C.B.C. EMPLOYEES NOT COVERED BY PART IV OF LABOUR CODE

Question No. 2,329—Mr. Howard:

Are there any persons in the employ of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation who the said corporation feels are not covered by the provisions of Part IV, General Holidays, of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code and, if so (a) how many persons are employed in each classification not so covered (b) what reasons does the corporation have therefor?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the C.B.C. that all employees on the regular establishment of the corporation are covered by the provisions of part IV of the labour code, with the following exceptions: (a) Those in management and professional categories, numbering approximately 1,500, who along with other regular employees do, however, enjoy 10 statutory holidays annually. Section 3(3) of the code exempts this group. (b) Those employed on a casual, temporary or part time basis and those retained by the corporation under letter of agreement who are considered by the C.B.C. as independent contractors. This is a relatively small number which fluctuates widely according to operating requirements.

Question No. 2,689—Mr. Ricard:

1. As of the date on which it was decided to grant a supplement to persons eligible for the old age pension who fulfilled certain requirements, how many employees were added to the staff of the responsible section in the office of the Department of National Health and Welfare in the city of Quebec?

2. What will be the total amount paid in salaries each year to these additional employees?

[Translation]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The Quebec Regional Office is at present employing casual staff to deal with the initial phase of implementation of the Guaranteed Income Supplement Program. Recruitment began in January and the numbers of staff (casuals), employed has increased gradually to the present total of 194. It is anticipated that the initial phase of this program will be completed by the end of April with a consequent reduction in the number of casual employees.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

2. At this time, it is impossible to estimate accurately the number and level of employees that will be required for the ongoing aspects of this program hence the total amount that will be paid in salaries each year. This information will be available only after enough applications have been processed to permit an accurate measure to be made of the amount and type of work to be performed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED SPEECHES BY CHIEF OF DEFENCE STAFF AND MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Did the minister give clearance, and thus approval, to the speech made by the chief of the defence staff to the International Relations Club at Bréboeuf College, in which improper motives were imputed to members of this house and particularly to privy councillors?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I did not know of the speech but I have complete confidence in the chief of the defence staff and he is at complete liberty to express himself publicly as he sees fit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: Then, Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege it seems to me that this is a matter in which the minister, in fact the Prime Minister and the government generally, must take some action. A report has been made as follows:

General Jean Allard, commander in chief of the Canadian armed forces, says opposition to unification mostly is a result of political ambition.

Members of the opposition in the House of Commons hope to strengthen their chances of being re-elected by opposing Defence Minister Hellyer's plan, he told a meeting of the International Relations Club at Bréboeuf College.

"I would like to ask former cabinet ministers why they are clinging to the name of the navy, army and air force..."

I think, Mr. Speaker, this is an unprecedented event so far as Canadian history is concerned, that a member of the defence forces of this country, and particularly the chief of the defence staff, would impute to members of this house and members of the defence committee improper motives in regard to the stands and positions they have taken with respect to a measure which is now before the house.

I think there is absolutely no excuse for conduct of this kind. It has never been permitted for members of the defence forces or members of the civil service in this or any other country which has the British parliamentary system of government, and I think it is incumbent not only on the Minister of National Defence but on the Prime Minister to take disciplinary action in this case in order to ensure that there be no repetition of instances of this kind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has raised this matter as a question of privilege. I do not rise to comment on the substance; I have not seen the statement. I do wish, however, to point out to Your Honour rule 41-A which deals with questions of privilege. It is not open to the hon. gentleman to raise the question in the absence of the notice provided for in this new rule which governs our procedure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have no doubt that hon. members will accept the correctness of the procedural point raised by the Acting Prime Minister. I felt it was my duty to hear the statement to be made by the hon. member for Calgary North, but the rule is clear that an hour's notice is to be given on a question of privilege. This is a rule which has been adopted by parliament and which parliament would expect to be followed.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): It arose out of the minister's answer.

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion is made that the question of privilege arises out of the minister's answer. I would not agree with that suggestion. If the hon. member for Calgary North felt he had a valid question of privilege he should have raised it according to the rules. I suggest to him that it would have been very easy to give the prescribed notice, as all hon. members invariably do when a question of privilege is raised in the house.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I did think my question of privilege arose out of the minister's reply, which was so contrary to what has been the practice in the past in this house. I thought I had a valid question of privilege which arose at that time, but naturally I defer to your judgment on the matter.

I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a supplementary question. As Acting Prime Minister will he take action to ensure that instances of this kind do not recur and that disciplinary action is taken in this case?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated I have not seen the statement. I will be glad to look at it. I will do so in the light of what my honourable and respected friend has suggested.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question. In view of the statement by the Minister of National Defence over last week end, I should like to ask whether he was enunciating official government policy when he told the Young Liberals Association that the press of Canada was guilty of irresponsible reporting and had done a great disservice to Canada in the manner in which the news was reported.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that it is open to an hon. member to ask anyone in the house whether he agrees with the views of a colleague or another member of this house. However, since my hon. friend has put that question I should like to say in answer to my hon. friend that the Minister of National Defence has the right to state his views, just as my hon. friend has that right. I recall one occasion, when my hon. friend was questioning a matter which I raised about his particular administration, when he made an observation which I do not think reflected too kindly on the press of this country.

Mr. Starr: What was it?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether in his years in office he has familiarized himself with Q. R. & O. If so, does he not realize that his answer is entirely wrong?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUEST BY UN SECRETARY GENERAL FOR CEASE FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister regarding the appeal by Secretary General U Thant for a unilateral cease fire by the United States, under which there would be a truce under which United States forces in Viet Nam would fire only if fired upon. In view of the fact that the Secretary General has indicated that he himself or a group of governments, who are members of the United Nations, might make an appeal to the United States for such a declaration by a fixed date, will the Canadian government indicate to the Secretary General of the United Nations Canada's support of such a declaration?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet seen the official text of the appeal of the Secretary General addressed to the government of the United States, but I expect to receive it later this afternoon. In general terms, however, so there can be no misunderstanding, the position of the Canadian government remains as set out in this house on a number of occasions. We should like to see the bombings stopped; we should like to see the infiltration stopped, and we should like to see this conflict transferred from the battlefield to the negotiating table as soon as possible. Any proposal or appeal which carries us closer to that objective will be supported by the Canadian government.

I should like to remind my hon. friend, and I am sure he will recall this, that in answer to a question from his seatmate I said that the government publicly endorsed the three point proposal put forward by the Secretary-General on March 14. That proposal seemed at that time, as it still does, to offer some hope for early restoration of peace in Viet Nam.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question. Is the Canadian government prepared to support an appeal by the United Nations to the government of the United States to set a fixed date for a cease fire to be carried out on a unilateral basis?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I can say unequivocally that the Canadian government will support an appeal to all sides for a cease fire. That was the tenor of the first proposal made by the Secretary General on March 14.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs accept the proposition of the Secretary General of the United Nations that the first initiative in stopping the conflict should rest, for the major part, with the United States?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think I have dealt with this question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative.

NATO—REPORTED INVOLVEMENT OF OFFICERS IN SPY ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of Canada's deep involvement in NATO does the minister have anything to report to this house in respect of the alarming reports regarding spy activities within the NATO organization?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a communiqué was issued by the Secretary General of NATO on March 23 in which it was stated that NATO has been informed that the news carried by the press in respect of the alleged involvement of 300 NATO officers in the ring discovered in Italy lacked any foundation. As a result of conversations I had with the Secretary General in England on Friday I would say there is no reason for changing that reply.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO FORMATION OF NEW DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the continuing decline in housing starts as reported last Friday by C.M.H.C., and in view of the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister last week concerning urban and housing affairs and techniques of handling related problems, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government is considering a new agency or perhaps a department of housing and urban affairs.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's statement speaks for itself. When the government feels that an announcement of its policy now under consideration should be made, it will be made. I am sure it will please my hon. friend.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the self imposed deadline of March 31 having been reached with no announcement from Geneva concerning the future price of wheat under the international wheat agreement, is the minister in a position to indicate whether negotiations have bogged down or is the government still optimistic about a 32 cent increase in the price of wheat?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have no comment to make regarding the 32 cents, which is a figure unknown to me. I think the suggestion regarding the March 31 deadline may be somewhat in error. The agreed terminating date for the current cereals negotiations at Geneva is April 30.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I did not suggest that it was the terminating date. All reports in the press indicated that the negotiators had set this particular, termination date for the negotiations on wheat, and that the future—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is a difference of opinion between the minister and the hon. member which we should not attempt to resolve just now.

SPORTS

NANCY GREENE—SUGGESTED RECOGNITION FOR WINNING WOMEN SKIERS' WORLD CUP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise with great national and parochial pride to bring to the attention of this house a matter of national significance. In view of the great achievement of Miss Nancy Greene, of Rossland in Kootenay West, in having won the first world cup for women skiers, to the delight of all Canadians, has consideration been given by the government to proclaiming her the centennial athletes' queen for Canada, or to some other recognition such as Canada's centennial champion athlete?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare to reply to this question. Before doing so may I say on behalf of all of us in the house that I am glad to see the hon. member for Grey North still in his seat, and I should like to extend to his seatmate, the hon. member for Humboldt-Melville-Tisdale, our warmest congratulations—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —on being selected whip of a rapidly reducing group on the other side of the chamber.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to make a brief correction. My constituency is Grey-Bruce, not Grey North.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. member for bringing to the attention of the house the remarkable achievement of Miss Nancy Greene in winning the world cup and thus establishing herself as the top woman skier in the world. She has generated the admiration of Canadians from coast to coast, and this feat certainly will be regarded as one of the most outstanding performances by an individual in the long history of amateur sport in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: In paying tribute to Miss Greene I wish also to express my congratulations to all members of our national ski team. Canada's level of performance in world skiing is on the ascent, and this year's team has made a notable contribution.

With respect to the specific and important point raised by the hon. member concerning a suitable award for Miss Greene, I should like to mention that some time ago the national advisory council on fitness and amateur sport undertook to consider the question of suitable awards for outstanding amateur athletes in Canada. That proposal has been approved in principle and within a very short time a special committee of the council will be meeting to determine the final details of such an award. Naturally Miss Greene would rank high on any list of possible candidates for such an award.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Acting Prime Minister said my constituency was Humboldt-Melville-Tisdale, instead of Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale. Nevertheless I very much appreciate the Acting Prime Minister's congratulations and thank him for the nice remarks he made on my appointment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

FREIGHT RATES

NOTICE OF INCREASE FILED BY RAILWAY ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Is he aware that the Railway Association of Canada, representing some 15 railroads in this country, have filed notice that they intend to increase some class and commodity rates? If the minister is aware of this, I wonder if he could advise the house whether the new railway commission has been set up with all the regulations and administration powers necessary to administer the new transportation policy in Canada, or is this an attempt by the Railway Association to raise these rates under the old act?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the application; like the hon. gentleman, I received it in the mail. Part V of the Transportation Act, which contains the amendments to the Railway Act, was proclaimed on March 23 and is now part of the law of Canada.

Mr. Olson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I know the act was proclaimed and is part of the law. What I asked the minister was whether the new transportation commission, along with the necessary regulations, has been set up to deal with this kind of thing in the event that any of these rates exceed the maximum allowable under the new act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, all amendments to the Railway Act—here I speak subject to correction in detail—were proclaimed on March 23. Among the other provisions in the act is a provision that until the new transport commission is set up the board of transport commissioners will act in its place. That is the law as passed by parliament and given royal assent at this session.

Mr. Olson: A further supplementary question. Can the minister tell the house whether the new transport commission is now set up?

Mr. Pickersgill: The answer, sir, is no.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

TRANSPORTATION

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON MARITIME STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In light of the drastic loss of winter traffic to Halifax, I wonder if the minister can now advise the maritimes, including his own province, whether the special maritime transportation study is now receiving consideration by the department.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the report of the consultants who were engaged jointly by the Atlantic Development Board and my department, their report is rapidly approaching completion and I hope will be in my hands shortly.

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary question. Could the minister now advise us whether this is a matter which will come before the house prior to our summer adjournment?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would hate to predict the course of this parliament for even one day.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the transportation aspect of the secret plans to keep open the St. Lawrence up to Montreal, will the minister stop all activity by engineers of his department until we have had the chance to examine this whole question in a committee of the house, as promised before the Easter recess?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would reassure the hon. gentleman that there are no secret plans whatever; therefore there is no need to suppress the secret plans.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Will the minister give every assurance that no engineers in his department or any other branch of the government are working on any plans to keep open the St. Lawrence in the winter to Montreal?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think in the very careful and calculated language of the hon. gentleman I could give that assurance. But I would not want to mislead the house, sir; therefore I might be permitted to add this word. As is well known—there is no secret about this—consideration is being given to improving the ship channel in the St. Lawrence for normal summer navigation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the Minister of Transport tell us whether officials of his department, in line with modern progress, intend to set up such a committee to ascertain the possibility of keeping the St. Lawrence open all year round to Montreal? Could he also tell us why his department, under which this matter comes, does not see to it that the St. Lawrence seaway is kept open all year round?

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: I fear that a reply to that question would start a debate, sir.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I take this matter up at ten o'clock?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED CHANGE IN ROLE OF CF-5 AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister advise whether the role or purpose of the CF-5 aircraft is being changed from that of a close support tactical aircraft to that of merely reconnaissance and surveillance, as attributed to General Allard, who says that the aircraft has been found peculiarly vulnerable to ground to air missiles?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is very difficult for me to determine whether there is urgency to the question asked by the hon. member.

Mr. Lambert: Well, Mr. Speaker, on the question of urgency, I understand there is a debate coming up on defence, so perhaps we might have the information.

Mr. Speaker: The question might be asked then.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF KINDERGARTEN TEACHERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. May I ask the hon. gentleman whether it is the intention of his department to pay salaries to teachers of kindergarten classes for native Indian children?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question should be placed on the order paper.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

LOUISBOURG FORTRESS—RETURN TO WORK OF MEN LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. May I ask the minister whether the government has altered its plans with respect to the development of Fortress Louisbourg?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A supplementary question. Since the minister does not have any knowledge, would he assure the 40-odd men who were paid off on Friday that they will have their jobs back tomorrow or the following day? If the minister is not in a position to answer now I will raise the matter at ten o'clock.

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF MANITOBA REPRESENTATIVE ON BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the importance of history in Canada's centennial year, and the fact that the position of Manitoba's representative on the historic sites and monuments board has been vacant for several months, can the minister indicate when this appointment might be made?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL OF FEED GRAIN BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

In view of the fact that this matter is of great interest to all the farmers in eastern Canada, is the minister in a position to give the names of the members of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, the names will be announced this week.

Mr. Ricard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would like to know if the minister will be able to announce those names definitely, since he has promised to do it three times in the last ten days.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will agree that the minister has already answered the question.

[English]

AIR TRANSPORT

MONTREAL—INCREASED AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Would the minister tell the house whether his department has taken any steps to increase air traffic control services in the Montreal flight information region to handle the increased air traffic for Expo and the centennial, announced by the minister on March 27?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of these stepped up air services for centennial year, will the minister make sure that Saskatchewan is not left lagging in the provision of services? There has been considerable complaint in the province that air transport service there is inadequate at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think every effort will be made within the capacities of the air lines serving Canada to provide service to every part of Canada to the best of their ability.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): A supplementary question. Has the minister any intention of bringing Canadian Pacific Airlines service to the maritimes, that part of Canada that was forgotten in this announcement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pickersgill: The answer to that question is no.

[Mr. Ricard.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN POLICING OF CEASE FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for either the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence. As it arises out of some remarks attributed to the latter before a meeting of the Toronto Young Liberals Association, I will address my question to him. Has Canada officially offered or will Canada officially offer to make peace keeping forces available to help police a cease fire in Viet Nam?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Would my hon. friend restate the first part of his question?

Mr. Brewin: Has Canada made or will Canada make any official offer to make forces available to help police a cease fire in Viet Nam?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have read what my colleague the Minister of National Defence has said concerning the situation that would arise in the event that at some point an invitation were extended to Canada to take part in a peace keeping operation, either in an expanded I.C.C. form or in some other form, perhaps under the UN charter. But I cannot see that the question my hon. friend has put is in any way related to what the Minister of National Defence is reported to have said. I do not see how the use of force, in the sense mentioned by my hon. friend, would be very helpful.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INTERIM ADJUSTMENTS IN PENSION RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In reply to a question asked on March 13 the minister stated that if the report of the committee studying veterans pension rates did not become available in the near future, further interim adjustments might be necessary. Could I ask the minister whether he has yet received the report, and if not has any decision been made with respect to further adjustments?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I think the clearest answer I can give to the hon. member is no to both questions.

CAMP HILL, N.S.—REPORTED LACK OF HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): My question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is the hon. gentleman aware of the charges and accusations that have been made that legitimate, pensionable veterans have been refused bed space in the Camp Hill hospital while merchant seamen from Canada and other countries are occupying beds? Will he investigate this matter?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I have certainly not heard of this. I will look into it but I very much doubt the accuracy of that report.

EXPO '67

STATEMENTS IN "LA PRESSE" RESPECTING LOGEXPO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce as the minister responsible for Expo '67.

Can he tell us whether he intends to take action against the Montreal paper La Presse because of the considerable damage caused by the irresponsible reports published in that paper with regard to Logexpo?

[English]

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not been contemplating any such action. Since the initial statement made by La Presse they have given very full coverage to the corrective action that has been taken and to the good progress now being made by Logexpo in bringing together people seeking accommodation and those who have it to offer.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister, with the help of his department and the Department of Justice, make inquiries in order to ascertain whether it is true that members of the Montreal underworld have approached an editorial writer from La Presse in an attempt to divert the attention of the Montreal police during Expo '67?

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION RESPECTING NEW UNIFORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. I am wondering what would be the implications to the Canadian defence readiness posture if information about the colour and cut of the walking out uniform of the armed forces were to be finally disclosed to an anxious and breathless public.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to know how to cope with such a comprehensive question as that raised by my hon. friend. However, if he is referring to the picture which appeared in some newspapers last week end, it might interest him to know that the gentleman in that picture was Captain Ken McLeod of the Queen's Own Rifles. He is a member of the directorate of ceremonials at headquarters in Ottawa. All the battle ribbons he was wearing were his own; and it is a great tribute to him that after so many years of distinguished service he is as useful —youthful as the picture portrays him to be.

Mr. MacEwan: Useful to the minister.

Mr. Hellyer: This very effective officer, who was having his picture taken—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CO-OPERATIVES

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Registrar General. On the day we recessed, March 22, he took as notice a question I asked with respect to a co-operatives act which the government has indicated from time to time was under consideration. I want to ask the minister at what stage the preparation is and whether we can expect this legislation to be produced in the near future.

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I must say that this legislation is still being considered in the light of the eventual amendment of other related acts, and no final decision has been taken at the moment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a supplementary question. May I ask the minister if the co-operative organizations will have any opportunity to make representations to those who are preparing this legislation prior to it being introduced into parliament?

Mr. Favreau: Of course they will have the opportunity. Especially now that the question has been asked, I assume the hon. gentleman is aware of some who want to make representations, so I will see to it that a proper occasion is afforded.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED LACK OF REFRIGERATOR CARS FOR POTATOES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he assure the house that adequate refrigerator cars for the transportation of potatoes is now available in eastern Canada? If not, would he be kind enough to look into this problem with a view to making transport available for the disposal of surplus potatoes?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I regret very much, sir, that it is not within my power to give such an assurance, as I am sure the hon. gentleman realizes. However, I will be happy to make the most urgent representations to the Canadian National Railways.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

CASTLEGAR, B.C.—REQUEST FOR PRESENTATION OF AIR FORCE PERFORMANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I dislike very much intruding twice during one question period, but this is a matter of urgency. In view of the request by the municipalities in Kootenay West, representing the wishes of the people, that the R.C.A.F. Golden Centennials put on a full show while in Castlegar on July 14, and in view of the fact that the Castlegar squadron of the Royal Canadian Air Cadets, Kootenay West, has been chosen as the top squadron in Canada, will favourable consideration be given to the request of the municipalities and the 25,000 spectators expected to attend—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

[Mr. Favreau.]

EDUCATION

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR CLASSICAL COLLEGE AT SUDBURY, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Could the minister tell us whether, after the repeated refusal of the Ontario government to give assistance to Ontario's French speaking classical colleges in order to allow them to survive, especially the college of Sudbury, it is the intention of the federal government to use the ancillary powers vested upon it by section 93 of the constitution to contribute to the survival of the classical college of Sudbury?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question should be put on the order paper.

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATIONS UNDER NEW LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Have all the necessary regulations under the Public Service Staff Relations Act and under the Public Service Act been promulgated? If so, when will they be available?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I know the work on the regulations has been going on urgently. I should like to take the question as notice to determine whether or not all of them have been completed.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Just before you call orders of the day, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Transport whether he can inform the house about any recent developments regarding the recent proposal by the province of British Columbia to establish a harbours board.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am not in the confidence of the government of British Columbia.

Mr. Howard: I rather expected that answer, from the statements made by the Prime Minister over the week end in Vancouver. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he knows whether the act has been passed and what action the government intends to take, that is the federal government?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think any action is called for except the action required under the British North America Act, to look at any legislation within one year of its passage. I presume that the Minister of Justice or his officials will do that at the appropriate time.

Mr. Howard: In other words—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OUTER MONGOLIA—INQUIRY AS TO EXCHANGE OF DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wish to ask him if action is now in the process of being taken with respect to implementing an exchange of diplomatic representatives with Outer Mongolia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I recognize that the minister said three weeks ago that there was no intention of making changes immediately. Nevertheless, considering the changing situation in that part of Asia, coupled with our lack of knowledge of the situation actually existing between Red China and the U.S.S.R., is consideration being given to this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have a lack of knowledge about Outer Mongolia, but I rather suspect the question could well be placed on the order paper.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

On the order:

March 22, 1967—House in committee of the whole on Bill C-243, an act to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof (as amended).—The Minister of National Defence.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order on the calling of this item. I do so knowing the seriousness of the situation at hand in that the house is being asked, or will be asked, to consider in committee a complex bill of many clauses on which the defence committee held many hearings the transcripts of which have not yet reached members of the house. Some, the later ones, reached hon. members at twelve o'clock today, that is, hon. members who went down to the distribution office and themselves obtained the copies. The last copy of evidence has not yet reached me. It may be in my office now, since 20 minutes to 3, but I do not know that it is there.

As has been the practice with other bills—and I cite the bill with respect to the Bank of Canada amendments where such transcripts were not ready—I submit that the government should defer the calling of this particular item until the complete transcript of evidence given before the standing committee is available for distribution to this committee. I think it would be doing a great disservice to the house to proceed with this matter without the evidence being in the hands of hon. members. I see no justification for the government going ahead at the present time.

Second, and this point is even more important than the first point, if Your Honour refers to Votes and Proceedings of Wednesday, March 22, at page 1591, as part of the fifth report of the standing committee on national defence Your Honour will see the following paragraph:

A further report, setting forth the above mentioned amendments to Bill C-243, is being prepared and will be presented.

Well, Your Honour, this afternoon on motions an hon. member of that committee in the absence of the chairman tabled the report. Those amendments are not printed in Votes and Proceedings. They are not available to hon. members as the committee report and they will not be available, other than as photocopies which can be made in a hurry or as some other sort of substitute.

I put it to Your Honour that these amendments and this report do not become official until they are printed in Votes and Proceedings, notwithstanding that in its fifth report the committee did say that it had ordered the reprinting of the bill, and that there is in the midst of our bills a copy of the reprinted bill. Hon. members, from the minister down, cannot take the original bill and the amended bill and show what changes were made by the committee. That would be a laborious process.

National Defence Act Amendment

I am as anxious as anyone else to proceed to an intelligent discussion of this matter. I have not passed observations on the unintelligent press reporting of the unification evidence, or the evidence on unification that the minister has. I shall refer to that later. I do say, however—and I spoke to the government house leader about this briefly early today—that to proceed with this item the evidence must be available to us. I say that hon. members of this house are entitled to that evidence. It is not a case of saying "Oh, well, it will be presented." We need that evidence to work on this legislation.

I suggest that Beauchesne makes certain references which imply that all the evidence shall be before the house when the matter is being discussed. In any event the evidence must be before hon. members, and it should not be presented merely at 2.30. To do that is contemptuous and frankly contemptible. Second, I put it to Your Honour that it is mandatory that the committee report embodying the amendments be printed in Votes and Proceedings before we can proceed to study the bill as amended.

If Your Honour will look at citation 318 on page 248 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, the paragraph dealing with the report by the chairman or member of a committee, Your Honour will find these words:

> If it is long, the house generally dispenses with the reading, as all reports are printed in the Votes and Proceedings for the information of members as soon as they are laid before the house.

I am concerned not only with members of the defence committee—and the acquantance of some hon. members on the other side with that committee was short enough—I am concerned with all members in the house. They must have the contents of the report before proceeding on it. That report was tabled at approximately 2.45 p.m. this afternoon, and I put it to Your Honour that that is not complying with the rules and practice of this house. The house having received the report, it may read it in Votes and Proceedings for today, and at the appropriate time proceed with the discussion of the bill.

I have raised these points because more and more with the evolution of the committee system in dealing with legislation, it will be absolutely mandatory that this house have the committee evidence before it, that it may properly consider the bill clause by clause. I therefore seek the co-operation of the leader of the house on the government side to turn to other business that we may complete these administrative details and allow hon. members to be properly prepared for this debate.

[Mr. Lambert.]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am always desirous of co-operating with hon. members, particularly when that will expedite the business of the house. I followed citation 318 (1) closely when the hon. member read it. It is interesting to note that it does not provide any requirement for the printing of the report in Votes and Proceedings. It does make reference to the information being available to hon. members.

Mr. Lambert: That is nonsense at this stage.

Mr. McIlraith: Information is made available to hon. members in the report of the committee and the evidence. The evidence has been printed in both English and French and has been distributed, and the sixth report containing the amendments made by the standing committee is to be found on page 2387 of minutes of proceedings No. 37 of the standing committee. That has been distributed.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert: Will the minister say when that was distributed?

Mr. McIlraith: If I might just finish my remarks—

Mr. Lambert: When was it distributed?

Mr. McIlraith: I think the hon. gentleman should have learned by now that in this house members other than himself are entitled to speak and that a little courtesy such as is extended to him when he speaks should be extended in return. I said when he asked his question that I would be glad to deal with that point. As I was about to say before I was interrupted, the bill itself, as reprinted by order of the standing committee of which the hon. member was a member, is in the binder of bills. So not only do hon. members have the bill as originally submitted to the House of Commons but they have the reprint of the bill as ordered to be reprinted by the standing committee which dealt with it. In the sixth report of the committee they also have the amendments in isolation. So it is very easy for hon. members to know precisely what clauses have been amended and what the amendments are.

The hon. member asked me when the evidence was delivered. He was kind enough to call me this morning about noon to say it had not been printed, whereupon I expressed surprise and said I would immediately look into the matter. This I did, and I was assured that it had been printed. I was also assured that at the very moment of that conversation the reprinted bill was being placed in the binders beneath hon. members' desks in the House of Commons. I do not know when they were delivered to hon. members' offices or to their mail boxes but I am assured it was done earlier today both as to the evidence and as to the reprinted bills.

Mr. Lambert: May I ask the minister whether he is satisfied that report No. 37 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence was distributed? He will clearly remember my telling him that No. 37 had been printed but was not available for distribution, though Nos. 34 to 36 were perhaps available to members if they went down to the distribution office and got them themselves. That was at a quarter to one this afternoon. At that time No. 37 was not available for distribution. It may have been printed but it was not available for distribution.

Mr. McIlraith: I checked on this immediately the conversation had taken place. I do not know the precise time; it was somewhere between twelve thirty and one o'clock. I was assured that it was printed, available, and distributed.

Mr. Ricard: I have just received my copy.

Mr. McIlraith: I have no way of knowing, beyond that.

An hon. Member: In English and French?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, in both English and French.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order which has been raised, this is too serious a matter to be glossed over so carelessly by the leader of the house. Yes, we have in our possession, placed in the binders today, Bill No. C-243 reprinted as amended and reported by the committee on national defence. Consequently we need some other document to which to refer in order to check with regard to the amended clauses. The old bill has been removed from our binders. I was looking for mine in order to begin making the comparison. Obviously we need something else in addition. It has been normal to use Votes and Proceedings with the amendments printed therein.

When the committee reported on March 22 it stated, as my hon. friend from Edmonton West has pointed out, that a further report setting out the amendments to the bill had been prepared and would be presented. This was presented today, but of course it cannot appear in Votes and Proceedings until tomorrow. The leader of the house tells us we have available the final report of the committee on national defence. That is not true. It is not available to me. I have not got it here, unless it is being delivered at this very moment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: This, I say, is making a mockery of the House of Commons. Here we have the senior page delivering copies of the final report of the minutes of proceedings and evidence—No. 37. I would want to be assured that every single member of the House of Commons has that report in his possession before we proceed with this debate this afternoon. It is all very well to come here with a dozen copies and pass them out to people who may be on their feet speaking or who have said something about this matter. Each of the 265 members of this house is entitled to this report. Even so, I say that the normal procedure is to have the amendments printed in Votes and Proceedings which is available at our desks, having been filed each day by the pages. We wish to refer to this background information right now and this is where it should appear. Unless every single member of this house can give you the assurance, Mr. Speaker, that he has report No. 37 in his possession it is not fair to ask this institution to proceed with the bill at this stage.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, aside altogether from what one might call the legal requirements to which the Minister of Public Works attached a great deal of emphasis, I think it is unfair and unreasonable to expect members of this house to proceed with a bill of this nature when the relevant committee reports and the bill as amended were not in their hands until a few moments ago. I did not receive Nos. 33, 35 and 36 of the committee reports until twelve thirty or one o'clock today. The first time I saw No. 37, which outlines the amendments made in the committee, was two or three minutes ago after it had been distributed in the house. I did not receive an amended copy of Bill No. C-243. The first printing of the bill was on my file when I came into the house.

I have taken a fairly active part in the affairs of the committee and perhaps I could get on reasonably well without referring to these documents. But most hon. members of the house were not members of the committee and I submit they are at a complete disadvantage in not having these documents at their disposal in such a situation as this.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw to Your Honour's attention the fact that on the inside of the first page of Bill No. C-243, which is in our folders, the following words appear:

> The amendments made in the committee on national defence are indicated by underlining and vertical lines.

Therefore the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre can simply look through the bill and find out where the committee made amendments, because there will be either vertical lines or the words will be underlined. I do not know whether he has the original bill with him in order to make comparisons but I am sure that like myself and other members he has a copy in his office. Even though the copy of the original bill may have been removed from his file here, surely another copy is available to him. It is customary to show the wording that was in the previous bill and the new wording and identify the amendments with vertical lines or by underlining. I do not see any great difficulty in sending someone to my office for a copy of the old bill if I want to make comparisons.

However, I am in some measure of agreement with the hon. member for Calgary North when he suggests that the minutes of proceedings and evidence taken during the latter stages of the committee hearings have just now been made available to hon. members and there should be an opportunity for them to review some of the evidence in order to familiarize themselves with it. If the normal course in committee of the whole is followed I suggest that there will be fairly long introductory speeches made by some members on both sides of the house reviewing the general principle of the bill and that by the time we get down to clause by clause discussion of the bill each member will have had an opportunity to review that portion of the evidence that he wishes to review. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in view of the many months we have spent in this session I suggest that we go ahead and finish the balance of the business on the order paper.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I subscribe to the views of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness). I am not a member of the defence committee. From time to time within the scope of my other duties I have attempted to study the transcripts of the proceedings of that committee. An important issue is involved here. I do not necessarily take the same viewpoint as some of my colleagues on that committee. I may or may not, but I think there is some very important evidence to be considered. I suggest that Your Honour can take judicial notice of the fact that the Prime Minister made a statement in which he said he had an opportunity some days ago to read the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller, that it was evidence which impressed him and that it should be considered in depth. That evidence only became available to me a few minutes ago. On an issue of this kind, Mr. Speaker, I think the whole value of the committee system is at stake. We have now obtained over 2,400 pages of evidence given by a number of witnesses, of which more than 250 pages was distributed today. There was a very excellent series of examinations and cross-examinations of these witnesses. We should have an opportunity to read all the evidence.

I do not go along with the hon. member for Medicine Hat who suggested that we can prognosticate that a certain length of time is going to be taken up with preliminary speeches. This is not necessarily the case. I am looking at the first two or three clauses of the bill, and hon. members who were not on the defence committee will be called upon to take certain positions with respect to those clauses, make important decisions and decide how they are going to vote.

At this stage I suggest it is utterly impossible for hon. members to analyse the evidence of very important witnesses contained in the last two or three transcripts, relate their evidence to what was said previously and come to an independent decision. If we are going to make proper use of the committee system I suggest it is incumbent upon the government to ensure that transcripts of proceedings are in the hands of members of the house in sufficient time for members to read them, examine them and make a decision on them. It is utterly impossible at the beginning of the debate today for myself and other members to examine the very important evidence given by the latter witnesses who appeared before the committee and say. "This is the view I am going to take."

I would say that this point is as much a matter of privilege as it is one of order. If our committee system is going to work then inevitably the government will have to do better than this if it is going to ask members to make use of the proceedings of committees. The committees are emanations of this house set up by the house to examine witnesses, something which we are incapable of doing in committee of the whole house. The defence committee has done an excellent job but we want an opportunity, particularly in the light of these recent transcripts, to examine the evidence and come to a decision. Without that opportunity I do not think we can do justice to this bill and to the work that the committee did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: There are two points raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West. The first one deals with the question of the report—

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member is suggesting that further comments be heard from the government benches. If so I will hear them.

Mr. Lambert: I hesitate to raise one point again, Mr. Speaker, and I do so only because, unfortunately, the hon. member for Medicine Hat inadvertently misled the house when he referred to the reprinted version of Bill C-243 and said it contained a note at the top of the first right hand page that the amendments are indicated by underlining or by vertical lines. That is only as between the revised bill and the original C-243. If he will look at the original Bill C-243 he will see that the underlinings and vertical lines indicating amendments to the act are entirely different and there is absolutely no relationship among the three at all. Therefore what he had to say in this regard was quite misleading, albeit perhaps innocently.

Mr. Speaker: If I may resume the suggestion I was going to make to hon. members on the first point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West, which deals with the report, the hon. member with support from other hon. members referred to citation 318 (1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition. I must say, with respect, that I tend to agree with the proposition advanced by the government house leader that the only requirement in that citation is that information be available for hon. members. That suggestion did not appear to gain much support from hon. members on the opposition side when it was made, but on reflection I believe this is the purpose of this citation. As hon. members know, the amendments are now before the house in two forms, in the form of the report which was tabled and which is now officially before the house and in the form of the amended bill which has been distributed. Of course I fully recognize that distribution might be a bit late, but the report could not be distributed until it was tabled in the house. This causes difficulty but it is not really a point of order; it is really a question of convenience.

I note that the hon. member for Edmonton West during his presentation appeared to appeal to the government house leader rather than to the Chair, assuming, I would think, that this is something the government should agree to rather than for the Chair to rule that it was a valid point of order.

On the other point, the suggestion is based on the desirability of letting the order proposed for consideration this afternoon stand long enough for hon. members to familiarize themselves with the evidence. I point out to hon. members it is not for the Chair to decide whether one hour, one day, or one week is sufficient time for members to familiarize themselves with the evidence, and because of this I do not think I can interefere to ask the house not to proceed with the order of business called this afternoon by the government.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a second point of order to raise with regard to the copies of the bills which are in front of us. I have in my hand a copy of the bill which was given first reading on November 4 and I also have a copy of the bill which was given to us today, reprinted as amended and reported by the committee on national defence. I ask you, sir, which copy are we to refer to in the course of our committee study?

It says in the explanatory notes in the reprinted bill:

> The amendments made in the committee on national defence are indicated by underlining and vertical lines.

Clause 2 of the bill that was given first reading on November 4 was amended in the committee on national defence. There is no vertical line to indicate the change that was made in that committee and even had there been I submit, sir, that the normal practice is for the reprinted bill to show the changes from the original act.

In the reprinted bill, new section 15 in clause 2 reads:

> The Canadian Forces are the armed forces of Her Majesty raised by Canada and consist of one service called the Canadian Armed Forces.

• (3:50 p.m.)

There is no indication given of the change made from the bill given first reading on November 4. There is not a single indication given of the change from the present act which is still in force and which, in section 15, reads as follows:

> The Canadian Forces are the naval, army and air forces of Her Majesty raised by Canada and consist of three services, namely, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force.

My point of order is this: What is the committee of the whole to do? Is it to deal with the bill which was given to us and read for the first time on November 4? Is it to use the reprinted bill which was given to us today? If it is, how is any member of the committee to know from the reprinted bill what changes have been made in the act now in the statutes? By a very careful reading of the act now in the statutes and the reprinted bill now in our hands we can, of course, pick out the changes, but this is not the normal practice at all.

In respect of all previous bills the government has taken the house into its confidence and has always underlined and indicated the changes which were being brought about. Normally on the explanatory note pages the section of the statute being repealed or amended is printed. I submit that this has not been done in this amended bill which is now placed before us for consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, this is a very interesting point. I cannot see much difference between the procedure proposed now and the procedure usually followed when bills and amended bills are being considered by the house. The only suggestion I can offer for the hon. member and for the benefit of all hon. members which perhaps is not a very useful one is that members could have both bills before them and compare one bill with the other. If hon. members can show me a standing order requiring that we should follow for the convenience of hon. members the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre then of course I would certainly rule in his favour.

[Mr. Churchill.]

What the hon. member is saying now is that it is not very convenient to proceed in the way in which the house is being asked to proceed. He may be quite right. I am not disagreeing with him. I have no right to express an opinion one way or another on this point. On the strict point of order, however, there is nothing in the standing orders of the house to support the contention of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. I am afraid I can only suggest to him as I did in the first instance that both bills be used by hon. members in the course of the discussion.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Churchill: Call the yeas and nays.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour please say yea?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed please say nay?

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Hellyer) which was agreed to on the following division:

On clause 2—Canadian forces, Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Churchill: Is this going to be a leadership speech?

Mr. Hellyer: —during the last few months the subject matter of the bill now before us has been extensively examined and debated in this chamber, in the standing committee on national defence and throughout the news media. Every opportunity has been afforded those who are opposed to this concept to make their views known. Unfortunately, in any debate of such magnitude it is difficult to deal with each of the various issues raised as precisely as I am sure we would all like. Nevertheless, this kind of open, free discussion is very beneficial, I think, to the understanding of the reasons for the proposal that is now before us.

I thought it might be helpful, Mr. Chairman, if today I went back and reviewed some of the background information which led the associate minister and myself to the position that we have taken in recommending this bill to the consideration of the House of Commons. If I may, therefore, I should like to go back four years approximately to the time that the then associate minister and I were given responsibility for the Department of National Defence and to relate to the committee the series and chain of events which we think justified the legislation now being requested.

At the time that responsibility was accepted there were three things that we decided had to be undertaken. We had, first of all, to bring the past up to the present, and by that we meant to acquire for Canada the nuclear warheads required for the weapons systems that had been purchased for our armed forces to enable them to carry out the commitments that had been undertaken on behalf of our country. The second was to review the equipment programs then outstanding. The third was to determine a long range defence policy for Canada.

In so far as the first of these is concerned, hon. members will recall that a bilateral treaty was signed with the United States of America under which it would be possible to stockpile nuclear warheads for those weapons systems which had been supplied to our troops and for which they were being trained. Technical agreements were signed between the forces of our two countries. A certain amount of construction was undertaken, and ultimately all of these weapons systems became fully operational.

The review of the existing equipment program involved a study of the requirements from a military standpoint, budgetary considerations and, third and probably most important of all their possible effect on future defence policy. In some cases programs were cancelled because they did not fit into our plans for the future, because there were weaknesses technically and, in some cases, the effectiveness did not justify the expenditure being made. In other cases we decided to continue the programs that had been undertaken and which were current at the time of the change in government.

All the while that these two matters were being attended to, preparations were in hand for the writing of a long range defence plan for Canada. Study groups were set up which included representatives of the navy, army, air force, the deputy minister's staff and the Defence Research Board. These studies covered a wide range of activities such as the military history of this country, the changes that had taken place in weapons technology over a period of ten years, an appraisal of the likely changes in technology in the coming ten years from that time, a look at the political situation in the world and a guess as to what might develop amongst the nations of the world in the decades to come. Finally, there was an appreciation of the strategic situation as it then existed in the world.

It is difficult to make political forecasts because no one has a crystal ball which is infallible. At the same time one has to make assumptions in order to base plans on them. These assumptions were ultimately stated in the white paper as it was published in 1964.

Cardinal to the plan as set out in the white paper was the strategic situation as it existed at that time. On this question there was no difference of opinion whatsoever. The unanimous decision by the chiefs of staff and all the staff members who considered it was that in the world today the least likely kind of was is an all out thermonuclear war. At the other end of the spectrum, the most likely kind of war is a continuation of small wars, riots, insurrections, the overthrow of civil government, namely, the kind of conflict that has been going on almost continuously throughout history and certainly continuously during the 20 years since world war II.

Each side in the cold war, the United States and the U.S.S.R., has sufficient thermonuclear striking power that even after one side had commenced a sneak attack the other would be able to retaliate, from hardened and dispersed bases, with sufficient power to wipe out the agressor's industrialized areas. Therefore this kind of attack would be irrational. There is no conceivable political goal which would justify a conflagration on that scale, a conflagration which would result in casualties ranging from 150 million to 300 million people in the first 24 hours, depending on the circumstances prevailing at the time.

From a rational standpoint, therefore, this kind of conflagration is the least likely during the ten year period. That is not to say it could not happen as a result of madness or miscalculation, but it is not likely to happen and certainly not from a rational standpoint. Steps have been taken to reduce the chance of miscalculation. A hot wire has been established between Washington and Moscow in order to check out at the highest decision making level the intentions of one toward the other in the event an incident happens over which there is some uncertainty as to what the intention of the other party really is.

The only other caveat which I think should be registered in respect of this strategic appraisal is that it is only true as long as the strategic balance remains, as long as the thermonuclear stalemate continues. This implies, of course, that we retain on the western side an effective deterrent which would make it inadvisable for the Soviet union ever to undertake an adventure of this sort.

The other end of the scale, however, is the almost certainty that there may be times when some political objective might be considered somewhere in the world as of sufficient importance to use force of arms. This is clearly what is going on in the world today. Our problem in Canada was to devise and develop a defence policy sufficiently broad and with sufficient flexibility that our forces could contribute to the deterrence of a major war at one end of the scale and through to these peace keeping activities at the other end of the scale or assist in putting out a small conflagration before it escalated into all-out thermonuclear war.

This is not easy because it requires a wide range of equipment and a wide range of training. At the same time, it is possible and we are achieving it. We are achieving it with considerable success and intend to continue to achieve it in the years ahead. Our troops in Europe are committed at the high end of the scale. They are there as a contribution to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and as a part of the integrated force in peacetime. Militarily, they are very effective. Politically, they are very important. It is an indication on the part of our country that we stand with our allies to deter aggression on the part of any possible enemy.

At the same time there have been demands on our forces to contribute to peace keeping and other activities. There is a real possibility that this will continue in the years ahead. It is difficult to determine in advance precisely what the requirement will be. We have participated in every United Nations operations so far, but there have been no two that have been the same. Each one has been different. The problem then was to devise a policy and to design a forces structure sufficiently flexible to enable us to continue to do what we have been doing, make our contribution to the NATO forces in Europe and on the high seas and increase the capability of our forces to participate in any action anywhere in the world which might be in the interests of Canada in so far as putting out, containing or controlling incidents which under other circumstances might escalate into something more serious.

This was the basis, then, of the policy as laid out in the white paper. There were two significant changes, I think, that really should be mentioned. They are associated with the two words, flexibility and mobility. First of all we reversed the policy of 1959, that the Canadian army in so far as new equipment was concerned would only be equipped to training scale for the three quarters of the army in Canada and to full equipment for the brigade group overseas. I know that my hon. friend from Calgary North has questioned this, but I have the policy before me. It was established in 1959. The formal decision was taken and it applied to over-all equipment purchases. Therefore the policy then in effect, which meant that only one quarter of the Canadian army would be equipped and available to fight overseas, was reversed.

The second most significant change was the decision to increase strategic mobility, in other words, to provide more aeroplanes and ships to transport our troops more quickly to meet any commitment either in Europe or any other part of the world. These were the two fundamentals from the policy side.

If I may, I should like to discuss now the organization side, the means by which this increased capability could be achieved. At the time I was given the responsibility as Minister of National Defence two impressions were made on my mind during the early months. One of them was that the six methods of direct reporting to the minister were too many and that there was insufficient co-ordination of plans. The three chiefs of staff, the chairman of the chiefs of staff, the chairman of the Defence Research Board and the deputy minister all had direct access. Programs could be brought to the minister directly by any of the chiefs of staff, and they often were. In a number of cases there was not the kind of co-ordination that is necessary in my opinion to get the most cohesive military force and the best balance between the forces of our country.

There was no over-all strategic plan applied to the three services. Each service was planning independently of the other services. There was no over-all co-ordination of the equipment programs in the sense that priorities were established on a hard basis to fulfil national objectives. Often programs were put forward by a single service directly to the minister, and often these were approved. These required such a proportion of the total funds available that subsequent programs needed to fit a higher policy could not be brought into the over-all financial picture.

It seemed necessary, therefore, that two changes had to be accomplished. One was an over-all strategic unity in planning, a unity of purpose with the services working together for clearly understood goals. Second, once having decided what these plans were and what the goals should be, there was then to be a military appreciation of the various priorities for equipment programs.

At that time, if hon. members will recall, the department operated on the committee system. The senior of these committees, apart from the defence council, was the chiefs of staff committee. It could co-ordinate and it brought about much co-ordination. At the same time it was not necessary for the service chiefs to have all their programs approved by the chiefs of staff from the standpoint of priorities vis-à-vis other programs. Also there was, I think, a tendency for the chiefs of staff to support each other's programs as a sort of quid pro quo for support, particularly when there was no real pinch on funds. We had the situation, therefore, where often the programs approved were not in my opinion the ones which were most important for Canada to give us the best balance of military capabilities to carry out the assigned tasks of our armed forces.

Below the chiefs of staff committee there were 200 or 300 other committees with members from the three services and from the civil side and also from the Defence Resarch Board. They considered a wide variety of subject matters but they had no executive responsibilities. Often it took them weeks or months to reach a decision. Often their decisions were delayed or influenced by single service needs. Once a decision was reached there was no guarantee that it would be put into effect by the three services because each service had the power of veto. The organization, therefore, seemed to leave something to be desired.

The Glassco commission came to the same conclusion. It reported that the amount of money being spent on overhead was too great, that the number of personnel in the headquarters establishments vis-à-vis the fighting machine was too great, that there was a great deal of duplication and triplication among the services and that a better organization was possible.

In considering the situation as we found it, as well as the Glassco commission report, we looked at the alternatives available to us. The one recommended by the Glassco commission was what we call the fourth force theory. It was in effect that those elements which are common to two or more of the services would be transferred to the authority of the chairman of the chiefs of staff. This was an appealing suggestion because it had been talked about and tried, I think, in other areas by other military forces. It has some drawbacks, however, which we thought were conclusive.

First, if you gave the chairman of the chiefs of staff executive authority to impose decisions in respect of the support services for the three fighting services you would reduce the chiefs of the three fighting services to mere rubberstamps. If, on the other hand, you did not give this executive authority you would have a continuation of the committee system with all its frustrations, delays and inefficiencies, with perhaps the addition of one extra person to each committee and the consequent increase in cost and inefficiency which would undoubtedly result from that.

Our conclusion, was that based on the experience in the United States, the initial efforts at integration which had taken place here in so far as the doctors and the padres were concerned, and from all information that we could gather from other military forces, the fourth force theory was not the right choice. It was inefficient, cumbersome and probably very expensive.

To meet the cardinal criticism that there was and has been a great deal of duplication and triplication we had to look for another solution. The solution we recommended to the House of Commons and the Canadian people at that time is one which was fundamental. It was the creation of a single military force as an alternative to three or four separate military forces.

We proposed that this would be accomplished in three steps: First, the integration of our headquarters staff in Ottawa on a functional basis; second, a re-evaluation of our field command structure and, third, the formation of a single force. Legislation was introduced in the House of Commons authorizing the first two of these steps. It authorized the integration of the headquarters organization and the reconfiguration of the field command structure.

We began on August 1, 1964 to reorganize the headquarters when the three chiefs of staff and the chairman, chiefs of staff committee, were replaced by a single chief of defence staff. The balance of the headquarters was organized on strictly functional lines, to wit, a vice-chief of defence staff, as is now the case, with executive authority under the chief of the defence staff for all the operations, naval, air and land, for planning of operations, for the operational requirements of all these forces and for the intelligence necessary as a basis for these plans or operations; a chief of personnel, responsible for the men and women of the navy, the army and the air force, responsible for individual training in all these forces including trade training and pilot training to wing standard; a chief of technical services responsible for the procurement of the hardware required by our armed forces, for the depots in which equipment is stockpiled, for the distribution of that equipment to the users, and for its maintenance in an acceptable state of repair and, finally, a comptroller general responsible for the accounting of the navy, the army and the air force and for the allocation of manpower to all of the requirements.

In the process of designing the headquarters organization the staff soon found they could not complete the design until they knew what the field formations would look like and what the command structure would be. The second stage was therefore accelerated. I should like to underline this. The second stage was accelerated because in practice we found there was such a close relationship between the first and the second stages that we had to know what the second would look like before we could complete the first. Therefore, several months before the date originally scheduled stage two was designed by the military staffs, presented to the defence council for concurrence, approved, and subsequently implemented many months earlier than we had thought at the beginning of the reorganization.

A year ago April 1 the bases were integrated as part of the over-all command structure reorganization. One of the primary purposes of the integration-unification cycle—as I have indicated earlier, these purposes cannot really be separated when we go as far as we are going and intend to go—was an increase in the effectiveness of money being spent. I should like to give five or six examples in specific areas which can be isolated to show that savings are and have been possible.

Previously we had five intelligence organizations in this country. We were interested in the experience in the United States where they had brought together their sources of strategic intelligence but left tactical intelligence to the services. Their reorganization did not result in any economy of manpower. Our reorganization has meant the formation of one intelligence agency to replace five. It has involved a reduction in personnel of 30 per cent and the result has been better service than we have ever had from our intelligence organization in recent years This is not just my opinion; it is the opinion of the director general of intelligence as well.

Second, let us consider the field of construction engineering. These are the men who build the runways for our air force the drydocks for our ships, the hangars for our airplanes, the buildings which house the men and women of the armed forces. There are, of course, specialities within this field but there is also a great deal of common knowledge which cuts right across previous service lines. Here a new organization was set up and it was possible to reduce the number of personnel required at headquarters by 44 per cent and the number of personnel involved in the national organization by 30 per cent. The latest report I have received is that the service being provided is excellent. In a number of individual cases I have been told that the service exceeds that provided previously. In theory this can be expected in some areas because there is a greater pool of engineering knowledge available to be applied to specific tasks which arise.

My third example concerns recruiting. When I first came to the House of Commons almost 18 years ago I can remember discussion about the possibility of integrating the recruiting system in Canada. The idea was talked about repeatedly down through the years but never implemented. Last year it was implemented with a reduction in personnel of 33 per cent. For the first time recruiting centres were not just co-located, as some had been previously, but integrated and given authority to enroll men and officers in the navy, the army and the air force. Notwithstanding the problems which inevitably arise in the first year, and a reduction of 33 per cent in personnel, we were able to recruit more people in 1966 than in the previous year.

Mr. Churchill: How many did you lose?

Mr. Hellyer: The next example I should like to give is that of the information services. This is one which was singled out by the Glassco commission, if I recall correctly. This was one of the most dramatic cases and the reduction in personnel amounted to 60 per cent with a consequential saving to the Canadian taxpayers of more than a million dollars in this limited area alone.

North NORAD region and Air Defence Command are being amalgamated and here again the expected reduction in personnel—it has not yet been fully achieved but it is forecast for achievement some time next year—is 30 per cent. The Canadian defence liaison staff in Washington was fully integrated with a reduction of 34 per cent in personnel. The Canadian defence liaison staff in London was integrated with a reduction of 44 per cent in personnel.

My next example relates to our communications system.

The Chairman: I must advise the minister that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Churchill: Before giving consent I should like to ask the minister a question. Does he intend to deal with the question of unification and the establishment of a single service? Everything he has said so far has dealt with integration; it has nothing whatever to do with unification. This is another instance of misleading the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: I appreciate the indulgence of the committee and if the hon. gentleman does give me permission to continue I will undertake to deal with that matter as soon as I have finished my introductory remarks.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree to allow the minister extra time in which to complete his statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert: I assume we will be granted suitable time in which to reply.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and I also thank members of the committee. It had long been suggested that a single long-line communications system for our armed forces would be more efficient and would save some money. That was undertaken in the 1950's and it fell flat on its face. It failed, and the reason it failed was that the three services could not agree even after agreeing that they should agree. Each service thought that its system was best. They were not willing to make the necessary compromises and to seek out the best system or a better one, and they were not willing to fund in a manner which would make the development of a new system possible. The experiment, therefore, did not succeed.

We have developed a new long-line communications system for the Canadian Armed Forces which will result in savings of 18 per cent. This new system is already working very satisfactorily. But more important than either the savings which have taken and are taking place, or the modest improvement in efficiency which I think we can claim, is the fact that it is enabling us to have studies made by the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific telecommunications system which will allow us to take a quantum jump in communications once the report has been made and has been acted upon. Our experts are convinced that very great inprovements are possible in this area. As a result of the single system which has been put into effect those improvements are now almost certain and require only the funding necessary for the new capital equipment once the plan has been presented and approved.

With respect to our cataloguing system I do not think it is any secret to members of the committee that the services have had separate cataloguing systems in the past. Air Marshal Annis, who appeared before the committee, used to say to me, "You know, we stored washers and shims under five different categories, five part numbers for the same thing." There were many cases where one service declared equipment surplus at the same time that another service was acquiring the same kind of equipment through the Department of Defence Production for use by that service. One of the first things to be undertaken was a new combined cataloguing system. The peak load which resulted from this combination was considerably greater than the previous load on the people involved, but the ultimate saving in personnel once the new system is complete will be 26 per cent.

These are just examples, Mr. Chairman, to show that where duplication and triplication can be eliminated savings are made, to show that the basic conclusion of the Glassco commission was a valid one, and to show also that acting upon that conclusion will be of considerable benefit to the Canadian people and to the armed forces who will get greater value for the money being spent.

One of the stated intentions of the savings that could be made was to use those savings for new equipment for the armed forces. No one regrets more than I do that last year we were not able to increase the amount of money being spent. This was partly due to technical considerations. We did not spend all of the money that was voted for equipment.

There was a certain amount of program slippage. I think this is inevitable, but at the same time we want to use the money which is made available to us by parliament for the acquisition of equipment so that the armed forces can carry out their tasks in the manner in which we would like to see them carried out, and so that they will have the equipment they need to do the job. I hope there will be a very substantial improvement in the coming fiscal year, 1967-68, but I must say, Mr. Chairman, that no improvement would have been possible with anything like the present defence expenditure without the savings that have been made by the elimination of duplication and triplication, particularly in headquarters and in those areas that I have set out this afternoon.

Mr. Churchill: And of 23,000 personnel.

Mr. Hellyer: I think my hon. friend will appreciate that a reduction in personnel had to be made in order to make a diversion of funds for the acquisition of equipment, and that, of course, was one of the objects of the exercise.

Mr. Churchill: Unmanned ships and understrength battalions.

Mr. Hellyer: This money is being spent for a wide variety of equipment which will give our forces balance and make them all more effective in the jobs they have been assigned. This program is well known and I will just skip over it briefly now by mentioning once again some of the more significant items.

The new support ships being acquired for the navy are really based on the model of The Provider which was undertaken by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Calgary North, when he was minister. Certain technical improvements are possible as a result of that experience but I think the significant thing is the increase in effectiveness of our naval force as the result of the acquisition of these three ships, and I include the one that was started then.

I have used this example a number of times and I would like to repeat it. In a study the navy did they showed that without any support ships it was only possible to maintain three destroyer escorts on station a thousand miles off Halifax on a continuous basis. With one support ship it was possible to maintain ten ships on station continuously and with two support ships it was possible to maintain the whole fleet on station continuously, or certainly for an elongated period in the event of crisis. This is a very effective use of funds. It is an excellent example of cost effectiveness as applied to military procurement.

Four new destroyer escorts are planned and the lead items have already been contracted for. This will probably be the most effective anti-submarine system anywhere in the world, certainly that this country has ever developed, using all of the expertise and all of the knowledge which is available to us on the basis of our past experience.

One of the most significant improvements of these weapons systems over previous destroyer escorts is the introduction of the use of helicopters with a range and speed which make it possible for them to go out and survey the ocean territory by the use of listening devices which are dropped into the water, thus increasing many times over the amount of ocean area which can be surveyed for submarines.

The weapons system of a ship with an improved sonar, a variable depth sonar, which as hon. gentlemen know is a Canadian development, and the use of one or two helicopters flown from the deck, which add very greatly to the over-all effectiveness of the weapons system, has a very great capability both in surveying the ocean territory and, if necessary, in destroying submarines once they have been isolated.

Earlier this afternoon before this committee began its discussions a question was raised about the tactical airplanes that are being acquired. These tactical airplanes are for close support for our ground forces but they will do in that role all of the tasks which one would expect of them, in other words, surveillance, interdiction and close ground support. It is gratifying that the Dutch government and Dutch air force have chosen the same airplane for the Royal Dutch Air Force. It is gratifying also that these airplanes will be built in Canada based on the Canadian configuration which is a very marked improvement over the earlier configuration of this airplane.

We have placed orders for self-propelled howitzers. This, I think, is the last remaining significant equipment necessary to bring our brigade group in Europe up to full operational potential. Sufficient of these howitzers are being acquired to equip the second heavy brigade which will be stationed at Camp Gagetown and which is being used as a rotational back-up for the one in Europe. The

M-113 armed personnel carrier is being acquired in quantity both for the brigade group overseas and in Canada. This is one of the most significant improvements in our over-all range of equipment and one which has provided to our infantry the armoured protection they have badly needed for so long.

The process of integration and unification is well on its way in bringing together first at headquarters on a functional basis members of the navy, army and air force to administer the total force in unity. In a sense then our headquarters is unified. It is unified in the sense of being a single management of the navy, army and air force. This is where the problem of semantics between these words crops in. It is unified but with members of three separate legal entities, the navy, army and air force.

Our command structure is integrated or unified. Again one could use either word. These commands include, in the units assigned to them, elements of more than one service. In their directional staffs are included members of more than one service all working together toward a common goal. Maritime command is perhaps the best example. Maritime command has assigned to it ships of the Royal Canadian Navy, airplanes of the Royal Canadian Navy, helicopters and of course the long range airplanes of the Royal Canadian Air Force, all under a single integrated, unified command and all with the same missions—anti-submarine, search and rescue, as well as a secondary transport requirement. It is interesting to note that each one of these missions involves more than one of the traditional elements. Anti-submarine operations are sea operations; helicopters are flown from ships. Then there are submarines, land-based airplanes and airplanes flown from the carriers all in the same role. Search and rescue is sea and air. Transport is sea and air. In almost every instance there is a combination of elements. The old clear division between land, sea and air no longer applies.

This kind of organization, which in my opinion is very effective and will increase in effectiveness throughout the next four year period at a steady pace, leads inevitably to a single service. Air Chief Marshal Miller in his testimony before the committee underlined this. He rejected the idea of separate heads of service. As soon as one rejects the concept of separate heads of service one is talking about a single service. Regardless of what you call it you are talking about unified management.

The plan for a single unified management was developed and approved by many of the officers who gave testimony before the committee.

Mr. Churchill: Would the minister permit a question at this point?

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. member mind waiting until I have concluded these remarks?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a point of order. If the minister is going to give us his impression of what a witness said in the defence committee, I do not think the house should accept that. Let us have the exact page reference for the statement made by the witness. I suggest that the minister is not doing this now with regard to Air Chief Marshal Miller when he creates the impression that Air Chief Marshal Miller has said something or other. We should have the exact page reference now that we have the information before us in the evidence of the committee. That is my point of order.

Mr. Harkness: The minister is completely misrepresenting the evidence given by Air Chief Marshal Miller.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the evidence given by Air Chief Marshal Miller is in the record. I do not think I am doing any injustice to it in my statement. The organization at headquarters and commands is effectively unified. In other words, all commanders report through the same chain of command to the same head of service. I think, therefore, that logic would lead one to the inevitable conclusion that the end objective is exactly as stated in the white paper at the time the cycle was begun, that is, that integration of the headquarters was the first step toward a single unified defence force for Canada.

The advantages which would result from the passage of this bill have been stated. Perhaps, however, I should go over them again today. The first is identification. All these people working together in the headquarters and in the unified commands will be identified with the force as a whole. There are some very serious disadvantages in doing it the other way. If people are in unified staff organizations as representatives of different services, the service representation becomes the significant factor in the choice of personnel. It becomes a matter of the ratio of personnel between one service and another, the balance of people by colour. From my own experience I believe the continuation of this system would be detrimental to the force and to the people in it.

I should like to commend to members of the committee the evidence given by the Judge Advocate General who has operated an integrated branch longer than anyone else in this country. In his evidence he pointed out the difficulties which arise in operating an integrated branch with representatives of three separate services.

Mr. Churchill: That is the legal branch only.

Mr. Hellyer: That is the legal branch. May I say that from my own experience the same problem arises in every other integrated branch. Even in respect of recent senior promotions the problem of service representation was one which had to be taken into consideration. Certainly there are some jobs which must be filled by experts from a particular specialty. There are many more which should be filled by the best qualified staff officers available, and it should not be of significance from which branch they come. Until we have a single service in identity and identification we will always have tugging and pulling for additional representation from one service in competition with other services.

The other side of this coin relates, of course, to career opportunity. The more staff jobs that are opened up to qualified people from all specialties the more opportunity there will be for employment for gifted people who want to progress, who are well motivated and have the necessary qualifications. Therefore there will be broader employment opportunities and consequently greater chances for the kind of person who should be advanced and should have greater responsibility in an integrated force of this kind.

Next let me refer to adaptibility of change, and this is related to the other two. When roles and missions change, and this will be of interest to my hon. friends in the New Democratic Party, it will be much easier to meet government requirements with a single force. Let me stop at this point and assure hon. members that there is no intention to change roles and missions at this moment beyond what has been publicly stated. This can be clearly set out, but I am stating to my hon. friends in the N.D.P.—heaven forbid that they should ever form a government —that it would be much easier to change these roles and missions within a single service than it would be with three separate services. I have put some examples on the record earlier as to why this would be the case and I do not think it necessary to repeat them this afternoon. However, it certainly would be easier to change these roles if the question regarding rank structure on a single service basis was not allowed to play too important a part in the political considerations within a department when decisions are being made, and I use that word in its narrow sense.

My comments now relate to the demands of modern warfare and these are related to changes in roles and missions. It is very difficult to foresee what future requirements will be. At the moment there is no intention for Canada to develop a space force although as hon. gentlemen may or may not know, we have some people who have been acquainting themselves for some period of time with the problems involved in space travel. If any future government decided it was in Canada's interest to develop a space capability, a single service would lend itself more readily to the formation of units and organizations to carry out that particular mission than would otherwise be possible. I can assure hon. members that with three separate services there would be an interservice battle as to whose mission this was going to be. With a single service this would not make any difference because the best qualified people would be eligible to change list and participate in the development of a new role of that kind. Those are some of the considerations.

Perhaps I could briefly deal now with some of the myths that have been raised. One relates to the question of the uniform, and I believe this has been effectively answered. I think this is one of the less important areas for consideration if one looks at it in perspective over a long period of time. Of course this is one area in which there is a great deal of emotion involved. That is inevitable. At the same time it should be clearly understood that what one might refer to as an "instant uniform" is impossible. We have made preparations for user trials this year of a limited quantity of uniforms. These uniforms will be worn by a number of members of the armed forces to ascertain how they stand the wear and tear of military life and whether they are generally acceptable. If subsequently they are considered acceptable or acceptable with some modifications that will be the time to make a decision to provide them to the services. Once that has been done the whole program will require a cycle of perhaps four or five years.

The suggestion has often been made that we have some secret arrangement to change our roles and missions in order to provide for peace keeping only. I think this myth has also been satisfactorily answered. The white paper stated that the best way to perform peace keeping roles was to extract from fully equipped and trained operational forces those elements required to meet the existing circumstances. That was the policy expressed in the white paper and it is the policy today. It has been re-examined by our staffs at least twice since the white paper was written and it has been found to be still valid. Forces designed for peace keeping only have a very narrow capability. Forces designed, equipped and trained for what one might call conventional fighting have a very wide range of capabilities from conventional war participation right down to peace keeping activities.

The suggestion that Canada cannot meet its commitments is not true. Again evidence has been provided the committee which indicates specifically that we can meet our commitments to NATO, NORAD and the United Nations and that we have been keeping our commitments and are now keeping our commitments. Whatever our commitments are in the future we will be able to continue to meet them on behalf of this country. Certainly, so far as most of our commitments are concerned, they are being carried out as effectively and in most cases more effectively than has been the case previously.

Let me now deal with the hybrid myth. The suggestion is made that the men of the new single service will be expected to do all jobs and will have to be Jacks-of-all trades. That is absolute nonsense. The men in the combat arms will still specialize in exacly the same way they have in the past. In the support services, I submit there will be wider areas of employment available to the men and women because the work they will perform will not be limited to a single environment. They will perform this work in various environments and therefore this will increase the avenues of opportunity. This will increase the opportunities for our servicemen to serve their country in a wider sphere.

The suggestion has been made that we will have to resort to compulsory service to maintain this kind of force. I think this is absolute nonsense. Many things attract people to service in the armed forces including the desire to serve their country, the desire to learn a trade, the desire to travel overseas, and to make friendships which last throughout their whole lives. There is a wide variety of motivation. We are gratified by the number of people who want to join the armed forces and we are sure that once this bill is passed and the public controversy surrounding it dies down there will be an increase in the number of young people waiting to join the armed forces. The latest statistics show that recruiting this year is appreciably higher than for last year and the year before during the same period.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I can only repeat some of the admonitions expressed to the committee by members of the serving staff. Earlier I indicated to the committee that we accelerated stage two because we found we could not complete stage one until we knew what the command structure was going to be like. We are now in precisely the same situation in so far as the future is concerned. We must know what the personnel structure will be and we have to know whether the men and women of the armed forces will be managed in three personnel streams or one. This is fundamental to future planning. There are many questions which cannot be answered or resolved by any amount of staff work until the answer to that fundamental question is known. The request of the serving staffs, the people who are charged with the responsibility of getting on with the plans of reorganization, is that parliament now indicate its intention.

The passage of this bill does not mean instant unification. The passage of this bill is a statement of the intention that the ultimate goal is a single service and all the men and women in the forces will be managed in a single personnel stream. This must be known in order that the kind of detailed staff planning required can proceed on an orderly basis. This was first stated in the white paper and reiterated before the committee. It is part of the total cycle. It is not being done in haste, not overnight, but over eight or nine years in total. The first two stages in the first three years were authorized by a previous act of parliament. It is true that much of the continuation of the integration process could be completed without this bill. It is true that many more benefits could still be obtained from the integration process minus legislation to create a single service. It is equally true, and I want to make this point as forcefully as I can, that there are some problems which cannot be solved, there are some questions which cannot be answered, until we know the intention of parliament in respect of this bill and whether or not the ultimate goal is a single service.

We have here an over-all cycle of eight years, each stage planned by the military after authority had been given to do the planning. Headquarters were designed by the military following the passage of Bill C-90. The command structure was designed by the military and approved in accordance with our constitutional practices by the minister and his staff in conjunction with the headquarters that were required in order to complete the whole and give meaning to the whole.

Once again there is the desire now on the part of the people involved to know the intent of the parliament of Canada so that they can plan toward the ultimate goal, know what it is and get on with the job. As was stated before the committee, some preliminary planning can be done but much cannot be done until this bill is passed and the will of parliament is known. I would therefore request and urge members of this committee to give serious consideration to all the points of view that have been put forward and to all the steps that have been taken, and then consider the steps that remain to be taken.

I hope that hon. members will then come to the conclusion that authority should be given now to the military to plan for the balance of the cycle, because that is what this bill is for, that is what this bill will provide, namely, the clear indication of the final goal and the authority to prepare the Queen's Regulations and Orders and all the other things that are necessary in order to take full advantage of the miracle, as Lieutenant General Moncel described it, and the tremendous progress that has been made, to bring it to full fruition and get on with the job in the most orderly and efficient manner.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be wrong for me to begin my remarks without expressing on behalf of the members of this house a warm welcome to you after your illness.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert: We expect that you will be with us until the end of this parliament, at least—I will not go any further—but in any case I assure you that we are happy to welcome you back today.

[English]

The minister has made the best possible case to this house to buy a pig in a poke. He has asked us to give the Department of National Defence, himself, the associate minister and their officers carte blanche to organize something. They are not too sure how it is going to go over a period of years. The minister is forgetting that in coming to this house to seek permission to make this most fundamental change he must prove his case. It is not up to the opposition and those who do not like unification to prove their case. I wish the minister had spent 50 minutes speaking on unification and 10 minutes on integration rather than the reverse. The onus is not on those who do not believe in the values of unification as demonstrated, and poorly demonstrated, I may say, by the minister and those who testified before the committee with regard to unification or the single service concept, to prove their case.

I do not for one moment dispute that many of the witnesses who appeared before the committee were able to indicate the values of an integration of command and an integration of functions. That is all we have had from the minister this afternoon, namely, a repetition, a rehash of a number of things that he said in 1964 when he was advocating Bill C-90, in December when he was talking on the resolution stage of Bill C-243, and again on second reading. This was the cardinal theme and it was so apparent in the testimony of so many of the serving officers. Everything dealt with integration. It was pointed out to us that these were the advantages of integration. But when they came to the question of unification the situation was different. They said, "we believe that," "we feel that," "we think that," and anything that was demonstrable, such as declining enrolment and an obvious and regrettable decline in morale, was brushed aside. A sort of airy-fairy optimism was breathed and in so far as these questions were concerned it was said, "Well, this might be changed."

Those are preliminary remarks, Mr. Chairman. Today in my objection to the Chair to proceeding with this bill I wanted to make sure of establishing a principle. It was not that I was not ready to debate this question, nor that my colleagues were not ready to do so. It was a question of establishing the principle that the government in making its case must come before this house with the complete case. That was not done. We have seen this nonsense of a technical compliance by having the pages run around as we started to discuss the bill and distribute No. 37 of the minutes of proceedings of the committee containing, not in one group, the amendments that were being proposed by the government to the bill they had before the house amending the National Defence Act. So we now have a bill which amends a bill which amends a bill. What a way to run an operation. This is what I complain about now; this is what I complained about the other day in respect of the hon. member for Lapointe.

[Translation]

But, had I spoken in French, I suppose that I would have been granted what I am asking today and that the debate would have been postponed until tomorrow. I find this an unacceptable principle. In fact, it was unacceptable the other day. And hon. members opposite supported the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) when he asked for parts of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of committees. But today, no, that is not necessary. Why? Is there any difference, whether it is the hon. member for Lapointe or a member on this side of the house who asks for all the minutes of proceedings and evidence before we come to a decision? None at all. Other items are on the order paper. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) is most eager to have his bills examined. But no, it is rank obstinacy to want to take this bill now because, whether it is examined tomorrow or the day after, it may not be implemented fully before nine years, according to the minister. Why be so eager then and so impatient to proceed today with the debate on this bill?

I therefore point out now that this is a question of principle. I wish to stress that point this afternoon as I will tomorrow and in the future. I hope that when they develop the committee system, hon. members will observe established principles.

• (5:40 p.m.)

[English]

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I also want to take exception to the attributing to some of my colleagues and myself of rather ulterior motives in our opposition to this bill, and attributed by a man who should know better and who should keep his mouth shut. I refer to the chief of the defence staff. There is as much right in the chief of the defence staff to say what he has about the hon. member for Calgary North, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and perhaps myself as there is in me to say of him that he is a great advocate of unification because it helps his career. You would say, Mr. Chairman, that that statement might be unfair. It is just as unfair for the chief of the defence staff to say what he has. The sooner he keeps his mouth shut on matters of this kind, the better it will be, and I will say that to him directly if I get the opportunity.

I was rather amused by a headline which appeared in one of the morning papers to the effect that there might be more heat than light during this debate. There was a long critique about how the committee proceeded. Some people who do not attend committee meetings very frequently have a lot to say about what goes on at such meetings. They really are unaware of some of the difficulties of the mechanics of the matter. At such committees hon. members from all parties in the house have a right to ask questions and they do, and there must inevitably be some repetition. Then there is repetition, of course, by various witnesses.

However, some of these people to whom I refer have perhaps not experienced a trial which tries to establish the truth where from a great deal of evidence you try to come to a consensus, to a point where you can form a judgment. Once these people to whom I refer have made up their minds, anything to the contrary becomes in their view rather more heat than light. After all, those who hold a contrary view are not enlightened in their mind.

As I say, hon. members on all sides participated in the proceedings of the committee. Certainly government members participated and did so because, as I said before, they are putting their case for a change before parliament and the country. They must put forward their case. Let them analyse the evidence, Mr. Chairman. Let them discuss the evidence given by four branch heads out of five who say no to unification today. Some of them directly and outrightly oppose it; others said, "Do not do it now." Other senior officers whose capabilities, abilities and military knowledge far surpass ours, including those of the minister, tell us, Mr. Chairman, that we are going down the wrong route.

There is a good reason why this whole question got off on the wrong foot. It got off on the wrong foot last June when we were starting to discuss the question of integration and the progress that had been made, and unification. Some of us on the committee also wanted to make some comments and ask some questions on the basis of the evidence that was then before the committee. But no, Mr. Chairman, back to the house came the estimates without comment. We then had that performance of last fall when, arising out of the mid-summer crisis with all the firings and resignations, there was a steadfast refusal to discuss the matter, to send it back to the committee so as to find out why it had all happened.

I have been a member of this committee since 1963 and, having sat on defence committees or defence estimates committees previously, I thought that we had a very fine committee in 1963-64. The report which was then presented was of assistance to the government. A non-partisan co-operation among members of the committee was established. People got to know about military affairs, and this state of affairs continued until last year.

The ill-considered action of June, 1966 caused this committee to adopt a partisan division. The same thing has happened on this question of unification. Having insisted upon a vote on second reading in this house when the principle was accepted, the government members might as well have gone off to the Caribbean for all they cared because they were not going to change their minds. They are committed by their vote in this house. And, may I say, so are the members of the opposition.

That is the nonsense of the situation, Mr. Chairman. The man responsible for it is the minister who insisted that this bill be accepted in principle before any witnesses were heard. It would have been so much easier and so much better for the future of the defence committee if the bill had been discussed prior to its acceptance on second reading.

May I say to the committee that the government members went through some education in military matters during the committee hearings. At times they were left a little short in numbers as the platoon went back and forth. Some members who presumably were asked to vote on the clauses of this bill had sat on the committee for less than two weeks and had not heard a fifth of the evidence. They did not have available to them the transcripts of the evidence but they voted right down the line.

Was this an intelligent vote? I cannot accept it as such, not on the basis of the evidence that was put before the committee by bona fide witnesses, men who were reluctant to come before the committee but wished to assist the house in arriving at what they felt was the right decision for our armed services. Those men have a great deal of heart and feeling for our armed services; yet they have seen the question handled in this perfunctory and preordained fashion. I think that this action that was shown was a great disservice done to our armed forces.

It was obvious this afternoon that there has been a great deal of confusion between the terms integration and unification. Sometimes they have been deliberately confused while at other times the confusion has arisen as a result of sheer ignorance. I must say I was surprised when I read the minister's comments about the press and the way they handled the unification debate and the testimony before the committee. I am not sure that the government would necessarily appreciate what he had to say about the press. Perhaps some of his colleagues will have other comments to make.

In any event, I read an article in this morning's Globe and Mail in which it was stated that the minister told the Young Liberals that the controversy over unification became inevitable once power groups, retired officers and service organizations, took public positions on the issue. That is the first item with which I want to deal. Is the minister the only one who is entitled to take issue on this question of unification? Why should not retired officers, who know far more about it than he does, as well as service organizations and the public, take part in the discussion of this issue? I suppose members opposite who take a view different from that of the minister will become power groups.

The article reads in part:

> He said some of these views were the result of genuine concern over the problems, while others were fostered by special interests.

Let him spell out these special interests or does he too share the opinion of the chief of staff that those of us who do not share his view in this regard have ulterior motives? Our concern about the armed services is just as sound, just as bona fide as that of the minister. He has no monopoly on this concern. These ulterior motives that are inferred at will contribute nothing to the advancement of the debate in this house.

The minister had something to say about editorial writers, and particularly an editorial that appeared in last Saturday's Globe and

Mail to the effect that a clause in the unification bill to delay implementation might help win parliamentary approval. This has been recommended by a lot of men including some now in the service. The chief of the general staff did say that a delay would hurt morale and so on but did not say precisely how this would come about. In any event, here is the comment about the editorial writer:

He said the editorial writer obviously had not read the full transcript of evidence before the Commons defence committee—

This would be true because it was not available.

—and listed several books that the writer had also apparently not read.

If they were the books the minister referred to in his appearance before the committee when there was some judicious picking out of certain passages, then perhaps it was just as well the man had not read them. If the minister had continued quoting from the books he would have found his face very red because the case was not supportable.

Mr. Hellyer: The way you chose your witnesses.

Mr. Lambert: The minister made a remark about choosing witnesses. If the minister's representatives on the committee had been prepared to call witnesses, we of the opposition were prepared to take all of those witnesses they wished to put forward.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): As many as they wanted?

Mr. Lambert: As many and as often.

Mr. Laniel: So the bill would not come back to the house.

Mr. Lambert: Oh, no, nothing of the sort, because the committee had been told it would be able to hear all the witnesses that it desired to hear. However, there was a desire on the part of government members to close off everything. The hon. member started out on the committee but then went off on some other course and was not there. Perhaps he has not read all the transcript, so the remarks of the hon. member for Châteauguay—

Mr. Laniel: For Beauharnois.

Mr. Lambert: Oh, for Beauharnois; je m'excuse—indicate he had better read the transcript of the remarks of some of his colleagues.

In any event, let us go on to see what the minister said about the editorial writer. He might say the same thing about the writers in the Globe and Mail. He said that the editorial writer obviously had not read the full transcript of the evidence before the defence committee and then listed several books which the writer had apparently not read. Then the article continues:

"I'm not even sure he's read my second reading speech," Mr. Hellyer said.

Well, I am not sure that reading the second reading speech would help anybody. However, I question whether the minister is on strong ground when he says this:

He added that it was a mistake for the public to assume that editorials are based on a wide fund of knowledge and depth of understanding.

I do not share all the views of these editorial writers but I find they are not writers for elementary school children and their knowledge is great. In any event, I want to deal with some of the remarks the minister made this afternoon. I am not going to indulge in an exchange of views with regard to integration. I think the first 50 minutes of the minister's speech were quite irrelevant to this debate. The point is, what are the advantages? Are there demonstrable advantages, are there preponderant advantages for unification, the single force concept? Are the men better fighting men? Do we get more for our defence dollar?

We have heard a great deal in terms of man management. Unfortunately, this program is man management mad. One point has been forgotten which General Moncel was able to emphasize. He said that after all our defence forces exist to fight. This is the real raison d'être for a defence force, that ultimately it may have to fight. We do not want that but if they are not trained for it, if they are not geared for it, then there has been no purpose in setting up a defence force. So I am suggesting to the members of the committee that the man management concept has gone wild, that there is a peacetime philosophy that has gone abroad and that what has suffered has been the fundamental purpose of having a big proportion of our forces available and trained to fight. The operational men have special considerations.

The members of the services are not of two categories. The people in the supply and administration fields are not a different category of member of the armed services from those who are in the field units. There is an exchange to avail ourselves of the skills of those in the administration and supply fields. We can also take men who are perhaps a little older and who have had experience. This is also a good place to train men, younger men even, and bring them forward where administration is required. In operational units horizontal promotion is as good as vertical promotion. This is what I feel is wrong; this is where my big objection to unification lies.

What is the demonstrable effect, and it must be demonstrable, excepting the integrated command, the functional command and the functional organization, of taking a sailor, an airman and a soldier and putting them in the same uniform, in the same rank structure and calling them the same thing? What particular advantage is there in that? After all, as the minister has said there are to be air, sea and land elements. Those men will be specialists, each in his own field. Of course we will not have hybrids, notwithstanding the example of stewards. One should hear the report about stewards from the army going on board ship and how good they are when they return. If that is the start, I must say it is a wonderful one. But we shall not get these hybrids; otherwise men will spend their time training for jobs and never put their training into effect.

If you have a sailor, an airman or a soldier in an integrated command why will he be better because he happens to wear the same uniform as the chap alongside him? Those who have had the privilege of serving in units in battle conditions know that there is something more than meets the eye that calls to a man. There are all sorts of little intangibles that you refer to and appeal to whether in the field of battle, in a ship at sea or in the air. It is not the man managing with computers who will bring that out in the fighting man. What matters is what you will do to the fighting man's heart and how you will get him to do just a little better under such conditions.

Why is there this change for the sake of change at this time? It is not needed for integration. Gracious me, it will take three years to get the supply services going full tilt, and that is on the best advice the forces have. We are told that the Judge Advocate General's branch is a good example. With all due apology to the gentlemen occupying the chief positions in that branch, and I know and respect them, their branch is unrepresentative of the armed services. One might call them civil lawyers in uniform. Theirs is the one section of armed services where normal retirement ages do not apply. In fact, again apologizing to the hon. gentlemen occupying those positions, that branch could easily be handled by civilians.

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Lambert: There is no question of rank or uniform. Perhaps the branch ought to be run by civilians. But that does not establish the argument that by asking a number of personnel in the Judge Advocate General's branch to be civilians we are asking the whole of the armed services to put on civilian suits or put on one suit. Not at all. The Judge Advocate General's branch is one particular type of administrative service.

The Chairman: Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Lambert: I thank hon. members for this opportunity. I hope I shall not abuse it.

We heard the minister speak about broader career and employment opportunities. Why should this be? Because a man is called a major instead of a lieutenant commander or squadron leader, why will he have wider career opportunities? If his uniform is light blue or dark blue or khaki rather than a uniform approved by user trials—and I will not pick any particular type of uniform—why will he be a better man? Why will he have a broader employment opportunity? This applies, once you reach a certain rank, to staff promotions and staff learning. But there are other areas in which it does not work as well. Surely those could be ironed out. But why do you need to put a man in the same uniform as all other men and into the same rank structure?

I shall have a great deal more to say when we get to the appropriate clause about the question of command and rank structure, and some of the difficulties in some of the regulations. Let me say here that there is a great potential for trouble ahead. Does anyone in his sane moments think that if a commander of a ship has decided to take the rank of lieutenant colonel that any officer junior to him will insist on his particular naval rank? Let us to practical. It will be all or nothing.

A great deal was made by my hon. friend from Greenwood that this measure would give us a force that will be more adaptable to change and will have a quicker response. The quicker response is merely a question of integrated command. The minister said there could be a quicker change of role and so forth. All right. I think the minister will have to agree that perhaps he is changing the role of the aircraft he is buying for the air force.

Mr. Hellyer: Not at all.

Mr. Lambert: This comes from a statement attributed to the chief of the defence staff. Somebody is wrong because there is a grave contradiction on this point, or a grave misreporting. I do not know how far this matter goes but here again we want clarification.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Why should there be in a single force, if its role is to be peace keeping, a greater adaptability to differing roles? Peace keeping, if that is to be the role of the force, is not in high odour among world councils today. Is this to be training for operations in the temperate zone? Is it to be for the jungle or for the desert? Is it to be for the Arctic? Remember, the uniform which is talked about is not the fighting uniform. Those will be diverse. The tank men will still wear dungarees; the sailors will still need dungarees at times. They will not be working in those uniforms about which we have heard. Let no one think that the only uniform the soldier will wear in the field or on peace keeping operations will be his "camouflage" clothes. Has the minister never heard of week end leave or time off from duty? Has he never heard of getting out of fighting or working clothes? I have heard a great deal of nonsense, men talking about the kind of shorts they wore in the field during the war, the unconventional clothes they wore fighting. I will tell you this, Mr. Chairman. As soon as they stopped that they went back to their regimental uniforms of which they were inordinately proud.

Ceremonial dress? How long will that last? Will sailors go walking ashore in a green uniform looking like Air Canada pilots? If that is what hon. members opposite think they can do, all right. But I wish they would consult some sailors and see what they think about it.

Surely the hon. member for Greenwood must envisage a further difficulty in his desire that our forces should work on a really co-operative basis with the forces of the rest of the world in peace keeping operations—the difference between the structure of our forces and that of the forces with which we would be working. Our Canadian organization is to be so distinguished, so different from that of others, and yet we are to work with British, French, Italians, Norwegians, Swedes. The call is for co-operation. But we intend to be the one country that is in step; everyone else will be out of step.

How is co-operation achieved? By integration. By working with equals, with people who know your type of job and who tend to think as you do. But we intend to set ourselves apart, to make ourselves really distinguished on this basis though we know that no one else is giving serious thought to unification.

Let us not confuse unification with integration. A number of countries are examining the possibilities of integration and action has been taken by some of them to a certain extent. But there they have cried halt, with none of this nonsense about one uniform, one rank, one serviceman.

We shall get an opportunity to examine the testimony of individuals whose opinions must be highly respected when we consider the question of unification. All the testimony of General Lilley for instance, has to do with integration and amounts to an explanation of an integrated supply service which is partly in blueprint form. It is still on a three-services basis. If the temperature of international relations were to increase somewhat and if we had to push the accelerator forward two or three notches we would be in trouble. The same applies to the training command. We would be in trouble.

The foundations of integration must be completed and tested, and what is found wanting must be changed. Anyone who listened to the comments of Air Chief Marshal Miller would agree they amounted simply to this: why introduce the dislocation of unification in addition to the problems already brought about by integration? What is the rush? This is apart altogether from an acceptance of the principle of unification.

I will close these remarks hoping that there will be full participation in this debate by members of the defence committee in all quarters of the house. This is too important a subject for hon. members to sit mutely by instead of analysing these proposals like intelligent men, as they are. I want to hear both sides of the question; there may be something I have missed. I also want members opposite to note those proposals to which experienced men have said no.

No country has faced such a situation as we have faced since June of last year in which so many senior officers, men appointed by the present minister under the new plan of reorganization, have chosen to fight or to place their heads on the chopping block. There is something very wrong when this happens.

We find the chief of the defence staff saying "halt". The vice-chief said "I am leaving". The chief of personnel said "I am leaving". The comptroller general said "I am leaving". The director of technical services, who retired a couple of months earlier, came to us and said "I was sick with frustration". What does this leave the house to consider? That they were all wrong? I have not spoken about those below who left the services and in whose case the doors clanged somewhat more loudly. The minister must think long about his actions with regard to those men.

It is said of Mr. McNamara that he ignores his military advisers. It has been strongly suggested that the present minister has patterned himself after Mr. McNamara. The difficulty with the minister is that he will have few military advisers left or will have none if this continues.

• (6:20 p.m.)

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, what we in Canada need in the field of defence is a clear defence policy. In all the mass of words spoken by the minister and his aides on the subject of unification there has been a complete failure to clarify or justify our defence roles, a failure to say what the future of the armed services is to be, what purposes they are to serve, what sort of hostilities we expect to be involved in. We have continued to put the cart of organization before the horse. We are presented with a cart; we are not told what sort of horse we are to have, what direction it is to go, and what sort of load it is to carry. We are bogged down in discussing organization, and organization without a clearcut statement of the contemplated future and roles of our armed forces is a waste of time and totally illogical.

On second reading of this bill the hon. member for Vancouver East and myself made clear what we thought were the basic and, indeed, vitally important questions underlying the issue of unification and involved, in our view, with the whole future of our armed services. In our view, as we expressed it then, unification would make sense only if we made a radical review of our defence commitments and decided to concentrate on a mobile intervention force. It was our considered conviction that this course ought in fact to be taken, that we should concentrate on such a role, that it would enable us to take an effective part in peace keeping and peace enforcing, and that it would do much more than that.

The opponents of unification have tried to present the alternative of carrying on our present roles, or the alternative of doing nothing but peace keeping. This is not what we envisage would be the purposes of a unified mobile intervention force. True, it would be available for peace keeping and peace enforcing, and we put the highest possible value on that. Of all the contributions that can be made by Canada to the security of the world there is none higher in our estimation than the importance of having available peace keeping or peace enforcing units ready to act for the United Nations, but it is a total error that such a mobile intervention force as we think should be the major defence effort of Canada would be confined to that.

Such a force would be available in the unlikely event of some invasion on the soil of Canada. It would be available quickly to deal with it. Now, this is a most unlikely occurrence in any event as, Mr. Chairman, we are part of the North American continent and share this continent with the most powerful nation that the world has ever known, armed with colossal destructive power, but if there should be some invasion of Canadian soil then a mobile intervention force that could get to the scene quickly would be the most effective type to have available.

It would also enable us to contribute, if we saw fit to do so for political or other reasons, to a mobile reserve for NATO. It is not a choice, as is sometimes said, between getting out of NATO and continuing to do what we are doing at the present time. The choice is whether we will continue to make useless contributions that make no sense and are obsolete or whether we are prepared to look toward a contribution of a mobile force that is needed and would be available if we decided to continue in NATO, or indeed in any other military alliance.

We believe that the present roles carried out by the Canadian armed services are no longer useful or needed. A great many of them are militarily useless. What are we doing in NATO? As hon. members well know, we contribute an army division, part of a massive tactical nuclear means of response to a full scale Russian attack on western Europe. There is no more improbable contingency in the judgment of any informed or sensible person than that such an attack would take place. If it did take place we have been told by no less a person than U.S. Secretary of Defence McNamara that there is a massive superiority of tactical nuclear weapons in the hands of the Americans and their allies. Our contribution to that particular form of defence is militarily completely useless.

We also believe that our air division in Europe is vulnerable and therefore useless. Worse than that, in times of tension it is positively provocative because at present our air division sits on the plains of western Germany with Russian missiles trained on them and in the event of any grave tension in Europe, although such an occurrence does not seem likely at the present time, the incentive toward early destruction of these air forces would be a possible provocation to an action that would tend to escalate rapidly into a full scale nuclear war.

We say that these particular contributions are no longer appropriate to Canada. They are not needed. I defy the minister, or any representative of the minister, to pronounce a single useful purpose that is being served by these particular forces. It is suggested that perhaps they perform a political service, and I want to deal with that a little later.

I come now to another commitment we have made, the commitment to the air defences of North America. I propose to refer to evidence in the defence committee where distinguished military men have stated that in their opinion this is an obsolete form of defence. In the age of missiles an attack by manned bombers on North America is so improbable that you have to assume complete insanity on the part of some enemy, and of course the only enemy in this field would be the U.S.S.R. There is not the slightest sign that such a threat is a real one and, Mr. Chairman, we should not be continuing a form of organization which prevents us from doing the things that are vitally essential where our major contribution can be made to the security of the world.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the defence committee considered Bill C-243 after second reading. I hope the Minister of National Defence and the government now realize the foolishness of the decision to require the examination of this highly technical subject by the committee after rather than before second reading. What happened? Positions were solidified. Every representative on that committee showed a complete inflexibility of view.

It would be less than frank for me to say what I was looking for as the evidence was given to the committee were matters that would justify the stand we have seen fit to take in the House of Commons on second reading. I would say of the government members on the committee that not a single question or intervention they made seemed to have any other purpose but wholesale support of the bill and nothing but the bill. At the same time the official opposition made their views very clear, and instead of having a calm, objective examination of the merits of the bill we had a continuation in the defence committee of a political wrangle and a strengthening of political opinions.

I hope we will not do that again. It was said that for some sort of practical reason it was inevitable that we had to have second reading first. I say it was a mistake that the sort of matters which the minister and other witnesses brought before the committee could not have been brought before the committee in a totally different atmosphere, in an atmosphere where we had not been committed to a particular stand before we had an opportunity to examine the situation in detail. Therefore, instead of having a consensus we were forced into a situation in which all members of the committee were taking sides one way or another, without being able to withdraw from the entrenched positions which had been taken on second reading.

Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, we did receive a very great deal of evidence. In my view we received a great deal of useful and worth while evidence. However, as I see it, that evidence has established the point I am trying to make to the committee now; it has made the point abundantly clear. None of those who were opposed to unification—including representatives of TRIO, the group which has opposed unification on behalf of many retired officers of the service—denied that unification would be an appropriate form of organization if we were to confine our role to that of a single mobile intervention force.

Yet the whole weight of the evidence established that, so long as we continue to have, for example, an army brigade isolated from other services and an air division operating solely as an air division, then the disturbance created by a new form of organization certainly is not worth while. This point was made with greater clarity by General Moncel than by any other witness who appeared before the committee. I should like to refer to some of his evidence. General Moncel I believe is well known to members of this house. He is a very distinguished officer who had a great deal of responsibility at top level for the working out of policy in this field. I should like to deal first with what he had to say about the roles. At page 1323 I put the following question to him:

May I put it to you this way: As I understand it, it is your view that unification of the services makes no sense as long as we continue with the roles that we have at the present time.

Mr. Moncel replied: "That is right". The evidence continues:

Mr. Brewin: For example, if I may draw you out with a few examples, if you have an army brigade group in Europe as it is now integration is meaningless or, indeed, harmful, because it creates disturbance in that it does not make any useful contribution to what we are doing in our brigade group now?

Mr. Moncel: Not "integration".

Mr. Brewin: I meant to say "unification". I am sorry.

Mr. Moncel: Yes. Who are you going to unify it with?

Mr. Brewin: Precisely; and is not the same true of the air division?

Mr. Moncel: Precisely.

Mr. Brewin: I suppose one could go through some of the other roles. The anti-submarine role of the navy—how are you going to integrate that when it is basically a naval role?

Mr. Moncel: That is right. I just do not know the answer to it. This is why I fault it here.

Mr. Brewin: But I understand you also to say that if for various reasons, partly political and partly military, you decide that it is necessary to concentrate on this sort of intervention force then unification begins to make some sense?

Mr. Moncel: Yes.

Mr. Brewin: Therefore, the real choice that we have to make, as a nation, and that we are responsible for making in Parliament, in the matter of making sense out of unification, is whether we are going to continue the roles that we have or concentrate on this mobile intervention force?

Mr. Moncel: Yes.

I went on to deal with the question of his own view, that it would be a risk to switch to a single force. Then at page 1324 we find the following:

Mr. Brewin: May I go back to this question of the different roles? Would you agree, General Moncel—in fact, I think you already have—that this——is partly a political consideration.

That is the choice of roles.

Mr. Moncel: Entirely a political consideration.

In my view, Mr. Chairman, this reveals the essence of the matter which is facing the house today. General Moncel put his finger on precisely the real issue. However much it may be obscured by the discussion of unification, the real issue is that unification makes sense if the concentration is to be on a single mobile force which will be available for peacekeeping and other activities, but if the present roles are to be continued then it does not make sense.

We do not find fault with the government because we oppose unification; we do not oppose it. We think unification is a forward looking and wise policy. However, we believe it is a forward looking and wise policy only if the logical base for it is established, namely the roles which are appropriate to Canada's position in the mid 1960's and 1970's, and not those roles which may have been appropriate in the late 1940's or 1950's. This is precisely the point which has been ignored by the minister. In ignoring it, in my opinion, he destroys the real basis upon which he could appeal to the country and to the members of the armed services themselves and obtain their wholehearted support for unification.

General Moncel said something else which I think the minister prefers to brush aside as easily as he can. General Moncel said—and I am paraphrasing his evidence but I believe I am doing so accurately—that if we were to build up a truly mobile force an added expense would be involved. I should like to read from the evidence at page 1322:

Mr. Brewin: General Moncel, I wanted to ask you to elaborate a little on the White Paper. I think you said that it had two major defects, as you saw it, and I wonder if I understood at least one of them, correctly. The White Paper contemplated the maintenance of the existing commitments that Canada was involved in, or, the existing roles—I think that is a better word than "commitments". "Commitments" implies that you have agreed to do it indefinitely; a "role" is something that you are doing. Now, as I understand it, the White Paper proposed the maintenance of a series of existing commitments—the brigade, the air division, the anti-submarine forces, the air defence, and so on; and it proposed continuing those without any apparent change and certainly with no early, or definite change. It also proposed, as I understand it, the creation of a mobile force, this intervention force, or whatever you want to call it.

Do I correctly understand you to say that if we are going to do all of these things this would involve a budget in excess of two billion dollars a year?

Mr. Moncel: Yes, sir.

Mr. Brewin: So that if you are going to accept a ceiling on the budget of, say, what we have now, which is approximately $1.5 billion, something has to give?

Mr. Moncel: Precisely.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Mr. Brewin: You have to make a choice on whether you are going to expand your mobile role or cut out some of the other roles. Is that correct?

Mr. Moncel: Yes. This is the alternative.

I asked the minister about this and he went into all sorts of evasions about time phases. He said it depended on how many helicopters we have and he actually said that they had not computed the cost of developing a mobile defence force. He said he did not know what the cost would be, but that it would depend on various contingencies. It was my expectation that with his organizational mind and his computers, he would have worked out precisely what this new concentration would cost. The vice chairman of the defence staff, Air Marshal Sharp, made it perfectly clear that the whole new concept into which unification is supposed to fit is a concentration on this mobile role. In spite of that, we are told the cost has not been worked out.

Sometimes in this field, we have to repeat ourselves to get a point across, and although this is a repetition I should like to say to the minister that is will not be possible to build up an effective mobile force and at the same time maintain all the existing roles efficiently keeping within a budget ceiling of something like $1.5 billion. So the minister must make a choice. So far he has failed to do so, and this vitiates the whole defence policy for which he and this government stand.

I do not think when we are debating unification I should partake in an elaborate examination of each of the different roles involved or explain how and why they are inadequate, but I should like to call the attention of this committee to a statement made by General Allard, the present chief of our general staff. This is a striking statement. He was being questioned about an article written by John Gellner which appeared in the Globe and Mail magazine on February 4, 1967. This article is in reference to Canada's defence and Mr. Gellner, dealing first of all with the plan for a mobile intervention force, said this:

> According to plan, within three years Canada will have a fully mobile intervention force of 15,000, equipped with the best modern weapons. This represents considerable power, especially when it can be applied quickly, and in a preventive role.

I take it Mr. Gellner was not writing from a figment of the imagination when he said there was a plan for an intervention force of 15,000 which would be fully mobile. Such a force is bound to cost money. Mr. Gellner goes on to deal with our existing commitments to NATO, and he says:

> It should be realized, and undoubtedly it is realized in Ottawa, that militarily the value of the Canadian contribution is minimal. It was contracted at a time when NATO planning was based on the assumption that a war in Central Europe could be a limited nuclear war and that the enemy could thus be deterred by the weapons of limited nuclear war. This theory could never have withstood serious examination; by now nobody in a responsible position inside or outside of NATO really believes in its validity.
> Yet for a variety of reasons, mostly political, it still determines NATO's deployment. This means Canada now has 126, and will have 108, CF-104 Starfighters standing unprotected on huge air bases (within range of Soviet nuclear missiles no doubt zeroed-in on them) and a brigade group prepared to manoeuvre on a nuclear battlefield, supported by a battery of short-range (15 miles or so) nuclear Honest John rockets designed to act much like ordinary artillery pieces (except for their incomparably greater power).
> All this is of no use, as it presumes to deter a kind of war the Soviets have repeatedly declared they have no intention of fighting, and the French have said they will not allow to be fought in central Europe.

Mr. Gellner goes on in this article to deal with another aspect of this matter, that is our air defence. I will not read this all, but he does write the following:

> This has to be borne in mind when one stands rather puzzled on one of our two Bomarc surface-to-air missile bases and sees 28 of these weapons standing virtually unprotected yards apart on a single pad, ready to repel a bomber attack. If attack ever came, the whole Bomarc complex would probably be taken out in the enemy's first surprise strike.
> With a little foresight, the Bomarcs could have been recognized for the military absurdities they were when installed in 1961. Yet we took them, had to take them, simply because our two Bomarc bases formed a link in a chain of similar U.S. installations.

It is about time we stood on our own feet in respect of defence and thought out for ourselves what was useful for Canada, rather than getting ourselves involved in what Mr. Gellner here describes as military absurdities. The government says it is forward looking, but when it comes to action it continues the inertia so typical of it, doing exactly what was done in the 1950's, with practically no change.

On March 15 the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when discussing our commitments to NATO, said this to a committee of the other place:

> The specific form of our contribution is under continuing review and has, in fact, changed significantly over the years. One example will, I think, suffice to illustrate my point. In the middle fifties, Canada provided twelve squadrons of F-86 interceptor aircraft to NATO. These were replaced in the early sixties by eight squadrons of F-104 aircraft, six squadrons of which had a strike role and two a reconnaissance role. This year, as a result of attrition, we are reducing the number of squadrons of strike aircraft from eight to six. At some time in the 1970's, all the F-104 aircraft will be "phased out". At the appropriate time in the future, the government will have to decide what position to take on a "follow-on" aircraft.

In other words, the Secretary of State for External Affairs says that at some time in the 1970's we will proceed to consider whether we will replace something that Mr. Gellner has indicated is in his view a military absurdity.

Perhaps what Mr. Gellner has said as a writer is not important to this country, but I should like to indicate that the view expressed in this article has been adopted by General Allard, the chief of general staff. He gave evidence to the defence committee, and I should like to refer to what he said in answer to the hon. member for Simcoe North as reported at page 1830 of the proceedings of that committee.

The hon. member for Simcoe North read the comments I have just read from Mr. Gellner's article, as to the value of Canadian contributions, and then added:

I want an opportunity to talk about it.

Mr. Allard: I could answer you right away, Mr. Smith.

Mr. Smith: All right, fine.

• (6:50 p.m.)

Mr. Allard: The answer to this is that this is a political question, and the political direction that I will get will certainly serve to generate the necessary plans. As far as Mr. Gellner's article is concerned, I do not—

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. gentleman to advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: Does the committee give the hon. member permission to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Edmonton West I shall try not to abuse the generosity of the committee. I was reading the passage from the proceedings of the committee where the hon. member for Simcoe North put Mr. Gellner's article to Mr. Allard, who said:

As far as Mr. Gellner's article is concerned, I do not disagree with it.

So we have the chief of our general staff saying that he agrees with an article, and indeed it makes admirable common sense, in which it is made abundantly clear that the military contribution we are making to Europe at the present time makes no sense militarily. I ask, what sense does it make politically? It has been said to me by some experts that we are buying some sort of influence, that by making a contribution that does not make sense we are somehow or other pleasing our allies. The sort of domino theory put forward is that if we were to withdraw this useless brick, upon which nobody depends, it would bring down the edifice. I am not running down the troops themselves, because they are first-rate and efficient, but it is suggested that if we withdraw from this useless role the whole edifice will come tumbling down. This is absolute nonsense. It is an insult to our allies, and I suggest it is an insult to our troops to say to them, "We want you to continue doing something that does not make good military sense at the present time." How can you build morale upon an argument of that sort?

My time has elapsed, Mr. Chairman, and I do not wish to trespass upon the generosity of the committee. In conclusion I would say to the minister that even at this late date it is time to use some imagination; it is time to make something in the nature of a stirring appeal to the people of Canada. Only a truly Canadian defence policy can obtain the support for which the minister asks in relation to his plans for unification. Only if it is seen that Canada is prepared to make a maximum contribution to peace and security will the minister receive the support for the policy he is putting forward. It is not good enough to carry on with this sort of inertia and repetition of our role. Politically a new phase has developed in Europe, yet we are carrying on the same immobile policies of the past.

Canada's defence policy should be directed to the future and not to the past. We are spending vast sums of money in this area. We are asking for the lives and devotion of many highly competent and dedicated men and women. They should be put behind a unified force; we accept that. But this unified force should play a modern, up to date role fitted into the needs of Canada to contribute to the security of the world in the 1960's and 1970's. As far as this party is concerned, we shall continue to urge that we do not worry just about machinery and organization, as though we were a group of organization men and nothing more, and we shall try to arouse the imagination and enthusiasm of the people of Canada for a contribution that makes sense at the present time.

Mr. Knowles: Seven o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I think I might as well call it seven o'clock and begin my remarks later. I therefore call it seven o'clock.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Order. I do not know what is the wish of the Committee, but there is no order of the house to suspend the sitting at seven o'clock.

Mr. Hellyer: Then perhaps, Mr. Chairman, you will rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again later this day, and an order of the house could be made to resume at eight o'clock, if this is agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pilon):

That the sitting of the house today be suspended from 7 o'clock p.m. to 8 o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), transport—request for restoration of service on Kettle Valley Railway; the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), immigration—reported discrimination in admission of immigrants from Poland; the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis), historic sites and monuments—Louisbourg fortress—return to work of men laid off.

Perhaps the house would agree, before suspending the sitting, to return to consideration in committee of the bill before it a few moments ago.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Knowles.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

The Chairman: The sitting is suspended from now until eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

[Translation]

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose at seven o'clock, it was considering clause 2.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, before getting into the subject matter of the brief remarks I propose to make, may I be allowed to express our pleasure at your return to the house after your stay in the hospital. We earnestly hope your health will continue to improve so that you may as in the past have the patience to listen to us.

This afternoon we have heard military experts such as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) as well as the brilliant lawyer who spoke for the New Democratic Party.

Tonight I should like to speak for the businessmen, the owners of small businesses.

Mr. Chairman, I admit at the outset that I am no expert in military matters; that is why I shall only make general remarks and give a brief summary of our military organization as seen by a civilian.

This afternoon the minister expressed his views on the military reform. He spoke as the soldier he is; he defended his position well; he spoke as a businessman would have done to protect his interests; as a labour leader would have pleaded the cause of his union. Now, I admire the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) and I always did, because he is strong willed, and when he has made up his mind, I think he has thoroughly thought out his decision before announcing it to the house.

I feel the defence committee performed some fine work, and I congratulate its members for having earnestly looked into the Canadian military question and especially for having suggested amendments and improvements which the entire population expects from the government.

I happened to read this morning an article by Clément Brown about unification. He had this to say about our discussions which started today:

> There is first, by order of importance, the armed forces unification bill, already read a second time and recommended, in spite of the Conservative opposition, without amendment by the parliamentary committee. That bill could give rise to a long debate since the Conservatives are against unification. All the more so since Prime Minister Pearson himself implied that he wants to consider the advisability of proceeding without delay with unification, when the most distinguished witnesses to appear before the parliamentary committee have advised the government to make haste slowly.

In my opinion, the main purpose of Bill No. C-243 is above all to unify the three armed services. I feel that such unification is not only advisable but essential. I fail to see why in the military field as in all other fields, expenditures should not be reduced as much as possible.

Therefore, I am rising this evening in order to express the views of our group concerning the unification of the three armed services, because we consider primarily the savings to be made. According to military technicians, it would also be beneficial to the unity of the army itself on the economic level, which would necessarily reduce administrative costs.

I heard this afternoon the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) talk about the uniform. In my opinion, that matter is of minor importance. Whether the soldier is given a blue, green or gray uniform, it does not change anything to the effect of the bayonet or the cannon, it is simply a matter of fashion. If experts in military fashion are needed, they should be consulted. But when some hon. members talked about the new uniform or said that an effort was made to impose the same uniform to the three services, that was, in my opinion, a very weak argument and I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Edmonton West—a man whom I admire also—object to that bill on that score. It seems to me that most soldiers I talked to in my area are looking forward to a single command, to unification. I am therefore mildly surprised that the Conservatives, as a whole, should so oppose the bill.

All kinds of excuses will be given for holding up the business of the house, such as the one we heard this afternoon, namely that all the committee reports had not been tabled. Mention was made of the delay in tabling the minutes and proceedings of the committee entrusted with the study of the bank bill. I suspect the same thing is going to happen again because the last reports were distributed to us at the beginning of the sitting. I got the last reports on arriving at my office, and at that, not in the final version but merely copies of the transcript.

Well, this is a procedure which I have not ceased to deplore in the five years I have been here. I deplored it even under other governments and it should not be resorted to in order to delay a discussion by putting forward such a worthless argument, as if it were a major reason to adjourn a debate that is so important and so urgent that—

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Gauthier: Certainly.

Mr. Lambert: Is it not a fact that, in the case of the Deposit Insurance Act, the reports of the proceedings were late and that the debate on the bill dealing with the Bank of Canada Act was delayed for four days because the French translation was not finished? I think that perhaps you will agree with me in this regard.

Mr. Gauthier: I agree that the reports took four days to reach us and that consideration of these documents was delayed until they were printed. But the debate began when the last report was received. That is what I mean. The same happened today: discussion was begun when the last report reached our office. In the other instance, we had to wait four days because about 12 French reports were missing. Let me speak as I did at the beginning, as a simple civilian. As civilians, we notice mainly the military budget. I said earlier that we were expecting a reduction in the expenditures, but when we look at the military budget, we notice that this year, in spite of all the minister's predictions, it is yet much higher than last year.

I do not know whether this is due to the fact that the country's expenditures are higher or whether the cost of updating our armaments have increased but everybody, the people in general find that a military budget of about $2 billion for a small country of 20 million people is just outrageous. We had hoped that the budget would be reduced by at least one third, but it is not the case and I want to point out to the minister that we are a little disappointed in that respect.

That situation may be due to the purchase of airplanes, mainly those we use for military training. I know that in my area, for instance, there is a centre where all day long they play with those small toys worth a million dollars apiece. When you replace 140 of those toys because they are a little worn out, at a cost of $140 million, we can imagine that the military budget is going to go up as the minister mentioned. I would not repeat that word, had the minister not used it but he spoke about waste in the Department of the National Defence. I think that we suspected it for a long time. In his statement, the minister said that there had been some waste, and I am confident that he will try and stop such waste so as to save in that respect.

What we really need, in brief, is an army to protect this country, not an army of which two or three battalions could fight abroad, for foreign interests. We do think and the people in general feel that we need an army in order to protect this country.

Canadian citizens are ready to pay for their own aircraft, but what they do not accept today is the fact that, after 20 or 22 years, namely since the last war, they still have to pay the costs of training and the travelling and living allowances of Canadian soldiers stationed in Europe and all other countries. In fact, they are wondering what a poor little country of 20 million people like Canada is doing there.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest it would be preferable to direct our dollars and our energy toward peace production rather than try to thrust peace upon people by force of arms. I believe that if we earmarked 50 per cent of the military budget for production, in order to give food to people in starving countries, we would be doing something useful.

Now, we cannot all be of the same opinion and, as I said a while ago, a soldier speaks like a soldier, a civilian like a civilian. That is why I admire the minister who defended his own cause in this house and defended it well. This does not prevent us from having our own opinion and from wishing that we may, some day, think more about feeding the people, for the sake of peace, instead of thrusting peace upon them, by force of arms.

I wish that day to be the nearest possible, I wish that the minister would think about organizing the army so as to provide protection for this country itself and that he would earmark the difference of millions of dollars to feed the people of this country first of all and then have them benefit other countries that are in need.

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, my first remarks at this stage of proceedings on Bill C-243 are to commend the standing committee on national defence for the great deal of work they did in examining in detail, with the benefit of expert witnesses, the provisions laid out in the bill. I do not pretend to be familiar with all provisions in the bill, as it is now or before it was amended, because this was a specialized study undertaken by a number of competent members in this house. While it is obvious that there is not full agreement among members, it seems to me that they have performed a useful service to parliament and to Canada by making their examination.

I rise tonight to express some opinions respecting Canada's role in international affairs politically and militarily. We in this party have long advocated that there ought to be far closer liaison between the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs. I do not suggest that the ministers or supporting staffs of these departments do not co-operate. I do suggest, however, that the policies of the two departments ought to be more co-ordinated than in the past.

If we are to talk intelligently about Bill C-243, which is designed to bring about a new structure for our armed forces, we ought first to discuss what the purpose and role of those armed forces will be. In this day and age I suggest that that purpose is completely tied to our foreign policy. I suggest, as has been said before, that Canada through obligation or choice, whichever term one wishes to use, occupies a unique position in world international relations. As the minister said a few moments ago, there is so much military power in the hands of the super powers that it is not likely either one will deliberately embark on a war calling on both sides to use all the power they have. As a result I think that Canada ought to use its resources in manpower and material in some way to keep the peace of the world. I had not intended saying this, but perhaps in the context of my argument I ought to say that I am not particularly interested in Canada's strength as a military power. I am, however, interested in Canada's capacity to assist in keeping world peace.

If we agree that Canada's major role in international politics is to have available men and equipment to be used anywhere in the world to extinguish small wars or disputes, we must examine our armed forces to see if they have the capabilities to perform those functions.

There is good reason for our role in the world today. Canada's troops are accepted by other nations for this purpose. For example in many parts of the world the troops of the U.S.S.R., the United States, France or Britain would not be accepted. I do not think United States troops would be accepted in some Asiatic or African countries. I doubt if those countries would accept Soviet Union troops. Were those troops to come in, the countries concerned would be apprehensive. They would be afraid that there would be an extension of Soviet power and influence, were the troops of that powerful country allowed to come in. Also in the middle east, the far east and other places in the world United States troops and military equipment would not be acceptable. The outstanding example of that might be Viet Nam, although I shall not discuss that now.

I suggest that the troops of the United Kingdom and France, former colonial powers, would not be accepted in countries that were colonized by Britain and France in times gone by. I have attended international meetings from time to time, some in the United Nations and some in our own parliamentary associations. If there is one thing that is obvious, it is that these new countries, these developing countries which were formerly colonies of Britain or France simply will not accept troops in their territories for any purpose. They do not want them. There is an obsession in many of these countries to rid themselves of all traces of former influence so that they can concentrate on governing themselves. There is no doubt in my mind that at this stage the forces of former occupying powers would not be allowed back if border disputes broke out between any of those nations. So I think Canada ought to accept this role. I recognize we have done so in a number of areas, even though we were perhaps not well prepared from a military point of view to fulfil this function.

Another reason for my thinking that Canada is well suited to this task is that among the smaller nations of the world—and I am thinking in terms of population—there is not one which is in a better position, because of the extent of its material resources, to support a peace keeping force.

This is an important consideration since we know that if the major powers, the major contributors to the United Nations, fail to agree on whether a peace keeping force should be sent, it is the practice for those who do not agree to withhold financial contributions in respect to such a force. This happened in the case of the Congo, to mention one example. I am thinking of circumstances where the security council has authorized a peace keeping force to begin operations, but where the assessment levied in connection with the force has been withheld. The need therefore is for a nation which is willing to provide a service of this kind, and whose material resources are sufficient to support such a force. The presence of the peace keeping force in Cyprus is an example of a service of this kind, and there are other examples. If there is wrangling in the United Nations about whether a force should be sent or not, great damage might be done while these arguments or discussions were going on, and the situation might deteriorate to the point at which no useful purpose would be served by sending in a small peace keeping force such as Canada can provide.

Having agreed that Canada ought to accept a peace keeping role and having drawn attention to Canada's unique position in being able to assume a role of this kind in international affairs, I come to the next logical step, namely how to design our armed forces in such a way as to make the greatest possible contribution to this concept. I said I do not pretend to be an expert on military matters. It might be possible using separate armed services to provide the forces and the equipment required. I am not sure. I know that these forces have been provided on several occasions in the past, though I suspect not without difficulty. It seems to me that acceptance of the concept which I and other hon. members have outlined is a quite different matter from devising the best possible means of carrying it out.

My hon. friend from Fraser Valley has pointed out, as reported on page 12423 of Hansard of January 30, that we in this party have long taken the position that certain adjustments should be made within our armed forces. His words on that occasion were:

> We ought to redesign Canada's defence strategy and military forces to eliminate useless expenditures on forms of defence obsolete in the light of modern circumstances.

This is even more important. We should, he said—

> —concentrate on establishing powerful, well-equipped, highly mobile forces strategically deployed and capable of immediate airborne transport to any area of Canada.

This was contained in a policy statement we issued several years ago. Having regard to the passage of time, I think the last part of that statement should now read—"capable of immediate airborne transport to any area of the world." So this concept is not new. It is not something we have very recently discovered. The bill before us represents in some respects the culmination of this idea; we are reaching the point at which action is to be taken in a direction we advocated a long time ago. It seems to me that for the purpose of fulfilling a role as a peace keeper in the world, a unified and integrated force would be more effective than three separate forces.

Nevertheless, I believe we should move rather slowly in the field of unification and integration. Sometimes I am puzzled about the interpretation of those two words as they are defined by various hon. members. If integration has already been achieved, and if all this bill will do is provide for unification, I am afraid I do not follow the argument. However this may be, it seems there is some reason and logic in having a single service under a single command if we are to provide the kind of force I have tried to describe. In the initial stages, at least, there has to be a higher degree of co-ordination between the services than we have now. Earlier this afternoon the minister suggested there were some deficiencies in co-ordination among the three forces we have at the present time. It is understandable that this should be so, whether or not one is intimately familiar with the organization of the armed forces.

So we agree to the concept of Canada's new role in international affairs, and we can find some measure of agreement upon integration, and even unification, up to a point. But I suggest to the minister that for the sake of morale we should not lose some of the very useful parts within our forces, and that we should go a little bit slowly in trying to set up a completely new structure. There are traditions in the Canadian forces that are proud and glorious, and rightly so. We should move very slowly, to make sure that no attempt, or apparent attempt is made to destroy these traditions or take away from the proud history of Canada's armed forces.

I am not suggesting to the minister that he is deliberately setting out to destroy such traditions, but accusations have been made that he is. If we move slowly, as I have suggested, and as my colleague from Fraser Valley suggested several weeks ago, we can make sure of providing a clear concept in the minds of all the men in the armed forces as to where we are going, and our purpose can then be achieved without too much pain.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the minister and to the government house leader that public debate, and debate in the House of Commons on integration and unification of tht armed forces have gone on just about long enough. I do not believe that anything useful is going to come, from here on out. The defence committee accepted a lot of amendments to the bill. No doubt representations were made to the minister and the department about other amendments.

I know there are those in this house and in other places who are hard and fast in their opposition to the provisions of the reprinted bill, but I believe we reach a point, and I think we have reached it, where nothing further of great usefulness can come out of extending the debate. I suggest to the minister that he get together with the house leader, look at the provisions of provisional standing order 15-A, and invoke some of them if this debate evolves into what appears to be developing, namely some kind of filibuster, the wasting of time to achieve certain things.

In my opinion the provisions of standing order 15-A are not too severe. Subsection 2 states:

> During routine proceedings a minister of the crown may propose that the question of allocation of time for any item of business, unless otherwise provided for, be referred to the business committee, and upon such proposal being made that question shall stand referred to the committee.

Although I was not in Ottawa at the time, I have heard that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre supported that there ought to be some discussion at least with respect to limitation of time on this debate, if there are members of the house who are determined that it is going to become an interminable debate.

Mr. Knowles: Before we get into trouble.

Mr. Olson: Yes, before we get into too much trouble, because it would be very difficult to limit debate after the house deteriorated, if that is the right word, into an ugly mood so far as the bill is concerned.

Subsection 3 of the standing order states:

> The business committee shall report back to the house on or before the third sitting day following such reference.

The minister can decide for himself how long he wants to wait before using this standing order. Maybe he thinks the bill will pass in one or two days. I would be willing to wait about three days, but after that time I suggest that he take it upon himself to move a motion referring the matter to the business committee. The rule provides that the committee is required to report back to the house within three days. But the committee might sit for only an hour before it became completely obvious its members could not agree, or it could sit for the full three days.

Subsections 5 and 6 of the standing order provide that in the event the business committee cannot agree, the minister may move for limitation of time. Subsection 7 states however, that—> —no motion made by a minister under sections 5 and 6 of this standing order shall provide for the allocation of a period of time less than two days for the second reading, two days for the committee stage, and one day for the third reading of any bill.

I would suggest to the minister that he be careful not to impose the absolute minimum of time specified in the standing order. Even if he finds out from whoever is on the business committee from the Conservative party that they are not going to agree to anything—and that has happened before, you know—

Mr. Lambert: You are being very sanctimonious.

Mr. Olson: —he does not have to impose the absolute minimum of time in the standing order.

There are some 48 pages in the bill and I suggest the minister should not give the Conservatives cause for the old cry that closure is being imposed by imposing the absolute minimum under standing order 15-A. What I seriously suggest to the minister is that if it becomes apparent that there is not going to be any agreement by the business committee, then we should have about three or four days for the committee stage. I think one day is enough for third reading, but we probably need more than two days in committee on something as important as this.

I hope the debate is not going to go on, and on, and on. It has gone on for a long time already and it can only get more acrimonious as the days go by. If there has not already been opportunity for all members who want to make representations with respect to the bill, then we should continue for a few more days, but I believe we have reached the stage where almost everything new that could be said about the bill has been said, and debate will be a little repetitious from now on.

I suggest we could continue for another three or perhaps four days before the minister imposes the provisions of standing order 15-A, and while the matter is before the business committee we could discuss some other item of business. But when the matter returns from the business committee I suggest another four or five days debate would be enough. Let us not have the House of Commons and the whole country bogged down because there are one or two, or half a dozen of our members unwilling to accept the majority decision of the house.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Olson: Yes, sir.

Mr. Churchill: If the hon. member's suggestion of closure is adopted by the government—and he often acts as a spokesman for the government—what percentage of time in that limited period would be given to his party of four and a half members? I think one member of his party is sort of leaving them now.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I have to straighten the hon. member's thinking out again, as I have often had to do. First of all, I am never the spokesman for the government. In case the hon. member was not sure about that—

Mr. Churchill: Should I have used the word stooge?

Mr. Olson: The hon. member said I am often the spokesman for the government, and I am telling him I have never been appointed spokesman for the government. He then described as closure the procedure that I suggested. Closure does not come under standing order 15-A, which provides for allocation of time.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: Closure of debate.

Mr. Olson: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre knows very well that, if there are a number of clauses, closure is a situation in which a minister of the crown moves every day that the question be put at the end of that sitting day. I think that is the way it works. I never was in the house when closure was used. There has been some type of stigma attached to it since 1956. I do not have the mental block in respect of closure some people have, because I believe closure has its place, if the majority of this house is being frustrated day after day and week after week by a very small minority. Although this conduct is confined to a large party, I believe it is only a small minority in that party which intends to hold up the proceedings. I believe there is a proper use of some form of allocation of time so that the majority still can run this country. I think we in this party would be willing to accept our fair share of the amount of time allotted under the use of provisional standing order 15-A.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I was under the impression that we would hear from a number of the Liberal members who were members of the national defence committee. It would appear, however, that possibly the officials of the minister's department have not finished writing their speeches for them, as was the case during the committee hearings. As has been suggested, possibly closure already has been applied to the Liberal members who were present during the hearings of the national defence committee.

At the beginning I should like to point out that I joined the committee on national defence in the very late stages of its deliberations. I was in attendance, however, long enough to realize that the Liberal members who served on this committee were there for the express purpose of feeding to the different witnesses whatever questions the officials of the department wished fed to them. This was a disgraceful performance on their part. With the exception of a few members who had enough on the ball to ask their own questions, the Liberal members were depending on the officials who sat behind them during the committee hearings to feed them questions to which answers were desired.

This afternoon we heard a very weak argument by the minister in respect of the unification bill. For 50 minutes he spoke about equipment and many matters other than the unification bill itself. At no time, other than in the last few closing remarks, did he concentrate in any way on the bill before us. He stood up and misled the house with the suggestion that because of integration or unification of certain operations in the services there had been a saving of 30 to 40 per cent. He used these percentage figures to indicate that there has been a terrific saving. If there is a staff in Washington or London, 30 per cent of that staff would mean the saving of only one person on that particular staff. Therefore his percentage figures will not mean a thing.

I should like to ask the minister to stand up in this house at the proper time and indicate that the percentages which he gave as savings are accurate. I should like him to say whether 30 per cent of a particular group, or 40 per cent of another group, were actually struck off strength or merely transferred to another branch of the service. Is the minister implying that simply by the reduction of a certain staff by these large percentages a saving has been accomplished? It is my understanding of the services that if a man is no longer required in his job he probably is transferred somewhere else.

The saving the minister implies is nonsense, unless the percentages to which he refers apply to people who actually are struck off strength. If he can give us this assurance, I will accept his statement that there is a saving. I suggest, however, that that is not the case. All we need do is look at the estimates for the Department of National Defence. It is nonsense and hogwash for the minister to tell the Canadian people that tremendous savings have been effected in the Department of National Defence.

I might refer back to the minister's propaganda team which sat in the gallery and fed propaganda to him. I say again that the saving the minister has implied is a lot of nonsense. In another place I would call it what it is, bluntly, but the rules do not permit me to do so. As appears at page 1582 of the evidence of the committee the minister wrapped up the summary by saying:

> Finally, may I say that in recommending the changes consequent on this Bill I do not wish to reflect in any way, on individual members of the Armed Forces. They are wonderful people and I am proud of my association with them. I have stated repeatedly, and I mean it with all my heart, that the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces are without peer anywhere in this world. They have served Canada well, in war and peace, and they deserve the deepest gratitude of the Canadian people.

Immediately afterward the minister went out and accused a loyal serving officer of the Royal Canadian Navy of being disloyal over an 18 month period. The minister should read his final words when he appeared before the committee when he said "I mean this with all my heart". It is strange that the minister then would go out and accuse a man, such as Admiral Landymore who has displayed loyalty and performed service to his country, of being disloyal over an 18 month period. This is the approach the minister takes. I might say that his remarks were about as far removed from the truth as they could be.

During the question period in the committee the same Minister of National Defence said that Admiral Landymore was fired for 18 months consistent disloyalty to the policies of the people he was paid to serve. Of course the press reports indicated that the minister made an apology in this regard. Having made the apology he then makes another statement which withdraws the apology he had made. In the first place the apology was not one which should have been publicized in the way it was, because the minister did not emphatically withdraw the charges he had made. Having accused Admiral Landymore of disloyalty over an 18 month period the minister, having been placed in a position where he found it necessary to make an apology, if he were any kind of a man, would have resigned his position instead of attempting to lord it over the serving officers in this country.

Not too long ago, after a briefing of the highest order by admirals and other members of the upper echelon of the NATO command, the minister released information which was classified. This is the type of man who speaks of loyalty and disloyalty. Hon. members on the other side are laughing so I shall repeat what I said: The minister should be behind bars. More drastic action might have been taken in other countries under similar circumstances, yet the minister merely stands and talks about disloyalty among serving officers in this country.

How does he back up his charges of disloyalty? During the committee hearings when he was asked about his charges of disloyalty against Admiral Landymore the minister said this, as recorded at page 1624 of the committee proceedings:

I do not think that he had any right to call that kind of a meeting. I do not think he had any right to demand personal loyalty from his officers, and now that you have raised the question I want to make this statement. I have never asked a military officer his politics, his religion, or for his personal loyalty. Yet Admiral Landymore in giving testimony before this committee said that he had extracted a promise from his officers.

The hon. member for Halifax then asked the minister the following question:

Mr. Forrestall: What type of a promise?

Mr. Hellyer: The promise was not to resign.

Because a serving officer asked his men not to resign from their commissions in the navy, the minister accused him of being disloyal over a period of 18 months. As recorded at page 1623 of the committee proceedings, the minister said that Admiral Landymore was fired because of 18 months of consistent disloyalty. The minister stated, as recorded at page 1623:

Yes, I think I could. I would say that following a meeting of commanders in Ottawa, as I recall, on November 19, 1964, Admiral Landymore fully understood what we had in mind. We planned to develop in this country a single service concept and that he was unalterably opposed to it at that stage and that he went back to Halifax to do everything he possibly could to prepare for an ultimate confrontation on the issue.

In reference to what the minister said regarding Admiral Landymore's understanding of the plans for the development of a single force in 1964, let me point out that the former chief of staff, Air Marshal Miller, indicated to the committee at that time there was no discussion about unification whatsoever. He indicated that there was no complete understanding of unification. He had only been retired for six months. How can the minister truthfully accuse Admiral Landymore of taking the action he took with a full understanding of what was to take place as far back as 1964?

The minister was asked why disciplinary action had not been taken against Admiral Landymore. I suggest that the hon. member who just spoke should read some of these answers in order to understand why we should not be limited in our time of debate, but given as much time as hon. members require. Let me remind the committee that the minister and the Prime Minister promised that ample opportunity would be provided for the discussion of this bill. In spite of that promise the Liberal majority on the committee rushed the conclusion of the committee's sittings, even though it had been indicated that the members wished other witnesses to be heard. Surely this government will not propose closure on this matter in the face of that promise. This committee of the whole house is entitled to all the time it requires to delve into the matter of unification. I accept the Prime Minister's promise and I expect he will live up to it, regardless of what the Minister of National Defence may wish to do. His obligation means nothing. I have not depended on his words or promises for a long time, and in this instance I put my trust in the Prime Minister's promise that we will have an ample opportunity to examine every angle of this proposal for unification.

In answer to questions as to why disciplinary action was not taken against Admiral Landymore the minister said this:

> No. I said if the issue involved had been anything less serious or less comprehensive than the single service concept and he displayed the disloyalty which he did throughout that period, then I would have had to insist that he be court-martialled.

If I have ever heard a ridiculous statement, that surely is it. The minister implied that if the matter was less serious he would have taken more serious action. Where is the logic in that approach? Since the matter was apparently extremely serious he did nothing about it.

I am afraid I can see no logic in that approach. If someone can point out its logic, then I must have a complete misconception of law and justice. Why should a less serious charge for similar action in respect of a less serious subject demand more serious action by the minister? That is an idiotic approach; yet, so is the minister. This is the same type of logic he has shown throughout. The minister has consistently refused to face up to the facts and pay attention to the advice of his senior advisors.

Without further reference to the minister's answers, I should like him to consider again his remarks relating to the incompatibility of Admiral Landymore and his second-in-command. As I recall the situation, the minister said on several occasions that these two officers were incompatible. He was asked where he obtained this information and he indicated that the information came through official channels. Air Marshal Miller was asked to give his understanding of what official channels might mean. He replied that the commanding officer would necessarily initiate communications through official channels.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South).]

In view of what Air Marshal Miller said, the reference by the minister to his information coming through official channels must be ridiculous, because this information must have come from Admiral Landymore. It is not the custom in the services of this country for subordinate officers to bypass their commanding officers when sending in reports. The commanding officer is always aware of what passes through official channels. In spite of this the minister has told us that he heard certain things about Admiral Landymore through official channels. Again I suggest to the minister that this is a lot of nonsense.

It is also interesting to note that the minister in referring to his source of information indicated that he spoke to junior officers. When asked where and when, he replied that he had met these people on many different occasions. The implication was that he could have met them at a cocktail party or something like that. I say to the minister that if he discussed anything in respect of this particular matter with a junior officer anywhere, whether it was at a meeting, a cocktail party, in his home or somewhere else, he was inviting that officer to break the written rule that is laid down which forbids any officer in the services to discuss political matters. Therefore the minister has been contributing to junior officers in the Canadian forces breaking the rules. Of course, what can we expect? What would the minister know about rules?

I understand that the minister is so determined to bring about unification that he is prepared to put his seat on the line on this question. Not everybody in the minister's party supports him. I would remind him that cocktail parties are held around here at which people drop the odd word. Some fellows get pretty loose in the lip at these cocktail parties. The minister should check this out, because he has not the support in his own party that he thinks he has. Perhaps on an occasion such as this somebody overheard the minister threaten to resign his seat and impose another calamity on this government, as though it had not suffered enough calamities already, unless the party saw fit to back him completely on the question of unification.

Having read the evidence of the recently retired chief of staff, according to the press reports the Prime Minister said he thought this matter required further looking into. The press immediately indicated that there would probably be some kind of saw-off in respect of unification. But apparently the minister went back to the Prime Minister and made another threat, so the Prime Minister, having said he had read Air Chief Marshal Miller's testimony and having indicated that it deserved looking into, has now said he is once again in full support of the minister. The support of the minister has been on and off.

What interests me is that the testimony given to the defence committee by Air Chief Marshal Miller became available to this committee only today. So the Prime Minister was perhaps referring to the coverage given this matter by the press. If that is the case, I suggest that the Prime Minister should read carefully Air Chief Marshal Miller's testimony, and if he made a decision on the basis of press reports, having read this testimony I am sure the Prime Minister, in all fairness to the people of this country and the men and officers serving in the forces, will demand a second look at the unification bill.

In the committee an amendment was moved that before the unified force came into being members of the army, navy and air force, the services which are to disappear when unification becomes effective, be reattested and that each and every individual serving in the forces be given the choice as to whether he was to become a member of the Canadian forces. The Judge Advocate General gave evidence before the committee that this is just a matter of paper, and is not necessary. I say to the minister that it is not just a matter of paper. It always was the practice, but that practice is being discontinued; whether legally, I do not know. However, it would not be difficult to produce for the minister evidence to the effect that men who during the war served in more than one service were discharged from that service before entering another. Having been discharged from that service, anybody who served in two of the services during the war obtained two discharge certificates. I do not know whether this is just a matter of paper, but the evidence given before the committee is something that I will not accept. I can produce for the minister discharges obtained by individuals which show service in the army and in one of the other services. In other words, it is not just a matter of paper, and before a man is signed into one service he must be discharged from the other.

Therefore why should it not follow that if you are going to wipe out the army, navy and air force, the men serving in those forces should be given the choice of entering the unified force? It is said that this is not necessary, but there are a number of precedents in this country which indicate that it is necessary. During a national emergency, a time of war, no man in the services was required to do other than that for which he signed up. I would refer to the "Official History of the Canadian Army", which is recommended reading for the Minister of National Defence, who might learn something from it. I would point out that in the writing of this volume the author was given full access to relevant official documents in the possession of the Department of National Defence. On page 43 is set out the first precedent. This was referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, but it bears repeating because I believe that if you wish to get anything across to this minister you have to keep pounding and pounding and pounding, and even then I doubt whether it will sink in because he has a stubborn attitude, for his own political reasons.

The minister has never denied that he threatened to resign if his party did not back the unification bill. I referred to that matter 10 or 15 minutes ago, and I remember a former Speaker ruling an hon. member out of order for not taking up a question of privilege within seven or ten seconds. I raised this matter 10 or 15 minutes ago, but the minister has never denied that he threatened to resign if his unification bill was not passed. He cannot deny it now on a question of privilege, because the time allowed for this has expired. I would ask the minister to pay particular attention to these words which appear at page 43 of the book to which I have referred:

> "Government decided to place militia on active service in Canada (mobile force). Although all submissions to council were ready and all plans made, we were horrified to hear—"

I repeat that.

> —we were horrified to hear the cabinet decided at the last minute to change the name of the mobile force from "Canadian Field Force" to "Canadian Active Service Force". The result being many changes, torn up stencils, and $65,000 worth of mobilization forms almost useless. Very hectic day—but we managed to get the general order 135/1939 issued and in the mail to all districts.

Here is a clear-cut precedent established during the time of an emergency, wartime, when it was required to re-attest all servicemen just because the cabinet at the last minute changed the name of the force. They were not abolishing any force; they were just changing the name of the force from Canadian Field Force to Canadian Active Service Force. For the minister's benefit I read the following passage:

General order No. 135 announced that the governor in council had "authorized the organization of a Canadian Active Service Force" and had "named as Corps of the Active Militia" and "placed on active service in Canada" certain specified units. The accompanying schedules listed nearly 300 individual units and formation headquarters, including the headquarters of "1st Corps C.A.S.F.", the whole of the 1st and 2nd Divisions, C.A.S.F., and quotas of corps, army and lines of communication troops. In addition, this order incorporated in the C.A.S.F. the units and details of the non-permanent active militia which had been called out under general order No. 124 to guard vulnerable points and man coast defences. Some additions were now made to the original list. The N.P.A.M. soldiers on duty were attested into the C.A.S.F., except for those not wishing to enlist, who were released in due course.

This again is another well established precedent indicating that when the original list was changed the N.P.A.M. men were reattested into the C.A.S.F., except those who did not wish to enlist. They were released in due course.

The precedents are many, Mr. Chairman, and I do not have time to review them all. However, I will again draw the minister's attention to page 63 of the "Official History of the Canadian Army", where the following statement appears:

The decision to send a force overseas involved changing the basis on which men had so far been enlisted into the Active Service Force.

So the decision to send these men overseas required this change to be made. I continue:

The Minister of National Defence had explained to the House of Commons on September 11 that under the Militia Act (Section 68) no man could be required to serve in the field continuously for a longer period than one year, unless he had volunteered to serve for a longer period or "for the war". He suggested that if a decision were made to use part of the Active Service Force overseas the men might be "re-enlisted for overseas service".

I call to the minister's attention that at this time this country was at war. These men were in the active service of Canada, but before they were sent overseas they were going to be re-enlisted.

The statement issued on 19 september confirmed that this would be done, the men of both divisions being re-attested on a basis of volunteering for service in Canada or elsewhere for the duration of the war. Orders were shortly sent out that the whole of the Active Service Force was to be reattested in this way."

And so it goes on and on, Mr. Chairman. During the war active service personnel were reattested to be sent overseas. This minister, along with his supporters in committee who do not understand the matter, voted against giving the men of our services today the opportunity to be reattested. In other words, they were given no choice whether they want to belong to the unified force or whether they want their discharge. The members of that committee voted against giving our armed services a privilege that this country saw fit to give them even during time of war. They are denying this to our servicemen.

What, in effect, did these members do in denying our forces this privilege, Mr. Chairman? I would draw this matter especially to the attention of the members from Quebec. They voted for conscription—because that is what it is, in effect. There is no voluntary aspect to this unified force unless the men are given the opportunity to be reattested and voluntarily become members of it. Unless this is done, the minister, with the support of the members of that committee, is conscripting every serving man in this country today into this unified force and denying him the right to make his choice.

An hon. Member: Hogwash.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to his speech has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret there is not unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue his speech.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege I realize I do not have consent but I would draw to the attention of the Minister of National Defence, who this aftertoon spoke for 60 minutes, that the understanding of hon. members was that we would be given the same opportunity. But I can wait. I can come back at him.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, as a member of the standing committee on national defence one of the things that has shocked, amazed and disturbed me is the superficial nature of the press reporting of the committee hearings. The testimony of many witnesses was only partially reported, usually just the sensational and negative portions of their evidence being given. Other witnesses were not reported at all.

It is therefore with a great deal of pleasure and admiration that this morning I was able to read in the April 3 edition of the Toronto Globe and Mail a first class, and in depth, job of reporting by Mr. Anthony Westell. Mr. Westell, rather than simply accepting the highly sensationalized and one-sided versions from the wire service coverage of the hearings, obviously took the trouble to read the evidence in depth. Because of the professionalism and clarity of his article, and because it represents an independent and not always favourable point of view, I intend to record a considerable portion of this article on the record.

Mr. Churchill: Could the hon. member permit a question at this point? It has to do with Mr. Westell's article. How did Mr. Westell get access to the reports of the committee hearings, which reached the members only today at noon?

Mr. Andras: I quote:

The transcript of evidence taken by the Commons committee on defence, when it was studying the bill to unify the three fighting services, runs to more than 2,000 printed pages, or close to a million words. Searching through the record for the truth about unification is rather worse than reading the verbatim evidence in a hard-fought criminal trial to form an opinion on guilt or innocence.

At a trial at least some of the witnesses are disinterested and impartial; before the defence committee, all the evidence was, in fact, advocacy of a particular point of view, and much of it was impassioned. The admirals, generals and air marshals who appeared were all experts, and for each opinion expressed there was a contradiction of equal authority, but no other evidence.

Mr. Westell goes on:

In these circumstances, the debate—or rather, the trial of unification—is likely to produce far more heat than light, far more confusion than clarification. The jury, which is the public, will hear many speeches intended to sway its emotions, but few which will inform its opinion. All the facts and opinions are already on the record in the transcript of the committee proceedings.

As a background to the debate in the Commons, this is an attempt to isolate and analyze some of the main trends of thought and argument that appeared before the committee. To illustrate the difficulty, and the caution with which judgment must be approached, consider a few quotations:

Rear Admiral Jeffry Brock, fired as Maritime Commander by Defence Minister Paul Hellyer in 1964 and since living in retirement: "Our navy now, and its anti-submarine capability, is greatly diminished from what it was 2½ years ago."

Commodore H. A. Porter, director-general, Maritime Forces, presenting a brief prepared in consultation with the naval staff and present commander of Maritime Forces: "I think from the anti-submarine point of view we are more effective today than we have ever been."

Then Rear Admiral Landymore is cited. His opinion is:

"Unification has very little, if any, merit. It is change for the sake of change. It is unnecessary and expensive. It is oriented politically and not militarily."

On the other hand, the next paragraph states:

Rear Admiral C. J. Dillon, 36 years in the R.C.N., a supply officer who was Deputy Comptroller-General when he retired last year, recalled to undertake a special study for the Defence Staff, and a student of military history: "I think when all the froth is blown off the beer and we get over this period of adjustment these people are embarking on, I suppose I could say my only regret is that I am too old to participate any further... I have often said to people when they have talked about unification, "You ought to belong to my church". I happen to be an adherent of the Church of Rome and it is going through some very traumatic experiences these days. They are probably akin in some ways to what is over the horizon for the services. I think we can rise above this... I certainly will shed a tear for the Royal Canadian Navy, but I think we live in a world where we must adjust to change... I think it is all going to work out all right."

• (9:30 p.m.)

Lt. Gen. R. W. Moncel, vice-chief of the defence forces until he retired last year after becoming convinced that unification was going too far too fast: "... First, to translate the white paper (of 1964) into the force that it called for required, by all my calculations, a force of 150,000 at a budget of $2 million, accruing at 5 per cent. I could never do for less than that, what the white paper said could be done."

Air Chief Marshal Frank Miller, chief of defence staff until he retired last year, questioned about General Moncel's statement: "I do not know where he got those figures; they do not ring any bells with me, and I think they are on the high side for our present commitments... I do not see any real difficulty in our meeting our commitments up until now."

Air Chief Marshal Miller, at the close of his evidence: "... I am in favour of integration as we have it now, as it is developing. I am not closing the book at all on some future unification, but because of the need to get the integration machinery oiled up and working, I would not want a disruptive influence such as unification at this time to be thrown into the machinery."

General J. V. Allard, chief of the defence staff, commander of the Canadian brigade in Korea, a commander of a British division, an amateur yachtsman and a qualified pilot: "I would like to make it clear, therefore, that in making my presentation before you, I do so as the man responsible for carrying out the policy of the government through the Minister of National Defence, for ensuring that the defence forces we have today are organized, equipped and trained and possess the morale to accept any task they have or are likely to be given...

I feel absolutely confident that this task can be carried out best by the reorganization of the forces as set out in Bill C-243 (the unification bill)".

These are merely a few examples of the contradiction and confusion of evidence before the committee. Critics of unification disagreed on the grounds for opposition. Exponents of the new policy supported it for different reasons.

Most of the critics were officers who had left the services, fired by Mr. Hellyer because they opposed his policies or retired voluntarily because they felt the reorganization of the forces was being pushed too fast. Most of the defenders of unification were serving officers.

There was a tendency in the committee to downgrade the testimony of the serving officers on the grounds that they were not free agents. It was argued that they had to support the government line because they knew Mr. Hellyer would axe them if they criticized. The ex officers, on the other hand, were held up as free agents speaking the unvarnished truth.

This seems unfair. The ex officers were out of the services, in the main, precisely because they opposed unification, and that was the point of view they expressed to the committee. The serving officers remained in the forces and had risen to the top jobs because they supported unification and their evidence was based on that belief. But both sides spoke from a background of distinguished military service and experience, and those who heard General Allard, for example, give his opinion would find it very hard to believe that he would perjure himself to please his minister, any more than Admiral Landymore would tell lies to embarrass Mr. Hellyer. It is easier and fairer to both sides to ascribe their conflicts to honest difference of opinion.

That does not help in making a judgment on which side is right. But some issues seemed to emerge as the main differences as the hearings proceeded.

There was comparatively little opposition to unification in theory or principle. The argument was over practice.

Many of the critics took the position that unification would make sense if Canada were going to concentrate upon development of a mobile peacekeeping force, but would be impossible, or worse, if the intention was to maintain international commitments to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Europe and to the United States in the North American Air Defence Command.

Their argument, very simply, appeared to be that the army in Europe operates within the integrated NATO command, that the R.C.A.F. in Europe is part of a larger international force, that the R.C.A.F. co-operates with the U.S. Air Force in the defence of this continent, and the R.C.N. operates as part of the NATO anti-submarine defence. These forces do specialized jobs in their own environment in co-operation with the forces of other countries, and cannot, in good sense, be unified.

If, however, the Canadian forces were to be regrouped to operate independently, as a mobile peacekeeping force to police trouble spots or put out brush fire wars, unification would make sense. The R.C.A.F. would transport the troops and provide close support on the battlefield, and the R.C.N. would run, in effect, a shipping line to carry the heavy equipment. All three services would be operating together to one end.

For example, General Moncel: "In the light of the commitments that are undertaken and which indeed are spelled for us in the white paper, a unified force has no place. Now, if you want to change the commitment to a commitment—I could write one for you if you want—which would call for a unified force, then unification per se is obviously a good thing..."

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. As a result of my experience in the house, I submit it is not open to members to read at length, word for word, from newspaper articles. I have been following the hon. member for Port Arthur for several minutes and he has been quoting verbatim almost a whole column of this morning's Globe and Mail article on the question of unification. An hon. member may make reference to a newspaper article, but certainly not put it on the record of the house in extenso. The hon. member must be in a position to speak for himself, notwithstanding the qualifications of the man who may have written the newspaper article or the work he has put into it. Certainly, let us have the member's own views but not newspaper articles.

The Chairman: I think I would have to agree that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West is well taken. It is not improper for a member to read from newspaper articles to support an argument that he is presenting to the house. However, up to this point the hon. member's speech has consisted almost entirely of the newspaper article. I hope the hon. member will conclude his remarks on that particular aspect as soon as possible and get along with his remarks on clause 2 of the bill.

Mr. Andras: With the greatest of respect, Mr. Chairman, I stated at the beginning that I was going to quote at great length from the article written by Mr. Westell. I feel it is absolutely pertinent to the debate, and I have a purpose at which I will arrive in concluding my speech. Unless there is a distinct ruling otherwise, I would ask your indulgence and continue to quote these very useful comments made by Mr. Westell. He goes on to report, for example, that General Moncel—

The Chairman: Order, please. I must again interrupt the hon. member and advise him that it is not improper for him to read a newspaper article to support his own argument. However, I believe it is improper for him to read a newspaper article which, up to this point, has formed his speech in totality. I hope the hon. member will co-operate and make his own remarks on clause 2 of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps Your Honour would permit me to raise a point of order which may possibly have been overlooked. I believe there have been rulings from the Chair on a number of occasions that any hon. member may quote from any source at all as long as he is willing to make the source his own and say that the views he is putting forward are the views he has adopted as his own. If one looks at the references he will find many to support this view. It is perhaps more frank to do this honestly and openly and admit who wrote the article than to deliver a speech in this house, the authorship of which is not so apparent.

Mr. Starr: They are all over on the other side.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I would refer Your Honour as well to citation 144 on page 124 of Beauchesne which reads:

> It is a rule in both houses of parliament that a member must address the house orally and not read from a written, previously prepared speech, for the reason that, "if the practice of reading speeches should prevail, members might read speeches that were written by other people, and the time of the house be taken up in considering the arguments of persons who were not deserving of their attention.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so far, the hon. member for Port Arthur, as has been pointed out, has said almost nothing, but has read from a report appearing in one of the morning newspapers which is readily available to every member of this house if he wishes to read it. I suggest the point is well taken. Just referring to the article without taking the responsibility for the remarks being quoted is improper on two counts. First, hon. members should not refer extensively to newspaper reports and, second, they are not supposed to read their speeches. I am interested in the hon. member's thoughts, not in the ideas of some newspaper reporter.

Mr. Brewin: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I refer to the contribution by the Minister of Transport. He said, as I understand it, that it is all right to read from the newspaper article if the hon. member adopts that article. How can he adopt the article when it contains a variety of views expressed by other people, some of which are clearly inconsistent with each other.

I have listened carefully to what the hon. member has read. In my view it is an excellent article but I would prefer to read it myself rather than hearing the hon. member read it in the house. In any event, it is impossible for the hon. member to make those views his own. As I have said, a great many of the views are ones that I would adopt, but they are inconsistent with other views in the article. How the hon. member can adopt this article as his own I fail to understand.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I ought to say something, as the hon. member has challenged me directly. I read the article this morning, and I thought it was an excellent and judicious article containing many apt quotations. One could take those quotations, as Mr. Westell did, from the proceedings of the committee. If they were taken from the committee proceedings no one in the house would argue that it was improper to quote them. The mere fact that they were reprinted in the Globe and Mail does not make them any less quotations expressed during the committee proceedings. The hon. member does not need to accept those views, but interlarded with the quotations are the very sensible judgments of Mr. Westell, with which in the main I found it hard to disagree since they contain so much common sense, and which seem to lead obviously, and almost inevitably to a conclusion which may be distasteful to some hon. members. I did not find them distasteful, and obviously the hon. member for Port Arthur does not find them distasteful.

If he feels that Mr. Westell was able to put in convenient language the sentiments that he feels, it surely should not be wrong for him to be permitted to express them. At least he is honest enough to say who had produced them.

I can well remember a distinguished member of this house, the late Mackenzie King, quoting at great length from a speech of Winston Churchill without attribution until it was all over. Then he made a complete and frank confession. Mr. King was always frank.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: He revealed his source and nobody took exception to that.

I remember an occasion, when I was on the other side of the house, when I took up a sheet of paper to read column after column because, as I said, I wanted to be quite sure that my views on that occasion were put accurately. During the course of that reading Mr. Donald Fleming, who was sitting here, interrupted me to say: "Nonsense. The hon. member is talking nonsense." Then I revealed that I had been quoting from something Mr. Donald Fleming has said three or four years before. Nobody said that was contrary to the rules. I suggest, in the spirit of the debates in this house, the hon. member for Port Arthur is following hallowed traditions.

Mr. Churchill: You are talking about parliamentary speeches.

Mr. Baldwin: What the Minister of Transport said may be true, but I would think that the article the hon. member for Port Arthur is quoting from does comment on proceedings which took place in a committee of this house, and as such the hon. member clearly infringed the rules. A committee of the house is part of the house. Citation 157 (5) of Beauchesne's fourth edition says this:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the House and referring—> —to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

I emphasize "referring":

When the hon. member quotes from a newspaper article which refers to proceedings in a committee of the house and the hon. member seeks to use that in debate, I submit he clearly infringes this very definite rule.

The Chairman: Order, please. I think the committee has spent sufficient time on the point of order. I shall refer to the ruling made in the first instance. There is nothing wrong with a member's using an article from a newspaper to support an argument he is making. Perhaps this is a good time to suggest that the hon. member for Port Arthur be allowed to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. Andras: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I started by saying that one of the things that shocked me during the deliberations of the committee on national defence was the superficial reporting undertaken by the press. In quoting, as I said quite frankly at the beginning, at great length from the article by Mr. Westell, I was illustrating the difference between superficial and good reporting. Almost everything that Mr. Westell has said is pertinent to this matter, and will add weight to the deliberations of the committee.

Mr. Churchill: Let us have some quotations from the superficial reports.

Mr. Andras: I am sure we will have those later from the other side of the house.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

For example, General Moncel said this:

> In the light of the commitments that are undertaken and which indeed are spelled for us in the White Paper, a unified force has no place. Now if you want to change the commitment to a commitment—I could write one for you if you want—which would call for a unified force, then unification per se is obviously a good thing—

Mr. Westell went on to say that this was the position which the New Democratic Party took from the beginning of the hearings, and it is the position from which they emerged at the end.

Mr. Nasserden: On a point of order, the hon. member who has the floor is deliberately breaking one of the rules of the house found in paragraph 6 of citation 157 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. In part that says the following:

> The rule is quite clear, that the quoting of a newspaper, an author or a book which reflects upon debate before the House, either directly or indirectly is entirely out of order, because members are here to give their own opinion and not to quote the opinion of others... Members may quote an article or a book stating facts, but a commentary on any proceeding or any discussion in the house, with the object of swinging an opinion to one side or the other, is out of order.

It is clear that the hon. member is contravening the rules of this house.

An hon. Member: Why not table the newspaper?

Mr. Andras: This was the position which the New Democratic Party took—

The Chairman: Order, please. I have already stated to the committee and to the hon. member the view the Chair takes with respect to the reading at length from a newspaper article. I invite the hon. member for Port Arthur to now proceed to his own remarks on clause 2 of Bill C-243.

Mr. Starr: He should resume his seat. He has no ideas of his own.

Mr. Andras: One of the difficulties is that there is so much of this article with which I thoroughly agree that I would most certainly have not strayed far from it had I used it as a basis for my remarks. If I may, I will continue to quote extracts and quote from the committee reports which are pertinent to the point I was making. One of them is the contradictions in the evidence given by many of the retired officers who appeared before us. On this question of commitments, which the New Democratic Party found to be of such great importance to them during the committee deliberations, the article says:

> Unfortunately, it is not that simple. Commitments to NATO are not immutable and are, even now, in the process of changing. And there is no clear line to be drawn between forces committed to NATO and those designated for peacekeeping, or restoring peace where limited war has broken out. Finally, there is no agreement among the critics of unification that a unified force would not be useful to NATO.
> As Air Chief Marshal Miller said: "I do not think there is any unanimity as to whether a unified force was a good contribution to NATO.

Mr. Churchill: Can the hon. member give us a page reference? On a point of order, the hon. member said he intended to give quotations from the evidence. Will he not give the page reference so that we can follow what he is reading in the evidence and see whether his statements are accurate?

Mr. Andras: I do not think I have time to do the detailed homework for the hon. gentleman.

The air chief marshal was saying he did not think there was any unanimity as to whether a unified force was a good contribution to NATO. Asked if a peace keeping force was compatible with commitment to NATO—

An hon. Member: Who asked that question?

Mr. Andras: Air Chief Marshal Miller replied:

> "Yes, exactly. It can be made up from elements of forces we need for NATO . . . I do not see that unification will add or subtract from our ability in any way in this."
> The committee spent a lot of its time arguing about commitments, but the picture never did emerge very clearly. Admiral Landymore, for one, was convinced that unification implied a secret intention by Mr. Hellyer to withdraw from international alliances. Mr. Hellyer insisted that the policy remains exactly as stated in the White Paper of 1964—to maintain existing commitments and, in addition, to build up capability for peacekeeping.

The article says, on this point:

> Asked whether Canada had intimated to its allies its intention to vary the commitment of the air division, (in Europe) Mr. Hellyer replied: "The modest reduction that is taking place this year has already been agreed. In so far as the future is concerned, we will have to indicate this to NATO, if my memory serves me correctly, in December of this year . . . We are not required to reveal our intention or to discuss our future plans and commitments except at that time . . . I think that during the course of the year, we will have to decide what to do for the following five-year period . . ."
> Considerations of foreign policy, obviously enough, influence Mr. Hellyer's position. While the defence committee was meeting, External Affairs Minister Paul Martin told the Senate foreign affairs committee that Canada cannot unilaterally withdraw forces from NATO without seriously endangering the stability of the alliance. But Mr. Martin did not rule out a change in the military commitment.

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order. The hon. member who now has the floor is deliberately and flagrantly disobeying your instruction and your ruling. He is continuing to read word for word from this newspaper article during the last two or three minutes, in spite of the fact that you have warned him he was not to do so. I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to see that your ruling is observed.

Mr. Andras: I should like to continue to make my point as to the contrast between the evidence given by the various witnesses, and if in doing so my remarks coincide very closely with this newspaper article in the Globe and Mail of April 3, it is a close coincidence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andras: I continue to paraphrase the article.

Mr. Brewin: Is the hon. member reading or not reading excerpts from the article by Mr. Westell in the Globe and Mail?

Mr. Andras: I am attempting to paraphrase it, Mr. Chairman, and to use quotations from the deliberations of the committee in establishing the contrast between the evidence given by the various witnesses.

The Secretary of State pointed out that air portable forces stationed in Canada are already committed to the defence of NATO's northern flank in Norway. Since he spoke, another mobile force in Canada has been committed to the NATO southern flank in time of war. It appears clear from all the evidence, but is nowhere officially stated, that the Canadian intention is to allow the R.C.A.F. nuclear attack force to run down until it passes out of existence in the 70's, but to replace it as a contribution to NATO with mobile ground forces carried by new transport aircraft supported by the new CF-5 ground attack naval plane, and backed by naval transport. This would be a unified force committed to NATO. It would also be the peace keeping or peace restoring force able to operate under UN command.

As several witnesses made clear, the double commitment of this force rests on the calculated gamble that Canada will not be asked to undertake peace keeping missions at the same time as it is called upon by NATO for action in Europe. The argument appears to be that if a major war breaks out in Europe, no one will worry about keeping the peace elsewhere; second, that as major war is unlikely as long as NATO keeps up its guard, Canadian forces may as well be usefully employed on peace missions.

There is thus no clear line to be drawn between commitment to NATO and peacekeeping. The roles overlap, and the assumption of peace keeping responsibility does not necessarily involve withdrawing from NATO, or even a significant weakening of Canada's military contribution. The commitment argument, therefore, is not decisive, or even very enlightening, in resolving the dispute over unification.

Mr. Starr: You have lost your authority, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I will have to ask the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair and, in the time which remains to him, to proceed with his own remarks on clause 2.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to establish that one of the important factors in the deliberations of the defence committee or, for that matter, in any other committee of the house is a dependence upon the formation of public opinion by objective, hard working reporting in depth. I think the article from which I have been quoting reflects these qualities. Since I am prevented from quoting it completely I commend it to every member of this house, particularly to those who did not have the opportunity to sit on the defence committee. It is an admirable condensation and an excellent summary of the issue before us.

I believe the press has a responsibility to report fully and objectively. It is possible that the debate upon which we are now engaged will be prolonged and impassioned, and in order that the public may judge the issue on its merits I hope the standard of reporting matches that from which I have just quoted. If so, it will have done a great service to the public. This article contains, in my opinion, a very rational approach to the subject before us. It weighs the issues rather than the personalities and I believe we in the house for the balance of this debate might well adopt the objective thinking embodied in this article by Mr. Westell.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Andras.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF SERVICE ON KETTLE VALLEY RAILROAD

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on March 17 last, as recorded at page 14117 of Hansard, I asked the following question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill):

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to transport a question to the Minister of Transport which is of national significance . . . Has the minister received a resolution approved by the annual meeting of the Kootenay-Boundary Chambers of Commerce calling for the restoration of passenger service on the Kettle Valley railway from Vancouver to Medicine Hat? If so, what consideration has been given to these representations which are supported by 150,000 people of all parties in British Columbia?

Whereupon Mr. Speaker said:

> This question of national significance should be placed on the order paper.

