came officially from the department. On further inquiry of the women's services of the navy, army and air force, I find that nothing like this is done for the women of the armed services of Canada. While I would not suggest that a policy of providing these devices for our armed services women is necessary—I would not suggest that for a moment—I do think, Mr. Chairman, that as a matter of principle the minister, associate minister, and their colleagues in the department ought to inquire of the policies pursued in the defence forces of other countries. I understand that we have not gone as far as we ought to have in this respect, and here I refer particularly to policies in Great Britain, the United States and other European countries.

This is only a theoretical matter at this point, Mr. Chairman, but I wish to make certain that there is no discrimination in this respect. I will not suggest that pursuing this policy is necessary from a practical point of view, but in theory it ought to be pursued. The government might implement some policy in this respect.

In conclusion I urge the minister and the associate minister to inquire into the complaints I have advanced on behalf of the women in the armed services of Canada, so that they may share in the equality of women in all aspects of Canadian society, in accordance with announced government policy.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I rise to take part in this debate after having listened with great concern to much talk on the unification of our armed services. I am still amazed that the minister wishes this house to permit unification of the services when he has not suggested the name that the new armed service of Canada will have. Perhaps General Allard had a good name when he advocated it be called Finks, using the four letters to denote Infantrymen with naval knowledge. Surely the minister and his capable public relations man, Mr. Lee, can invent a better name.

This debate has shown how parliament may be hamstrung. Before Christmas, when the matter was before the house, I talked, trying to convince the minister that the principle of unification ought to be sent to the committee for study. The matter did not go to committee. It is now an accepted fact that nearly all senior officers of the three services are against unification.

While Air Marshal Miller was the minister's assistant he was prepared to support integration, but was against unification, which he alleged would cost the Canadian taxpayers more money than the old, three service system had cost them. The committee studies bore out Air Vice Marshal Miller's contention. The unified services will be more expensive, not less expensive than the three separate services.

It is interesting to note that the Ottawa Journal recently has said that this debate ought to be limited and that the guillotine will be applied for the first time on Thursday. Great haste is being made to cut short the debate or to limit the freedom of speech. One would expect that something terribly important hinges on the passage of the bill, that it must be implemented almost immediately, or that conditions are such that the passage of this bill is extremely important for the armed forces of Canada. On page 14927 of Hansard for April 14, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, addressing the Minister of National Defence, asked this question:

> Is it not a fact that in the committee General Allard told us that he would like to see the proclamation of the bill postponed for at least four months, and that until the bill is proclaimed no action can be taken with regard to the steps toward unification. That is the advice of the senior officer in the defence forces.

As the question shows, there is a demand that the bill be not proclaimed for at least four months after passage. He went on to say categorically that until the bill was proclaimed no action could be taken toward unification. I ask the associate minister this: Why in these circumstances should we have to read in today's paper that the guillotine blade will fall on Thursday? As to suggestions that further evidence may be brought out, is any further evidence necessary after all the senior officers have given evidence and declared, practically to the last man, that they have grave doubts as to the need for unification or where unification will take Canada? This is made clear in an editorial which appears in today's Gazette—an article by Mr. Arthur Blakely. The author says the minister agrees the chiefs of staff are predominantly opposed to unification of the armed forces. And the minister is quoted as saying "Chiefs of staff all over the world are opposed to unification of the armed forces."

The evidence before the committee has made this abundantly clear. Senior military advisers who have spent years and years in the forces and who know the military art, are opposed to unification and wonder where it is taking them. In the light of their views and the hope expressed by General Allard that after the bill is passed it will not be proclaimed for four months, during which time no action could be taken toward unification, what need is there for haste? The minister himself said on Monday that integration will only be achieved as a result of a series of steps and may not be complete for seven or eight years. We live in a democracy where we cherish freedom of speech. Why then, should we have to read in the papers that the guillotine will fall unless we pass this legislation immediately? What is the urgency?

It was once commonly thought that the minister of defence wanted to pass this unification measure, believing he could do so without any great difficulty, in order to improve his own position as a contestant for leadership of the Liberal party. It was his idea that if he could effect savings in the Department of National Defence, the public would believe him capable of realizing savings in every department of government.

Most of those serving in our armed forces firmly believe that this was the idea in the minister's mind when he began this process of amalgamating the three services into one unified force—a force for which he has not yet found a name other than the one given it by the chief of staff, General Allard—Finks, that is, fighting infantrymen with naval knowledge. I am sure this name does not well suit the men in the forces today.

One could talk a good deal about esprit de corps—how it arises, and how it is maintained. It is interesting to note the minister's statement that putting our forces into the same type of uniform would not affect their morale or fighting spirit in any way. Yet what is happening throughout the world? In the present conflict in Viet Nam we are witnessing the creation, shall I say, of the Green Berets. What is significant about that? It is significant because it is a move to add something, an article of headgear, to the uniform which part of the force is wearing—to provide something which is just a little extra in order to enhance esprit de corps. This is important. Songs have been written about it. Books have been written about the special training these men must take.

The significant point is that these men are proud of having taken these courses and passed these examinations. They are proud to wear this particular piece of uniform. So here is a nation that has fought in many wars throughout its history, coming up with something new to maintain or build up esprit de corps among their servicemen. On the other hand, we in Canada are proclaiming that the generals and the vice marshals are all wrong and that uniform does little for esprit de corps. The minister says our forces can be dressed in green sacks, if necessary, as long as whatever they wear has some sex appeal about it. The associate minister agrees with this. Well, it is not enough. It is not enough to call them Finks and say they must be fighting infantrymen with naval knowledge. This is borne out by the fact that even today United States is creating special distinctions in uniforms to build up the esprit de corps of its fighting forces.

The whole question of the unification of the armed services was considered by the Russians shortly after the second world war. They carried out the initial steps and for all I know they may have gone as far as integration. But they did not go the whole way. They shrank from taking that particular step because they found it was not workable and would not provide for the best possible defence of their country.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): This is really what we are concerned about, and this is why taxpayers contribute toward a fighting force. They want it to defend Canada first of all, and then to play a role in keeping peace throughout the world.

May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Churchill: So that there may be no further delay imposed by hon. members such as the hon. member for Saint-Denis and the hon. member for Villeneuve, I propose we let clause 2 stand and go on with clause 3 the next time this bill is before the committee, which may be next October.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of National Defence suggested this last night and others of us have suggested it two or three times. If there is now unanimous agreement, let's do it.

Mr. McIlraith: There is no objection if the hon. member wishes to stand clause 2 and call clause 3.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree to allow clause 2 to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: The committee will now proceed to the consideration of clause 3.

Mr. Churchill: Rise and report progress.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I called it six o'clock.

Mr. McIlraith: In order that there may be no embarrassment as to procedure, let me say that I did not intend in any way to cut off the speech of the hon. member who was speaking at six o'clock. If he wishes to continue his remarks on clause 2 I will put the suggestion forward again at the conclusion of his remarks. I will transmit the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to my colleague the Minister of National Defence. It can be done in whichever way the hon. gentleman who was speaking wishes.

The Chairman: Order. Is it the suggestion of the Minister of Public Works that the hon. member for Acadia be permitted to conclude his remarks and that then clause 2 will stand?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, my embarrassment is this: The hon. member for Acadia had the floor. He sat down on the assumption that it was six o'clock, but did not appear to have concluded his remarks. The suggestion then was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that we stand clause 2 and proceed to clause 3. I agreed to that suggestion without realizing that by so doing I was cutting off the remarks of the hon. member for Acadia. I rose to explain my embarrassment in that regard. I had no intention to cut off the remarks of hon. member for Acadia.

I am agreeable either to have it understood that we still are on clause 2 until the hon. member completes his remarks or that clause 2 stand now. I am agreeable whichever way hon. members of the opposition wish to have it.

The Chairman: Order. As chairman, I should like the members of the committee to come to some very definite determination so that there will be no misunderstanding when the committee meets tomorrow or some other day.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, I should like to proceed with the bill. I think that tomorrow I would take probably five or ten minutes to conclude my remarks on clause 2 and then we could go on to clause 3.

Mr. McIlraith: Then I take it that we are still on clause 2, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The committee will still be on clause 2 when it meets again.

Progress reported.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 20, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR TIME ALLOCATION RESPECTING DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, in accordance with the provisions of standing order 15A, I made the proposal that the question of allocation of time for the committee of the whole stage and all remaining stages of procedure on Bill No. C-243, being item No. 107 on the order paper, be referred to the business committee.

The members of the business committee had discussions for three days on this matter, in accordance with the provisions of that standing order, and on Tuesday, April 18 I reported to the house that the committee had been unable to reach unanimous agreement on the question referred to it. On Tuesday, April 18 I also gave notice that on the next Thursday I would move for an order providing for the allocation of time. All this appears in Votes and Proceedings of that day. I now propose to make that motion.

As hon. members know, standing order 15A provides for a business committee which has the task of setting up a timetable for debate on a bill. The two-fold assumption behind that order is that all parties will want debate and discussion so that the thinking of the house and the country will develop and mature, and also that all parties will want the house to do its duty by rendering a decision regardless of what individual members may think that decision should be. It is inevitable that there will be differences of opinion. To devise an allocation of time balancing these differences is precisely the task assigned to the business committee. That task it sought to perform, but it was unable to reach the necessary unanimous agreement.

Therefore it now becomes the right and indeed the responsibility of the government under standing order 15A to take the step of providing the opportunity for the house to make a decision on the additional time the house should take in further discussion of the remaining stages of this bill.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. What stage are we at now in the proceedings of the house? I understand that Your Honour called motions. I do not see anything on the order paper to indicate that the minister has an opportunity to speak at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is quite right. I have been expecting the minister to make a motion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What has the minister been talking about?

Mr. McIlraith: It has become clear—

Mr. Starr: Order.

Mr. Monteith: Make your motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that he make a motion. I understand there may be a debate on the motion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: —and perhaps the minister can leave his comments until then.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I move, seconded by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill):

• (2:40 p.m.)

That an order be made allocating the time on the committee of the whole stage and all remaining stages of procedure on Bill C-243, an act to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof (as amended), being government order No. 107 on the order paper, and that the motion will provide that two days shall be allocated for the completion of discussion on the committee of the whole stage on Bill C-243, an act to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof (as amended), and that one day shall be allotted for the completion of the third reading stage on the bill.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on another point of order. I understand fully that last Tuesday the minister gave notice of this particular motion, and that it appeared in Votes and Proceedings to which I drew attention yesterday. However, it does not appear on today's order paper. I wonder, sir, whether you would give a ruling on this question. Is it permissible simply to give notice of motion and then, without following the normal custom of the house, to move the motion verbally the next day or some subsequent day without anything appearing on the order paper for the information of members? I am not sure there is any rule governing this procedure, but the custom of the house over the years has prevented members of the house from being taken by surprise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: It has been the practice to disclose the government's intentions in the order paper, and the same has applied to private members. Private members who give notice of motion with regard to the introduction of a bill place that notice in Votes and Proceedings, then the order paper brings it to the attention of the house on some subsequent day. Is some special dispensation being granted to the Minister of Public Works or to any member of the government, because in the past we have been accustomed to another procedure than that followed by the minister today? I would ask Your Honour's ruling on this important point; because if Your Honour reaches a decision that this may happen, then in future any of us will be free to give notice of motion, have it appear in Votes and Proceedings and then, at our choice, raise it orally when motions are called.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to the point of order just raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre I should like to read standing order 15A (5), as follows:

> If the chairman of the business committee reports that the committee has been unable to reach a unanimous agreement—

Which was the case in this instance.

> —or if the committee fails to report within the time specified by section (3) of this standing order, a minister of the crown, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 41, may give notice of motion that at the next sitting of the house, provided that day is not a Wednesday, he will move that an order be made allocating the time for the item of business or stage thereof.

As I indicated when I first rose, notice of motion was given on Tuesday. The motion was to be made on Thursday because the standing order provides it cannot be moved on a Wednesday. Paragraph 6 of the standing order reads:

> A motion of which a minister has given notice under section (5) of this standing order shall be made during routine proceedings.

Then the order goes on with other matters not relevant to the point at issue. In the light of the standing order it will be seen that I have followed exactly the procedure set out in it. This being so, I respectfully suggest that the procedure envisaged by standing order 41, which is specifically exempted from applicability to this motion, has no bearing and I am in order.

Mr. Speaker: In so far as the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is concerned, I have been giving some thought to this problem which I felt might be raised. Standing order 41 reads:

> Forty eight hours notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper; but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction—

I will not read the whole of the standing order. We should remember that the provisional standing order suspends the provisions of standing order 41. Section 5 of standing order 15A not only dispenses with the requirement for 48 hours' notice with respect to a motion for time allocation; it also renders inoperative the ordinary machinery for putting a notice on the order paper. Hon. members will note that a similar procedure with respect to notice will be found in standing order 33.

Section 6 of standing order 15A reads in part as follows:

> A motion of which a minister has given notice under section (5) of this standing order shall be made during routine proceedings.

I suggest to hon. members and I believe there is doubt about the interpretation of these words "routine proceedings". They must be interpreted in the light of the recommendation made by the special committee on procedure in 1955, which was concurred in by the house and recorded at page 944 of the Journals for July 12, 1955, as follows:

> That motions for concurrence in reports of any standing or special committee, for the suspension of any standing order, or such other motions made upon routine proceedings, as may be required for the observances of the proprieties of the house, the maintenance of its authority, the appointment or conduct of its officers, the management of its business, the arrangement of its proceedings, the correctness of its records, the fixing of its sitting days or the times of its meeting or adjournment shall be listed, when notice is required, called and disposed of under "motions".

In view, therefore, of the provision of the standing order and the interpretation which I think is the only one possible, I cannot accept the contention of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Churchill: Of what use is the order paper, then?

Mr. Speaker: I must say I am not too clear on the other point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, and if my impression is wrong perhaps he will correct me. I believe he suggested the motion is irregular inasmuch as there is no specific reference to those days on which the matter is to be considered—

Mr. Churchill: No; with deference, Mr. Speaker, I think my second question was overlooked because of the diversionary tactics of the Minister of Public Works. What I should like a ruling on is this. I quite agree that proper notice has been given, and I am not arguing that point at all. The rule has been followed. What I am asking a ruling on is this. After notice has been given and has appeared in Votes and Proceedings, has it not been the custom of the house, a custom which should be observed, that the motion for presentation to the house should appear on the order paper so that everybody is informed rather than have this oral reference back to an item in Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. Speaker: I was under the impression I had covered this particular point. I believe it is more than a custom that is involved here; this notice is given by virtue of standing order 41. However, this provisional standing order was specifically exempted from the provisions of standing order 41.

Mr. McIlraith: As I have indicated, the business committee has been entrusted by the house with trying to find a balance that would provide a timetable that would cover the two elements which must enter into the operations of the House of Commons if it is to perform the duty for which it is here. One of these elements is the opportunity for full and adequate discussion of proposals submitted by the government; the other is the taking of decisions upon proposals submitted by the government. The business committee having been unable to reach a unanimous agreement, it is now the responsibility of the government —as I have said, I think there is an obligation upon the government—to put before the house the amount of time the government thinks would be appropriate to provide adequately for the completion of the discussion of the measure, and to permit a decision to be taken on the measure consistent with the responsibilities of parliament.

I am not going to develop the argument further, because it must be apparent to hon. members on all sides that this measure has been very thoroughly discussed. Yesterday was the thirteenth day of debate on the committee of the whole stage of the bill; that is, the clause by clause discussion of the bill. Those 13 days of debate did not bring even clause 2 of the bill to a decision of the house, and it began to be readily apparent that the purpose of the official opposition was to inordinately delay this measure or to prevent a decision being taken.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The minister is imputing motives to the official opposition. He said it was evident that our purpose was simply to delay. Our purpose was to bring to the attention of this house, to the attention of the minister who has attended none of the debate during the last 13 days, and to the attention of the general public the weaknesses of this bill. Point after point was brought forward during the course of the debate, and new points entered into the argument during the last two days which have not been answered. The minister must withdraw his accusation.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the minister is not imputing motives. I think all members realize that nobody is trying to impute motives, and I am sure this is not what the minister is doing now.

Mr. McIlraith: If the sensitivities of the hon. member induce him to feel that I was imputing motives to him I would very happily withdraw the part of my remarks that caused him such offence.

Mr. Churchill: It was the general feeling over here, not only my feeling.

Mr. McIlraith: My remarks were not of such import as to cause him any offence. However, Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that the record of the discussion on this bill during the last 13 days is in cold print to be studied by all, not only by those who have been present to hear the debate. It is clear that a very long time indeed was being taken in the discussion of one clause of this bill. It seemed to the government in the exercise of its responsibility that such an inordinately long time was being taken to discuss this clause that it had a duty to give parliament the opportunity of deciding whether or not the House of Commons should take a decision on this bill. Under the British system—

Mr. Churchill: Would the minister answer a question at this point?

Mr. McIlraith: Well, Mr. Speaker I should like to put at least part of my remarks before the house without interruption. At the conclusion of my remarks I will be happy to answer any questions the hon. member may have; indeed, sometimes I enjoy his questions. In any event the truth of the matter is that under the Canadian parliamentary system, based as it is on the British system, the government is given the responsibility of governing. That implies the right to have a decision taken by parliament, or in this instance by the House of Commons, on the proposals laid by it before the house. That right, of course, in controlled by the full right of discussion by the elected representatives of the people sent here to consider these proposals and to take decisions on them. Any other arrangement would be intolerable, for the separation of authority and responsibility is the first definition of tyranny. I respectfully suggest that an overextension of either right would lead to the development of anarchy. To find the correct balance between debate and decision must ever be the task of responsible conduct in the House of Commons.

We in this parliament have chosen the procedure under temporary standing order 15A, but we must, in choosing that responsibility, exercise it in a way that will be consistent with our concept of parliament and not permit an abuse to arise that is the first step toward tyranny.

Holding those views, believing that the stage has now come when this house must pass on the proposal for the allocation of time which we have submitted, I have made my motion providing for two further days of discussion in the committee of the whole house on the individual clauses of the bill and one day for the third reading stage of the bill. With those words, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit my motion for the consideration of this house and ask the house to pass on it in accordance with the views of individual members.

Mr. Churchill: May I now ask my question, Mr. Speaker. I would now ask the government house leader whether, in discussing the length of time spent on clause 2, he will disclose, first, there was the suggestion that clause 2 is the most important clause of the bill; second, on behalf of this party I proposed to him on Monday that we were prepared to pass all clauses of the bill except clauses 2 and 6 which we asked to have deferred until the fall. Nevertheless, the rest of the bill would have been passed on Monday—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: —without further debate. In addition we were prepared to pass the bill on adult training, the report of the rules committee and interim supply by Friday of this week. That offer was rejected by the government.

Mr. McIlraith: I shall be very happy to answer that rather lengthy question as fully as I can. In assessing the important clauses of the bill, undoubtedly clause 2 is very important, going to the root of the bill. Whether it is the most important of the 65 clauses I cannot say, but certainly it is a very important clause going to the very root of the bill.

I do not want to go into details of what was said by each person in the business committee because I have always taken the position that the confidentiality of house leaders' meetings or business committee meetings should not be broken, but I would be happy to confirm that a proposal was made by the hon. member, not that we pass the bill as he suggested in his question, but that we let clauses 2 and 6 stand and that we then call the other clauses of the bill and carry them in the committee of the whole stage, and that the whole bill then stand, with the result that there would be no legislative effect, no legislative result to what was done.

• (3:00 p.m.)

The whole bill would then stand over for four or five months—I think that was the term he used—or, anyway, until the fall of this year, without having been passed. In addition, if the proposal not to proceed further with the bill at this stage of the session was acceptable, they would agree to winding up the other business for this session of parliament, that is the manpower training bill, interim supply and the report of the rules committee. They would do this within three or four days, or in any event within a very short period of time.

That proposal was rejected after careful consideration—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: It did get careful consideration, and it was rejected for the following reasons. First, the bill would have been stopped completely. I should add that as part of the proposal the hon. member had agreed on behalf of his party that in the new session, that is in the fall, the stages up to the committee stage of the bill would be dealt with without debate or vote.

These proposals were rejected for the following reasons. They would, in effect, amount to a complete stopping of the bill at this time. This would leave the Department of National Defence and the armed forces in a position of uncertainty.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: After careful consideration and examination it was felt this would lead to a material deterioration of morale in the department and armed forces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: It would mean also there would be no authority in the department to continue any steps forward in connection with this subject until the bill was passed. It would, in effect, be similar to the six months' hoist, because it would end the bill as far as this session was concerned though giving us the right, of course, to bring it forward in the new session of parliament and make progress next fall. This seemed to me and to others to be a wholly unrealistic approach to this question, although, as I have said, it did get very thorough consideration, notwithstanding interjections by some of the backbenchers opposite.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Are hon. members rising to ask further questions? We should determine in the first instance whether the minister has completed his remarks or whether he wishes to reply to further questions at this time.

Mr. Webb: A point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Before I recognize the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac, do I gather that the minister is relinquishing the floor to the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. McIlraith: No, I have indicated that I would accept a question from the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Speaker: Before the question is asked I believe the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac has a point of order to raise.

Mr. Webb: The minister was kind enough to say he would answer all questions.

Mr. McIlraith: I did not say that.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising to ask a question? The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich has been recognized first for that purpose.

Mr. Chatterton: May I ask the leader of the house to tell us the reasons which prompted the government to set two days for the committee stage? If the purpose was to bring an end to the debate why was a period of two days chosen rather than five or six days, for instance?

Mr. McIlraith: I can answer that question very simply. Notice was given on Thursday, one week ago today, that this procedure would be used. After that notice had been given the discussion continued, and in those intervening days it became quite clear from the lack of progress that there would be no disposition to dispose of the various clauses within any given length of time. Moreover, I had borne in mind that the committee had already spent 13 days in clause by clause consideration of the bill. I had also borne in mind intimations that no allocation of time however long would be agreeable to the opposition. It had been made very clear that it did not matter what length of time was proposed, whether weeks or months; they would not agree.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Webb: Since the government is today introducing closure in connection with a bill which concerns Canada's future defence, I would ask the minister whether it is significant that today is also the anniversary of Hitler's birthday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: But for a reference which was made at the beginning of the hon. member's question I would not answer it. This is not a closure procedure. A closure procedure is an arbitrary procedure taken to shut off debate. This procedure is based on the premise that there is a responsibility upon the house to permit a decision to be taken. It is a method of trying to make those groups which, without responsibility, would seek to impose their will on parliament, to negotiate and try to come to an agreement or arrangement consistent with their responsibilities in parliament. And it provides, in the event of failure to bring this about, that after due notice the house itself shall pass on the matter. That is not closure. That is the antithesis of closure procedure.

Mr. Nasserden: I have a question for the leader of the house. Is he insinuating that the intervention of Liberal speakers in the debate represented an encroachment upon the decision-making process?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think we are making any progress at this point.

Mr. Forrestall: I should like to ask the distinguished house leader whether, in the light of the evidence given before the committee by Brigadier Lawson and confirmed in this house that in any case from four to six months would elapse before the government could move to the promulgation of this bill, because of the regulations which have to be drawn up, he would comment on the position of the discussion on clauses 2 and 6 of this bill if we ask to have them stood over until the fall.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member seems to be under a misapprehension with regard to the process followed in what he calls the promulgation of the bill. I presume he has in mind certain regulations which have to be made and certain steps which have to be taken once the bill is passed and has become an act. Then the proclaiming of the bill becomes a procedure which does not need the concurrence of parliament; either the House of Commons or the Senate. It is an act by the executive on a different procedure, and in the interval between the passage of the act and its promulgation there is the authority in the Interpretation Act providing for those responsible, once it has been passed and approved by the parliament of this country, to pass the regulations under it. This is the essential difference. The hon. member seems to have missed the whole essence of it.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the house leader to explain why, since as late as Tuesday of this week, when the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre moved that we go on to other business and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) said "We are going to continue with the unification debate in order to give you every opportunity'" now in defiance of the express promise of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence that every opportunity would be given for a thorough examination of this bill, they are bringing in this closure.

Mr. McIlraith: I would be very happy to explain. I joined completely with the Minister of National Defence, and I am happy to note we were in such total accord, in going contrary to the official opposition's effort to prevent this bill from being discussed in the house on Tuesday, when we had given notice to resort to the procedure under standing order 15A. He, like myself, did not wish to deny the House of Commons the opportunity to discuss this bill that day and make progress with it. As to the second point, the misuse by the hon. member of the word closure, I have already dealt with that.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the play on words by the Minister of Public Works is clear and apparent. This isn't closure, he says, when in point of fact it is nothing else; and by simply saying that it isn't what it is, he in no way meets the argument that the guillotine is to be used in place of the axe.

I listened with interest to his dissertation on parliamentary debate and the manner in which it should be carried on, and I could not but be reminded of the words of Lewis Carroll when he said—and this describes the attitude of the minister.

> "I weep for you," the Walrus said:
> "I deeply sympathize."
> With sobs and tears he sorted out
> Those of the largest size,
> Holding his pocket-handkerchief
> Before his streaming eyes.

Oh, what an idea, to think parliament would ever consider that these paragons of parliamentary practice who sit opposite would do anything wrong and shock those sensibilities of which the minister spoke. I quote to him the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, one of the great democrats of this nation, one of the parliamentary giants of all time. Apparently the minister has not read what Laurier said. A moment ago he was complaining about the number of days that had been taken up in this debate. If my estimate is correct, in the days that have gone by 30 members other than members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition have spoken.

Mr. Starr: On the second clause.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course on the second clause, as the hon. gentleman says. By way of an answer, let me read what Laurier said to those people sitting opposite who in 1967 are revealing that they have forgotten 1956.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They said the same thing then. I could quote one and all, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), but I restrict myself to the latter. These were the words of ridicule that he heaped on us in 1956:

> The opposition, of course, claim, and they claim very often, to be gagged. If that is true, Mr. Speaker, they are the noisiest group of gagged men in history.

Those words came back to destroy the government of which the right hon. gentleman was then secretary of state for external affairs. The Minister of Public Works says the debate has gone on for so many days. Let me read what Laurier said in regard to debate. I refer to the 1912-13 Hansard at page 7431:

> It has been charged against us that we have delayed the business of the house, that we have prevented it from going on. Sir, I deny the charge altogether; there is not a word of foundation for it.

Further on he said this:

> It is true, sir, that we opposed a certain measure. It is true that we opposed the bill for naval aid. We did that with all the might at our command; we did it with all the means at our command under the rules of the house. Am I to be told that in the exercise of this power of strenuous opposition we did anything which is not in accordance with the best traditions of parliamentary government?

Then he went on to deal with the length of time, and in reply to an interruption he pointed out this fact, as recorded at page 9454 of Hansard for the same session, and I quote the interruption first:

> My right hon. friend would surely be disposed to admit that in nineteen or twenty days we ought to be able to make sufficient progress to enable every amendment to be considered.
> Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I do not admit anything of the kind. I can show precedents of bills of less importance that have taken the house more than thirty days in committee of the whole—

The minister referred to British parliamentary practice. As recorded at page 9534 of the same Hansard Sir Wilfrid Laurier said it is quite common in the United Kingdom to have lengthy discussion in committee on important bills, for one, two or three weeks. Then he went on and dealt in general with the situation in this regard.

Why has there been this debate, Mr. Speaker? Because we have not been able to get the answers to those questions we have asked.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am now going to refer to words that will become immortal as an example of non-egotism on the part of the Minister of National Defence. Before I do that I say this, what we have been treated to in this country in the last few weeks is a plethora of press releases issued by the visible presence of the representative of the minister—organized nonsense.

• (3:20 p.m.)

I cannot pass up the opportunity to refer to one thing that took place in the United States, because it is of interest today. In 1942 the father of the United States airborne forces and the first officer to command one of the divisions was William M. Lee. He had the rank of major general, which of course we must not bring up at all for consideration at this time. It was the custom then as a man jumped from the transport plane to shout "Geronimo". Geronimo was an Apache rebel who caused the Americans a lot of trouble. Major General Lee was transferred to another unit and his place was taken by General Maxwell Taylor. He issued orders that instead of shouting "Geronimo" each paratrooper of the division should shout "Bill Lee" as he jumped out. History is a magnificent study. It is probably only a coincidence that there was so much disorganization, confusion and a complete mix-up when that name was substituted for the former. Let me bring this up to date. The Minister of National Defence and this government are so disorganized and unprepared they might well shout the same cry.

What has happened at this time is that generals, admirals, and air marshals have been swept aside. Their views mean nothing. As the minister said in the course of his remarks "We have to use our own God-given intelligence" to make decisions. I ask the Prime Minister when he speaks—

Mr. Pearson: I am not going to bother.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is he not going to speak?

Mr. Starr: He is not going to bother.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is not going to bother. That is the best indication of the utter disregard the Prime Minister has for parliament; he is not going to bother to speak. Is that because he has adopted that unusually unattractive position he took in Vancouver when he was asked about the subject of abortion? He was asked where he stood in this regard and his answer was "I stand firmly". The next question was "where"? His answer was "On the fence". He is not going to bother. No wonder we are faced with closure. The Prime Minister does not want to answer. He does not want to take the position he should take as the leader of this nation and tell the House of Commons what this government intends to do in respect of unification.

What are the government's plans? In the last 24 hours we have been told—and it is interesting to note that the newspapers are now reporting these things—that plans are being made against the eventuality that a peace keeping force will be sent to Viet Nam. Surely this is part of the propaganda program. In the last few days there has been debate on this question, and suddenly now there is a deliberate leak by a defence department source while parliament is in the throes of a debate on this subject. I have said, and the minister has denied this, that it is generally accepted that this government intends to produce a kind of faceless organization, once it gets these men into green jumpers, to be used as a special force for peace keeping. I think that is one of the pivotal reasons for this measure. This suggestion has already been turned down by the United Nations, yet the government proceeds with this idea. A government spokesman has said that plans have been drawn up to send a thousand man force to Viet Nam. I asked the Prime Minister to give us this information, not that minister who refuses to answer questions and substitutes abuse for arguments.

Has there been any discussion about this with the United Nations? Has there been any indication of such a request forthcoming, or is this just another of these publicity blurbs that regularly fill the wastepaper baskets of the press? What indication has there been of any acceptance by Hanoi of a cease fire and withdrawal, without which there can be no peace keeping? These are questions we want answered, yet they remain unanswered. What is the government's attitude in respect of renewal or rejection of NORAD? Surely if this house ever had a right to information, it has a right in this regard.

What is the government going to do with these green uniformed representatives in the armed forces of Canada? What is the government's policy in respect of NORAD? What is the attitude of the government regarding our commitments to NATO? I read the diaphanous explanation given by the minister. I can only say to him that in my experience no man is his equal, if that is his general manner of answering. He conceals so little thought in so many words.

What is the government's policy in respect of NATO? Is there any foundation for the suggestion that the number of men will be reduced? We have a right to this information. This debate would have concluded long ago had we received answers to these questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes. I am not speaking about the 22 Liberal members, if that is the number, who have spoken. They would have spoken in any event. I am speaking about Her Majesty's opposition. We have no right to let this government sell Canada a pig in a poke, and that is what is being done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What amazes me is that the Prime Minister says he has nothing to say. Shades of Laurier. Shades of King. Shades of St. Laurent. The only time Mr. St. Laurent did not take part in a debate to reply to suggestions or questions was in 1956, and we all know what happened to the St. Laurent government in 1957 after that government trampled on parliament. This government ridicules us now. This is the same old bunch.

Mr. Starr: You have been integrated up to your necks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I can say is that this is an arid integration in so far as answers are concerned.

Mr. Prud'homme: What about integration within your own party?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I heard a voice. As a cuckoo in June, heard, but not recorded.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member wishes to rise on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, the "voice" heard was mine, and I should like to repeat the suggestion I made in my speech yesterday, that there should perhaps be a bill for the unification and integration of the Progressive Conservative party. That was all I said.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After reading what Walter Gordon said yesterday, if I may use his name, I would say that you do not want to talk about integration when you face extinction.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has already risen on a question of privilege which was out of order. I hope his question this time is more justified than the last.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, following the remarks of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, I could perhaps send him the notes he forgot on the articles written by the hon. Minister of Justice which appeared in the magazine Cité Libre.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I wish to apologize to the right hon. gentleman for saying that he has mellowed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I can only say to the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted that while he does not speak much in the house, when he gets outside he has strong opinions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After this happy interlude I now quote from a newspaper that worships at the altar of Liberalism. I refer to the Winnipeg Free Press. Some of its subsidiary newspapers are also doing a good job in that connection. I am going to deal with them on a later occasion. There are two of them in eastern Canada, if I may put it that way, that used to be independent Conservative newspapers but now belong to F.P. Publications and reflect so often the general views of the Free Press. On this occasion I want to quote from the Free Press:

> The federal government could be making a mistake—

That is the first time in the history of this government that the Free Press has ever admitted even the possibility or likelihood of a mistake having been made by the government.

> —if, in its determination to impose unification on Canada's armed services, it should resort to some form of closure on parliament.

The government can argue that the unification bill has been through the legislative mill, including the defence committee, and that there is nothing of value to be gained by prolonging the discussion. In fact, not all witnesses who should have been heard were called before the committee. And in spite of all the talking that has been done, some major questions remain unanswered—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is why I suggested that the Prime Minister cancel his temporary vow of silence in this debate. The article continues:

> —in spite of all the talking that has been done, some major questions remain unanswered--notably those concerning the effect that unification may have on Canada's military commitments under NATO and under NORAD.

That is what I am asking for. That is what we have been asking for for days. What is the minister going to do with these people? You put them in a uniform, you march them up the hill, you change the present uniform to one that is green, and march them down the hill again. What are you going to do? What are your plans? The article goes on to say:

> The suspicion has grown that the reason these questions have not been answered is that the government does not know the answers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a surprising thing that all the ministers have such a hiatus in their thinking and speaking when it comes to dealing with these questions. Then the article says:

> If closure is resorted to, this suspicion will be strengthened.
> Unification is government policy, but it is a policy that has met vigorous opposition from many members of parliament who must feel that they represent a substantial body of opinion. The government can press on—

I realize that. All they have to do is look at the battalions they have to our left in this chamber. The leader of the Creditistes says, "I march with you. Away with the uniforms of the past and all the traditions of the forces." Social Credit has not yet spoken with definiteness but I am sure the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson), with his infinite capacity for turning somersaults in the house, will be able to explain, with that clarity that always characterizes his utterances, why it is that while he does not agree with the principle of closure in this case he is going to vote with the government. There is also a possibility that he will vote against them, because now that he knows closure will be voted for by the Creditistes it is safe for him and those associated with him to vote against it.

The article in the Winnipeg Free Press goes on to say:

> The government can press on; that appears to be its intention. But if it does so at the expense of cutting further debate, it cannot help but leave the same kind of impression that the St. Laurent government left when it used closure in 1956—that here is a government which has failed to convince the majority of the population.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, they can gag us by brute force with the assistance of third parties, but they cannot gag our belief and that of millions of Canadians that what is being destroyed here is tradition, which the minister sweeps aside. He said, "What does it matter what your uniform is?" I am going to refer to his words in a moment when he gave his views on the processes that brought about this situation.

I now come to the explanation of the minister. From the beginning he has pursued a tortuous course. I have always had a rather warm feeling for him. While we sit opposite one another and express ourselves strongly in debate, there is still something within us that admires ability and capacity, and above all willingness, to do one's best for one's country. If I may make a diversion at this moment, Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring a simple example to the attention of the house. This happened in 1961. My wife and I were in London. We were invited to a dinner given in our honour by the prime minister of the United Kingdom. Sir Winston Churchill came that night. My wife sat between the prime minister and Sir Winston. I was on the other side of the table, away down. I had been introduced to all who were present there but I did not realize who the lady was next to me. Her name was Mrs. Chamberlain. I did not associate her in any way with the prime minister of the United Kingdom of the late 1930's and the early months of 1940. Sir Winston was in unusually good humour that night. I turned to her at one point and said: "Is it not wonderful the way he enjoys life at his age? He is happy tonight." She said: "Yes, if it weren't for him we wouldn't be here."

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Habel: That is a bedtime story.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know it registered nothing in the mind of the hon. gentleman. That is my idea of public life. Mrs. Chamberlain's late husband was driven out but she maintained that tradition which is the essence of the British parliamentary system. The interference opposite indicates that the hon. members do not know parliament.

I have followed the minister's course with a great deal of interest but the manner in which he has given explanations to the house indicates that when he is faced with arguments he takes up another position. His first statement was that all the experts and all the servicemen were on his side.

Mr. Hellyer: I never said that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was proven to be completely without foundation. His second position was—

Mr. Hellyer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman gave the impression he was quoting from something I said. Would he give the source and the time and place so I can find it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It has been said over and over again. Those who did not agree were retired, so naturally he must have felt he had the unanimous support of those who were permitted to remain.

Mr. Hellyer: You paraphrased it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the minister can name me one high officer who dared say he did not agree with unification and is not yet out of the services, I will give him the opportunity.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): This is Hitler's birthday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is an expression which I cannot repeat here but, to paraphrase, it means that when you advance an argument you should stand by it.

That was the minister's first position. There was the case of an admiral of the fleet who was condemned and denigrated by the minister. Six months later the minister said: "I really did not mean it". I wish he had developed the same epidermis with regard to the comment made by the member for Edmonton-Strathcona. But no, the minister was going to sue. He had no case because only what was said in the house was repeated outside it. I wonder when legal action will be taken? Never since General Currie in the Port Hope trial has there been anything like the reaction of Hellyer versus Nugent. I know him as Terry. When is the minister going to start the action? He must start it within a certain number of days. He will lose the right unless he acts soon.

Then the minister said: "Well, what they said really did not matter because after all they did not know". Let us read his words. They could not have been unprepared. They have every appearance of having been sent from above. They could have come from nowhere else. He said:

> Having listened to all of the points of view which have been expressed, I think it is incumbent on members and ministers to make up their minds on this matter. We have to use our own God-given intelligence to take a decision instead of simply relying on evidence of people in favour or the evidence of people not in favour.

As long as these generals, admirals and air marshals said they believed in a measure of integration their evidence was sound. But when they said they did not believe in unification they ceased to have that God-given intelligence which apparently is the monopoly of the minister and those associated with him. Farther on he went on to say:

> —believe me, Mr. Chairman, this is all I have done and it is what the associate minister has done.

Then he said:

> All I ask, Mr. Chairman, is that we use our own God-given intelligence and examine all of the changes in technology which have taken place during the last 20 years.

This is one of the strangest doctrines I have ever heard. Everybody is wrong but the minister and the associate minister who possess something that is denied to other members of parliament and which apparently has been arrogated to the minister and those associated with him, namely, God-given intelligence.

I ask the minister, where was this God-given intelligence in 1961 and 1962 when the minister said that the whole idea of having any nuclear arms is wrong? He said, "we will have nothing to do with it; it is pouring money down the drain." In January of 1963 the God-given intelligence received intelligence from another country.

Mr. Pilon: From NATO.

An hon. Member: God giveth, God taketh away.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This issue cannot be determined by this government. No doubt the other parties will say that the rights of parliament have not been trampled upon. I say to my friends in the New Democratic party: Your predecessors, the C.C.F. party, were wrong in every policy on national defence from 1938 onward. I have the record here.

I would like to know where Canada's contributions would have been if it had followed the policies of the New Democratic party. Unless it becomes necessary to elucidate I will leave the subject there, but the record stands. I repeat that in 1938, in September, 1939, and in 1941, the party which claimed so often to have a monopoly of humanitarian intelligence was wrong. I hope the passage of years has brought them a new capacity to judge on questions of defence.

Mr. Winch: Where is the Conservative party's God-given intelligence?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. member wants quotations, I can furnish them without any difficulty at all. I would ask him to read the record and I will be glad to discuss the matter with him now. Let him read the record of the declaration of his party's policy in 1937. Let him read the record of his party's policy in 1939 when there was complete agreement in the socialist party that not one man should be sent overseas and that Canada's aid should be solely economic. They say that parliament's rights have not been trampled on. But, sir, we in this party have taken our stand on this subject. They can trample on our views but if the correspondence that is coming in means anything, it is clear that this government has embarked on a policy that is not acceptable.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Someone criticized me for having said that General Allard has political ambitions. I think it was the Ottawa Journal, which used to be independent Conservative too. I was simply referring to a fact that the press had reported. I know also that in 1951, if I am correct in the year, General Allard was offered a portfolio but felt he ought to stay with the armed forces for a while longer. On the one hand we have the chief of staff and on the other we have a number of gentlemen whose names I am going to read. This list reads like a Who's Who in Canada's glorious record of service. They are: General Charles Foulkes; Lieutenant General Robert Moncel; Vice Admiral H. S. Rayner; Air Vice Marshal M. M. Hendrick; Admiral Brock; Admiral Pullen; Admiral Stirling; Lieutenant General Fleury; Air Marshal Curtis; Air Marshal Clare Annis; Lieutenant General Guy Simonds; Air Chief Marshal F. R. Miller, and the man who stood, Read Admiral W. M. Landymore.

There is the list of some of those who spoke out. Do not these men possess that God-given intelligence of which the minister has spoken? Are these men endeavouring to bring this nation to a position of degradation by their stand? What has happened here has been that this government, and more particularly the minister, has been playing politics with the defence of this nation.

Mr. Hellyer: Absolutely untrue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I said before, and I repeat, defence is being used as a platform for personal ambition.

Mr. Hellyer: Absolutely untrue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is easy to say this is untrue but the facts tell the story. No amount of denial can get away from it.

Mr. Hellyer: You tell the story but you don't know the facts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, Mr. Chairman, we have the admission. Those who tell the story don't know the facts. If you can equal that for a statement of positive self-satisfaction and egotism, it is your move. What manner of person is this? The minister has a divine right. Who are these people who do not know the facts?

Mr. Hellyer: No, I said you do not know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Look at me, the minister says; I have them but I am not going to tell parliament. This has been his attitude and when finally he found himself in an impossible position he attempted the strategic course of bringing about closure. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) says it is not closure; we have changed the name. It will have the same result, but let us be careful about the use of that word. It may be a synonym but it is not closure. Sir, never could a minister equal the vacuity of that last statement the minister made in his interruption. They do not know the facts.

Mr. Hellyer: That is not what I said; I said you do not know. Mr. Speaker, I want to make it more specific, I do not want a general statement—

Mr. Diefenbaker: But I am saying what they have said. I am not one who glorifies my position, as the hon. gentleman does, by setting myself apart. Oh, what a statement that was. Everybody else has lost his intelligence but he has his own God-given intelligence. Today he says "they do not know the facts". Then, he amends the statement and says "I do not know the facts". All I know is what I read in the evidence. Every solitary bit of the evidence that was given, I have read. If ever there was a case made completely against what is being produced here for the political deification of the hon. gentleman, this is that case.

What is being done is this: Here is what we are going to do, he says, and he submits his case without argument. You have got to take it because if you do not, then with the assistance of my colleagues I am going to bring about a vile repetition of 1956. I am going to push this measure through. I am going to push it down the throats of Canadians regardless of their feelings because I have the God-given intelligence that is denied to the generals, admirals and air vice marshals as well as to the men and women who serve in the armed forces and who write me daily saying that they hope the opposition presses on. They do not want their names mentioned or they will be destroyed. This is what is happening in this nation. They have every reason to be afraid because after all they only occupy the ranks of private, lance corporal, corporal or sergeant or equivalent ranks in the other services. What has taken place in this nation as a result of the manipulations of the government in this connection is that men and women in the armed forces are full of fear and foreboding. They do not dare speak out. They have been overwhelmed with the 48,000 copies of the speech of the minister duly annotated, decorated and engrossed. Each one of them knows what will happen if he dares to speak out.

On June 7, 1965, the minister put out another press statement reading in part as follows:

> The command structure of the Canadian armed forces has been redesigned on a functional basis, in keeping with the principles and objectives outlined in the white paper on defence of March, 1964.

He has done nothing of the kind. The white paper never envisaged the tinkering and interference that have taken place or the results that are today flowing from that action. The press statement ended in this way:

> The new command structure, which reflects the major commitments assigned to the forces by the government is the product of careful study by the defence staff. Major field commanders of all services have been consulted in detail on the plan which is four months ahead of schedule.

This statement, sir, is not true. If this government tramples on the right of parliament to information about why this change is being made, what our international commitments are and how they are going to be met under this neutralized scheme, and bulldozes this measure through, then Canadians everywhere will have the same feeling they had in 1956. They will feel that the rights of parliament have been trampled on. As far as the people in the armed forces are concerned, while they are now silenced by fear, the day will ultimately come when they will be able to speak out, by which time their morale will have sunk to unheard of levels, I am afraid.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister: Mr. Speaker, I could hardly resist the persuasive invitation of the right hon. gentleman opposite to take part in this discussion, so I should like to say a few words on the motion before the house. I am not speaking to the defence bill. There are three more days to discuss that measure and if I have a statement to make on it I will make it during that debate and not during this one which does not deal with the defence bill itself.

The right hon. gentleman did say that we on this side were attempting to bulldoze this bill through parliament. He is suggesting we are bulldozing it when, Mr. Speaker, we are in a minority position in this house and when the motion before us will not pass unless it gets the support of the majority of the members of this house. This is a queer kind of minority bulldozing.

A proposal was made a short time ago that was apparently designed to avoid this discussion. The effect of it was that we give the two clauses of this bill which are controversial, the two clauses that matter, the six months' hoist. That proposal was put before us. You know, Mr. Speaker, there is at least one tempting aspect to this proposal, and that is that if the six months' hoist were given, this matter would not come before this house again until next October. After listening to the right hon. gentleman this afternoon it is tempting to think that perhaps by that time we would be spared another speech by him on this question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what you have desired for years.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not my desire. I hope that my right hon. friend will be sitting in that seat for a long, long time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: And I am not being entirely unselfish in that wish, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. gentleman, with his customary scattergun approach, dealt with a great many things which had nothing whatever to do with this motion. In doing so, Mr. Speaker, I noticed something that he has done before, and I say this in no critical way. He redoubled his energy every time he lost his aim.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I help out the Prime Minister. That was first said in 1862 by Disraeli.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker; that was first said—and I should put it in quotes—in 1853 by William Ewart Gladstone. I should like to plagiarize some other observations but perhaps I had better begin to make my own speech.

The right hon. gentleman did talk about closure, and that is pertinent to the motion. He was against closure. He said he did not like it and that he could see no distinction between closure and time allocation. I suggest it should be obvious to anybody that closure can be imposed on the House of Commons without the consent of the House of Commons having been sought whereas time allocations cannot. Parliament has its opportunity and its duty to decide whether there will be time allocations, and parliament will decide this evening at a quarter to ten whether there should be an allocation of time to discuss this particular bill.

In support of his bitter attack on closure this afternoon the right hon. gentleman quoted some newspapers such as the Winnipeg Free Press. The Winnipeg Free Press, in commenting about closure in connection with the flag discussion, had this to say—and this is now one of the right hon. gentleman's favourite newspapers:

> Mr. Diefenbaker must therefore answer this question: If closure is the terrible thing which Conservatives pretend, why did he force it upon Mr. Pearson?

As I say, Mr. Speaker, this is what the Winnipeg Free Press had to say in connection with the flag debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the date of that article?

Mr. Pearson: It is the issue of December 14, 1964. It goes on to say:

> If the rule itself is wrong—

That is the closure rule.

—Mr. Diefenbaker must explain why he gave repeal of that rule such low priority that, even with a large majority—

The largest majority in our history, Mr. Speaker.

—and, as it turned out, with the assent of the Liberals—

Because we asked him to do this.

—he failed in six years to remove it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But we never imposed it at any time.

Mr. Pearson: It was mentioned during the campaign, and in the first speech from the throne of my right hon. friend's government there was included the sentence: "We will abolish closure". That was in 1957.

Mr. Hellyer: A broken promise.

Mr. Pearson: It was never used and it was never abolished, and it is part of our procedure now.

Closure, of course, can be a very arbitrary action. The right hon. gentleman referred this afternoon to Sir Winston Churchill in terms of admiration and respect which we all feel for a great democrat and lover of parliament. But Sir Winston Churchill did not hesitate in government to use closure when he felt it was necessary to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With the consent of the Speaker.

Mr. Pearson: But in order to avoid closure, Mr. Speaker, we have by agreement—and this is part of the rules and procedures of this house—worked out a system of time allocation for legislative and other proposals that come before this house. We hope that agreement on allocation of time can be reached voluntarily. However, if it cannot be reached voluntarily it can then be made the subject of a motion put to the house by the government of the day for its acceptance or its rejection. Is there any fairer way than that to bring debate to an end when the time has come for a decision to be made after due debate? That is what we are asking to do today, Mr. Speaker.

I want to discuss this procedure because I think this is the first time in our parliamentary history that any government has asked parliament to allocate time for a piece of legislation. We are here to consider this procedure, and I think we must consider it in light of the present parliamentary situation and the debate that has taken place on this bill. We must consider whether there has been time for adequate consideration and discussion in the light of the present situation of parliament, in the light of the important developments in our country which require parliamentary intervention and action, and in the light of the necessity for getting on with the business of parliament and the business of the House of Commons that requires us to take action in regard to these important matters.

I shall examine this resolution in the terms and context of our parliamentary program and the functioning of parliament under the present rules and in existing political circumstances. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is the context in which we should be discussing this matter and not in the context chosen for the most part by my right hon. friend, which would be more appropriate for the debate on the defence bill, a debate that has been going on for days and days and days. I shall ask the house, Mr. Speaker, to look at the basic situation we face today in the light of parliamentary and legislative action. When that is done I suggest that it will not be difficult to justify in the minds of the majority of this house and in the minds of the majority of people in this country that the time has come to bring this debate, important as it has been, to a conclusion so that we may get on with other important pieces of legislation.

Our country is developing. It is changing at a pace and in a way that is unprecedented in our history. New problems are constantly emerging because of these changes. Because of increased organization, because of the need of people to shift from areas of less than full employment to areas of labour shortage and because with our complex industrial economy it is essential to make adjustments constantly to ensure the continuance of the high rate of growth in this country, increasing prosperity and the high standard of living, we must adopt our living to new conditions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Half a million unemployed.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there are half a million unemployed and that is a deplorable situation, but only half as deplorable as when there were a million unemployed under my right hon. friend. Half a million is bad but one million is worse. We want the kind of legislative changes put into effect which will reduce the half a million unemployed to the irreducible minimum in this country.

All these complex changes in our society require changes in our law and in our legislative processes to keep pace with them. If the laws are not adjusted in accordance with the requirements of our new life they can impede the development of Canada and reduce our capacity to provide the standards and levels which we would otherwise be capable of maintaining. That means, Mr. Speaker, that more legislation is required on more subjects in this country than ever before in our history. I hope to be able to indicate the evidence of this shortly. If our parliamentary institutions are unable to cope effectively with these legislative requirements, people will lose faith in parliament and its processes and they will lose faith in democracy also.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Apart from the rapidly changing material circumstances of our society we are experiencing, as other countries are, a rapid change in values and popular attitudes. This has been reflected in this session of parliament in discussion of the laws relating to divorce, capital punishment, penal reform and other social problems. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is of fundamental importance that the legal fabric of our society lag not too far behind these changes in values and attitudes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Surely it is important and essential that parliamentary procedure adapt itself to these new requirements.

If our laws are to be changed, they have to be changed by parliament. That is one of the main reasons for parliament's existence. Let us have discussion, of course, but discussion leading to decision after a reasonable time has been given for that discussion. Discussion, yes—but discussion leading to legislation, to approval or rejection of the proposals put before parliament. If parliament is not capable of dealing quickly and effectively with the needs of the country, it fails in its essential purpose. This does not mean, Mr. Speaker, and I would not like it to be interpreted as meaning, that this parliament has not accomplished a great deal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ha.

Mr. Pearson: This parliament has passed and is passing more legislation than has ever been passed before in our history.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ha.

Mr. Pearson: That is true.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: In a similar period of time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought we were obstructing.

Mr. Pearson: But that is not the proper standard of measurement we must apply to our parliamentary procedures. The standard is not measured against the record of the past but against the needs of the present and the future. The standard is not what has been done in previous sessions or, indeed, earlier in this session. The standard must be the needs of Canada and the Canadian people in the weeks, months and years ahead. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is in this context that we must view the present situation in which parliament finds itself, and it is in this context, I suggest, that we must consider the decision of the government that there should be an opportunity for the House of Commons to allocate time as provided by our rules and to draw to a close this debate on defence unification and defence matters—by agreement, if possible. That agreement has not been possible. It was not possible because the official opposition made no proposal of any kind, as I understand it, for such allocation.

An hon. Member: That is not so.

Mr. Pearson: They made no proposal about any time that might be sufficient to dispose of this bill. Their view was that this bill is wrong—

An hon. Member: What about Tuesday?

Mr. Pearson: —that the government of the day does not accept their position that this bill is wrong, that it should not be proceeded with, and that they would continue to use the rules to discuss the bill in the hope of breaking our will so that we would abandon this bill at this time and go on with something else. Their position was, in other words, that we surrender to the opposition.

Mr. Churchill: Postpone the bill.

Mr. Pearson: Postpone the bill?

Mr. Churchill: That is the advice of the senior officers.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend says: "Postpone the bill." Postpone consideration of unification which was first put before members of the House of Commons in March 1964.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Nonsense.

Mr. Churchill: When did the bill come before us?

Mr. Pearson: We do not understand that. We think we would be derelict in our duty toward all the other things we ought to be doing in this house if we added to the time that has already been given in this house for the consideration of this bill. It has been said this afternoon and it has been said previously that the allocation of time and the way this motion is being put before the house are an undue limitation on the rights of parliament for free discussion of an important and controversial issue, as undoubtedly this one is, and very strong views are genuinely held by those against and those in favour of this bill. The charge, I think, is legitimate in the sense that it must be met.

How long has discussion gone on concerning this important measure? The figures have been put on the record before and I do not apologize for putting them on the record now. This bill, or this question, has been before the house in this session in one form or another for 27 days and the standing committee on national defence met on the bill on 26 days. This amounts, Mr. Speaker, to 53 days of discussion on this question in this session. I do not include in my total the three days spent largely on this subject on supply in February, 1966, nor will I include the 14 days on which this subject was discussed with varying degrees of intensity when the standing committee on national defence was considering the estimates for 1966-67 in May and June, 1966.

In case anyone should wish to examine my analysis of these statistics it is as follows: in the House of Commons, second reading, five days; in committee of the whole, 13 days; in interim supply, nine days, making a total of 27 days; in the standing committee on national defence on Bill C-243, 26 days. That seems to me to be an adequate time for consideration to be given even to a bill as important as this one.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Would the Prime Minister permit a question? He has indicated the time taken to consider this measure. Would he explain why the Minister of National Defence found it regrettable that more witnesses were not called before the committee?

Mr. Pearson: I am indicating the amount of time which was made available to hon. members of the house and the committee for discussion of this bill and producing witnesses to take part in that discussion.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Would the Prime Minister answer the question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister has the floor.

Mr. Pearson: I wish to pass now to another aspect of this question, one to which I alluded at the beginning of my remarks. I should like to make as clear as I can the stark reality of our parliamentary situation in regard to the time we have already spent on legislation and on other proposals this year and the time which will be needed to do the things which should be done, some of which are already on the order paper and others of which have been announced.

Before each session of parliament, as the right hon. gentleman knows, having been head of the government, all departments are asked to indicate what legislative measures are required together with an opinion as to their importance and priority. When this was done for the opening of this present session so long ago in January, 1966, a larger number of proposals than usual were put forward as being important and urgent because it had not been possible to deal with them in earlier sessions.

At the beginning of this session the cabinet reduced the list to those items of which parliamentary approval might reasonably be expected and which in our view warranted the highest priority. These appeared in the Speech from the Throne on January 10, 1966. The list did not by any means include all the legislation which was considered to be urgent or important or both. For instance, that particular list did not include amendments to the Canada Water Conservation Assistance Act, amendments to the National Parks Act, revision of the Expropriation Act, revision of the Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act, amendments to the Navigable Waters Protection Act, amendments to the Immigration Act and over 15 other pieces of legislation which were considered at that time to be desirable. These were all bills which in our view were needed to meet the national requirements and improve national life. Yet, as

I have mentioned, we felt it was impossible even to list them with any hope of parliamentary action—and we were shown to be right.

An hon. Member: Why fool around with this measure then?

Mr. Pearson: Of the legislation which was listed in the speech from the throne, parliament has by no means dealt with all of it even after sitting for 244 days, as of yesterday. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) has a question on the order paper in which he asks:

> What are the intentions of the government at this session of parliament with respect to the following measures forecast in the Speech from the Throne but not yet introduced:

The question goes on to set out those proposals. The intentions of the government are to get these measures dealt with. But what are the intentions, or the possibilities, of the House of Commons? By including these measures in the speech from the throne the government indicated its intention that they should be acted upon. But there is a second part to the hon. gentleman's question. Why, he asks, has action not been taken to date with respect to each of those measures promised in the speech from the throne. If the hon. member would consider what has happened in connection with the defence unification bill and other proposals, including interim supply, he might be able to answer his own question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Apart from the important pieces of legislation which the hon. member for Carleton has mentioned there are others of importance which he has not mentioned and which equally clearly cannot be passed at this session of parliament, though we would like to see them introduced and dealt with as soon as possible. Perhaps I should mention some of these. I do not think there is any possibility of getting them through this session though it is possible we can do so during the rest of the year: amendments to the Area Development Incentives Act; recapitalization of the C.N.R., visiting armed forces act; amendments to the Canada Corporations Act; Canada manpower and immigration council bill; national museums of Canada bill; bill respecting the Cape Breton coal industry; amendments to the National Housing Act; broadcasting legislation.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A point of order, Mr. Speaker. It arises from the statement by the Prime Minister that possibly the Cape Breton coal legislation could be dealt with this session.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The point of order arises from the fact that the minister of mines has already announced that it will not be dealt with during the present session.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Pearson: Had the hon. member been listening closely he would have realized that this was a list of proposals which cannot be dealt with during the present session but which we hope to deal with during the rest of this year. With the items I have mentioned and one or two others of less importance which I have omitted, including a proposal for the appointment of six more parliamentary secretaries—

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I put a question to the right hon. gentleman? A little earlier in his remarks he said that capital punishment might be discussed. In view of the uncertainty which hangs over those who are today awaiting death, is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation at the present session in this connection?

Mr. Pearson: I mentioned this as one of the problems which the government has been considering. It is not a matter which can be dealt with this session but I would hope it could be dealt with this year in a responsible way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: With the items I have mentioned—I have left out a few of the less important ones—and with those listed by the hon. member for Carleton we have 21 items of legislation which were considered to be important enough to warrant our trying to get them through in this session of parliament but which we shall not now be able to deal with, though I still say we hope to deal with them later in the year.

Nor is this the total measure of our inability as a parliament to meet the needs of the country, though it is certainly evidence of our failure to measure up to the standards which Canadians might reasonably expect in terms of parliamentary action. Let us consider the session we are trying to bring to an end, and I am sure all hon. members will be glad when that can be done.

Mr. Churchill: I suggested how it could be done six weeks ago.

Mr. Pearson: It could be done this week with respect to three items provided we gave up the defence bill, and we are not going to do that.

Mr. Churchill: Just postpone it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just postpone the disintegration of the armed forces.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Pearson: There are some things of such urgent importance that because of the requirements of the situation they must be done before we prorogue. They must be done this session. There is interim supply. Supply has been voted for April only and we must have finances for May to enable the business of the country to go on. Then there is the occupational training of adults bill. This must be dealt with as the old program expired on March 31. Interim action under the provision for interim supply cannot cover the full field.

There are the rules of the House of Commons. The interim rules, inadequate as I believe them to be for our present requirements, must be extended for the new session if we are to measure up even as badly as we have done in this session to the current needs. I would hope that the rules committee when it meets in the next session will be able to bring in some very far-reaching changes that will commend themselves to all hon. members.

Then there are amendments to the Wheat Board Act. These should be passed or essential provisions of the act will expire at the end of July. There are also amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act. Surely we are going to pass this legislation so that by our one hundredth birthday we shall have established equality between naturalized and native born Canadian citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: There are amendments to the Income Tax Act, to repeal the 5 per cent tax on business profits. There is revision of the Interpretation Act. This bill has been introduced in three parliaments, in 1962, in 1965 and in the present parliament. It has never been passed and because it has not been passed the whole process of statute law revision is being held up. The list I have given does not include action on the report on Mr. Justice Landreville or, indeed, the question of capital punishment.

How long will it take parliament to deal with these urgent items if there is no allocation of time in respect of the current debate? I would go further than that. In the light of these legislative requirements and the problems they pose to the House of Commons, surely it would be possible for the business committee to get together and allocate time to all these things I have mentioned—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: —because if we cannot do something like that, if we cannot plan—and it takes agreement by all parties to bring about this kind of planning—what will be the situation when we face our new session, our centennial session of parliament? When is it going to start? Well, we don't know. How much will it be able to do? Well, we don't know. That will depend on how we can plan the work by allocation of time to this and the various other measures we should put through before the centennial session.

Mr. Churchill: Closure.

Mr. Pearson: It is not closure because I hope it can be done by agreement as it is done in the United Kingdom each week by agreement between the whips, and done so successfully that there never has to be a government order planning time except on rare occasions. When such a government order is made in the United Kingdom—and I point out that we like to follow British parliamentary practice or at least we hear this said so often—when the government makes an order for allocation of time it becomes an order of the house once it is introduced by the government.

By contrast we are presenting the House of Commons with a procedure under which, by agreement, we can allocate time to all these important matters, and the priority and importance of these legislative proposals can be agreed on by representatives of all parties, not merely by the government. Surely that would be a step forward in the conduct of parliamentary business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: But if that cannot be done and if a new session begins say on May 8—I have no grounds for believing that that can happen, but let us for the sake of argument say we can end this session on May 5 and begin the new one on May 8—there are certain things that should be done, some that have to be done, before we can even consider a summer adjournment when hon. members may like to take part in at least some of the centennial celebrations.

With the maximum number of days they require for debate under our present rules, these things that in the government's view have to be done are the debate on the address, for which eight sitting days are provided; supply, 30 sitting days; supply motions, eight sitting days; the budget, six sitting days, or a total of 52 sitting days for those particular items.

Her Majesty the Queen, Mr. Speaker, will arrive for her centennial visit on June 29. From May 8 to June 28 there will be 38 sitting days to deal with proposals which could require, if we do not agree, 52 sitting days. In other words, we cannot possibly, unless parliament changes its approach to these problems, accomplish even the basic essential requirements to maintain the business of the country before the arrival of the Queen. That visit will require a parliamentary adjournment of a week or so around July 1, with the session resuming in the second week of July to cover the essential business. By the end of the second week in July, by which time I would hope that essential business would be completed, we shall not have passed one single item of legislation in the centennial session that I have been talking about. We can stay on all summer or we can come back in September or October.

The legislation that will be facing us at that time—I hope I am wrong but I do not think I am because it is not likely that the legislation will be facing us before then—will be legislation that is important to the country and which ought to be passed this year. It includes the Broadcasting Act, the Immigration Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canadian Development Corporation Act, the Cape Breton coal and development legislation, amendments to the National Housing Act, major social legislation including changes in the legislation regarding divorce, penal legislation, juvenile delinquency legislation and other social reforms, and a new corporations act to provide for better information by corporations and better protection for investors.

It also includes amendments to the Food and Drugs Act, amendments to the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act, amendments to the Criminal Code, amendments to the Parole Act, the budget bills, legislation which is ready or will be ready soon on manpower mobility, amendments to the Indian Act, amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Fishery Improvement Loans Act, revision of the Customs Act to take into account the results of the Kennedy round of tariff discussions, which I hope will be good, amendments to the Customs Tariff Act, a new Canada water act, amendments to the Financial Administration Act, amendments to the Canada Elections Act on election expenses—perhaps we can agree on cutting down the time for general elections—legislation to control pollution in interprovincial waters, amendments to the Post Office Act, amendments to the National Energy Board Act, legislation on educational television unless it has been previously dealt with by estimates—

Mr. Knowles: It won't be.

Mr. Pearson: —and a resolution covering the words of the national anthem.

These, Mr. Speaker, are not all the items of legislation that should be dealt with if the laws of Canada are to be made consonant with the needs of Canada, but this would be a good program for the rest of 1967.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: If we are going to be able to do this as a House of Commons, and I am speaking as a member of the House of Commons and one who has a very special responsibility in these matters, we do have to work out procedures not only in respect of the critical situation which we have now, something which has been building up, but procedures which will anticipate these difficulties and allocate time to bring in proposals before the discussion on those bills and proposals. If we can do that then we will be able as a House of Commons to plan a legislative program for the years ahead which will show that we are aware of the needs and the requirements of this new country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss the defence bill but to confine my remarks to the motion for time allocation which is now before us. It is unfortunate that it was necessary to move this motion to allocate the amount of time which will be made available for the debate on unification of the armed forces as set out in Bill C-243. I feel certain that had there been greater foresight and had less adamant positions been taken at the earlier stages it probably would not have been necessary to bring in the motion now before us. However, I am glad that the government did not act under standing order 33 which provides for closure and was invoked in 1956 during the pipe line debate. By acting under provisional standing order 15A of which notice was given a week ago today, the government has at least provided an opportunity for consultation and has given fairly adequate notice. If this motion passes tonight those who wish to discuss the bill further will still have three more days in which to do so.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that there comes a time when in respect of any piece of legislation, no matter how important, a decision must be made. The matter of the unification of the armed services, which is extremely important, was discussed at some length during interim supply, for four or five days on second reading, during 55 sittings of the defence committee and now 13 days on clause 2 in committee of the whole.

There is value in having a fairly prolonged debate on something which is controversial because a prolonged debate provides an opportunity for the public to become aware of the issues at stake. It also gives an opportunity for parliament to obtain a reaction from the public, particularly those sections concerned about the principles at stake in the legislation in question. However, this matter has been before the house at various stages since last October and the question of integration and the white paper since 1964. It would certainly seem to me that the public is now fully aware of all the ramifications of this legislation. Certainly parliament has had an opportunity during the sittings of the defence committee to hear expert opinion. We have now heard from both sides of the house and from all available parties with reference to their reaction to the proposed legislation. It seems to me that all points of view having been expressed, parliament now has a responsibility and a duty to make a decision on this matter.

Whether a member agrees with the unification legislation or whether he disagrees, surely the time has come in a democratic forum to allow the majority of members to register their opinion either for or against it. Not only have we a responsibility to do this but it seems to me we must give some regard to the fact that unnecessarily prolonged debate on one measure of necessity precludes discussion on other matters which may be of equally vital importance.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask a question?

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. Douglas: I would prefer if the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would defer his question until I have finished so I can keep some coherence of thought in the case I am trying to present.

Mr. Alkenbrack: That is pretty difficult.

Mr. Douglas: Yes, it is when I get silly remarks from people who do not even get up when they want to object. I am trying to make a cohesive statement, and I am sure that during the last 13 days a coherent line of thought would have been strange in this house.

I am not only concerned about bringing the debate on the unification of the armed services to a decision. I am concerned about the fact that the present impasse in which parliament finds itself focuses attention on the serious deficiency of our parliamentary procedures. There is little value now in trying to apportion blame as to who is responsible for the fact that now we must adopt the extraordinary procedure provided by provisional standing order 15A in order to bring this debate to a close. There is not much point in saying that the minister of defence is arrogant, that the government is bull-headed, or that the official opposition is obstructive and repetitive. What we have to do in all seriousness is accept the fact that all of us who are members of this house must assume some of the responsibility for the manner in which we have conducted the affairs of parliament. We must recognize that parliament has now become a full-time job and that the matters which concern parliament are much more complex and far reaching than they have ever been in the past. There is hardly an aspect of the daily lives of men and women that is not reflected in some matter we discuss in this parliament.

Parliament in this country, as in nearly all democratic countries, has reached out to touch areas of human endeavour that were not subjects of governmental concern 25 or 30 years ago. Because of that it seems to me that the old method of conducting the affairs of parliament will no longer suffice to meet the demands of the present situation. In this regard we have only to look at what has happened this session, which we hope is now nearing its end. The 1966-67 session will be the longest in our history. The previous record was set by the session of 1964-65 when the famous flag debate took place. That session lasted 248 sitting days. By next Tuesday, April 25, we will have equalled this record for sitting days, but since parliament sits longer hours we will actually have sat more hours. If this session of parliament extends beyond next Tuesday, which it undoubtedly will, it will have the record as being the longest parliamentary session in our history.

How much longer can we continue to operate under a series of archaic procedures when, after 14 months, we still find ourselves with a great many important items which have not been dealt with and will have to be passed over until the next session? There are many important questions which should be dealt with during this session and which, in the opinion of members of this party, must be dealt with at the next session and during this calendar year, 1967.

Assuming that a new session of parliament begins in the next week or two, it will take from then until July 1 just to deal with the speech from the throne, the budget and the estimates. What have we left? The Prime Minister has already indicated a whole host of things that he would like to see dealt with in the next session.

Mr. Lewis: This year.

Mr. Douglas: Yes, he wants to see them dealt with this year. I must say that while the Prime Minister wants them dealt with this year, I think it is a great pity that many of them were not introduced this session. While the government has not full responsibility for how long debates take, nobody prevents the government putting legislation on the order paper. Many of the things the Prime Minister has been dangling in front of us today like Christmas packages could have been on the order paper and they were not. Some of them are of long standing, but there are some items which in the opinion of this party must be considered and adequately dealt with in the present year.

One of these is the housing situation, which has now reached the proportions of a national crisis. There is the report of the broadcasting committee to be dealt with. Broadcasting in this country and the operations of the C.B.C. are almost in a state of suspended animation until we receive some direction and a clearcut policy is laid down. Then there are the social measures that members in all parts of the house have been discussing and to which the Prime Minister has indicated he is favourably disposed. These include such matters as divorce legislation, amendments to the Criminal Code regarding the dissemination of birth control information, and legislation regarding the legalizing of abortions where the health of the mother is in danger.

We need to deal with the manpower policy, which is not in a happy state at the present time. With 400,000 unemployed this country will need a manpower policy that is much more aggressive and far reaching than anything we have had to date. There is also the Canada-United States auto pact, which the government has now indicated it would be willing to have discussed by a committee of the house. If it is to be the pattern for future rationalization of the industries of Canada and the United States, this pact has to be examined to see how it has affected our economy, what benefits we have received from it and what disadvantages we have suffered. Then there is the legislation regarding the Canada Development Corporation which must be dealt with. This measure was first introduced in resolution form as far back as 1963 and has been put off year after year by the government. There is no legislation before us in this respect.

In my opinion the defence committee of the house and the house itself must in 1967 discuss NORAD. This treaty is subject to renegotiation in 1968. We do not want to be discussing it the way we discussed Bomarc missiles, that is, after the government has signed an agreement. The defence committee first and then the house ought to undertake the fullest possible investigation and examination of this problem, particularly with reference to the anti-ballistic missile program which could involve this country in tremendous expenditure.

We must also deal with unemployment insurance legislation. We are still waiting for some action on the Gill report. The benefit rates and ceilings are still those established eight years ago and they are completely inadequate today. We have not yet been able to deal with the report of the public accounts committee. This is a serious matter. Some of the comments of the Auditor General are disturbing. This house ought to have the opportunity to discuss fully the report of the Auditor General and that of the public accounts committee.

The Prime Minister in a speech yesterday referred to communications satellites. This whole matter is of vital importance to Canada if we are not to be dependent upon another country for our communications systems in the future. I am hoping the Prime Minister will agree to send this matter fairly soon after the new session starts to a committee of the house so we may know what type of research work is being carried out and whether we are taking adequate steps, and taking them quickly enough, to safeguard Canada's interests in the field of communications.

The Prime Minister has mentioned the matter of amendments to the Canada Elections Act to deal with the report of the committee on election expenses. There is the question of capital punishment, the matter of the Cape Breton coal mines, anti-pollution of water and air, and a whole host of other things. We will not be able to deal with these matters in 1967 unless we are prepared to examine the procedures of the House of Commons. In the opinion of the members of this party parliament must plan its business if we are to adequately discharge our responsibilities and grapple courageously and effectively with the vital problems that are confronting the people we represent.

The Prime Minister has given us a long list of items that he would like to have had discussed in this session and which he hopes will be discussed in the next session. He says that parliament has not been able to organize its business in a way which would have permitted these matters to be dealt with. I say to the Prime Minister that he must accept a very major share of the responsibility for this situation. One of the responsibilities of government is to give leadership in arranging the affairs of parliament. What attempt has the government made to plan the work of parliament? We set up a business committee with great hopes that it would effect the planning and conduct of our work in this house. I think that with the exception of the redistribution legislation, and now the unification of the armed services legislation, this committee has never been called into session.

The government has simply drifted from one little crisis to another and has made no real attempt to plan the work of the session or to get the co-operation of the parties in planning that work. It is true, as the Prime Minister says, that it takes all parties to do this. Of course it does. But it requires leadership, and that leadership must come from the government and the Prime Minister. It has not been forthcoming; the house has not been getting that kind of leadership. I am convinced that we have now such a backlog of legislative items that we will not be able in this calendar year to cope with them unless we begin almost immediately to use the business committee of the house to plan the work of the session one or two weeks in advance, to obtain where possible agreement as to the amount of time that will be allocated for each debate, and if we cannot reach agreement the majority of the members of the house will have to decide what that allocation shall be.

All of us are for free speech. All of us want to have the right to express our opinion. If that right is monopolized by a few and on a selective number of items, this automatically excludes other hon. members from discussing other items which they consider to be of equal importance. Unless we allocate time in the 1967 session of parliament we will wind up next Christmas or early next winter in exactly the same position we are in now, with a backlog of legislative items and programs untouched.

I am not suggesting for a moment that parliament can become a sort of board of directors. I recognize that parliament is also a forum for dialogue and for a confrontation of ideas. But even in a forum there must be some fair allocation of time so that various ideas have an opportunity to be expressed and various items can be debated. Therefore I am suggesting to the house on behalf of this party that if we have any hope at all that the items to which the Prime Minister has referred, those which I have enumerated, and many others for which the Canadian people are asking, are going to be dealt with during this session, then we must be prepared to exercise some self-discipline and to reorganize our procedures so that we can do the job we were sent here to do.

I want to make it clear that if there is going to be an allocation of time for debates, it has to be done in advance. It is not good enough when the government, dawdling along, allows itself to get into an impasse, calls the business committee together and tries to secure some unanimity, and then comes before the house asking that a debate be curtailed after strong emotions have been aroused and a certain degree of acrimony displayed. The only way we can really have planned debates is to plan them a week or two in advance so that we know what items are going to come up, so that we can agree among the parties that a certain debate will take two or three days or a week depending on the importance of the subject, and so that when we begin the debate we know how much time there is and therefore how many speakers each party will be entitled to have and thus will be able to plan our work accordingly. Those members who cannot take part in that debate can be preparing for another debate. In this way we could hope to deal effectively with the very large program which the Prime Minister has outlined.

But if we do not do that, if the government continues to drift as it has been doing, if it will not give any leadership—certainly the opposition parties cannot take the initiative in this matter—then I warn the government that it had better not try at the end of this year, when all kinds of items have not been passed and in some cases not even been introduced, to lay the responsibility at the door of the opposition. I can say to the government that if it is prepared to give some leadership and to use the business committee as a planning committee to organize the work of the house and the work of the committees, it will have our full and complete co-operation.

I do not need to tell the members of this house, who are just as close to the public as I am, that we are living in a very critical age when men, women and particularly young people are reassessing our institutions and customs. Things that were accepted as sacrosanct for generations are now being taken out and examined. We are now in the presence of a generation which is stripping off the irrelevant and outworn and which recognizes that if society is to move forward it can only be done by retaining the things that have relevance for life.

This is going on in every field of thought and endeavour. Parliament is not immune. People today are examining democratic procedures and testing democratic government, not on the basis of clichés but on the basis of its ability to perform, its ability to put on the statute books and to put into effect programs which will enhance human life, raise the standard of living and improve the quality of life for the ordinary citizen. If we are not able to do that, then the day will come in this country when men will begin to question the value of parliamentary government and will begin to think in terms of other kinds of government. That is why I think it is important that in this debate we avoid recriminations and seriously try to face up to this problem, which is the responsibility of all of us, that is, how we can organize the work of parliament so as to do the job that we were sent here to do? If we are not successful in doing that, then the people of this country will hold us responsible, and justly so.

Proposal for Time Allocation

Some two and a half years ago the members of the New Democratic party first called for a series of reforms in our parliamentary procedure. In closing I want to put on the record eight proposals which I have just released as being what we think is a reasonable basis for approaching this whole question of reorganizing the work of parliament. These eight procedures are as follows:

1. The annual session of parliament should be divided into sections, with provision for periods of time between such sections, when committees can meet and deal with matters referred to them by the house. This proposal calls for the planning of the parliamentary year and for arrangements to deal with all categories of business in a definite order. This will also enable the country to know the time of the year when various items will be considered. The government has a responsibility for giving leadership in an orderly planning of the business of the house.

2. There should be instituted a practice of prior allocation, by all-party agreement, of a maximum time for each stage of debate.

3. The role of parliamentary committees must be strengthened by giving them time to meet when parliament is not sitting, by appointing small, effective committees related to the present-day business of parliament, by providing them with the means and staff to do their work properly and by providing for their reports to be considered by parliament. Final decisions would have to remain with the house. But committees should be enabled to do their work and to make their reports in such a way that the ground covered in committee would not have to be covered again.

4. The present method of entering departmental estimates in committee of supply by a fixed number of motions at times determined by the government should be replaced by one such motion early in the session, and provision made for a maximum of six special debates per session, when such debates are asked for, on notice, by ten or more members.

• (5:10 p.m.)

5. Speeches made while Mr. Speaker is in the chair should be limited as follows: The Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, and any other speakers who now have unlimited time, to be allowed not more than 60 minutes for any one speech; The leader of a party other than the government or official opposition, or the first speaker for any such party, to be allowed 40 minutes; all other speeches to be limited to 30 minutes.

6. The resolution preceding a money bill should be eliminated. This would still leave three stages of debate on all bills, namely, second reading and third reading, together with the committee stage, during which the details of the bill should be discussed.

7. Arrangements should be made to provide the caucus of each recognized party in parliament with adequate research and other staff, the cost to be related to the number of members in the caucus. This new measure would involve a modest total cost and would give members of parliament a much better understanding of the business coming before parliament and thus enable them to serve more effectively their country and their constituents.

8. The quorum of the House of Commons should be increased. The present figure of 20, established on a temporary basis in 1867, is far too low.

We are not wedded to these proposals, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Has he managed to get the support of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for all these proposals?

Mr. Douglas: I am glad to say that not only do they have the support of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre but he was chairman of the caucus committee which drafted these proposals. I feel the government will have no difficulty in getting his support as well as the support of all members in this group with regard to the proposals I have outlined.

I am not saying these proposals are the final word. There are others who will have other proposals, some of which may be better than these. All we are suggesting is that the committee on procedure, which has already suggested to the house in a report with which we shall be dealing in a few days that the provisional standing orders carry over to the next session, ought to be convened as soon as the next session starts. I suppose it could begin its work now and could look at these questions in order to bring in proposals as early as possible in the new session. In this way we could overhaul our antiquated procedure so that we would have some hope that in the new session we will be able to complete the legislation which I am sure all members are agreed is absolutely essential for the welfare of this country.

It had been assumed early in the year that probably we would get a long holiday because of the centennial celebrations. However, anyone who takes a look at the list of legislation the Prime Minister read a short time ago, and who adds to it the legislation he did not enumerate, will recognize that the likelihood of a long holiday is most remote. I say that I cannot think of any better centennial project for the Canadian parliament than the overhaul of its rules in 1967 in order to deal with the largest legislative program that has ever been dealt with by any parliament in the history of Canada.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member said he would accept a question when he finished. Will he do so now?

Mr. Douglas: Yes.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. Churchill: While the Prime Minister is here I should like to ask this question. Would the hon. member support the proposal I put forward with regard to postponing the present bill on unification, which cannot go into effect as we have been told by the minister, by General Allard, and by the adjutant general, until the regulations are completed in about four to six months? Would he support the postponement of clauses 2 and 6 on the suggestion that the department go ahead and draft the regulations?

While the hon. member is thinking that over, may I ask him a second question? Would he support me in proposing that this debate come to an immediate conclusion, that we postpone clauses 2 and 6 of the unification bill but pass all the rest of the bill between now and six o'clock, go on with adult training tonight, complete the adult training bill, the rules committee report and interim supply by tomorrow night? Will he support me in those proposals because of the tremendous program of work that faces us this year?

Mr. Douglas: With regard to the proposals made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), we must deal with the first one because the second is contingent on the first. I would support the hon. member's proposal for postponing the debate on clauses 2 and 6 if I were convinced the hon. member would agree to an allocation of time when clauses 2 and 6 came up for consideration.

Mr. Churchill: I do agree, and you can reduce the consideration to two days instead of three.

Mr. Douglas: If the hon. member is prepared to accept an allocation of two days next October, then I cannot see what value there is in the postponement of this debate from now until October. If after all this discussion the hon. member wants two days for debate, then it seems to me we will not be any more ready for a vote after those two days of discussion next October. I really suspect my hon. friend wants to wait until next October to get his second wind. If the length of time that has been taken on the first wind is any criterion, I would hate to think what would happen with his second wind.

Mr. Baldwin: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question with regard to an alternative proposal which he might consider and which I should say is my own proposal? Would the hon. member give consideration, provided clauses 2 and 6 were passed, to agreeing that they should not be proclaimed until the minister and the government have had an opportunity of preparing these regulations? These proposals would then be brought back into the house for debate at a future time.

Mr. Douglas: My understanding is that the government has indicated already it has no intention of proclaiming the act for about six months. It seems to me that if the official opposition or other opposition parties want to ask the government during those six months to prepare regulations so we will have a chance to see them prior to proclamation, then this is something for the government to decide. However, I understand the proposal has already been rejected by the official opposition.

Mr. Lewis: The proposal of the hon. member has been rejected by his own party.

Mr. Baldwin: I indicated I was putting this forward as my own suggestion.

Mr. Douglas: I can see no objection to it, but it is a matter on which the government should express an opinion.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether I could ask one question? Is the hon. gentleman aware of the fact that seven out of the eight points of his very interesting proposals to amend the business of the house have already appeared before Mr. Speaker's committee on procedure and it was not possible to get them adopted?

Mr. Knowles: All eight of them have appeared.

Mr. Brewin: Why doesn't the government put them through?

Mr. Douglas: Since the Prime Minister has put this in the form of a question, may I say that merely putting words into the rules does not necessarily change procedures unless some action is taken. We have already altered the rules to provide for the establishment of a business committee. If the government does not make use of the business committee and the business committee does not function, and if there is no allocation of time or planning of debates, no matter how many proposals are made by the committee or how many proposals the house adopts the procedures of the house will not be any more efficient than they have been in the past.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Would the hon. member permit another question? Is the leader of the New Democratic party aware that the defence committee evidence, which was not objected to by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) at the time, shows that the government will not have any decision whatever to make about proclaiming this bill. It is not their decision to make.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Perhaps I should clarify my question for the leader of the New Democratic party.

Mr. Olson: Order. You do not have the floor.

Mr. Douglas: All I can say is that I am not aware of it, and I do not think anybody else is except the hon. member.

Mr. Olson: When the time comes for the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) to make his contribution to the debate, Mr. Speaker, he can raise this matter at that time. The first point I want to deal with is the eight very interesting proposals which have now been advanced by the leader of the New Democratic party. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) pointed out, they are not new because every one of them was presented to the committee on procedure not only this year but at meetings in the past and some of them were partially accepted.

The point that must be made is that these ideas did not originate solely from the N.D.P. Many of them were put forward by members of all parties in this house. I am a little surprised to hear them advanced at this time on the floor of the House of Commons because I was under the impression that the meetings held were in camera and that the proposals to be made by the committee would be in the form of either a majority or a unanimous report. I am a little disturbed, if nothing else, that all of these suggestions, or many of them, about certain aspects of parliamentary procedure should be advanced at this time as being policies of the New Democratic party.

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Olson: I will when I have finished my speech. As I said, Mr. Speaker, I think it is a disservice to the purpose and intent of these in camera meetings, which were conducted in an informal way, to have one party come along with practically all of the ideas advanced by various members and lay claim to them.

Mr. Douglas: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member is suggesting that the proposals which I enumerated were purloined from the committee and that somebody on the committee representing our party transmitted confidential information, then I want to say that such a suggestion is completely inaccurate and fallacious. As a matter of fact, the eight points that I enumerated today I outlined at a press conference two and a half years ago, and they were advocated by our representative on the committee. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, they could hardly have been purloined from the committee because we took them to the committee. Members of other parties may also have taken them to the committee, but I resent any suggestion that there has been some breach of confidence on the part of our representative on the committee.

Mr. Olson: After having the leader of the New Democratic party remind us that he did in fact present most of these points some two and a half years ago, Mr. Speaker, an even more serious question of privilege arises so far as I am concerned. If my memory serves me correctly, these eight points—I believe that in fact there were 11 put forward at the time—were contained in a press release which was issued between the time the subcommittee discussed them and the time the report was to be brought to the whole committee for further consideration. Therefore there is some kind of breach of propriety so far as I am concerned in the hon. member advancing these points now, and there was an even more serious breach of propriety at the time because almost all of them were in fact discussed by a subcommittee of the procedure committee. As I say, they were issued in a press release by the New Democratic party even before they had been discussed by the whole committee.

Mr. Brewin: And why not?

Mr. Olson: The hon. member asks why not. It seems that that is all the regard the hon. member has for the confidentiality of in camera meetings. I respect the nature of such meetings. It is useful to hold informal meetings conducted on a basis of confidentiality and without press releases being issued, because I happen to believe that far more gets done in that way.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am speaking now as a member of the New Democratic party caucus. I want to tell the hon. member that to my own knowledge the proposals which we put forward publicly through our leader two and a half years ago and which he has again presented today were hammered out in good faith by the members of this party meeting together. I point out that the ideas that were set forth were ideas that we individually and collectively put forward in our own caucus and about which we reached certain conclusions. As I understand it, that is the manner in which they were again put forward by my leader today. He put them forward as a proposal in good faith, with the honest hope that putting them forward in the context of this debate might improve the procedures of this house. I must say I am surprised that a member such as the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) should suggest that these proposals were put forward in any other context. As my leader has said, we certainly do not claim exclusive parenthood for any or all of the ideas contained therein.

In concluding my question of privilege, may I say that we regard these proposals as being worthy of serious consideration by the members of this house no matter in which part of the chamber they happen to sit. We only hope that the hon. member for Medicine Hat and other members will consider them worthy of support.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I did not want to interrupt the question of privilege but I would remind the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that his remarks were out of order because he is not in his own seat.

Mr. Barnett: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am in my own seat.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni I should like to make one or two comments, perhaps in a rather obtuse way. I realize that the hon. member for Medicine Hat has the floor, but since the question of privilege has been raised, and in view of some of the things said by the hon. member about honesty, I should like to make a few comments.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam talked about obstruction and repetitive speeches in the nice fashion in which he usually delivers his remarks. However, one of the things he said was that free expression cannot be monopolized by a select few. I should like to ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam to comment in all honesty on what he feels about the self-discipline of the hon. members for Skeena and Timiskaming who for over two years, by means of obstruction and repetitive procedures, prevented the subject of divorce being considered in this house and caused a great deal of concern to the people affected. I should like to ask the leader of the N.D.P. what his reaction is to two of his own members who made a goodly number of repetitive speeches because of a principle they believed in. Does he think that the time then was monopolized by a pretty select few?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the house is now getting beyond the limits of the question of privilege that has been raised. I would point out that the hon. member for Medicine Hat has the floor.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings will contribute to this debate later. The question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is not valid. The hon. member suggests that his party is advancing proposals which might be accepted by other members. Most of his proposals, however, were advanced in the business committee by hon. members not of the New Democratic party on an occasion more than two years ago. There needs to be no more discussion on the point.

Having disagreed with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam on one point, I now wish to agree with him on another. The hon. member suggests that the business committee should have been set up a long time ago to consider the allocation of reasonable times for many items of government business. It is unfortunate that under provisional standing order 15A the business committee should have been convened only at a critical stage of a controversial issue. It is unfortunate that other matters have not been referred to that committee.

It can be argued that when the house leaders meet their informal discussions are much the same as those that would be carried on in the business committee. Nevertheless, as far as I know no other item of legislation has been referred to that committee and then been the subject of a motion. Techniques ought to be developed for sending matters to that committee so they may be discussed and unanimous agreement on allocation of time for various matters may be reached. I say that because when there is a filibuster and debate continues for a long time with arguments being advanced not once but four or five times by the same speaker, an effective means of closure is implemented.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) complains that his group has not had an opportunity to discuss all the clauses in Bill C-243. That may be true. Yet his party has taken 13 days to discuss clause 2 without discussing any other clause. The hon. member says that we ought to stand clause 2, not pass it and go on with something else.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit me to say something, because I think he has been most unfair? The time the house has spent discussing the bill has not been solely taken up by members of the Conservative party. More than 30 members of other parties have spoken, including members of the hon. member's party.

Mr. Olson: That is correct. We made one speech.

An hon. Member: Two.

Mr. Olson: I am referring to the 13 days spent in discussing clause 2. I have observed that for several days on end only members of the Progressive Conservative party have spoken. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre gave an undertaking, though he had no right to give it, that there would be no discussion later on clauses 2 and 6 provided parliament could reach the stage where only those two clauses would be left for the next session. He had no right to make such undertaking on behalf of the opposition or even on behalf of his own party. The hon. member's position is false. No member of the house knows better than the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that if clauses 2 and 6 are not passed during this session they die, that if the bill does not pass it also dies.

There are rules that may restore a bill to the position it once held on the order paper. Should clauses 2 and 6 not be passed, that would be the end of them. Should the bill not be passed, the hon. member knows that that would be the end of it. The hon. member is pretending to be magnanimous by saying that the other clauses will be allowed to pass by six o'clock if clauses 2 and 6 are stood. It is magnanimous of the hon. member's party which has spent 13 days discussing one clause to offer to pass all other clauses in so short a time. The hon. member offered also to put all stages of other bills through within a few hours. Yet always the hon. member advances conditions that must be acquiesced in, his attitude being that he is acting with a spirit of genuine concern—

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is imputing motives. The suggestion I made, and I will repeat what I said to the government house leader, was that if clauses 2 and 6 were stood we would by agreement put the unification bill back on the order paper and it would occupy the position on the order paper it now occupies. Things like that can be done by agreement in the house and frequently are done.

Mr. Olson: The chairman of the business committee, the Minister of Public Works, said that it was impossible to obtain any kind of agreement relevant to the motion before the house. Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre denying that?

An hon. Member: South Centre.

Mr. Olson: I beg your pardon. Is the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre denying that?

Mr. Churchill: I have already answered the hon. member.

Mr. Olson: The hon. member now says that he will do this, that and everything else provided clauses 2 and 6 are stood. He knows full well that that portion of the bill would die once the session is prorogued. It is easy for the hon. member to be generous when he has included a hooker in his offer.

Mr. Churchill: That is very unfair.

Mr. Olson: Our party believes that careful consideration was given to including provisional standing order 15A in the rules. We believe that this provisional standing order should be used from time to time. This session began 16 months ago on January 18, 1966, and still important legislative items remain. It is unreasonable for the official opposition to attempt to usurp the responsibility of the order of the business of the house. That is the government's responsibility, and it should call legislation on the order paper as it sees fit. After all, the government party is the largest of the minority parties in the house and it has the right to govern and to assume the responsibilities and privileges of government. One of those rights is to say when each item of business shall be brought before the house.

● (5:40 p.m.)

I believe the right of the majority of the members of this house to make a decision is as important as the right to be heard—and both are important. Surely we have spent enough time in committee of the whole on the clauses of this bill, taking into account the time which was spent discussing the same subject in the standing committee and in various other debates this session. Therefore I say we have reached the stage when a vote should be taken. The majority of members indicated by their actions in this house several days ago that they are ready to reach a decision.

I am not criticizing hon. members for attempting to persuade not only members of the government but others in this house into thinking as they do with regard to Bill C-243. But there has to be some time limit placed on this process of persuasion. The most decisive way in which the members of any party can indicate their opinions on Bill C-243 is by voting on it. Several speeches each having been made on the same subject by many hon. members, I suggest we should now give members who have taken part in the discussion the opportunity to record their votes.

It seems to me there is something wrong and that a change is taking place in the practices of this house as can be seen by looking at the record over the past two years. Unless and until a minority is persuaded that it is going to win a vote, those belonging to it seek to prevent everybody else from voting. In my view this is a wrong interpretation of the parliamentary process. The government may be judged, and in most cases is judged, by the application of the policies it has brought in, and the majority in parliament should not be prevented from bringing in the policies they desire to bring in provided there has been a reasonable period for discussion. I do not believe a small minority has the right to frustrate the government and a majority of those in parliament in their desire to implement a legislative program.

Surely the point has long since been reached when anything further could usefully be said about clause 2. It is therefore my hope that this proposal will be approved before 9.45 p.m.—certainly by that time—and that we shall then conclude our deliberations on this bill and proceed to deal with other measures which are also of great importance to Canada and to Canadians.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, we have just heard a representative of a small minority in this house lecture the house and tell us that parliamentary business should not be prevented from going through because of the actions of a small minority. He himself is one of the best examples of the delay which sometimes characterizes this house, representing as he does only five members or possibly just himself.

Time and time again the hon. member who has just spoken rises to take part in debates in this house. He should be heard from on a proportionate basis, about once a week. Yet the house very kindly permits him to stand up and give lectures on the rules, to speak on points of order, to participate in debates. He has spoken twice during the debate on unification, though without adding anything to it. In my party of 96 members—it is not a small minority in the house—we never take the time which should be allotted to us. It is distributed. I am surprised that the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson), representing this rump of a party—

Mr. Olson: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Does he consider he has any greater right to speak in this house than I have? I believe he has spoken five times in the unification debate thus far.

An hon. Member: Six.

Mr. Churchill: Well, I believe I have a little more knowledge of the subject than the hon. member has. In any case, there are 96 members of this party who have a right to speak before the hon. member is heard. But that is not the way we operate. We are more charitable. We allow him to rise and speak and we suffer, generally in silence.

I will make one comment with regard to another remark of the hon. member for Medicine Hat. He attempted to leave it on record that when I made certain proposals with regard to the unification bill I was concealing the fact that it could not be placed on the order paper again in the same position it had formerly occupied and that I was being hypocritical in the offer I made. This, I deny. When I made my offer last Friday and when I repeated it on Monday to the house leader I said to him that part of the package deal would be an agreement as far as our party was concerned to put the unification bill back on the order paper in exactly the same position as it is now, in committee of the whole house. There is nothing hypocritical about that.

I raised this matter in a further question today. I referred to it again in a question to the leader of the New Democratic party while the Prime Minister was here. I extended the offer in the interest of getting on with the business of the house, impressed by my knowledge of what is to be done and impressed by that enormous list of two years' work that the Prime Minister read, being just as keen to get on with the business of the country as anyone else but opposed to having parliament subjected to pressure in connection with a bill which is not urgent. There is no urgency at all about the unification bill.

The Minister of National Defence has told us it will be several years before Bill C-243 becomes fully operative. The real reason for the proposal I put forward with regard to its postponement was contained in the evidence given by General Allard and by the adjutant general before the defence committee as well as the answers given by the Minister of National Defence himself in the committee and here in this house, namely, that this bill will not be proclaimed until the regulations have been written and approved and that these regulations will not be ready for some four to six months. Then we should also consider the fact that until the bill is proclaimed it is not law. General Allard assured us in the defence committee that not one single step with regard to unification other than planning would be undertaken before the bill is proclaimed. That is the whole basis of the proposition I have put forward for the postponement of the bill. There is absolutely no urgency with regard to it.

Mr. Hellyer: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: The adjutant general made it very clear that it would be impossible to draft the regulations until the precise wording of the act was known. The hon. gentleman wanted to allow clauses 2 and 6 to stand. Let us hypothecate for a moment. If there was suddenly some change in clauses 2 and 6, of what relevancy then would regulations be which had been prepared on the basis of the original draft? It was primarily for this reason that the legal branch of the department and all responsible officers of the department have insisted that we require parliamentary approval now, before regulations are drafted, so that they can be based on the parliamentary bill rather than on merely a draft which could be changed subsequently, which would have the effect of undoing any work done in the meantime.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: I heard the adjutant general state that case and the minister repeated it briefly on April 14. That is a good point. It is a technical point. The assumption is that the House of Commons might alter the wording in clause 2 and clause 6. But the Minister of National Defence has disclosed to us over months and years that he will not alter a single thing, and with regard to this bill I think it incredible that he will effect some alteration in line with our suggestion on clause 2. In other words, if we suggest that he rewrite into that clause the Royal Canadian Navy, The Royal Canadian Air Force and the Canadian Army, is he going to accept our suggestion? We are not so stupid as to believe that. The adjutant general raised a straw man and the minister has made use of it. There will not be one word changed in clause 2 or clause 6 unless the minister says that there shall be a change.

The minister has his supporters in his own party. He has the N.D.P., the Social Credit rump, and the Créditistes marching along led by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) who announced publicly—it is in a newspaper headline today—that he will support the Liberal government. He might just as well join the Liberal party. This is a straw man which has been raised. In any case, let us not be ridiculous about this, although the minister is being ridiculous.

Members of the departmental staff are accustomed to drafting bills and regulations and making subsequent alterations when they find they have made a mistake. It so happens that in the defence committee when the bill was under study the adjutant general brought forward half a dozen changes which he himself had discovered, and one or two were made in response to questions that we raised. There is nothing unusual about making a draft and having it changed. I have suffered the penalty of drafting material and having it not only changed but thrown out. But you survive, and I think the adjutant general could quite safely go ahead with his drafting.

As a matter of fact, if we pass, as I have suggested, all the other clauses of the bill, even if they are passed on division, there will be an inference that the bill as a whole will go through unchanged by parliament, and with the declared intention of most of the New Democratic Party to vote for it, plus the Social Credit rump and the Créditistes, the government is relaxing and the adjutant general might also relax. That, sir, is the reason I have made this proposal.

The bill does not become law until the regulations are approved. They will not be approved for four to six months. Until they are approved the bill will not be proclaimed and until the bill is proclaimed unification cannot take effect. So I say, postpone it. We will let parliament make a gesture by passing 99 per cent of the bill and we can postpone clauses 2 and 6 until the fall. The government can then bring the bill back into the house in the same position as it is now, and we publicly consent to that being done without raising any objections, points of order, or anything else. If the government then insists upon imposing its allocation of time closure procedure, let it go ahead.

I suggested in the Prime Minister's presence that so far as our party was concerned—and I am pretty sure my colleagues will support me—that an allocation of two day's time might be made next fall instead of three. I also suggested that we go ahead with these other matters of business and wind up this session on Friday of this week, starting the new session at the convenience of the government but certainly by May 1.

May I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that on Tuesday I introduced a motion that we move from the unification bill to the adult training bill. Technically it was out of order and the Speaker so ruled, but he did say that by unanimous consent that motion could have been adopted. Had the government agreed we could have discontinued discussion of the unification bill and we could have spent Tuesday and Wednesday on the adult training bill. I did not do that as a trick. I did it seriously and responsibly because we had received notification then that we would be under allocation of time and it had been intimated to us that the allocated time would run through Friday, Monday and Tuesday. In those circumstances we said among ourselves, "Why then continue the debate on unification on Tuesday and Wednesday?" The house could have gone ahead with the adult training bill. But the government is only concerned about introducing this method of closure and imposing a restraint on freedom of speech.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the government has twice made a very serious error. On the very day that closure was imposed in the flag debate we had reached the conclusion in our caucus to terminate the debate. But the government stupidly imposed closure.

Mr. Matheson: The country did not think so.

Mr. Churchill: It stupidly imposed closure. It thought that would gain it a victory in the next election but here it is, still sitting as a minority government. Once again in this debate, instead of coming to an agreement as could have been done the government rushes ahead with closure, so keen is it to impose its will on the house.

I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to state I shall have a few other things to say because I want to discuss allocation of time. I want to say something about the business committee and deal with a few other matters with respect to parliament. May I call it six o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury), Housing—Toronto—inquiry as to action to relieve shortage; the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir), Veterans Affairs—Camp Hill, N.S.—reported lack of hospital accommodation.

The house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

Mr. McNulty: Mr. Speaker, may we by unanimous consent stand notices of motions 145, 137, and 128 and resume the debate on No. 200 in the same of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—PAYMENTS MADE TO JOHN T. SAYWELL AND/OR JOHN C. RICKER

The house resumed, from Thursday, March 9, consideration of motion of Mr. Cowan:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other correspondence dated since January 1, 1961, exchanged between the Secretary of State or any agency or department of the government of Canada relating to payments made to John T. Saywell and/or John C. Ricker by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and a list setting out in detail each such payment to each such person.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I made a few remarks in support of the motion of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) when this matter was previously before the house. At this time I should like to refer to a specific situation in respect of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. In view of the fact we will have other opportunities to discuss this whole question I shall confine my remarks to this specific matter.

Since the matter was discussed last I have seen a number of articles in newspapers regarding the amounts of money paid to various people employed on a permanent or temporary basis by the C.B.C. One article to which I wish to refer appeared in a number of newspapers in the Thomson chain. The author is Mr. Patrick Nicholson, a member of the press gallery. The article pointed out that one telecaster for the C.B.C. receives the large sum of $35,000 per year. It also gave more detail in respect of other salaries and amounts paid by the C.B.C. to various individuals.

It seems strange to me that when we as the elected representatives of the people request information regarding money paid by the C.B.C. we are inevitably informed that this is none of our business and such disclosures would not be in the public interest. After all, we are only the people who established this creature of parliament. We are not permitted to obtain these facts but the newspaper media, the fourth estate, obviously has access to this information. Obviously the information is obtained from the corporation. I am glad it is provided because at least in this way we can find out indirectly how much is being paid to various permanent or temporary employees.

I should like to know why we as members of this house cannot obtain this information by placing questions on the order paper. Whenever the estimates of the C.B.C. are placed before the house, and this is the case in respect of the estimates of other departments as well, we are asked to push them through. I think we are entitled to this information and I support the motion of the hon. member for York-Humber. I hope other hon. members will also support this motion. The disclosure of such information will not damage the C.B.C., although it might embarrass those people who authorize the payment of these excessive amounts.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under a democratic system of government such as ours, I feel that members of parliament should be able to obtain all the necessary papers for their information, so as to be in a position to play their role properly as legislators and representatives of the people. This is a general rule.

At the point where we resume this debate, I deem it necessary, even though the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) concluded his speech started in early March, to restate the problem, to set the situation in its true light, to put forward the present policy of the government and of the C.B.C. and to comment that policy.

Last January, the member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) moved the following motion:

> That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents, dated since January 1, 1961, exchanged between the Secretary of State or any agency or department of the government of Canada relating to payments made to John T. Saywell and/or John C. Ricker by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and a list setting out in detail each such payment to each such person.

On February 1 last, the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh), minister responsible for the C.B.C. to the government and parliament, in her answer to the hon. member for York-Humber, said that there was no correspondence between the Department of the Secretary of State or any other agency or department of the government with respect to that matter, and asked him to withdraw his motion.

The hon. member for York-Humber asked that the matter be transferred for debate, adding that he had asked not only for the tabling of correspondence and telegrams but also other papers.

For my part, I assume that the Secretary of State, in saying that there was no correspondence, meant also that there were no telegrams or other papers. Had there been telegrams or other papers, I am of the opinion, knowing her frankness and integrity, that she would have admitted it simply, specifying, if necessary, the reasons of her refusal to table them.

• (6:10 p.m.)

On the other hand, if the services of Messrs. Saywell and Riker were retained by the C.B.C. either for talks or news commentaries or historical research, there must be somewhere in the C.B.C. files correspondence, telegrams or at least papers such as contracts, agreements or the like on fees or honorarium, etc.

However, going back to the text of the motion, I wonder if the member for York-Humber was explicit enough under the circumstances. Especially in view of the facts that he will mention in the course of the debate, and his numerous experiences to which he will allude:

In the motion, he mentions:

> —the Secretary of State or any agency or department of the government of Canada—

Why did the hon. member not mention also the C.B.C. as possible holder of the papers he was interested in?

Perhaps the minister's answer would then have been quite different. Perhaps also he would have had an answer along the lines of the words from the C.B.C. which he quoted in the debate. Here are those words:

> We don't give out information. Such information is not in the public interest. Such information is not divulged to parliament.

These personal comments which came to my mind, first after the response of the hon. member for York-Humber to the minister's answer, give a great deal of support to my remarks at this point.

Mr. Speaker, the debate requested by the mover of this motion began last March 9. Contributions have been made by the hon. member for York-Humber, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), who concluded his remarks a few moments ago.

When re-reading the mover's speech, I note that, right at the beginning, he answers the question I had asked myself, namely: Why did he not mention the C.B.C. in the text of his motion?

In fact, he said and I quote:

> I would not have had the temerity to move a motion asking for information from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation having had many years' experience of requesting information, which requests have been met with the bland answer: "We don't give out information. Such information is not in the public interest. Such information is not divulged to parliament".

The mover's argument could be summed up as follows: the C.B.C. will continue to ask for money but will not give us any information. And he stressed a statement made by Mr. Alphonse Ouimet, president of the C.B.C., about the von Thadden incident:

This action does not mean that the corporation will abrogate—

I am quoting Mr. Ouimet—

—its responsibility in terms of the principle of the right of the Canadian public to information.

That statement seems at first to be inconsistent with the usual policy of the C.B.C.

In short, the hon. member is questioning the impartiality of Messrs. Saywell and Ricker.

He has pointed out with sincerity, I think, why he disagrees with them, when those gentlemen criticize the tendency to centralization, that is the centralization of our press, but why does he disagree with them, when they praise the C.B.C.? And in order to control the situation, he asks that the said papers be tabled in the house.

The member for Timiskaming supported the member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), insisting on the fact that the hon. Secretary of State should have a greater authority over the C.B.C. which would allow her to report more adequately to hon. members or to parliament.

Also, the member for Oxford felt that certain government organizations, among which the C.B.C., had avoided the control of parliament, although their funds were provided by taxpayers, that it seems nobody has any authority over them, that they are responsible to themselves only and that they are neither responsible to the public nor to the house.

Moreover, when the hon. member for Oxford concluded his speech a while ago, he drew a parallel between the means of information for reporters at large and for members of parliament.

It appears, however, that the subject matter of the present debate on the policies of the C.B.C., as concerns information given to members or to parliament, has always been within the purview of the internal policy of the corporation.

Generally speaking, every personal and confidential paper must remain so, whether it be at the level of governments, public corporations, private companies or private individuals.

If the necessary papers really exist in the records of the C.B.C., but if they are of a confidential nature, we understand that we would not have access to them.

Furthermore, since the C.B.C. is a public corporation and, therefore, under the same system, as I understand it, as any other crown agency, such as the Canadian National Railways for instance, it is appropriate that it should pattern itself, in some respects, on the behaviour of private companies in general, and especilaly private radio and television companies, so that unfair competition may be avoided.

Besides, complex problems might arise if, in some cases, a person who takes part in a television program—a television star, for instance, who will be paid, let us say $1,000 for a show—realized that another who, in his opinion, is not more qualified—which can be a moot point between people of the trade—gets two or three times more money than he does.

It seems that, under existing legislation, when a question of bias within the C.B.C. or any other aspect of internal policy is involved, the minister, who is only the spokesman for the corporation in parliament, must leave any other authority to the governors of the corporation.

It has been said that, since the corporation is, for a major part, financed by the taxpayers, parliament should obtain all the necessary information to control the activities of the corporation.

In fact, this national radio and television service is financed by parliamentary appropriation and by business revenues. For instance, for the year ended March 31, 1965, business revenues accounted for about 27.5 per cent of the corporation's income, while the appropriation voted by parliament in 1964-1965 for our national broadcasting service amounted to about $85,900,000.

Therefore, this means that hon. members have every reason to make sure that the public, in short the taxpayers, are fully protected.

The administration of radio and television seems a very complex question, at least as far as I am concerned.

Ever since I came to this house, I have found that the standing committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts, was most active. On the other hand, a white paper on broadcasting was brought out by the hon. Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) as regards the passing of new legislation I believe, and a special committee of the house tabled a report on that white paper on March 21 last.

I noticed that the hon. member for York-Humber sat on those two committees. Knowing how outspoken he is, I suppose that he must have put forward, at times, some good reasons for granting the minister more control over the C.B.C.

In the present situation, I think I understand why the hon. member failed to obtain the required papers, if they are available at the C.B.C.

However, following the thorough studies I mentioned earlier, I do not doubt that the present government will make sure that the public interest and the interest of our fellow-citizens are always protected and will avail itself—I mean the government—of every opportunity to amend or improve the legislation to that effect for the specific purpose of always safeguarding the public interest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (6:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member who has just addressed the house whether he does not consider a cheque to be a document.

[Translation]

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, I feel that cheques—I have always considered cheques as papers.

[English]

Mr. Andrew Chatwood (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) for the production of correspondence, telegrams or other documents relating to payments by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to Professors John T. Saywell and John C. Ricker is very interesting in that it concerns the rights of so many people. It concerns the rights of the individual member of parliament, the rights of parliament as a whole, the rights of the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh), the rights of the C.B.C., the rights of Professors Saywell and Ricker, and the rights of other people who work for the C.B.C. and who from time to time appear on television or are heard on radio. In this debate we must decide whether or not it is right and proper that these documents should be produced at this time. I am assuming that what the hon. member for York-Humber is seeking to obtain is information as to the amounts paid to Professors Saywell and Ricker, thereby making this information available to the public as a whole.

The hon. member for York-Humber, in speaking on his motion, quoted from the book "Nation and Province" which was, I believe, circulated at one time among the schools of Ontario and in which, he said, sharp attacks were made on the printed word. In the course of my speech I should like to quote from other books written by Professors Saywell and Ricker. In two of these books these gentlemen collaborated with other authors. In this way I hope to give some indication of the type of people these gentlemen are, which will give us some background with which to consider whether or not the payments made to them by the C.B.C. should be made public. The first is a book entitled "Canada, A Modern Study" by Ramsay Cook in collaboration with John T. Saywell and John C. Ricker. This book is basically a history of Canada. I quote from it briefly.

> The successful defence of British North America in the war of 1812 brightened the future prospects of the British North American colonies. Moreover, the war once more confirmed the direction that the economic and commercial development of the area would follow. The Treaty of Versailles in 1783 had cut Canada off from the rich lands of the Ohio valley. While furtrading posts had been retained in the area south of the Great Lakes for more than ten years after that, the merchants of Montreal were beginning to look more carefully at the lands north of the lakes. Then Jay's Treaty in 1794 and, more emphatically still, the hostilities of 1812-14 made it clear that the United States had no intention of allowing British and Canadian traders to ply their trade south of the lakes. It was to the west and north that the merchants of Canada, who were mostly based in Montreal, now had to look.

On page 41, speaking of the Liberal ministry which Laurier formed in 1896, the author writes:

> Macdonald had laid the framework for the Canadian nation. Laurier knew that to complete the structure he would have to heal the sectional and racial conflicts that had divided and weakened the country. His main aim was always to bind French and English speaking Canadians together in a common nationality, by following a path that was neither narrowly English nor French, Roman Catholic nor Protestant, but broad enough to win the acceptance of all groups. As he told a friend:
> "My object is to consolidate Confederation and to bring our people, long estranged from each other, gradually to become a nation. This is the supreme issue. Everything else is subordinate to that idea."

Sometimes the way in which the C.B.C. appears to spend its money puzzles me at least a little. I do not think it would be irrelevant at this time to comment on certain other expenditures made by the C.B.C. which perhaps would give us a point of reference from which to consider the payments made to these professors concerning which papers are being asked for. Later I shall deal with the question of whether or not I feel the papers should be produced.

At times it is easy to agree with the hon. member for York-Humber but at other times it is perhaps a little more difficult. Concerning the question of the C.B.C's expenditures, I feel it would be impossible to expect any given program presented by the C.B.C. to delight or excite all the people of Canada. A sports program is of interest to some while others prefer the news. Some prefer one type of music, others prefer another. It would be unreasonable to expect all programs to please all people. Even if we take people with similar tastes in that they prefer sports, we may find that some may consider a particular television sports program to be very good while others find it to be of no interest or even distasteful.

The C.B.C. spends what would appear to be considerable amounts of money on television and radio programs. It brings in controversial figures over long distances and in some cases pays them for their appearance. Yet there are vast areas of Canada, particularly in the Canadian north, where the people rely for English language broadcasts on Radio Moscow in order to receive world news. There are also vast areas in Canada which are not covered by any Canadian radio service, nor are they covered by Canadian or any other television.

I suppose that the evaluation of the amounts paid to these two professors who appeared on the C.B.C., and who of course could not be heard in the areas which the C.B.C. does not reach, is to assist us in considering whether or not it is right that many Canadians do not have the privilege of receiving C.B.C. broadcasts, whether we consider the content good or bad. One sometimes wonders whether, if we did not have the C.B.C., we would not have to create it.

The question which comes to my mind is whether, if we do make public the amount paid to these individuals, we will really be in a position to say that it was too little or too much. Of course these amounts will have to be compared with the amounts paid the same people for other services in other areas. They will also have to be compared with the amounts paid to other people appearing on or performing services for the C.B.C. To decide whether or not these amounts are justified we would have to consider the opinions of the people who have seen or heard the performances of these two gentlemen and perhaps get an evaluation of whether they were overpaid or underpaid. Of course there is always the possibility they were not paid at all.

I should like to quote from another book in which these two gentlemen took a part in the authorship. The book is entitled, "The Modern Era" and was written by John C. Ricker, M.A., John T. Saywell, Ph.D. and Elliot E. Rose, M.A. It is a historical book and I give this reference so that hon. members who may wish to pursue their interest in these particular authors can consider some of the points which have been raised by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) concerning their attitude toward the communications media. The introduction to this book reads, in part, as follows:

> The years from 1900 to 1914 form a distinct period in the history of Great Britain, the United States and Canada. In its own way, each country passed during these years from the old world of the nineteenth century to the modern era. At the beginning of the period, Great Britain was a mature industrial nation with a vast empire; yet she had passed the peak of her power and faced "a time of troubles" at home and abroad. The United States was just emerging as a powerful industrial nation, young and confident, rough and untamed, and was embarking on an empire-building experiment of her own. In 1900, Canada first began to develop her rich heritage of natural resources in real earnest. Although still a colony, she was becoming conscious of herself as a nation. When the twentieth century began, each country had reached a different stage of national development. As a result, the specific problems each faced in the new century were different.

I turn now to page 379, where I read:

> History is an unending process; today's newspaper headlines may be history tomorrow. At the same time many of today's headlines will never be important historically, while events that have been hidden in the back pages of our paper might be. In other words, many of the events that seem so important today may not be considered important ten years from now. It is difficult to determine the historical importance of events that have occurred close to our own times; yet looking back at the years between 1900 and 1960, it is possible to see some evidence of tasks completed, as well as of problems unsolved that remain for this generation.
> One of the most striking developments in the modern era has been the alliance of the three English speaking democracies that border on the Atlantic Ocean. At the beginning of the century, the United States and Britain were divided. Canada was beginning to assert her independence of Great Britain and, during the Alaska boundary dispute and the election of 1911 on the reciprocity issue, showed her resentment against the United States. Yet in the face of dangers common to all three—the first world war, the second world war, and the threat posed by the communist world after 1945—the three countries have drawn together in arms and spirit. That alliance has in the past helped to preserve the democratic tradition in the modern world. We hope that it will continue to do so in the future.

The references to the press, Mr. Speaker, do not appear in this book. There are, however, references in another book to which I will refer later. In evaluating the expenditures the C.B.C. may or may not have made to these gentlemen, we are led to a consideration of the other expenditures the corporation may make. We are brought also to a consideration of whether or not it is desirable that we should consider the amounts the C.B.C. may have paid to individuals. Are we, in parliament, in a position to decide upon the individual wages due to these individual people? The indemnities paid to a member of parliament are of course a matter of public knowledge; but we are public servants. The people who know our indemnities are, in a general sense, our employers.

Comments are made from time to time on the size of the crews the C.B.C. sends out to cover a given story. It would appear to me that sometimes these crews are large. It would appear to me also that sometimes they do not go into all the areas of this country, and thus fail to give the whole picture. However, there are experts within the industry who perhaps can decide these things which are, in the large sense, too small to be debated fully in parliament.

It has been said that the C.B.C. can do a tremendous job with eight men in four days which could be done by other companies with a crew of four men in two days. I am not in a position to judge the accuracy of this statement. However, it does seem to me from time to time that some of the crews the C.B.C uses on special projects are excessive. I think it may be fair to say that the C.B.C. has no vision of the future of Canada. It has spent a given amount, we do not know how much, on this program. I do not say we should know the amount paid to these individuals. However, it does appear from the size of the program and the number of people the C.B.C. fits into this program, that the corporation is spending money which could more properly be spent on giving service to areas which at this moment do not have service at all, or have limited service from the C.B.C. and other stations.

The question of the C.B.C. paying or not paying is a matter of some interest. There is an area in my own riding where for many years the news announcers and people appearing on special programs have not been paid at all. They are volunteers. Even today, there are only one or two programs on that particular station for which the C.B.C. pays wages. The station operates in collaboration with the United States Air Force.

However, the fact that the C.B.C. does not pay wages in an area does not mean that they should not pay to bring people on television in the larger areas. It will always be necessary to pay to get the type of people the corporation wants on these national programs. It comes back again to the question of evaluating the two things, one, the price that should be paid and, two, whether that payment should be made public. In order to establish the price that should be paid, I believe it would be necessary to ascertain what other people in the industry are being paid for a given time. It would be necessary to establish what these gentlemen are paid for other services. I cannot say that I envy the job of the C.B.C. in establishing the amount to pay those various people, especially guest stars. I am led to understand that at times they can become temperamental and want the same payment as another star, or possibly a better time for the program. I would not like to have to decide the amount to be paid to one star in relation to what is paid to another.

While I feel that from time to time the C.B.C. may be spending some of its money less efficiently than I should like, I do not believe the amounts paid to individuals should be announced publicly, any more than the wages paid an individual in private industry should be made public. The amount an employer pays to his employees is not generally a matter of public knowledge. He does not generally announce it to the other employees, nor does he publish it in the newspapers. This is something the employee of course knows, and the employer knows.

• (6:40 p.m.)

As I mentioned, Mr. Speaker, a member of parliament's indemnity is known to him and his employer, which is the public. However, the people's earnings are a matter of concern to themselves alone and are not necessarily public information. I need mention only the secrecy of the income tax form. An individual taxpayer's income is not generally a matter for the rest of the world to know about, unless of course he wishes to make it known.

I suppose it could be said that the amount spent on producing a given program for a season or the total amount paid to performers for a given number of programs is a matter to be considered. However, the amount paid a particular individual concerns only him and his employer.

I would not want to have the responsibility of setting these rates, and I know that the C.B.C. has a difficult job in deciding upon rates for different people, depending upon how much they are in demand. For that reason I presume they would not want to release these individual figures. I believe these figures in question are too complex to establish the efficiency or otherwise of the operations of the C.B.C., though I concede it is the responsibility of parliament to ascertain that the taxpayer's money is well spent and that all Canadians receive at least minimum television and radio coverage.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I am a bit hesitant about entering this very lively debate on a most important subject because I happen, just by accident, to have a personal relationship with one of the two people who are mentioned in this request for documents that the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) is putting forth. I refer to Dr. John. T. Saywell.

When I was attending the University of Toronto between 1961 and 1963, Professor Saywell was my professor in Canadian history. He was also for a short period my thesis director. Unfortunately our relationship was broken off when he accepted a promotion and moved over to York University to become dean of arts, a position which he now holds. During the period when I was attending Professor Saywell's classes, I found him a very invigorating teacher, an excellent seminar leader, and a man with a most interesting knowledge of Canadian history. I should say, too, that he and I did not always agree. I can recall some very interesting conversations which took place in those seminars concerning the relative merits of various policies and ideas of the government during the period 1961-63. I suppose in retrospect, Mr. Speaker, that three year period was one of the most exciting politically that we have ever had in Canada.

The point at issue here is a motion for the production of certain papers, specifically documents outlining the amount of moneys paid to Professor Saywell and Mr. Ricker by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, documents that set out in detail the amount of such moneys paid these individuals over a period of time.

The position that some members of parliament have taken is that the C.B.C. should not have to provide parliament with this type of information. My understanding of the way parliament operates is that other crown corporations must provide information of this type to parliament, when it is requested. I have heard from officials of the C.B.C. that there is no objection to providing this kind of information to the House of Commons if the House of Commons asks for it. But these officials do have objection to providing this kind of information when it is asked for by an individual member. They make a distinction between the rights of the House of Commons as a whole and the rights of the private member.

It seems to me that some consideration could be given to this point of view. The justification for the stand of the C.B.C. or for its point of view is simply that if the C.B.C. were to give in and to provide this information at the request of a member of parliament, then because of the nature of the operations of the C.B.C., they would be completely inundated with requests for this type of information. We have only to recognize what happens to members of parliament when the C.B.C. comes up with a juicy bit of information which does not please members of parliament, or broadcasts a program which does not please them. We all know the type of reaction we get from members of parliament. The feeling of the C.B.C. is that if they were to provide this type of information to individual members, the C.B.C. would lose its freedom of expression. They would not dare to go into controversial areas; they would not try to illuminate the dark areas of our society; they would be nothing less than a sounding board for the preservation of the status quo in Canada.

To develop that argument a little further, Mr. Speaker, one of the difficulties that we have in making a judgment of the C.B.C. is that we have precious little to measure it against; for the role that we have set out for the C.B.C. is quite different from the role the C.T.V. has taken unto itself, or the role in which the American networks function. Further, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is a great deal of similarity between the operations of the C.B.C. and the operations of the B.B.C. in Great Britain.

One of the problems that we face is this: How do we know we are getting our money's worth in this particular example the hon. member for York-Humber has put before us? For example, do we know that the C.B.C. is attempting to present all sides of the argument, and not just one side? When we are dealing with the media of broadcasting and television, what counts in getting a particular point of view across is not necessarily the words used, but the tone of voice, the particular stare or smirk of the person uttering the words, the particular type of background he may be outlined against, the type of music which is used in accompanying his remarks. All of these have an effect on the message that is received by the viewer or listener.

The use of the printed word, however, is quite different. It has a much different impact on the reader, for he is concerned with words and the choice of words. Printed material, too, can be twisted by the subtle use of words. Some write better than others. For example some newspaper stories coming out of Ottawa do not reflect what went on; some correspondents invent phrases that remain in the minds of the public.

• (6:50 p.m.)

In 1962 or 1963, Charles Lynch or Charles King—and I may be wrong in this—invented the phrase "Diefenbucks".

An hon. Member: That was the Winnipeg Free Press, with a cartoon.

Mr. Reid: I believe a newspaper reporter started it. That phrase stuck more in the minds of the electorate than most of the logical and legitimate arguments against the government of the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert.

When the hon. member says that the C.B.C. is biased but that the printed word is not, I disagree with him. Bias takes many forms.

Mr. Cowan: May I rise on a point of order. If my hon. friend will read my remarks on this matter he will see that I said it is a case of the pot calling the kettle black.

Mr. Reid: I read the hon. gentleman's remarks of March 9, 1967, when he introduced his motion. He talked about the bias of the C.B.C., and how its programs were biased. In effect he said that as members of parliament we wish to prevent bias and therefore we ought to exert our authority over the C.B.C. and obtain certain documents to gain greater control over the programming content of the corporation. I see the hon. member nodding his head in agreement.

An hon. Member: He is falling asleep.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. Reid: I will agree that many C.B.C. programs are shoddy. Yet we in this house are not always first class. We have our good days and our bad days, and the C.B.C., as an organization, suffers from the same defect.

Mr. Cowan: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Reid: The hon. member for York-Humber has elevated himself to a status above that of a mere member of parliament or of the human race. It is refreshing to see persons of such high calibre sitting here.

The hon. member implied that the bias of the printed word was minimal. That is true in part, yet it is not quite true. In reading old newspapers, during my historical researches, I saw how on the front page of a newspaper a political speech would be printed in full, and on the editorial page it would be torn apart. I suggest that that is good newspaper reporting. But that sort of thing seldom happens now. One may call the editorial page biased, but at least the newspapers of the past had the courtesy of announcing their bias on the front page; they were for the Grits or for the Tories. In the old days you got the facts; now you do not get them.

How often are the complete speeches of political leaders reprinted? Hardly ever, I suggest. Today journalists interpret what was said and the original words are seldom reported to the Canadian people. In that way the newspapers are biased, and modern newspapers are just as biased as our broadcasters.

I see the hon. member for Lotbinière wishes to speak. To maintain my good relations with hon. members from Quebec I shall yield the floor to him. Those good relations will vanish, probably, after the start of tonight's game.