I fully understand that Mr. Speaker could not be expected to appreciate fully that this matter was of urgent and great concern to these 150,000 people in southeastern British Columbia. It has been of great concern to many organizations and the people I have mentioned for over five years because of the possibility of loss of this service from 1962 on, —and in that connection I hope I keep in line with the rules, even though I wish to quote from a press release by a man known as H. W. Herridge, parliamentary leader of the New Democratic Party and member for Kootenay West. This is the press release:

> THE ABANDONMENT OF RAILWAY SERVICES MUST STOP
> The government of Canada gave the Canadian Pacific Railway millions of acres of land and billions of dollars worth of natural resources in exchange for the building of a railroad. It seems that the C.P.R. has now forgotten all about these fabulous grants it received for providing services to the public. The C.P.R. continues to enjoy and profit from full possession of land and resources granted long ago but insists that all present services must be directly related to present profits derived from these services. Hardly a week goes by without the C.P.R. doing its best to fire an agent, discontinue passenger service or abandon a branch line.
> Will this practice be carried on until the C.P.R. tries to abandon the transcontinental railway line while remaining in full possession of the right of way?

The C.P.R.'s current proposal to abandon passenger service on the Kettle Valley Railway will be vehemently opposed. It is bad enough already that the C.P.R., which is the majority stockholder in the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, should operate the Kettle Valley line basically for the convenience of its subsidiary. It will be far worse if the interests of the people of the Kootenays be ignored entirely. Should railway passenger service be abandoned, people will no longer be able to reach several areas. Alternative modes of passenger transportation just do not exist.

The Board of Transport Commissioners should refuse to authorize any further removal of agents, curtailment of services or abandonment of branch lines until a complete and co-ordinated national transportation policy has been worked out.

This, and this alone, can ensure efficiency for the railways, justice for their workers, convenience for our people, and progress for our communities.

I might say that later on all the municipalities between Lethbridge and Penticton protested the abandonment of this passenger service, all the chambers of commerce, all the unions in the area, the Canadian Legion branches, women's institutes, in fact everybody who could be mobilized to organize the protest before the Board of Transport Commissioners when it held hearings.

Now, Mr. Speaker, quite recently this matter arose again as the result of my bringing the question to the attention of the Minister of Transort during the debate on the transportation bill, and I received a letter from Mr. Guy Constable, of Creston, a very prominent Liberal in Kootenay East, who thoroughly endorsed my efforts. At the Kootenay-Boundary Chambers of Commerce meeting on March 10 he presented the following resolution:

Whereas passenger train service on what is known as Crowsnest-Kettle Valley Railway was discontinued in 1964 by reason of the ruling of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada under section 314(1) of the Railway Act, it having been represented by the Canadian Pacific Railway that the train service was uneconomic, and

Whereas under Bill No. C-231 passed by parliament January 24th 1967 being legislation to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada and to amend the Railway Act it is declared in clause No. 1 that an economic and efficient transportation service is essential to the well-being and growth of Canada, and

Whereas by the discontinuance of passenger train service as aforementioned 150,000 people in south-eastern British Columbia are deprived of service over this railway which runs from Vancouver to Medicine Hat, and alternative means of transportation are inadequate and unreliable and hazardous, especially during the winter months, and

Whereas the railway company has failed to develop and promote passenger train service, has been subsidized by grants of varying nature and by accounting methods separating freight and passenger receipts has represented to the Board of Transport Commissioners that passenger service is operated at a loss.

Now therefore be it resolved that representations be made to the Minister of Transport requiring the Canadian Pacific Railway to re-establish daily passenger train service between Vancouver and Medicine Hat via Crowsnest-Kettle Valley Railway with day coach and cafe sleeper car service, or in the alternative that the Canadian National Railways be granted running rights over this rail route.

This was the subject of a very interesting discussion at the annual meeting of the Kootenay-Boundary Chambers of Commerce. Later on I find the following in the Trail Times of March 10 ,1967:

Unanimous approval was given Monday to a resolution calling for restoration of the Dayliner service from Vancouver to Medicine Hat, Alta.

The resolution was the first approved at the annual meeting of Kootenay-Boundary Chambers of Commerce.

I am quoting briefly from this newspaper report.

Speaking to the motion, Mr. Constable said he had been in contact with Kootenay West M.P. Bert Herridge who had encouraged reinstatement of the service.

Mr. Herridge quoted the Minister of Transport as saying, "It is a very interesting suggestion and well worth consideration by the organizations concerned."

I could go on at great length about this, but I do urge the minister to give consideration to the wishes of the people in this area, and to a reconsideration of the Board of Transport Commissioners ruling which denied passenger service since 1964, so that we will be able to enjoy the passenger service which the people in this area are looking forward to in the future.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in replying on this subject I regret that I have to substitute for my parliamentary secretary, because this subject is one which would be a little closer to him geographically than it is to me. I do not regret, however, that I do not have the despotic powers which I am sure the hon. member really does not believe I have, but which he suggests I might have—

Mr. Herridge: Does the cabinet not have the power?

Mr. Pickersgill: —to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway or even the Canadian National Railways to institute a passenger service. I think the hon. gentleman has used this forum, as is very proper, to voice a grievance of his constituents. I will be glad to draw a copy of Hansard with these interesting newspaper quotations from several other important sources as well as himself to the attention of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I will also draw them to the attention of the Board of Transport Commissioners and in both cases suggest that they give them the kind of serious consideration the hon. gentleman requests.

IMMIGRATION—REPORTED DISCRIMINATION IN ADMISSION OF IMMIGRANTS FROM POLAND

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, the other day I rose to ask a question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) regarding a Polish applicant who wishes to remain in Canada, having arrived here on a visitor's visa. At that time Mr. Speaker ruled that the question should be discussed at another time. I presume he meant on the adjournment debate as it is called. The adjournment debate allows but seven minutes discussion on the part of the person asking the question and three minutes of reply on behalf of the cabinet.

I am raising this question in respect of an individual by the name of Joseph Gruszka. I knew that if I were to ask a member of the cabinet to explain the phrase "non-discriminatory selection policy" which appears in the white paper on Canadian immigration policy 1966 at page 38 no one would be able to explain the three words "non-discriminatory selection policy" since "non-discriminatory" cancels out "selection" and "selection" cancels out "non-discriminatory. So a policy of non-discriminatory selection when boiled down means no policy at all. I do not mind there being an immigration policy, for this country, but I do object to people referring to it in praiseworthy terms when it does not justify the adjectives applied to it. We have discrimination in this proposed immigration policy just as we had in the past. In view of that fact, it is beyond my comprehension why we should be given a white paper that says there is no discrimination.

We in this country have been wringing our hands in sorrow because of the statement we have a brain drain to other countries throughout the world. I have said on more than one occasion I do not believe the brain drain is operating against Canada, because we are attracting more brains to Canada than are leaving because of the attractions of other countries.

In the case of Joseph Gruszka we are picking the brains of Poland and evidently telling Poland that having picked its brains we do not want the children of the sixth member of the family although we have accepted five members of that family already. Let me advise the house that there is a family by the name of Kawa living right across the street from me in the city of Toronto. There are five members of this family, two brothers and three sisters. Three of them are Canadian citizens, the other two not having lived in Canada long enough to qualify for Canadian citizenship. I understand they intend to apply the moment they have met residence requirements.

A sixth member of the Kawa family remained in Poland. Unfortunately he passed away in Poland, leaving a married daughter, the wife of Joseph Gruszka. He came to Canada last fall to visit his five uncles and aunts, whom we gladly accepted into this country. We show our non-discriminatory selection process by selecting these five members of the Kawa family to live in this country but when the son-in-law of the sixth member of that family, the man who died in Poland, endeavours to join his five uncles and aunts, he is told to get out of the country, and get out fast.

Not only was Mr. Gruszka instructed by the immigration office in Toronto to leave Canada, but the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) wrote a letter dated February 28 stating that Mr. Gruszka does not meet our requirements. It is very odd to me that five members of the Kawa family, now living in Toronto, met the immigration requirements, yet this sixth member is told that he cannot meet the requirements. We certainly picked the brains of Poland to the benefit of Canada in this regard and I hope we will stop wringing our hands about the unfair treatment we are receiving as a result of people from Canada emigrating to other countries. We are going out of our way to encourage the best people from other lands to come to Canada. Why do we say to the children of the sixth member of this Kawa family that they are not fit to be with us?

The recent white paper on immigration was flashed before the Liberal party by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and we were supposed to cheer and support it in every way. Apparently these white papers come down from heaven. This white paper includes several references to restrictions, selections, and non-discrimination. However, in the letter dated February 28 from the minister to myself he states in the first page:

> If nothing were done, the whole process of preselection of suitable and desirable immigrants would be disrupted.

How can we have pre-selection with non-discrimination as stated at page 38 of the white paper on immigration, which I have in my hand? Rather than ordering these people out of the country and stating that we have no discrimination, let us be fair and say that if the five uncles and aunts are acceptable, the children of the sixth member of the family are equally acceptable. I outlined in another place the kind of people who live on the street where I live. I have a vice president of an insurance company living alongside of me. We also have living on our street the general manager and vice president of a Canadian branch of an American concern. Next to him lives the owner of one of the biggest tea houses in Canada. Next to him lives a Canadian who owns two or three hotels and next to him lives the widow of the president of one of the great express companies of Canada, and next door lives a doctor. Right across the road from us live these Kawa immigrants.

Does that look as though Mr. Kawa could not look after his nephew, aged 28, who is over here; because if he can afford to move into the territory I have just named, he must be doing all right in this country of his adoption. This white paper talks about the fine people that we are bringing into Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, of course when the white paper claims that these non-discriminatory selection criteria are used it is in effect stating that the selection criteria being used will be the same with respect to proposed immigrants from all countries. There have been selection criteria based on part 31 of the regulations which have favoured one country over another in bringing immigrants into this country, as the hon. member well knows. It is the hope under the white paper that this type of discrimination in the application of selection criteria will be removed; that is why the term "non-discriminatory selection criteria" is used in the white paper.

Mr. Cowan: The term is contradictory.

Mr. Munro: It is not contradictory, if the hon. member would just listen to the explanation. It is based on the determination of the white paper to remove discrimination as between different countries, which has not been the situation heretofore.

Getting back to the question of Mr. Gruszka, he came to Canada as a visitor. I would advise the hon. member that my information is that his relatives indicated an interest in bringing him here as a visitor. He came here as a visitor, he was admitted in good faith as a visitor last November, and his wife and children are still in Poland. He then made application for landing, to stay here permanently, and it was refused. The minister has received representations, no doubt including those of the hon. member, and is giving consideration to them at the present time.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS—LOUISBOURG FORTRESS—RETURN TO WORK OF MEN LAID OFF

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I had occasion to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) whether the government had changed their attitude in respect of the policy of the development of Fortress Louisbourg. First of all I wish to convey my thanks to the minister for making himself available at this late hour, taking upon himself the responsibility of dealing with this matter and not delegating it to an assistant. I have chosen to make my representation at this time mainly because in order to have arrived at what might have been considered a satisfactory or more detailed answer would have required a number of supplementary questions being asked in the house this afternoon, and that of course would not have been too desirable at that time.

With respect to the development of Fortress Louisbourg, I need not impress upon the minister, because he is well aware of it, that this is a very worth while and necessary project in Cape Breton at this time because of the very acute unemployment situation there. It would probably be well to review some of the developments in respect of this project. Again, I am only repeating something about which the minister is probably well aware. Some time ago there was an intended lay-off at Louisbourg, and when this was brought to the minister's attention he was kind enough to make arrangements which meant that the lay-off did not take place.

Last November, I think it was, a similar lay-off was proposed. At that time an indication, whether official or not, was given that no money was available under the winter works program. Therefore this lay-off was the result. We made representations to the minister which clearly indicated that the only change in the financing of the winter works program was the doing away with the $500 winter home building bonus. This was admitted by the minister of manpower and the Minister of Labour. This fact having been brought to the attention of the minister the proposed lay-off last November was cancelled.

The answer that I received to my question this afternoon was this. I asked whether there had been any change in attitude toward this development—I do not know whether I am using the exact wording but the import of the question was the same—and the minister replied that he was not aware of any policy change in respect of the development of Fortress Louisbourg. If there had been a policy change the minister, of course, would be the first to know, in that this project comes under his administration. I accept the answer he gave this afternoon, even with the rider "not that I am aware of".

In case I am wrong, I should now like to impress upon the minister the great need for this government to do whatever it can to maintain the present employment situation in Cape Breton. I should not ask the government to maintain it as it is; I mean at least to keep it from sliding further back. To maintain it would hardly be the appropriate phrase to use, because I should like to see the government make an effort very much to improve the situation.

An opportunity to improve the employment situation there is very much presented by this development. The minister is well aware of what it means to the tourist trade in the area, and I impress upon the minister the need to consider the welfare of the people who have been working there, some of whom were laid off the past Friday, after having worked the project four to five years.

If there has been no change in the government's plans for this development, I see no reason why men who have been employed on this project for this length of time should now be given notice that their jobs are no longer available and that their service is no longer required. I would once again ask the minister to review this situation. If he is able to take the same action that he took on two previous occasions when lay-offs were proposed, I would thank him very much for it. I am also sure there would be expressions of appreciation from all the people involved in the lay-off, which I understand affects more than 40 workers. I would ask the minister to give every consideration to maintaining their status on the Louisbourg project.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has dealt with this matter of the building of the Louisbourg Fortress. I think it is important that we go into a little bit of history.

This project was advised a number of years ago by the Rand commission which investigated the coal situation on the island at that time. They suggested that the surplus labour there should be used on something constructive, and it was suggested that we should rebuild old Fortress Louisbourg. It was thought at that time that we should probably expend as much as $12 million to make it a gigantic tourist attraction, which I think it will become. So far we have expended about $5.5 million.

The hon. member asked whether there have been any changes. There have been changes since I took over the department. When I came to my department I found that those men were being paid $1.09 an hour, and I said that in my view a man could not be employed in these days at $1.09 an hour and produce anything. Since that time we have increased the wages by more than 50 per cent, and today I think we are getting more work out of these men.

However, I have the responsibility of creating something there. I do not want people digging around the place interminably, for a generation. We want to raise something above the ground which will be an attraction to people. The building that has been completed is a very fine one. We have for two or three years been keeping men throughout the wintertime, endeavouring to work outside in a climate which I am sure my hon. friend will admit is not one which men would ordinarily encounter. This last year, in response to representations made by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), we once again took on 44 men. This was not an official winter works program, but it was a works program within our own department to keep these men occupied during the wintertime.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am quite certain that a number of these men would have been drawing social assistance if they were not going to work. Weather conditions there are such in the wintertime that not a great deal of work can be done. We have exhausted the money. We exhausted it on March 31, and we have laid off the 44 men. They have been told that when we get to work again in the summertime,—and it is the summertime when we can get the greatest return from the men, because it is easier to work then—they will be taken on again as rapidly as possible. These 44 men will be given first call, except the odd one to whom we have indicated we are not going to be bound to take back.

There are a few of them we do not want back because we want work done there. We will be taking them back as soon as we can, probably in the month of May. The work is progressing fairly well. We are keeping relatively within our costs, but I want to have something produced. When completed, this will be an attraction for visitors, but until it is completed it is not going to be an attraction for visitors.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

APPENDIX

ANSWER TO QUESTION RESPECTING WATER EXPORT TO U.S.

Question No. 2,535—Mr. Irvine:

1. What is the present attitude of the government concerning the export of Canada's water resources to the United States?

2. Does Canada have a defined program for the assessment of present and potential water resources and, if so, what is that program in detail?

3. Has the government conducted studies to determine Canada's future water needs and the possibility of exportation of water to the United States and, if so (a) when and by whom (b) what were the terms of reference?

4. Has the government received from the government of the United States any invitation to discuss generally the long-term question of water export?

5. Does the government recognize a federal responsibility for conservation of water resources, and is there a national plan of conservation (conservation including control systems and pollution abatement measures)?

6. Is the government holding, or has it held conferences with provincial governments in connection with water resources and, if so (a) when (b) what were the results of such conferences?

7. What is the mechanism for acting upon recommendations of the international joint commission that apply to Canadian or partly Canadian water resources?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Energy, Mines and Resources and External Affairs as follows:

1. The present attitude of the government with respect to water export was discussed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in the House of Commons June 28, 1966 (Hansard, page 6997). In brief he pointed out that the question has not arisen in any concrete form, because there is at present no buyer and no seller. For our internal water management needs and to obtain knowledge which may be used to advise on export questions which may arise in the future, the government of Canada has undertaken and is undertaking, directly and in co-operation with the provinces, a large number of programs designed to increase knowledge of the water resources of Canada and to determine alternative means of developing these resources to meet present and future requirements for all purposes in the different basins and regions of Canada. The government proposes to strengthen and accelerate these programs as rapidly as resources permit and necessary arrangements with the provinces concerned can be made.

As a result of existing survey, mapping, resource inventory, planning and research programs, there is now a considerable body of information concerning the quantity, quality and potential for development of water resources in various river basins in Canada. Coverage is not adequate in many areas, however, and a systematic and rapid extension of resource inventory, comprehensive basin planning, water quality surveys, research and other programs is underway or proposed.

Information respecting existing water uses and future requirements for all purposes in the different basins and regions of Canada is, at present, quite inadequate for purposes of planning and policy formulation. This information is available for those basins in which joint federal-provincial planning studies have been undertaken and in certain other areas. Programs to develop a national inventory of water uses, to assess future water requirements, and, more generally, to study the growing economic implications of water development must be significantly and rapidly increased in co-operation with the provinces. Programs in these and related fields are under active consideration by government officials and discussions are being initiated with the provinces.

Investigation and studies undertaken through the above and other programs should enable the government of Canada and the provinces to determine the probable future requirements for water in the different basins and regions of Canada; the available supply of water to meet these requirements; and alternative plans and programs for development. These investigations will also indicate whether there is, or may be a surplus in any region available for export. The governments of Canada and of the provinces concerned will require this and other information to establish jointly a position on export if and when the government of the United States indicates that it might wish to consider the possible importation of water from Canada. This work is being undertaken by the newly established Water Sector of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, in co-operation with the provinces.

2. Canada has a large program for the assessment of present and potential water resources. This program concerns measurement and assessment of the quantity, distribution and quality of waters throughout the country.

(i) Streamflow Measurement: The first streamflow measurement in Canada by the federal government was made in 1894. An organized program was initiated in 1908, has grown in size since and is being considerably expanded at the present time.

Approximately 2,300 streamflow and water level gauging stations are now maintained in Canada to provide records of water level and flow of many of the nation's lakes and rivers. Of this total some 2,000 are maintained by the federal government and 300 by the province of Quebec, which operates its own survey for this purpose.

The federal government plans to instal 200 additional gauging stations during fiscal year 1967-68 to increase its network coverage.

The capital cost of establishing gauging stations specifically requested by a province is shared by that province. The provinces also contribute to the operating costs of these stations. The federal government pays all of the costs for those stations it requires, and maintains the necessary national organization to implement the survey program. Other co-operating agencies share in the costs of the stations they request.

Surveys of suspended sediment are made of many rivers under observation that carry a significant concentration of solids and where the solids are likely to create problems in water management and use.

(ii) Chemical Water Quality Network: A chemical water quality network is being established by the federal government throughout the country with provincial co-operation, and is expected to increase to about 250 stations during 1967. Chemical quality studies lead to assessment of the hardness, physical characteristics, colour, potability and methods of treatment for municipal and industrial use. During the past 20 years reconnaissance assessments have been made of the chemical water quality of many of Canada's river drainage basins. This program is now being intensified and extended.

(iii) Groundwater: Studies of groundwater resources are being expanded through establishing a national observation well network in co-operation with the provinces. Assessment of the reserve in aquifers, the replenishment or recharge of groundwater, the potential yield rates and an understanding of hydrogeological features are all included in this program.

(iv) Glaciology: A glaciological program includes the measurement of mass balance, that is the increase or decrease of the reserves of glacial ice due to climatic variation. Five glaciers in British Columbia and Alberta, selected as indicative of various climatic conditions, are under critical observation during the ten year period 1965-1974. Glaciers are a significant source of supply of water to certain streams in the Western mountain region.

In addition to these largely federal programs considerable information on water resources is gathered continually by provinces.

3. (a) See answer to Question 1 above re studies respecting export.

(b) No comprehensive nationwide studies have been conducted on Canada's future water needs. The government of Canada directly, and in co-operation with the provinces has conducted a number of studies which have included some assessment of future water requirements within certain river basins, these included—the Fraser river study, the Columbia river studies, the Lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba study, and the Ottawa river engineering board study. Reports on these have been tabled in the House.

Other studies of smaller basins have been made on behalf of the International Joint Commission.

Some of the provinces maintain a continuing inventory of water use through the application of water licensing procedures, but an inventory for all Canada has not been maintained. The federal and Ontario governments, through a co-operative arrangement, are conducting studies of northern Ontario waters. One phase of these studies relates to present and possible future uses of these waters. The water resources branch publishes annually "Electric Power in Canada" which contains an inventory of developed and known hydro power sites in Canada.

In addition the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is initiating discussions with provinces on the most efficient methods of conducting a comprehensive Canada water inventory of present use and future needs. An inventory of existing uses will be required before adequate consideration could be given to the determination of Canada's future water needs.

4. There has been no request by the government of the United States to the government of Canada to discuss the export of water from Canada to the United States.

The question of export has arisen at this time mainly because of private initiatives in the United States and Canada. The NAWAPA, Grand Canal and other suggested schemes diverting water to the United States are all private engineering concepts based on the, as yet, unestablished assumptions: that there is an economic demand for Canadian water in the United States; that Canada has a surplus, over and above its own future requirements, with which it might supply this demand, or a part of it; and that it would be in Canada's national interest to export water to the United States.

5. The primary responsibility for the administration and conservation of water resources within provincial boundaries in Canada lies with the provinces. Nevertheless, the federal government recognizes responsibilities for conservation and planning because of the interprovincial and international character of many water courses, because of its constitutional responsibility for certain water uses and the strong national interest in the wise development and use of water resources.

Federal responsibility in conservation is recognized through legislation which permits federal-provincial participation in water dvelopment studies and research and in the construction of water development projects. This legislation includes the Canada Water Conservation Assistance Act, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, and the Atlantic Development Board Act. The federal government has also provided numerous water conservation reservoirs in connection with its responsibility for navigation.

In addition, federal representatives participate in the activities of a large number of international and federal-provincial boards which have been appointed from time to time to investigate and plan the development of various rivers. The national policy which has evolved provides for federal participation with the provinces in investigations to inventory water resources, to identify development possibilities, and to study the feasibility of water conservation works which would form part of an over-all development program. Studies of this type have been undertaken by the federal-provincial Fraser river board, lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba board, Ottawa river engineering board, Saint John river board, and the co-ordinating committee on northern Ontario water resources studies. On international waters or waters which cross the international boundary, the federal government conducts national studies and provides data and personnel for the engineering studies of the International Joint Commission.

To stimulate pollution abatement, the federal government provides financial assistance through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to municipalities for sewage treatment facilities. This is supplemented in the Atlantic provinces by the program of the Atlantic development board. In addition, the tax relief offered to industry for accelerated depreciation of pollution abatement works provides a positive stimulus for pollution control. A number of federal departments and agencies, including Energy, Mines and Resources, National Health and Welfare, Fisheries, conduct research on water quality and pollution. Their work is being quickly expanded under the co-ordination of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. That department is also building a major research centre at Burlington, Hamilton harbour, for research into pollution and other water problems, particularly in the Great Lakes.

Clearly, a national plan must be built of many component federal, provincial and regional plans and programs encompassing all water uses. Such plans in Canada can be evolved only through continuing joint programs of the federal and provincial governments. We are proposing extension of comprehensive water development studies and the implementation of resultant programs under the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources as rapidly as financial and manpower resources and federal-provincial agreement will permit.

6. Yes. There have been a continual series of conferences with provinces to negotiate such joint programs as the Saskatchewan-Nelson basin study; the Nelson river power study; the Northern Ontario water study; the Bay of Funday tidal power study; the Atlantic provinces water resources study; and many others.

At practically all meetings of the Canadian council of resource ministers since 1962, water matters have been discussed. More recently in the last year, the Canadian council of resource ministers has discussed the pollution conference, the water for peace conference and the proposed seminar on water to be sponsored by the Canadian council of resource ministers. Of course, ARDA, PFRA and other federal agencies concerned with certain aspects of water matters also hold such meetings. However, no formal federal-provincial water conferences with all ministers, both federal and provincial concerned, have been held.

7. Under the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, the I.J.C. exercises both semi-judicial and advisory functions. In the former capacity the commission, under Articles 3 and 4 of the treaty, passes on applications affecting the level or flow of boundary waters or waters flowing across the boundary. In the latter capacity the commission, under Article 9, examines and reports on questions arising along the common frontier referred to it from time to time by the governments of Canada and the U.S. The commission reports to the Canadian and the U.S. governments upon the facts and circumstances of any question so referred, together with such conclusions and recommendations as may be appropriate. The Canadian government considers the commission's report and discusses it with the authorities who would be involved in implementation of the recommendations in Canada. After studying the commission's report and recommendations, the Canadian and U.S. governments consult to reach agreement as to the action which should be taken on the recommendations. If the Canadian government accepts the recommendations it assumes responsibility for the necessary implementing action to be taken in Canada.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 4, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

VACANCIES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received from the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Favreau) and the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) written declarations of their intentions to resign their seats in the House of Commons.

Pursuant to section 6 of the House of Commons Act, chapter 143 of the Revised Statutes, 1952, I have directed my warrants to the Chief Electoral Officer for an issue of writs for election of new members for the said electoral districts.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FURTHER REFERENCE TO SPEECH BY CHIEF OF DEFENCE STAFF

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise to make a personal explanation. Yesterday the hon. member for Calgary North raised a question in respect of an alleged statement made by General Allard. He objected to the report attributed to the general criticizing opposition members' motivation in opposing the unification bill. I think it is now clear to all hon. members of the house that General Allard made no such charge. The report which served as the basis for the question raised by the hon. member for Calgary North was an error in translation by the Canadian Press wire service.

In my reply I stated, as recorded at page 14414 of Hansard:

> I did not know of the speech but I have complete confidence in the chief of the defence staff and he is at complete liberty to express himself publicly as he sees fit.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is not.

Mr. Hellyer: I should have added, of course, that I meant within the general's responsibility as chief of the defence staff. If I had risen again on the subject I would have added this clarification and in addition would have suggested that I would prefer to take the question as notice until I had an opportunity to determine just exactly what the general had said.

I accept the responsibility for the impression that might quite properly be taken from my words. As I indicated, however, I have complete confidence in the general, and consequently he is not obliged to clear his public speeches with me or the associate minister. At the same time I regret very much the harsh words that were spoken in the House of Commons yesterday, because I am sure no member of this house would want to reflect unfairly on the chief of the defence staff, a very gallant and distinguished public servant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, on this same question of privilege I, of course, regret that the Canadian Press dispatch in regard to the statements made by General Allard was incorrect. However, I now have a copy of yesterday's La Presse which gives a different version of what General Allard said, and which has not been denied as being incorrect. I shall not read the report in French. I shall give a translation of it which I have secured.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: Some hon. members laugh, so I will read the French and then we will get the translation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: It reads:

[Translation]

> This week end General Jean V. Allard commander in chief of the Canadian army has asked himself if certain members of the opposition, "these former ministers", really tell the truth and what they really think when they oppose the unification of the Canadian armed forces.

• (2:40 p.m.)

[English]

The translation which I will give is:

> This week end General Jean V. Allard commander in chief of the Canadian army has asked himself if certain members of the opposition, "these former ministers", really tell the truth and what they really think when they oppose the unification of the Canadian armed forces.

This is not as flagrant as the report we had yesterday, but I submit that in principle it is basically exactly the same sort of thing complained about; that is, an officer of the armed forces, particularly the commander in chief of the armed forces, impugning the motives of members of parliament in respect of the stands they take in this house. Although as I say the statements are not as flagrant as those reported yesterday, the basic principle is the same and I think this is a practice which must be brought to an end.

Yesterday I asked the Acting Prime Minister to take steps. I am glad the Prime Minister is now back and I would ask that he take steps to see that officers in the armed forces do not make statements of this nature which seriously impugn the motives of members of this house, and particularly members of the Privy Council who are ex-ministers.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, also on the question of privilege, I should like to say that I think this statement which has been read out is worse than the one read yesterday. This statement contains a speculation as to whether we are speaking the truth. It is all right for members of the House of Commons to make remarks of that nature, because other members can immediately reply to them and they can be either withdrawn or substantiated. In this particular instance General Allard must substantiate his statement, prepare another apology or provide some explanation as to misquotation. This statement which now appears in the language which he apparently used in the course of his address is one which I consider to be worse than the statement which appeared in the press yesterday.

I hope the Minister of National Defence, with regard to General Allard will exercise the right he has in respect of any officer in the forces and the right that he intended to exercise against Admiral Landymore, whom he accused of making statements which he was not authorized to make. Why must there be a special protection for General Allard? Admiral Landymore was threatened with court martial proceedings. I think it is quite contrary to the custom and practice within the services for the minister to get up and say that General Allard is entitled to make any statement he wishes. Let the minister or the Prime Minister take some action to discipline a person who makes these attacks on members of this House of Commons and makes accusations that they are not telling the truth. This, sir, is what I object to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Harkness.]

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF HON. ROLAND MICHENER

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to announce that Her Majesty the Queen has approved my recommendation that Honourable Roland Michener be appointed as Governor General of Canada.

Mr. Michener needs no commendation to this house. We remember well his distinguished service as our respected and esteemed Speaker from 1957 to 1962. He was born in Lacombe, Alberta, the son of Senator and Mrs. Edward Michener. He graduated from the University of Alberta in 1920 and proceeded as a Rhodes scholar to Oxford University, where he studied law and obtained the B.A. and B.C.L. degrees. He was called to the bar of England in 1923 and to the Ontario bar in 1924.

Mr. Michener's whole life has been one of public service and in many capacities; in the R.A.F. during the first world war; as a member of the Ontario legislature; as secretary of that province; as a member of this house, and its esteemed and respected Speaker, and as high commissioner for Canada to India and ambassador to Nepal. His dedication to and interest in public service are shared by his wife, who will be of great and experienced assistance to her husband in carrying out his new duties.

The government has been deeply aware of the responsibility placed upon it in recommending to the Queen as her personal representative in Canada a successor to the late and beloved General Vanier, whose services to Canada will never be forgotten and whose passing we lament so much.

The position of governor general has been filled with great distinction during the 100 years of our history by 19 outstanding men, each of whom brought to the office some special quality and all of whom served Canada well. The standards that have been set in the past have been magnificently maintained by the last two Canadian governors general.

We will all, I know, be particularly appreciative of the willingness of Mr. and Mrs. Michener to assume such onerous responsibilities on short notice, in the full knowledge that in the next few months they will be faced with an extremely heavy program of duties in relation to our centennial celebrations.

I am sure the parliament and people of Canada will join me in extending to the new Governor General warmest wishes for success and happiness in the high office to which he is being called.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the appointment has not been unexpected. For the past four months it has been very clear from press references that Mr. Michener would be appointed. The appointment will receive widespread approval.

The Prime Minister has referred to the services of successive governors general. At no time in our history has the position of governor general been of more importance than it will in the next few years. Few realize the importance of the office. Many regard it as a sinecure consisting largely of ceremonial duties without constitutional significance. That view, widely held, is not based on experience.

During the time when I was prime minister there were two governors general, Right Hon. Vincent Massey and Right Hon. Georges P. Vanier. During the terms of both in respect for the traditional role of the governor general they were fully consulted as the representative of the Queen has a right to be. He also has the duty to give an opinion to the Prime Minister with regard to those things he believes necessary for Canada.

There are too many who hold the view that the position is obsolete or about to become out of date. Certain press references recently have suggested that Mr. Michener may well be the last governor general of Canada. Believing as I do in the monarchical system of parliamentary government, I see Canada in the second century preserving the form of government we have today.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Indeed, the governor general not only is the representative of the crown but the symbol of the crown in parliament. He is the linch pin of our whole system of British parliamentary democracy. Beyond his constitutional responsibilities the governor general can wield an immense power and influence for national good and unity, as a rallying point for all Canadians. He can be a stabilizing influence in times of ferment and discord within our country.

When I say these things I am simply outlining the manner in which the late General Georges P. Vanier carried out his duties. I did not have an opportunity of saying this at the time of his passing, and I may be pardoned now for the observation I am about to make, that he in his person did more than anyone living to bring about a new concept of unity within our nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was a measure of his dedication. The Prime Minister referred to the fact that when a country can mobilize people like this to serve, it is well for democracy. I recall so well the circumstances under which General Vanier was approached by me at the University of Montreal during the course of a visit to that city. It was only after earnest solicitation that he accepted the post.

To the new Governor General and his wife I wish the continuation of those high standards set by Right Hon. Georges P. Vanier and Right Hon. Vincent Massey.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there will be general approval of the appointment by Her Majesty of Mr. Roland Michener as the new Governor General of Canada. The Prime Minister is to be congratulated on having made this recommendation. This will be a very arduous year for a governor general in view of the heavy program that has been outlined. I have not any doubt at all that Mr. and Mrs. Michener will bring to their high office the dignity and friendliness which are so essential if they are to discharge their duties acceptably.

I think there is much to be said for having a head of state who is outside of and beyond partisan politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: I believe that has been the value of having a governor general and a personal representative of the crown as the head of state in Canada. We have been singularly fortunate in Canada in the governors general we have had over the years, certainly in my lifetime, but I think we can be pardoned for saying that we are especially proud of the Canadians who have occupied that high office. In Mr. Vincent Massey, an English speaking Canadian, and Georges P. Vanier, a French speaking Canadian, we have had two of the finest and most distinguished men to hold this office.

While Mr. Roland Michener follows a most outstanding succession, I have no doubt at all that with his record in the past of getting along with people he will also bring lustre to the office to which he is to be appointed.

Changes in Cabinet

I am sure members of all parties in the house will want to say that in so far as we as members of parliament are concerned, we will do everything we can to make his task easier and to make his occupancy of that office an outstanding success.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the appointment of Hon. Roland Michener to the high office of Governor General of Canada does not surprise anyone as his name has been mentioned repeatedly of late.

I do not have the pleasure of knowing Mr. Michener personally but I heard many speak very highly of him. When he was politically active although I may not have shared his views, Mr. Michener has always been considered impartial, and as a Canadian who wanted above all else harmony in this land. His appointment to the high office of Governor General of Canada will doubtless please the whole nation.

Mr. Speaker, there will be some in certain areas of the country, and more particularly in the province of Quebec, who will naturally claim that this appointment constitutes a vestige of colonialism. I do not share that view in the least.

If we consider what the late General Vanier meant for the whole of Canada, we have to recognize that a governor general may fulfil a most important role in the whole of Canada since he is above partisan politics, above the political parties, the Governor General may—as the new incumbent will—consider the various elements which make up this country and try to hold the pieces together. From that viewpoint, the governor general does not constitute a trace of colonialism but a symbol of unity and understanding, in one word, the symbol of co-operation and respect by the various elements that make up our Canadian nation.

With all my heart, I wish the Governor General and Mrs. Michener long life. I wish them also every happiness in the discharge of their functions which will enable every Canadian to admire them and witness all the good they are in a position to accomplish for the future of the country and the elements that constitute Canada.

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, we join with others in welcoming the announcement just made by the Prime Minister. Canada has been blessed with a succession of able and distinguished governors general, and following the death of the late General Georges P. Vanier, Canadians have wondered who would be chosen to fill this very important position. Among those suggested as possible successors was Hon. Roland Michener, Canadian high commissioner to India and former Speaker of this house.

Mr. Michener is remembered, I am sure, for his kindliness, his impartiality and his sense of justice. He served with distinction in the office to which he was elected by this house. His service as high commissioner to India has been characterized by a quiet and effective discharge of his responsibilities as the representative of Canada in that country. Now as Hon. Mr. Michener becomes Governor General I am sure Canadians will extend to him and to Mrs. Michener the same pledge of loyalty and affection they have always given to those who have served as the personal representatives of Her Majesty the Queen of Canada.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) wants to rise on the same subject he can only do so with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I regret very much that there is not unanimity.

THE MINISTRY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGES IN CABINET

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce certain changes in the administration. His Excellency the Administrator has accepted the resignation of Lucien Cardin as Minister of Justice and Attorney General, and the resignation of Hon. Guy Favreau as President of the Privy Council and Registrar General of Canada.

To these old and true friends I should like to express my deep gratitude for their unselfish and devoted service to the country through their service to the government since it was formed in April, 1963. Mr. Cardin served as associate minister of national defence and as minister of justice. Mr. Favreau served as minister of citizenship and immigration, as minister of justice, as president of the privy council and as house leader. On his retirement from the cabinet Mr. Favreau has been appointed a puisne judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec. I have benefited greatly from their wise counsel, and I greatly value their friendship. To both I should like to express my sincere thanks and warmest good wishes for the future.

On my recommendation the Administrator has agreed to the appointment of Hon. Walter Gordon as President of the Privy Council, and Hon. John Turner as Registrar General of Canada. His Excellency has agreed to the appointment of two members of this house as privy councillors and members of the cabinet; the hon. member for Saint-Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien), who has been parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, and the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau), who has served as my parliamentary secretary. The hon. member for Mount Royal will assume the office of Minister of Justice and Attorney General, and the hon. member for Saint-Maurice-Laflèche will serve as a member of the administration without portfolio.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ROUMANIA—EXCHANGE OF NOTES RESPECTING DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wish to table an exchange of notes between the government of Canada and the government of the Socialist Republic of Roumania concerning the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two governments.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONFERENCE ON FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS AND SECURITIES LEGISLATION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the house is aware the Prime Minister undertook in response to a suggestion by Hon. Daniel Johnson to arrange, if other provinces were in agreement, for a preliminary conference of the ministers concerned to plan and initiate preparations for a federal-provincial conference on the whole question of financial institutions and securities legislation. The exchange of correspondence between the Prime Minister and Hon. Daniel Johnson on this subject was tabled in the house on February 13.

While it has not been easy to arrange a date which is suitable to all concerned, I expect that April 10 will be acceptable for the preliminary meeting of ministers in Ottawa, to be followed the next day by a federal-provincial meeting of officials. The purpose of these initial meetings is to identify, consider in a preliminary way, and initiate preparatory work for a future federal-provincial conference regarding financial institutions and securities and the various measures that could be taken by both levels of government to solve problems in these fields. The Canadian government will be represented by the Registrar General, the new Minister without Portfolio and myself.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): In so far as the announcement concerning this conference of provincial ministers of finance is concerned, of course it was forecast during the debate on the deposit insurance legislation. This debate indicated that at one time there was somehow what would appear to be an unfortunate lack of liaison with regard to this question of deposit insurance, as well as something which has been advocated in many quarters of the house, uniform securities legislation to protect the Canadian public from certain unsavory practices that have cropped up in the handling of securities in this country.

I hope this will be a fruitful conference, and one in which the undoubted authority of the federal government will be established once and for all without bringing into the field of banking any extension of the power of veto which has been unfortunately introduced as a result of certain provisions of the deposit insurance legislation act. We will hope, as soon as possible, to have a meaningful report from the ministers concerned. We hope discussions can be held by the minister and his associates in the cabinet with the house committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, because we are vitally interested in establishing this position thereby putting the regulation of our financial institutions on a proper basis. In so saying I do not believe our financial institutions are to be necessarily better if they are to be surrounded by a multitude of regulations.

Labour Relations

FINANCE

TABLING OF TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON COTTON YARNS AND ROVINGS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have tabled today copies in English and in French of a report by the Tariff Board on reference 135, relating to cotton yarns and rovings for use in the manufacture of certain products including cotton sewing thread. I have tabled also a transcript of the evidence before the board at its public hearings.

I assure the house that the board's recommendations will be considered carefully by the government. Interested parties who wish to comment on this report should do so as soon as possible.

AIR CANADA

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT AND BUDGET TO HOUSE COMMITTEE

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if I could have the leave of the house I should like to move a certain motion.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to make this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill moved:

That the capital budget of Air Canada for the year ending December 31, 1967, tabled March 3, 1967, the annual report of Air Canada for 1966 and the annual report to parliament for 1966 in respect of Air Canada, both tabled on March 7, 1967, be referred to the standing committee on transport and communications.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR RELATIONS

PACIFIC COAST LONGSHOREMEN DISPUTE—TABLING OF REPORT OF COMMISSIONER

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, members of the house will recall that following the resumption, in December last, of work on the ships and docks in west coast ports and as one of the agreed terms leading to the return to work, I appointed Mr. Justice C. Rhodes Smith of the court of appeal of Manitoba an industrial inquiry commission under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to inquire into the work stoppage and make recommendations for the avoidance of similar situations. The commission has now reported.

I should like to ask permission of the house to table the commission's report today in English. French copies will be available when the translation now under way is completed. The report is very lengthy, running to well over 100 pages, and this accounts for the fact that the French translation is not yet available. The commission conducted an intensive investigation into the causes of the dispute. I do not intend to comment on the findings and recommendations, but I do commend them for earnest consideration by the parties and all those who have the welfare of Vancouver and our other western Canadian ports at heart.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I should like, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government to express sincere thanks to Mr. Justice Smith for his work, and to pay tribute to his work in this very difficult situation. I would also thank and express appreciation for the work of the two assessors, who were appointed to assist him, Captain H. J. C. Terry of Vancouver, and Mr. Joseph Morris of Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the report to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR JUDGMENTS IN BOTH LANGUAGES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-286, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that all judgments of the Supreme Court are written in English only, the purpose of the bill is to request the Supreme Court to present its judgments in French, in exactly the same way as it does in English.

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION PROPOSED BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister if he would advise the house of the nature of the reply given to Mr. Justice Landreville's request for an opportunity to present his case before the House of Commons. This was done in the United Kingdom in 1828. Is the Prime Minister going to give the judge this opportunity? When will the government bring in the measure which will bring this situation to termination?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I read the letter from Justice Landreville to which my right hon. friend refers I acknowledged it at once, and then referred it to the legal advisers to the crown for an opinion on the request that had been made. I received that opinion this morning. I will be studying it with my colleagues, and I hope to be able to make a statement as soon as that study is completed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the Prime Minister giving consideration to the suggestion of Mr. Justice Landreville?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am studying the reply of the Department of Justice to my request for information as to precedents and as to the proper course which should be followed in a matter of this kind. Until that study is completed I am unable to answer my right hon. friend's question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUEST BY UN SECRETARY GENERAL FOR CEASE FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he has had an opportunity to study the text of the proposal of Secretary General U Thant with respect to his declaration that there should be a unilateral cease fire by the United States in Viet Nam, under which United States forces would not fire unless fired upon. In view of the fact that the Secretary General has indicated that he may make a proposal for a specific date, or ask governments affiliated with the United Nations to make such a proposal, is Canada prepared to support this suggestion by the Secretary General?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we read with great interest the report of the Secretary General's statement, and we have been in touch with the Secretary General for clarification of that statement, which has certainly been ambiguously reported in certain quarters. As soon as we get that clarification we will be able to make a reply to the Secretary General.

His last proposal is apparently along the lines indicated by my hon. friend, that there should be a unilateral cease fire on the part of the United States. But there is apparently the exception which has been referred to, that this would not apply to returning fire that had been aimed at United States forces, and this might make for a very inadequate cease fire. This is the kind of clarification we are trying to obtain.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I would ask the Prime Minister whether he was correctly reported to the effect that the suggestion by U Thant, referred to by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, was unrealistic. Is that what he meant in the concluding words of the answer he has just given?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. The first report of the statement I saw was to the effect that without qualification or reservation of any kind there should be a unilateral cease fire on the part of United States forces. This seemed to me to be a cease fire on one side while the other side kept firing, not a very practicable suggestion. If there is a qualification to the effect that a cease fire should be maintained except against those forces that are continuing to fire, that is another matter and we are giving consideration to it.

Mr. Douglas: A further supplementary question. May I ask the Prime Minister, since he has looked at the text, whether that text does not include the words "only to fire if fired upon", and would that not answer the question that has been posed?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, it was not in the report that I saw initially. In any event I think those words should be clarified before a decision can be reached.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the tremendous urgency in this matter, and the danger of escalation, would the secretary of state discuss with the chairman of our committee on external affairs an early meeting of the committee, at which time the committee could go into this very urgent matter?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have already done that, Mr. Speaker, and I understand that the meeting is to be called on Tuesday next.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF REPRESENTATION IN PACIFIC AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Now that Canadian diplomatic representation in eastern Europe has been increased I should like to ask whether the government is giving consideration to increasing its representation in the Pacific region. I could name some of the countries where we are not represented, or where our representation is shared. This is a region where Canadian trade interests are of great and increasing importance. I am sure that Canadians, particularly in the western provinces, would like to know whether efforts will be made to increase our representation in that area.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a question of a very general nature; it does not appear to me to be of extreme urgency.

WEST GERMANY—REPORTED PROPOSAL TO REDUCE ALLIED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister advise the house whether Canada was apprised beforehand of the agreement apparently reached among the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and West Germany with regard to a serious reduction of forces in West Germany by both the United States and Britain? If so, what is the attitude of the Canadian government toward this agreement? Has Canada signified any intention to follow a similar course in the future?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I had discussions last week with representatives of the British government and of the United States government. There is no basis for that story. I am sure the discussions which are taking place between the governments of Germany and the United States and between the government of Britain and the other two governments will result in arrangements which will not warrant the conclusion the hon. member has drawn.

Mr. Lambert: This may be the interpretation the minister places on it, but it is certainly not the interpretation which is placed on it in other quarters.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not an interpretation.

Mr. Lambert: In any event I will ask the minister whether consideration is being given by the Canadian government to the withdrawal of dependants from Europe as has been done, in fact, by the United States.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker. And the answer to the preface to that question is that this is not an interpretation. I made a statement based upon information given by the governments concerned.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FURTHER REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS BY CHIEF OF DEFENCE STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he condones the statement attributed to General Allard by the newspaper La Presse, a statement which impugns the honesty and motives of certain privy councillors who are members of this chamber. If he does not condone those statements, what disciplinary action does the right hon. gentleman propose to take to ensure that there will be no recurrence of this sort of thing?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): One of the statements attributed to General Allard has already been corrected by the Canadian Press which was the origin of the original report, and I think I should be very careful about commenting on other statements attributed to him until there is an opportunity to test the accuracy of the reports of those statements also.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Agriculture. In the light of many representations made during the Easter recess by the O.F.A. and the O.F.U. on the subject of the hon. gentleman's recent dairy policy announcement, will the minister say whether he is now prepared to amend that policy?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): The policy as announced remains the policy. I have heard many comments on it, many of them favourable, I am pleased to inform the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You must have been out of Canada.

Mr. Greene: I am seeing representatives of the farm organizations with respect to this policy.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): When is the minister going to give complete details of the dairy policy for 1967-68?

Mr. Greene: I believe the statement made in the house speaks for itself. It is the entire statement, subject of course, to any action which the national dairy commission may take.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister soon be in a position to issue statements with the cheques which go out to individual farmers under the dairy policy?

Mr. Greene: I am hopeful that very shortly statements will be included on the stubs of the cheques to indicate to the farmers the nature of the payment and quantity of milk involved.

FINANCE

DRUGS—INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF SALES TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the commitment made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon) on April 26, 1965, when he was minister of finance, confirmed on March 29, 1966 by the present Minister of Finance, that a recommendation from the special committee on drug costs and prices for the removal of the sales tax from drugs would be followed by legislation to that effect, may I ask when we may expect this legislation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I have studied the report of the special committee on drugs. I have also reviewed the statement I made at the time of my main budget last year, and I can assure the hon. member that it would be the intention of the government to proceed to remove the sales tax on drugs as part of an over-all effort to reduce the price of drugs.

Mr. Knowles: May we expect such legislation in the present session?

Mr. Sharp: I cannot speak for the government. Certainly if it is possible to take meaningful action with respect to the general subject of the price of drugs I hope it will be possible to do something about the tax.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Is it the intention of the Minister of Finance and the government to remove the sales tax on building supplies at the same time?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

LOUISBOURG FORTRESS—RETURN TO WORK OF MEN LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Inasmuch as the government is keeping within its budget, will the minister reinstate the workers who have been laid off in connection with the Louisbourg project?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The hon. member and I had a conversation about this in the house last night after ten o'clock during which I think we said everything on this subject which was worthwhile. We shall reinstate these men as soon as they can do work outdoors.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): It is because of the statement made last night that I wish now, on a question of privilege, to draw the minister's attention to what he has said and give notice that I will raise this matter for further debate at ten o'clock. I refer the minister to his answer—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member state his question of privilege?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): My question of privilege involves the ambiguous answers we have received from ministers of this government and my endeavour to obtain satisfactory answers to questions I have directed to the hon. gentleman. I would draw the minister's attention in particular to the words he used as reported in Hansard at page 14471 in the first column, where he said the money had been exhausted. Just across the page, only a few hundred words later, he said "We are keeping relatively within our costs..." In view of conditions in Cape Breton at the present time and the answer the minister gave me yesterday in the house to the effect that there had been no change in policy, I ask this government whether on my representations, or on the representations of my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria or else on the representations of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, they will not do something for these men, and never mind this nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since the resignations within the Liberal party are weakening the government's position, is the Prime Minister considering calling a general election next June?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will be relieved to know that the answer is in the negative.

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in order to promote a spirit of national unity during our centennial year, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to reply officially and without delay to the statements made recently by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) concerning bilingualism in Canada?

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is intended for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he tell us whether it is true that the Liberal Women's Association is threatening to withdraw from the party if the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) keeps on making stupid and irresponsible statements with respect to French Canadians?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question contains allegations and is, therefore, out of order.

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

EXTENSION OF DISABILITY PENSION INCREASE TO DEPENDANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brantford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Would the minister advise the house whether consideration is being given to increasing the pension rate for dependants receiving veterans disability allowances?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I have answered similar questions on a number of occasions in the past. The entire matter is under study, as I have indicated, and in due course a statement will be made after conclusions have been reached.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR SUPPORT PRICE FOR NEW BRUNSWICK POTATOES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of great urgency for the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister able to inform the house as to the decision regarding the request for a price of $2.10 per barrel for surplus potatoes submitted on behalf of the potato growers of New Brunswick by the government of our province?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government's emergency program for the relief of the potato growers, whose plight was caused by excess production last year, was announced prior to the recess and provides for a percentage payment of 65 per cent of the ten year average price of potatoes, which does not amount to $2.10.

Mr. Flemming: As a supplementary question, is the recent request of the government of our province for a somewhat improved program receiving consideration?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, we have received such a request for an improved program and it is receiving consideration, but no change has been made to date in the program as announced.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): As a supplementary question, has the minister had a communication in the last day or so from either the government of Prince Edward Island or the legislature expressing their dissatisfaction with the program as announced previously by the minister?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I do not recall any specific communication from Prince Edward Island in this regard but I shall be glad to take notice of the hon. gentleman's question and check to see if there is such a communication.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ANTI-BALLISTIC MISSILE SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I understand that the seven nation nuclear planning group of NATO is meeting in Washington later this week and according to United States Secretary of Defence McNamara will be discussing the deployment of an anti-ballistic missile system. Will Canada be participating in these discussions with respect to the installation of such a system for North America?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the discussions will cover a wide range of problems affecting the alliance, including all aspects of the application of nuclear power and the effects of the use of such weapons systems. I imagine this will cover the whole alliance but not specifically the Canadian aspects. Any possible Canadian aspects would, I think, be discussed bilaterally between ourselves and the United States.

Mr. Brewin: As a supplementary question, would the minister be able on some appropriate occasion to make a statement on the policy of the government in regard to the installation in Canadian territory of such a system or part of such a system?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I have already given the hon. gentleman and I think all hon. members an assurance that there will be a discussion in the house on this subject before any plans are finalized that would involve Canada. I think this is a reasonable assurance because it is a very important area of development.

Frankly, I hope the negotiations between the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics will be successful and that they will agree mutually not to deploy these weapons systems. I think this would be a good place to end the arms race and put the money to more productive uses. However, in the event that this should not be possible and the negotiations become fruitless, we shall have to discuss the technical details carefully, and that would be the time for debate in the House of Commons.

DIVORCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF REFORM LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is giving consideration to the introduction of legislation to provide for an extension of the grounds for divorce? At present divorces are only granted upon the grounds of adultery. Is the government considering legislation to cover the ground now recognized in British law in legislation passed at Westminster?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is considering and will be considering recommendations of parliamentary committees on this and other matters with a view to taking appropriate legislative action.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister to clarify the statement he made in Vancouver in this connection over the week end. He referred to legislation concerning birth control and divorce reform. Did the Prime Minister mean it would be presented in the spring session of parliament or not until the fall?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be difficult to introduce legislation on a subject of this importance before the autumn because of the existing calendar year, among other things.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister based on the brief presented to the government by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association which in part urged that a careful study be made of the effect on the Canadian auto industry and its employees as the result of the Canada-United States auto agreement. In view of this would the Prime Minister now consider my suggestion that the Canada-United States auto agreement be referred to a standing committee of the house so that a careful examination could be made of it?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has based his question on the brief of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association which I received myself only this morning, and I would like to study the particular part relating to what my hon. friend has said before replying in the house.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN AMOUNT OF LOAN CEILING ON EXISTING DWELLINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington-South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour who is responsible for housing. In view of the existing critical housing situation is the minister giving consideration to increasing the $10,000 loan ceiling applicable to the purchase of existing houses?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hales: Further to my question, Mr. Speaker; in view of the fact that only 71 loans have been approved since this program was put into operation some time ago, does the minister not feel that serious consideration should be given to extending—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative.

Mr. Nicholson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would want to be accurate. This legislation was introduced last November.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's interesting speech out west dealing with new initiatives in the field of housing to meet the present crisis, has the government decided upon such initiatives and what is the nature of them?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we certainly are considering them now, and I hope the minister responsible will be able before long to make a statement in the house.

REPORTED ADVANCE BY CORPORATION TO YORK TRUST CO.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with a question that was put by the right hon.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Leader of the Opposition on March 22, as recorded at page 14,331 of Hansard, when he inquired about certain advances made by C.M.H.C. to the York Trust and Savings Company during the year 1965. I might say that as a matter of policy C.M.H.C. does not provide information about particular loan transactions. Borrowers, however, are themselves free to volunteer whatever information they see fit, and in this particular instance York Trust and Savings Company did indicate in its annual report for 1966 that it had made use of section 11 of the National Housing Act during the previous year and that it was able to reduce its indebtedness to the corporation from $20 million to $5.2 million.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, would the minister say that this type of transaction is a common one or were the Sinclair Stevens' interests placed in an unusually favourable position in the matter of that $20 million?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, section 11 of the National Housing Act provides for short term credits of this nature. The purpose of the section is to encourage banks, insurance companies, trust companies and other lending institutions to invest money in existing mortgages and to promote the development of secondary mortgages under the National Housing Act.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED PRESENCE IN CANADA OF GERMAN WAR CRIMINALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and I do so at the request of a number of persons who are quite concerned about this matter. In view of the statement made on the C.B.C. on April 1 by Mr. Simon Wiesenthal that Canada is harbouring at least 15 nazi war criminals and that he advised the Canadian government of this fact some time ago, has the minister been advised by Mr. Simon Wiesenthal of these war criminals being in Canada and, if so, what action does the minister intend to take on this information?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that the question is one of urgency to the extent that it should be asked at this time. I suggest it should be placed on the order paper.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

FEDERAL OBSERVERS AT QUEBEC ROYAL COMMISSION ON CRIME

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the new Minister of Justice and, at the same time, I should like—

An hon. Member: He has not been sworn in yet.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): —I am still going to ask my question, Mr. Speaker, and he might answer it later.

Is it the intention of the new Minister of Justice to send observers of his department to attend the sittings of the royal commission on crime established by the Quebec government?

I think that the minister might take this question as notice and answer it later on.

GRAIN

QUEBEC—POSSIBLE SALE OR LEASE OF ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Could he tell the house whether all branches of the departments concerned have now made their views known concerning the possibility of selling or renting Quebec city grain elevators?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am afraid those discussions have not concluded yet, sir, but I hope they will soon.

VOCATIONAL AND TECHNICAL TRAINING

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Would the minister agree to the tabling of any correspondence between the provinces and the minister or his department about Bill No. C-278, respecting the occupational training of adults, before this bill proceeds to a further stage in the House of Commons?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection if the interested provinces have no objection. If the hon. member wishes to identify the correspondence he would like to have tabled I could get in touch with the provinces and if they have no objection I will be glad to table it.

Mr. Fairweather: Thank you.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DECISION ON NAVY HYDROFOIL PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I understand the hon. gentleman is now ready to answer questions which were asked earlier by the hon. member for Pictou and myself regarding the future of the hydrofoil program.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the fire which occurred in the ship on November 5, 1966, a thorough review has been made of the entire program and it has been decided to seek Treasury Board approval for continuation of the hydrofoil project. Ship launching is now scheduled for mid-1968. Following contractor's sea trials, weapons system installation and over-all system evaluation, it is hoped to complete the project by mid-1970.

I should emphasize, however, that this is a development program. It is being completed as part of an over-all desire to increase our scientific knowledge in a number of areas of interest to Canada and our allies.

TRANSPORT

VANCOUVER—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING CROSSING OF NORTH ARM OF HARBOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In so doing I should like to express our gratitude for his visit to Vancouver recently and, since he looks so relaxed now, to suggest that it might be a good place for him to retire.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): You mean a good time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, in view of the recent visit of the Prime Minister to Vancouver, his tour of the harbour and his telephone conversation with the premier of British Columbia, may we be informed concerning whether he anticipates appointing a cabinet colleague to meet with provincial and municipal authorities on the matter of a new bridge or tunnel crossing the north arm of Vancouver harbour?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, my conversation with the premier of British Columbia and representatives of municipalities, which I found to be a very helpful one, visualized the initiative being taken in respect of these discussions by the government which has the initial responsibility in this matter; that is, the government of British Columbia. I emphasized to the premier of that province that if and when he would initiate these discussions a minister would go to Vancouver immediately. He suggested that perhaps the initiative should come from the mayor of the city of Vancouver. My reaction to that was that it should come either from the mayor or the premier and that it should come quickly. I said at that time we would send a minister to work out the details so that all levels of government would know exactly what was happening and what part of the cost they should bear.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER, B.C.—REQUEST FOR ACTION ON TUNNEL OR BRIDGE APPROACH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister was in the land of the daffodils over the week end did he discuss with the premier or other officials certain plans for access to the Vancouver international airport over the Fraser river?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but at the moment we have been in touch with the minister concerned, the minister of highways, and have asked certain questions arising out of the discussions we have already had. Until those questions are answered it is difficult for us to state exactly the extent of our commitment in this regard. The situation is that the federal government has a certain commitment concerning the axis road and when we receive the information requested we will be able to make progress.

CO-OPERATIVES

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of recent representations, is it the intention of the government to proceed with legislation at the next session to provide for incorporation of co-operatives at the federal level?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): It will not be possible this session, Mr. Speaker. If my hon. friend will await the speech from the throne he will then be able to see the proposals for legislation which we hope to be able to put forward during the next session. Perhaps I should add that there will be no delay between the one session and the other.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO INTENTION RESPECTING SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE F

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board and he may wish to take it as notice so he can consult with his colleague the Secretary of State. Is it his intention or the intention of the government to ask the committee of supply for approval of supplement F to the 1966-67 estimates?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which will be considered by the government depending on how legislation before the house is proceeded with. I should like to discuss this matter with the Secretary of State and my other cabinet colleagues before stating what the policy will be.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether it is the intention of the government to refer the Auditor General's report for 1966 to the committee on public accounts.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be useful to do this very early in the new session. I say this with the belief that this session will not last very long. I believe this would be better than referring it to a committee now and then having to refer it to another committee. If this session should be prolonged I would have no objection to referring the report.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister take parliament and the Canadian people into the government's confidence and have the Secretary of State for External Affairs report to parliament on the changing posture of Canada in respect of defence and external affairs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENSION TO FARM LABOUR—REQUEST FOR FAMILIARIZATION PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Now that unemployment insurance is compulsory for farm labour, can the minister give assurance that penalties for failure to obtain insurance stamps will not be imposed for a reasonable period while farm operators and employees reach a full understanding of their responsibilities under the new plan?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, fortunately or unfortunately the Minister of Labour cannot give an assurance with regard to the administration of a federal statute. The responsibility for carrying out the program under this act rests with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This responsibility has been delegated to it by parliament. All I can say is that in respect of the new legislation I am quite sure the commission will be reasonable and judge each case on its merits.

COAL

BRITISH COLUMBIA—SYMPATHY FOR VICTIMS OF MINE DISASTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege and express my sympathy to the miners and their families who suffered during the recent mining disaster at Natal in the province of British Columbia. May I ask the Prime Minister whether steps are being taken by the government to provide some aid in this regard?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of the house want to associate themselves with the expression of regret that has just been made. The government has already sent a telegram to those who have suffered. I have personally sent one as well. I join with the hon. member in placing on the record our feeling of sorrow and regret regarding this very tragic accident. It is our hope that the nine miners who have been taken to hospital suffering from serious injuries received in the disaster will soon recover. So far as the second part of the question is concerned, the suggestion is under consideration. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport is on the spot and will be reporting to me within a day or two.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary and I had similar thoughts in our minds. I intended to refer to the same matter and direct my question to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in order to obtain their comment.

I am sure this tragedy brings a realization to all of us of the dangers faced by the men engaged in this type of work. Having worked in a coal mine and having been fortunate enough to survive an explosion, I realize something of what these men have gone through. I appreciate the remarks of the Prime Minister.

CANADA LABOUR (SAFETY) CODE

INQUIRY AS TO PROCLAMATION AND PROMULGATION OF REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister say whether the Canada Labour (Safety) Code, which was assented to on December 21, 1966, has been proclaimed and have the regulations under that act been promulgated?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I recall that considerable progress has been made with the regulations.

That was my information at the time of my last inquiry before the Easter recess. I will take the question as notice and advise the hon. member at an early date.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Monday, April 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose last evening clause 2 was under discussion.

On clause 2—Canadian forces, Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to confine my remarks to the proposal contained in this bill regarding a single unified force, but since the long speech made by the minister yesterday contained so many misstatements and so much propaganda I feel it incumbent upon me to comment and set the record straight.

At the outset let me express my disappointment in the minister who has continued to create confusion in respect of integration and unification. Many of the difficulties we have experienced so far as this bill and the whole question of unification are concerned have occurred because the great majority of interested people in this country have been unable to distinguish between integration and unification as a result of the minister's use of these terms as being synonymous. Yesterday the minister said in effect that one might call this proposal integration or unification and that any discussion in regard to differences was merely an exercise in semantics. It is my belief that if members of this house and the general public had been clear two or three years ago as to the differences between integration and unification there would have been a great deal less confusion and we might have proceeded in a much more orderly way.

Let me once more state the differences between these two terms. Unification as we find it referred to in this bill and during the meetings of the committee in recent weeks means the formation of a single unified force by the abolition of the navy, army and air force. Integration, on the other hand, means putting together in a single administrative service, those aspects relating to paymasters, vehicle maintenance, the supply of food and all other administrative functions. The two things are quite different.

Anyone in Canada who has studied this whole matter is generally in favour of the principle of integration, although many complaints have been made in respect of the manner in which integration has been implemented by the present government. Generally there has been agreement in respect of the principle of combining administrative services. Most of our complaints and differences of opinion can be related to unification and the abolition of the army, navy and air force. As I say, if this matter had been made clear it could have been looked at by the general public in a much better light.

During the course of the minister's speech he stated that logic leads to the inevitable conclusion that integration must result in unification. Let me say to him what has been said to other ministers in the past, that if one starts with false premises and information he will inevitably arrive at false conclusions. That is exactly what the minister has done.

I should now like to refer to specific statements made by the minister during his speech yesterday. At that time the minister stated:

> Every opportunity has been afforded those who are opposed to this concept to make their views known.

That statement is completely incorrect. During meetings of the committee we asked that a considerable number of witnesses be called, many of whom have not yet been heard. As most members realize, several meetings of the committee were entirely taken up by arguments on whether or not more witnesses should be called. This was the result of motions by Liberal members of the committee that no more witnesses be called and that we wind up the hearings of the committee. The members of this party argued during the course of two or three meetings that we should call additional witnesses, particularly the former chief of the defence staff, Air Chief Marshal Miller. Eventually we did secure four more witnesses, but to state that every person who was opposed to this concept and wanted to make his views known had an opportunity to do so is completely false and incorrect. A considerable number of people who asked to appear before the committee never did appear because they were given no opportunity to do so and, as I say, the Liberal members of the committee tried to cut the hearings off even before we had heard the last four witnesses.

The next point upon which I should like to comment concerns the minister's remarks as reported at page 14430 of Hansard for yesterday. He said, dealing with some of the strategic considerations and so on involved in this question:

All the while that these two matters were being attended to, preparations were in hand for the writing of a long range defence plan for Canada. Study groups were set up which included representatives of the navy, army, air force, the deputy minister's staff and the Defence Research Board.

The minister went on to say that these studies covered a wide range of activities and he specified them. I think the only reason the minister put this in his speech was to try to give the impression that the reports which were prepared by the staffs supported his views in regard to unification. All the senior, retired officers who appeared before the defence committee did not support the minister's views. Not a single one—I repeat, not a single one—of those senior officers who are no longer members of the defence staff supported the minister's views on unification. Some of them said that unification was complete nonsense and they would not have anything to do with it. Others said that it might be all right in the course of time but certainly it should not be tried for a period of three to five years. In view of the fact that the senior officers who are now free to speak have all opposed the minister's ideas with regard to unification, it seems to me he is trying to fall back on these anonymous reports.

I should like to ask the minister—in fact I challenge him—to file these reports in the house so we can see what they do say. I have heard something of these reports. There was one produced by a very brilliant gentleman, now deceased, Mr. Sutherland. I have heard about two or three others that were produced. I have also heard that not a single one of those reports supported the minister's ideas on unification. They supported his ideas on integration. They laid out the advantages of integration, how it could be proceeded with and so on, but not one of them, if my information is correct, supported the minister's ideas on unification. Once more I challenge the minister to table these reports and let us see what they contain.

Following that the minister gave a general strategic appreciation. I do not disagree with this appreciation. In fact I have frequently spoken in much the same way and along the same lines both when I was minister of national defence and since. I think that part of the speech was perfectly all right, although it had absolutely nothing to do with unification. It was a general strategic appreciation and from that point of view was all right. However, I disagree completely with the statements which follow with regard to improving the flexibility of our forces by the changes proposed by the minister, that is, by putting into effect the unification of the forces. In my view, and this view was also the view of some of the competent witnesses who appeared before the committee, rather than improving the flexibility of the Canadian forces by these means we will considerably decrease their flexibility and make them less able, particularly from any combat point of view, to carry out the roles and activities which may be demanded of them.

The next matter upon which I should like to comment is dealt with at page 14431 of Hansard. The minister's statement reads as follows:

First of all—

The minister is talking about how much things were improved after he became minister.

—we reversed the policy of 1959, that the Canadian army in so far as new equipment was concerned would only be equipped to training scale for the three-quarters of the army in Canada and to full equipment for the brigade group overseas. I know that my hon. friend from Calgary North has questioned this, but I have the policy before me. It was established in 1959. The formal decision was taken and it applied to over-all equipment purchases. Therefore the policy then in effect, which meant that only one-quarter of the Canadian army would be equipped and available to fight overseas, was reversed.

That is a piece of complete nonsense. The minister raised this matter in the committee and in the committee, of course, unlike here, I had the opportunity to cross-question him. I should like to go over the evidence given in the committee with regard to that point to show how completely wrong is this statement which the minister continues to make in spite of the fact that it has been disproved, namely, that the Canadian army during the period I was minister was equipped to only three quarters of its scale and that there was a policy that that was the extent to which it would be equipped.

Mr. Hellyer: That is correct.

Mr. Harkness: I had never heard of any such policy until the minister raised it in the committee. That was the first time I had heard of such a policy. I can assure the house that when I was minister of national defence there was no such policy; as a matter of fact, the army was equipped to full war scale.

Mr. Hellyer: It was not, during the time you were minister.

Mr. Harkness: The minister can mutter away as much as he likes, but I am telling you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee what the actual situation was, not what this Minister of National Defence thinks it was. During the period I was in charge of the department and responsible for its policies, I say categorically that I had no such policy and, in fact, that the army was equipped to full war scale in most cases.

This matter demonstrates how difficult it is to deal with this minister. This matter was dealt with in considerable detail in the committee. I cross-questioned the minister on it and forced him to admit that the statements he had made in regard to these matters were not correct. But when he comes back into the house and makes a speech to the committee on this bill he reiterates the statement. In his speech of yesterday the minister talked about myths; he said he wanted to explode some of the myths. The minister is the greatest builder of myths so far as military affairs are concerned that we have ever had in this country. It is extremely difficult to deal with him because after one has exploded one of these broad, general remarks that he makes it does not make any difference to the minister. He comes back in some other place a few days later or a few weeks later and repeats the same, completely false statement that he made before.

As reported in the committee proceedings for February 23, 1967, at page 1600, I was questioning the minister as follows:

Now, next you get on to this matter you have brought up two or three times: "Three-quarters of our army was equipped only to training scales". This is not correct. What about our tank regiments; were they only on training scales when you took over?

Mr. Hellyer: Have they been acquired since the change in policy?

Mr. Harkness: I said: were our tank regiments on training scales of equipment only, when you became minister?

Mr. Hellyer: My contention, Mr. Harkness, was that this is a policy adopted in 1959; it might not apply to—

Mr. Harkness: I am asking you a specific question, and I do not want a general answer on the general line you give which does not come down to specifics.

• (4:10 p.m.)

The minister was being asked a specific question but went around in large circles and in the end avoided answering it. The advantage of a committee such as the defence committee is that its members can get down to specifics. The minister answered the question in the following way:

I think we had quite a surplus of tanks.

In other words, the tank regiments were not only up to full equipment but had a surplus of tanks. I then said:

Yes. In other words, then, as far as our armoured corps was concerned, it was not on training scales; it had full war equipment. What about our artillery regiments? Were they on a training scale only?

Mr. Hellyer: Again, Mr. Harkness, if you are talking about towed guns—

Then he tried to drag in a red herring because at that time there was nothing but towed guns.

Mr. Hellyer: There should have been.

Mr. Harkness: I could say just as readily that there should have been machine guns in the battle of Waterloo and the troops would have been much better equipped if they had had them. In actual fact, at that time our troops were entirely equipped with towed guns, as they are still. The minister went on to say:

—I think we have had a surplus of those.

In other words, we had more guns for the artillery regiments than were required. He went on to say:

This, I think, is more or less irrelevant to the decision you took that this policy would not be continued after 1959.

Mr. Harkness: What do you mean, the decision I took, and what policy?

Mr. Hellyer: That in future you would provide only training scales.

Mr. Harkness: My contention is that the forces were not equipped on training scales; that the statement that they were on training scales is completely incorrect. I am going over them arm by arm, in order of their seniority, and you have admitted that the armour was up to war establishment. I think you have admitted, at least indirectly, that the artillery was up to war establishment, and, in fact, that we had a surplus of guns. Is that not correct?

Mr. Hellyer: Speaking from memory with respect to the tanks and the towed guns themselves, I suspect that it is so.

He said that after having admitted that the units were not only up to establishment but that there was a surplus of equpment for them. I continue reading:

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: I think we should extend this into other fields, including ammunition and new equipments that were being programmed, where the more current policy applied.

Mr. Harkness: Naturally, Mr. Chairman, I think it is evident to everyone in this committee that an army cannot be equipped with equipment and actually in possession of equipment, which has been ordered but not yet delivered, but as far as the equipment laid down for the army is concerned, my contention is that this statement the minister has made that three-quarters of our army was equipped only to training scale is completely and utterly false.

Mr. Hellyer: With respect to those two equipments, Mr. Harkness, were they acquired during your time as minister?

Mr. Harkness: No, they were there when I became minister. Now, as far as the infantry is concerned, was the infantry not fully equipped with rifles, machine guns, anti-tank weapons, trucks, mortars, and so forth?

Mr. Hellyer: I would say: with ancient trucks, with ancient wireless, and with no armoured personnel carriers at all. As you well know, in the appreciation of our capability in Europe these were chronic deficiencies which were reported and about which nothing was done for a considerable period of time.

Mr. Harkness: You say, ancient rifles; how old were the rifles?

Mr. Hellyer: I did not say ancient rifles.

Mr. Harkness: You said, ancient equipment, generally. How ancient were the rifles?

Mr. Hellyer: If I said rifles—and I do not think I did—I did not mean to. I said, wireless and trucks.

In actual fact the rifles of the infantry battalions in Europe and in Canada were the same FN rifles which they have at present. They were secured some years before that and it was hoped that this rifle would be adopted universally by the NATO forces. The same thing applied to mortars, to machine guns and to other pieces of equipment. The minister tried to wriggle out of this and instead of getting down to the actual combat equipment he went on to speak about trucks. He said:

I said, wireless and trucks.

Mr. Harkness: All right, how ancient were the trucks?

Mr. Hellyer: Oh, ancient enough that it is time they were replaced.

Mr. Harkness: Well, how ancient were they? You make another general statement; I want you to get down to specifics. How ancient were they?

Mr. Hellyer: Which truck are you talking about?

Mr. Harkness: I am talking about the general issue of trucks. As a matter of fact—

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Harkness, but general issue trucks are divided into categories too. If you could be more specific on that, I could get the answer for you.

Mr. Harkness: We will take jeeps; how ancient were the jeeps?

Mr. Hellyer: I will have to get that answer for you.

Mr. Harkness: I will tell you; I think you will find that a considerable number of them had just been bought and the same thing applies to a large number of the other trucks. There was a constant stream of new trucks and equipment coming into the army during the period prior to when I was minister of national defence and during the period that I was minister of national defence. As I say, I do not think you can point to any specific arm of the army to which this statement truthfully can be applied: Three-quarters of our army was equipped only to training scales. You have not been able to mention one single instance yet where it applied.

Mr. Hellyer: I think the infantry were not adequately equipped anywhere, and that certainly applies to three-quarters in Canada, and probably to a very considerable extent to the units in Europe as well.

This goes on for another page. However, throughout this exchange the minister did not establish one single, specific instance in which the army was not equipped up to war establishment. He did not establish that the equipment was old, obsolete or anything else along that line. All he did was to draw a red herring by saying such things as that they did not have armoured personnel carriers or they did not have self-propelled howitzers, when in actual fact much of this equipment, particularly the armoured personnel carriers, was on order but had not yet been delivered and in fact was not delivered for several years. I think this is an outstanding example of what we were faced with in the committee when dealing with the minister. First he made a statement of this kind and when it was demonstrated that his statement was incorrect he turned right around and made it again. As long as we have a minister of this kind there can be no confidence in the minister on the part of members of this house, members of the armed services or members of the general public. As a result there will be an unsatisfactory state of affairs in the defence department.

The next statement of the minister on which I should like to comment deals with a considerable number of matters. It is to be found on pages 14432 and 14433 of Hansard. In all instances the minister tried to demonstrate that he has achieved great savings in manpower.

He mentioned intelligence services, information services and various other services and said there had been a 30 per cent saving in manpower here, a 40 per cent saving there, and so on and so forth. Of course there have been certain savings in manpower through the combination of staffs. Nobody disputes that. But the whole purpose of this statement is to try to persuade members of this house and the general public that the minister has made great savings and therefore, by implication, they are going to pay less by way of taxes, whereas the exact opposite is the case. The total cost for defence has gone up. In fact this year it has gone up by as much as $115 million. Except for one year it has risen ever since the present government took office. In addition to the fact that the cost of defence has not gone down and the taxpayer is actually paying more for defence, he is in fact paying a great deal more for less defence. The number of people in uniform is down by some 20,000 and is continuing to decline. There are not enough people to man the ships, the infantry battalions, the armoured units and all other units which are under strength. Not only are we expending more dollars for defence but we are getting a great deal less defence for every dollar expended.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: Nonsense.

Mr. Harkness: The minister, as usual, says "nonsense". All he ever does is to say "nonsense" and make general statements which he cannot substantiate. Even though he cannot substantiate them he keeps on repeating them. Apparently he believes it is a good propaganda technique to repeat something, no matter how false, and that if repeated often enough the people will believe it.

Mr. Foy: Can you substantiate everything you say?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I am able to substantiate everything I say. As a matter of fact the hon. member was a member of the committee and will therefore realize that I substantiated any claim I made there.

The next statement the minister made was with regard to recruiting. The minister said, as reported on page 14433 of Hansard:

> Notwithstanding the problems which inevitably arise in the first year,—

He is referring to integration and unification.

> —and a reduction of 33 per cent in personnel—

That is recruiting personnel.

> —we were able to recuit more people in 1966 than in the previous year.

Later in his speech the minister repeated the statement that he had been able to recruit more people in 1966 than in either of the preceding two years. If we wish to look at the actual number of recruits in those years, we turn to the brief the minister presented to the committee on February 23 to which a table is attached showing the number of recruits for the regular forces in each of the years from 1956 to 1966. The figures are as follows: 1956, 17,281; 1957, 19,739; 1958, 15,252; 1959, 12,047; 1960, 12,690; 1961, 16,092; 1962, 14,283; 1963—this is when the minister took over—11,804, the lowest figure since Korea, 1964, 10,539, again a new low so far as recruiting is concerned; 1965, 9,883 and 1966, 10,822.

The figure in 1966 is up somewhat from 1965 and it is up very little from 1964. However, those two years were the poorest two years we have had since the Korean conflict so far as recruiting is concerned. The minister compares 1966, which is a little better but not very much better, with the two poorest years in recent history so far as recruiting is concerned and then tries to make the claim that recruiting has improved. This is another deliberate attempt to try to deceive the general public as to the state of recruiting in the armed forces.

Recruiting is not the whole story so far as the strength of the forces is concerned. While this number of recruits was being secured in 1966, what number of people left the service? There were 10,822 people recruited, people coming into the forces for the first time, but a number of men left the service and many of them had been trained for years and years. They were at the peak of their efficiency when they got out or were fired. The number of people who left the service during that time totalled 14,792. There was, therefore, a decrease or wastage in the strength of the forces totalling 3,970 during 1966.

However, the situation was worse than that. At the end of 1966 there were 1,763 people who were still carried on strength but who had actually been discharged or were on terminal leave. The actual wastage in the service for 1966 was, therefore, 5,733. There were that many fewer people in the services than at the start of 1966. In spite of that fact the minister gives us these figures concerning recruiting and makes the statement that recruiting has greatly improved. This statement is designed to give a totally false impression to the people of Canada as to what the situation is not only in regard to recruiting but in regard to the effective strength of the armed forces.

The Chairman: I am sorry, but I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: Does the hon. member wish to continue? Does the committee give unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to thank the committee, Mr. Chairman, and I will not carry on for very much longer. As a matter of fact, I should like to come back to some of these matters and particularly to consider the matter of unification with which I have not actually dealt yet, and for that I must apologize to the committee. I have been concerned about answering some of the misstatements made by the minister. There are one or two more with which I should like to deal, but I will not impose upon the committee for too long. The minister stated, as recorded on page 14434 of Hansard:

> One of the stated intentions of the savings that could be made was to use those savings for new equipment for the armed forces.

A bit further along the minister said something else along similar lines about the savings which have been made and which could be used or will be used to improve the equipment of the forces. Yes, it is right on the next page, following an interjection by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre:

> I think my hon. friend will appreciate that a reduction in personnel had to be made in order to make a diversion of funds for the acquisition of equipment and that, of course, was one of the objects of the exercise.

The minister goes on with quite a few comments with regard to equipment and does the same sort of thing he attempted to do in committee, that is, to persuade the members and the general public that since he took office a great deal more money had been spent on equipment as a result of the savings he was able to make in manpower and so forth. The committee had presented to it a chart which showed the percentage of the defence dollar spent on equipment. The indication was that the amount had been going down and down every year until the minister became minister and then it began to level off and go up a little. I took objection to this chart and said it was false. This caused quite a stir amongst the minister's officials but finally they had to admit that it was. In fact, they tried to cover this up by saying that the chart had been mislabelled or something along that line.

The actual fact, Mr. Chairman, is that in spite of everything the minister has said with regard to saving money and so on the money expended on equipment since he has been minister has been a smaller portion of the Canadian defence dollar than was the case before he took over. If we start in 1961-62, the percentage of the defence dollar which was spent on equipment was 18.8 per cent; 1962-63, 14.8 per cent; 1963-64,—we are still in the estimates which I prepared—16 per cent; 1964-65, 13.4 per cent and 1965-66, which is the last year for which we have the expenditures published by the Auditor General, 12 per cent. This is the actual situation so far as expenditure on equipment is concerned, and yet the minister continues in every speech he makes to try to sell the point to the members of this house and the general public that he has been saving money on administration expenses and buying more equipment.

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: The minister claps his hands. Nevertheless, the Auditor General's report gives the exact figures showing how much has been spent on equipment and they disprove completely what the minister says. This makes no difference to him. He comes right back two or three days later or whenever he has the opportunity and makes the same completely false statement again. Once more I say that this makes for an extraordinarily difficult position so far as the members of this committee are concerned because we cannot place any credence in anything the minister says or the statements he makes.

I have a considerable number of other matters on which I wish to speak, Mr. Chairman, particularly in connection with the narrow question of the single unified force provided for in the bill. However, I do not want to trespass on the good nature of the house and I will come back to that at a later time.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the speech to which we have just listened by the hon. member for Calgary North, who has shown with great clarity that this house has been deceived by the Minister of National Defence. This is destructive of debate in this house. It is destructive of consideration of a bill as important as the bill now before us.

The hon. member for Calgary North has shown so clearly, by three outstanding examples, that the minister is misleading this house and the Canadian people. I do not see how we can carry on a serious discussion in the House of Commons on a bill affecting the defence services of this country if we are going to be faced with statements on the part of the Minister of National Defence which are palpably untrue.

It has been shown that he was quite wrong in what he said about the equipment of our forces to training scale in Canada. It is shown by the committee evidence quoted by the hon. member for Calgary North that he was quite wrong. Yet the minister repeated this statement in his speech yesterday. It has also been shown that he has misled the house with regard to the strength of the forces. He has said that there has been an increase in recruiting, without acknowledging the wastage that has occurred at the same time which has resulted in our forces in fact being seriously depleted.

How can we carry on a sensible discussion in a situation such as this with a minister of the crown who is not giving the truth to the House of Commons, Mr. Chairman? I suggest that serious consideration must be given by the government to this situation. It should be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister.

My point of privilege is that we simply cannot carry on a discussion such as this with the minister failing to give accurate information to the House of Commons. I am prepared to let the minister answer the charge I am making immediately to see whether he can clear up the statements that have been made by the hon. member for Calgary North, but I do not want simply a repetition of things he has said before concerning which he has been found to be not accurate.

I will deal with this matter at length when I speak in the course of the debate, Mr. Chairman, because I drew attention to matters such as this on November 4. But yesterday we again had a repetition of these statements, and the minister has now been shown by the hon. member for Calgary North to be at fault and to be misleading the house. What more dangerous thing can be done than that? How can the members of this house vote sensibly and with accuracy on the bill that he is presenting to us if we cannot rely on the statements that are made by a minister of the crown? That is the situation we face at this particular moment, and I think it is only right to give the minister a chance to reply. If he does not reply I think there is other appropriate action that might be taken.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I hope that the time the hon. gentleman has taken will be charged him as one intervention in this debate. I certainly will reply—

Mr. Churchill: You are not going to stop my speaking in this debate.

Mr. Hellyer: I will certainly reply in some detail, to some of these spurious allegations which have been made this afternoon, but at a later stage of the debate. I too get a little sick of hearing this repetitious nonsense from the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Flemming: He proved everything that he said.

Mr. Hellyer: He cannot prove the things he said because they cannot be proved.

Mr. Flemming: He quoted from the record and gave the page.

Mr. Hellyer: He was quoting vague generalities.

Mr. Ricard: He was reading from the text.

Mr. Flemming: He also gave the page.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in the course of this debate, not to oppose unification or integration of our armed forces, or anything of the kind, but merely to obtain some information on specific aspects of the Canadian armed forces.

But before I do so, Mr. Chairman, I want to protest strongly against the earlier outbursts, of the hon. members for Calgary North and of Winnipeg South Centre (Messrs. Harkness and Churchill) against General Allard. I wonder why those two former ministers of national defence hound the Chief of Staff, if not precisely because he is a French Canadian.

Mr. Lambert: Now, that is nonsense.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, it denotes partisanship, politicking; it smacks of racism; in short it shows a spirit of denigration which does not belong in this house.

Mr. Lambert: No more than the nonsense you are now talking.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I see that some hon. members are hurt, which confirms one thing: the truth hurts.

Mr. Ricard: You do not know what the truth is.

Mr. Grégoire: I would like to advance arguments against the way the hon. members for Winnipeg South Centre and Calgary North act with the chief of staff of the Canadian forces. I think that this is improper, and that indeed those two members should withdraw their words and stop behaving as they do.

Mr. Lambert: An old crow is always croaking.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I see the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is seeking to protect his colleagues; he should rather seek to protect the truth; it would be much better.

Mr. Chairman, the first point I want to make is what the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) is saying; he wants to speak but is never heard, although this once he is talking. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot will see that last Saturday in La Presse he was called a minister on the way down, or something like that, in the House of Commons. I apologize for not knowing the French translation of the word, but that is going down.

In any case, Mr. Chairman, those remarks were made and I see that they were shocked by them; they do not like to be told such things. Well, if they do not like it, let them desist, that is all.

The first thing I want to bring up about unification is this one. Has the number of air force pilots decreased because of unification of the armed forces? Or will the pilots who had enlisted for three years be kept for a much longer period although they have asked for their release?

One knows, Mr. Chairman, that under a program designed to train officers for the regular army, namely the R.O.T.C., students can enlist for three years and pursue their studies in the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. Chairman, for some time now, those flying officers, who have their wings and a permanent officer's commission, who are aircrew members of the R.C.A.F. and who should normally be discharged toward the end of May 1967, since they gave their regular notice in October 1966, that is six months earlier, and who were sure their undertaking would be respected by the R.C.A.F., found employment with civil aviation companies or elsewhere, but today the powers that be refuse to give them their discharge and say: We are short of pilots. And they are told: We cannot give you any answer, because no decision has been taken.

When those young men enlisted in the R.C.A.F., they were told certain things and today they are told an entirely different story. They are now told that instructions from the Canadian armed forces headquarters specified that flying officers holding a permanent commission are required to complete five years' service as trained pilots from the date they obtained their wings.

And, Mr. Chairman, I read this in a letter signed by Brigadier Doucet, executive assistant to the Minister of National Defence.

They are told that they are now required to complete five years' service as trained pilots, but when those young men enlisted in the air force, they were told that they were signing up for a three-year term. And they are also told:

> This requirement applied to R.O.T.C. pilots as well as to other pilots.

But when those young men enlisted in the R.O.T.C., they had signed up for a three-year term. However, they are told:

> This requirement is justified, because it costs the armed forces a lot of money to train pilots.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the authorities knew that when the men signed up. Why were they not told the truth then? Why were they misled then? Today they are told: You will spend two more years of your life as pilots in the armed forces. And that, when these young people could more easily find jobs today in civil aviation or elsewhere in the civil service?

The letter continues:

> Believing that they were entitled to be discharged after the three years of compulsory service provided in the case of students in the R.O.T.C.—

They admit this.

> —a young man submitted an application for release to be effective on the date of termination of his commitments toward the R.O.T.C.

It is said:

> In the meantime, the Canadian forces headquarters informed all pilots having been in the R.O.T.C. and having asked to be discharged, that their application would remain in abeyance until the study in question was completed and the results made public.

How does it happen, Mr. Chairman, that we make a young citizen sign a contract when he enlists and, when the time comes to release him, although he respected all the terms of his contract, the R.C.A.F. repudiates the contract and compels the young airman to stay two more years in the air force when there was no provision for that extension.

And the last paragraph adds:

—that a decision on the subject is anticipated in a very near future and that the final result will be disclosed.

Mr. Chairman, that is not the contract which was signed by the young Canadian who joined the air force. He enlisted for a three-year period to get his wings.

I would therefore ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) to answer this question: does the R.C.A.F. disavow its commitments toward the young recruits at the time they entered R.O.T.C.? Is the R.C.A.F. ready to fulfil its commitment as the young airmen have respected theirs toward the R.C.A.F.? And those young people who had signed up for three years after getting their wings, will they be released after three years or will they be forced to stay five years although they signed up only for three years? I would like to know what the R.C.A.F. intends to do about this. Would the R.C.A.F. and the Department of National Defence disown their commitment toward those young people?

Mr. Chairman, that is the first point on which I am asking for an answer from the department, namely if actually those who enlisted for a period of three years will now have to stay in the service for five years, and I would like to know if the R.C.A.F. will respect the commitment made, that is a period of enlistment of three rather than five years. I hope that the Minister and the Associate Minister of National Defence will be able to answer that question.

A second point I should like to deal with in this debate on the bill to amend the National Defence Act—

Mr. Cowan: Not Pascal.

Mr. Grégoire: No, Mr. Chairman. I pick up a book and the member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) wonders whether I shall quote Pascal. I will not. But I should like, Mr. Chairman, to quote another author, a Canadian citizen, a French Canadian, a French speaking Quebecker, Mr. Marcel Chaput. I have here his book entitled: "J'ai choisi de me battre." Mr. Marcel Chaput, doctor of chemistry, is a good Quebecker who was employed by the National Research Council.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

He resigned in 1961. Now, he is working to gain independence for Quebec.

The book is published by the Club du Livre du Québec. On page 45, there is a chapter headed: "French Canadians in the armed forces."

And Marcel Chaput wrote that at one point when he was with the National Research Council, and before he joined the independent movement in Quebec, he was directed toward operational research.

I should like to quote a passage found on page 44 of the book written by Marcel Chaput:

From this post in operational research created by the Department of National Defence, I acted as scientific adviser to Civil Defence. But the appetite of operational research knows no bounds. It is interested in all problems. Thus the department invited me, a French Canadian, to explain to him one day why, first of all, there are, proportionately speaking, fewer French Canadians than English Canadians in the armed forces and, secondly, why the former advance more slowly in the services than the latter. Are French Canadians less talented, lazy or antimilitarist?

That was his question. To continue quoting from the book written by Marcel Chaput:

It was perhaps expected that my work would confirm the old belief that young French Canadians are not attracted to the army and, therefore, do not enlist, except for those who do not manage to find a place anywhere else, which would leave some doubts as to their intellectual ability.

Figures in hand, I first demolished the preconceived notion that French Canadians do not enlist in the armed forces.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) wants to make comments which could be of some value at another time, but which are holding up our consideration of the bill for they are not directly concerned with it. If the hon. member wishes to make a separatist speech, there are other places and other occasions which are more suitable.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to hear the voice of the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Goyer), because I think it is the first time, in at least a year, that I see him rise.

Mr. Goyer: The hon. member for Lapointe is often out of the house.

Mr. Grégoire: That remains to be checked.

Mr. Chairman, this was not a separatist speech, because we do not want to separate anything; we are in favour of Quebec's independence in collaboration, in co-operation. He has called that a separatist speech; it is perhaps less tiresome to hear than his oversimple speeches, but these things must be said.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, I believe this paves the way for a question that I wish to address to the Minister of National Defence in connection with unification, and I think it must be recognized, under the circumstances.

I now go back to my quotation.

It may have been expected that my work would confirm the old belief that the army does not appeal to young French Canadians and that they therefore do not join up except those who cannot find jobs elsewhere, which might raise some misgivings about their mental capacity.

Mr. Goyer: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Grégoire:

I shall first do away with the prejudice—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Dollard has risen on a point of order to draw attention to the fact that the standing orders of the house are perhaps not being respected at the moment.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Chairman, we are used to blackmail tactics on the part of the member for Lapointe, just as we are used to his empty chit-chat. If the member for Lapointe will kindly indicate to the committee how his remarks may become a question to the Minister of National Defence, we shall listen. On the other hand, he should not trick the house and take the opportunity to make a speech which has no bearing on the matter now under study, and bring it to a close with unkind remarks without putting a question to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, the member for Dollard—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, order. I ask the hon. member for Lapointe to resume his seat, as I would like to stop this exchange on the standing orders. I believe the hon. member for Lapointe is entirely in order when he talks of the participation of the French speaking element in our armed forces, when he says it is more or less important, that perhaps it should be greater, more important, according to the ranks filled by French speaking Canadians.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I thank you. But first of all I should like to rise on a question of privilege concerning the intentions which the hon. member for Dollard ascribes to me. I must say it is extremely mean of him to do so. Moreover, I had just said that I would connect this to some questions asked in relation to the matter now under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, my question of privilege—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would ask the hon. member for Lapointe to resume his seat. I do not think his question of privilege is justified. The hon. member for Dollard rose on a point of order only to say that the hon. member for Lapointe was perhaps out of order. Therefore, I would ask the hon. member for Lapointe not to continue in this vein and to restrict his remarks to the bill we are now discussing.

Mr. Grégoire: Very well, Mr. Chairman. In fact, I consider this an event in the life of the hon. member for Dollard, to whom it does not often occur to let out his frustrated feelings. He had an opportunity to do this and I consider the matter settled. If he wants other opportunities to evaporate his frustrations, which I fully understand, I will be very glad to give him some:

And I go on:

With statistics in my hands, I destroy—

I am still quoting the book entitled "J'ai choisi de me battre" by Marcel Chaput, a book which I urge the hon. member for Dollard to read. I quote:

With statistics in my hand, I destroy first of all the notion that French Canadians would not enlist. If their number in the army is not proportionate to Canada's demography, it is not because they do not enlist, but rather because they do not stay in the army.

Thus among the ordinary soldiers and non commissioned officers the average length of service of the French Canadians is only three and a half years, whereas it reaches five and a half years for the other Canadians. More striking yet is the difference in the years of service between the French-Canadian officers and the others: English-speaking officers average 21 years of service; French-speaking officers average 11 years of service, that is about half less. English-speaking Canadians make a career in the army; French Canadians cannot bring themselves to follow their example.

With the authorization of the department, in November 1959, I delivered on that matter a lecture to the annual conference of ACFAS held that year at the University of Montreal.

That finding made the headlines in the papers the next day. French Canadians are, proportionately speaking, as attracted to the army as any other group of Canadians, but once they have enlisted, they start thinking about getting out of it. The next step was to wonder why. I wanted to take that step but the English-speaking authorities of the Department of National Defence would not let me.

Mr. Chairman, who was the minister of national defence in 1959? The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness). He should be here listening. I quote again:

> I wanted to take that step but the English-speaking authorities of the Department of National Defence would not let me. Or more precisely, they knew the answer: the French Canadians find out very soon after enlisting that they are members of a foreign army.
> At the time I am writing this, I learn that the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission on bilingualism and biculturalism has just discovered my study on the French Canadians in the army and will put it in its files.

That is my first question, which is directly linked with the unification of the armed forces.

On the verge of unification, I should like to ask the minister and the Associate Minister of National Defence whether they intend to extract from the files the defence department that study which Marcel Chaput prepared when he was working under the National Research Council, at the request of the Department of National Defence. I should like to know if the minister and his associate minister intend to take this study out of the mothballs and examine it, to find out what its conclusions were?

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, on the eve of unification, I should like the minister and the associate minister, because, in my view, the associate minister is just as important as the minister—they are associated in the management—and that he also has many virtues, many talents—

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I agree.

Mr. Grégoire: This is why I am always appealing to both, Mr. Chairman. Among all the Quebec ministers, if there is one who, in my opinion, has endeavoured—I hope that he will not take advantage of my complimentary remarks to act in the opposite way tomorrow—to defend the rights of French Canadians in the past, it is he. In fact, I even consider that he is the only one, and I am pleased to pay him this tribute.

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Grégoire: The Associate Minister of National Defence. Some hon. members could perhaps follow his example.

At all events, Mr. Chairman, a survey on the army was made by Mr. Marcel Chaput in 1959. He was not then, far from it, an avowed independentist and, furthermore, he was not active in their ranks. He was interested in those problems as should any other French Canadian citizen. He made a survey on behalf of the Department of National Defence to come to the conclusion that French Canadians did not remain very long in the army, and I quote the reason given by Mr. Chaput:

> —it is that French Canadians find out very soon after enlisting that they belong to a foreign army.

Mr. Chairman, after quoting those excerpts, I would like the minister and the associate minister to tell us what their department intends to do in that connection? Do they intend to bring forward the study made by Mr. Marcel Chaput and give it the publicity it deserves, because it is only then that we shall see whether the department is really interested in making the reforms suggested.

I hope, but I am doubtful somewhat, that the department is interested in making reforms in that field and, if so, let it produce and publish that study, and tell us whether it is intended to take the action suggested by Mr. Marcel Chaput at that time.

It is claimed that the Laurendeau-Dunton commission brought it out of the dust, that they have just rediscovered this study. I would then ask the Associate Minister of Defence and the Minister of National Defence whether they intend to read it, to publish it and to make the necessary corrections.

Mr. Chairman, there is a third point I should like to raise. It will be remembered that last summer, I think, or a year and a half ago, possibly two years ago, a note had been posted on the board at the Bagotville base, signed by an air force sergeant, announcing that in accordance with a decision of the authorities, the use of French as a working language was prohibited there.

I had put a question at that time to the Minister of National Defence, who had answered simply this:

> We will inquire into the matter and will give you an answer later.

Mr. Chairman, 12 months, perhaps more, have elapsed since the Minister of National Defence said that he would inquire into the matter and give an answer later. We never had an answer from the Minister of National Defence to a question I put a year ago whether it was true that such a notice had been posted saying that only English was the working language at the Bagotville military base, that French was prohibited. The minister never answered, gave no explanation. I wonder whether today, when we are considering unification of the armed forces, it would not be the proper time to give an answer because, Mr. Chairman, that may mean many things. Unification. This means that the French and English languages are unified and that it has been decided that English will now be the only language. Is that also part of the armed forces unification plan?

For instance, would the minister tell us about the notorious regulation in army manuals providing that English is the only official language in the Canadian army. This regulation applies to all, except the 22nd Regiment, I believe. But, aside from that, for all the other Canadian forces, army, navy and air force, English is the only official language, and French is not recognized.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to know from the minister whether that regulation is still in force; whether it was amended; if so, when and by whom? I should like to know whether the minister could give the house a new copy of the regulations, more specifically of that regulation, if it is still in effect or if it has been changed.

It is advisable to ask ourselves some questions, since we have never been told that this rule had been changed. And the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) is right when he says that English is the only official language, since it is laid down in the regulations of the army, the navy and the air force, except in the case of the Royal 22nd regiment called the Van Doos. It is the only regiment to have that privilege, that is to have French in addition to English as a working language.

Then I should like to know from the Minister and the Associate Minister of National Defence if any step has been taken in connection with that rule. Does the minister intend to change it, or has he already changed it so that in the future, the hon. member for York-Humber could say:

Well, from now on, English is not the only official language, but the army rules state that both languages are official. And I am sure that the hon. member for York-Humber, with his open-mindedness, would only be to happy to be able to say that both languages are official. He is generous; he is only too willing to have two official languages.

But for the time being, he rightly says that there is only one, since only English is acknowledged in the Canadian armed forces, save when we are granted concessions and privileges.

So I should like the minister to tell me what measures were taken with respect to the unification of the armed forces? Does the old rule still apply? Will it continue to apply or has it been amended?

I should like to raise a fourth and last point, Mr. Chairman, which may be a little more delicate. In the very near future, Canada will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the battle of Vimy. For all the Canadian people, of course, it is an important celebration since Canadian soldiers participated in the battle and won a great victory. In fact, several among us number relatives who fought on that battleground where the fiftieth anniversary of the battle of Vimy will be celebrated.

It happens that the battle took place on French soil, that the celebration will take place on French soil where veterans of the Canadian army and representatives will be in attendance. The Canadian army, the unified or integrated forces of the Canadian army, are happy to celebrate that victory but the French government will not participate officially as it would have wished in that celebration and many Canadians might not be as satisfied as they should be, because they will be represented officially, I mean not by members of the Canadian government, not by Canadian senators, not by Canadian members, not by the chiefs of the Canadian armed forces, admirals or generals but by Prince Philip of England. I want to say that I have nothing against him but what surprises me is the fact the army and the government have asked Prince Philip to be the official spokesman for the Canadian army and the Canadian veterans at the celebration of a battle won by the Canadian army.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, I take the liberty of speaking at this time in order to correct the statements just made by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). I fully realize that he is sincere and of good faith, but the Canadian government and the Canadian army will be represented at the Vimy celebrations by your humble servant. I am going there as the official delegate of the Canadian government, and I propose to bring along and to read a statement from the Prime Minister which will be two thirds in French and one third in English.

It should also be pointed out in all fairness that Prince Philip has been invited as a representative of the Queen of Canada at that ceremony and, therefore, he will enhance it by his presence. Canadians will find there again a participation fully along the lines of their constitution.

A minister of the crown will head the Canadian delegation and, moreover, circumstances would have it that he should be of French origin. As I said earlier, my statement or the message I shall convey will be two thirds in French.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to realize that my intervention led the Associate Minister of National Defence to explain several points.

However, Mr. Chairman, I do not withdraw what I said. I am glad I enabled the Associate Minister of National Defence to explain several points and I shall even ask him to be even more explicit, for according to French and Canadian newspapers, Prince Philip is heading the delegation as the representative of the Queen of Canada. There may be someone from the government to represent Canada, but Prince Philip will come first as the representative of the Queen of Canada.

Therefore, I would ask the Associate Minister of National Defence to tell the house who will take precedence to speak on behalf of Canada? Will it be Prince Philip or the Associate Minister of National Defence?

I hope it will be the Associate Minister of National Defence, and that is what I should like to know. Could the hon. minister give me an answer? Who will have precedence in speaking on behalf of Canada?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, if the house will allow me to answer the question, I would refer the hon. member for Lapointe to the press release issued by the Department of Veterans Affairs. The hon. member for Lapointe will understand that the Vimy ceremony is organized by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

According to the press release published in the newspapers, the head of the Canadian delegation in Vimy will be the Associate Minister of National Defence, Mr. Léo Cadieux.

Therefore, I have quite the impression that in delivering my speech in Vimy, I will act as interpreter of the federal government at this ceremony and I will speak not only on behalf of the cabinet and the government, but also on behalf of the Canadian people, in paying tribute to those valiant Canadians who fought for liberty in 1917 at Vimy.

Mr. Grégoire: Then, Mr. Chairman, I can only conclude from the remarks just expressed by the Associate Minister of National Defence, that for representing Canada, speaking on behalf of Canada, the Associate Minister of National Defence will have precedence over everyone else. He will speak on behalf of Canada, the Canadian army, Canadian veterans, at the commemoration of the battle of Vimy.

The Associate Minister of National Defence —if I understood correctly what he has just told me—will have precedence over everybody else. Can the Associate Minister of National Defence tell us whether or not this is a fair statement?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, to enlighten the hon. member for Lapointe, I will repeat to him that the form of my speech in Vimy will be the reading of a message from the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada. Therefore, I do not see who, apart from the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada, can speak on behalf of the Canadian people. I will be the bearer of a message from the office of the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Guay: He still does not understand.

Mr. Grégoire: I will not waste time on those remarks.

I must tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the Associate Minister of National Defence knows me well enough to realize that I understand very well. But what I wanted, Mr. Chairman —and sometimes it does good to insist and to have a point cleared up—was to have the associate minister himself say it because it has much more weight than if the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) had said it. Of course if it is the hon. member for Lévis who says so it has no weight, no importance whatsoever, but if it is the Associate Minister of National Defence—

Mr. Guay: What do you represent in Ottawa?

Mr. Grégoire: —it means something because it is said by someone in authority.

The Deputy Chairman: The member spoke for exactly 35 minutes; I understand that there have been a few interjections by the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Goyer) and that the hon. member for Lapointe has put a series of questions to the hon. Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux), but I think we can all agree that the time of the hon. member for Lapointe has expired.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I shall close my remarks at this stage, and if I want to elaborate on some points, I shall have another opportunity to do so.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, the white paper of March, 1964, which we now find to be a very interesting document, set out five main priorities. At page 24 of that document we find those priorities stated as follows:

> The choice of priorities outlined above is based on the following assessment:
> 1. Forces for the direct protection of Canada which can be deployed as required.
> 2. Forces-in-being as part of the deterrent in the European theatre.
> 3. Maritime forces-in-being as a contribution to the deterrent.
> 4. Forces-in-being for U.N. peace keeping operations which would be included in (1) above.
> 5. Reserve forces and mobilization potential.

Those were the five basic priorities upon which this government founded its current defence policy. The same white paper made it clear that the NATO commitment as we have understood it for many years would continue, probably using what the minister described in the white paper as a declining proportion of our defence resources.

We were told that the peace keeping role was to be given increased emphasis and the anti-submarine role was to be continued without major change. It was also indicated that air transport facilities would have to be substantially augmented. While it was noted that the NORAD commitment would probably require a declining proportion of our forces, it was indicated that the CF-101's assigned to the task would continue to be used during the life of the aircraft and that the Bomarc squadrons would continue to form part of our defence system as long as they remained an essential part of the NORAD system.

These suggestions were the result of a brief survey but they are generally accepted by students of the white paper. My conclusion is that the role of the armed forces as set out will continue into what we might describe as the foreseeable future but that the peace keeping role will be given greater emphasis in the future.

Since that white paper was written a decided and notable change in policy has taken place. The policy adopted by parliament, rightly or wrongly, was that which was outlined in that white paper. The policy now being pursued is very different. Let me quote what the chief of the defence staff said on February 28 of this year to the standing committee on defence. At page 1760 of volume 27 of the proceedings and evidence of that standing committee he said:

> Canada now wants, while remaining faithful to its existing commitments, to decide itself on the part it wishes to play in the new international society. This is not only its right; it is also its duty. It is its duty to participate to the best of its ability in peace-keeping by supporting the organization which had made itself the champion of the smaller nations—the United Nations Organization.
> In short, that is the transformation proposed by the white paper. That is what we are trying to do. My duty is to organize the military forces in accordance with government policy.

The white paper did not speak of the transformation of roles or policies and it did not indicate there would be a change in form. Indeed, quite the contrary was indicated. If that paper indicated anything it indicated only that there would be a change in emphasis, not a change in policy or role.

Throughout the committee proceedings it was stated that unification would only make sense if there was a single role but would make no sense at all if we continued our existing roles. While existing roles remain, the policy of continuing the existence of the army, navy and air force, identifiable as such, is a constant and continuing necessity. One might ask why that is the case. Let me use the air division in Europe as one example.

The air division in Europe is an integral part of the whole air defence system. It was organized and is operated and supplied not as a separate autonomous unit but as a unit forming part of the whole defence system. It works with and is dependent upon the whole system. The only conclusion I can come to, and indeed the evidence of the senior officers who appeared before the defence committee bears this out, is that the air division in Europe cannot be unified.

The brigade group in Europe forms part of the whole military network. Let me read what the chief of the defence staff said in this regard:

• (5:20 p.m.)

> Missiles are rapidly replacing bombers, and air defence is no longer the exclusive concern of aircraft, anti-submarine defence is no longer the exclusive concern of ships, and the land forces need aerial mobility. And we are asked why the forces have to be unified.

No matter how often that suggestion is made, the facts of the matter are not related to the ability of one part of the Canadian forces to work with another part of our arms but the ability of Canadian forces to work with and be an integral part of international fighting and defence organizations. If we have a mobile force with its own tactical air support—this is the intention, so we are told, and that the role of the CF-105 is about to be changed—that force can operate successfully only in the direct defence of Canada. Let me repeat that. If we have a mobile force with its own tactical air support, that force can operate successfully only in the direct defence of Canada. The mobile force must give up its tactical air support if it is to be used internationally simply because the control of tactical support of this nature is centralized so as to be available for the support of all ground forces in whatever theatre of operations Canadian troops find themselves as the result of Canada's commitments. In other words, the unifying of our forces into a single force reduces, not enhances, our ability to work in an organization such as NATO. In fact, I would say that in some cases it totally nullifies our ability to work in such an organization.

As long as we intend to maintain the roles laid down in the white paper it would be military nonsense to unify the existing three armed services. The conclusion must be drawn from the expert knowledge made available to the members of the defence committee by witnesses, many of whom were chosen by the minister himself to fill the top posts of operational and organizational responsibility in the defence structure of Canada, that a unified force could not fulfil the role laid down in the white paper. Some of these men were subsequently retired, forcefully, arbitrarily or by mutual consent. As I say, Mr. Chairman, their opinion was that a unified force could not fulfil the role laid down in the white paper. The full, sheer and continuing weight of the evidence of every former senior serving officer who came before us supports the contention that a unified force will not be able to meet and fulfil the role set for us in the white paper of 1964.

Let us see what some of these men had to say in support of that position. In the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of February 16, as reported at page 1222, General Foulkes said to the committee:

> Anyone who has exercised higher command in war, or who has been engaged in planning at SHAPE, or who has even been exposed to SHAPE exercises, will be aware that the cardinal principle dealing with the operation of air forces is that of maintaining the maximum centralization of these forces. Parcelling them out in penny packages is most wasteful and creates complete chaos in the air over a battlefield and a grave risk that many of our aircraft will be shot down by the neighbouring forces.

It would seem logical, therefore, that our tactical air forces should be organized not as a force united with other forces of Canada but as a separate force with its own command structure so that it can be used both nationally and internationally with equal facility. Since our role in NATO remains unchanged this would appear to be a vital necessity. Even in the context of small wars, brush fires, and indeed of peacekeeping, this would appear a must unless we are going to go it alone in our undertakings in the world.

What did General Moncel have to say on this subject? As reported at page 1305 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the committee, February 20, that estimable gentleman, a very distinguished Canadian, said:

> In the light of the commitments that are undertaken and which indeed are spelled for us in the white paper, a unified force has no place.

When asked if by "commitments" he meant our commitments to NATO, NORAD and so on, in accordance with our understanding of collective defence, his reply was, "Precisely." One must therefore conclude, in the light of this testimony and the weight of similar statements, many of them backed up with facts and experience, that to unify our forces while we maintain our existing roles as laid down in the white paper is militarily impractical and logically makes no sense.

What did Air Vice Marshal Hendricks have to say about this? As reported at page 1447 of the committee proceedings of February 21, he said:

> There is a final fallacy which appears in this concept of where we are heading, and that is that we can operate by ourselves. We can operate by ourselves only if what we do is very, very simple indeed—

Again, the conclusion to be drawn is that it is necessary to organize our armed forces so they can dovetail readily with NATO or any other alliance that may be arranged. But unification will not permit ready organizational dovetailing capability on the part of our armed services.

Let us come back to the role of the armed forces. The minister has repeatedly stated that the roles are the roles as they have been presented in the white paper. It must therefore be obvious that already the rapidly accelerating degree of integration of the armed forces is on the way to creating an organization which, when fulfilled, will become less usable with our allies than our present tri-service organizations.

Moreover, if unification is carried out and Bill C-243 is passed by this parliament we will be endangering our ability to work satisfactorily with our allies. However, there is one escape route. Unification may make sense if it is the intention to drop the roles as laid down in the white paper in favour of the single role of peacekeeping, brush fire operation and so on or, if you wish, create a mobile force for the defence of Canada within Canada and defending only Canadian soil.

General Moncel underlined extremely well the inflexibility of our present system and the narrowness of the limits of a unified force. He said:

> If you want a unified force that somehow is going to call up a need for a seagoing element that is essentially a transport element, that is fine—write your commitments accordingly; but do not then turn around and say that you want a fighting, deep sea navy next week, because you will not get it.

It is impossible to get it in that situation. The decision on the role or roles must be taken first, and after that the decision must be taken on the military organization necessary to fulfil the role or roles. We have to get the cart back behind the horse where it belongs. In view of what the white paper says, and in view of what unification requires in the way of a single role, it is obvious that this bill must be shelved until a close scrutiny has been given to the defence requirements. These contradictions, obvious and devious, must first be studied and understood before we proceed. On seven different occasions attempts have been made both in committee and here in the house—as a matter of fact I believe it is now eight or nine occasions—to have this matter referred to the standing committee on external affairs or to a combined committee on defence and external affairs so that we may guard against, if nothing else, becoming the laughing stock of the world.

It is a useful practice to examine what armed forces have been doing since the end of world war II. In Korea—and I am neither an old general nor a young seaman, nor have I had any military experience other than a brief period in the militia in Canada—unless I am much mistaken both our land and sea forces fitted in very well with the forces of other nations which participated, even though they were separate forces. I think I am right in saying that the Cuban operations were almost exclusively maritime. The organization of a separate United States navy seems to have fitted this picture extremely well. In Viet Nam today the armies of the United States, New Zealand, Australia, South Viet Nam and other contributing forces co-operate effectively under one over-all, unified command. If I remember correctly, Suez was a military operation which brought French and British land and naval forces together successfully. I cannot visualize how the operation might have been carried out had the contribution of one of these key nations been by way of a unified force.

We had another type of commitment such as the one in Korea. Could a unified force have worked there effectively? The lessons of history do not necessarily bear that out—in fact, quite the contrary. First, our tactical air forces could not reach anywhere on the other side of the Atlantic or Pacific oceans unless transported there by ships or refuelled in flight by very expensive aircraft which as a matter of fact we do not yet possess. But even if they were finally placed in some foreign land how could they fit into the structure of the forces of our allies who would have centralized the control of their tactical air forces?

How would our mobile force with its headquarters in the province of Quebec, miles from the scene of operations, deal with the land forces? Surely the component of the land force would have to be separated, as our brigade group in Europe is separated now, and this in turn would call for an army and not a unified force. The navy, likewise, would be operating almost exclusively in a naval role together with the navies of other nations. It would appear that as part of a unified force it would be poorly served, indeed most inadequately served, by such an organization.

However one looks at this thing, the conclusion that constantly rears its head is that unification, as long as we are working in alliances and contributing to collective national defence, is a change with little to commend it except that is is different. The organization of our forces must be compatible with those of other nations. I reiterate that it must continue to be so as long as the role of our defence forces continues to be the one which was set out in the white paper of 1964.

In committee proceedings No. 14 at page 440 the Minister of National Defence made the following remarks:

> I hope that I have been able to indicate that our defence objectives have not changed substantially ... and that we are prepared in these particular meetings to relate the policy to the structure, roles and equipment required by the forces.

Subsequent to that statement a succession of expert witnesses clearly stated—and I repeat it because it bears repeating—that unification is simply not compatible with the roles outlined in the white paper. Air Chief Marshal Miller made this point most emphatically. General Moncel, General Fleury, Air Marshal Annis and Admiral Landymore all made the same point from their own particular viewpoint based on their expertise and experience. Here we have top officers with outstanding qualifications and very recent experience, particularly so far as Air Chief Marshal Miller is concerned, and representing the three fighting environments and the support component, all clearly of the opinion that unification and the roles outlined in the white paper are incompatible, that there is no way of joining them together. Admiral Landymore pointed out quite emphatically that it would mean the end of an effective maritime defence for Canada and that Canada's international maritime commitments could not be fulfilled.

In the same connection General Moncel said the following, as appears in committee proceedings No. 22 at page 1333:

> The more the navy is forced into carrying the soldiers up and down the coast of Nova Scotia to the exclusion of everything else, the exclusion of going to sea; the more their equipment is rationalized with the army equipment; the more out of phase they get with allied navies—

In fact, General Moncel made this statement as appears at page 1332 of the committee's proceedings:

> I think if you want some form of intervention and peacekeeping on a minor scale, if you are satisfied with that and do it in conjunction with other countries, that you could have a unified force and do this thing. But, bear in mind the size of it—
> The kind of force that Canada can sustain alone, abroad, on a protracted basis, on a decent battlefield day, fighting at what we called FFC rates, is about a battalion.
> [Mr. Forrestall.]

He said that this was what we could support ourselves, both logistically and also, I suppose, in dollars and cents.

He also said, as appears at page 1313 of committee proceedings No. 22:

> If you press this thing forward your commitments must obviously vary with what the force is capable of doing. If you press a unified force through to its conclusion, you are going to have to drop some commitments, or change them.

At page 1317 General Moncel further warned:

> The planning heads have got to keep their wits about them and stay on top of this. It must be a progressive thing all the time, towards the most effective Canadian defence force. This is the object of the exercise; it is not unification. Surely the object must be to have the most effective Canadian defence force ... once you have unified it you are not going to un-unify it.

On the other hand, we have General Allard and Air Marshals Sharp and Rhyno indicating support for the policy. Bearing in mind that the latter are serving officers with no small obligation to see eye to eye with the minister on defence matters, it would appear to me that the weight of evidence does not favour unification. Perhaps it is unjust to these officers to suggest that their testimony might be somewhat reserved because of their relationships, but it is a fact that none of the present defence staff made any attempt to show, for example, that if our forces were unified they would be compatible with the forces of other nations. This may be an accidental omission, but the very fact that the air division and the brigade group in Europe will retain their exclusive air force and army structures respectively leaves me in some doubt that they were aware of their omissions, especially in view of the fact that the chief of the defence staff gave his testimony after all the others I have named with the exception of Air Chief Marshal Miller. The fact also that the chief of the defence staff used the words: "the transformation proposed by the white paper" indicates to me that he has begun to put far more emphasis on peacekeeping than on fulfilling the roles laid down in the white paper.

The acceptance of any clause of Bill C-243, other than those which were brought in to tidy up some legal matters, will mean tacit agreement or willingness on the part of the members of this house and the people of Canada to accept the total withdrawal of Canada from its existing commitments. These are long-time commitments. Frankly I do not think that this is what we should want or indeed what is needed for this country, but it is what we will get so long as we try to match unification to the defence roles in the white paper.

I am sorry the Minister of National Defence is not in the house. I wanted to make some remarks in connection with the statements made by General Allard in his speech over the week end but I will let them go until a later time. I will simply conclude by reiterating that the force and the sheer weight of evidence dealing with ranks, dress, morale, the roles of our forces, the organizational faults, the incompatibility of the unified force in terms of our foreign commitments, the supposed increased efficiency, and the dollars and cents savings which we have not seen yet, at least not in the form of hardware which was to have been the initial purpose, all point to the inadvisability of pursuing unification now. All of the evidence by virtually every serving officer who was forced to retire prematurely or who happened, by coincidence, to have come to the end of his time, points to the inadvisability of pursuing total unification now. Even those who suggest that there might be merit in the concept of a unified defence structure for Canada caution about the speed we are travelling along this avenue and point out that we are blindly going ahead without bothering to read the road signs first.

Mr. McNulty: Mr. Chairman, during the recent and, I might add, exhaustive study of the problems of the unification program by the defence committee Canada's anti-submarine role came in for close scrutiny. Numerous wild charges were made in the committee to the effect that the navy is being destroyed and that there has been a serious reduction in the operational effectiveness of our anti-submarine forces. A close examination of the evidence given in the committee proves that this is not so.

The first point I should like to consider is the allegation that the navy and particularly our anti-submarine forces are being destroyed. This allegation is not in accordance with the facts. On December 7, 1966, the minister informed the house, as recorded on page 10825 of Hansard:

> The naval share of the current five year equipment and equipment development program, ending March 31, 1971, is approximately $460 million. This represents a 23 per cent increase in the navy's share in equipment and equipment development over that spent in the previous five years.

This hardly seems to me to be evidence of an attempt to cut down our maritime forces. Charges were made also that the effectiveness of our anti-submarine force had been seriously reduced during the past three years. I would refer those who want the facts to pages 1926 to 1928 of the minutes of evidence of the defence committee for March 2, 1967, where they will find an excellent statement by Commodore H. A. Porter, the director general of maritime forces, on the effectiveness of our anti-submarine role. This statement was made by him and is recorded on page 1927 of the committee evidence. It should be noted that Commodore Porter prefaces his remarks by saying that his testimony is not just his own personal judgment but is the professional opinion of competent officers who are specialists in anti-submarine warfare. The suggestion has been made that a certain reduction in the number of frigates over the past three years has decreased our anti-submarine capability. On this point, Commodore Porter said:

> Although it had been planned to dispose of the older world war II destroyers and to place some frigates in reserve as the new destroyers became available, this plan was postponed for a number of reasons including the Cuban crisis of late 1962. Thus, by mid-1963 the Royal Canadian Navy was seriously overextended in maintaining this large number of ships in commission. In particular, some ships were manned with as little as 70 per cent of the crew required for operational efficiency. In addition, in order to man ships, even at that level, crew members from a ship entering regular overhaul and refit periods were transferred to a ship just completing such a period. Changes of 100 per cent in the manning billets in a ship within one year were not unusual.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I cannot see how the navy's effectiveness was in any way enhanced by keeping in commission 17 out of date under-manned frigates at the end of their useful life and whose operational effectiveness was far below potential. Indeed, Commodore Porter pointed out, as recorded on page 1927 of the committee evidence:

> As a subsidiary effect, the morale and efficiency of the men were affected owing to the doubling of duties in undermanned ships, the constant changes from ship to ship, and the reduction in the normal opportunities for many of them to enjoy home life.

Having established the problem, Mr. Chairman, what are the solutions? We have to go on the premise that effectiveness comprises three factors, namely, men, equipment and vessels. The men, we know, are of the highest calibre in the world. There is no question about that. But what of the ships? Commodore Porter says this, as recorded on page 1928 of the committee evidence:

> It is believed that in spite of the reduction in the number of ships, the effectiveness of the maritime force has not been reduced since the early 1960's but has improved and significantly so in certain areas. It is confidently expected that in the period ahead the new ships and helicopters under procurement action now as well as the planned retrofit of new weapon systems in older ships, will provide the maritime force with a greatly increased operational effectiveness when compared with 1963.

This point was continually raised during the committee hearings. Some hon. members opposite could not understand, or apparently did not wish to understand, that it is possible to have a more effective anti-submarine force today with fewer ships than we had in 1963, that quality is just as important, if not more, as quantity. I am no expert in this field. However, it seems to me only common sense that if the weapons and mobility of the fleet are greatly improved, as they have been, that the number of vessels, particularly those which are undermanned and obsolete, is practically immaterial.

I should like to give four examples:

1. The commissioning of the operational support ship, H.M.C.S. Provider, which permits an increase of 3 to 10 anti-submarine escorts to remain on continuous station 1,000 miles off shore in a force of 18 ships—a gain of three times the operational effectiveness according to Commodore Porter. Two more operational support ships are on order. These will further substantially enhance our ability to conduct anti-submarine operations, both in peacetime and in an emergency.

2. The addition of one submarine, with two more on order.

3. The conversion of seven St. Laurent class destroyers to carry Sea-King helicopters with mobile anti-submarine systems which give the force a tremendously increased mobility. I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, from the evidence that was presented to the defence committee by senior professional officers, that our anti-submarine capability has been greatly enhanced over the past four years because of the acquisition of the vessels just mentioned.

What about weapons and weapons systems? Surely they are critically important when considering the effectiveness of our maritime forces. Let us just examine them for a moment.

• (5:50 p.m.)

First, Mr. Chairman, we have the introduction of the variable depth sonar system for underwater detection of submarines. We have the introduction of the Mark 44 anti-submarine torpedo. There are improvements in the long-range detection systems in some aircraft and ships of maritime command. We have real improvement in the undersea detection and tracking system and, of course, anti-shipping rockets for the Tracker aircraft. Under development for the navy as well is the Sea Sparrow all-weather, close-range, surface-to-surface missile system which is to be fitted into the four new helicopter destroyers and two new operational support ships.

We have talked about the operational effectiveness of our maritime A.S.W. forces under the categories of men, vessels and equipment. We know we have the best men. We also know that although there are less ships in commission today than there were, say, in 1953, their effectiveness has improved significantly because of modernization, refit and mobility. Finally, we know that these ships now have and are getting better and more devastating weapons and weapons systems.

With all these known quantities, Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to understand why anyone should feel nervous about our maritime forces in the A.S.W. role being less effective than they were previously. Actually, I feel that Canadians should be quite heartened by the facts of the situation, that we are not only effectively meeting our commitment to NATO's SACLANT forces but that there is great promise for improving upon this capability in the 1967-70 period. Our naval experts serving today who are truly experts on the situation tell us that there is really no cause for alarm at all.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, it was a little over a year ago during the debate on national defence in this house that my colleague from Halifax made the point that he thought morale in the armed forces, and more particularly in the Royal Canadian Navy with which we are most familiar, was confused. Since the hon. member did not say it was bad—admittedly he did not say it was good but he did not say it was bad—this remark gave some comfort to the Minister of National Defence and the Associate Minister of National Defence. I think that if my colleague were to assess morale in the Royal Canadian Navy today he would indeed say that it was bad. When he and I have been home we have had the experience of almost daily contact with officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy and have had an opportunity to assess their feelings. At times we have been bombarded with the problems of those who feel that service life is no longer attractive.

If there is any question among hon. members opposite that morale is not a problem in the Royal Canadian Navy, I should like to refer to the daily orders of H.M.C.S. Saguenay, a destroyer-escort, for Monday, February 27, 1967. I have before me a photostat copy as reproduced in the Dartmouth Free Press for March 17. Part of the daily orders reads as follows:

> There will be no leave until morale improves.

The words "no leave until morale improves" have been underlined by the person who sent this excerpt to the Darmouth Free Press. So any attempt to gloss over the suggestion that morale in the services is not the same as it used to be before these strange processes got under way is defeated, and the minister can find no comfort in the state of the morale in the Royal Canadian Navy today, which he can observe just as easily as we can.

A few weeks ago, on a Saturday, a poor lost soul came to see me. He is a civil servant, one of those who work in an office where some form of integration has taken place. As a result of the administrative changes within his office he did not know who his immediate superior was or the man above that immediate superior. In fact, he did not know quite a few of the men in the chain of command until he got to the very top of the administration of H.M.C. Dockyard.

This person related to me something that has happened to quite a number of people who now work as civilian support for the services. These people are confused. They do not know the proper chain of authority or command in the offices in which they work, and when they ask someone whom they think might be their superior officers in that chain of command they get no satisfactory answer. This case of the poor lost soul in one of the establishments supporting the Royal Canadian Navy in Halifax is just one of the many human examples that exist under this integration and unification plan.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? The hon. member referred to an order which had been posted on the Saguenay on February 27, I think he said, indicating that no leave would be granted. I should like to underline the fact that on Monday, February 27 the Saguenay was at sea, so certainly some of the naval personnel at Halifax have not lost their sense of humour.

Mr. McCleave: It is possible they have not lost their sense of humour, and that is one way to look at the situation. But I presume that application must be made for leave and this is a matter which is dealt with during the course of a voyage and as the ship approaches port. So if this was an attempt at humour it was an ill-conceived attempt. It meant enough to some people at least that they raised a fearful row, or attempted to, by sending this extract to one of the newspapers in my area.

I did not have the advantage of being a member of the defence committee, though I have read a large part of the evidence presented to the committee. It seems to me that an objective examination of the evidence that was presented, including the remarks of the minister and the associate minister and of those who supported them in their beliefs, as well as the remarks of the former officers who do not support these concepts, would lead any fair-minded person to say that the preponderance of the evidence clearly went against the Minister of National Defence and the unification bill that we are now studying.

In this regard one could mention the evidence of such people as Rear Admiral William Landymore and others, but I think that the most telling evidence was that presented by a man who in a way was responsible for getting the unification show on the road, a man who had something to do with working out the integration that had preceded it. I refer, of course, to Air Chief Marshal F. R. Miller, who was chief of the defence staff when it was formed in July, 1964 and who left that staff in 1966 after approximately two years' service. Surely, the words of a man who worked closely with the Minister of National Defence and the associate minister are words which are well worth weighing when hon. members are considering the bill before them. I intend to review some of the more pertinent points which Air Chief Marshal Miller made.

First, we find him making this point in answer to the hon. member for Vancouver East, as reported at page 2290 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 35:

> So that when we embarked on the problem, when the government made this decision that we would go for integration, we were not too sure what it would be, and we regarded it as a pragmatic operation which we would set up—an organization using three services, that would ensure that there was single direction, single management applied to the three services. We saw the next step, the step which is now called unification, as being a subsequent step sometime later.
> I do not think anybody is ever completely satisfied with an organization. We made very many changes in our first integrated organization we set up, I imagine that they are still making changes. However, the large basic organizational frame is there, and I think it is a good one as far as an integrated defence staff is concerned.

So Air Chief Marshal Miller is giving his blessing to the idea of integration. Further on we read these words.

Mr. Winch: I follow up, then, with my next question. While you were chief of staff, was the policy of unification a matter of consultation between the military and civilian authorities, or were you obeying an assumption from the Minister of National Defence?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: I would think the best way to phrase it would be that it was an understanding that that was where we were going. I did not have what I felt was an instruction from the minister. It was an agreement to the policies set out in the white paper. The timing and the method were not spelled out there.

As we know from statements which have been made from time to time during this debate there was certainly no spelling out of the concept of unification in the white paper, though I think there was one mention of it on page 19. On page 2291 of the committee proceedings there is the following statement by Air Chief Marshal Miller:

The area of unification is a very sensitive one, as you well know. It strikes at the traditions and the feelings of a lot of people. I did not see, up until the time I left, that the return from pressing the unification sign was commensurate with the disruption and the great concern to the man in uniform that would result from it.

In other words he is saying, I think, that the "pros" on the side of unification are far outweighed by the "cons"—by the havoc which was being created. This is understandable in the light of the witness' previous statement that he never did get any heart to heart talks with the minister as to the road the hon. gentleman intended to follow.

I turn now to the evidence given by the Air Marshal as it appears at page 2297:

Mr. Harkness: Another thing which was brought up by a number of witnesses is that there was a threat that unification would inevitably—when you had a single unified force—result in a considerable loss of expertise in the three different environments of the sea, air and land warfare. What is your view on that?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: Well, that is predicated on the people being dissatisfied with the conditions and leaving. If the conditions are made attractive and information is made available to all the people, you might not lose them—I do not know. The big thing is the loss of people. I do not think we can force people to stay on if the government unilaterally tears up their contracts. If they join the navy and the navy disappears, you have, in my view, to give the men an option as to whether they will continue in the new service or whether they will leave. The decision with which you are facing those men has to be very carefully considered and prepared for.

Mr. Harkness: You would contemplate then that there might be a considerable further loss of highly trained personnel as a result of this move if it is made, going into effect.

Air Chief Marshal Miller: That is very well worth consideration. I do not think you will ever know what it is until you spell out what the conditions are and put them up to the men and see what the reaction is.

Mr. Harkness: That is one of the possible serious results.

Air Chief Marshal Miller: Yes.

I should have noted earlier that Air Chief Marshal Miller did not go before the committee with a prepared statement. He made his remarks off the cuff and anyone reading his evidence will appreciate that here was a man speaking from his heart and from his mind as to his actual experience. The whole tone of the evidence inspires a belief in its trustworthiness. As reported at page 2300, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is asking questions of the witness:

Mr. Nugent: Would I sum up your attitude accurately if I suggested that the case is simply this: Whether or not unification should ever be brought in and how quickly it would be brought in would be determined by a survey of the results of integration after these experiments had been finished and there had been a chance for an appraisal of their success or failure.

Air Chief Marshal Miller: Certainly the question of taking on unification was predicated on the integration—you call it experiment—the effort working.

Finally I should like to quote what this distinguished officer had to say as reported at page 2302. The hon. member for Kootenay East is the questioner:

Mr. Byrne: Then, do you believe that the implementation of Bill C-243 would result in significant demoralization of the various forces?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: If rushed, I would think so.

Mr. Byrne: If rushed. Do you consider that Bill C-243 is the exemplification of unification, that is, that it is exemplified in this bill?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: Yes, I think it is.

These are warnings which should cause the minister and the government of which he is a member, though a member diminishing in value, to pause. On reading the remarks made by the Prime Minister at a press conference which followed Air Chief Marshal Miller's presentation I thought the Prime Minister was about to take the statesmanlike step of switching on the red light and stopping this process until things had shaken down in the Department of National Defence. That was my impression of the Prime Minister's first reaction to the testimony of Air Chief Marshal Miller before the committee. Then something happened—I suspect it was a long distance telephone call from an annoyed Minister of National Defence—and the Prime Minister backed away from his previous comments.

It has often been said by those who favour unification and integration that they do so because the concept is new and because it will save money. I do not think it will save money—the budget of the Department of National Defence does not bear out that contention—and as for its novelty, it might be expected to appeal to young people. However, I should like to quote the results of a survey which was carried out in the Halifax area. A questionnaire was distributed to high school and university students and interested adults who visited Dalhousie University during a two day meet the public campaign. About 1,200 questionnaires were returned and, quoting from the Chronicle-Herald of Wednesday, March 22, these were the results:

On the issue of armed forces integration, 50 per cent were opposed, 42 per cent were in favour, and 8 per cent didn't care one way or the other.

This survey was carried out by, believe it or not, the Student Liberal Association at Dalhousie University. I once had occasion to become aware of the weight of this splendid organization. They helped nail my hide to the wall in the 1963 election so I quite respect them as adversaries. The survey they carried out would, I think, embrace a fair number of members of that organization and, to put it very succinctly, the results showed that half of the young people polled did not believe in the policies of the Minister of National Defence. Many of these people are those who might be expected to support him when he takes part in the steeplechase approximately a year from now, let us say, for succession to leadership of the Liberal party.

It is no wonder then, sir, that the Tri-Service Identities Organization, in its summation recently sent to all members of parliament, was able to present some ten arguments why unification was not a viable way of moulding our armed forces. Point No. 2 in its summation is an interesting one. It reads:

Claims that other countries are following the Canadian example have not been substantiated. In fact government intentions as expressed in white papers on defence in the United Kingdom, France and New Zealand show no indication of emulating the Canadian plan which will be carried forward if the bill is enacted. Informed persons in both the U.S.A. and United Kingdom, as evidenced by recent articles and statements, have indicated concern or disenchantment with the Canadian experiment.

But I do not suppose the Minister of National Defence is any more proficient in reading adverse opinions from abroad than he is in listening to adverse opinions at home.

A few minutes ago the hon. member for Lincoln made a point concerning the reduction in operational ships of the Royal Canadian Navy and argued that the ships remaining in service, because of their increased weaponry and other new refinements, are much stronger warships than existed ten years ago. Of course this is true, Mr. Chairman. I do not think it is an act of genius to discover this fact, but the hon. member goes too far when he suggests that we in the opposition misunderstand the effect of the reduction in the number of ships that are operational.

We grant that any one ship is superior in its fighting abilities, anti-submarine warfare abilities and detection of submarines than the same ship was a few years back. But what we are saying is that if we continue to reduce the number of ships and are left with one or two they may be vastly superior but they will not have the same over-all effect as a fully operational fleet.

The MacDuff Ottawa Report in the Dartmouth Free Press of March 2 makes a point which I think is a valid one in assessment of the type of criticism heard in the defence committee. It reads in part:

—what they consistently attack is integration—the process that has been going on for three years, that many of them developed and carried out, the process they say is good.

This has given the defence committee hearings a somewhat unreal air.

As an outsider in respect of the defence committee that point struck me as quite a valid one. In other words, Mr. Chairman, we are still in an area where many of the problems associated with change in the Department of National Defence arise because integration itself has not yet fully worked itself out. I am not surprised at this and in a way do not hold any minister responsible for it in the sense that the department is a very large organization indeed and when you have a large organization it becomes extremely difficult to make changes within it.

I noted the case a few moments ago of the poor lost soul who could not ascertain the chain of command in one of the civilian offices attached to the military establishment in Halifax. I think that part of the failure to achieve the maximum benefits of integration can be laid to the system itself. We are taking something very huge and trying to change it about. But I do not absolve the minister simply because Parkinson's law happens to be in effect in dealing with this matter. The fact is that the minister himself, by the golden handshake he has given many of his best advisers, or the golden boot might be a better way of describing it, has created havoc in his own organization. By reason of his failure over the past year to support his officers, particularly those in the navy, because of his failure not to berate publicly his own unnamed spokesmen in the department who have tried to turn the naval service into open class warfare, the minister has a great deal of responsibility in this particular area and much of what is happening is a result of the minister's own personal and unique way of doing things. In that respect I would wish that he could learn more from the very gentlemanly Associate Minister of National Defence who has somehow, despite all the uproar, managed to remain high in the esteem of every member of this committee.

Finally, sir, I would quote a program presented in somewhat jocular fashion in a letter by a Robert N. Clements of Spring Garden Road, Halifax, to the editor of the Chronicle-Herald and printed in that publication on February 9 this year:

> Sir,— It is hard to understand the timidity of Defence Minister Hellyer and his advisers in the promotion of the program of unification now being presented to the Canadian public through parliament.
> Why hesitate and refrain from a complete job? Why not rename the future defence service as the Canadian Water, Land and Air Department (CWLAD)?
> The senior officers could be listed as superintendents, first, second, and third class, and all the other ranks known as journeymen.
> Judging from samples of a few selected recruits displayed on television during the past several months, this action would attract such desired types in sufficient numbers to keep the service from complete collapse.
> A simple denim coverall would be good enough for the lot, and equipment could be reduced to a bucket and mop for the navy, a pick and shovel for the army, and some rubber balloons for the air department.
> The colossal saving would more than finance complete medicare for the whole country, without cost to any provincial government, with enough left over to do away with Health Minister MacEachen's means test and supply all old age pensioners at least 150 per month at age 65.

> Following this achievement, our government could turn its limited talents and time toward the integration of sundry splinter groups for unification of Canada into one country, rather than the present collection of Balkan-type states.
> As a start it could eliminate any further activity by our $5,000,000-plus, B and B commission which to date has merely served to stir up and create more bad feeling than any other activity in recent Canadian history.
> Further suggestions are available on request.
> Robert N. Clements

Finally, Mr. Chairman, it is again a matter of regret that a workable national defence policy could not have been evolved by members of all parties meeting in a committee with the type of witnesses that were heard by the committee on national defence but with the advantage that a very emotional issue had not been presented beforehand and therefore the advantage that concrete proposals could have emerged which would have represented the best common denominator of thinking in respect of this highly important field. As I say, I am sorry it has not happened in that way. The records of the committee on national defence contain too many harsh interjections by members with reference to each other and red hot clashes of personalities. This matter should not have become a highly personalized issue. I venture to suggest that this would not have been the case had the Minister of National Defence taken the advice to call upon an all-party committee of the House of Commons to deal with the problem of national defence in the future and perforce our external affairs policy which should be considered at the same time. That course was not taken. The government is following a course which has been proven to be one of folly. We shall continue to offer all the resistance we can to it.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, like all my colleagues I thought that everything had been said about that bill during the many sittings of the parliamentary committee and during the hours we spent discussing it at the various stages.

Like many other hon. members, I also felt that it was better to keep quiet in order to expedite the passing of this bill, because many of us are under the impression that everything we hear now is repeated and rehashed. The same arguments, the same testimonies are constantly being brought forward. There is nothing new and I think that all Canadians are beginning to be fed up with those endless discussions which fail to settle anything and take up the time of the house.

But nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, two incidents happened yesterday and today which prompt me to make an intervention that I shall try to keep as brief as possible.

The first deals with the opportunity seized by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire)—I am sorry he is not in the house and that the rules did not allow me to say this in his presence—to harp once again on his separatist string. Of course, this afternoon, his intervention was weak and sad in many respects. He put forward baseless arguments; for instance, he referred to the forthcoming celebration of the Vimy battle, and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) left him without a leg to stand on, to use a current expression. He also brought up another disgraceful incident purported to have occurred in Bagotville two years ago and he dragged out musty files authored by Mr. Marcel Chaput, that other high priest of separatism. He very nearly would suggest to the minister, in order to settle the problem, that he appoint Mr. Chaput as commander in chief of our army and he himself would become a little corporal, a corporal in camouflage, in which he would undoubtedly excel, to judge from the way he never misses a trick to promote his separatist ideology, with such success as we have witnessed this afternoon.

What seemed most scandalous to me, Mr. Chairman, was to observe the member for Lapointe who seeks to appear as the saviour of the Quebec nation and who never misses a change to grab the headlines and claims to be the only member in this house to defend the rights of the people of Quebec when he opened wide his arms to the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) himself a well-known wrecker, even a saboteur of national unity in this country.

We have seen earlier the Quebec separatist leader embracing the Ontario separatist leader; we have seen them billing and cooing, but back in their own ridings, one will say that he wants to protect the French Canadians, the other, the Canadian people.

Mr. Chairman, I was wishing a while ago that the rules allowed me to snap a picture of those two members of parliament whose ideologies are miles apart—or should be, if they are logical with themselves—whispering compliments to one another, exchanging suggestions to improve somewhat their vicious procedures which only boil down to destroying the understanding between the two main racial groups in the country.

I think this warrants a protest, Mr. Chairman, for it eloquently reveals the wolf in sheep's clothing and I am sure that the people of Quebec will soon realize that the leader of the Ralliement national is nothing but an imposter whose arguments do not hold water and who excels at making mental reservations and at twisting the truth to suit his purpose. Such an attitude had to be brought out into the open, Mr. Chairman.

Another incident occurred yesterday. The integrity of General Allard was questioned here in this house.

Mr. Chairman, General Allard was born in my riding and lived in my home town. He is somewhat younger than I am. I saw him grow up, go to school, go through his first campaign in the army. I know him well and I must say, in all sincerity, that he is a man of unassailable integrity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mongrain: Had he not been convinced that unification, that the integration which the government proposes to bring about were a good thing, I know he would have resigned rather than speak against his convictions.

Therefore, I think it rests with me, Mr. Chairman, to rise and defend him against his detractors.

And I am surprised that so much consideration has been given to the military men, the generals and admirals who sharply criticized that policy of the government and whom we read the evidence with attention and even respect. Many of those who allowed such a free criticism of the government will not permit the authorities of the Canadian army to defend the policy of their government as loyal Canadians should do.

I think that is illogical and that someone should point it out. It is the duty of General Allard to defend unification, because it is the policy of his government. I have never thought that it belonged to the servicemen to establish the policy of the country. Moreover, it behooves the government to establish the policy of the country and the military men to respect it. This is what General Allard is doing: his duty.

• (6:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mongrain: And had he acted differently, he would have been disloyal and he would have deserved the dismissal which some of his colleagues had to face.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that the morale of the troops was low. I am a bad judge in these matters. I choose to take General Allard's word, for he is better acquainted with them than I. However, should it be true that the troop's morale is low I believe that many members of this house should confess their guilt for it would be the result of their efforts to bring discredit on the government's policies and the high officers who are trying to implement them.

What would you think, Mr. Chairman, of someone who told 30 students in a classroom that their teacher was not following the right course because he insisted upon following the instructions of the School Board and the school principal? You would say: that is disloyalty. And eventually those students would lose confidence in their teacher. Their morale would suffer. The same thing happens in the army at the present time. And I think that members abuse here, in this house, of that criticism, and that they take advantage of too many circumstances to put in a bad light the responsible heads of the Canadian army who, for conscience' sake, want to defend the government policy.

Generals and admirals with a vast experience were called upon to give evidence. Everyone said what he had to say. It remains now for the government to adopt a policy, and neither those in favour of unification nor those against it can be muzzled, unless closure is to be imposed here.

Mr. Chairman, I think it should be added that General Allard is not a man who speaks through his hat and that he earned through hard work and experience the position he now holds. I should like to give, as briefly as possible, that it may be placed on Hansard, outline of the experience which allows him to speak knowingly of all the problems of the Canadian army.

1933: He received his commission in the non-permanent active militia.

At Trois-Rivières, Mr. Chairman.

1939: He went on active service and became a major in the Trois-Rivières Regiment (armoured). Between 1939 and 1943 he held several positions in Canada and overseas to become, in 1943, second in command of the Royal 22nd Regiment in Italy.

At the front. I feel that the fact that he risked his life for his country in 20 battles, that there might be peace in the world, should be reason enough to spare him the sneaky attacks now inflicted upon him.

December 1943: While acting commander of the 22nd, General Allard received the "Distinguished Service Order" (D.S.O.) for his courage, initiative and military competence in the battle of the Arielli, near Ortona.

January 1944: He assumed command of the 22nd Regiment and, in September, his outstanding record, in the break-through of the Gothic line, brought him a first bar to his decoration.

March 1945: He was promoted to brigadier, and was placed in command of the 6th Canadian Infantry Brigade in Holland. During that period, he received a second bar.

1945-48: He was sent to Moscow as military attaché to the Canadian Embassy, and he later became commander of the eastern Quebec command.

1950-51: He spent a year at the Imperial Defence College in Great Britain, then became vice-quartermaster general of the Canadian army.

1953: He was appointed commander of the 25th Canadian infantry brigade in Korea and represented Canada at the signing of the cease fire at Panmunjon on July 27, 1953.

1954: He was commander of the 3rd Canadian infantry brigade at Valcartier, then commander of the eastern Quebec sector until his promotion to vice-chief of staff of the army in Ottawa in 1958.

November 1961: Her Majesty the Queen approved the promotion of General Allard as commander of the 4th division of the British army on the Rhine, in Germany, the first Canadian to hold such a post.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mongrain:

October 1963: He came back to Canada as major-general in charge of survival operations at army headquarters.

1964: At the time of the integration of armed forces, in September, he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general and appointed chief of operational preparedness.

September 1965: He took charge of the new mobile force command.

1966: On July 16, 1966, he was promoted to the rank of general and appointed chief of defence staff for Canada.

Decorations: In addition to his decorations received for bravery, General Allard is commander of the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire, was awarded the Croix de guerre and the Légion d'honneur by France, the Lion of Bronze by the Netherlands, and the decoration of officers of the Legion of Merit by the United States.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, he has not learned his calling solely through books. He has learned it through practice. In fact, he took training in the navy and the air force.

In the air force, for instance, he has accumulated more than 1,000 flying hours aboard Tiger Moths, Pipers, Cessnas as well as aboard L-19 Birddogs. Then, he chalked up a lot of flying time as co-pilot on Dakotas, Beechcrafts, Seabees, Beavers. He also flew the British Hunter as well as CF-104's, CF-101's, DH-125's, Mystère 20's and CF-5's.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that this man is rather extraordinarily competent; his services to his country and to the peace of the world, deserve the respect of every man in this house and should at least protect him from such insinuations as were made when it was said that he supported unification and integration because he had to agree with the minister for reasons of personal advancement. He is not that type of a man and I know he would have the guts to resign if he was not convinced in his mind and in his conscience that it is the thing to do.

So, as the member for Trois-Rivières, I rise in the defence not only of a good citizen, but of a great Canadian, a great servant of Canada intent on maintaining peace in the world. And I urge my colleagues to show more consideration for services rendered and to stop wasting the valuable time of the house.

• (6:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to see the minister back in the house. Earlier he was absent and I hope he has dined well.

When I was speaking earlier, I suggested that the basic groundwork for a proper and adequate review of the legislation now before us could not be laid by anyone else in the house other than the minister, because he has ample time to set forth his views and understandings of the bill. Members must direct their comments to appropriate provisions; for that reason many of us will be on our feet on several occasions during the course of the next few days.

At this time I should like to extend the remarks I made earlier and outline my understanding of the state of the unification concept at the time the committee meetings concluded. It seems appropriate, in view of the marked division of opinion in respect of Bill C-243, that the minister reassess the evidence given to the committee and the meaningfulness of proceeding with the bill at this time.

We have been told quite emphatically that the government cannot accept any substantial amendment to the bill, that the acceptance of any such amendment would constitute want of confidence in the government and might force it to go to the people for a decision. I am not one of those who believe this should not be done. On the contrary, I feel quite strongly that if the people of Canada were properly advised and informed in respect of this measure, they would like to express their opinion on the merits of unification. I suggest this in light of the evidence and opinions which came to our attention during committee hearings.

During the course of those hearings, one very important fact came to light. Senior officers, past and present, openly declared their support for integration. The opponents of unification were most emphatic on this point, and most agreed with the principle of integration. Many of them, in fact all of those men who were retired earlier, worked very hard to achieve integration. Most of them felt that once the problems in respect of the implementation of integration had been solved, and procedures had been developed, not only could it be successful but in terms of serving members of the armed forces, efficiency and dollars and cents savings, it could be achieved.

It is my opinion, based on the evidence presented to the committee, that the time required to put integration into full effect and properly on the rails varies from three to five years. No one in the present or past defence staffs, in the higher echelons of the defence structure, denied that a great deal of work had yet to be done to bring integration to the end planned and hoped for by the minister and those directly responsible for its implementation. The task involved appears to include a vast amount of organizing in connection with establishments, procedures of supply and materiel, ways and means to judge the cost of various programs, various ways in which economies can be made and money saved, and consideration of the areas of waste that must be eliminated.

There appears to be a very large task of cataloguing in this respect. Indeed it is very desirable that this work should be carried out. In short, Mr. Chairman, there would be considerable work involved in this program, in the opinion of one senior officer who appeared before us. We were told that there already exists in one command a two-year backlog of paperwork. This work involves every branch of the Department of National Defence, including the commands which have been integrated. Not all of them have been integrated, because some cannot be; but there appears to be a vast amount of tidying up, consolidation if you like, and assessing of the merits and demerits of the steps that have been taken to date and those that must be taken as the weeks and months go by.

This being so, in my opinion we have now to weigh the merits of proceeding with unification at this time. We must do this if we are to proceed in any orderly manner toward the goal that the minister desires. As we know, parliament has approved unification in principle. It remains my very real conviction that had the evidence now available to us been made available prior to this stage of the bill, quite possibly the house would have had second thoughts about giving approval in principle to the bill.

Let us review briefly where we stand on the question of unification in terms of the urgency of moving forward with the program at this time. The chief of the defence staff, General Allard, gave us his reason for urging passage of the legislation now, and proclaiming it. His contention was that the officers and men of the armed forces have been kept in doubt for a very long time and the decision must be taken now, or without undue delay. His recommendation was that the legislation be passed forthwith and without such delay. Perhaps I may quote from the committee proceedings of February 28, the last paragraph on page 1769, where General Allard is reported to have said:

> Finally, I would refer to the question regarding any suspension or delay in proceeding with the final stage of the reorganization, and that is unification. I sincerely believe a postponement or delay in starting—and I insist on this word—starting this final stage would have a most serious effect on all of us now serving and on our recruiting prospects. What the serviceman is saying to us today is, "Get on with it."

If I might be permitted an aside, what the serviceman is saying today is that he is so fed up and disgusted with what is happening that anything is better than this constant living in limbo. General Allard continued:

> And in my opinion any delay—one year, two years, five years, or even a few months—would seriously impair morale.

I question whether morale could be any more seriously impaired than it is now. However, I continue to read what General Allard said:

> This proposal is not designed to cope with the past. It is for the present and the future. Although youth today is prone to disregard the past we intend to retain those things that are worth while and at the same time to build for the future.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

> This, then, is not for people of my age and older, but I hope that I at least can be part of those who helped to design the organization. I am convinced that not only is it right but that it will appeal to the youth of today and tomorrow.
> In summary, then, gentlemen, the situation is this: The idea of a single force, in a single, distinctively Canadian uniform, working, living, training and—most important—thinking together as one entity is an exciting and challenging idea. After all, it is designed to meet the problems of a modern world—a scientific world—which is growing away beyond the barriers of the past at a speed that cannot stand the slow pace of yesterday. For all this, you know that we do not intend to proceed in haste—I said it was a starting point—but rather in a carefully planned manner which will extend over a number of years. All that is required now is the authority to do so.

That is a fairly strong endorsation of the government and the defence people to get on with what General Allard terms the starting point of this new piece of legislation. He tells us that there is no other course, or at least he implies that. As I have mentioned, he says this quite forcefully. I suggest that there is a second course of action which we should consider and which would indeed achieve the very worth-while standards and requirements that General Allard has mentioned in relation to morale. He suggested that if we do not proceed with this legislation now, morale will worsen.

The second course of action is not one that is acceptable to the minister or the government, but I suggest it to them because I think it should be given some consideration. This second course of action is that the whole unification procedure be shelved, put on ice, and the men in the three services be informed that this will be done. It should be made clear that this program, which in any case, as I understand it, would take some five years to implement, will not be resurrected until the end of that period.

This course of action has many advantages. First, it will allow adequate time, by all estimates, to complete the necessary work in connection with the all-important phase of this matter, namely integration. Second, it will allow clarification of two important matters. The first is the distinction between unification and integration, which has not yet been successfully defined and spelled out. It will allow a period of clarification in this regard. There could then be implemented or initiated a study and a plan of the reorganizational change necessary, so that in fact the best of the old and of the new could be melded to provide Canada with what I am sure we all desire, namely the most effective force, in terms of our foreign commitments, for the least possible expenditure of dollars and cents.

Indeed, none of us disagree with what General Allard has said in this respect. Very recently we have heard His Holiness the Pope cautioning the people of the world about the inadequacies of some of their present thinking. I will not quote his words but they are a guidepost, a sign and an indicator that what we are doing is not for ourselves but for those who will follow us. It is therefore our responsibility to make sure that what follows is the best. This is our motivation.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, this will permit time for a total organizational study and a reassessment of the necessity for moving toward total unification. It would permit the integration process to be fully studied and worked out after which, according to a plan which would be prepared, we could make a decision about total unification. It is of great importance to recognize the necessity of advising the serving officers and men. This should be one of the first things to be done. We should let them know where they stand, what the plan is, and that they will participate in the period of reassessment and in the full implementation of the first stage of the program of the integration process. We should let them know that the final outcome of the plan and the degree to which it is successful in terms of the standards set down by the minister, the economies and efficiencies, will be based upon these factors.

As I said, it will provide a second benefit. It is not unrelated but indeed it is entirely different in the sense that it would give a new generation of serving forces an opportunity to understand better the changing roles of the defence structure of a country such as ours. It would give these younger men the opportunity of themselves assessing the proper military course. It would provide an opportunity for the world war II combat officers and men to proceed to their normal retirement. It will allow time for another minister to succeed the present Minister of National Defence. Indeed I cannot imagine an effective cooling off period under the present Minister of National Defence. As I said, it would give a new minister with new ideas and new approaches a possibly different understanding and approach to this problem, and an opportunity to bring his expertise to this end product toward which we are proceeding.

Third, it would allow time to assess fully the economic factor in what is proposed. It has been stressed that unification will cost very little. Some of us have doubts that the real economies have been studied and are all known. That is certainly quite true of integration and completely and totally true of unification.

Fourth, it would give us pause to consider a revised white paper. I have commented on this in the past. It has seemed to me almost incredible that we are making such a major move in our defence posture based on a white paper that now must be nearing four years of age, a paper which was produced in March, 1964, which means that its drafting must have been commenced in late 1963. It is therefore certainly three and a half years old. As I said, it would give us pause to consider a revised white paper concerning the roles and commitments that the next two or three years may require of Canada, in terms of its contribution to the collective defence of the free world.

It would give us time not only for a reassessment of the white paper in terms of defence but also in terms of our external affairs policy. There has to be some satisfactory solution to our NATO assignment, to our place in NORAD, and our position in the United Nations Organization in relationship to our desire to contribute to the peacekeeping role of that body.

Finally it would allow time for a healing of the relationship between the armed forces and the government. I think we delude ourselves when we attempt to suggest that at present this relationship is good: It is not.

May I call it seven o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), Indian affairs—inquiry as to payment of kindergarten teachers; the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), transportation—inquiry as to report on maritime study; the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston), external affairs—inquiry as to extension of representation in Pacific area.

[English]

Shall the committee resume the business interrupted a few moments ago?

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, before the committee resumes its sitting may I point out that I believe it is accurate to say that there is general agreement among the members that the sitting should be suspended this evening between seven and eight o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): My intuition has suggested to me that it was the desire of the house to adjourn for one hour, but our proceedings require the unanimous consent of the house before we can do so. Shall we resume the business interrupted a few minutes ago and go back into committee of the whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

The Chairman: The sitting is suspended from now until eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Forrestall: When the committee rose for dinner, Mr. Chairman, I had been setting forth a number of advantages to be gained through shelving the unification bill we are now considering. I pointed out that a delay of three to five years, if the bill could not be removed entirely from consideration—this would be the best choice, and of course must be the first one—should be brought about. If the bill could not be dropped, then the good advice of the senior officers who appeared before us should be accepted, namely that the bill should be delayed for a period of from three to five years.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret).]

I pointed out that such a delay would permit time to examine the full effects of integration. It would permit time to foster a better understanding than is possible now of what is taking place at the moment. It would permit an opportunity to review our roles, as set out in the white paper, by the standing committee on external affairs or, better still, by a joint committee of defence and external affairs. It would permit time to assess fully the economic factors involved. It would give time, as I have mentioned, to consider the roles of our country and the production of a new or changed white paper. Finally, Mr. Chairman, it would provide a cooling off period during which time there could be a healing process of the many ruptures that now exist to the good will between the government and the serving officers in our defence forces.

For all of these reasons, as well as many others, Mr. Chairman, that have been dealt with in the last few hours by previous speakers, or will be dealt with by speakers who will take part in the debate as time goes on, there are marked advantages to be gained in delaying the passage of this bill. On the other hand, sir, to proceed now can only add substantially to our present difficulties. We were warned by a number of military witnesses, who came before the committee, that proceeding now might well bring about a situation where a substantial number of good officres and men would consider leaving the forces.

These men might consider this course, notwithstanding the loss of pension and other benefits which might result. There seems to be, as I mentioned earlier, a false assumption on the part of the minister's supporters on the other side, namely that the passage of this bill as the final step toward unification, would resolve the type of problem that is going to be created by this bill. A prime example of this situation was given to the committee by Admiral Landymore. He pointed out the tremendous losses that could accrue to a member of the armed forces in terms of pension benefits, if he were to retire. I will not put all this information on the record, but it is available in the evidence of the committee if any interested parties care to look it up. It is problems of this type, pension problems, morale problems, rank structure problems, materiel and logistics problems, that are going to create in the minds of members of our armed forces a situation that will lead to the most serious possible consequences to our ability to meet our defence commitments.

On this basis the best course of action now is to throw the bill out altogether. I suggest to the minister that, in the minds of the serving members of the armed forces today, unification is so vague and undefined that the only moral course the minister and the government can adopt is to make certain that the men are given freedom of choice as to whether they wish to transfer to this new force. They must be given an opportunity to resign, to retire honourably without any pension penalty or loss of benefit, medically or otherwise, accruing to members who retire.

If the government fail to do this but proceed in the way General Allard, as I mentioned before supper would wish us to proceed—that is to say, to pass quickly this unification bill—then the minister must accept full responsibility for this course. I suggest to him that the success of the final implementation of such a far reaching measure as this is to be found in the willingness, loyalty and desire of those affected by the measure to bring about that success.

If the minister fails to recognize the necessity for this type of approach, then indeed it will be much longer than the half generation suggested before the bill and its implications finally become workable, not only in terms of the force itself but in terms of our foreign commitments. Perhaps it would take 20 years. We will have to pass through not one but two whole decades before we find a group which will willingly implement what the minister wants. To this end, Mr. Chairman, at the appropriate stage of the consideration of this bill amendments will be introduced dealing with pension rights, and so on. For the time being I thank the members of the committee for their indulgence.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, according to yesterday's Hansard General Allard, our present chief of the general staff, was reported to have made some very startling statements in a speech to the International Relations Club, and I believe these statements deserve some comment. Indeed, they were the subject of some proceedings in this house today on motions. I wish to make some comment because I do not believe that the people to whom General Allard referred—former ministers of national defence—would feel they should explain the matter to this house; but as a member of the standing committee I wish to devote my time this evening to replying to one part of that speech.

In the course of his speech, the general asked a question which I believe should be answered as forcefully as possible, and I intend to so answer it. The question was:

> I should like to ask the former cabinet ministers why they are clinging to the name of the navy, the army and the air force?

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, as a member of the defence committee, and being present when the three former ministers questioned General Allard at the hearings, I would say that perhaps one of the main answers to the general's question was his own inability to give intelligent answers to the questions put to him by the former ministers concerned—and I say that with all due respect to the chief of the general staff.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, in his speech to which I have referred he said:

> I have attempted to explain my views on unification of the armed forces before a parliamentary committee. I was obliged to say to a member of parliament: "Sir, if you do not understand, there is nothing that I can do".

I say that that is a ridiculous statement on the part of someone holding the position of chief of the general staff. If the members of this house would review General Allard's evidence they would find that his admitted attempt to explain unification could be classified, in my opinion, as a very poor and disappointing attempt, for one holding the position of chief of the general staff.

When asked to substantiate some of his statements with facts he was unable to do so, except to say that he had strong convictions that everything would be all right. I submit that strong convictions are not sufficient or satisfactory answers to questions. The chief of the general staff should have been able to give answers based on facts and figures. We have the right to expect more convincing evidence from a person holding such high office in our armed forces.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I repeat to the general that perhaps his own inability to produce facts and figures, in view of the position he now holds, could be the main reason why the former cabinet ministers clung to the names of the navy, army and air force. They are concerned about the security of our country under the present administration. I submit they have a right to be concerned about the security of our country, in view of what has developed over the past two or three years since the present minister has been head of the Department of National Defence.

I also submit that strong conviction is not a satisfactory answer to the question: How will unification or the single service concept save the Canadian taxpayers money? Strong conviction is not a satisfactory answer to the question: How will the single service concept improve the effective efficiency of our combat troops? They are the troops with which we are concerned, and I will refer to them later in my remarks.

Again I submit that strong conviction is not a satisfactory answer to the question: How will unification improve the morale of our combat troops? Strong conviction is not a satisfactory answer to the question: Can Canada fulfil her present defence commitments and take on the additional role of restoring peace, which to my mind is a very dangerous role for Canada even to attempt? Strong conviction will not replace forward planning of manpower and financial requirements.

General Allard admitted that in this regard he had made no studies. I would ask why this was not done. Strong convictions on the part of General Allard, that unification will not destroy the effectiveness of our combat troops, are not easy to accept in view of the testimony of his former colleagues in the same branch of the service. They are, I suggest, men of long military experience and of recognized stature in military life.

I am only sorry, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Lapointe is not in the chamber tonight, because I understand that this afternoon he suggested that two former ministers, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Calgary North, were raising the question of racism. I want to refer the hon. member for Lapointe to the fact that there were two former generals in our armed forces—they were in the army—with French Canadian names, and to draw to his attention their idea of what is unification and what it will do to our country and to our forces.

I should like to refer the members of the committee to minutes of committee proceedings No. 22. If I may paraphrase what General Moncel said, he was of the opinion that unification may be the "kiss of death" for Canada's defence forces. He also said that unification will work only if our defence commitments are reduced or changed because unification was an uncharted course with a dim destination.

I believe the hon. member for Greenwood will agree with that. He says he agrees in principle with the idea of unification though he did not really know what the term means. That I can understand. The hon. member indicates he did not say that; perhaps it was some other member in that quarter of the house. Again, he and his hon. friends wish to support the government. But they are sitting on the fence, leaving themselves an opening.

General Fleury says this with regard to his opposition to unification:

> I honestly feel that not one word I said here yesterday or today will have the slightest effect on what is ultimately carried out, because so many people have taken up such entrenched positions on the subject that it is very difficult for anyone to back away.

General Simonds said in part:

> My own view ... is that this unification having regard to all the implications of what defence policy should be, is not in the national interest.

He also said:

> If we are called upon to meet our obligations we could not do it. It could not be done with the manpower we have today.

This is a most revealing statement for one of our generals to make. I suggest that General Allard should review the evidence given by his former colleagues. I say that the chief of the general staff, together with the minister have, so far, accomplished six things in connection with this question of unification, and I propose to list them: 1. They have confused administrative tidiness with operational efficiency. 2. The have tried experiments when they should have prepared plans. 3. They have increased the defence budget and reduced the public understanding of it. 4. In themselves they have taken stubbornness for insight. In others, they have mistaken disagreement for stupidity or even disloyalty. 5. They have discouraged the prospective recruit and dismissed the seasoned officer. 6. They have jeopardized our national security. Perhaps these observations will make it clear to the general why former defence ministers still cling to the conception of a separate navy, army and air force.

I should like now to refer to a speech which was made in this house yesterday by the hon. member for Roberval. He said he was representing small business and would like to say a few words on behalf of the small business people of our country. It was a very confusing speech but I do not blame the hon. member for Roberval on that account; I blame the minister for the confusion which has been created. This hon. member said, in part:

> I fail to see why in the military field as in all other fields, expenditures should not be reduced as much as possible.

With this, we agree. Then he said, as will be found on page 14451 of Hansard;

> Therefore, I am rising this evening in order to express the views of our group concerning the unification of the three armed services, because we consider primarily the savings to be made.

Here again, with regard to this question of possible savings, the minister has misinformed the members of this house. In fact, there are no savings to be made as a result of unification. Anyone who undertakes a serious review of the evidence given before the committee, especially of the testimony given by those who have been involved in planning for the extension of the services, will agree that this is the case. I refer again to the testimony given by General Moncel, that if we were to carry out the commitments we have already made plus an additional role as a peace keeper or peace restorer, our requirement in manpower would be 150,000 men and the cost would be close to $2.6 billion. This is as close as he could estimate, and he had studied this situation.

Another point was made by the former minister of national defence, my hon. friend from Calgary North. He went back over the estimates and put it on record that since the present minister had taken over the department there had been less capital expenditure than ever before. He proved this contention to the satisfaction of most members of the committee. Yet the minister still says his program will save money for the people of Canada.

The only way in which the department has saved any money, and kept within its budget, has been through a reduction in manpower. Nor has this reduction been the result of anything proposed by the minister. It has come about simply because recruits are not forthcoming. The minister told us he wanted to reduce recruitment by 10 per cent. Well, he now has the figure down by 23 per cent —down below what I believe to be a safe figure.

The hon. member for Roberval went on to say:

> According to military technicians it would also be beneficial to the unity of the army itself on the economic level, which would necessarily reduce administrative costs.

Here again, the minister has created confusion in the minds of members because administrative costs have absolutely nothing to do with unification. Here, the confusion between the terms integration and unification goes too far. Any reduction in administrative costs is entirely due to integration, not to unification at all. The bill before us tonight was not necessary in order to obtain any reduction in administrative costs. Integration itself could have done that, and could have taken place without this bill being passed.

The hon. member for Roberval has apparently swallowed what the minister has been trying to put across, and to this extent he is like many of the Canadian people. He tells us he has great admiration for the minister. He feels the minister is doing a good job. But then he contradicts himself and says:

> Let me speak as I did at the beginning, as a simple civilian. As civilians we notice mainly the military budget. I said earlier that we were expecting a reduction in the expenditures, but when we look at the military budget we notice that this year, in spite of all the minister's predictions, it is yet much higher than last year.

A little later the same hon. member said:

> We had hoped that the budget would be reduced by at least one third, but it is not the case and I want to point out to the minister that we are a little disappointed in that respect.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Well, I want to point out to this committee that they will be a lot more disappointed if they swallow what the minister and the chief of the general staff are trying to push down their throats. Unification will accomplish nothing which the minister has told us will be accomplished. Proof of that was evident in the meetings of the defence committee, and anyone who wishes to study that evidence will realize this fact. The testimony given by men who formerly held high positions in the forces has warned us that it will not work. Men who have spent all their lives in this business have told us unification will not work. But what has happened? We have this minister who took office with new ideas, who said, "Yes, it will work. Anybody who disagrees—out they go." Finally he got somebody who did agree with him, a yes man, and the minister is pulling this thing through with the support of the majority of the members of the House of Commons. But still the members will not take time to read these minutes where the evidence has been put before them, will not take time to digest that evidence, and so we get speeches like the one I referred to a few moments ago, which to me mean nothing.

These members agree in principle but they do not know what unification means.

In his speech last night the hon. member whom I have quoted also referred to the party to which I belong and said in part, as recorded at page 14,451 of Hansard:

I am therefore mildly surprised that the Conservatives, as a whole, should so oppose the bill.

All kinds of excuses will be given for holding up the business of the house—

We are not holding up the business of the house, Mr. Chairman. We are carrying out our responsibilities in the manner in which the people of Canada expect us to do. We object to this bill in principle. We have reasons for objecting and we are trying to document those reasons so that the members will understand, if they can understand.

Before this debate is finished all kinds of accusations will be made against us. It seems remarkable that the critics of unification have been categorized as emotional, unprogressive, unreasonable, disloyal, obstructionist, destructive, politically motivated, and without responsibility. I imagine those terms will be repeated time and again as we hear hon. members from the other side get up to make their speeches. But surely members opposite have not been so thoroughly brainwashed, or taken in by the defence minister's misstatements, to believe that because Conservative opposition members, as well as witnesses of stature, hold opinions contrary to those of the minister that they do not do so by reason of knowledge, capability, experience, conviction, concern and sincerity. I hope they will give us credit for that.

I now wish to refer to some statements made by government supporters, which have been reported in the press. I refer in particular to the chairman of the Liberal caucus, the hon. member for Durham, who has said that the government may have to use closure. We heard these rumours and I say to hon. members opposite, go ahead and use closure. We expect that from the Liberal party. It has been done before and it will be done again. But in this connection I wish to quote from an editiorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail on March 28. The minister knows that the Globe and Mail is no supporter of the Conservative party, but this editorial referred to a letter sent by the hon. member for Durham to his constituents. It quotes his letter as follows:

The Conservative party will undoubtedly launch a filibuster to prevent a decision being taken.

The editorial comments:

Now, now, Mr. Honey, don't blame the Conservatives. The hearings before the Commons defence committee made it pretty clear, especially to the New Democrats who had been disposed to support the government on unification, that what the government was actually trying to do was to create a force for the implementation of a policy about which it had neglected to inform the country.

This is what we have been saying ever since this bill came before us. You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that on second reading we pleaded with the government, and with the minister in particular, to let us hear witnesses before asking us to agree to the bill in principle. But our plea was not met by the minister, and the Prime Minister was just as bad. He forced the house to agree in principle, before we heard the witnesses. I do not want to read the whole of this editorial but parts of it are very interesting. It says:

Unification only makes sense (unless there is to be a huge increase in the defence budget, and few Canadians would consider that made sense) if Canada is going to abandon many of its NATO and NORAD and sundry other defence commitments, and concentrate almost wholly on a peacekeeping role.

This is what we said in the defence committee, and this is the stumbling block with which the N.D.P. are now confronted. They agree that the single service concept makes sense only if Canada is going to opt out of its other commitments. If we do that I say, and I shall go on to prove, that we will lose our national pride, we will lose our sovereignty, we will have to rely on our big neighbour to the south to protect us, and as a Canadian I would not have much pride left if we did that. If we can do only one tenth of the job, because we have only one tenth of the population of the United States, then we should take pride in doing that in defending the North American continent.

I think all of us will agree that the only defence for Canada is on a continental basis. That is generally accepted. But let us not opt out or phase out of any commitment we have at the present time, until there is agreement among our allies as to that course.

The editorial goes on to say:

That may be a good idea or it may be a bad idea, or it may be partly good and partly bad. But the point is, it hasn't been discussed. Parliament has been given no opportunity for a full debate on what commitments this country should keep, what changes in its policies toward its allies and the world it should make, what new commitments it should undertake. Instead the government has been trying to rush Canada into a new vehicle —unification—without explaining that the reason for it is a change in destination.

The opposition would be less than responsible if it bought the new vehicle—

I shall not quote further from that editorial.

Even if this debate goes on for weeks and weeks we would not fulfil our responsibility if we let the minister and the government get away with unification until we know what it is, what it does to the security of our country, and what it does to our allies. Do we let them down? We should not pass the unification bill until we know what it is going to lead us into. This peace restoring role can be very dangerous. This experiment that the minister, because of political expediency, is trying to rush through is not for the good of Canada but for his own personal political advancement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal with the crux of the bill, namely unification. It is not my intention to deal with the subject of integration because I do not accept the suggestion that integration and unification are one and the same thing,—although the minister has tried time and time again to confuse hon. members and the Canadian public that integration and unification are good for Canada.

Certainly we agree that integration is good for our forces. The minister wasted a lot of time in the defence committee bringing in certain of his staff who dealt with nothing but integration. I say again that if we want to integrate our forces we do not need this bill. Integration has been worked on for years and years. Maybe it has not taken place as quickly as it should. I believe we would have given credit to the minister if he had insisted that integration be completed within a certain length of time. A certain amount of integration is O.K., but someone has said that the minister is putting the cart before the horse, and when integration starts to interfere with the effectiveness of our combat troops we say it is going too far.

Again we say that integration and unification are two entirely different subjects, regardless of the fact that the minister has tried to confuse us. Yesterday he spent 50 minutes of the time of his speech talking about integration, although we have told him time and again that we agree with it and have no objection to it. Perhaps we could criticize parts of what he is trying to do in integration, but integration has nothing to do with unification.

The minister spent only ten minutes of his speech yesterday dealing with unification, and the whole confusion is in the difference between unification and integration. It is on this confusion that the minister is playing, and this is why he is going to ask hon. members to vote for the bill, knowing full well it is the first step towards conscription, towards compulsory military service in Canada. Other hon. members will deal with that phase of unification.

I would say integration deals with and concerns the supply and administration of our forces and does not touch or interfere with our combat troops. For simplicity's sake I can say to those hon. members who have not had military experience that we can break our forces down into two elements with different training and different supply problems, the administrative element of all three services and the combat element of all three services.

I say again that if you put the cart before the horse for the sake of the administrative and supply element at the expense of the combat units, it does not matter how good your supply, administration and transport is if your combat troops cannot fight. This is what we are trying to impress upon this house. The minister is destroying the combat troops and making them useless so that they will not even fit into the commitments we have today. They will not fit into the NATO alliance. The NATO commander has made his plans. He knows what he wants. If he is given a force of people equipped with bows and arrows he will say that he cannot fit them into what he has planned. It is the NATO commander, and not the government of Canada, who is responsible for the NATO plan. The government of Canada cannot go to the NATO commander and tell him the way to run NATO. This is what the N.D.P. party has been trying to impress upon this house.

Mr. Brewin: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McIntosh: Yes.

Mr. Brewin: Does the hon. member not know that the commander has indicated very clearly the need for a mobile reserve force to which Canada indeed is contributing, and to which it could contribute even more.

Mr. McIntosh: Well, these terms, such as "mobile reserve" could mean several things, just like "integration and unification". One would have to ascertain from the NATO commander in detail what he means by mobile reserve. One could have a mobile command of cavalry, with horses, but it would be no good in the operations the commander has planned. As I say, when we give our troops to that commander we are giving them to him to use in the manner in which he sees fit, and therefore he should know what he is getting from each country. He should know the type of reserves and force he will have, so that he can plan the defence of what he has to defend. If Canada should come along with a force which will not fit into any of his plans, then he will say that Canada might as well keep that force at home. Possibly that is what the minister wants.

We do not oppose the bill as it refers to the dental personnel or logistics. We said this before. The minister has wasted our time in bringing such officers before the committee. Any criticism we have in respect of integration has to do with its being carried on to the extent of interfering with the effectiveness of the combat elements of our forces. On the other hand, we believe the intention of unification is to change the structure of our combat troops, and with this intention we violently disagree. We have put before this house our reasons for disagreeing with this.

Most of the controversy over unification has arisen because of the mystery which has developed over the meaning of the term "unification". I say the minister is directly responsible for this mystery. We attempted to find out from him what he meant by the term "unification". Time and time again we asked him what this meant. He gave us some high-falutin reason, but during the committee hearings he stated that he wished he had never used that expression. He said that he wished he had used the expression "single service concept". Had he done that in the beginning there would not have been the confusion which there has been in respect of the word today, and I do not think the detrimental press reports which there have been in respect of the minister would have been made.

Had the minister conveyed the idea to the members of this house that he had in mind the best interests of the force, rather than political expediency, I think he would have been a big man today, rather than a "has-been" next leader of the Liberal party. What should have been purely a military problem now has become intensely political, because of the manner in which the minister has handled this matter. The question in the minds of members of the opposition was whether or not this was an attempt on the part of the government to direct our attention from a contemplated change in foreign policy. This is what we wonder about. Over the past couple of years events show that the politicians have been deciding military matters with little regard for the views of the military experts. The Canadian public was confronted with such statements and headlines from the minister as, first: Unification is probably the boldest plan of military reorganization ever tried by a modern nation. He received headlines all across the country as a result of that statement. Then he said that we are now becoming a leader in defence organization, and thinkers, not just followers. He said that this is something new for Canada and new for the whole world. The third headline was that Canada will have indelibly etched her name as a world leader in military organization.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, but I must advise him that the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member may continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to say that the hon. member has not obtained the unanimous consent of the house to continue with his speech.

Mr. Hellyer: We should let him continue. His speech is getting better all the time.

Mr. McIntosh: Thank you. I will remember this, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Foy: Mr. Chairman, many times members of the official opposition have said that more witnesses should have been called and heard before the standing committee. I would have had no objection to the calling of more witnesses before the committee, had it not become apparent that the members of the official opposition were dedicated to kill this bill. I stated this in the committee.

Mr. Churchill: You have been listening to the minister.

Mr. Foy: At the time when the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona joined the committee as replacement members—to replace members who had seemed to have a reasonable attitude—the committee then became clearly a partisan exercise. As I have said, official opposition members were dedicated to killing the bill. In the committee we heard many statements, such as we have heard from the member who just sat down. These were statements which were insulting to the minister, insulting to the serving officers and to many others. I should like to refer to that old war horse from Winnipeg South Centre. I use this phrase with the greatest respect because I have respect for this gentleman.

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: He has a funny way of showing his respect.

Mr. Foy: Mr. Chairman, may I continue. My time is limited. The hon. member I have just mentioned delights in stirring things up.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. We have an expression of opinion from the hon. member that he should be given an opportunity to continue his speech without interruptions.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. It arises out of the statement made by the hon. member to the effect that I had joined the committee and then had proceeded to insult serving officers. My one simple question to him is, how many serving officers appeared before the committee as witnesses after I joined the committee?

Mr. Foy: I will answer that question later.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Answer it now.

Mr. Foy: I would have to look up the records.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, further on the question of privilege—

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think there is a question of privilege. Therefore, I think we should allow the hon. member for Lambton West to continue his speech.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made an accusation against me and I rely on the privileges of this house in asking him to either back up that accusation or withdraw it. He has indicated that I insulted serving officers. When I asked him how many serving officers were called as witnesses before that committee after I became a member of it, he said he would have to consult the record, because he does not know. If he does not know that answer, he should not make such a statement. He should now withdraw it, and will do so if he is any kind of man.

Mr. Foy: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is doing exactly what he was doing during committee meetings.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): What you are talking about is a lot of lies. You are trying to put across lies. Stick that down your throat.

Mr. Foy: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre took great delight in stirring things up. He does the same thing in this house. He often says terrible things and demands resignations. After really stirring things up he takes his seat and conceals his laughter. Mr. Chairman, very often the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and others sit in their places grinning from ear to ear, after causing a great disturbance.

Mr. MacEwan: Surely that is terrible.

Mr. Foy: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre loves to play the game of party politics. He loves that kind of action. I suspect that the hon. member agrees with the principle of this bill. He cannot convince me that with his vast experience in parliament and in military matters he is against it.

Mr. MacEwan: Would the hon. member throw away his notes and make a speech.

An hon. Member: Who wrote it for you?

Mr. Foy: Mr. Chairman, I hope the time being consumed by these ridiculous remarks is not considered as part of my allotted time. Whenever a member tries to make some reasonable comments this is the kind of thing we hear from hon. members such as the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

One of the most oft-repeated criticisms of the unification program is that the government is moving too hastily, or that it somehow plans to invoke instant unification. While I am sure that some of the critics who make this charge are sincere and I suppose well-intentioned, my membership on the standing committee on national defence has made me equally sure that they could not be more wrong in this regard.

During the course of the last few months, the hon. member for Northumberland has been travelling throughout the country making incorrect statements, one of which is to the effect that our servicemen will be transferred from ships to the air force, or to the infantry. This is a ridiculous statement. Perhaps, like Diogenes seeking an honest man, he is seeking the leadership of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. We all know he aspires to this position. If he is successful, by some fluke he could become prime minister of this country. That hon. member should take the time to learn the true facts about unification, before expounding on this subject about which he does not seem to know anything.

What this government is asking for is not permission to complete unification within a few days, a few months, or even a year. If anyone is labouring under the impression, he is mistaken and has not bothered to follow the evidence heard by the standing and special committees on defence. This would also obviously indicate that he has not followed the statements made by many serving senior officers and by the minister himself. I think we should examine some of the testimony given by these men.

Let me quote the vice-chief of the defence staff, Air Marshal Sharp, who gave this evidence before the committee on February 7 of this year:

> Because this is a very complex job, very thorough and careful planning is required. The department has, on the one hand, been accused of acting too quickly, i.e., not doing sufficient planning, and on the other hand, accused of not deciding sooner the details of what is involved in unification. Since planning takes time and since the details cannot be decided and divulged until the planning has been completed, it is obvious that the department cannot satisfy both of these criticisms. To take time for adequate planning means that there will be some delay before the details of unification can be announced. To quickly announce the details implies inadequate planning. However, to postpone the decision to unify until all the details have been worked out is contrary to common sense. It is tantamount to saying that the decision to build the trans-Canada Highway should not have been made until all the details of construction had been completed.

Air Marshal Sharp is an intelligent and distinguished officer who has been deeply involved in this program since its beginning and he knows what he is talking about. I am sure that the air marshal does not believe we are going to instantly unify our forces. Obviously he does see the logic in obtaining permissive legislation so that he and his colleagues in the Canadian armed forces can get on with the job.

[Mr. Foy.]

On February 23 the minister made the following statement before the standing committee regarding the timing of unification:

> It is an continuing evolution that will not be completed until 1970-72, as has been stated by many serving officers, including the heads of training command, materiel command, the vice-chief and myself.
> There is no way you can bring about 'instant unification'. Nor is there any intention to do so. It will all be done in a step-by-step, carefully calculated manner, with full regard for our operational effectiveness and the best interests of our servicemen.

Why do official opposition members continually say here in Ottawa and elsewhere that unification is to be completed immediately? Because they do so I suggest there is a lot of partisan politics being played as there was at the meetings of the standing committee. This type of thing is continually practised by hon. members opposite. They know very well that instant unification is impossible.

If we followed the advice of stand pat reactionaries every time we sought to enact important legislation for the benefit of Canadians, we would never get anywhere. It is only by realizing problems and acting on solutions that we are ever going to progress; that we are going to develop this great nation's full potential.

During this session the government has set a record by passing more important and long overdue legislation than at any other time in history. Such vital appendages to our prosperity as a guaranteed annual income for old age pensioners, medicare, the Canada Assistance Plan, manpower programs, a new transportation program, Bank Act revisions and such things as a Science Council and a health resources fund cover the broad spectrum of human need in Canada. I suggest to hon. members that this is accomplished because we are willing to progress and not stagnate.

Clearly, any delay in obtaining parliamentary approval for the unification of our armed forces would have a most serious effect on the morale of our great servicemen. They are, I am sure, anxious to get going on this imaginative program, but uncertainty is their biggest enemy—uncertainty as to when they will be allowed, as General Allard has said, to get off the front pages of the press and back to the job of running the forces. In fact, the general in his brief to the committee on February 28 outlined very lucidly the rationale for obtaining approval from parliament to enact the legislation and, of course, he too dispelled any fears we might have about instand unification. I should like to quote General Allard in this connection:

> Finally, I would refer to the question regarding any suspension or delay in proceeding with the final stage of the reorganization, and that is unification. I sincerely believe a postponement or delay in starting—and I insist on this word—starting this final stage would have a most serious effect on all of us now serving and on our recruiting prospects. What the serviceman is saying to us today is, "Get on with it." And in my opinion any delay—one year, two years, five years, or even a few months —would seriously impair morale.

Then further on he concludes:

> In summary, then, gentlemen, the situation is this: The idea of a single force, in a single, distinctively Canadian uniform, working, living, training, and—most important—thinking together as one entity is an exciting and challenging idea. After all it is designed to meet the problems of a modern world —a scientific world—which is growing away beyond the barriers of the past at a speed that cannot stand the slow pace of yesterday. For all this, you know that we do not intend to proceed in haste—I said it was a starting point—but rather in a carefully planned manner which will extend over a number of years. All that is required now is the authority to do so.

I should like to follow up on this eloquent plea by Canada's top serving military officer by saying this: The integration-to-unification program for the Canadian armed forces has been exhaustively scrutinized and debated since the white paper was issued early in 1964. Evidence given to the committee and to parliament during interim supply alone amounts to more than 4,000 pages of standing committee minutes and Hansard. To put these figures into plainer terms, the number of pages represents about a dozen comprehensive text books of information. So far we have talked about defence matters more than 114 days and have heard from over 130 different committee witnesses, many of whom have appeared two or more times. Any attempt by hon. members of the house to defeat this bill by a talkathon could only be regarded by the men and women of the forces, and the public alike, to be a ridiculous procedure, wholly infringing on parliament's responsibility to act.

It is said by hon. members on the other side of the chamber that there has been an undue rush toward unification. I say this is not so, Mr. Chairman, not at all. Having exhausted everything that can be said about the unification legislation, it is now our responsibility to turn the program over to our servicemen, let them implement it, let them get on with the job, and let them confirm our conviction that this is the right policy for our servicemen, for Canada and for our allies.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Chairman, the fact that the last speaker and some of those who preceded him have been so worried about the length of time this debate is going to take and have started to talk about closure, when we are not quite through the second day of discussion of the bill in committee, makes me wonder what they are trying to conceal. It seems a shame that so much of the debate and so many of the pages to which the hon. member who preceded me referred have been filled with irrelevancies, in so far as the problem of unification is concerned. Indeed, the professional staff, Air Marshal Miller and others who gave evidence and helped fill up the record, confronted us with a great many irrelevancies. For example, in a list in one of the briefs submitted to the committee there was included as one of the benefits of integration and unification the acquisition of the fan jet Falcon, that nice little, executive jet that cabinet ministers are getting to whizz them around the country. That aircraft was listed as one of the pieces of equipment we were acquiring because of the savings from unification.

A great deal of the argument put forward in support of unification has had nothing at all to do with unification; it has dealt with integration and the benefits of integration. Indeed, most of the witnesses who appeared before us, and I think most of the committee members, realize that there is a great deal of good to come from the integration of command, of certain supply services, and so on. But that is irrelevant in so far as this bill is concerned.

My friend the hon. member for Greenwood, with whom I often find myself in agreement, has also introduced irrelevancies into this discussion. He talked about unification in the light of a new role for the Canadian forces. I should like to suggest that while it may be very desirable that we increase our intervention role and build up our mobile force, whether or not our forces are unified will not make that intervention force or peacekeeping force any more or less efficient. In so far as this bill is concerned, that is an irrelevant argument.

However, I do agree with the hon. member for Greenwood that what we need is a new statement of defence policy, a statement indicating the priorities that we are attaching to our defence roles; because unless you know what you are doing or why you are doing it, you cannot organize your forces to meet those commitments.

I do not propose to quote at great length any of the witnesses who appeared before the committee. I should like to read two or three passages from the evidence of Air Marshal Miller, and for a particular reason. The reason is that he is the serving officer who very strongly supported integration; he had more to do than anyone else with the initial planning of integration, and until just six months ago he was the chief of staff. His definitions of integration and unification impressed me very much.

• (9:10 p.m.)

I think it would not be a bad idea if we had them in the record in close proximity. His definition of integration appears at page 2290 of his evidence, as follows:

By that I mean the operating of the three services under a single—what I would call—management. A single defence staff, a single planning organization, an d single budgeting arrangement.

That I think, sir, is a fine definition of integration.

His definition of unification appears at page 2311 of the committee's proceedings, where he said the following:

Unification is the formation of a single force, single rank structure, single administrative chain, the wearing of a common uniform and calling trades and ranks by common names. In other words, a single force instead of three forces.

What does Air Chief Marshal Miller say about the advantages and disadvantages of unification, always bearing in mind that he is a very strong supporter of integration? At page 2291 he said:

The area of unification is a very sensitive one, as you well know. It strikes at the traditions and the feelings of a lot of people. I did not see, up until the time I left, that the return from pressing the unification sign was commensurate with the disruption and the great concern to the man in uniform that would result from it.

Mr. Harkness: Do you, yourself, see any financial advantage accruing from the proposed scheme of unification?

Air Marshal Miller: There are no significant financial advantages whatsoever as far as I can see.

Mr. Harkness: Do you see any military advantages flowing from it?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: Again, there are no significant military advantages.

Mr. Harkness: Do you see any military disadvantages coming out of it?

[Mr. Smith.]

Air Chief Marshal Miller: The disruption is an unknown factor, and one which I have always rated rather highly. I did not want to have anything occur that would cause disruption in the services. I felt a lot of careful planning was necessary, and that probably time to educate people was required before the next step of unification was taken.

There is one more quotation of Air Chief Marshal Miller which I should like to read. It appears at page 2298. He was speaking about the loss of efficiency, and he said this:

I think it is a very bad thing for the forces. Many of the people who had left had a great deal to contribute to the forces organization in the future if they had stayed on. There were some key men who left.

Mr. Harkness: Would you consider then that the loss of considerable numbers of highly trained personnel extending right down into N.C.O's and so on, and technical trades, has impaired the effectiveness of the forces?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: Yes. With the loss of skill and talent from our pool, the pool is bound to be poor thereby.

Now I would like to turn to General Allard's evidence. Lately General Allard has been making some speeches. I found that his statements to the committee were most unsatisfactory. They were unsatisfactory in many ways. They were tinged with political overtones, they were irrelevant and in some instances they were misleading. If lately he has brought a certain amount of political fire about his head, he has no one to thank for it but himself. When in the committee we pressed him for details on his planning, his attitude was: you are just a civilian; you would not understand; this is a professional matter. In looking through his statement one can find many instances where he seems to have taken that attitude.

Some of the people who were questioning him, myself included, are of course very ignorant in military matters and have not had much experience. However, I still think that we are entitled to better answers than those which General Allard gave us in his rather haughty and arrogant manner. It was the only time when Rear Admiral Landymore made the statement about a military commander taking over. I agreed with many people that Rear Admiral Landymore had gone too far, but some of General Allard's statements to the committee made me wonder whether Rear Admiral Landymore's fears did not have some basis.

Mr. Hellyer: You should be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Smith: There is nothing to be ashamed of. Anyone can read the evidence. Let me give examples of some of the misleading statements made by General Allard. For example, at page 1764 of the committee's proceedings he drags in the ill-fated Bobcat, which was a military weapon with the development of which governments struggled for some time. I do not know how he could relate that to the benefits of unification or integration, but he did. The same reference on the same page relates to the Arrow program. On the following page he speaks about the national survival system as being something that would not be carried out because of integration or unification, but really it seems to me that this is completely irrelevant.

At page 1821 he made the following statement:

> Now, I have made a very careful study of the committee system, in which the army alone spent 50,000 hours—man hours—per year on co-ordination between the three services; this was the committee system.
> Therefore, when I finished my study, I was convinced that we had to have an organization that would deal with this centrally.

Again this is a matter of integration, not unification, but he has confused the two. He said, 50,000 man hours. In those terms it sounds rather like a lot. On page 1824 he is questioned about this statement. I asked him:

> General Allard, you mentioned in answer to Mr. Churchill a few minutes ago that 50,000 man hours were spent in the army on co-ordination. I have never been noted for my mathematics, but that would indicate to me some 25 or 30 men per year.
> Mr. Allard: It is much more than that.
> Mr. Smith: At 2000 hours per man per year?
> Mr. Allard: It is much more than that. If you wish, I will read this to you:
> Project ORA which was completed in June, 1964 showed that for army headquarters alone there were 702 memberships in 440 committees, subcommittees, working groups and similar bodies. The total army workload involved in participation in these committees was 52,205 man hours in 1963, equivalent to about the full time employment of 26 persons.

This was the great saving about which he had spoken in his evidence a few moments earlier. This is not the only place where the committee was confused by General Allard's evidence. One of the alleged benefits of unification is the so-called interchangeability of manpower, that it will be possible to take men serving in one trade and in one environment and transfer them easily and quickly to another environment, thereby effecting a great saving.

Many of the witnesses who were experienced commanders at sea pointed out that interchangeability is not always as easy as that. They pointed out that a signaler at sea has other trades to learn, and a signaler in a tank has other trades to learn. There would be a great deal of time wasted in retraining.

This was one of the strong points that General Allard made and there is this reference to it on page 1786 of the committee evidence:

> Mr. Lambert: And the man who is a soldier communicator, or a ground environment communicator, will also be a fit man at sea?
> Mr. Allard: Yes, Mr. Lambert. Already we have two airmen and two soldiers at sea as a test, and they went quite voluntarily.
> Mr. Smith: What are they doing at sea?
> Mr. Allard: —

This is very interesting.

> —At the moment they happen to be in a trade which is quite compatible with their ability.
> Mr. Smith: Which trade?
> Mr. Allard: Two of them are stewards.
> Mr. Lambert: Well, stewards at sea are ammunition detail, are they not?
> Mr. Allard: Yes, they could be trained.
> Mr. Lambert: This is the usual purpose, I think, for a steward at sea?
> Mr. Allard: It could be.

Now, that is the type of misleading evidence that we have obtained. This is the sort of thing which makes everyone doubtful having regard to Air Chief Marshal Miller's evidence concerning the lack of planning and the general lack of knowledge, as well as his strong plea for time to get the maximum benefits from integration. When the chief of the general staff is so uncertain about what is happening, it makes one very doubtful whether we should not at this time give credence to Air Chief Marshal Miller's plea for a delay.

You know, one thing about this debate on integration and unification is that the earliest estimate concerning the maximum benefit of integration is from three to five years. Unification will start to become effective at the end of that time, perhaps by 1970 according to an optimistic guess, or 1972 according to a pessimistic one. Of course, not many of the present generation of politicians and very few of the present generation of chiefs of staff will be around to see the horror we have committed by attempting to unify our forces, without any planning whatever.

Mr. McIntosh: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Lambton West has left the house because he made a few remarks to which I think I should reply. I think for his edification he should be told a few of the responsibilities of the opposition in this house. In his absence, I will state what I have in mind concerning our reason for opposing this bill. I will put my remarks on the record and the hon. member will be able to read them in Hansard tomorrow.

First of all, I want to refer to a few of the other remarks he made. Oh, I see he is here now. He said that the government was not proceeding in haste with this unification program. Well, I would remind the hon. member for Lambton West that every move in connection with this whole program has been made in haste, regardless of the promises given to members by the minister during his second reading speech, when he said we would be given ample opportunity in committee to question all the witnesses we wanted after the bill had been given second reading. This was one of the carrots he held out to members of the house. In addition, the Prime Minister gave the people of Canada the assurance that the critics of this unification program would be given ample opportunity to question any witnesses that they wished.

The minister stated the government was in a hurry to get this bill into committee after second reading. We pleaded with them at that time not to make us agree to the principle of the bill before we understood what it meant. I am surprised that some members in this house have made the remark that they agreed with the principle, but they did not understand what it meant. How could a person agree with a principle without understanding what it means? We would be delighted if we could agree with the principle and if we could believe it would be good for Canada. However, we do not understand what unification means, and I do not believe the minister understands what unification means. If I were to ask the hon. member for Lambton West what unification meant, he would not be able to give an answer. We proved this in the committee.

Mr. Hellyer: I gave an answer.

Mr. McIntosh: Even the minister could not give us a definition of unification.

Mr. Hellyer: I gave you one.

Mr. McIntosh: But did you try to interpret it? You stated in the committee that you wished you had used the term "single service concept" instead of unification. We wished that also, because you have tried to confuse us with this term "unification". I agree with one of the writers in the press who said he thought the minister had used the word "unification" and then dreamed up a force afterwards to fit. It appears to us that unification is bad for Canada. Certainly, we are going to object to this bill as long as we can or until the government can convince us it is good for Canada. All the evidence we have gathered so far proves the opposite.

Unification will not save the taxpayers money. It will not improve the effectiveness of our armed forces. Unification will disrupt and destroy the alliances to which we are now committed. It will destroy our national sovereignty and destroy our national pride. It will get us into many situations that will be dangerous for us.

Before I go into that, I want to indicate to the hon. member for Lambton West that we are opposing this bill because we feel it is our responsibility to do so. In order to refresh his memory, and in case he does not know that an opposition is an essential part of parliamentary democracy, I should like to remind him of the nineteenth century dictum of Lord Acton that power tends to corrupt and absolute power corrupts absolutely. This dictum remains as true today as when it was laid down. There is no protection for liberty simply in the word "democracy". Unchecked, the best of rulers become autocratic. This is the nature of man. We have seen evidence of this in the present minister.

Autocracy, tyranny and dictatorship are shadows that ever stand in the wings of the freest of parliaments. In the absence of a strong opposition, a cabinet with a commanding position in the house could and would rule without regard to individual or minority rights. The hon. member for Lambton West was alleging that we had no rights here, that we had no right to oppose this bill. We certainly have a right to oppose it, indeed it is our responsibility to oppose it until we know what it means.

The need of a strong opposition is supported by almost every political writer. Among these is Professor Basset who in his "Essentials of Parliamentary Democracy" has stated that the opposition is not merely tolerated but treated as indispensable. He emphasizes the existence of an opposition as an example of the difference between democracy and autocracy. As I said before, an opposition is as necessary to the parliamentary system as is the cabinet. The two are inseparable. One without the other would mean tyranny or chaos.

One of the most important functions of the opposition is to constructively criticize the executive. This is what we are doing and this is what we intend to do, regardless of the remarks from members on the other side and regardless of the press. We are carrying out our responsibility to the Canadian people. An opposition that discharges its parliamentary responsibilities properly is bound to appear as obstructionist to those opposed. We are bound to appear to be filibustering. But it is the very essence of our system that if the opposition party feels strongly on a matter of principle it must carry its opposition to the utmost extent allowed by parliamentary usage, and that is what we intend to do. Parliament is a place for responsible discussion. The weapons of the opposition are discussion and argument, and we intend to use those weapons.

Unfortunately, this opposition in parliament has been misrepresented by the hon. member for Lambton West to be obstructionist and time wasting, and uninformed critics cry for action. I wish they would become informed. Parliament will only remain the guardian of freedom and the custodian of our free institutions as long as Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is fully responsible—as we intend to be—and effective in the discharge of its functions.

When I spoke a few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, I referred to the minister glorying in some press coverage he had received across the country.

Mr. Foy: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McIntosh: Certainly.

Mr. Foy: I understood the hon. member to say that he did not know what unification meant. Is that what he said?

Mr. McIntosh: I said I did not understand what it meant.

Mr. Foy: Then on that basis the question I want to ask is this. If the hon. member does not understand what unification means, how can he state that unification is going to destroy the armed services?

Mr. McIntosh: I am opposed to any experiment with our armed forces, and I think this is an experiment. I do not know whether it is good or bad until some explanation is given. May I ask the hon. member for Lambton West what unification means? Would he care to answer that question?

During the committee hearings we asked many experienced officers for a definition of unification, and as the hon. member knows —he was there and heard them—most of them said that they did not know what it meant. Those who made the attempt to give a definition gave one which had no relationship to any of the previous definitions, and I might say that this includes both the minister and the chief of the general staff.

Mr. Pugh: They were just as muddled as the minister.

Mr. McIntosh: Perhaps more so, and the minister made them that way.

I should like to refer quickly to certain headlines across the country for which the minister took credit. One of these was: "Unification is probably the boldest plan of military reorganization ever tried by a modern nation".

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIntosh: The minister says "hear, hear". He still thinks this is a good headline. Another one read: "We are now becoming leaders in defence organization, and thinkers, not just followers". That one was flashed all across the world to our allies. We all know what General Simonds said when we asked him what our allies thought about this unification program for Canada. He said that they thought we were all nuts, as Canadians, and the minister is responsible for our allies thinking in this way. They are not my words; they are the general's words.

Mr. Hellyer: He was thinking of the opposition.

Mr. McIntosh: He could have been thinking of the opposition, but time will tell us who are the nuts.

Another headline read: "Canada will have indelibly etched her name as the world leader in military organization".

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIntosh: The minister's definition that unification means only a single service concept does not support or fit into these earlier statements, statements to which he just now responded "hear, hear". He still endorses them. The single service concept is certainly not the boldest plan of military reorganization ever tried by a modern nation—definitely not. Whom was the minister trying to fool when he made that statement? He has made us the laughingstock of other nations. I remember saying that of the minister in a speech in January, and this is what he is likely to do. He will likely make the Canadian troops embarrassed. He will embarrass our sailors at any port they visit. The minister has not heard the last of this, even if he is fortunate enough to shove the bill through the house; and with the support of the splinter parties he will be able to do this.

Nor does its implementation in any way make Canada a leader in defence organization. It has been pointed out to us several times in the committee that the United States has been following the single service concept in its marine force for years. I also say at this point that it is used chiefly in an offensive rather than in a defensive role. This is where this program might be very dangerous to us as Canadians.

In Canada the single service concept only makes sense if it is the intention of the government to opt out of our collective defence role and adapt our entire military efforts to the role of peace keeping and peace restoring. Here we enter the field of a change in foreing policy which may be the key to what the government is getting at. This may be the reason that there has been no forward planning in the Department of National Defence. When we ask how many men will be required to take on the extra role of peace keeping and how much money will be required for this purpose, it may be the reason that the minister and the chief of the general staff said that they had made no studies in this regard whatever, which to me is a very amazing statement on the part of the minister and the chief of the general staff.

Mr. Forrestall: A very revealing one.

Mr. McIntosh: Yes, very revealing. Again I state that the only answer we could get from the chief of the general staff was that he said he was strongly convinced that unification will work out this way. I contend that is not good enough for the members of the House of Commons. We want better answers than that. We are entitled to facts and figures. We cannot understand why this planning has not taken place. That is the duty of these people. That is why the taxpayers pay them. They are paid to plan and to provide these figures, to let us know what our role will be.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, this problem has now resolved itself into two major issues. As I listen to the speeches in this house made by those who are present, it seems these members have also come to this conclusion. The problem now involves our external affairs policy as well as our defence policy.

If this premise is correct, Mr. Chairman, then we have put the cart before the horse in dealing with our defence policy. At present we are dealing with defence policy before we have a clear understanding of what is our foreign policy. The members of this house have asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs to produce a white paper on foreign policy. If our foreign policy has changed, then perhaps this single service concept might be all right for the provision of a peacekeeping force. But I would suggest to the government that it is not Canada's duty to go alone into this peace keeping peace restoring role. Other countries as well as Canada should participate. We are not the guardian of the United Nations, and we are not the people who should restore peace in these brush-fire wars which are started from time to time in various parts of the world. That is not our responsibility. We are willing to help, and we in the opposition would support such a measure; but I do not think that we should be expected to perform this role alone.

Mr. Pugh: Nor pay for it.

Mr. McIntosh: Nor pay for it, as an hon. member says, as we are doing at the present time. The cost should be spread over all of those countries in favour of peace keeping and peace restoring.

If our foreign policy is to remain unchanged, then there is no need for a drastic change in our defence structure. I think that was amply borne out by expert witnesses before the committee. There is certainly no need for unification of our combat troops or forces. This is why we object to unification, because it disrupts our combat troops. We should keep those combat troops foremost in mind at all times. Their efficiency is most essential to the defence needs of this country. Perhaps we can have poor supply and administration elements, but we cannot have poor combat troops, which is what is likely to happen if we concentrate on the system that the minister is trying to enforce at the present time. We do not want tidy administration at the cost of our combat troops.

On the other hand, if the government's intention is to change our role in foreign affairs and to adopt a "go it alone" foreign policy —which is what some of us think it is— I suggest that as a small nation we cannot afford to contemplate such action, because it touches on such subjects as our sovereignty and our national pride. Some hon. members will no doubt be thinking that the suggestion that it is Canada's intention to opt out of its collective defence role is a ridiculous idea. It is not so ridiculous. I suggest there is foundation for such a thought. Some will say that government spokesmen have time after time given assurances to our allies and to the Canadian people that they have no intention of opting out of our collective defence commitments. Let us consider the facts and determine whether there is any ground for our concern.

Military experts have told us it is impossible in terms of available manpower at present budgetary figures for Canada to continue both her collective defence role and the proposed peace keeping peace restoring role. Remember the figures General Moncel gave us. We cannot continue to fulfil our commitments to NORAD and SACEUR while taking on another role as peacekeeper. Military expert witnesses have maintained that to fulfil both roles our manpower figures would have to be increased from 104,000—the lowest it has been for years—to approximately 150,000. Where are the recruits coming from?

Our defence budget of $1.5 billion would have to be increased to approximately $2.6 billion to cover a dual role status. This is almost double last year's defence budget. When government witnesses, including the minister, are questioned on cost and manpower requirements they freely state that no study of estimates has been made by the department in connection with increased requirements in either manpower or dollars. This is a strange admission, particularly when it comes from those in the department who should be planning this sort of thing. If we embark on a venture of any kind we need to know how many men are required. The Canadian taxpayer has a right to know how much the cost will be. The minister says he cannot tell us. But he intends to go into this venture regardless of the cost. These are facts which must be put across to the Canadian taxpayer.

The obvious conclusion to be drawn is that it is not the government's intention to continue both the collective defence role and the peace keeping role. It is parliament's responsibility to determine just what the government's intentions are. This should have been done before we agreed to this bill in principle, but the circumstances were such that we were forced to agree in principle before we understood what was meant. We still do not understand what this bill will mean. Although every member of this party voted against second reading of the unification bill, the government had sufficient support to force it down our throats.

The military expert witnesses testified that the task requirement of our alliances could not be carried out by a single service force. Statements were made that the single service proposed in Bill C-243 would be less effective in defending our country and in co-operating with our allies than the three services we have today. If this is so, why break up the present system? The three services were designed and evolved to operate and fight in three totally distinct environments—land, sea and air. Bill C-243 as written indicates that the single unified service would be basically "army" in character, and indicates a shifting in our defence policy.

I would say that our four brigade groups would in themselves call for most of the limited manpower available today and that there would be little left to fulfil the obligations to which we are being committed. This government, and particularly the minister, is steering us away from the natural modern concept of interdependence and leading us back to the antiquated role of maintaining a national force. In this day and age we are bound to take account of our interdependence vis-à-vis other nations. This is vital to the defence of our country. If the minister does not agree, why does he not abolish the defence force altogether? If he intends to let the United States protect Canada, why not save to the taxpayer the entire budget of this department? If he does not agree, let him tell this house what he is actually proposing. What is going to happen? Maybe this is not his responsibility. Maybe it is the responsibility of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There seems to be confusion between the two policies of this government. Possibly the Prime Minister should straighten this out before we proceed further with the bill before us.

Many Canadians are asking in what circumstances the proposed mobile force will be used. It is generally accepted that at present Canada has no enemies. Are we now, under the guise of peace restoring, intending to become an aggressor nation? God forbid. I submit that such a switch in policy as the minister now proposes means looking for trouble instead of avoiding it.

What will happen to the economy of this country if we undertake such a role as that of peace restoring? The discharge of an independent role in which we are prepared to meet a wide variety of conflicts short of all out war would mean warfare regardless of what it was called and would be carried out at the risk of the lives of Canadian servicemen. In the course of peace restoring we might suffer a military disaster; or we might become heavily involved. The United States started in Viet Nam with 24,000 men. They now have over 400,000 in that theatre and they are engaged in a major war. Let us not be lulled into thinking that there are no risks involved in a peace restoring role. We have a terrible example before us today in Viet Nam.

Military experts have stated it would be foolhardy in the extreme to assume that recruiting, poor as it is at present, would not deteriorate disastrously after the unification of the regular services. I am sure the minister is afraid of this, because he intends to force those who have joined the army, the navy and the air force to be integrated compulsorily in the single Canadian armed force.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. member like to hear a definition of an expert?

An hon. Member: Who is an expert?

Mr. Hellyer: Some of the people he has been referring to.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. McIntosh: The hon. gentleman is not an expert. If he were, I would listen to him.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. member not like to hear this? It might amuse him. The definition goes like this:

> Experts have their expert fun
> Ex cathedra telling one
> Just how nothing can be done.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Hellyer: The author is a philosopher —Piet Hein.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I always thought an expert was a man from out of town.

Mr. McIntosh: I am sure the house was pleased to hear advice from the expert. I am not sure all members of this house would agree with the interpretation the minister seems to place on the words he read. It seems to me that it is facetious for a minister to get up in a debate such as this and quote a passage of that sort. I suggest the minister should take the discussion more seriously.

Representing a great number of naval people as we do, we have to go back to our constituencies and tell them what this unification problem is all about and how it is going to work out. Although I do not give my support to the minister, and am not a supporter of his leader, the Prime Minister, I am very proud when the Prime Minister appears anywhere I am. All Canadian people take pride in his appearance in their midst. We are in a democracy and we in this parliament are in opposition. We are embarassed by the things the government does. We are embarrassed by the comments from other countries saying what they think about unification, but also we are very proud when Canada does something that is notable throughout the world.

We are always very proud of our armed forces, no matter what their role. They have always conducted themselves in a proper manner. We have made friends through the armed forces that we have in Europe, and when we go over there as tourists we are proud of the behaviour of our troops.

We do not want to let our troops become the laughingstock of all the ports of the world. Our sailors say this is what will happen. If the minister continues his determination to rush this bill through, then any effort we make is well worth while if we can delay its passage until possibly the government is defeated and another government takes over. It will take a long time to repair the destruction created by the minister. I hope we do not live to see the day that we regret what will take place because of the passage of this bill.

Military experts have stated on numerous occasions that it would be foolhardy in the extreme to assume that recruiting, poor as it already is, will not drastically deteriorate further under unification of the regular services. They maintain that if this bill is passed, then within the next few years Canada will probably find herself facing again the unhappy and politically dangerous question of compulsory national service because of manpower requirements. Under unification this conscription issue is almost inevitable.

I would caution some of my hon. friends on the other side of the chamber, who in the past have violently opposed compulsory military service, violently opposed conscription, to remember that when they get up and vote for this bill the result of its passage is likely to be conscription. This consideration alone should give parliament serious reason to pause and consider, before blindly endorsing this military fantasy.

Equally important, Canadian unification may place unlooked for commitments on our present allies, and in particular on the United States navy in meeting the Soviet submarine threat. I submit that present conditions do warrant further reflection on this defence issue, and I request the minister to pay heed to some of the pleas from this side of the chamber and withdraw the bill for further consideration. Some of the damage that has been done to him may be undone if he would be big enough to accede to this request.

I am sure that after listening to all the witnesses before the defence committee the minister must feel he is taking a serious risk. I do not want to say anything about his military experience, but I suggest that the number of people he has had to deal with since taking office, experienced military career officers, men of stature, should have had some effect on him through their advice.

This brings up the question that has been asked about the minister's treatment of Admiral Landymore. When the minister made a statement on the reason Admiral Landymore was fired, and then found out his discharge was not warranted, I cannot understand why he does not reinstate him once again so that Canada may again be served by this man of experience.

The Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Starr: Carry on.

The Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Mr. McIntosh: I have expired, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, there is hardly time tonight for me to do justice to a topic as interesting, engaging and serious as the unification bill in the two minutes that are left, so may I just make a comment with regard to the hon. member for Lambton West who contributed some semi-complimentary remarks about me.

The hon. member for Lambton West is a genial member of the house. He was a good attender at the meetings of the defence committee. He is what I call an anchor man in a committee, a man who is always there and who can be relied upon to do whatever he is told. He is the type of committee member that a minister likes to have, and his attendance at the defence committee should put him in line for promotion of some sort or another.

He gave unthinking obedience to the minister and to the minister's very active assistant during the course of committee meetings, and without any great thought to the bill he responded to all the suggestions made to him by the minister or the minister's assistant. In fact he reminded me of a Colonel Blimp in civilian clothes, and his genial attitude made it possible for us to put up with him and rather enjoy his company from time to time, but his contribution to the committee proceedings was not any greater than his contribution to the debate tonight. I was sorry that the hon. member stumbled a bit tonight when he was reading some of that Lee stuff that had been placed in front of him. He should have had a little more time to study it and get the sentences straightened out.

Tomorrow, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with the basic feature of the bill which is touched upon in clause 2. This clause modifies the present statute which, if I may paraphrase it, says that the Canadian forces shall consist of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force. The amendment in this bill strikes out Royal Canadian Navy, Canadian Army and Royal Canadian Air Force. In other words it eliminates the three services that we have known in the past. It destroys their identity and it is that subject which I wish to deal with tomorrow. May I now call it ten o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I was wondering, Mr. Speaker, if I could ask whoever is leading the house what business do we switch to tomorrow?

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not realize I was leading the house, but since the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Churchill: You are not doing it very well.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I am doing as well leading the house, in my absent minded way, as hon. gentlemen opposite are in carrying on the debate. We will go on with the unification bill and give them more scope for tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF KINDERGARTEN TEACHERS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I know the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) feels proud of the increasing expenditure that the Indian Affairs branch has made over the past few years in respect of education. I know he appreciates, perhaps to a greater extent than do some of his colleagues, the necessity to concentrate efforts in the field of education for our native people.

With the increasing population of native Indian people, consequently there are more younger people involved and this is part of the reason for the increased expenditure on education. Many, in fact most, native Indian parents did not, on balance, have the same educational opportunities that the non-Indian people have. In many instances there was a denial of educational opportunities. As a consequence of that and as a consequence of the fact that some of the Indian communities are relatively isolated and have been for some years, Indian children in some cases have a more difficult time developing their learning ability, and the speed with which they grasp things in school.

This situation is more difficult in isolated communities. It is the isolated communities, the Indian communities wherein there are day schools as distinct from the integrated schools, about which I should like to speak this evening. I should like to make special reference to kindergarten classes. I think we must concentrate on bending over backwards in an effort to assist in placing more emphasis on kindergarten classes, and that age group of children, so they will have a better opportunity to proceed through school at a pace comparable to that at which non-Indian children proceed through school. This is recognized by the department.

I should like to make reference to a form letter which was sent to the principals and chief councillors from the district superintendent of Indian schools at Prince Rupert. The subject is kindergarten classes, and the letter reads as follows:

> The branch is willing to provide books for teachers and supplies for a village kindergarten operated by a kindergarten committee.

That certainly is a recognition of the necessity to place some emphasis on kindergarten classes. The letter goes on to say that classes can be held at certain times and then makes reference to the age of the pupils who would attend in the 1967-68 year. Here are two other sentences which I should like to quote in their entirety:

> We are unable, at this time, to provide wages for those in charge, and so they must be voluntary workers.
> It is suggested that, if the people of the village are interested, the principal of the school and the council discuss this matter, and advise me of their plans.

The letter is signed by Dr. C. E. Johnson.

I would urge the minister to expand what is already a policy of recognition of the necessity to extend kindergarten classes, and to expand the policy which now offers books and supplies from the branch for kindergarten classes. I would hope that this would be expanded into a recognition that it may be necessary to employ teachers to teach in kindergartens in order to ensure that there is some continuity of approach in kindergarten classes for the native children, and so that the native children will have that much more opportunity to proceed through school and make the most use of our educational system.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, when I first heard this question I did not know whether the hon. member was attempting to be critical of the department or whether his well-known kindness toward me activated him into giving me an opportunity of telling him what a whale of a job the department was doing. He has now read a letter which purportedly was sent to a reserve, indicating that they would have to use their own money to pay their own teacher. He will have to give me more particulars in this regard, because this is something about which I know nothing.

At the present time we have 159 classes of children of this age group in federal and provincial schools receiving kindergarten instruction. Indeed, we have 3,000 Indian children attending these schools in Canada. That represents about 35 per cent of Indian children of five years of age. I have little knowledge of the number of kindergarten classes for the white population in Canada but I question whether 35 per cent would be attending kindergarten.

We have been pressing this policy as rapidly as we can because we want to telescope the opportunity for those children coming from Indian parentage, with little knowledge of the English language in some cases, by providing comparable classes and conditions to those the white children have. We are endeavouring to do this by offering this instruction. Within the next five-year period, by 1972, we expect to have 80 per cent of all five-year-old Indian children attending kindergarten classes. If we are successful this will be a magnificent record.

Not very long ago I had the opportunity of observing one of these classes in operation at the Cowichan reserve. This was a remarkable experience because there was evidence in these five-year-old children of some of the artistic qualities that Indians possess. I was very much impressed.

We pay regular salaries commensurate with the schedule applied to all teachers. Indeed in some instances at the present time, when these teachers have special qualifications, we pay additional salaries over and above the present scale. I am of the opinion that the letter which precipitated the hon. member's question was addressed to a remote or very small reserve. All reserves of sufficient size to accommodate a teacher and a classroom, and I was given this information when I was in British Columbia, has a kindergarten class paid for entirely by the department.

There is one exception. The Vancouver schoolboard is making a contribution toward the teacher's salary at the Musqueam reserve. In addition, one of the service clubs in Vancouver wanted to contribute $10,000 toward the accommodation of such a school and we gladly accepted that offer. If we are able to persuade other organizations of this kind to participate I think we will obtain the best advantages of the world in which we live.

I certainly will make inquiries in respect of the hon. member's question, but I think it must relate to a reserve where the number of children of this age group is not adequate to constitute a class. If that is not so, as the hon. member indicates now by shaking his head, we will attempt to rectify the situation as soon as possible.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF REPRESENTATION IN PACIFIC AREA

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) today whether or not the government, having completed arrangements for additional representation with Roumania, would be giving consideration to increasing its representation in the Pacific region. That is a question which seems to me to be of immediate significance to this country. As authority for its significance to Canada today, I should like to quote the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) as reported in the Vancouver Sunday Sun of April 1. I trust that the date of the report is no commentary on its significance. The Prime Minister is quoted as saying:

• (10:10 p.m.)

We know in Ottawa that Canada needs British Columbia.

The article goes on to say:

He said—

Referring to the Prime Minister.

—he is very much aware of the importance of export markets to B.C. industry.

He said B.C. interests in the export markets can be negotiated more successfully by the federal government "than if this province (B.C.) had to face the world alone."

Finally, the Prime Minister referred to British Columbia's interest in expanded trade with Japan and other Pacific countries. We in British Columbia appreciate those remarks, but there is a world of difference between going out to British Columbia and making a speech and seeing it translated into action here in Ottawa. This is the problem that was inherent in the question I asked this afternoon.

Certainly the completion of the exchange of representatives with Roumania does not have much to do with trade. I have before me the figures for exports from Canada to that country and three Pacific countries. In 1965, for the total year, Canadian exports to Roumania were $641,202; to Korea, $822,564; to Taiwan, $6,577,329, and to Thailand, $5,620,820. For the first six months of 1966 our exports to Roumania amounted to $672,610; to Korea, $13,015,792; to Taiwan, $5,162,889, and to Thailand, $4,937,854.

We know that we do not have representation in Thailand or Taiwan and that our ambassador to Korea is actually our ambassador to Japan. The interests that our country has with Japan constitute a full-time job for anyone in that position. So when the Prime Minister is quoted as having said that the federal government could do better than British Columbia facing the world alone, one wonders how, when its representation in the area is as inadequate as it has been for a very long time. We in British Columbia are interested in developing trade throughout the Pacific rim. We are interested in Canada taking its place as a Pacific nation. This has been advocated not only by people from this party but by people from the government benches.

I have here a copy of an address given by Robert L. Houston, executive director of the Canada-Japan Trade Council, to a luncheon of the Vancouver Board of Trade on February 13 last. I shall quote very briefly from it. Mr. Houston mentions Canadian business visitors to Japan in 1965 and says:

> Compare the 264 Canadian business visitors to Japan in 1965 with the much higher numbers of 1,150 Australian, and 16,000 American business travellers during the same year.

Later in the address he said:

> I feel that Canada could take a lead in exploring the setting up of an economic association between the U.S.A., Japan and Canada—

He goes on to elaborate on that idea. In this one address enough ideas are presented to keep the Canadian ambassador to Japan an extremely busy person, without having him also concerned about the neighbouring country of Korea. I know that the Asian nations I have mentioned are three of the strongest bulwarks against communism but I would hope that would not be a factor in the reluctance or slowness of Canada to move to increasing its representation there. I realize that Roumania is one of the communist nations of Europe and we have representation already in several of these countries. Roumania is not a nation with a large ethnic group in Canada to be concerned about.

I would hope that perhaps some of the reasons for the exchange are ones that will be of benefit to this country. I am sure we could benefit from immigration from that country, particularly from its province of Transylvania which compares somewhat to my own constituency. I know that criticism in my constituency has been expressed to the effect that the province of British Columbia does not put forward sufficiently in eastern Canada, the opportunities for industrial development in British Columbia but I feel that one of the difficulties it faces is that it must go out into the Pacific and do some of the representation there which is not being done by the federal government at this time.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be to point out to the hon. member that in directing his questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs he was somewhat misinformed. It is clear from his remarks that he is primarily interested in the question of trade. He will probably recall on reflection that the expansion of Canada's trade contacts is not primarily the responsibility of this department but of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the trade commissioners service. Therefore I am not able to give him information on whether or not we have trade commissioners in the post which he has named. However, I would point out to him—

Mr. Thompson: No, it has not.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If the hon. member for Red Deer would contain himself I would be able to answer the question put by his colleague. We have a farflung trade commissioner service and I do not doubt that we are represented in those posts.

Mr. Thompson: No, we are not.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Subject to those considerations I wish to point out that the expansion of Canada's external affairs department and the expansion of Canadian activities has brought with it great pressure to expand our diplomatic missions not only in eastern Europe but also in Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

I would also point out that this pressure, along with the already heavy obligations that the department has, has brought a great pressure on the number of officers we have and on the number of missions which we are able to open at any one time. Therefore, while I can assure the hon. member that the opening of further missions is continually being directed to the attention of the government, and the government does intend to open missions not only in Asia but on the other continents, I cannot at the moment give him a specific assurance that the particular missions to which he has referred will be opened. I will point out to him, however, that the question of trade is the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I am sure his remarks will be of great interest to the minister of that department.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

*REDUCED PAYMENT TO NATIONAL CAPITAL FUND

Question No. 2,751—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

Why has the government reduced the payment to the national capital fund from $25,000,000 in the fiscal year 1966-67 to $14,650,000 in 1967-68?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the difference between the sum of $25 million paid to the national capital fund in 1966-67 and the sum of $14,650,000 to be paid in 1967-68 is more than accounted for by the reduction in the amount required for the railway relocation project and for the construction of the Ottawa river parkway, which was well advanced toward completion on March 31, 1967.

REQUEST FOR CALLING OF NATIONAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the house will allow me to preface the question I am about to ask, I should like first to offer my most sincere congratulations to the new Minister of Justice, for whom I have the highest admiration, and also to the new Minister without Portfolio. The same applies to the others who have already entered the sacred precincts of the privy council.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now I direct my question to the Minister of Justice. It is a matter about which I am endeavouring to get information. Now that the new minister has taken office, would he give early consideration to the convening of a national constitutional conference—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to which in days past he has given his allegiance? I hope he will give consideration to this question and will be able to use the powers of advocacy in support of this conference now that he has the responsibility of office.

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the right hon. Leader of the Opposition for the occasion he has given me to thank hon. members of this house from both sides for the friendly way in which they have congratulated me on my appointment. I want to thank the Leader of the Opposition particularly for starting off gently by asking me a difficult question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course I will give consideration to the matter which the right hon. Leader of the Opposition has raised. I would always give consideration to a matter the right hon. Leader of the Opposition might raise. On the issue itself, I must say that I have not been in cabinet long enough yet to change my mind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEwan: Later this day.

Mr. Churchill: Twenty four hours.

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps at ten o'clock. My opinion, as I have expressed it a few times in the past, is that I did not feel it was good policy for the government to be overanxious about the convening of a constitutional conference, for the simple reason that some of the other ministers and myself feel there is perhaps not yet the measure of consensus existing in the country which would permit—

Mr. Starr: You have already changed your mind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: No; that will have to be shown. I would say that I am optimistic about the future of this country, as are hon. members on both sides of the house, and I think some day or other we will have that measure of consensus which will permit us to look at various forms of constitutional change.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In asking the Minister of Justice a supplementary question I should like to join in the general congratulations of the house and express especially the pleasure of this party in the minister's appointment, particularly as I heard on the radio this morning that he was a member of this party at heart.

My question to him is this. In order to try to establish the consensus across Canada that he thinks is necessary in order to deal with the constitutional issues raised by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, will the minister direct his attention to the suggestion that has been made on a number of occasions by various members of the house, that a committee of this parliament be established to look into this matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my feeling is that the history of the past few years has indicated that the opposite course is precisely the one that should be followed. I feel there is progress toward the establishment of a consensus, and this has happened as a result of sensible politicians in all provinces and in the central government looking at the difficulty of establishing agreement.

We did have the example of an amending procedure, which was discussed very largely across the country and which just did not arrive at any concrete conclusion because the country was not then ready. I feel that precisely because we have avoided such confrontations we are permitting responsible politicians everywhere to arrive at the conclusion which we on this side of the house have reached, namely that time is on our side.

COAL

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR VICTIMS OF MINE DISASTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister regarding the unfortunate mining disaster in Natal, British Columbia. All of us share the sentiments of sympathy which he expressed yesterday for the families of the victims. I want to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is now prepared to announce something fairly concrete. Press reports have indicated that the government of British Columbia is making a cash contribution to a fund to provide for the widows and dependants of the victims. Is the Canadian government prepared to make a contribution to such a fund as a first step in helping those affected by this mining disaster?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday this matter is under consideration. I am not yet in a position to make any announcement with regard to what we can do to help the victims of this terrible disaster, except to say that one decision has been made, namely that all contributions will be tax deductible. However, I hope to be able to make a statement shortly.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Prime Minister give early consideration, while this fund is being collected, to the federal government making a substantial contribution as a first step, which would not prevent the government from doing other things which it might be necessary to do?

Mr. Pearson: That is what I said is under consideration.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR DISCUSSION OF NEW DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

As a result of the new dairy policy of the government, has the minister received representations from the various agricultural organizations of the C.F.U. of Quebec with a view to resuming discussions between the farmers and the Department of Agriculture specifically with regard to that new dairy policy.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall any such communication, but I shall take the question of the hon. member as notice.

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister be willing to resume the dialogue with the farmers of Canada in connection with the dairy policy? And is it not true that the minister is to meet the farmers on Friday, April 7, that is the day after tomorrow, about this matter?

Mr. Greene: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall see the farmers, on Thursday and Friday, and I shall be very happy to meet the members of the C.F.U. as well, if they wish to see me about the new dairy policy.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF POSITION OF OMBUDSMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that R.C.M.P. Commissioner George McClellan is reportedly resigning his position to accept the post of ombudsman for Alberta, the first such office to be established in Canada, I would again ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to introduce legislation during this centennial year which would establish an ombudsman or parliamentary commissioner for Canada at the federal level.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I would ask my hon. friend to allow me not to answer his question now, as I will be making a statement on this in a few days' time. We have been giving consideration to this very complicated matter and we have not yet come to a final conclusion, but I hope to be able to make a report in a few days.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Solicitor General and ask him whether he can confirm the fact that Commissioner McClellan is leaving the R.C.M.P. to become ombudsman for the province of Alberta.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should point out that in the normal course of events the commissioner will reach retirement age as of August 15 of this year. Although he is under no obligation to discuss his future plans with me, we have discussed them at some length. Of course any announcement as to his future after his retirement from the force will have to come either from the commissioner or from his employer at that time.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether it is his practice to let his officials reach retirement age, or is he going to adopt the practice of the Minister of National Defence?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STUDY OF CORPORATION LAW REFORM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the success of the committee established by the government of Ontario in outlining the reforms needed in Ontario corporation law to provide better protection for the public in that province, does the government intend to initiate a similar study at the federal level with a view to providing better protection for the public in all parts of the country?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): We have already done that, Mr. Speaker, as the result of a decision to hold a meeting to consider this matter I believe next Monday.

INDUSTRY

REPORTED DECREASE IN CANADIAN AUTOMOBILE PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Industry. In view of the fact that Canadian automobile output decreased by 11.4 per cent during the first quarter of this year as compared to the same period last year, will the minister immediately consult with his officials and his colleagues in order to determine to what extent this decrease was caused by the Canada-United States auto pact?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Without admitting the premise on which the question is based, I should like to take the question as notice.

GRAIN

OATS AND BARLEY—REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO SHIP INTO MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): My question concerns the western provinces, and particularly Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I have to preface it by stating that today in Saskatchewan farmers are selling their oats on the farm at 70 cents to 80 cents a bushel, barley at $1.10 to $1.26 and feed wheat at $1.70 per bushel. There are ample supplies of the first two grains in that province. In Manitoba there is a very serious shortage of feed grain for those who feed cattle. The wheat board, of course, will not allow the transport of oats or barley from one province to another.

In view of the serious situation resulting from the shortage of these two grains in Manitoba, will the minister communicate with the wheat board to ascertain whether some temporary moratorium might be applied that would permit shipments to be made, thereby meeting the serious demands of Manitoba feeders?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would be glad to discuss this important matter with the wheat board and endeavour to give a report to the house tomorrow.

MANITOU SEED WHEAT—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF EXPORT EMBARGO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister had any recent requests to remove the embargo on shipments of Manitou seed wheat to the United States? If so, what action if any does he contemplate taking with regard to this matter?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have had no recent requests, though prior to the recess there were some communications in this regard. Our investigations indicated that there were two sides to the story, two views held by different groups of farmers. Having considered both sides of the story, no change in the government's policy has been made to date.

REQUEST FOR INCREASED MOVEMENT OF TOUGH AND DAMP GRADES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce and it has to do with tough and damp grain still on the farm. Would the minister inquire of the Canadian Wheat Board whether they will be in a position to allot more cars to remove this grain or to increase the quota?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making a representation, which I assume has been noted by the minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PUBLIC WORKS

PORT McNEILL, B.C.—REQUEST FOR BREAKWATER CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to direct to the Minister of Public Works a question which, to borrow a phrase from my colleague from Kootenay West, is of great national importance. I should like to ask the minister whether he will endeavour to prevail upon his colleagues in the cabinet to provide a supplementary estimate for the construction of a breakwater at Port McNeill on Vancouver island?

Mr. Speaker: I have to tell the hon. member what I sometimes have had to tell the hon. member for Kootenay West, that the question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Barnett: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Ten o'clock.

TRADE

COPPER—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF EXPORT RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the steady decline in the international price of primary and scrap copper, and the general improvement in the whole situation, is the minister considering rescinding any of the restrictions the government has imposed on copper?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the situation has eased somewhat in recent months. The 50 per cent quota that applied to copper scrap and copper alloy scrap has been increased to the point where, effective in April, it will be 100 per cent. Permits are now let freely for the sale of scrap not now normally consumed by refineries. There are no restrictions on exports to the United States.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR AID TO WAR VICTIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs of which there is no doubt as to its national importance. In view of the concern of many Canadians with the failure of the Canadian government to respond to Dr. Gustave Gingras' plea to provide a medical aid program to the children of South Viet Nam, is the government now prepared to give consideration to this plea and to the advice of the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Pelletier) who, when addressing the Montreal Reform Club on Monday, said "We could show where our heart truly lies by sending massive medical aid to both North and South Vietnamese war victims"?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of the question, of which I have received notice, I can definitely state that the delay in bringing this project in South Viet Nam into being has not been for want of a strong indication from the Canadian government of support for the idea of helping the children of South Viet Nam. Dr. Gingras himself went to South Viet Nam at the government's suggestion and request, and he made a report on his visit. We are still hopeful that something will come out of the work which he did and the work which has been done since. As soon as the results of our latest efforts are known, I will report them to the house.

With regard to the second part of the question, I have already indicated that Canadian aid is granted on the basis of government requests. If such request is made by the government in North Viet Nam the Canadian government will give it the consideration it would want to give.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask the minister of external affairs why the project sponsored by Dr. Gingras has been delayed for so long?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The reason, Mr. Speaker, which I have explained in this house already, is that the facilities where the rehabilitation project was to be established were not made available to the government of Canada. Facilities have to be established, including a site. We are still working on this, and if the site and those facilities are provided, the work of rehabilitation, as recommended by Dr. Gingras, will be commenced.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the minister correctly reported in the press as having stated that if a request was made by North Viet Nam for material aid—and I speak of other than medical aid—the government of Canada would grant it?

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, what I said was what I have said in this house on many occasions—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the minister say that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am now answering. If such a request were made, the government would give consideration to a request for medical supplies for the civilian population. I cannot be responsible if my right hon. friend had a report which he does not think is consistent with my reply. Certainly I do not believe his report is consistent with what I said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if anything the hon. gentleman says is consistent I have yet to find it. In the meantime I would ask the minister whether he said that material aid other than medical supplies would be granted if requested by the government of North Viet Nam.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have just said that my right hon. friend has read his report incorrectly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not at all.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the minister of external affairs relating to an answer given in this house some weeks ago. I wonder if the minister can now tell us when action might be taken on a proposed plan to bring Vietnamese children to Canada for rehabilitation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no report to make on that at the moment.

[Later:]

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the minister of external affairs. May I ask him whether any request has been made to the Canadian government for medical supplies to be administered to civilians wounded as a result of the conflict in Viet Nam. If there was, what would be the attitude of the government to this request?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As my hon. friend knows, all external aid is on a government to government basis, though I have had a letter from some correspondent suggesting that this government might not wait for a request from the government of North Viet Nam to give such assistance.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN PROPOSAL RESPECTING TRAINING OF PEACE KEEPING UNITS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have an easy question for the perturbed minister for external affairs. Is the report in the press correct that Canada's permanent representative at the United Nations has proposed that the United Nations set up uniform standards of special training for military units to be earmarked for United Nations peace keeping work, with special emphasis on police training?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I always find my hon. friend's questions easy to answer. Yes, that is a correct statement. At the present time the committee of 33 on peace keeping is considering what the United Nations might do in this matter. This is one of the proposals Canada has put forward on this occasion, as it has on others. It does not in any way limit the kind of peace keeping operations in which Canada has participated on so many occasions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I owe it to the house to remind hon. members that it is not according to the rules to ask whether a statement which appears in the press is or is not correct. I have been perhaps a little lenient with regard to the questions which have been asked during the last few minutes.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR ACTION ON FRAUDULENT FILM ON SEALING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries but in his absence I would direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the damage being caused to the sealing industry in Canada and to the marketing of furs in Europe by the showing of a film prepared by Artek Film Productions Limited, Montreal, in which scenes of cruelty were deliberately staged, will the Prime Minister indicate what action his government is contemplating against the perpetrators of this international libel?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The Acting Minister knows all about this, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Minister of Fisheries): I do not know, sir, that I know all about it. However, I understand that the Minister of Fisheries has already said in the house that this film was a fraud, and if there was any way of taking legal action to prove it was a fraud I would be in favour of doing this. I cannot understand why so much fuss is being made about seals when nothing is said about cruelty in catching salmon.

Mr. Crouse: I have a supplementary question for the acting minister. It is true that the minister has stated—I am quoting from his own statement in the house—that it has been determined, for example, that films shown on television here and abroad include lurid scenes staged for the purpose. I should like to ask the acting minister, in view of the fact that the sealing industry, which is an important primary industry, is being strangled by harsh regulations on the one hand and by the loss of its markets due to the showing of this film on the other, whether the government will take every action possible to limit the further showing of this particular film.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING EXTRADITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the new Minister of Justice.

I wonder if he could inquire and tell us whether the government has under consideration legislation to empower the Canadian government to refuse extradition of Commonwealth citizens prosecuted in the independent countries of the Commonwealth for offences of a political character?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the minister that he could inquire after the question has been placed on the order paper.

SPORTS

HOCKEY—WINNING GOAL BY RUSSIA AGAINST CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have been attempting since Monday to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare this question. May I ask the minister whether in his opinion the second goal scored by the Russian hockey team against Canada's national hockey team was offside.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking for an expression of opinion.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might like to ask another question rather than a supplementary.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I ask this question of the minister since this parliament voted funds to assist the Canadian national team to go overseas, and this parliament also voted the funds to make his trip possible. We are at least entitled to an opinion from the minister, or to an eyewitness account, as to whether the Canadian hockey team was bilked.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure this question would be very interesting at ten o'clock.

PUBLIC SERVICE

OTTAWA—PAYMENT OF SALARIES OF TRAVEL BUREAU EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question should be directed to the Minister of Industry and Defence Production but, in his absence, I will put it to the Minister of Public Works in his capacity as house leader.

Following complaints by employees of the Canadian Government Travel Bureau to the effect that they have been paid one and two weeks late for quite some time now, is the minister in a position or willing to take the necessary steps so that the employees of the Travel Bureau will receive their pay cheques regularly and will not have to go from the Baseline Road to 150 Kent Street, in Ottawa, to get them?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is out of order.

EXPO '67

REPORTED AGREEMENT RESPECTING VISITORS FROM IRON CURTAIN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The question, Mr. Speaker, is based on a newspaper story appearing in Monday's New York World-Journal-Tribune. Will the minister say whether, as the result of a top level secret agreement between himself and the Czech foreign minister last winter, Canada has given assurance that any visitors from Czechoslovakia to Expo who might defect to Canada will be sent home and that Canada has agreed to waive the $1,000 security bond required from people coming from behind the iron curtain?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this government does not enter into agreements of that kind, and certainly no such agreement was entered into.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT RED ENSIGN BE DISPLAYED AT VIMY CELEBRATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Associate Minister of National Defence, who I understand is to lead the party to the Vimy recognition ceremonies at the end of this week. Would the minister make provision for displaying the Canadian red ensign in addition to our present flag at the Vimy site, so the veterans of that period may see the flag they were so familiar with during the 1914-18 war?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows very well this Vimy ceremony is organized by the Department of Veterans Affairs. I shall be leading the Canadian delegation there, but I am not the organizer. I think this matter would come under the responsibility of the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Churchill: Then may I direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the arrangements for this ceremony for which I and my department are responsible, the Canadian flag will be the dominant flag at Vimy.

Mr. Churchill: A supplementary question. It is not a question of a dominant flag. I was simply asking whether, in addition to the Canadian flag, the minister could consider displaying the Canadian red ensign with which the veterans were so familiar in their war years.

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Speaker, in view of the hoped for presence of the Duke of Edinburgh, Prince Philip, at Vimy representing the Queen of Canada there unquestionably will be a display of the royal flag, the union jack, as well as the Canadian ensign.

Mr. Churchill: Refusal.

REPORTED INFILTRATION INTO CANADA OF INTERNATIONAL MAFIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I have a question for the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. In view of the reports published today in a prominent Toronto newspaper to the effect that the international mafia is infiltrating into Canada, and that the officials from Montreal are presently meeting with the federal bureau of investigation of the United States, could the minister give us any information on these serious allegations. If they are true, what action is his department taking to deal with the situation?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the R.C.M.P. are maintaining constant vigilance over the situation. As the newspaper reports, we have been in close contact with opposite numbers in the United States.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the house what liaison he has developed with his deskmate the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to avoid a repetition of incidents of the past, where these gangsters have been able to move with considerable ease back and forth across the border.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking for a statement on a hypothetical situation.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—CORRECTION OF PERSONAL REFERENCE IN NEWSPAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Speaker: I understand, from a note I have received, that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would like permission to revert to motions for the purpose of correcting Hansard. Is this correct?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a correction, but not a correction in Hansard. On page 7 of this morning's Toronto Globe and Mail, where there is a report of the proceedings of parliament for yesterday, I am referred to as "Stanley Knowles, P.C."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member would never be accepted.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I would not want the Progressive Conservative leadership candidates to waste their time lobbying for my vote. I am a confirmed and inveterate New Democrat.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 4, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer —Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening clause 2 was being considered. Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I am entering into this debate because of my conviction that the proposal placed before us by the government is unsound and should be resisted.

I begin by expressing my regret that in our centennial year we should be involved in a debate such as this. During centennial year we are emphasizing the history and traditions of our country in every hamlet, community and city of Canada. We are drawing attention to a glorious past; we are recognizing the activities of our forefathers and paying tribute to their work in developing this country.

During centennial year we are also recognizing the devotion to duty and the sacrifices of generations of military people who have contributed over the years to the defence of this country. During that historical survey attention will be drawn to the early conflicts in the early settlement of this country. Attention will be drawn to the difficulties with the native population, to the struggle with the United States in 1812-14, to the Fenian raids which caused loss of life and disturbance on our borders, to the 1885 rebellion in western Canada, to Canadian participation in the South African war, the first world war, the second world war and in Korea; and yet during this year when these things are going on, and when this recognition is being given to those who devoted their lives to the service of their country, we are caught in a conflict instituted by the Minister of National Defence, and supported by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister, with regard to the military services of our country. And if the government's proposal is carried, the traditions of these fighting services will be wiped out.

I say, Mr. Chairman, it is with regret that in this centennial year we have to have a debate of this nature. I do not normally shrink too rapidly from mild controversy in the House of Commons, but I do confess it is with great reluctance that in this particular year, at this particular time, I find myself involved in opposition to the government on an issue such as this. Just this coming week end, sir, there will be a celebration here in Ottawa, and one in France at Vimy Ridge, recognizing the activities of Canadian military people in the first world war. It is proper that this should be done.

The Vimy Ridge ceremony will bring back to the knowledge of Canadians who lived in that period, and to the attention of the younger generation, the sacrifices and endeavour of people in the first world war. Their attention will be drawn to the battle of Vimy Ridge, which was not more severe than other battles in that war, and did not occasion greater proportionate loss of life than some of the other battles in that war. It was not greater in importance than, say, the gas attack at Saint Julien, or the battle of the Somme, or the Passchendaele struggle in the fall of 1917, or the 100 days of victorious advance in 1918; but the capture of Vimy Ridge, one of the strongest points on the western front in 1914 to 1918, marked a change in the difficulties of the allied armies on that front, and was about the only optimistic note struck in the year 1917, during which we almost lost the war. It was the good fortune of the Canadian corps, working together, to be the spearhead of that attack, and Canada on that occasion found her national identity. For 50 years I have been wondering at people who are bemoaning the fact that we are striving to discover our national identity. It was discovered then, on April 9, 1917—

Mr. Churchill: —when between 80,000 and 90,000 young Canadians played their part in that struggle, and when in the space of three days over 3,000 of them were killed and over 7,000 were wounded. Sir, with these ceremonies so close to us I say again it is with regret I have to engage in a debate on the situation concerning the services for which I have such a high regard, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force.

It has been my good fortune to see these forces in action or to be assisted by them somewhere along the line in the course of such military experience as I have had, and I have nothing but admiration for the two forces with which I did not serve, the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force. I have the greatest respect for the fighting men in those services, as well as for those in the army, and the greatest regret that they are facing this crisis at this period of our history when the government is attempting to wipe out their great past and launch out on an uncharted future without placing reliance on the experience gained by the fighting men of Canada over the last 100 years.

Sir, this is exactly what is going to happen. Section 15 of the present statute, which is called the National Defence Act, reads as follows:

> The Canadian Forces are the naval, army and air forces of Her Majesty raised by Canada and consist of three services, namely, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force.

We are being asked in this parliament to strike out that section and substitute the following for it:

> The Canadian Forces are the armed forces of Her Majesty raised by Canada and consist of one service called the Canadian Armed Forces.

We are being asked to strike out the three services, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force and substitute for them the Canadian Armed Forces. The identity of the three well known services will be destroyed. We will have one single force and, if the minister has his way, dressed in the same uniform with a common rank structure.

That is what is facing us in this debate and that is what we are objecting to, among other things that are in the proposed amendments. I certainly lodge my objection to the formation of a single force to be simply called the Canadian Armed Forces, and to the destruction of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Yesterday, sir, attention was drawn once again to the lack of confidence that we have in the Minister of National Defence. The hon. member for Calgary North indicated, with several examples tied down to evidence given, that the minister is an unreliable purveyor of information to the House of Commons, and I raised a question of privilege on that occasion in order to underline the seriousness of the situation. I do not propose to spend all my time on that aspect of the subject today, but I do intend to draw attention to the credibility gap which has developed between the minister and the House of Commons, and between the minister and the Canadian people, and to point out that that gap has become a yawning gulf separating us, because we can no longer rely on the Minister of National Defence.

I think it is destructive of the parliamentary system that we are not able to rely upon statements by ministers of the crown. If we cannot rely upon their statements, what type of government have we in this democracy? It is no longer a democracy if ministers of the crown fail to give us the facts and fail to give us the absolute truth.

I drew attention to this difficulty on November 4 last in a speech which was not widely reported. In fact I do not think it was reported at all, but I make no complaint. I am not attacking the press of this country as the minister did. I think the press representatives of this country achieve miracles in interpreting some of the things we say here in the House of Commons, considering the restriction of space that they have in their newspapers and the, shall I say, domineering attitude taken by their editors, as a result of which some of their best copy ends up in the waste paper basket instead of in the columns of the newspapers. I am sure that is where most of the reports of my speeches end up. I do not blame the reporters at all. I find no fault with them for that. They really do a good job of summarizing in a short space what perhaps takes several hours to say here in the House of Commons or in committee. However, my speech of November 4 was a speech which showed that the Minister of National Defence was misleading the house and the country.

I should like to draw attention to two examples from that speech, and then I will take a third example from the committee proceedings. The first example appears at page 9577 of Hansard, where I was drawing attention to the one uniform idea:

> On October 27, as reported at page 9165 of Hansard, I asked this question of the minister: "Has the minister authorized one walking-out uniform similar in pattern, style and colour for all members of the armed forces?"
> The minister replied: "Not yet, Mr. Speaker." Then we went on to talk about the walking-out uniform, and I asked:
> "Will the minister give a clear indication of what is government policy in this respect—" I was referring to a single walking-out uniform for the armed forces. The minister replied: "It was set out in the white paper in 1964."

Of course, I immediately said that it was not set out in the white paper. I rose on a question of privilege and challenged the minister to substantiate his statement, which he failed to do. That is only one of a whole series of misleading statements to which I drew attention on November 4.

The second one to which I again draw the attention of the house appears at page 9576. I was drawing attention to certain things I had found in the Globe and Mail of Saturday, July 16. These are the words I used:

> In the same issue of the same paper I should like to read the following words of the minister.

These are the minister's words as they appeared in that paper:

> Long ago I called my commanders together and asked them if they could support my policies. They were given the opportunity of dissenting. I told them I respected their rights to disagree and I made it clear that they could leave with full honours. None did.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at that time we had evidence galore of the retiring or firing of members of the armed forces. Yet the minister said that after this caution to them none took any action.

Mr. Hellyer: That is true.

Mr. Churchill: He now says it is true. I find a little difficulty, as did the hon. member for Calgary North, in dealing with this minister because he keeps repeating the same falsehoods time and again. The only other example we have of that is Goebbels in the second world war. I do not know whether or not the minister is a faithful follower of that man, but he is using the same tactics.

We had given to us, as appears at page 8560 of Hansard for October 12, a list of the senior officers who either retired because of completing their term or were fired or resigned voluntarily. That list amounted to 79 officers for the period January 1, 1965 to August 30, 1966. These all are senior officers—commodores, rear admirals and vice admirals in the navy; brigadiers, major generals and lieutenant generals in the army, and air commodores, air vice marshals and air marshals in the air force. Of a total of 79 officers, 21 were from the navy, 28 from the army and 30 from the air force. Of the total, 38 were normal retirements by reason of age and 41 were either compulsorily retired or submitted their resignations before their term was up. The outstanding example was Lieutenant General Moncel who had between five and six years remaining before he would reach normal retirement age. Yet, the minister had told us away back in July 1966 that the officers did not leave. He said:

I told them I respected their rights to disagree and I made it clear that they could leave with full honours. None did.

We do not know whether that means that none did leave or that none left with full honours. I suppose there is something extra in that to consider. These were not the only officers who left. On February 13 of this year, at page 12938 of Hansard, a return was given with regard to a question asked by the hon. member for Halifax concerning resignations of serving officers of the Canadian forces at national defence headquarters. It is an astonishing list. It shows that 264 officers left national defence headquarters, 56 of them because of age and 208 because of retirement, voluntary or compulsory. These are officers most of whom are below the ranks I mentioned a little while ago.

So, what credibility can one place in this minister? Those two examples are not anything like as serious as the third example I now present to the house. This will be found in No. 16 of the proceedings of the committee on national defence for Thursday, February 9, at pages 651 and 652. I asked the minister certain questions, and I should like to read what I said:

I would like to have it proved to this committee that unification will provide the necessary reduction in overhead personnel operating and maintenance costs so that that will come down to 75 per cent and that there will be 25 per cent available for capital expenditures. The reason for my wanting proof of it is that we have been hearing for three years that great savings will be made by unification. What is the evidence? I am not talking about integration; I am talking about unification.

Then Mr. Hellyer replied:

I do not think anyone has made the statement—certainly I have not—that the financial savings from unification itself would be very great, or that they would be easy to document.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Well, I looked back at the white paper. I submit to you, sir, that the centennial celebrations in the year 2067, in addition to Magna Carta, the British North America Act and the Canadian Bill of Rights, there will also be on display for the people of that time the white paper of 1964, one of the great historic documents in Canadian history. I keep reading this document—the white paper —almost every week; it is becoming very worn. At page 19 of that white paper this is what the minister wrote:

Sufficient savings should accrue from unification to permit a goal of 25 per cent of the budget to be devoted to capital equipment being realized in the years ahead.

During the committee hearings the minister told me that no such statement ever had been made.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, would my friend permit a question. Is he now admitting from the time the white paper was written in 1964, that integration and unification are part of the same cycle and cannot be separated easily, as he and members of his party have been trying to do in the last few days?

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: It was brought out during the committee meetings that when the minister wrote the white paper in 1964 he was even more confused than he is at the present time. He used the phrase "unified defence forces" but the word "unification" only once. The word "integration" was used elsewhere He did not know what he was talking about. I believe he meant to say "integration", but he used the word "unification" in the white paper. That fact was brought out in evidence and I will find the page reference later.

In the same evidence to which I have referred, I am reported as having said, at page 652 of the proceedings:

Why I stress this question of unification is that through very active publicity campaigns the general impression abroad has been given that the whole program will effect great savings. The minister has now admitted that the savings on unification itself are hard to segregate, and I judge that they are minimal. What, then, is the value of unification?

Mr. Hellyer: This was explained in second reading, Mr. Churchill. It provides better career opportunities—

Mr. Churchill: I am talking about the saving of money, not these other things.

Mr. Hellyer: If you relate it specifically to saving money, as I have just told you, the savings that can be documented are marginal.

For almost four years now we have been told that there will be a great saving of money as a result of this program, yet the minister admitted before the committee under questioning that the saving in respect of unification would be marginal. In other words, it could not be discovered. Other witnesses gave the same information. Let us not talk about a credibility gap, because this is a gulf. Who can believe this minister? I do not know of anyone in this party who places any confidence whatsoever in his statements.

I have other things I want to talk about and my time is beginning to run out. In addition to the white paper, the minister made a speech on December 7 when introducing second reading of the bill. That can be considered the second major document of the defence department. No one is competent to discuss this matter in respect of the armed services or sit here in the House of Commons taking part in this debate unless he has read the white paper and the speech of December 7.

One can obtain a copy of the speech of December 7, with a red cover. It was a special publication which cost over $5,000 and was distributed widely across the country. It is a historical document which will be worth a lot of money 100 years from now. In that speech the minister gave four fundamental reasons for the importance of a single unified force. I had occasion to deal with those four reasons during discussions of the defence committee. I felt that the best person to deal with them would be Lieut. Gen. Guy Simonds. I think most military men in the country will agree that he is the outstanding officer from the army during our period who is now living.

Mr. Hellyer: During your period.

Mr. Churchill: I said during our period. The minister was alive and kicking during the second world war, and he might have had the same opportunity I had of serving under General Simonds. General Simonds belongs to our period. He enjoyed a good career and gained very wide experience during the second world war. He continued with the forces after, and became chief of the general staff. I do not know of anybody who has greater knowledge of actual warfare than General Simonds, particularly in respect of the combined operations of the navy, army and air force.

General Simonds has wider experience than anyone I know with staff colleges, and in respect of the theoretical side of warfare. He also has a great deal of managerial experience which he gained while here at Ottawa and as chief of the general staff. It was my feeling that he was the best person to answer questions in respect of the four fundamental reasons for having a single unified service. I put questions to him and he supplied answers.

The first fundamental reason the minister gave us in that celebrated speech is this:

> With the establishment of a common identity; sailors, soldiers, and airmen, although loyal to their ships, regiments and squadrons, will have an overriding loyalty to the whole force and its total objectives on behalf of Canada.

Those are the minister's words and that is the first argument. I then asked General Simonds this question:

> Do you consider that under the triservice system there has been a lack of an overriding loyalty to Canada?

The general then replied:

> I most certainly was never conscious of any during my service. I think that going back to the war and after, the Canadian serviceman was very proud of his country and very loyal to it. I do not think you could have demanded a higher degree of loyalty.

The second fundamental reason advanced by the minister was under the heading, "Careers". The minister said:

> For able and highly-motivated individuals, both officers and other ranks, wider, more challenging and rewarding carreer opportunities will be available.
> Unification will provide better and fairer employment prospects for service personnel. Under a system of separate services, opportunities are naturally limited to the scope, tasks and requirements of the individual service.

I then asked the general:

> Do you see a substantial improvement in career opportunities that could result only from unification?

The general then replied:

> I personally cannot.

This man has as wide experience as anyone in Canada. The third fundamental reason the minister advanced is this:

> The unified force will provide much greater flexibility to meet changing requirements in defence organization made necessary by advances in military technology and changes in the international situation.

I then asked the general:

> Do you consider that a unified force is essential to make it adaptable to changes in military technology and in the international situation?

He replied:

One of our problems, certainly in the army, and I think it affected people in the other services, was as the services tend to become more and more technical, getting a man of the necessary basic foundation of education to make him even good at one thing, and getting really thoroughly trained in one field.

The fourth basic fundamental reason the minister gave is this:

The nature of modern warfare has resulted in a compaction of time and distance to the point where decision making and reaction time must be much swifter than ever before in history. A unified force best meets this demand.

The need for fast decision making and quick reaction is synonymous with modern warfare.

I then asked the general this question:

Now, I do not know of anyone who has greater experience than yourself in the demands of modern warfare, decision making, quick reaction and the co-ordination of combined operations. Do you consider that the demands of modern warfare require a single service concept or, in other words, unification?

Then general then said:

No, I do not believe it does.

The general then gave a lengthy explanation as to why he had come to that conclusion. Those are the four fundamental reasons given by the minister in support of unification.

The Chairman: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. gentleman to inform him that his allotted time has now expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the committee to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you very much. I thank the minister for external affairs. I am glad that he is in his seat because I intend to say something about him very soon. I will also have something to say about the Prime Minister before I conclude, unless I am interrupted.

It was brought out time and time again in evidence before the committee that the reason for having a defence force was to train men to fight, in the event our country was attacked or our people were in danger. That is the fundamental reason and that is why they are combat forces. All the supply services, all the administrative services, all the command structure are designed in order that the combat forces may be able to play their part effectively in battle, whether it is on our own shores, which God forbid, or whether it is further abroad, in Europe or somewhere else in the world.

When our forces are fighting abroad, as they were in the two great wars and in Korea, they were protecting our way of life and protecting the people of Canada; but they were doing it miles distant from our country, and we were saved from the destruction of our country. I believe we are the most fortunate country in the world; we have been saved from awful destruction from artillery fire, missiles and bombing up to this point, and I hope we will be in the future. It pays dividends to conduct your battles far afield, whether it is with the navy thousands of miles from our shore or whether it is with the air force and army abroad fighting on some other continent.

Our defence forces—we call them defence forces—exist for that purpose, namely to have combat people ready for action. Canada takes second place to no country in the world when it comes to combat forces. This was proved in the first world war, in the second world war and in Korea. Let me remind the people of this country that following the assault on Vimy Ridge, which will be commemorated in just a few days now, the Canadian Corps was recognized by our opponents, the Germans, by General Ludendorf himself, as shock troops. Wherever Canadians appeared in the field of battle in 1917 and 1918 the Germans were alarmed, and with justification, because every time the Canadian Corps did appear in those last 18 months of the war, the Germans lost very, very heavily; they lost ground, they lost men, they lost artillery, they lost everything—and they finally lost the war. We were shock troops on a par with the best troops of England, the Guards, and on a par with the troops from Australia who fought side by side with us on some occasions.

An hon. Member: Why don't you write a book about it?

Mr. Churchill: I may write a book about it some day, and I will correct some of the fallacious information that has been spread out to our Canadian people. I say this is what our defence forces exist for—combat forces; and all these supply services assist. You do not put them all together, as the minister is attempting to do, and neglect, as he is doing, the combat forces. That is what he is doing; he is neglecting the combat forces. The minister has his mind centred on the administrative and supply services. Of course they are vital in wartime; you have to have them. A great many people have to serve behind the lines, behind the front or in the factories at home to provide the fighting troops with the arms and ammunition that they need. I hold these people in respect. But you cannot win a war just with the administrative and supply services. It is the combat forces that win a war. The minister fails to see this and is attempting to change the role of our combat forces.

Let us go by experience, without living in the past. I am so far ahead of the minister in this regard that I had him admit in committee—I wish I had the reference here today and had the time to give it—that I was a great proponent, as I always have been, of mobility in our forces. As far back as 12 or 14 years ago, right in this House of Commons, I demanded the mobility for our army which the minister is only now getting around to supplying; and he still has not completed it. He is so slow in this regard.

We were told that the minister discovered the armoured personnel carrier. I had the interesting experience of pointing out to him in the committee that the armoured personnel carrier was used in the second world war. The idea originated with General Simonds, and I, along with a few hundred other people, had the job of working out the tactics for it and using it on the battlefield. The minister thinks that he discovered the armoured personnel carrier. This is a Canadian "first" in the methods of dealing with infantry forces on the field of battle. We were the discoverers of the armoured personnel carrier. I am glad that the minister is gradually catching up with the second part of the twentieth century.

In our war experience we have operated, not independently but in support. This was brought out very, very carefully by the distinguished witnesses who appeared before our committee. Canada cannot act independently in wartime. We have acted in support. So long as our major allies, Britain and the United States, continue to have navy, army and air forces as separate identities, so Canada should have those separate identities in order that we may co-operate with them in wartime. We did it in the first war, in the second war and in Korea. In Korea our forces were brigaded with the Commonwealth division. That is quite proper; you do not operate alone. We operated with British troops in the first and second world wars, and on some occasions with American troops. But you do not operate alone.

These distinct forces should be maintained. I think this is an argument that you cannot get around, and it comes from the experience of our most distinguished service officers who gave evidence before the defence committee. What have we reached with regard to the utilization of our forces? This is where the Secretary of State for External Affairs enters upon the stage, because here is where the responsibility now rests. The Minister of National Defence has been going on his own, unchecked, untrammelled, and it is now time to rein him in and teach him some of the facts of life. The Secretary of State for External Affairs must give to this house, exactly and without his orotund phrases, a clear picture of what is Canada's external policy for the future.

Mr. Nesbitt: That'll be the day.

Mr. Churchill: Is the minister intending that we shall withdraw our troops from NATO? Is he intending that we shall just provide troops on demand from Canada by means of an airlift, if needed? Is he intending to discontinue the anti-submarine activities of our navy?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs knows better than the Minister of National Defence that there is still a threat from Russia. Russia has the largest submarine fleet in the world, and perhaps the largest fishing fleet. There will be danger off our shores unless we are prepared to be on guard. In Canadian naval circles and in United States naval circles this problem of protection against submarine threat is considered in its proper light. Why are we withdrawing from an anti-submarine role? Obviously we are, because we have fewer ships in service; we have not the men to man the ships that we have in service. So we are failing to maintain our commitment to NATO, by default.

I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what he intends to do with regard to the proposition put forward by the Minister of National Defence on December 7 in relation to peace restoring. This is a phrase that is now being commonly used by writers. My parliamentary friend, the hon. member for Greenwood, loves this expression "peace restoring." I told him at a conference at Scarborough that I was going to accuse him of being a warmonger. Let us have a definition from the Secretary of State for External Affairs of the expression "peace restoring". I asked some of the distinguished gentlemen who appeared before us what they understood "peace restoring" to mean, and they said "We used to call that war". I think they are right because there is an implication in that phrase that there has been an engagement in war after which peace is restored. Therefore "peace restoring" is a very dangerous phrase to use.

At the time of the Korean war the then minister of national defence and the then secretary of state for external affairs, who is now the Prime Minister, spoke about aggression in Korea. I was only a backbencher at that time. Not much more attention has been paid to me up here in front than when I was sitting in the back benches, so I can alternate easily between the two. At that time I asked the government: Why do you not call it war rather than aggression? People were shooting at each other and being killed. Now we call it peace restoring.

I am all in favour of peace; I do not want to go to war again. But let us be clear as to what we are doing. Peace restoring means punitive action, it means fighting. If we are going to provide an armed force with sea transport, air transport, and all the offensive weapons for peace restoring, it means that we are providing a force for war. Is the United Nations going to ask us individually and alone to undertake a mission for them and engage in war? I do not think we would be so foolish as to do that; and yet this is the information that is spreading out across this country. This is what people are saying. I will paraphrase some of their statements, such as: Canada does not have to maintain a navy, an army and an air force; Canada does not have to support our allies in Europe or the United States; let us have a special mobile and well equipped force for peace restoring.

I submit that this is a force for war. The Secretary of State for External Affairs must be careful about this, because the Minister of National Defence is running away madly. He has the bit in his teeth and he does not know where he is going. Let us not desert our allies or get out of step with the rest of the world. I will ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question, which he does not have to answer now because if he starts to speak I will not get another chance. There is trouble in Aden. I suppose that people would call it a brushfire war. If the British withdraw, are we to send there a special Canadian force to put out that conflict? A large number of Canadian soldiers would be killed if we did so.

What is the situation in Somaliland? Is there a chance that a brushfire war may develop there? What about Nigeria, where some internal trouble is developing? We have to be careful about this. Putting out brushfire wars sounds simple, but it is not, really. If a war starts, is there not a danger of the larger nations intervening in some way? Are we to rush over like a fire brigade to put out a brushfire war? I cannot think of anything more dangerous. We might easily sacrifice the lives of 1,000 Canadians by getting involved in such a conflict. Surely our job is to work with the United Nations, in concert with our allies, as we did in Korea, but not separately and apart. If we are going to work in concert with our allies, we should have a force similar to theirs, a navy, an army and an air force. This is what I am suggesting.

On January 31 I held out an olive branch to the Minister of National Defence. Subsequently I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he had read my speech, but he had not got around to it as he had been reading something else. In my speech I suggested that we should get the best of both worlds. There is a great division of opinion in this country. A great many people, more numerous than is imagined, want our defence forces to be maintained as they are now. They want the history and tradition of these forces sustained. They do not want the identity of the Royal Canadian Navy or the Royal Canadian Air Force wiped out. Let us get the best of both worlds. We want to continue to play our part in the activities of the United Nations in a peacekeeping role. I emphasize that it should be peacekeeping—not the warfare of peace restoring, but peacekeeping. I suggested in that speech that we should organize a special force for that purpose. We should enlist men specially, or draw them by secondment from the armed forces and let them serve overseas. We should dress them in a bottle green uniform and create an elite force to carry out police duties. This is exactly what our representative at the United Nations is advocating now.

I intended to ask the minister during the question period whether he has now accepted the suggestion which I put forward on January 31. Let us continue our peace keeping activities, such as we have been doing for years under UN auspices, and let us do it by means of a special force. We have about 2,000 men abroad performing this special task in Cyprus and the Gaza Strip, men in the surveillance corps and in the minister's pet organization, the International Control Commission. All of this could be done by a special force, with special training in police and diplomatic activities, because their role would be different from that of the fighting forces. I will admit readily that a force of that nature would not be useful at the outbreak of a war because they would not be trained to fight. I submit that it should not be a large force. We could provide 3,000 to 5,000 young Canadian men for this task. Here would be a chance for young Canada to do something abroad under the auspices of the UN. This would not be a peace restoring mission, which means bloodshed and slaughter, but a peace keeping mission, which is being carried out at the present time by the armed forces of this country.

The peace keeping force which I am proposing should be enlisted, trained and disciplined under the direction of the Department of National Defence for this particular purpose. We would not then be involved in the affairs of some of the countries which do not want armed forces on their territory, and quite rightly so. Our armed forces would not be acting in such a capacity, but we would have a special force for peace keeping purposes. It would be lightly armed for protection, not aggressively armed as is the case in some countries now.

That is the suggestion I put forward on January 31. I said: Let us keep our defence forces as they are now, and let us create a special force for United Nations peace keeping purposes. Let us not break up our defence forces which are now being trained for a special purpose and let us not pretend that we will set them at the beck and call of the UN for peace restoring, which is war.

I suggest to the government that it should think this over. Let us not confuse the Canadian public. Let us not destroy our three fighting services and develop a special peace restoring force for the United Nations, and then fail to take any action. If we wish to get involved in war, we will have to take some specific action here in the House of Commons.

I will conclude with a plea to the Prime Minister. It is the Prime Minister who carries the greatest responsibility with regard to the defence of this country. He has people to assist him. He has the advice of the experienced Secretary of State for External Affairs, a man who has surveyed the world and who has been here a long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: He has been here since 1935. He was here during the Munich crisis and the war with Italy. He was here at the outbreak of war in 1939 and participated in the discussions. He was here during the second world war when Canada made such great sacrifices. He was in office when we were engaged in war in Korea. He followed the course of the development of the United Nations. This man is a man of great experience and I pay my compliments to him. I hope he will continue to learn in the present, as he learned in the past, if he will listen today to the sound advice I am giving this afternoon. I hope he will not develop a closed mind, like the Minister of National Defence, but I do not think he will, because of his great experience. I suggest to him that I have given this government a way out with regard to this proposal.

Then, the Prime Minister has the advice and experience of a person like that available to him. He also has the advice of the Minister of National Defence, which he should reject at every opportunity. I was surprised to learn through Air Chief Marshal Miller, who was one of the best witnesses we had in front of the defence committee, that he had not discussed this question with the cabinet. Air Chief Marshal Miller has had a long service under both governments, the Conservative government and the Liberal government, and has dedicated his life to the service of his country. He served as deputy minister of the Department of National Defence and then chief of staff.

Finally, when the position of "Supremo" was created, he became the "Supremo" after 1964. Incidentally, I opposed that change. Air Chief Marshal Miller has had all this experience. He was one of the architects of integration, the right hand man of the Minister of National Defence, yet I take it he left the Department of National Defence in the summer of 1966 disappointed and disillusioned. I asked him, as I had asked others, if he had had any opportunity to discuss some of these problems with the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister of this country is superior in office to other cabinet ministers. He has a grave responsibility with regard to national defence. Consequently, I wanted to know if the Prime Minister was aware of what was happening.

I asked Air Chief Marshal Miller this question which is recorded at page 2328 of the committee evidence for March 21:

> Did you have an opportunity as chief of the defence staff to discuss with the defence committee of the cabinet or with the Prime Minister the proposal with regard to unification?

Now, the air chief marshal made an answer, but then he corrected it later because he thought he had been talking about integration and these two words, integration and unification, became confused. However, his corrected answer is as follows, as recorded on page 2342:

> It has been brought to my attention that there was a meeting of the cabinet defence committee on February 12 and March 24 to consider the white paper and integration. When I said I had not discussed this matter of reorganization I was referring specifically, I thought, to the question of unification.

This was in the year 1964. Now, March 24, 1964, when the white paper was being considered was the last time that Air Chief Marshal Miller, chief of the defence staff, had a conversation with the Prime Minister of this country with regard to the reorganization of the defence forces. This was the last time he met with the cabinet committee on defence, and subject to that time, over two years, he only talked with the Minister of National Defence on the subject of unification, a single unified force. This subject was never discussed by the chief of staff with the Prime Minister of his country.

What was the Prime Minister doing? Was he not interested?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Churchill: Let me finish, I am just about finished.

Mr. Hellyer: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman. The air chief marshal corrected this suggestion at the end of his testimony. It would be an injustice to him and to all the service officers, as well as to the government, to leave that statement on the record.

Mr. Churchill: I gave the correction. If I am given the time, I will go back to the question on page 2328 of the committee evidence. I asked this question:

> Did you have an opportunity as chief of the defence staff to discuss with the defence committee of the cabinet or with the Prime Minister the proposal with regard to unification?

[Mr. Churchill.]

> Air Chief Marshal Miller: As far as I am aware —and I would not absolutely swear to this without checking records—I never discussed the problem of integration with the cabinet defence committee or with the Prime Minister.
> Mr. Churchill: And unification? You say integration.

Now, later it was brought to the air marshal's attention that he had made a mistake. I read out his corrected answer which is recorded on page 2342 of the committee evidence. However, I will read it again:

> Air Chief Marshal Miller: ... It has been brought to my attention that there was a meeting of the cabinet defence committee on February 12 and March 24 to consider the white paper and integration. When I said I had not discussed this matter of reorganization I was referring specifically, I thought, to the question of unification.

Then, I asked:

> What year was that?
> Air Chief Marshal Miller: I think this would probably be quite early after the white paper was issued.
> Mr. Churchill: That would be in 1964.

The minister will not understand this, but I appeal to members in this house: Is that not clear? There is the correction by Air Chief Marshal Miller, and I have quite fairly given it. So I return to what I said. From March 24, 1964 until Air Chief Marshal Miller retired in the summer of 1966, he did not have a conversation with the defence committee of the cabinet or with the Prime Minister on the subject of unification. There is a gap. What was the Prime Minister doing all this time? I doubt very much if Air Chief Marshal Miller had any conversation with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wish I had asked that question. All this time one minister, the Minister of National Defence, has been running the show. I find fault that the senior members of the cabinet, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and more particularly the Prime Minister of this country, failed to grasp this nettle and deal with it. He has rejected it for over two years, and I am concerned. That is my case, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend, who has just taken his seat, Mr. Chairman, opened his remarks today by saying that he did not have confidence in the Minister of National Defence. He stated also that he felt justified in attacking his credibility and, by implication, his integrity. One might well have risen at once to object to these adjectives as being contrary to the rules of this house. I want to say now unreservedly that all of us in this house have every reason, even though all of us might not agree with his views, to have confidence in the capacity of the Minister of National Defence, in his credibility and in his integrity.

The hon. member who has just spoken called on me as Secretary of State for External Affairs to indicate my views on the measure before the committee. This was a proper request in the light of the relationship between foreign policy and defence policy. I may say that the Department of External Affairs enjoys the greatest possible measure of collaboration with the Department of National Defence. As Secretary of State for External Affairs I have enjoyed and been the beneficiary of the confidence and collaboration of the Minister of National Defence. At all points and on all questions my colleagues and I have been kept informed of the minister's recommendations and policies.

This measure now before the house, let there be no mistake about it, represents the collective judgment of the government of this country and represents its policy. It is supported both by us on this side of the house, and I am sure, by others sitting to your left, Mr. Chairman.

In the white paper on defence of 1964, under the heading "Objectives", the following is stated:

> The objectives of Canadian defence policy, which cannot be dissociated from foreign policy, are to preserve the peace by supporting collective defence measures to deter military aggression; to support Canadian foreign policy including that arising out of our participation in international organizations, and to provide for the protection and surveillance of our territory, our air-space and our coastal waters.

With this statement the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre agrees; and I would add that of course defence policy must always be based on the foreign policy of our country.

Now, sir, a number of hon. members have questioned whether unification of the forces may not affect our defence commitments. The short answer is that unification will not affect these commitments themselves but is designed to increase our capacity to carry them out. First, I think it would be useful if I were to explain why the government considers that it is in Canada's interest to make military contributions, as we do, to continental defence, to NATO and to UN peace keeping. All of these forces contribute to the defence of Canada, directly or indirectly.

Given the state of the world at the present time, it is in the interests of this country to provide for its own direct defence. But because of the cost of modern weapons and the fact that we share the North American continent with the most powerful country in the world, the only sensible approach is the co-operative one. So we entered into the NORAD agreement for the joint air defence of Canada and the United States against the threat of Soviet bomber attack.

The Soviet union still possesses over 150 intercontinental bombers, all of which carry a substantially larger bomb load than most missiles, and are more accurate. It is expected that the Soviet union will retain a significant number of bombers into the 1970's. If there were no anti-bomber defence the Soviet bomber force would still be a major threat to the continent. It is of course true that the missile threat is growing in proportion to that of the bomber. One of the big issues, as the Minister of National Defence observed in answer to a question yesterday, is whether the United States should proceed with the anti-missile defence program.

In this connection, as the Minister of National Defence remarked yesterday, the United States has recently initiated discussions with the Soviet union on this general question. I express the hope that these discussions will lead to an agreement to avoid the huge expenditure that would result from the deployment of an anti-ballistic missile defence and a consequent increase in the arms race.

The NORAD agreement provides that the North American Air Defence Command shall be maintained in operation for a period of ten years. Since it was signed in May of 1958, it will lapse in May of 1968 unless it is extended or a new agreement negotiated. NORAD has provided an effective basis for the joint air defence of this continent, and through it Canada has shared in the air defence of this continent.

The world situation in 1968 will not, of course, be that which prevailed ten years ago. Changes in military technology will inevitably affect the tasks and requirements of North American defence. Prospective developments must be carefully studied and Canada's role in North American defence in the years to come. This is what the government is now carefully engaged in doing.

In addition to the bomber and the I.C.B.M.. threat there is a growing threat to this continent, which obviously we cannot ignore, from submarines. This was pointed out by the hon. gentleman who spoke a few moments ago. In answer to what he said I would point out that we are co-operating with the United States to meet this threat, not only as a matter of continental defence but also within the NATO framework.

This leads me now to our commitments to NATO, which involve not only the anti-submarine warfare units, which I have just mentioned, but also ground and air forces in Europe. Why, Mr. Chairman, do we still consider it necessary to contribute forces in Europe? First, Europe, for historical and sentimental reasons, for reasons of security and for reasons of trade, is the primary focus of overseas interest for Canada. If it is true that we cannot live in isolation in a contracting and interdependent world, it is surely also true that we must continue to give a high priority to our general relationship with the continent from which we have sprung. To do otherwise would not be in accordance, as the government sees it, with the national interests of this country.

It has been NATO's combined military strength which has deterred possible Soviet military or political penetration of western Europe. This deterrence is as important for the defence of Canada as of Europe. Just at the time when relations with the communist countries in Europe are beginning to improve, it would be a mistake to take hasty steps to reduce the military force which has been responsible for the measure of stability now apparent in Europe.

Defence preparedness in Europe, which is part of the defence of Canada as well, does not preclude political change in Europe. Indeed it facilitates such change by peaceful and negotiated means. At the same time it provides insurance against a possible recurrence of danger.

A significant reduction of forces in an alliance such as NATO should properly be a matter of collective decision. Such a decision should clearly take account of Soviet power which, while at present politically muted, remains militarily substantial in eastern Europe. One way to reduce forces would be by mutual agreement between the Warsaw pact and NATO countries. That is something that we have been considering. This is a possibility which NATO has examined and will be examining.

But, Mr. Chairman, it takes two to strike a bargain. To those who advocate unilateral reductions, I would simply say that western—including Canadian—security interests demand a prudent assessment of the balance at any point in time between Soviet intentions and Soviet capability.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Now, sir, it is true that Canadian forces in Europe constitute only a small fraction of the total. Nevertheless they do contribute to the total NATO deterrent in Europe, and thus to the stability which now prevails on the continent, with all that that means for Europe's evolution both internally and as a constructive force and influence in the world. It also is a contribution, again I say, to the defence of Canada.

Furthermore, unilateral withdrawal by Canada could have significant political consequences. It could produce pressures in other countries to reduce or to withdraw their contributions. Indeed, an important aspect of maintaining the deterrent is the avoidance of the disruption of NATO at this time. Unilateral withdrawal by Canada would also have harmful effects on our bilateral relations not only with one country, our closest neighbour, but with other countries in western Europe. Of course these relations are important not only in terms of defence, but in terms of maintaining the concept of an alliance. This integrated force structure can bring very great opportunities if the necessary consultations are maintained and if the alliance itself is continued. A unilateral withdrawal would be notice on our part that we no longer believed in collective action for collective security through the Atlantic coalition.

Membership of an alliance carries with it not only benefits but obligations, both material and moral. It has cost this country as it has cost other countries in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization a great deal in terms of money and men. We have made this contribution because there was no other course open to us, in the light of the intransigent position taken by some countries earlier in the history of the United Nations, and the armed might that existed on the part of some countries, and particularly on the part of one country. While we have no desire to maintain a presence in Europe if it is not required for military or political reasons, the government considers now for the reasons I have given that the balance of advantage lies in continuing our contribution to this organization that has done so much to bring about or to assure peace in Europe.

I do not exclude the possibility that in the future it may become feasible, and indeed I hope it will, to withdraw our forces from Europe and to make our entire contribution from bases in Canada. But such a course of action is neither feasible nor desirable at this moment, and certainly not by unilateral decision. I ask this house to consider what would be the consequences on other countries, for example the smaller countries in Europe which are bound to us, in the NATO alliance, if we were to take a decision on our own to withdraw without the opportunity for collective consideration and judgment. Until we can be sure that we can make an appropriate and effective military contribution entirely from Canada, or until a Canadian contribution is no longer considered necessary, we should continue contributing forces in Europe as part of a collective defence, which remains necessary on a regional basis, because we have not yet been able to establish it universally through the United Nations.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre referred to peace keeping. I will not engage in a discussion about an expression which he said the hon. member for Greenwood used.

Mr. Churchill: And the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The concept of peace keeping I think is now well accepted within the context of the charter; certainly no country knows more about peace keeping than Canada, a country that has participated in nearly every peace keeping project of the United Nations. We are currently contributing to United Nations peace forces in Cyprus and on the Israel-U.A.R. border. We also contribute to United Nations observer missions active on Israel's frontier with Syria, Jordan and Lebanon, and in Kashmir. We participate also in the international supervisory commissions in Indochina, the latter three of course not being creations of the United Nations but of the Geneva conference of 1954. Canada has contributed to all of the larger United Nations peace keeping efforts in the period since 1949, and indeed, as I said a moment ago, to almost all of the smaller missions as well.

We have found ourselves generally accepted in this role for many reasons—because, I suppose, we do not happen to be marked with old prejudices, because we have well trained and competent forces, and of course, because we have been willing participants. We have been willing because successive Canadian governments—the government of which my hon. friend was a member as well as this government and other preceding governments—and, indeed, most Canadians I think, believe that the United Nations has an important role in maintaining the peace. Despite halting progress in establishing the effective authority of the UN, I think we are all agreed that in the long run the world's best hope is to equip the United Nations to stand unchallenged as the keeper of the peace.

We must work to that end, however discouraging at times the result seems to be—and how discouraging it is, right today, in the United Nations for the Canadian delegation in respect of its initiative to try to bring about a greater acceptance of collective responsibility in the financing and in the operational responsibilities of United Nations peace keeping.

There are some who would prefer that we should now devote the bulk, or even all, of our military forces solely to UN peace keeping duties. I think this proposition deserves critical examination, attractive though it may appear in the light of our longer range goal of co-operative international security. The United Nations is working with gradually increasing effectiveness to surmount the immense problems inherent in national rivalries, and in the social and economic injustices which give rise to world tensions. But there is still basic disagreement on what that organization can do with regard to the authorization, control and financing of peace keeping operations.

In co-operation with others, Canada is striving to reach a generally acceptable basis on which future operations can be undertaken, so that we shall not have to carry the kind of load which we are carrying, for instance, in Cyprus. Even if these questions are resolved there can be no assurance that the political consensus in the United Nations necessary to establish an effective peace keeping operation will in each case be attainable. This is particularly true for situations involving the major powers, let alone those involving a confrontation between them.

In these circumstances, there is really no present substitute for defensive arrangements among groups of nations. While we search and work for the ideal, we cannot discard the practical foundations of security. It would therefore be unwise to limit our contribution to the maintenance of peace and security solely to participate in UN peace keeping operations. To discontinue our commitments to continental and NATO defence now would imply that we denied a common responsibility with our allies to share in the defence of the North Atlantic area. It would suggest that we believe Canada should hold itself aloof from the basic differences of interest still inherent in east-west relations.

Now, sir, with this background the hon. member who has just taken his seat asks me as Secretary of State for External Affairs where I stand on the matter involved in this bill. There can be no doubt about that. The government's position is clear; it is unequivocal, this bill represents the policy of the government.

Mr. McIntosh: Before the minister leaves this one particular phase he is referring to now would he say a few words about government policy in regard to the peace restoring role? This is one thing that bothers us in the opposition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As the British government, through Lord Caradon at the United Nations General Assembly in 1965, clearly indicated, the question of peace keeping is only one side of the coin. There must also be the question of trying to bring about peace and the way to do that is through mediation and through the use of other peace making techniques, but not in the way suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. He said that the only way a peace keeping force should properly be employed was by the use of police power. It is true that there are 50 Austrian police officers in the UN force in Cyprus. There are also a number of New Zealanders who are in there as policemen; but does anyone who has followed the events in Cyprus, who knows the situation attending the United Nations in the Congo, and the situation in the Gaza strip, for one moment believe that peace could successfully be maintained by the use of policemen only?

I am sure that the use of policemen as a factor in peace keeping is something that has to be more and more developed. This was something we proposed at the conference on peace keeping that we had in Ottawa in the fall of 1964, but I cannot agree with my hon. friend that the immense tasks and the complications of peace keeping can be met in the way he believes he has uniquely conceived, as a new way of maintaining peace.

Mr. Churchill: How would you do it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would do it in exactly the way that under the leadership of the present Prime Minister we first did it in Suez, and in the way we are now doing it in Cyprus, and in the way it is now being done in the Gaza strip where over 1,000 Canadian soldiers have been involved in an organization of some 5,000 men for 12 years, and by their very para-military presence have kept the peace between the U.A.R. and—

Mr. Churchill: It has been a police force.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend resorts to these metaphysical statements. He is such a practical man that I never thought he would put himself in a position of emphasizing something in his speech which gave me the impression we are yet to hear more substantial comments from him in the opposition he is levelling against this bill.

Mr. Churchill: I complimented you in my speech, and that was a mistake.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This brings me now to the effects of unification of the three services on Canada's capability to meet our foreign policy commitments. I admit it is my responsibility to be able to answer that question. At the outset I should say I do not intend, of course, to cover the ground which my colleague the Minister of National Defence has covered, and which his senior officers and officials have covered in their statements. My concern is to state in general terms what the government's defence commitments are. These commitments arise out of the government's policies, all this in those areas of foreign affairs where our armed forces have the task of helping carry out the general objectives of the government of Canada.

Such important concepts as integration and unification are essentially means by which the armed forces are organized to fulfil these objectives. My hon. friend opposite may not agree, but that is the purpose of unification and integration. It is not, of course, in my purview to interpret the continuing process of armed forces re-organization. In undertaking and developing this process my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, and those responsible to him are fully aware of and responsive to the capability required of the armed forces to fulfil our foreign policy objectives. What they are doing is to put themselves in a progressively better position to ensure that the roles undertaken by the armed forces will be carried out with increasing flexibility and operational effectiveness.

It has been said that unification implies that the armed forces will be capable of only one role, that of a mobile force. That is the thesis of my hon. friend, the gallant member for Winnipeg South Centre—

Mr. Churchill: It is not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —but this is a misconception. Unification is a concept whereby the armed forces of Canada will be organized as a single service rather than as three separate services. At the present time each of the three services carries out a variety of roles.

Unification will not mean that any of these roles will have to be altered, much less abandoned. Just as each of the services now perform a number of different roles, so a unified service will be capable of carrying out different roles. Indeed, it will be capable of performing the same variety of roles required now by our foreign policy commitments and, in my view, performing them much more effectively.

Thus Canada will continue to provide air force units to participate in the air defence of the continent. We shall continue to provide air and sea force units for anti-submarine defence. We shall continue to provide air and land force units in Europe for NATO defence, and indeed we have even been able to offer a second mobile battalion in Canada to add to the battalion already committed to NATO's mobile force. We shall continue to provide contingents on land, sea and in the air as required for the various peace keeping commitments which we now have or may assume from time to time throughout the world.

Finally, we shall have the capacity to take an appropriate part in an international enforcement action, as distinct from peace keeping, should one be internationally agreed and the government decide to participate.

If unification is permitted to develop as planned it should in no way hinder our ability to fulfil our foreign policy commitments. My hon. friend asks for that statement and he has got it. It will not in any way interfere with our foreign policy commitments. Indeed, by increasing our general military effectiveness—

Mr. Churchill: In what way?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and by consequent economy of operation, the government will be able to fulfil present and future commitments with progressively improving efficiency. I accept the responsibility of saying that in my judgment the policy embedded in this bill is one that is capable of meeting the foreign policy obligations of this country, and it is—

Mr. Harkness: Would the minister allow a question? Is he aware of the fact that all of the senior retired officers who were questioned on this very point gave it as their opinion and judgment that with the single unified force which is proposed in this bill Canada would be unable to meet the commitments which the minister has just outlined, and which are laid down in the white papter?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Chairman. In answer to the former minister of national defence I am aware of that, and I am also aware that all our leading—

Mr. Harkness: Then do you think your judgment on the ability of this force to do so is better than theirs?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was going to make the observation that it is also a fact that all of the leading officers in the department now—

Mr. Churchill: The survivors.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —take a different view.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not offer this as technical evidence or judgment, but the other night I flew back from London with 100 men who had served Canada for a period of months with the Cyprus United Nation force. While, as I say, their technical judgment should not be expected to be that of more highly trained and superior officers, it is a fact that I found great unanimity among these men, who are helping to maintain the peace in Cyprus, in giving strong support for the policy embedded in the bill which is now being discussed.

We should, in a matter of this importance, be able to recognize that there are strong differences between us. These differences, however, in a matter of as great importance as this, should not warrant the kind of attack that was made today by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre on the Minister of National Defence. We can have differences, but surely we can discuss a matter of vital importance like this without seeking to gain political advantage or without making personal attacks on those who are carrying out a policy in which they believe.

Hon. gentlemen say that this policy may be wrong. This government believes it is an initiative which will be followed by other countries. This government believes it is an initiative which will enable us to fulfil our role in NATO, to fulfil our obligations toward continental defence and toward our obligations in support of the charter of the United Nations. It is on this basis and on the basis of the analysis I have given that I, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, support this bill.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member for Oxford rising to ask a question?

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes, Mr. Chairman. In view of the fact that the minister has told us at very considerable length and in great detail that in his view our existing commitments to NATO, NORAD and the United Nations will be maintained, and he hopes improved, no doubt he will have discussed these matters with his opposite numbers among the NATO allies, in the United States, and so on. Can the minister tell us whether it is the intention of any of these other countries to alter their armed forces in the way in which we are attempting to alter ours?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend knows that the policies of other governments can be announced only by those governments. I would have thought that my hon. friend, who has had experience in respect of external affairs, would have been the last one to put that question.

Mr. Nesbitt: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. As we all know, the minister is an expert in avoiding questions. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs perhaps will recall, I did not ask him to name any of the countries. I just asked him whether any allied countries in NATO had informed him that they intended to alter their forces in a manner similar to the way in which we are attempting to alter ours. I am not asking him to identify any country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend has the answer. He knows I cannot go beyond what I have said. However, since he has asked this question again I might say that, because of his experience over a period of four years as parliamentary secretary to a former secretary of state for external affairs, he should know that the force goals of the countries in NATO are determined as a result of discussion in the defence planning committee of NATO, and with the approbation of SACEUR, the supreme allied commander.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

There is nothing which is being done in this bill to which any exception has been taken in NATO. It is up to each country to organize its forces according to its policies, according to its standards, and according to the policies of its government and its parliament. The interest of the collective organization of NATO is that whatever system of military organization is employed is one which will permit the contributing country to fulfil its commitments in NATO. That is being done by Canada.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, may I ask one question of the minister. In the course of his remarks he said that Canada should not unilaterally withdraw forces from NATO. If he should argue that we should not do so without notice to or discussion with our allies, I do not think he would find much disagreement; but I should like to ask him whether there is any inconsistency in the suggestion that our officials at NATO could give notice to our allies that we wish to change the nature or form of our contribution and provide an increased contribution to a mobile reserve for NATO, a course which was approved by SACEUR and the military authorities as long ago as 1960. Is there any reason we should not do that, rather than continue with a militarily obsolete form of contribution such as we now are carrying through?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am glad the hon. member for Greenwood has asked me this question, because I had something I wished to say about some comments he made the other night. I did not wish to overreach my time, but I might take a minute or two now to deal with what I thought was the brunt of his speech the night before last, which is involved with the question he has asked now.

Of course there is nothing to prevent Canada doing this. As a result of a Canadian-Belgian initiative, there now is under way an examination into the state of the alliance. This examination will give all countries an opportunity to assess the present force levels to determine whether they have overreached themselves, whether it is possible to make reductions, and to what extent it is possible to encourage a program of mutual disengagement in Europe, which certainly must come if we are to see conditions of stability established in that continent.

The other night the hon. gentleman from Greenwood used, surprisingly for him I thought, such adjectives as "useless" and "absurd" in characterizing our military contribution in Europe. He buttressed his assertion—

Mr. Brewin: The present alliance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —with quotations from a recent article by Mr. Gellner. I am not competent to enter into a discussion on strategy. That is something for the military people, including the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. My responsibility is a political one to determine whether or not the military establishment proposed is one which will enable Canada to fulfil its commitments in the field of foreign policy. However, the questions raised by my hon. friend in his speech and again today are being considered as one element, as I said, in the NATO review of strategy which is under way.

The essential consideration when a nation participates in an alliance is that questions of strategy and the role of forces must be worked out jointly. There is no other way to have an alliance. My hon. friend nods his head; he agrees with that. The matters are discussed in the defence planning committee, in the NATO council, by the military committee and with SACEUR.

I want to suggest that our allies, and particularly those in Europe, do not belittle, as I think some hon. members of this house in their speeches implied, the military significance of Canada's contribution to the combined NATO deterrent forces. I thought that my hon. friend, who approaches this question with care and responsibility, perhaps failed to appreciate the extent of our contribution, a contribution that is recognized by SACEUR. In his speech the other night the hon. member also quoted from a statement that I made before the external affairs committee of the other place, but he omitted the essential argument of what I said in the other place. I had this to say, in addition to the quotation from my statement that appears in Hansard for the day before yesterday:

> It will be apparent that changes of weapons of the kind I have listed are of necessity gradual... each national contribution represents only a part of the total forces available to the NATO commanders and adjustments in these contributions must be phased into the over-all plan.

There could be no other way, if an alliance is to function with any measure of efficiency. So, while changes in the alliance, in strategy and in the forces of our allies, may mean there may no longer be a requirement in the years ahead for Canadian strike aircraft, the fact is that NATO strategy now requires their presence. SACEUR counts on their contribution, and the plans of our allies are based on their continued existence and presence. So in these circumstances I ask my friend, the hon. member for Greenwood: Would it not be irresponsible for Canada unilaterally to withdraw its aircraft from Europe?

I finally say this. I agree with what my hon. friend said the other night. We must envisage the stage when we achieve the collective security which in 1945 we thought was implicit in the United Nations charter. It is not there now, not because of any fault of ours, but because of a failure to implement the articles of the United Nations charter, because of the failure to provide a pooling of UN member military forces, as was done when NATO was established as an organization for the purpose of providing for the defence of the western powers. But there is a great improvement in east-west relations. There is a detente under way between east and west, particularly since the nuclear missile crisis involving Cuba in 1962. Since that time undoubtedly there has been a great improvement. I saw it myself when I went to Poland and to the Soviet Union in November last year. This is recognized in the NATO council. These days we discuss in the NATO council the possibility of extending this detente almost as much as we discuss problems that have to do with military arrangement.

We must work in that direction, in a direction that will ultimately permit the Warsaw pact powers and the NATO powers to disengage on a mutual basis, thereby encouraging increasing stability and security in Europe. That is the objective. If today we affirm our faith in NATO and in the necessity of continuing to support it, it is because present circumstances demand this. There can be no doubt of what our objective is, the objective of being able to reduce our commitments in Europe just as quickly as the political problems of Europe are resolved in a way which would justify that course being taken, without any prejudice to security and peace.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, would the minister like to answer another question? He seems to be in good form. Would he explain what he meant when he said I was advocating only police forces for United Nations purposes, because it seemed to me that I did not say just that. I said that the type of work we were doing just now could be done by police forces. Would the minister care to elaborate?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I said that the impression my hon. friend left today was that he was suggesting that the peace keeping program outlined by the Minister of National Defence was one that could be simplified. He gave the impression in the statement he made today—I know this is not what he intended, because of his well known military views—that all that was needed for an efficient peace keeping operation was for Canada and other countries to promote the establishment of police forces as a means of keeping the peace between dissident parties, for instance such as in Cyprus. I told my hon. friend that this was not a new concept. I was unwilling to take away my hon. friend's pride of authorship in that idea—I regret to say it is now in existence in some of the peace keeping forces—but it is not sufficient to make an effective peace keeping force operate. If that had been all that had been done in Cyprus, we would not have been able to keep the peace, as the United Nations force has done so successfully for three years. That is what I was trying to emphasize, and to indicate that this was the impression I drew from my hon. friend's interesting, but I thought—and I hope he will not mind my saying this—surprisingly nonproductive speech today.

Mr. Churchill: The minister sometimes draws incorrect impressions. He does not follow debate as closely as he used to in years gone by.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, would the minister permit me to ask a question? I want to ask the honourable and gallant colonel, the Secretary of State for External Affairs—and I ask this question because the policy of our party is to withdraw from NATO when it becomes a nuclear alliance; our party is opposed to nuclear weapons in the hands of Canadian troops at home and abroad, under any circumstances—whether he considers NATO to be a nuclear alliance, and whether he is in favour of nuclear weapons being used by Canadian troops at home or abroad.

Mr. Churchill: He is going to negotiate out of them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend knows that there are three NATO nuclear powers. There are two nuclear powers in the organization, and an additional nuclear power in the alliance. Canada is not one of these. No other NATO country has an independent nuclear capacity. Consequently, in that sense there are no other countries in NATO that can be categorized as nuclear powers.

Mr. Herridge: Perhaps my question was not quite clear, Mr. Chairman. Would the minister say whether Canadian troops in NATO are provided with weapons of nuclear capacity?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I have told my hon. friend that there are two nuclear powers in the organization, and another in the alliance. France does not share in the integrated command structure. There are no other NATO countries that have independent nuclear control. Canada did sign an agreement for the storage of nuclear weapons. Canada does have an arrangement with the United States, in NATO; but this does not give Canada independent national control. Consequently we would not be considered a nuclear power, for instance, under the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, now that all the questions have been asked and the answers given I have to figure out just how to rearrange my speech. May I say that I can appreciate the eloquence of the minister who has just resumed his seat, but I cannot accept the reasoning he set forth. I hope that in the time allowed to me I can make clear why I cannot accept the propositions he has just set forth.

When Bill C-243 was first introduced in the house, spokesmen on behalf of this party made it abundantly clear that we thought the bill was of such importance and so complex it should be referred to the committee on national defence for clarification and for the hearing of witnesses, before this house was asked to register an opinion in principle on second reading. That proposal, recommended by spokesmen other than those from this party, was not acceptable to the government. Therefore the bill proceeded through second reading.

Again at that time we made it clear that, while we were prepared to vote on second reading, we would do so with the understanding that the bill would be referred in its entirety to the committee on national defence so it could be studied in detail, so that witnesses could be heard, so that officials of the armed forces could give their views and, in particular, in order that we might obtain a clear enunciation from the minister and the government as to what is to be the future role of the Canadian armed forces. That meant, of necessity, an understanding from the external affairs department, because defence and foreign policy are closely interrelated.

The bill went to the committee and during a period of approximately six weeks 55 meetings were held, many witnesses were heard, and the bill was then returned to the House of Commons. Following that the first statement made in the house in this regard was made by the Minister of National Defence. I should like to quote the minister's opening remarks, which are to be found in Hansard of April 3 at page 14429:

> During the last few months the subject matter of the bill now before us has been extensively examined and debated in this chamber, in the standing committee on national defence and throughout the news media. Every opportunity has been afforded those who are opposed to this concept to make their views known.

We heard witnesses both in opposition and in support of this bill. We did not receive a clear indication as to the future role of the Canadian armed forces. We have yet to be informed of any consideration, deliberation or action in respect of the evidence before that committee. With the exception of some technical and legalistic amendments the bill has been returned in principle and basic fundamentals in exactly the same form it was referred to the committee.

Why has this bill involving such a controversial and important matter been returned to the house in basically its original form? In my estimation the answer is related to the arrogant and irresponsible position taken by the minister and the government. The minister has failed to accept even a compromise position or even to give a reasonable and factual explanation why he would not accept a compromise. Because of that failure we today, and for days ahead, will again have to repeat all the arguments.

So far as I am personally concerned, the major aspect of this bill involves the future role of the Canadian armed forces. I do not know how we can accept this bill, which lays down the principle of the reorganization of the Canadian armed forces—the army, navy and air force—until we know what the future role of this reorganized force is to be. I say without fear of honest contradiction that no one in this house, including those on the government side, knows what the future role is, or what our foreign policy in respect of defence will be. How can we decide whether we are opposed to or in favour of this bill?

I can prove what I say out of the mouths of the government members. Time after time the Minister of National Defence has said that whether we have a triservice, an integrated service or a single unified service we are going to meet our commitments. A few moments ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs backed up that statement. He said that unification will not affect our commitments and that in fact it will make us more effective. It is obvious that others on that side of the house feel that unification will help us to meet our commitments.

Only a few moments ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs said our commitments were subject to change. He reminded us that negotiations are being carried on with two of our allies in NATO in respect of changing roles, and that in 1968 the ten year contract under NORAD will be concluded. This will necessitate further negotiation.

If this house is to vote in a reasonable, understandable and conscientious manner on this bill, we must know what is in the mind of the government in respect of the future role of our armed forces, and we must know what we are prepared to commit to NATO, or NORAD peace keeping operations or peace restoring functions. That is the situation only in respect of the commitment aspect of our defence role.

The government then suggests, from the other side of its mouth, what will be the function of the defence forces of Canada. Let us go back to 1963 and see what the Prime Minister said at that time about the role or function of our armed forces. He is reported at page 784 of Hansard for June 7, 1963 as follows—and he was quoting his own speech:

> The government should re-examine at once the whole basis of Canadian defence policy. In particular, it should discuss with the United States and with NATO a role for Canada in continental and collective defence which would be more realistic and effective for Canada than the present one. This examination would be concerned, among other things, with the necessity of building up NATO's conventional forces and the part Canada could play in this.

During the same speech on the same date at page 791 the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

> I would hope that in a re-examination of defence policy we will be able to find a more effective form of defence in coalition than that which has been undertaken by the previous government.

Those were the words of the Prime Minister on June 7, 1963. We have heard today that we will maintain our commitments without any readjustment.

The government now talks about change. The government spoke about change in 1963 but there was no change. Without going back as far as 1963, let me refer to what the Minister of National Defence had to say in this regard. What did the minister say in this house last Monday? I will quote what he said, as reported at page 14430 of Hansard:

Cardinal to the plan as set out in the white paper was the strategic situation as it existed at that time. On this question there was no difference of opinion whatsoever. The unanimous decision by the chiefs of staff and all the staff members who considered it was that in the world today the least likely kind of war is an all out thermonuclear war. At the other end of the spectrum, the most likely kind of war is a continuation of small wars, riots, insurrections, the overthrow of civil government, namely, the kind of conflict that has been going on almost continuously throughout history and certainly continuously during the 20 years since world war II.

Each side in the cold war, the United States and the U.S.S.R., has sufficient thermonuclear striking power that even after one side had commenced a sneak attack the other would be able to retaliate, from hardened and dispersed bases, with sufficient power to wipe out the agressor's industrialized areas. Therefore this kind of attack would be irrational.

Then on the next page he continues his speech as follows:

Our problem in Canada was to devise and develop a defence policy sufficiently broad and with sufficient flexibility that our forces could contribute to the deterrence of a major war at one end of the scale and through to these peacekeeping activities at the other end of the scale or assist in putting out a small conflagration before it escalated into all-out thermonuclear war.

Let us consider the statement made by the Prime Minister on June 7, 1963 when he spoke about our new defence policy, the conventional role, and a new approach for Canada in collective alliances. Let us consider the words of the Minister of National Defence uttered here last Monday when he spoke about the best that Canada can supply, and when he said that it is irrational to think of a thermonuclear war because if one side starts it the other will be wiped out. In addition let us look at the statements made today, that we should meet our commitments with a new force. I ask the minister: What is the role of the Canadian armed forces? What was it, not only in the past, but what is it now when we are considering this bill and, in particular, what will it be in the future?—because now we are being faced with a complete reorganization of the Canadian armed forces.

I find the stand taken by both the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence to be completely irrational. A few moments ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that we should keep our brigade and our air division in Europe, and yet the Minister of National Defence has stated previously that any sneak attack might develop into a thermonuclear war. Even if there is a conventional sneak attack, how will our brigade meet it? Will it meet it with the Honest John rocket with a nuclear warhead? How will our air division fly to meet it? Will it do so equipped with nuclear warheads? I am not one who says we should pull out of NATO completely, but in my own view I do not see any purpose in maintaining in Europe our brigade and our air division. If they are going to stay there, then we should think about it in the light of the reorganization of our forces. If they are not going to be kept there, then that might change our thinking on Bill C-243. I believe we should be equipped for anti-submarine warfare, and I believe that this is a vital role which we can play in NATO. That is my own personal view.

I believe we should reconsider our position in NORAD, when the new agreement comes up in 1968. We must adjust to what our position will be in ten years. Are we going to maintain our present commitments with Bomarcs, with nuclear warheads on our Canadian soil, with Voodoos with nuclear war-heads? If so, why? Let the minister state, as he has done so often, that in the case of a war it is not Canada which will be attacked but the United States, and that it will not be an all-out nuclear conflict. What is Canada doing to prepare for such an eventuality? I say, Mr. Chairman, that we should have some knowledge of the future role of the Canadian armed forces. Knowing that, we can then give proper consideration to this bill.

However, I should like to go beyond that. I cannot remember any witness who gave evidence before the committee, whether in the service or retired, who has opposed the policy of integration. I do not believe there is any member in the house who would basically oppose integration. The question is, where do we go from there? Also I cannot think of one witness who gave evidence before the committee who did not say that it would take from four to six years to implement integration, to test it and then to adjust it according to problems which cannot be foreseen now.

In view of this it is my own personal opinion that we could have avoided this discourse, and these arguments pro and con a single service, if the government had adopted a more sensible approach to this entire question, if it had emphasized the fact that it would take five to six years to put integration into effect, and if it had not insisted on the legalistic bill now before us authorizing the government to promulgate integration inside of four months.

The minister put himself in a poor position when he announced it will take five years to accomplish the first stage, and now wishes authorization for the next five or ten years. Surely we should go step by step, because if we try to jump all the way we might fall and break our necks. This would mean the disorganization and disruption of the Canadian armed forces. Ultimately our forces may become a single service, but why does the government have to ram it down the throats of members of parliament, of members of the armed services and of the people of Canada? The minister speaks of the single service concept and of full integration, but there will still have to be an army, a navy and an air force; there is no question about it.

If we accept full integration, what is wrong with letting those who honour the traditions of the service they joined to be known as members of the R.C.N., the R.C.A.F. or the army, in the integrated service? The government can have its integration, its command, its control, but what is so wrong with letting the services maintain their units and their designations within the integrated service? Surely that is not a fundamental change, and the government and the minister could have acceded to it, for psychological reasons if for no others.

The same thing applies to the common uniform. It applies also to the one-rank structure. Why should we be the only country in the world—at least of which I know—among our allies, where an admiral has to be a general or an air chief marshal has to be a general? Why should this be so? Perhaps this situation will evolve eventually, yes, but why bring it about now to cause confusion and heartbreak?

It is not good enough to say that the minister is taking the power under which he may make these designations, but that the government may hold it in abeyance. Once you have the power, God knows how it is going to be used. Why is it necessary to bring in this sort of thing? I am convinced that a little bit of reason and compromise by the minister would have enabled us to go a long way toward meeting what he has in mind. I do want to reiterate that there is bound to be opposition when the minister says "This is it", and especially when we are not clear as to what the future role of our armed forces is to be. The government has placed many of us in a difficult position. We believe in progress; we believe in integration and we sincerely hope it can be made to work. Ultimately, it may lead to unification, a single service.

Then, we are led to ask, which comes first? From our point of view the policy and the rules come before the structure. If we can get the policy and the rules before the structure, then there might not be any question at all, beyond perhaps an odd change in a clause, and we could go right through this bill. If the minister and the government remain arrogant and say, "Play ball our way, or else," then in the last analysis we will have to decide on our course of action. If you cannot get a policy before a structure, then you must be getting a structure first, because the structure will force you to get a policy and an objective. It has to be one way or the other.

This is the position in which the government is placing the members of this house. We will have to make our decision according to what we believe is best for the armed forces and for Canada. From now until this bill is completed, the members of this party will maintain the principle that was enunciated by the hon. member for Greenwood, and which I have tried to enunciate, that no matter what happens we will vote on each clause according to whether we think it is good, bad or, indifferent in the over-all legislative picture. In the final analysis, we will search our consciences and vote in the way we think is right for the future of Canada.

Mr. Macaluso: I was a member, Mr. Chairman, of the defence committee and heard the testimony on this bill. The committee heard testimony on all sides of this particular question. I feel it is important to realize that, at least where the opposition is concerned, there are as many sides as there are witnesses opposed to this legislation. When dealing with this legislation and the testimony relating to it, it is necessary I believe to judge the merits of the evidence and the credibility of the individual witnesses who appeared. In so far as this bill is concerned, the committee could group those gentlemen who appeared before us into three categories. The first would be political, the second the serving officers and the third the retired officers.

Now, the individuals in each of these three categories have limitations in their ability to present evidence. The first group, the minister and associate minister, are obviously the most qualified in all areas, except perhaps expertise on specific points. The second group, service officers, complement the minister and associate minister by providing the expertise and opinions on military considerations, but must refrain from making statements on policy.

The testimony of the third group, the retired officers, is possibly the most difficult to weigh. In the committee, Mr. Chairman, we were faced with a very real dilemma, the credibility of this group of witnesses. The minister and the defence staff all gave comprehensive and corroborative testimony. Nowhere, I suggest, was there a contradiction, as will be indicated by the minutes of evidence. However, on the other side one finds it difficult to choose whom to believe, particularly when the conflict arises over what I suggest are the gut issues.

The relevance, credibility and merit of their evidence—I am speaking of the retired officers—is directly related to the positions they had while in the service, the length of time they have been out of the service and any bias that has resulted from their manner of leaving, their present political affiliations and their membership in or association with interested organizations. For the most part, these are men who have high rank and have given long and loyal service to their country.

However, Mr. Chairman, I ask, are they still in touch? We are all agreed that the study of defence matters is exceedingly difficult because of the pace of development and change, particularly in our Canadian setting, as a result of the present reorganization. I submit that these men no longer have available to them the plans, documents and sources of information that they had at one time. The new information they receive after leaving the service—and this came from the witnesses themselves—comes from news reports, which are not exactly the best source, and second or third hand from friends, who are presently serving officers. I might say that these are hardly adequate bases for judgment.

It is significant that many of them had not read the present bill but had prepared briefs on unification, and were quite willing and ready to answer questions on unification. This was their right, of course, and was what they were there to do. Many admitted however they had not read the bill. The many briefs presented, and the supporting evidence, produced certain contradictions which I should like to put forward, Mr. Chairman. General Moncel stated that he wrote four plans for unification, and the one the minister selected was the one he rejected out of hand. This statement appears on page 1212 of the committee evidence.

Later, Air Chief Marshal Miller, then chief of defence staff and General Moncel's direct superior, through whom these plans would have been forwarded stated, in answer to a question I asked, that he had seen no such plans. General Allard, present chief of staff, stated that in so far as he knew, these plans never existed. He had made a search of the department. Significantly General Moncel, referring to his retirement later stated, "I left because I could not write such a plan."

Admiral Brock, speaking about the lack of knowledge on the part of serving officers in 1964 as to what was going on, said as recorded on page 959 of the evidence:

> No one seemed for a single moment to believe that the one reference in the white paper could be anything but an odd expression.

Admiral Rayner put it quite succinctly when he said, as recorded on page 2011 of the evidence:

> I had no doubts of what a single unified service meant; I had always assumed it would be one service, with one uniform and a loss of identity to the three services we have now.

General Fleury, however, seemed to agree with Admiral Brock when he stated, as recorded on page 1315:

> It was not clear to me and it was not clear to the vast majority of the people in the armed forces what was meant.

However, General Moncel stated—and I read from page 1310:

> I was well aware of the fact that the white paper said that unification was the ultimate end.

There you have it, Mr. Chairman. One admiral and one general say they did not know and one admiral and one general categorically state they they did know. It is difficult for me to conceive of a deficiency of knowledge in high ranking serving officers in an issue so fundamental as this. It is my submission they must have known. Regarding communications, General Fleury said:

• (5:40 p.m.)

> Communications were very bad within the headquarters and between the commanders in the field.

General Moncel countered by stating that communications could not be simpler, that it is straightforward.

Later on, referring to the testimony of previous witnesses on the proposed reorganization, the hon. member for Edmonton West made this statement, as reported at page 1314 of the committee proceedings:

> No serving officers at the time were asked to testify how they felt about this organization.

To this General Moncel replied:

> If they said this, it is quite wrong. I sat on defence council and we heard lots of "chaps" giving vent to their views on it.

Admiral Landymore said that the new reenlistment program contained in the bill would be an invitation to trade unions in the armed forces. Again, General Moncel disagreed, saying that he could not believe what Admiral Landymore said would come true. When questioned by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek about Admiral Landymore's suggestion that, under provisions of the bill, the minister of defence could commit Canadian forces anywhere without consulting parliament, General Moncel said, as reported at page 1306:

> I cannot believe it.

Many of the witnesses that appeared expressed the view that the troops were opposed to unification. As reported at page 1379, Air Marshal Annis said:

> I believe our minister may be correct when he suggested that unification had large popularity within the Canadian armed forces.

To be fair to him, Mr. Chairman, he went on to characterize how this support was divided.

The list of contradictions goes on and on, Mr. Chairman. I have quoted these few examples to demonstrate the degree of the problem. On the one hand, we have the members of the present defence staff who agree to a man on all points in their testimony, including the opinion that unification is the right organization for the Canadian armed forces.

On the other hand, we have some retired officers, whose testimony is fraught with contradiction, who in the main agree on the principle of unification, but who disagree on different specific aspects with either the minister, the defence staff, other opposition witnesses, or in some cases even themselves. The important element in all their testimony is whether or not they agree with unification, regardless of the manner of implementation, and the consensus is a resounding vote in favour of unification. But, Mr. Chairman, as I have stated, some of them had not read the bill, nor had they heard or read the briefs of the defence staff. It is also significant that most of the discussion centred on the success of integration. of which of course they were all in favour, as that was the stage in which they were involved. If they were speaking of some of the difficulties which were being experienced with integration, they had solutions to offer.

The world is following our lead in integrating the armed services—

An hon. Member: Oh?

Mr. Macaluso: —but what of unification? Somebody says "oh", but it is a fact that this is so. We hear comments like: "We should not do it until somebody else does". "It has not been tried and it is not proven". "We are too small to try something like this". "Let the United States or Britain try it first. If it works—and I am certain it would—let us jump on the band wagon and follow their lead".

Most of these witnesses, Mr. Chairman, with one or two significant exceptions, were not opposed to the principle of unification. They were, however, opposed to doing it now, and for the most part their testimony was directed to that end. In effect, they said: Let us wait a few years and then we will go ahead.

General Foulkes, who was, in effect, an opposition witness, pretty well summed up this attitude when he said, as reported at page 1228:

> In 1963 when I was here I think I remarked that the attitude of the chiefs was "Yes, we believe in integration but please do not do it while I am here."

He is speaking of integration, not unification. He went on:

> "I do not want to be known as the chief of staff who ruined these services". This was the natural attitude of an officer who had come all the way up through the service, who was responsible for the welfare of the service and not only to those in the service, but to the institutions which supported it. Although they all supported it, they were not so keen to go ahead with it during their tenure of office.

Perhaps these men are not so keen now to go ahead with it during their term of retirement, and I suggest probably for the same reason as that referred to by General Foulkes. But the members of the present defence staff are prepared to go ahead.

General Allard stated to the committee, during his appearance before them on February 28 last, that in making his presentation he did so as the man responsible for carrying out the policy of the government, through the Minister of National Defence, for ensuring that the defence forces that we have today are organized, equipped, trained and possess the morale to accept any task they have or are likely to be given. He said he felt absolutely confident that this task can be carried out best by the reorganization of the forces as set out in Bill No. C-243.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that a man with the background, experience and service record of General Allard could make such a statement if he did not believe in it.

I would now like to deal with the fallacious statement—and it is a fallacious statement—by some hon. gentlemen opposite and some witnesses that unification is proceeding ahead too fast. When making these completely inaccurate statements, it is obvious that they have not listened to the expert testimony of witnesses before the committee. On Tuesday, February 7, 1967, at our very first meeting, we heard a two-hour brief by Air Marshal F. R. Sharp, vice-chief of the defence staff, and a major portion of that brief was directed to the time schedule for unification. I know it has been quoted before, but I should like to quote one paragraph of the vice chief's brief:

> Because this is a very complex job, very thorough and careful planning is required. The department has, on the one hand, been accused of acting too quickly, that is, not doing sufficient planning, and, on the other hand, of not deciding sooner the details of what is involved in unification. Since planning takes time and since the details cannot be decided and divulged until the planning has been completed, it is obvious that the department cannot satisfy both of these criticisms. To take time for adequate planning means that there will be some delay before the details of unification can be announced. To quickly announce the details implies inadequate planning. However, to postpone the decision to unify until all the details have been worked out is contrary to common sense.

Here, Mr. Chairman, we are faced with the most challenging and exciting concept in modern military organization, and what do the opponents use as arguments? They engage in picayune discussion, based on unwillingness to accept the testimony of the only men—let me repeat, the only men—who are in a position to know what the proper time phase is, namely the present serving officers on the defence staff.

[Mr. Macaluso.]

Air Marshal Sharp told us that planning for unification has been going on since 1964 and that it will not be completed until 1971 at the earliest. That, Mr. Chairman, adds up to a seven year program. Certainly, in this day and age it is time we realized that we can no longer afford to "wait and see" indefinitely; that we cannot simply put off our decisions for three years or five years because of the outcry of a small nostalgic group fighting for the preservation of an expensive, outdated and inefficient system of military organization. They are not looking for a pause for three or five years; they are looking for a permanent halt to the modernization of Canada's military establishment.

The Air Marshal's presentation illustrated with charts the program planning and scheduling. He indicated that to accomplish the aims of unification involved about 500 complex, interlocking stages and that progress or delays in one program had consequent effects on several others.

The minister and the defence staff have continuously stressed one point in the discussions both in and out of the committee, and it is that Bill C-243 is the final phase of the integration-unification cycle. Integration and unification are not neatly defined packages—and this was a point made by many witnesses, even those in opposition. They are not independent entities. Rather they are interlocking and interdependent stages in an over-all scheme designed to give Canada the best fighting force per tax dollar the world has ever seen.

General Allard told the committee that he has had to stop many programs that were impinging on unification, as the armed forces do not yet have the authority to complete their programs without the passing of this bill. To me, and to many of us, this indicates that planning and execution are well on schedule, and that the only part of the program that is behind schedule is the passing of the necessary legislation.

Much ado has been made about something called "instant unification". Some people seem to think that a stroke of the pen proclaiming this legislation will declare the process complete. This utter nonsense, as is shown by the opening statement of the minister. When this bill has been passed and proclaimed, it will do one thing and one thing alone—it will give the men and women of our Canadian armed forces the legal right to continue with the necessary final planning and to begin to implement the plan. Bill C-243 is simply permissive legislation—nothing more, nothing less.

General Allard, chief of the defence staff, said this:

> I would refer to the question regarding any suspension or delay in proceeding with the final stage of re-organization—unification. I sincerely believe a postponement or delay in starting this final stage would have a most serious effect on all of us now serving and on our recruiting prospects. What the serviceman is saying to us now is this, "Get on with it", and in my opinion any delay—one year, two years, five years or even a few months—would seriously impair morale.
> This proposal is not designed to cope with the past, it is for the present and the future.

It is warming to note that General Worthington in an article published in the Ottawa Journal of Tuesday, April 4, says the same thing. I continue quoting General Allard:

> I am convinced that not only is it right—but that it will appeal to the youth of today and tomorrow. The idea of a single force, in a single, distinctively Canadian uniform—working, living, training and, most important, thinking together as one entity—is an exciting and challenging idea. After all, it is designed to meet the problems of a modern world—a scientific world—which is growing away beyond the barriers of the past at a speed that cannot stand the slow pace of yesterday.

Now come these important words:

> For all this—you know that we do not intend to proceed in haste—but rather in a carefully planned manner which will extend over a number of years. All that is required now is the authority to do so.

Those are the words of General Allard. Air Marshall Annis agreed that he was not opposed to the end result, integration into one single force, one rank, one uniform. General Foulkes said:

> The problem can only be solved by complete unification of the three services with one Chief of Staff, one chain of command, one ladder of promotion and one uniform.

General Moncel said:

> I was well aware of the fact that the white paper said that unification was the ultimate end. Well, that was fine. There was nothing wrong with it as a name.

I ask you, are these the statements of men who are opponents of unification? Again I reiterate, the important element of all the testimony in opposition is whether or not they agree with unification, regardless of the manner of implementation; and as stated earlier, the consensus is a resounding vote in favour of unification.

When we look at the bill in this, its proper perspective, and examine the testimony of the witnesses who have seemingly opposed it, we find for the most part that there is really very little ground for contention. The major theme of these witnesses and of hon. gentlemen opposite has been "It's a good thing, but let's wait a few years before we do it."

Mr. Chairman, that is not a sound argument. The plan will not be implemented fully until 1972 at the earliest. Simple arithmetic shows that 1972 is five years away, and that we have already had three years of planning behind us. The minister and the defence staff are not rushing headlong into this, I submit. They are not moving at great speed as General Moncel said, "on an uncharted course toward a dim destination". I doubt whether he himself believes this. Rather, I submit they are moving at a controlled rate on a carefully planned program toward a concept necessitated by the technological revolution of the twentieth century and, perhaps more important, by the personal needs and welfare of Canada's serving men and women.

What is needed is enabling legislation now, so that they can get on with the planning and erase the uncertainty among our servicemen. It is now mainly the uncertainty concerning whether we are or are not going to unify that is bothering the servicemen, not the fact of unification itself.

We are here as parliamentarians, Mr. Chairman, to carry out the will of the Canadian people and to act in the best interests of our country. In so doing we are always faced with opposition viewpoints. We have long recognized that this is a good thing. Our parliamentary system is composed of two elements—Her Majesty's loyal government and Her Majesty's loyal opposition, and although there are times when members on this side of the house may feel that hon. members opposite take their task of opposing too much to heart, we would still not wish to see the form of our legislative body changed. This is all to say that, no matter what the issue, no matter what the time, there will always be opposition to every proposal because, as the expression goes, "You can't please all of the people all of the time."