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I listened with the greatest interest to what was said this afternoon, and I understand the emotion of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) when deploring the C.B.C.'s temerity, often displayed in programs which we could very well do without.

I am thinking, for instance, of last Sunday's program "Sunday" where we saw the hon. member for York-Humber. There I understood how the C.B.C. had bold programs.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the request submitted by the hon. member is quite justified.

It is a fact recognized by a number of people that it is becoming increasingly difficult and well-nigh impossible to exercise any control or any sort of authority over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is becoming altogether too bureaucratic an organization.

There is a lot of talk about democracy, but when some extremists attempt to put it into practice, democracy itself is destroyed. There are some flagrant cases, and this is where I understand the attitude of the hon. member for York-Humber. For example, the C.B.C. could be asked how a certain René Lévesque, a member of the provincial legislature today and a former minister, came to take a trip to Paris at the expense of the C.B.C. to interview Prime Minister Pompidou, when there are C.B.C. correspondents in Montreal.

Who is paying for that, if not the taxpayers? The Paris correspondent is then sent to interview a French publisher in Montreal. Abuses of this kind justify motions like the one we have before us today, Mr. Speaker.

I can very well understand why the hon. member for York-Humber complains that the C.B.C. is always showing presumptuousness and even contempt, as regards the parliamentary institution.

Mr. Speaker, if I were to go to my constituency of Lotbinière and tell the people there: "We are going to take the $123 million alloted to the C.B.C. and we are going to use them for family allowances—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order.

Mr. Choquette: —the electors of the Lotbinière constituency would vote as one man in favour of family allowances and against the C.B.C.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that my time is up. I deeply regret it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. I thank the hon. member for Lotbinière for abiding by the clock and I also thank him for his co-operation with the Chair.

The hour for consideration of private members' business being over, the house resumes the debate interrupted at six o'clock.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Pursuant to the order of the house of April 6, this sitting is suspended until eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Proposal for Time Allocation

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR TIME ALLOCATION RESPECTING DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McIlraith:

That an order be made allocating the time on the committee of the whole stage and all remaining stages of procedure on Bill C-243, An Act to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof (as amended), being government order No. 107 on the order paper and that the motion will provide that two days shall be allocated for the completion of discussion on the committee of the whole stage on Bill C-243, An Act to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof (as amended), and that one day shall be allotted for the completion of the third reading stage on the bill.

Mr. Churchill: You and I, Mr. Speaker, and a few hon. members will maintain a quorum in the house while the hockey match is in progress, and I will continue what I was saying before six o'clock.

I outlined then the proposition which I put forward to the leader of the house in order to speed up the business before us. In the presence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) I asked the leader of the New Democratic party for his support with regard to that proposition. So the Prime Minister, the leader of the New Democratic party, the minister of defence, the house leader and all members of the house who were present are now aware of the proposal that I put forward starting last Friday, repeated on Monday and repeated again today—a proposal designed to speed up and advance the pressing business which needs to be done by parliament. I quite agree that we should use our time in this house effectively and usefully. I regret very much that the leader of the New Democratic party failed to support the proposal that I put forward because with his support, and the support of his party, I am sure the government would have been persuaded to change its mind and postpone clauses 2 and 6 of the bill until next fall.

By that time the government would have the regulations ready and would be in a position to proclaim the bill immediately after its passage through this house. But the leader of the New Democratic party, who has not participated in the debates on the unification bill so far and who, like the Prime Minister, has rarely been present here during our discussions recently, failed to go along with my suggestion.

What I find strange about the New Democratic party as represented by their leader is that outside this chamber across the country the pretence is made that that party is opposed to the Liberal party. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon) in his turn goes about the country, as do others of his cabinet colleagues, putting up the pretence that they are against the N.D.P. Thus they confuse the people and fool them. Yet here in the House of Commons the Liberal party is consistently supported by the New Democratic party and sustained in office by that means. It is only on occasions when a rapid counting of heads is undertaken, and the N.D.P. group discover that it is safe for them to vote against the government, that they do so.

Today we were given an example of their support for the Liberal government. They are pretending they are a different party: They are the same. Mackenzie King, wrong in so many ways, was perfectly right when he said the C.C.F. was only the Liberal party in a hurry.

An hon. Member: Mr. St. Laurent.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. St. Laurent. That is the situation today. They are two parties with different names but the same ideas here in the House of Commons. The N.D.P. people go along with the Liberals.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ask the new parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He knows that.

Mr. Churchill: The best example is what has happened in connection with this unification bill. The members of the N.D.P. know very well—and I recognize they are people of intelligence—that the advice of those military experts who gave evidence before the committee, almost all of whom have been thrown out of office, is better than the advice given to this house by the Minister of National Defence. Yet they are co-operating with the minister and sweeping aside all that evidence in their anxiety to support the government. That is another object. They like the idea.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Winch: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Churchill: Certainly.

Mr. Winch: Is the hon. member discussing what he may think is the way we are going to vote on the issue of bringing this matter to a decision, or is he saying now how we are going to vote on clause 2 and on clause 6?

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have said it.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Winch: The question before the house now is the matter of bringing the issue to a vote. It is not a discussion on clause 2. If the hon. member thinks he knows how we are going to vote on clause 2 and clause 6 I think he is a little confused, because I do not believe he has the foggiest notion.

Mr. Churchill: I know the hon. member is going to vote against the bill; he has expressed opposition to it. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has said publicly in the defence committee, and here, that unless the foreign policy of the government is clearly established he cannot support the bill, and I think the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) is going to oppose the bill. I am not sure about the other members of that party, but I am surprised they would support the allocation of time proposal that came up today, since I suggested this other method of dealing with this particular problem and getting the House of Commons out of a difficulty. Be that as it may, we will see what happens when the time comes.

It is regrettable that an issue like this cannot be solved by agreement. Sitting on both the other side of the chamber and on this side, I have seen innumerable agreements arrived at, when difficulties were amicably settled in the lobby behind the curtains. These things are not recorded in Hansard. Neither are they recorded in the press, but experienced members of the house know how the house works. There is a tremendous amount of work done by agreement. This is how legislation goes through, unless we run into legislation that is controversial, such as the unification bill.

On many of our items of legislation there is an exchange of information, party to party, as to how many people are going to speak and how long they want. This is never publicly pronounced, but when you get a controversial bill you run into trouble. When a controversial bill is before the house the government should assess the opinion of the house, and should not press on with such a bill to the point that we have reached now, where it is going to impose closure, which is a restriction on freedom of speech.

We have not entered upon this debate lightly. We are not conducting a filibuster. Our opinions on this bill are soundly based, firmly held and rooted in conviction. We think the bill is bad for the country, and we are supported by the opinion and sound judgment of a great many former military personnel who held high office under the present government. This is not a light question at all. We are within our rights as an opposition in putting forward our arguments against the bill.

What are we to do—just collapse because we know that the smaller parties to our left are going to vote with the government and that therefore we cannot defeat the bill? Are we just to say, "We are going to be defeated anyway; let's give up?" This is not the purpose to be served by an opposition. If we have strong convictions on a subject under discussion we must present them. If there is a volume of opinion in the country opposed to a measure which comes before us, it is our duty to bring that fact to the attention of the House of Commons in the hope that the government will modify its bill, or postpone it, or withdraw it. That is the situation we have reached right here.

This idea that just because the government brings forward a measure the whole House of Commons should act as a rubber stamp, is something I will not accept. This is the idea behind allocation of time, Mr. Speaker. We have had the proposition put forward by the Prime Minister and by the leader of the N.D.P. that there should be allocation of time before—I wish I could underline this in Hansard—before a debate commences. Nothing could be more ridiculous; nothing could be more unsound.

Not until a debate commences and is carried on do you sometimes discover the peculiarities and the weaknesses of a bill before the house. I have seen this happen time and time again. For example, if we had had an allocation of time on the transport bill before the debate commenced, and had been restricted to two days in committee of the whole house, we would have had a far worse bill than finally emerged, because the amendments which poured in from both sides of the house transformed that bill. All those amendments took time to present and to be discussed. That is one of the reasons why I am opposed to the allocation of time idea.

Sir, I have made survey after survey of sessions in this house. I have put this on Hansard before and I do not want to keep repeating things I have said in the past. None the less it has been the case in session after session that legislation has always gone through, and gone through without much trouble except in those instances where a highly controversial bill was before the house. Over a period of 15 sessions that I have reviewed I have discovered that from 40 to 60 pieces of legislation were put through each session. On other occasions I have suggested that within the framework of 150 days to a session the house should be able to complete the major portion of its work and pass from 40 to 60 pieces of legislation if the planning is carefully done.

We are having this session one of the longest sessions in Canada's history, and one of the most poorly managed sessions in Canada's history. It is simply ridiculous to go for 245 days, as we have done in this session, running over the year, starting in January and ending perhaps in May of the next year. It is just nonsense. This session which was started a year ago last January should have ended in December. A new session should have started in January of this year, the centennial year, and we should have had a respectable and good session for centennial year. In such a year I would have kept out of the session controversial matters such as this.

I think it is a crying shame that in our centennial year we in this house are forced to put through a bill which is unsound, on which there is no need for haste, and which has brought on closure, or a restriction of speech in the house. Centennial celebration. What a farce the Prime Minister has made of parliament.

The session should have ended in December. I suggested at that time to members on the other side that although we still had before us the railway transportation bill and the unification bill we were prepared, again by agreement, to put those bills on the order paper in 1967 in the same position that they were in in 1966, if the session had closed in December, and not to go through all the committee proceedings with regard to the transportation bill, not to go through the second reading and things of that nature, but to put it back into the house in the same position as it was in in December, cut the session off, start afresh with a new speech from the throne and proceed then in an orderly fashion with supply motions and with estimates.

Look at the situation in which we are in now—245 days, talking about starting a new session some time in May, and we have the Prime Minister fumbling with regard to what we do between then and July 1. He has said that perhaps we will have to sit all July and August, and he laid out a list of legislative items as long as your arm, which will take another two years to accomplish.

In this session we have already passed 85 pieces of legislation. Obviously it has been two sessions crowded into one, according to the order paper, and there are other pieces of legislation still to come forward. I am not counting appropriation bills which follow supply. It is a good achievement. No one can complain that we have been holding things up. If you want to take it on the average, that is only about two days per bill.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Time and time again we have passed three small, minor or unimportant bills in this house in one day. Obviously a complex bill requires more debate. In any event the record of this house, so far as passing measures is concerned, has been good. The minute the government conceives the idea that it should force something through the house it begins to refer to allocation of time and closure. Government members begin to complain about the opposition talking about certain measures. Much of the difficulty experienced by the government in this regard could be avoided by agreement and I gave two examples before six o'clock. I am sure, for example, we might have used Tuesday and Wednesday of this week for the consideration of other legislation. I made a suggestion to the house in this regard on Tuesday, but it was rejected.

Before six o'clock I suggested that we could end this session promptly by postponing our consideration of certain parts of this bill until the next session. In this way we could pass the remainder of the bill, complete our consideration of the measure on adult training, pass interim supply and deal with the report of the rules committee. Before six o'clock I went so far as to suggest that this could all be done by tomorrow. But the government is inflexible and is bound to force its will on this House of Commons by closure.

The government does not have the support of the country on this matter of unification, because it was not a subject for discussion during the last election. There has been no mandate forthcoming from the people in respect of the destruction of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Army or the Royal Canadian Air Force. Unification was not a plank in the platform of the Liberal party during the election of 1965. This whole matter has been brought on since then by the Minister of National Defence, and against the advice of his senior officials he intends to push it through. That is why we maintain our right to present our case now.

Not everything that should and will be said about this measure has been said, and it is ridiculous to suggest, as the leader of the New Democratic party suggested, that the discussion on the bill has been exhausted. That hon. gentleman has not participated in the debate. I do not believe he has read the evidence of the committee or that he knows anything about this matter. In spite of that he says everything of value has been said. How does he know that? I have more to say about this measure, and I am sure others have contributions of value to make.

We in this House of Commons are constantly faced with this sort of situation. Some people want to curtail freedom of speech. Surely that is unnecessary. Year after year this house has passed important items. There have always been certain things which must be done. There has always been a great pressure to accomplish certain things of importance, and over the years we have restricted the amount of time for debate on certain matters such as the throne speech debate, the budget debate, supply motions and estimates. These restrictions have all been put in as a result of agreement. We have cut down on the time allotted for speeches during the committee of the whole house stage, and we have limited our question period. There may be other limitations we will have to bring about in order to facilitate the business of this house, but surely these limitations can be imposed by agreement rather than by arbitrary action on the part of the government. Surely these limitations should not be made by government ukases.

A few years ago changes of the kind I have mentioned were made as a result of the unanimous agreement of an all-party committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker. Such changes were made under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker Beaudoin and Mr. Speaker Michener. That is how things were done a few years ago. Useful and helpful compromises were reached. In contrast, under this autocratic government the house is being forced to restrict its freedoms.

To my knowledge five members of the cabinet have been telling the public outside this house how parliament must be reformed so that its work may be expedited. They have told the public that things should be done in a different way. I hope the public will realize that it is the government's intention to muzzle the opposition. All we in the opposition want is to debate government proposals. On the other hand the government wants to present its legislation to a completely silent opposition, which will act as a rubber stamp.

That is the government's thesis expressed in simple terms.

Members of the cabinet colour this plain and simple objective by certain phraseologies. They talk about modernization, streamlining and speeding up of our procedures. I am not aware of any period of time since I have been around here when there has been a greater degree of mismanagement by a government of the business of this house than there has been in the last few years. Items have not been brought forward on the order paper although they have been mentioned in speeches from the throne. Even when they are brought forward they are in such bad shape they have to be withdrawn, modified and changed to a great extent. Whenever one finds scores of amendments to a bill he must conclude that the government has prepared that bill badly. The members of the opposition have bailed out the government on numerous occasions during this session in order that measures could be passed. This has happened on so many occasions it would be difficult to recount them. This has been a session of mismanagement and it is being mismanaged now.

The leader of the New Democratic party suggested that the business committee set up last week should be left to arrange the business of this house. Let me remind him of the house committee which meets frequently to make arrangements in this regard. The business committee appointed last week met on Friday. It did not meet on Monday but met on Tuesday at 2:15 and reported to the house at 2.30. The only purpose of that committee was to decide whether we should consider this bill for two, three or five days during the committee of the whole discussion, and one or two days during third reading. It was hoped that I would bring forward the suggestion at that business committee that we should limit the number of days to the number suggested by the government.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question regarding the number of times the business committee met? Does he not feel that he should state that certain representatives of various parties on the business committee were in accord and that the committee felt it was necessary to meet more often? Will he not also admit that discussions continued with the hon. member on behalf of his group during the intervals between the meetings?

Mr. Churchill: The government house leader can place whatever interpretation he likes on what happened. In my opinion a business committee should meet on each of the three days set aside for that purpose. There should not be individual consultations. I do not know what took place during discussions between members of that committee and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), for example. That hon. member did not attend the meetings, nor did any member of his party.

The proposition I put forward earlier had nothing to do with what took place at the meetings of the business committee. I put forward a Conservative party proposition to the government house leader. This suggestion was considered by the business committee as a matter of interest and, perhaps, importance. It involved a package deal in respect of the general business of the house.

I am not sure that the business committee has been of any great value. The house leaders can do all this without going through the motions of calling the business committee. It should be decided whether we should spend one or two days on the bill in committee of the whole house, and how much time should be spent on third reading. The government should make that decision. If the government proposes to impose closure through allocation of time, let them say exactly how much time they are going to give the house. This is all I would ask of the business committee. If the government has the assurance of support from the New Democratic party, the Social Credit party and the Créditistes, naturally the Conservative representative has to give in because he is only one in a committee of four.

However, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to dwell on that aspect of the matter and will conclude by saying that I think it is unsound to attempt to enforce closure on the House of Commons. Freedom of speech in this chamber should be carefully guarded. An opposition that yields to a restriction on freedom of speech is derelict in its duty. This is basically why we must oppose closure, no matter what name it comes under. Whether it is called allocation of time or anything else, it is none the less closure; it is an imposition on freedom of speech, and we are expressing our opposition to it.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, go ahead.

Mr. Winch: I want to be very clear about the proposal of the hon. member; therefore I would like to ask him whether my interpretation of his proposal is correct. I gather he has made this proposal more than once. As I understand it, the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) is to the effect that clauses 2 and 6 should be held in abeyance and that the official opposition are prepared to deal with the other clauses of the bill at this time. I believe this proposal has been made because of repeated statements by the government that it will take at least four months to draft the regulations and have them approved before the bill is promulgated. I think the suggestion is that in October or thereabouts clauses 2 and 6 would come back to the house and would at that time be passed.

If my assumption is correct, I should like to ask the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre whether this necessarily means—it does to me—that the official opposition are prepared to have a government department working on and producing regulations, the passage of which involves orders in council, without legislative authority having been given. In my opinion, that is what the suggestion must mean. Then, I gather, in October we would come back to clauses 2 and 6. Are we to assume that the regulations having been drafted in the interim period and the remaining clauses of the bill having been passed, clauses 2 and 6 would automatically carry? I am sure the hon. member understands the point I am putting forward.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I dealt with this matter before six o'clock. The hon. member is pretty well correct, but quite briefly I will put it in my own words. I suggested that clauses 2 and 6 should stand until the fall, and I gave the reasons for making this suggestion. First, the regulations have to be prepared and they cannot be ready for four to six months. Evidence given by General Allard and the adjutant general, and agreed to by the Minister of National Defence, was that until those regulations are drafted and approved and the bill is proclaimed, this legislation is not law.

Until this bill is proclaimed and it is law, the regulations cannot take effect; and General Allard said he cannot take any step toward unification until the bill is proclaimed. That puts this matter off until October. I suggested that in the circumstances we pass the rest of the bill now. By inference—and I got that word from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) out in the corridor one day—this would give the adjutant general the assurance that he could safely go ahead and draft the regulations and the bill would not be so materially changed in respect of clauses 2 and 6 that his regulations would be thrown out.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Then I suggested that by agreement we would put this bill back on the order paper. As the matter now stands, the bill is in committee of the whole house. I said if this were done we would raise no objection, no points of order and would not participate in debate, and in the fall we would conclude the discussion of clauses 2 and 6, and third reading, in the same amount of time that the government is providing on this occasion, if they desire to impose closure. I also said that no harm would be done in that event and we could deal with other business at this time. I suggested that in exchange for this concession we would advance very rapidly with the adult training bill, the report of the rules committee and interim supply; and I went so far as to say that we would do all these things by six o'clock tomorrow night.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but the question I asked has not been answered by the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must point out to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) that the time allotted to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, hearing the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) speak of freedom of speech a few minutes ago leads me to reflect that each member may have a personal opinion on this matter just as anyone who takes the trouble of speaking about it.

Recently, I read in a newspaper an article by Mr. Dean, well-known correspondent and newspaperman, in which he wrote about those who preach freedom of speech in order to curtail it in others. I believe that if freedom of speech carries certain rights, it also involves some obligations.

The leader of the government (Mr. McIlraith) introduced a motion under standing order 15A suggesting the allocation of time, specifically two days, to complete debate on Bill No. C-243 in committee of the whole.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Standing order 15A was introduced on June 11, 1965, when the house agreed to certain amendments further to various reports of the committee on standing orders, on which it was my privilege to serve.

When this amendment was passed, there was considerable discussion in the house. Needless to say, the special committee on standing orders, after sitting nearly a year, had seriously considered the advisability of amending standing orders.

This afternoon, I heard the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), leader of the New Democratic party, recite once again the list of suggestions his party favours for the proper conduct of the business of the house.

I think it was the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) who remarked that these suggestions have already been made. Personally, I have no objection to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam or any other making suggestions to improve the proper functioning of the house.

Obviously, it was almost a repetition of the press release dated September 22, 1964, by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. I found a copy in my files and I read it during the supper hour.

However, I have noted that the government had implemented a number of the proposals made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam on September 22, 1964. If the government has not yet been able to find the miracle solution to get ahead with the business of the house, then let each and every one of us blame only himself.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), following those proposals put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, had answered on September 23, 1964, that he was very pleased to have the support of that hon. member as far as reform of the parliamentary procedure was concerned.

The Prime Minister repeated this afternoon that a system of allocation of time must be set up for the debates of the house, so that it might consider urgent matters.

Thus, after all the proposals made previously, the government finally submitted to the house amendments to the procedure in 1965. After a lengthy debate, most of those proposals were passed on June 11, 1965, including this standing order 15A about the allocation of time for consideration of any legislation.

I understand the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) when he says that the business committee has not met perhaps as often as it should have. As I said earlier, however, there may be a lack of sincerity and good will, since the house had agreed to provide in its standing orders a means to cope with the present situation.

That the government should have decided as a last resort to apply to existing rules and standing order 15A in order to allocate time for the study of Bill No. C-243 should not come as a surprise, and all members present must admit that a decision has to be reached with regard to that bill.

I understand that it will likely not meet everybody's wish, but after hearing quite a large number of speeches by the official opposition, some of which were quite thorough and others maybe less interesting and repetitious, I think that a solution had to be found and that the hon. leader of the government had no alternative but present the motion which he moved today.

Mr. Speaker, I should like, however, to make a suggestion and voice a personal opinion; if we do not want too much bitterness to prevail following this debate, it might be a good idea to come to an agreement and set clause 2 aside and go on with the study of the other clauses of the bill.

Under this motion, examination of the bill will have to come to a conclusion, and a vote will be taken, and without anticipating the result of that vote, I have no doubt that we shall vote on that question in the very near future.

I feel that it is in the interest of the country that we, as members, should have the opportunity to study the other clauses of this bill.

If the house decides that this motion is to become operative, I see no other logical solution, Mr. Speaker, than to agree to suspend consideration of clause 2 and proceed immediately with the other clauses of this bill.

I think we would show maturity in following this course.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, anything I had intended to say in this debate must be changed to some extent as a result of the intervention and of the interesting observations made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) this afternoon. He said then what I have heard on so many occasions from other distinguished members of the cabinet, not only during the present government's tenure of office but also when other parties held the office of government, that things must be done; we must get moving; the business of the country must be attended to. We received a long list of legislation which must be passed dealing with almost everything conceivable. I think the right hon. gentleman did forget to suggest that we should add some fitting words to the Sermon on the Mount, that we should amend the Ten Commandments and rewrite Hamlet's soliloquy. I suggest that the right hon. gentleman had everything in his speech.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: What about Hebrews 12 and 16?

Mr. Baldwin: I believe that intervention is superfluous because that matter is being attended to already. I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that there is an urgency about some matters. We must bear in mind today, however, that with the division in the political parties there is bound to be feeling. This is an actual part of the political process. In the course of the last two or three years the government which the right hon. gentleman leads has seen fit to introduce certain measures which have reawakened latent hostilities and strong dislikes. It will be for historians at a later date to say whether this was the appropriate time or whether it may well have been more appropriate to wait a longer period of time. The fact remains that in the country, and reflected in this house, there are stronger feelings of hostility than usually prevail.

Consequently, in assessing the necessity for introducing and dealing with legislation, there must rest upon the government the very grave burden of undertaking to give priority to measures which are less controversial. I do not expect there are many matters that will be dealt with in this house without controversy. It is in that atmosphere that the government now seeks to curtail debate on this bill by means of this motion. In the light of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has said, and according to my interpretation of events, much of the difficulty we are experiencing today must be laid at the door of the government.

In the fall of 1965, with a long period ahead of us and with urgent legislation to deal with, with the estimates for that fiscal year untouched, the government saw fit, for reasons which it considered sufficient but which obviously were not acceptable to the country, to call an election. Ever since that election the business of this house has not been properly ordered. Over and over again we have experienced situations in which legislation has been postponed, where ministers charged with responsibility for completing certain items have left on political safaris or for other good reasons. As a result, we have had to postpone these measures and deal with something else.

These postponements and delays have been the cause of uneasiness, and a feeling that there has not been that degree of advance which there should be in the legislative process here. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is a liability upon the government. After all, they are charged with the responsibility of so ordering the affairs of this house that we will know what we are doing, that when we start a matter we will have an opportunity to carry it through to completion. I believe these are some of the reasons for the feelings which have been generated in connection with this debate, and for which the government must accept a substantial degree of responsibility.

The right hon. gentleman spoke about changes in the legislative process. He mentioned certain matters, with some of which I would agree. We must bear in mind, and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) referred to this, that there is an equal responsibility resting upon the government to ensure the rights of private members. It is not enough simply to give to the grasping hands of government the right to use more power to speed up the legislative process for purposes which they consider necessary.

In the last few weeks, Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion to read some of the reports made by a special committee in the United Kingdom House of Commons, where they have been plagued with some of the difficulties with which we are faced. Running through the transcript of evidence are the same stories which we hear concerning the frustration of members and the desire of the government to introduce more and more legislation, often ill-conceived and therefore likely to be ill-digested. Some of this legislation, which the government thinks it wants, is not necessarily the legislation which meets the requirements of the country.

They have a very interesting arrangement there, Mr. Speaker, and in this connection I disagree to some extent with my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre. There, Mr.

Speaker appears before the committee along with the whips of the various parties and some of the prominent members of the parties, and they give their views. They are faced with precisely the same kind of problems with which we are faced. One of the major problems is one which was mentioned I think by the right hon. gentlemen, who had served on both sides of the house, namely the fact the government attempts to introduce legislation beyond the capacity of the government and the country to digest. This is a very serious difficulty.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that basically one of the major responsibilities of the government is to look carefully at the priorities. We would all like things to be done, I am sure, having in mind the situation which we occupy and what we have done during the course of political campaigns. We all have ideas we would like to see incorporated in the legislation, probably in many cases better ideas than the government has. We must recognize that the government has the responsibility and to that extent there must be a determination to assess the capacity of the country to absorb these legislative enactments. This has not been the case with this government.

I want to deal to some extent with some of the comments made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas). I agree with many of the proposals he has brought forward. I must say, with all due respect, that in my view the rules of this house do not belong to the government. They do not belong to any political party: They belong to the members of this house. I honestly do not believe it adds to the likelihood of free and unihibited discussion which we must have, not only in this house but in the committees, if there is any suggestion that any particular proposal for changes in the rules is the property of any party.

I accept the fact that the hon. member put these suggestions forward in good faith. However, I do not feel this is likely to be conducive to the type of change which we must have if parliament is going to survive as an active, viable and useful force. Equally I say to the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson), who intervened in this connection, that his definition of the allocation of time—I will have more to say about that later—if carried through to its logical conclusion would mean a great many changes. To what extent are some of the smaller parties of this house prepared to accept on motions—and in my humble opinion the government makes far too many motions that need not be made—an allocation of time in the form of not making statements on announcements which are made, with the right reserved to them to ask questions on orders of the day? This is a practice frequently followed in the United Kingdom. Personally I think it is a useful practice, because you precipitate a far more intelligent approach to a subject matter if, the minister having made a statement, an opportunity is given to ask questions. However, that is something the committee on procedure will have to discuss at a later stage.

Dealing with the particular motion before us, Mr. Speaker, I think I have been objective in my approach to the subject matter of this problem. I have not intervened or spoken in the debate up to this time, though I think I did say something on the resolution stage. I must be perfectly honest and say there are undoubtedly aspects of the debate which have appeared up to the present time which would justify one in taking the position that it might be a good idea, if not to bring the debate to an end, at least to arrange for a more orderly completion to the discussions we have had.

There have been invitations to impose closure and threats to do so. To my thinking, there has been repetition on all sides of the house which has been unnecessary and has not enlivened the debate. Statements have been made which I think should not have been made. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that we are not attending a tea party in the House of Commons. Feelings do run high, as they should and must. People do have a point of view to present and they feel very strongly about certain issues. I would be both surprised and unhappy if in the course of our debates we did not see these strong views and representations reflected in language which perhaps the following morning the hon. member who had used it might wish to correct. I have no objection to a little blood flowing, but I prefer blood and not garbage.

As a result of the continuance of this debate in this way, I think one of the problems has been our inability to get into some very critical and important issues which are involved in various clauses, the necessity for moving amendments and for joining issue, for coming together in conflict, on matters which have not been dealt with so far. If this debate ends without this being done, I think we will be doing less than our duty.

Finally in this regard, as advocate for the plaintiff, as it were, may I say I dislike dictation. I dislike tyranny. I dislike the tyranny of a government which imposes closure. Equally I dislike the tyranny of members who use more than their allotted time to present their views over and over again, preventing other members from having their opportunity to speak. But having said that, Mr. Speaker, I must say that what the government is now proposing is the wrong move at the wrong time in the wrong way and for the wrong purposes.

The hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance) who has just resumed his seat was one with whom I had the privilege of serving on the committee on procedure. Let me make it quite plain that what has been referred to as the allocation of time rule has no connection at all with what was proposed by this committee, on which I had the honour to serve some years ago. Any resemblance is purely accidental. I would certainly deem it a breach of privilege if I were accused of being in any way even part author of this particular rule. I would think the only way to find out who sponsored it would be to provide terms of reference under the children of unmarried parents act.

However, Mr. Speaker, as I say, this proposal is not an allocation of time. The allocation of time, as I construe it, is a measure which would not be used very frequently. The original proposal was one fairly mild in its application, and I do not think it would apply to too many measures. Those who promised us such great things are, I think, wide of the mark. But there are a number of measures we always have in every session in respect to which agreements made by the house leaders are not always observed, though not through the fault of the house leaders.

These are measures where it would be possible, through the agency and under the aegis of the business committee, to work out in detail an allocation of time, provided there is complete frankness on the part of the government in disclosing the legislation. I think that would have to be a condition precedent. I think it would involve as well a practice somewhat similar to that in the United Kingdom of filing all amendments to Mr. Speaker's ruling in advance of moving the amendments, ruling out duplications and those which are not in order, so we would know precisely what was involved in the debate and the areas which were controversial. However, I think it would be possible in some few measures to work out in advance an allocation of time, and I think the house would be appreciative of it and that it would do a great service.

This was the only intent of the committee on procedure when it proposed this step several years ago. It is my clear understanding that in respect to any step beyond that, the government must still be prepared, if it feels it has a good case, that it has the support of the country and it feels it must do so, to move closure, and to move it not under the guise of an allocation of time. That is their rights. If the government is justified in doing it, I for one would have no hesitation in supporting it in a proper cause. But the government must be very sure they are right, Mr. Speaker, and I suggest it is completely erroneous to exercise this right as they have done here, and to use the allocation of time rule at this particular period.

If the government is satisfied that this debate has gone on long enough, and if in the exercise of their discretion and in the carrying out of the duties and functions of the government they feel that they are acting in the best interests of Canada, then it is their duty to move toward and to impose closure, not this half-way measure which was never intended to be applied to a situation of this kind.

I know there are other members who want to follow me before the axe is honed and sharpened and put into the hands of the headman, but there is another reason that I feel very strongly about this, in spite of what I said at the beginning of my remarks. I think it is an issue which has been completely forgotten, and I think we should have the opportunity to discuss it in the course of this debate.

That is an illustration of the continuing growth by governments toward arrogating more power and more authority unto themselves to do by order in council, regulation and ministerial order in the dark recesses of cabinets and ministerial offices that which they do not dare do on the floor of the House of Commons. Lord Hewart called it the new despotism, in the form of anaesthetic.

We have talked about unification and integration. I will be quite frank and say that I oppose the government's action with some reluctance. I oppose it because involved here is the desire by the minister and the government to take unto themselves the right to change the structure of the armed forces of the country by regulation, order in council and decree.

We do not know what the government intends to do. The suggestion is made that there will be structural changes and important, fundamental and basic alterations. It is incumbent on the government to bring to this house before those changes are made the decrees, regulations and orders in council containing its proposals.

We are the most medieval, antedeluvian, anachronistic member of the democratic nations of the Commonwealth in our approach to this matter. Most countries, and I refer to Australia in particular, conduct themselves differently. In most Commonwealth countries nearly all orders in council and most regulations are brought back to the House of Commons for consideration or revocation.

I recognize that governments must have power, mobility, the right to move quickly, and flexibility. But hand in hand with that must go the right of this house and of parliament to check, to examine, to scrutinize and, where essential, to revoke and rescind orders in council and decrees. That principle is involved in this measure. I wanted to enter the debate last Monday, during the committee stage, but because so many members wanted to participate I could not. I wanted to propose what I thought was a suitable compromise—not along the lines of that suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, but in many ways similar. I put this to the minister for his consideration—and I asked a question of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam earlier embracing this suggestion. Let the bill pass, but add to section 6 (1) a provision that any proclamation in any way affecting the separate identity of the army, navy and air force shall not be effective until it comes back to this house, accompanied by the regulations or statements containing the exact proposal which the government seeks to introduce. At present we do not know what that is. The government asks us for carte blanche—for a blank cheque. That is dangerous, and we have had far too much of that.

Let me give an illustration. The President of the United States sought sanction for what is known as the Tomkin resolution, giving the executive power to increase the armed forces under varying circumstances to take care of the situation in Viet Nam then existing. This was to be done without any declaration of war. I am convinced from what I have read and from the people I have talked to—members of the United States Congress and Senate—that the members of those bodies would never, under any circumstances, have endorsed this request of the president and given the executive the authority under which the escalation of the war in Viet Nam has come about.

In a different way this is what the minister and the government are asking us to do. They want a blank cheque. They say: "We are the great white father, benevolent, all wise, all seeing; trust us; trust our discretion. The changes we make will be good; they will be helpful; the country needs them."

I have not that much trust in any government.

Mr. Nesbitt: Particularly not in this one.

Mr. Baldwin: And particularly not in this government, which has a predilection, because some of its members on the treasury benches have had experience in the civil service, to realizing the benefits arising from repairing mistakes in the dark, without ever bringing them to the light of day.

I say this to the minister: Many of our difficulties date back to the reasonable request that this bill be sent, before second reading, to a committee. Many of the problems which have been generated, many of the difficulties which have occurred can be traced back to the refusal on that occasion. Had the minister agreed to that request I should have been perfectly happy with an order allocating time. That was when the minister ought to have acted. He should have sent this matter to the committee on national defence.

Had the minister done so I submit that it would not have been necessary for the opposition to press certain changes; the government would have suggested them. The government would not have taken the hard position it has since taken, and from which it is unable to move.

Because of these things, though I have had grave reservations about the course of this debate, I cannot in conscience say that the government's action now is wise or necessary.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like others I regret the impasse reflected in the motion that is before the house for debate and decision today. Even so, I suggest that this day is not a dead loss. It has been good for us to take a hard look at some of our procedures. Indeed, I dare to hope that the debate that has taken place today will be of assistance to the members of the special committee on procedure, when we meet again either in this session or in the new session that should start soon.

Another advantage, although for the moment I might have to put that word in quotation marks, that flows from today's debate is the interesting list of items of business the Prime Minister gave us this afternoon. I hope that that list was not given merely as a debating point. I can tell the Prime Minister—and his remarks are now on the record—that members in all parts of the house will insist on government action on the many important issues he listed this afternoon.

Mr. Lewis: In 1967, too.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: As my hon. friend reminds me, the inference was that this was business which should be done for the people of Canada in 1967, and I say that this commitment on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) will have to take priority over any suggestion of a long holiday or anything else which might crop up.

Like others, as I have said, I regret this impasse. I believe it could have been avoided. One of the ways in which it could have been avoided would have been for the government to have acted completely in the spirit of standing order 15A by calling together all the house leaders, or the members of the business committee, to try to plan the length of time to be allotted to this debate before it started. I know that when I use that word "before" the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) will probably want to remind me of his statement a few moments ago, that nothing is more ridiculous or nonsensical than to try to plan the length of a debate before it starts. I can only say, then, that the way in which they carry on debates in the United Kingdom must be ridiculous and nonsensical, because the fact is they determine the time to be allotted to practically every debate which takes place in the mother of parliaments.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? While I believe nearly all hon. members would agree with him that it would be better at some time in the future to regulate all the business of the house by referring it to the business committee and reaching some agreement as to the time to be allotted to each measure, does he not believe that had this rule been used at the outset before the commencement of discussion, the government would have been accused at once of applying closure, even before consideration of the measure began?

Mr. Knowles: I do not agree with that assumption. I believe that had there been an honest attempt on the part of the house leaders or of the business committee to arrange, in advance, a reasonable time for this debate, we would not have found ourselves in the trouble we are in today. I proposed this myself in a television program on Sunday, April 2, before the debate started and I proposed it at a meeting of the house leaders on Monday, April 3. But the other house leaders thought it was not necessary.

I think the day must come when we plan our debates as well as the work of the parliamentary session generally, in advance, and I see no advantage in continuing to put that day off because of the fear which the Minister of National Defence has just expressed.

In the debate today we have before us two main issues. One of them is an immediate issue. The other is a long range issue. The immediate issue is very clear: Has the time come for the House of Commons to take a decision on Bill C-243. Surely, even after we have had our say about the rules and practice of the house, this becomes a matter of judgment—and it is a judgment which individual members will be called upon to exercise in about 20 minutes from now when Your Honour will, no doubt, apply "closure" to my own remarks. In my judgment and in the judgment of my colleagues this matter has been before parliament and before the country long enough for members to be in a position to take a decision.

We cannot liken this debate to the pipe line debate of 1956. I looked up the record today, though I hardly needed to look it up to recall it, and I found that in committee of the whole on that bill we spent practically no time at all debating its clauses. We were in committee of the whole for a few days, but at the very start closure was threatened and it was soon moved, with the result that we spent most of the time fighting closure or discussing points of order. We had practically no discussion at all in committee of the whole on the pipe line issue. On this occasion we have already spent 13 days in committee of the whole on Bill C-243, and even if the motion now before us carries, there will be two more or a total of 15 days. This, in my judgment, plus the time spent on second reading, plus the time spent in the committee on national defence, plus the time which was spent on interim supply is sufficient for members to be able to reach a decision. This issue being one of judgment I believe we should make up our minds at a quarter to ten this evening.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question? Coming as he does from Winnipeg, he is very fair. When he mentions the discussion of this issue on interim supply is he not overlooking the fact that it was not until expert evidence was produced before the committee on defence that we really got to the root of the matter? The discussion earlier was a confused discussion because the minister could not give us accurate information.

An hon. Member: Why have it, then?

Mr. Churchill: It was the fault of the minister. He was confused.

Mr. Knowles: I will be fair to my hon. friend from Winnipeg. I am quite willing to remove from our consideration the number of days spent on defence when we were on interim supply. I submit that the time left, the time spent on second reading, in the committee on national defence and in committee of the whole, is sufficient to enable us to exercise our powers of judgment on this bill.

But I think the other issue which is before us, the long range issue, is even more important. This matter has been referred to a number of times today, but like others I feel very strongly about it. I refer to the necessity which faces this parliament of finding a way, in a year which contains only 12 months, to deal with the amount of business which must come before us on behalf of the people of Canada. We often say that there is a great deal more to be done nowadays, and sometimes when we say this people think we are only generalizing. I would therefore like to give one or two facts in support of my contention that this is a very real problem.

If one takes the trouble, as I have done, to check the sessions of parliament going right back to 1867, he will find that before the turn of the century no session of parliament ever lasted more than four months—most of them lasted from two and a half to three months. If one looks through the records of the early part of this century he will find that but for the session of 1912-13 which extended over six and a half months—

Mr. Churchill: In 1903.

Mr. Knowles: No, but for the session of 1912-13 there was none of any great length. The 1912-13 session was the longest in the early part of this century. Most of them lasted for four or four and a half months. Even during the first world war the limit was about four and a half months. To come closer to modern times, some of us were here for the sessions during the second world war and we thought they were long. The fact of the matter is that although the sitting extended technically over the full calendar year, so that parliament could be recalled immediately in case of need, the total sitting time never exceeded six and a half months. I heard an interjection. Yes, some of us were here during the sessions I have just mentioned.

Since that time the length of sessions has increased. Until four or five years, the average was of the order of eight or nine months. Now for the second time in this decade we are in a session which has gone more than 14 months. Surely it is clear that the amount of business has so greatly exploded that we have to find some way to cope with the fact that there are still only 12 months in a calendar year.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I would like to think I might be the last person in the house to judge what we do by dollars, and yet I think even dollars can sometimes be an interesting measurement. I find that in the first years of Canada's parliament the amount of money that had to be appropriated, all told, was of the order of $20 million to $25 million. By 1900 that had doubled to $50 million. By 1939 it was still only $500 million, but today it is $11 billion. Let me put those figures in a slightly different way so that they can be compared with each other: in 1867 $20 million; in 1967 $11,000 million, an increase of 550 times.

Dollars do not tell everything and a lot of that, of course, is inflation, but surely the length of time we have had to spend dealing with the nation's business and the amount of dollars we have had to collect and appropriate suggest that our business has exploded to such an extent that we have got to take this problem seriously.

An hon. Member: A welfare state.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend says the problem of the welfare state comes in. He simply reminds me to point out, if I have time, that in addition to these evidences of what has happened, the fact of the matter is that parliament, which used to be concerned with roads, post offices and a few other things, is now concerned with everything under and over the ground, under and over the sea, and on into outer space, and with the life of man from cradle to grave.

The amount of business we have to cope with emphasizes the problem of time. That obviously is a prelude to suggesting we have to find ways of planning the use of our time. We have to find ways of regulating the amount of talking we do on the various issues that are before us. That of course immediately leads one to suggest that we must not orget the purposes of parliament.

I am reminded that the purposes of parliament, in the main, are twofold. There are a lot of incidental ones that we seem to produce as we go along, but there are two main ones. On the one hand it is our function to discuss the proposals that the government of the day places before the house, and a parliament that does not have free speech, a parliament that does not have the right to discuss those proposals as adequately and as sufficiently as necessary, is no parliament at all. But the other function of parliament is to make decisions, to decide whether or not the proposals placed before it by the government should be put into effect, and I say with equal vigour that a parliament that is denied the opportunity to make decisions on proposals that are placed before it is likewise no parliament at all.

I urge therefore that we should keep these things in balance. As a matter of fact, that is what the development of rules and procedures is all about. That is our constant struggle, to try to find the kind of rules that will achieve a balance between the right of free speech and the right of parliament to make decisions. The whole idea that in order to do this we have to do something about speaking time, whether it is the speaking time of an individual member or whether it is the time that the House of Commons spends on a motion or on an issue is, of course, not new.

We already have many time limits built into our rules, which we have come to accept without any question. For example, we have a 40 minute rule on speeches made while Your Honour is in the chair. When that 40 minutes is up the member speaking is through. Sometimes by unanimous consent he is allowed to go on, but the rule says that the member has had his say. There is no denial of free speech in that. The member must sit down so that another member can speak, and that applies whether it is the 40 minute rule when the Speaker is in the chair, or whether it is the 30 minute rule in committee of the whole.

[Mr. Knowles.]

We have accepted the proposition that the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne should be limited to eight days. No one shouts closure when the eighth day comes and Your Honour announces from the chair that the vote must be taken. No one says this is a curtailment of free speech. The same thing applies with respect to the Budget debate which is limited to six days. The same thing applies with respect to supply motions which are limited to two days. The fact is that freedom of speech does not mean licence to talk forever. It means the opportunity for some people to express their views, with due opportunity for others to speak, and this can be worked out only by rules and regulations that are fair to all concerned.

Therefore I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we are being quite consistent with the practices we have already established when we face the fact, as I hope parliament is doing, that we are going to have to accept not only limitations on individual speeches, not only limitations on perfunctory debates such as the address in reply, and the debate when Mr. Speaker is in the chair on the budget, but we are going to have to accept time limits on debates, on measures and bills that are brought before us.

I want to say again, as my leader said this afternoon, that doing this to me is not nearly as much a form of closure as it is for debate to be unlimited. I believe the most effective form of closure on other subjects is for the house to go on forever on one subject. I think one of the tragedies of the 1964-65 lengthy debate on the flag issue was that we spent so much time on it that we were not able to get at some other measures. I think if we had not spent all the time on the flag issue we might have got medicare in 1964. Someone said to me the other day, when I said this in another context, that there would not have been any more chance of getting medicare then than now, since it has been put back until July, 1968, in any event. In reply I would remind the house that in 1964 we did not have the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), and if we had had time to get at the medicare bill then we might have had it in effect a couple of years ago.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Churchill: Is it not a fact that in 1964 we gave up our summer recess in order to deal with the flag, and if we had not been on that we would have been away and not much other legislation would have gone through?

Mr. Knowles: Even having given up the summer recess and staying here, I would point out that the session started in the early part of 1964, in January or February, and did not end until the end of March or the beginning of April, 1965, so that in addition to giving up the summer recess we stretched the session to 248 sitting days. I suggest that is a perfect example of what a lengthy debate does by way of closing out debate on other important issues.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, we are going to solve this issue, but not just with respect to the matter now before us. The issue before us today is far more important than just the question of whether or not the final vote will be taken next Tuesday night on the defence bill. I think the question really before us is this: have we the wit to plan the rules and procedures of the house so that we will be able within 12 months to do the tremendous amount of business that is facing this country every year?

I see my time is running out, Mr. Speaker, not 40 minutes but because the vote on this motion must be taken at a quarter to ten. However, I would like to say just a word to the effect that the rule we are now operating under certainly needs to be improved. It is not the kind of allocation of time rule some of us produced in a committee a couple of years ago. It is one the government brought in instead, but even though this is not the best kind of allocation of time rule it is a great deal better than the old closure rule, No. 33, which I hope will yet be taken out of our standing orders. Indeed, I am as opposed to it now as I was in 1956 and in 1964. But may I remind hon. members that closure rule No. 33 is unilateral in its practice, whereas under provisional standing order 15A there is consultation between the government on one side and representatives of the opposition parties on the other.

The old closure rule, No. 33, when it came into effect was immediate. There was a vote at the start of the day and the debate was concluded that night. Those of us who experienced it in 1956 and again in 1964 know what it is all about. That rule allowed no room for negotiation as to the amount of time which might be allowed. Rule 15A, even with its imperfections, does provide for consultation and negotiation in respect of the time allowed. I suggest therefore that to try to compare the situation now with the situation of 1956 is a little bit far-fetched.

Some people suggest that what is being done now is the same thing, but one cannot make something the same as something else merely by making the assertion. The plain fact of the matter is that we had practically no discussion in committee of the whole on the pipe line bill in 1956, whereas we have already had 13 days and will have two more, a total of 15, in the committee of the whole on this bill.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is the answer to those who attempt to say that the application of this provisional standing order is the same as closure. Fifteen days of discussion is not the same as practically no discussion at all. Even when this rule was invoked last Thursday it provided, by the time element built into it, a number of days for further discussion. That was not at all possible under the old closure rule used in 1956.

May I say that I hope this house will approve of this motion tonight, to set the reasonable time limits proposed with respect to the further debate of this bill. I hope once we have done that we will all realize that the walls of parliament have not crumbled, that we have not limited free speech or ended democracy by adopting a limit of 15 days debate in the committee of the whole.

It is my hope that the matter will not end here, but that we will go on to improve provisional order 15A, or whatever number we may finally call it; because if we are going to cope with the problems that now face us we must adopt some allocation of time proposal that will really work, and will be fair to all concerned. One of the ways to make this work is to adopt a rule package which relates to the whole parliamentary year. It is not good enough to go on for eight or 12 months muddling through the business of the house in the way we have done and then invoke this rule to cope with a crisis. There should be a co-operative arrangement between the government and the opposition from the beginning of a session. The whole session should be planned in its entirety so that arrangements can be agreed upon as to limitation of time for individual debates.

Because this provisional rule has been invoked I will not complain if Your Honour tells me that it is 9:45 and that I must sit down. That is the rule, and I accept it. I do not believe the 40 minute limit on individual speeches is closure. I do not believe the eight day rule on the debate on the address is closure. If we have the intelligence to agree on the times to be allotted for various debates, that will not be closure. Rather, it will be the sensible planning of the parliamentary year so that we can carry out the business of this nation as grown men and women. I hope this is what we will soon do in this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 6 of standing order 15A it is my duty to interrupt proceedings at this time and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the main motion.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. McIlraith) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene); otherwise I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted in favour of the motion.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pennell: There is an echo in the chamber. Naturally, Mr. Speaker, I meant to say that had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. McLean).

Mr. Groos: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko). I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin). Had I voted I would have voted against the axe.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, would the house leader clear up an uncertainty and inform us of tomorrow's business?

Mr. McIlraith: Tomorrow we propose submitting item No. 107 on today's order paper to the house for consideration, and at the conclusion of that, item No. 134.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

HOUSING—TORONTO—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO RELIEVE SHORTAGE

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, two days ago I attempted to direct a question to the Minister of Labour about the housing situation in metropolitan Toronto. All members of that area, I am sure, are aware of the housing shortage, and particularly of the shortage of housing within the reach of the average citizen.

Recently the president of the Toronto Metropolitan Home Builders Association directed attention to the urgent need for overcoming difficulties blocking the supply of private and multiple dwellings in the Toronto area. The association outlined the basic reasons underlying the shortage in this way: first, insufficient serviced land; second, unstable mortgage financing conditions; third, an inequitable tax base and fourth, restrictive construction bylaws and conflicting building codes.

The association proposed solutions. It called for the provision of building lots in adequate supply for the mass production of homes by planning that would extend water and sewer facilities into areas of raw land. It suggested that modification of the educational tax burden was essential to allow municipal freedom in opening raw land for development without worrying about where the educational dollar was to come from. It demonstrated the need for the universal adoption of the national building code of Canada, which would allow more builder efficiencies and help to reduce red tape at the municipal level.

The association suggested the streamlining of the whole land development process, and the adoption of a sane policy with respect to land use. It said that builders in the metropolitan Toronto area are ready and able to provide family types of multiple housing, needed particularly in the area, but that the way had to be cleared by a change of attitude on the part of mortgage companies and municipalities—mortgage companies which preferred to finance downtown highrise apartments and municipalities which do not encourage multiple housing because of inherent education costs involved in connection with accommodation for families with children.

• (10:20 p.m.)

It is clear from this analysis that the housing crisis in Toronto is not one which lends itself readily to solution by federal authority. The recently retired president of the Urban Development Institute is reported in this evening's Toronto Telegram as saying that the Ontario government is toying with the housing crisis and derelict in its duty. Addressing the South Peel real estate board Mr. Grant Duff termed the housing problem an absolute disgrace and called on the provincial government to face up to fundamentals. He said—and I quote from the news report:

> Removal of the bulk of education costs from property will do more to solve our housing problems than any other single remedy.

Mr. Duff went on to say that recent provincial action in the housing field demonstrated that there is no recognition of the fundamental problem. The provincial government had apparently not recognized the effects of its policies on the land market. He pointed out that land costs in the metropolitan Toronto area were the highest in North America, adding:

> There could be no better solution to high land prices than an over-supply of residentially owned and usable land. Resulting competition would be of the greatest benefit to the public.

He went on to say there was a lack of adequate housing policies to which planners should conform.

Again it seems clear from the comments of this housing authority that the problem is not primarily one within federal jurisdiction. Yet a housing shortage in one of the great urban areas of Canada must be of concern to the federal government.

The Canadian Welfare Council in a recently published issue of its magazine Canadian Welfare said this:

> The disjointed approach to low income housing in Canada has produced far too much grief; far too few houses.

The author of that article, Mr. Michael Wheeler, called for a co-ordinated national approach to the problem. It does seem to me that when the environment of our people is becoming increasingly urban, when life in our cities is becoming the dominant kind of life that Canadians lead, the federal government must take a more active interest in the co-ordination of policy for improving the living conditions of our city dwellers.

I have suggested in the past that the federal government should have a housing and urban development ministry. I hope this will come soon, but in the meantime I would ask the Minister of Labour once again what steps the government has taken to relieve the shortage of housing in metropolitan Toronto and, if steps have been taken, what effect they have had up to this date?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say how much I appreciate the approach that has been taken by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) in dealing with this problem. It is the type of question that in my opinion should be asked more frequently because too much has been said, there has been far too much talk about Canada's growing housing problem—too much talk, I might say, by ill-informed people, people who have not taken the trouble to ascertain the real facts. That is why a question such as put by the hon. member tonight merits a complete answer.

[Mr. Stanbury.]

I am very pleased to be able to inform the hon. member that largely as a result of action already taken by the government there has been a marked improvement, a significant improvement, in our housing picture during recent weeks, and I am also very happy to say that no part of Canada will benefit from this improvement more than metropolitan Toronto. Again I say this is in no small measure due to steps taken by the government in December last, and shortly thereafter.

As of April 14 of this year, in effect in the first 100 days of this year, there had been more N.H.A. activity than there was during the whole of 1966, and that as I say again was largely a direct result of introducing a realistic rate at which the institutional lenders of money, those that provide most of it, will make it available to those who are interested in building or in purchasing homes.

But not only has this encouraging activity been in the field of direct loans, it has also been in the field of insured loans, and approved lenders have applied for roughly three times as many loans in the first 100 days of this year as they did in the same period last year. Already there are about 1,200 or 1,300 more applications in the first 100 days of this year than there were in the whole of 1966, and a large percentage of these are in metropolitan Toronto.

In addition to that, when it comes to direct loans you will recall that one of the other steps the government took was that it announced a special program to encourage house building during the spring months of the year, a special loan program, to begin April 1, or 20,000 loans. As of April 14, 17,000 loans have been applied for—that was before the middle of April though the loans were to cover the period April 1 to May 31.

In addition to this special spring lending program, where there is no presale requirement, for the first time in the administration of the National Housing Act, the C.M.H.C. have continued their normal direct loan program. As a result of this move there has been 300 per cent more N.H.A. housing activity in Canada in the first 100 days of this year than last year, and most of that is reflected in the metropolitan Toronto area.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. gentleman to advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, the most significant fact that I would like—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Unless the hon. gentleman would like me to ask whether there is unanimous consent of the house. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (10:30 p.m.)

Mr. Nicholson: The most significant fact is that in the last 20 years conventional lenders have provided more than two thirds of the money that has gone into the construction of houses. There has been very significant activity in this field.

Today I had lunch with a number of representatives of the lending institutions. They informed me of their plans for the future and we reviewed what has transpired during the past three months. The present trend would indicate that last year's drop in housing starts, roughly 32,000 to 33,000, will be more than made up this year as a result of this activity, apart from the additional government activity to which I referred.

I should not like anyone to think there are no housing problems facing us, but developments in the N.H.A. field and increased activity on the part of conventional lenders has been particularly encouraging during recent weeks.

Let me say one more thing in respect of public housing. We naturally are concerned with the situation referred to by the hon. member for York-Scarborough, which exists in Toronto and other cities. We are aware of the difficulties facing young married couples and others who are attempting to find homes in these cities. Whether we like it or not we are rapidly becoming a nation of apartment dwellers. This is a trend that is taking place in Germany, Sweden, Holland and the United States. There is a great movement of people from farms, and of new immigrants to our cities. With the limited space in our cities a greater percentage of our people are living in apartments. There are methods to correct the situation and each province is adopting its own program to do so. The federal government is, to a large extent, limited in what it may do by the actions of provincial and municipal governments. They are the authorities which pass the building and zoning bylaws which restrict the availability of land for individual home construction.

Mr. Knowles: Time.

Mr. Nicholson: Before I sit down I should like to thank hon. members for their indulgence. I would like to have dealt more fully with the progress that is being made as a result of federal initiative, but I have already taken advantage of the indulgence of hon. members.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 21, 1967

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FELICITATIONS TO PRIME MINISTER ON BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the house will permit me to do so I should like to extend my congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on his birthday anniversary, which is the day after tomorrow. The house will not be sitting then so I take advantage of this opportunity. While there have been occasions when I have not been in complete agreement with the Prime Minister, I have always belonged to that group which believes in doing honour to those, regardless of political beliefs, who make their contribution to their country and the world.

I couple with my congratulations the expression of the view that his distinguished career both nationally and internationally is worthy of mention on this occasion when he joins me in celebrating his seventieth birthday anniversary. Age does not weary, and I conclude by expressing the hope that he will now realize that those old age pensioners, who have not received the additional amount over and above $75 per month, cannot properly live on the amount they are receiving.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted on behalf of my colleagues to extend birthday greetings to the right hon. Prime Minister and to say to him how pleased we are to see him in such good health and good spirits. He has a very arduous year ahead of him during our centennial celebrations, and we are pleased that he is able to tackle his long list of commitments and to continue to be so effervescent here in the house. We hope his good health will continue.

• (11:10 a.m.)

I noticed earlier this week that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon) expressed the hope that the Prime Minister would continue as leader of his party. I should like to support that hope. When I look around at some of the prospective candidates for that office I feel that we would rather bear the ills we have than flee to those we know not of, or perhaps some that we know only too well. I would say to the Prime Minister that on this auspicious occasion we are happy to join in extending birthday felicitations to him, and hope he will continue to enjoy many more years in which to receive the appreciation of the Canadian people for his long years of public service.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Lest the Prime Minister think that we wish him ill rather than well, we in the Social Credit party join in the expressions of congratulation and best wishes on this very important occasion.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my group I should like to join with the other party leaders to wish the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) the happiest birthday ever. I hope that he will direct as much as possible the business of the house toward social legislation liable to get the support of most hon. members, if not all.

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, lest it be thought—

Mr. Pearson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to move closure on these tributes.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is one occasion, sir, when I am not going to pay any attention to the Prime Minister's wishes, because I feel I should pay attention instead to the wishes of his followers. I should not like it to be thought that the good wishes that have been expressed from the other side of the house were not every bit as sincere from this side of the house. Perhaps I could remind Your Honour that tomorrow is the fourth anniversary of the formation of the Pearson government, and we on this side of the house look forward to another four years of constructive activity for Canada under the same Prime Minister.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): It will be clear now, Mr. Speaker, why I moved closure. These family matters, about the prolongation of a particular individual or a particular party, should be discussed within the family. Perhaps the house will forgive me if I just mention that yesterday we did have a discussion of my birthday and all that it meant to my colleagues. They were good enough to make me a presentation, and it was not what I expected. They had asked me what I would like to have and I said perhaps the most appropriate thing to have would be a hair shirt, but it is better than that.

I would be less than human, and I do not think I am less than human, if I were not deeply appreciative and moved by the expressions of good will toward me on this occasion. There is nothing, Mr. Speaker, like a death or a birthday to make you realize you have virtues which are not always noticed by everybody. I am, if I may say so, particularly touched by the good wishes of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. It is a wonderful and refreshing privilege to be able to join heartily with him in something, for as the right hon. gentleman has indicated, we are together now in our seventies, and I am catching up with him. Whatever may happen in the future to either or both of us, I shall always remember that as I entered this most important decade in a man's life, even more important than going from his teens to his twenties, I entered it with his good will and his expression of personal friendship.

As the right hon. gentleman has said, naturally we do not often agree in this house. We have been in opposition to each other politically for many years. I sometimes get the impression when I read the newspapers and magazines that this kind of feuding which goes on is almost unequalled in Canadian history. I only wish these writers could read about what it used to be like in the nineteenth century in the Canadian House of Commons and in Canadian public life.

The reason we rise above these differences, difficulties and controversies in public and political life is that whatever we may think of each other politically, and whatever we think of our political views, we always have an appreciation for each other. This is because we know we are here for one purpose and one purpose only, and we are joined in that purpose; that is, service to our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Pearson.]

DRUGS

PROVISION FOR OBSERVATION AND TREATMENT OF ADDICTS

Mr. Milton L. Klein (Cartier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-292, respecting observation and treatment of drug addicts.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Klein: Mr. Speaker, developments in the fields of medicine and psychiatry tend to establish that drug addiction, when it occurs, results from some type of mental illness or disorder. It does not appear to be any longer appropriate to punish persons who are drug addicts; it is rather advisable to treat the said persons as being sick, mentally or otherwise.

The purpose of this bill is to remove the stigma of a criminal conviction attached to drug addiction by drug addicts, and to protect the public and such persons from possible subsequent addiction by assuring that observation and treatment follow the laying of charges.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house, which I understand from the hon. member for Cartier will probably be forthcoming, may I move that this bill be referred to the committee on justice and legal affairs?

Mr. Speaker: I think there would have to be unanimous consent of the house to return to motions. Is this the wish of the house?

• (11:20 a.m.)

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, there has not been an opportunity to discuss this matter with the chairman of the committee. I wonder if the request could not stand until Monday.

Mr. Brewin: Certainly, if the minister prefers it that way.

Mr. Churchill: Let us see the bill.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister say whether a spokesman of his department was revealing government policy when he said on Wednesday that the railway part of the Northumberland crossing may have to be dropped, or the whole project may be shelved?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, no spokesman from my department made any such statement.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Minister of Public Works assure the house that the government has not changed its commitment to proceed as rapidly as is reasonable with the construction of this project?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Much concern has been shown by hon. members representing areas near the Northumberland crossing, as well as by other persons, because of some speculative newspaper stories that have appeared during the last two days. Perhaps I can best answer the hon. member's question by saying that tenders for phase I of the crossing were opened on March 30. These are complex, and require extensive analysis and study. This analysis and study, which is normal, is now being made by the engineers and is not yet complete. Decisions cannot be made or anticipated prior to its completion. It may well be that when it is complete some adjustments or modifications may prove desirable. This cannot be anticipated at this time. Notwithstanding the possibility that some adjustments or modifications may be required, the government has every intention of proceeding with the construction of the crossing.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister assure the house that these analyses will not result in the delay of the project's completion date?

Mr. McIlraith: The analyses have not been completed, and until I see them I cannot give information other than that just given. It would be wrong to give speculative answers, I think, to speculative questions.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he will not discuss with his colleague the Secretary of State the incredible gaff made when C.B.C. television news described this causeway project as a reconsideration of the Canso causeway.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Kings): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked of the Minister of Public Works regarding the Northumberland strait causeway. There seems to be a little too much smoke around this issue for there not to be some fire. I direct my question to the Prime Minister. On behalf of the government will he assure the people of Prince Edward Island that contract bids exceeding the cost contemplated by the government will not result in the deferment or abandonment of this project?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is simply repeating or restating a question which was asked previously.

VOCATIONAL AND TECHNICAL TRAINING

PROPOSED CHANGE WITH RESPECT TO LIVING ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): In the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the new regulation, effective as of April 1, which will deny living allowances to persons, without dependants, who have not been continuously employed for at least three years. As this new regulation will have the effect of refusing living allowances to young people under 20 years of age, childless wives, widows, and new immigrants, I ask the Prime Minister whether protests about these regulations have been received and whether the government is considering altering them.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not myself, to my knowledge, received any such protest. Whether the minister has I do not know, but I shall make inquiries. I ought to add that this matter was discussed carefully before action was taken. I shall be glad, however, to bring the hon. gentleman's question to the minister's attention and to discuss it with him.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister tell the house under what authority this regulation was enacted, since the act itself has not been passed by the house?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether this question is in order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, I am simply asking under what authority the regulation was passed since the act itself is not in effect.