With regard to unification, it would be easy for us to say, "Let's wait a few years" and put it off, just as it would have been easy for the present Minister of National Defence to bask in the successes of integration and to leave the more difficult part of the job to his successor. But no one who is a member of this house will remain so for long if he always takes the easy way out. As members of parliament we must have the courage of our convictions, and having recognized our duty we must carry it out. Our duty now, I submit, is to pass this bill, to make Canada's defence force stronger and more able to do the tasks it will be called upon to perform. Let us get on with it and take our place in the vanguard of forward thinking nations.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Macaluso: I see that I still have some time left—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Macaluso: I had not quite finished.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I was recognized on a point of order.

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry if the hon. member thought I had finished; I was just moving my chair.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member may have recognized that he had some time left when he resumed his seat. The Chair had recognized me. The hon. member cannot now get up and say that he had a minute or two left.

I wish to draw to the attention of the Chair that the hon. member, by reading word for word from a prepared text for the last 25 minutes, has broken a rule of the house. This is another indication of how Liberal members think. When in committee the minister and other Liberal members were prompted by advisers from the department, sitting behind them. The hon. members had not the brains to ask their own questions. Here we see an attempt by Liberal members to repeat something that has been put on paper for them by officials from the minister's department.

Mr. Macaluso: On a point of privilege—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Six o'clock.

Mr. Macaluso: On a point of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Six o'clock.

Mr. Macaluso: I only take cognizance of talk that is talk. An empty seat is like an empty brain.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: What about tomorrow?

Mr. Hellyer: Tomorrow we shall continue with this debate; should it conclude during the course of the day we would take up the bill in the name of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and following that, the consideration of the temporary rules.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received from the hon. member for Outremont-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lamontagne) written declaration of his intention to resign his seat in the House of Commons.

Pursuant to section 6 of the House of Commons Act, chapter 143 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, I have directed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for an issue of a writ for election of a new member for the said electoral district.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VIMY RIDGE SERVICE—REPORTED REFUSAL OF FRANCE TO PARTICIPATE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of press reports to the effect that the Republic of France has refused to participate in the guard of honour and other observances at the fiftieth anniversary service at Vimy Ridge on April 9. Will the Prime Minister indicate what explanation there may be for this incomprehensible act on the part of France in view of Canada's tremendous sacrifice, and whether any representations were made to France? It seems impossible to understand why that country would not be represented on an occasion commemorating a battle that helped mark Canada's emergence as a nation and in which Canada poured out its blood and treasure.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, preparations for this special Canadian ceremony to mark the fiftieth anniversary of the battle of Vimy Ridge, which is a landmark not only of the war, but, as the right hon. gentleman has said, in our history, are primarily the responsibility of my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I can say that the preparations have been carried out with the full co-operation of the French authorities. The French government has appointed official representatives both for the ceremony and for the reception of His Royal Highness Prince Philip on his arrival. I believe there are no grounds for suggesting that the French government has not given adequate recognition to this observance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister say why the usual French guard of honour for such events is being denied by that country?

Mr. Pearson: Some of the details in some of the reports about this matter are not quite accurate. I hope shortly to be able to give the house a detailed account of the exact ceremonies that will take place at that time, and the extent of French participation in them.

NATIONAL REVENUE

STUDEBAKER CORPORATION—INDEBTEDNESS FOR CUSTOMS DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Last November the minister indicated that he had received a report from the Department of Justice in connection with the importation of some 10,000 Volkswagen cars by the Studebaker company. Has his department now decided whether these cars properly came within the Canada-United States auto agreement, or whether they are subject to taxation under the general tariff provisions?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this is a very difficult question to answer. We have received advice from the Department of Justice and are acting on that advice. I can assure my hon. friend that we will act within the law as it exists, but I may not indicate to him what we are doing with respect to a particular taxpayer's affairs.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am not asking the minister to indicate what he is doing with respect to a particular taxpayer, but in view of the fact that other auto companies must know what they are entitled to do under the Canada-United States auto agreement, have the minister and the Department of Justice decided whether it is proper for an auto company under the provisions of that agreement to bring into Canada cars manufactured by another company?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, we have made our decision in this matter, and I am sure all the auto companies know what our thinking in this type of matter is and how we will treat them as individual companies. But as my hon. friend knows I may not discuss the affairs of an individual company in the House of Commons.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the extensive lay-offs that have taken place in the automobile industry, the fact that the auto manufacturers have approached the government asking that they be relieved of their full responsibility under this trade pact, and that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has asked for a complete study and review of this agreement, would the Prime Minister now think it wise to refer this auto agreement to a standing committee of the House of Commons so all the facts may be brought out and an accurate assessment made of this agreement?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I certainly think it wise to look carefully into my hon. friend's question, and I shall do that.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of National Revenue has said he must not give details of individual cases. I presume he has read the report of the Auditor General, who says that under this scheme Studebaker owes Canada $2 million in income tax. Is the government in agreement with the Auditor General?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact the situation with regard to a particular corporation, which the Auditor General did not indicate in his report as the Studebaker corporation, has been examined carefully by my department. We will deal with the particular people involved, as we must deal with them, according to the law as approved by the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister suggest that there is any other automobile company which owes $2 million for the importation of these automobiles?

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the further supplementary question is argumentative.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, we have to get the information. The minister has stated that he cannot give us the information because of some income tax rule, but the Auditor General referred to this fact. Surely parliament is entitled to know whether this government will do what the Auditor General says it should.

Mr. Starr: This is another reason for having a committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CONSUMERS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister and ask whether it is the government's intention to set up a department of corporate and consumer affairs, and if so just when we can expect an announcement regarding the implementation of that decision.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, certain functions which concern corporate and consumer affairs have already been transferred to the department of the Registrar General from other departments. We are now giving consideration to the possibility of recognizing that fact by recommending to parliament that the name of the department be changed, but this is a matter for parliament to decide.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO AID UNEMPLOYED TEXTILE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the many lay-offs resulting from a gradual decrease in the output of textile factories, as well as the closing down of some textile factories, does the government intend to take action in order to find jobs for the workers affected?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the plans and policies of the government in respect of aid to areas where there is unusual unemployment have been made known in this house more than once. However, I will be glad to look into this situation so far as the textile workers are concerned.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CAMP HILL, N.S.—REPORTED LACK OF HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In his absence may I direct it to the acting minister and ask him whether he is in a position today to reply to the question I posed on Monday with regard to charges that hospital beds were not available for pensionable overseas veterans while at the same time beds were being occupied by merchant seamen from Canada and other countries.

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): I am afraid this question will have to be taken as notice once again. I am sorry for this.

AIR POLLUTION

EQUIPPING OF AUTOMOBILES WITH PROTECTIVE DEVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the government of Ontario announced that as an anti-pollution measure it will order the installation of clean air packages in all cars to be sold in Ontario. In view of this I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he would not seriously consider reversing his present position and ordering the clean air package as a national standard.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there appears to be some misunderstanding as to what the minister said. I understood Dr. Dymond to have stated that the clean air package would be put in use once its effectiveness had been demonstrated.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the announcement made in Toronto yesterday, and in view of the indivisibility of our atmosphere, may I ask whether the federal government is taking any steps to make sure that the various governments of this country will act in concert on this important issue of controlling air pollution?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, at present the Department of National Health and Welfare is giving consideration to the most effective role which can be undertaken by the federal government with respect to air pollution in Canada, and there is undoubtedly some necessity for co-ordination in this particular field.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary. In view of the fact that the United States government has already ordered this package in cars to be sold in the United States, I should like to ask the minister whether there is any serious doubt about the effectiveness of this particular feature.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is certainly not in order.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare will include cigars and cigarettes in this prospective anti-pollution measure.

HOUSING

SASKATCHEWAN—REPORTED REDUCTION IN STARTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the serious reduction in housing starts in Saskatchewan, reported to be 45 per cent for the months of January and February as compared with a year ago, will the Prime Minister ask his ministry to expedite new housing plans?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to take it up with the minister.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the steady worsening of the housing crisis in Canada, and in view of the need this creates for a full time minister, has the Prime Minister given any further thought to the establishment of a separate ministry for housing and urban affairs? If so, what decision has he made?

Mr. Pearson: I think this matter is worthy of consideration, and that consideration is being given.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): It was my intention to ask my question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, but it will fit in very nicely with the preceding question so in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. Will the government consider amending the Veterans' Land Act to reduce the amount of land required for building under that scheme, in order that at least in this category housing may be provided on a city or town lot?

Mr. Pearson: I will have to take that question as notice and discuss it with the minister concerned.

PENITENTIARIES

QUEBEC—AWARD OF CONTRACT WHILE QUESTION BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works or perhaps the Solicitor General in order to clear the air—I think it is most important—as to whether there has been a deliberate or unintentional insult to the joint committee on penitentiary matters.

My question, Mr. Speaker, is this. For what reason was a contract recently awarded to the Secant Construction Company of Montreal in the amount of $2,823,000 for site engineering at the maximum security prison 20 miles north of Montreal when the entire question of prisons and prison design has been referred to a joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate, which committee is meeting again this afternoon? I ask, Mr. Speaker, what are the grounds upon which contracts are let for maximum security prisons while the matter is receiving consideration by a joint committee appointed by this government.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take the question as notice. I am not aware personally of a contract being let but I will look into the matter and reply at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question, and Your Honour will tell me if it is in order. Is it not rather unusual for a minister not to know that such a contract has been awarded, according to the press?

Mr. Speaker: I can tell the hon. member that it is not in order.

[Later:]

Mr. Pennell: Perhaps I might be allowed to expand on an answer I gave earlier in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East. With respect I would draw his attention to the proceedings before the joint committee on penitentiaries dated January 24, 1967. In his evidence the superintendent of penitentiaries stated:

> The St. Anne des Plaines tender was accepted at $7,100,000 in round figures. There will be at St. Anne des Plaines an additional sum of $2½ million in development of the site, but that development will provide services which will also be available for other institutions to be built there in due course. The basic cost is $7,100,000.

I hope that is a satisfactory answer to the hon. member's question.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING FEDERAL DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that more and more is being heard about the establishment of a federal district for the national capital area, that is Hull and Ottawa, is the Prime Minister in a position to advise whether talks have taken place between the government or between himself and the provincial authorities concerned? If not, is it the Prime Minister's intention shortly to have talks with the Quebec or Ontario authorities.

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): To my knowledge, but I should like to check it, there have been no such talks. In so far as the plans of the government in this regard are concerned, I have nothing to add to what has been said already in the house.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

STEVEN TRUSCOTT—INQUIRY AS TO FINDINGS OF SUPREME COURT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether he is in a position to give the house any indication when the Supreme Court of Canada may be expected to hand down its judgment or recommendations in the Truscott case. I ask this because for some reason in the last few days inquiries have come from all parts of the country.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the law officers of the crown have no advance information as to when the judgment will be rendered in this case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the clerk of the Supreme Court of Canada been communicated with, and if not will the minister communicate with him to ascertain whether the court has any particular date in mind?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, with great respect I hesitate to suggest that the law officers of the crown should approach the court. I hope of course that judgment will be rendered in the near future.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reg Cantelon (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the minister's announcement that Welland canal fees should meet the cost of the canal, and his statement of recent date to the effect that the new transport bill was based on the principle that all phases of transportation should pay their way, I should like to ask the minister whether it is now his intention, in accordance with this principle, to raise the ferry rates in Newfoundland sufficiently to recover the $13 million subsidy which is required to operate that ferry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question should be put on the order paper.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister provide any information about the purpose of the negotiations presently under way in London to consider the possibility of extending the 1962 international wheat agreement for one more year on the basis of the existing price structure? Will the signing of such an agreement await the outcome of the Geneva talks, or would the GATT agreement supersede any existing agreement?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are pinning our hopes on a successful conclusion to the talks in Geneva which are presently under way. The discussions now going on in connection with the international wheat agreement in London are purely pro forma and not a matter of substantive negotiation.

OATS AND BARLEY—REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO SHIP INTO MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to answer a question asked yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition in connection with the feed grain situation in Manitoba. The situation is that currently in elevators in Manitoba there are 8 million bushels of oats and 4.3 million bushels of barley available for sale. There are, therefore, ample stocks of oats and barley available in elevators in Manitoba.

With regard to the transport of grains from one province to another to which my right hon. friend alluded, it is the policy of the wheat board to move board stocks freely to any areas in Canada where they are required. The right hon. gentleman obviously had reference to non-board stocks which would be sold in competition with board stocks, and the wheat board is not prepared to authorize the interprovincial movement of such non-board oats, barley or feed wheat.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in connection with oats, barley and feed wheat the minister has said there are sufficient stocks in Manitoba. Has he not had any representations from livestock feeders to the effect that such is not the case? They are the representations I have had.

Mr. Winters: No, sir, I have not.

FLOODS

FRASER RIVER—REQUEST FOR PREVENTIVE ACTION BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I want to ask the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received an appeal from Hon. H. H. Stevens of Vancouver urging him to take action to avert floods in the lower Fraser river by sending an engineering team to that area?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did receive a letter from Mr. Stevens yesterday afternoon. I immediately got in touch with the departmental officers concerned to see what the nature of the problem is likely to be, what could be done about it, and to ascertain whether the situation is likely to be as desperate as Mr. Stevens suggested.

LOTTERIES

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF CRIMINAL CODE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put my first question to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General whom I should like to congratulate on his recent appointment and from whom I hope to receive a favorable reply.

In view of the fact that his department has been studying the question of lotteries for the last two years and further to the recent statement of Dr. Szabo before the provincial commission on the administration of justice to the effect that a lottery would be a healthy public measure, is the minister considering an early amendment to section 179 of the Criminal Code to enable the provinces who wish to do so to establish provincial lotteries for purposes of education and social welfare?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, basically, the statement made by Dr. Szabo before the provincial commission is of interest to the provincial commission. I would have to see his statement, that is read the recommendations made to the commission. As to what is happening within my department, I must say that I have not yet received any report on the subject and, personally, I do not intend to initiate such legislation.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to ask the Minister of Justice and Attorney General—whom I congratulate on his appointment—whether his department has communicated with the Quebec Justice Department with a view to having that section of the Criminal Code amended so that provinces may introduce lotteries, and whether he intends to follow-up these requests?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's question is essentially the same as the one put by the hon. member who spoke before him.

NATIONAL PARKS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO NEW PARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Kings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. When may we expect a decision by the government about establishing a national park in Kings county, Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be on the order paper.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ANTI-BALLISTIC MISSILE SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is a conference in progress in Washington on a ministerial level with regard to an anti-ballistic missile system? If so, who is representing Canada at that conference and what is Canada's policy with regard to the proposal?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence is in Washington today, as he indicated the day before yesterday he would be. He has had some discussions with his opposite number, Mr. McNamara. The view of the Canadian government was stated by the Minister of National Defence the other day when he pointed out that Canada hoped the discussions between the Soviet union and the United States with regard to this program would result in an agreement by both sides not to proceed with it.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister of National Defence be there tomorrow as well as today?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence hopes to be back tomorrow.

Mr. Churchill: At what time?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I shall have to get that information at ten o'clock.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a related question. Could he inform the house whether the question of Canada joining with the United States in the development of a common user battlefield communication system involving the use of satellites is also being discussed?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to take notice of that question.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN CONDITION OF OTTAWA STREETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I want to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the deplorable condition of almost every road and highway leading into Ottawa, and in view of published reports that during centennial year the city will be filled with sewer excavations, road widenings, potholes, etc., could the minister not do anything to consult the local municipal officials and see that during centennial year visitors to Ottawa will not feel they are visiting some sort of devastated country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the minister concerned has noted the representation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

FEDERAL OBSERVERS AT QUEBEC COMMISSION ON CRIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice who is certainly one of the most brilliant acquisitions, for the province of Quebec, on the federal scene.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Let us hear about the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan).

Mr. Choquette: I am pleased to salute the future Conservative chief.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice, a little smarter than the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, whether his department intends to send an observer to the inquiry which is going on at the present time concerning the administration of Justice, since that inquiry will certainly end up by recommending amendments to the Criminal Code?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the administration of Justice, according to the constitution, comes under provincial jurisdiction. If we had been invited, I think that we would have considered attending, but as far as I know, we have not received any invitation. Anyway, I shall inquire.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the honourable "most brilliant acquisition" from the province of Quebec.

Mr. Choquette: On the federal scene.

Mr. Grégoire: On the federal scene. Would the hon. minister tell us whether his department also intends to send an observer to the sittings of the States General of French Canada, who intend to put forward amendments to the constitution?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not believe that this question is urgent enough to be acceptable at this time.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, may I answer the most brilliant separatist acquisition on the federal scene?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

GRAIN

QUEBEC—POSSIBLE SALE OR LEASE OF ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Transport. Has he received a telegram from the president of the executive council of the Coopérative Fédérée de Québec, Mr. Gingras, advising him of the possible rental or sale of the Quebec grain elevators to an American company?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I think the question is urgent—

An hon. Member: You are not the Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and I can assure the hon. gentleman that the government has no intention of approving the sale of the elevator at Quebec, and I underline the word "sale".

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are we to understand that the government could rent those elevators to an American company?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, it could happen, but there is nothing sure about it.

[English]

Mr. Ricard: Selling out to the United States.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps I might ask a supplementary question on this. If a lease is granted for ten years may I inquire whether the result will not be that the entire movement of domestic and export grain from the St. Lawrence will be under the control of international companies rather than Canadian companies?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, unlike the right hon. gentleman, when I became a politician I did not attempt to become a prophet, and I could not answer that question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I hope he does not become one, because up to the present time any prophecies he has made have been entirely without basis in truth or fact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister whether, under the provisions of the Canada Grain Act, it was not intended that the control of wheat exports should be under Canadian companies and not under United States companies, as might well happen if there were a lease or sale of elevators owned by the National Harbours Board.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have never been so flattered in my life to think that one of the most eminent counsel in Canada should ask a layman, as I am, for a legal opinion, but I do not think the rules allow me to give it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister had better look into it.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Because of the jurisidction involved in this matter with respect to the export of grain and the need to store it in elevators controlled by the National Harbours Board, would not the Prime Minister consider that a decision to rent or sell the National Harbours Board's elevators should be taken only after consultation with the Department of Agriculture and other departments, including the Department of Trade and Commerce, so such action will not take place haphazardly but will be given consideration and done in an orderly manner.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suspected from the first question, which I should have liked to rule out of order, that we would be engaging in debate. I think we might go to another question now.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—RIGHT OF PROVINCES NOT TO PARTICIPATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Ballard (Calgary South): I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of a statement he made recently to the effect that any province had the right to opt out of medicare. Does this represent a change in attitude on the part of the government? If so, what type of financial arrangements would be made by the federal government with provinces which opt out?

Mr. Speaker: This question is out of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF DISCUSSION OF NATIONAL DEFENCE LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I have a question for the leader of the house. In view of the absence today of the Minister of National Defence will the hon. gentleman consider asking the house to proceed with some other legislation so we can make some headway with the items on the order paper before proceeding with the defence amendments when the minister returns?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker. The very competent Associate Minister of National Defence—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: —will pilot the bill through the committee stage, and we are very hopeful that we can get forward with our consideration of this important measure so it can go to the other place for discussion and receive royal assent, and we can get on to the new session of parliament.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Who will be present to pilot the bill tomorrow, when the Associate Minister of National Defence is on his way to Vimy?

Mr. McIlraith: Though I have tried to keep the house well informed, I find it is best in this responsible position as house leader to go just from day to day.

Mr. Starr: Hour to hour.

Mr. McIlraith: The Minister of National Defence will be here tomorrow to pilot this bill through the house if it is still before us. It might go through tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: If it is not finished tonight I am sure we can arrange to have the minister available whenever the house is ready to proceed with the bill tomorrow.

Mr. Churchill: In order to expedite the passage of the bill will the house leader speak to his colleagues, such as the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and ask them not to make provocative speeches while the matter is being considered?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, I will be very glad to deal with that.

Mr. Ricard: You are about to make one yourself now.

Mr. McIlraith: The speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday was a very fine one, and I would hope hon. members opposite would raise the level of their discussion to the same high calibre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The hon. gentleman spoke of operating on a day to day basis. Would he consider the day and night operation of the house and tell us who will be piloting this bill tonight in view of the fact that the associate minister is required to be at Uplands airport by 8.30 this evening?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONSULTATION RESPECTING RELOCATION OF CERTAIN FAMILIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with reference to the recently announced policy of transporting Indian families from isolated communities to locations of greater opportunity. Can the minister inform the house whether the people affected have been consulted and, if so, what has been the nature of the consultation?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): In all instances where plans have been approved consultation has taken place and agreement has been forthcoming.

INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Minister of Industry): Yesterday the hon. member for Oxford asked to what extent the Canada-United States automotive agreement might be responsible for an 11.4 per cent decrease in the Canadian automotive output during the first quarter of 1967.

The automotive program is not responsible for the reduction in Canadian production of motor vehicles. On the contrary, it may be that because of the safeguards contained in the program for Canadian producers their output has been maintained to a greater extent than has been possible in the United States. In the United States output has declined by 24 per cent during the first quarter of this year compared with the same period last year. The figure mentioned by the hon. member respecting the decline in Canada is less than half this amount and if anything indicates the success of the program in the face of a world-wide decline in demand.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR CONTINUATION OF BASEBALL BROADCASTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Has the hon. lady received complaints about the removal of the baseball game of the week from the C.B.C.'s plans for the coming baseball season. If so, would the minister ask that this decision be considered?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The Prime Minister and I, at least, are interested in this matter, so I think I will bring it up at ten o'clock.

AGRICULTURE

REMOVAL OF SUPPORT PRICE FOR MANUFACTURING MILK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lee Grills (Hastings South): I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Why was the support price of manufacturing milk shipped by whole milk shippers removed, thus reducing their price to a level below that of last year, at a time when we are importing butter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is argumentative.

Mr. Grills: If you heard the voices of the farmers as I do, Mr. Speaker, you would realize that this is an important matter.

Mr. Speaker: I am not suggesting it is not important. What I am suggesting to the hon. member is that the question cannot be asked at this time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF ALLOWANCES IN RELATION TO ANNUAL INCOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): My question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and I have sent him notice of it. Has the minister considered making a review of the allowances paid to those veterans who find themselves poorer than they were before the guaranteed annual income plan was put into effect?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I cannot, of course, accept the hon. member's premise that they are poorer. The reason some of these allowances will not be available to them is that their income is considerably above the permitted level. I think I have stated earlier that the level of income permitted to recipients of war veterans allowances is $145 a month, which is considerably more than the $105 contemplated under the guaranteed income plan. Therefore it is not the case that they are poorer.

They have all been advised to consult with their regional officers in deciding where their advantage lies, and the department will counsel them in order to make sure that the greatest advantage under either scheme is available to them.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIF FORCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening clause 2 was being considered.

On clause 2—Canadian forces, Canadian armed forces.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the associate minister a brief question. In view of the reference made by the house leader to the associate minister's capabilities, with which I agree, and also the implied suggestion by the house leader that there is a possibility this legislation might be passed tonight, are we correct in assuming it is the intention of the associate minister to introduce this afternoon some important amendments to the legislation which would make it acceptable to the country or, alternatively, that he is prepared to withdraw it entirely for the time being?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I must advise the hon. member that I have no useful suggestion to give to him in that regard. I believe the bill which is before the house now is the policy of the government. This is the way we see it and this is what we want to put through with the co-operation of hon. members.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman—

[English]

The Chairman: Order. I apologize for interrupting the minister but there seems to be a little more noise than usual in the committee. Perhaps those who have conversations to carry on might do so outside the curtains so that we may hear the comments of the minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, before launching into the remarks I intend to make on this bill, I should like to answer three questions put to me the other night by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire).

Here is the first. I see the hon. member is absent, but I think Hansard can convey my reply which he will, I am sure, find useful, and can have circulated. It concerned R.O.T.C. pilots who, according to him, would have signed three-year contracts with the government. He accused the Department of National Defence of breaking those contracts unilaterally.

Further to a written request from the hon. member for Lapointe, we gave a reply to the effect that the matter is now under consideration as a result of a new ruling for pilots with a permanent commission. This ruling stipulates compulsory service for five years. As there is no contract but rather what is called a gentleman's agreement between the Department of National Defence and R.O.T.C. pilots, we have withheld a decision to give us time to study the matter. We hope to be in a position to announce our decision in the near future.

The second question concerned the briefs prepared by Mr. Marcel Chaput when he worked for the Defence Research Council. I must say to the hon. member for Lapointe that those reports were brought to the attention of the commission of inquiry on bilingualism and biculturalism but that the latter did not deem it useful to ask us for copies of them.

In the third place, the hon. member for Lapointe asked me a question concerning the use of the French language on Canadian military bases. I must remind him that, on all Canadian bases, administrative and supplementary orders are issued in both languages. Therefore, there is no reason to conclude to any discrimination and the incident he referred to the other night is, if anything, an unfortunate exception.

Mr. Chairman, I should now like to summarize, as succinctly as possible, the position I believe hon. members should take with regard to the issue now before us.

Mr. Chairman, despite the fact that we have been considering this matter quite sporadically for almost five months, I have a feeling that we have not made much progress and that perhaps we are carrying on what I would call a debate by proxy.

It is useful and possibly even essential to have the views expressed before the committee on national defence, in the newspapers and through other media. However, it seems to me that we must be careful not to pose as the spokesmen of the officers now retired or in the armed forces and continue on their behalf, so to speak, a debate which will not settle the matter because those officers have taken a position which will surely not change.

Our problem is not to speak for them but to form our own opinion and to reach our own decision.

Mr. Chairman, I am not saying that such evidence is useless; on the contrary, I feel that we must get the gist of it, weigh it, make up our own minds and reach our own decision.

Besides, it is obvious, as shown last night by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso), that some of the evidence, even on the same side, was contradictory and that the same witness managed at times to contradict himself.

Therefore, I would not want us to revert to our starting point and, in addition, to introduce further controversial subjects in the discussion concerning the unification of armed forces. I know that all hon. members who express their views in the house are quite sincere, but I believe there comes a time in a democracy when a consensus must be reached through a vote.

In my opinion, new factors have been introduced in the discussion when reference was made, for instance, to roles or missions. Some people say they are unable to make a decision on such a matter until the roles or missions of the proposed force have been determined.

It would be wonderful indeed, Mr. Chairman, if we could have an instantaneous foreign policy which could be changed from day to day and adapted to our desire to see our country play the role which we believe it is destined to play. But it seems to me that we should believe in our armed forces, in their ability to adapt themselves to these operations or roles which may change eventually.

Having been privileged to work closely with the armed forces in the past two years, I am surprised and even astonished to discover what a store-house of extraordinary talents they are. Let me give as an example the military tattoo.

This is a theatrical performance which is being taken round the country and which I consider to be extraordinary; it was staged entirely by the services. We managed to find in the armed forces people with theatrical experience who were able to produce from scratch a really extraordinary show. All this in my opinion shows the versatility of the officers and soldiers of the Canadian army.

I am also thinking of the contribution to Expo '67 in Montreal, which I find exceptional, made by an officer in the Canadian army, I am referring to Colonel Churchill. His contribution to Expo proved once again that the armed forces are a potential supply of competence. Therefore, when one thinks that the armed forces would be unable to face their role, if changed, one makes an error of judgment.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, to speak very briefly at this stage. I sincerely think that now is the time to determine where we stand and I apologize if, by saying this, I am repetitious. I classified into four groups the circumstances in which we find ourselves:

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

First, as far as I can see there is nothing that can be added in the way of evidence, facts or figures which has not already been stated. It seems to me that all of the evidence has been given by the minister in the white paper, in his remarks on second reading and by the minister and the military staff before the standing committee. Second, on the other side of the coin those who oppose the concept of unification have been offered every opportunity to make known their views before the committee and through the news media. Third, we have arrived at a crucial point in our deliberations. We can either waste time and go back over the same evidence and testimony again and again with no further progress in sight or, based on all the evidence we have received, we can begin to concentrate on the clauses of the bill now before us.

Mr. Nugent: Would the minister permit a question? When he says those who are opposed have had a full opportunity to express their views through the news media, does he have in mind any means by which those who are on retirement leave and not yet released from the forces could express their views through the news media, since it would be against the law for them to do so?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I said they had every opportunity to make known their views before the committee and through the news media.

Fourth, I believe it was the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek who alluded to the fact that most of us have come to some conclusion regarding the merits of this bill. I for one have listened with great interest to all the evidence presented to the standing committee and it seems to me that the reasons this debate is beginning to become repetitious fall within basic areas. What are those basic areas? What is unification? The minister in tabling the white paper said:

> Following the most careful and thoughtful consideration, the government has decided that there is only one adequate solution. It is the integration of the armed forces of Canada under a single chief of defence staff and a single defence staff. This will be the first step toward a single unified defence force for Canada.

On May 28, 1964 the minister said:

> So far as the ultimate objective is concerned, this has been clearly stated in the white paper, and I think this is a fair recognition that this is the first step towards a single unified force for Canada.

That was on second reading of the bill. On December 7, 1966, he again devoted many words in explanation of the single service concept. Again on February 7, 1967, at page 440 of the committee proceedings he said:

> —a single integrated service encompassing the naval, land, air and support units necessary to carry out its assigned roles and missions and operating under unified management and control.

Here then are four explanations voiced in different words but all meaning the same thing—a single Canadian armed forces rather than three individual services, the army, navy and air force. If there needs to be any further explanation it is set out in clause 2 of the present bill which says:

> The Canadian forces are the armed forces of Her Majesty raised by Canada and consist of one service called the Canadian Armed Forces.

Therefore I am satisfied that the goal of one service has been clearly stated and I am sure that all hon. members opposite are fully aware, as I am, that this remains and has been the basic goal ever since it was first announced in the white paper.

What is the purpose of one service rather than three? Like the definition, the purpose has been explained many times before, in the white paper, at various committee hearings, in the minister's comprehensive speech on second reading and on many other occasions. As a matter of fact, there have been so many reasons given for one service I am afraid we are concentrating on each rather than on the raison d'être itself.

Essentially, as I see it, this can be stated in the following way. All of the members of our Canadian forces, whether combat or support, whether they are in the army, navy, or air force, have one common purpose in respect of which these people can be identified. That is the defence of Canada. Traditionally it has been assumed that to carry out this purpose they must be grouped into three services, one representing the land forces, one representing the sea forces and one representing the air forces.

I can recognize that the overlapping of areas of responsibilities and weapons technology has created grey areas which can no longer be served by the traditional three service concept. We have tried to do something about that. Bill C-90 was the first legislative step required to begin the implementation of a program that would enable us to operate our forces in light of this overlapping of responsibilities by establishing (a) a single chief of defence staff and (b) a single defence staff. The single defence staff was created on a functional basis, that is, personnel, operations, technical services and comptroller general. At the next level commands were reorganized to carry out the following functions: air transport, training, materiel, air defence, maritime and mobile. At the next level the bases were also reorganized along functional lines: transport, operations, administration and supply.

From July, 1964, to the present we have been integrating our forces to carry out these functions. But because the function—not each individual service—forms the basic criteria for our reorganization, the continuation of a rigid three-service system hinders the full development—

Mr. Nugent: Ah.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): —and the full benefits that could be gained by a single force.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, would the minister answer one question? Can he give me one instance of any evidence given to the committee as to how it hinders at all? Can he give me one word of such evidence given before the committee?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, I would ask my hon. friend to extend to me the courtesy which I extended to him. The hon. member has spoken many times in this debate and I never asked a question with a view to interrupting him.

Mr. Nugent: I am only seeking information, sir.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Much has been made of the fact that the navy does not have any officer to speak for the navy at defence council. In the functional system which the reorganization of the Canadian Armed Forces is bringing about, neither the navy, the army, nor the air force has specific representation at defence council. Instead, the chief of defence staff and the vice chief, together with the chief of technical services, the chief of personnel and the comptroller general as associate members, represent the Canadian Armed Forces. Whether they are army, navy or air force does not matter. They are members of the defence council who represent their functional responsibility and I insist on the word "functional".

Similarly, at the armed forces council there is no specific service representation. The commander of maritime command speaks not for the navy but for maritime command; the commander of training command speaks for his command and not the individual three services which combine to make up his command. Who, then, speaks for the navy, the army, or the air force? The answer is no one, because the traditional three-service concept is redundant in a functional defence system. That is why at this stage in our progress it is necessary to remove the three-service concept and create a single unified force which can operate not as army, navy and air force but as officers and men in training command, in mobile command, in air transport command and in all the other commands or headquarters' functions.

Without going into all the reasons, which are already on the record, I have come to the conclusion that what Canada requires is a single defence force. As I said on February 1 in this house:

> This is the crux of the problem. From a single force containing land, sea and air elements, we must be in a position where we can detach the required portions necessary to fulfil a particular commitment. If the particular commitment requires a combination of land and sea elements, or land and tactical air elements, or just a land element we can provide this portion by detaching from the single force the strength and type of force required.

What may be difficult for my hon. friends opposite to understand is that even though there will be no army there will still be soldiers, even though there will be no navy there will still be sailors, and even though there will be no air force there will still be airmen.

Mr. Lambert: How will they know it?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Because they will perform the functions. In other words, there will continue to be those who fly aircraft, mariners and warriors. These men, together with those who support them, will not be grouped together in individual services but in one service, the Canadian Armed Forces.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I want to direct the attention of the committee toward a very important fact. For almost five months, in one way or another, there has been a debate on this bill. Either we will have a single unified force or we will not. What has become most upsetting during the past five months is that the service people do not know the outcome. They are most perturbed—

Mr. Lambert: Who brought it on?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): —that it has taken so long to decide their future course. I agree with them that to extend this period of uncertainty can do nothing but decrease their morale. Whatever period it takes to implement the plans toward the final goal of unification does not concern them. What they want is a decision yes or no. Do we proceed toward unification or not? I think that all the necessary evidence and testimony are now before us.

Mr. Lambert: God has spoken.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): But as General Eisenhower once said, "This is the place where the buck stops."

Mr. Churchill: It was Truman who said that.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am sure I speak for all servicemen when I say, let us get on with the decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I believe that the forces are convinced that the goal of unification is correct. They have been engaged in planning toward this goal in carefully measured steps. Parliament has been asked for the necessary permissive legislation to proceed along the reorganizational cycle. This is one of those steps. I for one cannot charge our forces with the responsibility of providing the best possible defence with the least expenditure and at the same time deny them the authority they require to carry out their task.

Mr. Lambert: Oh.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Some people say —and the hon. member is one of them—"All right, we accept integration, but let us stop there; let us pause." To me this is not possible. You cannot have integration without unification.

Mr. Lambert: Oh, that is nonsense.

[Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne).]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): And I will say that you also have to have it now.

Mr. Churchill: Prove your point.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Allow me to sum up again, Mr. Chairman. Integration established one chief of staff and from that point a single chain of management and command. Because the forces include sailors, soldiers and airmen, and as far as one can see into the future will continue to do so, many have difficulty understanding why we should not continue to have a Royal Canadian Navy, a Canadian Army and a Royal Canadian Air Force. These have been replaced as organizational structures by a single, integrated structure. As a consequence it has now become increasingly difficult to manage personnel on the three-service system, virtually impossible and certainly meaningless to manage finances on that system and, more important, to determine roles and policies on the basis of a three-service division.

All unification is doing is tailoring the cloth to the developing new organization. The inconsistency between the three-services organization and the present organization causes the shoe to pinch more and more and the point will be reached when the lines of distinction which should be maintained in a three-service organization can no longer be maintained because there will be no sensible way of drawing these lines in the single organizational structure that has now been developed. The only way to overcome this difficulty is to remove the requirement established by law to maintain three services. After this authority has been granted, there will be a great deal of work to be done in terms of amending existing regulations and instructions and it will therefore be some time before the single service can be put into effect.

It is important that this legislation be passed as soon as possible and any lengthy delay would set the stage for a very difficult situation—I believe an unmanageable situation—in the not too distant future. This is not only the course of common sense to enable the orderly progress of the reorganization that was commenced with the legislation that was passed to establish a single chief of staff in 1964 to continue, but it is the only course that will do for our servicemen what they have the right to expect, that is, to establish the fundamental legislative direction and authority to govern the inevitable transition into a single service.

At the risk of confusing what I hope has been a simple explanation of the problem, may I add that there will be no difficulty in identifying soldiers, sailors and airmen in the fighting units. It is normal and healthy to expect men in a particular fighting environment to identify with it in some distinguishable way. There is nothing inconsistent in this with a single service. The difference between this and the present system is that it is now necessary to maintain throughout a division between navy, army and air services which is no longer sensible and will become increasingly unworkable.

In conclusion I should like to give a few figures in order to demonstrate that the defence expenditure situation has already been improved by integration. In the way of general background it is perhaps worth noting that the defence expenditures have not varied widely over the last ten years. As a result the proportion of Canada's resources devoted to defence has steadily declined. Expressed as a percentage of G.N.P. the expenditures of the defence department have dropped from about 6 per cent ten years ago to about the current level of 2.7 per cent. This expenditure policy has made it necessary to re-examine continuously defence activities, procurement policies and methods of organization and—operation to find the—economies necessary to offset rising costs. It should also be apparent under these circumstances that every program must be viewed in the light of the resources available and, in particular, its contribution to Canada's defence needs as against that which would result from directing all or part of the resources to other defence programs. For example, if one thinks of buying, on a one-for-one basis, modern warships to replace the 16 frigates that have been taken out of service, the $800 million or so capital cost plus the continuing operating costs must be considered in the light of what it displaces in the way of other forces.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the minister but the time allotted to him has expired. Does the house give unanimous consent for the minister to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I thank hon. members for their courtesy. I will not be too long. I have two more pages. This is the real nature of the decisions that have to be made so long as there are strict limits on defence expenditures, as there have been over the last decade.

When integration was commenced in 1964 we undertook to manage the defence budget within an escalation not exceeding 2 per cent a year although the actual escalation in salaries and other prices was considerably in excess of this. At the same time we undertook to divert a larger share of the defence budget to capital needs. In the three years, 1964, 1965 and 1966, since this program commenced, defence expenditures have been held within the original targets. Compared with the preceding three years, defence expenditures over this three-year period were reduced by $184 million if the actuarial adjustments to the pension accounts are omitted, and by $158 million if they are included. For comparative purposes it is preferable to omit the actuarial adjustments as the policy of current adjustments to the pension account did not apply throughout the period. By any standard of measurement this is a considerable reduction, particularly when it has been accomplished in the face of rising costs.

Mr. Lambert: Fifteen thousand fewer men.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am not trying to hide facts. By way of illustration of rising costs, per capita costs of military personnel were $5,082 per annum in 1961, the first year of the six-year period, and $6,514 in 1966. On the civil side the per capita costs rose during this period from $4,004 to $5,143 and in both cases the major portion of this rise took place in the last three years.

The average military strength in 1963 was 122,700 compared with 105,000 in 1966. The difference, at 1966 per capita rates, amounts to about $115 million per annum. I mention this only to emphasize the problem of coping with rising costs and the compelling need to improve continously our ways of doing the defence business to avoid large increases in the defence budget. We have not managed during this three-year period to meet our original targets for expenditures on equipment. Expenditures on naval equipment in the last three years have been higher than in the previous three years, $208.5 million against $194.4 million, and this has also been the case for army equipment, $120 million against $100.8 million. On the other hand, expenditure on air force equipment have been substantially less. $289.4 million against $507.1 million. The main reason for this is that expenditures in the earlier three year period included $308.2 million for the CF-104 aircraft and there has been no aircraft program in the last three years requiring such a large expenditure. The figures I have used will no doubt vary somewhat when the final 1966 figures are in, but not significantly.

It seems to me, then, that the conclusion is clear. Defence expenditures have been reduced, and quite substantially. While equipment expenditures have not been increased as much as we had hoped, they have been increased in the areas where equipment shortages were most acute. As the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said yesterday, Mr. Chairman, this is my case.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Nesbitt: Having heard the remarks just made by the associate minister, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I agree, at least in part, with some of the comments he has made. He stated that the basic questions with which we are faced in this committee are, what is unification and what is its purpose. The associate minister then went on to give his interpretation and his views of unification as well as its purpose. I must say that his observations would seem to be of a rather individual character.

There is one other matter upon which I should like to comment before I get around to the point of examining what unification is and what its purpose is, and that is who developed this plan. This question has been asked on a number of occasions, and I think it is important for the members of the house to know who the author of this plan was. We do not see it being carried out in other countries which are great military powers. We do not see it being carried out in Great Britain. We do not see it being carried out in the United States, France, West Germany or the Soviet Union. Consequently one cannot help but wonder whence comes the idea.

Clearly the idea did not come from the senior officers of the three armed services in view of the large number of retirements, resignations and outright firings that have taken place in that group, somewhat over 40 in all. It clearly did not come from there. In the defence committee General Moncel gave evidence he had prepared four papers on the subject of unification for the minister, but General Moncel was not satisfied with any of them. The minister accepted one of those papers on unification which General Moncel considered was the poorest of the four. I believe this whole question of where this plan comes from is one of the most important questions. Military matters are highly technical and require a great deal of expertise and experience. For these reasons I believe we are entitled to know who thought up this plan. Why is it being pursued now when no other country is pursuing it?

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affaires intimated in his customary vague way that he hoped other countries would follow along. The evidence we heard in the committee did not seem to give the slightest indication that any other country was going to do the same thing. It has been stated by the minister and some of his colleagues that the civilian authority must always control the military authority. I believe every one of us would accept that point of view. The only point is that when we are dealing with a highly technical matter such as defence, upon which the whole safety of the country depends, plans which radically change our defence structure should be developed by people who know what they are doing.

We have had no evidence as to where this plan comes from. Indications are that it would seem to come from the minister himself. Perhaps the plan was originated in the cabinet, but we do not know. We would like to know where it comes from. If the plan did originate in the cabinet, the only person who would seem to have any qualifications with regard to military matters would be the Minister of Defence Production who had some senior military experience. There is no one else.

Was this plan thought up by the minister's adviser, Mr. Lee, to whom reference has been made so often? Apparently it has been said that many of the officers and others who are left in the armed services now agree with the plan. Of course, this is probably true because the minister has made it clear that anyone who does not agree with him does not stay in the forces. I would hardly expect any other point of view from the officers who are left. This is one question I would hope the Associate Minister of National Defence might answer before he leaves for Europe this afternoon or perhaps the minister will answer when he returns from his conference in Washington.

I think we are entitled to know who thought up this plan and why it is being pursued, particularly in view of the fact other countries are not pursuing it. There is no evidence that they are going to do so. Most of the senior officers have not recommended it and indeed have spoken against it, with the exception of those who are left in the armed forces. Of course, they are in a rather captive position.

I should like to make one brief quotation from a letter which was reportedly written by Lord Mountbatten to the chairman of the defence committee. The letter appeared in the Ottawa Journal last evening and I should like to quote from the article in that newspaper:

> He described himself as "an ardent advocate of unified command and integrated administration of the services."
> But he wrote: 'Unified command at the appropriate level is exercised by an officer from any one service, wearing his own uniform and using his own service rank assisted by an integrated staff who commands all units of the three services placed under his command.
> I firmly believe that the steps taken in the recent reorganization of the British services are on the right line.
> In the British organization care has been taken to preserve esprit de corps and morale and those traditions which help to maintain this in the services and fighting units.
> It has been accepted that to achieve this the three services must retain their uniforms and ranks with an identifiable professional head of their service. The idea of a single uniform and rank structure was also rejected as undesirable and unnecessary."
> The letter continues:
> "The general cut and colour of naval uniforms are internationally so well known that a sailor from any one country can readily be recognized as a sailor in any other country."

These are the views of Lord Mountbatten and they have been promoted by those in favour of unification as an indication that Lord Mountbatten is in favour of unification as envisaged by the government, which he clearly is not.

• (4:10 p.m.)

The next question, to which I hope an answer will be forthcoming sooner or later, is: What is unification? A few moments ago the associate minister attempted to give an explanation. I am glad it is very clear to him because it certainly does not appear to be clear to anybody else, including the former chief of staff who retired only last summer.

I should like to refer to page 2312 of the minutes of evidence of the defence committee, where Air Chief Marshal Miller made the following statement:

> I did not know, and I do not know now, the whole answer, all the proposals for unification.

If the chief of staff did not know, then I cannot understand how the associate minister, let alone any of us, knows what it is either.

In this regard I should like to refer to a newspaper which is generally considered one of Canada's leading and most thoughtful—the Globe and Mail. The March 22 issue carried an editorial entitled "An Unseemly Rush To What?" The following is an extract from the editorial:

> It remains too big a pig-in-a-poke for any parliament to ask Canada to buy, and the commons defence committee, for all its questioning, has not been able to trace out its shape. What is needed is a complete re-examination of the whole defence apparatus, and of the job it is intended to do.

I hope that on another occasion during this debate the associate minister, or the minister himself when he returns, will attempt to give the committee a more lucid explanation of what unification is. As I say, if the former chief of staff was not aware what it was and most of the other senior officers, according to the evidence they gave, did not know or only knew partly what it involved, how can laymen such as the members of this house know?

I now come to the purpose of unification, Mr. Chairman, and certainly this is the $64,000 question. There seems to have been a great deal of difference in the viewpoint not only of members of the house but also of members of the cabinet. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made an interesting but extraordinary speech yesterday which seems to be quite at variance with the evidence given by the present chief of staff, General Allard, as well as with the speech of the associate minister this afternoon. However, as usual the Secretary of State for External Affairs, whose speech I will deal with in detail in a moment, was very careful to make observations which may be taken both ways so that he is fairly well covered in that regard.

As to the purpose of this new unified force, as it is called, we were told by the minister, as well as by his colleagues both inside and outside the house, that one of the advantages of unification would be that it would be cheaper and more economic. That is certainly an important consideration, as everyone would agree.

This afternoon the associate minister gave us the most extraordinary set of statistics. It is often said that statistics can prove almost anything, which reminds me of the statistician who was six feet tall and drowned in a river with an average depth of two feet. The fact remains that we were told that unification would bring about economies and reduce defence costs.

A few moments ago the associate minister indicated that we would now be spending a smaller proportion of our gross national product on defence than was the case previously, that there would be economies. This is an interesting way of looking at the subject, but the fact remains that according to the defence estimates for the coming year, which the house will recall from previous discussion were compiled as if the bill had already been passed, defence expenditures this year are some $115 million more than they were last year. One of my hon. friends on the government side of the house has indicated that we are certainly going to save money with unification.

Mr. Matheson: That is right.

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member for Leeds says that that is right. It may be true, but I would suggest it is a strange way to try to convince the public we are going to save a lot of money and reduce expenses by unifying the forces when we have no way of proving this. The only thing we do know for certain is that it will cost over $100 million a year more to start with, though some of the evidence given in the defence committee indicated that it will cost even more. Although I realize that expenditure is important, it is not of prime importance when we are dealing with matters which affect the future safety of this country. In such case cost itself is not an overriding consideration.

The next question is: What is this unified force going to do? There seems to be a great difference of opinion on this score. Since defence is interrelated very closely with foreign affairs and foreign policy, as everyone agrees, we have to look to foreign policy to see how we should design our defence forces.

Yesterday afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs made a very long and interesting speech on foreign affairs and he reiterated Canada's foreign policy. I listened very carefully to the minister's speech and I reread it this morning. There is nothing in his speech vis-à-vis foreign policy with which I disagree. I thoroughly agree with his enunciation of our foreign policy. However, toward the end of his speech the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated—words to this effect are to be found at other places in his speech—as reported at page 14567 of yesterday's Hansard:

> That is the unified force.
> —will be capable of performing the same variety of roles required now by our foreign policy commitments and, in my view, performing them much more effectively.

I am glad to hear that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is so well assured in that regard, because he did not give one shred of evidence to support his view to this effect. Indeed, just the opposite: he admitted the increasing danger of nuclear submarines sent out to sea by the Soviet Union.

Our naval capabilities are now less than they were but the minister failed to explain why we are unable to man some of our ships. The new ones supposed to be laid down have not been laid down. How can we carry out our defence commitments vis-à-vis the navy in view of the increasing submarine danger? The minister had some sort of answer to this, and as reported at the bottom of page 14563 he said:

> In addition to the bomber and the I.C.B.M. threat there is a growing threat to this continent, which obviously we cannot ignore, from submarines. This was pointed out by the hon. gentleman who spoke a few moments ago. In answer to what he said I would point out that we are co-operating with the United States to meet this threat, not only as a matter of continental defence but also within the NATO framework.

As he frequently does, the Secretary of State for External Affairs got around this particular argument in a nebulous way by saying that we are working in co-operation with our allies. I think it is clear, since our naval forces do not now have the capability they had several years ago, that our allies, particularly the United States, are taking over this function to an increasing degree.

I now wish to ask a question bearing on our improved military capability. The Secretary of State for External Affairs told us yesterday that in his opinion he was sure it would improve. I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs this question, and I am sure it will be referred to him by others. Has he ever discussed this matter with Air Chief Marshal Miller or with General Allard? Certainly the Prime Minister did not discuss it with Air Chief Marshal Miller and if the Secretary of State for External Affairs did so I should like to know.

In any event, referring again to the testimony of the former chief of staff who retired last summer I point out that he said he saw no significant financial or military advantage in unification over integration. Are we to ignore the expertise of the chief of staff appointed by the present Minister of National Defence, are we to ignore Air Chief Marshal Miller's great knowledge and accept statements of laymen in this matter such as the Secretary of State for External Affairs, admittedly a layman, or the Minister of National Defence? If the air chief marshal said there was no financial or military advantage in unification, why are we doing it? I should like to know. The associate minister seems quite sure in his own mind; he is satisfied with this measure. I am not, and I think many other hon. members are not satisfied.

For the past few months it has been strongly hinted that the purpose of this new force is really to perform only some sort of peacekeeping operation on behalf of the United Nations. In some remarks I made on January 31 last I quoted from an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen last year—I do not want to take the time of the committee to quote it again—pointing this out. As hon. members know, the Ottawa Citizen is generally considered by most people to be the leading spokesman for the government, for various reasons. If the Ottawa Citizen said this I do not see how we can very well ignore it. Other newspapers have said this, including the Globe and Mail, which until recently had a pipe line to government intentions. That pipe line seems to have been ruptured within the last few days. In an editorial of March 22 last, to which I have already referred, the Globe and Mail said:

> A Defence Department that is creating a unified force which could not deal with these present commitments anyway and which seems wholly designed to undertake international peace-keeping interventions which the world has not asked Canada to undertake and which Canada's External Affairs Department has not said that Canada will undertake.

This makes the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday very interesting because he made it very clear, which is saying something, that Canada's basic commitments were for the defence of Canada through collective agreements, including the defence of our coastal waterways, that we are still keeping our commitments to NATO, NORAD and the rest, and that we would like to be able to meet requests from the United Nations. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made it clear that our international commitments as outlined by him had not changed. Then why are there these other suggestions?

In this regard I think the most important observation comes from the present chief of staff, General Allard, who made the following statement when testifying before the defence committee:

> —Canada now wants—while remaining faithful to its existing commitments—to decide itself on the part it wishes to play in the new international society—this is not only its right—it is also its duty. It is its duty to participate, to the best of its ability—in keeping the peace by supporting the organization which has made itself the champion of the smaller nations—the United Nations Organization.
> In short, that is the transformation proposed by the white paper. That is what we are trying to do. My duty is to organize the military forces in accordance with government policy.

That statement, perfectly simple, perfectly straightforward, is completely at variance with the statement of intention made yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. With conflicting evidence as to the purpose of the force, what are we in this house to do? Where are we going? What is this for?

General Allard, the chief of staff, says one thing. The Ottawa Citizen and the Globe and Mail agree with him. The Secretary of State for External Affairs says another thing. In fact, he refuted strongly the idea that Canada should take up only a peace-keeping role, implying that that was a cloud nine idea and thereby taking a slight crack at his friends in the New Democratic Party who do not think it is a cloud nine idea.

Mr. Knowles: What is wrong with cloud nine?

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asks what is wrong with cloud nine. Cloud nine is usually described as something nebulous that has a habit of dissolving when strong light is shed on it. It is something that is not very substantial.

It seems that there is much difference of opinion about the purpose of this force. Is it to be solely for United Nations peace-keeping or will it be used for our regular commitments? If it is for our regular commitments I point out that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has suggested how we can integrate this force with the forces of our NATO allies in Germany, in NORAD and the like. Evidence given before the defence committee showed that integrating this new force with the existing forces of our allies is like trying to mix oil and water. It will not work. So I ask, what is all this for? I think we are entitled to a much better explanation than we have had to date about this matter. It is very disturbing indeed.

If the force is to be used only for peacekeeping purposes and we let the United States look after the defence of North America completely, where does that leave us? Will we end up with this country being partially occupied by United States forces? Is that in accordance with present day Canadian nationalism? I think not. If we become nothing but a military province of the United States, this lovely peace-keeping force we are arranging would never be used. The United Nations would never dare to use it because it would be thought that it was some sort of quasi-United States or United States influenced organization. We would be in the position, as the right hon. Leader of the Opposition said, of being all dressed up and having no place to go.

We need a great deal more clarification of some of these matters before this bill is decided. The associate minister has told us this issue must be decided quickly before any more questions are asked. Well, some fundamental and basic questions have not yet been answered and I think it is up to the government to give us the information required. Otherwise the only conclusion reasonable people can draw is either that the government is attempting to deceive this house and the public as to the real reasons for unification or, as is so often the case, the government does not know where it is going. In an apparent attempt to contribute to cabinet solidarity the Secretary of State for External Affairs told us yesterday that he thoroughly believes this unifying force will enable us to meet our present commitments more efficiently. He expressed this view even though the evidence of all those who possess expertise on the subject is to the contrary. We should like some clarification of these matters and I hope it will be forthcoming before the present debate is terminated.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Oxford has indicated that before clause 2 passes a lot more clarification is needed. The note I would stress in the course of my few remarks this afternoon is: "Let us get on with it." I refer to an editorial under that title written by service people in the publication Voxair which is put out by the Canadian forces base at Winnipeg. It begins:

> The integration process began two years ago and that, to the rank and file, seems a long time.

I would point out that this editorial was written on August 19, 1966. It says that servicemen find it hard to understand the reason for the slow rate of progress, and goes on:

> More difficult to comprehend is the opinion, often expressed in the recent controversy, that the integration process is too fast...

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

> Most proponents of the "too fast" idea appear to be those who were against integration in the first place and who believed that integration and unification would not become a reality. When it now appears that it will, the natural reaction for anyone resisting change must be to attempt to delay the change.

Later in this editorial, which is in strong terms, the editor writes:

> Integration appears slow to those in the field. This should make a good argument for speeding up the process as much as possible. Any change of the magnitude of the one undertaken is difficult and sometimes painful, but the quicker we complete the change, the less painful it is going to be. If, on the other hand, the phase of change is allowed to go on ad infinitum we can be certain that morale will be adversely affected.

The concluding words of the editorial which, as I say, was written on August 19, 1966, are:

> It was known before the start that this was a difficult undertaking, but the over-all gains clearly justified the decision to go ahead. Now, in the middle of the changeover, let's not procrastinate for reasons of doubtful validity, but let's get on with it.

Mr. Churchill: Who is the author?

Mr. Matheson: The author is a wing commander.

Mr. Churchill: Has he been promoted?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Matheson: I am not going to answer what I think is a contemptuous remark with respect to a senior serving officer.

Mr. Churchill: It was not contemptuous.

Mr. Matheson: These officers have the right to express their judgment through their own proper channels.

As to the provision of information, I believe that commencing with this administration there has been more clarification of issues involving the ministry of defence than has ever been the case in Canada's history. I do not believe there has ever been a statement on the subject of defence as exhaustive, as fair and as detailed as was given to the Canadian public by the present Minister of National Defence in the course of his lengthy statement of December 7 last.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member accept another question?

Mr. Matheson: I will be happy to receive questions at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Churchill: Oh, I don't know that I can sit here that long listening to the hon. member.

Mr. Matheson: Perhaps not, but I have sat patiently through speeches made by the hon. gentleman, and this might be a good point at which to tell him that his comments last evening reminded me of the venerable character who was resolved to treasure and preserve all the institutions and habits of the past and not inclined to take even a brief look at the present. I think the time has come when we in Canada should be prepared to examine searchingly and conscientiously criticize all the institutions and conventions of the present in anticipation of the challenges and opportunities of the future.

Mr. Churchill: Did the hon. member say I was venerable? Is he making fun of me because I am older than he is? Does he not respect age?

Mr. Matheson: I think that no one travelling in a bomber across the ocean could hope for a more delightful travelling companion than the hon. member. I wish we could go together again soon.

My hon. friend referred yesterday to the events which took place at Vimy. When we reflect on what happened there half a century ago we think of the colossal wastage of human life that occurred there which, as at Verdun, destroyed a generation. We think of the Somme, of Passchendaele, of the tremendous loss of life which occurred in those battles and their lasting effect on Britain, France and the dominions.

I visited Vimy with some emotion because the name of one of the members of my own family is on the memorial there. Referring to the events of April 9, 1917, Gregory Clark had this to say, writing in Weekend Magazine of April 1:

> At 5.30 a.m., April 9, in a sleet and snow blizzard, the volcano of our artillery erupted.
> Behind the wall of fire we floundered up the ruined and filthy slope.
> We took the Ridge. In the next three days we went 4,500 yards, took 4,000 prisoners, 54 cannon, 104 trench mortars, 124 machine guns.
> We lost 3,598 killed and more than 7,000 wounded.

The author concludes: "Symbols are costly".

I have visited many of the battlefields of Europe and several in Asia. I really do believe that progress in military expertise, in tactics and in strategy has been phenomenal. I was with Colonel Fane, if I may call him that, going over some of the ground of the first world war, and I like to believe that there has been definite progress in the arts of war designed to reduce human slaughter and yet to accomplish those things which are intended to preserve peace and liberty.

In this regard I would call attention to some things which were said by General Worthington. "Worthy" was assistant adjutant and quartermaster general at national defence headquarters. A dynamic personality in every appointment, he became the revered and gallant commander of the 4th Armoured Division in 1942 and commander in chief of the Pacific command in 1945. Just think of some of the personalities with whom he was associated—men like Admiral Halsey and others of that calibre who were among the most outstanding military leaders of that decade. General Worthington showed his imagination and his managerial talents as coordinator of civil defence for Canada in the years from 1948 to 1957. Some of the things this great Canadian did in those years in a field which was of little interest to most people showed how truly knowledgeable he was.

I feel it would be useful at this point to refer to an article written by General Worthington under the heading "Reorganization Of The Armed Forces Long Overdue". This appeared in the Ottawa Journal of Tuesday, April 4, 1967. The general said:

> In February and March the parliamentary defence committee sat for six weeks hearing 23 high-level military "experts" on the integration and unification of Canada's armed forces.
> The testimony of most of these experts had a disturbingly familiar theme: What was good enough for the last war will be good enough for the next.
> As one of Canada's oldest generals it is my opinion that at the end of any large war the existing generals should be thanked, decorated and pensioned off.
> Put up statues, if you like, but don't let the old brigade meddle with the future organization of the services. Hand that responsibility over to the young, fighting colonels who had to fight the war with the existing weapons.
> Almost invariably the senior commanders plan with their heads looking over their shoulders back to the time when they were young and trained on equipment and tactics of that day.

General Worthington warns us of the peril at this time of thinking backward which could result in annihilation. He says:

> I believe the present reorganization of our armed forces is long overdue. It indicates up-to-date planning and foresight as opposed to prejudice, obsolescence and nostalgia.

He points out that Canada's military personnel could be wiped out in a single battle. I consider that significant because when we look at the statistics of Canada's defence effort we notice that currently we are spending approximately $1.6 billion. I feel that the Associate Minister of National Defence only started to put on the record the broad line of economies which have been effected. There could have been several speeches on this aspect alone had it been felt desirable to make them.

Had we never intended to change or modernize anything but merely replace the proper modern materiel for our existing establishments, this alone would cost many hundreds of millions of dollars. I believe I am correct in saying that the utilization for defence purposes of only 2.7 per cent of the gross national product of a country such as Canada places us in the category of being the third lowest contributor to the NATO alliance. Countries such as the United States, which comparatively have an immensely larger gross national product, are making much higher contributions. The point is that we in Canada are not making large contributions on the basis of our wealth and general economic strength. In terms of people we actually have a little over 100,000 men, sailors, soldiers and airmen, and this very fact alone at this time happens to be most helpful to us in the engineering of new processes, of new experimentation and in the pragmatic effort of bringing into being a concept which has been anticipated in every serious military school in the world, in the Soviet, in the United States, and all through Europe.

General Worthington said:

> Any suggestion that we provide defence for Canada alone is a ludicrous myth.

We are not in the stand on guard era any more with regard to Canada against an American enemy. If that is our thinking, then we should do it with splendour and simply multiply the kind of exercise performed at Fort Frontenac where we have ceremonials which I watch each year. They are decorative but neither practical nor very real.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs made an important contribution to the debate when he reminded us that our defence responsibilities are in the new collective sense and not in the isolationist or independent sense. I think he brought into proper balance our responsibility to NORAD, a contract that was entered into by the previous administration, and to NATO, which responsibility we assumed under the leadership of the late Louis St. Laurent, and to the United Nations.

[Mr. Matheson.]

General Worthington continues by saying:

> But Canada can produce a new, compact, efficient and integrated force to meet the challenges of the future. This force would be a highly skilled fighting machine, mobile and flexible, with an understanding of land, sea and air combat.

When we discuss mobility I am reminded of General Macklin who some people characterize as the author of mobility. I think it a fact that when we sent a mobile force to Suez some years go we had to dismantle our one capital ship in order to put our so called mobile force ashore. This is incredible. I believe that if Canadians generally could have sat in on some of the hearings of the national defence committee, especially when we were privileged to visit mobile command—at that time as I recall it was under the command of General Allard—they would have been impressed with the step-up that has been achieved in communications.

It would almost seem that many of the military concepts which were familiar to people as recently as the 1950's now tend to be somewhat obsolete. We are moving at a rapid pace. Frankly, I was impressed with certain parts of the evidence given by Air Chief Marshal Miller. I thought he was right when he spoke in terms of the pragmatic effort in what we are doing and the fact that this never can be achieved overnight. The Minister of National Defence has made this point more than once. This is something which never will be finalized. Certainly it will take a period of years to bring about a high degree of perfection. I believe at one point he suggested it might be something like seven years before unification can be finalized. Air Chief Marshal Miller stressed the fact, which was emphasized by the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday, that the interrelationship between defence policy and foreign policy is like the chicken and the egg in that defence policy really carries out or supports foreign policy.

If I wished to be frivolous I could pull out a quotation of Mao Tse-tung to almost the same effect, except that he considers war to be an extension of politics. I like to think that we are doing it in the reverse and that basically what Canadians are concerned about is to develop a military policy to protect and enlarge peace.

In his remarks the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, I thought very appropriately, mentioned Somalia. Perhaps this is the best example of a potential danger area. Here we have Somalia occupying a strategic part of Africa. Berbera looks across the Gulf of Aden to the British base of Aden which once dominated these waters. Britain plans to pull out of Aden next year. Many of us have had discussions with people who know something about this situation. At the moment Russia is moving into Somalia and is providing 150 Mig fighter bombers and enough T-34 tanks for an armoured brigade. This is just a little country. Egypt and Algeria present special and disturbing problems, as well as Syria and Iraq.

This is a current topic in world news. It is a frightening commentary that little Syria can bring war to her neighbours, Lebanon and Jordan, and from this area to the world. Many military prophets have suggested it is from the Middle East that there could develop a conflagration. Looking at these disturbing patterns we see, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence have previously indicated, that Canada has an important role in these areas of operation. I do not like to call them policing operations but in some places that is what they are. However, in other areas these operations require as much valour and far more imagination than was demonstrated in the battles of Passchendaele. So I think we must venture into the future with courage and great imagination.

A few days ago I was in Jakarta and spent some time talking to friends who explained to me why Russian tanks were patrolling the streets. They told me that under President Sukarno that little country—perhaps I should not say little because it has a population of 110 million but it is little in the sense of wealth as we know it today—actually beggared itself to the extent of $2 billion for Russian armament. This presented a tremendous problem which happily has been resolved as a result of political developments.

If this House of Commons has the courage, and this proposal calls for a special form of courage and a certain quality of faith, we propose to venture into new concepts in the military field just as we have done in a variety of economic areas.

Just think, Mr. Chairman, of the imagination that was demonstrated in this country when the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National decided to institute the piggyback system. This disturbed many existing concepts. Think of the results in Canada from the coast to coast large scale suburban development and urban redevelopment when many of the old lines of demarcation and boundaries were struck out in the interests of people and real social objectives. In the words of Air Chief Marshal Miller, the only approach that could be taken was the pragmatic approach. But let us move decisively toward that objective. We are not sure just how it will be accomplished or how soon, but we must not box ourselves in by fixing rigid lines in every area.

Let us reflect on the difficulties of the Canada-United States auto treaty in respect of which we all share a burden of responsibility and pride in this parliament. We do not know where it is going to lead us exactly but we think it will lead to progress for Canadian workers and the Canadian people.

Let us consider the great contribution of Colonel Ed Churchill mentioned by the associate minister a few minutes ago with respect of Expo. The whole idea of Expo came from the previous administration. This was an adventure in faith. Many of us have gone down to Montreal by helicopter, by ship, or by car to look at St. Helens Island and we all remember what a mess it was just a few months ago and how hopeless the whole thing looked. Yet through co-operation on the part of various agencies of government, the private and public sectors of our economy, industry and labour with its various skills, together with the co-operation of many nations, this great international complex has come into being.

Let us think of what has happened in the whole area of communications. We have moved rapidly from the telephone and wireless to radio, to Telex, to television, and to Telstar. All the old boundaries and ideas had to be stripped away and replaced.

I have been told abroad that many countries are looking at our act of faith in respect of unification with increasing interest because they know our military purpose and that purpose is peace. In addition, for the very reason indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre the past performance of Canadians in stormy places like Vimy, Passchendaele and the Somme has proven that we do not intend to welsh out of our responsibilities. We are not trying to pull out of NATO or to get out of our responsibilities to the United Nations or to our good neighbour on this continent. Whatever we do in the military field our purpose is to preserve liberty and peace for all men. That is our approach and we are trying to carry out this obligation wisely and with imagination.

Let me repeat the plea of my distinguished colleague, the Associate Minister of National Defence, and the requests of servicemen over some considerable period of time: let us get on with the job together.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps I may be allowed to ask the hon. member a question. He mentioned that he was aware of many countries that are watching Canada's experiment with great interest. To which countries was he referring?

Mr. Matheson: Perhaps my friend, as I am sure he is, will permit me to give him this information privately. I think it would be evidence of very bad taste on my part to refer to private conversations that I have had with people here in Ottawa and abroad.

Mr. Nugent: With responsible people?

Mr. Matheson: With people who represent their countries.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Such as Taiwan?

Mr. Matheson: I was not referring to Taiwan and I will not mention people or countries if you do not mind.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps I could ask the associate minister a question. He gave the impression when he spoke so eloquently that he was very much interested in the passage of this bill with a certain amount of expedition. Will the minister be here in the house next week to assist us in our discussions on this bill? Will he be here to help us out?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Is that a fair question?

Mr. Fane: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting for quite a while to make a few remarks on this issue. Before commencing I should like to say I am happy to be able to commend the hon. member for Leeds who is one member on the government side who has made his own speech rather than read one prepared by a member of the staff of the minister or the associate minister.

I am pleased to know that the associate minister is going overseas as a representative of Canada at the fiftieth anniversary celebrations of the battle of Vimy Ridge. I wish he had left this morning before he read his speech because it was not entirely worthy of such a fine gentleman who has always been held in very high regard in this house.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): May I interrupt the hon. member and point out that I only read part of the speech?

Mr. Fane: Presumably the part you read was the part I did not like. I very much regret that because of previous commitments I am not able to accept the invitation of the Minister of Veterans Affairs to attend those celebrations. I happen to be one of the individuals described by the deputy minister in a letter written for the minister. The thought expressed in that letter is very nice in that it suggests that medical care should be provided for the 73 veterans who are being taken to Vimy Ridge to represent their battalions.

• (5:00 p.m.)

He felt that this extra precaution was necessary in view of the quite advanced age and rather frail health of many of those who will be making the trip. Of course this does not apply to me. Being one of the possibles, I would have liked to be there. I would have liked very much to have the opportunity to accompany the associate minister because I might have been able to discuss with him some things about defence and perhaps show him why it is that people like me, whose service in Canada's army was very long, although perhaps not as illustrious as some—

Mr. Matheson: You were decorated.

Mr. Fane: —are opposed to the total unification of Canada's armed forces. I am opposed to it not because I am a member of the opposition and not because I belong to the Conservative party; if I were a Liberal and on the government side of the house I would still oppose it because of my personal convictions.

I believe this attitude holds good for the members of this party. We do not go all out for the total unification of Canada's three armed services. We think it is a wrong step. We think it should not be made at this time. We believe that the process of integration of the senior echelons of the services is adequate at this time. That is a view I have held for almost 50 years. I do not think anybody can say that my views are political. Fifty years ago I was not very politically inclined even though I started voting when I was 18 years of age because I happened to be in the army at that time. I very strongly resent the statements made by some hon. members on the government side that the opposition to this bill is entirely for political reasons. I do not believe that is so. It amazes me more than I can tell you that 100 per cent of the Liberal members can vote for this bill. It is entirely beyond my understanding how they can support it.

I sometimes wonder from whom the minister is taking his orders. He is so extremely adamant in his support of his bill. We cannot change his mind at all. He will not listen to reason. He simply will not deviate one iota from the ideas that he set forth in the original draft of the bill. True, there have been a few small changes made, but they do not amount to very much. Many people are blaming the minister and only the minister. That is not the way I see it. The minister is merely the member of the government who is spearheading this legislation and trying to get the bill through parliament. He cannot do it without the support of every member of his party in the house and without the full support of the rest of the cabinet, including the Prime Minister. So, any blame that is placed on the minister must be placed equally on all the other ministers, the Prime Minister and every member of the Liberal party in the house.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Everyone?

Mr. Fane: Everyone. Nobody in that party voted against the bill at any time. I think it was the hon. member for Lambton West, who has just come into the chamber, who remarked that the committee did not assume political implications until the hon. member for Cape Breton South was made a member of the committee in my place. I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that from my observations the committee became political a long time before the hon. member for Cape Breton South was made a member of it. I had to give up my place on the committee not because I was too quiet or for any reason like that but because of commitments in other places which I had to carry out.

The biggest trouble this bill has encountered has resulted from its presentation by the minister. The minister has made statements which have had to be somewhat modified at times, but the first statement that got him into trouble was his explanation of unification. I should like to read the definition that the minister gave on December 7, 1966. He had said this before. I quote from page 37 of a copy of the speech the minister made in the house on December 7 last:

> Unification is the end objective of a logical and evolutionary progression.

What in the name of heaven does that mean? On page 59 of the same speech, the second paragraph, he made a statement which has probably got him into more trouble than his explanation of unification. He said:

> Although a unified personnel management system will be introduced, the separate units and elements of naval, field and air forces will continue to exist.

Now comes the important part:

> That is to say, while the barriers to movement of personnel between the forces will be removed, personnel in the combat forces will continue to be identified as sailors, soldiers and airmen until the force structure within the unified force is developed.

Isn't that a dandy?

• (5:10 p.m.)

> They will continue to be identified as sailors, soldiers and airmen until—

Note the "until"

> —the force structure within the unified force is developed.

A statement like that would get anybody into trouble. I wonder whether he read it before he made it in the House of Commons.

Those are the things that have caused trouble for this bill. In the defence committee on February 7 he changed his statements a little. I quote from page 440 of proceedings of the committee No. 14 where he said:

> When I refer to a unified force I refer to a single integrated service encompassing the naval, land, air and support units necessary to carry out its assigned roles and missions and operating under unified management and control.

What does that tell us? Not very much more. It makes one wonder just exactly what is going on in the mind of the government, in the mind of the Prime Minister and in the mind of the Minister of National Defence. Until today I have liked to think that the Associate Minister of National Defence was not quite in accord with everything that was going on. I had hopes for him. I would still have hopes for him if I were only able to go with him to Paris tomorrow as I had the opportunity of doing.

We have been briefed by a number of very able and noted former servicemen. We were briefed by a few who were still serving, such as Air Marshal Sharp, Air Marshal Reyno and Major General M. R. Dare, who is the deputy chief of reserves and a long time friend and associate of mine in whom I have great faith. We were also briefed by Brigadier Lawson, judge advocate general. A number of ex-officers who belong to the Tri-Service Identities Organization also appeared before us. We also had before us the chairman of the committee on the maritime component of the Canadian defence forces, the president of the Naval Officers Associations of Canada, Mr. Wilson, and the president and vice president of the Ontario division of the Navy League of Canada. We were briefed also by the president of the Toronto branch of the Naval Officers' Associations of Canada.

I will list the very senior and experienced officers who have seen very responsible service in the past and briefed members of the committee. They were headed by Rear Admiral Brock, Rear Admiral Dillon, Rear Admiral Landymore, General Foulkes, Mr. Patrick, Lieutenant General Moncel, Air Marshal Annis, Air Vice Marshal Hendrick, Lieutenant General Fleury, General Allard, who is still serving as the chief of the defence staff, Vice Admiral Rayner, Air Marshal Curtis, Lieutenant General Guy Simonds, and Air Chief Marshal Miller. The majority of these people who are not serving now were against the total unification of Canada's armed services. They have the same attitude that I have, and it is not because we are old fogeys or are living in the past. These men are mostly young men who have just been retired before completing their normal term of service.

There are a number of things that I simply cannot understand. For example, how in the name of heaven are the Canadian armed forces going to operate with one rank structure? It is difficult to imagine a lieutenant colonel commanding a ship or an admiral being a lieutenant general. It is not so difficult for the air force to conform to the new rank structure because before their present rank structure they had army ranks and army uniforms.

The provision of a single uniform for Canada's defence forces seems to me to be a little out of line. No less a person than Admiral Lord Louis Mountbatten said the same thing as reported first in the Victoria Colonist of April 4, I believe, and in the Ottawa Journal of April 5. Incidentally, his letter was written to and published by the brother of the former chairman of the defence committee. The article reads as follows:

> Lord Louis, in the letter to Commodore Groos, said he hoped to clarify previous statements. He described himself as "an ardent advocate of unified command and integrated administration of the services".

I agree with that. It continues:

> But he wrote: "Unified command at the appropriate level is exercised by an officer from any one service, wearing his own uniform and using his own service rank assisted by an integrated staff who commands all units of the three services placed under his command.
> I firmly believe that the steps taken in the recent reorganization of the British services are on the right line.
> In the British organization care has been taken to preserve esprit de corps and morale and those traditions which help to maintain this in the services and fighting units.
> It has been accepted that to achieve this the three services must retain their uniforms and ranks with an identifiable professional head of their service. The idea of a single uniform and rank structure was also rejected as undesirable and unnecessary."
> The letter continues:
> "The general cut and colour of naval uniforms are internationally so well known that a sailor from any one country can readily be recognized as a sailor in any other country.
> Sailors the world over take great pride in this and so in their own services do soldiers and airmen."

• (5:20 p.m.)

I subscribe to that view very strongly, as I have said at other times in this house. My time is going quickly, unfortunately, but I wonder what the minister is trying to do to Canada's armed services. I wish he were here today to listen to what I have to say about him, because it is what I believe and what I have been told many times back on the prairies where people are credited with not showing too much interest in this debate.

In Alberta, the people say, "This man Hellyer, what about him?" He was a corporal and we know the record concerning two other corporals who had ambitions. Corporal Bonaparte took the name of Napoleon and as a result of his ambition he ruined the flower of France's manhood at the time he was running the affairs of that country. He jumped from a corporal to a field marshal. We also have the recent example of Corporal Schicklgruber who took the name of Hitler. He ruined Germany. He jumped from a corporal to commander in chief of the forces and ruler of the nation.

Today we have ex-Corporal Hellyer who is trying to do the same thing but he is trying to do it legally by having this bill approved by parliament. At this time may I read a little item from B. H. Liddell Hart's book, "The Other Side Of The Hill." The author sets forth the views of some of the German people about their leader, Hitler.

> He (Hitler) would not believe what he did not want to believe.

Is there not a parallel there with our minister? The author states that General Jodl had come to the conclusion that a dictator, as a matter of psychological necessity, must never be reminded of his own errors in order to maintain his self-confidence, the ultimate source of his dictatorial force.

I should also like to quote a remark made by Grand Admiral Erich Raeder of the German navy in his book, "My Life." He said:

> To have a service ... dominated by an overburdened politician with no military accomplishments whatsoever, rankled.

I believe this statement describes our feeling toward the present Minister of National Defence. He is prone to making statements which he has to retract later. For example, he made the statement that Admiral Landymore, a gallant officer with a very notable war service, had been disloyal for 18 months before he was fired. If the minister found that this gallant officer was disloyal to Canada before he was fired he was very derelict in his duty in not having him courtmartialled and legally put out of his position rather than just thrown out because he did not agree with the minister's idea of unification of the armed forces. This goes for the 40 other noted, senior officers in the Canadian army, who were fired or forced to resign. The minister should show a great deal more respect for the advice of people who have served and unquestionably have the interests of Canada at heart.

[Translation]

Mr. Legault: Mr. Chairman, one of the remarkable things during this debate and during the proceedings of the committee was a constant uttering and re-uttering of hypothetical suggestions for and against the unification of the armed forces.

The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Andras) has indicated that reports in the press were superficial and not serious.

The in-depth study of the report by Mr. Westell in the Globe and Mail reveals contradictory statements in their testimony by witnesses opposed to this legislation. I was most surprised to hear, in the defence committee, an Air Marshal condemn the CF-105 and later admit that he knew nothing about that airplane except what he had heard from others.

I think it is useless to continue arguing back and forth since the interpretation of the government supporters and the opposition is repetitive and time consuming. I think we are in a position to determine here the precise difference in policy between Liberals and Conservatives. Here, in this legislation, is a practical reform measure which is fully adapted to change and which would bring about an efficient state of affairs according to our means and our capacities.

On the other hand, we have a negative opposition favouring the status quo and deeply concerned if not buried in the past.

Major General Worthington, in his article published in the Ottawa Journal on April 4, stressed that point most eloquently, as well as the fact that we have to face our responsibilities today and tomorrow.

The reorganization of the Canadian armed forces into a single, flexible and effective service, which is what this bill means, was throughly explained by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) last Monday.

In this connection, it must be borne in mind that members of our armed forces are recruited on a voluntary basis and not, like in many countries, on a compulsory basis.

Air Chief Marshal Miller said in his testimony, that the Canadian armed forces, judging by the country's potential, are the best, as compared to that of any other country. According to international statistics, in Canada, the period of military service is longer than anywhere else.

It is easy to understand, therefore, why the men in our armed forces are better trained than those of other nations.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) has often mentioned that the morale of the men is not what it should be. However, General Allard has given us the assurance that, at the present time, morale is good, as compared to what it was at certain times in the past.

The hon. member seems to forget the confusion which prevailed in 1963 when he was Minister of National Defence because no decision could be made to equip our weapons with nuclear warheads. This must have irritated servicemen who probably lost any confidence they had in the authorities, at that time.

[English]

We have to evolve, Mr. Chairman, and adapt ourselves continuously. It is regrettable that some have to maintain a musket mentality and refuse to recognize the facts and the necessity of the reorganization called unification, best defined as a single armed force which would be the most efficient and practical solution to the conditions of today and the projected requirements of tomorrow.

No longer do we see the army battle another army or the navy fight another navy or simple aerial combat between aircraft. Each one of these services is called upon to co-ordinate and inter-mix its operations. It is urgent that unification be completed so as to eliminate any possible or probable catastrophes because of lack of practical co-ordination.

A vivid example of this is the suggested glossary of words used commonly by all personnel. Errors have been made with regard to specific technical terms common to one service but interpreted differently as to their meaning by another service. This causes delays and often costly mistakes. An experience that I have been made aware lately involved a telegram sent by an army officer to an air force base. I quote the contents: "Please acknowledge receipt of wire". The recipient wireless operator at the air force base immediately forwarded the message to the supply depot of his station as the word "wire" indicated to him that it referred to materiel. Many other expressions in each service have to be made uniform for instant comprehension.

There is a lot of debate on the policies and philosophy of the Department of National Defence relevant to the various organizations in which we participate for the mutual protection of democratic countries. These commitments we shall honour. But experience has shown that other situations could arise which, in the best interest of all concerned, could quickly alter our responsibilities. We have to accept the possibility of other commitments and a readjustment of the present ones. A unified force, efficient and flexible, is the answer to all requirements.

Another of the most common suggestions made during the course of the hearings of the standing committee on the defence by some hon. members opposite and by a number of retired officers was to the effect that the unification program has adversely affected recruiting. I do not believe this to be the case, and there is very convincing evidence to support this belief.

First and foremost, recruiting and total strength figures have climbed steadily since last September throughout all the adverse publicity and criticism by those who oppose the government's program. This in itself is real evidence that the reaction of the men and women of this country to this progressive and imaginative program in no way resembles the picture painted by certain members of the opposition.

[Mr. Legault.]

On February 23 the Minister of National Defence stated before the defence committee, as reported at page 1571 of the minutes of evidence:

> It has been suggested that recruiting has been and will be affected by the introduction of a unified service. There is little, if any, evidence to support this contention. Recruiting for the calendar year 1966 was the highest it has been since 1963. I have been advised by the officers in charge of recruiting that they expect a modest increase once the unification bill has been passed.

Farther on in the same statement the minister went on to say:

> To the extent that recruiting has been affected by unification, it seems to be more directly related to the controversy that has arisen and the negative statements by a number of retired officers.

In 1966, Mr. Chairman, despite the public controversy and the reaffirmed intention of the government to proceed with unification, factors which according to hon. members opposite have hurt recruiting, the armed forces received over 900 more recruits than they did in 1965. I understand also that recruiting for the first quarter of 1967 is equally good even though complete figures are not yet available. This is convincing evidence indeed that the reorganization of the armed forces has in no way adversely affected recruiting.

In 1966 the re-engagement rates for the forces also showed a considerable increase over previous years. Air force re-engagements improved by 2 per cent to a re-engagement rate of 84.9 per cent, the army by 10 per cent to 84.4 per cent, and the navy by 10.4 per cent to 66.4 per cent. In his statement to the committee the minister noted that naval re-engagement rates are considerably higher than those in the United States or the United Kingdom. If one considers the reaction of the men and women of the forces to the integration-unification program as shown by the recruiting and re-engagement ratio, as some hon. members have suggested, then we must conclude that their reaction is most favourable.

It is important to note as well that enlistments are improving during a period when the armed forces are subject to extremely heavy losses because of factors quite removed from the forces themselves and the present reorganization. On April 1, 1965 the defence committee heard an excellent brief by Group Captain C. R. Knowles, the director of recruiting at Canadian forces headquarters. In the course of his brief Group Captain Knowles stated:

> During the next two years some 24,000 serving personnel will be lost to the services through normal attrition—the largest part of them having reached retirement age.

I think it should be evident to all hon. members that not only during the past two years but at the present time the services are bound to undergo a tremendous loss of personnel who signed up at the beginning and during the course of world war II and are now reaching normal retirement age. I understand that this is commonly referred to by the military as the "war time hump" and that the greatest losses are occurring over the current span of years. I emphasize that these losses have nothing whatsoever to do with unification. They would have occurred in any case.

Another factor of considerable importance to armed forces recruiting is the employment situation in the Canadian economy. The particularly healthy state of the Canadian economy has resulted in an unprecedented demand for highly skilled, highly trained personnel. Anyone who has ever compared the salary of a fully trained pilot in the armed forces with that offered a pilot with similar training and experience by the civilian air lines can well appreciate the difficulties of retaining skilled personnel in the forces. The same situation exists in the case of electronic technicians and all the other skills which are required by a booming civilian economy.

The Minister of National Defence pointed out in the House of Commons on November 7, 1966, as reported at page 9650 of Hansard, that this problem is not unique to Canada. He said:

> Both the United States and the United Kingdom which are experiencing similar economic conditions have also been affected by manpower shortages. In January of this year the national board for prices and incomes in a report to the parliament of the United Kingdom noted that the British armed forces had had an over-all shortfall of 10 per cent in their recruiting target. The report went on to say:
> "In short, the services are facing a formidable problem in recruiting and retaining sufficient personnel and in their view (the services) the problem is likely to grow in the next few years".

Farther on the minister stated:

> On March 14, 1965 the New York Times reported that of the service men in the United States navy only one-fifth of those eligible were re-enlisting, and in addition primary recruiting had dropped drastically. In comparison, re-engagement rates for the Canadian forces reflect a healthy state of affairs . . .
> However, I repeat that there is no evidence to support the contention that recruiting and re-engagement rates are related to the policy of integration and unification. Our naval re-engagement rates are better than those of the United States and the United Kingdom.

I do not intend to suggest that there are not some people who have left or have not joined the services because of unification; I am sure there are. But I am equally sure that the contentions of some hon. members with regard to the effects of unification on recruiting and re-engagements are not valid. I am certain that conditions of service, pay, housing, promotions, career opportunities, and a job which he considers is worth while and in which he can take pride, often determine the average serviceman's decision to stay in the forces. All of these conditions have improved during the past few years as a direct or indirect result of the integration-unification program. These are the kind of factors which affect recruiting and morale.

In conclusion I remind hon. members that the chief of the defence staff, General Allard, told the defence committee that any postponement or delay in starting the final stage of the reorganization—unification—would have a serious effect on recruiting. No evidence or argument that we have yet heard in the house, in the committee or anywhere else has convinced me that unification should not be proceeded with immediately. On the contrary, from the point of view of recruiting, re-engagements and morale I believe the passage of Bill C-243 is most necessary.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question? If recruiting is as good as he says it is would he explain why our navy is unable to man its ships and why our infantry battalions are seriously under strength?

Mr. Legault: I stated that recruiting has improved since 1966. I stated also that the depletion had been caused by what is called the wartime hump, with practically 24,000 members of the forces leaving because of reaching normal retirement age. I think this is self-explanatory.

Mr. Churchill: Would that include General Moncel?

Mr. MacRae: Mr. Chairman, I wish to enter this debate briefly because of my lifelong interest in the military forces of our country and because of my deep interest in the army especially. Before beginning I wish to digress for a moment. I trust, sir, that you will not rule me out of order. I would like to congratulate those members of the government who have been promoted within the last day or two. I congratulate especially the very able former minister without portfolio, now Registrar General, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I realize only too well that in our system of government the executive has become more powerful over the years and the legislative arm, in which we serve as members, has become of less import. It is vital for governments to have the best men and women that can be found. While I do not wish the ministers a long tenure of office, I wish them well.

As the Associate Minister of National Defence is in his seat I wish to thank him for the many courtesies he has extended to me. I do not think any member of this house writes more than I do to the associate minister, especially about matters dealing with the immense Canadian forces base at Gagetown. I appreciate the never failing courtesy and help in these matters that have been extended. Though I have not always received the hoped for solution, I know that the minister has always attempted to be helpful, and I thank him for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacRae: I said that I would not be too lengthy but I wish to raise several important points. I have tried to approach the unification of our forces with an open mind. It distresses me that the whole development of this measure has proceeded as it has done. I am reasonably certain that many on the government side have grave misgivings about unification. No doubt a few members of my party to some extent agree with unification. Yet it seems to me we have been backed into a position where this has become an almost purely political matter on which the government has taken a fixed position and on which we have adopted a similar posture. I regret this. I have tried to approach this whole question with an open mind, as I said.

Though I believe that integration as originally conceived and implemented was an excellent objective for the minister and the government to have aimed for, from what I have read and heard in the sessions of the defence committee I have attended I am not convinced that we should proceed with unification at this time, certainly not with the haste with which the minister seems to be proceeding.

Among the many representations we have received have been some excellent ones from the Tri-Service Identities Organization, known as TRIO, for short. This body of men gave honourable service in wartime and having returned to civilian life are leaders in their communities across the nation. The position they have taken is not because of political preference. They are deeply concerned about this measure and they have made some excellent suggestions to us, as members of parliament. During my brief address I should like to put on record communication received yesterday from the Tri-Service Identities Organization. I shall comment on each point they make in their letter sent to every member of this house.

Their first point is:

> It is noteworthy that not one recently retired senior officer no longer having any attachment to the Department of Defence has supported the program which will be carried forward if Bill C-243 is enacted and everyone of any stature outside the services or government whose military opinion would command respect who has testified before the defence committee has expressed criticism or reservation on the proposed reorganization of the defence establishment.

I attended most of the sessions of the defence committee, either as a member of it when asked to do so by my leader or as an interested observer. The evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller impressed me more than the evidence of any other officer who appeared there. By this I do not mean to detract from the evidence given by such able men as General Moncel, whom I have known since the war years, Admirals Rayner and Landymore, Air Marshal Annis and General Fleury and others. Their evidence was helpful and it was devastating to the principle of that which this house is asked to enact.

Air Chief Marshal Miller was until a few months ago the senior serving service officer in this country, a distinguished and brilliant officer. I now wish to quote from a Globe and Mail editorial of Wednesday, March 22. I bring this editorial to the attention of the committee because I feel it is so well written, and I should like to place a portion of it on the record. It stresses precisely the point I am raising.

> When Air Chief Marshal Frank Miller retired last July he did so quietly, without any comment about the differences over unification then roiling the armed forces. Until that point, as the first chief of the integrated defence staff, he had been Defence Minister Paul Hellyer's right hand man—how significantly so is indicated by the fact that he had been persuaded to stay three years past the normal retirement age of 55.
> The testimony which Air Chief Marshal Miller gave to the Commons defence committee this week is, therefore, of peculiar importance, for it is the testimony of a man who had the regard of the minister, who personified integration, and who studiously observed the duty of an officer not to comment publicly on matters of public policy.

Air Chief Marshal Miller told the committee that unification, while it might well be the end result of integration, would not at present be timely; that more time was needed for the orderly development of the integration process.

One of my hon. friends has put on the record of the house the exact exchange as it took place in the committee, and the testimony given bears out what this editorial has to say.

"I felt that a lot of careful planning was necessary and probably time to educate people was required before the next step of unification." Implementation of the bill could seriously demoralize the forces if it were rushed; the loss of personnel so far had been bad for the forces—"some key men have left."

He said he saw no significant financial or military advantage in unification over integration.

Such testimony from such a man cannot fail to raise serious doubts in any thoughtful member of the committee—or of the public—about the wisdom of Mr. Hellyer's unswerving and headlong rush toward unification. It also raises again the question of what sort of communication has existed in the Defence Department. Air Chief Marshal Miller said he did not think any defence chiefs had advised that unification go ahead, but that the subject had been much discussed. Perhaps discussion and advice are sometimes two names for the same thing—which would suggest that the burden of discussion had been against unification.

I think the point is very clear. None of these knowledgeable senior serving officers, many of whom retired before the final decision to proceed with this measure was taken, support the legislation which is before us.

The second point raised in the letter from the Tri-Service Identities Organization to us is as follows:

Claims that other countries are following the Canadian example have not been substantiated. In fact government intentions as expressed in white papers on defence in the United Kingdom, France and New Zealand show no indication of emulating the Canadian plan which will be carried forward if the bill is enacted. Informed persons in both the U.S.A. and the United Kingdom, as evidenced by recent articles and statements, have indicated concern or disenchantment with the Canadian experiment.

I do not see any particular merit in being the first nation in the world to rush into unification. I think it would be much wiser for us to make haste slowly at this time, to secure one base before moving to another. No other nation in the world today is groping as Canada seems to be doing.

The third point raised in this letter is:

The effective strength of the forces is below 104,000 men or 20,000 under the strength at 31st March 1963. The original objective was to reduce the forces by approximately 10,000 men.

I did not disagree with this objective but I feel that the strength of our armed forces has now fallen to a dangerous level. The letter goes on:

Included in this excessive loss are not only many senior officers well in advance of retirement but also many officers in the rank of lieutenant colonel and colonel or equivalent in all three services. In the normal course they would have been available to fill appointments of greater responsibility, yet their retirement must restrict the selection for future leaders. This can have serious repercussions for the future if something is not done to check this exodus.

The fourth point raised in this letter is as follows:

There is evidence of concern over our capability to meet out military commitments as a result of the situation which has developed in the defence department in the last four years.

This, it seems to me, is a vital point for us to consider. It is true we are not one of the great powers of the world though some, including myself, like to think of Canada as being one of the middle powers. Though our population is only 20 million this nation has played a part far more important than might have been expected in the two great wars of the last half century and in the lesser wars which have been fought in Korea and elsewhere. It is significant that in 1914 when our population was only nine or ten million we sent almost 750,000 men and women to fight for democracy. Many of them are still with us including the honourable and gallant member for Winnipeg South Centre, the former defence minister, and others who defended this nation in the great battles such as Passchendaele and elsewhere. In the second great war this country put almost a million men and women into the armed forces. Our contribution in northwestern Europe, in Italy and in the Far East, including the tragic episode of Hong Kong, the service of our seamen on Canada's little ships on all the seas of the world, our valiant air force, all made a record far more impressive than might have been expected from a country of our population.

This being the case, our ability to fulfil our military commitments assumes a particular importance. It seems to me that the free nations of the world, and possibly some of those which are not free, have come to expect that when Canada undertakes to do certain things it will do them. If the commitments we have undertaken cannot be fulfilled by a unified force we will have been placed in an almost untenable position. Yet this is the opinion, almost without exception, of the expert witnesses who appeared before the committee. I think immediately of General Moncel and of Air Chief Marshal Miller, to mention only two. They have told us that with a unified force it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to fulfil the commitments we have made to NATO, to NORAD and to the United Nations.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

The Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock, in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business I do now leave the chair.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), Transport—possible elimination by the Quebec Central Railway of certain trains between Quebec and Sherbrooke; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Finance—drugs—inquiry as to removal of sales tax; the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis), Historic Sites and Monuments—Louisbourg Fortress —return to work of men laid off.

The house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, private bills and public bills.

Mr. McNulty: Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent may we stand notices of motions Nos. 145, 137 and 128 and proceed with notice of motion No. 201 in the name of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett)?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It has been requested that notices of motions numbered 145, 137 and 128 stand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house will now proceed to the consideration of notice of motion No. 201.

[Mr. MacRae.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

GEOGRAPHICAL CO-ORDINATES RESPECTING BASE LINES

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 23, consideration of motion of Mr. Barnett:

> That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all notes and other communications exchanged between Canada and the United States of America since the enactment by Parliament on July 16, 1964, of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act having to do with the issuance by the Governor in Council of one or more lists of geographical co-ordinates of points from which base lines may be determined in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) with regard to notes and other communications exchanged between Canada and the United States of America since the enactment by parliament on July 16, 1964, of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act I think it is useful, if I may, to refer to some of the authorities on this subject.

I should like to refer first to Todd on Parliamentary Government, volume 1, at page 358:

> In 1860 a motion in the English House of Commons for the production of a copy of a despatch received from abroad (upon a subject on which negotiations were pending) and before it had been answered, was successfully opposed by the Foreign Secretary (Lord John Russell) on the ground that "such a course would not only be contrary to precedent but contrary to every principle recognized by the constitution:" it "would be like inviting the House to dictate the answer."

Jumping to our own Canadian experience, on February 25, 1929, a member moved for a copy of all letters, cables, correspondence and other documents or agreements entered into by the Canadian government in connection with the Imperial Cable merger of 1928. The postmaster general, Mr. Veniot, asked for the motion to stand as the correspondence was of a private nature between the contracting parties, the different governments of Canada, England, Australia and New Zealand. He pointed out that until permission was received to place that correspondence on the table it could not be tabled.

On January 17, 1939, in the course of debate, not on a motion, the leader of the opposition, Mr. Manion, asked if it would be possible to have published the correspondence relating to the Munich crisis of September, 1938. The prime minister of the day, Mr.

Mackenzie King, replied that correspondence between governments, particularly where it relates to the possibility of war, is necessarily highly confidential and to make it public would require the consent of the governments concerned. So in that case the motion was denied.

Looking at more recent examples in this chamber I should like to refer to a motion for papers which was brought by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the subject of the imposition of United States embargoes. On January 24, 1955, Mr. Diefenbaker asked the government of the day for a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents since May 1, 1954, which had passed between any department of the federal government and the government of the United States regarding the application or imposition by the government of the United States of embargoes, in whole or in part, against importation into the United States of Canadian farm products. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on behalf of the government, indicated that the motion concerned diplomatic correspondence with a former government and dealt with negotiations still in progress. Therefore he maintained that the information was privileged according to the well established practice of the house and that it would not be possible to bring it down at that particular time. The Leader of the Opposition asked that the matter be allowed to stand. The Speaker intervened and added that perhaps in the circumstances it would be better to have the motion dropped. The motion in fact was dropped.

Incidentally, on that same day the Leader of the Opposition also asked Mr. St. Laurent for a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged since the first day of May, 1954, between any department of government and the governments of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba relative to the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project. On that same day Mr. St. Laurent in replying pointed out that since other provinces were concerned this would involve the consent of all these parties.

Moving to the year 1956, we have a motion for the production of papers relating to the Passamaquoddy project and involving an economic feasibility survey. It was motion No. 70 by Mr. Brooks. He asked for everything that had passed between any department or officials of the federal government and the International Joint Commission, the government of the United States of America, and any other government or organization of individuals, relating to a survey or surveys of the economic feasibility of the development of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project. Again the reply was made by the present Prime Minister who referred to the usual rules of privilege regarding international communications. At page 3615 of Hansard for May 7, 1956, he is reported as follows:

—in so far as the correspondence with the United States government is concerned, naturally the consent of that government will have to be obtained. In so far as International Joint Commission correspondence is concerned, it has been customary to regard correspondence of this international agency as privileged in this house.

The motion was not debatable and a vote was not taken. Mr. Speaker then said:

This will have to be explored on other occasions. When the hon. member wishes to have his motion debatable he will put it on the order paper without an asterisk. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the remarks made by the minister?

By agreement the question was transferred for debate.

Let us then move to 1957 when a new administration was in power headed by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). On December 9 motion No. 45 moved by Mr. Hahn for a copy of the preliminary report entitled proposals for the hydroelectric development of the Columbia river system in Canada was answered on behalf of the government by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) who was at that time the acting minister of northern affairs and natural resources. He said, as reported at page 2083 of Hansard for that date:

Mr. Speaker, I must oppose this motion ... It is a departmental document of a type which is not normally tabled.

He referred to the fact that negotiations with the United States regarding the hydroelectric development of the Columbia river system were taking place and would likely continue for some time, and that it was not in the public interest that these documents be made public during the progress of those negotiations. Mr. Hahn continued to press the matter, at the conclusion of which Mr. Speaker said as reported at page 2084:

That is my recollection, that the document was not quoted except to identify it. This is not a debatable motion. The minister has explained his objection to complying with the order, and all that remains now is to dispose of the motion. Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

The precedents to which I am referring relate in every case to correspondence between Canada and some outside agent or country.

Let me refer to Hansard for April 17, 1961, page 3704. On that day Motion No. 100 by Mr. Argue was answered by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), then the minister of veterans affairs. Mr. Argue's motion was:

> For a copy of any contract, letter of intent, correspondence, or other documents exchanged between Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority since January 1, 1956, in relation to the purchasing of Canadian uranium concentrates by The United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority.

The then minister said in his concluding sentence that the motion could not be accepted. The Speaker then said:

> In view of the explanation made by the minister, what is the wish of the mover?

Mr. Argue withdrew the motion. It was dropped, the order was discharged and the motion was withdrawn.

On December 11, 1963 the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) brought a motion for papers in these words:

> That an order of the house do issue for a copy of a general assessment of the Battelle institute report to the Alaska international rail and highway commission—

It was motion No. 160. He also requested the recommendations to the United States Congress prepared by the economic division of the department of northern affairs dated May 26, 1961. The present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) replied in these terms:

> I can assure him that if the report which he asked for, dated 1961, were made public it would be accompanied by a series of calculations and recommendations to the government which would demarcate the government's bargaining position in any conclusions or agreements made with the United States government if we arrive at the position where such a mutual undertaking was in prospect.

The hon. member for Yukon responded in the way in which I invite the mover of the motion now before us to respond. The order was discharged and the motion was withdrawn.

There are many other precedents to which I could refer in respect of motions regarding relations between Canada and other countries. We have built up certain traditions in this house regarding the publication of documents between Canada and provincial governments.

On March 26, 1961 Mr. Jones moved for a copy of letters and other documents between the federal and B.C. governments relating to Indian bands. The response was made by the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) who pointed out that while he was prepared to produce the existing correspondence with the government of British Columbia, in respect of correspondence with Indian bands the superintendent of Indian affairs acted as trustee for the Indians in these matters and the correspondence should not be produced unless the Indians agreed. In this case he brought another principle into play. We have heard about the principle in respect of a government or an agency such as atomic energy. We now have the principle in respect of interested parties, in this case the Indians.

On September 3, 1958 Mr. Benidickson moved for a copy of all correspondence since September 1, 1957 between the federal government and the province of Ontario in respect of sharing of costs of the roads to resources program. The motion was responded to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), then minister of northern affairs. He concluded by saying, as reported at page 4517 of Hansard for that day:

> It is impossible to table this correspondence while negotiations are going on because it would embarrass the governments concerned.

On February 2, 1959 the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) moved for a copy of all documents exchanged between the federal government and the government of New Brunswick or the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission concerning the construction of the East Saint John thermal plant. The motion was allowed to stand since negotiations between the governments were still in progress and it would have been improper to produce the papers at that time.

There is a great deal of relevance to some of the precedents I have just cited, particularly when we consider that the motion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is for a copy of notes and other communications exchanged between Canada and the United States since July 16, 1964 in respect of lists of geographical co-ordinates or points from which base lines may be determined in accordance with the provisions of the act.

On January 18, 1961, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), a member of the party to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni belongs, moved for a copy of all correspondence and documents exchanged between the department of northern affairs and national resources and the B.C. government regarding the development of hydro resources on the Columbia River. The minister speaking for the government at that time was the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), who opposed production until negotiations with the United States were over and the agreement ratified. The motion was withdrawn.

On April 17, 1961, Mr. Argue moved for a copy of any contract or other documents—I will not go into the details—exchanged between Eldorado Mining and Refining Ltd. and the United Kingdom atomic energy authority since January 1, 1956. As I mentioned before, the then minister of veterans affairs, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), felt that they could not be produced and in fact they were not produced.

While wishing to be co-operative, it is clear that there has been established in this house an important principle in this regard. To depart from this principle would occasion embarrassment to a government faithfully carrying out confidential negotiations with another country, a province or agency. For the foregoing reasons, Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that the government does not find it possible to accede to the hon. member's request.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, just before I rose to speak I was listening to the words of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) and I noticed something very peculiar in the chamber. Finally it became apparent to me, after looking around, that the trouble was that we were not graced with the presence of a single Tory.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am in the house.

Mr. Deachman: I concluded, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps they were absolutely exhausted by their efforts to defend the country against unification. However, I am very happy to see that one at least has strayed into the chamber, namely, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh). I see that the sap is rising again.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Deachman: I would be delighted.

Mr. Howard: Does it matter whether or not the Tories are here?

Mr. Deachman: No. We miss them for the aesthetics of their presence more than anything else.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Deachman: Certainly.

Mr. McIntosh: I think the last question was asked because there is so much unanimity between the Liberals and the N.D.P. that it does not matter whether we oppose what the government are doing; the N.D.P. will support them anyway.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think this might be a good time for me to remind hon. members that perhaps we ought to get back to the discussion of the motion before the house.

Mr. Deachman: I certainly agree with you, sir. The N.D.P. and those of us on this side of the house are interested in the House of Commons and we should return to the matter under discussion. I wish to review briefly what brought about the discussion on the production of papers in connection with the 12-mile fishing limit. Some changes are taking place in the fisheries of the world which need to be emphasized from time to time because they affect the livelihood of many Canadians. This question is important to our trade abroad. It is important to the future growth and development of Canadian trade and to the employment of people on both our coasts. Therefore I think it important to review some of these points for a moment or two.

When the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) spoke on February 9 last on this motion the argument he put forward was that the matter before the house was in reality a motion for the production of papers. He based his argument on that point. However, I want to go behind the motion to what gives rise to it. A matter of very grave interest gave rise to the motion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). It was my privilege last year, at the outset of this session when the estimates were brought down, to have the opportunity to chair the fisheries committee in its examination of the estimates. It was an exercise which I enjoyed very much and from which I hope I have profited.

I entered the committee room with other hon. members knowing virtually nothing about Canada's fisheries and found myself the chairman of a group who were very expert in this field. There were hon. members from both sides of the house, representing coastal constituencies and constituencies with inland fisheries, who had long been accustomed to looking after the needs of fishermen and thinking in terms of the Canadian fisheries economy. It was a pleasure to me to have the opportunity of associating with them and to explore with the Department of Fisheries, the Fisheries Research Board and the minister the grave problems affecting not only the Canadian fisheries industry but the world food and world population situation. This makes our Canadian fisheries so important and it makes our discussion of the 12-mile limit very pertinent.

After its examination of the estimates the committee made four recommendations to the minister. We recommended that the efforts and research of the department be strengthened in these areas: first of all, coastal pollution and pollution of our inland waters; second, increased research and the development in particular of methods which would bring to commercial feasibility the artificial production and spawning of lobster on the east coast and salmon on the west coast. Our third recommendation concerned the policing of some of our subsidized fisheries programs and, fourth, we dealt with the incursion of foreign fishing fleets into Canadian waters, which is the subject at hand and about which we were considerably worried at that time.

The world situation in respect of food needs no elucidation in this house other than to say that the world population is exploding at an unprecedented rate and our capability of finding food for the population of the world is not meeting that expansion. Hence, people in countries are going to sea as they have never gone to sea before in an effort to find the food and the proteins necessary to feed their vastly expanding populations. This has given rise to a number of changes in the fishing industry. First of all, the United States itself, although a wealthy nation and capable of taking care of the food needs of its own people, has become an importer of fish and fish products to an increasing extent. This has provided for Canada an increasing U.S. market.

It is of particular interest that the expansion of the market in the U.S. has been characterized by a great expansion on the west coast, particularly in the state of California where much of the increase in the west coast fishery market is now being found. It is a fact that European fishing fleets, long accustomed to fishing off the Grand Banks and in the waters of the Canadian east coast, now find they are bringing an increasing amount of their catch back to the European market and less to the U.S. market which they have long served. So the European market is making increasing demands upon that particular fishery. These demands have extended to the extent that the fisheries of the east coast are beginning to reach a balance of production, and it will not be too long before the world's greatest ground fisheries will be in danger of over-fishing and measures of conservation will have to be applied.

On the west coast we are experiencing for the first time the sight of foreign vessels in considerable numbers fishing off that coast with massive fishing equipment the like of which the Canadians and Americans accustomed to fishing that coast have never seen. I speak particularly of the huge Russian fishing fleets which have moved in around the entrances to the Canadian coast to the south and north of the Queen Charlotte islands, and also of the Russian fisheries fishing off the Aleutians and down the coast of Alaska, in addition to the increase in the Japanese fisheries fishing off that coast. This has come about simply because of the need to find protein for the increasing population of those countries. It has come about also as a part of the increasing technology of those countries and their capability of engaging in a major fishery based on huge equipment and done upon a very scientific basis.

It is this innovation on the west coast, at a time when our own ground fishery is increasing, that frightens the people of that area in respect of their fisheries, and of the future of their fisheries, if methods cannot be found and agreements cannot be reached to protect these great inland fisheries from being fished out by foreign fleets hungry for proteins for their starving and undernourished peoples.

We have other reasons for being interested in the growth of the ground fisheries, the protection of which is associated with the establishment of a 12-mile limit. We are accustomed on the west coast to the salmon fishery which is fished only when the runs are on, and this comes over a very short period of time. Then the canneries operate for a very short period of time, and when that is finished the man who is engaged, either in fishing salmon at sea or in the cannery, finds his work done. If it were not for other kinds of fish and other methods of fishing on the west coast the fishing industry there would be a very ephemeral and seasonal occupation indeed. But it has been because of the development of the ground fishery that the fishing season and the use of vessels and canneries have been spread out to occupy a much longer period during the year and to make of the fisheries on the west coast a much more stable industry.

This has meant that the fishing industry has had to get into business with much heavier equipment, with boats 60, 70 and 80 feet in length, vessels costing upward of $100,000, $200,000 and $300,000, and equipment and gear which is very expensive to operate and which must be amortized over a considerable period of time, and as the result of a very stable fishery. It has also meant that the old fashioned fishery, which was an old wooden shed with very little equipment in it, has been modernized into the most modern plants that you will see in Canada involved in the packaging and processing of food. It has meant that these plants are engaged in much more work in the course of a year, to process the fish brought in by trawlers which are now working on the ground fisheries off the coast of northern British Columbia and in the Pacific coastal waters.

There is a further development which is of interest to us as Canadians. One plant on the west coast has now a subsidiary operating in California. This subsidiary is receiving frozen fish blocks which are used for cutting up into fish sticks and portions, which it is packaging and selling in the U.S. market. So we are not only expanding a Canadian industry but we are engaging in the development of a foreign trade and establishing plants in the United States. I think the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon) would be delighted if he could hear this explanation of the very reverse of what he considers to be American imperialism in Canadian industry. This is more a case of Canadian imperialism in the United States, and it is very desirable from the standpoint of the west coast industry.

All this means that the fishery on the west coast, which once provided only a portion of the livelihood of people, has now become a very stable industry, not only at sea but on land and in the export trade, one that is capable of employing an increasing number of people and engaging a larger segment of the economy. Therefore it is essential, and becomes increasingly so, that this kind of fishery be well protected. There are several ways in which this can be achieved. One way of course is in the development of treaties and arrangements with regard to conservation between the United States and ourselves, and any others who may fish in these waters both on the west and the east coast, to see that we do not fish out these fisheries; because if we cannot conserve them, not only will they be of no good to us but they will be of no good to the rest of the world which relies on these fisheries for the food they so badly need.

The second point I want to drive home is that these fisheries are an off-shore resource of the Canadian people, and to whatever extent possible we as a nation should do what is in our power to protect this resource for our own people as a source of employment for them, and as a source of the future development of our own markets abroad.

We do not object, as Canadians, to the historic fisheries that have been developed in the waters off our shores over periods of hundreds of years, since the discovery of this continent. However, I believe there must be a recognition of the fact that we have some rights in these waters, and in the fisheries which we have taken the trouble to conserve and for which we have developed markets. It is important that we be aggressive as Canadian people in establishing the 12-mile limit and in protecting the bays of our offshore waters which are necessary to the conservation of these fisheries.

I cannot therefore be too forceful in urging upon the government and upon the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud), who I understand at this moment is in Russia discussing this question, amongst others, with his counterpart in the Russian government, the need to reach an agreement with the operators of the world's major fisheries on behalf of the Canadian people. In the last little while the United States has been successful in negotiating a 12-mile limit for Alaskan waters. They have had to make some concessions in order to achieve this. They have had to give the Russians a concession which enables them to come into Alaskan ports for food, for ship repairs and the like.

Of course, this kind of concession enables the Russian fleet to maintain itself offshore and engage in extensive fishing beyond the 12-mile limit for a longer period of time. This represents a considerable concession the United States had to make in order to establish this limit. We, to date, have not been too badly put upon by the massive fleets which the Russians are able to bring to bear on these fisheries. We have had a taste of this on the west coast, so that we know the initial, exploratory work in our ground fishery has been done by these foreign fleets. A serious problem is shaping up for us in the future, if we do not rest on top of it.

In closing, therefore, I want to say that I am glad to see this motion on the order paper because of the opportunity it provides to discuss this serious matter and emphasize to the government of the day, which I am proud to support, that this is a serious matter for those of us who live on the coast. We hope that the efforts of the minister, when he is in Russia, will be fruitful and that he will continue to impress upon the Russians, as well as our United States neighbours, who are tough customers to deal with on the subject of fishing in Canadian waters, that these Canadian resources should be used for the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Barnett: I hoped the hon. member would allow me time to pose one question.

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Barnett: Arising out of the report the hon. member gave us of the activities of the Minister of Fisheries during his visit to Russia, I want to ask if he can tell us whether the minister has been discussing the establishment of base line co-ordinates with the Soviet authorities?

Mr. Deachman: Like Will Rogers, I only know what I read in the newspapers. All I saw to that effect was that he was discussing this question when he was in Russia.

Mr. Andrew Chatwood (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this motion because of the vital importance of the subject to fishermen and because of my particular interest both in the geographical co-ordinates and the 12-mile limit. The question, I believe, is whether it is desirable to make public the notes and communications requested, and also if it is possible or proper, in light of the rules governing diplomatic correspondence, to produce these documents and letters exchanged between one government and another while negotiations are still continuing.

I should like in a moment to come back to a discussion of whether or not it is proper, and I do not believe it is. First of all, I should like to deal with the question of whether it is desirable to produce these papers. It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that by producing them at this time there would be an adverse effect on the negotiations taking place with other nations with regard to the establishment of the 12-mile limit. The 12-mile limit and the establishment of the co-ordinates are of vital importance. One hears now of cases of foreign draggers coming into our inshore waters and ruining the gear of our shore fishermen. This results of course in damage to the gear and a loss of catch. The continued activities of these draggers is resulting in a reduction in the amount of fish being taken by the shore fishermen, so there is an adverse effect on their living. The continued expansion of these foreign fleets and the methods they use for taking the fish have resulted in a reduction in the catch of our Canadian draggers who are operating farther out. We must look also at the fact that the world relies on the sea for food. We must therefore maintain the fish we have in the ocean, to maintain the world food supply. The control we would have through the establishment of these limits as a result of negotiations with other countries would be of utmost importance, both in establishing where these operations should take place, and in establishing the type of fish that should be taken.

We hear of cases where certain of these draggers using new systems are taking fish of all types, keeping the type they want and throwing the others overboard. This means that there are dead fish floating around which could have been used. Negotiations between the various countries would assist in both controlling the fishery and in ensuring that it will continue.

This excessive dragging in certain inshore areas has resulted in a reduction in the catch of the shore fishermen. This reduction has occurred for two reasons. In the first place, these large draggers from other countries are taking an excessive amount of fish, with the consequent reduction in catch for our fishermen. There has been a reduction in catch also as a result of the fact they have disturbed the area in which spawning takes place. The fact these operations have moved inshore has reduced the amount of fish in these areas and has forced our shore fishermen to move farther out. They have been forced to use larger boats and heavier gear. At the same time, the trawlers move through these areas and cause damage to the gear, as I mentioned before, and this has a serious effect.

The desire to establish a limit is not new, but it is of vital importance that we should have it. It is also important that we should discuss with other countries the appropriate limit we should have, so that it can be recognized by those countries which are fishing near our shores.

Some of the limits that have been set were set early in the 1900's. Norway declared her limit of four miles in 1906. In 1907 Argentina declared a limit of 12 miles; in 1909 Spain declared a limit of 6 miles; in 1912 Italy declared a limit of 7 miles; and in 1914 Greece declared a limit of 6 miles. Colombia declared a limit of 12 miles, Ecuador 15 miles, Korea 50 to 60 miles, the Dominican Republic 12 miles, El Salvador 200 miles, Cambodia 12 miles, India 100 miles and Ceylon 100 miles. These limits have already been declared by these countries.

However, I think we all realize that declaring a limit without the agreement of other countries who might want to fish off shore is not satisfactory. It would take a tremendous number of patrol boats to patrol a limit of, as is the case with some countries, 100 or 200 miles, and in view of this ineffective patrolling the limit could not be enforced.

Talking of our present limits and regulations, by agreement and by regulation the Department of Fisheries is doing an excellent job of patrolling both with the use of patrol boats and planes. I feel that this effort on their part would be improved if the limit were increased, and we had the agreement of other nations to such extension.

The effect of a limit on our fishery shows the importance of any bill to make this provision. It must be established here whether this production of papers would serve the purpose of protecting our fishermen and our fishery. It appears to me that the production of these documents would have an adverse effect upon the implementation of the base lines and of a 12-mile limit. It is necessary to make this provision under international law, and we must make sure that other countries obey such a limit.

In 1947 the United Nations set up the international law commission. Ten years later that commission, after a very exhaustive study of every aspect, presented a report covering this whole topic. In 1957 the United Nations called for a conference to be held in Geneva in 1958, and the conference was held in February through to April of that year, 86 nations attending. Progress was made. They did not make as much progress on this limit as we would have wished, but effective discussions were held. These discussions between the nations are what will make effective the provision of a 12-mile limit and the setting of base line co-ordinates.

If we do something at this point which will disrupt the negotiations we are having with the United States and other nations, the effect would be to set back the discussions we have already had and the possibility of bringing in the 12-mile limit within a short period of time. This would result in a further spate of discussions, which would set off to a later date still the setting of a limit.

These limits are of vital importance to the continuation of the fishery both on the west coast and on the east coast, where larger ships of other nations are moving in. Russian fleets have lately started to move in. The Soviet Union has developed even larger and more modern vessels, and their techniques are such that they are able to net a larger amount of fish than some of our traditional fishing neighbours who come from long distances across the sea. The Portuguese have been fishing off our east coast for some 500 years; and some of our American neighbours to the south have been coming into what are Canadian waters and taking what are the resources of Canada for many years.

When the limit is brought in we will have to recognize, at least for a limited time, some of the traditional rights of these countries. However, it is desirable—indeed, it is a requirement—that we gradually withdraw some of these rights, particularly in the case of vessels which are coming closer in to the shore.

The fishery on the east coast has been carried on almost since the time the continent was discovered. When the first settlers located along the coast of Newfoundland in the early 1500's they started to fish. Other crews came out from Europe to fish, and then returned at the end of the fishing season.

From that date, Mr. Speaker, the fishing industry has grown each year, although we have had the occasional bad year. It is now undergoing, especially on the east coast, a tremendous change in that new methods are being adopted in an effort to modernize the industry and assist the fishermen to obtain larger catches of fish as well as to market better products. At the same time the value of these efforts is being lessened by the fact that foreign draggers are operating offshore and closer inshore than they should, which both reduces the amount of fish available to be fished and hurts the grounds where the fish breed and spawn.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we must move as quickly as possible to bring in the 12-mile limit and control the method of fishing this area. If we were to produce these papers and disrupt the present negotiations, all progress would be hindered and virtually stopped. So I suggest that the papers requested should not be produced, because of the adverse effect this would have on the industry.

The fishing industry is divided into many parts—the shore fishery, the fishery from longliners and the fishery by trawler. The amount of fish taken from the shore has been increasing as the fishermen have improved their methods. Other methods of fishing have also improved. The amount of fish that the trawlers and larger ships, particularly the ships of other nations, are able to take has increased to a far greater extent and, as I have already mentioned, an adverse effect on our fishery.

In order to protect our fishermen, then, I suggest that we should not produce these papers at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that the time allotted for the consideration of private members business has now expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask whether the sitting of the house could be suspended for an hour for dinner.

Moreover, if members are agreeable, I am prepared to move an order similar to the one we had for the last number of weeks, providing for the suspension of our sittings from seven to eight o'clock on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays, and from one to two o'clock on Fridays. If the house wishes I will put the motion in that form.

• (7:00 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Chatwood.]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I move:

That on April 6, 1967, and until the end of the present session the sitting of the house shall be suspended from 7:00 o'clock p.m. to 8:00 o'clock p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, and from 1:00 o'clock p.m. to 2:00 o'clock p.m. on Fridays.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, the special committee on procedure has made its report as set out in Votes and Proceedings of March 20. It recommends that standing order 6 be provisionally amended for the next session of parliament, that on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays, except when private members business is to be considered in any such sittings, the sittings of the house shall be suspended from 6 o'clock p.m. until 8 o'clock p.m., and where private members business is to be considered the interruption would be from 7 o'clock p.m. until 8 o'clock p.m.; and that on any day on which a morning sitting is held—the next day being tomorrow, Friday—the sitting of the house shall be suspended from 1 o'clock p.m. until 2.30 o'clock p.m.

I felt, considering the unanimous agreement of the special committee, that for the balance of this session we might adopt these recommendations and put them into practice. I feel that a little good will by the government in this respect would do a great deal toward expediting the business of the house. If the government feels it must put pressure on this house, then of course we shall have to abide by what it does, and conduct ourselves accordingly.

Mr. McIlraith: We thought we were removing pressure. I of course would be happy if the report of the committee could be adopted immediately. I am sure if it were adopted now, I certainly would be prepared to move that the new rules come into effect for the balance of this session.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: They could be made applicable for the remainder of the session.

Mr. Starr: My congenial friend, the government house leader, is trying to put another stumbling block in the way of the matter under discussion. I feel there is no need to adopt the report at this time; that should be done at the proper time. The government has asked that the second report stand, on a number of occasions when it has been called by Your Honour. That has been their initiative. The motion now before us could have been drafted on the basis of the special committee's recommendation.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Starr: On division.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF ARMY, NAVY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to order made when Mr. Speaker was in the chair the committee stands suspended until eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock, clause 2 was under consideration.

Mr. MacRae: Before continuing my brief remarks on this clause may I say, sir, that we are all very happy to see you back in the chair, after your brief absence. I trust you are restored to complete health.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacRae: As a basis for my remarks on this subject I was using a letter received from the Tri-Service Identities Organization by all members of parliament a few days ago. The point in the letter to which I was addressing my remarks was the fourth, which reads as follows:

> There is evidence of concern over our capability to meet our military commitments as a result of the situation which has developed in the Defence Department in the last four years.

When the able and distinguished former senior officers were before us, I took occasion, as did many other members of the committee, to ask General Foulkes, General Moncel and others whether they believed that if the forces of this country were unified we could discharge the commitments we have made to NATO, to NORAD and to the United Nations. Every one of these military leaders stressed the point that they did not believe we could fulfil our present obligations under unification. I will admit that the Minister of National Defence did not agree with this, and he said so on several occasions, once in answer to a question I put to him. However, the evidence is there, for the record, in the committee reports. The able officers who gave evidence before the committee did not agree with the minister on that point.

Next I should like to place on record the fifth and sixth paragraphs of this letter, which are related.

> (5) Expenditures on equipment for the five years ending the 31st March, 1968 will not match the spending for the five years ending the 31st March, 1963 despite claims that the reorganization is to make more money available for equipment.
> (6) It is admitted that the steps in the reorganization which will be possible under Bill C-243 will not lead to savings of any account. Thus, if any savings are possible, it will be as a result of those steps taken since 1964 under the authority of Bill C-90. Bill C-243 having been categorized as permissive, the wisdom of proceeding at this time would seem to be questionable if economies are not to be effected and in face of the widespread criticism which the department's program is encountering.

One of the arguments in favour of unification which appealed to a great many people in this country is that a considerable proportion of our military budget could be saved each year if unification were carried out. This would be a valid argument, if it were true. But it would appear from the evidence placed before the committee which examined this bill that such is not the case. As this letter points out, there will not be as much money available for equipment in the next five years as there was in the past, and the economies which have been effected up to this stage have resulted from integration, not from unification. Again I would suggest that there is very little opposition either in this house, in the country as a whole or in the armed forces themselves to the principle of integration: It is unification which is disturbing all of us.

The seventh paragraph is one in which I am deeply interested and reads as follows:

> It has been admitted that morale should be improved. Many service personnel are deeply disturbed by the uncertainty which now exists for a service career and are unwilling to accept the reorganization as they now see it. Nothing should be done to aggravate this situation.

In my discussions with servicemen as I travel back and forth across the eastern part of this country I have found that a great many are deeply disturbed about what is happening, although there are, of course, some who are not giving the matter much thought.

Recently I was talking to a young helicopter pilot who was travelling from Halifax to Toronto. His feeling was that a great many key personnel were simply waiting to see what would happen, and that if this bill were to become law there could very well be a considerable exodus of key personnel from the armed forces. This would be tragic, especially when we have lost so many capable men already.

Paragraphs eight and nine of the letter read as follows:

(8) It seems remarkable that the critics of the reorganization have been variously categorized as emotional, unprogressive, unreasonable, disloyal, obstructionist, destructive, politically motivated or without responsibility. Do none of the extensive body of Canadians who hold opinions contrary to those of the minister of defence do so by reason of knowledge, capability, experience, conviction, concern or sincerity? Surely the calibre of some of the witnesses who have appeared before the defence committee dictates a high degree of credibility for their views and in no way justifies any discounting of their evidence and opinions.

(9) Overwhelming support for the reorganization program does not exist amongst Canadians generally. Thus the latest Gallup poll showed less than 50 per cent of Canadians support it. Observing that this poll was taken before the defence committee started its hearings, and before so much cogent evidence was presented by so many knowledgeable persons against the plans and policies as presently disclosed, would certainly permit the conclusion that even fewer Canadians support the program now than six weeks ago.

That is indeed an interesting observation. Finally:

(10) The military merit of the proposed reorganization has not been established in the light of our declared military commitments at least to the satisfaction of experienced ex-senior officers who appeared before the committee.

In summary I submit that no legislation has been presented to you during the long session now drawing to a close which has less justification or foundation for enactment than Bill C-243 as it is now written. While it is possible that amendments may be made to make the bill acceptable, these would have to go to the root of the legislation, namely section 2, and provide for the continuance of the navy, army and air force, the identities of which will be abolished under the present proposals. As this would in effect nullify much of what is now proposed, on balance the prudent and proper course would be to shelve the proposed bill and thereby the program which will be made possible thereunder pending further examination of all aspects of our defence.

I dealt with this aspect earlier in my address.

• (8:10 p.m.)

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say again that I think a great many officers and men in the services believe integration is a good thing. It has had beneficial results, but two or three years are required for it to shake down before it will have its full effect. Undoubtedly it will be beneficial. It has proven to be beneficial up to this point, but I believe, as I feel a great many Canadians do, that we should now proceed with caution. This particular bill at this time should stand, let us say, six months or a year, at which time it might be raised again when the feelings of opposition perhaps have lessened, when worries have been quietened, and when there is more evidence to show that unification is a step which we should take in respect of the whole organization of the armed forces of this country.

[Mr. MacRae.]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, it was my understanding that this debate, if debate it is, was supposed to be a discussion of the bringing up to date of Canada's armed forces in the world which we face in the late 1960's and early 1970's. We are supposed to be debating a program to bring Canada's armed forces into line so that they will be able to deal with the new technology with which our forces are equipped, and with which they are to be equipped. This means, Mr. Chairman, that when we are debating this subject we should be debating the form we want the army, the air and naval forces to take, and what we want them to do. It means that our judgment must be on the basis of efficiency and effectiveness, because armed forces are expensive.

Unification, as I understand it, implies the merging of administrative and support functions, command functions, command responsibility, personnel management, supply services, pay services, recruitment and training. To me it means taking a three dimensional look at our armed forces, and the world in which we must use them. The last time I participated in this debate on this subject I said that to me defence is only a function of foreign policy, and therefore we should take a look at our foreign policy to see what policies we intend to follow in order to determine what kind of force we require to fulfil those policies.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave us a most interesting tour of the world, as it appears to him. He underlined the assumptions and attitudes the Canadian government is taking in determining the function that the armed forces would perform as a result of this particular bill. In going over his speech, I find that he seemed to make three points. First, he said we were in NORAD to defend North America, because this is the collective way to do it, and that the United States is a pillar upon which all western security has been based since the second world war. Furthermore he intimated that one of the reasons France was withdrawing from the NATO alliance was that France was not willing to assume that the United States would stand up to protect her any longer.

The second point he made is that NATO now is basically a political alliance, whereas in its beginning it had been basically a military alliance designed to protect both Europe and North America from sudden attack from Russia. Things are changing. The NATO alliance itself now is in danger of breaking up, since the withdrawal of France and the subsequent moving of NATO headquarters to Brussels. The minister pointed out that it is necessary for all countries concerned with NATO to re-examine their position to see whether it is necessary to maintain the alliance under the present circumstances.

The third function which Canada has performed in a military way is that of participation in United Nations peace keeping operations in Cyprus and on the Israel-U.A.R. border. In addition it has provided observers on the frontiers of Israel, Syria, Jordan, Lebanon and Kashmir. Canada also participates in the International Supervisory Commission in Indo China, although this function of course does not come under the United Nations jurisdiction.

This is the basis for our foreign policy as the minister outlined it. It indicates a shifting role for Canada in its foreign affairs and in the role our military forces should play in order to take their full part. In other words, we seem to be moving away from what could be described as a static position or a holding operation to a position where our forces would be mobile and capable of moving quickly to trouble spots wherever they may be, and wherever our forces may be required.

I should like to remind hon. gentlemen that since the second world war we have had some 40 odd bushfires, small wars, which have broken out. It is this type of operation which I believe will require the participation of the smaller nations, such as Canada, which do not have any great interest in founding an empire, if you like, or in furthering their own national goals. We are able to go in as detached observers, and we have had fairly good results in this field.

There have been a number of arguments raised against unification. I think that basically they resolve into two arguments of substance. The first and most difficult to attack is the argument that we are going too far too fast. It is difficult for those of us in the House of Commons who are not experts in these fields to determine whether or not we indeed are going too far too fast. However, whether we should use this argument as a means to impede progress is another matter. My own feeling is that the argument, that we are going too far too fast, is the argument used by Conservatives when they wish to stop movements which are progressive in nature. In other words, this is the natural Conservative reaction to a progressive proposal. I would suggest to those newspaper reporters and editors who have said that there is no Conservative party in Canada that the defence debate we are having here is a perfect example of this, in the way they are putting forward the argument "too far too fast".

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Clancy: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member how old he is.

Mr. Reid: Well, Mr. Chairman, I can tell the hon. member for Yorkton that my age is 30 and I hold the position at the present time of being the youngest member in the House of Commons.

Mr. Clancy: I feel sorry for you.

Mr. Reid: The other argument which has been put forward is that of emotion. I think there is some sentimental attachment, if you like, to the idea that our forces should remain in the way we find them at any given time. I am not one of those who are particularly attached to the past although I must confess that before coming to this house I made my living as an exploiter of the past while serving as a professor of history. I do think there are times when change must come. Change involves a certain amount of risk.

No one here to my knowledge ever has admitted that he is perfect. Mere men will make mistakes. Whether the mistakes we will make in bringing forth a unified armed forces are greater than the mistakes we would make by maintaining our forces in the static form in which they now are, I leave for you to judge. My own personal opinion is that we must move; we must unify our armed forces; we must bring them up to date and we must make them truly effective. I believe that to unify is to provide our armed forces with the means to be effective and to take advantage of the new weapons systems which are increasingly becoming available, and that to unify is to take a realistic look at the world.

Mr. Churchill: Does the hon. member mind answering a question at this stage?

Mr. Reid: Not at all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Churchill: I am very much interested in this first class debate which is taking place. I should like to ask the hon. member in what way unification will increase the effectiveness of our armed forces.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Reid: I was going to refer to this particular point and perhaps this would be as good a time as any to do so. I have in my hand the last issue of the Atlantic Monthly in which appeared an article entitled "How the Pentagon Works" by Adam Yarmokinsky. He deals with the changes that have taken place in pentagon bureaucracy as a result of the activity of Mr. McNamara and the order he has imposed upon the chaos that existed there.

Mr. Lambert: That was not unification.

Mr. Reid: I agree that was not unification, but I want to point out that one of the things going on here is substantially the same, namely the reorganization of the upper command structure. The author states that by the mere apportionment of funds one can bring down the conflict that exists between various forces when there have been substantial changes. He says:

> That this apportionment of funds sometimes had more to do with the relative needs and ambitions of the military services than with the requirements of United States foreign policy was an unhappy but unavoidable consequence of this way of doing business.

They made the changes but they called them something other than unification. In point of fact I believe that streamlining of command function such as is taking place and has taken place will lead to considerable savings.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Reid: Certainly.

Mr. Herridge: Has he heard anyone in the opposition suggest that the organization of our armed forces should remain static? Are we not all in favour of integration?

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. Reid: That is a very interesting argument in semantics. Nobody yet has been able to define the difference between unification and integration.

An hon. Member: Not even the minister.

Mr. Reid: The minister in his most recent speeches has said that, so far as he is concerned, they are one and the same thing; that integration and unification are the same, and you can call it what you will. Whatever you call it, this is part of a cycle during which there will be a transformation of the armed forces over a period of eight years. Perhaps that fact alone will lessen the confusion more than anything else.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member answer another question?

Mr. Reid: Certainly.

Mr. Churchill: I think it rather improves the hon. member's speech when we ask questions from time to time. As a good young representative of Canada at the age of 30, is the hon. member in favour of striking out on Canadian policy, rather than bringing in McNamara policy from the United States? Has the hon. member consulted Walter Gordon in this regard?

Mr. Reid: I am one of those who does not care where a good idea originates. I will not turn one down because of its parentage.

Let me return to what I was saying. I should like to make two or three additional points in respect of what I think is really taking place during this debate. There are a variety of issues at stake which have not come to the surface as yet. There is a struggle going on between the armed forces bureaucracy, if you will, and civilian control. Who is going to run things and who is going to say what equipment should be bought or how deployment should be effected? That is one aspect of the matter.

The whole contest between these opponents has occurred in respect of the concept of unification. This is the point about which the hard battle is being fought. The members of the command structure, the retired senior officers, have been called upon to form the ranks of this new army within an army. They have fought a very impressive battle. Had they not done this I am sure the debate would have been over and done with long ago.

There is also a struggle going on within the armed forces between the senior and junior serving officers. General Worthington is reported in the Ottawa Journal of yesterday as having said that those senior officers who remained with the forces after the last war should have been released as soon as the war ended, in order that command could have been turned over to the young fighting colonels. There is a contest taking place between these two groups of men, one which is looking backwards to make their plans, while the other, I hope solidly in command, is familiar with the use of new weapons, technology and computers, if I may use that word in this house. They are familiar with the new way of doing things.

Mr. Churchill: These are very helpful on the battlefield.

Mr. Reid: This certainly has caused the serving officers some difficulty because they do not find compatible this attitude in national defence headquarters. In my own personal opinon this is perhaps one of those struggles which takes place between generations from time to time and I cannot really sympathize with the older fellows who are losing out.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask another question?

Mr. Reid: Certainly, sir.

Mr. Churchill: I am interested in the reliance the hon. member places on the words of General Worthington. I am a great admirer of that gentleman, who was the father of the armoured corps. I served with him at Camp Borden and I always felt he should have commanded a division in the second world war, because of his skill in directing troops and because of his fighting attributes. Why does my young friend place such reliance on General Worthington's words? He is no longer a young man. How old is he now?

Mr. Winch: Eighty eight.

Mr. Churchill: Why does the hon. member not rely on others like General Moncel, who is about 47, and other retired officers who are about 50 or 51 years of age? Because of my own age I will not refer to myself. I know the hon. gentleman has already relegated me to the ash pile.

Mr. Reid: First of all, I think it is only fair to say I do not like to make a difference between generations simply because of age. One has to accept good ideas wherever he finds them. General Worthington admits that he is one of those who should have been turned out after the second world war, so that command could have been turned over to the fighting colonels who actually fought the battles.

My last comments are in relation to the opposition claim that because no other country has adopted unification Canada should not adopt it. I am rather proud that Canada is taking a lead in this area. I think it is commendable, and we should do more of this type of thing. I think we have not done so because of an almost built-in inferiority complex. We are making an experiment in this regard. We are trying to look at the world through new eyes. We are trying to reorganize ourselves so that we may cope effectively in this area.

The other arguments put forward by members of the opposition are rather negative. The fact is that very few other countries have the same problems as Canada, and very few other countries want to play the same type of role that we want to play, as was outlined yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I think it is a fine thing that we should be willing to take on a fairly risky role as a peacemaker. I think it is a fine thing that we should go ahead and produce the forces required to make our participation in that kind of role an effective one. To my knowledge that is the only argument that can be made to the type of negative proposals put forward by the opposition.

The last thing I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, is that when the hon. member for Edmonton West spoke on Monday last he said that government members were committed by their vote on second reading. He went on to say, as reported at page 14441 of Hansard:

> And, may I say, so are the members of the opposition.

As I understand the rules of the house, this debate is a perversion of the rules, because it seems to me that after the vote on second reading has been taken, the principle itself is no longer under debate in the house. What should be the concern of members of the house is to go through this complicated bill in detail and check the various provisions in it, to ensure that the principle is being rightly and truly carried out to the fullest extent. I think that with this debate on clause 2 of the bill the opposition are guilty of short-circuiting or perverting the rules of the house. I suggest that if the opposition were really concerned about the armed forces, they would pass clause 2 as quickly as possible, or force a vote to show their opposition to the principle of the bill, and get on with the business of the house. The provisions of the bill are certainly complicated and far-reaching, and I think the country, the house and the armed forces would be better served if this were done.

Mr. Lambert: A dear boy in a rush.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member a question. I listened to him with a great deal of interest. Actually, I have two questions. First, with regard to the principle of the bill no longer being under discussion because of the decision on second reading, I would point out that I received a letter from a professor—I think this will arouse some interest in the hon. member's mind because it is a case of one professor speaking to another—on that very question. He asked: Is parliament right in determining, on second reading when the decision is made, that the principle of the bill has been decided? Would it not be sounder, and was it not really the original intention that the passing of the bill on second reading is only a declaration that the bill is acceptable in form and should then be considered in detail by the committee of the whole house or a special committee?

That is an interesting thought, rather than that on second reading we are settling the principle of the bill.

Mr. Reid: It is an interesting thought, Mr. Chairman, but it is not the way I read the rules of the house, nor do I think it is the way other hon. members read the rules of the house. My interpretation of the rules is that when you have given a bill second reading, the principle has been decided, and having decided the principle one then got down to discussing the details of the bill, to ensure that the principles were carried out to the fullest extent.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a further question. I wonder whether the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River raised that particular thesis with the minister, and whether he examined the minister's opening speech in connection with the very idealistic theory that he has just propounded. If he had examined the minister's speech I think he would have seen that there is contained in it a whole history of integration and justification for the principle of the bill. The minister spoke for 50 minutes on integration, and less than 10 minutes on unification. Therefore, perhaps the hon. member would care to suggest to the minister, "Physician, heal thyself."

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I have just one other question for the hon. member. I think we are making this an interesting evening for him. The hon. member was talking about the number of brush fires that have occurred since the end of the second world war and said that our forces should be prepared to move quickly to trouble spots. Is the hon. member advocating the use of the proposed unified force for peace restoring, and what would be his definition of peace restoring? The phrase was used by the minister in his speech of December 7, which I hope the hon. member has read, and it has been used by other people since. What does the hon. member understand to be the meaning of peace restoring, and how would he use our forces?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, I think it is a case where we would not go barging in unilaterally. It is a case where we would go in if we were invited by both sides, such as was the case with Cyprus, for example. We would really be providing a buffer. I do not think it is for us to go around playing the policeman, the way the United States is apparently trying to do in various parts of the world.

The point I am trying to make is that peace keeping, to my mind, means that when two countries happen to get into difficulty and require a buffer, we should be ready to provide that buffer at a moment's notice. Like politicians, countries often get into troubles that they regret later, and they look for a face-saving way of getting out of them. I think Canada can contribute in this way.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is qualified for the post of secretary of state for external affairs, because he has done exactly what the minister did yesterday. I asked the minister about peace restoring, and he transformed it into peace keeping and gave me a completely different answer from what I expected from him. The hon. member has done exactly the same thing.

Mr. Reid: It would seem to me that peace restoring would be a situation where you barged in unilaterally. Peace keeping would be a situation where you attempted to keep the parties apart and allowed time for the healing graces to work. I cannot see Canada, under any circumstances in the world, barging in unasked by both parties and trying unilaterally to settle an international incident.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I would be permitted to ask the hon. member a question. I have followed very closely what he has said, and what he did say intrigues me. Has the hon. member forgotten that when Bill C-243 was introduced in the house, the members of this party and the official opposition, because of voting on the principle on second reading, pleaded with the government to send the bill, before second reading, to the defence committee for clarification and explanation and so we could hear evidence in respect of this question. We were denied the right, by those of the government benches, to have the bill go to the defence committee before the vote on second reading. Because of the denial of the right to have the bill go to the committee before second reading, when it came to second reading we in this party said we would vote for second reading but only on the basis of the bill then going to the committee for clarification, explanation and to find out what the goal is in this respect.

We voted that way to get the bill to the committee. Now how can the hon. member say that we have accepted it in principle in view of what the official opposition and our party have tried to do before second reading, which was denied us by the government? How can he make such allegations when the government refused us that right?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, there is an easy explanation for this. First of it all it seems to me that the hon. member for Vancouver East is propounding a novel constitutional doctrine in this house. It is the government's responsibility to put forward its point on policy, to force it to a vote in the House of Commons and to accept the responsibility in accordance with the decision of the house. In this case the government did accept its responsibility. What the hon. member would like us to do is to send bills to committees before they are accepted in principle in the house, and therefore to debate the principle in committee. This may be right or wrong, but the fact of the matter is that the tradition, the custom and the way in which this house operates is to have the house decide on the principle and then send the bill to committee for discussion of its various aspects to ensure that the principle is carried out adequately.

Mr. Winch: If my hon. friend is saying that we have never sent a bill to the committee before second reading, then he should check and see what in fact has happened.

Mr. Reid: I am not saying that, because I remember that in 1964 a bill on transportation was sent to the committee for investigation of a particular aspect upon which the government had not reached a decision. In the case now before us the government had made up its mind, had decided to risk a vote in the House of Commons, and had accepted its responsibility. If integration or unification, call it what you will, does not work out in the way in which the minister says it will, then the government may fall. However, the point is that we do have a system of responsible government. If something goes wrong, the people of Canada will know where to point. It seems to me that the hon. member cannot ask for anything better than that.

Mr. Winch: Heads will fall at the next election.

The Chairman: The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, although I have not had the privilege of being a member of the committee dealing with this important subject I must confess at the outset that this is the third time I have participated in the debate. First I participated at the resolution stage. I did so again at second reading, and I am doing so now as we proceed toward third reading. I do so because I am becoming increasingly amazed at the government's tactics as they proceed from stage to stage in dealing with this particular piece of legislation. There is an old saying that what matters is not what you do but the way in which you do it.

As I have followed the deliberations in the committee and the discussions during the current third reading stage I have been amazed at the government's, and in particular the minister's, persistence in trying to bulldoze the legislation before us through the house, regardless of the evidence that was produced in the recent deliberations of the committee and regardless of the very sound arguments that have been propounded in the course of the debate at the present time, arguments which are largely gleaned from the voluminous committee reports which prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that there is a creditibility gap in what the minister has been presenting with reference to the present discussion.

Not so long ago the minister was being hailed across the nation as a miracle worker in reorganizing Canada's armed forces. The press in general, with minor exceptions, was loud in its praise of the manner in which the new minister was proceeding to accelerate the process of integration which has been going on in Canada for the past ten years. I know the suggestion has been put forward in this debate that this is an idea which has emerged from the new Liberal government and from the minister himself, but anyone who has been in touch with military affairs not only in this country but in other nations as well knows that every modern nation has been endeavouring to reorganize its armed forces on the basis of the integration principle, that is integration at the command level.

Having proceeded successfully thus far I am amazed to find the minister, seemingly supported at this stage by his very capable public relations service which up until recent times has been able to steer the press in the right direction, destroying his reputation, and permitting his reputation to be tarnished by a bullheaded approach to a policy which can only result in the destruction of our defence potential in carrying out our obligations and our various international commitments. This is an argument put forward not only by a stubborn opposition; it is an argument which has been put forward by men who were in key positions less than a year ago and who had the responsibility of carrying out the integration program.

The present government's stance is also being criticized to an increasing extent by the members of the fourth estate. One of the newspapers which has been most critical is one which has been known as the voice of Liberalism on the prairies, namely the Winnipeg Free Press. Since this debate started they have once again been thundering editorially against the nihilistic, destructive program of the government with reference to its decision to go the ultimate degree in destroying Canada's defence potential. Indeed the latest editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press, which appeared on April 4, is headed "Destroying Defence". I should like to read one pertinent paragraph which sums up in the proverbial nutshell the case we have been trying to make. Of course I take this on my own responsibility. It reads as follows:

> This revolutionary gamble and experiment is being foisted on Canada in face of the strongest possible protest by nearly every experienced admiral, general and air marshal in the country. If this step could simply be classed as a further blunder by an accident-prone government, and could be corrected when its faults became clearly apparent, the country could perhaps afford to go along for the ride. When it is realized, however, that Mr. Hellyer is playing with an annual investment of some $1.6 billion which vitally concerns the defence structure of the nation and involves our international obligations, the magnitude of this error becomes obvious.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

That is the voice of Liberalism in mid-western Canada, the Winnipeg Free Press.

• (8:50 p.m.)

There is a sense of shock, too, that the government, in our centennial year, should be proceeding with a policy that is so destructive of our traditions. We had hoped that this session would have been concluded before Easter, and that we could have proceeded with a new session known as the centennial session, when we could have taken under consideration more positive and beneficial programs for this nation. Instead, the decision has been made, notwithstanding everything that has been said by the opposition, by the press and by military authorities, to press on regardless of this tradition destroying process.

It is little wonder that one of the distinguished members of the press gallery who has just completed a centennial survey of the nation endeavouring to get the pulse by visiting every capital, by talking to each of our provincial premiers—I refer to Mr. Peter Newman—summed up his series by saying he found that Canada was suffering from neuroses. How could it be otherwise, when you have a government which deliberately creates a situation of division that seems to be based on the old Pavlovian psychological technique of blowing hot and cold to such an extent that not only is the government confused but they have confused the whole nation. The centennial commissioner, John Fisher—I have heard him on this theme many times—constantly urges Canadians to get off the psychiatrist's couch, to move forward on positive lines, to think in terms of things that hold us together, to emphasize those things which unite us rather than those things which divide us.

The approach of the government toward the bill now before us almost reflects the spirit of anarchy that is abroad in the world today. Now, admittedly, as I listened to the minister make his lengthy statement in opening this phase of the debate on Monday, there was a change in his attitude and his tone. His arrogance was subdued. The tendency to describe members of the opposition as ignoramuses, because they did not agree with his viewpoint, was also subdued somewhat. I think perhaps this was more the result of the recent press criticism that has arisen rather than any criticism that has come from this highest court of public opinion. The press has been criticial of the minister's unbending, stubborn, arrogant attitude on this matter. Not even the skill of his public relations apparatus has been able to smother this growing press protest. Of course, there are still some of the gentlemen in the press gallery who are dependent upon handouts from the efficient public relations machine for their information.

The myths have been destroyed. The myths that gave the initial program such unusual momentum and which resulted in the accolades from across the nation, and also outside the nation, have now been destroyed. There was the myth, for example, that the opposition was merely an admiral's revolt; it was a case of the government resisting a revolt of the military against the civilian, and so forth. As we had speculated at an earlier stage of the debate, there must be something radically wrong with the morale in the defence department when up to 40 of the top level military personnel are either forced to resign or are fired because of disagreement with and disillusionment from the approach of the minister. The myth that had made such a strong appeal to the public of Canada, to the ordinary citizen, that the policy contemplated in Bill No. C-243 was going to mean greater efficiency and greater economy has also, to use an air force phrase, now been shot down in flames. As the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Calgary North have pointed out in presenting detailed statistics, rather than resulting in greater economy it is going to result in greater expenditures.

The associate minister presented statistics today which pointed out minor savings in certain areas of the armed forces. However, he did not mention that it has cost the defence department $22.7 million for re-enlistment bonuses in order to preserve the level of recruitment even at the declining level at which it has been operating over the past two or three years. Of course, the over-all increased cost of defence expenditures has been mentioned several times.

Now, I mentioned the growing credibility gap. This is a $60 phrase for a procedure that has become all too common in public information services today of using techniques of propaganda in order to confuse the public. It is sometimes referred to as hidden persuasion. I am not going to go into this aspect of the debate this evening, but certainly it is misleading if it is not downright dishonest. There certainly has been confusion in the country and obviously there has been confusion even in the government ranks. The hon. member who just resumed his seat said nobody was able to distinguish between the terms integration and unification, and I am sure that includes the minister if one can judge from the comments he has made. In his speech the other afternoon, the minister used an interesting phrase which I think is revealing. He referred to the integration-unification cycle. I was reminded of the motto we used to have in our air force mess, "Those who go round in circles shall be known as big wheels."

There has been a cyclical approach in the attitude toward integration and unification and no one, let alone the minister, has endeavoured to give a clear definition of the two terms. The one aspect of unification that is being opposed by the official opposition is the ministerial decision that he is going to bring about a single service situation in Canada's defence forces; he is going to abolish the separate entities of the navy, army and air force. This is the one fundamental point that we are opposing at this particular time. In the course of my remarks, I shall give reasons for my own particular opposition.

The tragedy is that the minister himself, in the somewhat subdued approach he made in his speech on Monday, has confessed that the bill is unnecessary to do the things that are required under a so-called integration program. He merely wants the carte blanche permission of this house and approval of this parliament to proceed to that ultimate step which the voice of Liberalism on the prairies has referred to as destructive of our Canadian armed forces, as we know them at the present time.

I should just like to read the ministers's own statement as reported at page 14438 of Hansard for last Monday. He said:

> It is true that many more benefits could still be obtained from the integration process minus legislation to create a single service.

So he admits, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is unnecessary. This is the measure that is holding up progress of business at the present time. This is the major issue which is making it impossible for this house to proceed to more constructive and positive business. This is the one item that is making it impossible for this parliament to conclude an interminably long session so that we might get into the centennial session. If I may continue with the minister's confession, he went on:

• (9:00 p.m.)

> It is true that much of the continuation of the integration process could be completed without this bill.

We could not agree with him more, Mr. Chairman; that is the argument we are making. He goes on:

> It is equally true, and I want to make this point as forcefully as I can, that there are some problems which cannot be solved, there are some questions which cannot be answered, until we know the intention of parliament in respect of this bill and whether or not the ultimate goal is a single service.

What about the people of Canada? What about the opposition which has grown across Canada by leaps and bounds in recent weeks? What about the comments of the men who, as a result of long service in the armed forces of this nation, have acquired experience and have staked their reputations and sacrificed their careers in opposition to this unnecessary, authoritarian approach to carrying the program of unification toward a single service, thereby placing our whole defence structure in jeopardy?

As I say, Mr. Chairman, this is beyond comprehension on the part of anybody who understands the parliamentary process. Why does the minister not quit while he is still ahead? Why does he persist in ramming this bill through the house. It seems to me that his colleagues, realizing the situation that is being created and the negative reaction that has set in, might take some action themselves. Perhaps while the minister is away the associate minister, as suggested by the house leader of the official opposition earlier today, might seize the opportunity to do those things that were recommended by the committee and to establish a reasonable basis of compromise put forward in the form of amendments in committee thus making it possible for this house to proceed to other business.

The government have been guilty of poor management. The members of the official opposition used to be criticized when they were the government for not being able to organize the business of the house. Goodness knows, Mr. Chairman, when this session is going to conclude; and I see that the government house leader has come into the chamber just at the critical point.

I understand that when the new ministers who were appointed yesterday were having their pictures taken, the Prime Minister made the observation that although they looked very healthy and vigorous at that time, perhaps they should have their picture taken six months hence, when they will be in a condition of utter exhaustion. If the government is in utter exhaustion they have only themselves to blame, by assisting in a disorderly approach to the business of this house.

So much for the Minister of National Defence. The other aspect I should like to deal with is the essential reason why we oppose the single service idea. I am even more surprised at the attitude taken by the minister of external affairs, as displayed in his contribution to the debate yesterday. The criticism that has been levelled by the military authorities, who resigned or were fired as a result of their protests, has simply been, as I understand it, that this reorganization carried to the ultimate—the "redundant ultimate", to paraphrase the phrase of the Minister of National Defence—is placing Canada in the position where it can no longer defend itself adequately. Second, it places Canada in a position where it will not be able to meet its international obligations.

There were even difficulties, Mr. Chairman, with the speed with which the original integration program was carried out. I have talked to some of the military personnel, and they told me this was one of the major reasons for growing unease on the part of the men who at the time were carrying out the integration program from within the armed forces structure. There was no difficulty in reorganizing the command structure at headquarters, and this was long overdue.

The second phase was a little more difficult, and this was reorganization in the field. The reason it was more difficult than it might otherwise have been was because no guide lines were laid down. The order was merely given to reorganize, to integrate; and hopeless confusion resulted in the field at military bases across the country because the officers commanding in the field had not been properly briefed.

It is ridiculous for the present defenders of the ultimate policy to say that the men serving in the armed forces are happy, or that the commanders in the field responsible for carrying out the confused policy that was referred to by the previous speaker from Kenora-Rainy River have had these terms defined for them, at least up to the present moment. Anybody who visits military bases will understand the degree of confusion that exists and its resultant disenchantment with this policy.

I should like to mention one base I know, the joint air training centre at Rivers, Manitoba. This is the only integrated base up to the present time. The state of confusion, anxiety and unrest there is such that the minister himself had to make a personal visit to talk to the men in the mess, and not only the serving men, but also the townspeople. Incidentally, they were led by the Liberal member of the Manitoba legislature, Mr. Earl Dawson, in their protest at the lack of definition and clarity as to the ultimate function of the Rivers joint air training centre. This same gentleman, speaking recently from the opposition benches in the Manitoba legislature, carried this theme one step further and was highly critical of the current policies of his Liberal friends in the House of Commons at Ottawa.

I wish to deal with two main points, the first being the rapid acceleration referred to again by the minister in his speech. To be factual perhaps I had better give the chapter and verse reference. At one point in his speech, on page 14433 of Hansard, when referring to carrying out this process of reorganization, the minister said this:

> In the process of designing the headquarters organization the staff soon found they could not complete the design until they knew what the field formations would look like and what the command structure would be. The second stage was therefore accelerated. I should like to underline this.

It was at this point that the disenchantment of the chief of the defence staff and all the subordinates around him grew to such an extent that they began to protest. As they protested they were fired, or they resigned prematurely. This was the basic reason for the grand exodus, which amounted to a purge, usually seen only in totalitarian countries. I do not think anything like that has been seen in any other democratic country of the western world.

Not only were those people uneasy, because it placed field operations in such a state of confusion that nobody knew what he was doing, but they felt that this integration-unification cycle, to use the minister's words, amounted to everybody going around in tight circles with nobody knowing where he was heading.

My second point, which I wish to raise before my time expires, is this. This evidence notwithstanding, the Secretary of State for External Affairs fully defended the unwise policy of his colleague, the Minister of National Defence. In spite of criticisms which showed that the present rate of acceleration and the ultimate goal of unification would make it obviously and practically impossible for us to carry out our commitments to NATO, NORAD or even to the United Nations for that matter, he blandly asserted that government policy was unchanged, that we should be able to meet our commitments. He said this in the face of all sorts of evidence by specialists to the contrary. How does that fit in with the reorganization—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member to inform him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rinfret): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you. I shall not trespass on the generosity of the committee, other than to complete the points I have been making about our international commitments.

I was about to ask, how does the Secretary of State for External Affairs know what our NATO commitments, for example, will be? NATO is in a process of a radical change and transition. It is reaching for a new strategy, and it is utterly impossible at this stage to determine what the ultimate Canadian commitments might be. The necessity for proceeding with this legislation which, as the defence minister said, is unnecessary, becomes all the more difficult to understand.

Finally, the position of our friends in the N.D.P. with respect to our international commitments underlines the credibility gap which now exists. The hon. member for Greenwood has said that the unified force would only operate successfully if Canada withdraws from her international obligations in organizations such as NATO and NORAD. This was confirmed in the committee by General Moncel. Here is a group in the house that is taking its position in opposition, in this debate, on the basis of a situation which absolutely refutes the stand that has been taken by the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

To conclude, Mr. Chairman, I say that the important criterion in our armed forces, if they are to maintain the standard of excellence achieved up to the present point, is to maintain unity of purpose and strong, positive motivation. This can be done only by keeping alive that esprit de corps which made it possible for Canadians to stand at Vimy Ridge. It has been said several times that what happened there laid the foundations for our nationhood, as we understand it, and we commemorate that occasion in this our centennial year.

Canada's reputation as a nation and influence in the council of nations, has largely been established by the sacrifices of the men and women to be commemorated by the ceremonies which will take place at Vimy during the next few days. You can have technological change until you are blue in the face; you can talk about programming—I think the minister must have taken a course in management or business administration because he thinks he can run the armed forces as one can run a house construction firm—but you must have esprit de corps and traditions. It is past understanding why the government persists on its confused course, disrupting the business of this house and disrupting the spirit of unity during our centennial year. Hence our continued strong opposition to this present bill.

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make some brief remarks, and touch on one or two points which have come out in the debate so far.

The hon. member for Oxford pointed out this afternoon quite rightly that economics is not the sole criteria. Indeed, economics probably is not even the determining factor in a decision on the bill before us. Economics nevertheless is an important factor; it is relevant. It is a factor which, in my view, has been subject to some confusion.

It has been suggested or intimated that the process of integration and unification does not lead to appreciable savings. I should like to deal with some of the factors involved, in making an assessment of this point.

No doubt if one examines the expenditures of the Department of National Defence for the fiscal year 1961-62, comparing them with the fiscal year 1967-68, he could certainly conclude that defence today is costing Canada more than it cost in 1961-62. Such a statement can only be made if certain relevant factors are ignored, for example the fact that dollars do not remain constant over a six-year period. Such a statement can only be made if we forget or ignore the fact that the cost of sophisticated military equipment has increased tremendously over the past five years; it can only be made if we turn a blind eye to the percentage of the total budget which is devoted to defence, or if we ignore the fact that a new system of reflecting increased pension costs has been included in the defence budget. Such a statement can only be made if one neglects to consider the increases in civilian and military salaries over the past six years. Those who ignore these factors are evading the truth and creating a false impression with regard to savings and expenditures.

I should like to emphasize that in the period 1964-65 through to 1966-67 considerable savings were in fact achieved even though the factors which I have just mentioned are ignored. Hon. members should consider for a few moments the effects of inflation upon a relatively constant budget over a six year period.

Mr. Churchill: That is an admission.

Mr. Faulkner: The Dominion Bureau of Statistics has reported that the price index in connection with expenditures in the government sector of the economy rose from 110.3 in 1961 to an estimated 135.4 in 1966—the 1966 figure is based on a nine months period and contains an element of projection. The base year for these figures is 1957, with the index at 100. Now the defence budget for 1967-68, namely $1,688 million, would amount to only $1,375 million in terms of 1961-62 dollars, which is some $251 million less than the actual expenditure in 1961-62. On the other hand, in terms of 1966 dollars the defence expenditure for 1961-62, namely $1,626,104,000, would amount to more than $2 billion.

Perhaps some hon. gentlemen opposite—and this is obviously the case—do not appreciate the relevance of the comparison. But this is not a hypothetical or academic argument. Any statement to the effect that more money or less is being spent today than was spent in some previous year can only be made on a fair basis of comparison, and purchasing power as reflected in the price index is the only reasonable basis for such comparison.

Again it is hardly reasonable to suggest that the government is spending more on defence today than it did previously, when the percentage of the total government budget devoted to the Department of National Defence has declined considerably in the past four years. In 1963-64 the percentage allotted to defence amounted to 24.5; today, the departmental budget amounts to about 14 per cent. Ten years ago, 6 per cent of Canada's gross national product was allocated for defence. Today the percentage is 2.7.

Another factor of importance is that commencing in 1963-64 it has been necessary for the defence department to assume the cost of actuarial adjustments to the military pension fund arising out of pay increases. Prior to 1963-64, these expenditures were recorded by the Department of Finance in the government balance sheet. In the period 1963-64 to 1966-67, these actuarial adjustments have increased total expenditures by the defence department to the extent of approximately $179 million. When this additional expenditure is taken into account it can be seen that defence expenditures from 1963-64 to 1966-67 are all considerably lower than they were in 1961-62.