Mr. Speaker: That is why I felt the question was not in order.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): May I ask the Prime Minister, when he discusses this matter with the minister of manpower, to call attention to the fact that the impact of this regulation falls largely on new immigrants, and that this seems to be inconsistent with the terms of the white paper.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making a representation.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister of education of the province of Ontario has made a strong protest in this regard, stating that some 7,000 people under this program will be seriously affected, I should like to join with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam in strongly requesting—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for York South. I trust this will be a question and that the hon. member will not join in representations made by other members.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I think your wish will be observed, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will be good enough to discuss with the minister of manpower the possibility of tabling a copy of the regulation and the authority under which it was passed.

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to do that.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REPORTED PREPARATION FOR PEACE KEEPING OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I should like to address my question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether the government has instituted a crash program, as has been reported, to prepare for possible peace keeping operations in Viet Nam.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The normal planning is going on.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether he or anyone in the government has expressed any regret or made any protest in connection with the most recent and most dangerous escalation of this war by the bombing inside the territory of Haiphong.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, I have made no protest, nor would I even consider doing so until I had detailed information as to the nature of this particular operation.

[Translation]

TRANSPORT

QUEBEC—SALE OF BAIE COMEAU-RIMOUSKI FERRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he received representations from the Baie Comeau chamber of commerce about the sale to the British Columbia Ferries of the ferry Père Nouvel which provides service between Baie Comeau and Rimouski?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am not sure whether I have received any protest from that particular organization, but I have received some representations and these are being considered at the moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Would the minister say whether grants have been asked from the federal government for the Nord-Sud Company in connection with the ferry service?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I suggest the hon. member place his question on the order paper.

[English]

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—PROPOSED CREATION OF DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Some weeks ago I asked the Prime Minister, when the legislation was before the legislature of Quebec, whether his attention had been drawn to what has been called the external affairs law empowering the government of Quebec to deal directly with governments of other countries. Has the Prime Minister looked into this question? What is his viewpoint regarding this legislation? Is the legislation along the lines of that suggested by Mr. Lesage when he was premier of the province? What attitude did the government take then, and what does it take now, toward this unusual piece of legislation?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is a question on the order paper dealing with this specific point to which a more detailed answer than I can give orally will be given, I believe on Monday. Meanwhile I would only say that the legislation in question to which my right hon. friend has referred does not, in our view, infringe the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal parliament and government over external affairs.

TRADE

EFFECT ON CANADA OF POSSIBLE U.K. ENTRY INTO COMMON MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs was reported to have stated in effect that Canada must revise her traditional relations with the United Kingdom as the interests of the two countries now often differed. Does this mean that Canada disapproves of the suggested entry of the United Kingdom into the European common market, or does it mean something else? Perhaps the Prime Minister could elucidate.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it certainly does not mean that we have changed our views in regard to the United Kingdom and its possible entry into the common market, and it certainly does not mean we are weakening in any respect, or desire to weaken, our relations with the United Kingdom.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): As a supplementary question, may I ask the Prime Minister whether any survey is being made by the Department of Trade and Commerce or any other department of government to ascertain what Canadian commodities will be affected should Britain enter the common market?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Exhaustive studies have been made as to the possible effect of British entry into the common market. It is very difficult at this moment to come to any specific conclusions as to what that effect would be until we know the terms covering Britain's entry, if in fact that takes place.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): As a supplementary question, the terms under which entry may be made into the common market have been agreed upon by the member countries. On the basis of the present terms would Canada's agricultural preferences be seriously affected unless provision were made by the member countries of the common market to make an exception or an exemption in part?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we are doing our very best to protect the interests of Canadian producers, agricultural and otherwise, in respect of any changes that might be brought about by Britain's entry into the common market.

Mr. Korchinski: As a further supplementary question, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the industries that might be affected will be forewarned in the event that they will no longer have a preferred market in Britain?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

WATER RESOURCES

PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN "WATER FOR PEACE" CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister inform the house the number of federal and provincial government representatives who will be attending the water for peace conference in Washington from May 23 to May 31 this year, and can the minister inform the house whether these delegates will have an agreed Canadian position on water policy, water pollution and water waste?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

GRAIN

PROTEST AGAINST SLOW MOVEMENT FROM LAKEHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. K. Andras (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received a telegram from the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks local 650 expressing concern about the slow start of grain movement from the lakehead, and has he looked into this matter?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes. I did receive such a telegram this morning. I made some inquiries of the St. Lawrence seaway authority and, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I am advised that at the moment the wheat board is in negotiation with the shipping companies about freight rates, and I prefer to express no opinion whatsoever about these negotiations. But while the loadings have not been as great as they were last year, I am informed that a vessel was loaded yesterday and others are expected to be loaded today.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO EXTRADITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General but in his absence I shall direct it to the minister assuming his duties for the day. It has been reported by a cross country news service that senior officials of the R.C.M.P. have met with the attorney general's office in the province of Ontario to deal with the case of extradition for perjury against Hal Banks. Could the minister report on the results of this meeting?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take this question as notice. I am not aware of the results of the meeting.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Justice now give the answer to the question I addressed to him a few days ago on the same topic?

Mr. Trudeau: I think at that time, Mr. Speaker, I said something about the administration of justice being in the area of jurisdiction of the province, and that if there were any special circumstances in this case I would have them looked into. I presume they are being looked into.

[Mr. Andras.]

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

INQUIRY AS TO GRANTING OF TITLE "RIGHT HONOURABLE"

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, two or three days ago the Prime Minister announced a system of Canadian honours. I now ask him whether there was cabinet authorization for the granting of the title of right honourable recently given to the distinguished Canadian which in the past has been exclusively restricted to members of the imperial privy council? Does this mean that from now on some Canadians may expect to receive the title of right honourable without becoming members of the imperial privy council?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the title of right honourable as applied to the Governor General was agreed to by Her Majesty the Queen and the table of titles amended accordingly on the recommendation of the government, specifically on my recommendation as Prime Minister. This recommendation concerns the Governor General only. It had the effect of giving the Governor General the title of right honourable and divorcing that particular title in respect of this particular appointment from membership in what my right hon. friend has called the imperial privy council. It has no other effect and covers nobody else.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it the intention of the government that no longer shall membership in the imperial privy council be granted to Canadians?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, membership in the imperial privy council, so-called, which is indeed the United Kingdom privy council, is normally as a result of recommendations made respecting Canadians and others by the United Kingdom government and accepted by the Queen. The initiation of these does not come from the Canadian government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I realize that neither my right hon. friend nor I would have been members if it had not been the cabinet of the United Kingdom which made the recommendation to the Queen, but the Prime Minister apparently forgot the specific question that was asked. Is it the intention of the government of Canada no longer to have the right of Her Majesty the Queen to award to Canadians the title of right honourable, as members of the imperial privy council?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, this is a question that cannot be answered on orders of the day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why?

Mr. Pearson: Certainly there have been no such memberships granted in the four years this government has been in office except membership of myself as Prime Minister of Canada, which I have always considered as a kind of honorary membership in the United Kingdom privy council.

Mr. Diefenbaker: An honorary membership?

Mr. Pearson: There has been no recommendation made in those four years, and I do not anticipate we will be making recommendations of that kind in the immediate future.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

REPRODUCTION OF COAT OF ARMS ON MEDALLION FOR PUBLIC DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, a week ago the Leader of the Opposition raised a question as to the design of the coat of arms used on the centennial medallion, and characterized it as an emasculated neuter. The use of this particular design, I am now informed, is supported by leading authorities on heraldry. The revised edition of Boutell, for example, states that the shield of arms—and that is what appears on the medallion—constitutes the whole of a coat of arms. The rest of the design, not on the medallion, is considered additional heraldic material and not essential to the coat of arms itself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. An explanation like this should be made on motions. I would ask that the house revert to motions, because a simple statement of the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The answer by the Secretary of State appears to be commensurate with the question asked. Unless it is beyond the usual limits of answers I do not think we should revert to motions for that purpose.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, the government has received similar advice on the question from Mr. Alan Beddoe who, as the house knows, is a former heraldic adviser to the navy. I am sorry the right hon. gentleman is not anxious to have this answer—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this is exactly why we should revert to motions. I want the opportunity to answer this—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think there should be a debate on this matter at the present time. Perhaps the Secretary of State would like to limit the reply as much as possible. I suspect that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition perhaps will have a supplementary question to ask.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman should remember that this design was adopted by order in council and cabinet decision of September 5, 1957.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because of a statement which is without foundation. The coat of arms of Canada was given at Buckingham Palace on November 21, 1921, in the twelfth year of the reign of George V. That is the basis on which the coat of arms was issued to the government of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, what has been introduced—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We should attempt to have some order. My impression is that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is rising on a question of privilege and will be stating that question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It will be very shortly stated. The document which was issued respecting the centennial medallion states:

> The obverse or front side of the medallion (left), the Canadian coat of arms with the word 'Canada'—

That is not the Canadian coat of arms. It has been denuded to meet the Canadianization ideas of this government which is trying to separate everything—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of privilege I should like to read—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether we should go further into the matter. I fully appreciate that the Secretary of State wishes to reply to the suggestion made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. However, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition rose on a question of privilege and I have to rule that there is no question of privilege. Having done this, I doubt whether the minister should pursue the question unless she has her own question of privilege.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, as a privy councillor, surely since my report given to the house has been called into question this should sustain a question of privilege. There should be no question about this because I have in my hand the record of the cabinet decision, which consists of about three lines, to which is attached a memorandum by the then secretary of state, Hon. Ellen Fairclough. I should be pleased, so there may be no question about this, if I could be allowed to read it—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I again rise on a question of order. Let us return to motions. I have here the document giving the arms to Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There obviously is disagreement at this time as between the Leader of the Opposition and the Secretary of State. It seems to me that even if we did revert to motions we would not settle the difficulty. So perhaps we should go on to another question.

STORMS

HURON AND PERTH COUNTIES, ONTARIO—ASSISTANCE FOLLOWING TORNADO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I have been advised should be addressed to the right hon. Prime Minister. It has to do with the tornado which went through Huron and Perth counties earlier this week as a result of which there has been loss of life and much property damage. A fund has been started by local residents to aid the victims of this tornado. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider matching from the federal disaster fund the dollars raised by the local residents or, in whatever way he might see fit, give federal assistance. I am sure any assistance would be gratefully received.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend no doubt is aware, although serious enough to those affected the decision with regard to relief measures in this connection is in the hands of the provincial government. If the provincial government feels that federal aid is required the provincial government then gets in touch with the federal authorities. However, the department concerned, the Department of Agriculture, has already sent a telegram to the minister of agriculture in Toronto asking whether he would send to the federal authorities an outline of a provincial proposal for an assistance program. When this is received the government will know what part it should play in this relief program.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention in passing that on Tuesday an announcement was made in the Ontario house to the effect that representations were being made to the federal government on behalf of the victims of the disaster in Perth and Huron counties, and I understand an emergency fund has been organized and set up. I think application has been made to the national revenue department to the effect that donations to the fund should be tax free. Will the minister look into this matter with all haste so the organizers of the fund may inform donors that their donations will be tax free?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made his representation to the minister.

Mr. Monteith: I am asking the minister whether he will look into this matter with all possible speed.

EDUCATION

REPORTED REQUIREMENT THAT SCHOLARSHIP RECIPIENTS SWEAR ALLEGIANCE TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I give an answer which I think is commensurate with the question addressed to me the other day regarding the policy of the United States government in requiring loyalty oaths in respect of scholarships being awarded to Canadian students. This particular question was directed to me by the hon. member for Saskatoon and was based on a message received from a student. That student since has been in touch with my office by telephone to say that he wished me to know that his complaint turned out to be unfounded.

On the general question, we have been in touch with the United States government—the state department—and have been informed that it is against the policy of the United States government to require loyalty oaths from foreign students. There is only one exception to this policy. Under the national defence education act foreign students who apply for fellowships and indicate at that time their intention to become United States citizens must take the loyalty oath. With that exception, should evidence be provided to the effect that a United States university is failing to abide by this policy, the United States state department is prepared to take steps to prevent the administration of loyalty oaths to any foreign student.

[Translation]

FOOD AND DRUGS

REQUEST THAT LABELS BE PRINTED IN BOTH LANGUAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has he received any protests in connection with the federal food and drugs act provision that directions be written in English and is he contemplating an early amendment so that the said directions be compulsory in both official languages of the country?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the question of the hon. member is urgent and I suggest it be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Allard: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

HALIFAX—DEPORTATION ORDER RESPECTING POLISH NATIONAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, because of the urgency of this matter, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs may I try not to make a representation but rather to ask the Prime Minister whether he will immediately look into the matter of a deportation order against one Stanislaw Lubaszko, a Polish nationalist who is being held in isolation in Halifax?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will look into it immediately.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. To my colleague's question might I add that this man faces deportation this week, which gives the matter some urgency. I would also ask the Prime Minister whether the former policy of granting refuge in Canada to people from communist countries still applies, or has it been altered?

Mr. Pearson: To my knowledge it has not been altered, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPORTED HIGH DEATH RATE OF VETERANS WHO SMOKE CIGARETTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the health and welfare report, as reported by Canadian Press, that veterans who smoke cigarettes are dying at a rate 54 per cent higher than non-smoking veterans, would the minister indicate whether he proposes to take any further steps to meet this grave threat?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think this question is much too general and should not be asked on the orders of the day.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR BAN ON USE OF HIGHLY INFLAMMABLE FUEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the request of the International Transport Workers Federation that jet airliners be prohibited from using JP4 because of the high inflammability of this fuel, is the minister considering taking steps to ban the use of this fuel by Canadian air lines?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I could answer that question with a simple yes or no. I think it is not, therefore, the kind of question that can be dealt with on the orders of the day and perhaps the hon. gentleman would put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, perhaps we can deal with it at ten o'clock Monday night.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—IMPLEMENTATION OF ANNOUNCED GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman is in a position today to advise what progress is being made in regard to the takeover by the government of the coal holdings of Dosco-Hawker Siddeley, relative to his announcement of December 29 last.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to make an announcement today. The matter is proceeding as rapidly as possible. As soon as I or the minister concerned can make an announcement we will be very anxious to do so. I hope we can do so before long.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS TO FILL VACANCIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can the right hon. gentleman assure us that the appointment of the new chief of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will soon be made, and thus dispel the alarm caused by a statement made at the annual meeting of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson), that the government is having great trouble finding a man for the job because who wants to be nineteenth man on the totem pole, and that so many people have been approached that few persons of stature seem interested any more?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the alarm expressed by my hon. friend has no validity. I am sure we will very shortly be able to find good men and true to take on these very difficult posts.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PERMANENT HEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Has Professor Hugo McPherson of the University of Western Ontario been appointed head of the National Film Board?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not in order.

FINANCE

REGULATIONS UNDER DEPOSIT INSURANCE LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last the hon. member for Edmonton West asked a question of the Acting Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue, concerning the referring of the regulations under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act to the finance, trade and economic affairs committee. The minister took the question as notice at that time. I wonder whether he is now prepared to answer it.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to continue to take the question as notice until Monday, and I will have an answer for the hon. member at that time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

REQUEST FOR STUDY OF INTRODUCTION OF METRIC SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Bower (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. We seem to be overworking him on his birthday. Has the Prime Minister received representations from the Canadian Council of Professional Engineers urging the government, with cogent reasoning, to establish without delay a representative national body or commission with the necessary authority to carry out a study in depth of the possible implementation and adoption of the metric system in Canada as our standard of measurement? If so, can the Prime Minister assure the house that the government will take this step introducing, if necessary, appropriate legislation in the next session of parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question should be placed on the order paper.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING ABOLITION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister referred to the question of capital punishment. Last night various news media reported that the government had come to the decision that it was going to bring in a measure to abolish capital punishment. If this is so, in view of the number of people in the jails of our country under sentence of death, does the Prime Minister not feel that this measure should be introduced at once? If the government has come to the conclusion reported there is no reason why the overhanging fear and horror that rests on those condemned should be continued.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat, and perhaps I should put this on the record again, the exact words I used yesterday as reported at page 15135 of Hansard. The right hon. gentleman asked me a question which he introduced by saying:

A little earlier in his remarks he said that capital punishment might be discussed.

The right hon. gentleman was referring to myself. I have not been able to find those words in what I said. However, I went on to say in answer to the right hon. gentleman's question:

I mentioned this as one of the problems which the government has been considering. It is not a matter which can be dealt with this session—

For reasons which I tried to indicate yesterday.

—but I would hope it could be dealt with this year in a responsible way.

I hope this can be done, and done as quickly as possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I realize the weight of responsibility that rests on the Prime Minister in matters such as this. I ask him this. If the government has made up its mind, does it intend to follow the practice of granting commutations; for it would be very difficult to explain why anyone should be executed if the government intends to abolish capital punishment at the next session.

Mr. Pearson: As I understand it, and I would like to have this confirmed, there is no request for commutation likely to come before the cabinet for decision for a number of weeks. I would also like to emphasize that in any decision the government may take on this matter, and any method by which it may discharge its responsibility, there will be no interference of any kind with the complete freedom of all members on the government side and on all sides of the house to vote as their conscience dictates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does that last statement mean that it is not going to be a government measure, whatever is introduced?

Mr. Pearson: That is not necessarily the case, as my right hon. friend will know if he recalls the procedure that was adopted in the United Kingdom.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PILOTAGE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may ask a question of the Minister of Transport. It is a question that I like to ask him at least once a month. Can the minister indicate when he expects to table the report of the pilotage commission?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker.

EXPO '67

REPORTED INSISTENCE ON U.S. FUNDS AS PAYMENT FOR ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question asked of me the day before yesterday by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smallwood) which I think ought to be answered. The hon. member referred to a newspaper article which stated that certain motels and hotels in greater Montreal were reported to be refusing accommodation except when deposits were made in United States funds.

I think it would be wise for me to clear up that misunderstanding, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am told that this statement originated in a publication from a trailer camp organization intending to draw American tourists to their campsite. All it said was that prospective tourists could make deposits in United States funds. It was not intended to imply that they had to be made in United States funds. I was incredulous when the question was asked, and I am glad my incredulity was justified.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED RENEGOTIATION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that no proposal for renegotiating the migratory birds convention was included in the long list of parliamentary business announced by the Prime Minister yesterday, will he indicate the government's intention in this regard?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows this is an extremely difficult and complex matter which requires discussion. Discussions are taking place with various interests in Canada as well as with United States governmental authorities, and they must be concluded before any decision can be taken. As soon as these discussions are complete we will be in a position to know what to do. Because of the complexity of the discussions I felt this was not a matter I should mention as something we should do this year. I doubt that it will be possible to renegotiate the convention this year.

Mr. Simpson: I have a supplementary question. Will the Prime Minister not agree that it would be a good idea to clear up this matter during our centennial year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Wednesday, evening, April 19, clause 2 was under discussion.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the other evening I suggested that clause 2 should stand. I thought there was agreement to this suggestion on the part of the minister and members on the government side. That being the case I again suggest that clause 2 stand and that we proceed with clause 3.

Mr. Hellyer: That is agreeable, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree to stand clause 2 and proceed with clause 3?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I want to draw one matter to the attention of the committee. In the event that clause 25 is never reached for consideration because of the arbitrary allocation of time I should like to point out now one rather silly typographical error which should be corrected here rather than in the other place.

[Mr. Simpson.]

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the committee stand clause 2 and proceed to the consideration of clause 3?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 3—Commissioned officers.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, clause 3 deals with terms of service. The first part states that commissions of officers in the Canadian forces shall be granted by Her Majesty during pleasure. This is the same as the section in the present act except for the deletion of the names of the three services and the substitution therefor of "Canadian Forces".

Subsection 2 of new section 21 states:

> Persons shall be enrolled as subordinate officers or men for indefinite or fixed periods of service as may be prescribed in regulations made by the Governor in Council.

That is a change from the present act which states that persons shall be enrolled as men for fixed terms of service as may be prescribed in regulations made by the Governor in Council. It was pointed out by a number of witnesses before the defence committee that an indefinite term of service so far as the men are concerned will likely have serious consequences and therefore is a questionable provision. On December 7 the minister dealt with this matter during introduction of the bill and he had this to say regarding the length of engagement periods for men:

> If they join, it normally will be for an initial engagement of five years. If this engagement is mutually satisfactory, they may, under the provisions of the bill, be re-engaged for an indefinite period. If they want to be released later, this can be done with six months' notice, except in an emergency or during periods of obligatory service.

Admiral Landymore was the first of the witnesses who appeared before the committee to point out some of the difficulties which may arise as the result of putting into effect such a regulation. He stated, as found on page 1055 of the committee proceedings:

> This is an invitation to have trade unions in the armed forces. Let us say that a group of technicians is dissatisfied with some aspect of their service. They can, under this concept of engagement, en masse, give six months' notice, in order to exert pressure to have their wishes fulfilled Here is subtle, silent, collective bargaining, entering the armed forces. This has no place in the services. I am not objecting to trade unions or collective bargaining in industry or in civilian life but this form of activity is not acceptable in the armed forces, for very obvious reasons, however democratic we might wish to be.
> I cannot tell you how often this type of unlimited engagement has been considered and, in wisdom, not adopted. This concept has the further disadvantage that men will naturally always be thinking of opportunities elsewhere, and this, in turn, will lead to higher wastage rates in the forces—particularly amongst tradesmen whose skills are in demand in industry. We will live to regret this concept, if we allow it to become the practice. In an effort to have similar engagement periods for the three services, this has been jumped at as the answer. It is a foolish step to take.

Throughout a man's service he should be required to re-engage at set intervals. The initial engagement of five years is excellent. This should be followed by a second and third engagement of five years, each with a final engagement to pension. This spacing provides an essential safeguard and is fair to everyone.

General Foulkes also pointed out some of the disadvantages inherent in an indefinite term of service which can be terminated on six months' notice. His remarks in that regard can be found on page 1225 of the evidence. I will not take the time of the committee to read them.

There was also a considerable exchange between General Moncel and myself on this same matter, which can be found on pages 1339 and 1340 of the evidence. There is no question but that a provision of this kind will provide the opportunity for a group or several groups of tradesmen to leave the service to take up employment in civilian life. This is particularly true if these groups of tradesmen are dissatisfied and employment in their particular skills is available. These groups could leave on six months' notice. So far as some units are concerned, the result of this change would be that they would be unable to carry on effectively and perhaps not be able to carry on at all. This might be the case particularly so far as the operation of ships is concerned. If six months' notice were given by a considerable number of tradesmen, there would not be sufficient tradesmen to be able to send ships to sea. Under these circumstances I hope the minister will be prepared to move an amendment removing the indefinite term so far as the men are concerned and leaving the provision for a fixed term as it has been in the past with the governor general in council being able to set the term of service.

General Foulkes in his evidence pointed out the many disadvantages of this provision. One was that it may not be possible to operate a unit at all. Many training difficulties are created. If a commanding officer does not know the length of time the men in his unit are going to be in the service, it presents great difficulties so far as training programs are concerned and carrying on the technical, fighting training of that unit.

As I say, I can see no advantages. In fact, the committee was not told of any advantages when evidence was put before it in relation to an indefinite term of service. Under these circumstances I hope the minister is prepared to move an amendment to eliminate the indefinite period of service for the men and restore the situation to what it has been in the past.

Mr. Hellyer: The change in the law, Mr. Chairman, is really based on recommendations made by those who made the manpower study. A study was conducted on all aspects of terms of enlistment and the employment of other ranks. It was undertaken under the chairmanship of Admiral Hennessy, with representatives of the other services. They came to the conclusion that it might be desirable to have a policy whereby, after an initial period of say about five years, a decision would be made on the part of the service and on the part of the individual. The service would decide that the individual was acceptable as career soldier, sailor or airman and the individual would decide that he would like to make his career in the armed forces. This recommendation was included in their report and we included the necessary legal authority in the bill now before us.

I think it is fair to say that the defence staff is not wedded to this concept. In other words, there is no guarantee that it will work satisfactorily. It is, however, their judgment that it would be worth trying and worth implementing. If the provision does not work I am sure we would have no hesitation in changing it and using the authority which would be in the law to enroll men for a fixed rather than an indefinite period. I should point out, however, that the six months' notice by those who have signed on for an indefinite period is a matter of policy, not a matter of law. Once they have signed on they are in exactly the same position as officers, that is, they serve at the Queen's pleasure.

Under normal conditions we would allow them to give notice and to leave the service as we do at the present time for those who have signed for fixed periods if they have served three years of their engagement. In the event that a whole group of men gave notice simultaneously, obviously the policy would then have to be changed. It could not be permitted. This is a theoretical abuse which would not be acceptable. I agree with my hon. friend completely that a situation would be created which would not be in the interests of the forces and therefore could not be allowed. It is not likely to arise, but in the event that it did some new policy would have to be implemented at once.

This situation may be considered along the same lines as the way banks operate deposit accounts. From their experience they know that a certain number of people withdraw money on any given day. This is, basically, an acceptable point of view. If, of course, all depositors simultaneously want their money the system would not be viable and extraordinary measures would have to be implemented at once. Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I believe we would prefer to have authority to follow either course. In other words, we should like to implement the recommendation of the minister's manpower study or, if in the long run that should prove not to be the best policy, to be able to revert to the previous one. This would give us more flexibility than if we were restricted merely to definite terms of engagement. I would prefer to have the legal authority to have a choice in so far as other ranks are concerned as we now have in so far as officers are concerned.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask the minister what advantages there are in having an indefinite term. As I said earlier, we did not receive any evidence in the committee with regard to any advantages in an indefinite term of service but received a great deal of evidence relating to the disadvantages. In view of the fact there is a potential danger in the provision, as the minister has admitted, I can see no good reason for including it. This is particularly true in view of the fact the regulations undoubtedly will be drawn up along the lines the minister has indicated. They will likely provide for six months' notice for a man to terminate his indefinite period, so the situation then becomes the same as with a fixed term. You would, in fact, have imbedded in the men's minds at least the idea that they have a right to give six months' notice and get out at any time.

The minister says that special measures might be taken in an emergency. However, if it happens that large numbers of people give notice at a time when there is no general emergency, and there are no emergency powers, I do not know what you are going to do about it. I think you are going to arrive at the point where you will not be able to put ships to sea or have communication units which can operate properly.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Hellyer: You do not need emergency powers under these circumstances. The six months' provision is not included in the regulations; it is merely current policy which has been in effect for some time. In at least one case this policy has been altered and that is in respect of pilots. Perhaps I should leave any statement on the pilot situation until a little later. However, pilots are now required, with the exception of those who have been R.O.T.P. students, to serve a minimum of five years before the six months' notice provision comes into effect. This is for precisely the reason my hon. friend gives. Market conditions for pilots are so buoyant and there is so much opportunity for alternative employment that we require them to serve the minimum period of time to justify the expense of training them.

I do not believe my hon. friend's concern is one which is too serious. He asked what the advantages were in having this choice. I think the advantage is that the men would have the same security as the officers now have. They would know, once they had passed the initial stage of their careers, once they had completed their apprenticeship, that they would be accepted as career soldiers. Just as with the officers with permanent commissions, these men would know that barring misconduct or some other serious offence, some very major contraction in the size of the forces or something of that nature, they would have the security of continuous employment throughout their military career. This would give them a sense of security that they do not have with the fixed term engagement.

• (12:20 p.m.)

We also know from experience that this does make a difference. We have gone through this with the pilots and navigators. We found that short service commissions gave them a feeling of insecurity because they did not know in advance whether they would be offered a new term of engagement at the end of their present term. Thus they had no security in that they did not know after the second term whether they would get a third. A certain doubt was created in their minds and as a result they decided it would be preferable to take civilian employment rather than face the uncertainty of being given an additional short term of military service. This did become quite an important factor psychologically, particularly after the release of some short service air crew. For that reason all pilots are now taken on on a permanent commission basis.

I think there is a point in favour of having this indefinite period available to offer servicemen because it does give them the feeling of security and continuity that they would like to have so far as their chosen career is concerned.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the example the minister has given about short service commissions is a good one so far as the enlistment of men is concerned. The very term "short service commission" denotes that the commission is granted for a short period only.

Originally when short service commissions were granted the presumption was that these men would be released in most cases at the end of the term which was ordinarily five years with a short service commission. It has always been understood—this has been the regular custom particularly in the case of N.C.O.s—that when the period arrived to re-engage and these men wished to re-engage, then they would be re-engaged. I do not think there has been any uncertainty, let us say, in the minds of the enlisted men, particularly the N.C.O.s who were chiefly the ones re-engaged, about their ability to re-engage. Therefore I cannot see any advantage in this method. In view of its very obvious potential dangers, I still hope that the minister might be prepared to strike out this provision and revert to the former situation.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I am not as concerned about the potential dangers as my hon. friend. I also feel that, the staff having recommended that we have the legal authority to implement this policy if it is deemed to be in the interests of the service to do so, I should therefore seek parliamentary authority to so implement it. I have often been accused of not taking advice. I must admit that in this case, as in many other cases, I got conflicting advice. But the consensus of the military staff, those who are responsible for the organization of the forces at the present time, is that they would like to have this authority so that the policy can be implemented if it is considered by them and by the department to be in the best interests of the forces.

Mr. Groos: Mr. Chairman, if I may add a few words in this connection may I say that I understand the dangers the hon. member for Calgary North has outlined. However, certainly so far as the naval service is concerned the engagement period has been changed many times over the years. In my early days a total engagement period of 21 years—I believe it is now 20 years—was required to qualify for a pension. The period of 21 years was divided into two sections, the first of 12 years and the second of nine. I believe the division then became seven-seven-seven. Then it was five-five-five-five, and I believe that now there is a three-years initial engagement period.

This further change is being sought now and personally I do not object to this departure. As I think all of us in this house agree, those of us at least who have been in the services at any time, morale is all-important. Morale varies in the services very much with the pressures of civilian life that are brought to bear upon servicemen. Regardless of the period for which a person is serving, I think he regards himself as being chained to the service for the rest of that period, and automatically bad morale sets in. The advantage of this clause is that it will make the defence department much more responsive to the changes in civilian life that occur from time to time, and I think that this is a good move.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, now that we are discussing these matters of great importance I hope the committee will realize that some of the matters that the pundits have told us have been repeated over and over again have really not been dealt with effectively in this house because we have not had the time to do so. This is one such instance. Here is a specific change in the act for which the minister has given no satisfactory explanation.

The minister has told us that if advantage is taken of the indefinite enlistment arrangement or if circumstances arise where a large number of men are going to give six months' notice and this would disrupt the service, the Department of National Defence would then take appropriate action. I think that is a very bad legacy to leave to the minister's successor. As of Tuesday night the minister will have the bill approved by the guillotine and the juggernaut, with the assistance of his friends to the left of me, and he will then be free to go to some other position leaving the mess to be cleaned up by somebody else. I think the minister should put the matter into better shape. Why saddle another minister of national defence with a bad policy?

The minister has said that he sometimes accepts advice. I wish he would give us instances which show he does. He has had advice, as the hon. member for Calgary North pointed out, from three men of experience and long service, Admiral Landymore, General Foulkes and General Moncel. The hon. member for Calgary North quoted from Admiral Landymore's statement on this subject. Admiral Landymore made a very careful analysis of the proposals in this bill and General Foulkes also had something to say about it. I intend to quote from the evidence of General Foulkes and General Moncel.

• (12:30 p.m.)

I fully appreciate, having heard the Minister of Transport speak last week, that expert advice should be rejected out of hand. Only amateur advice should be accepted such as the amateur advice given by the Minister of Transport who made the silliest speech I have heard in this house in all the years I have been here. But despite what he said about experts I intend to put some remarks by experts on the record. Admiral Landymore, General Foulkes and General Moncel know something about service life and they know something about the necessities for keeping organizations together. We are not surprised that the minister will not accept their advice now, of course, because he has consistently refused to accept advice. He has adopted the policy of the Minister of Transport: Do not ask the expert; ask the amateur.

On page 1225, volume No. 21 of the committee evidence. General Foulkes was talking about this clause dealing with the career serviceman concept, as it is called. Subsection 2 of section 21 says that a person shall be enrolled as a subordinate officer or man for a definite or fixed period of service. The bill changes that wording. The proposed subsection will read:

> Persons shall be enrolled as subordinate officers or men for indefinite or fixed periods of service—

The word "indefinite" is used in addition to the word "fixed". As found on page 1225 General Foulkes said:

> For men and N.C.O.s the five-year engagement would look to be ideal from an age standpoint, but would create quite a training problem. To re-engage junior N.C.O.s and men for an indefinite period would tend to worsen the problem. A short engagement requires the commanding officer to make a reassessment of the man's capabilities for continuing in combat training for another period. The man's age is always considered carefully, and if there is any doubt the man is not re-engaged.
> By this proposed system, once a man is re-engaged he would have to be dismissed if he starts to slip at the start of his new engagement. I do not think this is very fair because if a man is dismissed it will place upon him a stigma which would not be an asset when seeking civil employment.

[Mr. Churchill.]

The general was considering the situation of individuals. The men of our services are not just statistics; they are individuals, as we are, entitled to their place in society, entitled to consideration, and entitled to the opportunity to retire from the services without any stigma being attached to their records, as General Foulkes suggests might happen.

General Moncel had some advice to offer about this matter—the advice of an expert, not an amateur. On being asked questions about this section he said, as found on page 1339 of the committee evidence:

> I would be against it. I just cannot imagine what Landymore is alleged to have said coming true in the service I knew, but it is a possibility, I suppose, but it is hard to imagine.
> Your great problem is that if you make it possible for people to go too easily you are apt to find yourself in very serious trouble. We have no guaranteed intake on a voluntary basis. It is extremely difficult to plan when you do not have the slightest idea how many troops you are going to have six months from now. In the United States it is relatively easy. You are invited by the government to come and serve, and it is not too difficult to sit down and estimate how many you are going to have in the force at a given date.

Applying those words to our situation in Canada, if it is open to a man in the armed services to give six months' notice, conceivably half a trained regiment could leave at the same time. I continue quoting General Moncel's evidence:

> From our point of view we keep them, in large measure, by good will, but we also have a contract. The chap is signed up. Now, in the course of our business you have to do a number of unpleasant things. This is part of the business, and you do unpleasant things because you are told to do them, and if you do not do them the penalties are very, very severe indeed. By design, if everyone has the option of saying on six months' notice, "I will soldier no more," you are apt to get into trouble because every time you get an unpleasant posting you say, "Thanks very much, I will not take this one," and off you go.

Mr. Hellyer: Was that from General Moncel's evidence?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: If I remember correctly that policy was in effect when General Moncel was the vice chief. I am referring to the six months' notice. I am almost positive that was the policy then. If he was so concerned about this question when giving his evidence why was he not more concerned when serving as vice chief?

Mr. Churchill: That policy was not in effect, or at least authority for it was not in the act.

Mr. Hellyer: I thought my hon. friend was discussing the policy of six months' notice.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that was not written into the act. What was done was done at pleasure. The minister has written this policy into the bill. All sorts of barrack-room lawyers in the services, with as much ability as anybody in this chamber, will soon discover the flaws in the act.

The minister now appears to be relying on General Moncel; yet a few days ago he dismissed him as a person to whom we should pay no attention. He checked the general out of the service when he had another six years of valuable, experienced service to give to our defence establishment. Obviously the minister adjusts himself to situations. Last summer General Moncel was useless. In this debate the minister said, in so many words, "Ignore General Moncel's advice". Now he says that before General Moncel left the service he favoured the six months' notice policy. In answer to that I can only say that in General Moncel's time the section authorizing that policy was not in the act. It has been written into this bill. I continue quoting from General Moncel's evidence:

> We went through this argument in great detail when we had the difficulties with the pilots and the rest of them and we had to buy their services.

As Terence Robertson said in the article I quoted the other night, the minister threw out 500 pilots, disrupting the air force, to show the air force, the service which had been most opposed to unification, that it must not in any way resist the government. According to Terence Robertson, after the 500 pilots were thrown out resistance toward the government subsided in the air force. Having denuded the air force of pilots the minister then had to buy back their services to fill existing needs. As General Moncel says, this is wrong. The general went on to deal with the pilots.

I am talking about men in the services and the proposal that they be enlisted for an indefinite period. The expert advice of Admiral Landymore and of Generals Foulkes and Moncel is that this is not a good idea. I support the hon. member for Calgary North in asking the minister to strike out the word "indefinite" and to leave the subsection as it was before.

I hope the minister will give us examples of co-operation during our debate on this bill. I hope he accepts some of the advice offered to him instead of continuing his pose of resisting suggestions. This is the minister who has said that every member of every chiefs of staff committee in the world is wrong that only he is right. He has tried to build himself up in Canada as the one who knows, as the only authority on defence matters. He has made himself de facto prime minister because the Prime Minister has abdicated in his favour.

I suggest that the hon. gentleman revert to his proper position and show some sense of co-operation in this house. As a first step I suggest he strike out this word "indefinite". I do so for the reason I have mentioned, to enable him to show some measure of co-operation. In the second place I suggest he do it because he has not put forward any real argument in support of retaining this word in the bill. Under the old act he has in effect a fixed term of service with a policy of giving six months' notice. Why cannot that be continued so as to avoid saddling the next minister of national defence with a situation which may be embarrassing and perhaps impossible?

• (12:40 p.m.)

The dangers have been pointed out. If this change is introduced the men in the services may very well get together in large groups, give their six months' notice and then be in a strong bargaining position in that they will be able to say they will get out unless such and such happens. I think this is quite wrong. In my opinion a fixed term of service with the flexibility the minister already has is satisfactory. I hope the next minister of national defence will not be saddled with this proposal. I take my seat making a firm request to the minister to accept a suggestion from this side of the house, and then we might proceed to consider the other clauses of the bill in a very agreeable frame of mind.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak on the same subject for a few moments before the minister replies. At the present time, as I understand it, service in our forces is on a voluntary basis. It will remain on a voluntary basis until this bill is passed. After that service becomes compulsory. I say it will be compulsory because of the word "indefinite" referred to by my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre. I should like to read the explanatory note again.

> The amendment to subsection (1) is consequential on the amendments made in clause 2. At present men are enrolled in the Canadian Forces for fixed terms of service. The amendment to subsection (2) would authorize their enrolment for indefinite, as well as fixed, periods of service.

Service at the present time is voluntary. But once this amendment is passed the men will be serving under a one-way agreement. I am concerned about members of our armed forces who joined the army, navy or air force under what they felt was a two-way agreement. Now the minister can transfer them compulsorily into what is to be known as the Canadian armed forces. I believe that those who now belong to the services and who fulfil the present requirements should have the privilege of getting out on six months' notice if they so wish.

I was interested in the speech made by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. It was a long speech and I should like to put it all on the record again but time will not allow me to do so. He asked several questions which the minister should answer. I will read part of what my hon. friend said as reported in Hansard at pages 14944 and 14945. This passage illustrates a few of the problems the minister will encounter in dealing with the officers and men of our armed services. Once this bill is passed the minister will have serious difficulties on his hands. He may think he has had a problem dealing with the official opposition but it is only a foretaste of what will happen within the armed forces once this bill is enacted. I am afraid of what will happen to the defence of Canada as soon as the minister tries to implement a measure which will not work. This is what the hon. member said:

> I want to tell the minister that I have had letters from many serving officers, not colonels or commodores but flight lieutenants and petty officers. I have four or five of them in my hand now. Within the last two weeks these people have been told that they cannot get out of the service.

I should like to know on what authority they have been told they cannot leave the service. They have an agreement, which I understand is valid at least until the passing of this bill, enabling them to get out after six months notice. What power had the minister or the government to cancel this agreement? I can understand that after the bill is passed the government will have firmer ground on which to stand with respect to these applications. But at the present time there is a two-way agreement and I believe that if these men submit their applications they have a good basis on which to fight their case. Regardless of what the judge advocate general told us when we were in committee, I believe these men would be on firm ground and I would suggest to all of them that, though it might be costly, they fight their cases on this legal ground. I am not a lawyer, but if I were in that position I would contribute to the funds of those who wanted to fight their cases. This is a freedom for which they fought and

I say that neither the minister nor the government has the authority to take it away.

My hon. friend said these applicants had been told:

> There is no longer the problem of transferring between the services because you do not have services now.

I say we do have services now and we shall continue to have them until the bill now before us is passed. Whoever wrote those letters had no authority to do so in those terms. There was no legal ground for sending such a reply as these people apparently received. It went on: "You now transfer from one environment to another". This will not be the case until after the passage of the bill before us. And further: "We are not a warlike country now, we are a peace keeping country". Many of the officers and men who make these applications forget that for some reason they are still considered as being on active service, and this has been the case since the Korean war. I cannot help wondering why this provision was never cancelled. My hon. friend went on to say in the course of his remarks on April 14:

> I think it was Moncel or Fleury who said that in his day, according to his terminology, peace keeping meant preventing war or fighting a war. Today, as I said before, we do not have services, or we will not have if this bill is passed. We have environments and interchange within environments. I should like the minister to stand up and deny the fact that there has been a freeze on the release of officers who under normal circumstances would be qualified to obtain their release—

• (12:50 p.m.)

I do not know whether the minister has made that denial or whether he intends to do so, but I believe that all applications for release made prior to the passing of this bill should be honoured. I think these people have made a reasonable request. I repeat that they joined a voluntary service. Now they are aware that they are in a compulsory service. They do not wish to remain with that type of service any longer and I expect that being young in years they are recently out of college or university and want to make preparation for their future lives. I do not think it is morally right for the minister to stop these people from taking up the occupations or professions they wish to follow.

These people have seen a lifetime vocation in voluntary service disappear. They want nothing to do with a compulsory service. The minister should let them get out so they may return to university if they so wish and become professional men. The hon. member went on to say:

> I will not read the names of these people because they are still serving officers.

We know what happened to serving officers once they expressed opinions and the minister heard about them.

I have here a letter from the wife of one of them dated March 29, 1967 in connection with his enrolment. She writes that he was told the policy would allow him release on request three years after graduation.

If this was the agreement the minister should live up to it and on six month's notice give that man his release after three year's service. The hon. member continued:

This is not a man who has been commissioned under the R.O.T.P. plan, whose education was financed by the government and who now wants to get out early. Every one of these letters is from a man who has served his time, in all cases over three years.

I see no reason why the minister should institute a freeze at this time unless he is concerned about what is going to happen after passage of this bill. I think he will see the greatest exodus from the armed services that Canada has ever experienced. But that may not happen if legally these men can be held after passage of the bill. However, I suggest that if they are held against their will the deterioration of our forces will be publicly seen in a very short time. The hon. member continued:

There is a certain regulation—I do not know the numbers of these regulations—to the effect that in normal cases six months' notice is sufficient to allow a release.

An hon. member interjected:

That is what the minister told us.

From my experience in debating this bill in the house I can say that the minister has told us many things and many times has apparently reversed what he told us in the first place. This has contributed to the confusion that has resulted in such a long debate on the bill. Whatever happens to our armed forces, and whatever actions personnel may take, will be brought on by the minister's own actions. It was his actions which have led to the lengthy debate on the bill, a debate which is now being chopped off by the guillotine. The bill could have been debated in much shorter time if the minister had been forthcoming with explanations and with answers to the questions we asked him.

The minister deliberately created confusion for a definite purpose. We have gone over this time and time again. It all goes back to the time of the white paper. The minister has said that unification was definitely mentioned in the white paper. In reply I say that the word "unification" appears only once in the white paper and has nothing whatever to do with what the minister now calls a single service concept. In the white paper it bore no relationship to the definition of unification that the minister gave us when we first asked him about it in the House of Commons. He gave us a jumble of words meaning nothing.

The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, replying to the interjection, continued:

I can believe that because the hon. member always makes good sense. These men are pilots and they want to get out. They entered the service under certain conditions, namely, that they could get out on six months' notice. The wife of one of them writes she has been advised that her husband has to complete two more years of service.

I wonder where this regulation came from? Is it a regulation or is it just a demand the minister is placing on those now serving in a voluntary force?

He has been serving for three years and has a commitment to a private firm which, of course, is jeopardized. This man is not one of those at the top; he is right in the ranks.

Another pilot writes under date of March 29, 1967 to the effect that last week officers had their release dates cancelled.

I cannot understand how this cancellation has come about. The minister has disrupted the lives of many men who want to get out of the service. These men have made commitments with respect to outside positions or have been promised outside positions. Now their future is jeopardized by the minister's action. This is very unfair.

Another member of the air force says that service policy resulted in a statement to the effect that all graduate pilots holding permanent commissions will be retained in the service until the completion of five years of qualified pilot service.

I wonder under what authority this directive was issued since we were told that prior to the passage of this bill a pilot could be released on six months' notice. I suggest that the minister has taken on more powers than he was granted by parliament. I repeat part of that last statement:

—will be retained in the service until the completion of five years of qualified pilot service. I am suggesting that at the time these pilots entered the service this policy was not in existence and it has resulted in discrimination. This man wants to go back to law school.

If there was no such regulation in existence when these men offered their services to the country and got their commissions in the army, navy or air force, then until this bill is passed the previous agreement should still hold. I ask the minister to explain what has taken place with regard to the applications of those who want to retire from a voluntary service and not be subject to compulsory service as will be the case when the bill passes. On what authority has the minister instructed his officials to reply to these applications with a directive that the men must now remain in the services for a period of five years?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to point out that no officer or man has ever had a right to release after six months' service, nor is it proposed that he should have such a right. As I understand it, the policy is that except in special circumstances applications for release will not be approved until six months have expired. Thereafter they will normally be approved, but this is subject to the exigencies of the service—

Mr. McIntosh: May I ask a question?

Mr. Hellyer: Let me finish my statement—

Mr. McIntosh: Did you not tell us they could get out within six months and is that not recorded in the minutes of the committee?

Mr. Hellyer: I said that is the policy but it is not a right. It is not a regulation, nor is it—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I call it one o'clock. Surely closure is not to be extended to meal hours.

The Deputy Chairman: It being one o'clock, pursuant to the order made by the house on April 6 this committee stands adjourned until two o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at one o'clock clause 3 was under discussion.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, a point was raised this morning which had been raised earlier in the debate by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and the hon. member for Lapointe. Earlier in the week I undertook to give a reply. I was unable to do so and therefore I should like to do so now.

A policy was introduced in August, 1966 under which pilots are required to serve a minimum of five years following completion of aircrew training. This policy was extended to all aircrew in November 1966. This policy will not be applied to R.O.T.P. graduates who were not asked to accept this additional obligatory service before commencing aircrew training. In the future, that is, commencing with the 1967 graduating class, R.O.T.P. graduates will not be given aircrew training unless they are prepared to accept this additional period of obligatory service.

Aircrew training is costly and this heavy expenditure of funds is not justified for R.O.T.P. candidates who are not willing to accept, prior to undertaking training, additional obligatory service to that which they undertook when they entered the R.O.T.P. Those who do not wish to undertake the obligatory service required of aircrew will be employed in non-aircrew positions. There is a surplus of candidates for aircrew training and therefore no difficulty in filling all of the aircrew training spaces with qualified candidates to whom the five year obligatory service rule is acceptable.

From August, 1966 until the present time, during which staff consideration was being given to the application of the aircrew obligatory service policy to R.O.T.P., graduates, there was uncertainty among those R.O.T.P. graduates who had or were undertaking aircrew training as to whether the obligatory service they had undertaken when they entered R.O.T.P. would be extended. This has caused concern on the part of R.O.T.P. graduates in this respect and I trust that this will be cleard up now that the decision has been taken to apply the aircrew policy only to R.O.T.P. graduates who undertake aircrew which they were committed on entering the R.O.T.P.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about a principle which becomes evident in this clause. I do not suggest it is something new so far as this bill is concerned, that it results only from the minister's policies, or anything of that sort. I refer, however, to the situation where an individual enters into a contract by which he is bound in respect of service in any of the services concerned. There is a tendency, as the situation changes and as a matter of convenience, for the government through the Department of National Defence to change the contract to suit its own requirements. This would seem to be one of the most demoralizing situations in which a serving man or officer could find himself. Under the provisions for retirement a man may retire from the services by giving six months' notice. The hon. member for Calgary North pointed out that under those circumstances there might be a situation where a great number of serving personnel might wish to retire at the same time. A group of personnel, for example, half a unit, might make application for retirement. They have decided they are going to retire under a certain set of circumstances.

The minister said that this is no problem at all, or words to that effect. I am paraphrasing. He said that under those circumstances the department would in effect change the regulations and not allow this. The serving man, however, assumes that he has this right, but if it is only a right which exists at the convenience of the service then it is not a right at all. This is a most demoralizing situation. I have heard the argument put forward that something might be done because it affected only a few and that therefore there was nothing wrong in doing it, that is, that any inconvenience which might be involved in carrying out the terms of the government's obligation was out of all proportion to the number of persons concerned. When it comes to a matter of keeping an obligation, I do not think in all justice that this should be based on convenience. The obligation which rests with the service to keep its side of the bargain should be just as binding as the obligation of the individual.

This is something which goes back a long time. Perhaps I may be excused if I cite an experience I had. This was one of the reasons I did not remain in the permanent force after world war II. In 1939 the R.C.A.F. started a program under which it granted some short service commissions because there was an apprehension that a national emergency might arise. Young men were offered short service commissions in the R.C.A.F. I was one of them. One of the requirements was that you were a university graduate; another was that you were in a certain age group, and so on. The terms under which we joined the service were that we would serve on active service for a period of four years, which could be extended to a total of ten years if a national emergency existed at the end of the four years. For taking this risk, as it were, in a kind of indefinite contract, part of the agreement of enlistment was that for every year served except the first year one was on active service, he would be given a gratuity of, as I recall, $500 a year until the end of the active service.

Two classes of aircrew were inducted into the air force and given commissions before the war began. These short service commissions were discontinued at that point or shortly thereafter. We had joined the service in the summer of 1939. After the war began there was a general raise in service pay which applied to the permanent force, to the people with short service commissions and to the special reserve, those people who joined the service after the war began, for the duration of the war. Naturally everyone accepted the increase in pay automatically and without question.

After about a year and a half we received a registered letter saying that since we were accepting the increase in pay we were no longer eligible for a gratuity at the end of our service unless we wished to return the increase in pay retroactively for the year and a half. We were a very small group. Quite a number had not been kept on—this was one of the terms of enlistment—because they were found not to have the aptitude to become flying instructors or aircrew members. After a year and a half quite a large number—I might say that these people kept their side of the bargain—accepted discharge from the service without question.

By the time the year and a half was up quite a number had been killed; only a very few survived the war. They kept their side of the bargain, but the government never paid the gratuity to the few who survived the war because they were a small, insignificant group. In my judgment, this is not something you can measure by numbers. It is a principle, a contract that must be honoured. I must confess that after the war, before I left the service in 1947, I was offered a permanent commission. I did not accept it, and one of the reasons I did not accept it was that I knew that a contract which I entered into in joining the service was binding on me but was only binding on the service as a matter of convenience and within certain limits. Actually, I am very pleased now—in fact, I have never been more pleased in my life—that I did not accept a permanent commission, because I can think of no more appalling situation to befall one than to be a serving officer under the present minister.

Mr. Forrestall: He would have thrown you out.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): He probably would, but that is neither here nor there. The point I am trying to make is that when men volunteer, as they do in Canada, to serve in the armed forces they want to know, and it is only reasonable that they should know, that the terms under which they join will be honoured and binding no matter how inconvenient it is to the service. I can visualize a situation where a difficulty may arise in regard to the six months' notice. If a situation develops where it is tempting for a great many servicemen, because of a particular set of circumstances, to get out of the services, there will be an inclination to do this quickly because it will be the early birds, the ones who do it first, who will be allowed to go. After it becomes a strain on the service the rest will be retained. It will be a question of who will get there first.

This is an unhealthy situation. I do not say this in criticism of the minister, but I point out that in my judgment it is a matter of vital importance to morale in the services that the services should be bound by their side of the bargain just as much as the individual is bound by his side. Unfortunately that is not the case. If you have a situation where the six months' notice privilege can be withdrawn under certain circumstances, I do not think it will make for good morale. No honourable man objects to keeping his side of the bargain, no matter how inconvenient it may be for him. We should realize that when a man joins the service it is the most important contract in his whole life. It involves his complete career in most cases, in peacetime especially, and is much more important than his purchase of a house, a car or something of that nature. It is a very unsatisfactory situation in which to find himself, if he discovers that after he has entered into this contract the rules can be changed by the government if it suits its convenience.

In my opinion this is not justice. I believe that the individual as well as the government should have equal rights when it comes to terms of engagement. That is all I wish to say on this part of the clause. I will have more to say later on the first part.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I have a brief question to ask the minister. This matter was dealt with in part just before the luncheon adjournment. I wonder whether this information has been conveyed in a very tangible and real way to the people affected under the R.O.T.P. It is my understanding that this information has come to many of them as a brand new awareness and understanding of their position with regard to the plan.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, on April 17 a telegram went out to all commands giving them the policy and asking them to communicate it to the men in their commands.

Mr. Forrestall: May I ask the minister one further question? What has brought about the great delay in communicating this information to the men? Was it because of a breakdown in communication?

Mr. Hellyer: As I indicated, Mr. Chairman, the staff had been considering the possibility of applying the additional, obligatory service to R.O.T.P. graduates. This matter only reached my desk and that of the associate minister a few days ago. We dealt with it expeditiously once it was presented to us. In fact, we felt, and I think my hon. friend will agree, that if we changed that obligatory service it would have been the wrong approach. We did not feel that would be right under the circumstances and therefore it will apply only in so far as future graduates are concerned —those commencing their training this fall.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. McIntosh: I am sorry I did not get back from lunch in time to hear the complete content of the minister's statement. Am I correct in assuming that the import of his statement was to the effect that this change only applies to R.O.T.P. personnel and that those who have served their three years, as suggested by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, wish to get out of the service and have made their applications will be allowed to do so? Is that the meaning of the minister's statement?

Mr. Hellyer: The requirement to serve five years applies to all air crew other than R.O.T.P., who abide by the terms of the obligatory service they agreed to when they joined the forces. That is the case up to this time. In so far as the future is concerned, no one will be given pilot training from the regular officers training plan unless they agree to serve five years following the completion of their pilot training.

Mr. McIntosh: In other words, this officially cancels the six month clause which the judge advocate general said was policy, not law?

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Chairman. The six months' notice only applies in the case of aircrew after they have served their five years obligatory service and, in the case of the R.O.T.P., men giving notice to leave the service after they have served their obligatory period. Perhaps this might be a good time to read into the record the exceptions in so far as the policy of permitting release after six months' notice is concerned.

Mr. McIntosh: Would the minister also refer to all services and tell us what happens to army commissioned officers and other ranks as well as navy commissioned officers and other ranks?

Mr. Hellyer: I understand the same policy applies to all the services. This statement is in response to an inquiry in respect of the voluntary release regulations and procedures. These are the exceptions to the six months' period of notice regulation for voluntary release. In these cases voluntary release will not normally be granted on six months' notice. I must again reiterate that this is policy, not something that is a matter of right or law.

The exceptions in respect of officers apply first to those obligated under Queens' regulations and orders 15.18, who have undertaken designed courses of over six months duration, R.O.T.P. medical and dental plan officers who are required to complete their period of obligation, and aircrew officers who are required to serve five years after completion of aircrew training, and R.O.T.P. aircrew officers required to fulfil the terms of their obligatory service.

The exceptions in respect of men apply first to men who are serving on a cycled ship, until the end of the cycle, men on fixed overseas unaccompanied tours such as in Cyprus with United Nations emergency force, and in Europe. These are six months or one year tours. Up to the present time, as far as can be determined, there have been no requests for release from officers who are serving on a cycled ship or who are on fixed overseas unaccompanied tours. If the problem arises the policy would presumably be the same as for men.

Second, I should add that compassionate or exceptional circumstances are accepted as reasons to release officers and men in the above categories. In other words, there may be circumstances so overwhelming that they would offset these exceptions. This would happen only in rare cases.

The current rules respecting release by purchase for all services are: (a) unless a man has urgent exceptional and compassionate reasons he is required to purchase his release if the request is made within three years of commencing his first engagement; (b) release is allowed without cost beyond three years service and on six months' notice; (c) men in second or subsequent engagements are released on six months' notice, and Q.R. and O table (1) is not invoked. I might add that except as modified by those exceptions, the Queen's regulations and orders, 15.33, apply.

I think that completes the balance of the policy. Hon. members will now know just what it is that is presently in operation in so far as policy on release is concerned.

Mr. McIntosh: I should like to ask the minister whether he has given any consideration to the requests of members on this side of the house to withdraw the word "indefinite". Let me refer to the minutes of proceedings and evidence, volume 32, March 14. The following question was asked by one member of the committee:

> Any fixed period; so that strictly speaking the "indefinite" is not really very important?

The judge advocate general then replied:

> No, it is not materially increasing the powers of the governor in council. It is just making it a little tidier, and easier to draft the regulations, and so on.

In view of the fact there is so much objection to the inclusion of this term, and possibly we are overly suspicious in this regard as to what it may mean, perhaps the minister would consider our request to drop the word "indefinite".

Mr. Hellyer: We discussed this matter at some length before the lunch break. At that time I indicated that the defence staff thought it would be advisable to have legislative authority for either fixed or indefinite periods for the enrolment of men. This would give the staff the same flexibility they now have in respect of officers.

The minister's manpower study on men, which made this recommendation in the first place, I am told and believe is the most comprehensive examination of the terms of enrolment and employment of other ranks in the armed services that has ever been undertaken in this country. It not only included a study by senior officers who formed part of the group but also involved consultations with many other ranks in all parts of the country and overseas. It was only after this exhaustive study that this recommendation was made. I believe they are only asking parliament to provide this flexibility. I cannot guarantee that this authority will ever be exercised. As the judge advocate general said or implied, we can now enrol men on a second engagement for a fixed term of 20 years, or something along that line. I think this would be more acceptable and would at the same time enable us to offer an indefinite period of enrolment with the security that goes with it to servicemen who have chosen to stay in the armed forces as a career.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I have one short question. I presume the judge advocate general ranks as an expert and therefore in the view of the Minister of Transport his advice should be rejected. That hon. minister suggested that only the advice of amateurs should be considered.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not quite follow this idea. We did get into a discussion yesterday about the situation. I take it my friend is actually referring to the judge advocate general.

Mr. Churchill: Yes. I understand he is an expert. The Minister of Transport suggested we should reject the advice of experts and pay attention only to what the amateurs had to say. I take it the advice of the judge advocate general should therefore be rejected.

Mr. Hellyer: I would not agree. I have found the judge advocate general to be a very intelligent and knowledgeable officer. His services have been invaluable in the preparation of this legislation. I am sure he will be helpful in the drafting of regulations after the bill is passed by parliament. He is an exceptional public servant and should be given full credit in this regard.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: You would prefer to accept his advice rather than the advice of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Hellyer: I prefer to accept his advice rather than the advice of the hon. member opposite.

Mr. Pickersgill: So that the gloss on the hon. gentleman's remarks will not be misunderstood, I think it would be desirable for him, knowing what a great student of history he is, to cite the place in Hansard where I ever said that the advice of experts should be rejected. To my knowledge I never said any such thing.

Mr. Churchill: I am sorry the Minister of Transport was not here before lunch because I said that his speech made about ten days ago was the silliest speech I had ever heard since I came to this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not altogether disagree with the hon. gentleman about that, but among the silly things I may have said I did not say anything quite so silly as the hon. gentlemen has said I said.

Mr. McIntosh: I may have gotten off the track, but I think I should say to the minister that I find the extensive study he says his department made into the inclusion of the word "indefinite" very alarming. We could not understand why the department had not made an extensive study of what the manpower requirements would be after the unification bill has been passed or what the cost to the country would be. We could not understand why the officials of the department failed to make a study of these important matters.

However, the minister now says an extensive study was made which led the department to believe this unimportant word should be included in the bill. This, in my opinion, was a waste of effort. I suggest to the minister that if it is not important and he takes the word of the judge advocate general he should adhere to the request of the members of the opposition and drop it. The minister says he doubts that it will ever be used. If it is so unimportant, why not drop the word and let us go on to another clause?

Mr. Hellyer: I think it would provide more flexibility to have it in. I am sure my hon. friend would not want to see anything put into the bill which would make it more rigid than is necessary in so far as the terms of enlistment and enrolment are concerned.

Mr. McIntosh: I think that by taking it out you would make the terms of the bill more flexible, not more rigid. This is the argument we are presenting.

Mr. Forrestall: There is a matter which I should like to take up with the minister, and for this purpose I should like to refer to the committee evidence, volume No. 36, page 2351. The hon. member for Edmonton West, in dealing with this particular section, raised a matter with the judge advocate general and the minister. I should like to put in on the record because I suggest it is applicable to the clause we are considering. We are requesting information on this point prior to this bill being proclaimed and becoming part of our law. At the bottom of page 2351 I find the following:

> But what I am primarily concerned about is that the regulations which may be published in regard to this, be referred back to the standing committee on defence for examination, as I will propose for any regulations which may be made with regard to any amendment, and that these be examined. We have had this undertaking in the finance committee under the Bank Act where a sort of carte blanche is being given to the minister to flesh out a general authority given by parliament. I think that the more we develop the practice in this parliament that regulations made pursuant to these general authorities be referred back to the committee which is dealing with the legislation, the better off we are going to be. Far too great a practice has arisen in the years past to rely on this carte blanche authority, which is not reviewable by parliament. I would like to know what the minister—

At that point the hon. member for Edmonton West was interrupted by the chairman and then the hon. member continued:

I want the regulations as indicated in section 21 (2) as proposed be referred back and the minister can be given an invitation here. We respect that type of undertaking, as we have done in the finance committee with regard to the Bank Act, with what we have done with the Insurance Deposit Act and others. These regulations will be, as soon as they are prepared and if the house is sitting and this committee is sitting, brought in and referred back to the committee, not merely tabled as an order in council.

The minister, after some further interjections, replied:

If you mean regulations after enactment, I do not see why this could not be arranged.

I should like to ask the minister whether or not these regulations could be brought back to the committee for review prior to the bill being proclaimed.

Mr. Hellyer: I would not like to give that undertaking because it will mean a delay. However, my undertaking to have them referred once they are proclaimed is good. I am sure that at that time the committee or the house, if they want to, would be in a position to pass judgment on them in the normal manner. There are opportunities in the house on motions of non-confidence and that sort of thing to deal with the situation where regulations have been referred and they do not meet with the general approval of the house.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Clause 3 reads in part as follows:

Subsections (1) and (2) of section 21 of the said act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

21 (1) Commissions of officers in the Canadian Forces shall be granted by Her Majesty during pleasure.