Hon. members shoud bear in mind, I think, that when the minister forecast savings as a result of integration at the time of the initiation of the program he stated it was his intention to hold defence expenditure at a relatively constant level over a ten year period, and not to reduce it. The savings resulting from the elimination of duplication, and even triplication, within the sphere of overhead and maintenance cost and the application of modern management principles and techniques to certain areas of the services, particularly the support elements, would be devoted to the purchase of new equipment. This has been done. If hon. members are in need of proof of the over-all savings which have been achieved so far, I suggest they consider the percentage of the defence budget which is now being applied to the purchase of new equipment.

Mr. Churchill: Twelve per cent.

Mr. Faulkner: The amount of the budget available in 1964 for new equipment was 42.90 per cent. This percentage declined steadily until it reached 13.6 per cent in 1964. Until the present government took over, there were no plans to change this situation; in fact, if no adjustment or reorganization had been carried out there would not be a single dollar available for the purchase of new equipment in this year's estimates.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense.

Mr. Faulkner: The downtrend was reversed, however, and in the 1967-68 estimates, 17.5 per cent is allotted for this purpose.

I should like to turn briefly to the question of an increase in the 1967-68 estimates. The blue book indicates an increase of $116 million over last year's figures. Some hon. members opposite, in particular the hon. member for Northumberland, have charged that this is an indication of the failure of the entire reorganization program. I have been informed by officials of the department, and this is borne out by work of my own, that this increase is made up as follows: $49 million for increased military pay and allowances; $8 million for increased civilian salaries and wages and $59 million for consequent increases in government contributions to the Canadian forces superannuation fund. These three increases total exactly $116 million—the precise amount of the increase compared with last year. When we consider this in the light of the fact that there is an increase of 2.4 per cent in the funds available for the purchase of new equipment, it becomes obvious that not only has the line been held but that again this year considerable savings have been achieved in operating and maintenance costs.

Despite all the factors which I have mentioned and which might have increased the defence budget, costs have been reduced and the line has been held. I think there should be no doubt whatsoever that considerable savings indeed have been achieved. There is no question but that the minister already has achieved what he promised in 1964—efficiency and greater savings in the Canadian Armed Forces. This is a point which has been disputed. I do not think, however, if one views the developments in the light of all the facts rather than by taking a selection of the facts that the statement I just have made can be contested.

The other point with which I should like to deal relates to the contribution made by the hon. member for Greenwood yesterday or the day before, and by his alter ego in the defence strategy field, Mr. Gellner. The hon. member for Greenwood was very critical of the role that the Canadian Armed Forces are required to play in NATO. Arguing largely with the views expressed by Mr. Gellner, the hon. member for Greenwood questioned the acceptability or the contemporary quality of the modern NATO strategy both in terms of the type of war we might expect in Europe, or lack of war, and the strategy of deterrence. He questioned the role of the CF-104 in Europe and also I believe the role of the brigade group.

Much of the argument presented by the hon. member for Greenwood makes some sense. I for one would be extremely worried as a member on the back benches of this government if I did not feel confident that our role in NATO is indeed under constant review. The suggestion by the hon. member for Greenwood, however, was that regardless of the position of the alliance and regardless of the position of our allies, what we should do is take arbitrary and unilateral action on our own part to decide ourselves what our role in Europe should be and then, I suppose, present it to our allies as a fait accompli.

It would seem to me that one of the fundamental conditions of a partnership in any form of alliance is that questions involving the long term strategy and the role of individual members of that alliance should not be questions which are decided by individual members unilaterally or arbitrarily. If alliances are to have any meaning, such subjects as these must be negotiated collectively. It may make for good rhetoric, it may be a popular position to take, and it may have all the attributes of a courageous, independent stand to say that we should develop an individual position here—a unique position, a Canadian position—and that our allies should adapt themselves to our concept of what our role will be, but this is the position which the leader of the French republic has taken and we know what the result has been. This seems to be the approach the hon. member for Greenwood is advocating.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question.

Mr. Faulkner: Yes.

Mr. Schreyer: Is he saying that the hon. member for Greenwood has advocated a unilateral action on our part with regard to our commitment vis-à-vis NATO, because as I understand it my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood, on several occasions has stated that the policy of the Canadian government should be to put to our NATO allies what we consider to be a desirable role. I believe the hon. member for Greenwood has refuted the idea of unilateral action.

Mr. Faulkner: There may be a question of semantics involved here, because in his concluding remarks at page 14449 of Hansard the hon. member for Greenwood made this point:

> In conclusion I would say to the minister that even at this late date it is time to use some imagination; it is time to use something in the nature of a stirring appeal to the people of Canada. Only a truly Canadian defence policy can obtain the support for which the minister asks in relation to his plans for unification.

Although that statement is not directly relevant, it is relevant in part. My interpretation of the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood is that the Canadian position should be—as it actually is—determined by ourselves, but that his approach seems to have the overtures of a rather self-centred or unilateral position. I do not know whether the hon. member for Greenwood would support a position of withdrawal, assuming he could not persuade our allies. If I have mistated the position of the hon. member for Greenwood, I submit that at least for my benefit he should clarify his position, although it may be presumptuous of me to say this.

This brings me to the final point I should like to make in respect of the position taken by the hon. member for Greenwood and I can only assume also by the group of which he is a member. It relates to this line which appears at page 14449 of Hansard:

> Only a truly Canadian defence policy can obtain the support for which the minister asks in relation to his plans for unification.

My interpretation of that is that the position of the hon. member for Greenwood is that unless the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs are prepared to accede to the position—which I think is an untenable position and one which is inconsistent with the position of a member of the alliance—which we are presently discussing, his party probably will not lend their support to Bill C-243. In other words, they are not refuting the principle of unification. They seem to be in accord with it; but there appears to be an element of argument they are introducing in which there seems to be a suggestion that they might withdraw their support for the bill if the terms suggested by the hon. member for Greenwood in respect of the position Canada should take are not accepted.

Mr. Schreyer: Would the hon. member permit another question. Is he in fact accusing us of subterfuge because we introduced the question of the relationship of the role our forces are to play in NATO to the issue of unification? Does he not also think that perhaps some of the senior officials in the Canadian armed forces are guilty of the same thing, because more than one has said that unification of our armed forces and the maintenance of our present role in NATO would make it rather more difficult. This is the position that my colleague has been taking as well.

Mr. Faulkner: No. The position of most of the witnesses who appeared before the committee on national defence related directly to the bill itself. I say that the hon. member for Greenwood has taken the position that in effect we do not have a defence policy, and that we are not presenting a distinctly Canadian position. What the hon. member is saying is that unless we adopt the position he is prepared to support—and this position has been disputed by myself and others, namely that we take a different approach to an alliance by adopting a heavy-handed attitude and negotiate an alliance which embraces our strategic concepts—he is not in agreement. Let me state that we are at this time carrying out negotiations. I do not think the hon. member for Greenwood can reasonably suggest that this government is not negotiating new roles for NATO and possible new roles for Canada on a continuing basis. To introduce this element of argument, when in fact something in this regard is being done, as a condition for support for this bill is unreasonable. I do not wish to overstate the case, but this attitude is something less than a direct confrontation with the issues presented by this bill.

Mr. Winch: Perhaps I could ask the hon. gentleman a question. I listened to his remarks very carefully. Does the hon. member not think that Canada should establish its own defence and foreign policies and institute them on a unilateral basis or in an alliance? I thought I put the position of this party very clearly before the house yesterday. We believe that we should renegotiate Canada's defence and foreign policies with an understanding as to our future role. Does the hon. member deny Canada's right to establish its own defence and foreign policies.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Faulkner: Of course not.

Mr. Winch: Why does the hon. member continue to express these stupidities to which he has referred in the last five minutes?

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with some interest to some of the remarks made today. Some of the arguments such as those put forward by the speaker who preceded me in respect of savings resulting from unification are absolutely amazing. Some of the figures he used to bolster his arguments are indeed surprising. I am reminded of the very old but true saying that figures do not lie but some liars figure. Obviously some of the hon. members opposite have had access to the services of some very expert liars.

Mr. Faulkner: In view of the statement of the hon. member I think I am entitled to a specific reference to those figures referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Nugent: I refer not only to the figures but to the manner in which they were presented. I am not in a position to say which of his advisors came up with these erroneous figures, or which of his advisors might be the worst liar or the least reliable so far as the percentages and dollar figures are concerned. Many of the figures given by the hon. member are incorrect, and the manner in which they were presented tends to make them misleading.

Mr. Faulkner: Which ones?

Mr. Nugent: I refer specifically to the last percentage, in relation to money spent on equipment.

The figures themselves do not matter much. They have been quoted so many times and in so many ways I am sure they will be misleading to anyone who reads Hansard. They are bound to be confusing, though I venture to say much stress will be placed on them. Obviously it is part of the Liberal game to confuse the issue. The evidence presented before the committee is clear. If there is to be any saving, it will result from integration. The evidence is also clear that no saving will be achieved through unification.

The minister has continually said that integration and unification mean the same thing. Obviously the evidence shows that they are separate and distinct in time and in character. They are not interdependent. If we want to get that distinction clear in our minds the question as to whether integration will or will not save money becomes unimportant. The only question before us whether unification is good or bad. Obviously from the evidence unification standing by itself is of little value.

Let me remind hon. members of the evidence given before the committee regarding the limitation on savings which could be effected through integration. Late in the evening of February 21 Air Vice Marshal Hendrick, who was in charge of Canada's air defence until his retirement in 1964, appeared as a witness before the committee. I had a lengthy question to ask the air vice marshal, but because of the limitation of time I summed it up as follows, at page 1477 of the proceedings:

I have 11 minutes to 10:30 and I would like to thank the air vice marshal for pointing out one thing today that people seem to have lost sight of,

and that is in the search for economy—trying to cut down on administration costs when they seem to be rising—integration is not the only solution; that there are in fact co-operative ways which were described which did have an effect this way. I gathered much comfort from your reminding us that the percentage of the common support service is really very low, and that if integration is to work it is only in such fields as common support or common training ground that it can be helpful.

Mr. Hendrick then said "Right". In other words, he adopted what I tried to sum up as his evidence, that the amount of savings which could be effected through integration was very limited, particularly to the command support services. Some of the savings which could be achieved are similar to those achieved by co-operative endeavours. Some savings are being achieved by both methods.

A great many figures were quoted this afternoon for the purpose of clouding the issues. This has been part of Liberal strategy from the beginning. They have tried to keep the facts from becoming known, and this has been the policy since unification first became an issue in this house. It was mentioned in such a way in the white paper so as deliberately to lead to confusion. Those who drafted the white paper I am sure have found that their conception of unification was not the same as now proposed by the minister. Certainly if the minister was successful in deluding them at that time there is no reason now to wonder why the public is also deluded. I am amazed at the deliberate attempt to keep the public from knowing what is taking place. I was also amazed by a statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as reported at page 14562 of Hansard of April 5, 1967. He stated:

I want to say now unreservedly that all of us in this house have every reason, even though all of us might not agree with his views, to have confidence in the capacity of the Minister of National Defence, in his credibility and his integrity.

I felt it was an effrontery on the part of that hon. gentleman to suggest that all of us have confidence in the capacity, credibility and integrity of the Minister of National Defence. First as to his capacity, we will be able to quote some more statements he has made. The minister himself has shown his incapacity so often that it hardly needs a comment. As to his credibility, I have always believed that the test of this is can he be believed, based on the source of his knowledge, his general sagacity, how reliable his advisers are, and so on, but general believability. Certainly no one in this house is going to believe a thing that the Minister of National Defence says unless they can see it proven three or four different ways, because we have seen so often that he just cannot be believed in anything.

Then as to his integrity. While I find nothing whatsoever to say for his credibility and feel that I must try very hard to say that we have some belief in his integrity, I am afraid that the consistent policy shown by the minister, and the consistent attitude of his supporters both in the defence committee and this house—that consistent policy being to make sure that the facts were not brought to the attention of the public and to try to hide the facts from this house and make sure they are not available—together with the fact that everything the minister tells us we find is not so, leaves a very serious doubt that he has any integrity at all.

• (9:50 p.m.)

When we see the actual situation to be that the minister has limited or no capacity, that the minister has no credibility, and that we have to search very diligently to find any reason to suspect that he has any integrity, we can understand why I felt that the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs was pure effrontery when he said that all of us in this house have confidence in the Minister of National Defence in this regard. If there is anyone in the house who really thinks I am being a little hard on the minister, all he has to do is look at the opening words of the Minister of National Defence himself on page 14429 of Hansard, the right-hand column. This was about the second sentence he spoke in the debate, and it reads this way:

Every opportunity has been afforded those who are opposed to this concept to make their views known.

We know how much opportunity was afforded those in the services who were opposed. The minute it became known that they were opposed, they were fired. I suppose this was an opportunity afforded them, because once they are fired and their retirement leave is over, they may have the chance to open their mouths. I suppose in that way we can say this minister has afforded them the opportunity. If we are to interpret his words in that manner, I suppose we may have some faith in his credibility. If that is what he means by credibility, and that is his standard of integrity, perhaps we can go along with that a little.

I find it hard to be as charitable about his action with regard to Admiral Landymore's testimony, when he went to the extent of tampering with the evidence of a witness to make sure that we did not get the facts. That action is hardly consistent with saying:

> Every opportunity has been afforded those who are opposed to this concept to make their views known.

I find that hard to believe, in view of the abrupt firing of Admiral Landymore, who made the great mistake of speaking frankly to the defence committee in Halifax, and within five days of answering those questions very frankly he was peremptorily fired, when he thought he had been summoned to Ottawa for a different reason.

I find it difficult to credit the minister with much integrity when he makes that statement, knowing what happened in the defence committee and how we were thwarted, frustrated and defeated in our attempts to get those witnesses we thought the defence commitee should call. Anyone who watched the day-to-day proceedings of that committee and who could see the evidence piling up of just how hollow a sham are the minister's arguments in favour of unification, watched the Liberal members start to panic as the evidence piled up more and more against the minister, and then saw the minister thrown in—and he put his own feet in his own big mouth—will understand why his supporters then really put on the pressure so that we could not call any more witnesses. You do not mean to tell us that the minister was not guiding and directing the members of his party to make sure that no more witnesses would be called.

Anybody who watched the proceedings of that committee and how hard the Liberals fought to make sure no further witnesses could be called, and anyone who looked at the list of the responsible witnesses we wanted to have called and had to settle without, and then reads the minister's statement, "Every opportunity has been afforded those who are opposed to this concept to make their views known", will have to be more than charitable to suggest that there is any justification in the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggesting to this house that we have any reason whatsoever to have any faith in the capacity of the Minister of National Defence, in his integrity or in his credibility.

However, it is not just the credibility of the Minister of National Defence that I attack; it is in fact the attitude of the whole Liberal party, the manner in which the defence committee was run, and the attitude of several members in this house. My seatmate, the hon. member for York-Sunbury, spoke this afternoon and I thought he was very charitable to hon. members opposite. He thought that most of them were taking their duties very seriously and were trying hard to do the right thing. I am afraid I can only come to the conclusion that they are incapable of understanding what is happening, or they have such blind faith in those in whom they should not have such blind faith that they have abandoned their duty to look critically at this question, have accepted without thinking the bland assurances of the minister, and have sat without listening and merely provided bodies, which would give to the public an appearance that some Liberals were interested in hearing what were the facts behind the defence argument.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government house leader what business the house will be considering tomorrow; and if it is the same bill, could he tell us whether the minister will be here tomorrow and at what period of the discussion of the bill the minister will be able to be here?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the business we propose submitting to the house for consideration tomorrow is item No. 107 on the order paper, that is, house again in committee of the whole on Bill C-243, an act to amend the National Defence Act, which we have been discussing all week. Then we will deal with item No. 134, second reading of Bill C-278, an act respecting the occupational training of adults, and then the motion for concurrence in the report of the committee that examined into the rules and procedures of the house.

In answer to the second question of the hon. member, as I indicated earlier today, the Minister of National Defence will be here—

Mr. Churchill: At what time?

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think it is the business of the hon. member at what time the minister will arrive back. As I started to say, the Minister of National Defence will be here throughout the whole of the sitting of the house tomorrow. Beyond that, it is not any of the business of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre when the minister will arrive in Ottawa, nor do I propose to tell him. I think the arrogance of the opposition in some of these matters is getting completely out of hand. I indicated during the question hour today, when hon. members opposite sought to prevent the discussion of the bill today, that the minister would be here tomorrow throughout the sitting. I repeated that tonight. That is as far as I am prepared to go on that subject. However, I hope that hon. members opposite and the committee in general will consider the situation.

Mr. Churchill: Never mind that. We do not want to be lectured.

Mr. McIlraith: I will go on if I wish.

Mr. Churchill: What arrogance.

Mr. McIlraith: We now have had a general discussion for four days. We are not complaining in any way about that. However, I would ask hon. members to consider whether we have not come now to the stage at which we could deal with a clause by clause consideration of the bill. I believe that this would be in the interests of parliament generally.

Mr. Churchill: We have the interests of Canada at heart.

Mr. McIlraith: I am quite prepared to agree with that; I hope the hon. member has. However, I am raising another matter. I believe that it would be worthy of consideration by hon. members to see if we could not proceed to consideration of the individual clauses of the bill so as to make progress. We have been met twice already this week with the demand that we defer the consideration of the bill but so far the discussion has been general. Today the minister has been away on an important duty; yet I think anybody who listened to the proceedings today would agree that the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) has been able and active in the debate. I think hon. members opposite should be very happy with the circumstances.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, in view of the lengthy speech which the government house leader made in reply to a very simple question of mine I must rise on a question of privilege, based on what he said. I am rather surprised at the arrogance and petulance which the government house leader has demonstrated. We asked him at what time the minister will be here tomorrow. He knew very well that we wanted to know at what stage of the discussion of the bill he will arrive. We are not worrying at what time he will arrive in this building or at what time he will go to bed or have his breakfast, but we want to know at what time he will be here for the discussion of this bill.

However, I am afraid the government house leader went a little far. He has a terrible habit of aggravating people and then admonishing and lecturing them. I must say to him that this government should control its arrogance. Of course the government house leader was in the house during the days when this government could afford to be arrogant, and this has not left him. Once in a while it comes to the surface, and he must display it to the whole house. I must point out to him that he cannot complain about the co-operation I have given him. I asked him a simple, straightforward question, and I hope that in the future he will not exhibit the arrogance which he displays from time to time, but will answer in a nice and simple way for our information.

Mr. Churchill: Just like the chairman of the defence committee. Let the house leader model himself on him.

Mr. Winch: Over a month ago we had a lengthy discussion at the resolution stage of the bill, and then at the introduction and second reading of the bill. We have had 55 meetings of the defence committee, and now we have spent four days on clause 2. Perhaps without undue repetition those who have something to say could do so, and then we could get down to a clause by clause study of the bill and finally either accept, amend or reject it in a responsible, parliamentary manner.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, so inconsequential is this bill that the Minister of National Defence was away all day. Unless he shows more interest in the bill, one could hardly expect the house to proceed with greater expedition.

Mr. Deachman: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At one stage of the committee procedure we could not find a Tory in the whole house, so I do not think there is anything wrong with a member of the cabinet discharging his duty outside the house.

Mr. Lambert: That is a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Starr: There were only three Liberals.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, if we are going to engage in a general debate on this issue, perhaps we could get into it as well, instead of having this cross-fire which is going on now.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to draw to the attention of the house the fact that there is one particular matter which must be cleared up in connection with the report which was given to the house by the chairman of the defence committee. It was unfounded, untruthful and not supported by his own minister. This is one of the matters which must be cleared up before the house leader can expect to get along with this defence bill. What the chairman of the defence committee reported to this house was certainly far removed from the facts, and until this matter is cleared up either the chairman of the defence committee or the Minister of National Defence is going to have to back water. I suggest it should be the chairman of the defence committee, who lied to this house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

TRANSPORT—PROPOSED REDUCTION IN RAILWAY SERVICE BETWEEN QUEBEC AND SHERBROOKE

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, on March 16 last, I had the opportunity to put the following question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill):

> Has the minister received protests against the elimination of passenger trains Nos. 1, 2 and 4 between Quebec and Sherbrooke and is it his intention, in the public interest, to recommend that the Quebec Central Railway reconsider its decision.

I am pleased tonight to make the following comments on my question. On Monday, March 6, 1967, the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada issued order No. 123,654 relating to the application by the Quebec Central Railway Company for authorization to discontinue operation of trains Nos. 1, 2 and 4 between Quebec and Sherbrooke in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the reasons given by the Quebec Central Railway Company and accepted by the Board of Transport Commissioners go against the public interest in a wide area and do not reflect adequately the tactics used by that company to get rid of that branch line and fail seriously in discharging its obligations toward the public.

Here are the facts:

1. Practically all the localities served by those trains are against their being discontinued.

2. The line on which those trains travel covers a distance of 147.6 miles between Sherbrooke and Quebec city. The industrial centres served by those trains include Sherbrooke, East Angus, Bishopton, Weedon, Saint-Gérard, Black Lake, Dark Lake, Disraeli, Coleraine, Thetford Mines, Robertson, East Broughton, Vallée Jonction, Sainte-Marie, Scott Jonction, Ville-Lambert, Breakyville, Charny and Quebec city.

3. The Quebec Central Railway Company has claimed that the average number of passengers carried on trains 1, 2 and 4 on each trip has fallen off gradually from 68 in 1962 to 26 in 1966. The communities served by this passenger train service represent a population of approximately 65,000, excluding Quebec and Sherbrooke.

The main points submitted by the Quebec Central Railway Company before the Board of Transport Commissioners to cancel the train service are as follows: first, the company reports an annual loss of $54,000; they show a reduction of passenger traffic as I have noted; and finally, they have cited the principle according to which financial loss is taken into consideration as regards the inconvenience caused to the public by abandonment of the operation.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I must say tonight in this house that the Quebec Central Railway Company, a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific, hid the truth from the Board of Transport Commissioners and the Canadian public, since the company has increased its passenger rates which are now double those of the C.N.R. and the best way to reduce passenger traffic is for this company to increase, to double their rates, compared to the Canadian National operating in the same areas.

In addition, that company encouraged a quite unsatisfactory passenger service, often delaying train arrivals and giving traffic priority to freight trains.

We found that on the Quebec city-Sherbrooke route, for at least three years, the company made every effort to discourage the public from travelling on its trains, by giving preference to junction lines and freight trains, rather than passenger trains.

Finally, the said company has utterly neglected both in the area between Quebec city and Sherbrooke and throughout the province of Quebec, to promote its publicity, in order to discourage passengers from using its railway service.

The minister should intervene and advise the company to maintain its passenger service, to reduce its rates and to increase its publicity in that area.

Trains 1, 2 and 4, operating between Sherbrooke and Quebec city, must be maintained:

(a) Passenger service, Mr. Speaker, affords better security to the public than motor vehicles.

(b) Before deciding upon a location, industries inquire whether there is a railway service to the area.

And surely the whole region between Sherbrooke and Quebec city, through East Angus, Thetford Mines and the other municipalities I mentioned earlier in my speech, need an industrial economic development.

(c) Even if the railway company has a deficit, it can easily be off-set by profits made elsewhere.

In closing, I would also ask the minister or his representative, or his parliamentary secretary, to bear in mind that, at the time of the centennial and Expo, over 200,000 citizens of the province of Quebec will be denied adequate railway service from Quebec city, Thetford Mines and the other municipalities, via Sherbrooke, to go and enjoy the pleasures which the centennial celebrations and the marvelous displays of Expo will offer.

I must say here, with the required emphasis, that the Canadian Pacific, through its subsidiary Quebec Central Railway, does not fulfil the obligations to which it was committed when it obtained its charter, that is to serve the public and give adequate rail service for the transportation of passengers and goods. For several years now, the Canadian Pacific has been accumulating profits to the detriment of Canadian passengers. It invests its benefits not fundamentally and primarily with a view to fulfilling its obligations as purveyor of adequate railroad services, but rather for various reasons contrary to the objectives originally agreed upon, and more specifically that of serving the public.

We see that the Canadian Pacific is building motels and launching all kinds of undertakings. Now, if the Department of Transport and the hon. minister do not intervene in this particular instance, we will soon see the company which is nourished and maintained by public taxes and government assistance, swerve completely from the course it should follow with regard to serving the public.

[English]

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the hon. member for Sherbrooke will not feel that his forceful effort has been entirely in vain. The Minister of Transport planned to be here tonight to deal with this question, but for reasons which I will not take time now to explain, it was impossible for him to be here.

He asked me to say that he is keenly aware of the representations the hon. member made earlier, and that he will be seized of the representations made on this occasion. The minister hopes to communicate with the hon. member as soon as possible.

FINANCE—DRUGS—INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF SALES TAX

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the budget speech of two years ago, made on April 26, 1965, by the then minister of finance, the present President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon), this statement found at page 439 of Hansard for that date was made about the sales tax on drugs:

> There has been much concern expressed about the high prices of drugs in Canada and proposals made that they should be exempt from the sales tax, which has always applied to them. The government has considered these representations but does not wish to act on them until the matter has been considered by the special Committee of the House on Food and Drugs.

There was an interruption at that point to which the minister replied. He then went on to say:

> If the Committee comes to the conclusion that, as part of a comprehensive and effective program to reduce the prices of drugs, they should be exempt from the sales tax, I would expect to see this done in a special statute covering all the measures required to give effect to the program, and I am quite sure the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley), who is Chairman of this Committee, will see it proceeds with this very important matter just as expeditiously as it can.

That statement, as I say, was made two years ago in the budget speech of that year.

One year ago, as recorded in Hansard for March 29, 1966, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) renewed the undertaking given by the former minister in these words, which I quote from page 3387 of Hansard for that date:

> I renew the undertaking given last year by my predecessor, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon), that if the considerations of the special committee of the house on food and drugs lead it to recommend that drugs should be exempt from sales tax as part of a comprehensive and effective program to reduce the prices of drugs, then the government would be prepared to recommend such action by means of a special statute covering all the measures required to give effect to such a program.

It was on the basis of those two commitments that I put a question to the Minister of Finance on Tuesday, April 4, as reported at page 14485 of Hansard. I asked the minister whether in the light of these commitments and in the light of the recommendation by the special committee which has dealt with drugs and drug prices we might expect the promised legislation soon. The minister's reply was to the effect that he had been reviewing the statements made on those previous occasions and that it would be the intention of the government to proceed to remove the sales tax on drugs as part of an over-all effort to reduce the price of drugs. When I asked whether we might expect to have this legislation introduced during the present session his answer was an expression of hope.

It would be unfair of me to say that the minister's answer was unsatisfactory, but I am a little concerned about the open doors which seem to be left in these assurances which have been given to us on several occasions. There are not only the two commitments made in the budget speeches of a year and two years ago, but on several occasions in answer to questions both ministers assured the house that if the special committee made a recommendation calling for the removal of the sales tax from drugs, action to that effect would be taken.

But there is always a qualification. For one, it is to be part of an over-all package. Another qualification, of course, is that the government wishes to take action in a way which will have the desired effect, namely the lowering of the prices of drugs to consumers. I do not quarrel with these conditions but I am concerned lest the desire to cross all the t's and dot all the i's may result in this matter being put off as so many things are put off by the government across the way.

Surely this question has been under study by the finance department during the two years in which it has been before the committee. There has been time to think about it, and if the minister is as convinced as I felt he was by what he said on Tuesday that action must be taken with regard to this subject, I hope this action will be taken soon. I recognize that the parliamentary program always presents a problem to the government of the day, but it does seem to me that this is a very important recommendation which the special committee has made and that in the light of the firm commitments given by two ministers of finance this is a matter which ought to be dealt with expeditiously; I do not think it is good enough to leave it until next session.

The minister still has one other piece of budgetary legislation to put through this session, the one having to do with the 5 per cent refundable tax. Here is something which is, I suggest, more important. The view of the committee has been made clear: The prices of drugs are too high for the Canadian people. I hope that action on this matter can be taken soon. This is my reason for placing this subject on the list for a late show—so that I might prod the minister into doing as soon as possible something which I dare to believe he really wants to do.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has made another fervent appeal for the removal of the sales tax on drugs. It is impossible of course for a minister of finance to forecast tax changes. I can only repeat the assurance I have given, perhaps in a somewhat different form, which may bring some comfort to the hon. member, to the house and to the country at large. The government is interested in seeing that the prices of drugs in this country are reduced.

The government will not hesitate to remove the tax as part of a program to that effect. Needless to say—and I am sure the hon. gentleman who has asked this question will agree—the removal of that tax should be used to give as much leverage as possible to other desirable action by the drug companies to bring about a reduction in the price of drugs to the consumers themselves. It is not sufficient, it seems to me, simply to remove the tax and hope for the best. I believe it ought to be part of an over-all approach to this matter.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS—
LOUISBOURG FORTRESS—RETURN TO WORK OF MEN LAID OFF

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I directed a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) in respect of the lay-offs at the Louisbourg project. I then referred the matter for debate on the adjournment motion, and on Monday evening the minister took it upon himself to go into the details of the problem I had placed before him. He reviewed the history for my benefit. I did not need to have the history in respect of the initiation of this project brought to my attention. I was aware that it had been carried out on the recommendation of Mr. Justice Rand and had been initiated under the Conservative government.

With the knowledge of what had taken place at that time and how this had developed I drew to the attention of the minister the fact that this has been the only effort made by any government to meet the emergency situation in respect of employment in Cape Breton. Government members like to refer to the fact that a coastguard college was established as an emergency measure, but I should like to point out that this was very meaningless because it followed the closing of a naval base by the same government. Assistance by this government in respect of the economy or the employment situation in Cape Breton has been lacking in many ways.

The minister never got around to answering my question. He said that the salaries had been increased by 50 per cent. That means that the men who are employed there still are almost 50 per cent below the prevailing rates. The increase of 50 per cent still leaves the workers at Louisbourg far below the average wage earners in the Cape Breton area. The minister said that he did think the men could work for a rate of $1.09 an hour. I should like to ask him whether he has made similar adjustments in the salaries of other northern affairs workers throughout the rest of the country, because these men in Louisbourg are still receiving more than some men in other areas. I am not suggesting that this is a justification for the low rate paid at Louisbourg.

The minister also said that this past year, in response to representations made by his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), 44 men were taken on again. Forty four men were taken on after a lay-off of approximately 150 men. As I understand it these men were not taken on as new employees at the project, but were men who were returned to their work as a result of having been laid off a few days earlier. Therefore, in response to a request by his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the minister did not hire 44 men. All the minister did was take back on the job the men who had been laid off. This is an old Liberal trick—slash here and slash there, and then take them back and make heroes of themselves.

Nothing has been done to assist the economy of Cape Breton by any government since the Louisbourg project was initiated by the Conservative government. Let me call the minister's attention to what he said, as reported at page 14471 of Hansard for April 3, 1967:

> We have exhausted the money. We exhausted it on March 31, and we have laid off 44 men.

Thirteen lines later he said:

> We are keeping relatively within our costs, but I want to have something produced.

We all want to have something produced, but why should there be a cutback on the Louisbourg project in that part of the country where unemployment is so high?

Last November the government said there was no more money for the winter works program. The Minister of Labour and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration have repeatedly said that the only alteration to the winter works program was the discontinuance of the $500 bonus paid in respect of winter housing starts. These have nothing to do with the Louisbourg project. Let me remind the minister that some of his colleagues have indicated that winter works projects can be done as well in the winter as in the summer. We now have a denial of this, for the convenience of a minister.

There have been 44 men laid off on this particular project because, as is suggested, this work cannot be done during the wintertime. That is in direct contradiction to what has been said by other ministers on other occasions. Has there been any cutback during the winter here in Ottawa in respect of the arts centre? Originally it was to cost some $12 million. The government is still pouring money into this project and I understand the cost has now increased to about $15 million. Expo started out to be a $20 million project and I understand it is now to cost in the neighbourhood of $100 million. Let us remember the $10 million to be spent on the film industry.

This minister has said the money so far as the Louisbourg project is concerned has been exhausted. If money is to be spent by this government so easily in respect of the arts centre and Expo I suggest that additional money can be found for Cape Breton.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): It is pretty difficult to reply to the hon. member's suggestion regarding the last of the big spenders, particularly when somebody else's money is involved. Obviously the hon. member would appeal for any amount of money to assist the people of his area. I suppose he interprets that as his duty as a member of this parliament.

The hon. member has made certain statements tonight that cannot be left unanswered. He has suggested that this is the only program to assist Cape Breton. Let me suggest that the Liberal government would never have started out with a per hour rate of $1.09. I was wrong when I suggested the other night that we had increased the wages by more than 50 per cent: They have been increased by 72 per cent.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): You said something like 85 per cent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Laing: The hon. member refers to this as the only program to assist Cape Breton Islanders. The hon. member is one of the first to agree to the annual allotment of $30 million in coal subsidies.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): That does not all go to Cape Breton.

Mr. Laing: That is the total amount in Canada. A great portion of it goes to Cape Breton. Let me remind the hon. member that this is an investment of approximately $7,000 per miner. I want to take him back again to where this started. It started as a make-work program and was so advertised at the time. We have employed an average of 260 men throughout. In addition to that we gave them trades; we had stonemasons—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): How many miners?

Mr. Laing: I hope the hon. member will be fair and I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will allow me a couple of minutes extra to reply to him. Most of the men were miners, and with that meticulous care that they have down there, a certain number of them had to come from one little village, a specific number from another, and so many from Sydney, and we had to carry them down by bus.

We introduced schools there and taught some trades. Some men were taught masonry. We found that when there was any improvement in the mining situation, those men we had educated most highly went right back to the mines because they could earn more money in the mines than working for us.

As to the prevailing rates, for every increase in pay that we gave to these men we had representations from the industry in the area that we pay our men too much and are affecting their industry. Therefore I am not able to accept the hon. gentleman's argument. He is making a case for his own riding, and that is all right with me.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): That is not the case.

Mr. Laing: We have a contract—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. A point of order cannot be raised at this particular time.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I look forward to Monday night, because the minister has just made a false statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The time allotted to the minister has expired.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.39 p.m.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VIMY RIDGE SERVICE—REPORTED REFUSAL OF FRANCE TO PARTICIPATE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in continuation of the question I asked yesterday regarding the unusual situation created by the Republic of France in failing to provide a guard of honour on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary ceremonies at Vimy, has the government, either through the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, communicated with the government of France to point out that what has occurred is regarded by veterans and their dependants as a slap in the face to Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the details of the arrangements are being worked out with the French government, as I indicated yesterday. I have nothing to add to what I said on this matter then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it a fact that the reason for the stand is as reported in certain elements of the press, namely as a means of indicating to Canada that General de Gaulle does not regard the Queen as Queen of Canada?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REPORTED AGREEMENT ON FREE WORLD MARKET AFTER JULY 31

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding press reports to the effect that at the meeting in London the wheat importing and exporting countries have agreed by majority decision that after July 31 importing countries will not be required to take a prearranged minimum quantity of wheat, and there will be no predetermined price range.

Since this was a majority decision I take it there was some disagreement. I should like to ask the minister what position the Canadian delegation took, whether Canada voted in favour of this free market after July 31, and whether this is the government's policy with respect to this matter.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker. As I mentioned yesterday and as I have said on previous occasions, our major effort is being made through negotiations for a new cereals agreement presently in progress at Geneva. At Geneva we have been seeking a substantially increased price for wheat and an increased price range. Under the circumstances we are unwilling to agree to a continuation of the price and the price range as provided for under the present international wheat agreement. So all we would agree to in the London discussion was a continuation of the framework of the agreement, but not the price structure.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the negotiations in Geneva are not likely to be concluded before the beginning of the new crop year, do I take it that at the London meeting the government voted to have a free market after July 31, and to remove the protective provisions which are contained in the present international wheat agreement?

Mr. Winters: Under the terms of the negotiations at Geneva they must be concluded by mid-year, so it is entirely likely that the present arrangements under the international wheat agreement will be succeeded by new arrangements under a cereals agreement as part of the Kennedy round of negotiations. So anything that is being done in London now does not in any way commit us to a price structure or a marketing arrangement; it simply keeps in being the framework of the I.W.A. and no more.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ANTI-BALLISTIC MISSILE SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister inform us whether at the meeting he attended yesterday in Washington any decisions were taken with regard to the installation of an anti-missile defence system?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there was a wide ranging discussion covering all aspects of the possible use of nuclear weapons and their effects, both strategically and tactically. This included a discussion of an anti-ballistic missile system. No decisions have been taken in this respect, but in view of the fact that the meetings are continuing this morning I do not think I should comment further until a communiqué has been issued officially by the meeting at noon today.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Who is representing Canada at these meetings now that the minister has returned?

Mr. Hellyer: Our ambassador to NATO, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR FURTHER INFORMATION ON DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In announcing on March 22 the dairy policy providing a total price of $4.75 for manufacturing milk, the minister promised that complete details of the program of the dairy commission would be provided by the commission in a very short time. That was over three weeks ago. I wonder whether the minister can tell us now just when the dairy industry can expect these regulations to be brought down.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Canadian Dairy Commission issued a statement on the same day I made my announcement with respect to the government's dairy policy, regarding the level of support of dairy products and the question of quotas which, taken in conjunction with the government's policy statement, encompasses the entire dairy policy for the ensuing year, subject to any changes that the dairy commission, on its own authority, may wish to make from time to time.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that in the 1966-67 dairy year the small creameries were almost wiped out, and in view of the fact that at the present time the fluid milk producers are worried about this dairy policy, will the minister take every possible step to ensure that all segments of this important industry will be given comparable treatment?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I am meeting with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture today, and the cabinet met with the farmers' union yesterday to discuss various aspects of the policy. With regard to the fluid milk producers, they are essentially the responsibility of the provinces. Under last year's agreement the federal government agreed to take responsibility for the support of the manufacturing milk industry. The fluid milk producers, of course, come under provincial quotas and provincial authority where there are provincial boards set up. I believe therefore the question of fluid milk producers is largely one for provincial authorities.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the general discontent amongst milk producers, can the minister tell us whether he will agree to modify and improve the dairy policy?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I feel that the present dairy policy is the best Canada has ever had. However, I am always glad to meet the farmers and take their suggestions into consideration.

[English]

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): May I ask a supplementary question. Have the agriculture ministers of the different provinces agreed that they are responsible for that portion of milk shipped by fluid milk producers that goes into manufacturing milk?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge in all provinces fluid milk quotas and fluid milk prices are set under provincial authority. I believe it is quite obvious, therefore, that within the constitutional practice as it has evolved the provinces have assumed responsibility for the price level and support in the fluid milk area.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the self-gratulation the minister has given to the dairy policy and the happiness it has brought to Canadian dairymen and farmers in general, would he let the house know the secret that explains why there is a greater upheaval among farmers today and a greater distrust of this government than ever before?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we are now getting into a debate.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Diefenbaker: A point of order?

Mr. Greene: I might point out to the right hon. gentleman that in the four years—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. The right hon. gentleman made an allegation that of course has no basis in fact, as is true of so many of his allegations.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the minister stating his question of privilege?

Mr. Greene: I point out to the right hon. gentleman that during the short time we have been in office we have taken the national average price of manufacturing milk from $2.66 to $4.75.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I should say now that the Leader of the Opposition has expressed his opinion on the matter and the minister has expressed his, and there appears to be some divergence of opinion between them. However, I do not believe there is a question of privilege, and I think we should go on to another question.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO BY-ELECTIONS IN HULL AND SUDBURY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I have a question for the Prime Minister. I should like to ask him if he is prepared to announce the dates for by-elections in the constituencies of Hull and Sudbury some time within the next month or two, so the new members from those areas can participate in the defence debate.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will be able to do that within a day or two, I hope, but I assume the defence debate will be over long before five new Liberal members can join this house.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

LOUISBOURG FORTRESS—RETURN TO WORK OF MEN LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Having received representation from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, will the government now rehire workers laid off at Fortress Louisbourg?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the question as asked is in order. The hon. member is making a suggestion or imputation. I do not want to be difficult, but I do not think the question as asked is acceptable. Perhaps the hon. member might want to rephrase it.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I will rephrase the question. I ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether the government will now rehire the workers laid off on the Fortress Louisbourg project.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think I have informed the hon. member on a couple of occasions very recently that beginning in May it is our intention to rehire, with first preference being given these people who were laid off.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): As usual the minister has been misinformed. Ten o'clock Monday.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should bring to the attention of the hon. member that to the best of my knowledge he has already asked this question twice and it has been answered twice. I am not too sure whether the rules of the house allow the same question to come up regularly in the adjournment debates, but I will look into the matter and consider the situation early next week.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to the fact that I have asked a different question on each occasion, and the answers are becoming more confused. I had given notice to debate this question at ten o'clock on Tuesday, but because one hon. member had made arrangements to use the ten minute period on Tuesday I could not get the floor that night, though there was a ten minute period for discussion. However, I give notice that I will debate the matter on Monday at ten.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member consults the rules he will ascertain that the matter is still in the hands of the Speaker to decide.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATEMENT ON REGULATIONS UNDER NEW LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question which was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on Monday respecting the regulations of the Public Service Staff Relations Board. Regulations pertaining to certificate applications have been approved by the board and will be published in the April 12 issue of the Canada Gazette. Regulations pertaining to dispute settlement specification, grievance process and adjudication procedure, complaints procedure and references on questions of law or jurisdiction have also been approved by the board, and it is anticipated that barring some unforeseen circumstance they will be published in the April 26 issue of the Gazette.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the minister will recall that I asked about the regulations under two acts, both the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Public Service Employment Act. Can he tell me about the latter?

Mr. Gordon: I will have to take that supplementary question as notice.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF LIMITS ON USE OF PESTICIDES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the government give consideration to establishing statutory safety limits on the use of two specific pesticides, aldrin and dieldrin, so that foods produced with their use may not carry a residue above health safety levels?

Mr. Speaker: Order, this question should be placed on the order paper.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South).]

NATIONAL SECURITY

PROTECTION OF U.S. VICE PRESIDENT ON CANADIAN VISIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Solicitor General. My question is based on criticism and considerable annoyance expressed by some Canadians and in newspaper editorials with respect to the necessity for two carloads of F.B.I. men to come to Canada to protect United States Vice President Hubert Humphrey on his recent visit to Canada.

My question is this. Will the minister inform the house whether in his opinion it was necessary for the F.B.I. to come to Canada on this occasion? And would the minister inform the house whether he considers that our own R.C.M.P. are not just as capable of protecting any distinguished visitor to Canada as imported bodyguards?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. No doubt the Solicitor General would like the opportunity to reply at least to the second part of the question, but I suggest to the hon. member, with respect, that the question is not in order.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Arising out of that question I ask the minister this. Is it a fact that because of an unprecedented influx of mafia gangland thugs into Canada, at the present time United States officials and those of the R.C.M.P. are meeting with a view to arriving at some plan that will control this kind of immigration that Canada does not want?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept as a fact the preliminary part of the question. I will say, however, that the R.C.M.P. are co-operating closely with law enforcement agencies in the United States to keep crime under control.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask specifically whether at this very moment and in the last week there have been meetings between the R.C.M.P. and United States officials of the F.B.I. and the like, to prevent or do something to prevent the influx into Montreal and Toronto of United States mafia figures.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. gentleman is referring to a press report that appeared this week in one of the daily newspapers, I am informed that the reference was not to R.C.M.P. officials but, I believe, to municipal officials who were visiting New York state.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am referring to the New York Times, which refers to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Pennell: I thank the hon. gentleman for bringing to my attention the reference in the New York Times. I was also referring to the same press report. It is my understanding that the reference was to a municipal police force and not to members of the R.C.M.P., though the report referred to them as being of the R.C.M.P.

I wish to reassert my original statement, that the R.C.M.P. are in continuing close co-operation with law enforcement agencies in the United States. It is my understanding that there has been no significant increase in organized crime since I assumed my responsibilities. I say this being well aware of the serious nature of crime, but the fact is that crime has been held under control owing to measures which have been taken over the past 18 months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: As the right hon. Leader of the Opposition by an ingenious method has brought this topic to the attention of the minister, could the minister now answer my question which would appear to be in order?

Mr. Pennell: If the answer to one question can bring the answer to another in order, I am pleased to say, first of all, that I have every confidence in the ability of the R.C.M.P. to discharge their duties in this and every other matter. The presence of persons accompanying distinguished visitors to Canada is a matter of liaison, and arrangements are reciprocal in visits of this kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Since when did the Canadian Prime Minister have that protection in his visits to the United States?

Mr. Matheson: He wouldn't need it anywhere in the world.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—CONTRACT DISPUTE WITH SCHOOL TEACHERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As yesterday was the deadline date set by teachers in the Northwest Territories in regard to their contract commitments with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, can the minister say whether a decision has been reached by the government with respect to these demands? If so, have the teachers accepted the government's offer?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to hear the use of the word "deadline", because I do not think there is a serious core of acerbity between the teachers and the department at the present time. With respect to the teachers in the Northwest Territories during the past year, there has been agreement to improvements in the terms of their employment. One item involving a small amount of money and reducing the contract period from 12 months to 10 months remains outstanding. This will be taken care of quickly, to the satisfaction of the teachers.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs based on a report that the United Nations mission to Aden is to be withdrawn. Has there been any suggestion from any source that the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs should use his good offices in this troubled area, or has be been overlooked by his friends in international circles?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he will be giving us some time today any instructions which he may have received from Mr. McNamara.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

POLLUTION

REQUEST FOR COUNTRY-WIDE SHOWING OF FILM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of his sponsorship of the showing last night of a very interesting film on pollution on parliament hill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Barnett: I should like to ask whether arrangements are being made through the council of resource ministers or otherwise to have this film shown in various centres across the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest this is a question which should be placed on the order paper. The information should be obtained in some other way than by asking a question at this time.

AGRICULTURE

POTATOES—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): I have a most important question for the Minister of Agriculture related to similar questions asked by my hon. friends from Prince Edward Island. Has the minister yet received a resolution unanimously adopted by the Prince Edward Island legislature urging an improved program for dealing with the current potato surplus? If so, is he giving favourable consideration to this reasonable request of the legislature?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): The resolution which was forwarded to me indicated that the Prince Edward Island legislature supported the appeal of the province of New Brunswick with respect to a program of relief in connection with the heavy surplus of potatoes in those provinces. Such a program has been evolved, and we are considering representations made by various organizations to determine whether an improvement can be made in the program which would make it more satisfactory in those areas.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REQUEST FOR NIGHT TRAIN BETWEEN MONTREAL AND QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the fact that Expo '67 will open in a few days and also that the legislature of my own province, a great number of members of parliament and even Expo's General Commissioner have asked the C.P.R. to operate a night train between Montreal and Quebec City, could the minister tell us if he has been asked, in the last few days, to do something to secure that service during Expo?

[Mr. Barnett.]

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): To the best of my knowledge I have not received any such requests recently; at least they have not been brought to my attention. But I have listened to the hon. gentleman's question, and in view of the urgency which he feels should be attached to the matter I shall be glad to bring it to the attention of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

AIR CANADA

PROSPECTIVE DELAY IN COMMENCEMENT OF TORONTO-LOS ANGELES SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister any comment to make on reports that a United States air line will gain a big lead over Air Canada in developing the Toronto-Los Angeles route because of delay in aircraft deliveries to Air Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member is asking for a statement by the minister, this is not a question which can be permitted at this time.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might try to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. When will Air Canada begin flying the route between Toronto and Los Angeles?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The latest target date I heard was some time in August. However, as a previous question—one which was indicated as being out of order—did suggest, there is a problem in connection with delivery of aircraft which is having an effect upon all these plans, I regret to say; it is not peculiar to Air Canada but it is being experienced by virtually all air lines with expanding traffic.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister now indicate the precise date?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is some date in August, and if the hon. gentleman will put the question on the order paper I will be able to ascertain from Air Canada precisely what it is.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the answer given by the minister is indicative that my suggestion that the question should be placed on the order paper was a correct one. We should go on to another question.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO TENDER CALLS FOR NEW DESTROYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. At an earlier date the hon. gentleman advised the house that his department expected to call tenders for the four new helicopter destroyers in March. I wonder whether the minister can now tell us when he expects tenders to be called for these ships.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Some time later this year, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR SALARY ADJUSTMENT FOR MEDICAL OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. When will the medical doctors in the army receive a pay adjustment which would be commensurate with their skill and which would at least bring them the advantages now being enjoyed by the dental officers?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the order paper.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I should like to adress this question to the Prime Minister. Having in mind the recommendation of the committee on justice and legal affairs calling for the establishment of a federal board to promote motor vehicle safety in all its aspects, can the right hon. gentleman say whether consideration is being given to this recommendation?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was discussing this matter with some of my colleagues yesterday.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED UNSATISFACTORY SERVICE BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND MAINLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In the light of the fact that at the present time mail is travelling by ice boat between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, does the minister think this situation reflects satisfaction with the quality of the service provided by the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): No, sir, but I will pray for sunshine.

DRUGS

BENEFIT TO CONSUMER OF REMOVAL OF SALES TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): My question is directed to the Minister of Finance and it concerns the recent proposal to remove the 11 per cent sales tax from the cost of drugs. Has the minister in mind any way of ensuring that this 11 per cent saving will be passed on to the consumer?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would think this is a question of a general nature which cannot be asked at this time.

[Translation]

GRAIN

QUEBEC—POSSIBLE SALE OR LEASE OF ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Would he assure the house that the grain elevators in the city of Quebec will not be rented to foreigners?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I think this question should be regarded as urgent, because the matter is under discussion at the present time. I do not think I can give an assurance in exactly the form desired by the hon. member, but I can give an assurance that this elevator will not be leased to anyone unless adequate provision is made for the proper handling of domestic grain for the farmers of the Quebec area.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Richard in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): When the committee rose last evening clause 2 was under discussion.

On clause 2—Canadian forces, Canadian Armed forces.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to pursue much further the few comments I made yesterday as to the inaccuracy of the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the confidence which the House of Commons should have in the Minister of National Defence. Today I intend to proceed with a few general comments as to what the position is in this chamber now with respect to this bill, particularly in view of the apparent confusion in the mind of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, and in the minds of some other hon. members as to what are the issues before us that we should consider.

First, of course, I am aware that we are in the awkward position that the house gave this bill second reading and then held committee hearings to determine whether the house should pass the question of unification in principle. Having held many committee hearings and having had the benefit of the advice of the best and most senior military minds in Canada, most of whom unfortunately were prematurely dumped by this amateur minister, I think we should now consider the evidence we have obtained. We must approach this on the basis of the evidence itself, the credibility of the witnesses, their experience and the sum total of all evidence on each point that may be in issue when we are considering whether we should adopt any clause of this bill on unification.

There was much comment in the House of Commons and in the defence committee, while we were trying to get more witnesses who could give more valuable information, to the effect that we had heard enough witnesses. I heard Liberal members on the defence committee suggest that we were getting one for one on each side, and that it seemed to be balancing out.

Liberal members seemed to have the feeling that if they could call one witness from within the Department of National Defence who would follow the minister's instructions, this would balance off the testimony of another witness who had the freedom to speak and give that committee the benefit of his experience and knowledge as one who had no motive but his own wish to assist his country by expressing his views. Those witnesses called who were no longer in the department were motivated only by a desire to bring to the attention of the committee all the facts and information and knowledge they had accumulated, the benefit of their years of experience and wisdom, so that we in the House of Commons and in the defence committee might be in a better position to judge the facts and decide on the basis of expert military testimony what was best for us to do with this bill.

Having pointed out the position of those people, and having mentioned the position of the Liberals on the defence committee—that it was a case of one from each side—I think we should now refer to the evidence of General Allard, particularly his opening statement which gives the House of Commons its most valuable indication as to the strength of the evidence presented by various people. If my hon. friends on my right would continue their conversations behind the curtain, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could make myself heard in this chamber.

We first became aware of how difficult this problem was in the Landymore incident when I charged the minister with tampering with the evidence. You will recall that at that time the minister said or gave the impression that he felt that because this witness was a serving officer responsible to the minister he, the minister, had the right to review his evidence; that the witness was appearing as a representative of the minister; that that made the minister responsible for his evidence and therefore that was the only kind of evidence that could be given. I believe each witness who has appeared from the defence department has believed in this course of conduct. I believe that if a serving officer feels—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I would appreciate very much if hon. members who are in this chamber or close by would refrain from loud conversations so as to give an opportunity to the hon. member who has the floor to make his remarks, and so that at least some of us may hear what he has to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nugent: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. If I may carry on with what I was saying, it is not a case of numbers of witnesses on each side. It is a case of looking at each witness, his ability to speak not only from the point of view of his experience and general knowledge but whether he is giving us the benefit of his experience and whether he is speaking freely for himself.

It is my contention that the witnesses who appeared on behalf of the Department of National Defence—all of them—were acting under the restraint of their positions and mainly following the official departmental line, and therefore not one of them can be counted on as an officer of experience in that position who has given us the benefit of his own personal opinion and personal experience.

Mr. Hellyer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite irresponsible on the part of the hon. member to reflect on members of the armed forces who are not able to come into this chamber and defend themselves. I think he should withdraw any allegation he has made, or any suggestion whatsoever that anyone who appeared before that committee and who is presently in uniform said anything other than the absolute truth as he believed it to be, and I would urge the hon. member in the name of human decency to withdraw the suggestion he has made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nugent: Considering the behavior of the Minister of National Defence concerning those under his power and the way in which he has treated them, I consider the minister the oddest source from which any appeal to human decency can come. Not only that, Mr. Chairman; it is I think evident from the remarks I have made—and if the minister will allow me to continue—that I have been very fair to those individuals. I have not suggested in any way for one minute that any one of them has lied to the committee. What I have suggested is that they had a duty to the department—and that is the way they seemed to believe it—to give to the committee that viewpoint which represents official departmental thinking, and that they are not permitted to say otherwise.

Certainly the Admiral Landymore case was a classic example. The minister changed the testimony. Admiral Landymore, being duty bound to follow the advice of his minister, found himself unable to challenge the authority of the minister to do this because he had to be guided as to the authority of the minister by the minister himself. But that did not stop him from feeling resentment and later on, when he was attacked by the minister, revealing the facts.

I was going to quote from the testimony of General Allard who gave us a very clear warning as to the limitation on his ability to speak before the committee. This quotation appears in volume 27 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on national defence at page 1759. I shall read the whole paragraph because I think it is worthy of consideration by this house in respect of the credibility, importance and weight that should be placed on the evidence given by various witnesses. General Allard said this:

> It is with mixed feelings that I appear before you today. I say this because although I know this will make no difference to the prerogatives and privileges of this committee—nor should it—I personally think that some of the practices and methods of operation are paradoxical. On the one hand, there are called before you officers of the forces, like myself, who are responsible for the organization, efficiency, and morale of the forces for your defence, and who can speak only within the bounds of these responsibilities under the policies set forth by the government.

Perhaps I should repeat that last sentence, because it represents in essence the attitude taken by General Allard and the other witnesses from the defence department who appeared before the committee. It gives us a clear indication of the limitation on their evidence and the extent to which we are able to find out the personal feelings of those testifying. Let me repeat the last sentence, or the last part of it:

> —who can speak only within the bounds of these reponsibilities under the policies set forth by the government.

> On the other hand, other people are called before you, who have no responsibilities to anybody but themselves, and therefore can make statements on matters for which they bear no responsibility.

I pointed out to General Allard at the time that as a gentleman he might like to change those last words by saying instead of "no responsibility", responsibility only as to themselves on their honour as gentlemen and former officers. If we ever lose sight of this limitation on the ability of serving officers to speak when assessing the evidence given before the committee we will fail to recognize the value of that evidence.

General Allard gave a clear warning in that statement. That is quite different to what the minister said I was suggesting, that officers were not being honest before the committee. The general's statement indicates that he has gone as far as he can to tell the committee how his evidence must be read. The treatment of Landymore is an indication of how careful we must be in reading the evidence of those witnesses who are under the thumb and direction of the minister. The minister's attitude has been consistent in this regard. I suppose he still feels he had the right to tamper with the evidence of the witnesses, to keep witnesses from giving their own personal opinions and to restrict them to giving the official party line.

I still contend that he has no right to do that. General Allard has told us clearly and simply that he accepts the minister's direction in this regard. It is my submission that if the chief of staff accepts that direction, then every officer under him and the minister must accept it. For that reason the skill and experience of an officer who has given testimony is of assistance to us only in understanding his technical knowledge and thorough appreciation of his department's work. The evidence gives us no clue whatsoever as to the personal feelings or beliefs of those officers who testify.

In view of the clear warning given us by General Allard I submit we do not obtain his personal opinion at all from the answers he gives to questions regarding the practicability of unification and whether it will work. He indicated that his job when testifying was to present official government policy. Therefore it was his duty to answer in the terms he did. In support of this submission I suggest we have the testimony of others, including retired officers, to the effect that as long as they maintained their positions they had to accept direction. They have said that when they found they could no longer go along with policy they had to resign. For this reason the first lesson to be learned from the committee hearings is how the evidence must be weighed.

The suggestion by members on the Liberal side that the evidence of one group of officers to the effect that unification will work balances the evidence of the other group who said it will not work is pure nonsense. The only indication we have had that unification is good has come in statements put into the mouths of certain officers by the Minister of National Defence. In my submission those statements are completely worthless as evidence. Therefore the only statements we can count on as representing the experience and honest opinions of the gentlemen giving evidence are those statements of the officers who were in a position to speak freely and honestly without restriction and without fear of reprisal. Those gentlemen were not compelled by a sense of duty to say certain things in order that they might remain in their positions.

Having made those remarks, let me say it is the duty of all members of this house to examine very closely the evidence given by those honourable gentlemen who appeared before the committee. Admiral Landymore presented two very excellent briefs. He was torn between the conditions of his service and the resentful position he was put in by the minister. Whether he liked it or not he found himself in the spotlight of a mounting quarrel.

None can doubt Admiral Landymore's excellent service to this nation over the years. Certainly his promotions over the years to the position he held in the navy, together with the evidence of other people as to his military ability and the way he handled himself before the committee, bear testimony to his integrity. I am sure we were all impressed by his general demeanour and bearing during the time he appeared before the committee.

Admiral Landymore and many other witnesses made a clear distinction between integration and unification, and this brings me to the second point I wish to touch upon. Perhaps I will go into it in detail on another occasion, but at this time I will indicate the nature of this point. The committee in considering this bill, must clearly understand that integration is one thing and unification is another. Unification is another entirely different concept, and until we learn to distinguish between the two we cannot properly understand this legislation.

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to make a few observations during this debate, which I consider to be one of the most historical in which we have had the opportunity to participate. At the outset in speaking on Bill C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts consequential to it, I should like to pay tribute to the forthright and courageous Minister of National Defence.

It is my belief that over the years the defence policy of this country and all its very complicated aspects have been allowed to slide. Very vexing problems have arisen but they have now been faced courageously by the present minister who has brought forward solutions.

• (12 noon)

In following the proceedings of the committee and the debates in the chamber we have witnessed democracy in action. I do not doubt the sincerity of hon. members opposite in the remarks they have made in participating in this debate. It is their duty to find out whether the legislation placed before them can be improved. However, I feel that at times some of the remarks made my hon. members opposite verge more on personal invective rather than constructive criticism. I believe the role of the opposition is to improve legislation, rather than trying to damage those people who are trying to bring forth legislation which they are convinced is the right thing for the country.

Mr. Lambert: Physician, heal thyself.

Mr. Haidasz: I know hon. members opposite are in a very difficult position. The record of the Liberal administration of the right hon. Prime Minister is an enviable one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Haidasz: It is an outstanding record which has met with the support of the majority of the members of this house and the majority of the Canadian people. I am also convinced that the defence policy of this government will eventually meet with the approval of the majority of the members of this house and the majority of the Canadian people.

Mr. Nugent: Party discipline is like military discipline, isn't it?

Mr. Haidasz: May I also say without reservation that I have confidence in the ability, the integrity and the credibility of our Minister of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Haidasz: I also have confidence in this legislation to integrate and eventually unify the armed forces of our country. It has been clearly explained and effectively defended by the minister, by the associate minister and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am also convinced that the defence policy of this government is in the best interests not only of our national security but also of international peace.

In the press last week there was a great hubbub about the remarks some people had made with regard to Air Chief Marshal Miller's testimony before the standing committee on national defence. Some people said they found his testimony very interesting. I should like at this moment to bring some of Air Chief Marshal Miller's testimony to the attention of this committee. One of the more interesting aspects of that evidence is the fact that this former chief of defence staff contradicted his former vice chief, Lieutenant General Moncel, on at least three occasions. The first contradiction is the following. General Moncel claimed that he had written four plans for unification, and that the one the minister had selected was one he had "rejected out of hand." The following exchange took place in the committee on national defence, as recorded at page 2299 of the committee's proceedings. The hon. member for Vancouver East asked:

> Did you, as chief of staff, ever see the four plans on unification drafted by General Moncel?
> Air Chief Marshal Miller: No.

A little later on Air Chief Marshal Miller stated:

> As far as four plans prepared by General Moncel are concerned, I am not aware of four formalized plans put up for comparison.

Next the hon. member for Hamilton West intervened by saying:

> If there were they would have gone through you as chief of staff, would they not, sir?
> Air Chief Marshal Miller: Normally, yes.

Air Chief Marshal Miller's answer corroborates General Allard's statement to the effect that in so far as he knew, no such plans existed. They existed perhaps only as a figment of General Moncel's nimble imagination.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member accept a question? Is the hon. member suggesting that General Moncel lied to the committee?

Mr. Haidasz: The second contradiction is the following—

Mr. Churchill: That is disgraceful.

Mr. Haidasz:—and it can be found on page 1309 of the proceedings where General Moncel claimed that we required a force of 150,000 men and a budget of $2 billion to meet our commitments. When asked about that Air Chief Marshal Miller replied:

> I do not know where he got those figures; they do not ring any bells with me—

The third contradiction—

Mr. Lambert: Is that a contradiction?

Mr. Haidasz:—is the following. With regard to communications the following exchange took place between the hon. member for Edmonton West and Air Chief Marshal Miller, as reported at page 2323 of the proceedings of the committee. The hon. member for Edmonton West said:

> General Moncel has indicated that he felt one of the difficulties encountered was a breakdown in communications between headquarters and field commanders.

Air Chief Marshal Miller replied:

> I do not agree with that; that is conjuring up a drastic picture that I do not think ever existed.

This is absolutely contradictory testimony as between the chief of staff and his vice chief. We saw no such exhibition with those officers presently serving. A great deal of talk has also centred on unification as a prime reason for a decrease in morale and subsequently a problem in recruiting. In the April, 1967 issue of Saturday Night, in an article entitled "Mr. Hellyer and the officers. Why unification is not the issue," James Jackson, I believe an ex-wing commander, states the following at page 23 of the magazine:

> While unification may bother those for whom the colour of their uniform or whether they call the place they drink in a mess or a wardroom are articles of faith, it isn't in itself an issue worth serious consideration. The United States air force, after all, changed both its name and its uniform after world war II. Members of the United States marine corps wear a common uniform and operate land, sea, and air weapons systems.

Mr. Churchill: What sea weapons?

Mr. Haidasz: The article continues:

> Neither body has suffered noticeable loss of morale as a result. The true defence crisis of 1966-67 is not an integration crisis. The true crisis is that the Canadian military community—particularly at the medium and senior levels of the officer corps which should provide its main vitality and direction—has almost completely lost its moral coherence. And this disintegration has in fact been going on since 1945, the year Canada ended its last war as a colonial participant and began unsuccessfully to act as a national military power.

Mr. Jackson goes on to say in this article:

> To blame Mr. Hellyer for destroying morale is in fact ridiculous. It has been destroyed by a succession of defence ministers and governments since 1945 who failed to provide intelligent policy direction. It has been destroyed by senior service officers incapable of giving sound advice or of implementing sound personnel policies. Mr. Hellyer has aggravated the problem, but he is not solely responsible for it. Today's irony is the spectacle of ex-ministers and retired ancient militarists furiously condemning Mr. Hellyer for a state of chaos they themselves were busy creating while he was still a backbencher.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense.

[Mr. Haidasz.]

Mr. Lambert: What are this man's qualifications, other than the ability to write with a facile pen?

• (12:10 p.m.)

Mr. Haidasz: Air Chief Marshal Miller concurred with this view when he stated, as reported at page 2293 of the committee's proceedings:

> First of all the diagnosis (that) was causing this—

He was referring to the recruiting problem.

> —was basically the time away from home, pay of the people who were separated from their families, shore-sea ratio; all these problems existed and required rectification. We could not do all the things to repair them as we wanted to do, but quite a bit has been done for the man in the navy now to make his lot a little happier one and therefore make it easier to recruit people into the navy.

To me this is an indication that the Minister of National Defence is carrying out his responsibilities, and is taking the necessary steps to ensure that the Canadian servicemen will have the best possible environment in which to perform their duties.

Much of the committee's time was spent on the subject of the operational effectiveness of the services, and I believe the quotation I have just read leads nicely into this subject. I should like to quote an exchange on this topic between Air Chief Marshal Miller and some of the committee members at page 2306, where Air Chief Marshal Miller and the hon. member for Edmonton West spoke about the drop in numbers in the air force. It reads as follows:

> Well, through the natural process of growing older, our forces were largely world war II forces—the officer category, and the NCO category—and there was going to be a bust of releases starting about now but going on for the next four or five years in which there will be a real bleeding-off of skilled people through normal retirement.
> This was a worrisome thing and one of the things we had to look at was to try and string out the younger group coming along, because there was a period there from about 1945 to 1950 where an increase in new people coming into the forces was very very small indeed.

At one point in the questioning the hon. member for Hamilton West and the air chief marshal explored the question of the actual effectiveness of the forces. I will read from page 2322 where the hon. member stated the following with regard to the navy:

> We would have greater fire power with the new equipment and with reduced personnel. It does mean to say that we are less effective by having reduced personnel.

At another point the hon. member for Hamilton West asked another question. He asked whether in the opinion of the air chief marshal the operational effectiveness of our land contribution to NATO has been enhanced since 1962, to which the air chief marshal said it has. The hon. member for Hamilton West asked him in what way, to which Air Chief Marshal Miller replied "more modern equipment in practically every phase of it. The hon. member for Hamilton West then asked:

> Would not this more modern equipment and increase in aircraft make us better able to carry out our assignment to the UN, should they come to us for additional commitments?

The air chief marshal replied:

> I would be of the opinion that it would, certainly.

Then the hon. member for Hamilton West asked "are we better off operationally today than we were in 1962? Air Chief Marshal Miller replied: "Yes". Later on the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek asked the following question:

> Now in answer to Mr. Macaluso's question, you said that the Canadian forces have greatly increased their combat effectiveness—all the services—in the last phase since 1962 to 1966, at the time you retired. Did I understand correctly that you felt there was quite an increase in the combat effectiveness of the Canadian troops?
> Air Chief Marshal Miller: Yes; I had a little joust with Mr. Macaluso on that.

Earlier in the deliberations the air marshal had stated "Certainly the quality of weaponry in all three services is better than it has been in the past." The air chief marshal concurred also with the article he had written while chief of defence staff. He said the following, as appears at page 2294 of the committee's proceedings:

> —throughout the period of reorganization we have maintained our operational capability. There has been no loss of efficiency, no cutting of commitments. Indeed, we have accepted new responsibilities and taken them in our stride.

I believe the air chief marshal's assessment corroborates the picture presented to us by the defence, staff, that Canada has never had a more effective force for the money being spent. With regard to our commitments, the air chief marshal and the hon. member for Greenwood exchanged the following opinions, as reported at page 2330 of the committee's proceedings:

> Mr. Brewin: Is it a fact, then, that within the existing budget limits you are saying that you can put more emphasis on both a mobile intervention force with greater transportability and carry out the existing commitments?
> Air Chief Marshal Miller: Yes, because you do it with the same force.

Therefore it seems that once again the air chief marshal and the defence staff concur in the opinion that our military force is in excellent shape and that we are effectively and efficiently meeting our commitments and fulfilling our roles.

With regard to the planning for unification the air chief marshal said the following, as appears at page 2296 of the committee's proceedings:

> Yes, there certainly had been discussion on it—

Later the hon. member for Kootenay East asked the following question, as reported at page 2302:

> Air Marshal Miller, is it your understanding that the government policy outlined in the white paper is one of ultimate unification of the forces? Is that a fair statement?

Air Chief Marshal Miller replied:

> Yes, that is what the white paper says.

There was certainly no doubt in Air Chief Marshal Miller's mind as to what the end result was to be. Again, much ado was made about the stage to which integration had progressed. When the hon. member for Simcoe North stated that he understood it was "just now getting into the clear planning stage", Air Chief Marshal Miller corrected him by saying the following, as reported at page 2304:

> Well, we are fairly well down the road on integration.

I believe my time is almost up, Mr. Chairman, but I will take only a few moments to finish my presentation. I should like now to quote one more passage from Mr. Jackson's article which appeared in April, 1967. It reads as follows:

> Mr. Hellyer may be far from solely responsible for the military community's predicament. But he is responsible for resolving it. Over-ridingly, this calls for national military aims clearly related to foreign policy, and for military rules that make sense in terms of weapons and force assigned. More immediately, swift and decisive action is needed in personnel policy. However unpalatable the final criteria for promotion, rank structures, retirement ages, and terms of employment generally, the chief immediate need is that they be promulgated in specific detail. The date of 1970, which Mr. Hellyer has set for unification becoming a "total reality", is far too remote.

Mr. Jackson summed up the situation rather nicely. The Minister of National Defence, the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the whole cabinet and its supporters know their responsibility to the Canadian people. Major evidence was presented by the defence staff. It is definitely an argument in favour of unification. The Prime Minister and his supporters will fulfil their responsibility to the Canadian electorate.

Mr. Chairman, may I appeal to the members of this house that without further delay we get on with this legislation to unify the Canadian armed forces, which I believe will be in the best interests of national security and international peace.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Harkness: I regret that the hon. member who has just taken his seat has seen fit to cast doubts on the honesty of General Moncel and the correctness of the testimony he gave before the committee. General Moncel was one of the most distinguished officers during the last war, and has been so since. I do not believe the hon. member adds anything to this debate or to his own stature by casting such doubts on General Moncel's honesty.

Mr. Haidasz: I rise on a question of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman. If any remark I have made casts such doubt on the integrity of General Moncel I wish to say that such was not my intention, and I withdraw any such allegation.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad the hon. member has withdrawn the allegation or the implications of the remarks he made. I might point out to the hon. member that the so-called contradictions which he mentions as between the evidence given by General Moncel and that given by Air Chief Marshal Miller are not in actual fact contradictions at all.

General Moncel said he had prepared four plans. Air Chief Marshal Miller did not for a moment say General Moncel had not prepared four plans; he merely said they had not come to his attention. This is a different thing altogether. In so far as the estimate of the number of people that would be required is concerned, General Moncel gave his opinion of the size and cost of the force necessary to meet our international commitments. Those were General Moncel's calculations. He was asked for them and he gave them. Air Chief Marshal Miller did not agree that as many men would be required or that the cost would be as great. There was a difference of opinion between the two in their judgment on that matter. However, this was not a contradiction in the evidence given; it was a difference of opinion as to the cost. Air Chief Marshal Miller did not for a moment say that more men than we have at the present time were not required. In fact I think had he been asked a question in that form he would have said that certainly we require more people than we have at the present time.

I also deplore the fact the hon. member attempted to give the impression that Air Chief Marshal Miller was in favour of the bill we are discussing and in favour of the unification plans of the minister. He was asked a specific question with regard to that, to which I will refer later, and his reply indicated he was not in favour of this unification plan. After the questioning was over Air Chief Marshal Miller made a submission in the form of a plea to the committee and to the government not to proceed with unification at this time. This plea is found at page 2342, and I should like to read a portion of the evidence on that page to indicate that the general impression the member has tried to give that Air Chief Marshal Miller is in favour of this unification bill is contrary to the facts:

> I feel the next step that was forecast in the white paper, that of doing away with the services, will cause the loss, against this business we have been discussing recently, of a lot of people we cannot afford to lose and that we will not get very much of a benefit from this single service proposal. Maybe after the lessons of integration have been learned and the team has worked out—and they are not through the integration learning process—the follow-on then of a single service will be a natural and non-argumentative course.

He says "perhaps", of course.

> But I make a plea for you to interpret my position as being in favour of integration as we have it now, as it is developing. I am not closing the book at all on some future unification but would not want a disruptive influence such as unification to be thrown into the machinery at this time. That is my personal view and I want to make it and leave it very clearly with you.

Mr. Chairman, the Associate Minister of National Defence and a number of other Liberal speakers have all made the plea that we should now get on with the business of getting this bill through. Last night the Minister of Public Works spoke along the same lines. These people leave out of their consideration the fact that the government itself has initiated a general defence, and to some extent even foreign affairs, debate on this particular bill. During his long speech the other day the minister spent most of his time on what I might call general defence policy, equipment matters and things along those lines. Under those circumstances I think it is only proper that all members of the house who are interested in these matters should have an opportunity to express their views, not only on the matter of unification itself but on all these other matters which have some relationship to it and which have been really injected into the debate by the members of the government.

When I was speaking earlier in the week I was dealing with some of the things the minister had said in his speech which in my view were incorrect, and upon which some comment needed to be made. The last of them was in regard to equipment. Following that the minister went on to say something about the equipment and the situation of the navy. This is a matter which has been the subject of argument between the minister and myself as well as other members for some considerable time. The minister has continued to maintain that the anti-submarine capability of the navy is the greatest it has ever been in history. I and a number of other people have maintained the opposite.

Without actually saying so the minister has implied, and the hon. member for Lincoln devoted his whole speech to this, that the evidence given before the committee supported his view. Mention was made of only one witness, and that was Commodore Porter. The allegation was that our anti-submarine capability now is greater than it has ever been. I feel, Mr. Chairman, there is no question but that is not the case. As a matter of fact the witnesses we had before the committee who were in the best position to give evidence on this matter told us that the anti-submarine effectiveness of the Canadian navy and the maritime command—it is not only a matter of the navy but of the navy and the air force —had considerably declined. This was the evidence of Rear Admiral Brock, of Rear Admiral Landymore and Vice Admiral Rayner.

These three senior officers have all been in command of maritime command or of Pacific-Maritime command as it used to be. In the case of Vice Admiral Rayner, he was in addition the last chief of the naval staff. I should like to put on record some of the evidence given by these officers. I will not read too much, although there was a great deal of it, but I want to indicate that our anti-submarine effectiveness has materially declined. On page 985 of the committee evidence, when Admiral Brock was on the stand, I find this:

Mr. Harkness: On Thursday the minister informed us in answer to questions that we now have 28 ships in commission, 8 of which are under refit, and of the 20 remaining, 16 are ready for immediate operations. Now, in spite of that the minister stated in this committee, and he stated repeatedly in the House of Commons and other places, that our anti-submarine capability is greater now than it ever was at any other time in Canada's history. What would be your comment on that?

Rear Admiral Brock: Balderdash.

Mr. Harkness: I ask you this particularly as one of our—I think everyone will admit—chief experts as far as anti-submarine warfare and general fighting naval operations are concerned, and I take it from your answer that you believe there is no validity in that contention whatever.

● (12:30 p.m.)

Rear Admiral Brock: Mr. Harkness, I would have to examine very carefully the words of the minister because, as I was trying to explain this morning, there is a difference between the fighting effectiveness of just a single unit and the capability of the whole.

Mr. Harkness: Well, following this up, of these 28 ships which we still have in commission, how many have been completed as new ships since you first took over command in 1963?

Rear Admiral Brock: Well, none. Some have been modified. There are modification programs and some of them have been completed. I do not think the whole program is yet complete. Again, better testimony on this subject is available from other more senior officers recently connected with the service.

Mr. Harkness: In effect, your evidence is that these 28 ships are the same ships that were in commission in 1963?

Rear Admiral Brock: Oh yes, indeed.

Then the admiral went on to deal with the amount of time it takes to lay down a ship. I continued:

Mr. Harkness: The minister's contention is that the present ships are so much more modern, so much more up to date, that the total anti-submarine capacity is greater than it was before but, in effect, these are the same ships. Now, what improvements have been made to them, to your knowledge, which would make them much more effective?

Rear Admiral Brock: I do not know of any improvements that have been made that had not long since been planned.

Mr. Harkness: I think this is correct. Helicopters have been added to some ships which is a program that was under way at that time. Improved sonar has been added which was another program that was in hand at that time. Have there been any other improvements in their anti-submarine capabilities that you are aware of?

Rear Admiral Brock: Not that I know of. It may be helpful to have colonels in command, but there is nothing else I know of now.

Mr. Harkness: As an expert in this field, then, you would say the contention that our anti-submarine capability is greater than it has ever been before just will not stand up to examination?

Rear Admiral Brock: It does not appeal to my judgment.

Mr. Harkness: I say that as an expert in this field you would say that is just not the case: that the present 28 ships which are the same ships with, in some cases, some improvements cannot do nearly as good a job as the 45 to 47 that we had in the beginning of '63?

Rear Admiral Brock: That is so, yes.

Mr. Hellyer: The admiral is a year out of date with his information.

Mr. Harkness: The minister can complain about that as much as he likes, but one of the great difficulties in dealing with him in the past has been that he keeps reiterating the same story no matter how often it is disproved. One of the advantages of the committee was that we were able to get the views of experts such as Rear Admiral Brock, Rear Admiral Landymore and Vice Admiral Rayner. We asked them specific and direct questions about the effectiveness of the anti-submarine role of maritime command and the navy at the present time, and their evidence was that it had very definitely declined, which is quite contrary to what the minister has maintained and is still maintaining, in spite of the evidence.

Mr. Hellyer: Their evidence is quite wrong.

Mr. Starr: Everybody lied but the minister.

Mr. Harkness: This shows the hopeless mess of the situation when dealing with the minister, Mr. Chairman. He is not an expert on maritime warfare or any other type of warfare. When we have the evidence of perhaps our three greatest experts on anti-submarine warfare in the committee, the minister simply says their evidence is wrong and he is right, in spite of the fact that he has no experience whatever in that field. Vice Admiral Rayner gave evidence on this same question, and his evidence is to be found at page 2029 of the committee reports.

Mr. Hellyer: He is even further out of date.

Mr. Harkness: Well, Mr. Chairman, the minister says he is even further out of date, but Rear Admiral Brock, Rear Admiral Landymore and Vice Admiral Rayner all said—and nobody said anything to the contrary—that all of the improvements which have been made in our ships since the minister took over his present office were already under way, had been planned for and were already being put into operation at the time the hon. gentleman became minister.

Yet the minister still says these people were out of date. They have only been out of naval service for two or three years, and in the case of Admiral Landymore he had only been out of the navy about a month at this particular time, or even less than that. The minister still says they are out of date and do not know what they are talking about. I believe the members of this committee as well as the Canadian public will know whose judgment and evidence to accept in this matter. I think very few people will accept the judgment of the minister as opposed to that of these three senior naval officers who have devoted most of their lives to this particular form of naval operation. As reported at page 2006 of the committee report Vice Admiral Rayner stated:

> I believe that a strong Canada requires a strong Canadian navy. Although the Minister of National Defence has issued reassuring statements concerning the navy's anti-submarine capability, it cannot be denied, that the navy has been reduced in size and effectiveness since 1964.

I asked the admiral a number of questions about that, but I am not going to take the time to put them on record. They indicated how the effectiveness of the navy had been reduced. As reported at page 2030 of the minutes I asked this question:

> Can you give us any estimate of the extent or the percentage which in your view the effectiveness of the navy has declined?
> Mr. Rayner: I do not think I could give you a figure for that. I can only say that the personnel have been reduced by about 20 per cent and in quality I would say that they have been reduced by more than that, much more than that.

That is the evidence of two of these officers. I am not going into Rear Admiral Landymore's evidence, but it is along the same lines. Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no question but that the anti-submarine effectiveness of our navy has very materially declined.

Mr. Hellyer: That is not true.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says that is not true, but I have just put on the record the evidence of the experts in this field.

Mr. Hellyer: That is not evidence, that is opinion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I listened attentively to the extracts the hon. gentleman has just read to us, and they were new to me. However, they appear to me to be merely assertions of opinion. There was not one piece of hard statistical evidence among them. Could the hon. gentleman read us not the opinions of Vice Admiral Rayner but the actual evidence on which he claims to have reached these opinions?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I could take the rest of today's sitting reading the evidence given in this regard by these three gentlemen.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just give three examples.

Mr. Harkness: I think the evidence given was quite hard evidence. These are people who know. If the minister wants an opinion about the ability of the Canadian Pacific Railway to move a certain amount of freight, he goes to the head of the Canadian Pacific Railway and asks him.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would expect him to be biased.

Mr. Harkness: The minister would ask him whether he could move it or not. That is the only way he could get an opinion, from people who are experts in that particular line and know what they are talking about. As far as this matter is concerned, that is the situation. Apart altogether from that—

Mr. Hellyer: The director general of maritime forces said the capability is better now, and he is very expert.

Mr. Harkness: If you read the director general's evidence, he was very careful in what he said. He was also under the direction of the minister and was brought in for this specific purpose. He has never been a maritime commander, though I am not casting any doubts on his knowledge and so forth.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman says he did not cast doubt on the testimony of Commodore Porter, but he has just done so. He said the commodore was not a maritime commander, and that in presenting to the committee evidence that our maritime force was now as good as or better than it had been at any time previously the commodore specifically presented a view that had been prepared in conjunction with the present maritime commander, who is the most up to date and most knowledgeable person in the anti-submarine business in Canada today. The hon. gentleman therefore cast reflections on that evidence. I think that is not justified.

Mr. Starr: The minister cast reflections on everybody else's evidence.

Mr. Harkness: This evidence was presented under the direction of the minister. Naturally one would not expect it to be contrary to what the minister has been saying. One would not expect it to contradict the minister's repeated statements that the anti-submarine capability of the navy has increased.

Mr. Hellyer: One would not expect a serving officer to give evidence that was not true. It was true, and I resent these constant suggestions from hon. members opposite that the serving officers did not put the facts before the committee.

Mr. Churchill: Can I get in this fight, too?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, I think you had better not.

Mr. Harkness: I think the minister has made a very serious error in bringing serving officers before the committee. This was referred to by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. The minister has had serving officers come to the committee to give evidence on essentially political questions, and questions of policy. It is in order to bring officers before the defence committee to give evidence on purely technical matters, for example on how maritime command operates, on how air defence command or any other command operates.

Mr. Hellyer: On the effectiveness of maritime command.

Mr. Harkness: To do as the minister has done, to bring in officers to give evidence to back up statements he has made about matters which are politically controversial is completely unfair to those officers. It puts them in a hopeless position, and I hope this will not be done again in future.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask my question now?

Mr. Harkness: No. I have a limited amount of time, and the question the hon. gentleman tried to ask was not a question at all. It was just a means of trying to interfere with what I was saying, and to delay proceedings.

An hon. Member: The minister can make his own speech.

Mr. Harkness: The minister gave figures before the committee of the number of ships in commission and in operation serving in the anti-submarine role. The number of those ships is very much reduced from the number in commission three or four years ago. At the present time we have only 16 ships actually in operation. Another four could be in operation had we sufficient crews to man them. Another eight are being refitted; were they not being refitted they would not have crews to man them. With only 16 ships in operation now our anti-submarine capability is materially reduced.

These are the same ships that were in operation four or five years ago. They are not new. They have been improved by adding helicopters and variable depth sonar, programs which were in operation when the minister took over, but I get very tired indeed of the minister continuing to reiterate something with respect to this matter that is directly contrary to even the most casual examination and application of common sense to the question.

I turn to another matter. On page 14436 of Hansard for April 3, 1967 the minister said:

> The advantages which would result from the passage of this bill have been stated.

I do not know when they were stated. They had never been stated in a definite or clear form. Certainly I defy anybody on the other side of the house to state in any short and comprehensible form what are the advantages of the bill. I continue quoting:

> Perhaps, however, I should go over them again today. The first is identification. All these people working together in the headquarters and in the unified commands will be identified with the force as a whole. There are some very serious disadvantages in doing it the other way. If people are in unified staff organizations as representatives of different services, the service representation becomes the significant factor in the choice of personnel. It becomes a matter of the ratio of personnel between one service and another, the balance of people by colour.

In any unified staff organization such as we now have at national defence headquarters it is not a matter of ratio, per se, among the three services. In any staff, particularly in one which deals with combined operations or with operations in which more than one service is involved, there must be representatives of all three services, to have available the expert opinion required to make the operation reasonably possible.

Whether or not all people serve in one uniform, there must be on national defence headquarters staffs or command staffs, officers from the sea element, as the minister prefers to call it, the land and the air elements; otherwise there will not be the expert and balanced advice and judgment which is essential in deciding a large number of matters. This matter of identification has no validity whatever. It does not matter whether the staffs are in one uniform or in six different uniforms, there must be experts from each branch of the service in any staff for it to operate effectively. On the next page the minister goes on to say this:

> The other side of this coin relates, of course, to career opportunity. The more staff jobs that are opened up to qualified people from all specialities the more opportunity there will be for employment for gifted people who want to progress, who are well motivated and have the necessary qualifications. Therefore there will be broader employment opportunities and consequently greater chances for the kind of person who should be advanced and should have greater responsibility in an integrated force of this kind.

The minister cannot have it both ways. He has argued that this measure will cut down the size of staffs. He is combining the navy, army and air force staffs into a single staff, thereby saving manpower and reducing the number of staff jobs. If he reduces the numbers of people holding staff jobs it is evident that he is reducing the opportunities people will have for those jobs. Completely the reverse of what he argues will happen in fact; there will be fewer opportunities for staff jobs.

Personally I think the staffs are too big. When I was minister of national defence I undertook a considerable number of measures to cut them down. This part of the minister's program I agree with; but the argument that by cutting staffs he will create more opportunities for staff jobs does not stand up to scrutiny. It is like saying that by reducing the number of ministries you allow opportunity for more people to become cabinet ministers. The reverse is true.

My next quotation follows immediately after my last one:

> Next let me refer to adaptability of change, and this is related to the other two. When roles and missions change, and this will be of interest to hon. members of the New Democratic Party, it will be much easier to meet government requirements with a single force.

Well, I think the exact reverse is the case, and in my opinion the balance of evidence we heard in the committee was to this effect. Instead of this unified force having greater flexibility, as the minister has maintained, it will have less flexibility. This is one of the arguments a large number of people have used against the single unified force; it will not be able to meet the roles laid down by defence policy.

Mr. Herridge: Does the hon. gentleman not realize that our argument was based on the fact that in the opinion of this group unification does not make sense unless Canada is willing to change its role with respect to defence?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I understand that argument perfectly, and if I agreed with the premise I would agree with the argument. I believe the argument is correct. If it is desired to get rid of some of these present roles, as the members of the hon. gentleman's party wish to do, the formation of a single unified force might make sense. But if these roles are to be maintained a single unified force is not capable of discharging them successfully.

The Chairman: Order. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harkness: The Secretary of State for External Affairs said yesterday that in his view if unification is permitted to develop as planned it should in no way hinder our ability to fulfil our foreign policy commitments. I pointed out that all the senior retired officers who appeared before the committee and gave evidence in this regard disagreed with this opinion. The Secretary of State for External Affairs went on to say it was a fact that all the leading officers in the department at the present time took a different view.

I do not think this is the case. As a matter of fact I know a considerable number of officers now serving who have indicated to me the reverse. They are not likely to come out publicly, of course, and I have not asked them for their opinions; I have been careful since I ceased to be minister of defence not to ask serving officers to express their views on any matter. However, a number of them feel so strongly on this issue that they have volunteered information, and there are to my personal knowledge a considerable number of serving officers who disagree completely with the idea of unification and who believe that if it is put into effect Canada will not be able to effectively discharge the roles which the objectives of defence policy impose on the armed forces.

There is only one other matter I will mention at this moment because I see we are due to adjourn in a very few minutes. As reported on page 14438 of Hansard, the minister said:

> The suggestion that Canada cannot meet its commitments is not true. Again, evidence has been provided to the committee which indicates specifically that we can meet our commitments—

Mr. Harkness: This is simply not so. I defy the minister to cite evidence which was adduced to show that we can meet our commitments. There was no evidence given along that line whatever. Once more I take objection to loose, general statements of this kind. As reported on the same page the minister stated:

> The suggestion has been made that we shall have to resort to compulsory service to maintain this kind of force. I think this is absolute nonsense.

The minister may think it is nonsense, but a number of responsible people think the reverse. Brigadier Malone who is vice president, manager and a director of F. P. Publications Limited, feels so strongly about it that he wrote an editorial on the subject which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of February 22; and I do not think he is one the minister will accuse of talking nonsense. He states:

> Of all the damaging consequences of Defence Minister Hellyer's proposed program for all out unification of our armed services, this conscription issue is almost inevitable, if and when unification becomes law in Canada.
> This consideration alone, apart from all other errors in Mr. Hellyer's plan, should give parliament serious reason to pause and consider before blindly endorsing his amateur military fantasy.
>
> In passing on the Hellyer legislation now, members must recognize their subsequent responsibilities for providing, by one means or another, for maintaining our national defences and defence treaty obligations at an effective level.
> It would be foolhardy in the extreme to blandly assume that recruiting, poor as it already is, will not drastically deteriorate further under unification of the regular services. Our reserve or militia formations of army, navy and air force, as well as our various volunteer cadet services, will in the future have little if any recruiting value for any amalgamated or unified regular force where all unit and service identification has been lost.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman's time is not limited any longer, and perhaps he will permit me to ask him a question. Does he suggest that his opinion, my opinion, Brigadier Malone's opinion or the opinion of the Minister of National Defence on whether conscription is likely to result from a certain course requires military expertise? Is this not a matter for a purely political judgment?

Mr. Harkness: It is not a question of a purely political judgment. Brigadier Malone bases this assumption on our present ability to recruit as a result of the existence of the militia, cadet forces and so on. The point is that these units will now be divorced from what one might call the general military organization. While there will continue to be a navy, an army and an air force as far as the reserve units are concerned, in effect there will be only one single force as far as the regular services are concerned. The view of Brigadier Malone and of others with great experience in connection with the militia is that as a consequence there will be a drying up of recruits, an inability to recruit. Thus if we are to meet our commitments it will be necessary to put into effect some form of conscription.

I am not even saying that I agree with Brigadier Malone in this regard. Nevertheless I am bringing to the attention of the committee that a great many responsible people are thinking along these lines.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a further question which with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I might direct to the hon. gentleman at this time. He suggested that the testimony of certain serving officers was coloured by the fact that they were still serving. Does he really mean to tell us that in the committee certain officers failed to give honest testimony uncoloured by any association with the administration? If so, would he name the officers against whom this serious allegation is made?

Mr. Harkness: I did not make any allegation. What I said was that an officer, a serving officer, being brought before a committee and required to give evidence in regard to what are really political policy matters, is in an extremely unfair and impossible position, and I hoped there would be no repetition of this. The whole history of Admiral Landymore's appearance here, last June I think it was, and the fact his testimony was actually altered by the minister or the minister's officials before he was allowed to give it, indicates the position an officer is in. He is not, by the whole traditions of the service and the position that he is in, able to do anything but support the policy laid down by the minister and the government whether he personally believes in it or not. It is not a matter of his personal belief; it is a matter of the system being such that he has to support it.

When I was minister of national defence I expected the officers to support the policies I was following, which they did. It was their duty to do so. I expect them to support the policies the present minister is following because it is their duty to do so, but that does not mean they cannot have their personal views. However, when they appear before a committee they cannot, by virtue of the system we work under, express their personal views.

[Mr. Harkness.]

The Chairman: Order. It being one o'clock—

Mr. Hellyer: On this very interesting point would the hon. member allow one quick question?

The Chairman: Order. An order of the house was made yesterday that the sitting would be suspended from one o'clock to two o'clock. I suggest the sitting be suspended now.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee was suspended at one o'clock the hon. member for Calgary North was speaking on clause 2. I understand he now wishes to continue his remarks.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, before the luncheon recess I had been dealing with matters which arose during the debate and with certain remarks made by various other speakers. I should now like to deal directly with clause 2 which contains the most important concept of this bill.

Part I contains the material matters of the bill but the matter giving us most concern is the proposed amendment to Section 15 of the act. The proposed amendment reads as follows:

> The Canadian Forces are the armed forces of Her Majesty raised by Canada and consist of one service called the Canadian Armed Forces.

The act now states that the armed forces consist of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force. The basic purpose of this bill is to replace these three services by one unified service. All of the arguments we have heard in this regard and most of the testimony given before the committee have related to this concept. Most of the remaining clauses are consequential upon that concept or involve other matters being dealt with at the same time.

What we are trying to decide at this time is whether a unified force is desirable. The weight of the evidence given before the committee was in opposition to unification at this time. I do not think there can be any question in that regard. There appeared before the committee 12 senior, retired officers, all of whom had very extensive and wide experience. The evidence of nearly all of them was completely against unification. They did not believe it was a good concept. They believed it would impair the efficiency of the forces. They believed it would put us in the position of not being able to carry out our defence roles effectively, and so on.

Nearly all those who were not completely against unification said that it should not be proceeded with for at least three to five years, that there should be a period of delay of at least that length of time to enable the integration processes which have been set in motion to be completed, to be modified as experience shows modification is necessary and to get the whole system really working properly. They said that after that had been done was the time to make an assessment of the situation and decide whether or not to proceed with the concept of unification.

The only evidence in favour of unification heard by the committee was given by the minister and the officers that he brought in to support his position, plus the evidence of a Mr. Patrick from Montreal who I believe was concerned with supply matters in the R.C.A.F. during the second world war. But as I say, all of what one might call the expert evidence, apart from that given by the officers serving at the present time, was very much against unification. Practically all the senior, retired officers were asked what advantages, either financial or military, would be gained from putting unification into effect. The reply in all cases was "none" or that the advantages would be minimal, that no significant advantages would be gained either from the financial point of view or the military point of view. On the other hand, they all saw very great disadvantages from the military point of view if unification were put into effect. As examples of their attitude on the financial and military aspects I will quote the evidence of only two of these officers. First I quote the evidence given by General Fleury, which is to be found at page 1506 of the committee proceedings. I asked him this question:

As Comptroller General you were, of course, particularly concerned with the financial end of things, and in your view and in the light of the experience that you had in that position, do you consider that there are any financial advantages to be gained by doing away with the navy, army and air force as separate services and combining them into one single unified force?

Mr. Fleury: I cannot see it.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, any financial advantages that could be gained would come entirely from the integration process which has been going forward?

Mr. Fleury: This is the way I saw it.

Mr. Harkness: Do you think there are any military advantages to be gained by the formation of this single unified force?

Mr. Fleury: Not with the defence roles being what they are now.

Then we come to the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller. I asked him the same question, and the evidence in this case is found at page 2296:

I do not know whether or not this is a fair question, and if it is not, of course do not answer it. Did you or the other chiefs of staff advise that unification should be proceeded with? I make the distinction here between unification and integration.

Air Chief Marshal Miller: I do not think there was any advice of that sort given.

Mr. Harkness: Have you any knowledge as to any plan that was produced in regard to unification, say, at the time the white paper was produced or shortly thereafter?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: No, there was no plan.

Mr. Harkness: Was there any plan, to your knowledge, produced subsequently?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: I would say that there was no comprehensive plan.

I put that evidence on the record because it has been said that expert advice was given to the minister in regard to unification. In actual fact we had no evidence, none whatever, that the minister received any advice from his senior officers that unification should be proceeded with. In fact, all the advice he received was the direct opposite, that unification should not be proceeded with. Following that I asked:

Do you, yourself, see any financial advantage accruing from the proposed scheme of unification?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: There are no significant financial advantages whatsoever as far as I can see.

Mr. Harkness: Do you see any military advantages flowing from it?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: Again, there are no significant military advantages.

I could go on and quote the evidence of other witnesses who appeared before the committee but I think that is sufficient to establish the fact that those who were in the best position to give evidence in this regard were definite that there was not only no financial advantage in putting unification into effect but also no military advantage. If that is the situation, that there is no financial advantage and no military advantage in putting unification into effect, why should we proceed with this bill?

On the other hand, the same gentlemen were asked what financial or military disadvantages there were in unification. They were asked particularly about the military disadvantages because as they had said definitely there were no financial advantages there was not much use pursuing that question. A good deal of evidence was given by all the witnesses who appeared before the committee in regard to the military disadvantages of unification, and they were very numerous. Every one of these witnesses pointed out disadvantages from the military point of view of proceeding with the plan of unification.

The reasons for their believing there were military disadvantages can be grouped under several headings. First, they nearly all believed there would be a decline in morale, that the decline in morale which has already taken place would be accelerated and as a result recruiting would be difficult.

Second, their evidence was that there would be an inability to meet the roles laid down for the Canadian forces, those which our defence policy provides as being necessary and with which I agree, that is, the defence of Canada itself, our NATO obligations and commitments, the air defence of the North American continent under NORAD, and assistance to the United Nations. Practically all these people gave as their view that a single, unified force would not be able to meet all these commitments, or meet them effectively. This is the direct contrary, of course, of the belief expressed on Wednesday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The third general heading under which they thought there were military disadvantages in unification was in regard to our ability to co-operate with our allies. They said that with a single, unified force, and with all the allies with whom we have to work who have their forces organized on the basis of a navy, army and air force, co-operation with our allies would be much more difficult and much less effective than has been the case in the past.

• (2:20 p.m.)

The fourth general group of reasons could be put under the heading of a decline in expertise. Nearly all these people believed that with the disappearance of the three separate services there would be a gradual decline in the amount of expertise in naval, land, and air warfare and as a result a gradual decline in the general effectiveness of the forces.

The fifth of these general military disadvantages was that insufficient expert knowledge would be available to the minister in national defence headquarters and on the staffs of commands. Those were the general areas of military disadvantage which all these people thought would result from unification.

Once more I should like to refer to some of the evidence given in that regard. First of all I will refer to Air Chief Marshal Miller. After asking him whether he saw any military advantages in unification I went on to ask him the following question:

Do you see any military disadvantages flowing from it?

He answered me in this way:

The disruption is an unknown factor, and one which I have always rated rather highly. I did not want to have anything occur that would cause disruption in the services. I felt a lot of careful planning was necessary, and that probably time to educate people was required before the next step of unification was taken.

Then the following exchange ensued:

Mr. Harkness: We have had a considerable amount of evidence here in regard to the amount of time that will be required to fully integrate materiel commands, the technical services and various others of the functional commands, and it has been raised that this will range from three to five years.

In your view, do you think there should be a period of something like three to five years to consolidate the integration measures before any further steps could logically be taken?

Air Chief Marshal Miller: That is my feeling completely.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, there should be a pause at the present time.

Air Chief Marshal Miller: Let us get the integration process further along the road before we rock the boat.

I could go on with more along that line but I will leave it at that point. The evidence is absolutely conclusive. It was the opinion of Air Chief Marshal Miller that unification should not be proceeded with at the present time. In view of the position that he occupied for so long and in view of the fact that he was the chief architect under the minister's direction in putting integration into operation, I think we have to pay very serious attention to what he has said. I think members of this house should be very wary of proceeding in disregard of his advice and his evidence.

I asked General Fleury the same question, namely:

Do you think there are any military disadvantages in the formation of such a force?

He replied:

I do indeed, and I think I have already outlined some of them. How we are going to operate in conjunction with our allies in the future is certainly one that looms very large in my mind. I do not know that this is going to have nearly the impact, in this and other areas, on the army and the air force as it will on the navy. I cannot for the life of me see how the navy, which has traditionally and of necessity worked much more closely with allied navies than it has with either of the other Canadian services, will be greeted when they put into port A or port B or port C.

He goes on to describe what he envisages is likely to be the embarrassing position and the difficulties which will ensue if unification is proceeded with and the naval people are put into a uniform which has no connection with the sea. Then I went on to say:

I must say that I agree with you. You consider that there would be a decline in the specialized military expertise of people in the sea environment, the land environment and the air environment once you had this unified force?

General Fleury then said:

Well, this is one of the areas I cannot see my way through at all. We have not yet recruited into the armed forces, as I see it, the calibre of genius who can command a squadron of fighter-bombers, a flotilla of destroyers and a regiment of tanks. Obviously, you are going to have to have a great deal of specialization, therefore what do you accomplish by insisting that everybody sort of looks alike and belongs to one force? Even in the army, I need hardly remind you, we never insisted that everybody be called "private". We had privates and we had drivers and we had gunners and we had sappers. They were all paid as privates and they all looked like privates, but they carried a variety of titles and names. If this works in a single service I cannot for the life of me see why it should not work with three services.

I think I have perhaps trespassed long enough on the time of the committee so I will conclude my remarks by saying that with the great bulk of the evidence being against unification, and particularly against unification at the present time, I appeal to the government and to members of the house to pay due attention to the opinions of men whose lives have been dedicated to the service of their country and who spoke with great feeling and conviction on these matters. As General Fleury said, I do not think there is any advantage whatsoever, and certainly none has been demonstrated, in doing away with the three services by unifying them into one. On the other hand, there are all the disadvantages which have been brought out. I think it would be doing a grave disservice to Canada's armed forces and to Canada's security to proceed with this measure and therefore I hope that the bill will be withdrawn.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, anybody who hears me speak today on the subject of the armed forces might perhaps say "he should be certified" as I have had no military experience since the days in 1922 when I was in the officers' training corps at the University of Manitoba before many of the members of the house were born. I have never had any doubt that a great strategic career in the armed forces was thwarted by the obsolete and ridiculous rule which the war office had in those days that one ought to be able to hit a target with a Lee Enfield rifle or one was not fit to command troops. I could not hit the target at the old St. Charles range in Winnipeg so I was wiped out of the armed forces and denied the possibility of having as distinguished a career in the last war as has the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, the hon. member for Calgary North.

I will not presume on my experience in any war to express any views on this matter. I cannot forbear from pointing out, that on the basis of the standard on which the hon. member for Calgary North put this matter, next to the Prime Minister I am probably the greatest expert in this house on the relations between politicians and officials, because he and I have both been officials and politicians longer than anyone else in the house and, if expertise depends upon length of service, and even in the case of the Prime Minister upon distinction of service, this constitutes a qualification. Of course I do not accept the view of the hon. member for Calgary North on this point. I think that the fact that somebody has sat in a chair in a particular position for 20 years may have the exact opposite effect from the one that he seemed to suggest. It seems to be his view that nobody who did not fight in the last war is entitled to have any opinion about how one should organize the defence forces which now, as I understand it and as I have understood ever since the North Atlantic alliance—

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Harkness: You are putting words into my mouth.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member says that I am putting words into his mouth but he is so good at putting words into his own mouth there is no necessity for me to duplicate the process.

Mr. Churchill: Words are better than a foot.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre will listen to me with the same respect and attention as I always listen to him.

Mr. Churchill: I seldom learn much but I will listen.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is good exercise, especially when, like me, you have only one good ear. However, I rose to say something about the rather extraordinary position taken by the hon. member for Calgary North about serving officers. He suggested that serving officers should not comment on policy. He referred to Admiral Landymore, and I must say I do not have the rather low view of Admiral Landymore the hon. member apparently has, when he suggests the admiral stayed in the service when his testimony was being changed. If that is his view of Admiral Landymore he is entitled to have it. However, it is not mine. I do not mean to cast aspersions on any officer.

My view is that we would be a lot better off in this house if we assumed that there was the same high sense of duty, the same honour and the same honesty in the service witnesses, both those who have retired from the service and those who are still in it, that we assume about ourselves in this house. Instead of casting reflections and indulging in personalities during this debate we should assume, unless there is concrete, detailed evidence to the contrary, that all of those who have given evidence have done so honestly according to their lights.

I must say I agree with the hon. member for Calgary North completely in what I take to be his view, namely, that witnesses who are officials are to be expected to provide evidence when they are called before a parliamentary committee on questions of fact but not on questions of policy.

Mr. Harkness: That is my position exactly.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that applies equally to any official who has recently left the service if he has been in a confidential relationship with a minister. It is surely just as wrong for someone who has recently retired and who, as in the case of some of these witnesses, is still on retirement leave, as it is for serving officers, to express views about policy merely because he disagreed with the views of the minister. Otherwise, of course, you simply stack the cards totally against any policy. You say that anyone who is retired may disclose all the secret discussions that took place in the formulation of policy, but someone who is still serving must do nothing of the kind. If this rule is followed you will inevitably get a preponderance of evidence on one side, but that will mean absolutely nothing.

I take the view, and in this respect I am perhaps more conservative, with a small "c", than the hon. member for Calgary North—I was going to say a British view but that is an old fashioned word—

Mr. Churchill: A Liberal cannot use that word.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I have pretty good titles as a Liberal, and I use British in a certain sense as opposed to other forms of democratic government. I take the view that officials should be seen but not heard on questions of policy. However important it is to have expert advice before a decision is made, once a decision is made that decision is the minister's. A minister who is not capable of making a decision should not be a minister. The idea of parliament prying, probing and trying to get at the advice the minister received instead of discussing the question on its merits, without any of these personalities and without any of these comparisons, some of which are rather odious, of one person with another, does not seem to be an effective way of reaching a conclusion.

In so far as the question of unification is concerned, I have listened carefully to most of the citations of the evidence before the committee given by the hon. member for Calgary North and I must say that most of it was sheer opinion.

Mr. Harkness: You should read it all; it would do you good.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman has read all the evidence before the transport committee or is willing to read it over the week end, I would make a bargain with him. Otherwise, I do not intend to. Many hon. members voted on the transport bill without examining all the evidence in the committee and many members, including me, are going to vote on this bill without examining all the evidence. This is inevitable under our parliamentary system when complex questions are before us.

All I am saying is that I believe that if we are going to have recently retired senior officers who have advised the minister in a confidential way exposing this advice to the public gaze and we are going to say at the same time that no serving officer shall express any view about the policy he is directed to carry out, then we are weighting the scale predominantly on one side. This is all I am saying.

It seems to me this fact has escaped the notice of many hon. gentlemen opposite. However, I suggest that it does not matter vitally. This is not a question, really, of expert military knowledge at all. I believe that with respect to integration it may well be that it is quite important—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): What are we on?

Mr. Pickersgill: For whom the bell tolls.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Are we talking about transport now? Have I missed something.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am just speaking as an ordinary member of this house—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Very ordinary.

Mr. Pickersgill: —trying to restore the balance a little bit.

Mr. MacEwan: Every inch a sailor.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right. I must say one does not necessarily have to wear a blue uniform to be a good sailor. I know something about that.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): As one landlubber to another.

Mr. Pickersgill: The point I am making is that in so far as the progress on integration is concerned, that has been going on for three or four years and the evidence of military experts is, of course, of great relevance. However, in so far as unification is concerned it has no relevance whatever. I want to repeat that. The evidence of experts is of no relevance whatever because there are no experts. There never has been, under modern conditions at least, a unified military force. It is like every step forward, and I believe this is a step forward; it is a step into something in which nobody has any experience. I suggest that generally we are apt to get the most imaginative views from young people who have a sense of adventure and not from people who fought the last war, however gallantly. I say that as one of those who, like the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, is rather a "has been". I recognize that I, like the hon. gentleman, who was born like me practically in the 19th century, have moved steadily more slowly, and as in the case of the hon. gentleman sometimes even backward.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: I do not turn somersaults though.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is well known that there were colonels, brigadiers and even generals who were in their thirties in the last war. Why was this the case, instead of taking the people who had fought in the first world war? It was because they wanted youth, they wanted imagination, they wanted people to be looking forward. For that same reason, sir, I suggest—

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Will he name the most successful generals, British and American, in the second world war and tell me whether or not they fought in the first? Now, come on, you are a military expert.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would arrange with the C.B.C. or C.T.V. to conduct a quiz program on which both of us would appear, I would appear with him at any time and answer his irrelevant questions. All they indicate is that he is moving further backward all the time. Like every military critic who has opposed every advance, the hon. gentleman wants to fight the last war or the war before the last.

Mr. Churchill: You are just so ignorant, that is all.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that we do not want—

Mr. Churchill: Let me ask the minister another question. He is having a lot of fun making fun and casting supercilious remarks about people who participated in warfare.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: I can stand a lot of this nonsense and I am not thinking of myself, but there is a limit to this. Was it my good fortune or was it my ill fortune to serve in two world wars? I could have sheltered in a university in the first world war and I could have sheltered at home because of age in the second world war. Let us get away from this nonsense, this casting of aspersions on people who were fortunate enough to survive. I did nothing of any extraordinary capacity at all; I just happened to survive. But is that something that is wrong? I am fed up with this stuff from non-combatant people who are making fun of fighting men.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think that what the hon. gentleman has just said is the best argument I can think of for the point I was making, which was that we should keep personalities out of these debates and that we should discuss this question exclusively on its merits. I am not going to defend my lack of record in the first world war and I am not going to defend it in the second world war. I made one or two jocular references to my experiences in the O.T.C., and it is my misfortune that I could not hit the target and the hon. gentleman could. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had one of the most distinguished military records in the second world war.

Mr. Churchill: No, not distinguished; I make no such claim.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have never questioned and I have never intended to question his devotion and service to his country. If I said anything, in a somewhat facetious and jocular fashion, that implied this, then I withdraw it unreservedly and I apologize to the hon. gentleman because there was no such thought or intent.

Mr. Churchill: I thank the minister very much. But when I spoke in rather a personal fashion I was not speaking for myself, because I do not care much what is said around here. However, I am disturbed about the attacks that are made upon men who served much better than I did in both wars. People are making scurrilous remarks about them, talking about them as being out of date and all the rest of it. They are attempting to pretend that these men were not good servants of their country, and that is what I object to.

Mr. Hellyer: Not at all.

Mr. Churchill: I want to defend them in this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman may object if he likes, but there is nothing that I said along that line except a rather jocular reference to him personally. If it was misinterpreted I withdraw it unreservedly. All I was saying was that when there really was a war on there was very rapid promotion of young people because it was felt that in battle, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's record, young, vigorous and imaginative people were needed—and I do not think anyone questions that.

Mr. Harkness: It was a question of endurance to a large extent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Maybe it was. Perhaps this is not a very good or strong argument, but whatever it may have been it does go back to the point that I have been trying to make all along, that I suggest the subject of unification should be divorced from all these questions about whether this expert is better than that expert or the other expert and looked at on its merits as a possible course of action in itself.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Harkness: That is what we have been doing.

Mr. Pickersgill: We should not say that my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence, who although he was very young in the last war did serve in the forces, is incompetent and incredible, as I think some hon. gentleman said, merely because his age was such that he could not become a general or even a colonel during the last war. It seems to me that that is totally irrelevant; and I hope that members on both sides of the house will cut out all this kind of thing from now on and concentrate on the point.

The point is really a very simple one. The point is that, having regard to the conditions in 1967 and the conditions we envisage until 1972 as far as we can envisage them by trying to penetrate the mists of the future, would it be a good idea or would it not be a good idea to have a single, unified armed force instead of three services? That is the sole question involved in this debate. Ridiculous considerations such as the colour of the uniform and even the titles of the ranks seem to me to be totally irrelevant to the basic question which is: Will it be better to have one unified force or will it be better to continue to have three services?

On this question, Mr. Chairman, I do not pretend to have any views that are worth contributing to the committee and therefore I am not going to express any views on that subject. But this is the question that we have to settle. That question, I repeat, under our British parliamentary system, is not to be settled by generals, however eminent, or admirals, however distinguished their service, or civil servants. It is to be settled by politicians, and by politicians who were elected by the people. That is the way our British system works. The decisions have to be made by the government of the day and the government has to stake its reputation and life upon them.

If the minister accepts the wrong advice and adopts the wrong course, of course he should be defeated. But we should not confuse the issue and avoid discussing the issue itself by engaging in this measuring of the evidence of this witness or that witness who may or may not have given a piece of advice.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: The really important thing is whether, on balance, in the judgment of those in this house who have to make the decision, our proceeding with another stage of this policy is the right decision or is not the right decision. I noted the words of the hon. member for Calgary North.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Would the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Calgary North took some words from the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller who said that we should consider everything carefully before we took the next step. I do not know whether that was just a lapsus linguae on the part of Air Chief Marshal Miller, but the next step is not a step that you do not contemplate taking. I wondered whether by saying "the next step" Air Chief Marshal Miller was not admitting that in fact unification was the next logical step but that it was merely a question of timing. That might be so. There may be many different views on that point, but that is not the point of the bill.

Everybody knows that, if this bill passes, there will not be any change from yesterday to tomorrow and that the process of unification will be a slow one. It will take several years. The minister has said that on several occasions. It should not be assumed that the minister or any member of the government is trying deliberately to decrease morale or to make the armed forces less effective or anything of that sort. All I say is, let us try to look at this question on its merits, without personalities colouring it, and let us assume that we all are anxiously trying to reach the best possible conclusion for the Canadian people in this difficult aspect of our public affairs.

This is perhaps a more difficult measure in many ways than any other. All other activities of government are, so to speak, civil activities. This is an activity where a certain line is drawn between military and civil life, but in all British countries and in all free countries, civil primacy has always been a requirement. I am sure no one on the other side of the house has any more desire to change that situation than has anyone on this side of the house. I am not suggesting that anyone has that desire. All I am saying is, let us look at this question on its merits. Let us try to forget our emotional feelings about it and let us see whether this objective is not a sound one. If it is, then let us have whatever safeguards are necessary for there to be the time required to reach that objective. If, as Air Chief Marshal Miller suggests and as has been suggested by others, timing is important and if all we are debating is the time at which we should take the step, it seems to me that much of the feeling generated in this debate is rather misplaced.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask the minister a question. As I understood the proposition he put, it was that no senior retired officer, civil servant, official or other person who has been in a confidential position should be free after retiring to express his personal views in regard to matters or to give evidence with regard to them? Is that the proposition?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I think the hon. member has overlooked a subtle difference. I did not question their right to give evidence. I think what I said was that if those who have retired gave evidence opposed to the policy and if serving officers were not able to give evidence in support of the policy there would be a preponderance of evidence opposed to the policy. That would not prove anything except that the serving officers could not give evidence and that those who had retired could. I did not question the right of retired officers to give evidence. I merely questioned the effect of their giving it upon the preponderance of military evidence. That is all.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask the hon. gentleman if his proposition is not directly contrary to what has been British practice for the last 150 years? Sir Winston Churchill, Lord Alanbrooke and goodness knows how many other prominent people who took part in the first and second world wars have published books and reminiscences giving details of discussions that went on. At the same time it has been completely accepted that serving officers and civil servants shall not under any circumstances be called on to express views about a policy being followed by the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not question anything the hon. gentleman has said. I go back to my original point. If you have a controversy about policy and if certain officers or officials because they disagree with that policy retire and express their disagreement, with those still in the services being inhibited from expressing their agreement—

Mr. Harkness: That is our system.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not questioning the system. All I am saying is, if you have a lot of evidence on one side and no evidence on the other that proves nothing. That is all I am saying. I am not saying whether this is a suitable or good rule.

Mr. Harkness: Is the minister maintaining that the evidence does not prove anything?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am maintaining that if the witnesses on the one side of the case are allowed to speak and the witnesses on the other side are inhibited by the rule from speaking all the evidence will be on one side. That is all I am saying.

Mr. Nugent: Inasmuch as the witnesses on the one side are all witnesses who have retired recently because of their disagreement, would the minister not say that their evidence should carry weight and that it proves their case?

Mr. Pickersgill: By the same token I would say that because all the officers who are now in the forces have remained in the forces, whether they give evidence or not it shows that they are all in favour of the policy. That argument would be about as logical as the argument of the hon. gentleman, and just as unimportant, I might add.

Mr. Lambert: But the minister was never a prisoner of his pension.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Could I put a question to the minister? I cannot help saying that I am surprised at the minister, a historian, taking such an unhistorical position. The minister is now forming a coastguard training school and is trying to interest people to look toward the sea in its many aspects. As a Newfoundlander does he not feel that the submerging of the identity of those who serve at sea will be a retrograde step? I appreciate what the minister said about young people but surely in wiping out the separate identity of the navy an obstacle to the minister's intentions is being created.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman should not have included his preamble because he may get a speech in return.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): That may have been my speech in this debate.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I remind the hon. gentleman that history would be very dull if it were nothing but repetition. It is because, once in a while, something new is done that history is interesting. I say this just to deal with the hon. gentleman's preamble. No, I do not, of course, agree at all with the view of the hon. gentleman. If I did agree with it I would not be in the government and I would not be supporting my hon. friend, the Minister of National Defence, in his bill. I believe quite strongly—and I say I believe because I have no expert testimony—that it will be just as easy to have pride in belonging to a single, unified Canadian force as it would be to have pride in belonging to the Canadian Navy, Army or Air Force. I believe that quite strongly. I also believe that in the absence of the artificial boundaries which now exist between the services—and we know that many people do not choose their right calling at the beginning—there will be better scope for the most effective use of the manpower required by the forces because there will be the widest possible field of choice open to those who are recruited.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Then why do we need a coastguard training school for young fellows going to sea?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. The time allotted to the hon. gentleman expired a while ago and unless the hon. member for Queens wishes to relinquish his time—

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I will not be diverted for long by what the Minister of Transport has said. I found his comments interesting, humorous in some places and in others perhaps ill-considered. But with regard to the evidence given by serving officers before the committee it is obvious that it was limited to evidence which does not contradict government policy.

Generally speaking, and I am sure this applies to the Department of Transport, if a senior official of a department appears before a committee with regard to something which involves government policy it can be assumed that he was asked for his advice on the technical considerations which led to a decision as to what policy should be followed. But this has not been the case in connection with this legislation. This is why senior officers are disturbed and unhappy. This is why 79 officers of senior rank got out of the armed services before the normal retirement age.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Many of them young men.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): That is true. This is why we on this side of the house have such grave reservations about this legislation and about this policy.

I was shocked to read some of the evidence which was given in the defence committee with regard to the question of advice. I shall refer to one passage in this connection, to be found at page 2328. The witness on that occasion was Air Chief Marshal Miller, the chief military adviser to the government until a very few months ago. Here is the extract from the evidence that I should like to read:

> Mr. Churchill: Did you have an opportunity as chief of the defence staff to discuss with the defence committee of the cabinet, or with the Prime Minister, the proposal with regard to unification?
> Air Chief Marshal Miller: As far as I am aware —and I would not absolutely swear to this without checking records—I never discussed the problem of integration with the cabinet defence committee or with the Prime Minister.
> Mr. Churchill: And unification? You say integration.
> Air Chief Marshal Miller: Integration or unification.

So the chief military adviser to the government, according to his own evidence, was not asked to discuss this most important change in policy with the cabinet before the policy was ennunciated, a shocking situation.

Mr. Hellyer: On a question of privilege, I think I should set the record straight once again on this matter. The white paper on the policy of integration-unification as envisaged at the time the white paper was published and presented to the House of Commons, was discussed on two occasions by the cabinet committee on defence and the cabinet took a decision with respect to the total policy after hearing the views of the chiefs, Air Marshal Miller and the senior staff at headquarters when he was chief of defence staff. He did not discuss this present bill with the cabinet committee on defence. That was done later by the present defence staff, because the bill was prepared subsequent to the changes in personnel which took place last summer. The concept of unification-integration—and both words were used in the white paper as was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre—was referred to the cabinet committee on defence and discussed there and the decision was taken after hearing the views of the chiefs, and I can assure the committee that their views were expressed in some depth.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I might say first of all that this is not a question of privilege. In the second place I should like to point out to the minister that Air Chief Marshal Miller was chief military adviser to the government at the time the white paper was produced.

Mr. Hellyer: And his views were heard.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I have put the evidence on record as it was given.

Mr. Hellyer: Then you might put the correction on the record too.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am not responsible for the evidence given before the committee.

I was interested in the proposition put forward by the Minister of Transport that we should examine this issue in an objective manner, weighing the merits of the case. I agree with the hon. gentleman 100 per cent and I should like to say that this is the very argument the opposition has been making right from the start of this discussion. My view of the supporters of the government is not so low as to think that if this question had been discussed in caucus, and the pros and cons of it evaluated before the policy was announced, this bill would have ever seen the light of day. This was not the sequence of events.

My reason for rising at this time is to make my own position clear. I said during second reading that it would have been better if the subject matter of the bill had been referred to the committee so that it might have been studied in an objective way before the minister and his supporters locked themselves into and inflexible position laid down in black and white in this bill in terms from which in his judgment there could be no retreat. Speaking on second reading, as reported on page 12544 of Hansard, for February 1, I said:

> All the opposition ask in connection with this very important matter of unification is that it be thoroughly examined, that we have the evidence of witnesses, without prejudice, without trying to force the outcome one way or the other. If unification has the merits the government claims for it, it will stand up under that examination. If it has not, it should not be perpetrated upon the Canadian people.

I still maintain that position.

When the defence committee, after the House of Commons committed itself to accept the principle of unification, considered the question, the evidence given to it was overwhelmingly against unification. I do not think any objective person can quarrel with that statement. I am not saying that all the evidence was against unification, but the great preponderance of it was. The evidence presented by expert witnesses has demonstrated that unification does not have all the merits claimed for it. It will not produce the economies claimed, and I could quote much evidence to that effect if I wished to take up the time of the committee. I shall just give one short quotation to this effect, to be found at page 1452 of the evidence:

Mr. Harkness: Would you agree that in order to carry out the roles at present laid down for our defence forces, a navy, an army and an air force of some sort is required, whether you call these forces by that name or not?

Mr. Hendrick: I do, indeed, I believe that the existence of fighting forces in the media of the army, navy and air force, by any name, which are unique and trained and not interchangeable with the others, will always be necessary in a military force.

Mr. Harkness: Do you see any advantage in doing away with our present three forces and putting them into one force called just a defence force?

Mr. Hendrick: Not the slightest bit; it baffles me completely. I think the economies could be achieved by much more simple means and I do not understand the advantages of this proposal at all.

Similar evidence was given to the effect that unification will damage morale and there is evidence in the bill itself to this effect; otherwise clause 6 would not be included. If this bill were as popular with the armed forces as the minister claims, our airmen, sailors and soldiers would be only too anxious for the day to come when they could rejoin the unified force. There would be no need for compulsion. They would be itching to become "unimen", or whatever you want to call them, and cease being sailors, airmen and soldiers, but there seems to be some suspicion that this may not be the case because there is a clause in the bill that says they have no choice. There is going to be compulsion in that the bill says: "Bingo, as soon as this becomes law you are in a unified force whether you like it or not, regardless of what service you joined when you became a serviceman." The bill introduces a form of compulsory service which has been traditionally alien to our armed forces except in one or two cases of dire national emergency.

There is also evidence, which I could quote at length but I will not, to the effect that unification of our armed services will increase the difficulty of working smoothly with our allies in military combination because our system will be entirely different from that of any other ally with whom we are associated. In this connection the evidence given by General Moncel is interesting. I was a member of the defence committee at the time he was giving evidence and I asked him this question, as recorded at page 1320:

Do you believe that our opportunity to gain from the experience and resources of our allies, which you mentioned some time ago in reply to a previous question—chiefly, Great Britain and the United States—will be lessened if we have an entirely different organization in the form of a unified force?

Mr. Moncel: Of course, it will. I will give you an example. When I was vice-chief there was a large and important conference down in the United States, which the vice-chief of the air staff would normally have attended. I went off and I was greeted extremely politely by the U.S. Air Force. I knew a lot of them by name, but we could not talk business.

Now, if I had not gone myself, as the vice-chief, who was I going to send? My next available senior air force officer was an air commodore and he would not have cut much ice in that league.

There is evidence of other examples along the same line but I do not want to take up the time of this committee putting them on the record.

I am greatly concerned about the ill effects that the policy of unification will have on our armed forces and on the return which the Canadian taxpayers will get for the money they spend. But I have a deeper concern, of which this procedure is symptomatic, because in this situation we have a government which has proven itself to be completely devoid of objectivity, unaffected by logic, and has not listened to expert advice when forming its policy. We see a government locked on a course which General Moncel has described, I thought extremely well, as follows:

The conditions which I specifically refer to are as follows. At this stage of the operation, the lines were pretty well drawn and its was abundantly clear to me that we were going to force ahead with this process of unification which, to me, appeared to be moving on an uncharted course at a very, very high speed toward a very, very dim destination —

That is the evidence of the man who when he was in the armed services was responsible for planning for the services.

Recently I read a newspaper article which said steps were being taken by the Liberal caucus to allow its backbenchers to become more involved in and informed on government policy before it was announced. If that is the case I only wish it could be made retroactive because I am sure that if the implications of unification had been thoroughly understood by Liberal members this bill would never have been introduced in its present form. They would have realized that this policy is unwarranted.

Many expert witnesses agree with me that unification will be destructive to morale in the armed forces, thus causing the Canadian taxpayers to get a lesser return for their defence dollar. I am somewhat disappointed at the interventions of government supporters in this debate, not because they have intervened but because more of them have not intervened. The course this debate has followed indicates that many supporters of the government are not enthusiastic about the government's policy, and those who have intervened have found it very difficult to provide substantial evidence to support the policy. In many cases they have embarked on sophistry and rhetorical quackery to divert attention from the real crux of the matter.

I am not taking objection to the speech of the hon. member for Hamilton West, at least no more than I do to other speeches purporting to support government policy, but let me take an example from that speech to indicate what I have in mind. That hon. member said that the official opposition is not looking for a pause of three to five years but rather for a permanent halt to the modernization of the Canadian military establishment. Because this step is new he ascribes to it the very attractive advertising term "modernity" and says that if one belongs to the forward looking generation it should appeal. The hon. member equates newness with merit. Obviously there is not necessarily a connection between the newness of a thing and its value. As a matter of fact, all the grave mistakes of history, and there have been many, were as modern as tomorrow the day before they were made. I believe we are making yet another grave mistake at this time.

• (3:20 p.m.)

We are now engaged in a program which will provide a unified force with everyone serving in that one force wearing the same uniform. We have yet to hear any compelling or convincing argument why this should be so. As a matter of fact witness after witness, all senior officers when this whole matter was being considered, has said that they were completely at a loss to know why we were embarking upon this policy. Let me quote from only one of these witnesses. The evidence is to be found at page 1452 of the proceedings of the defence committee. This is what was said:

Mr. Harkness: What are some of the disadvantages that you see in it?

Mr. Hendrick: First of all, if you preserve the fighting forces in the shape it is suggested you are going to, I do not see why you should change their identifications, their appearances and their symbols. There is a lot to be said for loyalties and traditions and the things which motivate men to go and take hazard. This is a long, historic thing and everybody, I think, will accept it and there is no reason to change these motivating things.

I think it is also essential for the fighting man to have a leader—someone he can look up to—a leader whom he knows has been through the mill; somebody who he can identify as part of his team. That is why the chiefs of staff being done away with for an army, a navy and an air force is such a sad thing, in my view. The junior officer, the airman, the soldier or the sailor does not have his outfit that he can look up to and, if he is an officer, even aspire to succeed. All this is part of having a viable force that has an esprit de corps and a purpose. It has been done this way for many, many years and there are very good reasons for it and I do not see what we gain by upsetting it.

I agree with that point of view and I am at a loss why we should have—I was going to say a navy but that will be lost—men acting in the role of sailors who will be different from sailors of any other navy in the world. Sailors of every navy I know of are recognized immediately as sailors. There may be a difference in the details of their uniforms depending on whether they are French, British, Russian, Japanese, German or Chinese, but they still wear navy blue. That seems to be traditional and these men can be immediately recognized as sailors. They take a pride in being seamen.

Ordinarily when the electorate puts a government into office, regardless of the party constituting the government it has the right to expect that when important decisions are made all the evidence will be carefully weighed and the whole situation will be looked at objectively. The electorate has the right to expect its government not to fly in the face of reason against the overwhelming weight of evidence. The electorate which put this government into office has misplaced its trust in this regard.

We are now embarking upon a tremendously important policy but this government has not recognized the right of the electorate to have the matter looked at objectively as to its merits and demerits. National defence is a very expensive proposition. It should not be a toy to be played with by one man or a group of men without all the technical and expert advice obtainable. In round figures Canadian defence requires the expenditure of $1½ billion per year. If one says a billion dollars fast most of us associate the figure with a million dollars. A billion dollars is a tremendous amount of money. Perhaps I can illustrate what I mean by something said by a United States congressman. He suggested that if someone gave his wife $1 million and she spent $1,000 per day she would be back for more in three years but if someone had given his wife $1 billion in 500 B.C. and she spent $1,000 per day from then on she would still not be back for more. We sometimes forget that $1 billion is one thousand million dollars.

This is the time we should consider the gravity of what we are doing. There is a great deal of evidence to indicate that what we may be doing is spending $1½ billion half as effectively as we should. The expenditure of that much money places a terrible onus on parliament and it should be taken seriously.

Mr. Hellyer: It is being spent about 10 per cent more effectively.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The minister suggests that it is being spent 10 per cent more effectively. That is the kind of statement we hear from time to time without proper substantiation. As I said, the evidence, as I understand it, is contrary to the minister's statement. No evidence has been given that unification, even in a theoretical sense, could be advantageous. It is true, of course, that articles in the press have said that the Minister of National Defence is an activist who likes to get things done. He introduced integration which was in process anyway. We agree with integration, and always have. But I think this notion of his being a great activist always doing something spectacular has perhaps gone to his head a little. The minister has taken this as a compliment and it is not necessarily so. Even a bull in a china shop is an activist. It depends on whether what you are doing makes sense. That is what qualifies one to take spectacular action.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I can see the minister, in the competitive atmosphere in which he finds himself, picking up the morning paper and discovering, or perhaps knowing beforehand, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, for example, is going to introduce a minimum income bill. I can imagine the minister saying to his executive assistant: We have to do something spectacular today to get the headlines, to stay in the news. Let's scrub the navy today, abolish the army tomorrow, have a general or an admiral for breakfast every day in the process and eventually do away with the air force.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

I think this matter is too important to treat in this way. If the minister wants to be an activist we could find him some type of activity that would not be so expensive to the taxpayers. I have nearly finished my speech, Mr. Chairman; I suppose my time has almost expired. We could find the minister some activity which would be less damaging and less costly to the Canadian taxpayer. Perhaps this week he could climb Mount Kennedy in a green uniform and next week he could set out from Halifax to Esquimalt, sailing preferably around the Horn, in a green uniform if he likes. But let him not indulge his whims in regard to something that is costing the Canadian taxpayers $1½ billion a year without his being prepared to accept the best expert advice available and to convert it into policy in the interests of the Canadian people.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): Mr. Chairman, one of the starting points of the integration and unification program of the Canadian armed forces is the creation of a distinctively Canadian force.

Canada is a young country. In the past we have had the good fortune of obtaining from our founding nations all sorts of information and knowledge which have accumulated through the centuries. But, in the life of every nation there comes a time when things past are no longer suitable or sufficient, where the umbilical cord must be severed. Our armed forces are one aspect of our foreign policy, and our foreign policy differs from that of other countries in the word. So why should this not be reflected by our armed forces?

In the last few years Canada has proved great efficiency through its contribution to maintaining peace and order in the word. This was made possible through our participation to alliances and peace keeping operations. We have examples of such operations in places like Suez, Cyprus, Yemen, Kashmir and the Congo.

As our country grew, particular interests and new requirements developed. Canada acquired a unique gratitude almost everywhere in the world. African, Asian and South American peoples know that we have no territorial ambition and that our only interest, in wanting to keep the peace, is to offer an opportunity to men of goodwill to work toward the solution of the problems of sickness, poverty and illiteracy facing humanity.

So why maintain armed forces that look like foreign troops? Why should we not have armed forces that would be really Canadian in really Canadian uniforms, and that would meet Canada's real needs?

As Canadians and taxpayers, we want our armed forces to really represent Canada, ourselves and our interests, and I am sure that many Canadians share my opinion.

[English]

During the hearings of the defence committee some hon. members asked: Why should Canada unify her services when no other country has done so? I should like to ask these people: Can Canadians not do something that they need without the assistance and the guidance of a foreign country? Can they not stand on their own two feet or are they still unsure of themselves and their rightful place in the world community? We have the experience, the training, the intelligence and the men to reorganize our forces to suit our requirements to lead the world in defence organization. Why should we hesitate to grasp this opportunity? Why must we always follow and not for once lead? Our participation in two world wars, in Korea and in peace keeping operations has given us as much experience as other countries of the kind that will be useful in the future. We have the calibre of people. Our troops in NATO are recognized as one of the best trained, if not the best trained, contingents within the alliance.

We have the men, men of the calibre of General Jean-Victor Allard, a most distinguished soldier who has been awarded the C.B.E. and four foreign decorations as well as his gallantry awards. He was the first Canadian officer to command a British division, a former vice chief of the general staff, a qualified jet pilot, fully bilingual, a true Canadian, an experienced and loyal officer, as well as a man of foresight and imagination. Any country would be fortunate to have such a distinguished gentleman as the head of the armed forces. We have units such as the famous Van Doos, to name only one—a regiment with numerous battle honours and a record second to none. I believe that the calibre of Canada's armed forces as a whole is second to none but their effectiveness depends on their organization.

It is the intention of the minister and the defence staff to provide the Canadian forces with the most streamlined, efficient structure. There are a number of hon. members who oppose this bill in spite of its obvious benefits. I can understand, even if I do not agree with it, opposition to this program when it stems from emotion. For some hon. members who have served in the forces it is a matter of sadness to see the disappearance of the services, and I appreciate that for some it is a matter of genuine regret. But time waits for no man and progress can only be achieved by recognizing problems and producing solutions to fit them. As the minister wrote in November, 1966 in an article in the magazine Saturday Night:

> When tradition overshadows effectiveness, it is time to draw the line. When tradition overburdens our forces so that they cannot be properly equipped we must take another look and decide which is more important. We will continue to retain as many worth-while traditions as possible but not to the detriment of the force as a whole.

Opposition to this bill on emotional grounds is understandable but I cannot condone it. Opposition on logical grounds indicates a lack of information, but opposition to this program when hon. members have had as much information and evidence as has been presented to them by the standing committee on defence is nothing short of obstruction and is a reactionary attitude.

Hon. members should think back to the flag debate. As bitter and acrimonious as it was the result was the production of a national symbol which is appreciated and respected from coast to coast and has become in two short years a symbol of Canadian unity. The same members who opposed the flag are now opposing the unification of the forces, and for the same reasons. They are rooted in the traditions of a foreign country, but I suggest that they are out of step with the times and with the vast majority of Canadians. I predict that the unification of the forces will become a matter of pride to all Canadians in the near future. It will become a symbol of all that is youthful, vigorous and progressive in our country. When I say "progressive" I do not mean Progressive Conservative.

I have one further point which I wish to leave with hon. members opposite for their consideration, and that is the question of expenditures. There have been considerable savings as a result of the integration program, whether or not hon. members choose to recognize it. The fact that we have been able to hold the line in defence spending despite rising costs, particularly in the military field, is a remarkable achievement. We have been assured by the minister, by the chief of the defence staff and by the vice chief that unification will result in an even more efficient organization. As members of parliament we have a direct responsibility to ensure that public funds are spent in the most effective way. I suggest that to ignore the advice of experts as to ways to save money and make this country's armed forces more effective is a very serious dereliction of duty.

I look forward to the passage of this bill because I believe that the unification process will produce a force which will be recognized throughout the world as Canadian, and not just by two-inch shoulder flashes, a force which recognizes and welcomes tradition but is not blinded by it, a force which will create new traditions, new precedents and world leadership in the science of military technology, a force that will be second to none in its ability to change with the time, a force whose uniform will denote members of the most modern up-to-date force in the world, and a force which will be distinctively Canadian and designed to meet future Canadian needs.

[Translation]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to quote a very brief excerpt from a statement made by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson), during the debate on interim supply, on November 10, 1966:

> We are sincerely convinced that the policy of this bill is a wide policy for Canada in connection with defence matters in the future. We are staking our existence as a government on this policy.

Mr. Chairman, that statement made by the Prime Minister reflects the opinion of the members of our party, and you may rest assured that we all stand behind the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): Now, Mr. Chairman, the speakers who preceded me, on the opposition side, have attempted to make us believe that, during the sittings of the committee on national defence, which I attended, the only witnesses in favour of unification were those from the department, and that all the other witnesses, that is former members of the armed forces, former senior officers, were all against the unification bill, that is against the Bill No. C-243.

I should like to remind members of the opposition that retired military men appeared before the committee mainly at the request of the opposition members and not of the government. Second, that they were anxious to tell us at the outset of their testimony—and they were the ones to say it, not we—that they had left the armed forces because they did not approve the unification project. In inviting these military people to appear before the committee on national defence, it was obvious that they would say: We did not approve it. Naturally, since they had retired on that account.

Mr. Chairman, this closes the few remarks I wanted to make.

[English]

Mr. Ormiston: Mr. Chairman, normally I would not make any comments on the remarks of a previous speaker but I would like to comment on one sentence in the speech made by the hon. member for Chicoutimi when he said that the arguments of the opposition were rooted in the traditions of a foreign country. This seems absurd to me. Possibly the hon. member might learn a lesson from one of the members of the front bench, the Minister of Transport, when he praised British justice and British attitudes. There is nothing more detrimental to co-operation among the people of Canada than to demonstrate such an attitude in a debate.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Having said that, I should like to remind the Minister of National Defence that he and I have more in common than would meet the eye. Neither of us has achieved field rank in the army but we have been closer to the rank and file, to the N.C.O.'s and the junior officers, than most of those who have taken part in the debate. While it is fine to rely on the remarks of serving senior officers who have presented their opinions before a committee of the house, we seem to forget the thousands in other ranks who are seldom identified but who have minds and wills of their own. I suppose that when ex-servicemen of the second world war get up to speak on unification they might well be accused of letting sentiment overrule common sense. However, I do suggest that in connection with the unification program there has been indecent haste. There may have been political motivation, but certainly we can think of other situations in which speed is detrimental. I do not suppose there is very much connection between unification and agriculture but when one enters upon the process of changing a dry land farmer into an irrigation farmer one finds that it takes many years. The human element and human nature require a bit of processing. I believe the same situation applies to unification.

Naturally, for the best efficiency of commands I think it is necessary that they be collectively organized at the level where people can work together. When the minister introduced his bill I wondered whether some of the experiences of the past had been analysed sufficiently. Those of us who served in the second world war can recall the innovation of combined services. Certainly this had not been tried to any extent before but it was carried out on many occasions. The three forces worked very well together, and I imagine that today there is a projection of this scheme in the battles being fought in Viet Nam. With the rapid changes being made in the conventional type of fighting, I wonder whether it would not be a good idea to have an observer in Viet Nam at the present time? This might, of course, violate Canada's role in so far as the truce team is concerned but certainly with so much at stake it would seem that the experience Canada might gain through having an observer on the fighting lines would be of the greatest importance when we are in the process of changing the structure of our forces.

When the minister says there is such enthusiasm amongst all ranks, I sometimes wonder what those who have no oppportunity to voice their opinions would say. It is obvious that the junior officer has a great deal at stake. He may feel it is necessary, in order to preserve his position and his pension, to go along with unification. As one who has tried to keep in contact with the forces during the past few years, I can say honestly that I have found all this talk of integration is welcomed. I can recall visiting some of the forces, various branches of the army and navy, and there was no conflict at all. On the other hand, I sometimes wonder about the position of all those officers who are forced into new positions and who are at the same time giving advice to officers under them. They are placed in a position of trying to act with experience and intelligence in that office to which they have been called. Those who are trying to adjust to this new type of unification must find it most difficult. We must commend them for their initiative and for their perseverance.

The minister has made a great deal of the fact that there will be many economies because of unification. I recall one instance where an alleged economy was simply a bookkeeping entry. My mind goes back to the time when the armed forces were relieved of the task of looking after the northwest highway system. Here was a task the army could use to train personnel to handle materials at their command and whereby the troops who were employed could operate under various climatic conditions.

In the last few years the northwest highway system has been under the jurisdiction of public works. I remind the minister that in that area there is a great deal to be gained by having the army operate the highway system, in fact just as much as from operating the facilities at Churchill. Much of the defence of Canada lies in the northern area and the ability of troops to operate under severe temperature conditions could be tested very easily on the northwest highway system. It seems ironical that with all the facilities available in that area the work has to be done by public works because the army could be used to the best possible advantage in training troops to work under conditions which might prevail in many parts of northern Canada whenever they might be called upon to defend our country. This is only one area in which I think there might be some improvement. Needless to say, there are others.

I feel that the haste with which the minister is pressing this bill is against all normal requirements. The attitudes which we become aware of in discussing the matter, particularly in so far as junior officers are concerned, are not conducive to promoting the unification of the armed forces at the moment. Integration has been accepted by all and sundry. Certainly a waiting period, possibly longer than the minister has indicated, would be of considerable advantage if the unity of the armed forces is to be maintained.

• (4:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks on Bill C-243, I should like to state right away that I believe in three or four basic principles. First of all, I should say that parliament is for debating, the opposition to oppose, and that it can be done sincerely on both sides.

Considering this whole debate as objectively as possible, I believe that we have sufficiently debated both sides of the question and that we have had enough opposition. At this point, everyone is thoroughly convinced that nothing would be gained by continuing the debate since all members of the house have already made up their minds and to continue this discussion indefinitely will simply confuse the issue still further. So, the purpose of my contribution will be to call on the good sense of all my colleagues. The government seems determined to stand on their position. To my mind, they have already accepted some amendments suggested by the opposition. The opposition seems determined to back the government against the wall.

In any case, the question will be settled on division.

Listening to many speakers who preceded me, I was thinking that most of them have repeated things that have already been said a hundred times over, have been printed in the Debates and in the proceedings of the parliamentary committee.

I was recalling, in jest, some sayings in French which are rather concise and pregnant with meaning for instance the following: "Silence is golden." I heard from the government side as well as the opposition side speakers who tried very hard to oppose the evidence given by some senior officers before the parliamentary committee by taking a few words here and comparing them with a few there in order to prove that the statement was illogical or did not make sense. Both sides played that game and it could go for a whole year.

Mr. Chairman, those who are used to debate know that one can get a man hanged by lifting a few words out of a statement and giving it some fancy interpretation; explained by five different speakers, they would mean five different things. That game does not lead anywhere.

I also recalled that other saying to the effect that "Silence is golden". It is a fact that during the present debate, silence would be golden, speech only silvern and that it is costly for the taxpayers. As a matter of fact, when I add up the number of days taken to repeat the same things, the tons of paper used to report and publish our discussions, I feel it is getting to be costly for the country to settle nothing, because I would be most surprised to find one member who has not yet firmly made up his mind and is not ready to vote.

I was also thinking of another English saying: "Too many cooks spoil the broth". If we have too many defence experts who come and express, ex cathedra, their own views on the method that should be used in 1967, 1970, 1975 or 1980, I am sure we will find a great many contradictions, and if the government allowed itself to be stopped by such things it would never manage to find an acceptable solution. I think the question is simply being buried under a deluge of words. It would therefore be wise for everyone to exercise a little self-discipline and say to himself: Fine, we will stop all this, ask for a division and settle the question; if the government is wrong, it will take the consequences.

I heard things which I find a little childish coming from serious minded people—and I think all the members of this house are serious minded—such as: "Who thought of this plan", insinuating thereby that one fine morning, after a lovely dream, the minister decided to introduce this sort of plan in the house.

Those who have observed the public scene for many years realize that integration and unification have slowly been taking place since the last world war, through natural evolution. The times call for it, Mr. Chairman. It is somewhat childish to ask such questions. Everybody knows that the ministers of this government, as did those of previous governments, are not bringing in such a revolutionary bill without having consulted all the experts at their disposal who, after all, are not all talking through their hats.

And, a little further on, this: This plan should have been prepared by competent people. Mr. Chairman, it is unbelievable that such remarks should be made after all that has been said on the matter. I am referring, for instance, to the statement I made last April 4, as reported on page 14516, speaking of the war service and the vast experience of the commander in chief of our armed forces, Mr. Jean Allard. I outlined an impressive picture, and it is there for anyone to read. Besides, it is an official statement. Mr. Allard is only the spokesman for the whole general staff which includes a lot of experienced officers. Now, to insinuate that they support the government because they do not want to compromise their future, their promotions in the army, is, I think, doing them a great injustice which they do not deserve. Most of them have risked their lives on many battlefields. They have surely proven that they are not faint-hearted; besides, they are about to go on retirement. I mentioned the case of Jean Allard because I have known him personally for over 30 years; I know he has the intestinal fortitude to resign rather than advocate measures in which he does not sincerely believe—as others did. But it is permissible to hold different views in such a case, and I say that if the minister—as I said earlier—has relied on the advice of experienced people like Jean Allard and those about him, one can say that his intentions are well motivated.

It was said, a little further, that the minister was being stubborn. Well, Mr. Chairman, this is a vicious circle; if the minister was not stubborn in defending his bill, he would be charged with a lack of leadership, with back tracking. He would never be able to satisfy the opposition. I believe, and I speak in an independent way, that he made several concessions to the opposition. He listened patiently to them and I think he deserves a special reward for the virtue of patience which he displayed in listening to everything which is said about him. I saw him squirm in his seat two or three times only. If I had been in his place, I confess that I would have jumped up two or three dozen times to protest.

What is called stubborness is, in my opinion, steadfastness which a leader, in government as ours, should have, which he should display before the nation. That is what the nation expects from its government: leadership and determination displayed by those who have character and know where they are going.

But I did not find it so nice, Mr. Chairman, when they started questioning the integrity of the minister; when they suggested that he was not honest, that he was making false statements. I believe that it is to demean oneself to say such things in this house.

Well, I, for one, Mr. Chairman, would be horrified to hear some day, for instance, that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) is not a man of his word, that you cannot trust his words, and that the same applies to any other party leader or any crown minister. It would be insulting. Now, then, to hint such things in the course of a debate is to degrade oneself in the eyes of the public, and it is far from enhancing the prestige of this parliament in the minds of those Canadians who are following our discussions.

I like very much how many hon. members opposite have spoken on that bill. Several have maintained the tone of the discussion on a high level; they have brought forward some serious arguments which they sincerely believe. Personal attacks merely contribute to bring discredit not only on those who launch them but also on parliament.

It was stated yesterday, Mr. Chairman, that not one shred of evidence had been brought forward to the effect that the bill would be beneficial. On the contrary, it seems to me that tons of evidence have been brought forward for people of goodwill. The question was asked: "What will happen in the future?"

We know certain hypothetical circumstances cannot be foreseen with mathematical precision, but if the action we propose through this measure is based on the evidence of those who are competent in military matters, who apply their knowledge to our needs in our relations with other countries, I feel we can say that we are adopting a progressive measure.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, this is not new. Since the beginning of time, upheavals have led to change. Let the students of history recall, for instance, how when cross-bows, arrows and spears were replaced by the blunderbuss, by firearms, one would have thought the world was coming to an end. Of course, parliaments in those days did not have as today transcriptions systems to enable the citizens to read in the archives of the heartbreak of those who opposed the change. But history ever repeats itself.

For instance, when the decision to abandon the cavalry was taken, some generals and marshals threw their uniforms away and resigned from the army, with tears in their eyes, their hearts broken, because they realized that another era was disappearing. Periodic evolution is the most normal thing since the beginning of the world.

When the Maginot line was invented, for instance, and troops were forced to dig themselves in like rats, it was such a novel method that governments were brought down. It proved efficient for a time, and then they came up with mechanized war. In fact, one remembers what trouble General de Gaulle stirred up when he tried to explain to a great number of his colleagues, French officers and parliamentarians, how much mechanized war was a necessity. It took him years, and there again governments were defeated. The world finally accepted what was evident, that mechanized war was a must, something essential.

The same thing happened in the field of aviation, Mr. Chairman. Indeed, it is said that Marshal Pétain himself did not believe that aviation could be efficient, and this gave rise to homeric debates in the French parliament of that time.

We have the same process today, except that the revolution is deeper. This is the age of nuclear or atomic war; we are in the age of electronics to the extreme and we must give the Canadian army people whose competence will exceed everything we have imagined to date. We will have to co-ordinate the services, to unify them into a central administration, if our armed forces are to give maximum efficiency.

It seems to me that it is obvious, Mr. Chairman, and it seems to me also that those who oppose the bill are dead set against it. In any case, even if those who oppose the bill are convinced that some things are not as they should be, why prolong the debate? Everyone knows that the government will introduce the bill as amended. Everyone knows also that some opposition members will oppose it. Everyone will know what the score is when a vote has been held on the matter. Let us take it as quickly as possible and go on to something more constructive.

Some basic truths should be recalled. The government is there to govern. It must govern. And to govern it must decide what legislation is called for. It comes to an opinion after hearing its experts, its department heads, also the opposition. It seems to me that it has been listening to the latter with great patience but, sooner or later, it must decide that the debate has been going on long enough and put a stop to it. I feel that enough has been said on that matter. Parliament speaks, it is the right of parliament to discuss and that of the opposition to oppose, but the debate must end, especially when it is obvious that it does not lead anywhere.

I do not think that deep down any opposition member feels that at this stage of the proceedings he will be able to bring the government to agree to any major amendment, except possibly on some details, when the bill is considered clause by clause.

Mr. Chairman, if the government is making a mistake, after getting advice from all its experts, after reading the evidence for or against the measure, after taking into consideration advice given freely by the opposition, there is a tribunal to which it will be accountable in the years to come. The electorate is, in short, the court of last resort.

Now we have told the government everything we had to tell them, I think it would be only fair to let the government implement its legislation.

Moreover, I do not think we are asked to implement unification overnight. It seems that this process which began spontaneously before the passing of any legislation, simply by the pressure of things, some time after the last war, and which unfolded itself normally, will have to go on unfolding itself and will not be completed before five, six, seven, eight or ten years.

But the government must be authorized by Parliament to go ahead and implement everything involved in this bill on unification and integration.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want, once again, to challenge the sincerity of those who are opposed to the bill and lengthen the debate; I merely want to point out that by attacking personally the minister, they take an unjustifiable attitude.

Personally I am not under any obligation to any party, to anyone in this house. I must say that I respect most members of this house, at least those I know, and among them, to a high degree, the Minister of National Defence. I admire his frankness, his honesty, his firmness and his patience in spite of all the criticism heaped on him for many weeks.

It is time, in my opinion, to put an end to those endless discussions and ramblings and take some positive action, that is vote, so that we may study the bill item by item and perhaps suggest some minor amendments which will probably be well received, and then proceed with some other piece of legislation.

If I rose today, Mr. Chairman, it was to appeal to all men of goodwill in this house. As a matter of fact, I know that all men of goodwill realize that everything worthwhile has already been said and that not one iota will be changed by extending the debate for hours and days. On the other hand, this will simply help to discredit Parliament a little more in the eyes of the public, at a time when it has managed to rehabilitate itself somewhat through the constructive work done in the last few months.

Even the opposition has been doing constructive work these last few months. Parliament has been rising in the esteem of the public. We should not destroy these achievements by interminable discussions, personal attacks and theories built on perhaps doubtful competence.

As we were saying, now that everything has been said, let us act, let us vote, and the electorate will judge whether this government is right or wrong.

[English]

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I do not know if by having the unanimous agreement of the Progressive Conservative party that I have the floor my credibility will be impugned. I was moved to speak in this debate by statements made earlier by the Minister of Transport, who exhorted hon. members to deal with this matter on its merits. I thought everyone was trying to do so. Judgment on the merits of the legislation differs, that is all.

I want to begin by saying that integration, so far as it has progressed, seems to meet with the almost complete support of most people who have considered defence policy and organization. The emphasis on mobility and the acquisition of new ordnance—hardware, as the Minister of Defence calls it—in support of a mobile role has received general and wide approbation.

From my study of defence policy and organization I think what has been achieved in the department during the last three years is commendable. Where commendation is deserved it should be extended: I extend it to the minister here and now.

The acquisition of Provider class vessels for logistic support; to supply our mobile forces with vertical envelopment capability, was logical. I have not heard of anyone in a command position challenging this kind of development. It is a pity, with the consensus which has been reached about integration thus far—

Mr. Hellyer: Could I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Schreyer: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: My hon. friend stated to the committee that there seems to be a consensus that most of the things we have done in the last three years have been good, that integration is a good idea that it is producing a more effective force, that it is in the interest of this country, and that we are moving in the right direction. If that is the consensus, and if that is the view held by so many people in hindsight three years later, why would the hon. member now think that our judgment is incapable of producing in the future the kind of progress that we have achieved in the last three years? I say this particularly in view of the fact that some people who are now so strongly in favour of integration and of everything which has been accomplished in the last three years, were not at all in favour of it at the time we began it.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Schreyer: Rather than attempt to reply briefly to the minister I would ask him to bear with me while I try to answer that question in the course of the next 20 minutes. If he is interested in obtaining a reply from me in this connection I will really try to give him one. But it cannot be done in a few sentences or a few minutes.

I say it is a pity that this consensus seems to be disappearing, but there are good reasons why this should be the case. I, for one, like many members in this quarter of the house, feel myself to be in a very uncomfortable position. We have been placed in that position by the insistence of the minister and his colleagues on proceeding at this time with the bill now before us.

I support the proposition that unification of the armed forces is desirable. However, I must admit that this support is based on incomplete knowledge of the situation; so it has to be qualified, particularly because some of the testimony of the experts in this field has been divided. There is obviously a good deal of disagreement among the experts, and this should be a signal for every one of us in this house to proceed with prudence and caution with respect to this phase of armed forces reorganization. The ordinary mortal when confronted with conflicting testimony by people who presumably are in the know would wish to proceed in a careful, pragmatic and experimental way. The logical course of action when confronted with conflicting testimony would be to proceed step by step, with measured pause and with measured pace. This is a concept which I believe is often popular among certain members of the front bench.

But when it comes to this particular measure hon. members opposite do not seem interested in proceeding with measured pause and measured pace. The Minister of National Defence has left the impression that he will not proceed step by step in the same way as ordinary mortals, but that he had decided to make a great leap forward. Beyond him he has supporters who are making blind obeisance to his command. It is not asking too much to urge this government not to place parliament in the position of becoming a rubber stamp and blindly approving the final phase of this reorganization process without having before it all the available evidence as to the progress made in the initial stages. Unless the minister is prepared to say that integration has proceeded through all its phases and that all the information is at hand for evaluation, he should be prepared to hold this legislation in abeyance until such time as integration has been completed and information has been collected on the basis of actual experience.

Though I support the concept, I still cannot bring myself to approve the pace with which the minister and the government are trying to put this legislation on the statute books. I do not feel there is any great degree of urgency attaching to it. I cannot escape the impression that this measure is being introduced prematurely. The Minister of Transport admonishes us to be dispassionate in our analysis of this legislation and to deal with it on its merits. I ask how this can be done when the merits of the policy cannot be determined with any degree of unanimity by those who are in the best position to know, namely, the senior service personnel.

How can we deal with this legislation on its merits unless we are in a position to analyse all the facts—and we do not have all the facts in our possession because, as I have pointed out, integration has not yet been completed in all its various stages? There is no need to use the language of overstatement; there is no need to impute motives or question the loyalty of career personnel in the armed forces, as has been done. There is no need to talk about the credibility of one officer as compared to that of another. Yet I did hear one hon. member opposite doing precisely this. Unless I am placing a connotation on the word "credibility" which is not warranted, I think the use of that word with regard to evidence given by senior officers who appeared before the committee is altogether unfair.

I wish to join with others who have spoken in this debate in imploring the minister to reconsider this legislation. I ask the hon. gentleman's colleagues to use their influence to this effect. I do so, not because the objective is something with which I disagree but because it would seem to me that the wiser course of action would be to hold this legislation in abeyance for a year, 18 months, or some such period.

Mr. Hellyer: Why?

Mr. Schreyer: There are at least two reasons I can think of. One is simply that there is no urgency about this bill. Unless the government of Canada is considering changing its defence role or trying to renegotiate its commitments within the alliances, there is no urgency. If it is the intention, as I gather from the minister is the case, to maintain unchanged our existing role and our existing commitments, there is no urgency.

• (4:30 p.m.)

One senior officer who appeared before the committee said that the maintenance of our existing commitment and role within NATO would be made more difficult by unifying our armed forces. Unlike other hon. members I do not intend to make specific reference to many of the statements made by senior officers appearing before the committee. That would be fruitless in this debate because in many cases the statement of one senior officer or retired officer is cancelled out by contradictory and opposing statements of opinion by another. But I would like to refer to the argument advanced by the minister, that there is no need to delay unification until integration has been effected, and that unification is not to be regarded as subsequent to integration but really as part of the same cycle.

This argument gets us bogged down in a war of words, in semantics. It is pretty ingenious to say unification is really part of the same cycle as integration, and should not be regarded as coming after it. I can see the minister making that argument, because it was a particular point of emphasis by members of the official opposition. But I think he is really trying to kid us, because even if one wants to use a word such as cycle, as opposed to sequential, the fact remains that cycles do have a sequence. I maintain that with integration, which is presently being worked out, it is no more than logical or reasonable to wait for a period of time to see if it turns out to be as effective as all indications show at present.

On repeated occasions the minister has stated that unification will bring about some economies and savings to the taxpayer. I agree with that statement, but in my opinion the savings that can be realized through unification will not be of the same magnitude as the savings achieved through integration. To suggest that unification will effect savings of comparable or equal magnitude to those effected by integration is overstating the case by a long shot.

There can be only one overwhelming argument in favour of unification and the passage of this bill now, and I digress to say we are proceeding with this legislation in a rather unnatural way. We are proceeding with it at a forced pace. It is legislation that has been introduced prematurely. It offends one's sense of what is logical and reasonable. Therefore any argument in favour of it would have to be very powerful, such as one suggesting that the government had decided on a foreign policy-defence policy combination to the effect that we should re-evaluate and renegotiate our existing military role and commitments. In that case it could be said that it was urgent to proceed with changing the organic structure of our defence forces. However, although the minister has said this may be a possibility at some future time, the fact remains that our policies are the same as they were three years ago.

I believe it was General Moncel who testified that if a political decision were taken by the government to adopt a different role within NATO then a unification policy would make sense, but unless such were the case he could not find any merit in this proposition. I think I have already said that some other officers when testifying said that if we were going to maintain our present role within NATO, then unification would cause difficulty in organization in the sense that it would make it that much more complicated to relate our forces within NATO to those of our allies in that organization.

The other day the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the military planning committee of the NATO council was in accord with the Canadian policy of unification, and that unification would not impinge upon the contribution of Canadian forces to the NATO commitment. That minister is not in the chamber now, but I would like to know from him, or some of his colleagues, on what basis he made that statement? Did he make it on the basis of some documentation, on an exchange of notes, or on the basis of an impression which he somehow gleaned when speaking to the officials of our allies in NATO, or to officials of the NATO command?

Was the Secretary of State for External Affairs just indulging in some wishful thinking? I do not think we need accept an important assertion like that from him without some indication as to the basis for it. Is it his mere ipse dixit that this is the attitude of our allies in NATO? It is of crucial importance to our understanding and attitude toward this legislation that we know how the officials of the NATO alliance feel about it. If this or any other minister makes the statement that this policy has the support of our allies, he should be a little more specific and indicate the basis for such a statement.

This fact brings me logically to a reference to a speech the other day by the Associate Minister of National Defence, who exhorted and pleaded with us to have faith in the policy of this minister and this government. It seems a bit strange that the associate minister should advise members of the opposition to have faith in this legislation, since it is our prime responsibility to evaluate legislation placed before us to the best of our ability on an analysis of related opinions, data and facts. We have not been given very much in the way of hard facts by the minister. He has spoken at great length and at times even with eloquence about changes taking place in the Department of National Defence. He has waxed very enthusiastically about some of them, but most of his remarks have related to integration.

The minister has not explained why it is absolutely imperative to pass this legislation now. He has not satisfied me as to the urgency of this matter. Without such an explanation and unless we are changing basic roles, what possible argument could be made for passing this bill this spring, this summer, or even this year? The minister of defence and other ministers have suggested that unification is something which cannot take place overnight. They ask us to pass this legislation now, in order that full planning for unification can take place, with complete unification being implemented in something like seven, eight, or nine years. That request undermines and defeats their own position and their desire to pass this legislation now. Unless I am drastically wrong in my understanding of how government departments operate, it seems that the department of defence can now engage in contingency planning. Perhaps that is not the jargon of the defence department but it seems to be an appropriate term.

It is my belief that all government departments are engaged in contingency planning every day of every month. Surely they do not require legislation before engaging in planning in respect of hypothetical circumstances. It would not be a violation of the law of the land or the chain of command if the department of defence engaged in planning for unification within a number of years. They are engaged in that kind of planning now. If I am wrong in that regard I hope someone with an intimate knowledge of what takes place within departments of government will correct me.

Surely the United States department of defence is engaged in formulating long-range plans for any possible contingency of hypothetical circumstance. That department must be actively engaged in planning for the future. The formulation of the framework within which unification will fall can properly take place now. At the present time integration is being implemented at various stages and the department can profit by the experience gained as integration takes greater effect.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, with the indulgence of the committee I could complete my remarks in two minutes.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Schreyer: In conclusion, let me say I accept the statements of hon. members opposite that the morale of the armed forces is not low. I am not in a position to say that it is high, but I will accept the assertion that it is good. For that reason, I cannot understand why this bill must be passed immediately. Surely it cannot be argued that we must pass this bill quickly because of a state of uncertainty which is causing some disquietude. Either the morale of our forces is good, or it is bad. If it is good, in spite of the so called period of uncertainty which has existed in recent months, why is there a necessity to put this legislation through at this time?

One is placed in a difficult position in supporting the objective or principle of this legislation, when that support must be based on incomplete evidence. For that reason it is logical and prudent to oppose the immediate passage of the bill until some further evidence in support of the measure comes to light. We should not be asked to support this legislation with a blindness to the differences of opinions and judgments expressed by those who are technically competent to judge. I plead with the minister to make a more comprehensive and conciliatory statement regarding this measure than has been made in the past few days. I do not do so with stubbornness, but with the interest of the nation in mind.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, my remarks this afternoon will be parochial. I should like to ask the minister, in the two or three minutes of my time I shall leave to him to tell me why there will be no undue effect in the Halifax-Dartmouth area as a result of base consolidation. I ask the minister to answer that question, in light of the assurances given to the house and the standing committee, as well as to community leaders in Halifax and Dartmouth, by the minister and the associate minister. I want to tell the minister, in case he does not know—I am sure he does—that the people of Halifax are very much concerned about this matter. The minister wonders why at times we question his credibility. This afternoon Fairey Aviation, E.M.I. Cossor, Sperry Gyroscope, and indeed every technical undertaking in Halifax that has civilian employees at H.M.C.S. Shearwater advised that by April 17 they are to remove these workmen. Mr. Minister, what in the name of all that is holy and good are you doing under the base consolidation program? Air Marshal Sharp, as reported at page 540 of the defence committee proceedings of February 8, answered a series of questions from myself about base consolidation. I said:

> I have drawn the inference that the minister has suggested that indeed a base consolidation program is under study.
> Air Marshal Sharp: Yes, sir.

On page 542 we got what we thought were some comforting words from you, Mr. Minister. Referring to a statement that had been made by the associate minister, the minister asked me:

> Which statement is this?

I replied:

> It was the statement—and I can only paraphrase it—in which he gave assurances to the civic community leaders that there would be no undue economic impact from base consolidation in the Halifax area.

Your reply, Mr. Minister, was:

> I think this is the fact. It is perhaps not fair to single out Halifax and say, "You are all right" and leave the impression that some other areas are not, but, as I have indicated, because of the singular nature of the Halifax area and the proportion of the fleet which is stationed there, I think that is a fair statement.

I would like to ask you, Mr. Minister—and if you can answer it I am sure I will be grateful, and so will a lot of other people in Halifax—why it is that we have a creeping and very apparent move on the part of the Department of National Defence to remove all the civilian employees from H.M.C.S. Shearwater, or I suppose I should dignify it and call it C.F.B. Shearwater. Why have you done this? Why are you continuing to do it? You said you were not going to do it. Why are you pussyfooting on this question and not coming out and telling us that you are going to close the base? Late last fall we had the spectacle of all the civilian firefighters, some of whom had been working there for many years, being transferred to other centres in the maritimes or to Dockyard. We were told this was a continuing pattern of change within the military concept. It had the effect of removing that phase of civilian employees from the base. And now we have this program which involves over 100 men.

Is the minister suggesting that it is more efficient to bring the aircraft and pieces of equipment that need work done on them down to the civilian plants in order that these repairs may be carried out? Will this bring about greater efficiency and save money? If that is what you are after, Mr. Minister, you had better stand up and tell us, because that is not the impression we have. Indeed, I think any study ever undertaken by any military group in any of the western countries has shown that work contracted for by civilian personnel under an on-base contract is a lot cheaper than when it is carried out by the military people themselves.

We have had the removal of the firemen, and now the removal of all the technical people employed by the various firms at this one base in the Halifax area. What makes this a matter of very grievous concern is the fact that there have been persistent rumours for many months that the balance of the civilian employees will be removed from Shearwater. I am referring to carpenters, plumbers, and electricians. The rumour is that they will be sent to Dockyard and brought back to the base at Shearwater as and when required.

I can tell the minister—he knows it and should not have to be reminded by me—that a very serious economic situation is developing in the Halifax area. There is a great deal of uncertainty, confusion, and indeed disgust on the part of the military people. They are fed up, and indeed they would like to see the minister go on with his unification program. Even hell is better than this uncertainty. Stand up and tell us now what is going to be done in this area. Stop pussyfooting. Tell us what bases you are going to close, when you are going to close them and what you are going to do about the civilian employees and the economic imbalance that will be left. You know that 30 per cent of our economy is dependent on these bases, and yet you do things like this.

What are the 100 families going to do? We will lose them from our work force. What will happen to the helicopter work at Fairey? It will wind up at United Aircraft, Montreal. We have had the phasing out of the Neptune program; there are plans for the replacement of the Argus; there have been vague promises that some time later in the year you, Mr. Minister, will call tenders for the first of the new D.D.H.'s. This is already five years too late. I suggest that if the minister had the courage of his convictions, Mr. Chairman, he would stop acting like Hitler did. I say to him, don't be afraid to admit that you have made a mistake once in a while. If you admitted this, perhaps the people in Halifax would be happier and your program of nonsensical unification could be accomplished.

I will leave you for a minute, Mr. Minister. I hope you will give me some answer. The people of Halifax are very anxious to have an answer as to what you intend doing with these bases.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I do not really think this intervention has been worthy of the hon. gentleman, and I do not think a reply at this stage of the bill, on something of this nature, would be worthy of me.

Mr. Forrestall: I will call it five o'clock, Mr. Chairman; but the minister has not heard the last of our objections to his constant, continual pussyfooting.

Progress reported.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house will now proceed to consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

Mr. McNulty: Mr. Speaker, may we, by unanimous consent, stand public bills under items 1 to 10 inclusive, and may we consider now item No. 11, Bill C-46 in the name of the hon. member for Carleton?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement to standing orders Nos. 1 to 10 and proceeding with order No. 11, Bill C-46?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES ACT AMENDMENT

CHANGE IN DESCRIPTION AND TENURE OF OFFICE

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-46 to amend the Parliamentary Secretaries Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill has a simple and direct purpose. It seeks to enhance and enlarge the role, status and prestige of parliamentary secretaries. It would try to restore the positions to the influence and authority for which they were originally designed, to the attainment of which they had made substantial progress by 1957, but from which they were reduced by negative action in 1958 and by legislation in 1959.

Parliamentary Secretaries Act Amendment

I welcome the opportunity of expressing my views on the subject prior to the introduction of the government bill of which notice of resolution has recently been given. Perhaps the debate today may influence the nature of that bill. However, I wish it to be remembered that the bill now under debate has been on the order paper since January 24, 1966, almost 15 months.

It is based upon long personal experience as a parliamentary assistant and later as a parliamentary secretary, and this experience included the performance of the work and duties of the office for more than 21 months, from February 1, 1958 to November 18, 1959, without official appointment, recompense or other recognition.

The bill seeks to do two things which in effect undo the legislation of 1959. First, it would restore the old name of parliamentary assistant, the name used for 16 years, and second, it would change the term of office to "appointment during pleasure" instead of "annual appointment". I submit there are valid and substantial reasons for both changes, and the result would be a great improvement in the public interest.

Although there were three positions described as parliamentary under-secretaries toward the end of the first world war, the practice of making such appointments ceased at the end of that war. The first formal action to establish the role of parliamentary assistant was taken by Mr. Mackenzie King in April, 1943 by the inclusion of an item in the estimates. The present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) was one of the first appointments.

It is clear from the discussion which took place that the establishment of parliamentary assistants had a twofold purpose: first, to grant relief to ministers in the performance of their duties, and second, to provide a system of apprenticeship for future ministers. On these two grounds there have been varying degrees of success, and I want to analyse them and to discuss them in detail, if I may.

May I deal first with the question of the relief of ministers. I think the complexities of modern government place an almost intolerable burden upon some ministers of the Crown. Not all ministers, however, have the disposition or the capacity to delegate. My own view is that the role of a parliamentary assistant should be that of a genuine assistant to his minister, taking from his shoulders the burden of routine work and freeing him for the consideration of vital policy matters. I think it is clear that this is what Right Hon. Mackenzie King had in mind when the system was first introduced.

Because his words uttered on April 20, 1943 are still as valid today as when they were spoken and constitute the best compendium of the duties of a parliamentary assistant, I propose to quote them, quoting perhaps at greater length than I would normally do, from pages 2366 and 2367 of Hansard for 1943. This is what Mr. Mackenzie King said:

> Other duties of assistants to ministers would be to assist the minister in parliament, to answer questions—not all questions—and also to take part in departmental debates so that the house may be given fuller information in regard to some matters than it otherwise would. To assist in the explanation of the estimates. I can conceive of occasions when an assistant to the minister might relieve the minister entirely of a large part of the explanation of the estimates. To appear before house committees, on behalf of the minister, participate in interdepartmental committees on behalf of the minister, to keep the house itself informed more promptly on matters which may arise in the course of debates; to assist in the planning of some of the post-war work of the government which will have to be done under the direction of the minister, but which the assistant to the minister, giving his time to it specifically, could do to good effect.
> Also to receive deputations—the ministers are beset with deputations—they cannot possibly see many of them. An assistant to the minister could see them and I should hope be able to be of real assistance in seeing that their representations were carefully considered.

Then there was an interruption by the then leader of the opposition, Mr. Graydon, after which Mr. Mackenzie King went on to say the following:

> Then there is the matter of a link with members of parliament. I am sure I express the view of many as to the inevitable difficulty of members having a chance to take up matters with ministers direct. It is impossible for a minister to meet members in the corridors and hope to settle different questions at a chance moment. An assistant to the minister will be mixing with members generally and will be able to bring to the minister many matters that otherwise could not possibly be brought to his attention.

Things do not seem to have changed in the intervening years. Mr. Mackenzie King went on to say:

> Then there is deputizing for the minister on different occasions, fulfilling specific duties. The duties will vary between one department and another, one minister may wish his assistant to perform certain duties and another other duties. Then there is the signing on behalf of the minister of many documents that otherwise would require his signature. There is the supervision of officials in some branches where an assistant minister can be of great help. The assistant to the minister can be of great help in regard to outside engagements as well as engagements inside the house. Almost any service that will help relieve the minister of a burden and give the House of Commons and the public more information with regard to the public business is the kind of position which the parliamentary assistant to the minister will be expected to fill.

Those original words with which the positions were created are words which I would wish to be read by all present and potential ministers and by all present and potential parliamentary assistants. I have read them for that purpose.

A rather vivid description of the life of a parliamentary secretary at Westminster is given by Herbert Morrison in his delightful book called "Government and Parliament", at page 66. Mr. Morrison, later Lord Morrison, said:

The life of the parliamentary secretary can be interesting and fairly full, or, on the other hand, uninteresting and rather empty according to the attitude of the minister and, to some extent, the higher civil servants. If, departmentally, he is left out in the cold or given little or nothing to do it is, I think, cruel, foolish, and unfair. It is cruel because it will develop unhappiness and bitterness in the heart of the parliamentary secretary; it is foolish because the parliamentary secretary of today is a possible minister of the future and it is desirable for him to learn all he can, including the taking of responsibility; it is unfair because, apart from creating a feeling of frustration, it makes a fool of the parliamentary secretary when he hears through other channels of things he ought already to have known about, and is driven to tell inquiring MPs that he is sorry but he knows nothing about it. Nor should it be forgotten that he has important duties to discharge with and for the minister from the treasury branch. Moreover, there is the important consideration that the proper employment of the parliamentary secretary can lighten the burden of the minister.

One can see that these words, written by Mr. Morrison, could well have been written about situations that have happened in this parliament. My own view is that the increasing professionalization of public life and the rapid progression toward baffling complexity in governmental administration demand that ministers of the Crown should delegate more and more to parliamentary assistants. Unless they do so, administration will suffer.

As to the other side of the coin, the other aspect of the role, apprenticeship for future ministers, how has this worked out? The question of the utility of the role of parliamentary assistant or parliamentary secretary as a training school or apprenticeship for the ministry is the subject of a most interesting article by Professor Denis Stairs of Dalhousie University, which appears in the second edition of Professor Paul Fox's excellent compendium "Politics—Canada" at page 216. Professor Stairs' statistics are as of January, 1964, and I have tried to bring them up to the minute, right up to this date.

The situation, sir, is that since the system of parliamentary assistants was introduced on April 29, 1943 until today, April 7, 1967, approximately 24 years, 101 persons have been appointed parliamentary assistants or parliamentary secretaries. Of these, 35 persons subsequently attained cabinet status, including the two parliamentary secretaries promoted to the cabinet this week. Of the 101 persons, 66 did not achieve cabinet status.

But that figure, of course, is deceptive since for example it includes 14 persons serving at present as parliamentary secretaries and two others who are still members of this house on the other side who served previously. It includes as well nine members on this side of the house who served as parliamentary secretaries without later attaining cabinet status, but most of whom would likely have that opportunity immediately after the next election. In order to achieve a fairer comparison, these 14, two and nine persons respectively or a total of 25 should be eliminated from consideration. On that basis, 35 former parliamentary assistants or secretaries attained ministerial rank and 41 did not.

A short table will show the position clearly. For each ministry, the table collates the statistics under four heads as follows:

Administrations	Total Appointments	Attained Cabinet Status	Did not but still in Commons	Did not and out of Commons
King-St. Laurent	38	19	0	19
Diefenbaker	36	9	9	18
Pearson	27	7	16	4
Total	101	35	25	41

This figure of 41 includes six who died, two while in office; three who were appointed to the Senate and are now serving there; four who were appointed to the bench; two who were appointed respectively to the Canadian Pension Commission and the Tariff Board, and nine who retired voluntarily from public life. Consequently, 24 of the 41 finished their public careers as indicated. The remainder suffered electoral defeat, but a number are still active politically and some may well return to this chamber for another chance at ministerial promotion.

A somewhat different approach to the appraisal of the role and value of apprenticeship as a ministerial assistant may be undertaken by an examination of cabinet appointments since April 29, 1943. During that period of almost 24 years, 95 persons have been appointed to the cabinet for the first time. This figure excludes senators appointed to the cabinet. Of the 95, 35 had had previous service as a parliamentary assistant or parliamentary secretary and 60 had not. At first, these figures appear to discount the value of apprenticeship as a parliamentary secretary, but it must be remembered that it would have been impossible for any of the original ministry formed by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) to have served as a parliamentary assistant, and several of the original members of the present ministry equally could not have so served. As well, in the Diefenbaker ministry, three successive deputy speakers were advanced—I will not say promoted—to the cabinet. With the exception of one who is now in the Senate, it was less than a successful experiment.

However, as a consequence upon consideration, there should properly be omitted 21 persons appointed to the original Diefenbaker cabinet, seven members of the original Pearson cabinet who never sat in the House of Commons during a period when they might be appointed as parliamentary secretaries and the three former deputy speakers to whom I have referred, or a total of 31. As a result, in a fair contrast, we observe 35 appointments to the cabinet since 1943 from the rank of parliamentary secretary, and 31 who did not have that service but who could not in the course of events have had it, as well as 29 other appointments to the cabinet.

In this latter category of 29 are such persons as a former Speaker, Mr. Speaker Glen, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), the first minister from Newfoundland, Mr. Bradley and his successor, the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), two former provincial premiers, Mr. Garson and the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming), General McNaughton and a number of others, the reasons for whose appointment to the cabinet are less obvious.

May I put this in summary form by offering this table:

Appointments to cabinet (excluding senators) of persons appointed thereto for first time, since April 29, 1943.

Administrations	Total	Previously served as parliamentary assistant	Did not previously serve as parliamentary assistant
King-St. Laurent	27	14	13
Diefenbaker	36	9	27
Pearson	32	12	20
Total	95	35	60

Now, sir, I have put that background on the record so that we may see the two basic reasons for parliamentary secretaries and what the result of their appointment may be.

I should like now to return to the two basic purposes of this bill. First, as I have indicated, it would restore the old style and title of parliamentary assistant. The intention of that proposal is to upgrade the office. I served under both names and I must say that I believe the introduction of the new name in 1959 very definitely downgraded the office. I found thereafter that most people thought my function in life was to write Don Fleming's letters, and I was never able after 1959 to be as useful to the Minister of Finance as I had been previously.

It is quite true that at Westminster the terms used are parliamentary secretary or parliamentary undersecretary. But the atmosphere is different there and indeed most are actually members of the ministry, though not of course of the cabinet. In earlier days in Canada, the term "secretary" was used for the senior administrative officer of each government department. This was changed to deputy minister, and the term survives only in the Department of External Affairs and in the Department of State. In my view, the public generally in Canada do not understand what a parliamentary secretary is. They believe him to be a mere scrivener of some sort. The name "parliamentary assistant" which was used for 16 years is more readily understood and much more correctly describes the role.

The second feature is to restore the term of office to "during pleasure" which it was for 16 years. If the positions are to achieve the purpose for which they were designed, annual appointments are ridiculous. It would be as sensible to reduce ministerial tenure to annual renewal.

The annual appointment was introduced as a technique of parliamentary discipline. The house is not unaware of my views that the powers of the Prime Minister have increased, are increasing and ought to be decreased. If parliamentary assistants are to be mere sycophants seeking always to court the Prime Minister for renewal of the mandate, the office should be abolished. I know of no other area of government where appointment is on an annual basis. Our tradition of appointment is during pleasure and this tradition, I submit, should be restored.

It is on the basis of these arguments, sir, that I commend this bill to the house. The government has a resolution now on the order paper and I suggest for the reasons I have outlined they should adopt the procedures that are suggested in this bill, the techniques in this bill, as a means of restoring and enhancing the status and position of ministerial assistants.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member resumes his seat I wonder if I could ask him a question. I thought his speech was excellent, if he is not too embarrassed at my saying so; I think he served a highly useful purpose in putting on the record a clear statement of the original purpose of the office. He made reference in the early part of his speech to the resolution on the order paper which provides simply for increasing the number of parliamentary secretaries or parliamentary assistants, as the case may be, beyond 16, the present limit.

Would he be agreeable to having his bill amended to provide for that increase? It would, of course, require that the house revert to public business for the purpose of adopting the resolution required, because of the added cost involved. Would he consider that proposal?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer to that question can be very simply stated. My objective is to get this bill and these principles adopted. I believe that the changes which the government are proposing are equally proper. Whatever technique would achieve this end would meet with my approval. I can only say that I speak for myself alone.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I do not generally approve of the proposition that in private members hour ministers should speak, but there is a resolution on the other paper dealing with this particular subject. If hon. members will bear with me, I will try to be very brief in my remarks.

The resolution simply asks the house to permit an increase in the maximum number of parliamentary secretaries to one for each minister having a portfolio and two for the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). The present maximum is 16. Nothing more is involved in the resolution.

As I indicated in my question earlier, I was quite taken, frankly, with the useful purpose served by the hon. member in restating the purpose and function of this office, whether it is called that of "parliamentary assistant" or "parliamentary secretary". I was glad because I am one of those who has had the honour, if you like, or responsibility or privilege, of serving in the two different capacities, that of parliamentary assistant for some years as well as that of minister. I believe that if this office is carefully handled by parliament it can be a great help to our parliamentary processes, both for the reasons offered by the hon. member, as well as for other reasons which I will not presume to take up the time of the house to give at the moment.

I view his bill as acceptable, subject to one problem that confronts me at the moment. We would like to amend the bill to put a ceiling on the number in accordance with our resolution. I am advised by the Law Clerk that this can be done by the house reverting to public business and adopting the resolution. Then when the resolution is adopted, according to the precedent that I have here, the resolution then adopted is referred to the committee of the whole house on the bill, its having been given second reading and referred to the committee of the whole house. Then, Mr. Speaker, when we reach the appropriate clause, an amendment will be moved changing the number, plus imposing the additional financial burden forecast by the resolution.

That is one procedure that can be used, Mr. Speaker. I have quite a lengthy manuscript here from the Law Clerk; and I believe that this is the correct procedure. I also have the precise precedent available. I am quite willing to do this if it meets with the wishes of hon. members. If not, I will not presume to take up more time in this private members hour.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I just want to be clear about this. I do not want to defeat any of the thinking here, but the government's proposal on the order paper is in the form of a resolution which will be followed by a bill.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): By amendment to my bill.

Mr. Lambert: The point is that the government's proposal is by way of resolution, which would have to be followed by a bill to amend the Parliamentary Secretaries Act. Because the payment of public funds is envisaged here we must proceed by way of resolution.

The difficulty I foresee in telescoping the two things is this. Although I may be wrong, my thinking about this is that this government resolution is tied to a particular bill. The provisions in the bill of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) could be brought in because it does not envisage the payment of funds. I doubt very much if we can telescope the two by moving from the government's resolution to my colleague's bill.

I would think we should proceed rather the other way, and I put this forward for consideration. To my mind a bill must follow the government's resolution. Even if the government's resolution were adopted, it could not be imported into my colleague's bill.

Mr. McIlraith: If I may deal with the point of order that has been raised, I had this matter turned up this morning and I got an opinion on how to proceed from the Law Clerk, as I have said. Undoubtedly, the method suggested by the hon. member could be followed. But the other method that could be used is to give the bill now before the house second reading and refer it to the committee of the whole house. At that stage—or at some earlier stage, but preferably at that stage—the government resolution, which can be dealt with by reverting to public business, would be adopted. Immediately on its adoption the resolution would be referred to the committee of the whole house on Bill No. C-46.

Then, Mr. Speaker, when we come to the relevant clause we then would have the authority, having met the requirements of the resolution stage, to amend the private member's bill on the private member's item of business by changing the number of parliamentary secretaries from 16 to the higher number proposed in the bill which would have been based on the resolution. We can proceed in that way and there is a precedent to substantiate it. That is an outline of the precise procedure.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask another question, Mr. Speaker. Supposing the private member's bill which is now before us is accepted by this house; would not the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) then be able to carry on with his resolution at the appropriate time and in the normal way at some future date?

Mr. McIlraith: No. The difficulty that we then would run into is this. We would have decided in this session to fix the number at 16. Therefore we will get into the old question of the same question being dealt with twice in the same session, because a decision would have been taken on the point. This is the difficulty with that procedure. It could then be argued that the government's resolution could not be proceeded with this session. That is the nub of the difficulty.

[Mr. Lambert.]

Mr. Churchill: Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps we are fairly close to a new session. If the private member's bill is passed now, it might be only a few weeks before there is a new session, and the government could introduce the measure at that stage. There would be no prolonged delay.

If that is not acceptable I have to say this: I do not think the house should be asked to revert to government business at this stage and give up the private members' hour. There should be no attempt to carry on government business which has only been brought to the attention of the house during the last ten minutes. This is contrary to the practices of the house. We require notice as to when matters will come before us and we were not notified at any time of this.

I do not want to detract in any way from the work of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell). I listened with interest to his presentation and will read in Hansard the tables and comparative figures he gave. I hope that he will be given the full credit for the proposal he has brought forward. It appears to make good sense and would correct a situation which should be corrected. I do not think we should go beyond that and attempt to deal with government business enlarging the scope of the private member's bill materially, and bringing in a further matter of debate, the increase in the number of parliamentary secretaries, concerning which there might be considerable expression of opinion in the house when the time for that comes.

I regret that I cannot accept the idea of the Minister of Public Works that we proceed from this stage to government business. There must be some other way of getting around this difficulty.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the point made by the member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), but I wonder if we do not in effect have an opportunity to see a private member's public bill get passed. This is something that happens in this House of Commons, but not very often. This is centennial year; let us do something different.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I think this proposition might be considered. If we were to revert to public business and take a great deal of time, then of course the arguments advanced by my hon. friend might carry some weight. But if we agree to accept the bill of the hon. member for Carleton and amend it, then it will take only two or three minutes to pass the other resolution. I would assume if we were to approve the procedure suggested by the Minister of Public Works and go into committee of the whole house on Bill C-246, that on arriving at the appropriate clause a minister of the crown would have to move the amendment. The result of the procedure proposed by the Minister of Public Works is that the bill before us would pass, with one amendment being made to it.

The bill itself would do two things. It would change the name from parliamentary secretary to parliamentary assistant and it would change the appointment from being an annual one to being one having "at pleasure" status. In addition to that, the governments' idea of increasing the number of assistants would be added, by an amendment to the bill proposed by the hon. member for Carleton. That would make sense. It would be interesting to see one of our private members public bills getting through. Let's do it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Churchill: What is the question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): That the bill be read a second time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In view of the manner in which the house has dealt with the bill might I ask for unanimous consent that it now be referred to the committee of the whole house rather than to another committee?

Mr. Knowles: That is automatic.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): As I understand it, it has been suggested that the other resolution be brought forward at this time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): My remarks refer only to this bill.

Mr. McIlraith: It was suggested that the bill be referred to the committee of the whole house. That we may be clear about the procedure, Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the motion should be that this bill be referred to the committee of the whole house.

Mr. Lambert: With the greatest respect, this is a private member's public bill and the automatic referral is to the committee of the whole house.

Mr. McIlraith: I stand corrected.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I stand corrected, also. I have been misled.

Mr. McIlraith: For the purposes of regularizing the procedure, this is the stage at which I would ask to revert to public business to move the resolution standing on the order paper dealing with this subject. If that is not agreeable to the house I would have no objection, because this is a somewhat unusual procedure. But this is the point at which it should be done. It requires unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it agreed that the house revert to public business?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I raised my objection earlier and I do not want to be pressed on this. I am quite content to proceed with the bill presented by the hon. member for Carleton, but not beyond that.

Mr. McIlraith: In view of that I withdraw my request.

The house in committee, Mr. Richard in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Short Title.

Mr. Matheson: I wish to say a word on clause 2.

• (5:40 p.m.)

I should like to endorse from a personal point of view exactly what we heard from the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell). I think that we have heard today an extremely thoughtful speech. The fact that this bill was on the order paper impelled a number of members to carry out research to some extent into the office of parliamentary secretary, originally that of parliamentary assistant. What has been presented to the house is so factual and well documented that it almost compels most of us now to remain in silence. This was a very scholarly address we heard, and a useful one from a comparative point of view.

My predecessor as parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, (Mr. Davis) was able to carry out duties of a unique character, as I saw them, during the period at the beginning of the present administration while I was serving as chairman of the standing committee on external affairs. My predecessor as parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister, a man who holds five university degrees to the level of doctorate, high post-graduate degrees in different disciplines, was able to devote many thousands of hours of work for Canada at the time of the exhaustive study which was being conducted into the Columbia River treaty.

It was not easy for a new administration to step in and discuss adequately at the political level an arrangement which had been the subject of months of research by the previous administration.

Mr. Herridge: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Matheson: I see that my dear friend from Kootenay West does not share that view. But I believe the country as a whole would agree that this great step forward was assisted substantially by the expertise of a parliamentary secretary who was both an electrical engineer and also, through his training at Oxford, a highly qualified economist.

During my period of service to the Prime Minister, since January 9, 1966, I have had until very recently the privilege and honour of sharing accommodation with the person who is now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau)—another ardent scholar, the product of Harvard University, the University of Paris and the London School of Economics. I know something of the work this parliamentary secretary did for Canada and if he had never assumed the high appointment he presently holds his contribution to Canada, as I see it, would already have been substantial.

Whatever may happen in the future to any parliamentary secretary, the experience of serving actively in one of the departments or in the department of the Prime Minister is no cause for bitterness—I think that is the expression in one of the quotations used by the hon. member for Carleton. On the contrary, it represents a great challenge and one which stretches most of us to the very limit of our abilities. I fully agree with the view expressed by the hon. member for Carleton in that the name has been an inconvenience. It is true that the word "secretary" has certain connotations in the United Kingdom which it has never enjoyed in Canada. Indeed, upon my appointment as parliamentary secretary I received a number of letters of congratulation upon my stepping out of politics into the civil service. Some people thought I would never have to go through the rigours of a political contest again. The name certainly has been a cause of confusion. Many people misunderstand what the office is. I feel this bill makes a useful contribution to parliament.

[Mr. Matheson.]

Mr. Faulkner: I would agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that in the centennial year there are grounds for greater co-operation and that when the house is presented with an opportunity, as it was a moment ago, to do something constructive which is recognized on both sides as having merit, it is regrettable we do not seem to have the stuff necessary to do it. As a new member of parliament and, no doubt, an inexperienced one, I think this is regrettable.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) presented cogently and at times movingly a compelling argument for improving the status and the role of parliamentary secretaries. I cannot but concur in the argument he presented on behalf of this bill. The practice in Canada has been that parliamentary secretaries or assistants are not junior ministers as is the case in Britain. Their roles are determined largely by the ministers themselves and necessarily vary from one ministry to another. If I felt that a change of title would lead to an improvement in the status I would agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for Carleton.

If the words which the hon. member quoted from our late distinguished prime minister, Mackenzie King, were put into practice by ministers there is no doubt that the role of parliamentary secretary could become a more useful and positive one both in government and in the House of Commons. We shall not bring this about simply by increasing the numbers of parliamentary secretaries. I object to the provision which speaks of 16 and envisages possible changes in the future.

This is a role which has to be examined. At present it is something of a no-man's-land. It is not clearly defined and, as I said earlier, it seems to vary from department to department depending on the particular portfolio to which a parliamentary secretary is attached. My main point is that the role of parliamentary secretary or assistant has not been developed as fully as it should be. Every minister needs a parliamentary assistant and I cannot think of one good reason why any minister should refuse one. The responsibilities which ministers of the Crown presently bear must really be back-breaking and there are areas in which a parliamentary assistant could clearly be of help.

What are those areas? I was surprised to learn of some of them as put forward by Mr. Mackenzie King, in what I thought was a highly contemporary piece of thinking. Parliamentary assistants could do a lot more in the way of receiving briefs from interested parties and from pressure groups outside government circles. They could also do a great deal in the way of receiving individuals who always seem to want meetings with ministers. If their role were clearly laid down they could serve as effective liaison between members of parliament and their ministers.

It would be difficult for me to make suggestions about departmental responsibilities which they might assume. I am not familiar enough with what happens in this area to know, but I would think there would be areas where a parliamentary assistant could do some useful work within a department itself.

In respect to duties in the House of Commons it is perfectly clear that what we expect of our ministers today is more than we should reasonably expect in terms of attendance and responsibility. I would suggest it is unrealisitc and inefficient to expect ministers to attend here as well as to administer the large and complex government departments it is their lot to administer. Parliamentary assistants could serve an extremely useful purpose in relieving their ministers of some of the time those ministers are presently required to attend in the house.

In fact I would hope that parliamentary assistants could be charged with the responsibility of piloting through the House of Commons bills which are not of a particularly controversial or political nature. The hon. member for Carleton very rightly expressed the possibilities for apprenticeship that open up in this area. We are all too cognizant of how important that apprenticeship is in preparation for ministerial responsibilities, and particularly for duties within the House of Commons.

In recent years it has been our sorry lot to witness what can be the consequences to individuals who are over-worked or, in some cases, inexperienced when faced with the responsibilities and the challenges posed by becoming members of the front bench in the House of Commons. No one needs to elaborate on that point. No one needs to apportion blame. It is a fact of life of which all of us should be cognizant and about which we should be concerned. Therefore I would see considerable possibilities for parliamentary assistants in the role that I have just described, that of relieving ministers of some of their duties and responsibilities within the House of Commons.

Another area where a parliamentary assistant could do some very useful work, if given the opportunity, is in assuming some of the responsibilities we presently require of ministers outside the House of Commons and outside their departments. I am thinking of official openings, speaking engagements, and the like. These are very important functions which have to be performed. National organizations, and indeed constituency organizations very often like to have ministers present at their annual meetings to discuss departmental policies, and how they relate to those organizations. Parliamentary assistants could do useful work in this regard.

One final area in which they could do some useful work is in the area of long term policy planning within departments. It is not realistic to expect civil servants to be responsible for projecting in what direction a department is to move in the future, and what are the alternatives or options in policy matters. These are things which are a political task and a parliamentary assistant could do some useful work in this regard.

All I would like to say in closing is that I fully support the arguments presented by the hon. member for Carleton. However, I feel that if this bill passes, the authority vested in parliamentary assistants must be made much greater. Not only must a parliamentary assistant appear to have the confidence of his minister, but he must have that confidence. He must have access to confidential papers and to meetings which his minister has with departmental officials. In short, a parliamentary assistant must become the alter ego of his minister.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my support for the bill and to congratulate the hon. member for Carleton on his speech, but I do hope it will not take another 100 years before we exhibit this centennial spirit, when private members bills are being considered in the house. I hope this will establish a precedent whereby bills will be dealt with on their merits, and I hope we continue the practice of referring them to committees more and more in the days ahead.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, I would like to join with other hon. members in congratulating the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) on this bill. Having had some experience in a minister's office I can assure the hon. member for Carleton of how important it is. As a result of this debate and of the negotiations that went on across the chamber it would seem to me hon. members are in favour of the objectives of the provisions in the hon. member's bill, and I would hope that when the government resolution, and the bill based on it, come up for discussion, the hon. member's bill could be introduced by way of amendment to the government bill.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Canadian system has resulted in a somewhat too inflexible bureaucratic control over the government. In the United States when a new president and new administration take office, the senior officials are replaced by adherents to the party coming in, which provides them with a greater flexibility. We can attain a greater amount of flexibility by having parliamentary secretaries working deeply within their departments. As it is now, ministers tend to be overburdened by a combination of administrative and political duties, which does not allow them properly to fill all their functions.

Mr. Churchill: You have talked the bill out.

The Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I am wondering about the business of the house. Do we take up this particular private members bill on Monday, or is there something else?

Mr. Pepin: The order on Monday will be the same as today.

Mr. Knowles: And next week will be the same as this week.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour for the consideration of private members business has expired.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

MEETINGS OF NATIONAL WELFARE COUNCIL

Question No. 2,810—Mr. Enns:

1. Since the appointment of members to the national welfare council on December 23, 1964, how many meetings has this council held and on what dates did the council convene?

2. Have such meetings been at the call of the minister or have members of the council initiated meetings?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The National Council of Welfare, since its inception in 1965, has met on three occasions: (a) April 5 and 6, 1965; (b) October 18 and 19, 1965; (c) A meeting was proposed for November 24 and 25, 1966, or alternatively December 1 and 2, 1966. However, it was postponed because of the uncertainty of the transportation situation at the time and the inability of some members to attend on the dates proposed. This meeting was subsequently held on January 19 and 20, 1967, the earliest that a generally acceptable time could be agreed upon.

2. Meetings are convened at the call of the chairman, the deputy minister of national welfare. It is expected that the council will meet once or perhaps twice a year. Since it is a newly established advisory body, there has not been any lengthy experience with respect to the frequency of meetings. It is anticipated that these meetings will be convened at regular intervals and that the council itself will be able to determine how frequently it should meet. If any member or members of the council or if the minister want a meeting convened, it will be arranged as soon as a suitable time can be worked out with the members. At the last meeting of the council in January, there was a concensus that the council hold its next meeting in September.

EXPO '67

REPORTED THREATS TO DESTROY CUBAN PAVILION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): In the absence of the Solicitor General possibly this question should be directed to the Prime Minister. It has to do with—

An hon. Member: He is here.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, Mr. Speaker, I did not notice the promotion. I see he is getting closer and closer to the Prime Minister's seat. Then I shall direct my question to the Solicitor General. It has to do with the threat that has been made regarding the Cuban pavilion at Expo. Has he a report to offer in this connection, and at the same time will he advise whether press statements are correct, namely that the Cubans who are now en route to Canada to look after their pavilion include 60 security personnel? Does the government not feel that the importation of their own police by countries who are going to be present at Expo is not in keeping with the security that we in Canada maintain, and that they ought to be told to leave their armies of security personnel at home?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the newspaper report indicated there is very close liaison between members of the law enforcement agencies in Canada, both the R.C.M.P. and the agencies in the province of Quebec, and the F.B.I. and other law enforcement agencies in the United States. I believe the press report also stated that certain information had been forwarded to Canadian authorities regarding the visits of people from parts of the United States with interests adverse to Expo.

So far as the presence of security personnel in Canada is concerned, this matter is now being discussed with my colleague the Minister of External Affairs and I will take notice of that part of the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is consideration being given by the government to telling these nations to keep their security forces at home when they visit Canada?

[Later:]

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What terms of possession were given to nations which set up pavilions at Expo '67? Are the agreements on a rental basis?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am wondering whether the question is not much too general to be asked and answered at this time. Perhaps the hon. member wishes to rephrase the question.

Mr. Mandziuk: I do not know whether I can rephrase it satisfactorily, but I should like to know what consideration has been paid by each of the nations setting up pavilions. Was any consideration paid to us in return for setting up these pavilions at Expo '67?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The Minister of Trade and Commerce is the minister who has jurisdiction over this matter, as far as any minister has, and I will be glad to discuss the matter with him.

Mr. Mandziuk: Would the Prime Minister also convey to the Minister of Trade and Commerce our anxiety to know what security guarantees were given by Canada or the province of Quebec to those who set up pavilions at Expo? Are they guaranteed absolute security or must they provide their own?

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATURAL GAS

ACTION OF U.S. COMMISSION RESPECTING PROPOSED PIPE LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of press reports that some $200 million worth of industrial construction will not be commenced unless there is assurance that facilities for gas transmission will be increased this year, can the minister give the house any information as to when we may expect a final decision from the federal power commission regarding the construction of the trans-Canada pipe line?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there should be an oral argument before the federal power commission on April 21 between the interested parties. I do not know when the federal power commission will make a decision, but we hope it will be soon after that debate. If it should not be on time to use the 1967 construction period, there is no doubt that later this spring a decision will have to be taken with regard to an alternative project. Trans-Canada Pipe Line has been instructed to prepare that alternative project for introduction before the National Energy Board.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether he has set any deadline for the Trans-Canada Pipe Line Company to begin the twinning of the line along the northern Canada route in the event that there is no final decision by the F.P.C.?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that there is a deadline about the F.P.C. decision but I can say that there is a deadline for the Trans-Canada Pipe Line Company to introduce its application before the National Energy Board.

Mr. Douglas: Can the minister say what that deadline is?

Mr. Pepin: At the end of this month or early next month, I would think. There is no specific date because the National Energy Board makes the decision on the hearing of applications and of course other companies in Canada might want to intervene either in favour of or against Trans-Canada's alternative project.

[Mr. Mandziuk.]

FISHERIES

PARTICIPATION OF RUSSIA IN NORTH PACIFIC TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend a welcome to the Minister of Fisheries on his return from his trip abroad. I should like to ask the minister whether the question of the participation of the Soviet union in the north Pacific fisheries treaty was discussed during the course of his recent talks with the minister of fisheries of that country.

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his kind words of welcome. I can assure him that in the frank exchange of views I had with the minister of fisheries for the U.S.S.R., Mr. Ishkov, the question of Russian participation in the north Pacific treaty was discussed. However, the hon. member will understand that no decision could be arrived at because this is a matter which also concerns two other countries, Japan and the United States.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING RESPECTING MARINE PLANT PROCESSING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should also like to express my pleasure at the safe return of the Minister of Fisheries after his 12 day visit to Russia. In this he was more fortunate than a former hon. member for Coast-Capilano who also visited that country while in the position of minister of fisheries.

While the minister was absent representatives of the federal government met at Halifax on April 5 with representatives of the five Atlantic coast provinces along with marine plant processors from Canada, the United States and Europe. Has the minister any report on the decisions made by government representatives and scientists to step up the development of the Canadian Atlantic marine plants industry, a matter which was discussed at that conference?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that such a meeting took place on April 5. A report is being prepared, but as yet it has not reached me.

INQUIRY AS TO FRESH WATER FISH MARKETING BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Have the minister and his officials now completed their study of the McIvor commission report of inquiry into fresh water fish marketing? If so, will legislation be introduced at this session to implement the recommendations of this report, namely that a fresh water fish marketing board be established under federal legislation?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in reply to similar questions addressed to me some time ago in this house I made it very clear that the implementation of the McIvor commission report came under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. An interdepartmental committee is studying this report. Meetings have been held with representatives of the provincial governments concerned and the industry, but no final decision has yet been reached on whether the recommendations made in the report should be implemented.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the Minister of Trade and Commerce but in his absence I wonder if I could direct it to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to consider at the earliest possible moment—for example, tomorrow—making a full statement on motions concerning the negotiations carried on under the cereals committee of GATT on the price of wheat? I use as my reason the tremendously alarming headlines which have proliferated in the west during the last two or three days to the effect that the western farmers' wheat is going to be put on the open market.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a short statement on Thursday or Friday, I think, on this matter. I shall be glad to discuss with him the proposal made by my hon. friend, but I need not remind him that the discussions are still going on.

Mr. Hamilton: There is urgency here in that it was these questions and answers in the house that caused the panic in the west, and that is the reason for the question.

POWER

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON NATIONAL GRID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I have not become quite adjusted to the greater distance existing between us now.

In view of the general support in Canada for the building of a trans-Canada electric power grid for the development of Canadian industry, and in view of the concern expressed in some quarters about proposals for the development of a continental power grid, would the minister make a statement at the first opportunity outlining government policy in this respect?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it should be known that my recent physical move away from this end of the house is no indication of a lack of affection for the hon. gentleman who has just asked this question. On the subject he raises I simply wish to say that the policy of the federal government has been to encourage the development of a national power grid.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understood the question was only whether the minister would make a statement. I suggest this is not the time to make it.

AGRICULTURE

PERSONNEL OF FEED GRAIN BOARD AND ADVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

The minister was supposed to announce last week the names of the members of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board. Since he has failed to do so, does he think he will be in a position to make that announcement this week?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot was late, because I made that announcement at the beginning of the sitting this afternoon.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I simply wished to further emphasize that the minister had deferred that announcement for several weeks.

Mr. Speaker: In that case, the question is out of order.

[English]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. I know that he, in common with the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, wants to do everything possible to unite this country in centennial year. My question is about the anticipated visit of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) to Quebec, to debate with the separatist member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). I ask this question in a non-partisan way, to clear up the matter. Will the right hon. Prime Minister assure the house that the hon. member for York-Humber is not making the visit to Quebec with the approval of his party or of the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question cannot be asked in this form of the right hon. Prime Minister.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO STAMP COMMEMORATING VISIT BY THE QUEEN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct my question to the Postmaster General. I ask him whether, in view of the visit of the Queen of Canada to our country this summer, his department is considering issuing a stamp with the Queen's head thereon, surmounted by the crown? Has the minister no answer?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): I have already announced that in honour of the Queen's visit this summer a stamp will be issued.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the stamp have on it the Queen's head, with the crown on it?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Ricard.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I want to know.

M. Côté (Longueuil): As soon as I have a picture of the stamp I shall send a copy of it to the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought you were abolishing the Queen.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO STUDY OF PROPOSED MERCHANT MARINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): My question is for the Minister of Transport. May I express the hope that because he has moved one seat farther from the Prime Minister that that is not to be taken as a demotion. I ask the minister about the status of the long awaited and long promised departmental study of a merchant marine for Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member and to the hon. minister that this question is much too general to be asked on orders of the day.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR DISCUSSION OF NEW DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Following the meetings announced last week by the minister with several farmers' associations, is he in a position to tell us whether he is ready to reconsider the price of manufacturing milk, in order to guarantee the farmers $5 per hundredweight of manufacturing milk?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the question of the member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) is similar to those put on several occasions last week.

Mr. Caouette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Last week I asked the minister if he planned to meet the farmers, and he answered me last Wednesday, that as a matter of fact, he was due to meet them on Thursday and Friday.

I should like to know whether anything developed from this meeting with the minister and if he is now considering the requests made by the farmers?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I met the farmers but I have nothing new to report to the house.

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEETING OF NUCLEAR PLANNING GROUP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Will the hon. gentleman soon be in a position to make any announcement about the meetings of the nuclear planning group in Washington last week?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I do not think there is much I can usefully add to the communiqué issued at the end of the meetings. It may be that at some subsequent time, after the possible success of the negotiations between the United States and the U.S.S.R. with respect to the future development of the anti ballistic missile system is more clear, there would be an opportunity for some debate on this question. In the meantime, I think there is not much I can usefully add to what is already public knowledge.

DIVORCE

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE RELIEF IN CASES OF PROLONGED DESERTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): My question is addressed to the Minister of Justice; I would have sent him notice, but I had a little difficulty locating him after the game of musical chairs last week. Because full fledged divorce reform later this year will throw a heavy burden on the courts, would the minister ask his government to consider an interim measure now to give relief to the neediest class of cases, that is, husbands and wives who have been deserted for three years or more?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now making a representation. It is not a question in a form that can be answered at this time.

Mr. McCleave: Then, Mr. Speaker, probably the simplest thing to do is to invite the minister to join me at ten o'clock, and I so do.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CAMP HILL, N.S.—REPORTED LACK OF HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, again I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I refer to the question I posed to him on Monday, April 3, and which I reiterated for the acting minister on Thursday, April 6, with respect to the charges and accusations that bed space was not available for pensionable overseas veterans at Camp Hill hospital, Halifax, while at the same time beds were being occupied by merchant seamen from Canada and other countries. Is the minister now in a position to reply?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman supplied me with information on a specific case which I am now having investigated. As soon as the answer is at hand I will forward it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): As a supplementary question, is the minister aware that Dr. C. J. MacDonald, director of the hospital, has completely refuted any such criticism, and will the minister hurry up his investigation as much as possible?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now making an argument.

WINTER WORKS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but in his absence and in the absence of his parliamentary secretary I shall direct it to the acting minister or to the Prime Minister.

Because of the severity of the winter which the Gaspé peninsula just went through and which has greatly delayed the implementation of the winter works planned by the municipalities, would the government consider the possibility of extending this period to May 31?

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): On behalf of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, I will take this question as notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN MORTGAGE INTEREST RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour who is responsible to parliament on housing matters. Because the interest rate on C.M.H.C. direct loans is based on the cost of short term treasury bills, namely 1¾ per cent higher than that cost, is the corporation giving consideration to lowering the interest rate below the present 7 per cent?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the policy in this respect was announced some months ago. There is no fixed rate. It is in line with the return, the long term yield on government bonds and, as previously forecast, it has already dropped to 7 per cent. It is the government's hope that there will be a further drop before long under the formula announced last December.

Mr. Keays: As a supplementary question, does the government intend to give consideration to changing its policy and not waiting the full three months as mentioned in its original policy statement?

Mr. Nicholson: That, Mr. Speaker, involves a question of government policy. It also involves legislation, and if any such change were decided upon it would be announced in the usual way.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. I would ask her whether the government has made any decision regarding the appointment of a president and vice president of the C.B.C.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Well, no, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: That is a well thought out answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I compliment the minister on that answer. It is like saying yes and no in the same answer, and only a good lawyer could achieve that. Now I ask her whether it is a fact that Mr. Jules Leger has been appointed president and Mr. Chris Young of the Ottawa Citizen vice president?

Miss LaMarsh: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that the question as asked cannot be accepted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why, Mr. Speaker, similar questions were asked of me when I was on the other side of the house—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —by these hon. gentlemen who now object. I can understand them objecting to the mention of Chris Young. The Prime Minister was the first to object.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was not in the chair in those days.

BANKRUPTCY

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Could he inform the house of what his position will be on bankruptcies in Canada, particularly in the province of Quebec where they are increasing at an alarming rate?

Mr. Speaker: I think the question, in its present form, is too general, hence out of order.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—PROPOSED PROTEST AGAINST USE OF FRAGMENTATION BOMB

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the intense human suffering involved, will the government protest to the United States government against the use of the anti-personnel fragmentation bomb in Viet Nam?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have asked for a report on the exact situation. When that is received I will be in a position to reply.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORT

SECOND FERRY BETWEEN NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Bower (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he now give the people of the maritime provinces the assurance that a supplementary ferry will be put on the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor run this summer, in order that the tourist business and the fisheries exports of those provinces will not be restricted but will be permitted the development of their full growth potential?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should limit his question to the first part of his speech. I suggest that the second part is not in order.

Mr. Bower: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, on February 24 I asked a question of the Minister of Transport on this matter of a needed supplementary ferry on the run I have mentioned. Your Honour said it was out of order and suggested that I take it up in the adjournment debate. This I did on February 27—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Bower: Now, with respect, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. In view of the facts to which the hon. member is just referring I hope he will notice I did not rule the question out of order, just the supplementary comments which I thought were superfluous. I recognize the validity of the question itself which was asked in the first part of the hon. member's comments.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was quite prepared to answer the hon. gentleman's question, and still am. I regret he is not going to be any more pleased than I am with the answer, but I am sorry to say there is not a ship available to my knowledge and therefore I could not give that assurance. But if some suitable vessel should become available I would be very glad to consider the possibility of adding to the service for the summer months.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): As a supplementary question, I wonder would the Minister of Transport give consideration to taking the Grande Hermine out of Expo and helping the people of the maritime provinces with it.

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSIBLE AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO FAMILY PLANNING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In reply to a question last week he said that legislation to amend the Criminal Code concerning birth control would not be introduced until the fall. In view of the announcement made on the week end by the Ontario provincial minister of health that that government is going to urge its county public health units to provide family planning advice, and will give the necessary money, can a simple amendment not be brought in earlier to bring the government of Ontario within the law?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to see amendments of this kind, which I have already spoken about in the house, introduced into the house as quickly as possible; but if this session goes on, for instance to the end of June, it might be difficult to start the new one before the fall.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING CHANGES IN FISCAL RELATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give to a minister embodying the brilliance and dynamism of youth, the opportunity to reply to his first question as a minister. So, I am putting this question to the Member of the Administration attached to the Department of Finance.

I should like to ask him whether following the talks held this morning, a redistribution of taxes is to be expected soon?

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to rephrase the question I directed earlier to the hon. member for Saint-Maurice-Laflèche, Member of the Administration. I should like to ask him if he had discussions this morning in Ottawa with the Quebec finance minister, Mr. Dozois, what was the purpose of those discussions and if he can report on the conclusions which were reached?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that he cannot direct a question to a minister unless the subject matter comes under his administrative jurisdiction. I do not know whether the question is asked in that way, but since there is a doubt in my mind, I shall ask the hon. member to let his question stand for the time being.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST THAT DAIRY PRODUCERS BENEFIT FROM PRICE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I am sure the minister will agree with me that because the Canadian Dairy Commission is a new agency there is some question in the dairy industry as to the responsibilities of this government agency. Because of a contemplated increase in the prices of dairy products to consumers may I ask the minister whether the Canadian Dairy Commission, the government and the stabilization board will be able to direct that the increase in prices, or any portion of it, will be passed on to the primary producers?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Dairy Commission announces the support levels of various products, and I believe an announcement in this regard will be made very shortly.

POTATOES—REQUEST FOR SUBSIDY TO MOVE SURPLUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister, in view of the fact that the matter involves one or two departments of his government. In the light of the fact that the surplus of potatoes in the maritime provinces, particularly in Prince Edward Island, has depressed the price to the farmers, has the minister received any request for a subsidy either for a starching process or in respect of the export of these potatoes? I should like to know which departments of the government are engaged in seeking a solution, and how soon we may expect an announcement.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture and I have discussed this matter. The minister will be making a report very shortly, possibly this afternoon.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a support program in this area in respect of starch plants was announced over a week ago.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I am referring particularly to additional assistance which has been asked by the farmers of the maritimes and by the legislature of the province of Prince Edward Island to meet this particular surplus. They ask also for an export subsidy to enable them to drain these surplus potatoes off the market.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the question of exports was considered. I believe export sales in the past year were the largest in history, and it was not thought that an export subsidy would be helpful to the farmers. However, the support subsidy was announced and further considered after representations from the province. I believe the procedures we are working out will be more satisfactory than that of the original plan.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. Will he give further consideration to a more satisfactory diversion plan which will meet the needs of the growers in this regard, especially in the light of the fact that he has been so kindly reminded of the problem by the gift of a bag of potatoes from Prince Edward Island which I understand was shipped to him by centennial iceboat transportation.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that every consideration will be given to the problem of the potato farmers, irrespective of any bribery or corruption which may have been involved.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

ACTION OF CABINET IN COMMUTING SENTENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

Is it the hon. minister's intention to have the majority decision of the House of Commons enforced with regard to capital punishment?

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Quite often when I ask a question you do not even allow the minister time to answer. I put a question on capital punishment to the hon. Minister of Justice earlier, and you immediately changed the subject.

Now, I put a question concerning capital punishment on the order paper, question 2,541, on January 27, 1967, and I have not yet received an answer. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether justice can overrule the decisions of this house, the decisions of parliament?

The majority of hon. members have decided that capital punishment should be maintained, but justice has not been done in that direction since that time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will admit that his intervention is a suggestion or a representation rather than a question of privilege, and I must therefore rule that his original question of privilege is not in order.

IMMIGRATION

FARM LABOUR—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF ADMISSION PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Madill (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. I should like to ask the minister whether he would reconsider for 1967 the limitation on the use of Caribbean labour on Ontario farms, particularly in the market gardening areas, by extending the period from November 1 to December 1.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice and discuss it with other ministers who are involved.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAOUETTE—UNSATISFACTORY ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege because I believe it is the privilege of every member to obtain as accurate a reply as possible when information is sought from a department and the officials of such department are required to give a reply.

Question No. 2,721, which I put on the order paper some time ago about Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation followed a question asked a few weeks previously to find out who were the notaries writing the contracts for the purchase of houses in Lebel-sur-Quevillon in the riding of Chapleau. The answer at that time was that the services of notary Réal Caron of Senneterre and notary Joseph Morin of Val d'Or were being used. I was asking for additional information and I was refused for instance data on the amounts paid to each of these notaries while given to understand that both wrote notarized contracts.

To question No. 2,721, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), replied that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had approved 335 loans for an amount of nearly $5.8 million in Lebel-sur-Quevillon for 378 units of housing. Of these, 92 loans have been cancelled, and 243 are active loans for 286 units.

To the direct question: How many of these loans required the services of Mr. Réal Caron of Senneterre, the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation replied: none. Yet, two or three weeks previously, I was told that notary Caron of Senneterre had drawn up contracts for houses at Lebel-sur-Quevillon.

To the third part of the question:

How many of these loans have required the services of Mr. Joseph Morin?

The answer was 243; that is the total number of the loans.

Mr. Speaker, the reason is not given why the services of notary Caron were not used. I should like to observe here after securing the information, that notary Morin—and I do not want to play politics—was the Liberal candidate in my riding at the last election and these contracts bring him $250 each which amounts to $70,750.

So, Mr. Speaker, I believe my question of privilege is quite in order and I should ask the minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation before the house to state clearly whether this corporation has been established for political patronage or to give justice to the citizens of Canada wherever they may be.

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether it would be in order to allow the minister to reply to the statement made by the hon. member for Villeneuve. I suggest to him that this really is not a question of privilege; it is perhaps more in the nature of a grievance than a question of privilege. I think if he will consult Beauchesne, citation 181 (3), he will ascertain that this type of objection, which as I have said is more of a grievance than a question of privilege, can not be raised in this way.

[Later:]

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Referring to the question raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve a moment ago, I would not want an erroneous impression to be left. I think Your Honour is quite right in your ruling—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is very difficult to let the minister make a statement when the Chair has ruled that there is no question of privilege. On the other hand, I understand the importance of allowing a minister to make a statement to correct what he considers to be an erroneous impression. But I doubt that this can be done at this time in the present circumstances in view of the ruling I have made that there is no question of privilege.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MOVEMENT OF PERSONNEL FROM ST. HUBERT TO NORTH BAY AREA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question of immediate importance to the Minister of National Defence. It has to do with the transfer of some 300 families from St. Hubert to the area surrounding North Bay in the township of Widdifield. This township has asked for assistance because of the added expenditures the municipality will have to make in order to meet this influx. Indeed, their tax rate has gone up by some 14 mills already as a consequence of this movement.

The municipality requests that this area be declared immediately to be a non self-contained unit which would enable the Department of National Defence to provide a grant under the Municipal Grants Act. I understand this matter has been looked into, and I should like to ask the minister whether he will once again give it consideration, because of the injustice that will be done as a result of this added taxation which has been brought about by these large numbers who have moved into the area.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the right hon. gentleman for his question. This morning the hon. member for Nipissing phoned me and came to see me in my office in respect of this matter. As a result of his representations I already have asked the departmental officials to examine the situation, with instructions to report back within 48 hours to see whether there is some way we can meet this problem.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister aware of the fact that the officials were there on Thursday and Friday and indicated that it would be impossible to give any assistance unless an alteration was made in the description of the particular unit?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the matter is being inquired into by the officials of the several departments involved. I have asked my deputy minister to co-ordinate the investigation and make a report to me as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PERMANENT HEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State related to one asked earlier by the Leader of the Opposition. Will the government be in a position soon to name a permanent head of the National Film Board?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I expect so, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Friday, April 7, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole to consider Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof. When the house rose on Friday evening clause 2 was under discussion.

On clause 2—Canadian forces, Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Chatterton: Mr. Chairman, we on this side advocated all along that the unification bill should have been sent to the defence committee before second reading or approval in principle. I wonder how many hon. members, particularly on the other side of the chamber, would have voted for second reading if they had heard the evidence given in the defence committee. Speaking of the evidence given in the defence committee, I quote from a publication of the Tri-Service Identities Organization:

> It is noteworthy that not one recently retired senior officer no longer having any attachment to the department of defence has supported the program which will be carried forward if Bill C-243 is enacted and everyone of any stature outside the services or government whose military opinion would command respect who has testified before the defence committee has expressed criticism or reservation on the proposed reorganization of the defence establishment.

I wonder, particularly, how many hon. members opposite have carefully read the evidence given by Air Chief Marshal Miller. In referring to Air Chief Marshal Miller I quote from an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail of March 22. The editorial is headed "An Unseemly Rush To What?" It reads as follows:

> When Air Chief Marshal Frank Miller retired last July, he did so quietly, without any comment about differences over unification then roiling the armed forces. Until that point, as the first chief of the integrated defence staff, he had been defence minister Paul Hellyer's right hand man—how significantly so is indicated by the fact that he had been persuaded to stay three years past the normal retirement age of 55.
> The testimony which Air Chief Marshal Miller gave to the Commons defence committee this week is, therefore, of peculiar importance, for it is the testimony of a man who had the regard of the minister, who personified integration, and who studiously observed the duty of an officer not to comment publicly on matters of public policy.

I will not quote at length from Air Chief Marshal Miller's testimony but merely give his reply to just one question. I quote from the Gazette of Saturday, April 8:

> Air Marshal, you have indicated in answer to Mr. Harkness that you saw no advantages to unification. Did I understand you correctly when you said you could list several disadvantages?

Here is the answer:

> I said I did not see any monetary return for unification, nor did I see any significant military effectiveness. I said I saw some unanswered questions associated with unification that perhaps should be spelled out before you could really get out and attempt to sell it to people—Gentlemen, could I say thank you for your courtesy and understanding.

And so on. Then Air Chief Marshal Miller said:

> I feel the next step that was forecast in the white paper, that of doing away with the services, will cause the loss, against this business we have been discussing recently, of a lot of people we cannot afford to lose and that we will not get very much of a benefit from this single service proposal.

I wonder how hon. members opposite would have voted in favour on second reading had they had that advice from Air Chief Marshal Miller. I wonder, for example, how the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) feels after having read the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller. I know that the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) was not there at that time—incidentally we are all very happy that he has been able to return to the chamber—but I am sure that he has since read the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller and I hope that he has not changed the position he took last October. I should like to quote the following from a letter he wrote dated October 20, 1966:

• (3:30 p.m.)

> On the subject of unification, I understand your views and my position at the moment is that I am awaiting the introduction of the government's legislation on unification. Complete unification is of course not practical, nor is it contemplated. The degree of unification the government proposes will very largely influence my own position.
> Yours sincerely,
>
> David W. Groos,
> M.P. for Victoria, B.C.

The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) made a speech on unification in the house on January 31. However, all he said on the subject matter of the bill was the following, as found on page 12468 of Hansard:

> I have purposely refrained, Mr. Speaker, from entering into the subject of the debate because, as chairman of the defence committee, I feel it is my most important duty, if this bill ever does come before us, to help resolve the differences during the clause by clause study in committee.

The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) is no longer chairman of the defence committee but it is my belief that, based on his distinguished record in the Royal Canadian Navy, he will be anxious to let his true thoughts on unification be known, and we look forward to his speech in the near future. I know that his constituents are anxiously waiting to hear from him. I myself was not able to become a member of the defence committee. I asked to be placed on the committee but that was not possible, and since I was a member of five other committees it was not possible for me to attend many of the meetings. However, I believe I read all the evidence given before the defence committee.

It is true that mostly as a result of the form of questioning of witnesses some of the evidence was conflicting. But that does not justify hon. members on the other side, who are no doubt making speeches for consumption in their home ridings, taking quotations completely out of context so that the people reading their speeches may be led to believe that a certain person who gave evidence before the committee was in favour of unification even though that was not necessarily so. For example, I will quote part of the speech made by the hon. member for Hamilton West on April 5 as it appears at page 14577 of Hansard. The hon. member quotes General Foulkes as follows:

> The problem can only be solved by complete unification of the three services with one chief of staff, one chain of command, one ladder of promotion and one uniform.

This is the only part of General Foulkes' evidence which the hon. member quoted. The obvious intention is to lead readers of his speech to believe that General Foulkes is completely in favour of unification. That quotation was taken from an article written by General Foulkes in 1961. If the hon. member had wanted to be fair he might well have quoted from a subsequent article by General Foulkes which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of Thursday, October 13, 1966, in which he wrote the following:

> One of the aspects of integration, which is relatively unimportant but which is causing some resentment in the services, is the announced intention to force the servicemen into a neutral uniform by 1967. Perhaps this is to be part of the "centennial" celebrations to show that Canada still maintains what a pundit once referred to as "the best dressed, best fed, best paid, but poorest equipped force in the west."

Again I quote from this article by General Foulkes:

> Since any acceptable integration scheme calls for the continuation of regiments of soldiers, squadrons of aircraft and flotillas of ships, the servicemen in these combat formations must continue to wear the appropriate combat uniform.

Again I quote from the article:

> We should not be mesmerized by the idea that a common uniform will ensure a happy, contented and efficient integrated service.

I quote further from the article:

> The minister has not been forthright in informing the services and the public of the true and real extent of the integration plot.

Continuing on the same lines the hon. member for Hamilton West quoted General Moncel as saying the following:

> I was well aware of the fact that the white paper said that unification was the ultimate end. Well, that was fine. There was nothing wrong with it as a name.

If read out of context that quotation certainly gives the impression that General Moncel was in complete agreement with the minister's plans.

[Mr. Chatterton.]

I should like to quote briefly from the evidence given by Lieutenant General Moncel as found on page 13304 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee on national defence. The following exchange took place:

> Mr. McIntosh: Would you tell the committee, General, why then you made the decision to leave your position as vice chief?
> Mr. Moncel: The conditions which I specifically refer to are as follows. At this stage of the operation, the lines were pretty well drawn and it was abundantly clear to me that we were going to force ahead with this process of unification which, to me, appeared to be moving on an uncharted course at a very, very high speed toward a very, very dim destination, and I did not think that I could produce the staff work necessary at that speed to keep the thing on the rails.

There are many such instances of quotations being taken out of context by hon. members opposite to mislead the people who would normally read their speeches. An effort has been made by the minister, by some of his officials and by informed persons in his department who write the press releases to give the impression that this wonderful scheme of the unification of our armed forces is being studied carefully and might be followed by other countries. The senior officer in the navy told me that in March of 1964 the Minister of National Defence called together at the medical services theatre all the officers from headquarters and told them that Great Britain was very interested in the program and that Lord Mountbatten was in favour of it.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to rise on a question of privilege. I do not think I should let this statement go unchallenged. Since there is no verbatim record of that particular meeting I cannot recall in precise detail what I said at that time but I do know I have never said that Lord Mountbatten was in favour of all the things we are doing. I know he is not. I have discussed and corresponded with him over the months and I have talked to him several times. What he certainly said when he was here a year ago was valid, namely, that whereas previously they were ahead of us, now we are ahead of them and they will go further in our direction because it makes sense. I would not want my hon. friend to give the impression that I said something I did not say in respect of Admiral Mountbatten's point of view.

Mr. Chatterton: I happen to know the person who wrote this letter very well, and I can assure you there is no credibility gap there.

The letter from which I am quoting is dated March 14 and was written by Commodore Harold V. W. Groos, R.C.N., retired. It reads in part as follows:

Probably the last thing you would choose to become involved in is Canadian politics, yet you are now in them deeply.

Yesterday, Monday, 13th March, 1967, our last chief of the naval staff of Canada, Vice Admiral Herbert S. Rayner appeared before the Canadian House of Commons defence committee to advocate the continuance of a navy in a distinctive uniform and with a titular head to speak for it and to set standards of seagoing fighting efficiency. Under cross-examination by Liberal party politicos who are out to submerge (i.e. destroy) the Royal Canadian Navy as an indentifiable sea force, Admiral Rayner quoted you as being in favour of retaining navies with titular heads.

Last night the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's national news summary referred to Admiral Rayner's testimony and then there was a two or three minute presentation of an interview with you which had been held at government house, Ottawa, last autumn. In your interview you supported strongly both integration and the unification of our armed forces.

Undoubtedly the television camera interview with you had been held in reserve by the Liberal politicians to discredit Admiral Rayner and in this it has succeeded admirably.

I have before me the original of the letter sent by Mountbatten of Burma, dated March 28, 1967 and commencing, "My Dear Groos". I should like to quote one paragraph from the letter:

You are quite right in saying that the last thing I would choose to become involved in is Canadian politics and I am indeed sorry that use has been made of the views I expressed during two visits to Canada which appear to involve me.

Then Lord Mountbatten encloses a statement which explains his position and I quote from this statement, of which I have the original signed by Mountbatten of Burma:

I have been asked for an explanation of my views on the integration and unification of the British services as they are said to have been misunderstood in Canada.

Then I skip part of the statement and quote this pertinent passage:

In the British reorganization care has been taken to preserve esprit de corps and morale and those traditions which help to maintain this in the services and fighting units. It has been accepted that to achieve this the three services must retain their uniforms and ranks with an identifiable professional head of their service. The idea of a single uniform and rank structure was also rejected as undesirable and unnecessary.

There was some talk of taking the uniform and ranks of one service and imposing this on the others but the idea of a man in say army uniform with an army title arriving at a foreign port in command of a warship was generally felt to be so ludicrous that it was not pursued. The general cut and colour of naval uniforms are internationally so well known that a sailor from any one country can readily be recognized as a sailor in any other country. Sailors the world over take great pride in this and so in their own services do soldiers and airmen. No compensating advantage could be seen in attempting to impose so unpopular a change.

The last paragraph of Lord Mountbatten's statement, dated March 28, 1967, reads:

These were the views I expressed or intended to convey when I was asked to explain them to the Canadian press, radio and television. Nothing has happened to change these views.

Mr. Hellyer: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I wonder whether the hon. gentleman, having now referred to the letter and the accompanying memorandum, would agree to table the letter and memorandum so that hon. members will be able to peruse them?

Mr. Churchill: He is not under any obligation to do so.

The Chairman: Order. It will not be possible for the hon. member to table the documents in committee.

Mr. Chatterton: I am quite agreeable. I have no objection and I have the permission of Mr. Groos to use these letters.

The Minister of Transport made a rather interesting speech last Friday and at one point seemed to imply that we should now vote on this matter, that we should let it come to a decision. The fact is that this is the first chance I have had to speak since the bill was returned from the standing committee and I certainly insist on my right to express my views. The Minister of Transport also made an appeal to members to stay away from personalities. I wanted to ask him a question but his time had expired and I did not have an opportunity to do so. The question I was going to ask him was whether he thought a remark such as the one I am going to quote now represented dealing in personalities. I am going to quote from the Globe and Mail for Monday, April 3, which contains an article concerning an address the Minister of National Defence gave to a group of young Liberals in Toronto. The article reads in part as follows:

The questioning, by about 60 young Liberals, ended with:

"Mr. Hellyer, is there any truth in the rumour that William Landymore may be our next Governor General?"

Mr. Hellyer pondered the question a moment.

"When the admiral retired last year he said he was going back to the farm to pitch hay—but what he's been pitching isn't hay."

Perhaps the minister can deny that statement and I will give him an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Hellyer: No, that is exactly what I said, Mr. Chairman. Throughout this whole episode I have been trying to keep a sense of humour. I think it is necessary in public life and I recommend to my hon. friend that he do the same.

Mr. Chatterton: If that is a sense of humour, then in my opinion it is the grossest perversion of humour I have ever heard, particularly after the statement the minister made to the effect that Admiral Landymore had been disloyal. This is a man who has given eminent service to Canada. This prompts me to quote from an article which I did not intend to use. However, the minister's reply has convinced me I should use it. No, I do not think I will. I shall merely refer to a column in the Victoria Colonist, for March 1, 1967, which is called "Bill Thomas' Notebook". I am not going to sink to the minister's level by quoting from it but I suggest to the minister that he read it.

The article to which I have just referred appeared after the minister's statement that this man who had given loyal service to Canada had been disloyal. The point that was raised consistently by members on this side during the debate on second reading was that the minister had not fully explained to us what integration or unification means. The minister and his vast propaganda machine have consistently tried to confuse integration with unification. This process is still continuing. The minister cites ad nauseam all the economics and other wonderful things that have been effected through integration, all the time implying that the same results will be achieved by unification.

I should like to quote Air Chief Marshal Miller again as found in the Gazette for Saturday, April 8:

> I did not see any monetary return for unification, nor did I see any significant military effectiveness.

• (3:50 p.m.)

The minister made a speech last Monday, I believe, in which he gave what he considered to be the advantages, as he saw them, of unification. I do not want to go over the same ground because I think the hon. member for Calgary North did an excellent job in destroying the validity of every one of the points that the minister tried to make in his attempt to sell the advantages of unification.

During the debate on second reading we consistently asked that the minister give a clear and concise explanation of his plans for unification. Every one of the witnesses who appeared before the committee, that is, the witnesses I referred to in my opening statement from the Tri-Services Identities Organization, said that there was no plan. Air Chief Marshal Miller was asked, this question:

> Have you any knowledge as to any plan that was produced in regard to unification, say at the time the white paper was produced or shortly thereafter?

He replied as follows:

> No, there was no plan.

Then he was asked this question:

> Do you feel that the single force concept would adversely affect the over-all security of this country?

Air Chief Marshal Miller replied:

> I really do not know. I am unhappy about the implications of a single force because it has not been spelled out and I do not know what it is going—

There was some suggestion by hon. members opposite to the defence committee that perhaps the plan was prepared after Air Chief Marshal Miller has retired. I believe he retired about August, 1966. The unification bill was placed on the order paper on October 31 so if a plan had been prepared for unification surely it must have been prepared before the bill appeared on the order paper. The chief of the defence staff stated that in August that he did not know of any plan, and I suggest that between August and October the minister hurriedly had a plan for unification prepared. If the minister did have such a plan prepared he certainly has not disclosed it yet to any members of this house. None of the officials of his department has been able to produce a plan for unification. There I can only hope that sufficient members on the other side, at least those with special interests in defence perhaps because of their service in the armed forces, will urge the minister to listen to the advice which has been given, and, if he listens to no one else, that he listen to Air Chief Marshal Miller.

I should like to conclude with an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail for Wednesday, March 22 dealing with the subject of unification. It is headlined: "An Unseemly Rush To What?" The last paragraph reads as follows:

> It remains too big a pig-in-a-poke for any parliament to ask Canada to buy, and the Commons defence committee, for all its questioning, has not been able to trace out its shape. What is needed is a complete re-examination of the whole defence apparatus, and of the job it is intended to do. What is not needed is a guns-blazing rush to get unification through the Commons to accommodate the government's desire to have done with the current parliamentary session.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, before I turn to the subject of the bill I want to say a few things about the standing committee on national defence which I had the honour to chair through the latter half of its sittings. It was like being a spectator at that famous Arctic poker game that Robert W. Service told us about at which all the men around the table simultaneously drew their revolvers on each other. Unlike that story, however, the committee members did not stay in that pose until they all froze to death. They held a total of 55 meetings between February 7 and March 21. They examined 28 principal witnesses and published 2,000 pages of briefs and verbal evidence. They examined and passed the 65 clauses of the bill and its lengthy schedules. Moreover, they wound up their work in time for everyone in this chamber to go home for a well deserved Easter holiday. None of the members of the committee missed more than a meeting or two and I am sure only then because of real necessity. We always had a full quorum and we had no problems getting started although as chairman I frequently had problems in getting people stopped. What we proved by our actions in that committee was that you can unify anything.

I want to say a word about the services of the committee. We were never without the services of an interpreter throughout all our hearings. We had the unfailing services of Mr. Hugh Stewart, the clerk of the committee. Despite competition from several other hard working committees, the committee reporting branch produced 5,000 folios of evidence during the hearings. All of this evidence was edited by the committees branch and then sent to the printer. Then the printing staff worked overtime through Easter to see that we received it back in time for the commencement of the committee stage of the bill in the house. Moreover, all the evidence was translated into French and the whole thing printed in French and English in time for us to use it in the house after we returned from Easter holidays.

Finally, Dr. Ollivier and the Judge Advocate General's staff incorporated all the amendments into the bill, saw that the French and English matched and produced a newly printed version for the house in time for our use. We do not often say things about the servants of the house and how they serve us and I thought, Mr. Chairman, you would like to be made aware of these things at the outset of the few remarks I wish to make on the subject of the bill.

A few years ago Professor Northcote Parkinson became famous as the author of a satirical book called "Parkinson's Law". He observed that while the number of British warships had decreased by 67 per cent between 1914 and 1928, the number of admiralty officials had increased by 78 per cent. The officials, he said, would have multiplied at the same rate had there been no actual seamen at all. The fact is, he told his readers, that the number of the officials and the quantity of the work are not related to each other.

In case anyone felt that he had chosen an isolated incident on which to base his theory he noted that the colonial office, in the period of British colonial decline from 1935 to 1954, had increased its staff from 372 to 1,661.

Speaking at the University of Alberta in 1963 in the Henry Marshall Tory lecture series, Professor Parkinson threw in a couple of extra observations on his theory. He said that a correspondent had pointed out to him that an organization which has a headquarters staff of a thousand can be regarded as administratively self-sufficient. It can keep itself entirely busy on its own internal problems. Then he spoke of a certain German industrial group that apparently had a headquarters staff of 2,000 persons. All its factories were destroyed by enemy action during the war but the administrative staff went on working as hard as ever though there was nothing to administer. I mention this because Bill C-243 deals with reorganizing a big headquarters staff, big enough to be entirely self-sufficient according to Professor Parkinsons' terms.

Before we become too dazzled by military science, let me make a few observations in the Parkinsonian manner about some of the things witnesses brought up before the defence committee. In the past there have been numerous examples of integration, some workable and some not. Always these integrations took place in the field at the command level, never at headquarters. Not until the present minister came along had anybody attempted to integrate the headquarters.

If you turn to the evidence of General Foulkes you will find very interesting reminiscences of integration attempts stretching back to the time when Hon. Brooke Claxton was minister of national defence. He brought together the three defence ministries of wartime days. He started the idea of unifying all three services but gave it up. He set up studies and committee work in connection with integration, studies which were later pursued and developed by some of the very men who appeared before the defence committee as competent officer witnesses. General Foulkes told us in an amusing way about efforts to unify the chaplain services. During the tenure of office of Mr. Pearkes as minister of national defence the matter had ended with the addition of a brigadier to the chaplain services but with no apparent amalgamation of services.

No one will say very much if the forces are integrated at that level. I am speaking of naval or air force units, for example. The local air force commander may not want to be put under the authority of the local naval commander but he will tolerate it and the system will work after a fashion because each commander believes that the arrangement is not permanent and that he will not have to put up with the other fellow forever. The air force commander may even take comfort in dreaming that he may one day be in charge of the integrated command. That is why the minister and other ministers have been able to get along with the business of reorganizing at the command level without causing significant political flurries.

When the minister integrated his headquarters a number of things began to happen that could not happen with integration at the command levels. First, the chiefs of the three services found themselves without jobs. They had gone from the organizational structure. At the same time the three services found themselves without chiefs above the level of the command structure. There was now a new chief who represented a consolidation of the three services. The new chief of staff now stood alone at the top of the structure and had to turn his back on the old three-service organization that he had known and grown up with. He had become the chief of the new integrated commands. All this happened when Bill C-90 was passed in July, 1964. This is what Bill C-90 did. All the important operative legislative and organizational steps which we have been discussing and which were necessary to create a unified force were taken when we passed Bill C-90 in July, 1964. Let me check this out with hon. members again.

[Mr. Deachman.]

First, the old chiefs of the three services were retired. Second, a single chief was established in their place. Third, the officers and men of the three old services were reorganized into new functional commands or components. As I say, this is what we did through Bill C-90. Only one thing of any real importance remained to be done and that was to give the new single force which we had created in 1964 a name. Bill C-243 asks us to do that. No clause in Bill C-243, other than clause 2 before the committee now, is of any real significance. I say that because clause 2 gives the force a new name.

The clause concerning the ranks of officers has been thoroughly amended. I invite hon. members of the committee to read clause 4 and note how it has been amended and what it means now. The power to regulate how officers shall be referred to has been withdrawn from the minister and placed in the hands of cabinet. It is only possible through an order in council now to change the designations of officers or the titles by which they shall be called. By no stretch of the imagination will the bill give landlubbers' titles to seagoing men. This was one of the major complaints made, and one of the complaints raised by my hon. friend from Esquimalt-Saanich a few moments ago. He has not studied the bill. He does not know what is in it. He has not read the testimony of General Allard. He has not looked at the evidence given again and again by the minister. Yet he stands up and says the same thing that has been said many times before though the committee diligently went about its business of attending to the very point complained about.

Mr. Nugent: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deachman: The words of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich were completely irrelevant.

Mr. Nugent: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich is not in his seat now but I am sure he would object, as I now object. The hon. member now speaking has said that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich did not read the evidence. I think the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich would take issue with that.

Mr. Deachman: It is very kind of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona to intervene on behalf of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich who is sitting behind the curtain, out of sight, listening carefully. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona cannot see him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deachman: I hope hon. members opposite will give him a round of applause, as have hon. members on this side.

Mr. Chatterton: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Am I to understand that the hon. member implies that I have not read the evidence given before the defence committee?

Mr. Churchill: That is what has been said.

Mr. Chatterton: I wish to state that to my knowledge, though I may have skipped a few pages, I have read from beginning to end all the minutes of proceedings and evidence which have come to my office. I have read every volume of the minutes of evidence of the defence committee.

Mr. Deachman: I will not dispute that, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member may have read the evidence but it is apparent that he did not understand it. I will not dispute that he did not read it.

Mr. Ricard: A smart-alecky remark.

Mr. Deachman: The rest of the bill consists entirely of consequential or editorial changes that had to be made to the National Defence Act and other acts affected by it. I repeat that this bill asks us to do only one thing of consequence. It asks us to give our forces a name: "The Canadian Armed Forces." It asks us to stop pretending, as the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich has been pretending this afternoon, that the men in the armed forces will experience some new, dramatic experience if this bill is passed by the house. It asks us to cease protesting that there is any real doubt about the effect of this bill. This bill is very simple indeed. It asks us only to give the force which was created by Bill C-90 a name. It asks us, in heaven's name, now that the baby is born, to cut its umbilical cord and let it live. I see the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich trembling on the edge of his seat so I will sit down.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Chatterton: If the only purpose of this bill is to do that, then why all the haste to force it through? Why not let it go? It is causing great dissension throughout the country so why not defer it as recommended by Air Chief Marshal Miller?

Mr. Deachman: Is the hon. member pleading with me not to give a name to the Canadian armed forces?

Mr. Chatterton: I am appealing for some common sense from the other side.

Mr. Ricard: Then address your question to someone else.

Mr. Deachman: Let me go over again with hon. members opposite the points which have been made clear so many times. The men will remain in their units. They will not be taken from their units and sent somewhere else as hon. members opposite have suggested time and time again. That is a sham and a shibboleth. The officers of the Royal 22nd will still march out of the Citadel with their men. The officers aboard H.M.C.S. Fraser will still be there to greet the sailors when they go aboard and they will still call the men by the same titles. This was guaranteed by the committee in its work, and the hon. member who is rising now was a member of that committee.

Mr. Nugent: Since the hon. member says that all this bill does is change the name of the force, I gather he disagrees with the Minister of National Defence who tells us the legislation is necessary in order to complete the process of integration.

Mr. Deachman: It is necessary that we finish the work of reorganization now, get off the back of the chief of staff and let him get on with his work. It is essential that these men should know what to call themselves if they are to have pride and a sense of esprit de corps as members of the new force. It is essential that this be done now and that we cut out this ridiculous debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCleave: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deachman: A great many questions are being asked; there seems to be a good deal of interest in my speech. Apparently points are being raised which so far have not come to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite. But I will hear the question.

Mr. McCleave: Does the hon. member not feel concerned lest by some mistake the Minister of National Defence should throw out the baby and simply keep the umbilical cord?

Mr. Deachman: Well, the hon. member's remark will be recorded for posterity. Members of the armed forces may find themselves with greater scope as a result of unification because they will be able to move freely across the whole width of the force. Young officers of competence will find broader opportunities available to them. The names of the units, as I have said, will not be changed. The customs and traditions of the units will not change.

One of the hon. members opposite, the hon. member for Vegreville, went to considerable pains in the committee one day to examine General Allard on this point. He did an excellent job of drawing from the general recognition of the fact that the traditions and customs of the regiments would remain and that there was no danger that these things would be taken away. I am sure he was well satisfied with the situation. Indeed, I am sure the general satisfied everyone present. Yet we still find people saying that these regiments and their traditions will be destroyed. This is nonsense, and members opposite such as the hon. member for Vegreville who have taken the trouble to find out the facts know very well that this is the case. Nevertheless the opposition has perpetuated this sham, believing that somehow or other it will have its effect upon the Canadian people who will eventually accept it as the truth. I do not believe this will ever happen.

The most radical thing which will happen to the man in the Canadian armed forces after the passage of this bill is that in due course he will get a new suit. I want to remind hon. members who have spent a considerable amount of time discussing this point that it does not require Bill C-243 in order to make that possible. The bill before us does not effect the cost of operating the forces. This was taken care of by Bill C-90. The savings to be made will result from the changes in materiel command and training command as those changes evolve. All this was provided for in Bill C-90 which was passed back in July of 1964.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are asking that we pause, that we kick this issue around like Chicago's garbage until we lose it. We do not intend to do this. The bill before us does not affect the composition of the forces. The composition of the forces was affected by Bill C-90 and those changes have now been made.

An hon. Member: Tell the minister that.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. Deachman: This bill has nothing to do with morale. The morale of some of those serving in the ranks reflected for a time the very low morale of their senior officers. Those were the men who got out because they did not believe that a minister should have the right to reorganize a headquarters. That is what this debate is about, basically. The Tories do not believe that a minister of the crown should have the right to reorganize a headquarters, only to tinker with the structure underneath. These are not the facts of political life. Great changes of this kind must be made at the political level. Hon. members opposite cannot evade this issue.

Finally, let me say a word to all those who say we should pause. It is necessary now to create an organization with a headquarters under a single chief responsible for functional commands working in the field. He is struggling to project a new spirit into this new organization, to teach the men new loyalities and a new esprit de corps. It is not an easy task and we do him no service by prolonging argument here for the retention of a military system which we voted out in this house when we passed Bill C-90 in July, 1964. We have said everything that can possibly be said about this matter ten times over, Mr. Chairman. It is time we stopped procrastinating. It is time to pass this bill and to give this force a new and honourable name and not leave it as a nameless child on the doorstep, something which hon. gentlemen opposite would like to do.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the hon. member a question? He just said something about giving the force an honourable name. Is there something dishonourable about the name "Royal Canadian Navy"?

Mr. Deachman: No, sir, but I would make a suggestion to the hon. member. If he believes in unification like I do, let us put them all into the Royal Canadian Navy. This is one way to achieve unification. You could take army, navy and air force units and put them under one single name. The Royal Canadian Navy will do; the Canadian Army will do; the Royal Canadian Air Force will do. It just happens that the bill we have before us has suggested a first class name which does not give offence. Instead of all those others names it simply calls the service the Canadian Armed Forces. I think it is a good name. I think it will look marvelous on the shoulder flashes. I think the armed forces will be proud of it and I ask the hon. member, a former distinguished and gallant officer, will he not assist these men by seeing that this new name is born?

Mr. Churchill: In answer to that question, I will do everything in my power to prevent the government from forcing this change on men who are now serving in three very honourable services, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, during the past week we witnessed strange happenings on the other side of the chamber with Liberal members, one after the other, standing up and reading from prepared texts contrary to what the rules provide. I wonder whether they were reading for the very simple reason that they have joined the minister's propaganda team and are not allowed to express one thought of their own lest they might say something not in agreement with the minister's propaganda.

The other day the hon. member for Lambton West speaking or, I should say, reading his prepared text made reference to my attitude while serving on the defence committee and said that when the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and myself joined the committee it became partisan and we began insulting serving officers. At that time I asked him how many serving officers appeared before the committee while I served on it and he said he did not know. I draw his attention, the attention of the minister and that of every Grit opposite to the fact that I was not on the defence committee for the complete examination of one serving officer. This, Mr. Chairman, will give you an idea of the approach of the Liberal party when we have one of its members standing up and accusing me of something which I could not possibly have done. Furthermore, the implication that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and I joined the committee at the same time is entirely wrong.

Despite what the Minister of National Defence may think I wish to tell him that he does not have the support for his unification bill within his own party that he would like to have. Some of its members have different opinions from his and that is why each and every Grit who stands up has had to read word for word from a prepared text, with one exception. The exception was the Minister of Transport who became exercised on Friday afternoon, jumped into the debate without the permission of the Minister of National Defence and, without notes, put his foot in it. I shall refer to what he said later, but he was the one exception and it was a mistake on their part to allow him to speak because he got excited.

Even the Secretary of State for External Affairs read word for word from a prepared text. Granted, he was dealing with foreign policy rather than with the unification bill. The minister is shaking his head. Before I am finished he will have a lot of shaking to do.

Since the hon. member for Lambton West saw fit to criticize me perhaps the best thing I could do would be to review the committee hearings to see what his attitude was. But I will have to forego that. He did not have an attitude in the defence committee so I cannot criticize something that was non-existent. The hon. member referred to the membership of the committee. How can the Liberal members who participated in the defence committee have followed what went on? Reference was made to the fact that I and other members in this party were involved in changes in the membership of the committee. For every Conservative change in membership on the defence committee there were at least six Liberal changes, a total of 41 changes on that side of the chamber. How could they have kept up with the evidence? They were shuffling in and out day after day. Not one of them liked to spend too much time on the committee.

We have just heard from the man who said he had the honour to lead the defence committee in the last half of its sessions. I repeat he said he had the honour to lead it. All I can say is that it is too bad he could not have turned that around and led the committee with honour. He did not lead with honour because on March 3 in this house, the first day he participated in the committee, he came into the house and made a report from the committee which was far removed from the truth, and the House of Commons spent the greatest part of the afternoon on a question of privilege in reference to his action as defence committee chairman.

I suggest to hon. members, and especially to the Minister of National Defence, that they look at page 13702 of Hansard for March 3 and read there what the defence committee chairman said. I would then call the minister's attention to the March 3 committee hearings, page 1960, where he will see for himself a complete denial of what was said by the chairman of the defence committee in the house. The chairman of the defence committee came into the House of Commons and reported something that had never happened. It is recorded in Hansard and the denial is recorded in the evidence of the defence committee hearings.

Since I am talking about the defence committee hearings I would point out that there have been a few other changes. I would request now that the Minister of National Defence hold available for the committee of the whole house the tape recordings of the hearings in the defence committee so that the written record as we have it now can be checked against the voice record of what was actually said. I will use those tapes as against the prepared evidence provided to us to prove again that there has been some tampering done.

Some hon. Members: Prove it.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The proof of it is in the minister's hands. Produce the tapes. We have the evidence of the committee. Produce those tapes. I have already proven, I think to Your Honour's satisfaction and to that of the minister, that the chairman of the defence committee came into the house on March 3 and reported incidents in the defence committee that never happened. Again I call attention to page 13702 of Hansard for March 3 and to page 1960 of the March 3 defence committee proceedings. The denials are recorded there for everybody to see.

What Liberal members have been trying to do in this committee and would like to do is to push something through the House of Commons, push something down the throats of the people of Canada, and especially push something down the throats of the serving personnel of this country. Why do hon. members day in and day out receive anonymous mail and newspaper clippings strongly denouncing unification? I believe many of these are coming from servicemen who, according to the rules, are not permitted to write to members of parliament objecting to this sort of thing. Again I repeat that the hon. member who said he had the honour to lead the committee did not lead it with honour. He has used the word "shame" and has said we should cut out this ridiculous debate.

This is another indication that hon. members on that side of the chamber are still trying to push something down our throats despite the fact—and I refer to what the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona brought out very clearly—that serving officers could only give evidence to the defence committee based on government policy and could not express an opinion outside that policy. The rule forbids them to go beyond that so they could express opinions only within that given policy. It is strange, however, that every serving officer who has recently retired and is now free to speak has expressed the opinion that he is against unification.

I should like to go back to the Minister of Transport. The Minister of National Defence will realize that the Minister of Transport jumped in because he was excited. He jumped in even though he did not have the benefit of the propaganda which has been available to the Minister of National Defence. He still made some strange statements. When I asked him whether he would permit a question, in his usual rude way he refused to give me that opportunity. Mr. Chairman, you and I know that over the years the matter of courtesy and rudeness between the Minister of Transport and I has been a debatable issue. So far rudeness and courtesy between the Minister of Transport and I are concerned, I believe we are almost even. He is away ahead on rudeness and I am ahead on courtesy.

I do not have the words of the Minister of Transport in front of me but at one point when he was trying to justify a unified force he said that there never has been a unified force. I do not know whether the minister realized it, but he was contradicting many members on the Liberal side of the house. Liberal members have held up the United States marines as an example of a unified force, which it is not, and in general have stated that it was the government's idea to pattern its force on the United States Marines. This statement has been made by members of the Liberal party and contradicts the statement made by the Minister of Transport.

Hon. members will remember also a rather strange statement made by the Minister of Transport not too long ago. He turned to the Prime Minister at a time when Conservative and other opposition members were accusing the government of backpeddling and retreating and said to his own Prime Minister that as usual he would have to backtrack. This was a very amazing statement. I did not think it could be improved upon until the minister spoke in the house on Friday. On Friday the minister made a statement which I think should be given some attention. As found on page 14668 of Hansard, the last paragraph, the minister is reported as having said:

> If the minister accepts the wrong advice and adopts the wrong course, of course he should be defeated.

I will be much more generous and say that if he should not be defeated he should at least resign his portfolio. The former minister of finance resigned his position because he had given the Prime Minister the wrong advice. According to the Minister of Transport, we should have the resignation of the Minister of National Defence.

I should like to turn now to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who in support of the Minister of National Defence last week made a few strange statements. He read his speech and spoke entirely on foreign affairs. In answer to a question concerning a statement made by General Allard and later published, the Minister of National Defence stood up in the house and said that he had confidence in General Allard and that General Allard did not have to clear his statements with him. Apparently the Minister of National Defence does not know the rules. Not only does the minister have to clear such speeches but he also has to give permission for them to be made.

This matter was brought up earlier by the hon. member for Kootenay West. At that time he asked a question in respect of a German who was to speak before a group in Winnipeg. The answer given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs was that he had no intention to interfere with freedom of speech. Last week the Minister of National Defence implied that General Allard can go wherever he wishes and say whatever he likes. The minister was entirely wrong and the Secretary of State for External Affairs was also wrong when he answered the hon. member for Kootenay West. The German in question was not allowed to speak in Winnipeg, or at least did not speak. The Minister of National Defence not only has erred but in addition he has received incorrect advice as is evident by the mistake made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of National Defence to the Queen's Rules and Regulations. The latest edition available to me is one I obtained from the Parliamentary Library. I should like to refer this to the minister as recommended reading. He should know at least the basic rules which apply to serving personnel in this country. Paragraph 679 reads as follows:

> The publication or disclosure of any form of unpublished official documents, or of their contents, or of official information to unauthorized persons, or the use of such documents or information in personal controversy or for any private purpose, without due sanction from superior military authority, is forbidden.

The paragraph 680 (a) contains the following:

> An officer or soldier is forbidden to publish in any form whatever, or communicate, either directly or indirectly, to the press, any military information, or his views on any military subject, without War Office authority. He is further forbidden without first obtaining War Office permission, to deliver any lecture or discourse, or to answer questions, on any military subject, either publicly or by means of broadcasting or television, or to prepare a paper or write a script on any military subject for delivery or transmission to the public. He will not prejudge questions which are under the consideration of superior military authority by the publication, anonymously or otherwise, of his opinions, and he will not take part, in public, in a discussion relating to orders, regulations or instructions issued by his superiors.

There it is in black and white. The Minister of National Defence does not know the simple rules which apply to serving officers. This brings us back to the fact that the ultimate authority over the military in this country is a civilian one. It is about time the minister re-examined his position and looked carefully down the road he is leading the forces of this country. The evidence contradicts what has been said by the Minister of National Defence in the house and supports the statements made by other members of the government in respect of certain adverse remarks which have been made. As I have pointed out, the Secretary of State for External Affairs found himself out in left field in respect of questions pertaining to freedom of speech when military matters are involved.

• (4:40 p.m.)

The Minister of National Defence apparently thinks he has the support of his members and believes that unification is a good thing. I come back to what I have stated before in the house on the question of unification. Canada has always been proud of the fact that we have had volunteer forces. In the committee the Liberal members voted against the opportunity to re-attest being given to every serving man in our forces. In other words, as I said before, what they have been doing is voting for conscription. It is nothing more nor less than conscription because every man serving in the forces today will be serving under compulsion unless he is given the opportunity to re-attest. It will no longer be a volunteer force.

I suggest that the hon. member in the back row keep quiet for a little while because we will get around to him during this debate. I say to the minister that he is not in a position to stand up in this house and sanction the action of Liberal members in the house and his staff. In fact, I defy the minister to stand up now and say that he supports the action of the members of his party in this house and his staff. Would the minister care to stand up and say that he supports their action?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, perhaps while I am standing I could ask the hon. gentleman the source of the Queen's Regulations from which he was reading.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): If the minister reads my speech tomorrow he will find the source. If he wants the Queen's Regulations I suggest that he go to the library.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman can tell us if they are the Queen's Regulations for this country?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The Queen's Regulations that are available—here again this involves another criticism of the minister—in the library are the British regulations on which the Canadian regulations are patterned. I ask the minister whether he would care to stand up and say that the regulation I have read from the British Queen's Regulations does not apply also to the Canadian forces. Does the minister know enough to say that what I have quoted this afternoon from the Queen's Regulations does not apply to the Canadian forces? Will the minister stand up now and say that he sanctions and supports the action of the Liberal members of this house and his staff? I put the direct question to the minister: Will you stand up in this house and say that you sanction and support the action of the members of your party in this house and your staff?

Mr. Foy: Regarding what?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The hon. member raises a question; he asks, regarding what? That carries the inference that there are certain things the minister does not support. I am surprised there is an admission by a Liberal that there is something going on that the minister does not support or that all those in his party do not support. I ask the minister wether he will stand up in this house—in fact I defy him to stand up in this house—and say that he gives complete support to the action of the Liberal members in the House of Commons and his staff with respect to the unification bill.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not want to interrupt your speech.

Mr. Danforth: I bet you don't.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South).]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I notice that the hon. member for Lambton West is back in the house. He did not stay around earlier so that I could point out to him the fallacy of his remarks last week. I would draw attention to the hon. member's actions in the committee. He has now come back into the house and is trying to make interjections. He should be ashamed of the fact that he stood up last week in the house and made the references he did regarding the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and myself. They were far removed from the truth. I should think the hon. member for Lambton West would at least want to tell the truth in respect of the committee proceedings. When on March 3 the minister was given the opportunity to support the chairman of the defence committee he would not support him. The hon. member has said that he had the honour to lead the committee but I say he did not lead it with honour. He did not get the support of the Minister of National Defence on March 3. He reported to the house matters which he said took place in the committee but which in fact never did take place there.

The hon. member for Lambton West has not told the truth in respect of what happened in the committee. The hon. member who led the committee for the last few sessions came into the house and tried to impose upon us the will of the Liberal members in that committee, without backing up the statements he made with the truth about what actually happened. The hon. member has stood in the house and referred to this debate as a sham. It was a shameful thing that he did. He should not come into the house and refer to members on this side and say that what they are doing is a sham and that this is a ridiculous debate. Nobody has performed his duties more shamefully than the hon. member who represented the minister on that committee during the last half of its sessions. This is the hon. member who says this debate is a sham so far as we on this side of the house are concerned. He made a sham of the defence committee. If he wants to know what kind of a chairman he proved to be during the proceedings of the committee I will quote a couple of sentences from the committee record. I start on page 1960.

An hon. Member: I will send you over a couple.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): If the hon. member were to send something over to me I would have to have cross-references because I would not believe it when I received it. Anything the hon. member puts in writing or says requires a lot of checking before we can finally get at the truth because the original will not have a speck of truth in it. Take note of the chairman's competence as demonstrated by this quotation from page 1960 of the committee proceedings for March 3, 1967:

The Chairman: I am always at the disposal of the committee and I will call for a vote on that from those who will meet here this afternoon.

Mr. Churchill: No, no, you cannot call for a vote, sir. You have to have a motion.

An hon. Member: I move that we adjourn until 2 p.m.

The Chairman: We have a motion. Now gentlemen, we have business to do.

This is all in one portion of the defence committee's proceedings. Having said that, in the very next sentence the chairman said:

I have no motion in front of me, gentlemen—

I would ask hon. members to look at page 1960 of the proceedings of the defence committee on March 3 where they will see for themselves the kind of leadership we had from the chairman of that committee. In the same breath he said:

We have a motion. Now gentlemen, we have business to do. I have no motion in front of me, gentlemen—

This will give hon. members an idea of the competence with which the committee was led. It will show them the lack of competence of the chairman who tried to lead the committee and who led it without honour.

I have indicated that Canada has always prided herself on the fact that we have a volunteer force. All that is required to continue in that way, rather than having the men in the services continue under compulsion until the time of their retirement, is to have them re-attested into the Canadian forces at the time the bill is proclaimed, if it ever is. I have on a number of occasions quoted from the official records to the effect that such attestation should take place. I have pointed this out to the minister and proved that during the war years, in time of national emergency, the Canadian government always thought enough of its servicemen to give them the opportunity to volunteer for service in whatever branch of the forces they wished to serve. But today we have the Minister of National Defence during peacetime refusing to give the servicemen of this country the same opportunity that was given to them during wartime by a former Liberal government. I have put this proof on record on a number of occasions, but for the benefit of the minister I will again draw attention to the Official History of the Canadian Army. On page 43 of that history it is stated:

"Government decided to place militia on active service in Canada (mobile force). Although all submissions to council were ready and all plans made, we were horrified to hear"—

• (4:50 p.m.)

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the babble on the other side of the house indicates that the Liberals are changing their minds.

—"the cabinet decided at the last minute to change the name of the mobile force from Canadian Field Force and Canadian Active Service Force. The result being many changes, torn up stencils, and $65,000 worth of mobilization forms almost useless. Very hectic day—but we managed to get the general order 135/1939 issued and in the mail to all districts."

General order No. 135 announced that the governor in council had "authorized the organization of a Canadian Active Service Force" and had "named as Corps of the Active Militia" and "placed on active service in Canada" certain specified units. The accompanying schedules listed nearly 300 individual units and formation headquarters, including the headquarters of "1st Corps C.A.S.F.", the whole of the 1st and 2nd Divisions, C.A.S.F., and quotas of corps, army and lines of communication troops. In addition, this order incorporated in the C.A.S.F., the units and details of the non-permanent active militia which had been called out under general order No. 124 to guard vulnerable points and man coast defences. Some additions were now made to the original list. The N.P.A.M. soldiers on duty were attested into the C.A.S.F., except for those not wishing to enlist, who were released in due course.

This is a clearcut precedent which shows that even during wartime the Liberal government gave to every serviceman in the country the opportunity to serve his country as a volunteer and not have to come under the compulsion which the minister is trying now to impose on the Canadian services.

There are many other precedents. I should like to quote from page 63 where the following description appears:

Very few men took advantage of the opportunity to leave the service which the new order afforded. The war diary of the Hastings and Prince Edward Regiment for 30 September describes the order's reception in that unit. It was probably typical of many:

"During the afternoon parade at Picton the terms of the 'Supplementary Declaration', form M.F.M. 2(x) were read and explained to Picton Coys., and they were told that they might have a short time in which to discuss these terms and deliberate over them. However one strong voice called out: I don't need any time on mine! Bring on the declaration! I'm all set to sign! This was the signal for quite an outburst of enthusiasm, and there was a period of shouting and cheering. The upshot was that when the Coys. were called upon to sign for overseas service "D" Coy. turned out to a man, but five members of "C" Coy. refused to sign and were heartily booed as a result."

In all, only five officers and 532 other ranks of the C.A.S.F. declined to re-attest and were struck off the strength, "services no longer required".

The minister and hon. members opposite would leave us with the impression that if one were to be re-attested into the Canadian armed forces, that is, the Canadian Army, the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force, chaos would result. If it is the opinion of the Minister of National Defence that to re-attest the men would bring about chaos, then may I remind him that during the war only five officers and 532 men in other ranks refused to sign the re-attestation papers and were struck off strength. The minister tells us that he is confident unification is the proper thing—

The Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few brief remarks on this important bill but I must say at the outset that I am not an expert on military matters; in fact my military experience is very limited. I was a member of the Church Lads Brigade. I have been a boy scout and a scoutmaster. I have been a member of the Arrow Lakes Rifles affiliated with the Rocky Mountain Rangers, and I served with the 54th Kootenay Battalion in the first world war. Later I graduated from the School of Guards which was operated in France during the first world war by the Brigade of Guards. Therefore you see, Mr. Chairman, that I am not really knowledgeable enough with respect to military strategy and tactics even to write a book.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit me a question? The hon. member is pretending he did not see active service overseas although I believe he did. Was the hon. member not wounded at the Somme? Was he not in the trenches serving with the other members of the Canadian forces at that time and was he not honourably discharged after having performed his duty to his country?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, in reply I will give the same answer I gave to the old lady who visited me in hospital in London. I told her I was bitten by a German wasp on five occasions.

I said that I do not profess to have sufficient knowledge of military strategy and tactics even to write a book. All I have done in this respect was to write a script for the local dramatic society which dealt with the well-known Bairnsfather character, Old Bill, and Colonel Blimp. That was the only production in the literary sense with which I have had anything to do. So I trust all hon. members will realize that I am speaking as an amateur on this subject and from a somewhat different point of view to that of my hon. friends to my right.

However, I do want to say that I know people feel very deeply on this question. They have strong feelings on both sides of the question and they express themselves very vehemently on occasions. I must say I do not like personal remarks in a debate of this kind. I think we can take a dig or two and make certain cogent references now and again as long as we retain our sense of humour, but if we are to maintain a certain standard we must present our views, in regard to policy as if we were gentlemen. I remember that my mother always said a gentleman was a man who always acted properly and never did anything wrong in public. I wish that members of this house would take my mother's advice in that respect.

The attitude of the New Democratic Party to the unification of the armed forces is based on our policy with respect to foreign affairs, the United Nations, and our defence policy with respect to NATO, NORAD and nuclear weapons. So there will be no mistake with respect to our policy I wish to place on the record the resolution adopted by the New Democratic Party at one of its national conventions. I wish to refer to the program which was adopted at our convention of August, 1963 held in Regina. Of course this program has been carried forward to this date. I wish to emphasize the rather different approach we have to this problem from that of hon. members on my right. Let me say before I go any further that I do not think any of us has any objection to integration but there are different and varying reasons for opposing what is termed unification. I should like to quote the resolution which reads as follows:

NATO has played its part in the maintenance of west European security. However, it has concentrated on a military role and has failed to adapt its policies to the growing importance of the economic and social front in the present world struggle. The New Democratic Party believes that we should seek a reappraisal and change of NATO's policies and objectives.

The New Democratic Party believes that the extension of nuclear weapons to any further states and alliances threatens disaster to the world. It therefore opposes Canada's troops being supplied with such weapons at home or abroad.

At present, except for those nations which have independently developed atomic capacity, neither NATO itself nor its members individually possess or control nuclear warheads. Should they do so, Canada must make it clear that it cannot remain in the alliance. To relieve tensions, Canada should press for a demilitarized zone in central Europe and for the simultaneous disbandment of the Warsaw and NATO pacts.

I must remind the house that in reply to a question of mine addressed to the Minister of National Defence some time last year he said that NATO was a nuclear alliance. Therefore, according to our national convention resolution we propose that Canada should withdraw her forces from the alliance. This was the basis upon which this resolution was supported by our convention.

I go now to our attitude to NORAD. In this respect I wish to quote from page 51 of the New Democratic Party program. I want to be exact in this respect because possibly some members actually do not understand our resolutions.

It is questionable whether NORAD ever made any significant contribution to the defence of Canada, and in any case it has outlived its usefulness.

Furthermore, there is every danger that the Bomarcs will be equipped with nuclear warheads. The NORAD agreements should therefore be terminated.

That is the attitude of the New Democratic Party with respect to NORAD.

I might say I had a most interesting experience when I visited NORAD, and I think the minister got some of the backwash from it. We were there for three days and were lectured by the United States officers in charge of these installations. They treated us very well indeed. Just as we were leaving the gentleman in charge said to one of the members, what is your politics, sir? He said, I am a Liberal. The same question was asked of the next member and he said, I am a Conservative. The next member said he was a member of the Social Credit party, and when asked I said I was a revolutionary socialist. When we returned to Ottawa people had heard all about this and wanted to know what I had been up to. I had really made this comment in a sort of a humorous vein but it was taken seriously and resulted in an inquiry about me so far as security was concerned.

Mr. Foy: Was your own party upset when you said this?

Mr. Herridge: No, I would not do anything of that sort, you know. We stand united except when we are apart.

Our policy with respect to NATO and NORAD is supported by other groups in Canada, including the Voice of Women, and in that connection I wish to quote a statement issued by that organization:

Following the publication of the white paper on defence, Voice of Women notes that the government recognizes that Canada's defence policy cannot be dissociated from her foreign policy.

Voice of Women acknowledges the usefulness and efficiency of the integration of the armed forces but notes with concern contradictions and discrepancies between the declaration of Canada and her representatives at the United Nations and Geneva and the contents of the white paper.

I am going to give a few examples because I have a lot of correspondence with various ladies in the Voice of Women and all my life I have taken a great deal of pleasure in pleasing the ladies.

The question of nuclear weapons for the Canadian armed forces is subordinate to that of Canada's political possibility as a member of a nuclear armed alliance.

When Canada joined NATO in 1949 NATO was not a nuclear alliance. When NATO became a nuclear alliance in December, 1957, Canada could not withdraw in view of article 13 of the North Atlantic treaty which prevents withdrawal before 1969. On the other hand, it is a fact that some countries, members of NATO, have refused all nuclear weapons while remaining in the alliance.

According to the white paper, the first objective in time and in importance of Canadian defence policy is collective measures for maintenance of peace and security as embodied in the charter of the United Nations, including the search for balanced and controlled disarmament. I am very pleased to note the discussions that have been taking place in recent months at Geneva in this respect.

On January 5, 1964, the Prime Minister said that he believes Canada's future military role will require a diminution of nuclear arms and equipment. How, therefore, can the white paper recommend nuclear arms for a nuclear role for Canada's armed forces? This is a question asked by the ladies in the Voice of Women.

The white paper states that the alliance must continue to possess nuclear weapons in the absence of controlled disarmament. The greatest obstacle to controlled disarmament at the present time is precisely the possession by NATO of nuclear weapons in ever-increasing quantities.

Our position with respect to NATO is being supported by an increasing number of people with some knowledge of the circumstances. For instance, recently Hon. Howard Green, former secretary of state for external affairs, was quoted in the Vancouver Province as saying that Canada should consider dropping out of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization when the present treaty expires in 1969. I might say that Mr. Green was in the same company as me for several years. I always had high regard for him. He is not a person to make a statement just to catch the press. He is a most serious-minded person and I knew him as such in civilian life, in the army and while he was secretary of state for external affairs.

The present Leader of the Opposition was quoted in an article in the Nelson Daily News of December 18, 1966, entitled "Diefenbaker Urges Cut In Canada's Force In Europe", as follows:

Opposition Leader Diefenbaker has added his voice to the growing chorus seeking a Canadian troop reduction in Europe.

I may that we in this party are very pleased indeed that the Leader of the Opposition is commencing to march in our direction. This is not the only case in which he has commenced to march in our direction. He has done so on several other occasions in recent months. Numerous editors across Canada are also beginning to realize that the defence policy of Canada must be altered to meet changing circumstances. It is for this reason the hon. member for Vancouver East said, when speaking in the house on January 30 last:

Canada should think not just of renegotiating its position in NATO but of getting out of NATO.

Later in the same speech he said:

No reasonable explanation can be given why, in regard to defence co-operation and our relations with the United States under NORAD, we should have nuclear weapons in the hands of Canadians and on Canadian soil.

Later he went on to say:

The policy of integration seems logical and reasonable to us, but the House of Commons should not be asked to endorse the principle of unification until the government has clearly outlined its attitude to existing military alliances and its reasons for the same, and the anticipated role for Canada's armed forces.

Later the same day the hon. member for Greenwood supported this point of view in similarly vigorous language. After this bill received second reading it was referred to the committee on national defence. A good many witnesses were heard both for and against the bill. I have not had the opportunity of reading all the evidence carefully, but I have picked out the evidence of those persons who received particular attention in the press or whose evidence was discussed by members in conversation. I was particularly impressed by the evidence given by General Moncel and by Air Chief Marshal Miller, who was Canada's chief of defence staff until his early retirement last summer. I was particularly impressed with some of the questions put to him in the committee and I should like to quote one. This is a man of authority and knowledge, and he was asked this question:

• (5:10 p.m.)

Air Marshal, you have indicated in answer to Mr. Harkness that you saw no advantages to unification. Did I understand you correctly when you said you could list several disadvantages?

Air Chief Marshal Miller replied:

I said I did not see any monetary return for unification—

Which in effect means no savings.

—nor did I see any significant military effectiveness.

When dealing with this type of legislation I think we have to pay particular attention to the opinions of one who so recently was Canada's chief of defence staff.

Passing from the evidence brought before the committee, I was interested to note an editorial in the Globe and Mail of Saturday, March 25, entitled "Where Are We Going". The article commenced:

Two New Democratic members of parliament, Andrew Brewin and Harold Winch, have at last put the dispute over unification of the armed forces in its proper context. Unification makes sense, they pointed out in a statement after the defence committee reported the bill back to the Commons, only—

The word "only" is the key word, Mr. Chairman.

—if the government intends to make drastic alterations in its present NATO and NORAD commitments. They would not, they indicated, support final passage of the bill until the government agreed to these alterations.

That is pretty definite.

Had NATO developed into some form of economic community, as once foreseen by Louis St. Laurent and Lester Pearson, there might be reasons for maintaining our part in it. It did not. We should bring our forces home. We can fulfil any responsibility to our European allies through treaties that could, for example, commit forces to their assistance in time of need.

There is also another purpose served by our armed forces: the preservation of peace in Canada itself. However much as we resent the thought, it has been necessary at times for them to play that role, and could be again.

Beyond all of this, of course, is the peacekeeping role, at which Canadians have distinguished themselves and which is undoubtedly, so far as most Canadians are concerned, the role we would wish our armed forces to play.

The military correspondent of the Globe and Mail is writing, I think, with considerable balance and thought in using these arguments. The editorial continues:

> In fact, most Canadians are much more interested in preserving peace than preparing for war. Making larger forces available to police duties is one way of achieveing such an objective. Another is through ever-increasing amounts of foreign aid to underdeveloped nations. Abject poverty feeds international unrest. Could Canada shift its defence emphasis from the manifestations to the causes of unrest?

I thought that quotation from the editorial in the Globe and Mail was very interesting indeed.

During the present debate the hon. member for Greenwood placed some interesting information on the record with respect to the evidence given by General Moncel. Later the hon. member made these remarks, as reported at page 14447 of Hansard April 3:

> In my view, Mr. Chairman, this reveals the essence of the matter which is facing the house today. General Moncel put his finger on precisely the real issue. However much it may be obscured by the discussions of unification, the real issue is that unification makes sense if the concentration is to be on a single mobile force which will be available for peacekeeping and other activities, but if the present roles are to be continued then it does not make sense.

The members of our group agree wholeheartedly with this point of view.

On April 5 the hon. member for Vancouver East made a very interesting speech in which he clearly indicated that it was the responsibility of the government to inform the House of Commons of the role of the armed forces, and that this party would have to make its decision on this bill according to what we believe is best for the armed forces and for Canada. In concluding his remarks the hon. member said, as reported at page 14573 of Hansard:

> In the final analysis, we will search our consciences and vote in the way we think is right for the future of Canada.

According to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to whose speech I listened carefully the other day, Canada has no intention of getting out of either NATO or NORAD. With respect to NATO he said that Canadian forces contributed to existing stability in Europe and that unilateral withdrawal of them could have significant political consequences. In effect, he said that the role of the Canadian armed forces was to continue as at present. In saying this he failed to meet the suggestion put forward by our party when this bill was first discussed before it went to the committee, as well as during the committee hearings and in the course of this debate, that the role of the armed forces should be to defend Canada and provide peace keeping forces for the United Nations when required.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, in another respect this debate has been somewhat disappointing in that it has not given the Canadian people any clear idea as to the cost of defence in the future, and I think they are entitled to know this. General Moncel, the former vice chief of the general staff, told the defence committee that Canada will require a budget of $2 billion to meet her commitments. I am informed that the associates of the minister have not confirmed or denied this statement.

Mr. Hellyer: They have denied it.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear the minister say that.

Mr. Hellyer: If they have not, I do now.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear the minister say that because I want to be as accurate as possible.

Mr. Hellyer: The evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller on this point is more accurate, I think, than that given by General Moncel.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his explanation in that respect and I accept it.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that the role of the armed forces as outlined by the Secretary of State for External Affairs is completely unsatisfactory from the point of view of the members of this party. We again affirm our belief that Canada should withdraw from NATO and NORAD, and we again express our opposition to nuclear weapons being placed in the hands of Canadian troops at home or abroad. Our view is that we should let Canada make a positive and constructive contribution to the development of peace in the world, first of all by the provision of peace keeping forces to the United Nations and, second, by the provision of funds, material and technological know-how and skills for underdeveloped nations.

That, Mr. Chairman, is our point of view, and we shall do all we can to support such efforts. I might say that I have heard people mention contributions of the order of 1 per cent, 2 per cent or 3 per cent of our gross national product. I believe we should all be men enough, and ladies enough, to support the taxation that is necessary to pay for this because no government can undertake any program of this sort at home or abroad unless it takes some money away from somebody. Finally, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that when it comes to voting on this bill this party will, as usual, exercise its conscience.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Before the hon. gentleman takes his seat would he permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I want to be perfectly clear about his standpoint with regard to his remarks on NORAD. Is he saying that it is his view, whether or not it is the view of his party, that Canada should not be party to any joint defence arrangement with the United States with respect to the defence of the North American continent?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, what I put on the record was the view of our party as expressed at the national convention, clearly indicating that Canada should withdraw from NORAD, as I have said previously on the resolution stage. This is the view of this party, not the view of the hon. member for Kootenay West. I am always very careful on those points.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Stefanson: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few comments on Bill C-243, commonly known as the armed forces unification bill. I have had the privilege of serving on the defence committee in the past but I did not serve on the committee when it considered this bill. Personally, I felt it was desirable to have personnel on the committee who have served in the armed forces of Canada, particularly as we are concerned about the defence of our country and the defence of freedom everywhere.

This parliament has many such distinguished members. On this side of the house in our party there are many such members who served with dedication and distinction during world war I and world war II. These men gained personal and practical knowledge of the structure of our armed forces, the structure of our defence philosophy and the structure of actual combat. Many of us do not have this experience. As one who did not serve in the armed forces of Canada I felt that a wise course for me to follow was to listen to the views of those with experience and practical knowledge. I also feel that a wise minister of national defence should follow a similar course.

I have followed the proceedings of the defence committee in the examination of the bill now before us. It is disturbing to me, as I am sure it is disturbing to Canadians everywhere, to read the testimony of so many former senior officers who have come out squarely against the principle of the bill and who in fact maintain that the present bill, if passed, will destroy the effectiveness of the armed forces of Canada. These are men who have dedicated their whole lives to the service of their country in peacetime and in war. These men are not seeking glory or personal gain but are expressing their views based on many years of experience. There sole aim is that our country be provided with the best and most effective defence force possible. They have no ulterior motives nor axes to grind. They have the welfare of their country at heart. We as members of parliament also, I hope, place the welfare of our country first.

It is most disturbing to see the long list of senior officers who have taken early retirement or who have been fired for expressing views different from those of the minister or opposing the intent of the bill before us. The calibre of the men who have left the army, navy and air force is exceptionally high. With so much opposition to this bill and with so much doubt expressed about any beneficial effects from it, I would think that the minister would be wise to go slowly and to take a closer look at all aspects of defence. The testimony of men like Lieutenant General Moncel, Air Marshal Annis, Lieutenant General Fleury, Air Chief Marshal Miller and many others has left doubt in the minds of many about the value of the bill and about where we are heading.

There are those, including the hon. member for Trois-Rivières who spoke on Friday, who say that this debate has taken too long. They forget that parliament is a place for discussion. Hon. members on this side have been participating in discussion, in a debate. Hon. members have been expressing their doubts and have been giving their views about this matter.

Everyone has agreed that integration is a good thing and I congratulate the minister for bringing it in because I think it was a forward step. Integration, however, had been under study for many years. The department had considered it for a long time and had carried out, as I have said, extensive studies. The minister implemented those studies. He also explained that integration was experimental, that errors would be made and that we shall not have the full benefits for some time to come. In that context I would think it would be better to wait until we can see the full effects of the integration program before proceeding farther. It was said when integration was introduced that there would be a saving of many millions of dollars. I do not doubt that some savings were effected but they were not as great as Canadians had been led to believe.

Coming from an area in which there are two defence establishments and living in a town in which there is an R.C.A.F. station, Gimli, now known as Canadian Forces Base, Gimli, I have been over the years and am still much interested in the defence of our country. I might say in passing that we have had exceptionally good commanding officers throughout the years. We have been very fortunate in the high quality of these men and we have always enjoyed excellent public relations in our district between servicemen and civilians.

People in the services have expressed many doubts about this bill. Some, in common with some hon. members here, are in favour of it; others, in common with other hon. members here, are opposed to it. We are reaching the point where many in the services are afraid of saying anything against the bill as too many have been fired for speaking against it. Surely both views ought to be heard particularly from the minister's department. Everyone ought to be allowed to speak freely.

I do not agree with senior officers making speeches and statements to the public, as reported in this morning's Montreal Gazette. The article is headed "Unification Defended". The text reads as follows:

> Vice-Admiral R. L. Hennessy Friday night delivered a spirited broadside at critics of armed forces unification in an address to the Navy League of Canada.
>
> "The myth that unification will destroy the navy isn't borne out by the facts," he said.
> "It verges on being insulting to the fine men of the navy."
> Those who say navy morale is low are either "ill-informed or misinformed."

The evidence before the committee showed that morale in the navy is at an all-time low; yet here is a senior officer saying that is not so. One of the reasons for hurrying this bill through is that if it is not passed morale in the armed forces will sink. As this officer says morale is high, there is no need to rush the bill.

While referring to freedom of speech I wish to read from an article in the Winnipeg Free Press of Thursday, April 6, 1967. The column is headed "Who Can Speak?". It says:

> Defence Minister Paul Hellyer's staff play under some peculiar ground rules when it comes to speaking out in public.
>
> In Parliament on Monday, when opposition members questioned some statements that General Jean Allard, the chief of staff, was alleged to have made in a speech in Montreal, Mr. Hellyer sprang quickly to his defence. (The fact that General Allard was misquoted has no bearing on this particular point, as Mr. Hellyer admitted he did not know what the general had said.) What Mr. Hellyer said in the House was, "Mr. Speaker, I did not know of the speech, but I have complete confidence in the chief of the defence staff and he is at complete liberty to express himself publicly as he sees fit."
> Does General Allard have this privilege because he is the chief of staff? Or does he have it because his views on unification coincide with Mr. Hellyer's? If it is proper for the general to express himself publicly as he sees fit, surely this should be extended to other senior military officers. But what happened to Lieutenant General Moncel, Rear Admiral Landymore, Lieutenant General Frank Fleury, Vice Admiral Kenneth Dyer and other senior officers when they questioned Mr. Hellyer's policies? They were fired out of hand.

Mr. Hellyer: Nonsense.

Mr. Stefanson: Nonsense, says the minister? I hope that those senior officers enjoy that freedom in speaking that we enjoy in parliament.

• (5:30 p.m.)

The Minister of Transport told us the other day that it was important to hear both sides of the question. I hope, therefore, that this freedom exists and that the promotion of men who expressed their views will not be prevented. If this has taken place it is certainly cause for a great deal of alarm.

Canada is a member of NORAD and NATO and it is important that her military role should be integrated with defence and foreign policies. In addition, I certainly think that Canada's military organization should be able to fit in with the military arrangements of allies such as the United States and Britain. Last fall I had the opportunity to visit defence establishments in the United States on a NATO trip. Most of the information we received was classified and I will certainly not refer to it here. I will merely say that at all the bases we visited, whether navy, air force or marine corps, the commanding officer was always a four-star general and in every case, I would say, he was roughly 50 years of age. The minister said we should not be listening to senior officers such as these but that we should be paying attention to the younger men. Nevertheless these are the people upon whom Mr. McNamara relies for his advice—the senior officers at these bases and at the Pentagon. I think it is indispensable that any minister should have the benefit of advice from people who have made the defence of their country a lifetime job.

I have put forward the view that our forces should be similar in structure to those of the United States and Britain. I found no indication that the United States was contemplating any change in the present constitution of its services, that is, an army, a navy and an air force. I should like to quote part of an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press, a paper which is a strong supporter of the Liberal party though it has often come out with editorials directed against the present government. This editorial says:

As members of parliament cast their votes in support or rejection of Mr. Hellyer's bill, they must surely recognize the grave responsibility they bear individually. It is a question that far transcends both politicking and party. Canadians will not lightly forgive or forget if our defence structure is thoughtlessly dismembered. This ill-advised step could, by a single act of parliament, sponsored by an inexperienced minister, tear down and destroy proven services which have been built with the sacrifice and efforts of Canadians in the past hundred years and more.

The reputation, character, efficiency and traditions of Canada's regular and militia units have been won and tested in action in battlefields in Europe, Asia and Africa, in the sea lanes of the North Atlantic and in the bombing and fighter missions in the air. They have been carefully designed and organized to work in the closest possible harmony with our two major allies, Great Britain and the United States.

It is beyond comprehension that Mr. Hellyer, by insisting on total unification, should ask parliament now to endorse a completely new defence structure, entirely foreign to both British and U.S. defence organizations. Unification, and elimination of service identities, despite Mr. Hellyer's statements to the contrary, have been openly rejected by Britain after much study—as declared in the white paper of 1963. A check with Washington would also reveal that the U.S. has no intention of unifying its combat units. To the contrary, the present purpose is to build up the proud reputations and esprit de corps of individual fighting units, whether it be the "Green Berets", the Marines or the first Cavalry Regiment. For Canada to launch into a radical experiment which will make our defence organization incompatible with U.S. and British organization constitutes the most drastic step ever taken with the defences of this country. It could, in large measure, destroy our existing defence structure.

Bearing this in mind, I say that the minister should be extremely careful, when contemplating changes in the defence structure of Canada, to see that our forces fit into the defence structures of the United States and Great Britain.

[Mr. Stefanson.]

Furthermore, the NATO agreement is to be reviewed in 1968 to arrive at a basis for the coming ten years and the indications are that great changes will be brought about. At this point I should like to read from another article which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on April 4:

In the course of the next year, Canada will be reviewing and renegotiating her military commitments under NATO. Common sense, at least, should dictate delaying any major revision of our defence forces until these revised undertakings become known.

Regiments, air squadrons and ships' companies are not simply constructed by bookkeeping statistics, mechanical devices, theories on paper, or by inexperienced guesswork. Canada has much practical experience to draw on. It should not be ignored. A far more cautious and realistic approach should be adopted before risking the destruction of such matters as confidence, harmony, pride of service, esprit de corps and proud tradition which every great commander in history has recognized as the vital qualities in any fighting service. Such things, when destroyed, cannot easily or quickly be restored.

In considering this bill in parliament, members should demand some explanation of the effect of Mr. Hellyer's program on Canada's important commitments under NATO and NORAD. These continuing responsibilities should not be ducked or diverted to buy support for Mr. Hellyer's unification program.

As has been pointed out, if Canada's role is to be merely one of peacekeeping, unification could perhaps be justified. But if we are to have a force of the kind which has existed in the past there can certainly be no justification for such a drastic step. I notice that even though integration was begun some two years ago the estimates for 1967-68 are roughly $115 million higher than the defence estimates for 1966-67. The total estimates of the department for the present year amount roughly to $1,600 million. This is an enormous amount of money. Members of this committee are entitled to know, as are the people of Canada, exactly what the defence forces of this country consist of. Most of the editorials which have appeared in the press are strongly opposed to the bill we are now discussing. Last night I listened to a television program in the course of which Charles Lynch said he felt the debate in this house was justified because in his opinion this was a dangerous bill and one which should be opposed. I am sure the minister has read editorials in papers right across Canada, every one of them condemning the bill before us and suggesting it would be most unwise to move hastily at this time.

• (5:40 p.m.)

In conclusion I wish to propose some questions to the minister. Will the passing of this bill save the people of Canada money, or has the minister some doubts about this? Will the passing of this bill assure Canada of an effective defence force, or has the minister some doubts about this? Is insistence on a single uniform not likely to have an effect on the morale of the forces? If it does affect morale would it not be better to allow the three services to retain their identities by retaining their respective uniforms? Has the testimony given by many qualified personnel as to their doubts about the bill not been a shock to the minister and left some doubts in his mind?

I find myself having serious doubts about these points, and if the minister has any doubts I hope he will proceed with caution and take another look at what this bill may achieve. He has indicated that it will take many years to implement the provisions of the bill. Therefore there does not seem to be any need for rush. Why not wait until the full effects of integration are felt and then perhaps the minister and all concerned will be in a position to assess the merits for or against unification? I therefore trust that if the minister has any doubts about the value of the bill he will request that it be stood so that consideration can be given either to scrapping it entirely or amending it.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I rise to take part in this debate as another member who was not a member of the defence committee. Having served on a number of standing and special committees of the house I realize that the members of the defence committee have acquired specific and better knowledge of the question we are debating than those of us who were privileged only to sit in on committee hearings and to read the evidence as it was published. However, the purpose of a committee is to report to the house assembled in committee of the whole so that all hon. members can consider the evidence and the report and look at them in perhaps a more broadly based fashion than a committee itself is capable of doing. Therefore I have no apology to make for rising at this time to make some general remarks on the whole question of unification.

There has been a considerable amount of comment about whether or not this or that member served in the armed forces, for how long, and in what service. I do not feel that this is essential to an ability to debate the subject. However, I feel no modesty about standing here because I did serve as an infantry commander for some time in the front lines on European battlefields. I do not feel that gave me any special knowledge about the larger organizational problems but I do think it gave me some knowledge on the question of the identity of individual fighting units and the importance that these units bear to the whole force.

We have used the words, esprit de corps and morale. These qualities are very essential. I shall deal with them a little more deeply in a few minutes but, regardless of all the other matters that have been discussed, fundamentally the question is, are we going to have an effective force for the defence of Canada's shores? That is the question we have to face. I feel that the answer is in the negative and that by unification we will not assist the morale of our fighting forces nor improve the over-all-picture.

There are a lot of questions that have not yet been answered. The whole weakness of the minister's position arises from the assumption that there is something difficult about the matter of unification which only the experts can understand. The understanding which the public has got is probably more important than anything else, because we cannot run that far ahead of public opinion and get away with it. I believe at this particular moment we are running ahead of public opinion, and running so far ahead of it in this effort at unification that the public will neither understand nor support unification.

Public reaction, both from those who had a smattering of military knowledge and from those who wanted to save money, was favourable to integration. People agreed in general with the fact that we could integrate support, supply and command services and thereby produce a more effective national fighting force at more modest cost. This was the first thing which the public approved, but I am going to submit that the public's view has changed and that the minister cannot ignore this change or, if he does, it will be at his peril.

The second thing the public felt was that unification, the second step of integration as they saw it, was not really understood by any civilian. However, they felt the minister had assurances from his experts that everyone in the services knew what was involved and everyone in the services approved. On this basis the public went along with the question of unification believing that though they could not understand it everybody else did. There was no effective vocal opposition across the country. But that public reaction has changed.

I find that people who talk to me as a private member of the house are now a little bit confused because they have learned that the experts did not know exactly what was involved and in large measure did not approve what was taking place. This has made a considerable difference in the minds of the public. They are now asking if the experts did not know, if the heads of the services did not know what unification meant, if Air Chief Marshal Miller did not know, then who does?

Until quite recently people thought the Prime Minister probably knew but then he said, "My, I am really surprised at what Air Chief Marshal Miller said. I will have to look into this again." All this is quite surprising to the public. They figured that at least the Prime Minister knew what unification was and what was involved. Now the public are beginning to wonder. So am I, and so are a lot of people who admitted they did not know what was involved but thought everyone else did.

As I read the committee proceedings I found that time and again expert military witnesses stated they could not define the meaning of unification. Some even said they could not understand the difference between integration and unification. Time and again witnesses stated that unification would not provide an increase in the efficiency of the services.

They stated that it is not clearly understood even by the members of the services and, finally, that unification would not improve morale and esprit de corps in the services.

I believe the government of the day is prone to ignore the individual. Everyone is treated in the way a mass of people would be treated. This is my criticism of much of their legislation. In respect of unification they are now going beyond that; they intend to abandon battalions and units which have been historic for centuries. They intend to abandon corps and even services—the navy, the air force and the army. Individual units are now to be abandoned and absorbed into an anonymous group where the personnel have no interest whatsoever in the others who are serving in the same service.

There is to be a green uniform. I think a grey uniform would be more suitable. In this way we would have a grey mass of indistinguishable persons, units and services.

Mr. Winkler: With black armbands.

[Mr. Aiken.]

Mr. Aiken: I should like to say, from my own very limited experience, that morale and esprit de corps are very intangible things. They cannot be photographed like a uniform; they cannot be counted like individual members of the service; they cannot be valued like equipment. They are, however, eminently more important than any of these things. The absence of a willingness to work together with another group, the absence of a pride in one's own unit, and the absence of pride in one's own service, take away all the desire of a fighting man to do a little better. All the great stories of military adventures have arisen because some member of a unit has done something which has brought that unit to the attention of others and has given it a special importance. The unit perhaps has led an attack or held the line and many of the personnel in that unit receive medals. These are the important things which are involved in morale.

Medical men tell us that shock often is the cause of death of persons who are involved in an accident. It is difficult either to define or distinguish shock. It can be caused by loss of blood or by injury. Sometimes it is caused by a combination of several things. The result of shock, however, can be death just as definitely as decapitation. In many cases the real cause of death never can be defined. I am attempting to establish that shock easily could cause the death of the Canadian armed forces if the fighting men should lose their morale and esprit de corps.

There seems to be a feeling that unification is based on some changed concept in respect of the defence of Canada or in respect of the methods of waging war. This new concept has not been defined by the minister and therefore we are left guessing as to what is behind the need for unification of the forces. Some people believe that the advent of a most horrible means of mass destruction will eliminate the likelihood of a conventional war or conventional battles. Of course, all the evidence is to the contrary. The battles which are going on at the present time are in the conventional war field.

I can remember that in the 1930's, prior to the second world war, we were told that if there should be another world war it might be the end of mankind. People gave as an example all the various types of gases which were available in great quantities. They told us about the germs which were being incubated in thousands of places. It was said that if war broke out these germs would be released and everybody would be wiped out. This did not happen. When members of the armed forces went into battle in the second world war, for months they carried respirators or gas masks and then later these were abandoned. In fact, even in his death throes and his final instability Hitler did not authorize the use of mass destruction.

I do not believe we should assume that there would be no conventional attack on this country, that there would be no conventional war, or that we would have nothing to meet of a conventional standard. I believe this is what we are doing and that we are laying a false basis, but I am not sure in what direction the minister is moving because this has never been explained. We really cannot tell in what direction the government is moving.

I should like to conclude my remarks with a word of advice to the minister. He may not wish to take it but I think he should. I know he has received much advice in the past few months but he has not received any from me previously.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): He has taken none of the advice.

Mr. Aiken: It is rumoured, Mr. Chairman, that the minister is attempting to push this project through because he has his eye on the leadership of the Liberal party.

Mr. Hellyer: You must be kidding.

Mr. Aiken: He wishes to show himself as a forceful minister. Be that as it may, whether he has his eye on the leadership or just wishes to be a forceful and effective minister is not of the slightest importance to me. I suggest he might show himself to be diplomatic. He could do this by backing off a little in the face of the recent and effective opposition to the program of unification which he has outlined.

In respect of greater men in the past it has been shown that intransigence has been the downfall of many politicians. The salvation of many others has been their ability to recognize criticism when it is well established and has a proper basis. In this instance I believe the minister would be well advised to reconsider his position, look at the opposition which has been raised, look at what the public has been saying in respect of his judgment, and then act like a statesman.

The Deputy Chairman: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the committee that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), Canadian Centennial—Castlegar, B.C.—request for presentation of air force performance; the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain), Canadian Pacific Railway—night train between Montreal and Quebec city; the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave), Justice—interim divorce measure.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I am not seeking to re-enter this debate because I am anxious to prolong it. If it is any satisfaction I can assure the minister that when we reach the individual clauses we in this party will not be intervening very often or at great length because the clauses have all been gone over in committee and most of them are merely consequential upon the main principle.

I am entering the debate again because the Secretary of State for External Affairs took part in the debate on Wednesday last and said some things that I think go to the root of the matter of unification and deserve very careful examination. He reiterated the government's contention that unification would not affect the carrying out of our present commitments. He also said that the government proposed to maintain our present commitments, particularly to NATO. It appears to me that on the surface we have here an absolute contradiction.

It seems to me to be as clear as a pikestaff that unification makes sense if some of our present commitments are to be abandoned but that we cannot maintain all our present commitments and concentrate on the mobile role. No one in this debate has attempted to contradict General Moncel's evidence; indeed, his evidence was plain common sense. He said that unification would be inappropriate if our present NATO roles are maintained. He said that the brigade group and the air division are not susceptible to unification and would not be affected by it. He said that unification would be meaningless as far as they are concerned. That is the view stated by General Moncel.

On the other side of the picture, Air Vice Marshal Sharp, vice chief of the general staff, says that there is to be a new emphasis on a mobile role. Mr. John Gellner, a writer, in an article which received the imprimatur of General Allard, chief of the general staff, said that a new mobile, intervention force of 15,000 is to be created, or if not created at least re-equipped and made effectively mobile within three years. I say it is as sure as day follows night that this involves a very considerable added expenditure and it will blow the ceiling right off our present defence budget, now fixed at roughly $1.6 billion a year, if at the same time as we re-equip this mobile force we continue our present NATO roles. No one has answered General Moncel's estimate that the creation and fitting out of this mobile force, together with the maintenance of our present roles, would cost at least $2 billion.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend recalls that Air Chief Marshal Miller did deal with this point later and said that in his opinion those estimates were not valid.

Mr. Churchill: He did not say they were not valid.

Mr. Brewin: The Minister of National Defence is correct, but he did not himself give any details. I would point out that the minister himself was questioned in the defence committee on this matter. What he had to say appears at pages 1592 and following of the committee proceedings. When the minister was questioned about what General Moncel had said in this regard he said that in fact no estimate had been made of what it would cost to produce the mobile intervention force. His statement was that perhaps we would need so many helicopters and until it had been decided that we needed so many the cost could not be estimated. He also said it would depend upon the timing, that is, at what rate we were creating the force and how quickly we did it. But he did not deny—and how could he deny—that if it were to be done in any reasonable time span at all it would mean substantial additional expense.

I do not think the minister is to be taken seriously when he suggests that no estimates have been made of the cost of this new policy upon which, I remind the committee and the minister, Air Vice Marshal Sharp said the major emphasis was to be placed. He said that the whole business of unification was centred around a new emphasis to be put upon the mobile force. I think it is quite incredible that no estimates were made. Admittedly, estimates may involve a series of variations, namely, whether you do it in so many years, whether you have 50 helicopters, 500, or whatever may be required, but to assert that the cost has not been taken into account, which is what the minister said, seems to me to make no sense at all. I think it would be more reasonable to assume that the government was not grossly negligent in this respect and has made some sort of estimate of the cost. If it has made such an estimate, I suggest such an estimate would make it perfectly obvious that we cannot create a mobile intervention force and maintain our existing roles, within the budget ceiling that we now have.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that if we cling to the existing roles in NATO, unification makes no sense. There is an inevitable conclusion to be drawn from this, and in this respect I agree with the official opposition although not with their ultimate conclusion. The inevitable conclusion to be drawn is that the government does not mean what it says when it asserts, on the one hand, that it is going to proceed with unification with all speed and, on the other, that it is going to maintain its present roles.

It is my view that the explanation of this matter is to be found in a careful examination of the speech last Wednesday, of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is a disciple, and a very apt one, of his former leader, the late Mr. Mackenzie King. Mr. Mackenzie King, when he spoke on external affairs—some of us are old enough to remember his speeches and to have looked at them carefully—was able to keep everyone happy. This was done by studied obscurity, by never saying clearly what course of action or what school of thought the government favoured. Included in his speeches in the house was one section which seemed to favour Canadian isolation from European wars, another support for the commonwealth, and another devotion to the ideals of collective security exemplified by the League of Nations. No doubt if there were any other significant elements of opinion they would be found duly recorded, rather vaguely and hazily perhaps, in the speeches made by the then prime minister. Every significant trend of Canadian public opinion would find its views somewhere contained in the announcement of Canadian policy. Then the experts used to get to work and analyse the different, inconsistent streams of thought that appeared in Mr. King's utterances, try to determine which predominated and guess Canadian policy therefrom.

I think that the ghost of Mr. King still rules the government which has adopted his style. Therefore I do not find it so surprising that the intentions of the government with regard to its future relations with NATO are wrapped in obscurity. It is quite prepared to adopt a sweeping organizational change in the Canadian armed services, which would only make sense if we were to change our roles in the future, and at the same time to assert stoutly its devotion to the maintenance of its present roles in NATO which do not at all fit into the new organizational structure.

However, in this light I studied the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs very carefully and I may claim by now, having been in the house five years and having followed the words of the minister very carefully, to be an expert Martinologist, if I may coin a word. As a result of my studies I think I have resolved the mystery. It is perfectly true that the Secretary of State for External Affairs in one part of his speech does indeed appear to assert firmly the intention of maintaining unchanged Canada's present role in NATO. But then I find at the top of page 14565 of Hansard the following statement:

> I do not exclude the possibility that in the future it may become feasible, and indeed I hope it will, to withdraw our forces from Europe and to make our entire contribution from bases in Canada. But such a course of action is neither feasible nor desirable at this moment, and certainly not by unilateral decision.

It is my suggestion that the key words in this utterance are "at this moment". The organizational structure of our armed forces must not be considered in the light of what is current at the moment but in the light of the future, and in the light of the future can there be any doubt at all that the government intends to change its role in NATO? I suggest that is the key to this seeming conundrum of a government which proposes a sweeping change in organization and at the same time refuses to announce policies which would make sense of this sweeping change. I think it is quite right for the government to consider the future. What I think is wrong is to conceal from the people of Canada its true intent. No responsible government can propose the continuance of roles which are no longer militarily useful, necessary or sensible.

Once again I call to the attention of the committee the statement made by General Allard in his evidence. After all, he is chief of the general staff and the main military adviser of the government. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred us to an article written by Mr. Gellner in which the latter described our roles in NATO as clearly lacking validity. He said that nobody in NATO believed in them. However, the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not refer in his speech to what the chief of the general staff said but simply referred to what Mr. Gellner said. Mr. Gellner is a commentator and writer. We are not obliged to accept his advice or views. He may quite easily be wrong. However, the point is that General Allard said perfectly clearly, in answer to a question from the hon. member for Simcoe North: "I do not disagree with this article". The meaning of this to anybody who wants to consider the matter carefully is perfectly clear, namely, that the chief of the general staff is saying that these roles make no sense militarily. If one reads his evidence carefully, the only justification for these roles is political.

Neither the Secretary of State for External Affairs nor the Minister of National Defence nor any other member on the government side has attempted to answer the challenge which I offered in the debate more than a week ago to discuss whether these roles had any military value at the present time. They simply keep saying: We must not change them at the moment; we must not rock the boat.

In excusing the government's silence on this matter the Secretary of State for External Affairs puts up a straw man and knocks him down. In his speech on this issue he said repeatedly that we must not proceed unilaterally to reduce our military contributions to NATO. So far as I know no one is advocating that we do so unilaterally. As long as were are part of an alliance it is our responsibility not to make any changes without consultation with, and notification to, our allies, but it is part of the practice of the alliance for each country to assume the role most appropriate to it. This was made clear by the Prime Minister himself when he spoke in 1962 before the election and when he spoke again in 1963 after the election and announced it to be the policy of this government and of his party to negotiate for a new role in NATO. This issue is coming to a decisive and conclusive point in the very near future.

During the course of his evidence before the defence committee the Minister of National Defence was questioned about the extent and the duration of our commitments to NATO. He explained that they were based upon an annual reconsideration but that now it was proposed to decide the basic roles to be undertaken for five year periods.

At page 1593 of the committee's proceedings the following exchange took place. The Minister of National Defence said:

> In so far as the future is concerned, we will have to indicate this to NATO, if my memory serves me correctly, in December of this year, assuming that all of the other nations agree to this procedure.

Mr. Brewin: But you have not as yet taken any steps to alter these commitments?

Mr. Hellyer: We are not required to reveal our intentions or to discuss our future plans and commitments except at that time.

Mr. Brewin: Is the government giving consideration to this question, or is it a closed question?

Mr. Hellyer: I think that during the course of the year, Mr. Brewin, we will have to decide what we plan to do for the following five-year period and indicate to our NATO partners what they can count on.

I would point out to the committee, and it is crucial that the house should be aware of this fact, that some time before December of this year the government—and I hope it will consult the house about this—will have to make up its mind on what it is going to do about these various commitments to NATO for the five year period in the future. I say to the government that if it proposes to make a change, and I think it should do so, then it is its duty to consult this house and to inform its allies in advance of the contractual date in December that it proposes to change Canada's roles.

As I have said, we have the assertion from the chief of the general staff that militarily speaking these roles are no longer valid. Of course we have this assertion by indirection because he was agreeing to a statement made by someone else. I suggest to the Minister of National Defence, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the government as a whole that they should come out into the open and say whether in December they are going to commit us for another period of five years to the continuation of roles which their own chief of the general staff has said, indirectly it is true, no longer have validity and which indeed, on a careful examination of the facts, are militarily indefensible at the present time.

It seems to me it has become part of the natural style of this government to avoid facing these hard choices and to refuse to announce necessary changes when it decides on them. We in this party particularly view this tendency in connection with the whole issue of unification with very grave regret because in our view the whole process of unification would be easier and would be more acceptable to the services and to the Canadian people if it were made very clear not what the government thinks at the moment, which is what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has told us, but what it plans for the future. If the government does intend, not in the immediate but in the foreseeable future, to propose a complete change in the nature of Canada's military contribution to the security of the world, it should say so.

Much has been said in this debate about morale. I believe that if there is one thing that undermines morale more than anything else it is uncertainty as to the future, uncertainty as to the purposes which are being carried out. Every man if he is to do his best, not only in the armed forces but everywhere else, must believe that what he is doing is useful and necessary. The evidence of many of the witnesses pointed in that direction. In fact, Air Vice Marshal Sharp, if I have his title correctly, made this clear to us. One of his main arguments in favour of unification was an argument based upon morale. When it came down to asking what he meant by that, it was clear that he meant the dedication of the Canadian armed services to roles which were meaningful. In his opinion, this was the reason unification would lead to better morale.

I want to quote one other witness before the defence committee, Lieutenant General Simonds, former chief of staff and a very distinguished soldier. I asked him if he agreed with previous testimony that one of the reasons he put emphasis on peacekeeping as being an important role—certainly not the only one —was that it gave to those concerned a morale that was built on thinking they were doing something vitally important. To this General Simonds replied:

Yes, I agree with that. There is nothing in that to contradict the statement I just made.

I do not believe there was. So, Mr. Chairman, it is quite certain in our view that Canada is going to concentrate in the future on a military contribution which will be a complete change from its present contribution. It is bound to get out of obsolete and inappropriate roles. The failure to state that Canada is going to concentrate on a unified force which can make a vital contribution to world security undermines the very basis of the argument for unification. We believe that unification is a necessary and proper development but a development that is based upon a recasting of Canada's military role. It is necessary to get up and say so, to indicate that the far reaching changes in organization we in this house are being asked to approve are part of an imaginative proposal to recreate a new and more significant role for Canada's armed forces.

The Prime Minister himself indicated that his government is proposing such a reconsideration, a new approach. I hope before this debate is over the Prime Minister, who has a vital reponsibility on security matters, will put this matter in perspective by telling the house that, whatever may be the momentary intention with regard to the maintenance of roles in Europe, the government contemplates as the most effective future role for Canada participation in a mobile intervention force and that unification is necessary to this and such a declaration is necessary to the building of morale and support for unification not only amongst the armed services but for the people of Canada generally.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, few debates ever held in this chamber have had more critical significance for Canada's future than that in which we are engaged. Yet at this stage it is not easy to present any novel or original arguments. For myself, I have never professed that knowledge of defence or matters military which would qualify me to speak with confident authority. On the other hand, sir, that very lack of expertise may have enabled me to approach the issue of unification of our armed forces with a completely objective view. I have been able to examine the evidence given in the standing committee without preconceived bias, and I have certainly done so without political partisanship.

To the study of that evidence I have given agonizing care. This detailed study of the evidence before the standing committee on defence has convinced me that this bill ought not to be enacted and has convinced me that if it is enacted it will irreparably damage the national interest. Indeed, sir, I fail to see how any objective person reading the evidence could come to any other conclusion. While I have spent many hours analysing and annotating the evidence before the committee, I see no particular point in spreading it further on the record. I will abbreviate my speech at least in that respect.

Nor do I think it is necessary or desirable to attack the integrity or bona fides of any witness. Most of the evidence presented to the committee was opinion evidence, and any experienced barrister knows how widely such evidence may differ even when tendered by equally sincere witnesses. But, sir, overwhelmingly the weight of evidence tendered by those who were free to speak without any inhibition was in opposition to this bill. I say to you, sir, that for parliament to act in the face of the opinions which were expressed by Air Chief Marshal Miller, General Guy Simonds and General Robert Moncel would be irresponsible and foolhardy in the extreme. It is all very well to say that there are other opinions of a contrary nature and to assert that the government and parliament have a responsibility to act.

My submission, which I want to make tonight directly to the Prime Minister, is simply—I make it to the Prime Minister because in my view he is the only man who can save Canada's present armed forces from annihilation—that administration and no parliament can properly disregard such expert opinion as that of Miller, Simonds, Moncel, Curtis and many others. No administration and no parliament should jeopardize the safety and security of a nation in the face of the opinions of such men.

I say to the Prime Minister that the task of statescraft is to achieve a national consensus, and where there is not a reasonable national consensus upon a fundamental issue affecting the very life of the nation then no action or at least delayed action is to be preferred to hasty and indigestible action. That is the very essence of statescraft. I assert to the Prime Minister that in my view this nation is not ready for unification and he should draw back before irreparable damage is done. This is not a matter merely of someone winning an argument. This is not just a case of the majority in parliament having its way. This bill is a blow at the very heart of our future as a nation. As Prime Minister the right hon. gentleman from Algoma East has a positive and unequivocal duty to all Canada to reconsider this hasty and ill-conceived measure. He was not sworn in as Her Majesty's first minister in order to preside over the liquidation of Canada's armed forces.

Sir, no one here doubts the desirability of what has come to be described as integration—integration of support services and a measure of consolidation of command. However, the destruction of service traditions, the dynamiting of all unit loyalties in order to create a single force, is another matter. In my view it ought not to be done. It certainly ought not to be done without the clear, unequivocal mandate of the Canadian people. I assert that only the Canadian people have the right to take the chances with the survival of the nation which are implicit in this bill. The Minister of National Defence claims to be leading the world on the road to unification. Personally, I would feel a great deal happier if other nations showed any disposition to follow; I detect none. In fact, the minister is leading a one-man parade. His attempts to gain the support of Admiral Mountbatten backfired over last week end and the explanations made by the minister this afternoon were totally unrealistic. Informed opinion in Britain, the United States and throughout the world indicates, I think, total disenchantment with the proposals that are implicit in this bill.

On Thursday last, Mr. Chairman, as reported at page 14592 of Hansard, the Associate Minister of National Defence professed to speak for all servicemen. He went on to say that he believed the forces are convinced that the goal of unification is correct. I believe that few statements ever made in this house have infuriated more people. Since that statement was made, Mr. Chairman, I have literally been besieged by messages, both identified and anonymous, from servicemen in my riding protesting against the arrogance of the associate minister in professing to speak for all servicemen, and asserting with what I believe is constitutional propriety that only the member that they elect can profess to speak in parliament for any citizen, civilian or serviceman.

The associate minister may profess to speak for the servicemen in the constituency of Terrebonne, but he has no mandate to speak for the servicemen in the constituency of Carleton. I would remind the committee that only the members for Halifax and the hon. member for Russell have as many service electors as I have in Carleton. From the representations made to me, I am convinced that the overwhelming number of my service constituents and their dependants share the views that I am expressing tonight.

However, sir, I do not believe that it is a matter of counting service heads. It is a matter of judgment. My judgment and my submission is that the Prime Minister should intervene now to withdraw this bill, and I plead with him to do so. My observations, both of my service constituents and otherwise, are that the operational efficiency of our armed forces has been brought to its lowest point. Destruction of service loyalties and abandonment of historic units cannot help but lower morale, and that is precisely what has happened. The situation today is that our armed forces are being used as a pawn in the struggle for the Liberal leadership, and the Prime Minister should put an end to it at once.

In my view, Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this bill constitute a direct breach of faith with all serving officers and men. They enlisted upon one basis; this bill shifts the ground rules completely without any right of election to the servicemen. Legally of course this can be done. Morally it is indefensible. When we come to the particular clause in the bill I shall have more to say on the subject.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I venture to direct my words immediately to the attention of the Prime Minister. Into his hands, the fourteenth man so privileged in 100 years of confederation, has come the chief responsibility for the safety and integrity of the nation. I submit to him that the issue before this parliament is too basic, too essential, to the national future to be determined over the protests of the outstanding Canadians who have given their lives to service in the armed forces. In fact, this bill has reached its present stage only by the purge of almost all senior military advisers to the nation, a purge more ruthless than anything ever attempted by anyone anywhere since Stalin's purge of the red army.

I repeat with all the emphasis at my command that the essence of statescraft is to give leadership in the achievement of a reasonable national consensus. This the bill cannot do. Normally the task of parliament is to exercise judgment and to make decisions. This bill transcends that and ought not to be implemented, in my view, without the direct mandate of the people.

If the Prime Minister persists in enacting this bill, then let at least clause 65 be amended to provide that the bill shall come into force only 90 days or 120 days after the next election. In saying that, Mr. Chairman, I am not advocating an early election. Indeed I believe that a bitterly fought election on the eve of our centennial celebrations would be undesirable. But no harm would come about if this bill is postponed a year or two or more. Indeed, I am convinced that much good would result from delay.

The Prime Minister was prepared, Mr. Chairman, to delay medicare, even at the expense of losing the Minister of National Health and Welfare from the cabinet. Despite the risk of his losing the Minister of National Defence from the cabinet—and may I confess to believing that the loss would be a heavensent blessing—let the Prime Minister agree to delay this bill. Then whenever the next election comes—be it one year or two years away, or whenever it may be—the people will have the opportunity to pass upon a proposal which in its present form, in my view, now endangers the very life of our nation. The people of Canada can take the risk of endangering the survival of the nation: My submission is that this parliament cannot.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, my first words in opening the second part of a speech that I began a week ago are helpful to the morale of the minister. I want to assure him right off the bat that in any conflict between statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and the Minister of National Defence I would go along with the Minister of National Defence.

The second compliment I should like to pay him is to thank him for the continuation of the hydrofoil program. I think the announcement that he made in answer to a question I raised a week ago has done a considerable amount to help the morale of the armed forces in the constituency of Halifax. It does show there is some hope that the minister, no matter what his shortcomings—and heaven only knows they have been combed over from right to left and from north to south in recent days in this chamber—means to keep the Royal Canadian Navy in business.

I referred to the statements made earlier today by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra because he would have us believe that anything going on here is but a simple exercise in name changing, that we were really spending an extraordinary amount of time bringing about this change in name. The hon. member also had unkind words to say about certain hon. members on this side, suggesting they had not really read the minutes of the defence committee he headed. Having heard his speech I suggest that he neither heard nor understood what was said in that committee. I refer to the remarks of the Minister of National Defence, in which he deals with what he considers an imperative need to get along with this bill. On the second column of page 14438 of Hansard the minister said this:

> The passage of this bill does not mean instant unification. The passage of this bill is a statement of the intention that the ultimate goal is a single service and all the men and women in the forces will be managed in a single personnel stream. This must be known in order that the kind of detailed staff planning required can proceed on an orderly basis.

Comparing that statement with the utterances of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra one would think that there was more to this bill than a mere change of name. Indeed, should the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra look at the bill—and I invite him to do so—he will find that in clause 2 a change is to be made to section 15 of the National Defence Act, setting up one service to be known as the Canadian Armed Forces. That of course is a change of name, but it involves the process of unification. In clause 4 there is something dealing with the naming of ranks, and in clause 6 the members of the armed forces will become members of the Canadian Armed Forces. Here again there is more than just a change of name.

Clause 7 softens part of clause 6, removing the possibility that a person who has entered service in the army, navy or air force will be conscripted to duties which were alien to him in a single service. Having said these things, I think we can safely dispose of the argument of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra that all we are dealing with here is a change in name.

I also wish to be kind to the minister, though briefly. I shall not change my nature entirely. A very good suggestion, appearing at first blush to support the minister, comes from Major General F. F. "Fighting Frank" Worthington, who said this:

> As one of Canada's oldest generals it is my opinion that at the end of any large war the existing generals should be thanked, decorated and pensioned off.
> Put up statues if you like, but don't let them meddle with the future organization of the services. Hand that responsibility over to the young, fighting colonels who had to fight the war with the existing weapons.

It seems to me, as one reads between the lines, that the Minister of National Defence ought to pay attention to the views of the fighting colonels, the hon. members for Calgary North and Winnipeg South Centre, two excellent and knowledgeable persons to whom I hope the minister pays attention.

The strongest indictment of the minister's proposal is that it asks us to do something, and we do not really know what it is. We suspect the minister does not know either. Nevertheless he is asking for parliament to give him carte blanche to bring about some new process involving the national defence of the country.

Earlier in the debate I quoted extensively from the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller. Passing over some significant portions dealing with my point, I turn to page 2300 of the committee minutes, where the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is asking this of the air chief marshal:

> If I have your testimony correct, unification had been talked about but you had never seen or heard the implications of it spelled out. Is that accurate?
> Air Chief Marshal Miller: We never had tentative unification plans submitted and agreed to.

The air chief marshal was chief of the defence staff, a position he held for two years covering a large part of the present minister's ministry. The air chief marshal perforce, one would think, would be the minister's closest adviser, and privy to his thoughts. He would be in the position of an adviser to the minister. The air chief marshal vacated that post in July or August of last summer.

On November 4 the Bill C-243 is presented to us in its present form. That bill has not just one page, as one would expect if it dealt only with a change of name, but has 48 pages in all, including the various schedules. It was not prepared overnight; as a lawyer I know that it would take weeks or months of preparation. The inference I am trying to draw—and I do not think one can be drawn to the contrary—is that the unification bill was prepared in the Department of National Defence without the leading officer of the department, the chief of the defence staff, having had an opportunity to know what it would deal with. If he had any inkling, there was no exchange of opinions between himself and the minister about the different parts of the unification concept. I find this almost unbelievable.

Any other minister bringing in something as radically new as this bill would have had an exchange of views with his deputy minister and leading officials of the department. Papers would have been prepared; the subject would have been discussed around the water coolers in various government departments. Why did this not happen here? I will repeat that part of the testimony where at page 2300, the air chief marshal says:

> We never had tentative unification plans submitted and agreed to.

I think those words were amplified in other parts of his testimony.

• (6:50 p.m.)

Here we have a massive 48-page bill dealing with unification, produced a few months after Air Chief Marshal Miller had left that office. It defies all common sense and all logic that any minister of the crown should proceed in such a fashion. Even trying to give the minister the benefit of any possible doubt, I find it impossible to believe that there could have been any thinking going into the unification concept which lies behind this measure. It could not have grown up overnight in the month or two before Bill C-243 was drafted. I hope I live long enough for somebody to write a book and explain just how this miracle could be possible. I hope it will not be the gospel according to St. Paul but that some independent observer will explain this miracle to my satisfaction.

There are one or two points which puzzle me in connection with the specific details of unification. One of them is the failure to spell out in simple form, or even in complicated form, the ordinary day to day life of a serviceman so that it would be understandable to those who are trying to grapple with this concept.

For example, nothing has been said about the type of uniform he will wear, the type of living quarters he will occupy, the possibility of his being taken from one kind of duty, in a tank, for instance, and put on another kind of duty, perhaps supporting those who are operating in an air environment. Boiling it down in my own mind, take the case of a young fellow who wants to be a cook in the services. He goes to an integrated recruiting station, which of course exists at the present time, and may be cajoled into going to sea to cook, when all his instincts are against this; he would much prefer to cook at a stationary base, or even for a field unit serving in a ground environment—and I apologize for using some of the older terms. But who on earth would want to be served food at sea by a seasick cook?