Subsection 1 of section 21 provides for all commissions for all officers of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force and says that those commissions shall be granted by Her Majesty during pleasure. When the bill we are now considering is proclaimed the section I have just quoted will no longer be part of the law. I assume, therefore, that all commissions now held by officers in our three services will cease to have any validity. I should like to know if my assumption is correct.

Mr. Hellyer: I think the situation is covered by subclause 2 of clause 6.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): We have here a situation which is the type of thing about which I was talking a little while ago except that in this case it applies to commissioned officers. Upon the proclamation of this bill, as I understand it, present commissions will no longer have any validity. They constitute the terms under which present serving officers engaged in the service. When Her Majesty's pleasure, as it is expressed, has ceased to exist, those commissions in the navy, air force and army will no longer exist. Apparently the minister takes the easy view—so what? These people are going to be commissioned into the new force. These are not the terms under which these officers undertook to serve in the first instance. They undertook to serve in one of the three services.

• (2:40 p.m.)

I am not just being difficult; I sincerely believe it would be recognized as a fact that the commissions of serving officers would no longer be valid. The terms under which they engaged will no longer be valid because they are being abrogated by parliament. Therefore there should be no compulsion on them to accept commissions in the new force. They should, of course, be given the first priority in accepting commissions in the new force if they so desire, but in fairness I do not think that there should be any obligation upon a serving officer to continue to serve in the new force unless he wishes to do so voluntarily.

What we have is a situation where men have embarked on a career on certain conditions which can be very binding upon them and difficult for them under certain circumstances. The conditions of the agreement entered into are enforced in many cases at great inconvenience to the individual. But when it is convenient to the government to do so the government take it upon themselves to abrogate the agreement and to substitute something else. It is like changing the rules half way through the game.

Therefore I do not think we should by act of parliament substitute a new arrangement for the agreement that was originally entered into by individual officers and make the substitution binding upon them unless they voluntarily agree to accept the situation. I should like the minister to say a few words on the question of the compulsion in regard to all serving officers in the present three services when this act is proclaimed.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether this is the proper place to ask the question, but as the minister mentioned men who leave the service to further their education I have a case in mind almost parallel to the one brought up by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings concerning the officer who, after completing his three years, wished to leave the service and go into law. The case I have in mind is that of a young chap who was in the service and was permitted to buy his way out. I do not know whether policy, law or regulations govern this situation, but this man was not given a refund. The answer I received from the minister's department was that unless he left the service to enter university he must forfeit his $125, or whatever the sum was. In this case this young lad had not completed high school and he left the service intending to complete high school and, then go on to university. If proof is given the minister's department that after completion of high school the young lad has gone on to university, will the purchase price paid by the young lad to the department be refunded?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. McIntosh: No, Mr. Chairman, I should like an answer to my question before allowing it to pass.

Mr. Hellyer: I am sorry, I do not know the answer to that question offhand.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Churchill: Call the yeas and nays.

The Deputy Chairman: Those in favour of the clause passing will please rise.

Mr. McIlraith: We should all rise.

Mr. Churchill: Call the nays.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. A request has been made that the yeas and nays be called.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Mr. Churchill: Only one person rose and you should have called the nays.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 40; nays, 25.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare clause 3 carried.

On clause 4—Ranks of officers and men.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this clause deals with the ranks to be held by officers, N.C.O.'s and men in the services. When this bill was originally introduced clause 4 listed the new ranks in the single unified force which would be in effect after the bill became law. It also had a provision that the minister may make regulations prescribing other designations for the titles of rank set forth in the clause.

No evidence was brought before the committee to show what advantages would accrue from having a single rank structure for all three services. It was stated that this would make for administrative ease. However, all of the witnesses who came before the committee were asked their opinion about this and they gave evidence to the effect that the proposed single rank structure would have very serious effects upon the morale of the services and that in particular it would be damaging as far as naval personnel were concerned. It was said that when our naval personnel encountered personnel of other navies they would be held up to ridicule and suffer embarrassment. As a result, I believe, of the representations which were made, amendments were introduced in the committee, some of which we find in the bill now before us. Column I in schedule A of the bill shows the ranks which originally were listed in clause 4. The ranks shown in columns II, III and IV of schedule A are those now in effect in the navy, army and air force.

It was represented to the committee when this amendment was introduced by the minister that it would have the effect of making the ranks appearing in schedule A universal as far as documents, pay records and things of that nature were concerned. Apart from that, Mr. Chairman, it would be possible for officers and other ranks to use the rank designations which are in effect in the respective services at the present time if they were authorized by the governor general in council. The explanatory note says:

The amendment would result in the following changes in substance:

(a) ranks would be prescribed for the purposes of the Act only;

• (2:50 p.m.)

In spite of the judge advocate general's explanation in the committee and the minister's explanation, the meaning of those words is not clear. These should be a clear explanation of the meaning of the phrase, "ranks would be prescribed for the purposes of the Act only" and a clear explanation of its implications. The note continues:

(b) the other designations of rank that might be used would be limited to the ranks now held in the three services; and

(c) the governor in council, rather than the minister, would have the power to make regulations respecting other designations of rank.

Some contradictions seem to be inherent in the words of the last subparagraph. The governor in council so far as I am aware has always had power to make designations of rank, or to make other designations where that seems desirable for any purpose at any time. The committee ought to have an explanation of the legal effect of subparagraphs (b) and (c). Do they contradict one another? In view of the evidence before the committee and all the complaints, editorials, letters and so on about instituting a single rank system; and considering that the minister has seen the folly of his original idea to the extent that he has introduced the amendment now before us allowing in the naval environment naval ranks, in the land environment army ranks and in the air environment R.C.A.F. ranks, would he not be prepared to drop this whole clause? There is no demonstrable advantage in keeping it. As I understand it, the ranks will continue as they are at present. I hope that is so.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I join with the hon. member for Calgary North in asking the minister to make clear the meaning of the phrase "purposes of the act". In addition, before the house confers on the governor in council the power contained in this clause, the minister ought to explain the circumstances under which it will be necessary for the governor in council to exercise its power. I understood, as I believe the hon. member for Calgary North also did, from the minister's explanation in the committee that the common rank structure in the three service environment has been introduced chiefly for accounting purposes and that the bill does not contemplate, for example, that persons in the navy will be required to adopt an army rank. It would help the committee if the minister could explain the meaning of the phrase, "for the purposes of the Act only, " and indicate what is contemplated in regard to what the governor in council may prescribe by regulation.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, where the bill says that the ranks shall be ranks for purposes of the act it means that they shall be ranks for legal purposes. Authority is given to the governor in council to permit different rank designations for other purposes.

The point I made clear in the committee is that it is not intended to introduce changes in rank designations at present beyond those that would be reasonably acceptable to the men and women of the armed forces. The great majority of the air force, I think, prefer the new rank designations, though the navy prefers not to use them. I understood that we would proceed with great caution in this area which is not important enough to exacerbate feelings. Over a period of time we think there will be an evolution toward single rank designations for some ranks. That may never happen in the senior seagoing ranks but much will depend, as I said before, on what other countries in the world do and how they change their rank designations. We do not in the future intend to rush the implementing of this proposal. We shall only do it in a way that is acceptable to the majority of men and women in the armed forces.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question. Clause 4 reads in part:

Section 22 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"22. (1) For the purposes of this Act, the ranks of the officers and men of the Canadian Forces shall be as set out in Column I of the Schedule.

I rise to ask the minister about the honorary colonels in the military establishment of Canada, some of whom are concerned about the effect of this bill on their future rank and dress. They wonder what their authorized dress will be once this bill is adopted. Will the minister inform the committee how this bill will affect honorary colonels with respect to the rank they will hold and what form of dress will be required when this bill becomes law? I might say in raising this point that I could not help thinking of that honorary colonel, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who I am sure wonders what his rank and dress will be once the bill is adopted.

Mr. Hellyer: No change is anticipated in the positions of honorary colonels and no change is provided for in the bill. There will be no requirement for them to change their regimental dress uniforms and they will be able to turn out in all the brilliant finery they wear at the present time.

Mr. Herridge: Does that mean that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as an honorary colonel, will be permitted to wear his kilt?

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: Most certainly he will be allowed to continue wearing his kilt. This is an opportunity to pass on a piece of information I picked up at the Vimy dinner the other night and which may be of interest to the hon. gentleman. Whereas we propose that kilts will still be worn for ceremonial purposes we do not intend to reinstate the practice of having people go into battle wearing kilts as was done in the first world war. One of the veterans of Vimy told me the other night that he saw men going into battle in kilts with mustard gas going up their legs. I am all for reform, he said.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for that information.

Mr. Forrestall: I thank the minister for his reassurance with regard to traditional naval ranks, that they will not disappear in the near future and, indeed, quite possibly will never disappear. If I have paraphrased what he said, I think the minister has now understood the point we have been trying to make for some months. It is a little difficult to accommodate a colonel on the bridge of a ship or in the engine room.

I should like to ask the minister whether he has given further thought to the making of what might be called intermediate appointments—private first class, private second class and so on up to corporal. The point was well brought out by two or three members of the committee whose questions appear in the proceedings of evidence No. 36. As to modes of address, there is no difficulty when we get to chief warrant officer. We call him "Chief". I suppose one would call a warrant officer "Mister". I am not sure what we would call a master. Has consideration been given to the classification of recruits? When does a private become a private first class? Has this been settled yet?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not think it has been settled but in the present pay schedule there is a differentiation which relates to qualifications. This is already in force. As far as I know there is no differentiation expressed in rank insignia as between the different levels of privates. As I understand it there is nothing to prevent the armed forces making recommendations that some sign be worn which would indicate the difference in qualifications. Indeed, they might wish to continue appointments such as lance corporals. I think this is within the power set out in the bill. It would be strictly up to the military. They could recommend what they thought was the most workable procedure.

Mr. Forrestall: Am I correct in assuming that today pay is tied purely to trade structure as opposed to rank?

Mr. Hellyer: It applies to both. There are different pay fields for the same rank. One applies to rank and one applies to particular qualifications of persons holding that rank.

Mr. Forrestall: Could the minister extend the treatment he has promised senior naval officers to other ranks in the navy and express the hope that they will never become corporals?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not want to try to outguess the future. The associate minister has just been travelling in Europe and he has found great interest in this reorganization in the capitals he has visited. This leads me to believe it is much better to watch and see how the history of the world develops than to make decisions which might not take account of the situation five or ten years from now.

Mr. Churchill: The minister has spoken of the interest which may be developing in other parts of the world. This could be interpreted in two ways—interest in commendation of an enterprise or the fascinated interest of horror when something is being done which is wrong. I do not accept the minister's inference that other countries are anxious to follow the lead which has been set by him.

Mr. Hellyer: Some of this interest is accompanied by commendation. If the hon. gentleman would like me to do so I might give him an indication on third reading of the interest which is being shown in other parts of the world.

Mr. Churchill: Why would the minister want me to accept any statement of his on that account when he has said it so often in the past and we have been given contrary evidence presented by people in other countries of the world? The minister may say that everybody is following our lead but experienced people elsewhere in the world say, no; they say this is a shocking thing to have done. The minister has no support from the United States, Australia, New Zealand or Great Britain. What is he talking about? Nonsense.

Mr. Hellyer: I doubt that opinions on this subject would be unanimous in other countries any more than they are here. There are bound to be people in all countries who think as the hon. gentleman does.

Mr. Churchill: I hope there are not many more people in the world like the minister, who is a self-centred egotist.

Mr. McIntosh: Does the minister remember the answers given by his former advisers when they were asked whether they had held discussions with their counterparts in other military forces of the world? Does he remember what these military officers in the service of other governments told his advisers when asked what they thought of this plan to decimate the Canadian forces? I recall specifically what General Simonds said with reference to a conversation he had had with his opposite number in the United Kingdom. He said: "Those people thought we were nuts". The minister should also remember that when he first introduced this bill in the house we on this side said that if he were not careful we would be the laughingstock of the world as far as our armed forces are concerned.

The minister tried to create the impression that he was bringing in a new idea which would revolutionize the military thinking of the world. In my opinion that was a ridiculous claim. The concept of a single service is not something new, and the minister knows it perfectly well. It has been discussed and discarded by practically every country in the world. The proof is on record. The minister has no basis for saying that unification will be successful.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Once the minister demolishes our services it will take years for us to put them back into shape after we come into power in the very near future. The minister is costing the country millions and millions of dollars. Everything he has said in regard to unification has not come to pass. He said it would save the country money but the last estimates which he introduced increased the defence budget by $115 million. Indeed, one might say that those people who are getting the contract for the new uniforms are possibly the only ones who will benefit from unification. For the minister to say that other countries will profit from this Canadian experiment is ridiculous.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 57; nays, 17.

On clause 5—Embodiment.

Mr. Churchill: Clause 5, Mr. Chairman, is very much like clause 2. It reads as follows:

(1) The services known before the coming into force of this part as the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force are embodied in the Canadian Forces.

That is followed by subclause (2). In the original bill which was discussed by the defence committee it read as follows:

The Canadian Forces continue, as a single service, the services known before the coming into force of this part as the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force.

I drew attention to the fact that this implied no change in the services and that the three well known services would continue. As a result the judge advocate general, had a second look at it and accepted suggestions advanced by opposition members because, being non-partisan, he does not recognize political distinctions. The clause was therefore reworded.

This clause draws attention once again to the obliteration of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force, and in their place we are to have the Canadian Forces or the Canadian Armed Forces. Away goes the tradition of the armed forces of Canada which have had distinctive names ever since their inception. No longer can we speak with pride of the Royal Canadian Navy. The word "royal" is anathema to the government party and they want it struck out.

The Royal Canadian Air Force, which like the navy established a magnificent record in wartime, is no longer to be spoken of as such. The men who are flying the transport planes and so on are only to be members of the Canadian Armed Forces. There is to be no special distinction. The pride that was felt by members of the Royal Canadian Air Force will disappear. It was a great distinction to belong to the Royal Canadian Air Force. Quite properly that force received attention during the second world war. It and the navy were active before the army units were employed. The Royal Canadian Air Force fought in the Battle of Britain, the battle that saved civilization in this country. Yet this minister, supported by his colleagues and the Prime Minister, who to my mind is the guilty one in the whole exercise, is wiping out that great tradition.

My hon. friends opposite laugh. They want nothing to do with the past. They want to wipe it out. We are expected to look forward to an uncertain future and make fun of everything that happened in the past, make fun of the people in the services who have made such a contribution to Canadian life.

Mr. Groos: That is not so.

Mr. Churchill: Just to show how careless this government is with regard to tradition and recognition of the sacrifices of the past, I wish the Minister of Veterans Affairs were here this afternoon, the man who bungled the Vimy Ridge—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Churchill: You can shout "shame" but let me tell you the story. He is the man who bungled the Vimy Ridge remembrance ceremony both in Europe and here in Canada, the man who did not give recognition to a representative of the Canadian Corps Association, who did not provide for a representative of the Canadian Corps Association to travel to Vimy Ridge with the regular party and who neglected the representative of the Canadian Corps Association here at the cenotaph ceremony. Yet the Canadian Corps Association was organized after the first world war and represents those divisions that fought at Vimy Ridge as well as other units. It has had a long and honourable history. But that is part of our tradition and therefore we are expected to forget it. The Minister of Veterans Affairs, like his colleagues, pays no attention to the past. He is not interested. He won't be bothered. This is the attention he gave to the ceremonies in remembrance of that famous battle.

• (3:20 p.m.)

I wish the derisive laughter could be recorded in Hansard. Members of the Liberal party laugh at such remarks about the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force. They jeer at anyone who speaks of the history of this country and its traditions. All these things are to be wiped out.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has the floor and I would invite members to make a little less noise during the time he is making his remarks.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I do not object to the derisive attention I receive from the Liberal members. I will not be discouraged from speaking in this chamber. I often stand up here to defend freedom of speech. I will seize every opportunity to make my voice heard here in opposition to what the Liberal party is doing to this country. This is all part of a pattern which we meet day after day and week after week. Whether it has to do with the word "royal" or the coat of arms, everything in Canada's tradition is to be set to one side, laughed at and derided. I believe the Secretary of State has something to say and I should like to hear what it is.

Miss LaMarsh: What I should like to say is that the hon. gentleman has dishonoured the house several times. He has produced a phony letter and now, having sat in this house and having heard the explanation that the government of which he was a part was the only one which had anything to do with changing the coat of arms or its depictions, he tries to use what one of his own colleagues calls "the big lie" to change the record.

Mr. Churchill: We are doing well, Mr. Chairman. About ten days ago the Minister of Transport entered this debate. As I said, I thought his contribution was the silliest I had ever heard. It has been exceeded now by the contribution of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State will now rise in her place and withdraw the accusation that I introduced into this house a phony letter. Mr. Chairman, I call upon you to protect the privileges of hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: The minister has to prove her case or withdraw her remarks. On a question of privilege, I ask that that be done.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. I consider the remark made by the Secretary of State to be in fairly strong language, but I am not convinced that it is altogether unparliamentary.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps you did not hear the accusation. The Secretary of State said that I had introduced into the House of Commons a phony letter. I say that is an accusation to the effect that I did something dishonest or dishonourable. I say that the Secretary of State must withdraw that reflection or prove it. That is my point of privilege, sir. What phony letter did I introduce in this chamber? In what respect was it phony? That is the proof I want.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, on the question of privilege may I say that the question is not as to the hon. members' motives. The words suggested either that he introduced it and knew it was phony or did this not knowing any better. I think it is entirely plausible from what we know of the hon. member that he introduced it out of sheer stupidity with no motives at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Well, of course—

An hon. Member: An arrogant bunch.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, they certainly are arrogant. I have asked the Secretary of State to withdraw her accusation and I have also asked the Chairman on a question of privilege that it be withdrawn. If you, sir, do not wish to rule that this is a valid question of privilege then I must, under the circumstances, accept your silence. I have asked the Secretary of State to withdraw her remark and she will not do it. She knows she cannot prove that the letter was phony. She was afraid after making that statement and every member of the Liberal party is afraid. They are afraid of that issue.

On the second point which she raised with regard to the coat of arms—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Can the hon. member prove that the letter was genuine?

Mr. Nesbitt: What letter?

Mr. Churchill: Under what circumstances do I have to bring proof in this house with regard to what is introduced in this house? Will the hon. member prove to us that the things he introduces are genuine? I have grave doubts about that, but I have never bothered to attempt to insult the hon. member by asking him to prove his innocence. I doubt that he would be able to do so, but I am not making that suggestion.

The hon. lady has suggested, in respect of the references to the alleged coat of arms appearing on the medallion for our school children, that there is something wrong with that and that we were the ones who introduced it. This morning I happened to read the brochure published by the present government in 1964 describing the coat of arms. The Secretary of State, of course, has not read this document. She does not get around to some of these things. But in this document there is a definition of the coat of arms. It is defined as consisting of a shield, a helmet with a mantling and supporting arms on either side and the inscription below. The coat of arms consists of the whole picture, not solely the shield. So once again the Secretary of State is wrong. Perhaps she now would like to leave the house and continue her correspondence elsewhere, because her contribution to this debate is of the same low quality as that of the Minister of Transport. It has added nothing. I should like to return to where I started at clause 5.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: If there should be any other diversionary remarks I will be prepared to receive them and deal with them appropriately. This clause wipes out the famous names, "Royal Canadian Navy", "Canadian Army", and "Royal Canadian Air Force". They now become a part of our past which according to the Liberal party should be forgotten. This is what I object to—forgetting the past.

An hon. Member: You never learn from the past.

Mr. Churchill: I wish the Liberal party would learn from the past. They received a very severe lessons in 1956, 1957 and 1958. I hope the Canadian public will give them the same severe lesson again in the near future.

An hon. Member: It is coming.

Mr. Churchill: They are attempting to destroy our traditions. The other night I read into the record from the writings of Terence Robertson certain words concerning the change in our national defence policy. He showed very clearly what is in the minds of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, namely Canadianize everything in this country. If anything has a hint of origin other than in Canada it is to be obliterated.

The article by Terence Robertson and the speech I made in respect of it the other night have not been answered. Who on that side of the house is going to answer that speech and the remarks of Terence Robertson? Silence prevails. Of course, that address was made at 9.30 at night. When one speaks at 9.30 at night in this house the things he says do not get into the press and rarely reach radio or television. Therefore, his words go unnoticed.

An hon. Member: It all depends who says it.

National Defence Act Amendment

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: I may repeat the speech at a more appropriate time when I can catch the ear of those who are in the gallery. Perhaps I could get someone on the minister's staff to issue a release based on my speech. It is not very complimentary to the minister, and of course that is not the type of release that goes out to all the newspapers of the country. But it would be worth while if what the Liberal party is attempting to do to the country was made public knowledge right across Canada. It is trying to change so many of our habits, our traditions and so much of our valued history. That is exactly what this government is attempting to do, and clause 5 of the bill shows so clearly what is to be wiped out, ignored and forgotten.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I shall take only one minute to salve the conscience of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) who, it seems to me, is overly concerned with the removal of the word "royal". I suggest he exaggerates when he says that the intention is to remove anything reminiscent of the British crown, just to Canadianize everything brutally.

I shall tell him, as the saying goes in my part of the country, that he is more catholic than the Pope, or that he is more royalist than the Queen. And I would like to prove it to him by quoting the words of Her Majesty the Queen of England, for whom, incidentally, I have much respect; those words are taken from the speech she made during her last visit to Canada. Here is the exact quotation from her speech:

The role of the constitutional monarchy is to represent the democratic state, to sanction lawful authority,

As far as I am concerned, the lawful authority is the elected government, the one in office.

—to ensure the legality of the methods—

That is what is voted by parliament.

—and to guarantee that the will of the people will be carried out. I strongly wish—

I am still quoting the Queen.

—that none of my people will know coercion. To be happy, the citizens of a country must live in a climate of confidence and affection.

And note what the Queen said:

But a dynamic state must not be afraid to rethink its political philosophy. There is nothing surprising in the fact that an agreement drafted a hundred years ago does not necessarily meet all the problems of this day.

The Queen herself said that.

[Mr. Churchill.]

[English]

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, just before clause 5 passes I should like to draw the attention of the committee to a remark made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre about the Minister of Veterans Affairs, namely, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs does not care about the traditions of Canada's fighting men. I would remind the hon. gentleman, although I think he knows it, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs was an officer in the R.C.A.F. during world war II, was shot down in battle and was a prisoner of war. Like the hon. gentleman opposite, he was a gallant gentleman and served his country well in battle. I think it is stretching the imagination to select this minister out of all others and say that he does not care about the traditions and past of the gallant men with whom he served. I do not think the hon. gentleman opposite would want that remark to stand on the record or would want to select this man, of all people in the House of Commons, and say that kind of thing about him. I give the hon. gentleman the opportunity to withdraw that statement from the record.

Mr. Churchill: I know all about the record of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, so what the hon. member has said is not news to me at all. I said nothing about the military record of the minister. I said that he fumbled and bumbled with regard to the Vimy Ridge recognition ceremonies in Europe and here in Canada. I leave that on the record and I put it on again. I will put it on a third time if the hon. member wants me to do so.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to re-enter the debate when I came into the chamber but I was impressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre fighting a battle with respect to clause 5, and fighting it alone. I want the committee and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to know that he does not have to fight this battle alone. Another reason for my rising at this time was that in my humble contribution to this debate last Monday I made the statement, as reported at page 14987 of Hansard that this government, which is in a minority position in the house, was doing these things to our armed forces for no better reason than political expediency. I quote my words as they appear at page 14987 of Hansard.

One of these expedients is the removal of Anglo-Saxon traditions from our services.

That remark was followed by a one word interjection by the Minister of National Defence. I point out to the committee that the word was "Nonsense." In other words, the Minister of National Defence implied that my remark was nonsense.

Mr. Hellyer: So it was.

Mr. Alkenbrack: The remarks I made at that time are substantiated by clause 5 of this bill. Is clause 5 nonsense? I claim that clause 5 is the most injurious clause ever introduced into military legislation in the history of this country.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Alkenbrack: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: Does my hon. friend think that the introduction of airplane engines into ships is designed to do away with Anglo-Saxon traditions? Does he think that bridge control on our ships is designed to do away with Anglo-Saxon traditions? Does he think that the pursuit of excellence is designed to do away with Anglo-Saxon traditions? I ask the hon. member to apply his common sense to this matter. We are trying to develop a force for the second half of the 20th century and the years ahead, not for the 1930's and the 1940's.

Mr. Forrestall: Surely you don't mean that, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Hellyer: We are taking a forward-looking approach and showing some leadership in the field of military organization which I am sure will be emulated later not just by Anglo-Saxon countries or Scandinavian countries but ultimately by countries all over the world. Does the hon. member feel this is in any way a reflection on our heritage? I am sure he would not want to give that impression.

Mr. Alkenbrack: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister when he is going to ask me a question.

Mr. Hellyer: I just asked you a question.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I am not surprised at the interjection of the minister. He interjects by asking about material things, the use of engines, the use of bridge control, and so on. I am not surprised that my remarks brought the minister to his feet because he now realizes the enormity of his error, especially with regard to clause 5 of this bill. The minister talks about material things such as engines. Is he referring to British engines? What the minister says may be the case, but I am not debating the merits of material things. I am talking about our Canadian traditions, excellent traditions which have been handed down to us. We have many good traditions which have been handed down by both our mother countries. However, I am talking about the very valuable Anglo-Saxon traditions and practices, especially those of a military and defence nature, which have been our inheritance and which we have used so successfully in the past. In clause 5 of this bill the Liberal party betrays those Anglo-Saxon traditions and influences.

You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that on the page opposite clause 5 the legal advisers have attempted to give an explanation of this amendment. I draw your attention to the fact that clause 5 (1) of the original bill read as follows:

> The Canadian forces continue, as a single service, the services known before becoming into force of this part as the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Apparently that did not suit the minister, the cabinet, the Prime Minister or the Liberal party's electoral interests. God only knows what electoral roads that party will follow in future, but at this time they are playing this game for all it is worth. They decided there must be a change in this regard.

Clause 5 as it appeared in the original bill was apparently not strong enough or definite enough in its pronouncement as to the dissolution of the three separate services. The government had to come up with what now appears on page 3 of the bill. This is obviously the death knell of the separate services and the names they have carried down through the past, thanks to the Anglo-Saxon influence.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Three Rivers and I should like to remind him—

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Let me remind the hon. member that the name "Three Rivers" does not even exist as the name of my constituency. It is "Trois-Rivières".

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, may I remind the hon. member that my grandfather was born in Three Rivers, Quebec.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, to our delight the son does not live there.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, let me remind the hon. member that the son is now 90 years of age and is living on Somerset Street here in Ottawa.

Mr. Mongrain: Let me apologize by saying that perhaps he only looks like his son. I change my reference to grandson.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I offer my apology to the hon. member for Trois-Rivières for my mistake in respect of the name of his riding. He is correct; its name is "Trois-Rivières". I have visited the area and have great admiration for it because of its culture, geographic location and history.

The hon. member did refer to the crown and its affect on this situation. Let me remind him that the crown has guaranteed and is the guarantee that his and my rights shall be preserved. To me there is nothing personal in the crown. It represents the power that lies within that hon. member and each of us individually and collectively as citizens of Canada. The crown means nothing more than that to me. If we allow these guarantees to be eroded we as Canadians may no longer enjoy our inherited rights. We do not know what might happen in this country as a result of Liberal erosion of our rights. It might become subject to dictatorial power which will not be to the benefit of the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. Mongrain: I rise on a question of privilege.

My noble friend has attempted to insinuate that I advocate the disappearance of the crown. I have the greatest respect for the crown, as I have said, but there are conditions which arise on occasion which the Queen understands better than some of my friends on that side of the house. She in her own words has said that occasionally changes must be made and that she will accept such changes as long as they are suggested by a legal government, democratically elected.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Is not this type of discussion in respect of the crown and Her Majesty entirely out of place during this debate?

Mr. Alkenbrack: That is the exact and succinct reason I referred to the crown rather than Her Majesty. To me the bearer of the crown is not at issue. The crown itself is significant of the guarantees made to Canada in the past which exist today. I was referring to the erosion of Anglo-Saxon traditions in our forces and I think I have made my point clear. The hoots of derision by those who care nothing about these traditions mean nothing to me.

[Mr. Cowan.]

I submit that the Anglo-Saxon traditions which have been carried on by the armed forces down through the years and centuries ought not to be allowed to be eroded. For that reason I should like to move that clause 5, which stamps out the individual names of the three branches of our armed services, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army, and the Royal Canadian Air Force, be struck from the bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Let me remind the hon. member that our procedure requires that he submit his proposed amendment to the Chair in writing in the proper form. In any event, I suggest to the hon. member that his intended purpose will be served in another way. He may obtain the same result by voting against the adoption of this clause.

Mr. Pickersgill: According to our traditions we should have a copy of this amendment.

Mr. Forrestall: Why do hon. members want a copy of the amendment? They have not been interested in this debate up till now?

Mr. Alkenbrack: I submit that clause 5 should not be included in this bill. I will write out my proposed amendment and submit it to the Chair forthwith.

The Deputy Chairman: May I suggest to hon. members that the proper course of action would be to vote in favour or against the clause.

Mr. Churchill: We want to speak in reference to this clause.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, while the amendment is being prepared in the proper form, perhaps I as one member for Halifax would be remiss if I did not remind hon. members and Canadians as a whole of the history of the Royal Canadian Navy. Let me remind hon. members of the great contribution the Royal Canadian Navy has made to the Canadian way of life.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I have in front of me some notes prepared on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the R.C.N. which occurred some seven years ago in 1960. The Royal Canadian Navy came into being in 1910 as a result of the promulgation of the Naval Service Act on May 4 of that year. It was a natural step in our evolution and progress from the wilderness to full nationhood and the acceptance of our responsibility not only in terms of our own nation but in terms of the common safety of man everywhere.

The year 1910 was a fairly meaningful one for the R.C.N. I am not going back into the past but am simply giving a young man's appreciation of the contribution made by our naval service over the last 57 years and what this contribution has meant to the world. I should like to recall some dates to hon. members, such as June 1, June 3, June 19 and August 4. They were all milestones. On August 4, H.M.C.S. Rainbow was commissioned at Portsmouth. It may be recalled that H.M.C.S. Rainbow was the first ship to enter the Royal Canadian Navy. H.M.C.S. Niobe followed on September 6. Again, I am sure all hon. members are very much aware, or at least they should be, of the very gallant record of the Niobe.

In so far as things historical are concerned, a few minutes ago the minister told us that what he was doing was laying before the Canadian people the role of our armed forces for the next 50 years. He knows better than that, and I think we all know better than that. We are all aware of the fact that no matter what we do with our armed forces today they will be obsolete in three years' time, so rapid are the technological changes which are taking place. We are all aware of this.

I remind the minister that on October 1, 1910, Atlantic command was established—in other words, maritime command. There is nothing new about it at all because 57 years ago we had a maritime command. On October 13 of that same year dockyard and Admiralty House in Halifax were transferred to Canadian ownership. This was a very meaningful event in terms of the economic and social life of Atlantic Canada. These are very real things and are not passed over easily.

On November 8, still in that year, Rainbow arrived in Vancouver. These things should not be treated lightly. On May 4 of that year dockyard at Esquimalt was formally transferred. On May 18, 1914, the Royal Canadian Naval Vounteer Reserve was established by order in council and on August 4 war was declared. His Majesty's Canadian ships were placed under admiralty operational control. On that date Rainbow sailed to seek S.M.S. Leipzig, and to protect H.M. ships Algerine and Shearwater, other great Canadian names.

On August 5 two submarines built at Seattle for Chile and purchased by the premier of British Columbia were delivered to the R.C.N. off Trial Island. H.M.C.S. Niobe sailed from Halifax in September of that year to complete her complement at St. John's, Newfoundland. Again, we find evidence of the expansion of this Canadian contribution to the world. On November 1 the first four Canadian casualties were suffered by our Canadian naval service. H.M.S. Good Hope took part in this battle and was carrying four Canadians in her crew.

There are other dates that are very significant in terms of the Royal Canadian Navy. There was the explosion in 1917 at Halifax. In connection with all of these things the Royal Canadian Navy has been geared to give comfort to man in an hour of crisis or disaster. After the war, in 1920, naval demobilization was completed. In 1921 we got some more submarines for training purposes and our fleet began to grow. On June 16 the Royal Naval College disappeared and became something a little bit more identifiable with our own Canadian needs. In 1923 the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve and the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve were established.

On July 1, 1923, H.M.C.S. Stadacona was commissioned in Halifax. This was one of the most significant events that happened in the 218 years of history the city of Halifax has enjoyed. Its role has been immeasurable in many respects, Mr. Chairman. On March 1, 1928, we added more ships, the Champlain and the Vancouver which were to replace the old Patriot and the Patrician. On February 27, 1939, we lost H.M.C.S. Thiepval in Barkley Sound, British Columbia. On May 22, 1931, H.M.C.S. Saguenay was commissioned, followed by H.M.C.S. Skeena. These two ships are very significant in terms of our Canadian navy. These were the first two ships to be commissioned in Canada on the basis of Canadian design, engineering and talent.

On July 1, 1934, Commodore P. W. Nelles became our chief of naval staff, the first Canadian trained officer to receive this appointment. We see here the evolution and development which has taken 57 years to bring about. On July 26, 1936—I was four years old at the time—a royal guard from H.M.C.S. Saguenay paraded at Vimy Ridge for the unveiling of the Canadian memorial by King Edward VIII. This was the first royal guard provided by the R.C.N. for the person of the monarch. These are milestones in our development.

I see one hon. member opposite paying some attention and that is the chairman of the defence committee who must be very familiar with these facts. He must indeed feel some sadness in his heart today at what is taking place. I am not old fashioned. I am in favour of progress. These things all happened long before I became an adult. However, I am very proud of them.

• (4:00 p.m.)

On May 31, 1939, King George VI presented his colour to the R.C.N. in Beacon Hill Park, Victoria, B.C. The hon. member is probably familiar with that and in all likelihood was present. Perhaps I should repeat it for him. On May 31, 1939, King George VI presented his colour to the R.C.N. in Beacon Hill Park, Victoria, B.C. We started the building of our fleet and the Fraser and St. Laurent sailed in those early months before the war. On September 1 the R.C.N., the R.C.N.R. and the R.C.N.V.R. were placed on active service. On September 10 Canada entered the war by declaring war against Germany. On September 16 convoy HX-1 sailed from Halifax to the United Kingdom; the local escort were H.M.C.S. St. Laurent and Saguenay. Again we have these two very famous names of ships that made a very great contribution to the war effort. On December 10 the first Canadian troop convoy sailed for Britain, escorted out of Halifax by H.M.C.S. Ottawa, Restigouche, Fraser and St. Laurent. These are the things we are throwing away, that we are casually brushing aside because they are not right for the next 50 years.

On May 24, 1940 H.M.C.S. St. Laurent, Restigouche and Skeena sailed to reinforce the naval defences of the British Isles in repayment, in part, of our great debt to the past that some people would like to brush aside casually.

There are a lot of significant dates in 1940, such as June 25 and July 31 These are dates which remain in the memories of a lot of people, and they are not ashamed of that fact. On September 24 of that year the Annapolis, Columbia, Niagara, St. Clair, St. Croix and St. Francis ex--U.S.N. destroyers which were part of the 50 or 60 given to the British naval strength at that time, were taken over, if I remember correctly, by the British and handed over in turn to the Canadian authorities to man.

On October 22, H.M.C.S. Margaree was lost in collision with the Port Fairy in the north Atlantic. On October 25 H.M.C.S. Bras D'or foundered in the St. Lawrence. On December 4 the Prince Henry was commissioned as an armed merchant cruiser, followed by the Prince David on December 28, again extending our capability to contribute to the defence of the free world.

On March 25, 1941 the Otter burned and sank in the approaches to Halifax harbour.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

On May 25 the first Canadian corvettes arrived in St. John's to establish the Newfoundland escort force. On June 14, three weeks later, the first group of ships of this Newfoundland escort force sailed to protect a convoy of merchant ships along that treacherous trek from Halifax and St. John's to the United Kingdom and up to Murmansk.

The war is full of records of glorious dates. Those who want to brush them aside casually are the less enriched for it. It is records such as these that build some spirit of Canadianism. Certainly the loss of them is not going to build that spirit. We should be able to look back with pride at a distinguishable force, an identifiable element of our armed forces. Men should be able to say that they joined a particular force, that this is their heritage, that it is what they are interested in. This, Mr. Chairman, is what we are throwing away. It is what we are being chided about. What is wrong with having some feeling of deep seated pride in our history?

I could go on for an hour reciting dates such as these. If we keep on as we are we will not have enough ships left to constitute a Royal Canadian Navy even if the government wanted to retain that force.

I have one or two other remarks to make on this particular clause before it passes. I understand that the amendment has now been withdrawn so I will be brief. My remarks have essentially to do with the point made earlier, by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, at which time he likened what is happening here to clause 2 and to the intent and content of clause 6, namely the compulsory aspect of this bill.

I am sure that the decision to do this is the minister's alone and nobody else's. No recourse has been had to any of the arguments that we advanced, either in committee or in this chamber during the last 12 or 14 months. Indeed at times it has been so frustrating that we wondered whether there was any point in continuing to ask questions, because in most instances it was extremely difficult to get straightforward and clear-cut answers.

In this connection I would remind the minister that compulsory action of this sort will not result in any meaningful implementation of his plans or this bill. The men will accept it because it is compulsory and they are loyal. Every officer and serving man is loyal first of all to Canada. But they have had no part in this whatever. Their best advice has been brushed aside. It may have been considered but we have not been told it has been duly considered, even though we have inquired. The minister has simply gone ahead arbitrarily and said that this will be their new role, their new look. I suggest to the minister that what he will wind up with is a lot of men and officers who will work from nine till five or from eight till four and then return home and do some gardening.

In the old days a job was a job and a task was a task, and they were performed by men who had some pride in what they were doing. One day next week those days will disappear. There will be a quiet transition. But in the implementation of the regulations and in the meaningful day by day detail that is implied in this bill, the minister and those responsible for the furtherance of this measure will find a lot of disinterest on the part of the middle ranking officers and men. He will find a lot of nine to five men who will return home at the end of the working day and forget about their work until the following day.

I suggest to the minister that there is an opportunity for him here. We should not have to ask him to withdraw a clause such as this. We should not have to ask him to relax the compulsory aspects of this measure at all. The minister should see the dangers of such a provision. I am sorry that the amendment will not be introduced, because I would have supported it vigorously.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I had undertaken to move an amendment to clause 5, which seeks to abolish the word "Royal" from "Royal Canadian Navy" and "Royal Canadian Air Force." The three forces, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force are to become known as the Canadian Forces. The point is that as my amendment was not procedurally sound, I beg leave to withdraw it. I shall be content to vote against the clause at the appropriate time.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make on this clause. Having served in the Royal Canadian Navy for over four years and being still in the reserve ranks, I feel on this unhappy occasion that a few remarks might be in order.

It has been said that a nation with no past has no future. The real meaning of that expression is that a nation does not live by bread and resources alone, but that it builds its history on its traditions, and the events which have taken place to build it. To forget all these traditions and events is to forget that we have a country.

The government has done a quite commendable job through its parks branch in commemorating historical events, and with the centennial celebrations. For that reason I am puzzled why there is this attempt to remove some of our background and traditions, and particularly those of our armed services. It is particularly necessary for the armed services to have traditions. Traditions are not tangible; yet they build something known as morale, which the psychologists have a difficult time explaining. Without morale—and I expect the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) knows what I mean—you can have all the ships, aircraft and tanks in the world and they will not be worth their metal. If the people in the forces have no will to fight or have no fighting spirit, they may as well have no weapons.

Factors other than tradition contribute to fighting morale, of course; but one of the most important factors in building morale is tradition. That is why the services emphasize the background of a regiment, or of a ship particularly if the ship has been in service for some time. The navy is proud of naval traditions and naval battles; and the same applies to the air force. Psychologists tell us that people joining a service associate themselves with the traditions of their service. Those traditions are not to be let down. That is why one of the most important elements of fighting spirit is morale.

I hope the minister and some of his bright eyed, bushy tailed flannel suited computer experts remember my words. The minister may acquire fine equipment; he may obtain his answers from computers, but he will not have a fighting service that is fit even for peace keeping operations for the United Nations. I hope he bears that in mind.

Does the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) wish to ask a question?

Mr. Groos: No thank you.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am always interested in the hon. member's remarks.

Removing the word "Royal" from "Royal Canadian Navy" and "Royal Canadian Air Force" will not save the taxpayers any money. That will not accomplish anything except to destroy the morale that is necessary for any fighting force. One wonders why the minister and his colleagues are so dead set on abolishing the word "Royal". It has been suggested by other members that this is part of the government's plan to destroy Anglo-Saxon traditions. I do not know whether that suggestion is correct, but it looks as if it may be. I hope it is not, but future events will show whether it is or whether it is not.

In conclusion may I say this: The Royal Canadian Navy has had a long and great tradition. The hon. member for Halifax dealt with it and I will not repeat what he said. For some of us in this house who see the navy being obliterated this is a sad moment. I never thought, during the years I served in that force, that I should see the day when this parliament would destroy it, wiping out its traditions and record. I am sorry to have to be here at this time, and I can only hope that the future may bring some changes.

Mr. Winch: My remarks on clause 5 will be brief. I spoke on this clause during the debate on second reading, in the defence committee hearings, and subsequently when the bill was referred back to the committee of the whole house. Because of the implications contained in clause 5 I find it necessary to emphasize something to which the minister has not paid proper attention.

Let me say at the outset that I have no objection basically, after planning, testing and readjustment, to integration culminating, in unification of the three services. If we do amalgamate our three services into a single service, surely no one will argue that in that single service we shall not have an army, a navy and an air force. I cannot conceive of any form of Canadian armed service not containing an army, a navy and an air force.

• (4:20 p.m.)

With integration going forward toward a single service, can the minister explain to me why, without destroying the single service concept, it is not possible to retain the Royal Canadian Navy as a unit of the single service, the Royal Canadian Air Force as a unit or element of the single service, and the Army as a unit or element of the single service? I have used those terms "unit" and "element" because they appear in clause 5.

To my way of thinking, preservation of the names "Royal Canadian Navy", "Royal Canadian Air Force" and "Army" would in no way prevent a reasonable minister arriving at an efficient realization of the principle of integration or its culmination in a single service. It would not even interfere with his computers.

Because the maintenance of a name means so much and because the traditions and the honours and victories mean so much, why is it necessary to be so adamant in saying that the name will have to go. It does not make sense. It certainly is not common sense for a minister who wishes to get so complex and far-reaching a bill as this through the House of Commons.

I have been a member of the defence committee ever since it was established. As far as possible I have attended every meeting of that committee. I think it would be reasonable, just and commendable for the minister of defence to consider the principle which I am trying to espouse and expand. You can have your principle of a single service—but without wiping out and destroying that which means so much to thousands of our people who have served and who are serving in the navy, in the air force and in the army.

If the minister can assure me that the meaning of the words in the third line of the first subclause of clause 5, namely, "are embodied in the Canadian Forces" is that we can have, as units or elements, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Army, I shall vote for clause 5. But if I do not receive this assurance I shall have no hesitation about voting against clause 5 as it is now.

Mr. McIntosh: I hope the minister will pay some heed to the plea just made by the hon. member for Vancouver East. However, I doubt very much whether notice will be taken of any plea made by a member of the opposition. This was clearly demonstrated a few minutes ago when we asked for the deletion of a certain word, "indefinite", which the judge advocate general said was inconsequential and without great importance. The plea made by the hon. member will almost certainly fall upon deaf ears. Indeed I doubt very much whether the minister even heard it.

We in the opposition refer to clause 5 as the compulsory transfer clause. When members of the present armed forces joined that force, they joined either the navy, the army or the air force. That was the agreement they made. The hon. member for Queens has referred to the contract entered into by members of the present forces. They joined a particular service. By a stroke of the pen this government intends to wipe out that service. I am not a lawyer so I am not prepared to say whether this clause is ultra vires. The passing of the bill will mean that those who have entered into a contract to serve in the army, the navy or the air force are now compelled to serve in the Canadian Forces. This is in any case a change in terminology, but it may also be a change of a much more substantial kind.

We suggest that the minister should consider the feelings of those who do not wish to continue to serve as members of a Canadian armed force. The contract into which they entered has been terminated by the abolition of the three services: There is no contract in existence. I do not object to those now in the services volunteering to enter the new force, but I plead on behalf of those who feel they will no longer be able to serve Canada as army, naval or air force men.

I should like to place on record some of the questions which were asked on this subject by a member of the defence committee and the replies given to him, because I am sure this evidence will strengthen the point I am making. The judge advocate general is the witness being questioned, and I am quoting from pages 2082 and 2083 of Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, No. 32.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): If I, as a serviceman in any one of the three services decided, when this act was about to come into force, that I would dispute the legality of it, under what law could I be proven guilty?

Mr. Lawson: Well, I suppose you would desert and you would be tried as a deserter.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A deserter from what?

Mr. Lawson: From the Canadian forces.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On what basis would I be considered a deserter, if I had signed to serve in, say, the army?

Mr. Lawson: Because parliament has said—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The army no longer exists, according to the law. How can I desert something that has been wiped out?

Mr. Lawson: But parliament has said that you are now a member of the new force; so as a member of the new force you are a deserter.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): But I have not said that, and my attestation papers do not show it. How can the law actually pin me down as having deserted something that parliament has wiped out?

Mr. Lawson: But parliament has provided that you are to be a member of the new force; and therefore—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Arbitrarily?

Mr. Lawson: You continue serving the term of service that you have agreed to serve.

I wish to point out that the term these men agreed to serve was not a term in the Canadian Forces but in the army, the navy or the air force. Yet by a stroke of the pen clause 5 (1) declares:

The services known before the coming into force of this part as the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force, are embodied in the Canadian Forces.

• (4:30 p.m.)

The three services are wiped out. The contracts made by the members of the present forces were contracts to join one particular arm of the services. Therefore I say there is a cancellation of those contracts, and those who do not want to stay in the forces should be given some consideration, whether by being pensioned off or by the provision of some settlement, plus honourable discharge.

The question went on further:

With the specific force, the army? I have signed my attestation papers. I have joined the army. The army is wiped out under the bill. What legal method can the government adopt to prosecute me for deserting something that they have done away with?

The answer was:

The law is there. Parliament has enacted the law. Parliament has said that this is the law and you are bound by that law.

Then there was another question:

Yes; but my question is: how are they going to apply that law? This is the essence of the whole question. How are they going to apply the law to something that is no longer in existence?

The answer was:

Simply by the fact that if you leave you are a deserter. You can be charged with desertion and tried for desertion. You can raise the issue at your trial.

Another question was asked:

How could he be charged with desertion of something that he has not joined?

The answer was:

Because parliament has said he is in it.

I am not too sure parliament can say he is in it. This is a case that should be tried by the courts of our land, to see if we have the power to pass this particular clause of the bill breaking a contract unilaterally. In view of what has transpired previously, all this is very odd to me.

We were talking about regulations that were going to be introduced after the bill had passed. The judge advocate general told the committee he had formulated some regulations, or suggested some regulations to the minister. I would like to read a portion of them because I do not believe they coincide with his remarks about joining the new service. These two paragraphs of the suggested regulations are very interesting:

No officer or man who immediately prior to the coming into force of Part I of the Canadian Forces Reorganization Act was enrolled in, or had been transferred to, the Royal Canadian Navy shall without his consent be required to serve as a member of the crew of an aircraft or in a land force;

How can the judge advocate general say he will not be required to serve as a member of a crew of an aircraft or in a land force when he has just said he is going to be required to join the Canadian Armed Forces whether he likes it or not? There is nothing in this bill that says he will not have to serve as a member of an air crew or in a land force. In fact there is nothing in the bill to say an airman will not have to serve in a submarine, if the minister desires that he serve in it. That is why we say that this is compulsory transfer.

Another suggested regulation is:

No officer or man who immediately prior to the coming into force of Part I of the Canadian Forces Reorganization Act was enrolled in, or had been transferred to, the Canadian Army shall without his consent be required to serve as a member of a crew; and no officer or man who immediately prior to the coming into force of Part I of the Canadian Forces Reorganization Act was enrolled in, or had been transferred to, the Royal Canadian Air Force shall without his consent be required to serve as a member of the crew of a ship or in a land force.

There is something funny here. They say that without his consent he will not be required to do certain things in the new service. However, they make it abundantly clear that regardless of what force he is in at present, he is going to be compelled to join the Canadian Armed Forces. That is why we say this is a compulsory transfer. We say this is the first step in conscription, the first step to compulsory service in Canada. I am not disputing whether that is good or bad, but if this is what it actually means then the minister should get up and tell Canadians that this is conscription. In that event I would be pleased to note the number of those members from Quebec who will get up and vote for this clause because I am quite sure their opponents in the next election will use it against them. We know the history of conscription so far as the province of Quebec is concerned.

I was very glad to see my colleague get up a few minutes ago and voice his opinion about the French matter. I say that certainly we believe you people of French stock are entitled to certain preferences under the B.N.A. Act, and I do not think we have objected too strenuously to your demands. But once you start stepping on the toes of other ethnic groups in this country then you are asking for trouble, and if it does come don't forget that you asked for it.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. Groos: Mr. Chairman, I heard a few remarks recently to the effect that somehow or other this bill has a sort of Anglo-Saxon bias. That is what prompts me to interject just a few words at this time because I just cannot understand that. In such reading of history as I have been able to do I have never noticed that the Anglo-Saxon race has ever been noted for its slowness or its reluctance to build on its past experience. After all, that is how the British nation achieved most of the greatness for Britain that we all admire today. They are the ones who gave meaning to the words "growing tradition."

I would like to point out to hon. members opposite that surely this is what we ourselves are trying to do with this bill. With it we are trying to build on past experience something new and something good for Canada. I am positive, just as positive as I am standing here in this chamber, that regardless of the gloomy forecasts which are coming from the officials opposition, the Royal Canadian Navy tradition, the Canadian Army tradition and the Royal Canadian Air Force tradition will live on, and on, and on in the traditions and the ways of the new Canadian Armed Forces.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I would like to be able to agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat. With all sincerity, without any bigotry or bias with regard to any racial group of people in any part of this country, I wish to say that over the last few years I have witnessed a series of events eroding much of what we have been proud of in our history. It is most unfortunate that during our centennial year celebration some departments of government are trying their best to celebrate appropriately the centennial of our confederation with attempts to make us, as Canadians, more conscious of our history, while at the same time other departments are whittling away at our traditions, good traditions, honourable traditions, traditions which most Canadians hold dear.

There may be other millions of Canadians who object to these traditions on some grounds which in my estimation are not valid. If they do object, they should state their reasons. Parliament should be a place where men reason together and not a place where, because they happen to have a voting majority, they force their particular biases and their particular desires down the throats of all Canadians who do not happen to hold their point of view. Democracy, in my judgment, is a more subtle thing than the exercise of voting power. If a democracy is to work properly, surely there should be regard for the traditions, the feelings and the points of view of all segments which together make up a country, if that country is to hold together at all.

There are millions of people in this country—I know there are a great many in my constituency and I am sure there are many others like them—who feel so keenly about this erosion of things which they hold dear, that their ability to make the contribution they would like to make toward a united Canada is lessened. I believe this fact is very sad, especially if what is taking place is unnecessary. In much of what is being done here I see actions which appear to be based completely on prejudice. I think it is most unfortunate, because I believe prejudice is unnecessary and need not exist.

I have the highest respect for Canadians of all racial backgrounds, but the fact that they come from different racial backgrounds or from different parts of the country does not give them the right to force me to submerge any recognition I may have of my origin, or the traditions which I hold dear. This does not give them that right any more than it gives them the right to wipe out my religious thoughts.

In this connection I should like to quote briefly from Edmund Burke:

> A nation is not an idea only of local extent and individual momentary aggregation, but it is an idea of continuity which extends in time as well as in numbers and in space.
> People will not look forward to posterity, who never look backward to their ancestors.

In this particular clause we are whittling away at one of our traditions. I do not care what the minister thinks about "Royal" or whether the majority in this house think this word should be eliminated from the names of our services. If they think it should be removed, they at least should have the courtesy and the tolerance to realize there are millions of Canadians and, although I have no way of knowing what the percentage is, I believe there are many thousands of Canadians in the services, who are proud of this tradition.

The traditional appellation "Royal" was not given lightly to military units. It is something special. It is given in recognition of duties performed and standards achieved. The Royal Canadian Air Force was not always the Royal Canadian Air Force. It received this part of its appellation by achievement. Even if I were one who approved of this unification, which I am not, I see no reason that in the process, by the back door, the government should take this opportunity to wipe out the designation "Royal" from all of our armed services. This has nothing to do with the efficiency of engines or the kind of electronic equipment which might be used; that is obvious.

I should like to ask the government to come clean, to put their cards on the table, and tell us what they are up to. What is the purpose? Do they think these traditions are divisive and bad because they happen to be associated with one ethnic group in this country, namely the Anglo-Saxons? Is that the reason? I do not agree with that reason. I do not think we should allow our traditions to be eroded or destroyed, regardless of their origin.

I am of Scottish origin. My ancestors fought against the constitutional authority of Britain almost as recently as the French Canadians did. I might say that for their pains they were treated much less kindly than were the ancestors of French Canadians. That, however, is aside from the point. I do not believe we should fall into the trap of judging conditions in the 20th century by the codes or ethics which existed in the 18th century. This of course is a means to stir up prejudices in the minds of those who either do not understand, or would stoop to compare the two situations. They are not comparable. I do plead with my colleagues who represent other parts of Canada to have regard for these things.

Mr. Churchill: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): These things are held dear. What I am about to say, I say without any political implications, without any attempt to cast reflection on the government or anything of that sort; and although I am speaking only for myself, I know there are others in my constituency who feel the same way. I confess that in the last four years I have considered very seriously moving from Canada and becoming a citizen of another country because I believe, if this trend should continue, that this would be the best course to take, although a difficult one, in the best interests of my children and my children's children.

This is an indication of how deeply some of us feel about the things I have been speaking of. I am not surprised that people who come from other parts of the country and from other backgrounds perhaps do not appreciate this. All I ask that you do is look into it. I do not care what methods you employ in looking into it so long as you do it objectively. I would like some of the hon. members who this afternoon, sneered at some on this side of the house who spoke from the heart, although perhaps a little heatedly, to go down to our constituencies, mix with the people there, and find out what these people think. Let them do that, before they come to the conclusion that because of some magic, since they happened to get elected with a minority government, in some way this gives them a divine power to be dictators for the next four years or for the life of this parliament.

Democracy, in its proper sense, is not that sort of thing. Democracy is the temporary placing in the hands of those who acquire the confidence of the Canadian people the responsibility of carrying on government for a limited period of time, not just in the interest of those who support them but in the interest of all Canadians, paying proper attention, in proper balance, to the rights and aspirations of all Canadians. A dictatorship of a majority as Burke said—and I do not quote him verbatim—is no more righteous than a dictatorship of princes.

I would commend to hon. members that they read citation 18 on page 16 of Beauchesne's fourth edition of parliamentary rules and forms and citation 67 commencing on page 54. I think they are both particularly applicable to this situation. I shall quote only part of citation 67:

> A minority party may question ministers, may criticize but cannot control in the ordinary case a government with a reasonably large majority. There can be no control of the executive where the supporters in parliament are prepared without question to obey the leaders of their party—through the whips. All that the minority party—the opposition—can do without support from members of the majority party is to question, inquire and criticize, but whilst this does not amount to control it is an important method of checking abuses of power.
> With the support of a majority of members it would be possible for a cabinet to suspend the sitting of parliament, have the minority members arrested, withdraw the safeguards of liberty such as habeas corpus and freedom of speech, and to establish virtually a dictatorship.

The point is that in our system of government there is no magic power that protects the electorate against the folly of a government if they wish to indulge in such folly. care must be taken by the electorate when they do the electing, because once they elect a majority in parliament, that majority is all-powerful until the next election.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

The only thing that keeps our democracy alive is the intangible sense of decency, honour and respect for the rights of others and a sense of tolerance among those people who form the majority. This is why I have objected most strenuously to this bill. I have done it, not with any thought of political advantage. I feel aggrieved when we are accused by the minister of holding up the passage of this bill, when he himself has refused to pay any attention to the representations that have been made with the deepest sincerity by hon. members in this and other sections of the house. The minister has brushed aside the advice of loyal, conscientious Canadians who happen to be serving officers and who have given their lives to a military career and the service of their country.

I think that when the minister accuses us of holding up this legislation and messing up the program of the government, he is akin to Kaiser Wilhelm accusing the Belgians of being perverse because they loused up his program to be in Paris before Christmas of 1914. When it is a question of what you believe to be right, objectively defended, you must let the chips fall where they may. It is under those terms that I have taken part in this debate.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes left to me I should like to make a few remarks concerning the advantage or disadvantage of abolishing the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the R.C.A.F. If the government and the Minister of National Defence had decided that the present army, air force and naval services and units, particularly the traditional and long standing units, were to be wiped out and completely abolished, I would have thought it would have been suggested that new units should be established to take their place.

Competition is involved in this question. Hon. members have spoken about morale in the services. This involves the question of competition, not only in the military area but in every facet of the life of man. The spice of life is competition, to be just a little better than someone else. That is the reason for living of most people. If you take this competition away from the armed services, if you take away their right to compete in military as well as non-military activities, I think you take away the life and soul of the armed services. Nothing is being substituted for the units that are now in existence. We are going to have a faceless, grey—or green—group of people serving Canada, without any incentive to do a good job for this country on behalf of their particular unit.

Mr. Chairman, I see it is five o'clock. I presume you will want to rise so that we may proceed to private members hour.

The Chairman: I think that under the terms of the standing order there will be no private members hour today. I would invite the hon. member to continue.

Mr. Aiken: As I read the rules, Mr. Chairman, it is fairly clear that there is no provision for the suspension of private members hour. If I may at this point, I should like to state my reason for suggesting that the Chairman should rise and report progress. Standing order 15A sets out the procedures to be followed during a debate on allocation of time. Paragraphs 7, 8 and 9 of that standing order indicate a special concern for the one-day allocation of time on third reading of a bill, but no special treatment for second reading of a bill, or committee stage, which we are now in.

I should like to point out particularly that the provision for one day on third reading has been given special consideration in section 7. The one day is allotted for third reading on three or four conditions. It states:

> No motion made by a minister under sections (5) and (6) of this standing order shall provide for the allocation of a period of time less than two days for the second reading, two days for the committee stage, and one day for the third reading of any bill.

The specific provisions for third reading provide that it shall be called as the first item of business under government orders on a Monday, Tuesday, Thursday of Friday. Presumably that is so we will not have a short day such as Wednesday. It also provides that third reading shall have precedence over all other business on one of those days until the normal hour of adjournment.

Section 9 of this standing order provides that Mr. Speaker shall have the authority to extend the one day for third reading for four hours. Here again the rule obviously expresses some concern about the final day for the debate under the time allocation. It gives Mr. Speaker the opportunity to extend the time, if necessary. For the purposes of such an extension it would be necessary on a Friday, such as today, to carry the debate on third reading through until six o'clock because of the one hour notice requirement. However, that is not the situation today. We are now at the committee stage. There may be some ambiguity in respect of section 7, although I do not see any. This section specifically states in the sixth line, "for the third reading of the bill".

The section then makes specific provision for the one day debate on third reading. In the present circumstances I would say that the words "it shall have precedence over all other business until the time of adjournment on that day" has reference to third reading. If there is any doubt in this regard let me remind hon. members that the private members hour is considered somewhat sacrosanct. It has never been set aside unless provided for by a specific rule. I do not think I need enlarge on that point, or stress it.

We as members have been very jealous of our private members hour. Under some provisions that hour can be set aside. Standing order 16 makes such a provision, but excepts debates for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, or for a debate on allocation of time. In that regard private members hour cannot be suspended. The reference there to the allocation of time has nothing to do with this debate, but a debate such as we had yesterday. I thought we were a little bit off base yesterday in having a private members hour.

In any event there are provisions such as those contained in standing order 15 (4) and (5) which provide for the suspension of private members hour under certain conditions. Standing order 38 (2) provides that the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne shall have precedence over private members hour. There is nothing in any standing order which says that private members hour shall be suspended without specific provision for such suspension. I submit there is no provision for the suspension of private members hour at this stage of the debate. For that reason I think you, Mr. Chairman, should rise and report progress, if you believe there has been any, allowing Mr. Speaker to assume the chair during the private members hour.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, there is a very important point which concerns us here in this regard. I was a little surprised that we did not immediately proceed to consideration of private members' business. I am not aware of any circumstances which would allow the government to encroach upon private members' time without a formal rule, or without a motion to suspend private members hours.

Sometimes this is done by agreement. Standing order 15 (3) specifically sets out the order of business for Friday. There is provision there that the hour from five to six o'clock shall be private members hour for the consideration of private bills and public bills.

Nothing has transpired in this house to indicate that private members hour shall be suspended, or that private members shall be deprived of their time.

Quite frequently during this session the government has made a request to abrogate the private members right in respect of this hour. Quite frequently that request has been granted. On several occasions I have protested because I think private members are being careless in the protection of their rights. I am afraid that if they yield too frequently the government will take over this time for the consideration of government business.

The order paper indicates there are 175 public bills standing in the names of private members. Some of those bills have not been reached during this lengthy session while others have been up for discussion and adjourned. Very frequently we talk about obtaining decisions in respect of these bills. If private members hour is to be discontinued in order to consider government business there will be an infringement on the rights of private members. This will prevent a decision in respect of important bills, important not only to the members who introduced them, but also to the country.

As pointed out very clearly by the hon. member who has just spoken, the order under which we have been operating up to five o'clock says nothing specifically about suspending private members hour. I doubt very much if any government would take away private members time without consent, in the one instance, or without specifically mentioning that fact in a motion. I know that from time to time when we have reached a point within days or weeks of concluding a session, we have had motions put forward to the effect that private members hours will be eliminated in order that government business may be considered. This, however, is done clearly and openly and the motion is subject to debate and vote.

In this particular instance, working under this new rule which the government devised, there is nothing to indicate that private members hour would be eliminated on any day. If the government had intended to eliminate private members hour when we were in this closure operation, that would have been so specified. It is not so specified here. The other point that was made by the hon. member who preceded me was that in the section which has been quoted, except for the first sentence, it applies to third reading proceedings. I do not see there that private members business is struck out. Perhaps this is the result of careless drafting, but in all other sections of this order, such as subsection 6, there is an indication that Mr. Speaker shall, at fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business, interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put the question.

I would think, by inference, that what is intended is that this is government time that is being used for this special purpose and not private members time. I am sure that the government never intended to encroach so seriously on private members hour. I do not want to encroach any longer on private members hour. I am here to defend the rights of private members. I hope that you will find it in your power, Mr. Chairman, to rule that we should now proceed immediately to private members business, which will be public bills.

Mr. Winch: I rise, Mr. Chairman, strictly in search of information. I find myself completely stumped. It is my understanding that under a decision which was reached by a majority vote in the House of Commons, for every five minutes we lose in a procedural discussion we are losing five minutes of the time permitted for discussion of the 65 clauses of a most important bill. We have already lost sixteen minutes of time allotted for the discussion of this bill. May I ask whether it would not be possible to proceed so that we spend time on this bill and not lose a second, because we require every second—I think this is the position of the Conservatives—so that we might discuss the 65 clauses.

Mr. Olson: I believe, Mr. Chairman, you will have to look at standing order 15A, paragraph 7. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka has already drawn this to your attention. There is a sentence which commences:

> Such an order having been called on any Monday, Tuesday, Thursday or Friday, it shall have precedence over all other business until the time of adjournment on that day, unless it is disposed of earlier.

I think what you will have to do, Mr. Chairman, is decide whether that sentence relates to the first or last part of paragraph 7. I suggest to you that it relates only to the second part because it says, "such an order". Prior to that only place the word "order" is used is the following:

> For the purposes of this section, third reading shall be deemed to have been considered for one day provided the order for third reading is called—

I believe, Mr. Chairman, this is the place to which that word is related. I have to agree therefore with the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and, infrequently but at least on this occasion, with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, when they suggest there is no provision here for dispensing with private members hour. I have to agree also with them when they point out that the motion moved by the Minister of Transport, as reported at page 15119 of Hansard for April 20, makes no provision for dispensing with private members hour. Of course, private members hour would be suspended anyway if we were on third reading, where the order is given as has been pointed out. I suggest therefore there is no provision in standing order 15A to dispense with private members hour on any day except the day third reading is being considered, which we presume will be next Tuesday.

The Chairman: I should like to point out to hon. members who have taken part in the discussion of this point of order that the Chairman is confused, too. On January 21, 1964, when these provisional standing orders were agreed to, standing order 15A was included. I do not believe members of the committee will be surprised if I say that some days ago, when there was some inclination that standing order 15A would be invoked, the Chair spent considerable time studying 15A and its subclauses to decide exactly what was meant in different situations.

Standing order 16, which deals with private members business, in my view is the standing order which governs the ordinary practice with regard to private members business. I suggest to the committee that at the moment we are under a special order. I must admit that I cannot quite agree with the interpretation given to paragraph 7 of standing order 15A by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre or the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

I read paragraph 7 in this way:

> No motion made by a minister under sections (5) and (6) of this standing order shall provide for the allocation of a period of time less than two days from the second reading, two days for the committee stage, and one day for the third reading of any bill.

Since second reading has been disposed of, that part of the rule does not apply. I continue:

> For the purposes of this section, third reading shall be deemed to have been considered for one day provided the order for third reading is called as the first item under government orders on a Monday, Tuesday, Thursday or Friday, and provided it is continued, if necessary, until the normal time of adjournment on any such day.

Now I come to the phrase "such order". I think it is the duty of the Chair to interpret what this phrase "such order" means. It is the contention of the Chair that this phrase "such order" applies to the first part of paragraph 7 and not the second part, which refers to third reading. If this were not so, then I do not know how you would interpret the last sentence in this paragraph which reads:

> Under any other circumstances, a total of five hours shall be deemed to be the eqiuvalent of one sitting day.

It is my view that the phrase "such order" applies to the whole operation of this particular order under which we are operating and would indeed apply to second reading, to the committee of the whole stage as well as to third reading. I suggest the order having been called on a Monday, Tuesday, Thursday or Friday, it would have precedence over all other business until the time of adjournment of that day, unless disposed of earlier. I say again to members of the committee, there is a great deal of confusion in the mind of the chairman, so I quite understand the possibility of there being some misunderstanding on the part of hon. members.

However, it is the duty of the Chair to make a ruling in this matter, and my ruling will have to be that this particular part of paragraph 7 applies to the operation of standing order 15A in the committee of the whole stage. It is therefore my view that private members hour for today will be suspended.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might ask your indulgence to rule also on standing order 16, which provides that the proceedings on private members business shall not be suspended by virtue of the operation of provisions of standing orders relating to the allocation of time to certain debates.

In the first instance I accepted the fact that this probably referred to the debate we had yesterday on allocation of time; but there again standing order 16 says that the proceedings on private members business shall not be suspended in relation to the allocation of time to certain debates. I raise this as a second point and I think we might have the advantage of your ruling at the same time on another matter that is equally difficult.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The Chairman: I recognize the validity of the argument that the hon. member presents. I am sure that he too will recognize the difficult position in which the Chair happens to find itself. Standing order 16 applies to the general operations of the house and standing order 15A applies to a special case. My problem is to give the proper weight either to the provisions of standing order 16 or to the provisions of paragraph 7 of standing order 15A.

There is a conflict here; I do not think there is any doubt about that. I have recognized this conflict for three or four days now, but I have to make up my mind where I should place the weight. I place the weight on standing order 15A, paragraph 7, and it is my opinion that at this time I would have to decide that this standing order does suspend private members hour. I believe the debate on the committee stage of Bill No. C-243 should continue at this time.

Mr. Churchill: Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, because of the seriousness of this question and the apparent infringement, to my mind, on private members time, it is with regret that I will have to appeal your ruling.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

Mr. Speaker, the question is an appeal from a decision of the chairman of the committee of the whole. In the committee of the whole the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka raised a point of order to the effect that the hour for the consideration of private members' business must be proceeded with at 5 o'clock.

Using section 7 of standing order 15A, after having given due consideration to the conflict between the provisions in this section and those in standing order 16, the Chairman ruled that the committee of the whole on Bill C-243 should continue, whereupon the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre pursuant to standing order 59 (4) appealed to Mr. Speaker from the decision of the Chairman.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I make no apology for raising the point of order, despite the comment I hear from hon. members on the other side and to my left. We operate under rules, and when there is a conflict between rules we are entitled to raise the matter. I thought we were wrong yesterday; I was doubtful when debating the allocation of time motion, in view of the provisions of standing order 16, whether our procedure in going on with the private members hour yesterday was correct.

Today a similar question arose, but today it was felt that we should not go on with private members hour.

Briefly, it seems that there is a conflict between provisional standing order 15A and provisional standing order 16. In considering the point, the Chairman acknowledged that really there are two conflicts one being within provisional standing order 15A(7).

To clarify the matter perhaps I ought to say this. Sections 7, 8 and 9 of standing order 15A refer specifically to the third day of debate after an allocation of time has been made. That is, they refer to the day of the third reading. I emphasize that third reading is particularly dealt with in those three sections.

Section 7 makes specific statements. First, that the order for third reading shall only be called on a Monday, Tuesday, Thursday or Friday; second, that the order must be the first item of business; third, that the debate shall continue until the normal time of adjournment, and fourth, that such an order shall have precedence over all other items of business. The point at issue within section 7 arises from the words beginning at the seventh line from the bottom, which are:

Such an order having been called on any Monday, Tuesday, Thursday or Friday—

I submit it is clear that those words refer to an order for third reading, because third reading is dealt with after the first sentence of the standing order. I submit that everything appearing after the first seven lines, which constitute the first sentence, refers only to third reading. This contention is strengthened because closer to the beginning of the section we find that the language says that third reading shall be called as the first item of business on a Monday, Tuesday, Thursday or Friday, and farther on in that section the words are, "Such an order having been called on any Monday, Tuesday, Thursday or Friday," and so on.

Section 9 of the standing order says that Mr. Speaker shall have the authority to extend the sitting of the final day of debate for four hours. I presume that that is to make certain that the last day is as full and as complete as possible. There is no argument about any reference to the third day. Also it is clear that we are now in the committee stage, and this brings up another point. The second point, or putting it more correctly, the second difficulty on which the Chairman ruled had to do with standing order 16 which says that private members' business shall continue. Quoting the relevant parts of standing order 16 we find these words:

> The proceedings on private members' business, . . . shall not be suspended by virtue of the operation of the provisions of standing orders relating to the adjournment of the house . . .
> or to the allocation of time to certain debates.

It is quite possible that that wording refers to the allocation of time to certain debates, or to the discussion about that allocation of time. That wording may also refer, and probably does refer, to all debates taking place during the allocation of time, and herein arises the uncertainty.

My final point is this. It is clear, I submit, that the private members hour should not be interrupted or dispensed with unless there are specific provisions to that effect in the standing orders. Nothing in the standing orders says that the private members hour under these circumstances shall be dispensed with, and there was nothing in the order of the house allocating time which said that the private members hour should be dispensed with. Under those circumstances we ought to proceed with private members' business.

I am not raising my argument to delay the house. Should Your Honour decide that private members' business is not to be proceeded with, I shall continue with my remarks that were interrupted at 5 p.m. Surely, however, if we have rules, then we ought to know what the effects of those rules are.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): It would never occur to Your Honour, because of your obvious fairness, that this discussion was designed to delay the debate on the unification bill. Remarks to that effect were made from the government side of the house, and they might leave the wrong impression in Your Honour's mind.

Mr. Hellyer: Do not smile when you say that.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka in his closing remarks has shown that there is here an abrogation of private members' time. The submission made earlier to the Chairman was on that point. The government does not infringe on the time of private members unless specifically by motion or by taking other procedure in accordance with the rules. I recall that in a number of years when we were reaching the end of the session and attempting to conclude the business of the house we found it necessary to eliminate the private members hour. This was always done by a motion to that effect. The ambiguity which is contained in the rule under which we are operating led us to draw this matter to the attention of the Chairman and now to Your Honour's attention.

I have put in a plea earlier for the rights of private members who have frequently given up their time during the course of this session, and who should not be asked to do so again because there are 175 bills in the names of private members set down for the consideration of this house. This constitutes an additional contribution of mine to the very good argument presented by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words and I am afraid that what I say will not be of great assistance to Your Honour. It is obvious that you have a very difficult problem on your hands.

If I can recall our discussions about this rule, rule 15A, when we were adopting it a couple of years ago, the intention was that a day on third reading would be the same as a day on second reading or in committee of the whole house. But I am bound to say, as one reads carefully the exact words of that standing order as we have passed it and of the other standing orders, that the case presented by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) is quite strong.

I will go further and cite another point in their favour. In Votes and Proceedings of Monday, March 20, there appears the second report of the special committee on procedure. One of the recommendations made in that report is that standing order 15(4) be amended. The purpose of amending standing order 15(4) was to put together in one place the instances where the private members hour may be suspended.

The report is interesting to read in the present context and it suggests that even in the committee on procedure we are a bit confused on this point. On page 1552 of Votes and Proceedings for March 20, 1967, we find this recommendation:

> That Standing Order 15(4) be consequentially amended on a provisional basis to read as follows:
> 15(4) On any Monday, Tuesday or Thursday, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of this Standing Order, the consideration of private members' business shall be suspended when an order for resuming the address debate or the budget debate, an order for a motion 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair' for the House to go into committee of supply, or an order to go into committee of the whole on a money resolution, pursuant to standing order 61A, is set down as the first item of government business in any such sitting.

I hope no one will accuse me of revealing what has gone on in the special committee on procedure if I say that in presenting this proposal we were not trying to present anything new; we were merely trying to put in one place the various orders relating to the suspension of the private members hour. I submit that this also is on the side of the position taken by the two members of the Conservative party who have spoken.

The statement made by the chairman of the committee of the whole house to the effect that the phrase about third reading in standing order 15A should be treated parenthetically also carries weight. The phrase at the end of that section, "such an order", does seem capable of being applied to the whole of that section of the standing order. We all sympathized with the chairman when he admitted that he was confused. I do not think he needed to apologize for that. I think the wording of this standing order leaves a good deal to be desired.

There are times when we call upon Your Honour to overrule a ruling made by the chairman of a committee of the whole house. You have demonstrated your impartiality and the chairman has demonstrated his largeness of soul by the fact that on one occasion this did happen and a chairman's decision was overruled. Obviously this should not happen very often. I wonder whether in these circumstances—because, after all, there is not much time left either for a private members hour or for the discussion of the defence bill, —whether it would not be better for Your Honour to rule that the special committee on procedure should redraft the whole of this standing order. It seems to me there is nothing to be gained by ruling either way at this time.

There are arguments on both sides but if one looks at the precise wording before us there is a great deal to be said for the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. In any case I offer the suggestion that Your Honour reserve your decision until the special committee on procedure has had a proper chance to look at this matter more thoroughly.

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): There are just one or two other points which I should like to bring to Your Honour's attention in view of the ruling made by the chairman of committees that private members hour should have preference over all other business until the time of adjournment.

I would refer Your Honour to page 2 of today's Routine Proceedings where the order of business for Friday is stated as follows: oral questions, government orders, questions, public bills and private bills. Today we have already considered questions, oral questions and government orders. So we have already carried on some of the order of business, and it would seem to me that if it is the ruling of the Chair that private members hour should not take precedence, then immediately upon our deliberations beginning this afternoon we should have gone on to the consideration of this particular bill in committee of the whole.

Since we have not done so, it would appear to me we should continue normally in accordance with the provisions of the standing order which is in effect, and consider that we should have proceeded at five o'clock to consideration of private members business.

I would point out, in view of the fact that Your Honour may decide to uphold the ruling of the chairman of committees, that we have already spent five hours on the consideration, according to this, and therefore suggest there is valid reason for not carrying it on into private members hour at five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their helpful comments. I think I should repeat the comments I have made previously when similar circumstances have arisen, that is, when the Speaker has been asked to review a decision reached by the chairman of committees. There is a fundamental difficulty about this in that the chairman of the committee is not only chairman of the committee but is also Deputy Speaker of the house and this, I submit to hon. members, complicates the situation when it comes before the person who occupies my position to review or reconsider a decision reached by the Chairman.

On a previous occasion I have suggested that that particular provisional standing order should be reviewed, and that an appeal or a questioning of the decision by the Chairman of the committee should come to the Speaker, not by way of appeal but perhaps by way of trial de novo, or by way of stated case; certainly not by way of appeal. This having been said, I have looked at the standing order which is the source of our difficulty and I am in full agreement with the suggestion made by the chairman of the committee, wholly supported by all members, that there is a confusion, and ambiguity and uncertainty in the interpretation of the relevant provisional standing order, No. 15A.

The question of course is to determine whether the third sentence of provisional standing order 15A (7) refers to the second sentence or refers to the first one, when we read:

> Such an order having been called on any Monday, Tuesday, Thursday or Friday—

The question is whether the order referred to there is the order on third reading. The main difficulty comes from the obvious conflict between this provisional standing order and standing order 16 which specifies the cases where private members hour may be suspended. Of course standing order 16 refers not at all to this particular circumstance. There is no reference to the case where an item of business is under consideration under a time allocation order.

Having been a member of the special committee of the house reviewing these standing orders a couple of years ago, I am willing to plead guilty, along with other members who were concerned with this review, to perhaps not having gone far enough. I cannot agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that perhaps this was intentional, because certainly if we accept that there would be a suspension of private members' business when we are considering the third reading stage of a bill, then if we are to follow the argument made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), that exception would have been provided in standing order 16; but it was not.

And yet if we were considering the third reading stage of an item of business under a time allocation order, on a day when we have private members' business, I wonder if anyone should argue that we should not suspend the private members hour because it is not specified in standing order 16. Obviously there is a mistake either in the drafting of provisional standing order 15A or in the reconsideration that should have been made of standing order 16.

I have every possible sympathy with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that because of this uncertainty we should leave the matter in a state of suspended animation. There are four minutes left this afternoon and I can say very honestly to hon. members that if I were to make a ruling, in view of the uncertainty of the situation I would certainly rule to support the decision of the Chairman of the committee, because there is as much logic to support his view as there is logic to support the other view; and when in doubt I think the Chair should not overrule the decision of his colleague, the chairman of the committee of the whole.

For this reason, and in view of the fact that there are only three minutes left before we adjourn at six o'clock, I would suggest to hon. members that we either go back to private members business for a little while, for the next two minutes, or that we call it six o'clock. But of course we would have to resume in any event in committee of the whole, and this exercise will take a short while, which will take us to the time of adjournment. We will suggest in a formal way to the special committee on procedure that it review at the first opportunity the provisions of provisional standing order 15A in conjunction with the provisions of standing order 16.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 5—Embodiment.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might call it six o'clock. I am prepared to go ahead with my remarks if necessary. I had two minutes before five o'clock, and it is now one minute before six o'clock.

The Chairman: Is the committee agreed to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I realize, Mr. Speaker, that we are working under an allocation of time order, but there is nothing in the rules which says that could not be changed or modified; so perhaps the leader of the house has some different business to announce for Monday.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, for Monday we propose submitting to the house for consideration item No. 107 on government orders on the order paper, and if it is concluded during the day, then item 134.

Mr. Churchill: What about unemployment insurance and the dairy industry?

Mr. Hellyer: On Wednesday and Friday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 24, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

TABLING OF STATEMENT RESPECTING COMMONWEALTH WAR GRAVES COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I should like to table a statement I have issued on behalf of the government in connection with the fiftieth anniversary of the Commonwealth War Graves Commission.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

YOUTH COMMISSION PERSONNEL, SAINT JOHN

Question No. 2,731—Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert):

What are the names of the personnel working in the greater Saint John area for the Canada youth commission and what are their specific duties?

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): I am informed by the Company of Young Canadians as follows: Mr. and Mrs. G. Fatels and Miss S. Williamson are the Company of Young Canadians' volunteers working in Saint John, N.B. They were requested by the Saint John urban redevelopment office to assist in the development of the north end - west side urban renewal scheme, and have been working with the residents of that area in studying the redevelopment opportunities available in that program.

CENTENNIAL COMMEMORATION OF LOUIS RIEL

Question No. 2,739—Mr. Schreyer:

1. Has the government of Canada or the Canadian centennial commission any plans to arrange for the commemoration of Louis Riel during centennial year?

2. If so, what is the nature of these plans or arrangements?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the centennial commission as follows: The confederation train and caravans, in sections dealing with western Canada (1869) (1885) commemorate Mr. Louis Riel.

Under Festival Canada, a program of the centennial commission, an opera entitled "Riel" has been commissioned. The libretto is by Mr. Mavor Moore and the music by Mr. Harry Somers.

TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT TAKEOVER OF ROCKCLIFFE AIR STATION

Question No. 2,744—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is it the intention of the Department of Transport to take over the airfield and all or part of its facilities at the Rockcliffe air station as of April 1, 1967?

2. If so, have the Canadian armed forces agreed to this turnover, and what facilities are to be included?

3. Are steps being taken to locate storage space for goods and material now stored in the two hangars located on the northern boundary of the air station so that these may be vacated and turned over without delay to the Department of Transport?

4. Is there existing storage space in the so-called ready hangars located at the extreme southeast section of the Uplands airport where such goods and material could be stored?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Transport and National Defence as follows: 1. It is the intention of the Department of Transport to take over the airport proper and one associated building at the Rockcliffe air station, to be operated on a temporary basis, day VFR conditions, and at minimal licenceable standards for the convenience of light local and itinerant aircraft. Further consideration will be given to its continued operation if the needs of the aviation industry warrant. The takeover is to be effective as soon after April 1, 1967, as these takeover arrangements can be completed.

2. The Department of National Defence proposed this takeover, which includes the land and runway complex comprising the airfield and one building.

3. Only one of the two hangars on the northern boundary is being vacated.

4. No.

Questions

CENTENNIAL COMMISSION GRANT FOR DINNER HONOURING GEORGE BROWN

Question No. 2,785—Mr. Hales:

1. Did the centennial commission make a grant towards the dinner recently held in Toronto in honour of George Brown, one of the Fathers of Confederation?

2. For what amount was the grant?

3. By whom was the grant requested?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the centennial commission as follows: 1. Yes.

2. $2,000.

3. Mr. Ralph Cowan, M.P., on behalf of the centennial dinner committee, which dinner was organized by a group of businessmen and editors from Toronto.

CONFEDERATION CENTRE, CHARLOTTETOWN —CONTRIBUTIONS TOWARD OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE

Question No. 2,816—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. What amounts have been paid by the government of Canada towards the operational and maintenance costs of the Confederation centre, Charlottetown?

2. What was the date of such payments?

3. Has an undertaking been given by the government to contribute an annual contribution for such purposes and, if so, what is the amount?

4. Is this amount the equivalent of the total operating and maintenance costs and, if not, what is the difference?

5. What contributions has the Canada Council made towards support of activities presented in the Confederation centre?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by my department and by the Canada Council as follows: 1 and 2.

Amount	Date of cheque
$ 45,000.00	April 3, 1967
25,000.00	December 5, 1966
100,000.00	November 2, 1966
25,000.00	September 1966
25,000.00	August 1966
25,000.00	May 1966
22,500.00	January 1966
87,500.00	July 1965
40,000.00	May 7, 1965
$395,000.00

3. Yes, to the extent of one half of the total operating and maintenance cost but not to exceed $175,000 each year.

4. Answered by number 3.

5. Apart from some $36,500 provided toward the architectural competition for the design of the centre, the council has provided some $173,000 toward the support of activities at the centre, as follows: $10,000 in the year 1964-65, $62,937 in 1965-66 and $100,800 in 1966-67.

ARDA PROJECT No. 7030

Question No. 2,838—Mr. Schreyer:

Regarding the answer on April 5 to question No. 2,789, what was the cost per major item that was involved in the $20,000 expenditure for ARDA project No. 7030?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): The data provided by the province of Manitoba when the project was proposed were:

	Total cost	Federal share
1. Provincial staff analyst	$10,000	$ 5,000
2. Other staff consultant	6,000	3,000
3. Material and supplies	2,000	1,000
4. Report (The People of Manitoba)	2,000	1,000
Total cost	$20,000	$10,000

DELAY IN AIR CANADA FLIGHT, MONTREAL-WINNIPEG

Question No. 2,843—Mr. Jorgenson:

1. Was the three hour delay of the Air Canada DC-9 aircraft flight of March 18, 1967, from Montreal to Winnipeg via Ottawa, in any way related to insufficient facilities or staff at Dorval?

2. Was the aircraft out of service time in any way related to difficulties arising from the recent implementation of midnight shift requirements?

3. How many hours was the aircraft available at the overhaul base prior to its being released as airworthy on its regular service that morning?

4. What were the specific reasons for the three hour departure delay?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. No.

2. No.

3 and 4. The aircraft which it had been planned to use for this flight remained overnight at the Montreal station. A fault existed in the electrical system. Component replacement did not rectify the problem. The plan was revised to call up an aircraft which was undergoing a schedule check at the maintenance base. This aircraft had arrived at the base at 2400 hours and was released as serviceable following the check at 0845. Following servicing the flight departed Montreal at 0945 operating two hours 45 minutes late.

*STAMP COMMEMORATING SIR CHARLES SAUNDERS

Question No. 2,847—Mr. Irvine:

Is it the intention of the government during this centennial year to introduce a special stamp or in some other way to recognize the great contributions made by Sir Charles Edward Saunders, the originator and founder of Marquis wheat, who was born in our confederation year in London, Ontario, and (a) if so, of what will the recognition consist (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. As a result of the contribution the Canada Post Office is making in commemorating the centennial of confederation, the philatelic program for 1967 is one of the heaviest in Canada's history. Numerous outstanding subjects were suggested for portrayal on postage stamps, but it was necessary to defer many worthy suggestions even though they were of national and international significance.

PARK STEAMSHIP CO.

Question No. 2,895—Mr. Grégoire:

1. Is Park Steamship Company, Limited, still operating and, if so, will it be given a French name?

2. If it is no longer in operation, has the company returned its letters patent?

3. If it is still in operation (a) what are its activities (b) who are its directors (c) when will it stop its activities?

Hon. John N. Turner (Registrar General):

1. No. Surrendered its charter June 27, 1966.

2. Yes.

3. Not applicable.

RETURNING OFFICER, VILLENEUVE CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 2,896—Mr. Caouette:

1. Is Mr. Fontaine the returning officer for the constituency of Villeneuve?

2. Has he been replaced as the returning officer for the new constituency of Villeneuve and, if so, for what reason?

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): 1. Yes, Mr. Fontaine is the present returning officer for the Villeneuve riding.

2. Yes.

According to the Canada Elections Act, a returning officer must be appointed by the governor in council for each electoral district, Now, as the boundaries of the present electoral district of Villeneuve were readjusted by virtue of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (13 Elizabeth II, c. 31), a returning officer had to be appointed for this new electoral district—and this was done accordingly.

*GRANT FOR FERRY SERVICE, BAIE COMEAU-RIMOUSKI

Question No. 2,916—Mr. Ricard:

Has the federal government received a request for grants on behalf of the Compagnie Nord-Sud Limitée in relation to the ferry service between Baie Comeau and Rimouski?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GREECE—INQUIRY AS TO RECOGNITION OF NEW RÉGIME AND SAFETY OF CANADIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister regarding the new régime which has come to power in Greece by a military coup d'etat. In view of the fact that this government appears to be a military dictatorship which has suspended many of the democratic provisions of the constitution and imprisoned a number of political leaders, I want to ask the Prime Minister if Canada intends to recognize the new régime and continue diplomatic relations with that government.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question of recognition of a new régime is an important one, and it will be considered by the government. Meanwhile I do not think I can say anything else about the change in the internal government of Greece.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the Canadian government considered withholding recognition until such time as there is some indication of the restoration of democratic rights in that country and some assurance given with respect to the security of the political prisoners?

Mr. Pearson: Of course, Mr. Speaker, that is a hypothetical question. As far as the latter part of the question is concerned, we have no information which would lead us to believe that the recognized standards of international law and justice will not be observed by the government now in power in Greece.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether any information has been received from our embassy in Athens as to the safety of Canadian citizens who may be in the country.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. A report has come in from our embassy indicating that to the best of their knowledge all Canadians are safe. I also noted in this morning's news reports that there has been no fighting or violence following last night's events in Greece.

UNITED NATIONS

SOUTH-WEST AFRICA—CANADIAN POSITION AT EMERGENCY SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister give any indication to this house of the course to be followed by Canada at the emergency session of the United Nations to deal with the question of South-West Africa, which opens in New York today.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the special assembly which has been called to consider this and one other question is, as my hon. friend knows, meeting today. The first item on the agenda is to the one mentioned by my hon. friend, consideration of a report from the committee that has been discussing this question in the light of the assembly resolution of last autumn.

I understand three resolutions were submitted to that committee, and the committee has not made a unanimous report. Two of the resolutions provided for the territory to be administered or supervised by the security council because of the alleged failure of the mandate and the mandatory country; the third was a resolution sponsored by Canada, and I think two other countries, providing for—I am just relying on memory now—an inspection of the situation by the United Nations Secretary General or a representative. That is the resolution which the Canadian delegate to the special assembly will be supporting.

[Mr. Pearson.]

AIR CANADA

INQUIRIES AS TO SERVICE TO REGINA AND WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I regret that I could not give him notice; I have been away and have just returned. Last year when DC-9's were put into service I asked a question about DC-9 service by Air Canada to Saskatchewan. At the time the answer was that the target date for this service would be May 1. We are getting rather close to that date now, and I am wondering whether the minister can ascertain when Air Canada will indeed put DC-9's into service to Regina, and whether the target date remains as announced.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to make inquiries.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. At the same time the minister is making his inquiry would he ascertain whether the direct flight between Ottawa and Winnipeg is to be discontinued on May 1 and, if so, why?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do that too.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT—POSSIBLE RELIEF OF CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS FROM COMMITMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry. May I preface it by welcoming the minister back to the house after his extensive trip.

Because of the decline in the production of motor vehicles in Canada, is it a fact that Canadian car manufacturers are asking to be relieved of certain commitments which they agreed to when the United States-Canada auto pact was signed?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I replied to a similar question before my departure. I thank the hon. member for welcoming me back, but at the moment I have nothing to add to the reply I made previously.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister assure the house that no relief from these commitments will be granted?

Mr. Drury: If at some time in the future it may be impossible to fulfil some commitments which have been made, I do not think the hon. member would wish to insist on impossibilities.

NATURAL GAS

DECISION ON PIPE LINE BY U.S. AUTHORITY—NEW APPLICATION BY TRANS-CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can he say when the United States authority may render a decision on the Great Lakes application; and can he say also when the National Energy Board of Canada will be considering a new application filed, as I understand, by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The answer to the first question is that I wish I knew. The answer to the second question is, on May 23.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): May I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Mr. Speaker. Will the government act on the recommendation of the justice and legal affairs committee to set up a federal board charged with responsibility for all matters of motoring safety?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): I have not had an opportunity of studying this matter, but I shall do so at the earliest possible moment.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF ANIMAL PROTECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the escalation of pressure on the members of this house for an investigation into the protection of animals, will the Prime Minister indicate when the government plans to assign this matter to a parliamentary committee?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am afraid I cannot answer that question. I shall be glad to look into it.

STEVEN TRUSCOTT—INQUIRY AS TO FINDINGS OF SUPREME COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Will the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to the Steven Truscott case be announced this week and, if so, does the minister know on what day the decision will be made known?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): I can only say that I share the hon. member's hope that we will receive the judgment in this case very soon.

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO EXTRADITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to ask the Minister of Justice a question. Has the minister any further information he can give the house with respect to the question I asked him on April 14 as to whether Harold Chamberlain Banks is to be charged under the Criminal Code with perjury?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Yes, I have an answer to that question. It is also an answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce the other day. This matter has been placed in the hands of the local provincial crown attorney, Mr. John Cassels, who I expect in turn has been consulting with his superiors in the attorney general's department at Toronto. The investigating officers are receiving their advice from these sources. In my view, under the circumstances any statement relating to possible proceedings should come from the provincial authorities.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR SUBSIDY ON SURPLUS FLUID MILK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I wish to direct to the Minister of Agriculture the same question that I addressed to the acting minister last Wednesday. The acting minister said he would refer this matter to the minister on the minister's return to the house. My question is as follows. What was or what will be the government's response to the request that fluid milk be reinstated in the dairy subsidization program?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): The government's program as announced entails a basic distribution of functions as between federal and provincial responsibilities. Inasmuch as the provinces already exercise a responsibility for quotas and price levels of fluid milk the fluid milk producer and his support are clearly and primarily a provincial responsibility. I believe that the distribution of responsibilities, with the provinces assuming the responsibility for support of the fluid milk producer and the federal government assuming responsibility for the support of the manufacturing milk producer, will in the long run serve the best interests of the dairy farmers of Canada.

Mr. Olson: Could the minister tell the house what he has heard from those provinces which have no subsidy program for surplus fluid milk? Will the federal or provincial governments give relief in the near future to take care of this deficiency, now that the subsidy has been removed?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, of course I cannot speak for the provinces. I believe that all provinces or provincial agencies set the price of fluid milk, and that either the provincial government or one of its agencies sets the quota. If any province in its wisdom, as happened in Ontario this past year, feels that it wishes to subsidize fluid milk producers at figures over and above their production quotas, and basic prices, that of course is a decision that must be made by that province's government.

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Is the minister aware that this new policy is causing an increase in the price of bottled milk sold on the street?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is an argument and not a question.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

REASON FOR FURTHER CONSIDERATION OF ABOLITION LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenanc): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he inform the house why he intends to have reconsidered the decision taken by the house on capital punishment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this question is in order.

[Mr. Olson.]

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENTS RESPECTING BAD CHEQUES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): My question is addressed to the Minister of Justice; I apologize for not having given him notice but perhaps he will take this as notice. Would the minister look into the relevant sections of the Criminal Code to see whether something could be done to tighten up the provisions relating to N.S.F. cheques?

Mr. Speaker: I think this is a question which might well be placed on the order paper.

GRAIN

PROTEST AGAINST SLOW MOVEMENT FROM LAKEHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): I have a question for the Minister of Transport with regard to negotiations which were under way last week between the great lakes shipping companies and the Canadian Wheat Board. Can the minister say whether these negotiations have been successfully concluded, or whether grain is still not moving from the lakehead positions?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am not sure whether the one situation would follow from the other. I regret to say that since this is not primarily my ministerial responsibility I did not make special inquiries this morning with regard to the matter. But I will.

NATIONAL PARKS

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT RESPECTING EXPANSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of recent remarks by the minister about the desirability of extending our national parks may I ask whether the hon. gentleman has any new legislation in mind which would give expression to these new ideas?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I can assure the hon. member that we intend at the new session to introduce a measure with respect to parks, and we are in negotiation with a number of provinces looking toward additional parks in Canada.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Can the minister say whether his ideas include the expansion of the park in New Brunswick?

Mr. Laing: We are thinking in those terms, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BELL ISLAND, NFLD.—ASSISTANCE FOR UNEMPLOYED MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Industry, and first say how glad we are to have him back in our midst. Last week the Prime Minister said that more than one department was looking into the problem facing the people on Bell Island, Newfoundland, and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration told us what his department was doing in this connection. I want to ask the Minister of Industry whether his department is conducting research, either on its own or through the National Research Council, into the possibility of upgrading the ore deposits on Bell Island or pelletizing the ore there in order to make use of the two billion tons of recoverable ore which are estimated to be on the island.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): I thank the hon. gentleman for his kind expression of welcome. As far as Bell Island is concerned, extensive investigations were carried out about two and a half years ago as to the possibility of chemical treatment of the ore to make it appropriate for use in Canadian furnaces. I regret to say that in spite of the intensive research work done we have not as yet produced an economic answer.

Mr. Douglas: As a supplementary question may I ask the minister by whom these tests were conducted, and is it possible to get copies of the report?

Mr. Drury: Basically, Mr. Speaker, by the National Research Council together with outside consultants, and I will see if it is possible to make a copy of the report available to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Joseph P. O'Keefe (St. John's East): May I ask the minister if those steps will be continued to investigate the problems of the ore at Bell Island.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the conclusions of those conducting these investigations were such as to warrant or justify continuing them any further.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works and ask him if he is waiting until he can give me an affirmative reply in answer to question No. 2,728 which has been on the order paper since March 10. This has reference to the harbour development at Chandler, Quebec.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to look into the matter immediately.

TRANSPORT

QUEBEC—SALE OF BAIE COMEAU-RIMOUSKI FERRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport.

Would the minister have any further information to give the house concerning the sale of the ferry Père Nouvel?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I could perhaps remind the hon. gentleman that certain arrangements were made by the federal government to assist in inaugurating this service, and the contractor undertook to carry on the service until December 31, 1966. Since that time there has been no obligation on the part of the contractor toward the federal government, and any relation he would have now I should think would be with the provincial authorities.

TRANSPORTATION

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON MARITIME STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask if he could be charitable to us in the maritimes and tell us whether it will be this fall, or perhaps hopefully this spring, when we will get the maritime transportation study report?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Hope springs eternal, Mr. Speaker, and I hope it will be in the spring.

Mr. Knowles: What year?

Inquiries of the Ministry

HIGHWAYS

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR CONSTRUCTION OF ROADS TO RESOURCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact many of the provinces have built roads under the roads to resources program and have not completed all their planned work, and apparently are not willing to continue without further federal assistance, may I ask the minister is the government considering further financial assistance in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: This question should be placed on the order paper.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF BILINGUAL PREMIUM POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put another question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Since we are now celebrating the national secretaries' week, could the Prime Minister take this opportunity to grant the 7 per cent raise, retroactive to October 1, 1966, to the secretaries of members of parliament and others who are recognized as being bilingual?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question has already been asked.

REQUEST FOR ADJOURNMENT SO MEMBERS MAY ATTEND EXPO OPENING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works in his capacity as government house leader. In view of the fact that all members of parliament have been invited to attend the opening of Expo on Thursday of this week would the minister say whether a decision has yet been reached as to whether or not the house will sit that day.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is planned that the house will not sit that day.

Mr. Churchill: What about Friday?

Mr. McIlraith: We are prepared to not sit on Thursday.

[Mr. Knowles.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

USE OF CIVILIAN AIRCRAFT TO TRANSPORT RESERVE UNITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister advise this house the reason for the leasing of Air Canada aircraft to move reserve units to training establishments? If our defence forces are fully equipped and competent to meet defence commitments, why is it necessary in Canada to move reserve forces by private fleets of aircraft?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this question might be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Winch: The contract is being signed this week, Mr. Speaker.

WATER RESOURCES

FRASER RIVER—IMPLEMENTATION OF BOARD RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the concern that is felt by many people in the lower mainland of British Columbia, could the minister indicate whether any conferences are going to be held with provincial authorities regarding the implementation of the recommendations in the Fraser river board report?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am going to meet on this particular subject next month, I believe on May 3, with the British Columbia minister responsible for water. With respect to possible flooding, I might say that all possible measures are now being taken, and I might also say we are having an interdepartmental meeting this afternoon to try to co-ordinate these measures as well as possible at the federal level.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us if the emergency measures apply to emergencies in the current year, or are they merely for future undertakings?

Mr. Pepin: In the current year, Mr. Speaker.

PARLIAMENT HILL

INQUIRY AS TO EXTINGUISHING OF PERPETUAL FLAME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Some visitors from the west came to parliament hill Saturday to see the national capital. Can the minister explain why the perpetual flame was extinguished at that time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AGRICULTURE

ARDA—APPLICATION IN LOWER ST. LAWRENCE—GASPÉ AREA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. René Tremblay (Matapédia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

Following a week-end meeting at Cabano, in Quebec, where an important section of the territory of the Lower St. Lawrence Development Board decided not to join the area as a whole in the implementation of the Rural Development Plan, is the minister in a position to say whether this decision will somehow affect the implementation of the ARDA program in the lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé peninsula?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question seems too general in character to be asked at this time.

Mr. Tremblay: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

HALIFAX—DEPORTATION ORDER RESPECTING POLISH NATIONAL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Friday I was asked, I think by the members for Halifax, concerning a deportation order against one Stanislaw Lubaszko. The minister concerned has received representations on behalf of this man. No action will be taken to remove him from Canada until the minister has had an opportunity to review all aspects of the case.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the Prime Minister and the minister for their expediency in this matter. In the absence of the appropriate minister may I ask the Prime Minister whether he will look into the possibility of this man being permitted to attend church services; in other words, perhaps he might be taken out of the isolation in which he now finds himself.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I will be seeing the minister this evening and can mention this to him at that time.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I had a question which I wished to address to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with Expo in Montreal. Since these cockatoos that are able to speak French and English are not paid in cash, will those which master both languages be given 7 per cent more food than the unilingual ones, or a 7 per cent higher perch in the pecking order at Expo?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Friday, April 21, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Friday evening clause 5 was under consideration. Clause 2 had been allowed to stand. The proceedings in respect of this bill are subject to the time allocation order which was adopted Thursday, April 20, 1967.

On clause 5—Embodiment.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, call the vote. We are ready to vote on this clause. Call the yeas and nays.

Clause agreed to: yeas, 77; nays, 43.

The Chairman: I declare clause 5 as amended carried.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Officers and men members of Canadian Forces.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a suggestion in respect of the procedure for this afternoon. Would the committee agree to stand clauses 6 and 7 and proceed with the consequential items commencing with clause 8? The committee then could return to the substantive clauses once the consequential and general clauses had been dealt with. I realize that all clauses were examined in detail by the standing committee on national defence and it may be the opinion of this committee that it is not necessary to repeat in full the discussion here. It might be preferable, however, if hon. members would agree, to proceed to clause 8 at this time and consider the clauses which are not too controversial. This would allow us to spend all the remaining time on the substantive clauses in part I of the bill.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, this suggestion by the minister comes rather late in the day. If the minister had accepted the first reasonable proposal which I put forward about four times that we stand clauses 2 and 6 until next fall, this would have made some sense. I am surprised that he is not now prepared to do that. In fact when he got up to speak earlier that is what I thought he was going to say. In view of the unrest in the services and in view of the difference of opinion which exists across the country with regard to this bill the suggestion I put forward appears to be more and more reasonable each day. This would not interfere at all with the process of drafting the regulations.

I do not wish to impute motives to the minister, but the suggestion he has made this afternoon conceivably could prevent or curtail discussion of clauses 6 and 7 which are vital to the bill. We might find ourselves taking up time on the inconsequential clauses which are in part II. Our preference is to continue now with clause 6 which is one of the vital clauses in the bill. Much as I should like to agree with the Minister of National Defence, who never agrees with me, I have to reject his suggestion as unsound.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Churchill: Oh, no. I have just said that this is one of the vital clauses in the bill and I propose to move an amendment to improve it.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The first part of clause 6 reads as follows:

> Officers and men who were members of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army or the Royal Canadian Air Force immediately prior to the coming into force of this Part are, subject to the provisions of the National Defence Act, members of the Canadian Forces.

This is one of the compulsory features which have been introduced into this bill. As soon as it becomes law the members of the navy, army and air force will be shifted into forces to be known as the Canadian Forces. We discussed this during defence committee hearings, and I think it would be worth while to re-emphasize the subject of those discussions at this time, because there are many more members present to give it their attention.

During the committee hearings I moved two amendments to this clause, which were voted down in the normal fashion by Liberal members voting against any of our proposals. I intend to put those proposals before the committee of the whole house in order that it may decide whether or not they are valuable.

Clause 6 introduces a compulsory feature. Men who are now in the three services are all volunteers. When they enlisted, whether it was last year or five, 15 or 20 years ago, they made a definite choice. They had the opportunity, wishing to serve their country, to become members of the army, the navy or the air force. Each officer and man made a deliberate choice as to the service in which he wished to devote some part of his life. Some of them deliberately chose a service in which to make a lifetime career. The government through this bill now intends to shift those officers and men from these three services into the Canadian Forces. The names of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Canadian Army will disappear.

These officers and men who chose to make a contribution to Canada as members of one of the three services will no longer have this choice. They will be shifted into the Canadian Forces and will no longer be able to take pride as members of the navy, army or air force. The government is now saying that they are now in the services and will remain as members of the renamed service without any choice in the matter.

I gave an example of what happened in the past during the committee hearings and I should like to repeat it on this occasion. It is drawn from the experience of September, 1939. On September 1, 1939 officers and men were attested, enlisted, and sworn into the Canadian field force. I speak from practical knowledge because I was acting as assistant to the adjutant of our regiment on that occasion. These officers and men became members of the Canadian field force. Within a short period of time the cabinet at Ottawa changed the name to the Canadian active service force. The documents which had been prepared for the Canadian field force were destroyed.

All this has been recounted in the official history of the Canadian effort during wartime by Colonel Stacey. There was great wastage of time and money. New documents were issued in the name of the Canadian active service force and we were instructed throughout the army to re-enlist, reattest and swear in again the people who had been members of the Canadian field force. We went through all that reattestation.

The Canadian active service force provided only for service in Canada, so when the decision was reached that forces would be sent overseas—and it was reached very quickly—instructions came again from the cabinet through the Department of National Defence to the effect that everyone who had been sworn in to the Canadian active service force must be asked whether he wished to serve only in Canada or elsewhere in the world abroad. We had to go through the whole process once again. That happened in wartime when the officers and men were all volunteers.

In wartime it is conceivable that no one would object to a name being changed half a dozen times, from the Canadian field force to the Canadian active service force, the Canadian expeditionary force or anything of that nature. However, the government of that day took the stand that the officers and men, having specifically entered the Canadian field forces, should have the opportunity of saying whether they wanted to belong to a force of a different name.

That opportunity was given and the change was made. When it came to determining whether they would serve elsewhere than in Canada the government of the day decided the officers and men should have yet another opportunity to make a choice. When the several thousand who had been reattested into the Canadian active service force were asked whether they would serve outside Canada only a very small number declined to sign on for service abroad. The official history indicates that there were only about 500 all told who declined.

The point is that even in wartime the officers and men were given that choice. They were all volunteers and free citizens of this country. Our objection is that under clause 6 this opportunity is not to be given to the officers and men who are now in the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army, and the Royal Canadian Air Force. Without being reattested or sworn in, and without any choice whatsoever in this matter, once this bill is declared law these officers and men become members of the Canadian Forces.

I should like to move the following amendment to clear up this matter, and I am sure the Minister of National Defence, now that he has had time to think this over, will agree that this freedom of choice should be offered to the officers and men now in the services. Consequently I move:

That clause 6 be amended by adding thereto the following subclause:

(3) No officer or man who was a member of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army, or the Royal Canadian Air Force immediately prior to the coming into force of this part shall be enrolled in the Canadian Forces without his consent registered by reattestation.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, the matter raised in this amendment is most serious, one which will have the most far reaching and the longest lasting consequences of any in this bill. Unlike the minister I am not one who believes that the bill before us will provide the answer to our defence posture over the next 40 or 50 years. Indeed, I will be quite surprised if we do not find ourselves in the position of having to make further changes within the next two or three years.

However, it is to the amendment to clause 6 that I would like to address my remarks. Perhaps I will start by analyzing it as I understand it. It is quite clear when it says that officers and men who were members of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army or the Royal Canadian Air Force immediately prior to the coming into force of this part are, subject to the provisions of the National Defence Act, members of the Canadian Forces.

It says in effect, as the previous speaker pointed out, that this is compulsory. The word "conscription" has certain connotations, but I think it is an expression of the government's failure to recognize any moral responsibility whatsoever to serving officers and men in the three services.

The explanation of clause 6 is not very clear. The remarks of the minister concerning this clause leave much to be desired. All we know about clause 6 is that it is transitional. However, as I mentioned, a better explanation is needed. So strongly do I feel about this lack of information that in my opinion the government is open to the charge that its failure to explain fully and properly the meaning of this clause is nothing more or less than a deliberate attempt to gloss over its very serious and far reaching implications.

I am not prepared simply to look at the word "transitional", to accept it and move on to the next clause. It is my hope that in the course of the remarks we may make on this clause the minister might give second thought to what is happening. As I read the clause and analyse it, I find the government is indeed saying to our 103,000 serving personnel "You are being transferred. You are fine, decent chaps; you know we have your best interests at heart, but just go along with our plan." In effect it says to them "Come along with us and we will look after you. The days of the identifiable services are gone, but have no particular fears about the new force. We will give you nothing at all to worry about. You will be there all right, but you will be there simply because we have decided. We will take care of you."

This is an abandonment of the very essence of the structure of our force, that is its voluntary nature. Every flag officer, every general, every air marshal and every commissioned officer is being told to burn his commission or toss it into the wastepaper basket. Since each was commissioned into only one of the three services, they are in effect being ordered to join the new force, and to accept something which is not part of the commission they originally accepted. Every officer and every man has been attested into the service of his choice, but he is now being attested into the service of the government's choice. Again I say this denies the voluntary nature and aspect of the structure of the Canadian armed forces.

First let us examine the voluntary aspects of their service. Each serving officer and man joined one and only one of the three services. He did so of his own free will after first having committed himself to a career for life in the Canadian forces and after having chosen which of the three services he wanted to join. He did this voluntarily. These men are in every sense of the word volunteers. Indeed, the officers volunteered to serve for life; that is for the length of time prescribed in the regulations for officers of the rank they would attain during their particular careers.

Each officer in any service on joining voluntarily had a different undertaking to the officers in the other services. This was the result of the free exercise of his choice. A naval officer decided to be different from an army officer. Under the existing regulations naval officers who reach the rank of lieutenant commander have a career which continues until they reach the age of 45. An army major, whose rank is equivalent to that of the lieutenant commander, has a career which continues until he reaches the age of 49. An air force squadron leader, whose rank is equivalent to that of a major or lieutenant commander, serves to the age of 47 if he is on the flying list. Commanders, lieutenant colonels and wing commanders have careers which last until they reach the ages of 50, 49 and 49 respectively. Captains of the navy, colonels and group captains have careers which continue until they reach respectively the ages of 55, 51 and 51.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

At one time the minister indicated that these careers were different. The fact is that each of the officers who joined voluntarily joined for a career which would last a certain length of time. I will repeat a word which I think is the key word in this context, namely "voluntary". They did so voluntarily. As far as I know no one as yet has been informed as to the length of the career which will apply to any particular rank in the new force.

The reason I introduce this problem is that serving officers and men are quite concerned about it. This legislation simply says to the whole of the officers' corps "Don't worry about it, old fellow. We will look after it. You no longer have anything to say about it."

• (3:30 p.m.)

I come back to another point, the use of the word "transitional" in the explanation concerning clause 6. The explanation of the intent of the clause covers up the matter quite successfully. A cursory reading of the clause would, I suppose, leave a person in the same state as members of the committee were left, quite confused. What is important today is whether or not we have the right to permit this confusion, this uncertainty, to continue. What does the government mean and what does the minister mean by the use of the word "transitional"? Matters such as this must be cleared up so that the men who are being arbitrarily transferred will understand what it is they are transferring to, for what period of time and under what conditions.

If we pass this legislation without the consent of the officers and men, the bargain made with respect to the length of their careers, to which I referred earlier, will be broken. Alternatively, differences will be created which will most certainly cause resentment in rank levels where the different lengths of career apply. This is a natural consequence of the failure to clarify these matters before this clause receives the approval of this committee. This again, is the underlying reason for the suggestion by the official opposition that clauses 2 and 6 be allowed to stand until the fall. This procedure would permit the departmental people time to come up with adequate answers and detailed explanations so that these men would know where they are going and what is going to happen.

The fact that lieutenant commanders may have longer careers than hitherto and majors may have shorter ones means you are playing around with the careers of officers whose lives have been voluntarily dedicated to a particular aspect of the service of Canada. This is not morally right, whether or not it is legal. While members of parliament may have the legal and constitutional right to do as they desire, there is a greater moral order, and sometimes I believe it would be wise for us to keep this in mind. We are doing something serious here, and this clause should be substantially amended.

I suggest that the amendment before us is a good one. If it is not made then not only the government but the House of Commons will have broken faith with these 102,000 men whose careers are governed by the promotion regulations in each of the three services. These regulations differ, but that is immaterial to the issue. Whether one service has a faster or slower method of promotion is not a matter of dispute. We do not argue about that at all because that was so in the past and must be so in the future. Promotion is geared to the requirements of the fighting environment. When you get to be even as old as I am you find it is more difficult to run uphill, and I am still fairly young. These factors must govern and because of that this area is not in dispute.

The point at issue is the fact that each of the services has separate promotional regulations. This is a fundamental thing, and I come back again to the freedom of choice. Before any man should be invited to accept a modified or unified system, he should have the new system fully explained to him and then be asked whether he will go along with it. If you transfer him without his consent you are compelling him to accept a different structure from the one for which he volunteered in the first place.

I believe this is the burden of the argument in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. The National Defence Act has provided, I think quite properly and fairly, that no officer or man can be transferred from one service to another without his consent except when the forces are on active service. This would be during a period of emergency as determined by parliament. The National Defence Act uses these words:

> No officer or man shall without his consent be transferred from the regular forces to the reserve forces, or from the reserve forces to the regular forces, or from the service of the Canadian forces in which he has been enrolled to another service of the Canadian forces.

This is subject to the following exception:

> An officer or man on active service, may for the period of such service, be transferred from the component of the service of the Canadian forces in which he has been enrolled to the same component of another service of the Canadian forces or from the reserve forces to the regular forces.

If clause 6 passes without amendment we will have shown a total disregard for the undertaking given to the officers and men who volunteered to serve Canada in the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force. This view was clearly expressed to the committee by one witness, and the reference is found at page 1050 of minutes of proceedings No. 20 for February 15, 1967. Rear Admiral William Landymore spoke at great length on this point but I shall not read his evidence into the record. I commend it to any member of the committee who is interested. This is one senior officer's opinion of the effect of the moral obligation which is left as a result of the amendment of this section of the National Defence Act.

I have listened to all the evidence in the committee and I have reread it on a number of occasions during the last two or three weeks. I cannot find anywhere in the evidence given by any of the officers, either presently serving or recently released, any argument whatever which effectively counteracts the argument advanced in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member. The minister has not attempted to prove that the government has neither legal nor moral obligations. I am sure he has accepted the fact there is a legal obligation, as the judge advocate general told the committee there was.

I believe that the minister recognizes the moral obligation whenever he is asked directly, but he has never done or said anything to counteract the meaningful amendment which is now before us. As I said earlier it has been glossed over as though it was unworthy of debate. We do not have the right to gloss over something which so radically affects the lives of the officers and men who have volunteered to serve and, if necessary, to give their lives in defence of this country. The judge advocate general, Brigadier Lawson, in his evidence before the committee concerning this clause pointed out that in his opinion it is law. We accept that, and I am not talking about the legality of it at all.

• (3:40 p.m.)

It may be of some interest to some people to pursue this matter in the courts of our country, particularly from a civil rights point of view. There are two sections in the Canadian Bill of Rights which it is interesting to look at in connection with this clause, though other hon. members will deal with this aspect of the matter in more detail. The judge advocate general pointed out that he thought we had better be very careful about his advice. I should like to refer the committee to a question and answer exchange reported at page 2077 of minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 32 for March 14. The question put by the hon. member for Calgary North was as follows:

I do not think it was ever considered that a lawful duty would be to put an infantry battalion commander in the command of a ship.

Mr. Lawson: It certainly would have been a legal duty, Mr. Harkness, no matter how foolish it might have been.

Mr. Harkness: No, but I say, I do not think that to go and command a ship could even have been interpret as one of that infantry officer's lawful duties.

Mr. Lawson: Oh yes; I would say it would, sir.

Mr. Harkness: Under the naval provisions he is responsible for the safety of the ship, but he has no background, or training, or means of being responsible for the safety of that ship.

Mr. Lawson: Oh, I agree with you, it would be a very foolish—

Mr. Harkness: Well, that is why I do not think that it even would be legal.

Mr. Lawson: Well, no: I think in law, this would be a lawful duty.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, this comment speaks for itself. If I may extend this point, though I do not want to belabour it, there are international marine laws which have some bearing on the matter. I am referring to certain marine laws which exist under maritime law.

According to article 10.07 of Queen's Regulations the following regulations apply:

(a) No officer or man may be transferred from one list to another without his consent.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

This same article prescribes for each of the three services respectively. In each case consent is required. Therefore it follows that if consent of the individual for a transfer within a service is required, in view of the existence of section 26 of the National Defence Act there does exist a very reasonable doubt that when this bill is enacted it will be in fact be legal. As I mentioned, it is already in conflict with certain provisions under maritime law with regard to the lawful duties of a captain of a ship. It is in contradiction to section 26 of the present act. While the brigadier says that parliament is an end unto itself, and this may be so, I suggest that we are overlooking certain moral obligations. Indeed, we must accord respect to the laws of countries other than our own, and I make this point in connection with our obligations under maritime law.

I hope that some serving officer will have the courage, the determination and the guts to take this question to the Supreme Court of Canada under the Bill of Rights to find out whether the bill is legal. On the other hand, I hope all of them do not do so because I understand the Supreme Court is very busy at this time of year. However, it has been suggested that this might happen.

Whether the bill is legal or not, anybody who has read the evidence given at the committee hearings, has sat and listened to this debate and has bothered to inform himself—a tremendous amount has been written and said about this bill—must be driven to the firm conclusion that there is no doubt in light of the evidence that it is morally wrong to move members of the armed forces, arbitrarily without their consent and without their exercising an option, from the force in which they voluntarily elected to serve and perhaps die for their country to some other force. It is equally as immoral as giving a lieutenant in the army command of a ship or giving the command of a ship or an aircraft to any unqualified person.

I feel that the government has arbitrarily broken a very basic term of the contract entered into with these serving men. The minister should find in his heart some grounds for giving these men a choice. Let the men decide whether or not this is what they want to do. If he did so I think the minister would find that the vast majority of them would willingly serve in the new force because they would have the knowledge that they did so voluntarily. It is this business of having this rammed down their bloody throats to which they object. Give the men an option. Give them a few months to make up their minds. If the men who joined the navy feel in their own minds there is a substantial loss of the marine and naval traditions of Canada, then give them the option of retiring voluntarily without any pension penalty. Give these men the full benefits to which they are entitled. Certainly the ones with whom I have spoken and corresponded seem to be sincere, loyal and dedicated. If the minister were to do this, he might find that his plans for the future of the Canadian forces would be implemented much more harmoniously.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I think the members of this committee should realize that unless the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre carries we will be asked to pass a law which brings in for the first time peacetime conscription in Canada. We are discussing a peacetime voluntary force in a democratic country and the government is now proposing conscription. There have been a couple of occasions in this nation's history when a major upheaval occurred over the conscription issue. Yet on both occasions conscription was justified because this country's very life was at stake and we were then involved in a very serious conflict. However, there is no war in sight today and no reason has been advanced on the part of the government for resorting to conscription.

What makes it even more reprehensible is that this conscription does not apply to a particular class of people who might be suitable for the armed services or whose presence in the services might be necessary for the preservation of this country. We are going to limit this conscription to those who are now serving in our armed forces simply because these people agreed with the government of Canada to serve in one or other of our forces as they exist today. Certainly anybody who looks at the situation in this light, which I think is the only fair light in which to look at it, must demand compelling reasons from the government for resorting to peacetime conscription of the members of our armed forces.

How can the minister in all fairness conscript these men? Our men in the past have enlisted in the service of their choice as volunteers. If we take the navy as an example, they enlisted in the navy because they like naval traditions, naval life, the brotherhood of seafaring fighting men, and the kinds of trades they could learn in the naval environment. Reasons of this sort induced people to enlist voluntarily.

I say there can be no mistaking what the minister is doing. He—when I refer to the minister I refer to the government—is changing the agreement that was made with these volunteers. The government in effect is saying: You have no choice. Is that fair? Should that sort of thing be necessary if the men, as the minister alleges, are enthusiastic about serving in his new armed force? The minister and General Allard say that the men will be proud and anxious to serve in this force. If that is so, why is there this discrimination? What is the minister afraid of? If the men are so enthusiastic, why is he afraid of giving them a choice?

When men have served 15 or 20 years of a 20 or 25-year career it is difficult for them to give up their pension rights and to find a suitable job in civy street. Why does the minister need clause 7 to reassure the men that in the new force they will perform duties similar to those they performed in the old force? The answer seems obvious. The minister seeks to conscript in peacetime a small number of men. The government is changing the terms of the employment contract unilaterally. I can only conclude that the minister has less confidence in this measure than have the members of this house or of the armed forces.

Furthermore, I am not satisfied that parliament has the legal right to do what it seeks to do. In my view this clause deals with civil rights. It has nothing to do with matters pertaining to the armed forces. Brigadier Lawson says that the men who enlist in our armed forces have no contract. That argument has little weight because in my view this clause deals essentially with a matter of civil rights. I know that military affairs come within the ambit of the federal government, but I also know that civil rights do not. They come within the ambit of the provincial governments. By passing this clause parliament may be infringing on the exclusive right of the provinces to deal with civil matters, civil rights legislation being an exclusive prerogative of the provincial governments. Dominion-provincial relations are important matters. Do we, therefore, wish to go ahead blithely and pass this clause if there is any question about provincial rights being involved?

The government is seeking to change a contract that the men entered into voluntarily and it is seeking to do so in peactime when no national emergency or disaster is upon us. I know that in wartime the government may abrogate civil rights, but we are not at war. Must the government, then, conscript a small group of people by saying to them, "Your contract with the government is to be changed?"

I cannot help feeling that somebody will take this clause before the courts and make a test case of it. What will happen if, as I expect may happen, the courts rule that this clause in sum and substance deals with civil rights and not with a defence matter and that the enacting of this clause was beyond the constitutional authority of parliament? Should the courts reach that decision this law would be null and void. The minister would find himself in a strange position because if he wanted to keep his armed force he would have to offer substantial monetary inducements. The situation the country would be confronted with would be that the members of the armed forces would not be subject to the provisions of this clause. Actually they would be governed by no effective law and the result would be chaos. I can imagine the pay raises that would be offered and the blandishments that would be held out to induce personnel to re-enlist. That is the picture as I see it, and that is what the minister risks by introducing the compulsory aspect of this clause.

I should like to study the law more closely. It may be I am wrong in my contention as to the law but I think there is a good chance I am right. If I am and the courts should throw out this clause, where will the minister be? He will have a force without a single body in it. Legally, there would be no one in it; there would be no troops, nobody subject to the old discipline. But the minister intends to take this risk. He wants compulsion. Why? He tells us that most of the men will want to stay, that only a small group will want to leave. He tells us that most of them would be constrained by concern for their careers, that many who did not welcome the proposals enthusiastically would probably stay in the force anyway. In any case, in light of the terms of clause 7 he says they would not have much to worry about.

This is the situation if the minister's words can be relied on. He would prefer to risk being left without troops than take the course we suggest. He would prefer to take the chance that he is possibly telling the truth and these people might re-enlist. This says a lot for the confidence he has in his own appraisal of the circumstances and in his own testimony.

We know there is one circumstance which might well dissuade troops from re-enlisting. Unification plans are still hazy. General Allard has told us that the plans are not yet complete, and we have the testimony of General Moncel that the government seems to be proceeding with the plan which was the worst of the four considered, the one which was so bad that he rejected it out of hand. We cannot doubt that there is uncertainty as to exactly the form unification will take. Contrary to the minister's testimony, I suppose there is a natural anxiety on the part of those in our armed forces concerning the reactions of members of the forces in other countries to those serving under this hybrid, unknown, untried scheme. They wonder what kind of beast they will be taken for.

Members of this house know very well how important the effect of these things is on morale and esprit de corps. If the minister were ready to admit this he would not be talking so blithely about wiping out the identity of the three forces. We can only take it that our view is the correct one and that there are good reasons why the men should hesitate to volunteer to re-enlist. Otherwise the minister is right, in which case there would be no reason to resort to conscription for the first time.

For some reason or other the minister always does things the hard way. We know he would prefer to ram something through parliament than seek co-operation. We know he would prefer to trample on parliament rather than have parliament help him. We know he would prefer to keep parliament in the dark as to the facts or mislead parliament as to the facts rather than explain things frankly. But in this instance, since there is obviously something so contrary to common sense about this proposal I cannot help feeling I have missed the point somehow and that there must be some argument to be advanced from the other side in connection with so serious a proposal and one which is so unfair to all who have volunteered.

It is important that what we do in this house should be fair to those who serve in our forces. Their views on whether or not parliament is behind them will certainly be a major factor in the future if we are to get the best out of these men. We must not even appear to do something which is unfair to them. But there has not been a single word spoken on this subject yet either by the minister or by the associate minister. I hope one or the other will get up and explain why it is necessary to conscript people despite the assurance that most of them are enthusiastic about this plan.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I do not share the legal and constitutional fears which have been expressed by the hon. member for Halifax and by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. However, I am impressed by their statement that there is a moral obligation to give those who volunteered under certain conditions the chance of changing their minds if the law steps in to change the conditions under which they are to serve.