There are other examples. I am advised that in the Royal Canadian Navy they do not want men much over the age of 40 to embark on vessels, life at sea being what it is. They feel that only the rare person over 40 who has good physical stamina should be allowed to continue a career which would keep him in a sea environment. Again—and I am relying on advice given to me by professionals—this is not the case with those serving in the air force or the army. They may not want senior officers or older men to handle planes, but I understand that the age requirement is not so restrictive. On this point I should like the minister to tell us just how unification would take into account the different approaches which the services use toward their personnel.

Last week I mentioned the case in Halifax of a person who under the present integration process could not find out who his immediate superior was. Other cases have come to my attention in the Halifax area. The transportation services of the three armed forces have been integrated, and this seems to have quadrupled the number of people engaged in transportation, most of them occupied in writing memoranda to each other without any increase in the number of motor vehicles being driven about. I suppose this is inevitable; it is bound to happen when you take a large department and attempt to reorganize it. I do not minimize the problem the minister faces on this regard, because he has a $1.5 billion operation to look after, and it is difficult to make changes in it. But seeing the Parkinsonian laws in operation following the integration of transportation facilities for the armed forces in the Halifax area, one wonders how effective these plans are and how quickly any bugs can be ironed out.

Finally, I should like to make four points concerning the course which I respectfully suggest the minister should follow. I see it is almost seven o'clock, so perhaps I could wind up my speech at 8 p.m. and make them then—it will take about five minutes.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the house that pursuant to an order of the house made last Thursday, April 6th, this sitting be suspended until eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, in my remarks before the dinner hour I had indicated that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, chairman of the defence committee during its final sessions, appeared to have been there in body and not in mind, and was unaware of the implications of Bill C-243 which we are now considering. I suggested to the Minister of National Defence that at some time an attempt be made to spell out as simply as possible, so that even he could understand, just what was meant by his concept of unification, and what it would mean in the practical day to day living of members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

Also before the dinner hour we heard an outstanding speech and plea by the hon. member for Carleton, mainly directed to the Prime Minister who has the paramount interest and authority with regard to this matter. I could only very humbly second the very forceful, eloquent and wise words of the hon. member for Carleton. I hope that the Prime Minister, who seemed to grasp the nettle a few weeks ago by expressing surprise and interest at the remarks of Air Chief Marshal Miller, will again come to grips with the subject and exercise the responsibility that is his.

Finally, sir, I would like at this time to make four suggestions to the Minister of National Defence as to the course he could follow. The first is that I think it is necessary that integration be made to work. Integration is the expressed will of the parliament of Canada. There has been considerable evidence given before the defence committee about the snafus, the bugs, the serious problems that have cropped up in the Department of National Defence, and I understand most of these relate to the process of integration.

If the first step, integration, is not a completely successful one, why on earth should we in this committee expect that the further step of unification should be a successful one? The Minister of National Defence makes the point that it is necessary to have something on the statute books so that integration can be carried a step further into the area of unification. If this be so, and I take the word of the minister that it is so, then I suggest this step as a corollary to point No. 1, namely an amendment to section 18 of the present National Defence Act which would permit units of one service to join other services. I think in this way experimentation of a useful nature could be carried out, and the minister could iron out the bugs and develop his concept with a small unification scheme, rather than starting in with over-all unification.

I have made my second point in a previous contribution to this debate so I will not dwell on it at any length, but I wish to say I was very much impressed to see the service battalion in operation at Camp Gagetown a number of years ago. I think the minister and the officials of his department would be taking the right course were they to continue to fit the non-combatant units and non-combatant services together in support of the three services. My third point, dealing with unification, has to do with my first point concerning making integration work and attempting unification on a more humble scale. I think we should have some proof, and probably evidence given before an all-party committee on national defence, before the full plunge into unification is made.

My fourth and final point is in the area of high speculation and opinion. However, in this debate everyone has entered into this field. As other hon. members have so well pointed out, we are largely in the field of opinion when we deal with this matter.

It seems to me that if the minister's philosophy is correct and if all the developments in national defence here and in other countries are to be assessed correctly, we have had a significant move in this century, probably as a result of the nuclear age. It may be that the days of large-scale citizen armies are over. We have gone through a period of approximately 200 years when countries as a whole have been at war; and now, because of the nuclear age, we are coming into a period when small, professional and highly mobile services are necessary. Perhaps this is illustrated by the fact that the minister has closed down a number of the militia units which had been in existence in Canada for a long time.

I suggest to the minister, that, keeping in mind the holocaust a nuclear war would bring, the logical extension of what he has been doing would be to take even further steps in developing a closer bond between the services and those who are not in the services. I believe the thinking today would suggest that the civilian population could become more involved in emergency matters than in military matters; that is, we would still rely on the small professional force, but the citizens who are not members of the services would have to carry out the measures which are necessary for the survival of the population.

This type of development, horrendous though it might appear, is consistent with the realities of the nuclear age. I do not believe we should continue to think in terms of the 1914-1918 and the 1939-1949 era. The Emergency Measures Organization should be further developed in order that it will be in readiness to step in instantly, in a time of emergency, so that the people can be mobilized—not in the military sense—in an effort to survive.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make an appeal to the minister to pay some heed to the advice which has been offered and the questions which have been asked from this side of the chamber. National defence really is too important a matter to be either a partisan issue or one which develops as a result of one person's style of thinking. As other hon. members have pointed out, heretofore unification itself had never come before the retired chief of the defence staff in a tangible form and in a form which would have entitled us to raise questions concerning exactly what the minister had in mind. Until we have knowledge of what he has in mind we are entitled to ask questions on behalf of all the people of Canada.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I was happy to hear the hon. member for Halifax wind up with a reminder of the importance of this debate. I thought the hon. member for Carleton brought that very forcibly to the fore. It seems necessary to comment on some of the incredible speeches made in this house by hon. members across the way. I found the remarks made by the Minister of Transport on Friday remarkable in more ways than one, and I intend to get around to them later. Also the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra made an incredible speech this afternoon, for one who was chairman of the committee. During the committee hearings I did not think he had any realization of what was going on, but I did not expect such a frank exposé of the depth of the ignorance he had concerning what was involved as he exhibited this afternoon. I will also comment on that.

One suggestion which was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Greenwood I think should be developed by what is possibly a logical extension of his reasoning. I found myself quite unable to disagree with the arguments he put forward when he mentioned what the government is trying to do, so to speak, through the back door. He pointed out that the only way in which anyone could find a logical pattern in what the government is doing is to suggest that secretly they seem to have made up their minds that Canada must change its role in defence and world affairs. If I judge his remarks correctly, he has found this to be in the peace keeping role; that is, that the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs can be interpreted to mean only that Canada's commitments will be changed later this year, and that the present unification bill, the shape of the forces and the speeches made by the Minister of National Defence all form a pattern which indicates that Canada intends to drop or drastically change some of its commitments in respect of NATO and so on. It would seem that we are intending to put more emphasis on peacekeeping and that our foreign affairs policy in the near future will follow this pattern.

The hon. member for Greenwood deprecated the fact that the government was not being more frank with the members of the house and the people of Canada in revealing its intention. The only thing about which I quarrel with the hon. member is that I believe he may be counting too much on this government following a plan because certainly from what the Minister of National Defence has been doing it is obvious that the lack of a plan has been the most disturbing thing to the members of the armed forces and to the nation in the last couple of years. Therefore perhaps the first mistake we make is in expecting to find some logical plan which the government is following.

It may be that the action they are taking makes so little sense that they are just as misguided and undirected as they appear to be. Certainly the hon. member for Greenwood is the only one who has attempted to search out what the government may be doing. I should like to point out that if he is right, then it occurs to us that our policy in respect of foreign affairs is being decided now by a change in our armed forces.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I am one of those who have always felt that the armed forces of Canada should be able to respond to the support of the policy of the government on external affairs as that policy may exist or be formed from time to time, that the only policy that makes sense is to keep our armed forces in such shape that they do not interfere with the ability of the country to be able to formulate or change its foreign policy, and that the armed forces should be able to give as much weight and credence as possible to the external affairs posture that we adopt. Therefore I am most disturbed at the thought that the hon. member for Greenwood may be right, and certainly the evidence indicates that he is, that what is happening today under this minister is that our armed forces are being tailored so that we can have only one possible sort of external affairs policy.

Up to this time I am sure that most people in the country have been perturbed at the thought that the minister is selling the country a bill of goods when he says that he has been giving us more defence for less money, and we have found the evidence to be that we are getting less and less defence for more money. Next we are disturbed at the thought of what he is doing to our armed forces, the amount of destruction and harm he is doing to them, senselessly, since there is no rhyme nor reason why he should be proceeding with unification, and certainly less reason why he should be proceeding with this program with such haste. This situation becomes even worse when we consider that the result is not just less defence for more money but we are going to lose our ability to manoeuvre in the field of external affairs. I am against external affairs being decided on the basis of defence policy, especially when it is sold under such false pretences as the minister is using in attempting to sell it. I am even more against it if we are to be put in a strait-jacket that will determine our external affairs policy for years to come.

I think this is a fundamental point that the house should not overlook. At least with the old structure of the defence forces as we know them, we had freedom to move about in our defence policy as we wished. Many witnesses who appeared before the defence committee pointed out that it was perfectly possible and logical, and this had always been the case, for the government to decide external affairs policy and then, by selecting certain parts of our traditional armed forces, to make up any special units required to undertake any special tasks to which our external affairs policy committed us.

What is happening now is that we are going to make up a special type of force that will perhaps be most beneficial to one type of defence policy. What is more, we are destroying our traditional concept of the forces. We are destroying our three forces and substituting therefor a new and untried concept of one armed force, which it is hoped will be most useful in a new role in external affairs. The reversal of this process will be very, very difficult. We are not embarking on something that can be treated lightly. It is not an experiment, as are some of the experiments in integration, that can be reversed overnight if we find it is not working. If we allow this bill to pass and the government then proceeds to change its external affairs policy so that their new concept of an armed force makes sense, and we are to try that foreign affairs policy for two or three years and then change our minds and decide that we should find some other role or roles more in keeping with our status as a nation, more in keeping with our size or the feeling of the nation as to what we should be doing in world affairs, we will find ourselves in a strait-jacket. You cannot turn around and create a navy overnight, after it has disappeared for two or three years. You will not be able to create an air force as fast as you can destroy it.

The idea of having just one force because of the whim of this minister, in view of the way this concept has been presented in the house and the political attitude taken by government supporters, which will leave us in a strait-jacket for many years to come when it comes to external affairs policy, is something that just makes me sweat. I think the reminder of the hon member for Carleton was most timely in his appeal to the Prime Minister. Every hon. member of the house should be reminded of this. It makes me very much afraid of what is happening in this house when I hear hon. members opposite say, "Let us get on with the job," and when I hear them approach this very serious problem of unification and its long-term effects on this country with the political arguments that they have used.

The Minister of National Defence has been telling us that integration-unification are one package, despite the overwhelming evidence that this is directly contrary to the truth. Hon. members on the other side of the house have used such political red herrings as to suggest that those who are against unification are against integration, are against modernization of our forces and are against progress.

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nugent: How any member of parliament who takes his duties seriously and acts, as I believe a member should in this house, with some sort of honesty in regard to his duties, can state as his view such trash, in what should be a responsible speech, is quite beyond me. The hon. member for Leeds and one or two others on that side of the chamber followed exactly that policy, despite the wealth of the evidence to the contrary given by almost every witness who appeared before the defence committee that integration and unification are not one, that in fact integration is not one complete step at all, that each integration experiment is separate unto itself. I do not know how they can take this position, even with the assurance of General Allard, the chief of staff, who is for unification. The assurance of General Allard to the committee was that any step or any experiment in unification that does not work can be reversed. After that kind of clear evidence of how distinct and separate is each one of these experiments in integration, we still get this kind of nonsense from the minister and his blind followers on the other side of the house, namely that it is the integration-unification package that we are talking about today, and don't criticize unification or you are against progress.

If the mentality of hon. members opposite is of that standard, and if that is all they have learned after all the evidence that so many very able men gave to the defence committee, they should not be in this House of Commons, because either their intelligence is so weak or their integrity is so lacking that they are very badly misplaced here.

I hope I have time to deal with the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, because it was a dandy. I did want to comment on the speech made by the Minister of Transport, since he is a very old and experienced member of this house—perhaps I should have said, since he is a very experienced elder member of this house—and one would normally expect to take what he says rather seriously. This, in essence, is what I gathered from his remarks: First, that we did not have to follow the advice of the experts on military affairs; that since we are breaking new ground and it is a new experiment, anybody's opinion is as good as anyone else's. That sounds to me an incredible approach to take, one that I did not think would be taken by anyone old enough to have graduated from school, and certainly not one in keeping with a man who holds a responsible portfolio in government, as does the Minister of Transport.

But the Minister of Transport pressed on with that theme. To give hon. members an illustration of how peculiar the thinking can get when one starts by saying we must defend the program, rather than logically arguing its faults or merits I would quote the following exchange as recorded on page 14670 of Hansard for April 7:

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not questioning the system. All I am saying is, if you have a lot of evidence on one side and no evidence on the other that proves nothing. That is all I am saying. I am not saying whether this is a suitable or good rule.

I would say that any member who stands up in this house and says that, since all the evidence is on one side and none on the other this proves nothing, is bringing forward a most remarkable theory. I can understand why the minister was thwarted in his attempts to become a lawyer. Obviously no one whose logic is so lopsided as that would ever be admitted to the bar of any province in this country. I thought the entire purpose of the evidence was to prove a point. However, the Minister of Transport continues to say the following, and perhaps more light will be shed on his argument as he progresses:

Mr. Harkness: Is the minister maintaining that the evidence does not prove anything?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am maintaining that if the witnesses on the one side of the case are allowed to speak and the witnesses on the other side are inhibited by the rule from speaking all the evidence will be on one side. That is all I am saying.

Then I asked the minister a question, and the gist of his reply was that since no evidence was given on the order side we should discount the evidence given by the independent witnesses, such as Lieutenant Generals Fleury and Moncel, who were free to speak.

I want to review for a minute the situation in that committee. We asked for all the evidence from all the witnesses, all the senior officers who were now free to speak and who had been in the armed forces since the inception of the integration program. We wanted to hear them all, so that we could get a consensus of what went on. We were balked at every turn by members on the Liberal side. We asked for many more witnesses than we were able to get. To get any of them was like pulling teeth.

If there had been any officers who had reached the normal retirement age or who had retired early who were in favour of unification, I am sure there would have been no objection to hearing their evidence from anyone on the Conservative side of the house. We wanted to get all the evidence from all of those who were in a position to give us their expert advice, who had knowledge of the situation and knowledge of the facts, and who were now free to speak. What the Minister of Transport said is that since the only ones who were free to speak were against unification we must ignore their evidence because, according to his reasoning their evidence does not mean anything. I suppose he accepted my argument that those who are still in the forces must simply follow the government's policy, and we are unable to get their private and personal opinion. He sums it up by saying that only those in the department who are inhibited from speaking freely are in favour of unification, that the only ones who spoke against it are from outside the department, and that therefore we have called only witnesses on one side of the argument.

As I attempted to suggest to him in my question, surely if there are people who are free to speak and who believe in unification they would have come. Would the Liberals not have called them before the committee if there were any such people? Surely they must have had some officers in the positions of Lieutenant Generals Fleury and Moncel and Air Marshal Annis who would have come forward and backed up the minister in his ridiculous stand on this question. Is it wrong for this house to conclude that because the only witnesses who were free to speak all spoke against unification there is nobody free to speak who is in favour of unification? This is the logical deduction which I would make from the failure of the proponents of unification to produce one free agent to speak on their behalf. When I say "one free agent" I must qualify it by saying that a couple of witnesses who appeared before the committee were in favour of unification, but most of them were out of touch with the services. General Foulkes spoke on both sides; and there was another independent witness, long removed from the services. But I think I am accurate in saying there was unanimous evidence before the committee given by those who were in the most responsible positions when the integration program was started, who were most intimately connected with what was going on in the forces and who were free to speak, that unification is wrong.

If some of them did not go quite so far as to say it was wrong, they certainly said it was wrong to proceed with it at this time. The most support the minister received was when some of them said that when the experiments with integration are completed, the results tried and tested, it might be found that unification would be a good thing and we might then introduce it. However, those are the kindest remark that the minister got from people who are in a position to know. Bearing that in mind, how can the assertion be made by so many hon. members on the other side that we should get on with the job, since integration and unification are one package? What nonsense.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who was chairman of that committee, amazed me with his speech today. He said that all this bill does is to change the name of the forces. He certainly made a monkey out of those on the other side of the house who say it is necessary to pass the unification bill so that we can carry on the great work of integration, complete the modernization of our forces, streamline them and finish up the job started. As a matter of fact I thought this was the minister's theme song, this was his argument. The minister has been saying that it is all one package and that unification is necessary to complete the whole process. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra understands as well as I do that the minister's remark is a lot of hot air, because it is not all one process.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra told us that the bill on unification is not necessary. It is apparent that he has listened carefully to the evidence of the witnesses before the committee. I am afraid his financial arguments are a little confused because every witness who came before the committee said that any saving which can result either from integration or unification will be the result of the integration process alone. They have all told us that unification will not save us money. Perhaps that is what the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra meant when he said that this bill is not necessary. He went on to say there would be no savings as a result of this bill. Certainly he demonstrated a degree of honesty which we wish the minister showed. It hurts me very much to hear the only member on the Liberal side being so honest about the financial aspect and so confused about the other aspects of unification, which makes his evidence on our behalf not very helpful.

This may be a little embarrassing to the minister, but that is the way that the chairman of that committee sees it after all those sittings. He said first that the bill is not necessary, second that unification will not save us money, and third that this bill does not affect the composition of the forces. This is a most remarkable statement; in fact I find it incredible. Here we have a bill, the sole purpose of which is to destroy the identity of the three separate forces as they now exist and substitute therefore the minister's brainchild of one force. In fact the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra is making light of this great achievement of the minister. He says that the bill does not affect the composition of the forces, and yet the Minister of National Defence says that this is a brilliant new concept, that Canada is now the leader of the world in this field and that other nations are just too slow and cowardly, but that soon they will follow us when we have this new force.

In spite of all this the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra says the bill has nothing to do with the composition of the forces. I am sure he must have taken a very active, personal dislike to General Allard, the chief of staff, because the only reason that has been put forward by the minister or anyone on his behalf was a remark made by General Allard. He said that he was sure once this bill had been passed and there was no more uncertainty, the forces would settle down and morale would have a chance to improve. This, Mr. Chairman, is the only reason for speed, the only justification given by General Allard, the minister or anyone else as to why this bill should be pressed with what we have always considered to be such unseemly haste. This was the reason we could not call more witnesses. The Liberals may have missed their chance. They may have been able to find an ex-service officer with knowledge and freedom to speak who may have upheld the minister's idea.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra says that this bill has nothing to do with morale. Then he says the real effect of it is to give the forces a new and honourable name. Surely, Mr. Chairman, this is highly insulting to those forces that have built up Canada's reputation abroad. This is highly insulting to those serving officers and men who, through two world wars, made it possible for any serviceman wearing a Canadian uniform to walk with pride, no matter in what company he may be. The Royal Canadian Army, the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force have always had a tremendous reputation. However, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra is going to give them a new and honourable name. I wonder, is there any limit to how much abuse the soldiers, sailors and airmen have to take from these members who will go to any lengths in their assertion that, because what they are doing is new, then obviously it must be right. Anyone who gets in the way is an old fuddy-duddy who has done nothing to deserve any consideration, and who is trying to block progress.

I think perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I have dealt sufficiently with the background and the manner in which some of this evidence has been handled by people who should know better. I do not care what party a member represented on that committee or what party he represents in the house, his duty is to weigh carefully the evidence in as objective a manner as possible. His mind should be made up only after a careful and fair consideration of the evidence. The evidence of no witness should be rejected out of hand because it happens to conflict with a preconceived opinion. Due weight and consideration should be given to the person giving evidence, his experience, the position he occupies, his access to information and his ability and willingness to speak freely and frankly to the committee. I reject any suggestion that any of the witnesses who came before our committee were not trying to give us the truth in so far as they were able.

I have pointed out, and I believe the Minister of Transport has indicated he agrees with me, that serving officers are inhibited in giving their evidence, that they can only give evidence that is in line with the policy they are bound to carry out. This evidence, therefore, cannot be given the same weight as the evidence of independent officers. However, this is not a reflection on their honesty. I believe it is a reflection, perhaps, on this house, as I pointed out some time ago. Certainly, if we are going to call witnesses before a committee, they should be able to give free and honest opinions. I disagreed with the minister when he said that he had the right to indicate what he wanted them to say. Certainly I believe this is a matter which should be looked into by the house.

Be that as it may, the evidence before the committee has been overwhelming, from those who were free to speak, to the effect that unification should not come now. Another group of witnesses said they would not go so far as to say unification would never work, but it certainly would not work now. It certainly needs more study. I hope, Mr. Chairman, to have other opportunities to speak because I firmly believe that many of these officers, after long years of service to the country and with the technical competence they have, should have their opinions put on the record of this house. The next time I speak I hope to be able to quote from their evidence and give a few good examples of their excellent opinions.

Mr. Clancy: I should like to ask my colleague about the other ranks, since he referred to officers who were inhibited from speaking.

Mr. Nugent: The only people who were called before the committee to give evidence on behalf of the department were officers. I was talking about the evidence before the committee rather than opinions in the country generally because we know the people in the service are inhibited from speaking, whether they are officers or other ranks.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, a week ago I opened for the opposition, the discussion on Bill No. C-243 and, since that time, we have heard many members from all sides of the house. In fact, looking over the list of speakers, I see that 16 government members, about 20 members of the official opposition, five of the New Democratic Party and three independent members have participated in the discussion and their speeches were fairly extensive; following this, the Social Credit party and the Ralliement Créditiste both participated.

In view of the fact that we have also had interventions on a completely separate subject related to defence, the external affairs of the country, it seems to me that we are considering not only the technical aspect of the amendment to the National Defence Act but also the entire program of external affairs of the country.

That is why I found rather strange the words of my hon. friend the member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) when he closed his remarks Friday afternoon by saying:

> Therefore, we say, now that everything has been said, let us act, let us vote and the electorate will judge whether this government is right or wrong.

Mr. Chairman, I find this an over-simplification of the problem. True, a blind or a deaf man may, if you will, be forced to vote, and if the electorate has to decide whether the government is right or wrong. I believe that by that time it is a little too late. If we destroy our armed forces by this reorganization, it will then be too late to say: The government has done that.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that ten to 15 years will be required to correct—

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert: Surely.

Mr. Mongrain: Has the hon. member the impression that his flow of words and speeches will change the opinion of any member? Has he not rather the impression that all have made their decision and that we are continuing to speak without settling anything?

Mr. Lambert: It may be that, in this context, I was ahead of the views of the hon. member for, in my first contribution to the debate a week ago, I said that the government had asked or demanded that the house state its views on second reading, and the yea or nay of an hon. member, whether on the government side or in opposition, would not have changed his opinion, as a result of all the testimony we have heard in committee; therefore, the government has proceeded under a false principle, and so there is nothing new there.

But what I would like to say to the hon. member for instance, is that here the evidence given before the committee can be reviewed, so that the public in general will understand the principles involved. Public opinion has changed to a great extent in the last week and even in the last few days.

In fact, what we have heard in our ridings is enough to make us realize that people understand the difference between integration and unification. I do not know if the hon. member has underlined that difference, because he left room for doubt in his speech Friday afternoon.

What does the word integration mean? And the word unification? For the information of the hon. member, I feel that the debate—in which the government members took part as much as the opposition members—showed the people what was what. There was a certain amount of reporting, but it is also true that some reporters or newspapermen have become fed up; they cannot make up new headlines, so they get fed up, because they want news, something new. We might organize a dance to create a diversion or change somewhat the present atmosphere.

But, on the other hand, are we not trying to decide a matter of major importance, a fundamental matter, something which we will be unable to get rid of tomorrow? That is tragic for those of us who oppose not only the principle of unification but unification now or later, or unification itself.

I do not accept the principle of unification and I am as sincere in this view as any of those who accept it. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières emphasized many times everybody's good faith and, therefore, blameworthy motives should not be imputed to anybody. On the other hand, I will say this, to him and to all hon. members: the truth always persists and a repetition of good arguments does not weaken them. In certain circumstances, arguments must be repeated, sometimes in one way, sometimes in another way. Therefore, I say that we have not lost our time.

We have heard almost all members of the defence committee. Certainly, a few others will take part in this debate; at least I hope so. I am sure we will hear in a few moments the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Groos), who was chairman of the committee for several weeks. As a former career officer, he should have some observations to make.

Now, I should like to go back to another matter raised by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). I deeply regret that he is not in his seat tonight. He took issue with my colleagues from Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) and Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), as well as myself, charging that we were racists because we objected to certain statements made by General Allard.

Well, I can say he is the one who introduced racialism, as some journalists did, too, who claimed that we were criticizing General Allard because he was a French Canadian, because he spoke French. But why General Allard and not General Moncel, or General Fleury? They too are French Canadians. And also, some criticism has been overlooked—

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not want to be unkind to the hon. member, on the contrary; but I should like to ask him to state very clearly that he is not putting the member for Trois-Rivières in the same bag with the member for Lapointe. I do not want to be associated with his remarks, especially with regard to racialism.

Mr. Lambert: No, I thought I had indicated clearly that I was through referring to the remarks the hon. member for Trois-Rivières made last week about General Allard.

As for me, whether the chief of the armed forces is named Smith, Boychuk or Allard, I could not care less. But I maintain that he had no right to speak as he did. After all, our argument was based on a reliable report published in the newspaper La Presse in which he was reported as having condemned the motives of certain members opposed to Bill No. C-243. I shall not repeat his remarks, but I do not think the chief of the armed forces was justified in imputing motives to members of the house. I shall not add anything more, but he had no right to say that.

On a technical matter, it is only natural to disagree, because after all, it is impossible to always reach unanimous agreement.

I feel that even though he disagrees with his former colleagues on that point, they can also be believed. As for him, I am not imputing any motive but, on the other hand, he should not impute any to us either.

[English]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I found the intervention by the Minister of Transport the other evening to be rather strange, and this point has been referred to by my colleague from Edmonton-Strathcona and others. It is not so much that he wanted to discuss whether unification was good or bad; he was directing his remarks to something that I think is quite fundamental to a discussion of this bill, and the procedures of this house in arriving at his conclusions on this bill. He was raising a doubt as to whether retired officers should come before a committee to testify on military matters.

The minister said that these officers did not put any evidence before us but that what they said was only a matter of opinion. Gracious me, Mr. Chairman, even before the committee on transport and communications the greater part of the evidence given on the bill that the minister had before the committee was a matter of opinion. If I may say so, there is a great deal of difference between the type of witnesses one would call to speak on a bill such as Bill No. C-243, which deals with military matters, and witnesses who would give evidence on a bill dealing with transport. After all, Mr. Chairman, military men are not out on civvy street; they are specialists and are found only in the armed services. That is where they get their knowledge.

Admittedly some civilians, if one distinguishes them from military persons, are also experts on military theory. I would have hoped that some civilians might have come forward to testify for or against this measure, to give the committee the benefit of their opinions.

It has been suggested that the former officers brought forward to testify were sympathetic to the opposition. I know I put forward the names of several officers on behalf of the official opposition, at the suggestion of my colleagues, but I do not think anyone knew what at least 90 per cent of their testimony would be.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member is not being serious?

Mr. Lambert: That is a fact.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member ought to talk to some of his colleagues. I have had conversations in private with some of them.

Mr. Lambert: I will not mention names. We did not know what 90 per cent of the testimony was to be. I can say this to the minister, that it was not known what the testimony of the former chief of the defence staff would be. The majority of men who have testified have kept their silence and their counsel. I could have dredged up men by the legion who would damn the minister in no uncertain terms. He should have listened to some telephone calls I received in Edmonton during Easter week from service and ex-service personnel. They spoke about unification. I will not repeat what they said about the minister, but they were not complimentary about the legislation he proposes.

Be that as it may, the members of the defence committee needed expert advice about the workings of integration and unification. One cannot say that in the main the retired officers who came before the committee had been retired for many years, or that the minister had discussed or failed to discuss this measure with them. Most of these men had had recent experience, and their testimony must be weighed carefully and must be given grave consideration by all hon. members of the house and by the public.

I know some feel that when a man reaches the rank of major general, rear admiral or air vice marshal that he starts wearing too much gold braid, which gives off some sort of radiation affecting his brain, and that he begins suffering from senility. This is a grave misconception. I suppose, similarly, that editorial writers think this way about publishers. They imagine that "the old man has gone soft in the top story". When it comes to running a newspaper I think that editorial writers, news reporters or cartoonists will agree that the publisher very likely is some streets ahead of the men who criticize him. Of course there are exceptions.

I say to this house that it will be a poor day when we cannot get men to come before a committee to express their views. I will agree that senior serving officials in the department should confine their testimony to facts. As will be seen from the testimony of a number of witnesses, when they were asked questions about confidential matters, about confidential advice they had given to the minister or others, they quite properly claimed privilege. No one insisted that they breach it. It will be to the advantage of the house to adhere to this facet of procedure. Before the Indian affairs and northern development committee the former commissioner of the Northwest Territories had some blunt things to say. When a man of mature judgment and experience who has had a great deal to do with implementing a policy comes forward should we not, as laymen, listen to him? How is one to determine policy? Is one to take only the minister's advice? This is the last thing we ought to do; otherwise we all become rubberstamps for ministerial suggestions.

It will be a happier day when legislative proposals are turned over to committees before second reading, to be accepted or rejected in principle at that stage. The present measure is a classic example of why our system is not working. The Minister of Finance has said that legislation emanating from the Carter report on taxation will be placed before a committee, as a proposal, before acceptance on second reading. That I think is a step in the right direction. That procedure was followed with the transportation legislation last year, also in the Northwest Territories bill. These are halting steps in the evolution of parliament.

An hon. Member: By way of policy?

Mr. Lambert: I say this is part of the evolutionary process. What I have suggested ought to be done is in fact done in many legislatures of western Europe. As I say, I think this bill shows, in a classic way, where our procedure has been wrong. This afternoon, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra made a ploy, if one may term it that, saying that we should get on with this bill: "It is so easy, let us get on with it." What is the hurry? I am reminded of a cartoon drawn by Chambers where, standing against the wall, with their hands tied behind their backs, and facing the execution squad are a soldier, a sailor and an airman. In charge of the execution squad are caricatures of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence. To them is attributed the caption, "We have decided to go on with the execution, but we will postpone the funeral." This is precisely what the government intends to do with the bill. They say, "Pass this bill and we shall defer its implementation.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Vice Admiral Hennessy has said that morale in the navy is high. General Allard in his evidence before the committee said morale would get worse if this bill were not passed. Would morale indeed get worse if this bill is not passed? Remember there is not one member on this side of the house who talks about fighting morale when he talks about morale. As Admiral Landymore said in his testimony in June of last years: Ask me about the morale of men in maritime command; there are two kinds; if you talk about fighting morale there is not one who is not prepared to do his duty and even beyond it; but when it comes to a different kind of morale, job future, certainty, living conditions and all those things, morale is backward. It is in this second sense that we have discussed morale. Never once has there been a question as to the fighting qualities of our forces. Fighting capacity, yes, but that is something which is related to numbers and training, or the excessive bleed-out of men getting out ahead of time, and a weakness in recruiting brought on by the uncertainty of some of the steps taken toward integration, the "golden bowler" program, for instance, and some of the other things which weakened the direction of the forces.

Now we are faced with this other business of unification. Some may ask: Why repeat these things? As I said to the hon. member for Trois Rivières, a good argument never loses force by repetition.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the hon. member say the same of a bad argument?

Mr. Lambert: A poor argument never had any substance to start with.

Mr. Hellyer: Well—

Mr. Lambert: The minister is a great one for generalizations. This whole question of integration and unification could have been put forward in a better way. There would have been less uncertainty in the forces; there would have been a greater understanding by the public and by this house if the minister had given us much more information, if he had been fair with hon. members instead of treating us as ignoramuses, as we were treated on a number of occasions. We are not ignoramuses. I do not know what the minister used to think when he was in opposition. Was he then an expert?

The dilemma in which this house finds itself is still unresolved. It is one which has been adverted to by my hon. friend from Edmonton-Strathcona, by the hon. member for Greenwood, by the hon. member for Vancouver East and others. It was introduced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he intervened in the debate. It is something to which I myself have adverted during earlier debates with regard to Bill C-243, namely that the objectives of our defence policy have been modified or are to be modified, because the way in which reorganization of our forces is now taking place would make those forces incompatible with the full discharge of the present commitments and objectives of our defence policy.

Defence policy cannot be determined by the nature of our armed forces. That is putting the cart before the horse. Yet, as was pointed out by a number of the witnesses before the committee, we are committing ourselves in this bill to organize our forces in such a way as to lose our ability to fulfil our obligations as we have undertaken them.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs told us clearly the other afternoon that no change in policy had taken place and that none was contemplated for the time being, though perhaps in the future the situation could alter. If that is the case, a much larger question mark has been placed over this bill. This bill is not necessary in order that integration of command may be brought about. There is a great deal of work still to be done. The whole of materiel command has to be organized and brought into operation. The machinery has to go on stream, and it is a long way from that at present. The same applies to training command. There are a number of ancillary and related problems which so far have not even been discovered.

The minister strikes me as an architect, or an engineer who hires a contractor to put up a building of revolutionary design. He puts in the foundations, builds the walls and the roof, closes in the windows, and then says: We had better test the foundations. This is where he has gone wrong.

This bill is completely and utterly unnecessary. In fact, the bringing forward of this idea at the minister's insistence has meant the loss of his most senior advisers and many more whose services we can ill afford to lose. Why? They are all out of step and he is the only one who is in step. As a result of this unresolved question between foreign policy and defence policy I wish to reiterate an argument which has been made earlier today—that the Prime Minister himself must now come into the picture. It is his responsibility as the senior minister to enter this debate and lay out clearly the relationship between the foreign policy of this government and its defence policy in the light of what it proposes to do. Until this is done the basic question behind this proposal will be left unresolved.

Mr. Fulton: I think it is not without significance that the discussion on this important and far reaching measure is taking place at a time which coincides with the 50th anniversary of the battle of Vimy Ridge, an anniversary which we have officially marked in Canada by sending a contingent of veterans overseas to take part in ceremonies on the site of that battle.

I am ill-equipped to pay adequate tribute to the heroism of those who fought in that battle or in the other battles of that war, or of the second world war, the Korean war, or any of the battles in which Canadian forces have taken part. Suffice it to say, however, that this is an area, the area of military accomplishment and of honour on the field of battle, in which Canada has established no mean tradition. Canadians have a very fine tradition of accomplishment militarily on land, on the sea and in the air and I would suggest therefore to the minister, and to hon. members opposite, especially to the Minister of Transport in the light of the speech he made on Friday last, that it would behoove them to take a second look at any measure which, as this measure does, strikes so directly at the heart and the content and the feeling of Canadians with respect to their military traditions, their service traditions, and the traditions of the splendid units which have served Canada so well in the past.

I am not one of those, and I think there are few of them in this chamber, who are opposed to change where change is demonstrated to be beneficial and where it is clearly proven that the change will produce a better result than the situation which now prevails. But I am indeed opposed to change for the sake of change especially where, as on the evidence we have before us so far, we have the opinions, not of reactionaries but of military moderates, of the people who have had training, who have brought their minds and their thoughts, and their desire to serve the best interests of Canada, to bear upon this problem. They have declared themselves overwhelmingly against the proposition that this bill will do any good, and overwhelmingly in favour of the proposition that the bill, on the contrary, will do great damage to the military effectiveness of Canada's Armed Forces.

What have we in effect by way of background for the consideration we are giving this measure tonight? We have here one minister, the Minister of National Defence, against over 30 senior advisers who, because of their disagreement with the policy, have either been compulsorily retired or have taken early retirement. These are not brass hats in the old and opprobrious sense of the word. They are not Colonel Blimps. They are men in whom Canada has a substantial investment in training and in experience, men from whom Canada should be getting the maximum return now in terms of advice and service and in the shaping of the armed forces in line with the accepted policy, and that is the policy of integration and not the policy of unification.

Well, where are they now? Gone, all gone; and the minister remains in the face of the weight of evidence, adamant, stubborn, determined like a Hitler to give no extra ground in spite of the advice of his senior advisers—nor an inch. It does not matter if it means sacrificing the best interests of the armed forces of this country—not an inch will he give, because he personally is committed; and his personal position to him means more than what any council of moderation would advise, such as some gesture, some adjustment in view of the overwhelming evidence that has been given before the standing committee on national defence.

The minister now blames the press. "Oh," he says, "the effects of this bill have been misrepresented. The controversy has been misreported and distorted in the press." It is not just the senior military advisers; it is the press of the country, never the minister, never his stubbornness, but always somebody else who is wrong. "Yes," he says, "they distorted the meaning of the statements." But then in his discussion in Toronto recently before a group of young Liberals, having attacked the press he went on to attack Admiral Landymore. Having attacked the press because it reported the facts, then he attacked Admiral Landymore; and after that he said, "I hope the press won't report what I have just said." What a childish attitude. And, Mr. Chairman, he was on television. The minister, with all his avowed modernity, forgets there is a modern means of communication which, unfortunately from his point of view, brings home to the public the absurdity of his position.

That is the background against which we are discussing this measure. But while I think it is important to bear these facts in mind and to assess the importance or the significance of the minister's stubborn position, these are not the most important arguments or reasons that we should bring to bear in forming our judgment of the measure. No, the arguments in principle, the laws of principle remain, and they of course outweigh even the considerations of the evidence to which I have been referring.

I repeat, sir, that on the basis of the evidence, on the basis of the facts, there has been no sufficient justification made out to support the far-reaching and the dangerous proposals that are embodied in this bill. There has been no sufficient justification for the headlong plunge into unification, with all the turmoil, and all the upset, and all the loss of efficiency, and all the loss to the services of the senior advisers that it has involved and will involve in the future.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Search as you will, I defy hon. members opposite, or the minister, to show us where is the justification for this measure. Does it lie in the realm of economy? Are we going to save money by this proposed measure? Certainly not. According to the evidence of the distinguished officer who for seven years was chief military adviser of past governments and of this government, there is to be no economy.

If one looked for an illustration of the absurdity of the argument in favour of economy the demonstration of it is complete and total. One could find it in the recent words of the minister himself. He said there was going to be economies but when taxed with the question of what it meant to have one common uniform, did he say it would result in savings? No, he said that when servicemen were doing their ordinary daily work they will retain their working uniforms, and when attending any traditional ceremonies, in messes or elsewhere, they will retain their traditional uniforms. He said that only when walking out will they have a common uniform. What kind of absurdity is that?

So a common uniform means one extra uniform, and what pride can any one man, or any one unit have in the fact that when he or they walk out, instead of wearing a traditional uniform they have to wear a common uniform? What kind of saving is that? What improvement will it bring to their morale; or is it just extra expenditure on an extra uniform which will add nothing in terms of economy or efficiency?

What about efficiency itself? Is the single rank structure going to add to the efficiency of the fighting prowess of the men in the units and of the service themselves? Can it be denied that if we are to have effective defence forces for an effective defence of Canada—and in spite of the minister's intransigency that is still the primary responsibility of any government, to ensure the national security of the country—we have to have forces capable of military effort against attack, capable of striking a blow on the sea against any seaborne invasion or follow-up, capable of military effort on land to contain, and to repel, and to defeat any land forces that may attack us?

I see that the minister has just received another message from on high. I mention this in passing, Mr. Chairman.

To continue, we have to have forces capable of effort in the air, capable of beating down an airborne assault on Canada and of attacking troops on land. We have to have forces capable of military effort in the three spheres. If it is necessary to have forces capable of a military effort in three spheres, what possible increase in effectiveness would there be in having them in one uniform instead of three, or in having a single rank structure instead of three. This has not been demonstrated and of course cannot be. What about the national interest; what about Canada's responsibility for maintaining and protecting the integrity of Canada. I suggest the evidence clearly establishes that if this course of unification is proceeded with it will mean that now, and in the foreseeable and definite future, when it comes to the matter of the defence of Canada, once again we will be dependent upon the United States and will not be able to play even our proportionate part in the defence of the North American continent.

While no one for a moment would suggest that Canada, by itself, can defend its part of the North American continent, nevertheless it is our responsibility to play our full part in the alliances and defence arrangements. This certainly means we must be prepared to integrate closely our forces in these alliances with the forces of those with whom we are allied in respect of the defence of the North American continent. This means the close co-operation of our forces with those of the United States, and we are fortunate that that country is there. How on earth does the minister suggest that this unified force of which he is speaking will be capable of bringing about a more effective Canadian effort, in respect of the type of Canadian responsibilities we have in this sense, than would three integrated forces each capable of its own distinct but co-ordinated effort in the three areas in which the defence forces must function, namely on the sea, on land, and in the air?

What about the more effective discharge of our defence commitments? Is it here that the bill can be justified? As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton West and other hon. members, we do not even know what our commitments are. The NORAD arrangement is under review at the present time. Is the minister in a position to tell us what will be the result of that review?

If the minister knows, will he tell us what factors govern the decision we are being asked to make here concerning the kind of forces we should have. The NATO commitment is under review at the present time, but we have had no statement either from the Minister of National Defence or from the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the direction these negotiations are taking. We have had no statement concerning an alteration in any of our commitments, any new commitments, or the affirmation of an old commitment which might come out of these reviews.

As a result of this bill, if it passes, we will be giving our forces a narrow capability. They will be capable of only one exercise, the exercise which the minister appears to hold in priority to all others.

Mr. Hellyer: Where did you get that false impression?

Mr. Fulton: From the minister's own words. From the only things the minister has said it is evident that he places at the top of the priority a peace keeping force.

Mr. Hellyer: You have not read my speech.

Mr. Fulton: The minister's speech is capable of a number of interpretations; but the minister's whole attitude is capable of one interpretation and that is that in his view Canada's prime contribution in the defence field is that of an integrated force capable of being transported anywhere in the world for a brushfire operation. Therefore in that sense our commitments and our capabilities must be tailored to the kind of forces we have. Yet, when we have the situation where our commitments are in fact being reviewed, when NORAD and NATO are under review, what should happen is that we should keep our plans flexible so that our forces are tailored to our commitments, instead of our commitments having to be tailored to the kind of defence force this bill inevitably will force upon us.

There is another and I think more important objection than those to which I have referred. Not only do we fail to find any justification for the measure on the grounds I have mentioned, such as economy, efficiency, national interest, and the discharge of our defence commitments, but the primary objection to the whole headlong precipitous course which the minister asks us to follow is jeopardizing the one sound, sensible policy, and that is the policy of integration.

I cannot understand why the minister, who professes to be a progressive and far-sighted man, would run the risk of jeopardizing the policy of integration. This is more than any of us, military advisors or anyone else who has given much thought to this matter based on experience, can possibly understand. In support of my contention that the bill jeopardizes the policy of integration, I should like to refer to the evidence of Air Marshal Miller as given in the committee on national defence. Air Marshal Miller emphasized that he and all the senior military advisors were committed to and were working hard to implement the policy of integration. He also emphasized that the policy was far from complete, and that the program was far from being implemented. He said there were many unresolved problems of a type which required solution in order to lay a sound basis for the development of integrated forces and an integrated and effective effort. He said that this was being, and would be, jeopardized by rushing into unification.

I should like to refer members of the committee to a portion of the air marshal's evidence in this connection as reported in the Gazette of Saturday, April 8. In discussing the theory of integration he said:

> There have been various approaches to working and developing an organization that will control the three services. We have had examples of it in the two world wars, and we have examples of it in many of today's activities. So that, I think, anybody who has been in the military, thinks, and has studied the problem of what we have come to call here in the Canadian scene, in the context here, integration. By that I mean the operating of the three services under a single—what I would call—management. A single defence staff, a single planning organization, and a single budgeting arrangement.

This, of course, is the outline of an effective and co-ordinated defence effort. In the course of his evidence, Air Chief Marshal Miller was asked this question:

• (9:40 p.m.)

> But was there consultation between the military and civilians, or were you under instructions as chief of staff to bring up plans for unification?

To that question he replied:

> To the best of my knowledge and recollection, I have never had any instruction to bring up a unified plan.

I pause there to point out that Air Chief Marshal Miller was chief of defence staff until as recently as July of last year, and he says he had never had any instructions to bring up a unified plan. He had received no instruction to bring up a plan for unification up to July of last year. This bill was introduced last fall, and we are told now, to paraphrase the minister's words and his stand, that the whole welfare and efficiency of the defence effort of the country depends on getting this bill through. It has been too long delayed, we are told. Yet no instructions were given for the preparation of the first plan for a so-called program of unification as late as July of last year when Air Chief Marshal Miller resigned.

Air Chief Marshal Miller gave another answer that I think is of special significance. He was asked whether he would comment on the bill and its dedication to the principle of unification, and said:

> Specifically on the bill, I am not familiar with it because I have not had an opportunity to really look at it.

He went on:

> On the principle of integration, my own feelings about it are that it might very well be the end result. I do not think it is timely now.

I do not want to substitute my opinion for that of Air Chief Marshal Miller but I think that passage should read, "On the principle of unification, my own feelings about it are that it might very well be the end result." Then he said:

> I do not think it is timely now. I have felt that the problem of integration and getting the organization, if you like, was the area where the biggest return in manpower savings and in effective control of military lay, and it was important to get that right before we had ventured into the area of unification.

In those passages and others from the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller it becomes quite evident that what concerned the chief military advisers of the government was that they were all committed to the program of integration but felt that that program, and indeed the welfare and effectiveness of Canada's defence forces were jeopardized by the rush into unification. What they were saying was, "Let us get on with and complete the program of integration." Incidentally, that policy and program started long before the present minister was even in the house. It was started shortly after the end of world war II. It was started by the very men whom the minister has been attempting to brand as brass hats and reactionaries. It was started by the military moderates who thought and planned and succeeded in bringing forward plans, modifications and reforms that were in the interests of the country, and it was furthered by a number of ministers before this minister ever came into the house.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. member, where in the evidence it was suggested that they had brought forward the integration plan?

Mr. Fulton: That who had brought forward the integration plan?

Mr. Hellyer: Whomever you are talking about.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister say that this is one of his brainchildren? Is the minister now trying to claim parentage for the plan of integration? Does he say that his predecessors Brooke Claxton, George Pearkes and my seatmate in the house had no ideas of integration? Does the minister pretend that he brought in the concept of a chief of combined staffs and a chief of staffs committee, which were innovations of this concept and the first step in the policy of integration, with a definite idea of integration? These things were done long before this minister became minister of national defence. Those were the steps taken and the plan of these military moderates, over 30 of them, who have resigned or been forced to take retirement because of their disagreement with unification. These were the things to which they were dedicated. They resigned because they felt these plans were being jeopardized by the minister's unthinking, unjustified, unsubstantiated and headlong rush into unification.

This is exactly what Air Chief Marshal Miller said. These were not men who resigned in a blaze of publicity, although one or two of them did because they were forced into public controversy with the minister. Does the minister suggest that Vice Admiral Dyer is not a thoughtful and progressive military moderate? Does the minister suggest that General Fleury is not a thoughtful and progressive military moderate? Does the minister suggest that General Moncel is not a thoughtful, intelligent, brilliant military thinker and planner, and a moderate? All these people, and others, resigned because they felt the sensible, intelligent, progressive, sound plans to which they were dedicated were being jeopardized by the brainchild of the minister and one or two of his inexpert advisers. That is the fact.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Would the minister put his nod on the record?

Mr. Fulton: I suggest that it is incumbent upon this committee, having assessed the situation, having heard the weight of the evidence, bearing in mind the advice that has been received by the government, and now by the house and the country, from these experts in the field, not to jeopardize the sensible reform of Canada's armed forces and Canada's defence effort. This is a reform which would have the result of a co-ordinated staff, co-ordinated planning, integrated supply services and integrated efforts on the part of three fighting services of top efficiency. Those integrated plans should not be jeopardized. Rather, we should say it is not necessary to proceed with this measure now. This is the overwhelming advice we have received. We should say: Let us complete and consolidate the measure of integration. Let us build the integrated forces. Let us build in Canada the most skilful and effective integrated defence forces in the history of any country. But let us not jeopardize all this by succumbing to the dictates of one minister, which have already resulted in the largest purge in the peacetime history of any western country of skilled, seasoned, thoughtful and intelligent military advisers.

Let us get on with the job of building the integrated forces. Let us get on with the job of building the kind of forces which, when it is necessary—and let us pray God it never will be—to call upon them, will repeat, with the same morale, the same splendid tradition, feats such as those to which we have just paid tribute, the feats of Vimy Ridge. Let us get on with the job of building these integrated forces. If we do that with half the skill with which we built the separate forces, and if we can build the kind of Canadian defence forces which will attract Canadians into service and in which they will serve with the same zeal as did the veterans at Vimy, Ortona and at Korea, preserving the traditions and morale of the fighting services, giving them the best backing in integrated command, planning and supply of the best weapons, we can be proud of the job we are doing.

Parliament will have performed a really tremendous service to the country by insisting that this bill be brought to a halt and demanding that the minister and his staff get on with the job of integration, in order that Canada's role in the field of defence may remain sufficiently flexible, so that when our commitments are determined we will have forces of the kind that can be designed to discharge those commitments with the same splendid tradition of heroism, valour and effectiveness as has always characterized Canada's armed forces in her past glorious history.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Chairman, there are a few comments which I should like to add to this debate. First, there is an evident desire to proceed to a clause by clause study of the bill, and some demonstrations of impatience that the opposition is taking time to explain its position and bring out the points which it feels should be made for the benefit of Canadians generally, to help them to reach an understanding of what is involved in this so-called unification program. The opposition has a job to do, and its job is to make the objections to this proposed legislation perfectly clear to the Canadian public. Because this is a matter of great importance, the clarification to the public of the matters involved is so important that the necessary time should be taken, and I hope that the impatience of which we saw signs will be less evident in the future than it has in the past.

The rules of parliament are made so that the opposition can bring forward objection to any legislation which is offered by the government, and the time is provided under the rules for this to be done. If the government is not satisfied with the way this has been done, it has a remedy which it can apply.

One reporter wrote that this debate has gone on for 119 days, since the introduction of the white paper in 1964. I am not prepared to vouch for the correctness of that statement, but we do know that the debate has gone on for a long time, and rightly so. Surely the length of the debate and the efforts of the opposition to make good its points against this legislation should be a warning to the government to listen to the opposition and to modify its legislation. What the opposition is asking for, and all it is asking for, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Kamloops, is that this rush to do away with the three branches of our armed forces, the army, the navy and the air force, and to unite them into one single force should be stopped at this stage, until the integration which has been taking place up to date can be thoroughly tried out, and improved upon where necessary. Following this, if it becomes evident that unification, or the abolition of our army, navy and air force and their union into one organization with a single command, a common uniform and a common rank structure, should be carried out, this should not be done until the present state of integration has been thoroughly proven.

The people of Canada have been very uncertain as to what is involved. In listening to the debate over the years the government itself seems to have been very uncertain as to what is involved. It was not until quite recently that the ultimate objective of doing away with the army, the navy and the air force and uniting them into one body was made clear and that the objections to the whole program became very pronounced. I suggest that the management of this legislation has been mishandled. Uncertainty has been allowed to persist and the government has failed to make its position clear.

[Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West).]

I should like to refer the committee to an editorial which appeared in The Legionary, the official organ of the Royal Canadian Legion, for the month of November, 1966. The Legion, through its president, wrote a letter to the Prime Minister. I believe that part of it should be put on the record at this time. It reads as follows:

> We have been deeply concerned at some of the public statements which have been made lately, both by those opposing and those proposing complete unification of the Canadian forces. In spite of our best efforts to understand the situation we are compelled to say that, because of the lack of authoritative, clear-cut information and explanation we find ourselves unable at this moment to form a sound judgment on the whole question.
> The Royal Canadian Legion is not interested in the partisan politics which appear to be developing in connection with this question. We are, however, deeply concerned about the question of the state and condition of our defence forces at any given time. It appears to us that sufficient thought and planning have not been given to the important questions of tradition, morale and esprit de corps or, if so, the members of Canada's forces and the public have certainly been kept in ignorance.

The point I am trying to make here is that there has been continuous uncertainty, even on the part of the best informed people in this country, concerning the question of the unification of our armed forces. For that reason the government should listen to the opposition and should be prepared to stop the integration process in its present state and to give it a thorough try before proceeding further. That is all that the opposition is asking.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it ten o'clock?

The Chairman: It being ten o'clock shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will carry on with this fascinating debate. Should it conclude during the course of the day, we will take the business that I announced the other night.

• (10:00 p.m.)

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL—CASTLEGAR, B.C.—REQUEST FOR PRESENTATION OF AIR FORCE PERFORMANCE

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it will not take me very long to lay my complaint before the minister. The riding which I represent has always been very interested in navy, army and air cadets. The young people of the district in the various schools throughout the years have taken a great interest in the cadet corps. I am pleased to say, and the minister may not know this, that the Castlegar air cadets won the prize this year for the whole of Canada. I certainly congratulate the commanding officer, the parents and the children. The navy cadets of Kootenay West won first prize for the cadets in British Columbia. I hope the minister is taking in all of this.

There has always been a great interest in flying in our district. We have an unusually large number of men and women who have their private licence to fly planes. Even the little village some miles from where I live, with a total population of only 1,000, has a small airfield. I believe there are about ten young people in that district who have their private licence for flying planes. There has been a great deal of interest in the district in recent years in respect of the R.C.A.F. Golden Centennials. The people have discussed this group and are anxious to see a full show at Castlegar. I have had letters from practically every municipality in the riding of Kootenay West urging that the Department of National Defence, if it is possible, provide a full air show at Castlegar when this squadron is visiting the interior of British Columbia.

It is for that reason I asked the following question as reported on page 14422 of Hansard for April 3:

> I dislike very much intruding twice during one question period—

This is quite correct, Mr. Speaker.

> —but this is a matter of urgency.

It is from the point of view of the people I have the honour to represent.

> In view of the request by the municipalities in Kootenay West, representing the wishes of the people, that the R.C.A.F. Golden Centennials put on a full show while in Castlegar on July 14, and in view of the fact that the Castlegar squadron of the Royal Canadian Air Cadets, Kootenay West, has been chosen as the top squadron in Canada, will favourable consideration be given to the request of the municipalities and the 25,000 spectators expected to attend—

I should like the minister to let me know what can be done about this so that I can reply to the municipalities as soon as possible. I apologize for keeping him late this evening after a very tiring day.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows, I think, from correspondence that I did offer to look at this question. Regrettably, the itinerary of the Golden Centenaires has been made up and is already so full that the crews are being worked to the maximum of their endurance. It has been suggested by the staff that any additional performances would be more than could rightfully be expected from them and might produce fatigue which would jeopardize the safety of the unit. It has, therefore, been recommended to me, and I have had to concur with the judgment of the staff, that additional performances should not be authorized.

The unit will be flying through Castlegar en route on two occasions, I believe, and there will be opportunity while there to talk to the crews. The air cadets can see what the airplanes look like and have discussions with the crews of the acrobatic team. I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend a more positive reply, or that in this case we cannot oblige him and authorize the extra performances that have been requested. I really feel, under the circumstances, it would be doing an injustice to the very fine crews who form the Golden Centenaire team. I really do not think I would be justified in this case in overruling the judgment of the staff.

Mr. Herridge: Could I ask a question. Would the minister let us know the dates that these men will be there?

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—REQUEST FOR NIGHT TRAIN BETWEEN MONTREAL AND QUEBEC

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, for the fourth or fifth time I beg the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) to give us his assistance so that a night train may run between Montreal and Quebec city, at least for the duration of Expo.

I want to explain right away that I do not blame the minister who until now has been extremely kind in offering his help, but to try to get as much assistance as possible to urge the Canadian Pacific authorities to run such a night train. Until now, the only answer we got was in the negative.

Mr. Speaker, here is the whole matter in a nutshell.

Between Montreal and Quebec city, and especially in my immediate area, there are 350,000 people who are poorly served by the Canadian Pacific and who, at Expo time namely, will not be able to leave for Montreal in the morning and come back at night, which means that they will have just a few hours in the afternoon to enjoy Expo.

That night train was requested by the government of my province, through a unanimous motion. It has been requested by about 40 municipalities, by a great number of federal members, of my colleagues here; the project has also been supported by Expo's commissioner general and several special interest groups which have sent resolutions in due form.

In spite of all that, not only does the Canadian Pacific refuse to run the train in question but they even refuse to grant us an interview so that we may state our case.

Mr. Speaker, I charge the Canadian Pacific with gross negligence in its duty towards the people. I should like to remind the management of the Canadian Pacific that they became wealthy through the gifts and grants of the Canadian people, and that they have a moral obligation to the Canadian people to supply them with services that I call essential services. They have no right to treat such important and unanimous requests as this one with the haughtiness they have shown.

I charge the Canadian Pacific with refusing Expo assistance which would be of infinitely greater value than the building they put up, that of guaranteeing reasonable services for all those who wish to visit Expo.

Mr. Speaker, it is not only the people in my area who need this night train; there are thousands of passengers who will not be able to stay in Montreal during Expo and who will have to spend the night in municipalities 50 or 80 miles away from Montreal, when they would like to visit other municipalities after spending the day at Expo.

There are also people in my area who will not be able to reach Montreal by car because of inadequate roads and parking facilities.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

I charge the Canadian Pacific with having amassed wealth off public moneys and refusing today to recognize its obligations totoward the commonweal.

I charge the Canadian Pacific and, in particular, Messrs. Crump and Sinclair, respectively chairman of the board of directors and president of the company, with treating offhandedly those who are responsible for the commonweal, the members of the provincial legislature and the members of parliament, the members of our municipal councils and those who are responsible for the intermediary organizations.

I charge the Canadian Pacific with preparing systematically and diabolically the degradation of its system, of its passenger services, probably with a view to getting rid of it eventually and throwing it into the lap of the government.

If they tell us those services are not profitable, it is precisely because they neglected them so much for years that they turned their users away from them.

• (10:10 p.m.)

But because of this particular time, with Expo drawing near, the Canadian Pacific should co-operate with us more fully.

I charge the Canadian Pacific with making fun of the authorities by writing letters containing misleading arguments, withholding part of the truth and failing to reply to our specific requests in order to obtain an interview and state our case.

I ask the minister to give us more than the moral support he has been granting us generously up to now, because I shall tell what we intend to do from now on. As a matter of fact, this very week, we shall make arrangements to meet the Board of Transport Commissioners and ask them quite earnestly, while putting forward every possible argument to act as mediator in that dispute.

We will go further, Mr. Speaker. We are going to prepare documentation for an overall inquiry to be conducted into all the shortcomings of the Canadian Pacific passenger service, which are intended in a very systematic way, and I intend to use whatever means placed at my disposal by the parliamentary procedure to have an over-all inquiry carried out across the country. And if Messrs. Crump and Sinclair, respectively chairman of the board of directors and president of the company, keep ignoring our request to be received in delegation, the members of the provincial legislature, of the federal parliament and of municipal councils will go and stand on their doorsteps as long as they do not show up to hear us, and this precisely for the purpose of coming to a solution before it is too late, because Expo is opening on April 28.

I dealt with that matter four or five times and I will bring it up 20 more times, if need be. I urge the minister to support us as much as he possibly can. I thank him for what he has done for us so far, but I see that to get action from the high priests of the C.P.R., who feed on the wealth of Canada and do not realize that they have a moral obligation toward the people, all the tact of the Minister of Transport will be needed and probably also all the energy of a great number of hon. members who see that their constituents are deprived of a service and that they themselves are treated with arrogance and contempt.

[English]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in replying to the hon. member for Trois-Rivières I draw to his attention that this matter was brought to the minister's notice only last Friday afternoon. At that time the minister replied that he would bring the matter before the officials of the Canadian Pacific. The week end has intervened and it is perhaps early to have anticipated a detailed reply. The minister was not aware until an hour or two ago that the hon. member would again raise this question this evening. We regret again that there is not a confirmed reply for the hon. member, even were such obtainable from the Canadian Pacific, which is not directly under the jurisdiction of the minister.

The minister has asked me to assure the hon. member that his remarks this evening, made forcefully and directly, will be drawn to the attention of the officials of the Canadian Pacific. I have also the assurance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, sitting near me this evening, that he will add his good offices to the request to be made, since he is greatly concerned with the success of Expo.

DIVORCE—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE RELIEF IN CASES OF PROLONGED DESERTION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, this morning I received a letter from a young woman with five children who had been deserted for over five years, asking about the prospects for changes in the divorce law. I think my experience in receiving this letter is no different from the experience of most other hon. members in this chamber.

However, that is not why I raised this question earlier this afternoon. I thought about it for approximately a week because it seemed to me it would take some time for the joint committee to bring in its recommendations to this chamber and to the other place; and then, of course, the government would need time in which to study the recommendations. There are good and sufficient reasons in my opinion for establishing wilful desertion of three years or more as an immediate ground for divorce, and I should like to present these reasons to the Minister of Justice. Before I do so may I compliment him, as many other members have done and will do, on his appointment to that position. We have great faith in him and great hopes for the work he will carry out.

I shall set out some of the reasons for my thinking we should pass a divorce measure without waiting for a full bill, which in my opinion could not come before this house until much later this year, either in October or in November. First there is the burden on the courts. There are some 60,000 people in Canada who have been deserted by their spouses, and since our divorce rate is about 8,000 a year one can see that a considerable burden will be thrown on the courts by applications in connection with this class of case alone.

My second point is that courts have to establish rules with regard to cases of desertion. In many of these cases one of the parties has either bolted from the province or established himself, or herself, a long way from his or her home. This will mean the establishment of special rules which I do not think will need to be established in connection with most of the other classes of application now being considered by the divorce committee, with the possible exception of cases involving people suffering from incurable insanity. The courts need time in which to establish rules, and this alone would eat up several precious months.

In the third place, my mail would indicate that the class of deserted people is the largest single class—with the possible exception of cases involving cruelty—which will have to be considered under the new divorce law. To my mind, when a marriage has broken up for three years or more it is up to this parliament to provide some relief for those who are left behind with the children.

Finally there is this question of the children. The Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and others have indicated that in our new divorce law we must of course consider the needs of the children. This will probably be the most difficult part of drawing up the new divorce law and one which will give the joint committee the greatest concern. But the fact is that after desertion has occurred for three or more years it is probable that any legal remedies which exist will either have been attempted and have worked, or will have been attempted and have failed. So I do not think this particular aspect of divorce reform is a stumbling block in this class of case.

• (10:20 p.m.)

May I suggest to the minister that he admit limited judicial separation or divorce on that ground, judicial separation being favoured by the Catholic Council and by some of the Protestant faiths. I think we have to pay heed to religious thinking when we bring in our divorce reform. Second, may I suggest to him that this is best done by talking with the house leaders. If we are to have immediate reform in this one specific field it can only come if the members of this place exercise discipline, recognize a need, and say the measure will pass with very short debate. If that is not possible, Mr. Speaker, then that class will have to wait until the fall months come around. But if the minister, through the house leaders, is able to achieve an agreement on this class of case, which to my mind is the most worthy of immediate relief in the process of divorce reform, then perhaps we could have an interim measure presented and passed in a remarkably short time, even though we are in the dying hours of the session. In short, we could have a sort of special centennial project of which we can all be proud and then, later in the fall, take the more leisurely and long-term approach to some very difficult problems in the divorce field.

Hon. P.-E. Tudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) for his kind congratulations and assure him he has introduced a subject with which I will be very much concerned in the months to come. I want to assure him that this is a matter which I and my colleagues regard as being of major importance, one which will get very serious consideration when all the facts are before us.

I think the arguments brought forward by the hon. member are well thought out and reasoned, and I will say quite frankly that they do merit consideration. However, the problem he is really raising is whether this type of legislation is better attacked piecemeal or when introduced as a whole, and whether the spirit of reform and the spirit of the law can be better preserved in one way or in another.

As the hon. member knows, for some time a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons has had the whole question of divorce, including the grounds for relief and the adequacy or otherwise of existing legislation, under serious study. It is expected that this committee will be in a position to report in the not too distant future, and I submit that it might be unfair to the members of this committee, representing as it does both houses of parliament, to introduce any measure of an interim nature which might imply government approval or disapproval of any recommendation which the committee may feel disposed to make.

It is essential that in considering the reform of Canada's divorce law the government should, in the interests of all concerned, view the problem in the broadest possible perspective. The needs of those who are suffering real hardship must of course be taken into account, but it is doubtful whether piecemeal solutions should be envisaged at a time when there is a serious attempt being made to solve the problem as a whole. This is a complex and sensitive problem, and one which must be approached in a spirit of mature deliberation if legislation in keeping with present day realities is to be achieved.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 11, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MADAME VANIER

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT TO CANADIAN PRIVY COUNCIL

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house, because I think it will be of interest to the house, that Madame Vanier is leaving Ottawa tomorrow to establish permanent residence in Montreal. I know I am speaking for all members when I say that during her years at Rideau Hall she won a place in the hearts of Canadians that was equalled only by that which had been gained by her distinguished husband our beloved Governor General. The words I have used to try to express our admiration, affection and respect for the late Governor General apply equally, I am sure, to Madame Vanier. She was one half of a perfect partnership in service to Canada.

The house may also be interested to know that this evening at 6 p.m. Madame Vanier is to be sworn in as a member of the Privy Council of Canada. She will be the first woman, apart from ministers of the crown, to occupy that honourable place.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the announcement by the Prime Minister concerning the elevation of Madame Vanier to the Privy Council is something for which there will be general support. It is unusual, but it is entirely justified. Her grace, her charm, and above all the fact that she never lost sight of the people as a whole, or in other words her lack of stuffiness, gave to Rideau Hall a distinction by which the term of office of her late husband will always be remembered.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is significant that when members in all parts of this house and editorial writers across Canada were commenting on the passing of the late Governor General, almost without exception reference was made to the splendid contribution Madame Vanier had made during the years she and her husband had occupied Rideau Hall. I think therefore it is most fitting that this house should pause in its deliberations to pay tribute to a very charming lady who brought to her position not only friendliness and kindliness, but also an intellectual capacity that enabled her to play an important role in the public life of Canada.

The Prime Minister is to be congratulated for having paid tribute to Madame Vanier by appointing her to the Privy Council. I am sure this gesture will be approved by Canadians in every walk of life. We think this honour well deserved and well earned. We wish Madame Vanier a long life, and we hope the gratitude of the Canadian people will always be for her an endearing memory.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we wish to congratulate the Prime Minister for appointing Madame Georges Vanier to the Privy Council. This is welcome news. In addition to bringing to its meetings her usual charm which parliament and all Canadians have come to know, I am sure that Madame Vanier will make a worthy contribution to the Privy Council. I feel that the Canadian people as a whole will be happy to hear about that appointment which will give even more weight to the Privy Council of Canada.

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, we wish to associate ourselves with the words of appreciation to Madame Vanier for the splendid contribution she has made to Canada, and to join in the expression of best wishes as she leaves to establish residence in Montreal.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN FIFTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) wants to return to the item "Presenting Reports"?

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): If Your Honour please. I was somewhat tardy in rising in my place when the order was called, and I apologize to the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I have the honour to present the fifteenth report of the standing committee on transport and communications in English and in French, and with the consent of the house I intend to move concurrence in this report later this day.

[Later:]

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Speaker, if the house gives its consent I move:

That the fifteenth report of the standing committee on transport and communications presented this day be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

SIR DONALD SANGSTER

TRIBUTE ON DEATH OF PRIME MINISTER OF JAMAICA

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regret I have to call the attention of the house to the passing an hour or so ago in Montreal of the recently elected prime minister of Jamaica. Sir Donald Sangster had been ill for some weeks in Montreal, and in spite of all the efforts of a great Canadian medical institution they were unable to save the life of this fine and noble man. He had served his country over the years with great distinction and devotion. He was the servant not only of Jamaica but of the commonwealth. My own feeling of regret is increased by the knowledge that I have lost one who was a good, personal friend.

I am sure the house will join me in expressing sympathy to the relatives of Sir Donald Sangster and to the people of Jamaica in the loss of their distinguished prime minister.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

REPORTED SPEECH BY STATE SECRETARY RESPECTING METHOD OF OBTAINING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister whether the enunciation regarding Canadian citizenship made by the Secretary of State last evening in the city of Montreal represents government policy. She is reported to have said:

Citizenship, she said, should not be a status automatically accorded anyone born in Canada but should be obtainable only by a process of application, swearing in and the issuing of a citizenship certificate.

I ask the Prime Minister whether such a retrograde step is in the contemplation of the government.

[Mr. Macaluso.]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to discuss this matter with the Secretary of State to find out if in fact she used the words attributed to her in that report.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT RESPECTING ABORTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister and draw to his attention a report concerning a Canadian hospital showing that a number of abortions have been performed to protect the physical and mental health of the mothers involved. Considering there is reason to believe that such actions are contrary to the Criminal Code, I ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government, as announced previously, to bring in legislation fairly soon clarifying the Criminal Code in this respect.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already said to the house that consideration is being given to the introduction at as early a date as possible of legislation dealing with matters of this kind, including that matter referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering that matters of this kind are becoming acute problems which may lead to legal difficulties, can the Prime Minister not give us any assurance that such legislation will very likely be introduced before July 1?

Mr. Pearson: In view of what is happening in the House of Commons at present with regard to progress of legislation on the order paper, I cannot give that assurance, but I should like to think that it can be done before July 1.

Mr. Knowles: It could be introduced.

EXPO '67

PROVISION FOR ATTENDANCE OF PEOPLE ON LOW INCOMES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Is he seeking a formula to enable the destitute to visit the 1967 World Fair?

[English]

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think I had better speak to the hon. member about this question; I am not quite sure what he has in mind.

BANKRUPTCY

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Registrar General. Can the minister tell the house when he will introduce the proposed amendments to the Bankruptcy Act dealing with fraudulent bankruptcies?

Hon. John N. Turner (Registrar General): Mr. Speaker, I have asked the three man committee charged with the study of the revision of that act to accelerate that study. I hope to have a report from them some time toward the end of the year. It is a very complicated subject. In the meantime we shall continue to improve and strengthen the enforcement and administration of the Bankruptcy Act.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR DISCUSSION OF NEW DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture.

The minister is aware, I suppose, of the reaction of Canadian farmers who find the dairy policy for 1967 clearly inadequate.

As milk producers are faced with financial problems, could the minister inform us whether on March 21 when he met the representatives of the farmers of the province of Quebec, he should not have been accompanied by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp) instead of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand)?

Mr. Speaker: The question is out of order.

Mr. Godin: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR STUDY OF HANDLING AND TRANSPORTATION PROBLEMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister say whether consideration is being given to initiating a study of grain handling and transportation problems, with a view to improving the methods being used?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, transportation does not come within the ambit of my department. The question of handling comes in some instances under my department and in others under the Department of Trade and Commerce. The whole matter is continuously under review. Considerable improvements were made during the past year, particularly in the port of Vancouver, and the government will continue to take all possible steps to improve the situation.

MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION PROPOSED BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the other day I inquired of the Prime Minister whether he had replied to Mr. Justice Landreville's request for an opportunity to appear before the house. Second, I asked the Prime Minister whether the government intends to introduce a motion for the impeachment of Mr. Justice Landreville during the present session.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The procedure to be adopted in respect to this matter, including the request of Mr. Justice Landreville to be heard before the bar of the house, is still under consideration. As soon as a decision is reached as to the best procedure to be followed I will be glad to make an announcement to the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the rumour that Mr. Justice Landreville was discriminated against because he is a French Canadian, is the Prime Minister considering the possibility of giving him an opportunity, not only as a French Canadian but simply as a Canadian, to defend himself before the highest authority in the country, the federal parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is repeating substantially the same question as that put by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING DIFFICULTIES IN HIRING TRANSIENT LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the large number of complaints which I am sure all members of this house have been receiving from the farmers of Canada concerning the inconvenience, the added bookkeeping and the red tape that is necessary when hiring part time or transient help, has the minister conferred with his responsible colleagues in the cabinet to see what can be done to implement exemptions, thus making it easier for farmers to hire part time or transient help?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): This question is under active consideration. I take it the hon. member is referring in particular to the requirement for the registration of transient workers for unemployment insurance. We are taking up this matter with the commission, and if procedures can be evolved which will be less burdensome to the farmers, we hope they can be put into operation by the commission.

Mr. Hales: I have in mind the obligation imposed on farmers to secure, first of all, the social security numbers of those they hire, then to pay part of the Canada Pension Plan contributions and then the unemployment insurance—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ARDA—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT RESPECTING MANITOBA INTERLAKE REGION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. Has the agreement for the comprehensive program to be undertaken under ARDA and FRED in the interlake area of Manitoba been signed by the federal and Manitoba governments? If it has not already been signed, when will the signing of this agreement take place?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): It has not yet been signed, Mr. Speaker. I expect that some time in the month of May there will be a ceremony in the interlake area to mark the signature of this agreement by the two governments.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ACTION FOLLOWING REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON ELECTION EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. In October of 1966 a committee on election expenses made a report which contained a considerable number of suggestions for legislative changes. I think this matter was referred to the committee on privileges and elections, and the Prime Minister expressed his desire that legislation should be brought in before the next election.

My question is, would the Prime Minister discuss with the chairman of the committee on privileges and elections the urgency of having early hearings by the committee on this important subject?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to do this, Mr. Speaker. Of course we have lots of time before the next election to deal with it.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

TROIS-RIVIÈRES, QUE.—HOLIDAY ARRANGEMENTS TO PERMIT EXPO VISITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Postmaster General.

Has the minister received in the last few days requests from the Postal Workers' Union in the Trois-Rivières area asking him to authorize that their holiday schedule be drawn up in such a way as to allow them to visit Expo '67 more regularly? If so, has his department reached a decision to that effect?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, ten o'clock.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to rephrase the question I asked a while ago and explain to you why I think it is urgent. For administrative reasons and for the purposes of the union an answer will have to be given to those unions within a few hours.

Therefore, I direct again my question to the hon. Postmaster General. Did he receive any requests concerning holiday schedules, with a view to encouraging visits to Expo by postal workers' unions in my area and did his department reach a decision to this effect?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize the urgency of the question, but I do not believe it is of national interest and, therefore, I hesitate to allow the hon. member to ask it. It might be easier to permit the minister to answer.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I must say that following the representations forwarded to me by the hon. member for Trois-Rivières, discussions took place between the director of the Quebec district, the Trois-Rivières postmaster and the leaders of the union of postal employees in Trois-Rivières and they finally came to an agreement, whereby four or five times during the summer months, extended week ends will be granted to the employees so that they may all visit Expo.

WINTER WORKS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question which was put to me yesterday by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) with regard to our winter works program.

The hon. member asked if our department intended to extend the deadline for that program.

My answer, unfortunately, must be no. The purpose of that program is to fight recurrent unemployment during a certain period of the year and if we extended it for one reason or another, the very purpose of the program would be altered.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

Is it not the opinion of the hon. minister that forced unemployment is equivalent to real unemployment? And, under the circumstances, the area represented by the hon. member for Bonaventure is suffering from extraordinary unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is argumentative and not a proper question.

[English]

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, is the minister able to answer the question I asked him the other day?

Mr. Marchand: If you consider this question in order, Mr. Speaker, I am ready to answer it.

[Translation]

Mr. J. Russell Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the answer given by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, is the latter aware of the problems resulting from the hard winter experienced in the Gaspé peninsula this year? The people would be glad to perform such work until June 1.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, the winter has been hard not only in the Gaspé peninsula but in several other areas of the country as well.

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN DISPOSAL OF ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture in the absence of the Minister of Transport. Has the minister anything to report to the house about the disposition of the government elevator at Quebec city?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker. Any announcement in this regard will be made by the Minister of Transport, if one is to be made.

Mr. Hamilton: As a supplementary question, has the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development been informed of the wire from the Coopérative Fédéral de Québec asking that a decision be delayed until they have been consulted?

Mr. Greene: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RETRAINING OF WORKERS LAID OFF BECAUSE OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in addressing a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration I wish to congratulate him on his elevation in the seating arrangement of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: I am sure he will now be more readily accessible to give advice to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the statement he recently made in the house that there were not sufficient facilities for the purpose of training laid off workers in the city of Oshawa, has the minister been in touch with the provincial government of Ontario and has he worked out an agreement whereby additional facilities will be provided?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his congratulations. We keep in permanent touch with the Ontario department of labour, but I do not have readily available a report on our discussions. There is no question of signing a new agreement with the Ontario department of labour or education, but I can inquire and give a more complete answer some other day.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roger E. Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State, but in her absence I should like to direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister. Was the interview of a Cuban leader in Miami, Florida, on the national network last night, in which he warned people to keep away from Expo '67, the C.B.C.'s contribution to the success of Expo?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as asked is not acceptable.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Inasmuch as it now seems evident that each Canadian taxpayer will have to pay an additional $5 to take care of Expo, will he consider charging an additional 5 cents per head to be used to pay the salaries of seal hunters, thereby eliminating this cruel practice?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FISHERIES

REQUEST THAT MINISTER REPORT TO HOUSE COMMITTEE ON RUSSIAN TRIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. I should like to ask the minister whether he would agree to appear before the standing committee on fisheries to give a report on his recent visit to the Soviet union if a suitable order could be arranged for the committee to meet at an early date for that purpose.

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): This would be a decision for the consideration of the standing committee on fisheries after discussion probably with myself.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INCOME SUPPLEMENT—GRATUITY TO RETIRED N.S. COAL MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should like to ask the minister under what formula or process did the department arrive at the decision that retired Cape Breton miners were receiving pensions?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the method of dealing with pensions by private companies is a matter for those companies. We have not taken any particular action. The same policy is in effect now with regard to these pensions as that which has been in effect in respect of all the pension increases made up to the present time.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Apparently the minister misunderstood my first question. I asked him by what process or formula the department decided that the retired miners in Cape Breton were actually receiving pensions as such.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the department made any decision with regard to a determination that a particular class of income was considered as pension. If my hon. friend has any particular cases in mind I would be glad to investigate them to ensure that the retired miners in Cape Breton are properly and fairly treated under the act which has been passed by parliament.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Is it the intention of the crown corporation, which is being set up, to protect the $75 a month the miners originally received from the company—not by way of a pension but, as I told the minister when his legislation was going through, by way of a gratuity and nothing else. He has sent out instructions in respect of the gratuity.

Mr. MacEachen: I cannot anticipate what action will be taken by the crown corporation in this regard, but I do recall that I did address a communication to the president of the Dominion Coal Corporation requesting that consideration be given to this particular matter. I will review the correspondence again and advise my hon. friend about the situation.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL SUBSIDY ON EXCESS FLUID MILK PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would he consider changing the dairy policy to extend the federal subsidy to excess milk produced by the fluid milk producers?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all these questions were, of course, very carefully considered. With respect to the question of fluid milk producers who come under provincial quota it was deemed preferable, in order not to have mixed jurisdiction in this area, that jurisdiction over the manufacturing milk producers and the support of the manufacturing milk producers, which is clearly a federal responsibility in accord with the agreement reached with the provinces last year, be left with the federal department, and that jurisdiction over the fluid milk distributors, who are under provincial quota in all provinces or provincial authority, be left to the provinces on any question of product support.

Mr. Webb: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether he is aware, as I am sure he is, that many of us are receiving telegrams to the effect that if some drastic action is not taken soon there will be considerable unemployment in the fluid milk industry.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The supplementary question is argumentative.

BUTTER—CONSIDERATION OF RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

In order to promote the consumption of butter rather than margarine, will the minister consider the possibility of restoring the subsidy on the consumption of butter?

[English]

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not just sure what the hon. member has in mind. The policy was changed last year. Previously the subsidies were paid to the farmers by the creameries with the creameries being reimbursed. Since last year the subsidies have been paid to cream shippers or whole milk producers directly by the federal government. This policy has been retained this year on a higher base, having been increased from 85 cents to $1.21.

Mr. Ricard: I have a supplementary question. Perhaps I could also provide the minister with some information. There was a time when—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member could provide this information during a private conversation with the minister. He should not do so at this time.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will he indicate whether the highly lauded promise regarding a school milk program is about to be launched?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that this question can not be asked at this time.

INQUIRY AS TO BASIS FOR FLUID MILK SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister say whether the decision to discontinue the federal subsidy on surplus fluid milk was taken on a unilateral basis, or in conjunction with submissions of farm and dairy organizations and provincial governments?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in order.

POTATOES—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN SURPLUS DIVERSION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture regarding the serious situation still facing thousands of potato growers in eastern Canada. When will he be in a position to announce an improvement in the surplus diversion program which the legislatures of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have declared inadequate.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): The question of a program for the province of Prince Edward Island, with which I am sure the hon. member is concerned, is not concerning the adequacy of the federal legislation but rather is a question of the preparation of a provincial program to make use of the federal legislation. I am pleased to instruct the hon. member that we are in touch with government members and officials of the province of Prince Edward Island, and I think have achieved a program which meets with their approval.

INQUIRY AS TO HEADQUARTERS OF LIVESTOCK FEED BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, based on the announcement he made in this house yesterday. Is the minister in a position to inform the house whether the location of the headquarters of this Canadian livestock feed agency has been determined yet as between Ottawa and Montreal.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The headquarters will be in Montreal.

ASSISTANCE TO GOLD MINES

REQUEST FOR INCREASED SUBSIDIES TO PERMIT HIGHER WAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The minister said, not long ago, that if mine officials want to hire competent workers, they will have to increase the salaries paid to miners.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

Now, in order to achieve this goal, would the minister favour higher subsidies to the gold mines in order to enable them to pay higher salaries to their employees?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to send a copy of my speech to the hon. member for Villeneuve. He will note that I did not speak of "salaries", but merely of living conditions.

With regard to the assistance to gold mines, the act will no longer apply by the end of the present year, and I am sure parliament will have to decide whether it should be extended.

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Does the minister intend to suggest that the subsidies to gold mines be increased?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the policy will be announced in due course.

POWER

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON NATIONAL GRID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. When will the minister be in a position to inform the house concerning the present government policy with regard to a trans-Canada power grid?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Well, Mr. Speaker, this policy has not changed. The Canadian government is interested in the construction and extension of that power grid. The hon. member knows very well that construction of hydroelectric facilities essentially comes under provincial jurisdiction. We endeavour, however, to protect the national interest in these matters.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBLE INCREASES IN CEILING AND BENEFIT RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. On two or three occasions I have asked him when we might expect legislation which would amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to increase the rates of benefit under that act and also to raise the ceiling under which contributions are made. Can he say whether we are any closer to the introduction of this legislation than we were the last time I asked him?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, at the time this question was last asked I do not think reference was made to raising the ceiling. In this area, I would think that is something which would be done by order in council rather than by legislation. In respect of the other part of the question, good progress has been made in preparing the draft legislation to be laid before this house. The progress is encouraging. I stated in answer to the hon. member the last time or so that this question was put that I was doubtful whether it could be done during this particular session of the house, but that, if not, I hoped that it would be high on the priority list for the next session.

Mr. Knowles: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that this session has lasted longer than the minister anticipated, could this not now be brought before the house during this session?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The supplementary question is argumentative.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROTECTION OF NUTRITION STANDARDS FOLLOWING MILK PRICE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the price of milk is to go up by 2 cents per quart within a month, what plans has the Prime Minister or the government to protect the nutrition standards of individuals and families on low incomes?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In my opinion the question as asked should not be posed on orders of the day.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR INSTRUCTIONS ON OBTAINING TRADES TRAINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact a change will take place as of April 1 in respect of trades training, would the minister issue or have his officials issue a press release or a statement of some sort advising those, particularly in Nova Scotia, who desire trades training what steps they should take?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to publicize the new program so everyone will know those things to which they are entitled.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour in connection with housing. In view of the continuing and deepening housing crisis in Canada and the Prime Minister's reply to me last week to the effect that the government is considering new initiatives in an attempt to cope with this problem, has any decision been made and can the minister tell the house what the new initiatives will be?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my first impression in respect of the hon. member's question is that he is not very well informed. While admittedly there is a housing crisis, I wish to make it clear that it is not an increasing one. Marked progress —encouraging progress—has been made in the house building program of late, and I think it is reasonably safe for me to assure hon. members that this year we will have the largest spring housing start program in the history of Canada.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the houses which are being built under the National Housing Act are to a large degree totally beyond the competence of most Canadians to obtain—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he has to ask a question.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, we must be allowed some preface to our questions in order to—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, in view of the nature of the interruptions from across the way I will start again.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does not have to start again, even though there may have been interruptions. I am sure the minister heard the prefacing remarks as well as I did.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Your hearing is very good, Mr. Speaker. I felt that because of all the interruptions from across the way the minister might not have heard the question. In view of what I have said, does the government intend to adopt any housing initiatives in order to take care of the 70 per cent or 75 per cent of Canadians who cannot afford to purchase homes under the N.H.A.?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I could not possibly accept that premise and so cannot answer the question.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether his department's estimates show that the number of house completions this year will be fewer than last year?

Mr. Nicholson: No, starts should be up by 20,000 or more.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a similar supplementary question relating to the question I directed last week to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Will the department consider bringing forward legislation or an amendment to the V.L.A. in order to allow veterans in the country to build on a city or town lot rather than a half acre, as is now required?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been considered on a number of occasions, but no decision has been made to change the act.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a supplementary question. Since the minister's department has informed veterans across the country that a further change is contemplated, and in view of increasing pressures, does the minister consider that now is the time to make that change? I remind him that several changes have been made in the last few years.

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to answer a question which includes such an erroneous premise.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has just indicated that I made an erroneous statement. I intend to support that statement later by a letter from the minister's own department.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have already heard four or five supplementary questions. I suggest that we should go to another subject and return to this one in perhaps a few minutes.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the almost daily evidence that the recommendations of the Carter commission have created a climate of great doubt and uncertainty in the minds of those interested in the further development of our resource industry, can we expect a statement from the minister at an early date to give some reassurance to those engaged in this development?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have said on several occasions the government will make an extensive study of this report before it reaches any decision or makes any statements about its policies.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he can give the house and the country an indication of when we may expect the budget for 1967-1968.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have a date in mind but I do not know whether the progress in the house is such that it would be safe for me to make any prediction at all.

Mr. Fulton: I have a supplementary question. Is it the intention of the government to introduce the budget during this session, or during the next session of parliament?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I hope this session will end very soon. It is my expectation to introduce the budget at the next session.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MONTREAL—POSSIBLE INFRINGEMENT OF BILL OF RIGHTS BY MUNICIPAL BY-LAW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

In view of the fact that a number of prosecutions have been undertaken in the city of Montreal under a municipal by-law which apparently forbids the employees of an establishment from talking with customers, is the minister in a position to tell us whether the officers of his department are making an exhaustive study of the present legislation to determine whether there is an offence from the federal viewpoint under the Canadian Bill of Rights?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lotbinière knows that the Canadian Bill of Rights applies only in federal fields. The act itself provides that the officials of the Department of Justice must review the acts to make sure that they do not go against the Bill of Rights itself.

Mr. Choquette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General for whom candidates for the bench now have great respect. Is the minister thinking of calling a federal-provincial conference to encourage the provinces to elaborate their own Bill of Rights?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much that the central government can suggest to the provinces what kind of legislation they should have, but I am convinced that the hon. member's suggestion is so good that it will be heard in various provinces.

REPORTED INFILTRATION INTO CANADA OF INTERNATIONAL MAFIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, last week I directed to the Solicitor General a question dealing with a series of reports that members of the international gangster organization known as the mafia were infiltrating Canada. I think he indicated at that time that he was going to investigate the matter and make a further statement. Has he done so, and has he anything to report on this very serious matter?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I cannot quite recall answering in the vein suggested by the hon. member. I pointed out, in answer to a question put by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, that there was continuous liaison and co-operation between the law enforcement agencies in Canada and the United States where a watchful eye is being kept on this situation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HALIFAX—REQUEST OF DOCKYARD COUNCIL RESPECTING PAY RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether he is now in receipt of a rather lengthy telegram from local 273 of the Canadian Labour Congress, the men at H.M.C. Dockyard in Halifax. If so, can he indicate to the house what has been his reply to the telegram?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall have to check, Mr. Speaker. I believe I received that telegram yesterday, but I would like to check.

REPORTED NATO APPROVAL OF PROPOSED CHANGES IN CANADIAN FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When he indicated to the house last week during the defence debate that the restructuring of the Canadian armed forces met with the general approbation of the NATO military planning committee, was he speaking on the basis of documentation or was he expressing an impression that he had?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking a question about a matter which is now before a committee.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT BY MINISTER ON PEACE PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we do not like to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs ignored throughout the question period. Can he tell us what progress he is making in connection with his four point plan for peace in Viet Nam?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that my hon. friend read the evidence given before the external affairs committee this morning.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

STATEMENT ON STAMP COMMEMORATING VISIT BY THE QUEEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to amplify the answer I gave the right hon. Leader of the Opposition yesterday regarding the stamp which will be issued by my department on the occasion of the royal visit this summer. The Queen's head which will be reproduced on the stamp will not be surmounted by a crown.

[Later:]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I believe the right hon. Leader of the Opposition said just now that the crown would be abolished.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not say that at all.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): That is what we heard on this side. Yesterday, following the answer I gave the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, he slipped in a statement, as he sometimes does during the question period, that he thought we were abolishing the Queen.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the minister state his question of privilege?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is that this is not the first time the right hon. Leader of the Opposition has tried to imply that this party wishes to establish a republic.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt very much that that is a question of privilege. I do not think it is.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): It is not the first time that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the minister has a question of privilege.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the minister insisting that he has a question of privilege?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I would just like to explain, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to be unfair to the minister, but may I point out that he has already indicated what he has in mind. His suggestion is that comments made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition imply a position taken by the government. I really do not see how that can be construed as a question of privilege.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, when the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday "I thought you were abolishing the Queen", I thought he was addressing the statement to me—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I ask for the minister's co-operation in this regard. I think I am in a position to say, having heard the preface to the subject he wanted to raise as a question of privilege, that there is really no question of privilege but rather a point of debate which the minister might want to take up at a more appropriate time.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Monday, April 10, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole to consider Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof. When the committee rose last evening clause 2 was under consideration.

On clause 2—Canadian forces, Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last night I was making a plea that the government modify its position with regard to the pressure it is placing on the house for a fast passage of Bill C-243. I pointed out that there existed across this country serious uncertainty as to what was involved in this legislation. I also pointed out that those all across this country who oppose this legislation or parts of it and who wish it to be modified depend on the opposition to press home their arguments and make the points which they wish to be made before this committee.

Speaking of uncertainty, we have to go back to the issuance of the white paper on defence which outlined the government's intention with regard to the reorganization of our Canadian armed forces. I think it is right to assume that the government obtained the best advice they could at that time. They called in the military experts of this nation, questioned them and discussed the matter with them. On the basis of the information obtained they drew up the white paper. However, it has not been made clear even yet just what is intended to be the ultimate effect of the proposals published in that white paper.

Let us consider the two words, integration and unification. I am depending heavily for my argument on the testimony given before the standing committee of the house by Air Chief Marshal Miller. I know that Air Chief Marshal Miller's testimony has been freely quoted and I can well understand that. Of all the professional military witnesses called before the standing committee, the experience of Air Chief Marshal Miller probably qualified him as the best witness called.

For those who are not familiar with his career, if there are any here, Air Chief Marshal Miller served from 1931 to 1955 in the R.C.A.F. He was a professional soldier. I think it is agreed by everyone that he was a professional soldier of the highest type, one of whom all Canadians can be proud. He was one of many such who were called before the standing committee. From 1955 to 1960 Air Chief Marshal Miller served as deputy minister of the Department of National Defence. If there is any place where any man can acquire more valuable experience than in the post of deputy minister of the department, I cannot imagine it. From 1960 to 1964 Air Chief Marshal Miller served as chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, as long as that body existed. When the joint chiefs of staff were abolished and responsibility was turned over to a single chief of staff as part of the integration program, Air Chief Marshal Miller was given that responsible position. He served as chief of staff from 1964 until 1966 when he retired.

There was no evidence produced to indicate that relations between Air Chief Marshal Miller and the government or the minister were anything but most cordial and most cooperative. Air Chief Marshal Miller defined integration as a force having a single defence staff, a single planning staff and a single budget procedure.

The program of integration, in contrast to unification, is widely supported. I think we can say it has been unanimously accepted by all of the officers and specialists in the defence department. Air Chief Marshal Miller defined unification as a single force having a single rank structure, a single administrative chain of command, a common uniform and a force wherein the trades and ranks would be called by common names. Air Chief Marshal Miller stated, as recorded on page 2326 of the committee evidence, that when the program began unification and integration were interchangeably used. These words were accepted as having approximately the same meaning. It was only when the program got well along that a differentiation was made between the meaning of these two words.

As Air Chief Marshal Miller pointed out in his definition, integration called for a single defence staff, one commander and one chief of staff rather than the three members of the joint chiefs of staff including the chairman. Instead of having three chains of command as we formerly had, there was to be one chain of command, one single administrative chain. There was to be a single planning staff, that is, you would have a commander of planning and one staff serving the three branches of the armed forces. In addition, there would be a single budget procedure. The budget for all our Canadian armed forces would be handled through one organization, one budget planning board. Now, this is acceptable to practically everyone.

Later a proposal was made that unification should take place. Unification has boiled down to the abolition of the three branches of the service, the army, navy and air force, through reorganization into one force under one commander, having a common uniform and with the trades and ranks called by common names. It was at this point that very serious opposition arose across this country. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that instead of diminishing this opposition is increasing. I plead with the government and I plead with the minister to take note of this fact. There is no reason, at least no evidence has been submitted by the experts in the field, why the government cannot stop now, having accomplished a very substantial measure of integration quite apart from what is now called unification.

Let the government stop now and subject the present state of integration to a substantial trial period. It can be tried out for whatever time is required, six months or a year. Some of the experts suggested from three to five years, and some even longer than that. The present state of integration should be thoroughly proved, I suggest, before we go on with what is now known as unification.

As for the advantages and disadvantages of stopping now or proceeding further, again I should like to quote from Air Chief Marshal Miller's evidence because as I have already indicated I do not think there could be any more valuable evidence. From the standpoint of experience and qualifications the Air Chief Marshal was more adequately fitted to provide information than anybody else. The testimony he gave did not stand out by itself. The testimony he gave—he was one of the last witnesses to be called by the committee—substantiated evidence which had been repeated by witness after witness among that talented array of military specialists whom the committee invited to appear before them.

We do not need to stop on this side of the water for evidence in this regard, because in the Montreal Gazette for Saturday last, April 8, Admiral Mountbatten was drawn into the controversy. He did not want to be drawn into the controversy and there was no inclination on his part to interfere in Canadian political affairs, but he sent a clarifying statement from London after he had been advised by Richard H. Gaunt, a retired Canadian naval officer, that he was being represented in Canada as an all-out supporter of unification. Admiral Mountbatten made his position clear, and if we want the evidence of a disinterested specialist, surely his evidence would qualify as such.

As reported in this issue of the Montreal Gazette, Admiral Mountbatten stated:

"Few people still oppose the integration of arrangements for pay, food, clothing, furniture, equipment, etc., since this must be a more economical way of providing them," he said in his statement...

Admiral Mountbatten pointed out, however, that in the British reorganization, great care had been taken to preserve morale and service tradition.

One of the chief complaints of the opposition at this time is that the government has not paid sufficient attention to the wishes of the personnel in the armed forces. Then the article continues with this direct quotation from Admiral Mountbatten:

"It has been accepted that to achieve this"—

I assume he means integration.

—"the three services must retain their uniforms and ranks with an identifiable professional head of their service," he said. "The idea of a single uniform and rank structure was also rejected as undesirable and unnecessary".

The Montreal Gazette felt so strongly about the matter that this morning's issue carried an editorial on the question. Part of it reads as follows:

Lord Mountbatten, too, is an advocate of unified command and integration of services...

[Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West).]

But integration and unification are two quite different things. Both men—

There the article is referring to Admiral Mountbatten and Air Chief Marshal Miller.

—come down strongly against haste in creating a single service with a single uniform.

Lord Mountbatten confirmed there was some talk of unifying the services in Britain, but it was turned down as "undesirable, unnecessary and"—

I am sure the minister will not like the last word.

—"ludicrous."

"No compensating advantages could be seen in attempting to impose so unpopular a change," he said.

Air Marshal Miller, speaking on the advantages and disadvantages of unification, said:

"I said I did not see a monetary return for unification, nor do I see any significant military effectiveness. I said I saw some unanswered questions associated with unification that perhaps should be spelled out before you could really get out and sell it to people."

These are honest doubts, honestly expressed. And they are grounds for caution in adopting in Canada a policy that can bring no monetary return, and which might be unnecessary, if not ludicrous.

There is evidence, Mr. Chairman, to indicate that there may be disadvantages. As reported at page 2297 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence, Air Chief Marshal Miller was asked this question:

Do you, yourself, see any financial advantage accruing from the proposed scheme of unification?

Again, there they are talking about unification as opposed to integration. Air Chief Marshal Miller replied:

There are no significant financial advantages whatsoever as far as I can see.

He was then asked this question:

Do you see any military advantages flowing from it?

He replied:

Again, there are no significant military advantages.

So there are no financial advantages and there are no significant military advantages. If the best expert in the field makes statements of this kind, Mr. Chairman, surely the government should pay some attention to them.

Again he was asked:

Do you see any military disadvantages coming out of it?

Air Chief Marshal Miller replied:

The disruption is an unknown factor, and one which I have always rated rather highly.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I do not know whether the word "highly" is a good word here. It might be interpreted as meaning that perhaps there is something commendable about this possible disruption, though quite evidently Air Chief Marshal Miller did not mean anything of the sort. He indicated that the disruption which might result from unification is an unknown factor and one which he had always rated rather highly or of great importance. He went on to say:

> I did not want to have anything occur that would cause disruption in the services. I felt a lot of careful planning was necessary, and that probably time to educate people was required before the next step of unification was taken.

There we have the advice of the leading expert in the field, a man who has served long and faithfully in our armed forces, a man better qualified than anybody else to speak.

> I felt a lot of careful planning was necessary, and that probably time to educate people was required before the next step of unification was taken.

That theme was repeated a number of times by other witnesses. I will not repeat their evidence because there is not enough time. Parts of their evidence have been quoted freely and widely.

I suggest to the government and the minister that a case has not been made out to show why we should not stop this process of unification, if one can call it that, at the present stage of integration. It has not been shown that it would be unwise to stop the process. Air Chief Marshal Miller and many other witnesses said that we should thoroughly test the process of integration for a period of years before taking the drastic step of wiping out our three services and combining them, with one uniform and a common rank structure. There is evidence to show that the prospect of unification is upsetting the morale of the troops and is disturbing people from one end of the country to the other. I suggest to the government that if there is no sound reason for not stopping the integration process now and testing it thoroughly before going on, the government should stop it and allow us to get on with the other business of the country.

Mr. Groos: Mr. Chairman, I begin what I hope will be my brief remarks with a sincere thank you to my friends on both sides of the house who sent their good wishes while I was in hospital recently and who welcomed me back to the house so kindly. To be personal for a moment, my condition turned out to be a temporary one at this time. I found from speaking to other members that a great many of us in this chamber have had a similar experience. I do thank you all and I hope that other members, if or when their turn comes —and I hope and pray it will not—will have as happy an outcome as mine was.

While I was away some remarks made by the hon. member for Kamloops appeared in one form or another in the press. I again wish to express my thanks to my hon. friends on both sides of the house who in this instance took up the cudgels on my behalf. I do appreciate it but I would like to go on to say that, having read a few days ago in the Victoria Times a further interview with the hon. member for Kamloops, I wish to clear the air right away and say that I accept without any reservation whatsoever his explanation of what it was he had in mind in the first instance. Part of the basis for the hon. member's remarks was that I was worried about unification. "Concerned" might better have described my feelings for, of course, I am concerned about unification. Aren't we all? That is what we are here for today; this is our job at this moment.

Unification is a big thing for Canada. When parliament entrusted the defence committee with the study of the bill on unification and its implications, surely it then became our task to hear evidence, to work on the bill and if possible to make it a better bill. That is what committees are for and that is what we did. We all became concerned about the bill.

While I am on my feet and in a thanking mood, Mr. Chairman, I hope you will allow me to use this opportunity to thank the very patient members of the defence committee who laboured with me as their chairman for most of the past 12 months. In particular I want to thank the steering committee which included, of course, the hon. member for Edmonton West, the vice chairman of the committee, and the hon. member for Vancouver East who always had a fair contribution to make to our committee's deliberations.

Let me say a word or two before I go on about the witnesses who appeared before our committee. I, of course, heard all those who appeared before my sudden departure and I think I have read all that was said by those who appeared subsequently. I know you will agree, Mr. Chairman, that we are indeed a favoured land when our nation can command the services of such men. I am not pretending that I agreed with all that was said but, without exception, the witnesses had something valuable to contribute and they put forward their case with a sincerity that no one could doubt and with a dignity we can all envy.

I will not speak at length about the deliberations of the committee, the number of witnesses, the pages of evidence or even about the number of words as ascertained by some keen mathematical mind, which have been spoken on the subject. I will, however, describe to the house what I think are some far-reaching implications of this debate. Since last July and particularly in recent weeks thousands of words and endless repetition have been the order of the day on the precise definition of unification and what it means, and I think this has constituted a good part of the problem which we members and the public have faced. There is, of course, no such word as unification in the dictionary in a military sense, and I am sure in my own mind the Minister of National Defence will never again coin a new word to describe such a far-reaching and, if I may add my own view, such a far-seeing operation as that which is now before us in this bill. Since the word has no definitive military meaning we have been left to our own devices to interpret it in our own way.

My personal definition or view, which incidentally is the same today as when I started considering the matter many months ago, is that when we speak of unification we are talking about taking integration as far as it is practical to go. I understand my own definition, which is hardly surprising, but what is far more important, the people I talk to can also understand it and see more clearly what it is we are trying to do. From here on in my speech, then, I shall refer to what is before us as the integration-unification bill or process.

I think it is of the greatest importance when speaking on this matter to emphasize the following point, that the planning for integration-unification will be done by the men in the armed forces themselves. The minister has said so, and that, of course, is how it should be. It is the servicemen who will be affected by it so it is only right that they themselves should be the ones to draw the route to be travelled toward the general objective which will be given to them by parliament, I hope very shortly. Furthermore, regardless of what has been said here by both proponents and opponents of the plan, the very fact that the planning will be done by those who will both execute the plan and live with it is a guarantee, at least to me, that they will have a very large measure of control over the speed of execution of the plan. In addition, it is a guarantee to me that the plan in its final form will be a good one, coming as it will from men of such experience, ability and good sense as those who appeared as service witnesses before the committee.

The minister has not denied that in its final form the integration-unification plan may look a lot different from what it does now. He has told us he takes no immutable stand on the details, and there are few hard and fast details in the bill itself. One of the opponents of the bill, referring to the lack of planning, likened it to a man proceeding down a road in a dense fog, going from lamp post to lamp post. I have no argument with that. I find it a good simile. It all depends, of course, on whether you know where you are going and whether or not you start out on the right road. I believe we are on the right road and that we do know our objective, and I can imagine no better way of proceeding along this ill-defined thoroughfare than by taking easy steps from one recognizable point to the next. Is this not precisely what the service planners have been telling us they are doing, and in the bill before us is the government not asking for permission to continue this orderly planning progression toward the integration-unification objective?

In a task of this magnitude, particularly when it involves entering areas hitherto unexplored, areas where hidden dangers may well lurk, there will unquestionably be changes of route and method. But what of that? Does this mean that the task is one which should not be attempted at all simply because we do not know all the answers in advance? Must we Canadians really be, as Marshall McLuhan has described us—he is not an air marshal and, indeed, has nothing to do with anyone's armed forces—must we Canadians really be "mildewed with caution" as he said we are? I do not think so. We have been accused of destroying things which should be preserved. That is not our objective. We are not setting out to destroy anything.

Mr. Churchill: Only the army, the navy and the air force.

Mr. Groos: We are, however, trying to build something new and in the process of building some things, some good things, I admit, have to be changed. Take the uniform. Much has been said about it but, no matter what has been said, service uniforms are not being completely removed. To emphasize the permanency of the integration-unification arrangements and the interpendence of those who serve in the new organizations it is proposed, however, that on many occasions all officers and men should wear what is basically the same uniform. What is wrong with that? It makes sense to me. I could certainly live with that arrangement. It means a change, but that is how things go. We see this sort of thing happening in all fields of life, so an explanation or apology is scarcely needed from me. It is a fact of life, and we have to keep up with the pace of life if we are to survive.

I believe this bill before us, this imaginative bill is one good example that Canadians are not always, to quote McLuhan again, "looking into the rear-view mirror and defending the status quo, which is outmoded the moment it happens." If in the process of opposing the bill we carry our objections beyond the realm of fact into the lush, tempting fields of speculation and fancy, it could well be a disaster for us all. For example, were the armed forces of Canada to become demoralized by protracted debate and ridicule lightly heaped upon this new idea by this house, we would all suffer.

Those responsible for a debate of that sort would have to be ready to shoulder a heavy responsibility. Can they be as sure of themselves in their objections as they claim in this house to be? I doubt it very, very much. Hon. members and others need no reminder from me that in the armed forces of Canada we are dealing with a group of volunteers who traditionally and rightly shun the limelight, who do the peoples' bidding without question and who voluntarily forgo, because of their love of Queen, country and adventure, a great many of the democratic safeguards which we civilians prize and about which we so endlessly boast. There would be no such freedom if there were no such armed forces in the free world. In return these men ask very little, but what they demand is sensible direction and at least some understanding by public and parliament alike of what their problems are. I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying that this house is in the process of creating, if it has not already partly created, a problem of morale in the armed forces which requires active consideration by all of us as members of parliament.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Groos: I would prefer to deal with questions at the conclusion of my brief remarks. A goodly portion of the comment in the House of Commons, in the press and outside the house has somewhat naturally been concentrated on the negative aspects of integration-unification. It could hardly be otherwise. But there comes a time when such comments have side effects far greater than were ever perhaps intended. If you keep telling a person he is sick, sooner or later he starts believing it. If this were to happen in our armed services, we would all be in trouble and every member in this house would share the blame.

Various hon. members on the opposite side have painted a dismal picture of the morale situation today within the Canadian armed forces and in particular in the Royal Canadian Navy on the east coast. I can only say that this does not fit in with the impressions I get from across the country and the position as I see it from the point of view of the R.C.N. on the west coast. Of course, there always were two navies in the Royal Canadian Navy—the east coast navy and the west coast navy. And I am quite sure that if things on the east coast are as bad as they are being painted by the hon. member for Halifax, then subject to the Minister of National Defence making a few new arrangements with NATO, which should not be too hard to do, the west coast navy will cheerfully take over some of the Halifax or east coast obligations and show once again in a spirit of friendly competition, the spirit which so often exists in this house, that anything they can do in Halifax we can do better in Esquimalt. In fact I think there really is a need within the R.C.N. for a readjustment in the division of the strength of the navy between the east and the west coast of Canada. Surely present events across the ocean in China and in other countries bordering the Pacific rim are convincing evidence enough to warrant such a change, and I ask the minister to give it his serious consideration.

In recent years the east coast navy has not, to my knowledge, been up to full strength. For years and years it has had to borrow sometimes reluctant sailors from the west coast navy. This is no reflection on any admiral, least of all on Admiral O'Brien, now maritime commander in Halifax, who must know that for many years he has had my admiration and respect. He has, among other things, a tough problem with bad weather and lots of snow, which makes the west coast look pretty attractive to some sailors.

So much has been said about changes in uniform and so forth that I feel I must make some further comment and, if hon. members will permit me, I would like to say that within my own experience naval officers in particular over the years have been overly conservative in matters of changes of dress. For example, ask any old sailor what happened when in 1941, I think it was, we were issued with the Canadian Volunteer Service Medal with its little silver maple leaf to denote Canadian volunteers on overseas service. Many of us just did not wear it because it was different and other navies did not have one. This is true.

Ask old sailors about the time we were directed to wear "Canada" flashes on the shoulders of our uniforms to denote what country we were from. Once again there was great hostility to this, and for many months many officers just did not make the change.

What about the red maple leaf painted on the funnels of R.C.N. ships, an idea that spread like wildfire throughout Canadian ships abroad once someone thought of it? We were ordered to take it off, and on my ship —incidentally this was overseas so I do not know who was responsible for ordering it to be taken off—we went through a period of finding that it had been painted anonymously on the funnel by night and being obliged officially to paint it out by day. What a farcical situation that was. I remind hon. members that it was not until the war was over that this distinctive emblem was permitted to become official, and of course it has remained official until the present day and will not be changed under this bill.

Again, you should have heard the uproar in some quarters when, as a result of representation by the sailors, the navy's traditional tot of rum was allowed to be issued mixed with a cola drink instead of water. What a catastrophe that was going to be. Nelson wouldn't have liked it. As a matter of fact I think he would have liked it because he was a very progressive admiral.

I will not try to describe the feeling in some quarters when it was discovered that zippers were to be incorporated into the naval uniform, and would you believe that diagonal serge cloth for sailors' uniforms would cause any heartburn in anyone? Well, it did and many is the old sailor who will recall he was ordered to dispose of his "tiddley" uniform because he had had it made ashore of light weight comfortable diagonal woven serge. It wasn't quite regulation then but it is regulation now.

If hon. members are not too tired of these matters I can go on. We even put a zipper on the sailor's jumper. But here it turned out we were making progress. When we dared to put zippers on the sailors' jumpers the Royal Navy copied us, but it was not until they did so that suspicion of this innovation completely disappeared in some quarters of the R.C.N.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Groos: I would rather wait until I have finished.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I was under the impression the hon. member was a commodore. It appears he was a tailor.

Mr. Groos: For a moment I would like to talk about the rift which has undoubtedly and quite understandably been caused by the integration-unification process and all that it entails or, rightly or wrongly, appears to entail in the minds of its supporters and detractors. This, as we have seen, covers a whole heap of territory, as you, Mr. Chairman, might say in more grammatical terms. The rift extends beyond the service and well into civilian life. It is there and it bodes ill for the future of the armed forces if something is not done about it and done fairly quickly. I place the blame for a great deal of this on a quite unbelievable lack of understanding as to what it is we are trying to do. Even today I hear people, who should and in fact do know better, talking as if we were trying to turn over servicemen into all-purpose fighting paragons. Soldiers in kilts, climbing the rigging of ships—what utter nonsense! It is sad, but it is perhaps indicative of the lengths to which otherwise normal, rational people go when they are confronted with highly charged emotional matters in which they are very much personally involved. I do not blame them unduly.

Speaking personally, before we had the facts and were dealing with wild rumours I found some difficulty myself in being impartial and unbiased. But this is not the case today. Apart from pointing out that the vast majority of these rumours subsequently turned out to be quite false, I should also say that there was much about the old organization and the old way of doing things which we are now trying to change with which I also disagreed and disagreed even more strongly. On balance I think I can say that from the start I have been in favour of the idea behind integration and unification, and now that integration-unification is with us I want to see it work in the best possible way.

How can we overcome the rift about which I speak and how can we best go about it after this bill in its final form is passed, as I believe it shortly will be? It may be of interest to some hon. members to know that in other countries' armed services in modern times there have been other emotional cataclysms and even deeper-seated rifts than in our own, but the unbeatable combination of good will and intelligence has healed the wounds. I cannot believe that we lack in Canada, particularly among those who are affected and are interested in integration-unification, either intelligence or good will. So I think we are going to come out of this situation in good shape all right.

Since the service which seems to have been zeroed in on, if I may use that expression, is the navy, I would draw the attention of hon. members to a situation which developed in the Royal Navy of Great Britain not long before world war I when Great Britain's far-flung empire covered so much of the globe and the Royal Navy was quite realistically called "Britain's sure shield" and was very largely responsible not only for defending the empire against all comers and all combinations of comers but also for policing the farthest corners of the empire's interests.

The schism in this case developed over a difference of opinion between two senior admirals, Fisher and Beresford, both very popular and both men of ideas and integrity. Fisher was the more senior of the two and he became the first sea lord of the British Admiralty. He was a reformer, and I think it is fair to say that in the light of history it can be seen that the great majority of his reforms have stood the test of time and, had they not been put into effect, the British Royal Navy would not have been as well prepared as it was when in 1914 and again in 1939 it was called into action. Many of the innovations Lord Fisher introduced, and he produced quite a few, are still with us today. Fisher had his supporters. Beresford, on the other hand, had his.

I will not go into the details, although there are many books in the parliamentary library which cover this subject. Those who are fond of history and who seek literary diversion could do worse than spend an hour or two following the course of this dispute. I am sure they will be struck by the quite astounding similarity between the development of recent events in Canada and those engendered by the Fisher-Beresford dispute. Many of the points put forward by both sides were equally contrived. Many of their fears turned out to be just as groundless and many of their methods were quite as farcical as some we have witnessed. I will stop there in the interest of time.

I am interested in bringing to the attention of the committee the aftermath of the controversy in Britain, the rift and the damage to naval and military discipline because, believe it or not, the dispute was still being talked about in the British navy when I arrived on the scene some 25 or 30 years later. In my opinion we can make no better start to mend this rift of ours than by getting on with our job of dealing with the clause by clause study of the bill and voting on it. Let us remove the heavy, deadly pall of uncertainty which now hangs over the armed forces. Let the servicemen know for certain where they are going. At least let parliament set the objective and let the armed forces get on with their job of planning their own route and timetable in order to get there.

To the members of this house I have this to say: In a venture as imaginative and far reaching as this I am glad to have a part. I happen to be playing my part today in the House of Commons, but with this sort of challenge I feel so strongly about this bill and what it will do for Canada that I would return willingly tomorrow to the navy, if they would have me, at my old or any lesser rank —I am not fussy. You can see from the amount of weight I am losing that I am getting ready to fit into some of my old uniforms. I am not just saying this, I mean it, and I know there are others who feel the same way. I mention this only to point out that there are many ex-servicemen who are as anxious as I to see this all-Canadian venture succeed and who are anxious to give Canada another "first" in the military field and another mark of prestige in international circles.

All hon. members now have a hand in this important measure. In speaking to hon. members opposite I should like to say that this is a better and more practical bill today than it was when it went to the committee, not that there were any changes made in the committee while I was there but rather changes made later by the members and by my successor as chairman. There may possibly be other improvements still to be made. How can we tell unless we get into the clause by clause discussion?

The opposition undoubtedly has a duty to perform and as everyone knows I have never questioned that. But I am questioning it now. There is considerable, though as I have said perhaps unintentional, danger if we persist with this debate much longer. I think it can rightly be claimed that the opposition has played the game and has put up a fair fight with tangible and valuable results, but the time has come when we must get on with our task as parliamentarians and our job of making a decision. It may be difficult but we cannot delay it forever. The government has the responsibility and is prepared both to assume its responsibility and stand by the consequences. There are other consequences to be borne in throwing up a roadblock and stalemating this debate and for these the opposition has to judge its own responsibility.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) but I must advise him that the time allowed for his speech has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Deputy Chairman: There seems to be unanimous consent that the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. Groos: I thank hon. gentlemen. I promise I will not be more than a minute longer. I invite the official opposition and other members opposite to consider the details of this bill. From what I have seen and heard the present members of the armed forces are ready and, what is more, from what we have seen, ready and able to get on with the job when parliament gives its consent. Let us give them a chance and let us do it without further rancour or further delay. Once parliament has made its decision let us also again close ranks as we have traditionally closed ranks within the defence committee and give our servicemen our wholehearted and undivided support. They deserve it. I will have more to say, Mr. Chairman, when we are discussing the clauses in the bill later. I hope it will be soon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, we are glad to see the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) back in his place. He suggested he is ready to join the navy again and has regained the sylph-like form appropriate to the uniform he wore with distinction. May I say that if the rank of admiral is still available he may be sure that after his speech today the Minister of National Defence will place him in that category.

There is one statement he made with which I am rather in agreement. I wonder whether he really meant it when he said, "Remove the heavy, deadly pall which hangs over the armed forces". That is exactly the position in every part of Canada. He expressed the view parliament is taking too long in committee. I can only take the figures handed to me. Yesterday there was some change; but as of Friday the number of Liberal members who had participated once or twice—and I count each separately—was 15, the number of Progressive Conservatives 18, the number of N.D.P., four, and Social Credit, one. Yesterday the number of Conservatives increased.

In listening to speeches about parliament I find the argument strangely reminiscent of 1957 about which the present Minister of Justice—a message has been sent to him that I am going to make some references to him as the philosopher of Liberalism—referred to in an article. In 1963 he wrote an article which appeared in Cité Libre in which he said:

I remember the Liberals of 1957. They were cynics who felt they enjoyed a personal claim to power and they came within a hair's breadth of putting parliament in bondage. One would have thought that six years in opposition would have had on those Liberals an effect somewhat akin to purgatory. Unfortunately the events of the last few months prove that this is not so.

We are faced with the same idea. In spite of the "honeyed" words of one hon. gentleman, we know what the government has in mind. They brought in a flag by closure and they intend to pass this legislation by the same means. That is their objective. The speech made by the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) today had all the earmarks of having been inspired from above.

Mr. Groos: That is not so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The government is preparing once more to trample on the rights of parliament. The hon. gentleman said one other thing when he described this legislation. He said it was like blind men at night with lamp posts in the way but still travelling forward. No better analogy could be made in respect of this legislation.

I have read all of the evidence and all of the speeches and I summarize my views in a few lines. There is no basis for unification from the view point of effectiveness, economy, defence commitments to NATO and NORAD, or on any other ground. Parliament is trying to get the facts but today it is very apparent what is happening, even though the minister and the Prime Minister have hidden behind a veil of silence. Our armed forces are going to be reduced to a major contribution to an international police force and Canada's defence is going to be almost completely dependent on Washington. That is my summary of the situation. Parliament is here to clear up this matter.

The hon. gentleman did raise the curtain a little when he mentioned that something new was being brought in. Within the last few hours the executive assistant to the Minister of National Defence underlined the following to a number of journalists.

> The bill on unification of the armed forces raises a problem as to whether Canada will have a British mini-navy, a British mini-army and a British mini-air force.

He then goes on to say after other words that this point has never been discussed in the House of Commons. That is exactly what we have been saying. The purpose of this legislation is to bring about an extended separation from all those things that are part of our traditions.

Already 450 green uniforms have been ordered. Yesterday the minister explained the purpose of that order as being experimental. That is not what was indicated to the manufacturer. He was advised that these uniforms were to be ready so that when Expo opens we will be able to show de Gaulle and all the rest that we do not wear the kind of uniforms that were mistaken in 1956, as the Prime Minister once said, for British uniforms. This matter has not been discussed in the house, suggests the director of policy for the Department of National Defence. Why should the press receive from the lips of this gentleman a policy that has not yet been discussed in parliament? One hears parliament condemned. This has been going on for years. Let me read a quotation from the London Times.

> The standing of the House of Commons in the country, it is said, has never been so low. The commons is criticized for its futility, for having lost effective control of the executive, for being a closed club intent on its own rituals and out of touch with the mass of the nation, for the partisan behaviour of its members, for the rudeness to each other of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition.

That is the type of criticism mouthed in this country. The article then states that parliament has a place.

> In the first place, parliament still educates the nation.

It cannot educate the nation unless what is said here receives at least a modicum of coverage in the press and other media. Parliament is subject to condemnation to a great degree because of the failure to discharge their responsibility of those who should be disseminating what is taking place here. I have often heard all we need is a group of men who have never been in parliament and they will come up with the inspiration and forward-looking policies we need. The writer of this article states:

> A parliamentary statesman only emerges after long years of trial and winnowing in the "face to face" encounters of speech and action which constitute the essence of parliamentary life.

That is what we are doing. We are arguing a case but the government is hiding behind generalities. The Montreal Star, which seldom has anything good to say about the opposition or the Conservative party, carried this statement the other day:

> The government deserves the pounding it is getting on unification.

The article states that various ministers are arrogant and adamant. I do not have to identify them. The looks on their faces reveal their admission into that group. The article then states:

> We have become used to this from Mr. Hellyer, but now Mr. Martin has chosen to get in on the act.

I am sorry to have to add the next words:

> He did not help.

• (4:40 p.m.)

When will the guillotine fall? A number of members have spoken, including an independent member from Quebec whose independence is defined only by the description. The other day he said that nothing is to be gained from continuing the debate. The government knows that many hon. members to my left will line up in support. I listened to the defiant words of the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.), a moment ago when he said this government is prepared to stand or fall on this issue. The government never makes such statements unless it is sure to stand.

Defence is a tremendously serious matter in this nation. The increase in expenditure has mounted to an extent which few could have contemplated in the days of Beresford and Fisher to which he referred. When the hon.

member for Victoria (B.C.) mentioned the dispute between Lord Fisher, the fighting admiral, and Beresford, the philosopher of the navy, he did not add that both wanted to maintain and not destroy the British navy. Let me underline that.

Just before the second world war Canada's defence expenditures ranged between $17 million in 1935-36 and $34½ million in 1938-39. Today's expenditures run up to $1,658 million. This is something which adds materially to the weight of taxation in our nation.

Last July the minister as he went across the country issued regular statements regarding the danger in which he found himself. He said in Vancouver that it was terrible how the admirals were trying to get his head. That I am sure they would not have wanted at any time. The minister said when this legislation is in effect we are going to save millions and millions of dollars. The last year we were in office the amount expended on defence was $1,575 million. Today it is $1,658 million, and the estimates are up $115 million this year. I say to the minister, not in anger, that I thought better of him. His attitude before parliament indicates he has not been here long enough to know that one cannot deceive parliament, that it will not be accepted.

I am told that the Minister of National Defence was on the way to the leadership of the Liberal party. In the last few weeks his image, and it was a good image, has suffered as a result of his failure to tell parliament the facts. We have been used to this. One after the other the ministers of this government have told parliament matters that are not true. The description found in the dictionary of those who engage in this systematic practice is pseudologers. The minister withheld information. He did not give a true picture. He tampered with the evidence of a witness before it was given.

A moment ago the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) said: "We do not know where we are going but when we pass this legislation the men in the armed forces will certainly know what to do and they will go just as fast or as slow, apparently, as they wish." What will happen to them? What happened to Admiral Landymore who was condemned as a person guilty of treachery and disloyalty to his country? That went on for six long months. Then the minister, as a result of the intervention of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra who stated that there was no basis whatsoever for the allegation, rose and said, "I am sorry." He said, "I withdraw." I admired him at that moment, but that same evening he repeated on the C.B.C. the accusation he had withdrawn in the afternoon.

I can just see the opportunity these officers will have to determine the course of unification. The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) mentioned a zipper. That is the best expression I know to indicate the attitude of the Minister of National Defence. He puts a zipper on the lips of those who say anything critical and he removes it from the lips of those who join in the hallelujah chorus.

An hon. Member: "Hellyerlujah."

Mr. Diefenbaker: The other day when the Prime Minister made his uncertain speech in Calgary he said that having read the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller he found it interesting. He gave everybody to understand that he was going to back down. However, the next day he said, "I will not back down."

The financial report of the Department of National Defence did not agree with the report of the Auditor General. The Auditor General was right. The minister had to apologize to Lieutenant General Fleury and he had to apologize to Rear Admiral Landymore. This government does not back down, it backs up, or fails to back up that which it has charged. We have never had a true picture.

The minister sits in his place day after day waiting for information from above, failing to give parliament the facts. We had to wait until his executive assistant leaked information to the press yesterday. In December he made a speech which appeared in Hansard with annotations and adornments. The people of Canada have paid for 45,000 copies of the speech.

It is a serious thing when in the matter of defence which is at all times difficult, those with expert knowledge are swept aside. That does not mean that the military authority should dominate the civil authority. Nothing of the kind. The civil authority must be maintained. No one has ever taken a stand to the contrary that I am aware of in the last 35 or 40 years. Everyone except the one who occupies the highest position in defence in this country today—I am told he has political ambitions—says that unification is not going to work out. But this does not matter; they go through with it regardless of the consequences.

• (4:50 p.m.)

I will read the list: Admiral Brock, General Foulkes—do not say these gentlemen are Tories because Foulkes almost became a Liberal Candidate. He was anointed in Victoria.

An hon. Member: What about Brock?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am talking now about Foulkes. If I am going too fast for the hon. gentleman, I apologize. Foulkes had been promised the nomination by the leader of the Liberal party and he turned up at the convention in Victoria.

Mr. Foy: I understand that you almost became a Liberal candidate at one time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is the first time I ever heard the hon. member speak, and I want to hear him now. If I have done nothing else, I have at least been able to hear the voice of the hon. member for Lambton West. I thank him for making it possible now to identify him.

I return to a reading of this list: Lieutenant General Robert Moncel; Air Vice Marshal Hendrick; Air Marshal Clare L. Annis; Lieutenant General Fleury; Admiral Rayner; Air Marshal Curtis; Lieutenant General Guy Simonds, who has been recognized in every military book on the second world war as one of the greatest tacticians this country or any country ever had; Air Chief Marshal Miller, and everyone knows his reputation is outstanding. I have already mentioned Admiral Landymore. These gentlemen have proven their dedication. In my opinion, the most irresponsible part of the whole affair has been the campaign of denigration launched against those who dared to express an opinion contrary to that held by those in authority. As Shakespeare said, they exercise "a little brief authority, most ignorant of what he is most assured".

Has Lord Mountbatten any reason to express his views, except to clarify the falsification of those views spread from the Department of National Defence? This man has been one of the greatest, if not the greatest, exponent of combined operations. They thought that they could misinterpret his view and the C.B.C. helped. The C.B.C. used an interview given by Mountbatten last fall and then misinterpreted it.

Has Mountbatten any partisan feeling in this matter? I am going to read two or three excerpts from his statement. I do not want to repeat, but they tell the story. If he had not been such an authority they would not have been using his name. They thought what he said favoured them. He was asked by Commander Groos of Victoria for an explanation of his views on integration and unification of the British forces. Lord Mountbatten's statement ends this way:

> In the British reorganization care has been taken to preserve esprit de corps and morale and those traditions which help to maintain this in the services and fighting units. It has been accepted that to achieve this the three services must retain their uniforms and ranks with an identifiable professional head of their service. The idea of a single uniform and rank structure was also rejected as undesirable and unnecessary.
> There was some talk of taking the uniform and ranks of one service and imposing this on the others but the idea of a man in say army uniform with an army title arriving at a foreign port in command of a warship was generally felt to be so ludicrous that it was not pursued.

They don't back down but they have started to back up. They will now permit members of the various services to wear their uniforms when off duty, if I understand the latest incongruous rule issued by the department.

They say we should not debate this matter, Mr. Chairman. There has never been any authorization from the Canadian people on the question of unification. It never came up in the election campaign. The Minister of National Defence was asked about it in Halifax on October 3 and stated that no decision had been made. According to a Canadian Press dispatch, he backed up his promise by stating to a press conference on Sunday night, October 3, that soldiers will always be soldiers, sailors will always be sailors and airmen will always be airmen. No wonder the Montreal Gazette today in an editorial entitled, "Even Ludicrous", points out this fact:

> And they are grounds for caution in adopting in Canada a policy that can bring no monetary return, and which might be unnecessary, if not ludicrous.

I am always here if it is possible, but the other day I was not privileged to be in the house when the Secretary of State for External Affairs decided that he would take part in the debate—Paul helping Paul. I read his speech very carefully. It was a hedged defence of unification. He is not often this way; he is generally direct. However, the other day a tinge of uncertainty found its way into his remarks as recorded on page 14562 of Hansard:

> I want to say now unreservedly that all of us in this house have every reason—

Then, there is an alteration in course.

> —even though all of us might not agree with his views, to have confidence in the capacity of the Minister of National Defence—

• (5:00 p.m.)

He repeated the objectives of defence policy. He had our defence forces spread all over the world as thin as margarine on a cracker. He had them going here, there and everywhere. He said we were going to support collective measures, we were going to participate in international organizations and support policies arising therefrom, and were going to protect and look after the surveillance of our territory, our air space and coastal waters.

When he uttered those words, Mr. Chairman, he must have known that these ideas were not practical in any way but were simply generalities. With the few people in our armed forces, how are we going to protect our northern areas, our vast empire of the north? We are now going to become the world profferers of forces provided with international duties, a proposition that has been turned down by the United Nations. We are going to say to countries: Do not ask and you shall receive.

What is Canada's policy, Mr. Chairman? Where do we stand on NATO? A general observation was made on this question, but it had a qualification that would have done honour to Mackenzie King. There are some today who say that we should not be in NATO any more, that as a result of the détente of the last year and a half a new relationship has been established with the U.S.S.R. The only reason for that is that the U.S.S.R. is more frightened of Communist China than of us. Communist China stands as a tremendous threat over the U.S.S.R. in Asia. If Mao Tse-tung wins, the division will continue. If Mao Tse-tung loses, those in charge of Communist China will desire once more to combine their ideology with that of the U.S.S.R. We cannot allow the bulwark of our freedom in NATO to be swept aside by anticipated peaceful relations. That is an ephemeral premise. If ever Communist China once again lines up with the U.S.S.R., there will be a return to that system of consistent probing to find our weaknesses by the U.S.S.R.

What is our image abroad? When I sat on the other side of the house those who today occupy the treasury benches said: "When we take over, all will be well". They were in error. Events show they were not justified in saying this. The Prime Minister of Canada went to Washington and was allowed to cool his heels while the president talked on the telephone. He might as well have been in the doghouse.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

What about France, Mr. Chairman? If ever a country owed much to Canada it is France. The blood of Canada was poured out in sacrifice in the first war. More Canadians were killed in action than were killed in the United States forces. We were, of course, involved in the war much longer. My classmates went down at Vimy, 19 of them in the ranks. There was no representative of France in any senior position at the recent ceremony. A brigadier general turned up. Surely there must be some reason for this loss of face by Canada in France.

When the Secretary of State for External Affairs arrived in Paris in 1963 there was no one to greet him. The French have a meticulous regard for protocol. The Secretary of State for External Affairs arrived on an important mission to take up certain matters with the French foreign minister and had to ride into town on the hurricane deck of a baggage truck. Only one possessing the dignity of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I intervene simply to point out to my right hon. friend that the difference between his going to Paris and my going to Paris is that I was allowed in.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I do not follow that observation. When I went to France I was received by General de Gaulle with the full honours accorded a leader of a foreign nation. I am not saying this in any desire to ridicule, but I do say it is wrong that a man occupying the high and dignified position of minister of foreign affairs should be so treated in that way. Mussolini did not ride into Rome in such fashion.

What is the attitude of the United States toward Canada? There has been a disregard for the greatness of this nation and its contribution. All over the world we are engaged in a spending spree in external affairs. I look, for example, at the costs of Canadian embassies. In France the cost since 1962-63 has gone up from $834,870 to $1,396,000. In the United States it has gone up from $698,800 to $1,252,000. The answer is that you cannot spend your way into the hearts of other nations unless you deliver the goods.

Why did General de Gaulle take this attitude, Mr. Chairman? When he received Premier Lesage I do not know how many guns were fired. I do not know how many guns will be fired when he greets Premier Johnson, but when Canadians as a nation turned up at Vimy nobody from France was there.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Prud'homme: The French people were there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Nobody turned up except those poor, humble people French in heart who knew what the sacrifices had meant.

In all seriousness I asked the other day whether this situation would come about. The Prime Minister answered that the plans had not yet been completed. This simply means that this government has lost for Canada in a period of four years an international prestige that she has enjoyed through the years. Are we going to rebuild that by offering to supply Canadian forces for the United Nations. The United Nations last December brushed that suggestion aside. That was the greatest setback that Canada has ever suffered at the United Nations.

Can you place your trust in this government on the matter of defence policy in view of their record on nuclear weapons? I have the quotations when the present minister and those associated with him rose in their places to say we should not have nuclear warheads on the Bomarc, we should not permit our division in Europe to be armed with nuclear weapons. When the minister said that, was he sincere? Were those his true sentiments? That is what the Prime Minister said. Then in the twinkling of an eye something happened. In January, 1963, following a pilgrimage to Washington by one or two who are now ministers, the policy of the Liberal party suddenly changed. Was that not strange? There was the arrival of an emissary from Washington, one who had been President Kennedy's organizing genius. Some of the ministers opposite have knowledge of this fact. There were funds galore for the Liberal party in 1963.

An hon. Member: That is unworthy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: One wonders what portion of the funds came from the United States. One wonders whether the C.I.A. was straightening out Canada because we dared to stand on our own feet.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes. It was a very strange situation, sir. The United States ambassador stuck his nose in. On January 30, 1963, Washington issued a statement that was an obvious interference in the coming Canadian election.

I have wondered about this. Where are we to obtain the truth? We shall obtain it from the lips of one who sits today in the Privy Council of Canada—I told him in advance I would refer to him—a man, as I said the other day, of high integrity, the Minister of Justice. He told the story and I shall read a few portions of it. If anybody wants more I shall be glad to read on. I refer to an article by the present Minister of Justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I join in the applause. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not be applauding in a moment when they hear what was said. They have not read the article. I want to hear them applaud later. The article begins with the words, "Lester B. Pearson—the unfrocked priest of peace". He says that the policy turnover did not come before the Liberal party before it was announced. I have the words here. I can quote the entire article if necessary. This is what was said:

> I am not at the moment concerned—

This is the minister.

> —with the merits of Liberal party nuclear policy. I am only concerned with the anti-democratic reflexes of the spineless Liberal herd.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Monteith: No applause comes from the other side.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On page 10 it is said that the leader of the Liberal party changed the policy, in the course of a speech in York-Scarborough on January 12, 1963. Then the article goes on to say:

> Thus the same man who denounced the NORAD commitments and refused to be bound by them . . . found himself two months later bound by an unexpected sense of honour—

All I can say is that the hon. member for York-Humber may yet qualify for membership in the Privy Council.

Mr. Starr: Say a few more things, Ralph.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The fact that the present Minister of Justice said these things is of interest. He also asked what the reason was for the change.

> The answer is not much of a mystery.

On page 15 we have the reason:

> Whence came then the scruples of Mr. Pearson related to the Bomarcs? . . . The answer is not much of a mystery. Mr. Pearson's scruples were a matter of conscience—perhaps even subconscience—and obviously American.

This is very interesting. I made statements as to what happened in 1963 when the Minister of National Defence discarded everything he previously stood for. He had told us about the only policy that could be good for Canada. He ditched that in a matter of hours in January, 1963. Why? Perhaps the minister could answer that now. What does the writer, now the Minister of Justice, say about where "conscience leads to dishonour"?

It was obvious for some time that the United States did not appreciate Mr. Diefenbaker. From the start he had proposed to revamp the Commonwealth and to loosen the ties with the United States. Commercially he proposed to swing to the United Kingdom 15 per cent of our external trade.

He named the O'Leary Commission ... he selected an external affairs minister (Mr. Green) who seemed more interested in peace than in pleasing the Americans. He—

Diefenbaker.

—was selling wheat to China and dealing with Cuba ... That was enough for American public opinion to hope for a Liberal victory last June 18. They were misled. Worse was to come. American opinion learned with stupefaction last October—

That is October, 1962.

—that the Soviets were placing in Cuba missile installations—

He wrote that we did not act fast enough on October 22 to please those in Washington.

Kennedy's hipsters could not tolerate this. At the very moment when the wind of freedom was blowing among NATO partners, especially France, was the time to make an example of those who would be independent by an exemplary chastisement.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I have not heard much applause from over there lately. I was to be chastised in an exemplary way for attempting to stand up for Canada. That is what the present Minister of Justice said.

There was an easy victim chosen. The word was given: "Diefenbaker must go".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They always applaud that, Mr. Chairman. But in 1963, when they were allied with the United States administration—let hon. members opposite wait until I have finished because then there will not be so much applause. The Minister of Justice went on to say:

I am not being dramatic. Do you think that General Norstad, former NATO supreme commander, came to Ottawa on January 3 only as a simple tourist, when he accused the government of Canada of not living up to its engagements? Do you believe that it was only accidental that Mr. Pearson in his speech of January 12 based himself on the authority of General Norstad?

Do you believe it was by inadvertence that the state department on January 30 issued a communique strengthening the position of Mr. Pearson and boorishly treating Mr. Diefenbaker as a liar?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Do you think it was only by chance that this statement gave the opposition leader abundant arguments with which he stuffed his speech in parliament on January 31?

Was it just simple coincidence that these events ended with the downfall of the government on February 5?

I go on from there:

Why should anyone think that the United States would act differently in the case of Canada than they did in the case of Guatemala where reasons of state demand it and conditions permit it? The reasons were there.

Then the writer explained the situation in some well chosen words:

On the other hand, Mr. Pearson was there, ready to step in. He was respected. He had worked for peace in the United Nations. The financial interests knew he was surrounded by a group who could re-establish economic order without reverting to extreme measures.

I am still quoting. I dislike quoting extensively except when necessary in order to place the record before hon. members.

What greater temptation, and what could be easier for the Americans than to add the last straw which would overthrow a government whose position had been shaky ever since the elections?

That is the election of 1962.

The circumstances were such that the blow must come from the Pentagon and required that the Prime Minister betray the program of his party along with the principle with which he had consistently identified himself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I said that, it would be heresy. The paths of criticism lead up to the Privy Council. I have not heard much applause from over there lately.

The bagmen promised that funds would be forthcoming.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: These are not my words. These are the words of one who knew. He said:

Power beckoned to Mr. Pearson; he had nothing to lose except his honour. He lost it. And his whole party lost it, too.

Talk about a testament. Everything I have ever suggested during the campaign of 1963 has been proven. A little later—I have many more of these pages because this is a long article; it takes a long time to deal with it—we find the heading: "From Clownishness to Liberal Philosophy".

The series of farcical situations which arose following the apostasy of Mr. Pearson on January 12, 1963, found at last its justification in the position of Mr. Walter Gordon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The article goes on to tell us about the hon. member for Davenport, now President of the Privy Council. I am not going into that. I have dealt with him on other occasions. The writer went on to say:

> The political philosophy of the Liberal party is simplicity itself. "Say anything, think anything you like, but put us in power because we are best fitted to govern". If Canadians cannot agree on a flag, very well, we will give them two. (Pickersgill).

It is an astonishing article. There are several more pages of this. If anybody wants to read the whole thing I would be very glad to let him have it. The writer sums up:

> The party is opposed to nuclear arms, but the leader says it is necessary to be in favour of them (Pearson); everyone will remain free to be against them (Pickersgill) although, in his heart, no one will be (the Young Liberals). Then again, all this does not really concern us (Lacoste). The ordinary Canadian has only to put his trust in the Liberal Party (Gordon). The leaders are always right (Choquette), and my husband has not changed his views—

That last statement was made by a certain lady. Oh, it is all here and it is summed up in these words:

> What idiots they all are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The best show I have heard in this house for years.

An hon. Member: A very weak answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will hurry on and refer to a later page. He goes on to say:

> I must keenly regret the defeat of a government of Canada in parliament—

This was the government I had the honour to lead.

> —on a question and following a strategy drawn up by the Americans.
> It is all right for Pearson and the Liberals to shout "Ready, aye ready" when the word came from across the border from the militarists and the fund raisers.

I suspected that many times. Bagmen. It would almost qualify some of these people for the Senate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He sums up the whole thing in these memorable words:

> But I would have liked, at least for appearances sake that a few Canadian M.P's would have had the reflexes of a Herridge, or a Cameron, the old socialist.

Then it mentions doing the White House's "dirty work". There is much more I could quote from this article. There is an inexhaustible supply.

> What does morality say about those who buy votes with principles betrayed?

He is speaking of those who sit opposite.

> To corrupt spirits by reducing politics to a system utterly denuded of principles seems to me far more serious than having handed out a few presents to the electorate. Are there no electors among the people for whom courage, sincerity and public spirit maintain some attraction?

• (5:30 p.m.)

There are some, Mr. Chairman. I have simply outlined one set of circumstances. I am asking this question of the government of Canada. There they sit, the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister, who stood against us and said we were wrong, that the only policy for Canada was to have no nuclear weapons under any circumstances both here and overseas. The reason is now revealed why principles for which they stood were jettisoned. On the basis of what has been revealed by the Minister of Justice regarding these ministers—and there are others sitting over there who were here about that time—I think the Canadian people have the right to ask why they are hell bent to push this legislation through in time for Expo. The reason is that the minister threatened last July, according to the Canadian Press, that if he did not get it through he was going to resign. He wants to be at Expo with his 400 green apparelled men. "The Duke of York marched up the hill and then marched down again."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition began his speech this afternoon by saying that as a result of unification it would be the policy of the government to develop a United Nations peace keeping force only.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not only.

Mr. Hellyer: This has been categorically denied by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This has been categorically denied by me.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): So what?

Mr. Hellyer: And yet the Leader of the Opposition repeats the lie—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You should never talk about lies.

Mr. Hellyer: —as his followers have on numerous occasions during the course of this debate. The answer, Mr. Chairman, does not rely just on the word of ministers of the crown, although that should be good enough for the right hon. gentleman. It is in the facts, in the facts about a $1½ billion five year re-equipment program for the Canadian Armed Forces which includes armoured personnel carriers, not just for the brigade overseas but for the Canadian army stationed in Canada as well; armoured reconnaissance vehicles, again not just for the brigade overseas and training scales at home, as was the policy of the right hon. gentleman when he was prime minister, when he was developing—as I may say later in the debate—a force which only had a capability for United Nations peacekeeping activities and when this was the official policy of the Department of National Defence, armoured reconnaissance vehicles not just for the brigade overseas and training scales at home but for the whole Canadian army; acquisition of self-propelled howitzers, 155 mm., for the brigade group in Europe and for the heavy brigade in Gagetown; anti-tank missiles and anti-tank guns; helicopter equipped destroyers in order to increase even further the anti-submarine capability of our navy and its ability to contribute to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the anti-submarine role; the purchase of two additional operational support ships in order to increase by an order of magnitude the ability of ships to stay on station in anti-submarine operations and to make a real contribution to the anti-submarine role, as well as to provide the Canadian Armed Forces with a back-up capability to transport troops and equipment if required; ASROC missiles for our ships, fighter bombers for our mobile force, air trucks to carry our troops and equipment.

I ask the right hon. gentleman, is this the equipment list that one would buy for a peacekeeping force only? It is not. It is the list of equipment required to give the Canadian Armed Forces the flexibility that they require to enable them to do all of the tasks set out in the white paper and re-enumerated in my second reading speech earlier in this debate.

Mr. Churchill: You talked about a peace restoring force. That is a punitive force which would require those arms.

Mr. Hellyer: As I said in my second reading speech, Mr. Chairman, our force is a force for the 1970's, a force which can contribute to NATO and to NORAD as well as to United Nations operations or to any other demand placed on it by the government of Canada in the national interests of this country. Even Air Chief Marshal Miller dealt with this myth in his testimony before the defence committee and I am surprised, therefore, in view of the reliance that the right hon. gentleman places on his testimony, that he should repeat this afternoon in this committee the misstatement of fact which has been repeated over and over and over again by his supporters for weeks and months during the course of this debate.

Another charge which he made this afternoon was that defence expenditures were increasing. Well, of course this is true in current dollars, Mr. Chairman, but as the right hon. gentleman knows, and if I recall correctly, the defence estimate for the last full year of his government was $1.63 billion. Translated into terms of present dollars on the basis of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics index for governmental expenditures, that is the present equivalent of a budget of $2 billion. I think that the right hon. gentleman should try to give the people the facts in this regard and not try to confuse them by mixing up in his mind current and constant dollars.

Then he made an allegation which I could only interpret as being a slur on the chief of the defence staff, General Allard, making some vague suggestion that he had political ambitions. This is a contemptible slur on a distinguished soldier, but it is understandable from a man who conducted witch hunt after witch hunt after senior military officers in the defence department at the time he was prime minister of this country, when there was an aura of fear pervading the senior military establishment because of the then prime minister's well known fear of military men.

General Allard is a distinguished Canadian soldier. He is a distinguished son of this country who has played his part in war and in peace and who was the first Canadian to command a British division. I think the right hon. gentleman should do him the courtesy of a gallant gentleman and not cast slurs on his integrity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the Minister of Justice tell the truth?

Mr. Churchill: Tell us about Admiral Landymore.

Mr. Hellyer: Then there was the suggestion that the unification of the armed forces was not an issue in the last election and therefore the Canadian people had no way of judging whether or not they were in support of this measure. It was a plank in the last Liberal party platform and certainly the men and women of the armed forces knew it was part of the Liberal platform, as was stated so eloquently in the testimony given before the defence committee by a number of recently retired senior officers.

Mr. McIntosh: Air Chief Marshal Miller did not know, your chief of staff.

Mr. Hellyer: The most incredible part of the speech by the right hon. gentleman this afternoon to this committee throughout the whole time he took—I do not know how long it was but it seemed like a long while—was that he did not give one cogent reason why this bill should not be proceeded with. He did not give one cogent argument contrary to the principle of unification. He did not in any way address himself to the principle of the bill but sought rather to indulge himself in some sort of electoral nostalgia. Then he cast aspersions on the motive for unification, the reason for it. The reason is to increase the military effectiveness of the Canadian Armed Forces. It is to give the absolute maximum in military effectiveness for the Canadian tax dollars which are being spent. It is to refine and design a military force with the maximum of flexibility and capability to carry out its tasks in the decades which lie ahead. This is the reason for the military reorganization.

However, even in the reorganization, Mr. Chairman, there is an element of Canadianization. I do not think this should be objected to by the right hon. gentleman. This will be part of the consequences of reorganization because in so far as military organization is concerned Canada will be leading the world and will be out in front of all other nations.

Again this afternoon the right hon. gentleman made a very serious charge. He said I had failed to give parliament the facts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Absolutely.

Mr. Hellyer: But he did not go on to give one single example of the facts I have failed to give to the house. Where is his sense of British justice?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hellyer: Where is his regard for the bill of rights?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this is the first time the British have come into it.

Mr. Hellyer: Is he so completely unmindful of the principles which he preaches in the bill of rights and from the platform that he would make a charge of that kind in this house and then not give even one suggestion of what he might have had in mind? It was a most extraordinary intervention. I was surprised most of all, however, by his new found love for senior military officers. This is a characteristic which I have never ascribed to him. I have never ascribed it to him because of his record when he was prime minister and because of his many public pronouncements, as well as some of the things he said this afternoon in his speech.

I think that it might be advisable to go back and review some of the relationship which existed between the military and the civil authorities in order to put it into perspective. I should like to start with the cancellation of the Avro Arrow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was recommended by the defence chiefs.

Mr. Hellyer: The right hon. gentleman has just stated that it was recommended by the defence staff. Is that correct?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is correct.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, on January 1, 1959, in his home at 24 Sussex Street he told Mr. Charles Templeton that he, the prime minister, was going to cancel the Avro Arrow notwithstanding the pressure by the military and by industry.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, so far as Mr. Templeton is concerned his veracity needs no assistance, but I should like to read the evidence of General Foulkes given before the special committee on defence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am rising on a question of privilege and will not be howled down. I wish to read from the evidence given before the special committee on defence on October 22, 1963.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Leader of the Opposition is rising on a question of privilege and should be given the opportunity to state his question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This evidence was given by General Foulkes. He said:

> That is the story of the Arrow, but the chiefs of staff came to the conclusion that it did not make military sense to purchase aircraft at a cost of $8 million each when we could maintain aircraft with similar performance from the end of an American production line at something about $2 million.

There is the record.

Mr. Crouse: Apologize.

Mr. Hellyer: I thought the right hon. gentleman might take that point of view so I spent most of the morning reading the record. This was about three weeks after he advised Mr. Templeton that he had made a decision. Then the chiefs of staff took a decision in respect of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is an unequivocal falsehood.

Mr. Hellyer: He was not going to be pushed around by the industrial military complex. He was going to show who was running Canada and he was going to cancel the Avro Arrow regardless. Those are the facts. The decision was subsequently confirmed by the chiefs of staff, as the right hon. gentleman has suggested. If I may say so, the whole Avro Arrow episode showed the lack of a unified approach in respect of defence matters and a lack of adequate priorities in respect of defence requirements.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. St. Laurent—

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. gentleman should not get emotional. This is precisely one of the reasons the defence reorganization was recommended to the House of Commons, so that there could be a unity of approach, a unity of strategy and an adequate set of priorities in order to reduce the likelihood of this type of problem recurring in the years ahead. It was quite right that the government should make a decision at that time. The government had the responsibility to make a decision. Nobody is denying to the right hon. gentleman the right to have taken the decision in the manner he did. I think, however, it should be pointed out that regardless of the merits of the decision, whether it was right or wrong, at that time the biggest brain drain this country possibly ever has seen started. It was much greater than anything that has happened in so far as the military is concerned because of the unification of the armed forces. The two are not in the same order of magnitude. Because of this great brain drain our country lost some of the most highly skilled engineers and designers this country has ever developed. I am sure that nothing will persuade them to come back as long as there is any prospect of the right hon. gentleman ever becoming prime minister again.

The second example I should like to give is the choice of the airplane for the strike role; I am referring to the CF-104. Here again, Mr. Chairman, there is a very unusual sequence of events. The choice that was made of the CF-104 was a government decision. It is true that eventually the chiefs of staff made a recommendation, but only after they had been directed to do so by the government of the right hon. gentleman and only after they had already said that this was not the best airplane to carry out the role and was in fact not suitable to carry out the role. I do not know who made the decision—I do not know whether it was made by the right hon. gentleman himself or by the late Senator Brunt, but someone made the decision and it was promulgated.

Even more important, however, was the role for which this airplane was acquired. The air force reversed itself in respect to its opposition to the CF-104 three days after the airplane was approved because it was afraid of rocking the boat in respect of the role that had been accepted by the government for the air division in Europe. The strike role was the military choice. It was accepted by the government of the right hon. gentleman. It was not a role which was assigned to the military by the government—quite the opposite—and it led subsequently to a very silly situation which has been referred to already this afternoon by the right hon. gentleman.

• (5:50 p.m.)

In an article written by the late Major General W. H. S. Macklin he said:

> Having made the strange blunder of ordering, at a price of hundreds of millions, a whole series of weapons needing nuclear warheads or rockets for effect, the cabinet refuses to arm them accordingly. They swallowed the nuclear camel and then choked on its tail, and this has made them look uncertain, and even stupid.

That was a decision made by the government of the right hon. gentleman, and it did in fact lead to a situation which has been the subject of debate ever since.

The government of that day spent hundreds of millions of dollars on equipment and training for a strike role accepted by the government, the consequences of which it really could not have fully understood. Later the same government refused to acquire the atomic weapons necessary to make the role effective. At that time the consequences were quite different.

The right hon. gentleman asked me earlier why I had changed my position. Let me tell him again that I did so because Canada had accepted a commitment, through the government of the right hon. gentleman, and had told our allies we would fulfil this role. The government purchased the equipment with which to fulfil that role and when the time came to make a decision to acquire the nuclear weapons to make it effective it refused to act.

One of the other charges he made this afternoon was that we were letting NATO down and that there must be some reason for France's attitude toward Canada at this time. This represents an incredible lapse of memory on the part of the man who was the prime minister and who authorized the defence department to spend probably $1 billion for nuclear equipment and training and then welshed on our obligation by refusing to arm these weapons, thereby embarrassing our forces for the first time in Canada's role in NATO.

I do not think the full consequences of this act are completely understood by the right hon. gentleman. The Royal Canadian Air Force now has available to it in Europe an explosive power comparable to several thousand times that used at Hiroshima. This is the consequence of a role undertaken by the previous government without comprehending the advice given to it by its military chiefs.

The right hon. gentleman suggested this afternoon that this was the result of a decision arrived at in Washington. This was not a decision made in Washington. The recommendation that Canada adopt a strike role was made in our own defence department. It was decided on here by the military, submitted to the government, and approved by the government of the day without comprehending the consequences. It was also supported by the minister of national defence of that day.

My point is this: Was there any analysis by the civil authorities of this recommendation and was there any analysis by the civil authorities of the consequences of engaging in this role? Was there any independent analysis by civil authorities in the defence department or elsewhere in the government of the relative contribution that Canada could make to our allies by accepting this role as against some other role for the Canadian armed forces?

In my submission there was no independent civil analysis. I submit there should have been such an analysis before accepting this advice, with its consequences of staggering proportions, and rubberstamping it. There should have been an independent analysis of the consequences of placing Canada in a position of accepting a role without really considering any of the options available to us as a nation. This was done by an acquiescing government without the will or the facilities to exercise an independent judgment in respect of a matter of this tremendous magnitude. The government just went blindly along.

One important consequence of that action has been the determination the associate minister and I have had since we assumed reponsibility for this office to make sure that there was a much greater exercise of civil authority than had been the case under the previous government which was responsible for accepting the strike role on behalf of Canada.

Mr. Brewin: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes.

Mr. Brewin: I should like to ask the minister whether he thinks an independent civil judgment would have warned us against taking this particular role and whether he now has obtained an independent civil analysis which indicates that we should terminate this particular role?

Mr. Hellyer: I think that is a perfectly valid question. The answer to the first part is yes, in my opinion. I think an independent analysis would have brought to light the options and might have indicated at that time that the over-all stockpile of strategic power available to the west or the alliance was adequate to deter and that under those circumstances the weakness of the west related to conventional forces. It might have indicated that we could have made a greater contribution by developing our conventional forces at that time.

We are now in a position of having the equipment and the trained forces and other resources necessary to carry out the role. This complicates the situation. We are not in the same position we were in before the role was accepted. The white paper suggests that we should reduce this role as the aircraft are attrited. I think this is a valid policy at this time. I am not the least bit convinced that if we were doing this over again a good analysis might not have shown a more appropriate military way for Canada to spend her funds to augment the total capability of the alliance, strengthening the alliance as a whole.

Let me give two contemporary examples of the situation in the United States between the civil and military authorities. On the basis of a newspaper article written by Mr. Joseph Kraft, which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen, it is alleged that there is a difference of opinion in the United States in respect of the bombing of North Viet Nam. According to this article:

> One side, led by Secretary of Defence McNamara, is sceptical, to put it mildly, about the value of the bombing. In their view, bombing the north has not achieved any progress in its political objective—which is to weaken the resolve of the Hanoi government to keep up the war. That assessment is apparently borne out by recent C.I.A. evaluations.

Later on the article states:

> On the other side, there are the advocates of the bombing, led by the joint chiefs of staff—

Would the right hon. gentleman accept the military advice, which I presume is unanimous, of the chiefs of staff, or would he accept the advice of his civil authorities and his minister in respect of the political and military effectiveness of the operation? The point is that the government has not only the right but the absolute responsibility to exercise independent judgment after reviewing all the military plans and proposals and after hearing all the evidence and the points of view. The government must then take a final decision and accept the responsibility for that decision.

My final illustration in this field is anti-ballistic missiles. Here again there is a very strong difference of opinion between the military and civil authorities. Mr. McNamara believes that the installation of an anti-ballistic missile system might not provide the protection that is suggested by his military chiefs of staff. I should like to quote from evidence he gave to Congress which I think puts his point of view better than I could. It reads as follows:

> It is the virtual certainty that the Soviets will act to maintain their deterrent which casts such grave doubts on the advisability of our deploying the NIKE-X system for the protection of our cities against the kind of heavy, sophisticated missile attack they could launch in the 1970's. In all probability, all we would accomplish would be to increase greatly both their defence expenditures and ours without any gain in real security to either side.

This is not the point of view of the military chiefs of staff. Their point of view is that the Soviets might not increase their offensive capability, that they might not want to divert the resources necessary in order to maintain an adequate deterrent. But I think the McNamara philosophy is straightforward, that if we on the western side depend for our security on the nuclear stalemate, on having sufficient offensive power to penetrate Soviet defences and to be able to inflict unacceptable damage on them at any time even after the first strike, then they will have the same philosophy that they on their side will want to maintain sufficient offensive capability to enable them to inflict unacceptable damage on the west, in spite of our defences in order to deter attack, and to be able to perform this even after a first strike, which of course we would never undertake. But again the point is this: Do military authorities in their submissions have the right to have their proposals accepted without proper scrutiny by the civil authorities, or do the government of the day and the responsible secretary of state or minister have the responsibility to investigate and satisfy themselves, or itself in the case of the government, that the proposal is in the best interest of the nation or the alliance?

Mr. Fairweather: Will the minister permit a question? I think this is a very interesting point but I have not been able to appreciate the significance of Mr. Kraft's article in the Ottawa Citizen from which the minister quoted stating that the secretary of defence is against bombing Hanoi and the recommendation of the United States joint chiefs of staff. Who wins in this difference of opinion?

Mr. Hellyer: I think it is obvious in that case that there are also others in that government who believe that the bombing should continue and this is supported by the chiefs of staff.

In so far as the anti-ballistic missile dispute is concerned, it is not yet resolved. As the hon. gentleman knows, there are discussions going on between the United States and the U.S.S.R. in the hope that some agreement can be reached, and I for one certainly hope and pray that this will be the case. I do not think there is too much optimism, but at the same time it is by far the most sensible thing to be done because the consequences are almost unbelievable. I would like to talk about them for a minute.

The cost to the United States of introducing a heavy anti-ballistic missile system is estimated now at $20 billion. Those who are familiar with defence expenditures and the tendency for these expenditures to escalate believe that the cost would reach at least $40 billion by the time the system is made effective. An equal expenditure of perhaps $40 billion would be required in western Europe, and assuming that the Soviets introduce a system of equal complexity and sophistication when they have the technical know-how to do so—and there is no reason to believe they could not develop it because they have been doing research for many years—their cost would be comparable.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the minister but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Deputy Chairman: It seems that there is unanimous consent for the minister to continue his speech.

Mr. Hellyer: I appreciate the co-operation of the committee. The over-all cost of installing this system could be as high as $120 billion. In other words, it would represent the commencement of the greatest arms race in the history of the world. But this is not the end of it. In addition to the cost of deploying the anti-ballistic system there is the cost of the additional offensive capability on each side necessary to penetrate the defences on the other side in order to continue the atomic stalemate and to provide the measure of assurance of destruction which deters each side from using the offensive capability.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask the minister another question on the very point he is now discussing? Is it not true that, in addition to the expenditures he has mentioned, to render an anti-ballistic missile system truly effective there would have to be a system of shelters to deal with fall-out, and that this would be not only an added expense but would require a good deal of regimentation of people to get them to use the shelters when required?

Mr. Hellyer: This is true, but the cost is not great in comparison to the total cost involved for the anti-ballistic missile system.

The anti-ballistic missile question raises a number of considerations. First of all it raises a very serious moral question. I think we have to examine in the western world the advisability of spending anything like this sum of money on a defensive system which, as Mr. McNamara suggests, might not prove to be successful in doing anything other than maintaining the status quo. I think we have to look at the situation in the world and consider alternatives so far as the expenditure of sums of this magnitude is concerned. We have to look at it also from a strategic viewpoint. If the ultimate goal is to win the war of ideas, then I think we have to consider very carefully the possibility of diverting a large proportion of this expenditure to more useful purposes which would have a greater impact on the people of the world, and particularly those people who are uncommitted, to show them we are sincere in our intentions.