It is strange that in the discussion so far neither of the two hon. members who spoke so eloquently about moral obligations and peacetime conscription mentioned that in the defence committee the minister clearly and unequivocally stated that except in the case of national emergency an opportunity would be given to those who had enlisted in the services to opt out of their obligations. If such an option exists I suggest it is a travesty of the facts to talk about peacetime conscription. A conscript who can opt out is obviously not bound by a very dangerous form of conscription.

I am sympathetic toward the amendment but it does seem to me that administratively it might be far more satisfactory if those who are presently in the services were allowed to opt out rather than that they should be given the opportunity to re-enlist. I can see a number of reasons why it might be better to adopt the opting-out provision. The minister has stated clearly—and this is on record in the proceedings of the committee—that this option will be given.

I believe the minister should repeat this statement, as no doubt he is willing to do, in which case much of the difficulty which has been suggested would be removed. Not only should he make a statement along these lines but somehow, in the legislation itself, the right to opt out should be clearly conferred. After all, even though the minister has made a statement to this effect, he will not be minister for ever. He may be promoted upstairs or he may be demoted downstairs. I do not know. I think it would be much better if this option were clearly embodied in the law. It may be that the minister has some intention of making such a change. If he does so, the claim that he is conscripting people in peacetime will not be a very serious one. If he does not, I am afraid suspicion, however unjustified, will linger. I hope he will clarify the position while we are in committee.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Greenwood has just made an interesting observation with respect to compulsory service. He has suggested it would be much better to give serving personnel the opportunity to opt in rather than to opt out. I ask him this: just what would re-attestation be but an opportunity to do either of these things? Therefore in this amendment, which calls for the re-attestation of the forces, the hon. member's argument is met because on re-attestation nobody would re-attest only those people who want to opt into the unified force. The argument that it is better to give the men the opportunity to opt in rather than to opt out is exactly what this amendment meets. No man signing re-attestation papers would be doing anything other than opting into the unified force.

The whole question of compulsory service or conscription, as it is better known, is all wrapped up with the minister's confidence in his own bill. He maintains that the service people are behind it and that a majority of the senior officers are behind it. How can he say there is a majority? Has he taken a poll and will he give us the result of that poll? Despite what the Minister of Transport thinks about the evidence given before the defence committee and despite the opinion of the Minister of National Defence on expert evidence, although I think he should recall what he himself said about experts, the fact remains that Air Chief Marshal Miller, the recently retired chief of staff, told the committee that each individual who had signed with a particular service had an agreement with that service and before going into the unified force it would be necessary to tear up his old agreement and let him sign a new one.

During the discussion on clause 2 I asked the Minister of National Defence several times to make the tape recordings of the committee hearings available to us. I made that request for the simple reason that I want to compare what is on the tapes with the printed version of the defence committee hearings. For instance, on two or three occasions the minister referred to the contract which each and every serviceman has. He used the words "the contract." If there was such a contract then each individual must be given an opportunity to sign a new one. I have failed to turn up those words in the printed record of the defence committee hearings and that is why I want the tapes produced. I asked for them previously. Again I request that the tapes of the defence committee hearings be made available to us. If we get the tapes we shall have the minister's own words in reference to a contract which each and every serviceman has. If there is such a contract then it is legal and binding, and in order to put a man into the unified force the contract must be rewritten.

To return to the minister's confidence in his bill, here is a pure and simple test of that confidence. Let him allow each and every serviceman to re-attest. But no, the minister will not permit that. I dare say he may be struggling with some kind of amendment to cover something that is already available, at least according to the instructions I have received from the Department of National Defence, namely, that anybody can get out of the service on six months' notice. If the minister is thinking of such an amendment I can tell him there is no reason for it because that is the instruction I received from the department in the fall.

An hon. Member: Instruction?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Exactly, instruction. The minister said that to reattest the men would bring about chaos. What kind of chaos would it bring about? If the minister's confidence is well placed, everybody is going to rush to sign up again. This is peacetime. In referring once again to the arguments of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre I should like to read from page 43 of the Official History of the Canadian Army where it is stated:

> Government decided to place militia on active service in Canada (mobile force). Although all submissions to Council were ready and all plans made, we were horrified to hear the cabinet decided at the last minute to change the name of the mobile force from "Canadian Field Force" to "Canadian Active Service Force." The result being many changes, torn up stencils, and $65,000 worth of mobilization forms almost useless. Very hectic day—but we managed to get the general order 135/1939 issued and in the mail to all districts.

It goes on to elaborate on the fact that during wartime each and every serviceman, with the change of name of the force, was given the opportunity to reattest. I quote this because a request was made in the defence committee for a legal opinion from the Department of Justice on whether or not this could be done. It was reported to the committee that a legal opinion was given. If need be, I apologize to the brigadier, but so far as I am concerned the legal opinion was only hearsay. We saw nothing in writing from the Department of Justice. We do not know who in the Department of Justice gave that opinion and until that information is provided it still remains a very pertinent question whether or not this move by the Department of National Defence is legal.

Again I call the minister's attention to what happened in wartime in respect of the decision to send a force overseas. It involved changing the basis upon which men had enlisted in the active service force. These men had enlisted as volunteers. I quote from page 63 of the Official History of the Canadian Army:

> The Minister of National Defence had explained to the House of Commons on 11 September that under the Militia Act (section 68) no man could be required to serve in the field continuously for a longer period than one year, unless he had volunteered to serve for a longer period or "for the war." He suggested that if a decision were made to use part of the active service force overseas the men might be "re-enlisted for overseas service." The statement issued on 19 September confirmed that this would be done, the men of both divisions being re-attested on a basis of volunteering for service in Canada or elsewhere for the duration of the war. Orders were shortly sent out that the whole of the active service force was to be re-attested in this way.

Again I draw the minister's attention to the fact that this re-attestation took place during wartime. I quote further:

> During the afternoon parade at Picton the terms of the "Supplementary Declaration," Form M.F.M.2 (x) were read and explained to Picton Coys., and they were told that they might have a short time in which to discuss these terms and deliberate over them. However one strong voice called out: "I don't need any time on mine! Bring on the declaration! I'm all set to sign!" This was the signal for quite an outburst of enthusiasm, and there was a period of shouting and cheering. The upshot was that when the Coys. were called upon to sign for overseas service "D" Coy. turned out to a man, but five members of 'C" Coy. refused to sign and were heartily booed as a result.
> In all, only five officers and 532 other ranks of the C.A.S.F. declined to re-attest and were struck off the strength, "services no longer required."

The minister says that to re-attest the service personnel into the unified force in peacetime would bring about chaos. This is another indication that he has absolutely no confidence whatsoever in his bill, and I would especially draw his attention to this little incident. Could I have the minister's attention, please?

Mr. Hellyer: You have it.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Is he aware of the fact that one of his colleagues—when I say one of his colleagues I am talking about one of his cabinet colleagues—saw fit to invite me into his office to discuss this very clause and having discussed it, having made references to the examples I have just quoted, this minister, who nevertheless stands up and votes against what we are trying to do on this side, agreed and himself provided a few precedents to back up what we are now arguing, that men in the peacetime forces certainly should be given the opportunity to reattest, especially since the government saw fit to reattest the men during wartime.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Forrestall: Will the real minister stand up?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I might also draw to the attention of the minister some other official records. I am referring to the period following the war in Europe and the activities which were still going on in the Pacific. On April 4 the Prime Minister made a statement in the House of Commons on the Pacific program. This included the information that the men to be employed against Japan would be chosen from those who elected to serve in the Pacific theatre. In other words, there would be no compulsion.

I do not mind competing with members present in the house, Mr. Chairman, but I am having a rough time competing with the noise coming from behind the curtains on the other side.

An hon. Member: Just keep on reading.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The hon. member for Russell could not carry water for a serviceman let alone carry anything else around here. I think the hon. member should be ashamed of himself for being here in this house and allowing Canadian men to be put into the new service compulsorily. The hon. member sits in his seat day in and day out and never makes a worthwhile contribution of any kind other than interjections. If the hon. member for Russell, who is a very prominent member in the snake pit, thinks he can bother me by his interjections—

Mr. Tardif: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman; the hon. member is quite right when he says I sit here regularly, but when he says I make no contribution I should like to say to him that he is making no contribution when he says nothing but foolish things and wastes our time.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I am waiting for your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I should amend what I said and say that the hon. member sits here on occasions.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Cape Breton South has the floor.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, did I hear a ruling on the question of privilege?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Russell, having been mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, wished to state his point and has done so. The hon. member for Cape Breton South has the floor.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): When are we going to get the truth from the Minister of National Defence? When are we going to get the truth concerning what happened in the defence committee? When are we to get the tapes so that we will be able to check them against the printed testimony? When will we hear the minister deny that there is a contract which has been signed by all members in the services? Is the minister now going to get up and deny that he said there was a contract? Is the minister going to deny what the chairman of the defence committee said in the house? I defy the minister to get up and deny these things.

The minister has sat here and listened to the arguments from this side of the house. Now they are bringing in the guillotine. We will have to stop discussing unification and the welfare of the armed services. Why? I will tell you why. They want to go down to Expo on Thursday. They want to take Thursday off. That is the reason we have to stop discussing unification. We have to go down to Expo; we have to wine and dine at the expense of the servicemen. That is what they are doing. How many members on that side can get up and say that the serviceman is receiving the privileges to which he is entitled? How many can stand up and say that this is not compulsory service? Let us hear from the member for Russell now. I have to raise my voice to make myself heard. If anyone has the guts, let him get up, raise his voice and say that what I am saying is wrong and that there is no compulsion about this bill. Let the minister who invited me into his office and agreed with my arguments in respect of clause 6 get up and say he does not agree with me.

What do we get from the Liberal party? The same old attitude. Imagine the nerve this government has when it says we must stop the debate on this bill so that we can go down to Expo. This is what the government is trying to put across to the country—stop this talk about unification so that we can go down and be wined and dined while the Canadian serviceman not only is being compulsorily put into the service but is being put into a service which from now on will not have the distinction of being voluntary. We are now to follow the policy of those countries which have conscription. This is what the minister is bringing about. If he is now going to bring in an amendment to soften this blow, let me remind him that a serviceman today can obtain his release from the service on six months' notice. If that is not so, then may I say that a minister of this government has written a letter to that effect. I have that letter.

Let the Liberal members get up and recall what went on in the committee on national defence. Let everybody remember that the Minister of Transport said that there are no experts on unification because it has never been tried before. He has cast a reflection on every man who has served his country and served it well. The Minister of Transport is laughing. It is surprising that the minister is laughing because whether he likes it or not a number of members of his own party have contradicted his argument. The Minister of National Defence has contradicted him. Members of his party have stood up and read speeches which were probably prepared by officials of the Department of National Defence.

How many people in this country are aware of what the opposition was up against when they were fighting this matter in the committee? The other evening an hon. member referred to the fact that I was appointed to the committee very late in the hearings. He spoke about my contribution. He went so far as to say that I had fallaciously represented that unification could lead to conscription. I should like to have the hon. member refute my arguments. I maintain that what I say in this regard is the truth.

In so far as what went on in the committee is concerned, how many people in this country are aware of the fact that the minister sat behind his committee members along with members of his staff, including his deputy minister, who were there for the express purpose of feeding to the Liberal members on the committee questions which they themselves did not have sufficient knowledge to ask? How many people in this country know about that situation? How many people in this country will believe the Minister of Transport who said that these serving officers or old hats, or whatever he referred to them as, know nothing about this situation, that what was wanted was fresh minds with imagination and that experience and knowledge did not mean anything? That reference includes not only those officers who have recently retired but must also include those now serving in a senior capacity. The Minister of Transport said: "They do not mean a thing". He says there are no experts on unification. He says that it has never been tried before. If it has never been tried before, why did so many members of his party say that unification is a good thing and that the United States marines have it?

• (4:30 p.m.)

There is a contradiction between what the Minister of Transport and the Minister of National Defence have said. One can go through the discussion and find these ministers contradicting each other day after day, but in the final analysis the Minister of National Defence has used that lie to advance his argument. Perhaps someone will suggest that this is unparliamentary language, but a spade is a spade no matter how you look at it. So far as the original use of the word "lie" during this debate is concerned and whether or not it is parliamentary, it was introduced by the minister when he suggested that members on this side were repeating lies. I ask the minister now who originated the lies we supposedly have been repeating.

Mr. Hellyer: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I wish the hon. member would not pluralize that word. I used it in the singular.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): That still does not get you off the hook. Who originally used the word or told the lie that we have been accused of repeating? Let the minister rise on a question of privilege and tell us who originated that lie.

An hon. Member: Order. Stick to the point.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): You have a lot of helpers down at this end, Mr. Chairman, but I do not suppose you will recognize any of them. Who originated that lie? Was it originated by a serving officer who testified before the committee? Was it originated by the Minister of Justice who was quoted, or was it originated by a member of the press? The minister has never answered the question. Yet he is the one who made the suggestion first and he has continually allowed his position to be advanced by that big lie. I am not referring to the big lie technique, and I will repeat this outside the house. I am referring to the big, deliberate lie of which he spoke and took advantage.

The minister now suggests that we should put our service personnel into one unified force without giving them the opportunity of volunteering honourably to be servicemen. Apparently there must now be an element of compulsion even though on several occasions during wartime a choice was given to the men. Let me remind the minister that one of his own colleagues in the cabinet has agreed with this suggestion, although I am sure he will vote against the amendment.

The actions on the part of ministers have been very strange indeed. The former minister of finance—I have not been able to keep up with his promotions—saw fit to sit back and laugh at certain suggestions from this side. I wonder whether he laughed when the Minister of Transport said he should resign. The suggestion was made that no minister who gives the government bad advice should remain in this house. He gives all kinds of advice outside this house on economics and the actions of other parties such as the New Democrats or the Conservatives. He has often given advice to the Liberal party, but I notice that his stature in that regard has decreased considerably.

Only a week or so ago the Minister of Transport when expressing his opinion about unification suggested that anyone who gives bad advice should resign. Surely one might infer from that statement that the Prime Minister should no longer be here because he accepted bad advice. The former minister of finance, as he is best known in the house, makes all kinds of statements regarding issues in this country. Yet he apparently does not see fit to express his opinion in the house on the unification issue. Why does he not express an opinion? Why does he not get up and support the lies upon which the minister of defence has been relying?

The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence assured us that every opportunity would be given to hon. members to hear evidence and examine this bill. One can find by considering the evidence before the committee that the Minister of National Defence was sorry that an opportunity was not given to other people to appear before the committee. In spite of that fact he and his colleagues have now decided to use the guillotine to cut off consideration. Presumably they find that necessary in order that we may visit Expo on Thursday.

What this minister and the Prime Minister are doing in respect of unification of our armed forces is shameful. On a number of occasions during wartime the serving personnel of this country were given the opportunity to reattest. The Minister of National Defence professes confidence in the provisions of this bill. Yet he says if we were to allow the personnel to make a choice it would bring about chaos. How could that be so? The hon. member for Greenwood referred to the suggestion that our service personnel should be given the opportunity to opt into the unified force. Apparently the Liberals were willing to accept that suggestion. All they need to do to show their acceptance is vote for this amendment. Of course, they realize that if an opportunity is given to the serving personnel to opt in they will also be given the opportunity to opt out. I suggest that if the minister does have the confidence in this measure which he professes he should accept this amendment.

Surely we should continue our Canadian forces on a voluntary basis. We should remove any stigma that may be attached to a compulsory service requirement. Although some ministers have expressed a different feeling, I believe the Minister of National Defence could meet a great many of the objections of hon. members on this side by accepting this simple amendment. He should give the serving personnel of this country the same opportunity provided on several occasions during wartime, the opportunity to choose to re-attest. The legality could be considered later, but I think this principle should be accepted by the government at this time.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, for clarification in respect of this clause I should like to ask the minister whether or not he can shed some light on the current status of the armed forces pension fund. It is my understanding that it stands at something over $2 billion and that during the fiscal year 1965-66 $37 million was paid out in pensions. Can the minister advise the committee whether it would not be possible for the government to give consideration to those who choose to take the existing avenue of recourse to resignation rather than whatever may come afterwards? Can the minister tell us whether or not there is sufficient money in the fund to justify the suggestion put forward by Admiral Landymore at page 1052 of the proceedings of the defence committee on February 15 where he pointed out the following:

In order to treat everyone fairly, each officer and man must be given a full pension. By this I mean, a pension equal to 2 per cent of his pay and allowances (averaged over the last six years of service) for each year of service, for all those who have served ten or more years. For those who have served less than ten years—they should have their pension contributions returned to them—

In addition I agree fully they should be given some kind of a settling-out grant, if that is indeed what it is. I raise this question simply because of the illustration given by Admiral Landymore in his testimony. He gave the case history of two officers of the same age who joined the R.C.N. on the same day. Both were still serving at the age of 44 and both had completed 25 years of service. One had been more successful than the other and had reached the rank of naval captain while his term mate was still a lieutenant commander. I suppose that actuarially speaking they are the same age and would have the same life expectancy and therefore the captain who paid in slightly more, because the system is contributory, might be expected to draw slightly more out of the fund. But indeed, as Admiral Landymore pointed out in his evidence, this was not the case. He said:

But this doesn't happen. The captain's pension is subject to a 55 per cent reduction. The lieutenant commander's pension is reduced by 5 per cent. The captain will receive a pension of less than $3,000 a year, while the lieutenant commander receives a pension of about $5,000 a year. The captain has been penalized—he has paid more for his pension, he has taken greater responsibility, and, for his success he receives a much smaller pension.

Before we get to the point of determination on this clause I wonder whether the minister could give us some information on this matter? I would like to move a further amendment after we have dealt with this one, and I believe this is the appropriate place for it.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, this is a most important clause and one which deserves the careful consideration of the committee.

First of all I should like to assure hon. members that these matters were given thoughtful consideration in the department and by the law officers of the crown. It has been suggested that the relationship between officers and men and the crown is contractual in nature. It has long been held, both in the United Kingdom and Canada, that there is no bilateral contract between the Crown and an officer or man serving in the forces of the crown. Thus in 1896 it was said in a case in the United Kingdom:

—it has been laid down over and over again ... that all engagements between those in the military service of the crown and the crown are voluntary only on the part of the crown and give no occasion for an action in respect of any alleged contract.

This case was applied in a Canadian judgment in 1921 where it was said that for both officers and men of the Canadian forces the engagements "are voluntary only on the part of the crown". The same decision was reached in 1940 when the Exchequer Court examined some nine previous cases.

In 1959, in an action for the recovery of pay and allowances, the Exchequer Court was called upon to determine whether anything in the National Defence Act had altered the previous non-contractual relationship between the crown and officers and men. In delivering judgment it was said:

—I think, that in construing the provisions of the National Defence Act I must apply the presumption that parliament, when enacting that act, did not intend to alter such a well established principle unless there be found therein language which in express terms or by clear implication leads to the conclusion that such an alteration was intended. An examination of the act satisfies me that it contains no such express terms or any language which clearly implies that such an alteration was intended.

It has also been suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite that this clause is not within the jurisdiction of parliament and that it comes into conflict with the constitution.

It has long been held that legislation by the government of Canada which properly relates to one of the heads of Section 91 of the B.N.A. Act is intra vires although it may affect the property and civil rights of individuals. Heading 7 of Section 91 is "Militia, Military and Naval Service, and Defence."

In 1958 the Supreme Court of Canada quoted with approval a judgment of the Privy Council in which it was said:

Most of the specific subjects in Section 91 do affect property and civil rights but, so far as the legislation of parliament in pith and substance is operating within the enumerated powers, there is constitutional authority to interfere with such rights.

A decision by the Supreme Court of Canada in 1962 is directly in point. In that case the Supreme Court was called upon to decide whether a provision of the Exchequer Court Act, which provided that an officer or man of the armed forces was deemed to be a servant of the crown for purposes of establishing liability, was ultra vires as affecting property and civil rights. Part of the judgment reads as follows:

In my opinion, to declare the nature of the relationship existing between the crown and members of the armed forces for any or all purposes is legislation within the exclusive jurisdiction of parliament under head 7 and accordingly, intra vires. This does not depend, in my view, upon any such ground as that to do this is necessarily incidental to the powers of parliament under head 7: it is a direct dealing with the matter within such powers.

In considering this bill it must be presumed that officers and men join the service to serve their country, Canada. I do not think it is too unreasonable to assume that they will want to continue to serve Canada in the unified service. Nevertheless I think it can be argued that in view of the fundamental nature of the change proposed in merging three services into one, the officers and men should not, except in an emergency, be required to continue to serve against their will.

It was for this reason that I gave the standing committee on defence the assurance that the present policy in respect of releases would continue. I must admit that I have been impressed by the argument that it would be preferable to write the provision into the law rather than to rely on a statement of policy. I propose therefore, after we have disposed of the amendment now before us, to ask one of my colleagues to move the following as an amendment.

That clause 6 be amended by adding thereto subclauses three and four as follows:

6. (3) Notwithstanding anything in this act or in the National Defence Act and subject to subsection 4, where an officer or man was a member of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army or the Royal Canadian Air Force immediately prior to the day on which this act is proclaimed and, within two months after that day, makes application in writing to his commanding officer for his release, he is entitled, except in an emergency, to be released within six months after that day.

(4) Where a person while an officer or man has received university, advanced technical or aircrew training or education at public expense, his right to release under subsection 3 is subject to such conditions as may be prescribed in regulations made by the Governor in Council.

I am advised, Mr. Chairman, that there is some question of the amendment now before us being in order because, as I understand it, it is in exactly the same wording as an amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in the committee, as recorded at pages 2371 and 2372. It is my understanding that a decision of the committee is binding on the house. Nevertheless, if you find that this amendment is in order I would ask the committee to defeat it and then I will ask one of my colleagues to introduce the amendment to which I have just referred and which I hope will be found generally acceptable.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal briefly with the question of pensions which was raised by the hon. member for Halifax. First of all, there is no more money in the fund than is required to meet its obligations. As a matter of fact, hon. members will recall that in the estimates recently presented to the House of Commons the largest single increase, I think something in the order of $75 million for the fiscal year, was required to meet an actuarial deficit—I think only one fifth of the actuarial deficit —caused by increases in pay awarded to members of the armed forces last year.

It is true to say, therefore, that notwithstanding the size of the fund, the fund is committed to meet obligations on the basis of undertakings presently in force. It is a very generous pension fund, and I think quite rightly so because service in the armed forces is unlike service in many other fields of endeavour in that it requires the best of an officer or man during his most productive years. It is not unreasonable, therefore, that he should be treated accordingly by the people of this country. It was designed in order to keep officers and men in the forces once they had served for a reasonable period of time, and by and large it has been successful in doing this.

It is one of the provisions, I think, of most industrial and public pension plans, that after a certain period of service there is a definite advantage to the individual to remain in the organization or service in which he is employed. I believe one could raise a general question about the desirability of this kind of pension plan and the regidity that it introduces into our system, and perhaps the desirability of having much more portability than presently exists between different pension plans. However, at the moment we are looking at the problem strictly in the context of the legislation now before us, and in that context I think we must admit this bill does not change the circumstances under which the pension law was written in so far as its general application is concerned.

Servicemen leaving the service now are subjected to an actuarial reduction. They receive a smaller pension over a longer period of time, and this has been taken into account in determining the payments required to the fund from time to time, including the actuarial deficit to which I referred a moment ago. A suggestion was made to the effect that the actuarial reduction not apply. The result would be that a special benefit would be provided for people leaving the service. I think this would not be acceptable for one reason, according to my discussions with the officers and men of the forces, and that is that the people who would be most likely to take advantage of it are the pilots, engineers, lawyers and professional people whose training would be in the greatest demand in the civilian economy.

This problem has been freely discussed internally. We have come to the conclusion that the result of this kind of special treatment would not reflect directly our appreciation of the bill now before us but would reflect much more closely the opportunity available to individuals in the civilian economy. We have gone into this question very carefully over a long period of time to see whether or not there might be some relaxation in the present reduction at some senior levels. At the present time we have not been able to devise a policy which meets satisfactorily all the cases. We are still looking into it. I have not seen as yet a proposal which was not subject to very serious technical reservations.

Mr. Forrestall: Surely the minister will accept the fact that there is a tremendous disparity between captains and lieutenant commanders?

Mr. Hellyer: I freely admit, as I did in the other committee, that there are basic anomalies in the law. It is under general review to see if we cannot design a more equitable law. In the meantime there are anomalies which are known by my hon. friend and others.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the fund is fully committed to meet present obligations, any bonuses or extra considerations given to those who desired to leave the service as a result of this bill would be a considerable additional charge on the public account. We have decided this would not be in the best interests of the service or the country at the present time.

The Chairman: May I make a reference to the point of order raised by the Minister of National Defence with regard to the amendment before the committee. I should point out that in the opinion of the Chair a decision made in the committee on national defence with reference to an amendment does not bind this house. If that were so, then all the amendments made in the standing committee and recorded in this bill would also be binding on the committee of the whole.

May I refer hon. members to page 523 of May, seventeenth edition, the second paragraph under the heading, "Synopsis of Stages of a bill"? This paragraph reads:

> Upon this principle, it is laid down by Hatsell, and is constantly exemplified, "that in every stage of a bill, every part of the bill is open to amendment, either for insertion or omission, whether the same amendment has been, in a former stage, accepted or rejected".

Mr. Forrestall: I have one or two questions for the minister concerning pensions. Are my figures correct, that approximately $37 million was paid out in the fiscal year 1965-66 while some $55 million was taken in?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not have the figures before me, Mr. Chairman, but they sound reasonable. I would be willing to accept them until otherwise advised.

Mr. Forrestall: My other question must be, what has happened to the pension fund? Has it gone back into general revenues? Is it not kept separate? This is a contributory plan and the money belongs to these men, no matter how they get it back.

Mr. Hellyer: I am afraid the question being asked is well outside of my jurisdiction. If I had to give a reply merely from my own vague knowledge of the subject, it would be that these are largely bookkeeping entries in government accounts and the money has already been used for other governmental purposes but the interest is credited to the account each year.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Forrestall: That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. Hellyer: Then the total amount outstanding in the account is available to meet the liabilities of the fund. If I understand the system correctly, it is merely that the funds have been used on government account and the interest accrues on that basis.

Mr. Groos: Mr. Chairman, just before we vote on this amendment I should like to say that I agree with some of the things said by the hon. member for Halifax just prior to the minister's remarks, particularly in respect of the case to which he referred of the captain and the lieutenant commander and the disparity in their pensions. Bilateral contract or not, Mr. Chairman, as the minister has explained this is undoubtedly legal. However, I was glad to hear the minister make the point that this anomaly is being studied at the moment.

Although this is an inequity I know it is unintentional. Certainly it is not intentional under the arrangements proposed by this bill. I hope the minister and the department will continue to give the matter special attention because I believe it wrong in every way—I deem this inequity in effect to be a penalty—to penalize any man or officer who has the intelligence or distinction to be promoted, as is the situation in this case. Therefore I hope that the minister can find some way to resolve this question in the near future.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment on a couple of matters raised by the minister in connection with whether or not a contract exists between the serviceman and the government. Although the argument he used that the government is not bound by the contract and that the courts have held that what the government gives the serviceman under what we regard as an agreement is a voluntary payment may perhaps be technically correct, I would point out that while the serviceman is bound he is only bound to the extent to which he signs.

The minister told us that a serviceman joins the services to serve Canada, and then he used this in the same context when talking about a contract. That is completely misleading. The serviceman is not bound to serve Canada in this context. He is bound to serve in the armed force that he joined, and that is all he is bound to do. I want to make sure that we are not misled by what the minister says and that there is no suggestion that when a man joins the armed services he is bound to serve Canada and therefore automatically bound to serve this new force. That argument does not hold water when subjected to legal interpretation. I do not think I would have too much difficulty in distinguishing the other cases in light of the pith and substance of this legislation, but that question can be argued before the courts.

The minister has suggested that a man can be released from the forces by giving notice within two months after the coming into force of this legislation and be released after the expiration of six months. As far as I am concerned this puts the matter on the wrong basis. This legislation provides that a man is voluntarily transferred to the new force unless he takes the opportunity to release himself from the forces within a certain length of time. This does not alter the fact that this amounts to peacetime conscription. This release is only available to certain people who disagree with unification, and I can see that the six months' period is going to be made plain hell for anybody who waits for his release under those conditions.

We all know, what the minister has done to senior officers who disagreed with him, and I have some idea what would happen to members of the forces, who today are unable to voice their feelings and live in fear and trembling down through the ranks, if they said something which was not in accordance with the minister's policy. I think that the minister's explanation is most unsatisfactory.

Amendment (Mr. Churchill) negatived: Yeas, 25; nays, 74.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether my colleague the Minister of Transport would be good enough to move this amendment for me, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could move the amendment and the Chair could read it without my doing so, if that is agreeable.

The Deputy Chairman: It is moved by the Minister of Transport:

That clause 6 be amended by adding thereto subclauses (3) and (4) as follows:

(3) Notwithstanding anything in this act or in the National Defence Act and subject to subsection (4), where an officer or man was a member of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army or the Royal Canadian Air Force immediately prior to the day on which this act is proclaimed and, within two months after that day, makes application in writing to his commanding officer for his release, he is entitled, except in an emergency, to be released within six months after that day.

(4) Where a person while an officer or man has received university, advanced technical or aircrew training or education at public expense, his right to release under subsection (3) is subject to such conditions as may be prescribed in regulations made by the governor in council.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the minister would like us to think that he has made quite a concession here. But all he is doing of course is writing into the bill something that he has already said in committee and this merely clarifies it. The minister is still retaining the objectionable factor that my amendment was intended to cure, namely, compulsory transfer from the present services into the new service.

I am even wondering whether there is a catch in the amendment. It contains the words, "except in an emergency". Section 31 of the present act, which is not being amended, deals with the problem of securing a release from the forces. That section provides:

• (5:10 p.m.)

Except during an emergency or when he is on active service, an officer or man is entitled to be released at the expiration of the term of service for which he is enrolled or re-engaged.

That applies to the end of a man's service. An exception is made in case of an emergency or when the man is on active service. We were told by the Judge Advocate General in the committee hearings that since the Korean war officers and men in the services have been on active service. Is the minister taking shelter behind the phrase "on active service"? If an officer or man applies for release, under the proposed amendment, will the department's reply be that he is on active service and must complete his full term? What is the minister's answer?

Mr. Hellyer: The answer would be in the negative, that matter being covered in proposed subsection 3 by the words "except in an emergency". This proposed subsection would not be effected by the fact the armed services are on active service.

Mr. Churchill: I have another question about pensions. Where a man or officer wishes to withdraw, does the minister contemplate any penalty with respect to his pension? Will that penalty be any different from any penalty the man might incur now if he were to withdraw voluntarily?

Mr. Hellyer: If I understood the hon. member's question, the present regulations would apply and there would be no penalty. In all fairness I must differentiate between how the word "penalty" is used and what a penalty is. We must be careful of our language here. What is normally called a penalty is an actuarial reduction. There would be no other penalty beyond the actuarial reduction and the regulations presently in force would continue to apply.

Mr. Churchill: I intend to vote against the amendment because it retains that compulsion to which I have been objecting. I regret that the minister has not sufficient confidence in our armed forces personnel to permit them to reattest. For some time now he has been telling us that everybody in the services wants to go along with his plan. Yet he will not risk his ideas by putting an attestation paper in front of armed forces personnel to prove his point. I doubt very much that conditions in the services are as happy and pleasant as the minister says they are. I think there is unrest in the services. Were the minister absolutely sure of his men he would do as we did in September, 1939, when we reattested the volunteers twice in a row without trouble. The official history shows that only 500 men out of several thousand failed to reattest. Perhaps a small number only would fail to reattest again, were they granted the privilege of attesting with respect to enrolment in the service. I am afraid that the minister does not have the courage of his convictions.

Mr. Forrestall: May I ask the minister a question? It is obvious that the amendment will carry. I agree with the position adopted by previous speakers. Will the minister undertake to communicate the intent of the amendment to our armed services without delay so that its meaning may be clear to them and they need not resort to news media or other unofficial means of communication to obtain information about the amendment?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, I shall be pleased to give that undertaking. A lengthy telegram is being prepared to be sent to members of the armed forces when the bill is passed by this house and the other place setting out a number of provisions, including this one, and informing our armed forces personnel what they can expect in the months ahead and when the regulations will be made available to them for perusal.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister a question similar to one I asked before. I do not expect a reply from the minister but I ask it hoping for a reply. My question involves those men who, two months after this bill is proclaimed and becomes law, say they do not wish to re-enlist. It is well known that in our forces there may be ambitious sergeants eager to prove to their superiors that they are worthy to be promoted. Ambitious sergeants can make life intolerable for men who have to wait six months before being released. In view of the hardship that some men may suffer at the hands of ambitious sergeants would the minister not consider shortening the waiting period to two or three months? Is there any reason why that cannot be done?

Mr. Hellyer: Six months is the maximum period, Mr. Chairman. That time period is included in the bill out of deference to those who will be posted to replace people seeking release. Some notice must be given so that another serviceman may be posted to replace the man wishing to go. This time period is necessary for the administrative machine to function in some sort of reasonable fashion and to give fair notice to the replacement officer or man and to his family.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I ask the mover of the amendment to define "emergency" as set out in the amendment.

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps I could tell the hon. member. It means war, invasion—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I asked the mover of the amendment to say what is meant by emergency. This again shows the slipshod way in which the government handles the affairs of our armed forces.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman has been in this house and in the committee long enough to know that when a minister is piloting a bill through the house and asks one of his colleagues to move an amendment that is merely a matter of formality and that the minister who is dealing with a bill is in the best position to explain precisely what the meaning of the amendment is. It does not seem to me that there is any particular reason on this occasion for the hon. gentleman to extend that usual courtesy for which he is so famous.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): As I may have said before, when it comes to courtesy and rudeness between the Minister of Transport and myself I may he ahead on courtesy and the minister may be ahead on rudeness. I ask the Minister of National Defence whether he will not strengthen his amendment by using the words "national emergency" to make clear that by national emergency a war or something of that kind is contemplated.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: I think the conditions I have described are considered to be national emergencies.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Well, would you mind writing in the word "national" then?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not think that would alter the effect of the law at all.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): It certainly qualifies the term. If the minister thinks it would make no difference, there should be no objection to writing the word in. A national emergency would be one affecting the whole of Canada. The department could dream up any number of emergencies so far as the armed forces are concerned.

What the minister has said about administrative difficulties is another indication that the Department of National Defence is not operating as efficiently as it should or as it did during wartime. During the war the department was able to reattest the men on very short notice indeed. In fact, within one day they went ahead with a decision to do it. Now the minister says at least two months are needed. This is a reflection on the administration of the department and it implies a lack of competence on the part of the minister. He tells us now that the addition of the word "national" would not result in any change. In that case, why not write it into the bill?

Amendment (Mr. Pickersgill) agreed to: Yeas 66; nays, 28.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment carried. Shall the clause as amended in the standing committee and further amended in committee of the whole carry?

Mr. Churchill: On division.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Restriction on employment.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Churchill: Let us not be in such haste. There are groans from the other side, as usual. I do not intend to make a long speech. I did put forward a proposal the other day which would have shortened our consideration of this bill but it was not accepted. We discussed the bill on Tuesday and Wednesday when we should have been doing other business. Had my proposal been accepted we would not have had this debate on Thursday or Friday or today. This is where the time has been taken up.

While I am speaking of time I think it is going too far for people to announce to the public in one way or another that the time of the House of Commons spent on this bill has been as great as they say. It is hardly fair to give the impression to the public, as some people have done, that this bill has been under discussion for 55 days or, according to others, for 29 days. It is quite untrue. The bill came under discussion on December 7 when the minister made his speech on second reading. Only then was it before the house for debate. That was on a Wednesday. The reply on December 7 by my hon. friend from Edmonton West was limited in time to about 20 minutes. Then the bill came up again on second reading earlier this year and we spent —what was it?—two days on second reading. In committee of the whole house we have now spent several days on it.

An hon. Member: Sixteen.

Mr. Churchill: That is all the time which has been spent on this bill and I wish that those who make announcements over the air or in the papers would be fair to the House of Commons and give the people of Canada the correct impression. We have not spent an excessive amount of time on this bill which is of major importance.

Clause 7 of the bill reads:

> Except in an emergency, no officer or man who was a member of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army or the Royal Canadian Air Force immediately prior to the coming into force of this part shall, without his consent, be required to perform any duty in the Canadian Forces that he could not have been required to perform as a member of such service.

This clause recognizes something which we think should continue to be recognized, namely, that men have made a definite choice in entering one of the three services and should be given an opportunity to continue in the service of their choice. It is intended to protect people who are now in the three services from being required to perform duties outside those they might have been expected to perform in their present services. Obviously some such clause was necessary or the hierarchy of the department might transfer officers and men from navy to army or from army to air force who had no wish to serve in an altered capacity.

The very fact that this clause appears in the bill indicates that people who enter the defence forces after the passage of this measure will be subject to transfer among the branches of the service. Otherwise, why is it here? There will be two types of people in this service after this bill is passed, those who have already entered the army, the navy or the air force and those who enter the defence force later. Though the minister has told us they will not be required to do certain things, they will obviously be subject to transfer with or without their consent. This may have a bad effect on morale or it may lead to unsatisfactory conditions.

We had an example offered us which, frankly, I consider to be somewhat ridiculous. A pilot exercise was carried out in which two members of the army served on board a destroyer. The purpose was to see whether it would be satisfactory for somebody from the army to serve at sea. It all depends on the individual. Some people could serve as readily on land as at sea or in the air, but I do not think this pilot project proved anything at all. Nevertheless it is an indication that what is intended is that men who enlist in the future are going to be shifted, without any leave on their part, from one branch of the service to another or from one area to another. Even those whose enlistment earlier was in a special force—navy, army or air force—in an emergency will be moved about under the provisions of this clause.

The whole point of clause 7 is that it indicates the complete obliteration of the three distinct services. Yet in wartime there will still be activity at sea, separate and apart from land and air, there will still be activity in the air, separate and apart from land and sea, and there will still be activity on land, separate and apart from sea and air. This is taking place in Viet Nam at the present time. In the Vietnamese war there have been fights between fighter aircraft, and we had an example involving Israel and Syria just two weeks ago. But the minister has told us, "Oh no, all of this is in the past. All of this is old-fashioned. That is the way people used to do it in the olden days but now it is all different. No longer will there be clashes between air forces or clashes between fleets."

The strange thing is that other countries are still maintaining their fleets. They are building up their submarine fleets. For example, I do not know how an army is going to deal with a submarine 400 miles off the coast of Canada. It would appear to me you would have to have ships and airplanes to undertake that task, but the minister tells us that all of this is to be altered and nothing is to be done as it was done in the past.

I point out that under clause 7 the intention is quite obvious in an emergency to move the people presently in the services from one force to another, and it is also the intention that when new people enlist in the future they will not have the privilege of those now in the separate services to select what they are going to do. They will be liable to be shifted back and forth. It is an undesirable clause.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I find this clause a little confusing. If we are to take the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra as correct, that all this bill does is change the name of the forces, then obviously it contains no provision to change the duties of serving personnel, and so I shall expect the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra to vote against this clause as being useless and redundant.

Mr. Deachman: You had better reread my speech.

Mr. Nugent: I got sick listening to it once, and heaven forbid I should have to reread it. The argument made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre applies. I imagine that when this act comes into force there is going to be a clear distinction so long as there remains in the new force anyone who is carried over from the old forces. There will be two classes of citizens, so to speak, in the armed forces, and this clause is going to make sure that it will be a permanent distinction. One class of citizen will be the new members who are subject to any duty at all in the combined forces and the other class will consist of those carried over from the old forces who, when ordered to change duties, can say, "Just a minute; here are my duties." In other words, whether in the country generally or in the armed forces we have always tried to avoid making a distinction between the working or serving conditions of one citizen and another, but this is going to be perpetuated by this bill and perpetuated not just for the six months during which anybody now serving can get out of the services after the coming into force of the bill.

I have an idea why the minister included this provision. It is to reassure people that their conditions of service will not change that drastically, that it will be the same old job. It is to tell them that, just as the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra said, "Maybe you will have a new uniform but there will be no drastic changes and you had better stay on." This reveals the depths of the minister's fear of how shocking members of the present forces find unification, his fear of the amount of demoralization that has set in and his fear of the degree to which serving personnel are going to abandon the unified force when they get a chance. So this provision is thrown out as a crumb to try to stem the tide of revulsion sweeping the forces against this bill.

It also points up very drastically some of the speeches which the minister and his supporters have made respecting the duties of the new force and the advantages of interchangeability even under integration, such as those claimed for the common training command. We have had some indications that training command is not working all that well. It has been discovered that there is not that much training in common among the three services, that specialization sets in so quickly that already, according to the evidence, there is real doubt that having one amalgamated training command has accomplished anything. Some testimony has been given that it is a waste of time and more expensive than an individual training command for each of the services. However, if the claimed great advantages of unification are going to be brought out, are going to be sold, then I suppose the minister had to sell the idea of interchangeability and training command was an illustration of it. All I can say is that this certainly makes a mockery out of his argument of interchangeability because if they have been trained in one service they cannot be required to perform in another. If we are going to get any advantages out of interchangeability, and we doubt there will be any in a realistic sense, then under the new set up only the new men who enter the force can be interchanged, according to the provisions of this clause.

However, I think this will not be the hindrance that it appears to be because the facts of military life are going to take effect, especially with reference to the phrase "without his consent." The classic army situation of asking for three volunteers, you, you and you, is not really so far removed from the truth. Volunteers in most instances are just picked at random or the sergeant may say to them, "You are going to do this, won't you?" That will be the extent of it and I think this is a beautiful illustration of the fallacy of some of the arguments used by the minister. It is a perfect illustration of the never-never-land in which the Minister of National Defence seems to live, in that it shows what he will do to try to sell this bill, what he will do to try to take the stink out of what he is doing to the armed forces and the extent to which he will go to make us believe everything is fine. But all this accomplishes is really nothing. The only worth of this provision will be shown if life in the armed services is not realistic and if the phrase "without his consent" means something, but that is a pretty nebulous sort of thing because consent is too easily obtained.

• (5:40 p.m.)

If I am wrong in that regard then, of course, the only effect of this clause will be to make a very distinct cleavage between the two classes of people who will be in the services from the time this legislation comes into effect and for all time. Since the new boys will have joined freely and will be willing to serve anywhere they may regard the old boys as second class citizens. This situation might accelerate the attempt of the old boys to get out or it might accentuate the differences which will exist between the two groups and lead to misunderstanding. I do not particularly care whether or not this clause passes. No doubt it is necessary for those who will have the will to stand up and take advantage of it. I believe it will create a good deal of confusion, but perhaps that is what the minister deserves for having brought in a bill of this kind.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Mr. Churchill: Call the yeas and nays.

Clause agreed to: Yeas 51; nays 24.

The Chairman: Clause 8.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, we have pretty well completed part I, which is the essential part of the bill. I wonder whether we might revert now to clause 2. I think we would be prepared to deal with that clause without further discussion. If we then proceeded with part II we might make rapid progress in respect ot those clauses.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I think that is an agreeable suggestion if it meets the wishes of the committee.

The Chairman: Is it the wish of members of the committee that we revert to clause 2?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 2—Canadian Forces, Canadian Armed Forces.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, will you call the yeas and nays.

Clause agreed to: yeas 58; nays 22.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Although my point of order will have no effect on the outcome of the vote, I should like to say it is a well known rule that once a vote has been called, whether in committee or otherwise, members are not permitted to enter the chamber to record their votes. During the last two votes members on the Liberal side have rushed in in quite large numbers. At the time they were coming in this fact was drawn to the attention of the Chair, I believe, by shouts of order from this side of the house. It was most evident that quite a number of members on that side rushed in although the rules do not permit this. I realize my point of order is just that and has no effect on the vote. I believe, however, that the Chair recognizes the fact that these members did walk in after the vote was called.

The Chairman: I think the point of order raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South is well taken. At this point I might read standing order No. 12 which is applicable in this regard. The standing order reads as follows:

(2) When Mr. Speaker is putting a question, no member shall enter, walk out of or across the House, or make any noise or disturbance.

I would ask members of the committee to adhere to that standing order.

Clauses 8 to 25 inclusive agreed to on division.

On clause 26—Drunkenness.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, may I say a few words in respect of this clause. I should like to apologize to the brigadier but I am still concerned about clause 26. I realize the seriousness and consequences of the act of being drunk while on duty. However, the clause reads:

Drunkenness is an offence and every person convicted thereof is liable to imprisonment for less than two years—

I wonder whether the minister, with the assistance of his law officers represented by the minister's very able assistant, would indicate whether this could be more closely tied in with the civil law or made a little clearer in relation to that law.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult to compare military and civil situations, although I suppose in some instances they are comparable. In the armed forces certain tasks have to be performed for the general safety of the organization as a whole. If a man were drunk on duty and failed to perform that task, that failure might result in a very serious loss of life of other members of the forces. Such a failure could result in consequences of a very far-reaching nature.

Naturally the penalty provided in this regard relates to an extreme case. In most cases, as a matter of fact, the penalties applied are much less than the maximum, but one might envisage a situation where the magnitude of a crime and its consequences might be so great that a penalty of this order of magnitude would be justified, particularly as a deterrent to that kind of failure to perform.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, this is a permissive clause which gives the authority to a tribunal to send a man on active service to jail for up to two years on conviction. Let me give an example. Suppose it is 6.30 at night and four fellows are in the mess having a beer or two. One of them may not have had any lunch and is a little bit under the weather. That man is subject to a sentence of 90 days in jail. This seems absurd to me because most individuals who are thrown in jail in Canada for being drunk usually are sentenced to 24 hours and a fine of $5 and costs. That is the end of the matter. In any event I will leave the matter with those comments.

Clause 26 agreed to on division.

Clauses 27 to 65 inclusive agreed to on division.

Schedules A and B agreed to on division.

On clause 1—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make a lengthy speech at this stage but I should like to make this comment. At this stage and subsequently on third reading we could delay the passage of this bill by a discussion on this point of importance. The defence of the realm is one of the prerogatives of the Crown which must be considered seriously. Just recently we witnessed a ceremony at which a representative of the crown was sworn in. During the course of that swearing-in ceremony it was obvious that the Queen's representative became the commander in chief of the military forces of Canada, the Canadian defence forces. In view of the grave responsibility which rests upon the representative of the crown in this regard it is essential that a minister at some stage—this would have to be done before third reading—indicate to the House of Commons that the consent of the Governor General has been obtained in respect of this fundamental change in this area of his responsibility.

I suggest to the minister that considerable argument could be developed regarding this point which relates to a matter some people may feel inconsequential, archaic, old-fashioned or out of date. On the other hand, under our system of a constitutional monarchy with a parliament consisting of the crown, the House of Commons and the Senate, anything that infringes upon the prerogatives of the crown should be considered carefully. The House of Commons should not assume powers that have not been given.

I have read some debates on this subject. While I understand that practice and custom over the years have limited the prerogatives of the crown to a considerable extent, I realize what is happening in this country regarding the wiping out of so much of our tradition. Let me suggest to the minister that if he will give us an assurance now, or when he proceeds with the bill tomorrow, that he will make the customary statement indicating that the Governor General has been apprised of the nature of this bill and consents to this fundamental change in our armed forces, I will not prolong the debate on the issue of these prerogatives. Let me remind the committee that it is open to us at this stage and on third reading to put forward an argument which would effectively block the passage of this bill for some time. Is the minister now prepared to give that assurance?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I will take that under consideration. I think it raises a rather fundamental constitutional issue. Certainly under our constitution parliament consists of three parts: the House of Commons, the Senate, and the crown as represented in our country by the Governor General. Therefore the bill cannot become law before it receives the consent of the Governor General who is the commander in chief of the armed forces. I do not wish to go beyond that at the moment but would want to take a look at some of the constitutional authorities.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Transport is fully aware of all this. We quite agree that there has to be the consent of the Governor General after the bill has been passed by both houses. What I am speaking about is approval prior to the removal of one of the prerogatives of the crown.

Mr. Hellyer: I will certainly be willing to look into the matter because I am just as intrigued by the point as my hon. friend is.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, if the minister is going to look into it I hope he will consider very seriously the view that in a constitutional monarchy control over legislation would appear to rest with this house in accordance with modern practice. I would be very surprised indeed if the Governor General's view on this matter would either be expressed by him or should even be sought from him. I would have thought the Governor General would carefully avoid injecting himself into a political matter of this nature which has been fully considered by parliament because the matter is so sweeping and so interesting. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said the view he is propounding might be regarded as archaic and old-fashioned. I did not catch the third adjective but if I may I might possibly add "antediluvian". However, whatever it may be it is of sufficient interest that I hope the minister will not treat it lightly but will look into it seriously. My feeling certainly is that any intervention by the Governor General or any request for his intervention would, in this day and age, be a constitutional anomaly and one probably to be avoided.

Mr. Churchill: I hope the hon. member for Greenwood is not attempting to muddy the waters. I was not asking for an intervention by the Governor General. The hon. member for Greenwood has intervention so much on his mind in connection with the peace restoring force, intervention of which he approves, that he is getting a bit confused. All I am suggesting is that the Governor General, being commander in chief of the forces of Canada, should be apprised in advance when something is going to be done with regard to the forces for which he is responsible. Has that been done? If it has not been done, will the minister do it? Will he inform the house that it has been done and that the Governor General has graciously consented that the government go ahead with this measure, after which it will receive royal assent?

Mr. Knowles: Is that not an intervention?

Mr. Churchill: I am surprised the hon. member has not given us the reference. He debated the issue with regard to the petition of right in 1951. At that time five members of the House of Commons participated, namely hon. Mr. Garson who was then minister of justice; the hon. member for Prince Albert; the former member for Greenwood, Mr. Macdonnell; the former member for Eglinton, Mr. Fleming, and Mr. Coldwell. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre also participated. The then minister of justice accepted their point of view. It was an interesting legal debate. He came back to the house before third reading and brought the message that the Governor General of that day consented to the house dealing with one of the prerogatives of the crown. This was done before third reading.

We have only taken about seven minutes on this point. I do not want to detain the house with this very interesting and potentially lengthy argument. Everyone can see that the hon. member for Greenwood and, on my invitation, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would love to get into such a lengthy, difficult and abstruse debate and would not add much light to it. I would ask the minister to look up the reference and to give us the assurance tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: I was taught to yield not to temptation.

Clause agreed to on division.

Title agreed to on division.

Bill reported.

The Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time, at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir), Veterans Affairs—Camp Hill, N.S.—report of lack of hospital accommodation; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), Water Resources—participation by Canada in "Water for Peace" Conference: the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane (Mr. Tremblay), ARDA—application of ARDA in the lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé region.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, in view of the progress we have made today I wonder whether it would not be the desire of the house to take a little longer for dinner than we might otherwise have done.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I was just going to do two things. First I wish to thank hon. members for their co-operation in committee of the whole house in respect of the bill to amend the National Defence Act and to say how much we appreciate the co-operation of hon. members on all sides of the house. I think there was a very thoughtful and careful examination of the bill in committee. The second thing I would like to do is to concur in the suggestion that in view of the progress we have made perhaps the house by mutual agreement might rise until eight o'clock this day.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is an order of the house made on Thursday, April 6, that the house suspend its sittings from seven to eight o'clock. If it is the wish of the house to suspend now until eight o'clock it will require unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Before we rise could the house leader tell us what item of business will be called at eight o'clock?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to talk with the party leaders in the next five minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The sitting is suspended until eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF COSTS, AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES, ETC.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-278, respecting the occupational training of adults.

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deliver a few remarks on the second reading of this bill on behalf of the minister, who was on his way to fulfil a speaking engagement prior to our being advised that the bill would be coming up for consideration this evening. The absence of the minister is entirely unavoidable, and I should like to make these remarks on his behalf. I do not believe anyone expected the unification bill would be disposed of this afternoon, after such a lengthy debate.

Mr. Speaker, the bill we are to discuss this evening is not new in principle, to members of this house. The policy on which it is based was made clear by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) last October. Essentially, what the bill does is to give the government of Canada power to buy various kinds of training for Canadian workers. Hitherto, we have not done this. We have reimbursed the provinces for a part of the costs that they incurred in providing training. The change puts us in a more positive role. It makes us responsible for seeing that training responds to the needs of the economy. But I want immediately to make it very clear that, in doing this, we are not violating provincial jurisdictions. We represent the consumers of training. We are enabling the demand for training to be effective.

To serve its purpose, training must be provided in the occupation in which the individual will be able to find employment suited to him. We propose to pay for that training. There is no thought of our doing the training. The bill of course does not provide for that. It simply makes us the financial agents of all the hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers whose future earnings are dependent on more training, but who do not have the resources to invest in the training at the time they need it.

There is no doubt about the economic need for the program. Canada's demands for skilled workers must very largely be met by tapping the reservoir of able but untrained people in our labour force. That is the principal way to meet the skilled manpower shortages which hold back our industrial growth. The bill is directed toward those goals. It is not designed to compete with provincial education and training systems. It is not to provide cultural betterment, or to help people go to university. Those are vital matters, but they are not what this program is about.

Every day technological change robs old skills of their value. Men and women who were once adequately trained find that they cannot compete in our increasingly technical world. Since 1949, for instance, over half a million farmers have left Canadian agriculture. Very few of them left with the skills that other industries needed. In our new economy the number of people who will have only one occupation during their lives is very small. But retraining people whose jobs are disappearing is only part of the task; we must also train the adults who earlier could not get the training that people need today. Even compared with ten years ago, school systems have been greatly expanded and diversified. They provide today's secondary school graduates with much more of the knowledge needed to earn one's way in the world.

But that has been no help to the great majority of people who are now working. The opportunities were not there during their youth. The training that will be financed under this legislation must meet the practical needs of a wide range of mature adults and it must frequently utilize techniques different from those normally employed in the training of youth. We cannot realistically ask a mature adult to return to school for an extended period of time; we must have accelerated courses which will do the job as quickly as possible. Adults want to work at a job; training is a route to that goal, not a goal itself.

The core of a successful adult training program is the ten months skill course. The provinces run a wide range of such courses, and we can expect that this range will widen further as the program expands. But workers all too often have forgotten—or never received—their basic training in arithmetic, scientific and linguistic skills. When this background is necessary for a skill course that a worker wants to take, we will pay for it. But the intent of the program is not extended educational training. The basic upgrading is simply a means to the objective, which is occupational training.

The individual courses that will be financed for adults will extend from a week to a year, depending on what they want and need. A man may need, and will be able to get, a one year upgrading course followed by a one year skill course. But this will not be a lifetime limit. A basic premise of the program is that our manpower needs shift over time. A man who must pursue several occupations during his working life may need training for each one.

It is not, of course, enough to make the proper kind of training available. Adults who have economic responsibilities need income during training. Those people who have been members of the labour force—for the past three years, or for one year if they have dependants—will be eligible for allowances to let them take training.

Eligibility for payment of training costs will require only that a person be one year above the school leaving age and have been out of school for one year. Even the last condition will be waived for apprentices. But it would not be fair to give people who lack adult responsibilities the allowances designed to let people discharge those responsibilities. We would not wish, by offering these allowances, to induce young people to drop out of school and take short term adult training when more high school training or a technological institute course is what they most need.

There will be no means test for allowances and a person need not be unemployed to qualify. These allowances are an income substitute to let people take training. They are not a form of relief. The allowances will initially be between a minimum of $35 and a maximum of $90 a week, varying with the number of dependants a man has and the general level of earnings in his province or region. The maximum scale will be $35 for a person who supports only himself, $55 for a person with one dependant, $65 if there are two dependants, and $75 if he has three or more dependants. In addition, a person who must leave his home town to take training will get up to $15 weekly to compensate for the extra expense. This is a total of $90 per week, or approximately $390 monthly.

We will seek provincial advice and agreement on the appropriate level of the allowance we use in each province. If a province wishes, we will be willing to use different scales in different parts of a province to better reflect variations in the level of earnings.

The bill provides that, starting on July 1, 1968, the allowance limits will be escalated each year in line with the increase in average hourly earnings in manufacturing. Over the last available five-year period this index has gone up by an average of 3½ per cent each year. The scales used in each province and the amount for each dependant will be adjusted at the same time as the national limits.

An essential aspect of allowances for adults is prompt and regular payment. I should therefore mention one detail that is provided for in the regulations. Canada Manpower Centres will be able to advance $25 to those who need it to help tide them over during their first week of training. Most adult training courses will be provided by provincial or municipal authorities. Of course, we will deal only with the province, which will make its arrangements with the municipalities.

The bill means that, when we enrol a adult in a publicly operated training course, we will pay the cost of putting on the course and we will pay an amount to compensate the province for the capital and interest charges on the buildings and equipment that are used. We will pay a fair share of the provincial overheads involved in providing general administration for the courses. We will have an interim payment system to ensure that the provinces get a steady flow of cash to meet their expenses. The financial settlement at the end of the year will be based on the actual costs of training.

The bill lays it down that we will purchase training from the province when it is available. But if the province agrees that it does not have the course a man needs near where he lives, we will be able to pay for training in a privately operated course. In this case we will negotiate a fee, not above the usual level, with a private training school.

The bill also provides for the purchase of training in industry. A man who is employed should not be forced to quit his job in order to get training. In most firms, workers accumulate seniority and pension rights. To sacrifice these rights to take training would frequently mean to abandon the only security a man has.

The training we will pay for in industry is the same kind that is available in public institutions. It would be easy to record a vast increase in training if we offered to pay for the kind of on-the-job training that new employees get in most firms. But that would not be an economic use of public funds.

What we will pay industry to do is the type of training that it now does all too infrequently. That is the classroom type of training that the provinces provide to people who are not employed. But in industry "classroom" becomes a rather elastic term. One of the great advantages of industry as a training ground is that it already has the modern equipment that people must use in their jobs. A "classroom" in industry can be a part of a factory floor. It is the equivalence of the training given in public institutions that counts, not whether people sit at desks.

Although nearly all firms routinely provide on-the-job practice to new workers, only one manufacturer in four gives even one day's formal training to any of his workers. This is not because firms fail to recognize the need. It is because general training is often uneconomic for the individual firm. The workers who would benefit frequently leave for jobs with other firms, so that the company that does classroom training may help its competitors as much as itself.

Accordingly the bill recognizes a public obligation to pay for classroom training in industry. We must see that training is good business for the individual firm as well as for the individual worker. But we will not pay all of the firm's costs of training. The company will derive real benefit from the trained workers who do stay with it. Therefore it is sufficient to pay for the direct costs a firm incurs in training its workers; the firm will need to contribute the use of its facilities and equipment.

The biggest of the direct costs is the wages the firm pays workers while they are in training. We will reimburse the firm for most of these wages. We will calculate the proportion of the normal working week that is devoted to training. That proportion will be applied to the maximum training allowance or to the normal weekly wage, whichever is the lower.

There is one situation in which the bill provides payment for training in industry of a kind that is not provided in public institutions. When a technological change is going to displace established long-term employees at the same time as the company needs new people to run the automated equipment, we will be able to pay for on-the-job training in order to encourage the firm to retrain its older employees for the new jobs rather than hire outsiders.

Not all the training by industry will be done in factories. Sometimes it is more efficient for workers to take time off to go to nearby provincial institutions, and the bill provides for payment in such cases. Training need not be full time.

Thus the bill makes it possible for training to be provided in various ways to meet different situations. The training can be in courses operated by provincial or municipal authorities, private training schools, or employers. The courses can be full time, part time, evening, correspondence, or even by T.V. We hope that the provinces, which are improving adult training methods, will continue their experimentation.

For the individual Canadian this bill means that federal services will be available to help him decide what training course will benefit him most, to pay for the course; and to pay him an allowance to maintain an income while training.

The vast majority of these adults will be referred to provincial courses by a Canada Manpower Centre. The manpower counsellor will help people to find out what they can best do. Many people already have solid and marketable skills, and the need is to find the right job for them. Sometimes a man has an adequate skill but there is no market for it locally; if so, the counsellor will be able to offer a mobility grant for a permanent or exploratory move to another town where the skill can be utilized. Frequently, however, the need is for training. When this is what the man wants and needs, we will be able to pay for it.

A rather different arrangement will be made for apprenticeship training. Thousands of apprentices, engaged in three or four year programs, take a six or eight week provincial course every year. These apprentices are not in need of counselling; they are already in a program which will give them a solid trade. They will be able to proceed directly to training.

Similarly, we will not ask people being trained in industry to march en masse into a manpower centre. If they wish it we will, of course, provide individual counselling before or after training. But in the main our officers will determine simply that the prospective trainees are qualified and that there is a healthy market for the skills to be taught; there is no need for us to duplicate the work which is carried on by company personnel directors.

I am afraid that we must face the fact that there are today more adults who need training than the system can handle this year. We cannot expect to provide training immediately to all who could benefit from it. At first we will have to select the people who need the training most. Obviously an unemployed man should get priority if he is able to benefit. The general criteria will be the size of the income increase that the training will give the man, his ability to absorb the training, and his determination and ability to put it to use afterwards. In all cases we must look to see that there will be a long run demand for the skills; there is no point to training a man for unemployment.

I do not mean that every trainee will always get a job right away after training. We must face the fact that training helps to fill demands for skilled people; it does not itself create that demand. Training can shift people from occupations generally in low demand to occupations generally in high demand, but it does not create a particular job.

In recent years all our labour markets have grown tighter. I am confident that properly managed policies can keep the economy running at a high pace. But even if there is a temporary decline in demand, our training efforts should not falter; they are the way to save the individual from being a permanent victim of recession.

There are a few other features of the bill that I should mention at this stage. When we pay for provincial courses, we will be including an amount to cover the costs of capital and interest involved. The bill recognizes that not all provinces can readily borrow the money they need to construct training facilities. We will be able to make loans to construct and equip adult training centres. Interest on these loans will be only fractionally above the long term interest rate that the federal government must pay, and it will be below the rate at which the provinces could normally borrow on the market. Our fees to the provinces for training adults will be the source of interest and capital payments on these loans.

Also, of course, the phase-out of the old T.V.T. capital payments may be used by the provinces for increasing their capacity to train adults.

Approximately $550 millions in grants will be available to cover 50 per cent or 75 per cent of the costs of construction of many projects, and a province can borrow the rest of the money for an adult centre from us if it wishes.

Another need is teachers. Indeed, one of the skills which is most in demand today is the skill possessed by an experienced tradesman or technician who has also learned how to teach adults. So long as technical and vocational teachers continue to be in short supply, our counsellors will be able to refer men and women who possess the necessary technical skills to courses which will train them in the art of passing on those skills. Thus the program will pay to train the trainers.

If the provinces are to experiment with new ways of teaching adults, and if we are to develop better ways of matching training with our emerging manpower needs, we must have research.

We propose therefore to co-operate with the provinces in paying for research which is concerned with developing new ways to teach adults and with designing courses to fit adult needs. The research which is done to better the training of adults will also contribute toward improving the training provided in secondary and post-secondary schools.

I might add that we have already taken some highly significant steps to foster development of more suitable methods for adult training. Our pilot adult training projects will shortly be getting under way. These projects are frankly experimental. They are 100 per cent financed by the federal government but they will be run by independent boards appointed jointly with the provinces. The boards will be given complete freedom, within their budgets, to experiment in the development of advanced and accelerated methods of adult training.

Hon. members will recall previously when there was some discussion that they asked for an indication of the magnitude of the expenditures which we anticipate and the number of adults we expect in training. It is very difficult to estimate our expenditures this year, partly because of the transitional arrangements with the provinces. Capital phase-out payments will probably be about $120 millions. We expect that training costs, including other transitional payments, will come to about $110 million.

Future expansion must depend on the needs and on the resources available. At present there are 288 publicly operated centres which train adults. The adult enrolment at the beginning of the year was 65,716. We expect that in this fiscal year a total of about 120,000 people will receive adult occupational training in public institutions. The number will increase considerably in subsequent years. Until we have had more experience, I would not wish to predict the pace of the increase. But I would expect that in the foreseeable future the number of people trained in a year should rise to about 5 per cent of the labour force—which at present would mean over 350,000 persons.

I believe that we are moving into economic circumstances that make adult training on this large scale essential. It is the way to make our economy fully productive. It is the way to make the door to the affluent society open for the individual Canadian.

This bill creates the machinery to respond to the urgency of the need for adult training. I believe that the benefits, to our economy and to our people, will be very great indeed.

This bill has been waiting for some time to be considered; it has been waiting while hon. members discussed the unification bill. In order that the government should not be deprived of the opportunity to provide training, it has been necessary, since April 1, to supplement the program by regulations under the authority of interim supply.

During this period certain criticism has been made in press reports which may be causing some confusion as to the facts. I would like, therefore, to end by repeating this statement on the essential facts that the minister made yesterday:

> Many more Canadians now have the opportunity for retraining for a better job. This is the effect of the program. It means that every person in Canada who has been out of school for more than a year can benefit from retraining. The federal government will pay the whole cost of occupational training for anyone who will be able as a result to do a better job. This includes immigrants equally with long-term residents and citizens.
> The new program replaces previous arrangements under which retraining was available only to workers who were unemployed or who fitted various special categories.
> In order to take training most adults must be provided with an income while training. This is fully covered in the federal program by means of training allowances. These allowances are a minimum of $35 a week and considerably more, up to $90 a week, for workers with dependants to support.
> The only restriction on these allowances is that they are not to be used to compete with the school system. They are designed for retraining, not to make training a substitute for school. Therefore, to qualify for allowances as well as free training, a trainee must either have dependants or have been working or seeking work for the past three years.
> These facts were made public in October at the last federal-provincial conference. It was made clear that there was nothing to prevent any province from offering allowances to younger people without dependants, if it so wishes.
> From the start, the new program will train at least as many workers as the former program did. The federal government is providing larger funds, and as the provinces provide more facilities, an increasing number of people will benefit.

I believe I have nothing further to add at this time.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, before the parliamentary secretary sits down may I ask him a question about the regulations to which he referred once or twice in the body of his speech, and to which he made a more lengthy reference at the end. As the bill before us provides in clause 12 for regulations to be passed after the bill has been enacted, under what authority have the regulations been enacted prior to the passage of the bill?

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Munro: My information, and I believe it is accurate, is that the details embodied in this legislation were sufficiently set out in the main estimates in such detail as to give the government authority to embody its program in regulations, in order that we might get it under way.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary a further question. Is he referring to vote No. 5 of the estimates of the Department of Manpower and Immigration for the current year? If he is, does he think there is any kind of detail there which would give authority for these regulations?

Mr. Munro: I believe that is what I am referring to. The point has been checked and we have been advised that there is sufficient authority for the regulations we have made. However, I will be happy to check this further.

Mr. Knowles: It looks slippery to me.

Mr. R.-E. Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): May I say at the outset that we endorse what the parliamentary secretary has said as to the importance and urgency of this bill. As a matter of fact I think the record of the last two or three weeks will show that on several occasions we in the opposition tried in vain to get this item moved to the head of the order of business because we felt it was certainly much more urgent than the question of unification.

As we move into a new area of business, in the light of past experience with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) who has shown he can accept suggestions and advice even from the opposition benches, I am sure we can proceed with much more efficiency and make much better progress than was evident in connection with the unification bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) introduced the resolution preceding this Bill No. C-278 on March 3 last, I had the opportunity to congratulate him and the government on this step forward.

On behalf of my colleagues, I have no hesitation in renewing my encouragement and I trust that the minister will take into due consideration our few remarks during this debate.

Any discussion concerning the occupational training of adults affords us the welcome opportunity to look fully into this problem of prime importance for the development and progress of society with regard to future opportunities, challenges and needs.

[Mr. Munro.]

[English]

In the course of his remarks on March 3, the minister stated:

> This new program is an integral part of a national manpower policy whose basic purpose is to bring economic opportunity within the reach of Canadian workers.

This all sounds very good. It seems to imply that the government is ahead of the game and reaching forward with benevolent policies. I believe, though, that we must consider this as being the government's side of the story only. It was surely not the good heartedness of the government, its deep concern for the well-being of Canadian workers, which inspired the minister of manpower to prepare and introduce this bill. I believe that hon. gentlemen on the front benches opposite, as the government, and we, as members of parliament, are forced to consider this action as a matter of cold, economic necessity.

Our best economists and social scientists have long been urging all institutions responsible for this country's social development as well as for its educational policies to face the fact that as Canada emerges as a modern industrial society our old occupational structures must change, and change fast, if we are to remain competitive in the international market and retain the benefits of an affluent society.

Mr. Speaker, a technological society cannot come into its own or even develop satisfactorily unless opportunities are provided for all segments of the society to obtain higher and modern education. I will not attempt, for the time being, to invade the sacred area of formal education—I should like to remain in politics for a little while longer—but I am concerned by a forecast made by one scientist that in a highly industrialized society, one constantly in an atmosphere of progress and change, a man must anticipate four or five occupational changes in the course of a lifetime. Four or five such changes implies as many periods of readjustment or retraining.

It is difficult to deny or to ignore such a forecast, and this makes our responsibility as a parliament for finding forceful answers to these questions even greater than it would normally be. That is why we are anxious to see the present measure come forth for consideration in spite of weaknesses which it contains, weaknesses which can possibly be ironed out later.

In his introductory speech of March 3, the minister referred to the training allowances act which provided greatly needed opportunities for training unemployed workers, together with a measure of financial assistance. This was, and remains a progressive piece of legislation and parliament had no hesitation in seeing it through, because it was timely. However, this should not prevent our calling attention to certain weaknesses which have shown up since its inception—weaknesses which might be avoided in the present case. I refer specifically to the fact that approximately one third of the budgeted amounts were not used. The people for whom the bill was enacted did not respond. Why?

I believe the simple answer is that the government and the department of manpower just did not bother to do the necessary research and prepare the groundwork so as to make sure that the measures they brought forward were those best suited to answer the needs. The same considerations apply to the measures proposed in Bill C-278. I believe no program of this magnitude and consequence should be put forward for enactment unless it has been preceded by an extensive and expert research program. No act which will affect millions of people in the days ahead and which will cost millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money can be accepted by this house unless the minister can explain on a basis of facts—dry facts and figures—that an effective adult education program is under way. The public must be made aware of its advantages. The interest of the people involved must be awakened so that they appreciate the value and necessity of further education, as well as the economic advantages of retraining to meet the requirements of an industrialized society.

When I mention the need for a research program I do not mean political research to find out what sounds best for the purpose of catching votes, but scientific research into ways and means of accomplishing specific ends.

Nowhere in his introductory remarks did the minister indicate, much less prove, that such a research program into adult education had been carried out. Yet without it we are heading for possibly failure. We have been given no indication that the minister or his department have done their homework before sitting the exam. The example is appropriate at this time of the year when our children are preparing for the year-end tests. We constantly remind them that if they do not do their homework they cannot expect promotion. By the same token, if we do not tell our children just how important a good education is, the number of drop-outs will inevitably increase. How can we expect to build a great society or, in the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), "a good society", on the basis of an increasing number of drop-outs or, in the present case, of adults who do not respond to these training opportunities. The government must have learned from its experience in connection with the training allowance act that human desires and needs cannot be met, nor human interest be awakened, by money or financial assistance alone. Yet most of the parliamentary secretary's remarks tonight centred around the idea of paying and paying for services.

We will influence and interest people if we first convince them of the values and needs of education and training, through proper methods of communication between those who direct the economy, the planners, and those who execute, the workers. We know for instance that quite a number of federal departments are involved and have spent millions of dollars on research programs on social development. Just to mention a few, they are the Department of Forestry and the ARDA program, the Department of Industry, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and presumably, at least I hope so, the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

Has there been any co-ordination between these various programs? Have they gone their separate ways? Has one department relayed its information to the other? Has manpower sought out relevant information from the other departments? Have interested groups been consulted systematically to investigate real employment opportunities? Is there a follow-up program already prepared to shore up possible weaknesses or shortcomings if something goes wrong or if, once again, there is no public response?

I think, Mr. Speaker, we all agree that we must have the answers to these questions before we can be expected to support the bill. More questions come to mind. How many jobs must be filled? Some figures were given tonight. How were they arrived at? Are they guesswork, or scientific in their content? How many candidates are expected in the first, second and third years? Where are the jobs located? Are they concentrated in urban areas, or will people be directed to new areas where new opportunities are needed? Are the people involved willing to go where the opportunities are before they undertake retraining? Have these people said so, or is the department guessing again?

Have the provinces shown any response to the federal government's offer to lend money over a period of 30 years for building training facilities? What happens to those loans if facilities are put to other use after five or ten years? What is meant by the phrase "private training facilities" contained in the minister's speech of March 3? It is hoped, indeed it is essential that this information be given to members of the house before we are asked to approve Bill 278.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that the minister is particularly concerned with any form of discrimination, no matter where or how it is expressed. I would sincerely hope that training opportunities as implemented or developed through the Canada manpower centres will not be taxed with or accused of such discrimination because of poorly defined policies.

Another consideration which must occupy our minds in studying this bill is the very evident misunderstanding which already seems to exist between the provincial and federal governments as to the effects of discontinuing existing programs in favour of the present provisions in this bill. The case has been very clearly spelled out in an editorial feature in the Globe and Mail of Saturday, April 22, under the title "The Retraining Row," with appropriate subtitles such as, "Queens Park Points a Finger at Ottawa," and "Ottawa Points a Finger Right Back." I imagine, Mr. Speaker, other hon. members will draw your attention to this article so I shall not put it into the record, although it would be well worth the while and the time.

Basically, the problem that this controversy underlines is the fact that the manpower department could easily lose sight of the fact that, independently of this or that argument, the basic concerns here are manpower, the national economy and the industrial society. All of these are federal concerns which must be met. No exchange of letters will settle that, and I urge the minister to get into these discussions, personally and immediately, with the provincial authorities. Let his successful experiences of the past as a hard but sensible negotiator come to the rescue, because one thing is certain: If this plan does not work, whatever the reason, he will have to answer for it not only to himself and to his government but also to the population as a whole.

[Mr. Régimbal.]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Listening to the parliamentary secretary this evening I was dismayed that I could detect no consideration on the part of the government for the objections to the basic principles contained in this bill which were enumerated when the bill was debated last March. I was one of the members of the joint committee dealing with the white paper on immigration which heard representations about the shortcomings in the white paper, pointed out by individual members in the committee and by organizations from one end of Canada to the other in hearings which lasted for many weeks. Members of the committee were happy, and complimented the minister on the fact that he was broadminded enough to listen to the representations that were made and to study them. Many of those representations pointed out defects in the white paper, and last week the minister came to the committee with a statement which in effect rewrote major provisions in the white paper, substituting for them much more sensible and humane provisions.

I too complimented the minister. That is why I find it hard to understand why he, who was able to be realistic and specific in reassessing the principles he had enunciated in the white paper, and who was able to change his mind and, in effect, propose a modified policy, should now tonight, through the parliamentary secretary, make a speech in which not one principle enunciated by him last March 3 has been changed, and in which not one of the detailed objections have been met. More important, Mr. Speaker, I find it hard to understand why none of the objections by the various provincial governments, which have had a great deal of experience with manpower training programs, has been dealt with by the parliamentary secretary. It is as though nothing has happened in the last few months; as though none of the objections had any weight. It is as though nobody knows anything but the minister and a few of his top officials and, as a result, the suggestion is that we are to go ahead and accept all the provisions of this bill whether we like them or not, or whether the provinces and the educators like them or not. Apparently the minister and a few other key officials have all the answers.

I want to reiterate what we said on March 3, that in our opinion this division which the government makes between education, as the government calls it, and manpower training, is a completely fictitious one. It is a division which will lead to untold and incalculable difficulties. I can only assume, Mr. Speaker, that what we have here is the working out to the Nth degree of the principle which seems to have been adopted by the government, I suppose at the suggestion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau), that Ottawa must not infringe on fields which are the responsibility of the provinces; and if one province objects, then Ottawa cannot make any arrangements with the other provinces.

This is a completely fallacious position and one which will lead from one difficulty to another. After all, Mr. Speaker, if the provinces are in the field of technical and vocational training today—and I think it is good that they are—it is because the former Conservative government brought in a technical vocational training act in 1961 under which more than $600 million was given in capital grants to the provinces by the federal government.

• (8:50 p.m.)

As a result of this program there are in virtually every province in Canada effective technical and vocational training programs. Having co-operated with the federal government in a program which was urged on them by the federal government it is not surprising that the provinces not only have gone into these programs but have made plans to expand and continue them. The fact is, and I do not think there can be any question about it, that the provinces were met at the last federal-provincial conference by a unilateral decision on the part of the federal government to get out of the technical vocational program field. I should like to read a few lines from the statement at that conference by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), where he said:

> We are determined to get out of shared cost programs in education ... For us to be involved in the school system in the name of technical and vocational training inevitably introduces distortions ... Increasingly your decisions—

Meaning the decisions of the provinces.

> —as to what to do are influenced by a natural desire to get as much as possible out of the programs of which we will pay 50 per cent.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the federal government which encouraged the provinces to get into the technical vocational training field should be criticized for having framed that program. Indeed the federal government should be commended for this, because I think it is a very great advance in educating the young people of this country in ways which they will find useful. Later in the same statement the minister said:

> So, unless you are prepared to argue that we should have the permanent influence on your programs that shared-cost arrangements give us, I suggest that you must accept the principle of our withdrawal.

On March 3 I said, and I now say again, that this withdrawal is a disaster for the people of Canada, for the young people who wish to leave school, and for those who will need to be retrained. I believe that rather than get out of the shared program in the field of technical and vocational training the federal government should expand its role. We have this unilateral decision to get out and as a result of that we have the draft of a program, the regulations for which most of us until recently and some of us until today have not had an opportunity to look at. I am informed that it is true not only in respect of the province of Ontario but also the province of Manitoba that the entire decision to get out—not only the principle, but the details of the program which is now before us and which will be carried on as a result of the implementation of this bill—was worked out unilaterally by the federal government and by the department of manpower. I am informed there were no consultations with the provinces. Because of the fact that the province of Ontario is the largest and most industrially oriented province, and I am quite sure has the most successful technical and vocational training program in the country, it is not surprising, as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail, that the minister of education of the province of Ontario asked to see the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to discuss the new program, the details in respect of it, and some of the problems which will arise and which are arising as a result of the change in the program.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration, however, could not find the time to meet with the minister of education of the province of Ontario. Well, I do not suppose it is my function to tell the minister what his job is, but I think that had he spoken at a few less Liberal party meetings and had met with the minister, we might have been a little further ahead. I understand that the Canadian Association for Adult Education asked the minister for a meeting so that they could discuss this matter with him. I believe they have a technical and vocational committee which is interested. They could not arrange a meeting with him. He was too busy.

The result of this is that in every province questions are being asked. Rather than expose us to the dry, dull dreary statement which the parliamentary secretary gave us tonight, it would have been better had the minister dealt with the suggestions which are listed in an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Saturday, which was referred to by the previous speaker from the official opposition. It may be that those objections are not correct, but the article in the Globe and Mail of last Saturday and its article of last Thursday quoted officials of the federal department, who are supposed to implement the program, as saying completely contradictory things in respect of how this program will work.

I should like to quote from the Globe and Mail of April 20:

> L.F.D. Coulson, Ontario assistant director, Canada Department of Manpower and Immigration, admitted the regulations were a "semi-fait accompli" and that there was confusion over them.
> He said the manpower department would give an extremely broad interpretation to what constituted three years continuous work experience.
> He said it would include a housewife of three years.

In other words, a woman who had not worked but who had been a housewife for three years, in the opinion of Mr. Coulson, would be able to participate in the retraining grant. The article goes on to say, however:

> An Ottawa spokesman for the department said a housewife's duties would not likely be considered labour force experience.

If the officials in the department do not know what the program is and how the regulations will be implemented, is it any wonder that there is consternation, and indeed that there is a panic among the provincial authorities who have been operating the manpower training programs since 1961. What are some of the difficulties? I shall deal with a few of the many difficulties which I am sure will face us when we are dealing with the bill clause by clause, and even more so when we study the regulations which have been implemented and which, as stated by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), were brought about in a pretty slippery way.

What do we find in the new regulations? The key point is that they exclude from the allowances any person under age 17 and any single person over 17 with fewer than three years working experience. I suggest that this is complete nonsense. We might take the example of a person who leaves high school. I am not too concerned about whether he finishes high school and receives a diploma, whether the existing curriculum in the high school does not fit his needs, or that he leaves for reasons of his own. Surely it does not make sense that we should say to such a youngster who is 17, 18 or 19 years of age that he cannot attend one of these manpower retraining centres now, that he cannot receive a living allowance now, and that he must go out and find work such as sweeping floors, or do anything—even be unemployed.

According to the provisions of this bill one must be unemployed for a substantial period of time before being eligible. During this time of unemployment these young individuals may become married and start to raise families. At that time, when they are living on their own with their families, we then all of a sudden become happy to allow them to attend our retraining centres. Then we must not only pay for the retraining, we must pay a living allowance. What earthly sense can there be in that kind of artificial approach?

Surely what we must do is encourage everyone who wants to increase his ability to perform a job which requires a skill to do so as quickly as possible. By imposing this kind of penalty we are being unfair to the young people concerned. As a result of this attitude we will suffer a great economic loss in this country.

This bill is discriminatory against women. The present government has appointed a royal commission to study the status of women. Many women who married early have children and have not been part of the working force for many years. At the age of 35 or 40 their children have become more or less independent and they may wish to go back to work. Under the provisions of this bill women who have not been in the working force will not qualify for admission to our retraining centres. That is not only a disadvantage to the country, because of a waste of potentially productive capacity, it is discriminatory against those individuals.

When we reach our clause by clause study of this bill we must consider carefully that portion relating to training programs in industry. I do not criticize industrial training programs, indeed I suggest they are not now numerous enough. Industry should be encouraged to participate in those schemes which will upgrade their employees' skills. Nothing in these provisions spells out the type of program in respect of which grants will be made by the federal government, nor do they indicate the amount of money envisaged by the government to be allocated toward the cost of these industrial programs. It is conceivable that several large companies, and I think specifically of the railway companies, Air Canada and Bell Telephone, may devise programs which could use up the total amount of federal government money allocated under the provisions of this bill for the coming year. I am not suggesting that would be wrong in principle, but nothing is set out in the bill, and nothing has been said by the parliamentary secretary, which would indicate the relationship between the amount of money available and the number of programs involved for this type of program, and the total for all programs.

I was surprised that the parliamentary secretary, who represents a constituency in the city of Hamilton, with a large number of immigrants did not deal with the subject matter of concern expressed by the province of Ontario, the city of Toronto and other provinces. This matter was referred to by the Toronto chairman of the metropolitan board of education in an article which appeared in today's Toronto Globe and Mail. He took very strong exception to what he considers to be a clear indication in this bill, that the immigrants that have come to Canada in large numbers, and who will be coming to Canada during the next year or two, will be very sharply curtailed so far as their right to attend these training centres is concerned. This is true because of the requirement that individuals must have been available for employment for a period of three years prior to their qualification for inclusion in this program.

The board of education in Toronto is spending $1,500,000 this year to teach immigrant adults and children to speak English. In light of that effort by the city of Toronto and similar efforts on the part of cities such as Winnipeg, which I happen to represent, it seems very strange that the federal government should embark on a program which will not be available to those individuals who require training. Obviously that is the case, unless there are regulations in respect of this bill which members of this house and officials of the provinces have not seen or understood.

Mr. Munro: Would the hon. member permit a question in respect of the article which appeared in the paper this morning? Did he also read the minister's statement in the same issue, in which it was stated that it has been known for months that the provision regarding three years in the working force would not be prejudicial to immigrants, in that the years they had worked prior to coming here would also count?

Mr. Orlikow: I wonder why the parliamentary secretary finds it necessary to get up at 10 minutes after 9 p.m. on Monday, April 24, to tell a backbencher from the city of Winnipeg that this has been known for months, in light of the fact that provincial officials have been trying for some time to discuss this matter with the federal Minister of Manpower and Immigration. If this fact has been known for months, why is it that the Ontario provincial minister of education has not known about it? Why is it that the chairman of the Toronto metropolitan board of education has not known about it, and why did the minister have to issue a press statement yesterday apprising interested parties of this fact? Why were these things not discussed in detail with provincial officials?

Some people have suggested that the New Democratic party developed the expression "co-operative federalism". In any event the government has adopted this phrase as an expression of its policy. In spite of that fact this federal government states that this is what it intends to do and the provinces must accept it or leave it. To my way of thinking co-operative federalism in this field suggests that the federal government should say that this is what it thinks ought to be done, and then ask the provinces to discuss the situation. Surely this is true when we are dealing with a program such as this initiated by the federal government.

It is not surprising to me that provincial governments are looking with a good deal of scepticism and a good deal of concern at shared cost programs, because it is pretty easy for the federal government to say to the provinces: We are prepared to pay half of the costs if you will come into this with us. Very often the provinces think it is a good idea, particularly when the federal government is going to help pay for the costs. However, if at some time in the future, one, two or five years later, the federal government decides suddenly and on its own that it is going to get out and let the provinces carry the burden, a burden which may well run into hundreds of millions of dollars, it is not surprising to me that some provincial governments might say: Under the circumstances and in the light of past experience we are not going to go ahead with this. At present this does not seem likely but it would not surprise me very much if in view of the way this problem has been handled the provinces said to the federal government: We are afraid to go into the medicare plan because although you might agree now to pay 50 per cent of the costs, three or five years from now you might say that health is a provincial matter and leave it to us to handle on our own. I am not saying the federal government has done this, and I for one would certainly have been sorry if they had done it. I am glad that nearly every province has indicated it is going into the medicare plan. However, as regards this decision on technical-vocational training made, as I said and I know I am right, without any consultation with the provinces, both with regard to the principle and to the details, it is not surprising that, to say the least, the provinces are very unhappy with the present situation. I urge the Minister of Manpower and Immigration—who is not here today, and I will not be too critical because I know that none of us expected this debate to begin tonight—to follow the example he set in the white paper on immigration. It is not too late. I do not think anyone will quarrel with the expansion of the program, although as I said earlier I think the division between education and manpower training is an artificial one which does not really exist.

Nevertheless, it is not too late for the federal government and for the department to sit down with the provinces, to go over the objections which they might have, to try to meet these objections, and to work out a program which will not only be accepted by the provinces, because they have no choice —after all the provinces are interested in getting as much financial assistance from the federal government as they can in this program as in every other program—but to work out a program which will meet the legitimate doubts, fears and objections of the provinces because, with all due respect to the officials in the federal department—and I know there are some very competent people there—they are not the ones who have had the experience in the field of educating young people or retraining older people for jobs. Who has had the most experience in this field? It is the provincial departments of education, the boards of education and the schoolboards in larger cities such as Toronto, Hamilton, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Calgary and Edmonton.

It seems to me that the experience of these agencies and bodies, their know-how regarding what mistakes we should not and need not make, has been completely ignored, according to information which I have. Not only has it been ignored but apparently it has been rejected by the federal department.

I will say again in closing that it is not too late for the minister and for his department to take the time to discuss the details of the program and how it is to work with the provinces and with the people who are working in the field. Right here in Ottawa there are people who have had a great deal of experience in adult retraining. They have not been consulted. The same is true in Toronto and other places. I suggest to the minister, before we get much further with the bill, that he and his officials take the time to sit down with the interested agencies and get advice from them, so that the program can be improved.

Mr. Munro: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question before he concludes his speech. I do not think he would want to leave a misleading impression. I think he indicated the bill discriminates against women. It certainly does not; they are treated the same way as Canadian men. If they are over 17, they can get training. Of course they have no income while they are training if they are supported by their husbands, but if they have dependent children, they get allowances. This applies to immigrants. All of them are treated exactly alike under the bill. I think this should be made clear.

Mr. Orlikow: I do not think this was a question, but I will not make another speech. If these things which the parliamentary secretary mentioned are true, then I say what I said a little earlier, that it is amazing that the provinces and the cities which have worked in this field simply do not know it is so. Women who have not been working and are thinking about working are concerned about whether they will qualify.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): I think the parliamentary secretary should act in accordance with the rules of procedure. He has not asked a question. I think any further observations on the bill should be made in the committee.

• (9.20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on Bill No. C-278, although I have not yet had time to read it and our leader would have been far more able than I to comment on it generally. Still, it is obvious at first glance, that this bill will certainly give rise to several questions, will lead to discussions, not only while under study but even more so when it is implemented.

A while ago, I heard the previous speaker who, naturally enough, spoke as a socialist. He probably would have like the federal government to take over the whole field and manage it as it sees fit. But we, who are not of that opinion at all, and who are here first of all to protect the interests of the provinces in their fields of jurisdiction, ask whether the minister first consulted the provinces when he considered introducing this bill. I wonder whether this bill is not again the work of federal bureaucracy coming to the provinces and telling them: Here is a bill we have drafted; you may either accept it or reject it. If you accept it, you will derive some benefits; if you reject it, you will get nothing at all.

I believe that if the minister had been consistent before bringing in such a bill, he would have invited the representatives of the different provinces, during federal-provincial conferences, to give serious consideration to the legislation, in view of the fact that this is another one of those shared costs fields, in which provinces are as much interested as, if not more so, than the federal government. It seems to me that it would have been highly logical for the minister to consult the provincial representatives before starting out to draft such a bill.

Personally, we are wondering if Quebec will accept once again the conditions laid down by the federal government under this bill.

As usual, though, the federal government comes in through the back door. It reminds me somewhat of that man who under the pretext of bringing a box of matches to the woman of the house who needs them, puts the whole house on fire once inside.

I feel that if the federal government truly recognizes that education comes under provincial jurisdiction, it should leave it to the provinces. It should give back to them the means to administer those fields; it should first of all withdraw from their taxation field because it is another excuse for levying another tax. It should withdraw from provincial taxation fields and give back to the provinces in all fairness what belongs to them. Then, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that the provinces are just as able as the federal government to give the required and appropriate education to their people.

Here, it is said that the provinces will be consulted in due course on such projects; but when the government for instance, is dealing with the employers on their relations with their employees, I wonder whether the provinces will have a word to say or whether the federal government will deal directly with the employers, with the large companies anxious to have their manpower trained in certain skills.

In this regard, if during consideration of this clause, we realize that the provincial governments will not be consulted when the question dealing with the employers arises, we shall certainly be opposed. We will not be in a position to accept such a clause and we will object to the federal government dealing directly with an employer, whatever his importance may be.

As far as assistance is concerned, it seems to me that, according to the bill, this will consist in paying for the training. But there all kinds of additional expenses, for instance, rental of premises, school construction, as mentioned further in the bill, purchase of equipment, etc.

I wonder whether, after all, the provinces will not be contributing the lion's share once again. And the federal government will say: Well, we have given you such and such a thing. But the provinces and their citizens will be paying three times the value of what they will have received. We find that the federal government is willing to grant or rather to guarantee the loans made to provinces to enable them to build facilities and schools, give those courses and buy equipment, but it will still be the provinces, since the federal government is no longer able to borrow money, which will borrow for a period of 20, 25 or 30 years and will once again be burdened with those debts from which the federal government will perhaps have taken 50 per cent of its funds, while saying: We are the ones who have paid for those buildings.

A bill such as this, Mr. Speaker, always seems to bring on new taxes. That is the reason why we are asking so many questions.

We are well aware, looking at the history of the various governments which succeeded one another here, that when a government wants to help the people, it promises them two dollars but extorts five from them.

These are the points which we wished to call to the attention of the minister. We will keep our eyes open in order to see what advantages the Canadian people will reap from this. I am one hundred per cent in favour of training, but if the country does not benefit from this training, we shall have to think twice about it. I say that because precisely I received letters, four or five letters from young people and adults in my riding who after having attended refresher courses last winter or two years ago, have been unable to get a job. They cannot find a job, even with their competency card. It is very well to have 90 per cent of the population educated but it is better to have 100 per cent of the people employed.

Everyone knows that despite all our efforts in the field of education, our young people are deserting the province of Quebec which pays for their instruction, their education. In fact, one thousand, fifteen hundred and even two thousand technicians are leaving every year for our neighbour country to earn their living, after we have defrayed 100 per cent of the cost of their education and training.

In addition to this proposed training, which is good by the way, as long as we remain within the limits of delegated powers, my contention is that the government should also take into account those who are going to graduate, in order to provide them with a job on the day after they obtain their certificate.

Mr. Speaker, we will certainly have further comments to make, as we examine this bill clause by clause, but I simply want to warn the government that it should not act like in the past, in short this should not be another opportunity to intrude a little further in matters of provincial jurisdiction.

[English]

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): One becomes a bit pessimistic of these opening statements on second readings of bills, Mr. Speaker, that are presented with considerable flourish and skill, along with promises of a new world beginning with the passing of legislation in whatever area may be the subject matter of the bill. When one examines this bill, it becomes clear why the premier of British Columbia objected to the dropping of the shared cost programs following the last federal-provincial fiscal conference. There is one thing about a shared cost program; it becomes a little difficult to sort out who pays for what. I suppose that in some ways it is more desirable for the federal government to announce that they are going directly into the field of adult education, because it does become more apparent how large or how small is their contribution in that particular area.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

We know that the premier of British Columbia is not alone in his concern about the changeover from shared cost programs to this type of program. For we are told that eight out of the ten provinces involved have already told the federal government that there will be serious difficulty with the bill that is before us this evening. Why should we be optimistic about the bill, Mr. Speaker, in view of the gaps that developed in the implementation of the Canada Assistance Plan? Why should we be optimistic about what is going to happen with adult education in view of some of the gaps that are developing in the implementation of the guaranteed annual income program in so far as it ties in, or rather fails to tie in, with the Canada Assistance Plan? For example, some of the funds for this program are being borrowed from the War Veterans Allowance Act, instead of being provided under the guaranteed annual income program.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern about this legislation that has been brought to my attention in a letter from the secretary-treasurer of the board of trustees for school district No. 22 at Vernon, British Columbia. In a letter addressed to Hon. L. R. Peterson, the minister of education at Victoria, they express very great concern over the problems created at the local level by the passing of Bill No. C-278. They go on to say:

> With the withdrawal of grants in aid for vocational and upgrading courses it is practically impossible to provide courses of this nature at a fee that the general public can afford to pay.
> We would therefore urge the provincial government to continue the system of grants for vocational courses being offered through our adult education department as has been done in the past.

At the moment, Mr. Speaker, neither the minister in British Columbia nor the minister in any other province can answer this letter because the bill has not been passed. However, I am sure that after we do pass it provincial ministers will still have great difficulty in answering any similar letter to this, as they await the implementation of the various clauses in this bill. Again I see very little cause for optimism, that the transition from the previous vocational training subsidies paid by the federal government to the payments provided under this legislation will be smooth.

I feel that the provisions in this legislation dealing with the classification and ages of adults show a serious lack of concern for, or knowledge of, the school rhythm as pupils move through from the system. It is common practice across this country to set the age of 15 as that at which compulsory education ends. The age may be raised to 16 in some provinces, though by no means in every province in Canada.

Anyone who has worked in a school, Mr. Speaker, knows that a great many who become eligible for this kind of program are just waiting for the day when they can leave school. This is not necessarily a criticism of the school system; it is in a way a fact of life. They wait for this day, and by the time they are 15, many of them have been waiting nine years until the day they could leave, at 15. It is not going to mean anything to these people when you tell them: "Perhaps you had better not leave yet, because if you leave now you will not be considered an adult by the federal government; you will have to wait three years. Therefore you had better stay in the school system for another three years".

Despite the hopes of the department of manpower in presenting this bill, I am aware that this sort of admonition to the teenager who has waited seven, eight or nine years to leave school will not be sufficient to retain him in the ordinary school system for a further three years, and he will leave regardless.

One of the previous speakers referred to the only road that opens up to early admission into the program. The teenagers of this country will need neither the previous speaker nor myself to tell them that they can quickly find a way out; that if they happen to have someone wholly or substantially dependant upon them for support they will then be able to qualify.

Although I think it is very much the role of the federal government to concern itself with adult education and with vocational training, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is the role of the federal government openly to encourage early marriage, as this bill does. I think all of the family planners, juvenile courts and school counsellors across this country are united in their efforts to postpone early marriage for any of these people. Yet we have in this bill a policy which these people will be very quick to see enables them to qualify for the program two years and three months sooner than they would otherwise have qualified for retraining assistance.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, these teenagers would not even need to move away from home. We already know that many of these early marriages are supported in part by the parents of the young people involved. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, there is built into the bill the incentive to marry early in this country.

We might also ask why the legislation does not spell out a little more clearly that private training courses will be used fully as well as the public school system. This is an area of education which private enterprise began to develop very early in Canada, and developed to a very great extent. There are many occupational groups which are served entirely, or virtually entirely, by private training schools. I think of hairdressing as one example, and there is of course the business field. There is tremendous involvement on the part of private enterprise there.

The Association of Canadian Commercial Colleges is not satisfied with the provisions of this bill as they have been announced. They would like some emendation so as to include the idea that it is highly desirable to employ the resources of the private sector of the economy of Canada in all such efforts to further the policy of this bill. In spite of the reassurances given by the parliamentary secretary this evening, I think it would be of interest to this group and to the members of this house to have these reassurances spelt out a little more clearly.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Again, Mr. Speaker, why should we be optimistic about this government's concern for private enterprise in view of the problems which will be created with the proposed future implementation of the medicare scheme? Why should we be optimistic when we know that this government's attitude to private enterprise has been that private enterprise is either an unmitigated evil, or at best a necessary evil? Why should these schools find any reassurance in the bill presently before us?

Another area of legislation concerns me very much. It is that part to be found in clause 13 of the bill which reads:

Where a person has received a training allowance to which he is not entitled or a training allowance in an amount in excess of the training allowance to which he is entitled, the amount thereof or the excess amount, as the case may be, may be recovered at any time as a debt due to Her Majesty or may be retained, in whole or in part, out of any subsequent amount payable to that person as a training allowance.

Why should we be optimistic about what will happen once this bill is implemented, considering what happened under the old age security legislation and the War Veterans Allowance Act. This government has persistently gone after people who through no fault of their own have received overpayments. What criteria will be used to recover repayments made under retraining courses? Will a person be charged with having accepted an overpayment if, through no fault of his own, he is forced to drop out?

Worse than that, will the government inveigle people to come back and finish their courses, that the overpayment paid to them may in some mysterious way be recovered? Will the strange system of bookkeeping be used by which the government imagines that by providing courses and withholding part of its allowances it will in some strange way recover overpayments?

It would be better if in the future we could introduce in this country a system of primary education that, beginning with kindergarten levels, will make sure that the education given to people is effective education. We ought to find ways and means to encourage the right people to take up teaching; we ought to have great numbers of the right sorts of teachers, that our young people beginning school may not be frustrated, may not be short changed, but may receive a sound foundation in education. By doing that we should reduce the need for the type of retraining programs that affect people later in life.

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate to discuss the important measure before us. As my colleague, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Régimbal) said a little earlier in the debate, the government might be criticized on the ground that seven weeks have passed since Bill C-278 was introduced. This is one of the most important measures to have come before this house for a good many years because it deals with the lives of so many of our citizens.

Before proceeding with my remarks I wish to commend the former minister of labour, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), for the very fine and constructive measure he introduced when he was minister, the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act. In doing my homework for this speech I read the minister's speeches on this subject, and I thought they were excellent.

It is easy to understand why this measure is before us. The effects of technological change are being felt more and more every year. Recently, when somebody commented on the year that has just passed, 1966, he said that it would be known in years to come as the year of the strikes. We had many crippling strikes in this country last year. Some of those were for higher wages, some were caused by union rivalry but it seems to me that in no small measure many strikes were caused by something not so evident, that is, unrest and the fear of working men who see that their skills are no longer in demand. It is tragic to see men who for many years have worked well with their hands being told one day that they are not wanted. Many of those men have families.

When I was home during this past week end I saw a delegation of railwaymen who were deeply concerned because two trains were being taken off the Canadian National Railway. It was the old story: More can be done with the big diesels than ever could be done in the days of steam. One man told me that he had worked on the railway for 26 years, had six children, and had been laid off. He would not be able to find steady work. This sort of thing causes a feeling of unrest among our workingmen, and that in turn causes some strikes.

Let me talk of automation. I was born on a farm, and as a young man I can well remember how lumbering was carried on. Of course the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) one of the most proficient lumbermen in eastern Canada is more competent to speak on lumbering than I am. In my boyhood it took two men with a cross-cut saw to cut down a tree. A few years later came the chain saw enabling one man to do three or four or five times the work that a man with the cross-cut saw had done. Tractors replaced horses; and so it went. Men who were in demand on the railroad and lumbering industries are being told that there are no more jobs for them.

We in the House of Commons are on the mailing list for every publication, probably, in the country. In a recent issue of the Ontario Logger magazine, an article said that one man operating a logging machine which had taken ten years to develop and which cost a third of a million of dollars could do as much work as scores of men had done previously.

All that the operator, who is enclosed in an air conditioned cab—and that is a far cry from the old conditions—has to do is to select the trees. The machine will remove the bark, limb the tree, cut it into eight foot lengths and stack them along the road. One man with one of these machines can do in one hour what it would have taken more than 20 hours to do with a chain saw. There we have an example of what has happened in a basic industry.

I am interested in this measure because I am a teacher in the field of technical and vocational training, and this bill deals with that subject. A few years ago I took part in an interesting experiment in the retraining of workers. In my constituency there is a cotton milling town named Marysville. Some 12 or 15 years ago, due I believe to financial difficulties encountered by the parent company, the mill was closed and many workers were thrown out of employment. This mill had been in operation for almost 100 years and generations had worked in it. When their employment ceased they had no skills except those of cotton workers.

The minister of labour at that time was Hon. Milton Gregg, V.C. who represented my constituency. Later he became a political opponent, although we have always remained the closest of friends. He arranged with private industry and the department of education of the province of New Brunswick to retrain these people who had lost their jobs in the mill. I personally took some 30 or 40—I forget the exact number—and retrained them in office skills. The scheme worked very well. Unfortunately, a few of them did not have the necessary basic education, and this was the only reason they did not succeed. The rest worked hard at their courses and the great majority of them are still working, using the skills in which they were trained at that time.

It is impressed upon us every time the subject of education arises that education is a provincial matter under the terms of the British North America Act. The province from which the minister comes, the province of Quebec, which is also the province of my birth, is more conscious of this particular right than any of the others, and guards it more jealously. But I have reached the conclusion with the passing of the years that when we rewrite our constitution, as eventually we shall have to do, this is a situation which we shall have to change to some extent. In 1867 when this nation was formed people travelled very little. They grew up, married and died, not more than a few miles from the village in which they had been born. Now we travel back and forth across this continent in a few hours. A few years ago I taught a student, a soldier's daughter, who in the course of 12 years had gone to 15 different schools. It is surprising that this child had done so well in her studies. If we are to have ten systems of education it will be necessary to find some way of co-ordinating education in this country of ours.

I wish now to make a plea on behalf of a very special group of educators who are interested in this measure. The hon. member who spoke before me, the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston) raised this matter and I should like to elaborate on it. When he was presenting the minister's statement this evening the parliamentary secretary told us that the facilities offered by private educators would be used in connection with this measure. The hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke drew attention to the fact that there is in this country a very special group of private educators, the private business school people. Several hundred of them are meeting here in May and bringing distinguished educators from Britain and from the United States to their convention. I want to put the following facts on record for the benefit of the minister, his parliamentary secretary and those who are doing the work of the department.

The private business colleges of this country can do, and have been doing for more than a hundred years, a completely efficient job in the field of adult training and retraining. Many members of this House of Commons in the course of achieving an education have gone to private business schools to learn the business skills. Business colleges are established throughout this country and are grouped in an association known as the Association of Canadian Commercial Colleges. They are very much aware of the problems involved in adult education and are able to adjust quickly to solving them. Many of them are already participating in program five training, that is, the training of the unemployed. The minister told us the federal government will pay the cost of training all adults in occupational training courses not operated by the province or an employer. This is the point in which I am very interested and in which the private business schools are interested. These colleges have the plant and equipment available, and they also have the staff capable of undertaking these services.

Most of them are small, and this makes for flexibility; they can meet the needs of the students more effectively. They are open 12 months of the year. They hold both day and evening classes in addition to summer schools and Saturday morning classes. Business colleges can do a more effective job in this field than public schools can, because their overhead costs are lower. I say this with some authority because I have worked both in public schools and in private business schools in my own province.

I feel strongly that the government should use existing facilities of these private schools in the development of its program under this act. The admission of the private sector could affect the very existence of the private schools. It is true that education is a provincial matter, but the federal government is not intruding upon the education field as far as the young are concerned; it is adults who are to be trained. Again, the federal government is paying the cost and it seems to me only reasonable that in these circumstances it should be able and willing to direct.

There is nothing wrong about the government purchasing the services of private enterprise in connection with any endeavour upon which it has embarked. As a believer in free enterprise I am of the opinion that the more we use free enterprise, the better it is for this nation. I should like to suggest to the minister that in the regulations related to this measure he should incorporate the following principles. First, it is the sense of this legislation that it is highly desirable to employ the resources of the private sector of the economy of Canada in all efforts to further the policy expressed in this bill. Second, that in this respect the participation of private enterprise may be procured. Third, that the director and the heads of any federal departments or agencies to which the conduct of programs described in this act have been delegated shall take such steps as may be desirable and appropriate to ensure that the resources of private enterprise are employed to the maximum feasible extent in the programs described in this bill.

I am serving notice to the parliamentary secretary that in committee of the whole I will introduce an amendment to one of the clauses along these lines.

We realize that in the private school field there are some schools which are not doing a good job. But there are many hundreds of these schools which are doing very well indeed. I could name many of them in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario—indeed, in every province. But naming one or two would be unfair to the others. The minister will have heard of them and I am sure other members of the house know about them because they have spoken to me with regard to them on many occasions.

• (10:00 p.m.)

I would refer again to the question of accreditation. For the most part private schools operate under the jurisdiction of the trade schools acts in the various provinces. I know this is the case in my own province of New Brunswick. In the case of Ontario and many other provinces exactly the same situation exists. Where schools operate under a trade schools act they must be accredited and they are thoroughly supervised by the province. I see, Mr. Speaker, my time is up for today. I would hope to continue when we return to this particular measure and I advise the parliamentary secretary that I will be introducing an amendment at the appropriate stage.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the house leader would inform us about the business for tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we would start with the third reading of Bill C-243 and, if that is concluded, we would continue the discussion of Bill C-278. Then we have the interim supply bill and the rules, in that order. There are one or two other items on the order paper that members should be ready for on very short notice.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—CAMP HILL, N.S.—REPORT OF LACK OF HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, since the time allotted to us under the rules at this point is very limited I shall deal with this question as quickly as possible. On April 3 I addressed the following question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Teillet), as recorded at page 14421 of Hansard:

Is the hon. gentleman aware of the charges and accusations that have been made that legitimate, pensionable veterans have been refused bed space in the Camp Hill Hospital while merchant seamen from Canada and other countries are occupying beds? Will he investigate this matter?

The minister replied:

I have certainly not heard of this. I will look into it but I very much doubt the accuracy of that report.

I followed this up with a question to the acting minister on April 5, which he took as notice. On April 10 I again brought it to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and he very kindly stated that he was having an investigation carried out regarding a particular case. At that point I brought to his attention the fact that the hospital director, Dr. C. J. MacDonald, according to a report in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of Wednesday, April 5, even before the minister had a chance to report to the house, had given this statement to the press:

"Veterans have always had priority of admission —and always will have," he said. "In fact, we have never found it necessary to refuse admission to anybody. While we have been short of beds, we have never been without them."

So apparently all these complaints I have received mean only one thing, that everybody is out of step but Charlie. Again the minister very kindly on April 19 gave a somewhat similar reply, and at that time I indicated I would like to deal with the question at the adjournment of the house, under the rules, which I am now doing.

This problem was first brought to my attention by a veteran in the town of Sydney Mines, and I would like to put his letter on record. I might say that he is a 100 per cent pensioner. His letter reads:

Having been a pensioner for a number of years, and going back and forth to Camp Hill up until 1960, and receiving good treatment, on March 7th of this year I had need to go to Camp Hill hospital for treatment. But on word from the D.V.A. doctor in Sydney, Dr. Ross, that there were no beds for me in Camp Hill, I finally told him I had to go. He then told me to go and when I reached there, the same story would be related to me of no beds.

After a lot of discussion and dickering, I finally received a bed.

When I was able to move about, I found out that if you are not a veteran you will receive a bed more promptly than a veteran.

In one room there were three Russians, Turks, Spaniards, and to top it all, Chinese doctors that were almost impossible to understand. I don't think this is one bit fair to a veteran. The country doesn't owe us everything but at least we should be provided with a place to die in peace.

We were, at one time, proud of our hospital until we were sold down the river by someone.

Will you please let me know if we have any right to a bed in what used to be our hospital, or not, and what priority we have.

Enos Ashe,
136 Fraser Avenue,
Sydney Mines, N.S.

Incidentally that gentleman is a member of the town council of Sydney Mines and is quite prepared to appear before the minister, or any inquiry at any place, at any time, to support his statements.

Following this I received a letter from Wilbert Hupman of R. R. 1, Port Mouton, Queens County, Nova Scotia. It is as follows:

Dear Sir, I am writing you re your statement in the Commons concerning veterans in Camp Hill. This is 100 per cent true in some cases as it happened to me also. I do not believe in unnecessarily complaining, but this is carrying things very recklessly and if it keeps up where can a veteran turn for help. I was more than pleased that someone brought this to the attention of those responsible and I have also written the veterans minister. In closing I wish to thank you for bringing this to light.

Then I should like to quote this portion of a letter from a person named Lawrence Walker of Summerville, Hants County, Nova Scotia:

I am a veteran of two wars. I thought Camp Hill was established for us, but I find it half full of fishermen.

Further on in the letter he says:

What to my mind is needed is a board of inquiry where we can testify to what is going on.

I also note this letter to the editor, from one Bernard O'Neil of Digby:

Sir: Having just arrived home from Camp Hill Hospital I should like to make some comments about the hospital as I observed it while I was there for about a week.

First of all, I feel that veterans who served their country in time of war are not getting a fair shake at Camp Hill.

While it may be true that veterans are not refused, they certainly get deferred, sometimes for a month.

In my own case an attempt was made to defer me, but my local doctor pressed the matter and I was admitted.

When I arrived in Camp Hill I found that there were a number of beds empty. Also I discovered that there were a number of compensation cases who were not veterans, who were patients in the hospital.

I was also told that beds were being occupied by marine insurance cases, also non-veterans.

As far as treatment and care are concerned, I feel that there is insufficient staff, particularly medical staff, at Camp Hill. The doctors are definitely overworked and sometimes cannot get to examine or treat the patient until he has been in hospital for several days.

In my own case, I was at Camp Hill for four days before I was examined. My bed went unmade for two days even though I asked to have it made.

Although I am a D-Day veteran and served overseas until V-E Day and am also a pensioner, I was advised I would have to pay a fee for doctors' services while at Camp Hill. I understand this fee is based on patient earnings and is a custom which has only recently been instituted.

I do want to say in defence of Camp Hill that the food was very good while I was there and the staff was most friendly and kind, even though badly overworked.

Here again everybody is out of step but Charlie.

I have here a clipping from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of April 8, 1967. The heading is "DVA Is Criticized at Legion Zone Meeting" and it is as follows:

The Department of Veterans Affairs was criticized at a meeting of Zone 12, Canadian Legion, in Clark's Harbour, presided over by zone commander John Freeman, of Sable River.

With delegates in attendance from Yarmouth to Lockeport, Comrade Freeman was critical of Camp Hill DVA for not sending a representative to this important meeting, which was concerned with obtaining information on pensions and treatment.

Then further on:

Several veterans told of being released from Camp Hill Hospital without, what they claimed to be, proper justice.

In conclusion Mr. Brown urged branches to send delegates to the Sydney Convention.

Mr. Speaker, all I ask the minister, who has been very courteous, is whether he would refer this matter to the standing committee on veterans affairs, and then if everything is in order, as suggested by the minister and the doctor in charge of the hospital, no one has anything to worry about. I would suggest that this would be the way to clear up the matter once and for all.

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I accept unreservedly the attitude of the hon. member; that is, he is interested in the welfare of our veterans of Canada and the presentation he is making this evening is simply in an effort to help us provide the kind of service which we all believe the veterans of Canada should have. My answer to him will be in the spirit of that idea.

• (10:10 p.m.)

I fully appreciate that our people are overworked and understaffed, and that we have difficulty in finding the professional staff to man our hospitals. The hon. member has underlined the quality and the spirit of our hospitals. While these people are overworked they do go out of their way to serve the veterans of Canada.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

Let me place a few facts on the record. There is always a bed available for the admission of a veteran for treatment of a pensionable disability, and such veterans have first priority if prompt admission is medically indicated. After the treatment of pensionable disabilities, the next priority is in respect of persons whose treatment is the responsibility of other departments of the federal government. We have a responsibility in this regard. The next priority is the treatment of various categories of veterans for non-pensionable disabilities, and eligibility usually involves their type of service and financial circumstances.

It is the responsibility of the department and doctors to determine whether treatment in a departmental hospital is required, whether it is for a pensionable or non-pensionable disability, and whether the admission is urgent or elective.

For part of last winter Camp Hill hospital was operated at almost full capacity. Indeed additional beds had to be set up to accommodate all admissions. However, at no time was admission for treatment of a pensionable disability, which was required immediately, delayed or denied. This can also be said in respect of treatment for non-pensionable disabilities.

For a short period during this winter, admissions which were not urgent were postponed briefly to a more appropriate time, in the interests of best treatment. The complaints received make it appear that these decisions on the basis of the opinion of departmental medical officers were sometimes in conflict with the wishes of the veterans, who desired immediate admission, even though they were not immediately medically necessary.

I conclude by thanking my hon. friend for giving me this opportunity to put these facts on the record in order to clear up any misunderstanding which may have occurred.

WATER RESOURCES—PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN "WATER FOR PEACE" CONFERENCE

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I appreciate the presence of the minister here this evening. I congratulate him for the work he has done in his department in connection with this very important question of a national water policy, and I congratulate him for his part in organizing the conference held a few months ago on pollution in our environment. The speeches he has made throughout the country indicate his concern about this whole question, and I congratulate him for his work in reorganizing certain administrative features to deal with this whole problem more efficiently and effectively in years ahead.

Let me say that the minister and I have a sort of mutual disability. We both suffer from water on the brain. This very important question of water pollution is one of concern to many Canadians at this time. Water is priceless, and it is becoming of more importance every day.

One can exaggerate the value of many things, but not the value of water. Not one plant, animal, or even a beautiful woman can exist without it. We cannot maintain or improve our living standards without an ample supply of pure water. Without any doubt our health and our recreational facilities for generations to come will depend on action by the federal, provincial and municipal governments in the very near future.

This matter was again brought to my attention quite recently by an article which appeared in the April 22 issue of the Financial Post written by Mr. Clive Baxter, and entitled "Water, water everywhere—and Ottawa knows why". It reads as follows:

Canada will be represented in force at the big Water for Peace Conference in Washington May 23-31—but the lack of enthusiasm could show through.

It is no secret the Canadian government was miffed when President Johnson announced the 60-nation conference two years ago—without bothering to consult the other governments. It forced everyone's hand and Ottawa was annoyed.

Until Ottawa and the provinces can agree on a long-term water-export policy, federal officials have been sidestepping suggestions from any source that a U.S.-Canada water conference might be useful. When the Water for Peace meeting was scheduled, there suddenly appeared the dangerous prospect of "talks within talks" that could put the Canadian delegation in the position of having to take a stand on transborder water sales.

When it was learned the conference organizers were planning a North American regional session, the danger suddenly appeared acute. Ottawa immediately objected and managed to get that part of the agenda changed.

It now appears likely that embarrassing confrontations can be avoided. The agenda is suitably broad to make bilateral water discussions inappropriate if not impossible.

Canada's delegation will comprise federal and provincial government representatives. Energy, Mines and Resources Minister Jean-Luc Pepin told FP they will go to Washington with an agreed Canadian position on the need to co-operate on the whole question of water use, hoping to set a good example to other federal states in battling pollution and water waste.

Then the article goes on to deal with other aspects of this conference. I trust that when our delegation goes to Washington it will be united in agreement, because without a doubt they will find the United States delegation united and determined in their actions with respect to the years ahead.

I just want to quote from a very interesting book which was recently published, entitled "Water, The Vital Essence". It indicates how important it is at the present time that our delegation goes in agreement and stands united. I will quote this from page 209 of the book.

An official in the United States, who shall otherwise be unidentified, was once heard to suggest that the ultimate solution to the water supply problems of the northeastern United States would be to divert large amounts from lakes in the Province of Ontario—and that if Canada should object, then the United States would simply have to take it over.

I have the transcript of that address and the name of the person who stated that. It goes on to read:

Canadians are perfectly aware of the interest of the United States in their water. In spite of strong political opposition, Prime Minister Pearson has been willing to discuss the matter. "The United States," he said in a televised address, "is finding that water is one of its most valuable, and becoming one of its scarcest, resources, and we have—well, we have lots of water." "Exporting water", he said, "can be as important as exporting wheat or oil. This can be one of the most important developments in our history." An official inventory is being taken in Canada, which has one-sixth of the world's fresh water supply, to see how much could be spared from its two great north-flowing river systems, the Mackenzie and Nelson, or from the province of Ontario, where one acre out of every ten is under water.

I am quite sure that since the present minister has taken office the Prime Minister would not make a statement similar to the one he made on television during that election. However, it is because of this concern that I asked the minister the following question on April 21:

I wish to address a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

At that time the minister was absent on official business.

Can the minister inform the house the number of federal and provincial government representatives who will be attending the Water for Peace Conference in Washington from May 23 to May 31 this year, and can the minister inform the house whether these delegates will have an agreed

Canadian position on water policy, water pollution and water waste?

● (10:20 p.m.)

It was at that point, Mr. Speaker, that you shot me down and forced me to stay late this evening in order to get an answer to my question. Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that Canada expects every member of the Canadian delegation to this conference to do his duty on this occasion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to shoot the hon. member down a second time.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I cannot help but thank the hon. member for his very watery compliments, Mr. Speaker. Even I might bloom under such care. His first question had to do with the number of people who are going to attend this conference called "Water for Peace" in Washington in May. I cannot provide a definite, final figure as yet, but a figure of 60 delegates, federal and provincial, will give a good indication of what it will be. There will be an about equal division of federal and provincial representatives. Some of these people will be full fledged "representatives", others will be "ministers accompanying the Canadian delegation" and others will be "experts" and "advisers". I might indicate that there will be also a category known as "observers". They will not be members of the Canadian delegation; these will be individuals from Canadian universities and from engineering firms who have asked to be invited by the secretariat in Washington. They will be attending on an individual basis. This gives an indication of the composition of the Canadian delegation. Every member of that delegation, be he a federal or provincial appointee, will speak as a member of the Canadian delegation and not as a provincial or federal spokesman.

Mr. Herridge: Good.

Mr. Pepin: The second part of the question has to do with the policy we are going to uphold during that meeting. May I underline that the "Water for Peace" conference is not an intergovernmental negotiating or policy making meeting. As a matter of fact, Canada would not have accepted an invitation to that kind of meeting. This will be a rather informal gathering at ministerial and technical levels for the purpose of exchanging information and ideas, and of fostering co-operation between different countries and different parts of the world. Consequently, there is no need for absolute unanimity or uniformity of views as between the members of the Canadian delegation.

There will be, however, a "country position paper". It will be a review of the Canadian situation with regard to water. This Canadian paper has been prepared by a national committee made up of representatives of the federal and provincial governments. To speak very frankly, the paper will be a descriptive paper of what exists in Canada and is not a policy making paper. It is more descriptive than anything else.

I might add we are going to have, in a few days, here in Ottawa, a meeting of all or most of the Canadian delegates to Washington in preparation for this conference, in order to co-ordinate our views as much as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister's time has expired.

AGRICULTURE—ARDA—APPLICATION IN LOWER ST. LAWRENCE—GASPÉ AREA

Hon. Renè Tremblay (Matapédia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, on orders of the day, I put a question to the hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Sauvé) because last weekend an extremely important event took place on the lower St. Lawrence.

A meeting was held at Cabano of representatives from three counties comprising the nine ridings which make up the pilot area of the lower St. Lawrence, Gaspé peninsula and Magdelene Islands. It was decided, by a majority vote, that a council would be organized but that this council would remain independent from the rest of the area in order to pursue the specific objectives of the three counties, namely Kamouraska, Rivière-du-Loup and Témiscouata.

The reason why I raised this question is that it fits into the framework of the general plan of the lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé Peninsula Development Board.

As we know, the federal government, through the ARDA act, administered by the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development contributed 50 per cent of the cost of those studies. The cost of such studies was considerable at $4 million and the 50 per cent federal contribution, under ARDA, will amount to something like $2 million.

Therefore, it is very much in our interest that this project as put forward by the Eastern Quebec Development Board should be implemented. But before discussing that particular problem of bringing the structures of the plan into being, I would like to recall the six objectives mentioned in the development plan. I quote:

1. Modernize traditional basic fields (farming, fishing and partly forestry) in which is found the concern for redevelopment, the utilization of resources contained in the second alternative;

That is the alternative where all the resources of the territory would be fully used.

2. Create new dynamic activities (tourism, industry and mining) which imply that considerable efforts will be made in those fields to keep the territory's population at a minimum of 325,000 people where it is economically realistic to supply them with the urban services they want;

3. Increase the value of manpower seeking to establish the geographical and vocational mobility required by the contemplated development and use of resources, the promotion of proposed new undertakings and the accepted rate of emigration.

4. Establish a planning and participating institutional framework likely to provide an institutional basis for the planned regional development in cooperation with the population;

5. Build up a regional awareness which will result in a popular sharing in the objectives and the method of proposed development and, finally;

6. Rationalize the regional area to provide at a practical cost the regional population with the urban services they hope for and which will create the basic conditions essential to the development of certain sectors, particularly tourism and industry.

The fourth objective, the establishment of a local body to implement the plan is precisely the subject of discussions between the various sectors of the region.

• (10:30 p.m.)

I wish to point out that the decision made by the Grand-Portage area with regard to the three counties of Kamouraska, Rivière-du-Loup and Témiscouata, may not meet the legitimate wishes of the people of the area, but that such a stand should perhaps not be considered as jeopardizing the implementation of the program in the whole territory. That is the point I want the minister to answer.

Mr. Speaker, this very costly plan has also given rise within the population to great aspirations towards improved economic conditions, and the people should not be deprived of advantages they normally expect because of the partial implementation of that program.

It may also be necessary to somewhat restrict the scope of the original plan, so that we, from other sections of the area, from Matapédia-Matane, may be able to contribute to the achievement of those aims. I know that the federal government has not only helped to finance these studies but already begun talks with the authorities of the province of Quebec concerning the implementation of this program.

Therefore I would ask the hon. minister to shed some light on his talks with the provincial authorities, so that we may see how soon the inhabitants of that region may expect to see realized the aims of the program which I have just enumerated.

Because we are very far from the great urban centres, because the people in our region, unlike those of many other areas in the country, have not benefited from natural and other advantages, I believe they may legitimately aspire to receive through ARDA, both from the authorities of the province of Quebec and the federal government, the help they need.

In concluding my observations, I should like to thank the minister for his unfailing concern in the implementation of this development program, although I would like his answer to my question to give reassurance to the people of this area.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane (Mr. Tremblay) for having brought this matter to the attention of the house, because I believe it is most important for the people of that area.

Hon. members will remember that in July the authorities of the Eastern Quebec Development Board submitted to the provincial government and federal authorities a report, in six volumes, which they had taken three years to prepare.

Since then, the provincial and federal authorities, at the level of each department involved, have studied these recommendations. Several meetings have taken place between provincial and federal officials. Meetings have even been held at the governmental level.

I am pleased to say that the implementation of that development program, which will require a special agreement between the Quebec government and the government of Canada, according to the terms of the existing federal-provincial agreement, will be undertaken, I hope, between now and September or October.

On May 28, at Chandler, will be held a meeting of all the representatives of the corporate bodies which were mentioned at Cabano, and I then think that the provincial and federal authorities will be in a position to announce the decisions confirming the intention of both governments to proceed with the program.

Large amounts of money will be involved and federal authorities have already organized a contest to recruit personnel for the area.

Let it suffice for me to say that the problems involved in setting up the organization come under the exclusive authority of the province and that discussions which may have taken place in the area and which were referred to by the newspapers, reveal the social interest of the area which was sought by the Eastern Quebec Development Board, has produced most interesting results.

Just because certain sections coming under the Eastern Quebec Development Board believe different organizations should be set up does not mean that the development program is endangered. On the contrary, it indicates a particular interest by the population, and I should like to reassure my colleague on the implementation of the plan.

I have no hesitation in stating that in the present circumstances, if the federal and provincial authorities continue to co-operate as they have been doing so far, it will be our pleasure before the fall, to sign an agreement which will be a feather in the cap of both the provincial and the federal governments involved.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 25, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE LATE KONRAD ADENAUER