Again I ask my right hon. friend, would he accept what is obviously a unanimous suggestion of the United States joint chiefs of staff without the independent appraisal that has been given to it? I am sure he would not. I would not suggest for a moment that he would, and if he did I think he would be very unwise. It would, without question, be endorsing an escalation of the arms race, and I am sure he would be most reluctant to do that. Would he endorse the fantastic expenditures without a careful and independent analysis of the alternatives? I hope he would not, although judging from the position that he and his party have taken in this debate I would not want to put them to the test. Incidentally, the antiballistic missile system is an army system. As you know, the aerospace defences of this continent under the NORAD command are predominantly air force. I do not think I need to elaborate at any length on the problems that could conceivably arise in reconciling these two facts.

One must listen to all points of view and then decide.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is exactly what we are asking the minister to do.

Mr. Hellyer: Of course the chiefs of staff were predominantly opposed to the unification of the armed forces. Chiefs of staff all over the world are opposed to the unification of the armed forces. Chiefs of staff all over the world and those who have decided in their minds that they are going to become chiefs of staff are opposed to the unification of the armed forces.

Mr. Churchill: The minister is the only one in the world who is right.

Mr. Hellyer: They can be wonderful people. They can be dedicated public servants. They may have served their country with distinction and gallantry. They may be masters of the military art. But when they become chiefs of staff they take on an additional role. Then they become heads of service. Then they become party chiefs. Then they have responsibilities over and beyond those responsibilities they have had throughout their careers. They then carry in themselves the vested interests of their whole service, of its traditions, of its rank structure and everything for which it stands, including its fair share of appointments and of military expenditures. It is not unnatural then that men who have been chiefs of staff are—I should not say unanimous because there are some exceptions among chiefs of staff—in majority opposed to unification.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which ones are in favour?

Mr. Hellyer: There are some.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who?

Mr. Hellyer: I am going to come to that in a minute. There are some people who are in favour. I think the general statement I have made is a fair one. Once a person becomes head of a service he has a responsibility to that service which in his opinion supersedes his previous freedom of action.

Mr. McIntosh: What authority have you for saying that?

Mr. Hellyer: I think it is quite natural then that they should take this point of view. In addition, I believe if you were to select anyone in the whole world you could not find anyone who would be more biased in respect of military unification than a chief of staff, for the reasons I have given.

I must say I am surprised when I hear some of the endorsements of integration. I am all the more surprised when I hear some endorsement of integration coming from people who, when we started this scheme in 1964, were just as opposed to integration as they appear to be to unification now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who are they?

Mr. Hellyer: I have been trying to avoid personalities, Mr. Chairman, and it is very difficult for me to do.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. McIntosh: This is just more of your confusion.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Is the minister implying in his remarks that integration commenced in 1964?

Mr. Hellyer: No. If the hon. member will read my second reading speech he will find it is a historical process which has been going on for 20 years. I can say in fairness, I think, that integration prior to 1964 had not been very great and most of the integration has taken place since 1964.

I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared in one of our service papers written by a serviceman in respect of two points which have been raised. If I had more time I would quote from it at length. The two points I should like to make in particular are in respect of the pacing or timing of the unification process and, second, the question of integration versus unification. The editorial is entitled, "Let's Get On With It", and appeared in Voxair:

> The integration process began two years ago, and that, to the rank and file, seems a long time. The reason is that few things appear to have changed at the operator and unit level. This is easy to understand, since the process was designed to work down from the top, and only recently some results of these changes have been noticeable in the field.

Later we find this:

> More difficult to comprehend is the opinion, often expressed in the recent controversy, that the integration process is too fast. This opinion implies a comparison, and one can only wonder what it is compared to, since this is the first time any nation is integrating and unifying its forces.
> Most proponents of the "too fast" idea appear to be those who were against integration in the first place and who believed that integration and unification would not become a reality. When it now appears that it will, the natural reaction for anyone resisting change must be to attempt to delay the change.

I must underline that, Mr. Chairman, because this is exactly what my experience has been. Those who now say "too fast" are in some cases those who have never really endorsed the idea of integration at all and in some cases were adamantly opposed to it. Later on the author of this editorial writes:

> As we stated above, integration appears slow to those in the field. This should make a good argument for speeding up the process as much as possible. Any change of the magnitude of the one undertaken is difficult and sometimes painful, but the quicker we complete the change the less painful it is going to be. If, on the other hand, the phase of change is allowed to go on ad infinitum we can be certain that morale will be adversely affected.

This view, Mr. Chairman, is not that of the associate minister or myself or the chiefs of staff now serving but that of one of the servicemen, and it is the view of many who have expressed opinions to me in respect of this matter.

Mr. Fane: Will the minister allow a question?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes.

Mr. Fane: Will the minister give us the name of the person who wrote that editorial?

Mr. Hellyer: I will send the hon. member a copy of the editorial and that will give it.

Mr. Churchill: Put it on Hansard. I think you should put the name on the record since you are reading the article.

Mr. Hellyer: I will send it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Churchill: Identify the article.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Put the name on the record.

Mr. Hellyer: I have no objection, but this point was raised yesterday by me and my hon. friend took exactly the opposite point of view then when he said it was not necessary.

Mr. Churchill: That was in respect of tabling a document.

Mr. Hellyer: Well, Mr. Chairman, I will send a copy to my hon. friend.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The argument yesterday was in respect of tabling a document which is done in the house when the Speaker is in the chair, not in committee. The minister is once again giving false information.

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Churchill: I said nothing about this yesterday except in respect of the tabling process. What we are asking for now is the identification of a document from which the minister has read. We are entitled to the name of the author as well as the journal in which the article appeared.

Mr. Hellyer: I will try to provide it to my hon. friend. In any event, I accept responsibility for it in order to get it on the record.

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order again—

Mr. Hellyer: This is not a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You cannot flout the rules.

Mr. Churchill: The minister is flouting the rules. When members quote from documents they give the name of the author. The minister is asked now to give the name of the author. Of what is he afraid? Whether or not he is afraid, this cannot be done under the rules of the house, refusing to give the name of the author of a document from which he is quoting. If it is an editorial from one of the newspapers which are daily circulated, that is a different matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This looks like self-serving evidence.

Mr. Churchill: So far as we are concerned, we should know the author.

Mr. Hellyer: I will try to get the name of the author. The only reason I cannot give it at once is that it is signed with the initials O.F. There is a list of the editorial staff and the publication is Voxair. It is published in Winnipeg and represents the views of a great many Winnipegers so far as this subject is concerned, so I recommend it to the hon. member.

Military opinion in respect of this question is obviously divided. The majority of the senior officers are in favour of what we are doing, but not all. The choice of witnesses before the committee meant that the point of view expressed would inevitably be contrary to the proposal to unify the armed forces. The scales were loaded in advance. The views of all the retired service officers who appeared were known in advance. I could have told my hon. friend almost precisely what they would say before listening to their evidence.

As I said earlier, these witnesses fell into the category of people who had held high, responsible positions and who felt that all the interests of the services that they had served so well were vested in them. I feel that in many cases they still feel that way. I know they do as a result of talking to them. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, there are other views as well. I should like to read the views expressed by two ordinary people, and I think they express very well some of the things I should like to say to the committee.

The first article I should like to read is entitled, "Thankful Hellyer Is "Jet Age", Not Nostalgic For Cavalry Stables". The article reads in part:

The stubborn opposition to the unification of the armed services by older generals and admirals is not surprising to many of us who served in both world wars.

In his memoirs the British writer on military matters, B. H. Liddell Hart, gives statistics which prove that between the two world wars, the general staff spent more money for hay and oats than on gasoline and oil. They still believed that the cavalry divisions were more important than developing armoured divisions.

• (6:20 p.m.)

He states: "It was disturbing to find that—after six months in office, and a war crisis so obviously near—Gort (Lord Gort, chief of staff, 1937-39) was still concerned with the reactions of military conservatism, and so anxious to avoid offence by moving faster than the older generals would tolerate".

Liddell Hart gives credit to Hore-Belisha, a war minister before 1939, for modernizing the army more in nine months preceding the world war II than had been done in all the years since world war I.

Let us not forget what two civilians, Lord Haldane and Hore-Belisha, did to shake the complacency and conservatism of the old generals who believed in fighting a new war with the methods of the previous one.

Let us the thankful that we have a jet-age defence minister in Paul Hellyer and not a world war I general who has nostalgia for the Ross rifle and the odour of the cavalry stables.

That was signed by Henry C. Hall of Richmond Hill.

I have another letter from a retired officer. The newspaper heading to the letter is "Unification Means Better Morale, Leadership—Brigadier", and the letter reads as follows:

What I find disturbing about the current discussions regarding unification of the armed forces is that there seems to be little, if any, reference to the basic principles involved.

The bitter arguments revolve around uniforms, ancient history and personal emotions.

Broadly speaking, the advantages of unification can be summed up as unity of purpose and, secondly, cohesiveness.

Unity of purpose from top to bottom, has growing significance with the development of modern and changing weapons and conditions. It has special relevance to the modern problem of "limited war"— the form of war (other than "peace-keeping") which is likely to involve Canada.

Cohesiveness ensures maximum effort in the direction of the desired "purpose". It includes such factors as the power to implement decisions in a comprehensive manner; ability to concentrate effort; flexibility; improved communications; effective economy in use of manpower and equipment, etc.

The commonest objections to unification are the anticipated difficulties in connection with expansion of part or all of the armed forces (if needed); ability, or lack of it, to co-operate with allies; morale.

For all major expansion the problems of unified and separate forces would be largely the same. This, therefore, is not a valid objection, as the scales tip somewhat in favour of unification.

Co-operation with allies, always difficult, seems to present no greater difficulties one way or the other.

Morale is the most important single thing in war. Many things go to make up morale but the one overwhelmingly important single factor is leadership.

It is significant that Napoleon's armies in their hey-day had a high level of morale, and it was because of leadership, not because they looked back into the distant past for inspiration and not because they wore old-style uniforms.

We must look to the future. Already we have Hovercraft which travel over land and water riding on a cushion of air; rocket harness for individual propulsion of foot soldiers over obstacles; reconnaissance "scopes" that see targets in the darkness; improved management and control techniques.

All these things call for modernization of the armed forces set-up. Canada with its small armed forces is in an ideal position to do this.

That is signed by Guy S. N. Gostling, Brigadier retired, of Niagara-on-the-Lake.

Mr. McIntosh: What has it got to do with unification?

Mr. Hellyer: It has a lot to do with unification. They are the principles which are required to build a single service and to make it cohesive and effective, and I commend them to my hon. friend.

As I indicated, Mr. Chairman, military opinion is by no means unanimous, but these two letters to which I have just referred and read into the record are indicative of dozens, perhaps hundreds, that I have received.

I might add that there are other high ranking officers who have spoken in favour of unification. For example, there is General Churchill-Mann who has spoken in favour, as well as General Keefler of Montreal. The other day an excellent article by General Worthington appeared in the paper and I commend it to my hon. friends.

Mr. McIntosh: I do not think it was excellent.

Mr. Hellyer: Then my hon. friend might reread it because it has a moral in it which is worth thinking about.

Mr. McIntosh: It was also based on false premises.

Mr. Hellyer: There are many retired senior officers who believe in unification of the armed forces. Perhaps it is regrettable that we did not have the opportunity to call more of these officers to give evidence in order to give some balance to the testimony instead of just calling recently retired officers, many of whom, on their own statement, retired because they were no longer in accord with the policy of unification of the armed forces.

Ministers of national defence are, by law, responsible for the armed forces. I believe I have to listen to all of the advice that is available. That is essential and fundamental. But having listened to it and evaluated it and analysed it, it is then the responsibility of the minister to make a decision and to recommend that decision to the government. Then, of course, he must persuade the government that his is the correct decision.

In the case of integration-unification, the chiefs of staff were heard when Bill C-90 was first presented. When the white paper was presented, believe me, Mr. Chairman, some strong views were expressed on the whole proposal. I had to be able to convince the government that the point of view being put forward in the white paper was the right point of view. That was my responsibility and I was able to do that. I am still able to do it.

Later, Mr. Chairman, when this Bill C-243, was presented to the government, the chiefs of staff endorsed what was being proposed and they have fully participated in the preparation of the bill right from its earliest stages. The bill was drafted with the complete cooperation of the senior military officers and commanders in the field who were part of the process. They participated in the drafting of my second reading speech. I think it is fair to say that more senior military and civil authorities in the defence department participated more fully in the preparation of my second reading speech than in any other speech given in this country by a defence minister since we have had defence forces in Canada.

Mr. McIntosh: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes.

Mr. McIntosh: I should like to know from the minister whether he agrees with one of his members who said that integration and unification are the same thing.

Mr. Hellyer: I have given my hon. friend a definition in the committee and I do not wish to repeat it now. If he wants me to make another speech later on I will do so.

Mr. McIntosh: I did not ask for a definition. Yes or no, are they the same thing or not?

Mr. Hellyer: It is part of the same cycle. If I may use a physical analogy, you could say that conception and childbirth were separate but that they are all part of the same natural phenomenon. Once you start integration and proceed to the extent that we have and to the extent we intend to proceed, Mr. Chairman, you lead to unification. I think the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.), summed it up very beautifully this afternoon when he said that unification is carrying integration as far as is practicable. In other words, it is carrying it to its logical end of a single service. I think that is undeniable logic and I commend it to my hon. friend.

My last point, Mr. Chairman, is this. Having listened to all of the points of view which have been expressed, I think it is incumbent on members and ministers to make up their minds on this matter. We have to use our own God-given intelligence to take a decision instead of simply relying on evidence of people in favour or the evidence of people not in favour. Of course that evidence is relevant, but when the crunch comes we have to use our own intelligence and, believe me, Mr. Chairman, this is all I have done and it is what the associate minister has done.

Speaking of the associate minister, Mr. Chairman, I regret more than I can say the attack that was made upon him in the press the other night by Charles Lynch, and I hope that Charles will have the decency to apologize to him in the way he apologized to the late Governor General. One does not have to have served during the war with high rank. One does not have to be a genius. One does not have to be a professor. All I ask, Mr. Chairman, is that we use our own God-given intelligence and examine all of the changes in technology which have taken place during the last 20 years. Looking at all the changes and evolutions in the world about us, I have come to the conclusion that this is a good measure. I strongly support this bill; I think it is right for the armed forces of Canada. I believe it is good for Canada, and it is good for our servicemen. Once it has been implemented I am sure they will find that it works effectively and that they can be part of it and proud of it. It is a policy that builds on the past but looks to the future rather than to the past.

• (6:30 p.m.)

I believe that Bill C-243 will come to be regarded as one of the most progressive pieces of legislation to have been passed in the history of Canada. We shall all be proud of it. I ask that the committee be allowed to conclude its deliberations and let the government accept its responsibility, let the Department of National Defence get on with the job.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Is the hon. member rising?

Mr. Nugent: I want to take part in this debate, merely to follow up the minister.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Villeneuve.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I followed very closely the contribution of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) to the debate on Bill No. C-243 without, however, noting anything special, anything new in his attitude towards the unification of the Canadian armed forces.

He started saying that the government would probably resort to closure once again to gag the opposition to the bill, in an outright sabotage of the rights of parliament. He overlooked the fact that the way in which his party has been handling the debate in the last several days constitutes in itself a "gag" which prevents parliament from exercising its right to reach a decision on any bill whatsoever.

He stated emphatically that the people on his left would support the government in passing Bill No. C-243. Now, the Leader of the Opposition surely does not have to worry about the rights of those members, or the intention he ascribes to them, saying they will vote with the government on this bill. Mr. Chairman, we vote for sound legislation, deserving the support of such people as are not restricted by political considerations, as do not wear blinkers that keep them from seeing beyond their own narrow political interest, as do not try to play politics with any issue.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

The Leader of the Opposition also tried to appeal to the emotions or feelings of French Canadians and English speaking Canadians, by mentioning France, Vimy, etc., although that has nothing to do with Bill No. C-243, with the unification of the armed forces.

What I most regretted in the statements which have been made during this debate, is the fact that once more, General Allard, the Chief of Staff of the Canadian Armed Forces is attacked. Unfair accusations are being made against him and, earlier, I acquainted myself with remarks made on April 4 last by the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) when he related the military career of General Allard. As shown in Hansard on page 14516, he said:

> November 1961: Her Majesty the Queen approved the promotion of General Allard as commander of the 4th division of the British Army on the Rhine, in Germany, the first Canadian to hold such a post.

The Leader of the Opposition who not only enjoys passing himself off as the leader of the loyal opposition of Her Majesty but who enjoys repeating it to us week after week and even in nearly all his speeches, should at least show some respect for the decision of Her Majesty the Queen who approved a promotion of General Allard as commander of the 4th division of the British Army on the Rhine.

And if General Allard deserved at that time—and I am sure he did—the confidence of the Queen, I think that the Leader of the Opposition and the members of the Conservative party should stop their smear of General Allard, imputing motives to him or charging him with remarks he may never have made or, at least, whose meaning is not that which was given to us in this house.

Besides, General Allard himself said that he had no interest in politics. We hear others, for instance, who are not actually serving in the army but who are former admirals, bluntly state before the standing committee on defence that they belong to the Progressive Conservative party. I am thinking, among others, of former Admiral Brock, and no one, however, would think for a moment to run him down or to discriminate against him. Why then discriminate against General Allard?

Is it because General Allard has his own ideas in politics? We do not know, but that is not the problem. How does General Allard come in this debate, since he has as much right as anyone else in Canada to his own opinions, even as chief of the Canadian armed forces?

Mr. Chairman, we in the Ralliement Créditiste will certainly vote for Bill No. C-243, and here are our reasons.

It is true that we are facing a dilemma. Should we favour the amalgamation of Canada's three services, or keep the status quo and maintain Canada's present defence organization?

If the present Leader of the Opposition was on the other side of the house, I am sure that, on the basis of the recommendations being made by the three services, he would bring down a bill similar to that now under consideration and that he would ask parliament to approve it.

But because it does not come from him and because his role is that of leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, he has to say no when the other says yes, and that is one of the main reasons for his opposition to Bill No. C-243.

Now, Mr. Chairman, should we maintain the status quo or proceed with the unification of the three armed services of Canada?

That is the choice we have to make and we must make it in the interest of the Canadian people and not in the interest of a Canadian political party. And we have to make that choice according to the facts, to the possibilities of improving the administration of national defence like any other department. What is the interest of Canada? What is the interest of the Canadian people, which it is our first duty and responsibility to protect?

At long last, the Canadian people are waiting for something from their government and from their institutions. In fact, they want a healthy, progressive, thrifty administration as far as the economy of the country is concerned.

As far as the Canadian people are concerned it would seem at first sight that these three basic points do not apply to the present type of administration, if we are to judge by the financial statements of governments from 1939 to date.

The report of the Glassco commission, volume 4, page 61 rightly notes:

> —the dramatic change that has taken place in the level of federal expenditures since 1939, a twelve-fold increase, has two main sources—the broad enlargement of social services and the development of a peacetime defence organization on an unprecedented scale.

We are now provided in peacetime with a defence system the like of which we probably never had during all wars.

The votes concerning national defence increased to $1,652 million in 1962, from $385 million for the 1950 fiscal year. For the first time, Canada's total military strength in peacetime is more than 125,000 men, to which must be added about 50,000 civilian employees of the armed forces. Practically half of that is made up of civilian employees.

Another important feature of the armed forces is that the number, the quality, the organization of personnel are determined according to the wartime tasks, thereby constituting a problem as to their employment in time of peace.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we see that, in 1950, the defence estimates amounted to $385 million; in 1952, to $1,447 million; in 1958, to $1,687 million and that, under the administration of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), who was then prime minister; in 1960, to $1,537 million; in 1962, to $1,652 million.

That total of $1,652 million which the Department of National Defence (including the Defence Research Council), the procurement of equipment and the civil defence cost us in 1961-62, accounted for 25 per cent of the whole budget. But taking into consideration manpower, equipment and other operating costs, defence is accountable for a much higher proportion of federal government expenditures. Excluding statutory subsidies, payments to provinces and interest on debt, the government expenditures amounted to less than $4 billion in 1961-62. More than 40 per cent of that amount was for defence.

Those figures are very eloquent and tend to prove clearly that the status quo cannot be maintained any longer as far as this matter is concerned. It now constitutes the greatest drain upon Canadian finances.

But this is not all. In September 1960, the servicemen represented 26 per cent of the 465,998 members of the public service taken in its broadest sense. The civilian personnel in the Department of National Defence, in other words the non-military employees in the department, represented 26 per cent of all department personnel. Defence accounted for 87 per cent of all government expenditures allocated for the buying and upkeep of equipment in 1961-62, and for almost 60 per cent of the money spent on supply.

The armed forces occupy six million acres of land in the various provinces and more than 140 million square feet of built surface, that is, about 80 per cent of all the building owned or leased by the government. These are the possessions of the Canadian army.

In view of these eloquent figures and the interest of the Canadian people, it behoves us to ask ourselves some serious questions and to find out whether the Department of National Defence answers the ardent desire of the people to have a healthy, progressive and economic administration.

Furthermore, the present administration obviously does not meet this basic wish of the Canadian people. We hear all sorts of recriminations, from all parts of the country, concerning the extravagant expenditures of the Department of National Defence.

The Glassco commission mentioned some enormous and foolish expenditures discovered within the Department of National Defence. One need only read the reports of the Auditor General. Unjustified expenses have been detected there for several years now.

The administration of the armed forces is now divided between three headquarters staffs. Thus expenditures are tripled at some levels and doubled at others. Were men created to serve peace or war?

We have reason to wonder when we have to pay in triplicate the expenditures of a department called the Department of National Defence.

It is obvious, Mr. Chairman, that a country needs a defence structure. But spending more efforts and money on war operations than on peace operations is something else. That difference is seen, for instance, when the time comes to help other countries.

In the minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 1 of the standing committee on national defence, for Tuesday, March 1, 1966 and Thursday, May 5, 1966, one can see, on page 11, the following statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin):

I think it would be useful to discuss three that are of major concern to us in Canada: NATO, Viet Nam and Rhodesia—

Before doing that, I wonder if I could take advantage of this meeting of the committee to recall that on March 23, I announced that the government proposed to ask parliament to approve a major expansion in our food aid program to India; in the coming year, we had decided to play our part in helping India to meet its current emergency by providing one million tons of food to that country. There is to be a meeting in Washington late today or tomorrow morning, and I would like to make a further announcement in this connection.

[Mr. Caouette.]

• (6:50 p.m.)

And the minister went on:

I now wish to advise the committee the government proposes to take an additional step to assist India. A sum of approximately $19 million remains to be paid by India as principal and interest on two loans which the government made in 1958—

Nine years ago.

—to cover the purchase of Canadian wheat and flour. It is proposed to forgive the remaining payments on these two loans.

"It is proposed to forgive the remaining payments". And that forgiveness has just taken place.

The first of the remaining payments was due on March 31.

My colleague, the Minister of Finance, has signed an agreement with the Indian High Commissioner to postpone this payment pending approval by parliament to cancel the full amount of $10 million which is outstanding. The agreement provides immediate relief in the amount of approximately $3.7 million, which this payment represents.

The cancellation of the outstanding debt will be additional to the food aid for India to which I have referred and which will cost about $71 million in this calendar year.

Seventy one million dollars, Mr. Chairman, that Canada will contribute to India, as announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Chairman, we think this unification will enable the government to save substantial amounts it can attribute, for instance, to the Department of Agriculture, so as to allow the latter to give our farmers much more help than they are getting at the present time. If we can provide $71 million in food and in kind during the 1966 fiscal year, we can surely appropriate over $120 million for our Canadian farmers in 1967 in order to give them, for instance, what they asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene), that is, $5.10 per hundredweight, of manufacturing milk.

If we can pay the millions I have just mentioned to India by reducing the expenditures of national defence, we could surely—and I feel it would be a kind of national defence effective for Canadians to save our farmers from complete failure and stagnation—give our farmers the possibility of meeting the needs of the entire population.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, concerning the unification of the three services, will be approved. And we are glad when we think that it will give us the opportunity to reconsider our national defence, to redefine it and to place it in the present international context of cold and threatening wars.

We are also pleased, because it will give us the unique opportunity, in my opinion, to reduce the expenses by establishing a rational administration within the department.

I would not like to see in five, ten or 20 years, some reports such as the one of the Glassco Commission on the exorbitant expenses of the Department of National Defence.

In our consideration of this bill, we must never forget that we must build a world based on peace and mutual aid. That is what we are doing in fact, when, in some countries, we try to promote relations of mutual help and conciliation, if you prefer, or those economic ties which may help us to be of assistance, not by providing weapons, but clothes, technicians, etc., to enable the people to work for a just and durable peace.

Let us promote peace and mutual assistance, and not threats, blackmail and war with its accompanying bloodshed.

This principle must prevail in our minds throughout the discussions, and let us not forget, moreover, that the whole Canadian people is involved, whether it is mentioned or not, in the defence of this country. Any sound administration cuts expenses to the bone and seeks maximum efficiency.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) said earlier that the chiefs of staff oppose unification because heads will roll. But, Mr. Chairman, if it is to benefit of the Canadian people that they should roll, we must not hesitate a single moment, and I think it is bad taste for the official opposition to keep accusing the government of all kinds of things in spite of the fact that the latter consulted, as pointed out earlier by the Minister of National Defence, the senior officials of the Department of National Defence or the officers of the three services. People are recommending unification of the Canadian army, that is one force instead of three, in short a single command and not ten different ones.

All this makes us wonder whether the present organization and administration of our defence are in line with those basic principles whereby we should aim at maximum efficiency at the lowest possible cost.

In the light of the previously quoted figures that were confirmed by the report of the Glassco commission and by the Auditor General of Canada, we can only reply in the affirmative.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to say anything more. Further, we have nothing against army officers, far from it. We have now the air force, the navy and the army; let there be one command and one Canadian army.

Hours are being spent here to discuss whether the uniform should be green, red or some other colour; such is not the purpose of Bill No. C-243. Its purpose is to unify the Canadian armed forces so as to promote a better understanding and a greater unity within the Canadian army. It would enable our Canadian soldiers to better understand one another, to better understand the national defence problems, because the problems which arose 10, 30 or 40 years ago are not the same as those facing us today.

I feel it is important for Canada today to have an army which knows what it wants, an army which knows where it is going, an army which realizes the important role it has to perform for its country's future, that is, to maintain peace at home and to foster it throughout the world instead of waging war.

[English]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes left before the dinner adjournment I would like to refer to the strange statements made by the Minister of National Defence and to the strange witnesses he called upon to support arguments that he advanced. He introduced the name of Charles Templeton. This amazes me because only a few years ago this same Charles Templeton wished a recession on the people of Canada in order to bring the Liberal party back to power. This is the kind of witness the minister depends upon to support his arguments, a man who, on national television, wished a recession on the Canadian people in the interests of the Liberal party. To me this is the most amazing thing that could happen in this chamber at this time. In addition, the minister harked back to the argument about the Arrow aircraft. It is amazing that he has re-introduced that argument.

I will call it seven o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and repeat this later.

The Chairman: Before suspending the sitting perhaps the committee would permit me to read the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment. They are as follows: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) Public Works—Port McNeill, B.C.; the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Grills), Agriculture; the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin), Agriculture.

National Defence Act Amendment

Pursuant to an order of the house made on Thursday, April 6, this sitting is suspended for one hour. The committee will resume its work at eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose this evening at seven o'clock clause 2 was under consideration.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, we all realize that in the lobby there is something much more attractive going on. I, along with other members of the house, would like to have the privilege of watching it. However, business of the house must go on.

At two minutes to seven o'clock I was drawing attention to the obvious weakness of the Minister of National Defence, who found it necessary to bring in the name of Mr. Charles Templeton in support of an argument he was putting forward. What I was saying at that time bears repeating. Charles Templeton is a former Liberal candidate who, along with some of his supporters, had envisaged himself as a potential leader of the Liberal party. His political ambitions died the minute he appeared on television and told the country that he wished upon the people of Canada a recession in order to bring about a return of the Liberal government in Canada. Goodbye Mr. Templeton. This is the kind of man the Minister of National Defence now calls in to support his arguments.

The minister put forward some other strange arguments this afternoon. He specifically referred to the cancellation of production of the Arrow. He has put himself on record as to why at that time he considered this to be one of the worst disasters in Canadian history. Why did he consider it to be a disaster? He said it was disastrous because an air speed record could be established for Canada by the Arrow. He apparently was not concerned about the capability of the Arrow in a defence role.

The minister knows full well that the production of the Arrow was the subject of a decision on the part of the St. Laurent government prior to the election of that year, a decision which was not followed because of the pending election. Let me refer to the evidence of General Foulkes, another prospective Liberal candidate who did not make good in that regard. In 1963 when testifying before the defence committee, General Foulkes had this to say:

> This proposal was looked at by the St. Laurent government in the last few months and they decided at that time, with the election on their hands that this was one of the first things they would have to get at when they came back because it could not be carried on within the present appropriation.

That general in the army, a prospective Liberal candidate, told the committee that the St. Laurent government had already made a decision to cancel the Arrow. I do not know why the minister continues to revive these arguments, but it should be brought to his attention that they in fact contradict what he has been trying to shove down the throat of the Canadian electorate. General Foulkes then went on to say this:

> That is the story of the Arrow, but the chiefs of staff came to the conclusion that it did not make military sense to purchase aircraft at a cost of $8 million each when we could maintain aircraft with similar performance from the end of an American production line at something about $2 million. Furthermore, we could not see from where the funds were coming to finish the production of the Arrow.

This afternoon the minister suggested that the cancellation of the Arrow was a disaster because Canada did not establish an air speed record. The minister took strong objection in this regard. I suggest if the truth of the matter were known he objected strongly to this cancellation because of some economic situation in the city of Toronto. Had he admitted that as being his reason for objecting, I should give him full credit. Every member of parliament should make every possible representation to see that the economy of his own area is looked after.

The minister said this afternoon that the Leader of the Opposition and members on this side of the house were repeating lies. That is the very thing the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development accused me of the other day when I was honest enough to say that I was interested in the financial welfare of my constituents. I do not mind admitting that I will take every opportunity in this house of making representations which will improve the welfare of the people in my part of the country.

Earlier in his remarks this afternoon the minister accused the Leader of the Opposition of repeating lies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): That drew some applause from the Liberal side, but not a denial from the minister. If we are repeating lies, it has been confirmed that we are not originating them. Whose lies are we repeating? A good portion of what the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon was direct quotation from the present Minister of Justice. Was the hon. member then repeating lies?

Who originated the lies that we are supposed to be repeating? Were they originated by the present Minister of Justice or by former serving officers such as Miller, Moncel, Landymore, Brooks, or Foulkes? Are those the people the minister had in mind? Is the minister or any member of the Liberal party prepared to get up and say that those gentlemen were lying? Apparently no one is prepared to make such a statement and therefore we can assume that we were not repeating lies when we quoted the arguments of those gentlemen.

The minister took it upon himself to single out a certain pressman. Is the minister prepared to identify the members of the press gallery whose lies we are repeating? Apparently he is not, so we may take it that he is not prepared to back up anything he said this afternoon. He simply voiced a bunch of words and now does not have the intestinal fortitude to support what he said only two hours ago.

The minister saw fit to single out a distinguished member of the press gallery and said he hoped he would have the honour or the gumption to make an apology. All I can say is that the minister in singling out this particular individual, as he has done on other occasions, has done a most cowardly thing, knowing full well the man to whom he referred has no comeback.

Mr. Hellyer: Are you kidding?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): He asked him to apologize.

Mr. Hellyer: Have you read his column?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): At least that gentleman, when he found he was in error, was big enough to retract his statement, but apparently the minister is not big enough to retract anything. He made certain statements this afternoon which he is apparently not willing to support at this time. Will the minister get up and accuse the present Minister of Justice of lying when he wrote the words quoted this afternoon? Will the minister get up and accuse the former serving officers who have been quoted of originating these lies? What the minister did this afternoon is exactly what he accused the Leader of the Opposition of doing.

Let me bring this whole thing a little closer to home. In quoting what took place in this house on March 3 hon. members have referred to a statement made by the chairman of the defence committee. In this regard I accuse the minister of deliberately supporting that lie told in this house. On March 3 the chairman of that committee caused a procedural argument in the house when he said that the committee had voted on a certain issue. The record indicates what happened but when I called upon the minister to get up and support that statement he failed to do so. By his failure to deny what we suggested happened, the minister has supported that lie. The fact that the statement was a lie can be proved by Hansard, or the records of that committee.

The lie appears in the evidence which is contained in Hansard and in the committee's record. The chairman of the defence committee lied to the house when the question of privilege was brought up, and the minister approved it. Now he accuses members on this side of repeating lies, and yet he cannot support that statement. I can and do support the statement that he has stood by in the house and allowed members of his party to lie on his behalf.

Recently we heard the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra say that he had the honour of leading the defence committee. I say he did not lead it with honour. This afternoon we heard from the hon. member from Victoria (B.C.), who chaired the committee during the first half of its meetings. We all know he had a distinguished war record. He has done honour to this country and has served this country well. Despite the fact that we are well aware of his record and of his rank, his speech sounded to me more like a speech made by a tailor than by a commodore. He spoke on matters which had nothing whatsoever to do with the unification bill.

I have not had a chance, nor has any other member of the house, to review the remarks made by the former chairman of the defence committee, but I do recall his saying something about looking in the rear view mirror and looking back on the outmoded defence methods. My understanding of his statement is that he must have been referring to the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany and all the allied countries as being outmoded, because they follow the tradition of three services rather than the supposedly pathfinding unification bill which the minister is trying to put across.

The minister said that we are going to lead the way. The government has at every opportunity called upon every distinguished serviceman known to them to speak in support of the unification bill. However, despite the fact that the members on the Liberal side of the house have used the cowardly approach by referring to Lord Mountbatten as a supporter of unification, the fact is that Lord Mountbatten certainly does not support the concept of unification as the minister sees it. Not only does he not support it, he ridicules it. Lord Mountbatten, whom the government has tried to use as a witness on its behalf, has ridiculed the approach which is now being used by the minister.

Several speakers on the other side of the house, including the Minister of Transport, have advanced arguments on behalf of civilian control. I say that there is no need for argument on that basis. As was pointed out this afternoon, we know of no one who has gone on record as opposing civilian control. These remarks were made the other day by the Minister of Transport and they were also made on this side of the house. I agree with them; civilian control is important. As far as the Canadian forces are concerned, civilian control is exercised by the parliament of Canada, and the decision made here must be carried out.

I did not have the opportunity to hear General Allard's evidence before the defence committee.

Mr. Prud'homme: That is too bad.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I wish the hon. member for Saint-Denis would cease interjecting. If his interjections were to appear on the record we would have to print a separate volume of Hansard, but we would not have even one page for what he says when on his feet. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be a good idea if you asked him to rise when he wishes to say something.

Mr. Prud'homme: I said it is too bad the hon. member did not hear General Allard's evidence.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I congratulate the hon. member for standing up at last.

To return to General Allard and the fact that when he appeared before the defence committee I did not have the opportunity of hearing him, let me mention that I do not know him. There is no doubt that he has served Canada well and has a distinguished war record. However, let me come back to what the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Transport and many hon. members on this side have referred to, namely civilian control. Since the control of the services is exercised by the House of Commons I feel that I can rightfully stand up and criticize what General Allard may do outside of his particular line of duty. I do so, despite what the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have said, namely that General Allard can speak anywhere on any subject and at any time without clearing his speeches with the minister. If the minister were to look into the rules and regulations he would discover that such is not the case. The Secretary of State for External Affairs can say as often as he wishes that he will not inhibit freedom of speech in this country, but let me hark back to what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay West, namely that the serving personnel in our armed forces or any visiting forces are not free to say what they like. The hon. member referred to the German officer who was to speak in Winnipeg, but then found out that what he wished to say was not in accordance with the rules and therefore he was not permitted to do it.

The minister should have learned his lesson from that. He is also aware of the fact that not only does General Allard have to clear his speeches with him, but he has to obtain the minister's permission before making them. How can the minister stand up in the house and say that he has so much confidence in General Allard that he will allow him to make any statements he may wish to make at any time? This is ridiculous. Since civilian control of the armed services is ultimately exercised by parliament, I maintain that we as members of the house are entitled to tell General Allard that according to the rules and regulations, and despite what the minister says, he is not permitted to make statements outside the house about any matters that are being discussed in the house.

Mr. Prud'homme: It is too bad the hon. member could not have heard General Allard's evidence.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Why does the hon. member not go out and watch the hockey game? He has his neck away out, whether he knows it or not. It is just because I do not want to embarrass somebody on the minister's staff that the hon. member got away with it the other night. I would suggest to the hon. member that he behave himself because, whether or not he thinks it is funny, I can place him, the minister and some members of the minister's staff, in a very embarrassing position. When it comes to dealing with the minister I have no scruples, but I have sympathy for some members of the minister's staff. So I would advise the hon. member to behave himself, because it is not too late for me to do something about it.

To get back to what I was saying—

Mr. Prud'homme: You are lost.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have had occasion to stand in the house and hear this type of interjection and interruptions. They do not bother me; in fact they keep me going. The hon. member is making a mistake if he thinks he is getting away with it. As I said once before with regard to the actions of the Liberal party, any time that the snake pit becomes active again I am prepared to wait it out. They do not bother me a bit. If the hon. member would stand up on his feet, something he seldom does, except on the bidding of the minister, I would appreciate hearing what he has to say.

• (8:30 p.m.)

In speaking today the minister has revived some old arguments. He is going to lead Canada and the world in the reformation of their defence forces. He is doing this by overlooking a solemn promise made by him and by the Prime Minister. One would have thought looking back a couple of years, that the first thing any Liberal defence minister would do on assuming office would be to carry out the solemn promises made to the effect that the Liberals were going to renegotiate Canada out of the nuclear agreement. This matter was mentioned this afternoon and brought clearly to the minister's attention. This is another broken promise. Then again, who but these Liberals could call breaking promises the successful operation of a government? There have been broken promises all the way down the line.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal directly with the minister and his unification bill. I return to the old argument that the minister has no confidence whatever in this bill. Again I say that if he had confidence in the bill, as he maintains he has, he would follow a different course. This afternoon he made an odd statement when he said that most of the senior officers were in favour of unification, but that some were against. Did he conduct a referendum? Did he get around to all the officers in order to arrive at this opinion? Unless he did, how can he say that these officers support it?

If the minister has the confidence he says he has in this unification bill, why can he not do what was done during wartime when all the serving personnel in the Canadian forces were reattested? This was done during a war. I think I quoted figures the other night which indicated that, of all those serving in the forces at that time, only five officers and 532 men refused to be reattested to go overseas. This is a time of peace, yet the minister and his supporters in the government have said that to reattest the men today would bring about chaos. Well, you cannot have it two ways. If it is going to bring about chaos, then you do not have confidence in this measure. The only chaos that could result would be the retirement from the service of those people who no longer wish to serve in a unified force. There would be chaos for those members of the army, navy and air force who had an opportunity to volunteer to go into this force and who supported the minister. This is the chaos to which reference was made. Either you are going to show confidence in the unification bill or you are going to reattest the men. The minister has not got the intestinal fortitude to test the servicemen on this bill.

The minister can dictate to the people of Canada through the press because he can get a favourable press. However he does not dare give the serving personnel of this country a privilege which belongs to them during war, when they have an opportunity to volunteer. The men came back from Europe and there was a war going on in the Pacific. Nobody had to go to the Pacific unless he specifically signed his name to a document indicating that he volunteered for service there. There was no compulsion whatever. However, today in a time of peace, when unification is under consideration, this minister is forcing down the throats of serving personnel of this country the obligation to serve with a unified force. This is compulsion. As I said before, during the committee hearings when members had an opportunity to vote on an amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that would give all our serving personnel an opportunity to volunteer for the unified force, members of the Liberal party, no doubt on instructions of the minister, said no. The minister has refused our serving personnel an opportunity voluntarily to join the unified force. In other words, I say it again,

Mr. Minister, you have brought about conscription in this country because every person serving in our army, navy and air force from now until his retirement time is serving under compulsion.

Of course, the minister will stand up and say this is a ridiculous argument, that serving personnel can get out on six months notice. My argument is that this opportunity should be given to each and every person in the service. They should be given an opportunity to belong to that service voluntarily. There should be no compulsion whatever. The Canadian government did not use compulsion during the war, but we have it now. This adds up to one thing, a dictatorial approach. We have ample examples of the minister's dictatorial attitude day in and day out in the House of Commons when members of his party stand up and read from prepared texts containing that which the minister wants them to put across. The fear is always present that if a member expresses an individual thought something will be said that will not be in agreement with the minister's approach.

The Chairman: Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Nugent: I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that after listening to the hon. member for Cape Breton South the minister is going to be very pleased to hear that I have developed a sort of grudging admiration for him following his speech this afternoon. I want to emphasize, of course, that it is a sort of grudging admiration. Whenever one excels in something one gets a sort of grudging admiration. Since the minister has relied throughout this debate on the tried and true system of the big lie developed by Adolph Hitler, and since he is so adept in the practice of this system, I developed a sort of grudging admiration for the amount of skill he brought to bear in using the system.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I should allow that slur to go unchallenged. I am going to tell my hon. friend that if he ever says that outside the House of Commons I will have him prove it before a court of law.

Mr. Nugent: Well, Mr. Chairman, this is certainly a great advance for the minister. He is the only cabinet minister, perhaps the only member who ever sat in a legislative body such as this, who was charged before the house with an offence which would certainly have barred him from sitting in the cabinet, or perhaps might have been regarded by the house as an offence which would have rendered him unfit to hold a seat in this house. This statement comes from the minister who sits there now, who still sits there, under the charge I brought against him in this house. He, by his own voice, refused unanimous consent to the only method by which he could clear his name. This is the first time this has ever happened in British parliamentary history in any legislative body such as ours. Certainly, this is an indication the minister has climbed the ladder of honour to quite a degree since he in such cowardly fashion turned down the only way he could clear his name. Certainly, I am pleased to see that apparently he has now some regard for his name and reputation.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South).]

However, in case the minister is interested, tomorrow I will be speaking in Manitoba. I will be back here on Thursday and I will repeat that I would be glad to meet the minister in a court of law. I assure the minister, in case he is unaware, that courts of law outside this house are not as tolerant as the house. If a person is charged with tampering with the evidence of a witness, he does not have a right to avoid a trial in a court of law no matter how much he may scream and try to avoid that trial he so richly deserves.

However, I was going to be kind to the minister. I had thought, since the only thing for which we can praise him is excellence in one regard, that is his ability as a salesman of the super lie, that certainly he did that which is most essential for one who wants to sell the big lie, and that is to give the appearance of utmost honesty and indignation that anyone should lie—

• (8:40 p.m.)

The Chairman: Order. I fear that I must interrupt the hon. member at this point in order to suggest that perhaps some of the phraseology he is using now is outside the limits of parliamentary language.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, the technique of the big lie is what I will accuse the minister of excelling in. This is a sales technique that is known, and I do not think it has ever been found unparliamentary. I might point out that I did not hear any complaint from the Chair when the minister had the effrontery to suggest to my leader this afternoon that he was repeating in this house this lie argument; so I thought I might very well make this my theme.

This paragon of virtue went on to repeat this lie, as though it was a terrible crime that no one should hear about. He then said that my leader was casting aspersions on officers, but no one has cast more aspersions than has this minister of defence.

I would suggest that the epitome of hypocrisy on the part of the minister is for him to suggest that this appears horrible to him. All I was doing in complimenting him upon putting himself in the position of one who is bound to be the leader in this particular technique of selling the big lie, was suggesting that the minister was pretending he was a paragon of virtue. He carried this technique off very well. In fact, I detected genuine indignation in his voice when he talked about repeating the lie. He was not indignant because the lie was repeated; he was indignant because he understood that he was the only one in the house who had a stranglehold on that technique.

He proceeded to give us a perfect example of this, Mr. Chairman. He repeated a technique which he has encouraged the backbenchers in his own party to use in this chamber, namely the reading of newspaper editorials and other misleading documents which suggest that those who are opposed to unification belong in the horse and buggy age.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nugent: I do not mind that from the Liberal benches, Mr. Chairman. The minister of defence was also indignant at the remarks of my leader, suggesting that some reflection was being cast upon gallant gentlemen. The minister suggested that what my leader said could only be taken as a reflection on gallant gentlemen who have worked hard for integration and believed in it, who went as far as they could and then had to quit because they believed that the further step of unification would destroy what they had worked so hard and so long to achieve.

In the suggestion of the minister that those who were against his views belong in the horse and buggy age and are against progress, we see a great example of the technique of the big lie, and in two ways. First of all, we see his attempt to say that people like Moncel, Miller, Dyer, and so on, belong in the horse and buggy age, even though they may have been responsible for whatever savings and improvements the minister has been able to bring about.

Second, we have what I can only call the epitome of hypocrisy in the suggestion that what the Leader of the Opposition said could be taken as a reflection on gallant gentlemen. How much more striking example can we see of complete reliance on the big lie, Mr. Chairman? You clothe yourself in the garments of honesty, integrity and righteousness and then repeat things which are untrue, that would be said only by one who believes in the philosophy that the bigger the lie and the bolder you tell it, the more likely it will be believed. That is exactly what the minister is doing.

I should like to give a few more concrete examples of this, with some evidence to back them up. We have for instance the big lie so often told on the other side, that those who are opposed to unification are against progress; that they are opposed to defence planning to enable us to figure out where we are going, when previously there has been too much muddle headed thinking. Now for the first time, according to the minister, we are going to plan things properly: We will now get all the advice we need, we will know where we are going and will all pull together. This is what the minister calls the new spirit of progress.

Let me give some examples of how much planning there was in unification. The minister, who is so ready to suggest that some aspersions might be cast upon the honour of honourable gentlemen serving in our forces, proceeds to give the most all round condemnation of the chiefs of staff I have ever heard, with arguments which are not honest in support of that condemnation. Although the minister did not give us any names he suggested to us that in 1964 there were many who were opposed to the entire idea of integration. He is now surprised to find how many of them agree with it. We are supposed to believe that there has been a wholesale conversion, or something. He very conveniently omits to indicate how we can check these names, but of course we know that it is a figment of his imagination.

The minister then proceeds to quote the opinions of some anonymous servicemen, after having assured us that those who had risen to the highest positions in the military affairs of this country should be ignored because they belong in the horse and buggy age. These anonymous authors quoted by some unidentified newspaper say we should speed up the process and get on with the job. This is all to support the biggest lie of all which the minister has spread in this house, and on which both he and the Liberal government must rely today, namely that integration-unification is one package; that the great benefits of integration that we have been told about cannot be realized unless and until we complete unification. When this grandiose scheme is completed we will then start to derive the benefits.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Having mentioned a few things with regard to which I thought some evidence should be placed on the record, I should like to mention one other matter before I turn to the evidence given before the committee. I listened very attentively while the minister told us that in 1964 it was his responsibility to sell the cabinet on the feasibility, the practicability and the advisability of unification as defined in his white paper. He stated he did that, and it was still his responsibility to do it. I wonder what the minister told the cabinet that was not revealed to the chiefs of staff? I wonder what he said. When the white paper came out in 1964. The evidence before the defence committee was clear that nobody in a position of responsibility appearing before the committee knew of or understood what the minister tried to call unification. This ought to be a clear warning to the cabinet that it has been sold a bill of goods. If what was proposed was clear to the minister, it was not clear to anybody else. It was not clear that back in 1964 the minister was considering the implementation of unification. Following that reasoning it is obvious that the bill of goods the minister sold the cabinet in 1964 is not the bill of goods he is trying to sell to the country today.

Volume 19 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the national defence committee contains evidence of Admiral Brock, the first man whose head the minister cut off. I wish to read several excerpts from that evidence. The minister this afternoon had the effrontery to say that there was no evidence to support what the right hon. Leader of the Opposition had said, when the right hon. gentleman said he had read every word of evidence, and that he had come to his conclusions on weighing that evidence. It is time to place some of the evidence on record here. The newspapers have not published it all and obviously many government members have not comprehended it or have not paid attention to it.

On page 975 of volume 19, about one third of the way down the page, we find this:

Mr. Churchill: You took the same conclusion from the white paper, then, that I did. The concluding remarks of the white paper, which I think should be quoted, are:

"In this paper no attempt has been made to set down hard and fast rules for future policy and development.

[Mr. Nugent.]

... The paper is a charter, a guide, not a detailed and final blueprint. The policy outlined in it is not immutable. It can be altered or adapted to meet the requirements of changing circumstances, national and international."

It is clear from those words that if the minister succeeded in selling his policy to the cabinet, he was given a blank cheque. After all, at that time the minister was the fair-haired boy. The machinations taking place in the defence department were not known to the public, though I expect some of his colleagues had their suspicions.

The evidence continues:

Did you conclude from that that there was no finality in 1964 with regard to proposals being put forward?

Rear Admiral Brock: I could not have come to any other conclusion, inasmuch as I had heard—from his own lips—assurances from the minister that his programs would be cautiously proceeded with and implemented.

That is not what happened. Senior officers found suddenly that they had to leave, because they could not agree with the minister's sudden decision to implement unification. Admiral Brock had had the minister's assurances, we know how much those are worth.

The committee heard the evidence of Admiral Brock. Members can draw their own conclusions about the minister's suggestions that he was trying to bring in a system where planning was paramount, where the services would be together, and where everybody would know where he was going. That was the plan for the 1970's. Unfortunately the rest of us are not clear about the meaning of this measure, and the minister has not explained it.

I wish to quote further from the evidence of Admiral Brock, the chief of maritime command, one of the senior officers in the entire Canadian Armed Forces. Certainly no one has had a more distinguished record of service. Though the minister may have slighted people, though he may have lectured them as he did this afternoon, he cannot cast aspersions on Admiral Brock's veracity.

At page 977 is the following:

Mr. Lambert: I want to thank the committee for letting me step in at this time. Admiral Brock, in July of 1964—which followed the passage of Bill No. C-90 by about a matter of six or seven weeks—had there been at that time any disclosure to commanders of your level any plan for the integration of either the headquarters in Ottawa, or in the field?

Rear Admiral Brock: So far as I am aware, the answer is no,—

Remember, the chief of maritime command is speaking:

—and so far as I am aware, no such plan existed. In fact, it is my understanding—and it was the understanding of most of us, that the minister meant seriously what he said—that he was going to work his way through this, that nothing was inflexible and the plan would be developed as we went along.

I expect that most members in the house recall the minister's saying that the big distinction he brought to his department was that for the first time in Canada's history the admirals or generals, and others of similar rank, would know where they were going. There was to be sound planning for the future. Unfortunately we have evidence from witnesses that no senior officer knew of any plan in the minister's mind at that time.

Then, to continue the quotation from the evidence:

Mr. Lambert: Nothing had been disclosed to you with regard to a single unified defence force?
Rear Admiral Brock: Certainly not.

This is referring to July of 1964, when the minister had referred to integration and unification as one package.

It continues:

Mr. Lambert: The reason I raise this is that such great reliance is placed upon the fact that at some point in the white paper there is one phrase that integration is the first step towards a single unified defence force, and that this was notice to all concerned, and what we are seeing today was apparent to everyone. What I am asking is: Was it apparent, or was it even disclosed in any degree at all to the senior commanders of the forces?

● (9:00 p.m.)

The answer was:

Rear Admiral Brock: No, not that I am aware of, and of course it would be quite unreasonable to expect 140,000 sailors, soldiers and airmen to read the white paper, even if they could have gained anything from this.

I myself asked him some questions on this point. In the course of his argument the minister has placed straight reliance on the contention that unification and integration were part of one big plan. The reason the minister wishes to tie them together is that there is much evidence before the committee that the services will benefit from integration, but none that they will benefit from unification. There is plenty of evidence that unification would be harmful, and my hon. friend from Calgary North has listed at least six different reasons why this would be the case. The reason the minister is trying to sell this big lie that integration and unification are all one package is that unless he can succeed in tying them together there is nothing which could be said in favour of the present bill, since unification is something which all the evidence condemns.

All the benefits talked about by the serving officers called by the minister are benefits resulting from integration. There is not one shred of evidence that unification will bring any benefits. I intend to quote from the record to show how unfounded the minister's argument is in this regard. Let me read from volume 19 at page 984, where I was questioning Rear Admiral Brock:

Perhaps I will put it more directly. You were in a position that with anything as startling as the unification proposal that the minister now puts forward—anything so far reaching—in your experience in a responsible command position did you feature such an innovation being brought in without a great deal of long distance planning with the best advice of all the senior personnel?

This is what the minister has just been talking about. He told us he had to do some real planning—get the best advice together and come up with a real plan. The question is based on exactly what the minister said he had been doing. Here is the reply:

Rear Admiral Brock: Well, Mr. Nugent, really there was not anything startling about it because anyone who has been involved in the military field has thought about these things. We know that the very same sort of proposition has been advocated by crackpots in other countries and discarded and, as far as we were aware, within military circles, it was thought to be just not on; Canada could not go this way.

The evidence continues:

Mr. Nugent: Let us suppose that it had been taken seriously, that the minister was going to implement it and that you had known about it; how much planning then would have been required, do you think, between the conception of the idea and the formulation of that policy by the minister and the advice given by responsible officials as to how long it would be before you would be in a position to complete the plans to start to implement it?

Rear Admiral Brock: I cannot give you a specific answer to this. This partly depends upon the stability of the government, for one thing. During my last period in Ottawa as assistant chief of the naval staff and vice chief, I served five ministers of national defence, and everybody wanted a radical review of defence policies.

This minister tells us he is the only one who has decided to get off the horse's back and drive forward. The answer continues:

It seems to me before we can decide how long it would take to formulate in detail the practical application of a new way of things we much have some consistency in the general national approach and outlook. The military establishment, interrelated with the Department of External Affairs, must be sure of their course and it takes a good many years to make a change as great as this.

I will skip two lines, an exchange between the chairman and myself, and continue:

Mr. Nugent: Then would unification, as the minister suggested bringing it in, be brought in in a responsible way without a plan and are you aware that there ever was a plan?

Rear Admiral Brock: I am aware that there was not a plan. There was not a plan that was made known to the then responsible senior military advisers.

I will pause there. I hate to rub it in. It is only the minister's speech this afternoon and his bragging about his planning innovations which prompted me to read this again into the record. Admiral Brock is surely one of the officers who must have known. There are others who knew, and I intend to deal with what they had to say.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Nugent: I am sure I will have sufficient information to enable me to make another speech or two.

Mr. Churchill: I am encouraged to say a few more words on this bill because of the intervention by certain people of some importance on the other side of the house. The chairman of the defence committee, the hon. member for Victoria, (B.C.), spoke earlier, and the Minister of Transport intervened on Friday. Once the Minister of Transport enters a debate like this one, it is wide open for anyone to speak because I do not know of any person on the government side who knows less about this particular matter than does the Minister of Transport. Then there was the intervention on Wednesday of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, a contribution which deserves some attention. Today we heard from the Minister of National Defence.

I think it is important that in a debate there should be an exchange of opinions. This is what debate is. Arguments are put forward by one side or the other. Whether or not opinions are changed in the course of these discussions is an open question. But I do know that a great many members of the House of Commons, to say nothing of the public, have learned much more about the unification bill than they knew before.

We have heard people announcing that a great many meetings of the defence committee were held and that a number of witnesses were heard, and that in these circumstances all that remains is for the issue to be decided here by a vote. I submit to you, sir, that all members of parliament should have an opportunity to find out what happened in the committee. Not every member of parliament has the time to read the voluminous reports which are prepared by committees, and sometimes a member will benefit by hearing a summary of what has transpired in a committee. I do that here, and have for many years. I do not serve on all the committees but I like to hear from members who serve on committees. I listen to their reports to the house, just what they amount to, and then if I am in doubt about some matter I refer to the detailed committee proceedings. This goes on all the time.

I found a great deal of interest not so long ago in hearing the debate on the transportation bill, one of the most important bills to come before the House of Commons in recent years. The committee on transportation had an enormous number of meetings. It heard expert evidence. We have been encouraged in the present debate to pay no attention to expert evidence. The committee on transportation had a different view. It called in experts and listened to them very carefully. Then the bill came before the house, having been amended to quite an extent in the committee, and was later amended in the house.

That debate was very interesting. A great deal of information was put in front of us, to such an extent that I found it was possible for me to participate in the debate, which I did, and the Minister of Transport will recall that it was on my initiative he got tripped up over the clause on the Crowsnest Pass rates and suffered what he later termed a humiliation—and it was, because he was very careless.

I give that as an example of what should be done following the meetings of committees. A committee brings back a report to the house. The members sitting in at committee hearings have an obligation to give a report to the House of Commons in order that other members who have not participated in the committee hearings may get a summary of what was done there. Then you have the other aspect of it, that there are members of the House of Commons who, for one reason or another, do not serve on committees in which they are interested but who have a great deal of knowledge of the subject matter before those committees, and those members should have the opportunity to debate the issues in the House of Commons. That is precisely the course of this debate. We have spent several days on it, but not any more than are required, because of the nature of the subject and its importance.

An opportunity has been presented for members of the defence committee to state the case in the House of Commons, and there is an opportunity for other members who were not on that committee to express their views on this vital matter. Over and above that, each member of the House of Commons hopes that somebody somewhere in the general public will hear something about his views and perhaps be influenced by them.

I also think that in this particular matter of defence we have an obligation to speak on behalf of those people who cannot be heard, who have not the privilege of making their voices heard. That applies to all the people within the services, because under their regulations they do not have the privilege of making public speeches.

There is a widespread discontent within the services, and those of us who are aware of that think we are duty bound to bring it to the attention of the government and to the attention of the people of Canada. If not, you hear only one side. You hear only from the minister, telling the public that everything is fine within the services. Those of us on this side of the chamber know perfectly well that that is not the case. We have had too much information given to us, in one way or another, to show that there is massive discontent within the services and that it has been occasioned by the action of the government.

In the defence committee we drew attention to the very large number of officers who left the services prior to their normal retirement. Many of those people left the services because they were told by the minister that they either had to go along with his proposal or get out. A great number of junior officers left the services early because of what they saw going on—uncertainty in the Department of National Defence, too many respected senior officers fired out of hand, and great doubt as to the future in the services.

During the course of the committee hearings I had occasion to discuss with one of the witnesses the number of personnel who had passed through national defence headquarters. I think that in the space of two years 3,000 officers had passed through national defence headquarters: I call it Grand Central Station. A great number of those officers left the services entirely; others were shifted back and forth. I do not know of any business that could operate efficiently with such a large personnel turnover; and yet under the minister that is what was going on at national defence headquarters.

It is no wonder that General Fleury said he could not stand it any longer. He did not know from one day to the next what officers were going to be working with him at headquarters. That is the type of chaos created by the minister. It is quite proper that this should be brought to the attention of members of the house and to the attention of the public.

The trouble stems from the erratic behavior of the minister and his impetuosity to get this particular bill passed at the present time. I think he selected this as his centennial project. He had to think of something, and last summer he decided this would be his centennial project and he would end up in 1967 with a newly designed defence force, a unified force. Otherwise I cannot see any reason for the haste, because all the advice that was given to him was to the contrary.

The senior officers, even those still serving, have said, "Give us more time to work out the aspects of integration. We need more time to straighten out materiel command," which takes in the supply end of it. They have said "We need more time on Training Command." and there is the greatest doubt in the world as to whether Training Command is going to work, and work effectively.

The minister brushes all this aside as inconsequential. The people actually working at the job do not find it inconsequential at all; they find it a very difficult task. They are worried about the consequences, and if an emergency comes upon us this year, I have the gravest doubts as to whether the present organization could effectively meet that emergency. I think the minister would be forced back to the older system of three services.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, the chairman of the defence committee in its later stages, who operated moderately effectively after we had given him instruction as to how to conduct committee hearings, reported to the house yesterday with regard to this bill and made what I consider to be the most astonishing statement I have heard with regard to it. At page 14714 of yesterday's Hansard you find these immortal words of his:

> Only one thing of any real importance remained to be done and that was to give the new single force which we had created in 1964 a name. Bill C-243 asks us to do that. No clause in Bill C-243, other than clause 2 before the committee now, is of any real significance. I say that because clause 2 gives the force a new name.

Not content with a ridiculous statement like that, he repeated it about seven minutes later. That comes from the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who acted as chairman of that committee. It comes from the man who reported to the house that there had been 55 meetings and 38 witnesses heard. He said that the only purpose of the bill was to give the forces a new name. Well, if his words are accurate, there has been a terrible waste of time here in parliament and in committee. But of course his words are absolutely inaccurate.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Far from just giving the forces a new name, the bill destroys the three services, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force, and substitutes another force for those three. Clause 2 of the bill to which he referred does that by amending the present act, striking out those names, and making one service called the Canadian Armed Forces.

A little further on this same clause provides for the creation of a special force. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra did not mention that but I intend to mention it. Further on in the bill—and we will be coming to this later on—clause 6 provides for the compulsory transfer of the people now in the navy, army and air force into the single service, the Canadian Armed Forces.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one can readily realize the absolutely erroneous impression given by the chairman of that committee to the house when he spoke yesterday and said that it was just a simple little matter of changing the name. That is not so at all. On this side of the house we have said that we should retain the three services, work away at the integrated side of it, and see whether we can make a success of it. In 1964 I had doubts concerning that and opposed the legislation right down to third reading, just as I am opposing this. I still have in my mind a big question mark with regard to integration itself.

Mr. Hellyer: You are consistent.

Mr. Churchill: If I can be shown that it can be successful in respect of the integration of the supply forces and so on, then I am prepared to accept integration. I believe, however, that it is wrong to have just one chief of staff. I do not intend to repeat the argument I used in 1964, but I believe, now when integration has not been effected, it is foolish to go ahead with unification.

[Mr. Churchill.]

The bill of course does more than just change a name. It wipes out the three services and makes one service. We have been told that everybody in that one service will be—although not called sailors, soldiers and airmen—working quite a bit either at sea, on the land or in the air. We have been told there will be no transfer of people from one area to another. This is not accurate, because this clause 2 with which we are dealing, modifies section 17 of the original act. I will read the words:

> In an emergency, or if considered desirable in consequence of any action undertaken by Canada under the United Nations Charter, the North Atlantic Treaty or any other similar instrument for collective defence entered into by Canada, the governor in council may establish and authorize the maintenance of a component of the Canadian forces, referred to in this Act as the special force . . .

If this is passed the power will be given to the department and to the minister to create a special force. In that special force may be placed any person, officer or man, from the unified force. It does not state that those who have had their training at sea, in the air or on the land will not be required to serve elsewhere than in the area in which they received their training; it does not say that at all. It says that a special force may be created and in that force will be placed officers and men of the regular force. There is no protection here at all. There is nothing which states that a man who has been trained only for land operations will not have to serve at sea, or vice-versa. Yet, we have been told that none of this will happen.

As I say, right there in this bill is the evidence that it will be possible for the minister and his staff to do this. When the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra said that all this bill did was to change the name he omitted to draw the attention of the house to clause 6 to which the hon. member for Cape Breton South referred so effectively.

Why did the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, the chairman of the committee, not frankly tell the members of this house that in clause 6 a compulsory feature had been introduced which borders on conscription. This is a feature which will affect very seriously the officers and men now serving in the three separate services, because once this bill has passed the house and the Senate and has been proclaimed, it will become the law. On its becoming law some of the officers and men who now are in the Royal Canadian Navy will cease to be in the Royal Canadian Navy and will become members of the defence force, and the officers and men who now are in the Royal Canadian Air Force will cease to be in that branch of the service and will become members of the defence force. The same will be true of the army. They will not have a choice. We brought this up during the committee hearings. We argued with the minister about this. We asked him whether he was going to give the men now in the present services a choice as to whether or not they would go into this newly styled single force, and he said no. He says no to almost everything.

I pointed out the experience we had in September of 1939. I appreciate the fact that I am not supposed to refer to any of the wars which have taken place in the past, but I will take the chance again. On September 1, 1939, when we were enlisting men in the Fort Garry Horse we signed them on into the Canadian field force. They were enlisted and attested into that force—the Canadian field force. In two or three days word came from Ottawa that a new title had been selected. That new title was the Canadian Active Service Force. It was necessary to reattest those men into that force.

Then, somewhat later, word was sent to us that under the Canadian Active Service Force there was no compulsion to serve outside the boundaries of Canada. Therefore it was necessary to take a third step. The officers and men were asked whether they wished to serve abroad. It was necessary again for them to indicate their desire by signing their signature. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South has pointed out, that was done in wartime and quite conceivably the cabinet of that period could have said, "Well, we have organized the Canadian field force and since we want to change the name to the Canadian Active Service Force, we will do it by order in council and that will be that, and all those who have enlisted to date will be automatically in the Canadian Active Service Force". Even in wartime, the government used its common sense and said that the men, having been attested into the Canadian field force, with that name being changed, would have the opportunity of saying whether or not they wanted to be in the Canadian Active Service Force. The government of that day did not say everyone in the Canadian Active Service Force must serve anywhere in the world. That government gave the officers and men a chance to make their own decision.

I hope it never happens, but if this bill becomes law and is proclaimed I hope the minister will give the officers and men of the three services an opportunity to say whether or not they want to serve in this new force and, if they do not want to serve in it, let them be retired or honourably discharged without any reduction in the pension to which they may be entitled at that time. These officers and men are all volunteers and this is how they should be treated. When we discussed this in the committee, the minister rejected the idea. That is another example of the typical, arrogant and domineering attitude of this Liberal government.

Let me indicate why this is important. The men presently serving in the three services made a decision when they enlisted in those three services. Some men went to the recruiting officers and said they wanted to serve in the army, while others said they wanted to serve at sea with the navy, or perhaps with the air force. Many of them have made a deliberate choice in this regard. Some people do not like the ocean and are not very comfortable at sea. I happen to be one of those. Some people do not want to fly and would much prefer to serve on land in a particular unit of the land forces. Very often the men in the army will make a specific choice. Perhaps they do not wish to be in the armoured corps because it means they will be shut up in a tank. Perhaps they suffer from claustrophobia. Thousands of people during the second world war had no use at all for the armoured corps from the standpoint of serving in it, because they did not want to be shut up in a tank, where they could burn to death if it was hit by a shell. Similarly some people in the navy do not want to serve in submarines.

All these people should be given a choice. But that is not the plan for this 1967 centennial arrangement. The officers and men will have no choice, but will be compulsorily placed in this new force. As I pointed out, if a special force is formed in an emergency, these men may be transferred at will from one branch to another.

In answer to the suggestion by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, that there was only one major change in this bill, I pointed out three. These changes involved the wiping out of the three services—the navy, army and air force; the creation, if necessary, of a special force to which anyone may be posted as the staff or minister sees fit, and the automatic and compulsory conscription of these men from the navy, army and air force into one defence force. That gives you some idea as to why there is opposition to this bill.

The minister has given no indication of a willingness to yield on any aspect of this bill. In this respect he differs from the Minister of Forestry, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and the Minister of Transport. I do not have any less admiration in this regard for those men, but I do know from their work in this house that they have modified bills at the request of the opposition, or when it became apparent that they were running into too much difficulty.

Perhaps I have said enough in respect of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. I should not have spent so much time dealing with his remarks, because really they are not deserving of any attention at all. I intend to pass over the references I was going to make regarding the Minister of Transport, and I shall do so with one exception. That minister interrupted the hon. member for Calgary North as reported at page 14658 of Hansard, when he said this:

> Mr. Pickersgill: I listened attentively to the extracts the hon. gentleman has just read to us, and they were news to me.

The hon. gentleman from Calgary North had been reading extracts from the testimony of Admiral Rayner. The minister was so ignorant of the committee proceedings he felt these extracts were new to him. It has been our impression that the greater portion of the committee proceedings are unfamiliar to members of the cabinet, and that the Minister of Transport is not the only ignorant person on the treasury benches. Apparently he had not heard the testimony of Admiral Rayner before. I suppose the same is true of all other members of the cabinet except the Associate Minister of National Defence and the Minister of National Defence. That is another reason it is essential to have a debate here in the House of Commons, in order to draw attention to those committee proceedings. I could say a great deal more about the Minister of Transport, but most of it would not be very complimentary.

Let me now refer to certain remarks of the minister for external affairs who entered the debate on Wednesday, April 5.

The Chairman: Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that his allotted time has now expired.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Churchill: My words of wisdom regarding the minister for external affairs are to be lost, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, on Friday evening last I drew the minister's attention to a very serious situation which has developed in one aspect of the maritime command in Halifax. I express my apologies to the minister if I became a little emotional and got carried away. Perhaps he will stop reading so I can make an apology to him.

Mr. Hellyer: I am listening very carefully.

Mr. Forrestall: Can you do that and read at the same time?

An hon. Member: It is not hard to follow you.

Mr. Forrestall: It is not hard to follow my remarks, but I am being sincere. I wish to express my apologies if indeed I was a little perturbed and disturbed with the loss of 100 jobs and the effect this has had on the families of those affected. This is of great concern to me. The minister has given his assurance that base consolidation, and plans leading to it, would not have an undue economic impact on the area. The other night he was reading, as he is now, and I lost my temper. I think the people of Halifax are deserving, and incompetent as I may be to express their views and opinions, I think they deserve at least to be heard. As I said the other night they deserve some kind of a reply. My words, which were possibly spoken in anger, were nevertheless very sincere and born of the desire not to see the Halifax area unduly affected by what, in the words of senior serving officers and indeed the minister himself, may be described as a natural sequence to the evolution of unification and integration.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Indeed if we are to follow this through to its logical conclusion, that is to say the saving of money, the conversion of this money into better and more sophisticated equipment, then it would be logical to look at base consolidation. I have indicated on a number of occasions in the house, as have more senior members of this party, the extent to which Halifax, Dartmouth and the municipality of Halifax depend upon defence expenditures. There is no need for me to repeat that.

I simply want to bring forward one or two points in the few minutes available to me tonight. I will mention again to the minister that we have not as yet had any explanation of why the government has taken the second major step leading to the total removal of civilian employees at Shearwater. What is the government's intention? What is its plan? I will remind the minister that confederation was founded in no small way in the Atlantic provinces. The dollars and cents that led to its proper development were extracted from the maritime economy. This was quite true for many years following confederation, not to mention the years leading up to it. We are entitled to frankness. We are mature enough to accept rational decisions which the government might make. We are aware of the fact that it does represent the majority opinion in Canada.

We are prepared to accept the fact that possibly the minister might be right. All we ask from him is his honest evaluation of the studies which have been made, to date, with regard to base consolidation. We would like to hear from him whether or not he is going to close Shearwater, or whether he is simply asking quietly that civilians be removed so that when base consolidation comes to bear on that naval establishment he will be able to turn to the people in the area and say, "I am sorry, but there are no civilian employees involved; all we are doing is transferring the military establishment." Will he tell us, for example, whether it is his intention to close Cornwallis, transfer the training establishment to Shearwater and remove the flying training establishment from there to Greenwood? Will he tell us whether or not these moves are being considered? Much is at stake.

I raise this matter again with some degree of trepidation because, as I said at the outset of my remarks, I was somewhat flustered and concerned when I discussed it on Friday. I made some remarks in the heat of anger which I would not have made otherwise. However, today I received a telegram from Mr. A. Wesson, president of the largest union at Fairey Aviation, which reads as follows:

Situation unchanged. Notice given today to terminate employment of 60 more employees. Letter following.

I am concerned about that. I said before and I will repeat again that I am very concerned about the dialogue that we have established in connection with this bill. Like other hon. members in the house I believe quite sincerely that we have not got around to talking about what we should be talking about. Today I asked the Prime Minister whether he was in receipt of a telegram signed by Mr. D. A. Bona, president of local 273 of the Canadian Labour Congress setting forth very real concern regarding wage rates. Why should he not be concerned? This concerns 700 or 800 members in his union, many of whom are paid different wage rates. What lies at the root of all this is the total inability of the government and the minister to clarify not only the effects of integration and unification upon the service personnel but the effect on those civilians in Halifax and Dartmouth who are affected by integration and unification.

I am making these remarks because they are indeed important. I think Mr. Bona's telegram is important enough to be read into the record because it voices a concern. It is a reaction to a vacuum left by the minister—and I am sorry the associate minister is away. I am very pleased, however, that he has gone to participate in the events at Vimy; as a young Canadian I have great appreciation for that. I am not unmindful of it, nor do I think are other young Canadians of my age. However, I am sorry he is not here. I am sorry the President of the Treasury Board is not in the house. Indeed it is discouraging to note that only three members of the cabinet are here.

Mr. Turner: How about your side?

Mr. Forrestall: I am pleased to see the minister has now included our group among the government treasury benches.

Mr. Turner: How about your side?

Mr. Forrestall: I am sorry; I apologize to the minister. I think everybody is watching the hockey game. There are probably as many out in your lobby as there are in ours, so I apologize. I am sorry a minister on the treasury bench is not available because I think it is pertinent to read the contents of this telegram into the record. The telegram indicates the concern that exists because of a lack of adequate information, a lack of a basic plan and a lack of basic organization in connection with integration and unification.

• (9:50 p.m.)

This telegram is addressed to me, but it is a copy of a night letter sent to the Prime Minister and reads as follows:

In the past four months we have attempted to have the Department of National Defence our employer recognize the need to give fair play and simple justice to employees in federal local union 273 C.L.C. To date we have received sympathy and the reply wait until collective bargaining. The employees in ship repair at H.M.C. Dockyard have received projected increases of 21 cents over and above the seven shipyards formula by an agreement signed January 31/67—

I do not need to explain that to the minister, he knows what it is.

—yet the department continues to refuse to even consider projecting any increases for labourers, motor transport in CFB Halifax and yard craft and auxiliary vessel employees. Certification and collective bargaining could be delayed indefinitely in reference to our members in the case of yard craft and auxiliary vessels. These employees have one of the lowest wage rates and fringe benefits systems of government employees. Labourers in this area have poor labour rates with the area rate 31 cents below the ship repair labour rate. Motor transport drivers receive 16 cents below the ship repair labour rate. We were informed that we would not be hurt by integration and this has been reaffirmed on subsequent occasions yet employees that were under the ship repair wage rate and those employees that after years of discussion finally reached a better wage rate have lost not only their purchasing power but the opportunity to continue to progress to a better standard of living by leaving the area rate. We appeal to you, sir, to rectify this grave injustice and consider the possibility of interim increases until the employees are able to bargain for themselves.

I think the telegram speaks for itself, Mr. Chairman. This was a direct threat to the real effect of unification and integration. There are 300 people in Canada who can tie up—indeed, there are 32 people in Canada who can tie up our entire maritime defence. This group of approximately 30 people can, under the guidance of local 273 of the Canadian Labour Congress, do this.

There is something else which has concerned me very deeply, and it has to do with some references made by the minister in the committee. I believe he had the unmitigated gall to cast some aspersions on the British defence posture. I refer to statements recorded on page 524 of the committee evidence, at which time Air Marshal Sharp had made some comments on the advances in science and their effects on modern weapons. It was suggested these advances could cut across the roles of the three services. It might be possible that an officer might make a recommendation to buy a piece of equipment which would enhance and maintain the status quo of his service but which would not be in the best interest of the country, if one looked at the total picture.

The witness had been questioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, and the Minister of National Defence interjected:

I will give you an example—

Here, Mr. Chairman, I am talking about an argument put forth by the Minister of National Defence that unification is not only desirable but is absolutely necessary.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

—and I do so with some trepidation because it involves another country. I think the recent difference in opinion between the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force with respect to who was going to acquire tactical aircraft for the future, was conducted in a manner in which both services put service interest ahead of the national interest. Now, that is my opinion, and you can disagree with it if you wish.

I not only disagree with it completely, but I question the minister's responsibility in making a statement about the United Kingdom at this particular level. Indeed, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre replied to that statement in this way:

I certainly disagree with the Minister of National Defence for Canada criticizing something that has happened in Great Britain.

Mr. Hellyer: I think it is one of the best classic examples of the reason why the single service concept is inevitable, as well as being a good solution militarily and economically.

Mr. Churchill: This is a shocking statement coming from a minister of the crown.

Then, the chairman of the defence committee indicated his reaction by saying:

What is so shocking about it?

Mr. Churchill: Implying that the Royal Air Force and Royal Navy had a conflict of interest with regard to loyalty to their country.

These statements referred to difficulties in the United Kingdom and were dealt with in some depth by the one man in the United Kingdom who should know, Christopher Mayhew, the recently retired minister of national defence in the United Kingdom. Since it is getting close to ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I should like to quote briefly from appendix II, page 171, the resignation statement of Mr. Christopher Mayhew as it appeared in the Journals of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom:

The rigid fixing of a budget in advance placed a heavy strain on inter-service relations—not that inter-service rivalry was on anything like the scale that public opinion has been led to believe: It should be placed to the credit of the admiralty board that from the beginning to the end of the defence review it stoutly maintained that if we were to remain east of Suez we should need F. 111 A's for the job as well as the carriers.

Our Minister of National Defence has indicated that the difficulties in the United Kingdom were really the result of interservice rivalry brought about because the services were not unified or integrated. Christopher Mayhew says the difficulties were brought about primarily because of the rigid fixing of a budget in advance.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC WORKS—PORT McNEILL, B.C.—REQUEST FOR BREAKWATER CONSTRUCTION

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see that the Minister of Public Works is not here tonight because as Minister of Transport he visited the general area about which I want to raise this question. However, I am sure that the parliamentary secretary to the minister, to whom I have recently supplied a map of this area, will learn something from it and add his influence to what I hope will result from the question I am going to raise.

On April 5 I asked the Minister of Public Works whether he would endeavour to prevail upon his colleagues in the cabinet to provide a supplementary estimate for the construction of a breakwater at Port McNeill on Vancouver Island, I should say that this is the first occasion I have raised a question under this order involving proposed construction under the public works department, and I hope that the fact that I am doing so will serve to lend weight to the importance I attach to this matter.

I may say that it was with a great deal of regret that I had to advise the people of this area that this item was not in the estimates which were tabled for the current fiscal year. I was therefore not too surprised to find the lead headline in the next issue of the North Island Gazette, which is published in the neighbouring community of Alert Bay, read "Port McNeill Erupts!" The article went on to say:

> Village council was thrown into turmoil at its meeting last week when it learned that the community's long-expected breakwater was not included in this year's estimates of the federal public works department.

I may say that their anticipation that such would be the case was based, in part at least, on a letter addressed to me by the Minister of Public Works, a copy of which I furnished the council, under date of June 9, 1966, in which the minister said, in part:

> —it is proposed to consider an item in the 1967-68 estimates for the construction of a boat harbour at Port McNeill—

While I tried to make it clear to them that that statement meant nothing more nor less than what it said, that there was in existence, of course, the Treasury Board process of examination of proposed estimates, nevertheless I had indicated that I felt reasonably optimistic that this item would be included in the construction program for this year and that it would in fact go forward. I also indicated that until the estimates were actually tabled this was the most definite statement that we could expect on this subject. Their disappointment is, in my view, not at all over-rated.

I should explain, Mr. Speaker, that this community on northern Vancouver Island has recently become an incorporated municipality, as have some other places on the north island. I recognize that here in Ottawa it is perhaps a little difficult to keep up with the very rapid expansion which has taken place on the northern part of Vancouver Island. I should point out that the federal government took over in 1964 a wharf which had been constructed by the owners of a logging camp, and it is really from this date that the rapid development of Port McNeill as a community with shopping centres, banks, a modern hotel, and so on and so forth, has taken place. It has now become the centre for the new regional high school for the school district of north Vancouver Island.

I am sure the minister is aware that the Prime Minister and all of the members from the province of British Columbia as well as the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of my own party have received representations from that area since the item failed to appear in the estimates. Wires were sent from the village of Port McNeill, from the Port McNeill and district chamber of commerce, from the school district, district No. 85, which represents a large consolidated school district covering the entire northern section of Vancouver Island, and also from the Port McNeill Women's Hospital Auxiliary. I should point out that the only hospital in the district at Alert Bay is dependent on water transportation from Port McNeill.

I also point out that there has now been established a regional level of government for north Vancouver Island known as the regional district of Mount Waddington. This body represents the entire northern area of Vancouver Island's incorporated and unincorporated communities. Its members say unanimously that the immediate construction of this breakwater is essential to the continuance of development of ordinary life in these parts of Vancouver Island. The local member of the legislative assembly who also happens to be the minister concerned with municipal affairs in British Columbia, has agreed that this is true.

One of the best letters to be sent to the Prime Minister and to be made available to me is from a local minister of the United Church of Canada who says:

> It is important for you to understand that this is not simply a pressure campaign based on the theory that "the squeaking wheel gets the grease." On the contrary, the need for a breakwater for Port McNeill is urgent and the many letters you have received from this community should be interpreted in this light.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a small matter. Ten or 12,000 people on the north end of Vancouver Island are concerned vitally with this facility as is evident from the many representations.

In 1871, when British Columbia entered confederation, its population was 36,247, all but 9,000 of whom were Indians. If 36,000 people were considered important enough to warrant the building of a railway to the Pacific coast, surely the 10,000 or 12,000 people on northern Vancouver Island warrant some consideration at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I can well understand the disappointment of the people of the Port McNeill area that this project was not included in the Department of Public Works estimates for the fiscal year 1967-68. My own impression is that much of what the hon. member has said is correct. I myself first heard about the requirements at Port McNeill last summer, when I was visited by a very persuasive man, a Mr. Joseph J. Cvetkovich, who talked with me about the situation there. He recounted his great difficulties in landing at Port McNeill in a small aircraft during a storm.

There is general agreement that the project would be helpful to the fishing fleet in the district and that an additional benefit to flow from it would be that it would provide a protected harbour for the movement of persons and goods. The Minister of Public Works is fully aware of the need. Certainly the consideration promised in his letter of June 9, 1966, was given. In fact, I believe the Minister of Public Works might have succeeded in having the work undertaken in the present fiscal year had a little more money been available.

[Mr. Barnett.]

• (10:10 p.m.)

I assure the hon. member that the Minister of Public Works continues to be keenly interested in this project and that he is a very persistent man. The hon. member and the people of the Port McNeill area may derive some consolation from the fact that the minister will continue to focus attention on this project. I feel confident that eventually the Minister of Public Works will succeed in having this work carried through.

AGRICULTURE—REMOVAL OF SUPPORT PRICE FOR MANUFACTURING MILK

Mr. Lee Grills (Hastings South): My reason for taking part in this debate tonight is to ask the minister or his parliamentary secretary why the support was removed from the surplus milk shipped by fluid milk shippers of this country.

First, I would suggest we consider who is affected. It is the producer of fluid milk, who has put more effort and more investment into his dairy operation than any other dairy farmer. I do not want to detract from the efforts made by other milk producers, but it is the dairy producer who has had to produce the highest quality and maintain a supply throughout the 12 months of the year. This means extra expense, extra investment and additional equipment.

No milk producer can produce an equal quantity throughout the year without having surplus milk at some periods. It would be impossible. So a producer finds himself with different quantities on hand. Some might be shipping 50 per cent to a fluid milk market; others, 75 per cent. In any case a considerable quantity goes to a manufacturing plant as what is called surplus milk. It is with respect to this portion of his production that the support he received last year has been withdrawn. I maintain that the fluid milk producer is being discriminated against, and this had led to further difficulties for the reason I have mentioned.

It is true the producer may get a premium price for the milk sold on the fluid milk market. But if 50 per cent of his production goes to a surplus market without benefit of a support price he finds himself in the unenviable position of having to produce milk during a 12 months period without adequate compensation, in the final analysis getting no more than the other person. So the fluid milk producer is questioning whether he ought to continue to ship his milk to a fluid milk market.

I read in this morning's paper that the price of milk in Ontario is increasing, and I am sure this increase will be followed in Quebec and in the other provinces of Canada. Why should this be so? It is because the fluid milk shipper is not getting support for his surplus. Other prices are advancing, so he is asking a higher price. It is suggested that the price of milk will advance by two cents a quart. I maintain this situation is brought about because of the insecurity of the fluid milk shipper. So this question affects the price of milk across the country, and as one involved in the dairy enterprise, I hate to see what is happening. I do not like to see the price of milk keep on advancing. I do not wish to see the price of anything keep on advancing. The cost of living is going up, and this is one more step.

I say there is no surplus. We have been importing butter, and that does not put us in a surplus position. I maintain that the minister and the government must take some action or further trouble will develop. My remarks are not intended to be critical. I hope what I am saying is constructive criticism. I also hope something will be done before it is too late, because already there have been threats to dump milk if the farmers do not get the proper price. I hope none of us see any milk dumped in Canada because I think that would be a sin. It would be something to be ashamed of in a starving world.

I do not like to say that the minister does not understand, but I am beginning to realize that he is not a farmer. He is a minister of agriculture learning as best he can. I would not like to say he does not care, because I think he does. I only hope he takes some action before it is too late. This thing has gone beyond the point of pushing it around in the House of Commons. It is time some action was taken.

Farmers across the country are getting older and older. I was talking to a cheese factory operator yesterday and he told me his production of cheese is down 25,000 pounds in the first quarter of this year, and he has no reason to think that this decrease will not continue throughout the year. As I say, our farmers are getting older, and they are getting tired of a seven day week operation.

As a result of my few remarks I hope the minister will give some consideration to this problem I have many documents on my desk which I can show him to establish that some farmers are shipping two thirds of their milk to a manufacturing plant, and the present situation is pretty difficult for them.

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Hastings-South (Mr. Grills) for bringing this important matter to the attention of the minister and the house. I can assure him, as one who has produced fluid milk for an important market, that the government is quite conscious of the fact that there are additional costs attached to the production of fluid milk and that there is a difficulty in maintaining continuity of supply.

There is, however, an important feature, in that we must determine the jurisdiction under which each of these areas falls. In the first place, fluid milk is produced according to provincial requirements and regulations. It is hauled in vehicles that come under provincial jurisdiction, and provincial governments are generally regarded to have accepted, and they themselves have accepted, the responsibility for fluid milk.

On the other hand we feel that manufacturing milk, part of which goes into an export trade, is our responsibility, and it has been agreed that it is the responsibility of the federal government. I think probably the federal government has assumed its full responsibility in measuring up to a very satisfactory degree, but maybe not to the full aspirations of the producers of manufacturing milk.

I only want to mention three salient points in connection with the federal policy. The first of course is that these jurisdictions have been defined. Second, $120 million has been appropriated to the Canadian Dairy Commission to assist in the establishment of a satisfactory price for manufacturing milk f.o.b. factory, and I would like to say that this is based on a buying price for butter of 63 cents per pound, and 20 cents for powder. This means approximately $4.75 f.o.b. factory to the farmers, and this is considerably more than has prevailed in recent years and recent months.

While the policy is not all that might be desired, I regret on behalf of the minister that we are unable to meet the requirements of the hon. member for Hastings South in suggesting we should further support fluid milk prices. This is clearly the responsibility of the provincial governments.

Mr. Grills: That does not answer the question.

AGRICULTURE—REQUEST FOR DISCUSSION OF NEW DAIRY POLICY

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, last March 22, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) announced the dairy policy of the Canadian government to the effect that deficiency payments to milk producers would be raised to $1.21 per hundredweight, which would bring the price of milk to $4.75 f.o.b. factory. And the minister went on to say that there would be a 10-cent deduction per hundredweight for export costs.

As pointed out by one government member, it was really an increase but I suggest that increase was far below what was asked the day before by the thousand delegates who came to Ottawa from all parts of the province of Quebec to make their grievances known to their members of parliament and to appeal to the cabinet.

At the time, various regional associations of dairy producers were heard through their president, but the man who explained the farm problems more fully was without question Mr. Lionel Saurel, president of C.F.U., who summarized the tragic situation in which the farmers find themselves.

He did an excellent job; the farmers were proud of their president and all hon. members present listened attentively.

Mr. Saurel did not use high-sounding words; he gave the facts.

Even the Minister of Agriculture was impressed by his sincerity, because while Mr. Saurel was talking he managed to say to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Sauvé) who was sitting next to him: If he could be with us to convince the others.

Those words were repeated to the 1,000 farmers by the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development when he was asked to speak to them.

At some other point during the meeting, the minister spoke to them again, this time without being invited to do so. He told them not to worry any more, that although he himself, a city dweller, did not know much about the situation, the government had many experts who already were aware of it.

It was after meeting one of those experts that I decided certains facts should be pointed out. The said expert seemed confined to 1963, at which time the Conservatives made way for the Liberals.

This person told me that milk was then sold at $2.66, while today the price is $4.65.

[Mr. Grills.]

Mr. Speaker, if experts can amuse themselves by making comparisons, I shall do the same. I should like to remind the parliamentary secretary to the hon. minister that in 1950, milk was sold at only $2 per hundredweight, but at that time, I repeat, a tractor cost $1,200 or $1,500. Now, to buy a tractor we have to pay $4,500 to $5,000. But let it go, as far as the tractor is concerned, since one only buys every ten years. However, in the case of meal and fertilizers which farmers buy seven months a year to feed their cattle, the price difference is still the same.

For example, today, for barley, oats and corn, the farmer pays $3.75, whereas he only paid $1.25 per hundredweight in 1950.

The farmer now pays $4 or $4.25 per hundredweight for bran and shorts which are just by-products of wheat, while in 1950 he paid only $1.25 or $1.35.

Knowing that the hon. minister is about to revise his policy, I hope that the 300 per cent increases on machinery and meal will be taken into account.

When the minister strongly hopes that Mr. Saurel will be at his side to convince the others whom does he have in mind? Who are those cabinet members opposed to the new dairy policy?

Personally, I thought that inadequate funds explained the inadequacy of the dairy policy. I am reassured in reading the minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 43 of the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs sitting on Monday, February 6, 1967, on page 3000.

This involves the Minister of Finance and Receiver General who was replying to a question by a member and I take the liberty of quoting the question and answer. The member asked:

> Mr. Sharp—Do you feel that at present in Canada the money supply is sufficient?
> Mr. Sharp: Shall I put it this way? I believe that during the term that I have been in office the money supply has been sometimes more than adequate for the purpose.

The member asked:

> I would just like to ask the minister to repeat his last answer.
> Mr. Sharp: I have not been concerned about a deficiency of money and credit. I may be concerned about that in the future but during my year or so in office I have not been concerned about that problem.

In view of the fact that finance could not influence the Minister of Agriculture in his dairy policy could the minister or the parliamentary secretary to the minister (Mr. Beer) give, for the guidance of all farmers, the names of the cabinet members who hindered him in his work?

Since the minister has already expressed the wish of having at his side the president of the Catholic Farmers Union, in order to work up intrigues, could we know who are the others he was thinking about in a moment of sincerity?

It is essential that presidents and representatives of farmers unions or organizations apply to the right person if their intrigues are to be effective, and I hope that the freedom of action then given back to the Minister of Agriculture will enable him to review his dairy policy, while taking into account the price of tractors, and of feed grain. Since the indemnities of ministers and of house members have tripled, in all fairness, the price of milk should be increased to $6 per hundredweight, but the farmers are not asking that much. They are asking for $5. By accepting $5 per hundredweight, they are making a $1 gift to society, to consumers, whereas if the government adds $1 to the $4 granted last year, it is merely a payment on account of what it owes the farmers.

[English]

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I regret first of all that I am unable to reply in the other official language, but I wish to thank the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) for his important question. Let me assure him that no one could be more sympathetic to the cost-price squeeze in which the farmer finds himself than the minister or I, personally. Probably all of these factors were taken into consideration by the minister when he insisted on an additional amount of money to support the dairy program. We must recognize that the amount of money allocated to the dairy support program has been increased by 33⅓ per cent for 1967-68 over that for 1966-67. I am sure the hon. member would be the first person to agree that this is a substantial step forward.

I regret of course that the $1.21 of federal money in respect of every 100 pounds of manufacturing milk is not sufficient to meet the need. It was the feeling of the minister that this increase represented a responsible step forward at this particular time, and all that the government and the minister saw fit to work into the program for this particular year. I am not aware that there will be any immediate review, but certainly as time progresses the policy will be reconsidered.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

LEGISLATION RESPECTING STATUS AS TO MUNICIPAL TAXATION, LIABILITY, ETC.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic) asked leave to introduce Bill No. C-288, an act to amend the Crown Corporations Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to place crown corporations on the same footing as private businesses. More particularly, this bill provides that: (a) public corporations shall be subject to municipal taxes, just like private businesses; (b) in case of bankruptcy, public corporations shall receive payment on the same basis as other businesses, with no special privileges; (c) that public corporations should not enjoy privileges with regard to patents; (d) that a writ of mandamus should be served upon a crown corporation as to any private company; (e) that the penal laws should apply to public corporations as they apply to private companies.

In other words, the object of this bill is to bring public corporations under private law and take away from them the prerogatives of public law. When the state runs a business, it must be subject to the same statutes as tradesmen.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, motion for papers No. 215 is acceptable to the government.

Would Your Honour be so kind as to call motion No. 220?

I ask that the remaining motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

MCKINNON INDUSTRIES—LAID OFF WORKERS

Motion No. 215—Mr. Barnett:

That an order of the house do issue for copies of (a) a list of the names and social security numbers sent to the transitional assistance benefits board by McKinnon Industries Limited, St. Catharines, Ontario, as being laid off from employment since September 8, 1966 (b) a list of all those named in part (a) above who have been certified as being eligible to draw transitional assistance benefits (c) a list of all those named in part (a) above who have received or who are now receiving transitional assistance benefits payments.

Motion agreed to.

COLOUR TELEVISION SETS PROVIDED BY C.B.C.

Motion No. 220—Mr. Smallwood:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, orders, receipts and other documents, since July 1, 1966, between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the recipients of 107 colour television sets, conferred gratis, upon individuals within and without the corporation.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed that there are no such things as colour television sets conferred gratis upon any individuals, therefore there is no correspondence. I suggest to the hon. member that he consider withdrawing the motion, since it would require a "nil" answer.

Mr. Smallwood: In the circumstances I cannot withdraw this motion. I placed it on the order paper so I might have information. I wish to congratulate the hon. lady for informing the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot have a debate now. All the hon. member can do is ask that this motion be transferred for debate. Is that what he wants to do?

Mr. Smallwood: No. I will ask that the question be put to the house.

Miss LaMarsh: But I have informed the house that I have no objection to accepting the order, though it will have to be by a "nil" return.

Mr. Speaker: I suppose there is no alternative before the Chair but to put the question to the house.

Miss LaMarsh: I have no objection to accepting the motion, but there will be a "nil" return. That is why I suggested that the hon. member should withdraw it.

Motion agreed to.

WATER RESOURCES

REQUEST FOR DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE ON POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I direct a question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the Great Lakes research institute and the conference which has set forth the growing seriousness of pollution and the intolerable levels reached at Toronto and other large cities, through the presence of concentrated infectious bacteria.

I ask the Prime Minister whether in view of the seriousness of this problem he would undertake to hold, or give consideration to holding, a federal-provincial conference immediately so that plans may be co-ordinated to deal with this growing and increasingly dangerous problem before health in the metropolitan areas becomes seriously affected.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This matter, including the possibility of holding a conference along the lines indicated by the right hon. gentleman, has been under consideration, but in view of the urgency which he rightly attaches to it I will give consideration to the question he has asked me today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the Prime Minister for his answer, and ask him whether the government is prepared to commit the necessary resources to a program which would adequately and effectively come to grips with this major problem in industrialized society today.

Mr. Pearson: The matter is being considered with the provinces and when we are aware of the nature and scope of the problem and of the resources which will be required to deal with it effectively we shall then have to decide how best the expense can be shared among the three levels of government.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Would the Prime Minister consider putting this matter on the agenda to be discussed by members of the Canadian and United States governments when they meet at Expo this summer, with a view to opening up the boundary waters treaty so this question of pollution might be added to the responsibilities of the two nations, thus providing constitutional encouragement for both countries to move in this field?

Mr. Pearson: The matter is already being considered by representatives of the two governments on the International Joint Commission. I think this is the most effective agency for dealing with this matter, and I hope the commission will report to the two governments before long.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VIMY RIDGE SERVICE—INVITATION TO PRESIDENT DE GAULLE AND ARRANGEMENTS FOR CEREMONY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the public discussion which is taking place regarding the Vimy ceremony last Sunday I would like to ask the Prime Minister two questions. First, was President de Gaulle ever formally invited by the Canadian government to attend the ceremony at Vimy? Second, in view of the fact that the ceremony was taking place within the territory of the Republic of France, were there any discussions through diplomatic channels with the French government regarding the arrangements for the ceremony prior to the plans being finalized?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This matter was discussed on the diplomatic level by representatives of the two governments, and it was made quite clear to the government of France that if the representation of France on this occasion could be at the highest level that would have been very welcome to the Canadian government. If my hon. friend would put his question on the order paper I might be able to provide a more detailed written reply.

Mr. Douglas: Would the Prime Minister answer the first part of my question? Was a formal invitation ever extended to President de Gaulle to attend the ceremony?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, the French government was invited to participate fully in the ceremony, and it was made quite clear that if it had been possible for General de Gaulle, as head of the French government, to be there, that indeed would have been most welcome to the Canadian government.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Is the Prime Minister in a position to tell us whether, in the course of those diplomatic talks preceding the Vimy ceremonies, all the suggestions of the Canadian government on this ceremony were accepted by the French government?

[English]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the arrangements that actually took place were worked out in collaboration with the French government and by agreement with that government.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have had a number of supplementary questions. This is a short day for questions, and I wonder if we could go on to another matter.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONSIDERATION BY FINANCE MINISTERS OF USE OF BANK OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance and Receiver General.

Yesterday was the closing day of the federal-provincial conference on monetary questions in Canada which was attended by the provincial ministers of finance as well as by the federal Minister of Finance and Receiver General. On this occasion, or during the talks, was there any question of using the Bank of Canada to finance the public sector of the Canadian economy, without interest?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker; none of the provincial ministers or myself supported the position taken by the hon. member for Villeneuve.

Mr. Ricard: You voted for it a few years ago.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Would the hon. Minister of Finance and Receiver General be kind enough to tell us what the bright suggestions were on that occasion?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is now asking the hon. minister for a general statement, and I do not believe this is the proper time for it.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

Would it not be important for the hon. minister to advise us, in view of the importance of the matter, of the result of that federal-provincial conference, or at least tell us whether the provincial ministers of finance disappeared, as if by magic, without knowing what happened?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to make a statement on motions if the house would be interested, but I do not think it would be appropriate for me to make a statement at this time.

FINANCE

REGULATIONS UNDER DEPOSIT INSURANCE LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell us whether the regulations envisaged under the Deposit Insurance Act have yet been formulated, since we hear that the act is to be put into force by the end of the month? If so, when will he be in a position to table those regulations as he undertook to do in the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention to bring the act into force on the 17th of this month. I shall have to inquire about the particular point of the regulations, and I know the hon. gentleman is reminding me that I had promised to refer these to the committee.

REQUEST FOR STUDY OF CORPORATION LAW REFORM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister based on an answer he gave to a question I asked him a week ago today in this house. The question I asked at that time, as recorded at page 14548 of Hansard, was:

In view of the success of the committee established by the government of Ontario in outlining the reforms needed in Ontario corporation law to provide better protection for the public in that province, does the government intend to initiate a similar study at the federal level with a view to providing better protection for the public in all parts of the country?

The Prime Minister replied as follows:

We have already done that, Mr. Speaker, as the result of a decision to hold a meeting to consider this matter I believe next Monday.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is my question to the Prime Minister. Knowing that that meeting has been held and that the matters considered were only a very minute part of the inquiry which took place in Ontario—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member now is making a speech, and I think he should ask his question.

Mr. Hees: In view of what I have said, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government of Canada intends to initiate a similar study so that all citizens in all parts of the country may receive similar protection.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The meeting was held last Monday after studies had been made by the provincial and federal governments. As a result of this meeting the studies are being continued.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, that is not in connection with corporation law. The meeting which was held last Monday, as I am sure the Prime Minister knows, dealt with a very small section of corporation law dealing with securities, not general corporation law.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING NEW MILITARY COMMUNICATIONS SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask what I am sure you will accept as an important question. I should like to direct it to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister advise the house whether it is correct that without a policy statement, without a reference to the committee on national defence or a supplementary vote, negotiations are under way or have been concluded in respect of a new military communications system within the southern hemisphere to be known as "battleground communications", to which Canada is to be committed for 4 per cent of the capital cost? If so, may I ask what is its purpose so far as Canada's alliance commitments are concerned.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): This is a rather complicated question. I am not sure whether the department has issued a press release on this, but I will inquire and if so send a copy of it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Winch: What did the United States do? That is my question.

Mr. Hellyer: If they have a press release we will have one as well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I had better explain for my rather cynical friends opposite. This was a tripartite arrangement involving ourselves, the United States and Australia. It was agreed that we would release the news to the press simultaneously. As sometimes happens, a leak occurred in another country in anticipation of the press release. There is, however, nothing very unique in that situation in an open society, as my hon. friends on both sides of the house are aware.

This is a development project which Canada has entered into with the United States and Australia. We have committed ourselves under the development funds which are available to us to participate to the extent of 5 per cent of the project definition stage of this program. At the end of that time the program will be reviewed and we will then decide whether we will continue in the development stage.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence just how this ties in with our alliance commitments.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question might require a somewhat complicated answer. Perhaps it should not be asked at this time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—APPARENT ELIMINATION OF PRODUCTIONS IN ENGLISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. It appears that the C.B.C. is following a course of action which is leading to the elimination of English productions in the Montreal studios. May I ask whether the government concurs in this policy of the C.B.C. and, if not, would it see that we at least preserve what we have in the province of Quebec of a bilingual and bicultural capability?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there would be no such policy. If there were the government would not concur in it. I am sure no management of the C.B.C. would ever make such a decision.

INQUIRY AS TO CONTROL OVER HOCKEY BROADCASTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State. In view of the statement made today by an official of CBOT television that all decisions as to which hockey games are to be shown on which networks are to be made by that rather partisan group, MacLaren Advertising, rather than by the C.B.C., will the minister do everything in her power to prevent such further usurping of the rights of parliament and the taxpayers who pay for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain of this, but I suppose this is another case where the MacLaren firm has purchased the rights and sold them to the highest bidder. However, I will certainly ascertain the facts.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, does the minister agree that such an important matter to Canadian culture as hockey broadcasts should be in the hands of the MacLaren Advertising Company, which has such close relations with the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is not in order.

[Mr. Speaker.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR ADJOURNMENT SO MEMBERS MAY ATTEND EXPO PREVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister consider adjourning the house on April 27 so that all members might have an opportunity to attend the preview of Expo on that date?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I think this matter should be given consideration, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO DESIGN OF NEW INSIGNIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, asking him whether the report is correct that he has now designed another insignia for use by the Post Office Department. If so, when does he intend to introduce it?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

TORONTO—MAIL ADDRESSED TO DISMISSED CHIEF CORONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. I understand that on instructions from the minister's department mail addressed to the dismissed chief coroner in Toronto, Dr. Shulman, is being forwarded to Dr. H. D. Cotnam, the Ontario supervising coroner. In view of the fact that the dismissal arose out of a controversy between those two gentlemen, will the minister consider some more appropriate way of dealing with Dr. Shulman's mail?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question can be asked at this time.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN CONFERENCE ON EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Will the minister, the parliamentary secretary, or officials of the department be taking part in the Canadian Association for Adult Education conference on educational television to be held in Toronto tomorrow?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker; there will be representatives from the B.B.G. and the C.B.C. together with individuals from other departments of government and from the staff of the under secretary of state.

[Translation]

POSTAL SERVICE

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN GASPÉ AND BONAVENTURE CONSTITUENCIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Postmaster General.

In view of the large number of representations received from the far-away county of Bonaventure and a few communities in the county of Gaspé because of the long delays in the local delivery of mail, could the minister investigate to see whether such a deplorable situation could be corrected, if he is anxious to achieve the intended purpose in implementing the mail delivery by truck?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made representations which have been noted by the minister.

[English]

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Did he receive notice of my request for a statement in respect of the I.W.A. versus GATT regarding negotiations on wheat prices?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did. This matter was communicated to me by the Prime Minister, and I read the reference in Hansard as well. I doubt whether you would permit me to make a statement at this time, but I am prepared to do so if it is your wish.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REMOVAL OF UNIFORMS OF NAVAL PERSONNEL ATTENDING COMMONS DEBATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I am informed that a dozen chief petty officers and petty officers from the Royal Canadian Navy, coming from the east and west coasts, are attending a supply course in the district. As one feature of that course they are at present in the gallery of this chamber. Before coming here they were told to remove their uniforms because the unification debate will be taking place and it would not be appropriate for them to be in naval uniform on this occasion. Can the minister explain this situation?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, not only am I unable to explain it, I had not heard about it until this moment. I will make inquiries.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether he has a couple of green uniforms floating around that these gentlemen could use?

Mr. Hellyer: I will see whether I can find some.

HALIFAX—REQUEST OF DOCKYARD COUNCIL RESPECTING PAY RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask whether he is in a position today to indicate to the house the content of his reply to the dockyard workers in Halifax?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have the reply on my desk. I will try to make it available tomorrow.

C.F.B. SHEARWATER—ASSISTANCE TO CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration may I direct this question either to the Minister of Labour or to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that some 60 or more civilian employees at C.F.B. Shearwater are being laid off this Friday because their work is being transferred to armed forces personnel, are steps being taken by any government department to assist these employees to secure other work?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take the question as notice and take it up with my colleague for reply later.

EXPO '67

INQUIRY AS TO INVITATION TO HIS HOLINESS THE POPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Has the hon. minister approached again His Holiness Pope Paul VI or asked officials of his department to do so, with a view to persuading him to come to Canada in 1967?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I refer the hon. member to the replies I gave a few months ago, as well as to the reply of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson).

Through the Apostolic Delegate, the Pope advised that he did not intend to come to Canada this year due to prior engagements.

[English]

INQUIRY AS TO SITE RENTAL CHARGES AND SECURITY GUARANTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask whether the right hon. Prime Minister discussed with him the question I asked last Monday, as to whether anything was paid for leases by those setting up pavilions at Expo, and what guarantee of security was given to these nations. Is the minister prepared to answer the question today, or when can we expect an answer?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did bring this question to my attention. I think the question was in two parts; one dealt with security and the other dealt with rental rates on the site of Expo. The answer to the latter part of the question is that the sites are provided free to any nations building pavilions on them, but Expo does undertake to service the sites and the servicing is at the rate of $2 for every square foot of exhibit space.

Mr. Mandziuk: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What are we to understand by "servicing"? Does this mean security? Do we provide R.C.M.P. protection, will the Quebec provincial police provide it, or what is the situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now asking for a detailed statement.

Mr. Mandziuk: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, we would like to know what "servicing" means; whether it is just giving them water and electricity, or do we give them anything else?

Mr. Winters: I am prepared to answer the question, Mr. Speaker. The security arrangements are still under discussion, and this is a matter of co-operation among all levels of government. However, basically each country is charged with security within its own building. Outside the building the security falls on the appropriate level of government. The city, the security force of Expo, the province and the federal government work in co-operation.

Mr. Mandziuk: Thank you. That is what I was after.

CONSUMER CREDIT

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for Montreal's answer to Kennedy, the Registrar General. Can the minister tell the house whether his department carefully studies reports presented by the consumer credit committee, and will some of their recommendations be implemented?

[Translation]

Hon. John M. Turner (Registrar General): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to reply to our Canadian Charles de Gaulle. I have the highest regard for the hon. member for Lotbinière even though I do not fully share all of his opinions.

I have asked that the report of this committee be inquired into and thoroughly studied. Undoubtedly, the recommendations will be considered by the government and its decision on this point will be announced in due course.

Mr. Choquette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Should the minister be considered as the future minister of consumer affairs?

Mr. Speaker: The question is out of order.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): A supplementary question to the minister. Further to his consideration of the report of the committee on consumer credit and the cost of living, is it his intention to recommend to the cabinet the establishment of a department of consumer affairs?

Mr. Turner: As I have said, Mr. Speaker, that decision will be announced in due course.

[English]

Mr. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I should like to address to the Prime Minister. Does the question asked by the hon. member for Lotbinière indicate that the brass is getting a little away from the grass?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is speculative.

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Registrar General. Will he assure hon. members on this side of the house that he will not follow the lead of the potential leadership aspirants of the Conservative party, but will give leadership to the formation of a consumer credit department in the manner—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VIMY RIDGE SERVICE—INVITATION TO PRESIDENT DE GAULLE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, without in any way associating the hon. member for Lotbinière with General de Gaulle, thereby committing such a slander on the general—

Mr. Choquette: Thank you, Barry Goldwater.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any representations were made to the government of France regarding that country's cold shouldering of the Vimy Ridge gathering. Is the minister in a position to tell the house frankly why General de Gaulle had no high-ranking official representative there from the French republic? Was this the fault of the government of Canada in failing to invite him?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has already answered that question—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. The government of Canada has since Sunday had discussions with representatives of the government of France. The statement made last week by the Prime Minister, that the government of France had done everything that it could reasonably be expected to do, is an accurate statement of the situation; and so has the government of Canada. I suggest to my right hon. friend that his desire to promote good relations between our two countries is not enhanced by the questions which he continues to ask.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the hon. gentleman think those relations were enhanced because the Canadian government failed to invite President de Gaulle?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, relations between—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am just wondering whether hon. members on both sides of the house do not think we are now getting into a debate on this question. This is a period for questions, not a period for debate.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can give the house a definite answer as to whether the president of the French republic was invited through the diplomatic channels, over which the minister presides, to attend the ceremony or to send a leading representative of the French government, or was this botched by his department and are we now trying to throw the blame on the French government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is repeating the question that was asked previously.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I believe I should answer the question put a moment ago by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Starr: Order.

National Defence Act Amendment

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I certainly do not want to interrupt the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but my impression was that the question asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam had been asked previously by the minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—PROPOSED PROTEST AGAINST USE OF FRAGMENTATION BOMB

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Canadian government would protest to the United States government against the use of the anti-personnel fragmentation bomb in Viet Nam. The Secretary of State for External Affairs replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I have asked for a report on the exact situation. When that is received I will be in a position to reply.

May I inquire whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs has yet received a report.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think an official reply has been received, but I have already dealt with this question in the external affairs committee.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, would it be too much to ask the minister to give a reply to the house on that point?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, what I said was that the Canadian government was opposed to the bombing, it was opposed to the infiltration from the north to the south, and it hoped that both parties and all concerned would endeavour to get to the peace table.

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether, when he is investigating reports on the use of anti-personnel fragmentation bombs by American forces in Viet Nam, he would also look into reports carried in the Bangkok World and other newspapers in that part of the world as to the use of anti-personnel fragmentation bombs by North Vietnamese forces against the free world forces in the south.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Batten in the chair.

[Mr. Starr.]

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose last evening clause 2 was under consideration.

On clause 2—Canadian forces, Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, last night at ten o'clock I was endeavouring to correct what appeared to me at the time, and which upon subsequent research and a little reading proved to be the fact, a misrepresentation of certain basic facts in connection with the recent review by the United Kingdom of their defence policy.

• (3:20 p.m.)

As I mentioned last night, the minister suggested in committee that the recent resignations and so on in the United Kingdom were, in his opinion, indications of valid reasons for a totally unified defence structure. I just wanted to complete my remarks on this aspect of the matter today and make one or two other comments on Christopher Mayhew, because I believe they are pertinent and they do indicate to us in Canada what is going on in at least one major area of this world.

In his book "Britain's Role Tomorrow", chapter 13, Christopher Mayhew deals with the question of whether the establishment of a single armed service is the best way to proceed. He has this to say in part:

> The major danger in unification is that a clear vertical chain of command on a "functional" basis can seriously weaken the links between different functions inside a particular service. Unifying the three service personnel departments could weaken the links between the air staff and the R.A.F. operational commands, between those who deploy the aircraft and those who fly them. A central logistics department could interpose a bureaucratic wall between the navy and its dockyards. A central training department could separate the army from its jungle warfare school in South Johore. In any defence organization, the most numerous and important ties are those between different functions inside a particular service, and not between the same functions inside different services.
> Put another way, the relationship between the "user" and the "producer" in a particular service is more important than the relationship between the "users" in different services and between "producers" in different services. This will remain true for as long as servicemen still have to specialize in order to fight in three different elements—land, sea, and air.

I commend the reading not only of Christopher Mayhew's statement of resignation in the house but of his book "Britain's Role Tomorrow". I think if that is done by some hon. members opposite they might have a slightly different opinion about the merit of going ahead with full unification.

Now, Mr. Chairman, during orders of the day this afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked the government if they would give consideration, or if indeed they were giving any consideration, to one of the spin-off effects of integration and unification. I apologize to the committee for raising this matter a second time. It has been three weeks now since it was known that about 100 men would be dislocated because of a change in defence purchasing policies. I suspect these policies flowed directly from the Department of National Defence.

In any event, these policies are part of the defence purchasing policy and have led to the lay off of some 60 employees of Fairey Aircraft, an equal number from Cossor, an equal number from Sperry Gyroscope, and other companies might have one or two employees involved. We know that cutbacks have been made in the Neptune program, and there has been a reorientation of the Sikorsky helicopter work back to Montreal. All this has put these firms, particularly Fairey, in a position where they have no alternative but to lay off these men for an extended period. This means a loss of earnings for these men and, since we are talking about 100 men probably earning $5,000 each per year, the total amount might run to half a million dollars.

In addition, we were promised there would be no undue economic impact on any area because of unification. We have not even got unification yet, but we are already feeling the impact. I urge the government and the minister now to look very hard and very quickly for a method of overcoming this peculiar difficulty that is already rearing its ugly head.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question before he goes on to another part of his remarks. He was dealing with the disastrous economic situation that will result in Halifax, and may I ask him if he is aware that some time ago this same minister closed the Point Edward naval base in my area, resulting in the loss of 700 jobs and a payroll of over $3 million? We were assured also by the Prime Minister and by the minister from Nova Scotia that no undue effects would take place.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Many people are still without jobs.

Mr. Forrestall: My hon. friend raises a question with which I am very familiar indeed. It is for this reason I plead with the government to take some action immediately in order to avoid the economic hardships that we are suffering. I know the Sydney situation well which resulted from the closing of Point Edward. As I said the other night, this constant fear of telling the truth, of exposing their plans and letting people have a look at them so that retraining programs can be undertaken, is not good. The government will not do this; they say nothing is happening. However, you wake up one morning and find that the rug has been pulled out from under you. The maritime provinces cannot stand this economically.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): You will get phony promises from the minister that no one will suffer.

Mr. Forrestall: It seems to me this is not the way to approach this type of problem. This consolidation program is not a classified program. What is secret about it? What are we trying to hide? The program should be brought out into the open so we can talk about it so our provincial people can get together with the federal people and work out a scheme in co-operation. As I have said, when you close a major military establishment about 100 civilian jobs are lost. Shearwater is just a start, and this type of thing could go on. I believe there are some 5,700 or 5,800 civilian employees directly or indirectly connected with the Department of National Defence in the Halifax-Dartmouth area. We cannot afford to wait until the last minute to learn the ultimate fate of these employees.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I mention again the fact that for two days now I have asked the Prime Minister to indicate his reply to questions concerning a major situation in respect of the 700 or 800 members of local 743 of the Canadian Labour Congress at the Halifax dockyard. The situation is that the government is practising open discrimination against labour. These men are not classified under the ship repair group as labourers, board of transport people, riggers, brush hands and so on, and they find themselves in the position of receiving, among other things, one of four different rates of pay. Repeated pleas to the government by way of the associate minister and the President of the Treasury Board have produced no results whatever. A final plea has been made in the form of a night letter to the Prime Minister asking him personally to intervene to correct this situation, or at least to recognize that there is a very serious problem here. I suggest to the minister that unless some action is taken these men will go on strike and will picket the yard, and we will then find our national defence structure in maritime command grinding to a very abrupt halt.

I close by leaving those two problems with the minister. I ask him to be kind enough to urge upon the Prime Minister and his colleagues in cabinet the necessity for finding some solution to the problem confronting the employees at Shearwater, and I ask the government to move quickly to overcome the disparity in labour wage rates among members of the general workers union at H.M.C. Dockyard.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to do something entirely foreign to my nature but which I feel must be done. I am going to submit a plea to the minister not to proceed with this measure at this time. It is within his power to delay further debate on this bill. If the minister will not listen to my plea I will direct it to the Prime Minister, yes, to the entire Liberal cabinet. I do so with the knowledge that the members of the official opposition are determined in their stand. We feel it is our duty to object to this measure in the interest of the defence of this country. We feel that this is what the people of Canada expect of us. We feel that if any other party were the official opposition it would do the same thing. My only regret is that by following the course we are determined to follow we will be labelled with words that have often been used before such as obstructive, disloyal, destructive, politically motivated, and without responsibility. But I can assure the minister that regardless of the words used to describe our action we are going to fight this measure because we do not agree with it in principle.

That is why I plead once more with the minister. I feel that he was perhaps initially misinformed about this measure. He has heard me speak on this point in the hearings before the defence committee. I referred him to a statement made by his present vice-chief, I believe it was, who suggested that there were only two courses open to the minister, although I think subsequent evidence has shown that there are more than two, in order to operate within a fixed budget and still maintain the effectiveness of our armed forces.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

When this point was raised in the committee we pointed out to the minister the action that France had taken in similar circumstances. They were faced with a similar proposition and had to maintain the effectiveness of their forces. What did they do? They immediately reduced their armed services by 50 per cent but obtained modern equipment so that their effective fire power remained the same and they stayed within their budget. This the minister could do.

There are possibly even more courses open to the minister, but I would ask him to pause at this time. Many of his former senior officers have also asked him to pause, to let the integration of the forces develop and see how it works. We have told the minister time and time again that we are not opposed to the implementation of integration.

However, Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some misunderstanding about what integration means. Certainly there is a lot of misunderstanding about the difference between the term "integration" and the term "unification". I was very surprised yesterday to hear the minister say that integration and unification are more or less part of the same cycle. I suggest that the minister is confusing not only the members on this side of the house but also his own members and the Canadian public when he makes such statements. This confusion has existed throughout the course of this debate. We are not unaware of the commitments of the government during this centennial year and it is not our desire to prolong this debate. Neither do I dislike the minister; in some ways I like him very much. But as I said, I think he has been misled, even though he will not admit it.

Mr. Régimbal: He is a willing victim.

Mr. McIntosh: Thank you; that is a good term. Yes, he is a willing victim. However, he should realize it now. If he does not, then the cabinet and the Prime Minister should. In any event, we are determined to pursue our course in regard to the implementation of unification.

• (3:40 p.m.)

I point out to the minister how some of the confusion arose. It was of his own making, as I think he will admit. First of all, when we asked him what unification meant we had just cause for asking. You will remember, Mr. Chairman, the number of senior officers who were discharged or had resigned because they did not know the definition of unification. In fact, it was evident in the committee that an embarrassment had been caused to the minister when he had to apologize to a certain admiral who had taken certain action.

The Canadian public do not know why that admiral took that action, but Admiral Landymore had been confronted by a number of subordinate officers under his command who had asked him what unification meant. The admiral told them truthfully that he did not know but that he would go to Ottawa to find out. His immediate superior, Air Chief Marshal Miller, also admitted freely to the committee that he did not know either and so he could not give Admiral Landymore an answer. As a result, Admiral Landymore went back to his subordinates and truthfully told them that he did not know what unification meant, that there was confusion. In addition, we also had the evidence of Lieutenant General Moncel on this point, to which I will refer in a few moments. I believe his evidence was referred to by the hon. member for Parkdale who I see is now in the chamber and I hope will remain.

Personally, Mr. Chairman, I have four reasons for pleading with the minister as I do, and I should like to put them on record. My first reason that we should delay this debate for six months, one year or even more—it does not matter—is that we want to examine the problems which have arisen from the evidence presented not only in the committee but also in this house. At the moment the definition of unification appears to be contradictory. I will come back to this point and explain why this is my first reason for delaying this measure.

My second reason is to assure ourselves that the identity of the three services within a single service concept will be maintained. There is some doubt in our minds that this will be the case.

My third reason is that we want to obtain further details of the cost and efficiency of present government defence plans, and the impact that these plans will have on the economy of the country. This point was made by the hon. member for Halifax. We want further concrete proof that the effectiveness of our troops will not deteriorate. We are more concerned about the deterioration of our combat troops than about tidy administration.

Time and again we have said that the minister has put the cart before the horse. We have no disagreement with the concept of implementating integration to tidy up the supply and administrative elements of our forces, but we do object to any tydying up, amalgamating, integrating or unifying that affects the combat effectiveness of our troops. The fighting part of our services must be kept uppermost in our minds. No matter how good the supply element is, no matter how tidy the administration, the combat element of our forces is the most important.

My fourth reason is that the positions with respect to NATO and NORAD are to be reviewed in 1968 and 1969. That brings up another point. Are we to go it alone, using an expression the minister may have used, in defending our country or should we be part of an interdependent group? It was agreed in committee that Canada can only be assured of a defence through a collective alliance. In this day and age no country can defend its own borders.

I now return to my first point in order to deal with the contradictory evidence we had before us. On page 502 of the committee proceedings Air Marshal Sharp, in talking about the differences between integration and unification, said:

> The dividing line—in the case of integration you must maintain three separate services, even though they are headless, because the present act does not permit you to unify into a single service. In the case of unification, which will be permitted by the amendment before you—

He is referring to Bill C-243.

> —you can create a single service and one does not need to maintain the three separate services.

I emphasize the last words:

> —one does not need to maintain the three separate services.

Previously he had said on page 501:

> —then people in it should be able to be employed anywhere and not keep them segregated as navy, army and air force—

These words directly contradict the minister who said on several occasions that there would be no change in the organization of forces units, that the system will not be changed by reason of unification, and that we shall certainly continue to have infantry regiments as well as the Royal Canadian Armoured Corps and the Royal Regiment of Canadian Artillery. The minister said:

> Although a unified personnel management system will be introduced, the separate units and elements of naval, field and air force will continue to exist.

That seems quite straightforward, though it contradicts what Air Marshal Sharp said, namely, that one need not maintain the three separate services. On the other hand, the minister says that we will continue to have the navy, army and air force but I point out that he ended his statement with these words:

Until the force structure within the unified force is developed.

We do not know what that means. Do those words mean that there is a time limitation to everything the minister has said? Do they mean that we will have the army, navy and air force for a limited time? We do not know how long that time will be. The minister has caused confusion. Members on the other side of the house are confused about what he is doing, though 80 officers resigned because they could not understand the term "unification". I freely admit, having attended 55 meetings of the committee over eight weeks, that I am as confused now as when I began about the term "unification". That is partly because time and again the minister has turned somersaults.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra said yesterday that unification only means a change of name and uniform. If we could believe that we as the official opposition would tell the government to go ahead with the bill. But we do not and cannot accept that because we remember the minister's words:

Until the force structure within the unified force is developed.

Obviously there will be some change, and it is a change we are afraid of. Having listened to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra during approximately 55 meetings and knowing he has heard the evidence before the committee, I was surprised to hear him make that statement.

I was not surprised to hear the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River say that the minister had told him that unification and integration are one and the same thing. I know the minister does not believe that, but I do not think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was deliberately telling a falsehood. He was repeating something that had been told him. The official opposition is in a quandary which it would like to straighten out. It cannot be accused of not being sincere or concerned about the matter. We are concerned about the minister's remarks.

The hon. member for Parkdale, apart from saying how much he admired the Minister of National Defence for his forthrightness and courage, said that he was in favour of unification. He put up a fairly good argument and I read with interest passages in his speech where he referred to something I had said. I mention the hon. member's speech because, having read it and knowing him as I do, I believe he has deliberately distorted the facts.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Perhaps he did not distort facts in that part of his speech dealing with the evidence of Air Chief Marshal Miller but he did distort them when dealing with Lieutenant General Moncel. The hon. member tries to make much of the fact that the former chief of defence staff seemed to contradict his former vice chief, Lieutenant General Moncel. The hon. member read a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East, as found on page 2299 of the committee proceedings:

Did you, as chief of staff, ever see the four plans on unification drafted by General Moncel?
Air Chief Marshal Miller: No.

That appears to be a contradiction. But on reading the evidence it appears that the four plans drafted by General Moncel were not submitted. All hon. members draft speeches time and again without submitting them. General Moncel did not say that he had submitted any of these plans.

I see hon. members on the government side shaking their heads. They know that when something new is proposed in the services, plans are drafted. General Moncel honestly tried to understand what the minister meant by unification. He thought he understood. It was as difficult for the general as for practically everybody else to understand what was meant.

How can we expect the Canadian public to form an opinion on issues of this kind? How can it be expected even of members of parliament who do not spend their lives in the services studying these matters? I do not know on what basis the minister has reached the conclusion that unification will work. The generals have advised him that it will not. We have tried to find out where he got the idea of unification. We have tried to find out what it really means. He has not been able to explain it even to his own supporters.

I continue to deal with the speech made by the hon. member for Parkdale in the course of which I was mentioned. I believe he distorted the views I expressed. One of the members of the committee, the hon. member for Hamilton West, questioned Air Chief Marshal Miller about the increased effectiveness of our combat troops. He asked whether there had been an increase since the last war, or since this government had taken over and, of course, the air marshal said there had been an increase.

The reason I asked my question was to show that Canada's increased effectiveness was not the result of anything achieved by the minister. Every country in the world has proceeded in the same way. Combat effectiveness has increased. This is why I say the hon. member's speech in this house was distorted. I believe this was an intentional effort on his part, not that he is doing any service to his party, because he is confusing the members of this party and making it more difficult to understand this problem. And, as I said before, we sincerely wish to understand what is happening. The second point was:

To assure ourselves that the identity of the services within a single service concept will be maintained.

We do not think it will. And we have gone over the next point time and time again.

To obtain more detail with regard to the costs and efficiency of the present government's defence plans.

When we asked the minister and the chief of the defence staff what the estimated cost of their plan would be and what manpower would be required, we were surprised to learn that they had made no studies whatever along these lines. The same question was put to the former chief of staff who said he had made preliminary studies and that manpower would have to be increased by about one third; I think he said from 104,000 to 150,000. He also estimated that the cost to the people of Canada would roughly be double the amount of the military budget at the time the committee met. I think he said $2.6 billion. This was, of course, based on the assumption that we would continue our present commitments while creating a new, peace restoring force.

Members of the committee pointed out that even at the present time it is difficult to get sufficient personnel to fulfil our present commitments. In these circumstances we differ with the minister as to the advisability of setting up another force particularly when, as was pointed out by some hon. members yesterday, such a force would be of little use to the United Nations at the present time. An offer to provide one has been rejected.

It is all very well to make the offer, but why should we let our own defences down, thinking we have sole responsibility for peacekeeping throughout the world? I have stated before that the peace restoring role is altogether different from the peace keeping role and that it is a very dangerous one. I have pointed out that when the United States embarked on a peace restoring role in Viet Nam it did so with 24,000 men. Today there are over 400,000 Americans in the field there. Canada cannot afford to take on such a role.

What arrangements have been made to set up a combined force with those of other countries? There is no use in our going into a venture of this kind with a population of 20 million and limited financial resources if no other country is willing to become an ally in a like role. I urge the minister to shelve this bill for a time, bearing in mind that the NATO agreement is to be reviewed in 1968 and the NORAD agreement in 1969. The allies may decide at that time that NATO is no longer needed.

As a supporter of NATO I would say that NATO has prevented a third world war and that no matter how much it has cost Canada it has been well worth while. I am sure that any hon. member who is acquainted with the organization of NORAD can have little doubt about what it can do to protect the North American continent, and I would say that any contribution we have made in this respect has certainly been worth while.

I am sure I speak for every man in this house who has ever served in the armed forces when I say that our soldiers, sailors and airmen are the last who want to see war of any kind. Our senior officers have many times been called Colonel Blimps and brass hats, without justification. It has been said they would rather see action than anything else. This is not so. Any man who has seen action abhors war. These are reasons for pleading with the minister to shelve this bill at least for the present.

There is another organization which has been very interested in the actions of this committee and of the Minister of National Defence in bringing forward Bill C-243. I refer to the Tri-Service Identities Organization, or TRIO. They are opposed to the measure and they have spent a great deal of time opposing it and trying to understand it. I believe every member of the House of Commons has received a letter or memorandum from the president of that body. It reads as follows:

1. It is noteworthy that not one recently retired senior officer no longer having any attachment to the Department of Defence has supported the program which will be carried forward if Bill C-243 is enacted and everyone of any stature outside the services or government whose military opinion would command respect who has testified before the defence committee has expressed criticism or reservation on the proposed reorganization of the defence establishment.

2. Claims that other countries are following the Canadian example have not been substantiated. In fact government intentions as expressed in white papers on defence in the United Kingdom, France and New Zealand show no indication of emulating the Canadian plan which will be carried forward if the bill is enacted. Informed persons in both the U.S.A. and the United Kingdom, as evidenced by recent articles and statements, have indicated concern or disenchantment with the Canadian experiment.

3. The effective strength of the forces is below 104,000 men or 20,000 under the strength at 31st March, 1963. The original objective was to reduce the forces by approximately 10,000 men. Included in this excessive loss are not only many senior officers well in advance of retirement but also many officers in the rank of lieutenant colonel and colonel or equivalent in all three services. In the normal course they would have been available to fill appointments of greater responsibility, yet their retirement must restrict the selection for future leaders. This can have serious repercussions for the future if something is not done to check this exodus.

4. There is evidence of concern over our capability to meet our military commitments as a result of the situation which has developed in the defence department in the last four years.

• (4:00 p.m.)

5. Expenditures on equipment for the five years ending the 31st March, 1968 will not match the spending for the five years ending the 31st March, 1963 despite claims that the reorganization is to make more money available for equipment.

6. It is admitted that the steps in the reorganization which will be possible under Bill C-243 will not lead to savings of any account.

Mr. Hellyer: Much of that was wasted. The Avro Arrow took up much of that five year period.

Mr. Ricard: What about the underwear you bought for 100 years?

Mr. Churchill: And the simulator.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Minister, that is one argument that should be settled or at least discussed before we proceed with this bill to unify the services. This is another statement which has caused confusion within the department. Therefore I again plead with the minister not to proceed with this measure at the present time. You provide arguments yourselves against going ahead with this measure, arguments which cause many of us to stand up here, like I am now doing, to oppose the principle of this bill because we do not understand it. I continue the quotation:

Thus if any savings are possible, it will be as a result of those steps taken since 1964 under the authority of Bill C-90.

A great deal could be said about Bill C-90 which was passed by the house. If, as members of the government have said, unification only means a change in name and uniform and unification and integration are one and the same thing, then certainly we do not need Bill C-243. However, I am inclined to agree with Air Marshal Sharp when he said we will not have the three services within a short time. Regardless of what the minister has said, Bill C-90 was sufficient to do everything put forward by government members so far in this debate.

Liberal members have made no argument why we should proceed with Bill C-243. At times the minister has attempted to do so, but the wisdom of proceeding with it at this time would, as TRIO states, "be questionable if economies are not to be effected and in face of the widespread criticism which the department's program is encountering." TRIO also states:

7. It has been admitted that morale should be improved.

The minister should take into consideration that the morale of the services was not improved after serving personnel found out about Bill C-243. It has already done a lot to bring down morale in the services. I continue the quotation:

Many service personnel are deeply disturbed by the uncertainty which now exists for a service career and are unwilling to accept the reorganization as they now see it. Nothing should be done to aggravate this situation . . .

9. Overwhelming support for the reorganization program does not exist amongst Canadians generally. Thus the latest Gallup poll showed less than 50 per cent of Canadians support it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that the hon. member continue his speech?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, briefly.

Mr. McIntosh: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I thank the committee for this unusual privilege.

Mr. Hellyer: You have been very nice this afternoon.

Mr. McIntosh: I hope you will reciprocate, Mr. Minister, and heed my plea because, as I said at the start, it is foreign to my nature to plead but this issue is much greater than any one member, including you, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Hellyer: Agreed.

Mr. McIntosh: It would be disastrous if it is not beneficial to Canada. That is why I make this plea, and I hope some of my colleagues will get up and make the same plea. If you, Mr. Minister, will not heed our pleas I hope the Prime Minister and other members in the chamber will listen to us.

Mr. Churchill: The parliamentary secretaries might help out.

Mr. McIntosh: I continue the quotation:

> Observing that this poll was taken before the defence committee started its hearings, and before so much cogent evidence was presented by so many knowledgeable persons against the plans and policies as presently disclosed would certainly permit the conclusion that even fewer Canadians support the program now than six weeks ago.
> 10. The military merit of the proposed reorganization has not been established in the light of our declared military commitments at least to the satisfaction of experienced ex-senior officers who appeared before the committee.

I think there is justification and foundation for this plea, Mr. Minister, and I hope you will take note of it.

If I am not taking too much time of the committee I would like to refer the minister to an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of Tuesday, April 4, a newspaper which usually supports the Liberal party. It is headed "Destroying Defence." I regret that some of it is not complimentary to the minister but I think it should be put on record. I will not read it all. It says:

> This revolutionary gamble and experiment is being foisted on Canada in face of the strongest possible protest by nearly every experienced admiral, general and air marshal in the country.

I wish to remind the minister that these are people who have spent all their lives in the services, people who have been taught to serve and not to disobey, who have been taught to give advice to the best of their knowledge and ability and have done so even to the point of being dismissed.

> If this step could simply be classed as a further blunder by an accident prone government, and could be corrected when its faults became clearly apparent, the country could perhaps afford to go along for the ride.

But we are afraid, Mr. Minister, that we cannot go along for the ride.

> When it is realized, however, that Mr. Hellyer is playing with an annual investment of some $1.6 billion which vitally concerns the defence structure of the nation and involves our international obligations, the magnitude of this error becomes obvious.

In another portion the editorial says:

> This ill-advised step could, by a single act of parliament, sponsored by an inexperienced minister, tear down and destroy proven services which have been built with the sacrifice and efforts of Canadians in the past hundred years and more.

With reference to the services the editorial says:

> They have been carefully designed and organized to work in the closest possible harmony with our two major allies, Great Britain and the United States.

Today more than ever defence is interdependent. We must have a defence alliance. We must have the alliance of the different countries in NATO. We must depend on our neighbours to the south because, as I have said time and again in this chamber, they are going to defend the North American continent regardless of whether or not Canada wants to be defended. I say that if we can undertake one tenth of that defence, and I say one tenth because we are 20 million people compared with 200 million Americans, if we can do that one tenth of the job well, which I am sure our Canadian forces can do as they have done in the past, then we will retain our sovereignty and national pride which are so valuable to a great many of us.

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIntosh: The editorial also says that unification is "entirely foreign to both British and United States defence organizations." It is also entirely foreign to the set-up in NATO. Four brigade groups cannot fit into the NATO commander's plan. It is almost impossible. It will be an albatross around NATO command's neck.

Mr. Hellyer: Does it say who wrote the editorial?

Mr. McIntosh: No, it does not, but you can have it if you want it when I have finished. It also says:

> In the course of the next year, Canada will be reviewing and renegotiating her military commitments under NATO. Common sense, at least, should dictate delaying any major revision of our defence forces until these revised undertakings become known.

I could go on, Mr. Chairman. I have much more material, but I want to thank the committee for letting me finish this portion of what I have to say.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek a question at this time?

Mr. McIntosh: Yes.

Mr. Haidasz: Was it the intention of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek to convey the idea to the members of this committee that Lieutenant General Moncel was against unification of the Canadian armed forces?

Mr. McIntosh: Yes, absolutely. If you will read the entire minutes of proceedings and evidence in respect of this matter when he appeared before the national defence committee as a witness you will find that he said—I do not have the evidence here at the moment but I have it some place—that he did not know and still does not know what unification means. One can read certain portions of that evidence out of context, but if I could have the time to look up this evidence, I could show the hon. member that if one takes the evidence as a whole—and not too much of it—he will see that General Moncel was and still is against unification. In fact that is one of the reasons he left the department prior to his normal retirement date. I believe he had six or seven years more to serve.

Mr. Haidasz: I should like to refer the hon. member to minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 22 of the standing committee on national defence, page 1310, where General Moncel answered a question asked by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona concerning unification. General Moncel said:

> I was well aware of the fact that the white paper said that unification was the ultimate end. That was fine. There was nothing wrong with it as an aim. There was nothing wrong with it all; and it may be that had they been given the time it might not have taken five years: it ought to have taken three or four years in which a plot could have been evolved and the commitments altered to make unification fit like a glove without all this nonsense and trouble that we have had.

Does that not mean that General Moncel understood what the aims of the white paper were and that he went along with the aims expressed in the white paper and the ultimate aim which is unification of the Canadian armed services?

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out to the hon. member for Parkdale that the term unification was used once and once only in the white paper and certainly not in the sense of the interpretation we have of it at the present time. "Unification" meant "to unify", in the general sense. It certainly did not mean what the minister has said time and time again. This is one interpretation given by the minister:

> Unification is the end objective of a logical and evolutionary progression.

He later changed that and said that he wished he had used the words "the single service concept" instead of "unification". Had he done that in the first instance, I imagine that General Moncel and many other senior officers would still be in the department. It is because of this misunderstanding of the term "unification" that there has been disagreement between the government and the opposition and between the government and the members of the forces of our country. This is the reason we ask that this bill be held up and that the government proceed with the business they have in mind for the centennial year, because we are determined to keep discussing this bill until we obtain a definition of unification which all of us understand and which the officers and men who have to serve under it understand. It is our responsibility to see that the Canadian people understand what unification means, to see whether Canada can afford unification, and to see whether we can obtain the manpower to supply all these formations—NORAD, NATO, SACLANT, and so on—and still come up with a brigade group which can be used in the role of restoring peace as well as in the peace keeping role. The hon. member has introduced a statement which shows that there is an admission that we really do not know what we are talking about when we talk about unification.

Mr. Haidasz: Does the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek really believe—

The Deputy Chairman: I believe the hon. member for Parkdale has directed two questions to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek and wishes to stress these points further. I would suggest that he do so at another time.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, we have had a very fortuitous set of questions and answers as a prelude to the presentation I shall attempt to make at this time. What faces the nation today is the necessity for clarification in respect of the real meaning of the word "unification". The defence of Canada is the most important subject we could discuss on the floor of this House of Commons. Between wars we all earnestly hope that peace will remain indefinitely and old retired soldiers like myself hope that we will be able to sit back in an armchair and leave matters of defence to competent committees and able ministers. I only wish that this was the situation, but I do not have such confidence.

This is not a personal attack. I have the utmost regard for the character, integrity, kindliness and principled intent of the Minister of National Defence, but this is the worst thing I could say about him because wishful thinking and kindly thoughts are not enough to ensure that today and in the future Canada will survive. When Mr. Chamberlain was prime minister of England I shuddered when I read the reports from Munich. We all wish for peace in our time. My young life was shattered by the results of wishful thinking. Had we had a different man in the defence department or in the prime minister's chair in England in the 1930's when Mussolini was on the rise and Hitler was still a bad name associated with a book he had written, we might have had peace in our time. War is something that faces every government whether that government is in Canada or somewhere else. Those of us who have lived between wars in the western world must be alert and be prepared to pay the price of freedom. I for one have not forgotten that the price can be too high for forgetting.

I think I am outnumbered in this house in respect of some of the very firm ideas I have on this matter. I would like to see a modified draft system in Canada so that every young Canadian, whether he wanted to or not, would be given an opportunity to become physically and morally fit and able to defend his country to his last drop of blood and to his last dollar. I realize that between wars this idea is just as unpalatable today as it was in the days when one lone voice in England, that of the late Sir Winston Churchill, spoke in this manner. I am not attempting to draw a parallel between my capabilities and his except in one narrow sense. My dedication is the same. My life and my talents are at the service of my country, whether in the army, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in parliament or anywhere else. Nothing else is any good today if one wants to stand up and call himself a Canadian.

I want to know that the end result of this bill will mean the survival of Canada as a free nation with her own sovereignty. If the minister can give me an assurance in this regard, I will support the bill and use every influence at my command to get other hon. members and the people of Canada to support it. If this bill will worsen our position and sacrifice every tradition we have held as one of the lion's pups I will vote against it. Perhaps we do not want to be referred to as British because we have now grown too big. Perhaps we do not want the word "royal" attached to our regiments. That is not a dispute. We want our regiments to be Canadian, composed of men who will fight to the last to defend this loved land. I know that every man within the sound of my voice will agree with that idea.

Should we keep quiet until we know the answers to these questions? Should we stop talking until the minister tells us in clear, unequivocal language that the great traditions of our three services, on the land, on the air, and on the sea, will continue under this one, unified force? Must we wait to be assured that this free and noble Canada will survive and that every man will be willing and happy to do his part to defend this country in peace and in war?

We have all heard the lie, whether unintentional or not, that has been repeated in this country following the cancellation of production of the Arrow. This whole situation has been made a political football. I wish everybody in Canada knew the real truth. Production of the Arrow was cancelled because the government of the day decided it could not pay the bill for this type of weapon while at the same time overcoming transportation difficulties and the high cost of production with our small population.

Let me refer hon. members to volume 15 of the proceedings of the special committee on defence. On October 22, 1963, the ex-chief of staff, General Foulkes, made it abundantly clear that the production of the Arrow was cancelled because of political reasons. The government headed by the present Leader of the Opposition was left with the dirty job of cancelling its production. It was a job that had to be done at that time and this was known by every member of the armed forces of that day.

As an alternative we accepted the proposition that the Bomarc would be useful. Hansard is full of the present defence minister's comments regarding the Bomarc. He suggested that to accept the Bomarc armed with atomic weapons would be to make ourselves slaves subservient to the Pentagon. I will not bore the committee by referring to the remarks of the present Secretary of State who supported that view, because I do not expect the ladies of Canada to carry the burden of defence. The present minister of defence told us on numerous occasions that if we accepted the Bomarc under any circumstances we would become slaves of the Pentagon. Today we have the Bomarc equipped with atomic warheads. The minister knows that he has absolutely no control over the use of the Bomarc.

Fortunately I have had some legal training. Let me explain why no one in this country has any control over the use of the Bomarc. The United States McMahon Act spells out that the President of the United States, and he alone, will determine if and when atomic weapons, whether on United States soil or elsewhere, are to be used. The members of the present administration have solemnly promised to accept that situation. Members of the present administration have said they had to accept this situation because of a previous commitment. I do not know whether the situation can be renegotiated but many of us would like to see the McMahon Act changed so that we would have what has been termed dual control of atomic weapons on Canadian soil or in the hands of Canada's armed forces.

I will accept the minister's assurance that unification will have no significant effect on Canadian armed strength, Canada's sovereignty, or her right to survive in a still hostile world. Will unification in fact denude Canada's armed forces? Many people have suggested that the present minister of defence is responsible for the strange relationship between the United States and Canada in respect of atomic weapons in Canada, but where does the Prime Minister fit into this picture? He was our expert in relations with the United States and he knows better than perhaps anyone else in this country our international legal rights. That right hon. gentleman has spent a lifetime studying this aspect of international relations, and I venture to suggest that perhaps no other man in Canada knows better than he whether the situation which exists as a result of the McMahon Act can be changed. I do not know the answer to this problem but it clearly exists as long as these armed aircraft are in the skies over northern Ontario and Quebec.

I do know something about soldiering and the morale and pride of a regiment. As a boy of eight I learned the semaphore method of signalling while in the Canadian militia, and as a boy at school I was a cadet. I served with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and no force in the world has a higher morale or greater tradition. If we did away with the red tunic we would have something less than the great traditions now enjoyed by that force. The red coat represents justice, fair play, humanity and a square deal.

Let me remind hon. members that the greatest contribution made by the mounted police force has been made by those at the grass roots level. The greatest contribution made by Canadians serving in the armed forces, whether at sea, in the air or on the land—I mention land last because I am a soldier—has been made by those in the ranks who slept without sheets in rough blankets. They won glory not only at Vimy Ridge and Passchendaele but also on the beach at Anzio, at the Sangro to the Sangro river and from Caen to Berlin. This Canadian glory has been enlarged upon by Canadians serving in units in Cyprus and in the Congo. I am immensely proud of them because they are serving in the same way Canadians served in two world wars. It is not necessary to put them into green uniforms in order to maintain the traditions of our services.

I believe in peacekeeping and I would hate to see Canada's military strength spread along a thin green line around the world without having some security at home. I put Canada first in my consideration although I long for equality in the Congo, peace between the Arabs and the Jews and among the Cypriots, be they Greeks or Turks.

• (4:30 p.m.)

I think first in terms of defending the little creek where I was born and then Canada and if I have any energy left I am quite willing to share it for the benefit of the rest of the world. But I do not think it is necessary to unify all our regiments. I suggest that the minister himself does not really believe it because the highland regiments say, "You are not going to take away our kilts," he dare not take away their kilts, and he knows it. So he has made an exception in their case.

An hon. Member: He tried to take away their bagpipes.

Mr. Bigg: The minister said, "We will not touch the highland regiments". He will not touch the Royal 22nd regiment, and I do not blame him, because the Royal 22nd regiment is one of the finest regiments of men who ever put on the Canadian uniform. I will not say it is the best because there are a great many others—the Princess Pats, the 48th Highlanders, the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery, the Service Corps, the nurses, the WAACS, the WAAFS, the Royal Edmontons. I could go on all afternoon; the list is endless.

I think the minister should ask for advice and when he does he should be man enough to accept it. I stood on the carpet many times before my commanding officers when they asked my opinion about this and that situation, and I gave it. I was never fired for it, I was promoted, because when they did not agree with me I stood behind my guns and said, "I have signed my name to this after giving my opinion to the best of my ability. If you want somebody else's opinion, take it, but let his signature be on it." Let the minister sign a paper saying that he thinks unification is better than the three forces as we have known them. Let him show me that it is better if he can, and I hope he can, because I have no doubt this bill will become law.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Hear, hear.

Mr. Bigg: I am cheered by the Postmaster General. The noses have been counted. I am afraid the deal has been made. But do not criticize us for getting up and saying what we think about it because we are putting our signatures to this bill, for and against, when we stand and vote. If we did not stand and vote the very rocks of Canada would cry out. How many men still serving in the armed forces would like to say what they think about unification? I would like to see a great many more of them stand up and say it and get fired. There is room for them in this house—I would say about 128 seats.

An hon. Member: On which side?

Mr. Bigg: These men are not for unification. The men who serve in the Royal 22nd are not for unification. Those in the highland regiments are not for unification. Those in the navy certainly are not. And believe me, all the men who serve in the navy are not Wasps. A great many men who serve in the navy kneel to their God and serve their church in the way they wish because they live in a country that allows them to do this and always will. It is a sad day if they have to fear any minister of the crown.

Is unification an end in itself or is it a political tool? If unification leads to survival and to a better, safer Canada, if unification and men serving in one uniform will mean that more young men will be willing to step forward and wear the uniform of their country, I am all for it. I have not been sold on it. I read the names of those men who have given their opinions on unification. I served under one of them. He was major of our battery and is now the late—late in service but far from dead—Lieutenant General Guy Simonds, one of the finest soldiers who ever put on a uniform in or out of the Canadian forces. He does not like unification. General Foulkes does not like it, and he was honest enough to say in the parliamentary committee that the Avro airplane was not destroyed by the present Leader of the Opposition but because of the inability of the Canadian people to pay the enormous, snowballing costs of this rather oversized and—I believe these were the words of the minister himself—obsolete aircraft.

Tradition in the army depends to a great extent on the pride of the unit. I have been assured that the Black Watch regiment will keep its kilt. I hope they will and I think they should because members of my family on my father's mother's side wear the Johnstone tartan, which happens to be the Black Watch tartan. This means something to me. I speak personally in this regard and I make no apology for so doing because it is the only way one can speak when talking about things such as morale which are personal and depend on one's own personal loyalty and tradition. I would be horrified if any minister of the crown said that if I was disloyal to him and his ideas I was disloyal to Canada. In a rougher age we would have had to meet at dawn, but he would have had to be a good shot.

I again pose the question: What is the end result if we carry the unification program through to its logical conclusion? Are we going to maintain the necessary morale? Are we going to get the necessary recruits? Are we going to keep the traditions and loyalty of our regiments and our services? I come from a military family. My father's brother cut the submarine nets at the Dardanelles as a captain in the British navy. Incidentally, he was the youngest captain in the British navy. He would hate to be called colonel. Two of my brothers were in the air force and one in the navy. We are proud of our differences. We are proud of the fact that we joined of our own free will the armed service of our choice. In fun they laugh at me and call me "Silver" and in fun I call them "Jack Tar" or "birdy-bird" or something like that, making a joke about the other services. But I know we have unification in spirit, unification in dedication to our country. This is unification that means something. It is unification which does not worship a word but worships the principle behind the behaviour of all decent Canadians.

I have not been sold on this idea. I think unification means something else. The rear admirals, air marshals and generals who have expressed opinions about unification served most of the time in the ranks and their opinions cannot be swept aside just because we do not happen to agree with them. This is a matter about which the brass and the grass agree, and I think the minister should listen to their advice. If the minister really wants a cross-section of opinion, let every member of the armed forces sign with his own pen a short screed on what he thinks of unification. Then old fogeys like me can stand on one side, and if the rising generation of young Canadians who wish to serve Canada want to do it in a green uniform and do not want to be called soldiers, sailors and airmen, that is all right with me. I do not know what we are going to call our serving men but it does not matter. I am not here to fight about words.

I am trying to find out the real principle behind this bill. I am trying to add my small voice to the voices of the long list of distinguished men, men who have made the grade, men who have been recognized as leaders in the military field and who have given a lifetime of dedicated service. I cannot believe that at the end of 30 years of this kind of service any man would be disloyal for 18 months or even 18 minutes. I cannot go along with the proposition that it is necessary to be disloyal to a country or to your principles to disagree with politicians. I feel with every ounce of feeling I have in my body that there are truly times when one has to stand up and risk being fired or even being shot, if that should be the result of sticking to one's principles and disagreeing with one's senior officers. This is a rare occurrence, and that is one of the reasons I know these men are honest and dedicated. I have spoken to them and I have worked with them. I have served with them. If my opinion means anything, I will say that if I had my service to do over again, particularly in the mounted police, I could not have done as good a job if I had not worn the red coat in the same distinguished way as my good father who belonged to the old North-west Mounted Police and who recently passed away.

These traditions are handed from father to son and from generation to generation. I do not believe we should brush them aside lightly. I believe we should have very cogent arguments indeed if we are going to interfere with the traditions of the British army, the British navy, the Canadian army or the Canadian navy. In many cases our service has been interchangeable. My deskmate fought the Battle of Britain in the Royal Air Force. This did not make any difference. He was fighting for Canada on every mission he flew. It was his own home in Canada that he was defending when he fought over the deserts of Africa, over the mountains of Asia and suffered for three or four years in a German prison camp. Are we going to take all of that away? I think we would be losing something very valuable if we did. I hope this does not sound like a purely emotional appeal.

[Mr. Bigg.]

There is a practical value in retaining morale. I would rather have 10 men who wish to retain the traditions and record of the regiment than 20 who do not care. I do not believe we are being ultra-conservative, with a small "c", by resisting unnecessary and unpleasant change. Polonius gave advice to his son and said, "be not the first by which a new thing's tried, nor yet the last to cast the old aside." I would not want to see us unify our forces in this manner merely to be able to say we did it first. If being first were the only thing, then Cain was a wonderful man because he was the first man who slew his brother. "A country without tradition," someone has said, "will not long remain a country." I believe we have to develop something more than a world peace keeping force in order to retain our freedom. I long for that day, and I am sure the minister does, but I would not like to see him blinded by wishful thinking. Let us not be too many thousand years ahead of our day. Let us not risk the whole of Canadian sovereignty by trying to get ourselves a great name at Flushing Meadows. As one of our members said this afternoon, the United Nations has it within its power to provide a peace keeping force when all the nations are ready to give up some of their sovereignty in the name of world peace.

This is the cause for which our own Prime Minister won the Nobel peace prize. As we all know, however, this idea was not unique in our country. Those of us who went through the unnecessary privations and risks of war never want to see war again. We are willing to go to any lengths to secure that objective except that we will not risk the security of our own land. I say again to the minister that if he can convince us that the result of unification is going to be greater security for Canada in the short pull as well as the long, that it will provide us with a more efficient, better trained force which will be more easily integrated with the armed forces of our allies, he will get a great deal more support than even he may have expected.

Many months ago, if my memory serves me right, when we asked for clarification of this bill the minister told us it would come in due time. He intimated clearly, at least to me, that by the time he clarified the meaning of unification the little green men would be running around and parliament would be involved in a useless debate. I believe that in his own words he said it would be a fait accompli. I see the minister shaking his head but that is certainly the impression he gave me. This may not have been his intention but I believe that impression is widely shared.

Mr. Hellyer: I might have told my hon. friend by way of conversation that legislation is not required for new uniforms or rank designations. If one wishes to do that, it is provided for under the present law. I might have said that to him, but I am sure he would not want to give the impression I said we would be doing something for which the law does not provide.

Mr. Bigg: I was not referring to any private conversation which may have occurred between the minister and myself. I was referring to the statement he made in this house when he was asked to clarify the real meaning of the word "unification". I am well aware of the fact that orders in council can change the peak on a cap and that sort of thing. What I have been trying to put over this afternoon, and I hope I have made some progress, is that we are not just talking about the colour of a uniform or even the destruction of the names of regiments. This is not what I am worried about. I am really worried about the policy of the government and the projecting of this policy into the dim future. What do we really mean to do with regard to Canadian defence, Canadian sovereignty? I, for one, assure the minister that the change in the colour of a uniform or the changing of the names of the services would not make any difference to the attitude of many people toward defence. If the changing of the uniform is unnecessary and the taking away of regimental badges is unnecessary to achieve an end, that end being, I hope, the greater security of our country, then a lot of these minor difficulties might disappear. I think the minister will have to admit that, perhaps not intentionally—

• (4:50 p.m.)

The Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. gentleman that the time allotted to him has expired. Does the hon. member wish to continue?

Mr. Bigg: If I may just finish, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bigg: I think that if some of these deep questions of policy were answered we would not worry about the shape of the cap or the colour of the uniform. I can assure the minister—I think I speak not only for myself but for the vast majority of the members of this house—that we would go a long way toward what the minister calls unification if that unification were based upon a principle.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I rise to say a few words on Bill No. C-243. I was not a member of the defence committee but there are a few matters I should like to raise.

I believe that across the country serious doubts exist about the wisdom of this bill. I believe that the average citizen feels that it is the duty of the opposition to oppose when it believes that legislation may be of doubtful value, may do irreparable harm or is wrong in principle. One of the ministers on the government benches was reported to have said in a speech the other night that the opposition was not doing enough probing, that it was not criticizing sufficiently to be as constructive as it should be in its role as the opposition. Well, let us not be accused of this.

I think one matter the house will regret is that this bill has been brought forward in our centennial year, a time when we are celebrating so much of our historical past, when in a sense we are paying homage to the people who made Canada as we know it today, possible, the people who pioneered this land. These people cut the forests, cleared the land, established homes and built the country that is seen today as the centennial train travels across Canada.

Our politicians had the sense to unite Canada and built it into a nation. This was not achieved by some process of integration and unification or requiring everybody to have the same culture, the same language, the same religion.

We must also remember that our soldiers, sailors and airmen have protected Canada in two great wars by fighting in foreign lands. During the first great war I was at high school and the flower of that school's pupils enlisted when they became old enough. Two thirds of them became lieutenants and only about one third of these men returned. Had they all come back, Mr. Chairman, I often think what a tremendous contribution they might have made. At that time, there were only eight million people in this country, but over 600,000 were under the colours fighting for Canada. We suffered well over 100,000 casualties and more than 50,000 men did not return.

Last Saturday I had both the honour and the privilege of speaking at a Vimy Ridge banquet. Several of those present had been at Vimy Ridge. One man there had also been one of those in the retreat from Mons. And who can forget the "old contemptibles", one division which held off many German divisions and fought a rearguard action to Dunkirk? It was interesting to listen to the stories of these men as they recounted their experiences. One man in the "old contemptibles" was with a battalion of 850 men, only 45 of whom were still alive at Dunkirk.

Vimy Ridge was an impregnable fortress. One peculiarity of the terrain was that there was a great amount of a particular type of chalk or limestone through which the Germans were able to tunnel and bring forward their supplies to the ridge. Not only was the ridge dominated between 1914 and 1917 by the German forces but its fortifications were continually strengthened. It was attacked three times before the Canadians attacked. The French tried on two occasions and then the British tried. The French sustained at Vimy Ridge over 150,000 casualties.

The Canadians captured Vimy Ridge, this impregnable fortress, over the very bodies of the French and the British buried in the soil. I wonder whether this is something we sometimes forget. The experience I had last Saturday night listening to the reminiscences of the men who fought there and about their comrades who were left behind in France is one I shall remember for a long time.

Vimy Ridge was the first staggering blow that the German land forces received. It was the first punch under which they reeled back. This was in part due to the sentimentality and esprit de corps of the particular units under which many of the soldiers fought and unfortunately died. To the heroes of Vimy Ridge belong the honour and the glory of fighting together as a complete line, as a complete force. For the first time in the war the first, second, third and fourth divisions fought on the battlefront approximately six miles long. I suggest that this was really the first baptism of fire for Canadians as a group and was the consolidation of our Canadian spirit. It was here that we found our identity in the crucible of a war where men fought and died in the trenches and on the fields. This was the first trench warfare of any importance and it was fought often in mud and mire, stained by the blood of their fallen comrades.

The air force was there too. Can anybody forget Billy Bishop and Alcock? Yes, Mr. Chairman, we also had a navy. Perhaps it may be a little discomforting when we recall these events to realize how much we owe to these people. During the second world war the navy and air force also played an active part and covered themselves with glory.

Yes, we are concerned about the morale, the esprit de corps of the air force, the navy and the army just as we are concerned about that spirit in our schools, universities and colleges. Universities feel it necessary to keep their identities as separate entities. Families have a tradition of going to a certain university. Because on my mother's side my people were Scottish Presbyterians I went to Queens. No other university, to my people, was just like Queens though all universities tried to teach and did teach the same things. The Grants and Gordons of undying fame as principals were there. We also had Guy Curtis who made the football team a legend. Many a football game has been won by the inspiration of singing ballads to commemorate Guy Curtis. The memories of the Batstones, the Leadleys and the McKelvies are traditions at Queens.

One may ask, what has that to do with this bill? Simply this. When you unite the infantry, the air force and the navy you may find yourself with a force without tradition or loyalties. That might well mean the difference between defeat and victory in combat. Above all, what do you do with the young men and women of Canada who express a preference for the navy, the air force or the infantry? Canada is a big country, the second biggest country in the world. Will we in effect reduce our forces to the status of brush fire fighters?

Mr. Hellyer: I answered that question yesterday.

Mr. Rynard: The minister will have to keep on answering it. Do young Canadians want to join that type of league? Do we want a glorified police force or do we want an army, an air force and a navy proud of their traditions, proud of the heroes of Vimy Ridge, and proud of Bishop and Alcock? Do we not want to be proud of the navy that helped keep the sea lanes open in the last war? The nephew of a former prime minister of this country was a doctor in the navy and paid the supreme sacrifice in the Atlantic when his ship was torpedoed.

I do not believe that unification will lead to a force our people will be proud of. As a matter of act, unification will leave us confused. When some persons talk of a British mini-navy, mini-air force or mini-army, it is not clear what is meant. Similarly, it is not clear what is meant by unification.

One ought to keep in mind that Canada is a maritime nation. That may sound strange, but a map will show that we are almost surrounded on four sides by water, having the Atlantic on the east, the Pacific on the west, the Arctic ocean to the north and the great lakes to the south. In view of that it is necessary to have the three separate forces and particularly to retain the navy. It must be remembered that every seagoing man is a fighter. Even if a man is a cook, at sea he will fight when the occasion arises.
